Surprise Retiree Raises The Stakes Of Battle To Come (WP) . 114
Interest Groups Mobilize For Court Push (AP-Y2) 115
Contentious Hearings Ahead As O'Connor Resigns (FT) 116
Battle Begins For O'Connor's Successor (MINNST) 117
Corporate America, Organized Labor Have Own Views On Vacancy (KRT) 118
Process Won't Be Business As Usual (LAT) 119
O'Connor Held Balance Of Power (NYT) 120
In The Center, Hers Was The Vote That Counted (WP) 122
Analysis: Last Day Reflected O'Connor's Legacy (PPG) 125
O'Connor Leaves Bench In Limbo (DMN) 127
Justice O'Connor Had Pivotal Role In Big Rulings (WT) 128
O'Connor's Independent Voice Made Her A Pivotal Figure (KRT) 129
Sandra Day O'Connor To Retire (TIME) 131
O'Connor Known For Pragmatic Style (AP-Y2) 131
O'Connor Leaves Legacy As Key Swing Vote (AP-Y2) 132
O'Connor Leaves ... (LAT) 133
A Dedication To Excellence From A Jurist Without Precedent (WP) 133
Timeline: Sandra Day O'Connor's Key Decisions (WP) 136
Opinions By Justice Sandra Day O'Connor (NYT) 137
A Look At Major Decisions In Which O'Connor Played Key Role (KRT) 139
A Look At How Justice O'Connor Voted (AP-Y2) 140
Reaction To O'Connor Resignation (AP-Y2) 141
Personal And Political Concerns In A Closely Held Decision (NYT) 142
O'Connor, First Female Justice, Retires From Supreme Court (KRT) 143
Rehnquist's Future Still In Question (AP-Y2) 145
Bill Clinton Poses Social Security Remedy (AP-Y2) 145
Democratic Group Plans Quirky Campaigns (AP-Y2) 146
Drug Lobby Got A Victory In Trade Pact Vote (NYT) 147
Bush Names Kelliher To Head Energy Panel (LAT/BLOOM) ... 149

DOJ_NMG_0000612

Lawmakers Agree On Road Spending (WP/AP) 149
Pentagon Is Asked To Justify Parts Of Base-Closing Plan (NYT) 149
Panel Targets More Bases For Closure (AP-Y2) 150
In Mississippi, Soaring Costs Force Deep Medicaid Cuts (NYT) 151
Sweeping Medicaid Cuts Hit Missourians (REU-Y2) 152
Medicaid Cuts Hit Missourians (KCS) 152
Tutors' Zeal Based On Faith (WT) 154
Senate Keeps 'Bunker-Buster' Program Alive (AP-Y2) 154
Senate Votes To Shut Down Laser Meant For Fusion Study (NYT) 155
Senate Leader Calls For Limits On Drug Ads (NYT) 156
U.S. Economy: Factory Index, Confidence Increase (BLOOM) 156
Heating Demand Pushes Oil Up $2.25 (NYT) 158
U.S. Stocks Gain On Manufacturing Report; Shares Of GM Advance (BLOOM) 158
Dollar Hits High Against Euro On Strong U.S. Economic Data (NYT/AP) 159
Dollar Surges As U.S. Factory, Consumer Indexes Top Forecasts (BLOOM) 160

Other News:

Jury Awards Family $1.95 Million In Dick Schaap's Death (NYT) 161
Climate Plan Splits U.S. And Europe (WP) 161
Scotland Awaits Global Chieftains (FT) 163
Scottish Police Heighten Security Ahead Of Group Of 8 Summit (LAT) 163
G8 Officials In Last-ditch Bid On Africa, Climate (REU) 164
Live 8 Concerts Seek To Change Policies Of Leading Countries (KRT) 165
The EU Problem (KRT) 166
The History Of The European Union (KRT) 167
Film About Despair In South Africa, And School That Offers Hope (NYT) 167
Russia, China Team Up To Assail U.S. Foreign Policy (LAT) ... 169
White House Renews Contact With N. Korea (AP-Y2) 169
US, North Korea Have Contacts (AFP) 170
North Korea Wants U.S. To Withdraw Remark (AP-Y2) 171
Glimpses Of A Hermit Nation (LAT) 171
U.S.: Photo Not Of Iran Chief (LAT) 172
White House Waiting On Iran Leader Facts (AP-Y2) 173
Iranian Leader Denies He Was Among Radicals At Embassy (NYT) 174
Legacy Of Embassy Seizure Fades (WT) 175
For Former Tehran Hostages, A Tangle Of Anger At Both Captors And The U.S. (NYT) 176
Abbas Seeks Cabinet Post For Hamas (LAT) 177
Germany's Parliament Votes Out Coalition (WP) 178
Schröder Loses Confidence Vote; Early Election Is Likely (NYT) 179
Schroeder Orchestrates His Exit As His Party Flounders (LAT) 180
Chinese Harassed U.S. Activist (WP) 181

TERRORISM NEWS:

Negroponte To Review Intelligence Changes (WP)

By Walter Pincus
The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte will review changes made at the Army's National Ground Intelligence Center (NGIC) to address criticism by a presidential commission in March that found there was "gross failure" in the center's analysis of Iraqi arms in 2002, said Gen. Michael V. Hayden, Negroponte's deputy.

Two NGIC analysts, who since 2002 have received annual performance awards, judged in September 2002 that the aluminum tubes that Iraq was purchasing were "highly unlikely" to be used for rocket motor cases because of their "material and tolerances," according to the report of the president's commission on intelligence. The NGIC finding, which the commission termed "completely wrong," bolstered a CIA contention that the tubes were meant for nuclear centrifuges and were evidence that Saddam Hussein was reconstituting a nuclear weapons program.

The NGIC said it discovered its errors before the president's intelligence commission started its review, and as a result "instituted changes to training and procedures to improve analytic products," according to an Army statement delivered in answer to written questions from The Washington Post.

The two civilian analysts responsible for the tube analysis "were instrumental in developing that training and procedure improvement," the Army statement said.

Hayden told reporters Wednesday that the NGIC and two other intelligence agencies cited by the presidential commission -- the Defense Intelligence Agency Humint Service, which handles human intelligence, and the intelligence community's Center for Weapons Intelligence, Nonproliferation and Arms Control (WINPAC) -- would be held accountable for mistakes on prewar intelligence.

"They are doing their own look, and we will do our own," said Hayden, who added that the NGIC's activities fall under the DNI's purview. The House and Senate intelligence committees have also opened inquiries into the NGIC, according to congressional sources.

DOJ_NMG_0000613

The NGIC has a staff of 900 full-time scientists, engineers, intelligence analysts and soldiers, with most of them at a relatively new facility near Charlottesville. It provides analyses of foreign armies, including scientific and technical work on their weapons.

Meanwhile, the NGIC has also been in the spotlight as a result of a controversy involving MZM Inc. MZM is a research company whose government contracting business has come under scrutiny after it was disclosed that its president, Mitchell J. Wade, purchased the California home of Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) for $1.6 million, but shortly thereafter sold it, taking a $700,000 loss.

Cunningham, a subcommittee chairman of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and a member of the Defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, lived on a yacht owned by Wade docked in the Capital Yacht Club on the Potomac River.

A federal investigation is underway covering the Wade-Cunningham house sale, which the congressman last week acknowledged showed "poor judgment."

On Oct. 18, 2002, MZM got the first of what would grow to be a series of orders for NGIC work. This initial one was for a seven-week, $194,000 study analyzing a computer program concept called "FIRES," according to material provided by the Pentagon. FIRES was a program first suggested by an NGIC employee who believed that if U.S. operatives around the world collected blueprints of important buildings worldwide, an important intelligence database could be developed.

At the time, the NGIC's senior civilian employee and executive director was William S. Rich Jr. Rich had been the top civilian official at the NGIC since its inception in 1994. In September 2003, Rich retired from the NGIC and thereafter went to work as senior executive vice president for strategic intelligence for MZM, according to former NGIC colleagues and Pentagon documents. Rich has not returned telephone calls, and MZM has refused to comment on its NGIC work.

Other NGIC employees have been hired by MZM. The former sergeant major at the NGIC, George A. Peeterse, is an MZM vice president. Contacted by telephone at home last week, Peeterse declined to discuss MZM or the NGIC. "We have been told to refer all questions to MZM headquarters in Washington," he said.

Pakistan Nabs 3 With Alleged Terror Links (AP)

Associated Press, July 2, 2005

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) -- Three men suspected of ties to Osama bin Laden's terror network have been arrested in Pakistan, a major newspaper reported Friday.

The suspects were traveling in a vehicle when they were caught Thursday in Mardan, a deeply conservative town in northwestern Pakistan, according to The Jang, Pakistan's largest circulation newspaper.

That is the same region where Pakistani intelligence agents on May 2 caught Abu Farraj al-Libbi, reputedly No. 3 in the al-Qaida terror network.

The Jang said an army officer supervised this operation, but gave no other details.

Sept. 11 Suspect Who Fled Germany Before The Attacks Writes Wife He Won't Return (FINDLAW/AP)

By Claus-peter Tiemann, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, July 2, 2005

(AP) - HAMBURG, Germany-A Sept. 11 suspect who fled his native Germany before the attacks told his wife in an e-mail he would not return for fear of being handed over to U.S. authorities, according to evidence presented at a trial Friday.

Said Bahaji is wanted on an international arrest warrant by Germany on suspicion he helped Sept. 11 suicide pilots Mohamed Atta, Marwan al-Shehhi and Ziad Jarrah as they plotted in Hamburg.

He fled the northern port city shortly before the Sept. 11 attacks and is believed to be in Pakistan or Afghanistan.

His e-mails, intercepted by German security services, were read aloud in the retrial of Mounir el Motassadeq, 31, who is also accused of providing logistical support to the Hamburg al-Qaida cell.

"Nobody can guarantee that I won't land in Guantanamo," Bahaji wrote to his wife in a March 12, 2005 e-mail, referring to the U.S. detention center in Cuba. "I won't turn myself in," he said in another.

In an earlier e-mail, Bahaji seemed to be trying to convince his wife to join him.

"Life with the unbelievers is terrible," he wrote in March, 2004, referring to Germany. "The situation here is good, that means one can live well here."

Other e-mails from Bahaji, a German whose father is Moroccan, have been read out previously in the proceedings against el Motassadeq, as prosecutors try to establish el Motassadeq's connection to the Hamburg cell.

DOJ_NMG_0000614

El Motassadeq was convicted in 2003 of more than 3,000 counts of accessory to murder and membership in a terrorist organization and sentenced to the maximum 15 years. But the conviction was thrown out last year and a retrial was ordered after an appeals court ruled unfairly denied testimony by key al-Qaida suspects in U.S. custody.

A verdict in the retrial is expected in August.

AP: Documents Show Gitmo Inmates Defy U.S. (AP-Y2)

By Ben Fox, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

Military authorities have previously disclosed some incidents of guard retaliation at Guantanamo Bay, which resulted in mostly minor disciplinary proceedings. What emerges from 278 pages of documents obtained by The Associated Press is the degree of defiance by the terrorism suspects at Guantanamo.

The prisoners banged on their cells to protest the heat. They doused guards with whatever liquid was handy — from spit to urine. Sometimes they struck their jailers, one swinging a steel chair at a military police officer.

And the American MPs at times retaliated with force — punches, pepper spray and a splash of cleaning fluid in the face, according to the newly released documents that detail military investigations and eyewitness accounts of alleged abuse.

Some prisoners at the U.S. base in eastern Cuba have gone on the attack, as in April 2003 when a detainee got out of his cell during a search for contraband food and knocked out a guard's tooth with a punch to the mouth and bit him before he was subdued by MPs. One soldier delivered two blows to the inmate's head with a handheld radio, the documents show.

"Several guards were trying to hold down the detainee who was putting up heavy resistance," recounted a translator who saw the incident. "The detainee was covered in blood as were some of the guards."

The soldier who struck the inmate, and was dropped in rank to private first class as a result, described it as a close call. "The detainee was fighting as if he really wanted to hurt us. ... We all saved each other's lives in my opinion," he wrote.

The documents, obtained under a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit filed by AP, are far from a comprehensive look at Guantanamo and do not provide full details about each incident.

Names and some other identifying details have been blacked out by military censors. Handwriting at times isn't legible and pages appear to be missing or out of sequence. In some cases, it is not possible to decipher who did what to whom. Disciplinary measures against the troops were either relatively minor or unclear in some reports.

The internal investigative reports do, however, provide a snapshot of life behind the wire at Guantanamo, depicting a tense, hostile and sometimes chaotic place.

In one of the more serious incidents described in the documents, detainees told guards that an MP threw the cleaning liquid Pine-Sol in the eyes of a prisoner in the middle of one night in January 2004. In a written statement, another soldier said he came in immediately afterward to find what smelled like cleaning liquid dripping from the cell.

"The detainee could be seen rubbing his eyes intensely and moaning in pain," he said.

Documents show that the guard, from the 661st Military Police Company, did not admit throwing the cleaning fluid when questioned about it that night but did say the detainee had spit on him, and may have thrown urine.

A medic on the cell block flushed the detainee's eyes with water, a witness said.

A Department of Defense investigative memo written six months later concluded the soldier had mistreated detainees twice — the second offense involved cursing at inmates — and that his superiors failed to report either episode.

Investigators recommended disciplinary action against the soldier and a probe into why the incident wasn't reported up the chain of command, but the outcome is unclear from the papers.

In a statement to investigators, one service member said he hadn't seen the Pine-Sol incident but noted that U.S. personnel have been taught to use restraint with detainees: "The training we have received here at Guantanamo Bay has always stressed ... that no matter what happens on the block do not retaliate ... it will just get you into trouble."

Still, tensions between prisoners and guards have been high since the first suspects arrived in early 2002, hooded and shackled, mostly from the battlefields of Afghanistan.

The detainees' defiance discussed in the documents ranged from mild — prisoners getting matching haircuts in a show of solidarity or refusing orders to stop practicing martial arts in the exercise yard — to hostile acts like spitting or throwing unknown liquids at the MPs. One soldier used pepper spray on prisoners because, he said in a report to superiors, he feared that the unknown liquids hurled could pose a health danger.

One soldier told military investigators he punched a detainee's face because the man spit at him and hit him as he tried to put him in restraints at the prison hospital in October 2004.

"My instincts took over after the hitting and spitting," said the soldier. Documents show authorities recommended that the punishment include reduction in rank to E-4, loss of a month's pay and extra duty for 45 days, though the outcome is unclear.

DOJ_NMG_0000615

In the prison camp's early days, inmates showed their anger over the heat and the practice of leaving lights on in their cells at night by banging on the bars throughout one guard shift in September 2002, the documents say. One detainee who was believed to be leading the protest threw what an MP said smelled like water from the toilet on him. The MP tried to spray water from a hose in response, but the detainee blocked it with a mat.

The guard who tried to spray the detainee was charged with assault, given a reduction in rank to private first class, which was suspended, and reassigned to other duties at Guantanamo.

In another case, an inmate threw a partially full urine bottle at an MP in May 2002, apparently because he believed the soldier had intentionally kicked his hospital bed. When the soldier threw the urinal back, the detainee grabbed a steel chair and swung it at guards before they subdued him.

A military witness defended the MP, writing: "I believe (name deleted) to be a good and honest soldier ... and just influenced by negative elements among us." The documents don't make clear what punishment, if any, the MP got.

Military officials at Guantanamo did not respond this week to questions about relations between guards and detainees at the camp, which has held some 700 prisoners from 45 countries since it opened. There are about 540 detainees there now.

___

EDITOR'S NOTE: This story is based on information contained in 278 pages of U.S. military documents dealing with investigations of alleged abuse of prisoners at Guantanamo Bay. The Associated Press obtained the documents under a Freedom of Information lawsuit.

Guantanamo Fuels Hatred And Boosts Al Qaeda -report (REU-Y2)

By Sabina Zawadzki

Reuters, July 2, 2005

The United States must close Guantanamo prison, where its treatment of some 500 terrorism suspects encourages hatred toward the West and bolsters Muslim membership of the al Qaeda network, a new report concludes.

The Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) commissioned the report from its human rights representative, Belgian senate president Anne-Marie Lizin, and will vote next week whether to accept its findings.

"A generation of young Muslims, fed on the images of Abu Ghraib, of the treatment reserved for the Guantanamo detainees and rumors about profanation of the Koran, will have filled the al Qaeda ranks and those of other extremist groups," said the report made public on Friday.

"The longer the detention is in the camps the more the hatred against the U.S. and the West becomes anchored in hearts and minds," it said.

"Being fully aware of the U.S. authorities' dilemma between national and world security and long procedures, we recommend terminating the Guantanamo detention facility by announcing a calendar of closure."

In June, the U.S. military described cases of mishandling of the Koran by U.S. personnel at Guantanamo naval base in Cuba, including splashing it with urine and kicking it. Muslims view the Koran as the literal word of God.

U.S. UNDER PRESSURE

The U.S. government, increasingly under pressure at home to close the prison down, has said it is key to protecting the country from further attacks. Last week it said it was addressing abuse claims and holding prison staff to account.

The OSCE, consisting of 55 member nations from Europe, North America and the former Soviet republics, is an organization that aims to maintain security and flag conflicts and human rights issues in its region. The United States is a member.

Guantanamo mostly holds prisoners scooped up in Afghanistan during the U.S. offensive there in retaliation for the Sept. 11 al Qaeda attacks on the United States.

Human rights groups as well as institutions such as the European Parliament and the Council of Europe have criticized the United States for holding detainees there for indefinite periods and not assigning them "prisoner of war" status.

Instead, suspects are labeled "enemy combatants," something the new report called a legal nonentity under international law. If charged with crimes, they stand in front of a military tribunal which can demand capital punishment.

On Thursday, Lizin made news this week when she canceled a meeting in Brussels with the Iranian parliament speaker after the visitor, a strict observer of Islam, said he would not shake hands with the female senate president.

Italian Leader Chastises U.S. In Kidnapping Case In Milan (NYT)

By Elisabetta Povoledo, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000616

Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi demanded Friday that the United States show "full respect" for Italian sovereignty, after summoning the American ambassador and asking him to explain the reported abduction of a Muslim cleric by people associated with the C.I.A.

Mr. Berlusconi told the ambassador, Mel Sembler, that he "demanded full respect for Italian sovereignty from the United States," according to a curt statement released by the prime minister's office. He also reassured Mr. Sembler that relations between the countries remained strong.

Mr. Sembler confirmed to Mr. Berlusconi that the American government's respect was "complete and total, and won't be neglected in the future," the statement read.

Mr. Sembler was summoned to discuss the disappearance of Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr, or Abu Omar, a Muslim cleric who was seized on a street in Milan in February 2003.

Last week, an Italian judge ordered the arrest of 13 people linked to the Central Intelligence Agency on charges of kidnapping Mr. Nasr and flying him to Egypt, where he is still in prison, according to friends. At the time of his disappearance, Mr. Nasr was being investigated by Italian law enforcement officials for possible links to Al Qaeda.

Armando Spataro, the chief prosecutor investigating Mr. Nasr's disappearance, asked a Milanese court on Friday to reassess the position of another six Americans reportedly involved in the abduction, and to issue arrest warrants for them.

The initial arrest warrants placed Mr. Berlusconi's government - which has supported the Bush administration in the Iraq war - in a tight political spot. The war is highly unpopular here, and opponents have jumped on the incident, calling it a major embarrassment whether the government had advance notice or not, and demanding a clarification of the relationship between the United States and Italy.

The rapport between the countries was much strained in March, when United States troops in Baghdad killed an Italian intelligence agent, Nicola Calipari, as he was taking an Italian hostage he had just helped free to the airport. The two governments were not able to agree on what happened that night, and have issued contradictory reports.

On Thursday, Carlo Giovanardi, minister for relations with Parliament, told Parliament that the government had not known anything about the kidnapping in Milan.

Italian opposition leaders dismissed the meeting on Friday as a waste of time. "Berlusconi and Sembler could have spared us this farce," said Pietro Folena of the center-left Olive Tree coalition. The Americans, he said, "hide the truth about Calipari, kidnap presumed terrorists and then give no explanations."

US Wraps Up Joint Military Exercises In Sahara States (AFP)

AFP, July 2, 2005

The US military has wrapped up three weeks of joint exercises in five Sahara nations aimed at honing the skills of the African militaries in a push to prevent remote desert zones from becoming terrorist havens.

Nearly 800 troops under the US European Command (EUCOM) joined the exercises begun June 6 in Mali, Niger, Chad, Mauritania and Algeria and dubbed Operation Flintlock.

More than 2,000 African troops jumped out of C-130 transport planes, practiced marksmanship, learned about "law of the land" warfare tactics that preserve basic human rights during combat and studied orienteering, a US officer said Friday.

"Right now they are more focused on survival than going on the offense, so there needs to be a greater investment of time and energy with the nations on all levels," US Army Major John Silkman told AFP by telephone from Germany, where EUCOM is based.

"Their basic skills were rudimentary, but they understood the immediacy of the situation and the legitimacy of what we are trying to do to help protect their citizens within their borders," Silkman said.

"But we delivered the training we said we would, the countries said they were satisfied and we've built strong relationships. That to me means success."

Military officials from Senegal, Nigeria, Morocco and Tunisia also participated in an anti-terrorism scenario exercise in Dakar that required military cooperation to solve.

Only days before the exercises began, insurgents attacked a Mauritanian military base in the remote northeast on the border with Mali and Algeria, killing some 15 people and injuring 17, according to a Mauritanian government toll.

The raid was claimed by the hardline Algerian Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, which has links to Al-Qaeda and is known to have sent insurgents to the front lines of combat in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Such perceived threats have spurred an increase in US military funding to the Sahara states, which include the world's poorest countries and lack the high-tech equipment used by more sophisticated armies.

From 2007, the United States aims to fund a new Trans-Saharan Counter-terrorism Initiative for 100 million dollars annually for five years to boost the capacity of the region's armed forces.

DOJ_NMG_0000617

But such a militaristic response to the terror threat, without a complementary effort to end the poverty that is among the factors pushing young people towards insurgency, could backfire on the United States, critics such as the International Crisis Group thinktank have warned.

Other US exercises planned in coming months include an aerial training session in internal defense with the Nigerian air force set for late August and a naval exercise in the Gulf of Guinea.

"We have to find common solutions to common problems, and help African countries build better counter-terrorism forces," Silkman said.

"There is no denying the strategic importance of the region and we are only at the beginning of what we need to do here."

Overpopulation Seen Spawning Terrorism (WT)

By Raza Naqvi

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

A report released Thursday by the Population Institute links increases in global terrorism to "unprecedented" population growth in the past 50 years.

Speaking at a press briefing, Werner Fornos, president of the Population Institute, said if population growth remains unchecked in certain regions there could be "serious security consequences" for that region and others surrounding it. Yemen, Palestinian territories and Afghanistan, breeding grounds for Islamic terrorists, have some of the highest growth rates in the world, he added.

"Particularly in Palestine, many women turn suicide bombers," Mr. Fornos said. "[Population congestion] leaves young women convinced this is what they need to be active in."

According to the Population Institute report, entitled "Breeding Insecurity: Global Security Implications of Rapid Population Growth," the world's population will increase from 6.5 billion today to 9.1 billion by 2050, with most of the increase occurring in developing countries.

Aside from the security threat, the Population Institute's report highlighted a number of other political crises that could mushroom into global security threats.

"Revolution and other manifestations of political unrest are likely to originate within groups of youth looking to change the current political system," Mr. Fornos said. The report says 40 percent of the world's population is under the age of 20, the vast majority of whom live in developing countries.

The other major concern arising from population growth is the scarcity of fresh water to support it.

"Currently, about a third of the developing world's population lives in countries with severe water stress," the report states. "As the populations of countries sharing water grows, water shortages will become inevitable."

Mr. Fornos added that the world's population currently has to share 1 percent of the Earth's water supply.

The report cites a number of government reports since the Nixon era that have linked overpopulation to potential terrorist breeding grounds. According to the Population Institute study, "Vice President George H.W. Bush's 1976 task force on terrorism report, youth bulges and youth unemployment were recognized as demographic detriments of terrorism." Youth bulges are caused by "the combination of high fertility rates and declining infant mortality rates," both symptomatic of excess population growth.

The issue of population growth is not receiving the attention it merits, according to Mr. Fornos. At a poorly attended press conference, he regretted not being invited to the White House and other Washington policy institutes.

"Terrorism is not the major problem in the world today," he said. "Terrorism and population growth are important."

The United Nations Population Fund recommended $1.5 billion is needed to adequately tackle the problem, but last year's contribution to the U.N. fund was only $500 million, ironically the largest single contribution to date.

PATRIOT ACT:

Patriot Misfire (WP)

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

THE VOTE BY the House of Representatives last month to block use of a provision of the USA Patriot Act against libraries and bookstores sends a powerful message of bipartisan anxiety about the Bush administration's approach to terrorism. Unfortunately, that message is something of a misfire. Attached to an appropriations bill, the amendment by Rep. Bernard Sanders (I-Vt.) responds to a provision that, while imperfect, makes a good deal of sense and about which there is no evidence of abuse. The administration's response was characteristically hyperbolic: The Justice Department warned that Mr. Sanders's amendment would carve out "bookstores and libraries . . . as safe havens for terrorists and spies, who have, in fact, used public libraries to do research and communicate with their co-conspirators." But on the merits, the provision is not one that merits particular concern -- and a spending bill, in any event, is a ridiculous means of improving it.

DOJ_NMG_0000618

The provision in question, Section 215 of the Patriot Act, allows the FBI to get an order from a special court in national security cases to force the production of business records and other documents. The provision does not deal specifically with libraries or bookstores; indeed, the Justice Department says it has never used it to get library or bookstore records and, as of the end of March, had used it only 35 times for any purpose. What's more, the power it grants is largely redundant; the FBI can get that same material using a grand jury subpoena. Although there are procedural differences between the two mechanisms, these differences do not seem hugely significant either from an investigative or from a civil liberties point of view. In fact, in some respects, the procedure under Section 215 is more protective than a conventional subpoena.

Section 215, which, like the rest of the Patriot Act, was passed in haste, could stand improvement. The mechanism for challenging an order under it in court should be made explicit, for example, and it ought to be clarified so that the secrecy associated with orders issued under it does not impede communication between a recipient and his or her lawyer. But the department supports such changes, which would merely codify rules it already observes in practice.

Even if cutting off money were a reasonable way to improve the law, the substance of Mr. Sanders's amendment makes little sense. The amendment would prohibit spending on Section 215 orders for records from libraries or bookstores. But the privacy interest in such records, while real, is not obviously stronger than the comparable privacy interest in medical, credit card or other business records. And, of course, barring production orders under the Patriot Act would not protect libraries from having to turn over those same records under other laws.

If this vote signals that the House of Representatives is truly interested in acting to protect civil liberties, a whole host of issues awaits its attention. But Section 215 of the Patriot Act shouldn't be high on its list.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Mall Crowd To Undergo 'Emergency' Evacuation (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

The sprawling crowds on the Mall for Monday's July 4 fireworks display will participate in the first major test of Washington's downtown emergency evacuation routes since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, officials said yesterday.

Starting 15 minutes after the fireworks show ends, police officers are to direct tens of thousands of pedestrians and motorists leaving the Mall to seven evacuation routes, in which green and red traffic signals will be extended to four minutes. The test will last 45 minutes.

"This is a major step forward in emergency transportation planning, which we hope we never have to use for real," Dan Tangherlini, the District's director of transportation, said in a statement, adding that the test "will show how traffic and pedestrians are affected and how our transportation systems work in an emergency."

The routes in "Operation Fast Forward" include Constitution Avenue between 15th and 23rd streets NW; Independence Avenue between Third Street and Washington Avenue SW; and 14th Street between Pennsylvania Avenue NW and C Street SW.

Department of Transportation officials will observe the evacuation from the command center in the Frank D. Reeves Municipal Center on 14th Street NW, watching televised images from some 50 traffic cameras at the intersections. To replicate emergency conditions, officials will alter the timing of the traffic signals using laptop computers.

Douglas Noble, the department's chief traffic engineer, said the agency will view the test as a success if "we have an uneventful and quick exiting for people leaving the event. We will have collected information in terms of how well this works in getting people out of the city."

Law enforcement and transportation officials across the region have struggled since 2001 with the logistics of evacuating Washington during a terrorist attack. Concluding that the region's roads and transit network cannot accommodate an evacuation of the entire city, officials have focused on moving smaller groups from specific locations.

Metro estimates that more than 300,000 spectators traveled underground to last year's Fourth of July celebration, which was marred by rain. More than 500,000 people rode Metro to the fireworks display the year before.

About 125,000 vehicles -- more than a sixth of the number that drive city streets during a weekday rush hour -- are expected to travel downtown for the event, said John B. Townsend II, a spokesman for AAA Mid-Atlantic.

DOJ_NMG_0000619

Recalling the panic downtown on Sept. 11 as people tried to leave the city, Townsend said that conducting the test on a holiday weekend is an effective way to "approximate what you have on a good workday in D.C."

The test would help motorists leave the area more quickly, he said, as well as demonstrate how officials can improve evacuation plans.

"It's a litmus test for how the situation will work during an emergency," he said.

The list of downtown evacuation routes also includes Ninth Street between Pennsylvania Avenue NW and Interstate 395; South Capitol Street between Washington Avenue and M Street; Washington Avenue between Independence Avenue SW and South Capitol Street; and Third Street between Constitution Avenue NW and Independence Avenue SW.

Protocol Changes Still Have Loopholes (WT)

By Robert Redding Jr.

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

A top D.C. official said a newly created federal emergency protocol will not resolve communications problems between city officials and the U.S. Capitol Police, which is headed by the Metropolitan Police Department's former No. 2 officer.

Edward D. Reiskin, deputy mayor for public safety and justice, said the protocol establishes notification procedures between the Department of Homeland Security and D.C. officials.

But an evacuation of the Capitol on Wednesday and a similar incident in May that left city officials in the dark were directed by Capitol Police, who do not figure in the protocol.

"They don't control the legislative branch," Mr. Reiskin said. "It's a totally different animal of government. It's not monolithic."

Capitol Police Chief Terrance W. Gainer has not returned calls requesting comment. He was the executive assistant chief of the Metropolitan Police Department from 1999 to 2002, when he took charge of the force that secures congressional buildings.

According to the new protocol, a police officer at Homeland Security's Operations Center is supposed to contact the police department, which then contacts the D.C. Emergency Management Agency (EMA). The EMA then notifies the mayor and other city officials.

D.C. fire department spokesman Alan Etter said Wednesday that the FBI notified the head of his department, and Metropolitan Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said he learned of the event after receiving a page from police headquarters.

Chief Ramsey said he now is considering placing a police officer at the Capitol Police command center, in addition to an extra officer at Homeland Security's Operations Center and one at the Transportation Security Administration.

Mr. Reiskin yesterday said he did not know why a communications line between Capitol Police and EMA did not work or was not monitored on Wednesday.

The same line was described as being a live feed by EMA Director Barbara Childs-Pair last month.

Mr. Reiskin offered no details about the protocol's revisions, which D.C. officials submitted Thursday to Homeland Security.

"We expanded it," he said. "What they had originally put in place was specifically for airspace violations. We just made it a little more generic to cover all violations."

Homeland Security officials could not be reached for comment.

This is the first time there has been a major revision of the protocol between the District and Homeland Security since the department was established following the September 11 terrorist attacks.

On Wednesday, a private plane drifted into restricted D.C. airspace, prompting an evacuation of federal buildings. A similar event occurred May 11.

It was not clear yesterday whether the pilot of Wednesday's errant flight, Scott Murwin of Athens, Ga., will face charges.

WAR NEWS:

President Visits Injured Troops (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

President Bush expressed his gratitude to the nation's men and women in uniform yesterday, praising them for "laying the foundation for peace for generations to come."

Bush visited 37 soldiers wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan and being treated at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington.

"Every time I come here, I am struck by the remarkable resolve and courage of the men and women who are treated here," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0000620

Presidential spokesman Scott McClellan said one soldier who had lost a leg struggled to rise so that he could stand at attention to salute Bush. The president "shared some tearful moments with the family members of the soldiers. He also shared some laughs with them and a lot of hugs," McClellan said.

Bush spent an hour and a half going from room to room, meeting with the soldiers and their families.

Afterward, he urged Americans to celebrate the Fourth of July holiday by showing their support for U.S. servicemen and women. He suggested flying the American flag or writing a letter to a soldier overseas.

Bush also awarded five Purple Hearts to four soldiers -- one was wounded twice and received two awards.

Bush's visit comes three days after he rejected calls from critics to set a timetable for withdrawing troops from Iraq. During his speech to the nation Tuesday night, he also urged Americans to be patient in the face of fading support from the public.

Walter Reed has treated more than 4,200 patients from the Iraq war, 1,150 of them with combat injuries, and more than 300 wounded troops from Afghanistan.

Gunmen In Iraq Kill Aide To Cleric (WP)

By Andy Mosher

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

Gunmen assassinated an aide to Iraq's most prominent Shiite Muslim cleric on a street in central Baghdad on Friday, and a Sunni Muslim cleric was kidnapped shortly after in the same neighborhood, according to Iraqi security officials.

In the face of these and other sectarian attacks, Muslim preachers used sermons at Friday mosque services to call for an end to violence.

Police said Kamaleddin Ghuraifi, a Baghdad representative of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, was gunned down on his way to Friday prayers at al-Doreen Mosque on Haifa Street, a dangerous area where Iraqi and U.S. officials say order is gradually being restored by Iraqi security forces. Two of Ghuraifi's bodyguards also were killed, according to a spokesman at Sistani's headquarters in Najaf, the Shiite holy city 90 miles south of Baghdad.

"We cannot protect every scholar of Sistani. They number in the thousands," the spokesman said. "We accuse the extremists. This is not the first time they have targeted a Sistani scholar."

Later, gunmen entered a nearby Sunni mosque during Friday prayers and abducted the preacher, Amr Tikriti, police 1st Lt. Mohammed Hiyani told the Associated Press. It was not clear whether the kidnapping was related to Ghuraifi's killing.

Also on Friday morning, a driver detonated a car bomb outside an office of Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari's Dawa party, one of the principal groups in the Shiite coalition that holds a majority of the seats in Iraq's National Assembly. The attack killed the driver of the car and a bystander.

Conflict between Iraq's majority Shiites and the Sunni Arab minority that wielded power until the fall of President Saddam Hussein in 2003 has flared since Jafari's Shiite-led government was formed in April.

The country's nearly two-year-old insurgency, which is driven by Sunni religious radicals and secular Sunnis loyal to Hussein, has included assassinations of political and religious leaders in the Shiite community as well as bomb attacks on Shiite neighborhoods. Sunni leaders have accused the Shiite-dominated security forces of using security crackdowns to settle sectarian scores.

Since mid-June, Shiites have suffered the brunt of the violence. Another Sistani representative, Samir Baghdadi, was shot dead last week in Baghdad, and on Tuesday, Dhari Fayadh, a Shiite and the oldest member of the National Assembly, was killed by a suicide bomber.

"The sectarian war is escalating, and the objective is to draw the Shiites into civil war," warned Jalaladeen Sagheer, a Shiite cleric, in his Friday sermon at Baghdad's Buratha Mosque. He urged listeners not to use violence, because "if catastrophe struck, it would devastate everything. No one will benefit from it except the enemies of Iraq."

In the southern city of Karbala, another Shiite cleric, Mohammad Hussein Almeedy, denounced the insurgents' tactics. "What is the moral and religious justification for killing innocent Iraqis who are Muslims?" Almeedy asked in his sermon. "How can they justify the killing of women, children and old persons?"

Efforts by U.S. and Iraqi military forces to drive insurgents out of towns in western Iraq continued Friday. About 1,000 U.S. Marines, soldiers and sailors and 100 Iraqi troops conducted a fourth day of search operations in the town of Hit, about 95 miles northwest of Baghdad. The Marines said in a statement that the push, called Operation Sword, was continuing to meet little resistance.

Less than a mile north of Hit, the statement said, Marines and sailors found 15 roadside bombs -- 13 of them placed along an 800-yard stretch of road. "The insurgents had attempted to attach several of the bombs together in order to make a larger explosion and increase the blast radius of the bombs," the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0000621

In Ramadi, a city 60 miles west of Baghdad, residents directed police to a spot where the bodies of three men -- described as a Saudi, a Jordanian and a Kuwaiti -- had been dumped out of a pickup truck, according to Iraqi army 1st Lt. Hussein Fadhil Alwan. The residents said the dead men were members of al Qaeda in Iraq, the guerrilla group led by Abu Musab Zarqawi.

Later, a statement posted at a mosque in Ramadi by Zarqawi's group accused a local tribe of the killings and warned: "We promise a fast and very swift punishment for this tribe because of what they did. They are apostates from Islam -- they should be killed."

Top Shiite Cleric's Aide Killed, And Shiite Office Attacked (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

A senior aide to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric, was gunned down on his way to Friday Prayer in Baghdad, and a suicide car bomb exploded near the office of a major Shiite political party, an Interior Ministry official said Friday.

A few hours after the killing of the aide, Sheik Kamaleddin al-Ghuraifi, bullet holes could be seen scattered across a fence, and blood smeared the pavement inside a cordon of police at the scene, in the Allawi Al Hilla neighborhood in Baghdad. Residents said Mr. Ghuraifi died immediately, and the ministry official said four other people also died in the shower of bullets.

The car bomb exploded in the Mansour neighborhood of Baghdad at 1:35 p.m. on Friday, only a few minutes after the killing of Mr. Ghuraifi, outside an office belonging to the party led by Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. The Interior Ministry official, who insisted on anonymity, said one guard had been killed and two wounded in the blast.

In Kirkuk, a roadside bomb exploded near a public bath, wounding two people, and gunmen killed a woman driving near a large mosque in the center of town, said Col. Taha Muhammad, a member of the city police force. The motivation for the attacks was not immediately clear.

An attack about 7 a.m. shut down the Kharkh water treatment plant, which supplies most of Baghdad's drinking water. The attack hit an electrical substation that powers the plant, setting it on fire and causing damage that will take at least three days to repair, said Abu Haqi, an Electricity Ministry engineer.

The Kharkh has been struck repeatedly, most recently two weeks ago, placing great pressure on Baghdad's mayor, Alaa al-Tamimi, and the American forces to carry out repairs and keep the plant running.

Master Sgt. Greg Kaufman, a spokesman for the Third Infantry Division in Baghdad, said the fire was centered on the power distribution control room at the substation. He said that investigators had found unexploded ordnance around the site but that any connection between the ordnance and the attack was still undetermined. "I'm sure that's what they're investigating," he said.

Also on Friday, American marines said they were investigating the death of an Iraqi civilian that occurred last Saturday during raids of houses near Haditha, a city in the troubled Anbar Province in western Iraq.

According to an account by relatives of the dead man, Muhammad al-Sumaidai, marines entered the house, in the village of Shaikh Hadid, shortly after 10 a.m. Marines asked if the family owned any weapons and Mr. Sumaidai took them to a back bedroom, where, according to the family, a rifle was kept. Family members were asked to wait outside the house, while Mr. Sumaidai remained inside.

About an hour and a half later, the marines left, and family members found Mr. Sumaidai dead in the house, with a single bullet wound in his neck, said Samir Sumaidai, the dead man's cousin, who is serving as Iraq's ambassador to the United Nations.

The military said in a statement that the events, as described, "roughly correspond to an incident involving coalition forces on that day in that general location," and that it had started an investigation. Last Friday, a day before Mr. Sumaidai's death, Yasser Salihee, an Iraqi correspondent for Knight Ridder, was shot and killed by an American sniper while Mr. Salihee was on his way to get gas to drive his family to a swimming pool, the news agency said. That death is also under investigation by the military.

Though Iraqis die daily in attacks by insurgents, as well as in shootings by Americans and Iraqi troops that are often a result of split-second misunderstandings, the American military has refused to release the numbers of Iraqi civilians killed.

Gunmen Assassinate Aide To Leading Shiite Cleric In Iraq (KRT)

By Leila Fadel

Knight Ridder, July 2, 2005

An aide to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's leading Shiite Muslim cleric, was assassinated Friday in central Baghdad in the latest attack on leaders of Iraq's Shiite majority.

DOJ_NMG_0000622

Kamal al-Deen al-Ghuraifi was walking from his home to the Al-Karkh mosque to give a sermon, but before the imam could get there, a car sped up the wrong side of the road. Four men with Kalashnikovs leaned out the window and sprayed him and his guards with bullets, said Police Maj. Abdul Wahab Ahmed, the officer in charge of the investigation.

Al-Ghuraifi died instantly from the four bullets that pierced his body. His bodyguards were injured. One was his son.

Only 40 minutes later and about 55 yards up the road, a group of gunmen stormed into the Sunni mosque Saad Bin Abi Waqas. As Sheik Amer al-Tikriti began his sermon, they dragged him from the pulpit and kidnapped him.

"It was one man for one man," Ahmed said.

Al-Ghuraifi was the sixth representative of al-Sistani's to be killed in Baghdad since the new government took office on April 28, according to al-Sistani's office in Najaf.

The seemingly eye-for-eye actions Friday afternoon reflected the growing sectarian violence and political tensions in the nation.

In further violence, a car bomb exploded outside of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari's Dawa party office, killing one bystander and injuring another.

"Terrorists are trying to create sectarian sedition here in Iraq by killing the religious figures from both the Sunnis and the Shiites," said Haitham al-Husseini, a spokesman for Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, a leader of the Shiite political party the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

Meanwhile, Sunnis have threatened to boycott the constitutional committee if their list of names to participate in drafting the constitution isn't approved this week, said Dr. Saleh al-Mutlak, of the Sunni National Dialogue Committee. Al-Mutlak is on the list submitted to help write the constitution. Sunni participation in writing Iraq's constitution is considered key to getting the document accepted by the Sunni minority, from which most of Iraq's insurgents have come.

Also Friday, wide swaths of the capital were without drinking water for the second time in two weeks. A fire at a purification plant in Tarmiyah, just north of Baghdad, caused the shortage, according to the Interior Ministry. It's unclear how the fire started.

Iraqis already deal with scarce electricity in sweltering heat and sewage problems. When they leave their homes, though, they risk their lives; if they aren't hit by a car bomb or an improvised explosive device, they may be mistaken for insurgents and get shot.

In other violence, a political satirist on the government-owned Iraqia television station was kidnapped and killed in Mosul.

Police found Khaled al-Attar's body riddled with bullets, said Ghazi Faysal, the manager of the Iraqia network in the north.

Senior Shi'ite Cleric's Aide Slain Near Baghdad Mosque (WT)

By By

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

Gunmen killed an aide to Iraq's most influential Shi'ite cleric and two bodyguards in a drive-by shooting outside a Baghdad mosque yesterday.

Elsewhere in the capital, a car bomb exploded near a checkpoint outside the offices of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari's Islamic Dawa Party, killing one person and injuring at least four more, officials said. Mr. al-Jaafari was not there at the time, party official Ayad al-Nedawi said.

Shi'ite cleric Kamal Ezz al-Deen al-Ghuraifi, an aide to leading Shi'ite cleric Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Husseini al-Sistani, was shot as he was about to leave al-Doreen mosque after leading prayers, according to his son, Hamid Kamal. Police confirmed the attack.

Two bodyguards were killed and another four were wounded, he said.

Mr. al-Ghuraifi, in his 60s, had been a Baghdad representative of Ayatollah al-Sistani for the past decade, said Amer al-Hussaini, a friend of Mr. al-Ghuraifi's.

It was the third attack on Ayatollah al-Sistani's aides in recent weeks.

In the attack on the Islamic Dawa Party offices in Baghdad's Mansour neighborhood, the suicide bomber detonated the car near a checkpoint about 80 feet from the building, which used to be Mr. al-Jaafari's house.

Interior Ministry administrative affairs undersecretary police Maj. Gen. Adnan al-Assadi had left the building about a half-hour earlier, police said. A neighbor was killed and four armed guards for the compound were wounded.

Meanwhile, a roadside bomb targeting a U.S. Marine convoy in the Anbar provincial capital of Ramadi instead killed two civilians and wounded two others, said 1st Lt. Blanca Binstock, a spokeswoman.

Another roadside bomb missed a U.S. military convoy in the New Baghdad district but killed a civilian and wounded three others.

In western Iraq, U.S. Marines conducting raids aimed at disrupting foreign fighter networks defused nine roadside bombs yesterday, a day after a light armored vehicle struck a mine, wounding six Marines, a company commander said.

DOJ_NMG_0000623

A supply convoy entering the city of Hit found the roadside bombs spread along 500 yards of a major artery, and Marines participating in Operation Sword traced trigger wires to a school, said Maj. Steve Lawson of the 3rd Battalion, 25th Marine Regiment.

Marines finished searching houses for weapons yesterday morning in 122-degree heat and began foot patrols in the city, about 85 miles west of Baghdad in volatile Anbar province. The operation began Tuesday with more than 1,000 U.S. troops and Iraqi soldiers.

Maj. Lawson said his company detained 10 suspected insurgents, and one of its tanks killed a man moments after they saw him trigger a roadside bomb.

A fire at a power station that supplies a Baghdad waterworks shut down the facility, leaving millions of people without drinking water, officials said.

The blaze came a day after Baghdad Mayor Alaa Mahmoud al-Timimi decried the capital's crumbling infrastructure and the lack of clean water and threatened to resign if the Iraqi government did not provide more money.

Iraqi Seeks Probe Of Killing (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

Iraq's U.N. ambassador Friday accused U.S. Marines of killing his 21-year-old cousin "in cold blood" during a June 25 raid in a village in the Sunni Muslim-dominated province of Anbar.

Samir S.M. Sumaidaie called on the United States to investigate the death of Mohammed Sumaidaie in "a credible and fair way to ensure that justice is done." He said the killing represents a "betrayal" of Iraqi and U.S. efforts to rebuild Iraq on a foundation of "freedom, democracy and respect for human rights and the rule of law."

The allegation comes as the United States is trying to persuade Iraq's Sunni Muslim community, which provides the largest base of support for the insurgency, to break with Islamic extremist elements in Iraq and participate in the country's political transition. The U.S. military has held a series of private meetings this summer with insurgent leaders to convince them to back the political process.

A spokesman for the U.S.-led multinational force in Camp Fallujah, in the heart of Iraq's Sunni region, issued a statement saying an inquiry had been launched into the incident, noting that the "allegations roughly correspond to an incident involving coalition forces" in the area on June 25.

"We take these allegations seriously and will thoroughly investigate this incident to determine what happened," said Maj. Gen. Stephen T. Johnson, commanding general of Multi-National Force-West. The investigation could take several weeks, according to the statement.

According to a witness account compiled by Sumaidaie, U.S. Marines and Iraqi Army units were conducting a joint series of raids June 25 in the town of Haditha. At 10 a.m., 10 Marines searching for weapons knocked on the door of Mohammed's father's house.

Mohammed, described as a "relatively shy" engineering student, "greeted them pleasantly" and led them to his father's bedroom, where the family stored an old rifle filled with blanks, according to the account.

His relatives say they do not know exactly what happened next, but they say that several family members, including Mohammed's mother, were gathered in the hallway and heard a thud in the bedroom. Meanwhile, according to Sumaidaie's account, one Marine dragged Mohammed's younger brother, Ali, through the house by his hair and beat him.

The family was asked to wait on the porch while the Marines continued searching the house for another hour, the account said. When they finished, an interpreter for the Marines asked Mohammed's mother in Arabic whether it was her son in the bedroom. The account said he told her, "They killed him!"

"In the bedroom Mohammed was found dead and laying in a clotted pool of his blood," according to the account.

Sumaidaie wrote in a statement released Friday: "If that account is broadly accurate, and I have absolutely no doubt that it is because I made sure of it, a serious crime has been committed. All indications point to a killing of an unarmed civilian -- a cold-blooded murder."

The United States' acting U.N. ambassador, Anne W. Patterson, expressed "heartfelt condolences" to Sumaidaie and asked the U.S. embassy in Iraq and senior Pentagon officials "to look into the matter immediately," said Richard Grenell, spokesman for the U.S. mission to the United Nations.

"The situation is obviously just terrible," Grenell said.

A Scotsman With The Gifts Of Gab And Jab (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

DOJ_NMG_0000624

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

INCORRIGIBLE to the core, George Galloway is used to being threatened, ousted, libeled, filleted in the press and just plain reviled.

Over the years, the grand-père terrible of British politics has been called corrupt and treacherous; labeled an apologist for Saddam Hussein, a claim he forcefully rejects; portrayed as a Louis Vuitton-toting Socialist; and dismissed as a self-aggrandizing Labor Party turncoat.

"I could show you my scars," Mr. Galloway, 50, said from inside the ramshackle room where he sat, the stubby end of his Montecristo cigar a reassuring arm's reach away. "I am swimming against the stream. As Dr. Johnson once said, 'The grimmest dictatorship is the dictatorship of the prevailing orthodoxy,' and I am fighting that orthodoxy. It's not that I relish it. It's that I am not afraid of it."

But since his appearance in May before the United States Senate Subcommittee on Investigations, where to the delight of many here and in America he flung scorn at two senators over Iraq, vilification has shifted to a modicum of admiration (even if it is grudging, at least in Britain).

Mr. Galloway, who is accused by the Senate subcommittee of enriching himself through the scandal-plagued oil-for-food program, volunteered to testify. Then, he swiftly turned the tables, he said. Entering the room, "not as the accused, but as the accuser," he ripped into the senators for ignoring central questions about Iraq and conducting what he called "the mother of all smokescreens."

He was embraced by the antiwar movement. Mr. Galloway, a gifted orator with a flair for the verbal showdown, says he is planning a speaking tour of the United States in September, challenging Americans to challenge their leaders more forcefully. Here at home, his House of Commons e-mail box had to be shut down for a spell, after it buckled under the heft of thousands of messages; most came from America, and some were sent by the family members of dead and wounded soldiers, he said. Letters also poured in.

President Bush's supporters, on the other hand, took a different view of his performance; they called him a rude, wrong-headed troublemaker. A "loudmouth Scot," said a Fox News commentator, John Gibson.

"I think I burst a bubble that had been waiting to be burst, a very toxic bubble," Mr. Galloway said. "The powerful in the United States, the elite, speak to themselves. They rely upon the most base electoral tactics, not to mention billions of dollars, to get themselves re-elected. That succeeds, but it doesn't persuade.

"And from the point of view of the British people, the British people have been heartily sickened by the obsequious way the British politicians have been behaving towards the United States elite for a very long time." He added, "And I touched that nerve there."

Mr. Galloway, a left-wing member of the House of Commons, has long been called "Gorgeous George," for his attachment to well-tailored suits, Cuban cigars and bronzed skin.

A one-time Michelin tire factory worker from Dundee, Scotland, he developed a passion for the Arab world by accident when, in 1975, a Palestinian student leader turned up one day at the local Labor Party office. Nobody else was around, so he talked to Mr. Galloway, and by the time he left, Mr. Galloway was ready to march, shout and speak for the Palestinian cause. An interest in other Arab issues soon followed.

Mr. Galloway has also made sport of angering Prime Minister Tony Blair. As Mr. Blair and President Bush prepared for war with Iraq in 2003, Mr. Galloway became one of their chief critics, mercilessly disparaging both as misleading the public into combat. In one interview for Abu Dhabi television after the invasion of Iraq, Mr. Galloway said the two leaders attacked Iraq "like wolves." Mr. Galloway then wondered, on tape, "Where are the Arab armies?"

Mr. Galloway was expelled from the Labor Partly shortly thereafter, following what he terms a "show trial" for making "prejudicial" remarks.

Despite the expulsion, Mr. Galloway won re-election to the House of Commons in May as a member of Respect, a Socialist party he founded with an antiwar focus. He managed to steal away a Labor seat in a Muslim neighborhood, mostly because the incumbent had voted for the war. The race was described in the press as the nastiest and rawest of the year.

AS his appearance before the Senate showed, Mr. Galloway is as pugnacious as ever, and as certain as ever that he is being proved right every step of the way. "Who today denies the centrality of the Palestinian question to the stability of the world?" he said. "And who now doubts what we said about the war in Iraq? It took longer to be vindicated on Palestine than Iraq, but vindication on both, I'm sure, is there."

Among the things that most deeply offend him about Mr. Bush's war calculus is the "disinformation," he said, the unraveling of a script intended to frighten and provoke.

"If you look at the most immediate lie, it was the lie he told the American armed forces that they would be received as liberators. They said implicitly that the Iraqis would throw flowers and rice at them, when in fact they are throwing something much more red hot and razor sharp. Nearly 1,700 have paid with their lives, 16,000 have been wounded and nearly 1,500 are disabled forever."

"The second most profound untruth that was told, and deliberately implied when not told, was that Iraq was in some way responsible for 9/11 and that Iraq was connected to Al Qaeda," he added. "I said over and over again, and the antiwar movement said, there is no Al Qaeda movement in Iraq, but there will be if you invade it. It will be a honey pot for every extremist in the world. These people are descending like spores on Iraq, and they will infect the whole area, and one day they will leave that area and hurt us."

But, the biggest whopper of an "untruth," he said, was "that invading and occupying Iraq would make the world safer, when any fool could see it would make the world more dangerous. Only a mad person could look at Iraq today and say things are better off."

The press, too, played a disheartening role in the march to war, he said. "They tamely regurgitated the arguments."

Now, "the Americans are sunk in a very deep swamp," Mr. Galloway said. "It is costing the taxpayers billions of dollars, soldiers are dying like flies and they are stuck there."

There are many who disagree with Mr. Galloway's conclusions and cite recent developments in Lebanon, Libya and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as proof that the Iraq war and an increased American pressure for democracy have borne some fruit in the region. Nevertheless, a growing number of people now view the war and the occupation with a jaundiced eye.

As for the dust-up in the Senate, Mr. Galloway said he was thrilled to speak his mind and, as one journalist here put it, flaunt his "gift of the Glasgow gab."

HE had "underestimated the American people," he said, and overestimated the competence of American politicians.

"I am searching for words that are not insulting. I was very underimpressed," Mr. Galloway said. "I think America treats politicians like nobility, and that's certainly not how they are treated here." A result is that American political arguments are "not properly tested."

For example, a few Americans who sent e-mail began by apologizing for not knowing his title and for calling him Mr. Galloway, "like they should be saying the right honorable."

Then he smirked, and added, "This is quite amusing, because Mr. Galloway is usually the nicest thing I am called."

'Get Out, You Damned One' (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

President Bush has the bully pulpit, but Saddam Hussein has the hot novel. Bootleg copies of his latest work are selling briskly in the Middle East, and not just because of the free publicity he got when Jordan banned it this week. Say what you will about Saddam, he knows his audience.

The critics have not been kind to the prose and the plot, but they miss Saddam's strength. He's a marketer. He is said to have finished the novel just as the war was beginning, when American leaders were fantasizing about their troops' being welcomed as liberators. But Saddam knew enough to give his novel a surefire title for the post-invasion era: "Get Out, You Damned One."

It's a naked appeal to xenophobia, an impulse that's far more ancient and widespread than the yearning for democracy that President Bush talked about this week. Yet it's been curiously underestimated by conservatives who used to pay close attention to just this sort of instinct.

When liberal intellectuals dreamed of a socialist world with a selfless "New Man," conservatives realized that he'd be as greedy as ever. When some feminists envisioned the end of gender stereotypes, conservatives insisted there were ingrained differences between the sexes. Yet when American troops met resistance after the war, conservatives dismissed the early insurgents as "dead-enders" and expected Iraqis to join Americans in quickly vanquishing the thugs.

In those early days, when the memory of Saddam was still fresh, you could walk down a street in Baghdad and be greeted by an Iraqi stranger thanking you for bringing freedom. But even back then there were plenty of Iraqis like Saleh Youssef Sayel, who proudly told me of the reaction of his 5-year-old son, Mustafa, to an American soldier.

"The soldier tried to shake his hand, but my son refused," he said. "He knew enough English to say, 'No. You go.' Later he told me he wanted a gun to kill Americans. This is a natural feeling. Nobody wants a stranger in your house or your country."

The natural impulse to dislike outsiders is so strong that it barely matters who the outsiders are.

When experimental psychologists divide subjects into purely arbitrary groups - by the color of their eyes, their taste in art, the flip of a coin - the members of a group quickly become so hostile to the other group that they'll try to deny rewards to the outsiders even at a cost to themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0000626

And when the members of a group really have something in common, like family ties, they're willing to fight outsiders even if it means their own deaths. Xenophobia produced genetic rewards for hunter-gatherer clans. When the evolutionary psychologist J. B. S. Haldane was asked whether he would lay down his life for his brother, he replied, "No, but I would to save two brothers or eight cousins."

Iraqis have their own version of that line: "My brother and I against my cousin; my cousin and I against the world."

Because marriage between cousins is so common in the Middle East - half of Iraqis are married to their first or second cousins - Arabs live in tightly knit clans long resistant to outsiders, including would-be liberators. T. E. Lawrence learned that lesson when trying to unify Arabs early in the last century.

"The Semites' idea of nationality," he wrote, "was the independence of clans and villages, and their ideal of national union was episodic combined resistance to an intruder. Constructive policies, an organized state, an extended empire, were not so much beyond their sight as hateful in it. They were fighting to get rid of Empire, not to win it."

Today's liberators in Iraq like to attribute the resistance to Islamic fascists' fear of democracy and hatred of the West. But those fascists know that an abstract critique of Western ideology isn't enough to attract followers. In their appeals they constantly invoke the need to expel foreigners from their soil, a battle cry that is the great common denominator of suicide bombers around the world.

Maybe, as President Bush hopes, Americans can stay long enough in the Middle East to jump-start democracy and reduce the long-term risk of terrorism. But in the meantime, they're bound to face resistance, no matter how noble their intentions.

During the Civil War, Union soldiers were amazed to see poor Southerners without any stake in the slavery system defending it in suicidal charges. But there was a simple explanation, as a barefoot, emaciated Confederate captive famously put it when a Union soldier asked him why he kept fighting: "Because you're here."

U.S. Searches For Troops In NE Afghan MountainsOfficials Say Team's Fate Still Unknown (WP)

By N.C. AizenmanWashington

WP -- A1 – Afghan Crash, July 2, 2005

U.S. forces continued a massive hunt Friday for a missing military team in the mountains of northeastern Afghanistan, three days after a Special Operations helicopter bringing troops to rescue the men crashed amid enemy fire, killing all 16 service members aboard.

A man claiming to speak for the Taliban militia called news organizations Friday to say that Taliban fighters had captured one of the men and killed seven others. But U.S. military officials said there was no evidence to support the claim. The missing team was made up of fewer than 10 soldiers, one officer in Washington said.

U.S. troops set up a checkpoint in Konar province, near Pakistan. (Reuters)

"All we have to date is that our guys are missing," said Lt. Col. Jerry O'Hara, a U.S. military spokesman here. "We don't have any positive proof that shows us they were injured, they were captured, or they are just in a hiding spot, waiting for our forces."

The incident in Konar province began Wednesday, when a small team of Special Operations forces were hiking through the region as part of Operation Red Wing, a mission against al Qaeda fighters, according to the military officer in Washington. The officer said none of the team members had been found, nor was it known whether any had been killed or captured.

"They could be hiding under a rock, waiting," the officer said. "There's an ongoing operation searching for them."

According to O'Hara, U.S. commanders last heard from the team on Tuesday afternoon after it started taking fire. The downed Chinook helicopter, a Special Operations aircraft, was one of at least two sent to extract the team, O'Hara said.

The Chinook appeared to have been hit by a rocket-propelled grenade as it approached its intended landing site, causing it to smash into a mountainside, Lt. Gen. James T. Conway, director of operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told reporters Thursday.

He said the troops on board -- eight members of a Navy SEAL team and eight Army airmen -- appeared to have died in the crash. On Thursday, U.S. forces were finally able to reach the site and recover the bodies, but the ground team was not found in the area.

O'Hara said "all available assets" were being used to find the men, but that the search had been hampered by the steep, forested terrain and the possibility that "at any turn the search can turn into a fire fight if we encounter enemy forces."

Military officials said it was unclear who had fired on the helicopter. In addition to al Qaeda fighters, insurgents linked to the Taliban militia and Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, a fugitive former Afghan official, are also reportedly operating in the area.

The incident came as U.S. and Afghan forces face growing violence from insurgent groups that appear to be numerous, well-equipped and intent on undermining Afghanistan's modicum of stability after two decades of civil strife, foreign military occupation and religious repression.

DOJ_NMG_0000627

At the same time, an increase in street crime, gang violence, kidnappings of foreign aid workers, murders of Afghans who support the U.S.-backed government and continued high levels of drug crop cultivation and trafficking have added to a sense of insecurity in the country. Afghan officials have been struggling to rebuild their country since the Taliban militia was ousted by a U.S.-led military campaign at the end of 2001.

U.S. Troops Still Missing After Crash In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Still searching for a small reconnaissance team, hundreds of United States troops swarmed the mountainous terrain of eastern Afghanistan on Friday, near where a helicopter was shot down on Tuesday, killing all 16 aboard, military officials said.

The helicopter, a Chinook MH-47 with Navy Seal commandos and other Special Operations personnel aboard, was flying in to extract the reconnaissance team during a battle with insurgents suspected as members of the Taliban and Al Qaeda, said Lt. Col. Gerry O'Hara, a military spokesman at Bagram Air Base north of Kabul. The Chinook came under small-arms fire and was hit by a larger projectile, most likely a rocket-propelled grenade, and crashed, the military has said.

Ground troops and aircraft were searching the steep wooded mountainsides of Kunar Province for the team but still had not located them by sundown on Friday, Colonel O'Hara said. "We are using all available assets to work the search for our missing," he said.

A spokesman for the Taliban, Abdul Latif Hakimi, said earlier in the week that Taliban fighters had killed seven American "spies" on Tuesday.

In another telephone conversation, he told Reuters on Friday that the Taliban had captured one American soldier. Some of his earlier claims have been unreliable, but his announcement that the Taliban had shot down the helicopter on Tuesday proved correct. He told Reuters that the American was captured Wednesday by a Taliban fighter as he was climbing a hill to get away from the crash site.

There was no evidence to suggest that the men in the missing unit were injured or dead, Colonel O'Hara said.

On Thursday, American troops secured the crash site, recovered the 16 bodies and began an investigation of the crash, the military has said.

Another United States serviceman disappeared Saturday when his Humvee slid down a steep river embankment in the same area of eastern Afghanistan and is now the subject of a search-and-rescue mission in the same area.

Troops have been engaged in a broad anti-insurgent operation, named Operation Red Wing, in the region all week but there was no fighting reported Friday, Colonel O'Hara said. "There has been no contact from the enemy directed at our forces today," he said.

Violence did, however, erupt in Uruzgan Province in central Afghanistan, where Taliban rebels kidnapped and killed nine tribal officials, according to an unidentifed Afghan official cited by The Associated Press. The Taliban then sent a boy with an offer to exchange the bodies for those of dead militants, the official said.

In the last three months, about 465 suspected insurgents, 43 Afghan policemen and soldiers, 125 civilians and 29 American troops, including the 16 in the helicopter crash, have died in the fighting, according to a tally by The A.P.

The 16 fatalities in the helicopter crash represent the single heaviest combat loss in the three and a half years of war in Afghanistan. In recent months, the Taliban have staged a resurgence, and American forces have ventured into particularly remote areas to root them out.

They have encountered hardened fighters, most of them Afghans but some foreign fighters, including Arabs and Pakistanis. There have been signs that the guerrillas have been receiving outside financing, equipment and weapons, military officials have said.

The Pentagon said that the dead in the helicopter crash included seven soldiers from an Army Special Operations aviation unit from Hunter Army Airfield, Ga.; one soldier from a Special Operations aviation unit from Fort Campbell, Ky.; and eight Navy Seal personnel from units in Norfolk, Va., and San Diego.

U.S. Forces Scour Afghan Mountains For Missing Unit (MINNST/AP)

By Daniel Cooney, Associated Press

Minneapolis Star Tribune, July 2, 2005

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN -- U.S. forces scoured rugged Afghan mountains Friday for an elite U.S. military team missing in the same area where a U.S. helicopter was shot down. A purported Taliban spokesman claimed insurgents captured one of the men.

DOJ_NMG_0000628

In central Afghanistan, Taliban guerrillas kidnapped and killed nine tribal leaders and sent a boy to offer to exchange the bodies for those of dead militants, an official said. The tribal leaders were among 25 people killed in three days of fighting in Uruzgan Province -- yet another troubling sign of violence as September elections near.

The missing military team in the remote eastern mountains worsened the already stinging blow suffered by the U.S. military after 16 soldiers were killed Tuesday aboard the MH-47 Chinook chopper.

U.S. forces were using "every available asset" to search for the missing men, military spokesman Lt. Col. Jerry O'Hara said. "Until we find our guys, they are still listed as unaccounted for and everything we got in that area is oriented on finding the missing men," he said.

The missing troops are a small special-operations unit, said military officials, speaking Friday on the condition of anonymity because rescue operations were still underway. Though the team has been missing since Tuesday, the military had refrained from discussing their situation to prevent the Taliban from setting out in search of them.

The downed helicopter had been sent to pick up the soldiers Tuesday when it went into the mountains near Asadabad, close to the Pakistani border, O'Hara said.

The Taliban claim to have kidnapped one of the men came from purported spokesman Mullah Latif Hakimi. "One high-ranking American has been captured in fighting in the same area as the helicopter went down," he told the Associated Press. "I won't give you any more details now."

Reacting to the claim, O'Hara said, "We have no proof or evidence indicating anything other than the soldiers are missing."

Hakimi, who also claimed insurgents shot down the helicopter, often calls news organizations to take responsibility for attacks, and the information frequently proves exaggerated or untrue. His exact tie to the Taliban leadership is unclear.

The loss of the helicopter and its complement follows three months of fighting that has killed about 477 suspected insurgents, 47 Afghan police and soldiers, 134 civilians, and 45 U.S. troops.

Remnants of the former Taliban regime have stepped up attacks, and there are disturbing signs that foreign fighters -- including some linked to Al-Qaida -- might be making a new push to sow an Iraq-style insurgency.

US Team Missing In Afghanistan After Chopper Crash (AFP)

AFP, July 2, 2005

US forces searched for a small reconnaissance team which has been missing since a helicopter sent to extract them was shot down in Afghanistan, as the Taliban claimed they had captured a US soldier.

Ground troops combed a mountainous, wooded area of militant-infested Kunar province in eastern Afghanistan around the crash site to find their comrades, US spokesman, Lieutenant Colonel Jerry O'Hara, said.

Sixteen personnel, including eight US Navy SEALs, were killed when their MH-47 Chinook crashed after being hit by what is believed to be a rocket propelled grenade on Tuesday. The ousted Taliban have claimed responsibility.

"The helicopter went in to lift them (the reconnaissance team) out of that area. We have not located them as of yet, but we are doing active patrolling to find our missing US service members," O'Hara told AFP.

"All available assets are being used to find our missing," the spokesman added.

He said security reasons prevented him from disclosing how many personnel were in the missing team or the number of US troops involved in the search operation.

Taliban spokesman Abdul Latif Hakimi said Friday that the rebels were holding a US serviceman and that they had killed seven American "spies" in the area. Earlier this week the militia said the dead men were Afghans.

"Our mujahideen arrested one American soldier alive in the area," he told AFP by satellite telephone from an undisclosed location.

"They have not started interrogating him, that is why I cannot tell you what his name is and what rank and which department he comes from."

Hakimi said they had footage of an exchange of fire with the so-called spies and of the captured American, which would be displayed on the rebels' website www.alemarah.com "tomorrow or the day after".

There was no way of independently confirming Hakimi's account and some of his previous claims have proved to be untrue.

US spokesman O'Hara said he could only confirm that a number of US service members were missing.

"I am not in the business of confirming or denying what the enemy says," he said. "All that I can report you today is they are missing. We have no evidence saying they were captured. We have no evidence saying they are injured."

The US helicopter was the first to be shot down by hostile fire in Afghanistan and the death toll is already the biggest for US forces from a single attack since they toppled the hardline Taliban in late 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0000629

Lieutenant General James Conway, director of operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, told a Defense Department briefing in Washington late Thursday that the helicopter was downed by a "lucky shot".

Recent months have seen an escalating insurgency by the Taliban ahead of Afghanistan's landmark parliamentary and legislative elections in September.

More than 500 people, most of them militants, have died since the Taliban launched the offensive at the beginning of the year.

In southern Uruzgan province 25 people were killed during a week of militant violence, including nine who were killed in an attack on a police post on Friday.

Four policemen and five suspected Taliban were killed in Tabag village in Friday's attack, Uruzgan governor Jan Mohammed Khan said.

Seven Taliban were killed Monday when they attacked a police post in another village 60 kilometers (38 miles) south of provincial capital Tirinkot.

Two days later Taliban rebels attacked the same village and kidnapped nine village elders and a child, accusing them of spying for the US-led forces. Khan said the nine were later executed by Taliban in front of the child.

Names Of Crash Victims Emerge, And Families Mourn (NYT)

By Rick Lyman

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Steve Reich never expressed regret that his promising professional baseball career lasted only two games for a Baltimore Orioles farm team before the Army summoned him back to active duty 10 years ago.

"When the Army said they couldn't spare him, that was it," said Gary Fitzherbert, a longtime friend of the Reich family in Washington, Conn. "No argument. Baseball was a big dream, but it always came second place to the service."

Major Reich, 34, a West Point graduate, was in the command seat of the Chinook MH-47 helicopter that was shot down on Tuesday in a treacherous mountain ravine in eastern Afghanistan, killing him and 15 others trying to relieve a Special Forces team battling resurgent rebels. As the names of the dead began to emerge late this week, families and friends were assimilating the news.

Danny Graves of the New York Mets remembered Major Reich, his fellow pitcher on the U.S. National Baseball Team, for which they played in the early 1990's. "He was so polite and respectful that when he talked everyone on the team kept their mouth shut," Mr. Graves said. "It was like we knew that we had to listen. We were all young, immature kids just dreaming about playing big-league baseball. His dream was to serve his country. You knew a couple of minutes after meeting him that's what he wanted to do and what he was going to do."

American military officials in the Afghan capital said they had confirmed that all 16 on the helicopter died in the crash, which Pentagon officials said had apparently been caused by a rocket-propelled grenade. The victims were seven soldiers from Hunter Army Airfield, Ga.; one soldier from Fort Campbell, Ky.; and eight Navy Seal commandos assigned to units in Virginia Beach and San Diego.

Eight of the names had become public by late yesterday. Pentagon spokesmen said a full list would not be released until all of the families had been notified.

In Honolulu, Robyn Healy, former wife of Senior Chief Petty Officer Dan Healy, 36, said she and their two children had received word of his death on Wednesday. Chief Healy had been a members of the Seals and had spent 15 years in the military.

"He was just a good guy, always joking around," Ms. Healy said.

In Franklin, Tenn., Mayor Tom Miller had a press conference on Thursday to announce that his son-in-law, Sgt. First Class James Ponder III, who was stationed at Fort Campbell, died in the crash. Mr. Miller described his son-in-law, a flight engineer known as Tre, as "not real tall, somewhat thin, but tough as nails."

Sergeant Ponder, 36, joined the Army shortly after graduating from the Battle Ground Academy in Franklin. He left behind a wife and two daughters, ages 6 and 7.

Jim Bowman of Midway, W.Va., said he had been informed that his stepson, Petty Officer First Class Jeff Taylor of Little Creek, Va., was among the dead. Mr. Taylor, 30, was a member of the Seals who left behind a wife, Erin.

The parents of Jeff Lucas, a 34-year-old membersof the Seals from Corbett, Ore., said they had gotten confirmation Thursday that he was among the dead. He had a wife, Rhoda, and a 4-year-old son. "No mountain was too high for him to climb," said Mr. Lucas's father, Rick, in an interview with The Bulletin of Bend, Ore.

Word came from Representative Jon Porter, Republican of Nevada, that Shane Patton, a member of the Seals from Boulder City, Nev., had been killed. Lee Russell of Stafford, Va., said he had received the same news about his 31-year-old son, Master Sgt. Michael Russell of the Army.

DOJ_NMG_0000630

Lt. Michael M. McGreevy's classmates at the United States Naval Academy said there had been no doubt that Mr. McGreevy, a midshipman nicknamed Groove, would end up a commando.

"Everyone knew he was going to be a Seal from the get-go," said t. Randy C. Cruz, who had been class treasurer the year Lieutenant McGreevy had been class secretary.

Classmates remembered Lieutenant McGreevy, 30, as a model Annapolis man, but teachers in Portville, N.Y., his hometown, said he had ended up at the academy by chance.

West Point had been Mr. McGreevy's first choice, said his high school track coach, Gary Swetland. Although Mr. McGreevy had graduated third in his class, both military academies put him on waiting lists. Annapolis called a week earlier than West Point.

"Michael was an outstanding achiever in everything he did," Mr. Swetland said. "But not because he was blessed with the remarkable skills and talents of an athlete. He simply willed himself to be a champion."

Mr. Swetland said Mr. McGreevy had nearly been dropped from the track team as a freshman. But he was relentless and, by graduation, had transformed himself into an award-winning athlete and the top high school middle-distance runner in western New York.

"At the time, I knew Michael was a very good kid, and I was awfully proud of him," Mr. Swetland said. "But as I get older, I realize how very fortunate I was to even know someone like Mike McGreevy."

It was as a member of the Seals that Lieutenant McGreevy eventually settled with his wife, Laura, in Virginia Beach. Neighbors said he doted on his 16-month-old daughter, Molly.

In Washington, Conn., 20 miles northwest of Waterbury, friends and relatives of Major Reich were planning a weekend of memorials for the star who had helped clinch the state baseball championship for the local high school and had become top pitcher on the West Point team.

"This was a kid who everyone was expecting to be invincible, so people are having a hard time believing that he isn't coming home," said Richard C. Sears, the town's first selectman.

A Fourth of July fireworks display will include a flyover by a Chinook helicopter to honor the fallen soldier. On Sunday, a prayer vigil will be held at the First Congregational Church, where Major Reich's mother, an emergency room nurse in nearby New Milford, is a mainstay in the church's quilting club. And on July 10, a memorial service will be held on the lawn of the town hall.

"It's the biggest space we've got here in Washington," Mr. Fitzherbert said. "And we expect tons of people to show up."

Pentagon Implements Higher Death Benefits (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 2, 2005

WASHINGTON - The military announced Friday that it will begin providing vastly increased death benefits to the next-of-kin of military personnel killed in combat zones or combat-related training.

Last month, President Bush signed into law the increase in the death benefit from $12,000 to $100,000. The military announced Friday it was implementing the law.

The increase was part of an $82 billion emergency appropriations bill to fund the war in Afghanistan and Iraq, which also included a provision increasing military life insurance payments from $250,000 to $400,000.

The new benefits are available to the relatives of those killed since Oct. 7, 2001, the day the United States began overt combat operations in Afghanistan. It will take several months to find everyone who is eligible for the retroactive benefit, the Pentagon said in a statement.

More than 1,700 U.S. military personnel have died in Iraq, according to the Defense Department. About 150 have died in Afghanistan and neighboring countries.

Marines Exceed Reenlist Goals (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

Although finding enough recruits continues to be difficult, the Marine Corps has exceeded its goals for persuading Marines to reenlist, officials said Friday.

Lt. Col. Mark Menotti said that reenlistment bonuses, appeals to patriotism and the Marines' sense of camaraderie helped the Corps exceed its goals for reenlisting first-term Marines as well as those serving a second or third tour.

"Marines realize they are part of something special and significant," said Menotti, head of manpower and reserve affairs.

In certain job categories, particularly those needed for combat in Iraq, bonuses exceeded $30,000. The largest of the bonuses are for infantry skills personnel, so-called grunts. Others are for linguists and intelligence analysts.

DOJ_NMG_0000631

The Marine Corps earmarked $52 million for bonuses, up $1 million from the previous year. Two-thirds of the money is for Marines reenlisting for a second tour, one-third for those reenlisting for a third or fourth tour. If troops reenlist while in Iraq, the bonuses are tax-exempt.

As of Friday, the beginning of a new fiscal year, the Corps had reenlisted 5,949 Marines for a second hitch, beating its goal by 0.2 percentage points. It retained 5,079 for a third or subsequent tour, exceeding that goal by 9.4 percentage points.

With many Marines serving multiple tours in Iraq, and more than 500 Marine fatalities there, some officials had worried that the Corps would not be able to meet its reenlistment goals.

Since establishing its annual reenlistment goals — in 1993 for first-term Marines, and 2002 for second- and third-termers — the Corps has never failed to meet them, Menotti said.

Yet for the first four months of this year, the Corps missed its goals for recruits. It was the first time in about a decade that the Corps' recruiting pitch, which dared young people to prove they were tough enough to be Marines, had fallen short.

In May, the most recent month for which the Pentagon has released figures, the Corps exceeded its recruiting goal by 3%, although it fell short of its objective for the reserves by 12%.

Marine Commandant Gen. Michael W. Hagee told a congressional hearing Thursday that the Corps would meet its goal for recruits. "The quality of individuals we are shipping to recruit depots remains high," he said.

On Wednesday, the Pentagon announced that the Army had met its most recent monthly recruiting mark after four months of shortfalls.

In Bid For Recruits, Military Has Allies In Nascar And Fans (NYT)

By Viv Bernstein

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

On most weekends during the Nextel Cup season, as Nascar's premier racing series travels from city to city, a marketing company hired by the United States Army follows, setting up shop outside the racetrack with a free interactive display that attracts thousands of fans.

There is a rock-climbing wall and a pit-crew challenge, where fans can be timed changing tires just as the Nascar teams do. A short film compares the military to Nascar, juxtaposing images of racecars next to tanks. Video games feature combat on an imaginary street where Arabic writing appears on the walls of buildings. Children and adults can stand in a replica jeep and pretend to shoot at the enemy with a mounted laser gun.

"It's an opportunity for them to touch and feel the Army, to give them a real Army experience," Col. Tom Nickerson, who is in charge of the Army's recruiting outreach program, said in a telephone interview.

The displays at Nascar events are generating as many as 1,000 to 2,000 leads for potential new recruits on each racing weekend, said Guy Morgan of Keystone Marketing Company, which operates the display. That amounts to nearly 40,000 leads a year, Nickerson said.

Those leads, culled from releases that fans ages 16-39 must fill out with personal information and sign to visit the display, are coming in at a time when the military has struggled to find recruits.

"If all of our programs were doing as well as our racing program was, we wouldn't have a recruiting problem," Lt. Col. Mike Jones, the National Guard deputy division chief for recruiting and retention, said during a telephone interview. "Obviously, you have to do more than one type of outreach program to be successful in any business. Nascar alone will not fix our total recruiting needs. What Nascar does, it hits that segment of the population that is very pro-military service."

Many Nascar fans drape themselves in the flag, and the sport boasts a long, close relationship with the military. High-ranking officers frequently attend races and are taken behind the scenes, receiving applause when introduced to the drivers at the prerace meetings. Before almost every race, there is a military fly-over during the national anthem.

"I think that Nascar is as much Americana as anything else," Mike Helton, the Nascar president, said Thursday. "I think most Americans, a huge majority, support the military, so I don't think we're exclusive to that.

"You've got a lot of mothers and fathers, brother and sisters, sons and daughters, who are Nascar fans that have family members who either have been military or are currently military. That's as much America as Nascar racing is, and the fan base of Nascar."

Nascar's founder, Bill France, developed that close association with the military from the beginning. But it was not until this decade that the military started marketing itself to the fans.

Now, every branch uses Nascar as a recruiting tool.

The Marines and the Air Force were the first to arrive, in 2000; the Navy came in 2002 with a sponsorship in the Craftsman Truck Series. The Army, which joined the National Hot Rod Association in 2000, added Nascar sponsorship in 2003 along with the National Guard. The Coast Guard arrived in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0000632

The Army has bought sponsorship in a race team - the 01 car driven by Joe Nemechek in the Nextel Cup series. The National Guard is the title sponsor for Greg Biffle. The Air Force is a secondary sponsor of a racecar driven by Ricky Rudd. The Navy, the Marines and the Coast Guard support or sponsor racecars that compete in the Busch Series.

"It's a growing sport, and our target market, age 17-24 males, is pretty much into Nascar," Master Sgt. James Edwards, a spokesman for the Marine Corps recruiting command in Quantico, Va., said in a telephone interview. "We looked at it as an opportunity to get our message out."

Edwards said the Marines were spending $3.6 million to sponsor their Busch racecar this year, although they were meeting their quota for new recruits and did not use the racecar sponsorship to generate leads.

The Nextel Cup Series is much more expensive. Nickerson said the Army would spend $16 million on Nascar this year, including $9 million for the team sponsorship and more for the display and for a sponsorship of Kim Crosby, a female driver in the Busch Series.

That is out of an annual marketing expenditure of $230 million to $240 million.

Nickerson said there were few sporting events that drew 100,000 fans, who often came for a three-day period, arrived several hours before the event and "spend a lot of time just walking around."

"That is a rich environment for soldiers and recruiters to talk to influencers and prospects." Nickerson said. Influencers are parents and others who have influence over a military prospect's decisions.

The National Guard has received significantly more time on television broadcasts because of Biffle's success. The Guard signed on as Biffle's main sponsor in 2004, before he became a top driver. Biffle now has a series-best five victories and leads the Nextel Cup points standings.

The logo on the front of Biffle's No. 16 racecar received the equivalent of nearly $20 million of advertising air time through the first 14 races this season, according to Joyce Julius & Associates, Inc. The company tracks the time a logo is seen on screen during a race or is mentioned, and compares that to the cost of buying advertising time for that event.

Jones said the National Guard would spend $5.5 million this year, having sold secondary sponsorship to other companies such as Subway to lower its costs. The total price of the sponsorship is around $15 million. The Army team, which has not won this season, has received the equivalent of $16 million of air time through 14 races.

The Army uses its sponsorship for more than publicity. At almost every race, the Army also brings in what it calls "future soldiers" - those who have enlisted but not yet reported for basic training and can still walk away from their commitment. The connection helps keep them motivated to report, Nickerson said. The recruits often meet with Nemechek.

"I just tell them how much pride I have in my race team, how much pride our race team has in building the racecars and trying to make our team run well on a weekly basis," Nemechek said in a telephone interview. "I tell them how proud I am of them and the step they're taking in their lives.

"I'm a racecar driver and I am very proud to be representing the Army and representing all these men and women that are about to become or about to get into the Army along with all the soldiers around the world."

Tyler Borck, 18, of Wauseon, Ohio, is not likely to be represented by Nemechek anytime soon. Borck was one of the thousands who visited the Army exhibit before a Nextel Cup race at Michigan International Speedway on June 19.

Borck said he was not worried about giving personal information to the Army. His high school had provided his address to the military. He usually throws away the pamphlets he receives in the mail.

Megan MacDonald, another visitor at the display in Michigan, is planning to go to college but said she is considering the military. The display, including free dog tags, got her attention.

"It's pretty cool," MacDonald said.

The Army will have more opportunities to sway her. The card she signed with her personal information will be added to a large database and sent on to a local recruiter.

DOJ:

Rosenstein Confirmed As U.S. Attorney In Md. (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Staff

The Baltimore Sun, July 2, 2005

In its closing hours before adjourning for a holiday recess, the Senate confirmed yesterday Rod J. Rosenstein, a high-ranking government lawyer who quickly ascended the ranks at the Justice Department, as Maryland's U.S. attorney.

Rosenstein, 40, of Bethesda, could arrive in Baltimore to start his new job as the state's top federal prosecutor as soon as next week.

Rosenstein declined to be interviewed about his plans for the office of 70 attorneys in Baltimore and Greenbelt, saying he is still waiting for President Bush to sign his commission.

He released a brief statement: "I am grateful to President George W. Bush for giving me this opportunity to serve the people of Maryland, and to Senator Paul Sarbanes and Senator Barbara Mikulski for accepting my nomination. I look forward to rejoining the distinguished men and women of the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"As we work to enhance public safety and pursue justice for Marylanders," the statement continues, "we will strive to inspire public confidence by adhering to the highest ethical and professional standards."

Rosenstein had previously worked as an assistant U.S. attorney in Maryland, emerging as the leading candidate to move up when former U.S. Attorney Thomas M. DiBiagio announced his resignation in December. Allen F. Loucks, a deputy in charge of the office's civil cases, has been serving in an interim role since January.

The U.S. attorney's office can be an influential one, using its broad prosecutorial power to tear apart violent drug gangs and dismantle white-collar criminal organizations. In Baltimore, federal prosecutors have intervened in cases - especially those involving witness intimidation - where the city's overwhelmed courts failed to yield convictions.

For more than three years, DiBiagio's office aggressively pursued public corruption investigations, scoring a number of high-profile victories in such cases as investment banker Nathan A. Chapman Jr. and former Baltimore police Commissioner Edward T. Norris, who was Maryland's state police chief when he was indicted.

But DiBiagio received criticism after The Sun published internal e-mails a year ago in which DiBiagio called for three "front-page" corruption indictments before Election Day, prompting Justice Department officials to issue a rare reprimand to the prosecutor.

Loucks replaced DiBiagio and quickly dismissed his predecessor's indictment against a former state official and ended the office's investigation into the financial practices of the Baltimore City Council.

Rosenstein comes to the office with a strong background in public corruption cases, including work on the Whitewater investigation during the Clinton administration. Most recently, he has served as principal deputy assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's tax division.

His nomination by President Bush in May met no opposition and was lavishly praised by those who said Rosenstein mixed legal talent with strong, reformist leadership. At a going-away party at the Justice Department's Great Hall this week, speakers teased the two-time Ivy League graduate - from the University of Pennsylvania and Harvard - for being a "geek," but uniformly lauded his intellect, tireless devotion to his work and open mind.

"He has a sign in his office that says 'Don't tell me what I want to hear. Tell me what I need to know,'" Assistant Attorney General Eileen J. O'Connor, Rosenstein's former boss, told the group of more than 50 colleagues.

Rosenstein's selection appeared to be more a product of his work in and support from the Justice Department, breaking with the tradition of selecting U.S. attorneys who have close ties to Maryland's political establishment. Rosenstein's selection, in the eyes of some, served to distance the office from DiBiagio, who received his appointment with the active support of Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr.

Known by some for his conservative ideological bent, Rosenstein also worked for Whitewater independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr. But Rosenstein, who trained in public corruption cases, left the office before the investigation delved into the relationship between President Bill Clinton and Monica Lewinsky.

Senate Makes It Official For Letten (NOTP)

By Martha Carr, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, July 2, 2005

It's been a good week for Jim Letten.

Not only did New Orleans' top federal prosecutor win a conviction against a Jefferson Parish judge for mail fraud, Letten on Friday finally got word from Washington that the Senate made his appointment as U.S. attorney of the Eastern district official.

Letten, a Republican, has held the post on an interim basis since April 2001, when President Clinton's appointee, Eddie Jordan, stepped down. Until Friday, Letten was one of a handful of the nation's 93 U.S. attorneys serving without White House confirmation.

The straight-laced prosecutor, who is rarely at a loss for words, said he was humbled by the news.

"This is a reminder yet again to me and to all of us that we work for the citizens, and that public service is not a right but a privilege," he said. "The only thing I can promise is that I will continue to do everything I can to continue to earn the community's trust."

Unexpected ascent

DOJ_NMG_0000634

When tapped for the job four years ago, Letten was known as a competent manager with little interest in politics who was expected to return to the ranks of working prosecutors once a more politically connected successor was named.

All that changed when then-Gov. Mike Foster's choice for the post, wealthy Metairie businessman and Bush contributor Fred Heebe, was accused of domestic abuse by his ex-wife and a former girlfriend. Heebe eventually withdrew his name. Disputes within the state Republican Party stalled subsequent attempts to decide on a nominee.

Meanwhile, Letten kept his head down and launched several high-profile corruption investigations, including a probe into the Jefferson Parish courthouse that netted convictions of two judges -- Alan Green at trial last week and Ronald Bodenheimer after a guilty plea -- and separate inquiries into New Orleans City Hall and the city's public school system.

Then, last year, when Republican David Vitter won the U.S. Senate seat vacated by Democrat John Breaux, he announced Letten was his choice for the permanent post. Then it was just a matter of passing through the slow-moving nomination process.

Finally, on Friday, the Senate unanimously affirmed Letten after he won the blessing of its Judiciary Committee earlier this week. Neither vote drew controversy.

"This is great news for Louisiana," Vitter said Friday in a statement. "Through his (Letten's) continued leadership, the U.S. attorney's office will be able to continue the ongoing fight against corruption and cronyism."

Letten, 51, will serve at Bush's pleasure, most likely at least until a new administration takes office in 2009. If another Republican wins the presidency, Letten could retain his post. If a Democrat is elected, Letten likely would be asked to resign, spelling an end to his almost three decades of service to the office. Rarely do U.S. attorneys rejoin the ranks of working federal prosecutors.

Earning respect

A career litigator, Letten is best known for helping convict former Gov. Edwin Edwards on charges that he rigged riverboat gambling licenses.

Since he has been in office, Letten has continued to aggressively pursue government corruption, one of the region's most intractable problems. He also has been successful in rallying the city's various law enforcement agencies toward common goals, including curbing violent crime and drugs. For that, he enjoys an unusual level of institutional respect.

New Orleans Police Chief Eddie Compass put it this way recently : "His integrity is unquestioned, his people skills are extraordinary, and his ability to organize and come up with plans for complex problems are major assets. He doesn't let grass grow under his feet."

After 2 ½ years prosecuting criminal cases for Orleans Parish District Attorney Harry Connick in the early 1980s, Letten joined the federal payroll as part of the Organized Crime Strike Force, a unit that tried a mix of cases in five states, from drugs to gambling to labor racketeering. In 1988, at age 34, Letten became its chief.

He retained that position when the unit merged with the local U.S. attorney's office in 1990, and in 1994, he was named first assistant to Jordan.

. . . . . .

Martha Carr may be reached at mcarr@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3306.

ICE Head Named U.S. Attorney In N.Y. (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Michael J. Garcia, who has headed U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) since the agency's creation in March 2003, has been named by the White House as U.S. attorney in New York.

Mr. Garcia has been criticized by some members of Congress for longstanding budgetary missteps and by ICE supervisors and agents who have complained the agency was a threat to the country's national security efforts because of mismanagement, low morale, a lack of a clearly defined mission and ongoing financial problems.

But the veteran prosecutor, a former assistant U.S. attorney in New York, is expected to win Senate confirmation to the post based on the backing of Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, and New York Gov. George E. Pataki, a Republican.

The post has been held on an interim basis for the past two years by David N. Kelley.

"Assistant Secretary Garcia is honored to be nominated by the president for this important position and looks forward to working closely with the Senate during the confirmation process," ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said yesterday. "In the interim, he will continue to fulfill his responsibilities overseeing the critical work of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement."

DOJ_NMG_0000635

ICE was created following the merger of the U.S. Customs Service, the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and the Federal Protective Service. Criminal investigators from the Customs Service and INS were assigned to the ICE Office of Investigations and given the task of preventing terrorist attacks.

But ICE's ability to gather and share intelligence data, conduct counterterror investigations and enforce U.S. immigration laws has been challenged by both its supervisors and agents.

Many supervisors and agents said in letters and e-mails to Congress that the agency was burdened by a complex and mismanaged administrative system that lacked a definitive mission statement, adding that ICE's investigative efforts had undergone a "functional paralysis."

Noting that while the fiscal 2005 budget called for a $300 million increase, ICE canceled all training, implemented a hard hiring freeze, ordered its cars parked, ended Spanish-language training for investigators and limited spending and investigative activities.

As an assistant U.S. attorney in New York from 1992 to 2001, Mr. Garcia helped prosecute some of the nation's highest-profile terrorism cases. He was a member of the prosecution team that in May 2001 won convictions against four suspected terrorists accused of conspiring with al Qaeda founder Osama bin Laden in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

Mr. Garcia also was involved in the successful prosecution of the terrorists involved in the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center in New York, and he helped prosecute Ramzi Ahmed Yousef and two others on charges of planning 48 hours of "terror in the sky" in a conspiracy to plant bombs aboard 12 American passenger aircraft in the Far East.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Jurors Doubted Scrushy's Colleagues (NYT)

By Kyle Whitmire

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., July 1 - In the end, the jury deciding the fate of HealthSouth's former chief executive, Richard M. Scrushy, focused on one issue: credibility. But it was not Mr. Scrushy's credibility they were thinking about - he did not testify in his own defense. Instead, they wondered, could they believe the five former company executives who testified against him?

"No one really corroborated one another," recalled one juror, Christopher Cooper, a 37-year-old computer technician at a local bank. "Each one of them had a reason to hide something."

The jury acquitted Mr. Scrushy on Tuesday of all 36 counts that had accused him of presiding over a $2.7 billion accounting fraud while running the HealthSouth national hospital chain. The Justice Department, legal experts had thought, appeared to have a strong case against Mr. Scrushy after all five of the company's former chief financial officers agreed to cooperate.

Facing such a cadre of government witnesses during the five-month trial was a daunting challenge, one of Mr. Scrushy's lawyers, James Parkman III, said at a news conference after the verdict.

"We couldn't go in with the idea that there were five of them," Mr. Parkman said. "We had to go in and try to sell the idea that there was only one, and they acted together as one, acted together as a group, and therefore cut that number of five to one."

The one former executive they focused on was William T. Owens, who worked his way up at HealthSouth from assistant treasurer to chief financial officer and even served briefly as chief executive in 2002. The defense characterized him as a tax cheat who would lie to protect himself.

Mr. Owens, in cooperating with the government, had secretly recorded his conversations with Mr. Scrushy. But those recordings were often difficult to hear and ambiguous in meaning, jurors said.

"I can't talk about the federal government, but a pocket recorder could have recorded better than what was on that tape," a second juror, Curtis Bender, said.

Mr. Cooper, the juror, said that he thought another of the chief financial officers, Weston Smith, had been lying to protect his wife, whom some witnesses connected with the fraud. Mr. Cooper also said Mr. Owens hadtransferred many of his assets to his wife before making his plea deal.

The jurors said the plea agreements, rather than strengthening the government's case, made the witnesses' testimony suspect. Before the trial, a federal judge had sentenced Michael Martin, another former chief financial officer, to six months of home detention. The defense characterized the sentence as excessively lenient, allowing Mr. Martin to sleep in his own bed, go to the store and even play golf.

DOJ_NMG_0000636

"They were fooling the public, fooling the stockholders, bankers, auditors," Mr. Bender said. "They fooled a lot of people for a lot of years and got away with it - that's what it seemed like."

But Mr. Bender, 54, a lineman for the Alabama Power Company, added that he could not conclude that Mr. Scrushy had known about the fraud. "That's where the reasonable doubt came in," he said.

Phoebe Ellsworth, a professor of psychology and law at the University of Michigan, said the case was somewhat analogous to one in which a co-defendant might testify in exchange for immunity. "Jurors ask themselves why one guy should be taking all the heat and another guy should be taking very little."

One juror said he thought the prosecution's case was strong enough to convict Mr. Scrushy. But because the juror, Willis G. Vest, 63, was suffering from migraine headaches, he was replaced with an alternate.

"To me, there was more than enough evidence and testimony, but people disagree," Mr. Vest said in an interview after the verdict. "Almost every witness agreed with each other."

Initially, at least, some jurors agreed with Mr. Vest. The first vote taken by the jury was seven to five for acquittal, Mr. Bender said. After further deliberation, a second vote ended with only three holdouts for conviction. In a note to the judge, the jury said that it was deadlocked on all counts.

The judge, Karon O. Bowdre of Federal District Court for the Northern District of Alabama, gave the jury a so-called Allen charge, a special set of instructions emphasizing the resources spent on the trial, with an encouragement to reach a unanimous decision.

"I was feeling like we didn't do our job, that this was the easy way out," Mr. Bender said. "But after she told us to go in there and try to reach a verdict, I was glad because now we could go in there and start deliberating."

After that, one juror changed his mind and Mr. Vest said he began to suffer from the migraine headaches.

The lone remaining holdout, a female juror, whom her colleagues declined to identify, finally gave in during the last four days of deliberation. The final vote, on Tuesday, was unanimous for acquittal.

"It is not surprising that one holdout would eventually agree with the others," Dr. Ellsworth said. "If the other guy had stayed on it might have been a different story, but being a minority of one is very difficult."

Mr. Bender said he went into the trial suspecting that Mr. Scrushy was guilty of violating the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, a law passed by Congress in the wake of the accounting scandals at Enron and WorldCom.

"If he signed that paper, knowingly or not knowingly, I was thinking he was guilty; he's C.E.O. of the company," Mr. Bender said. "But once we got into the courtroom and started reading what the law requires and not requires, it just blew my theory right out."

Shortly before his indictment was unsealed in 2003, Mr. Scrushy left a predominantly white suburban church to attend Guiding Light Church, a large, mostly black congregation in Birmingham. On weekends during the trial, he often preached and made donations at black churches in the area and was the host of a religious television program.

Many of the ministers who appeared on the show also appeared in court, sitting behind the defense table. The jurors, however, insisted that that was never a factor in their deliberations. "I was hoping that Birmingham would not make this into a black or white issue," Mr. Cooper said. "His charitable donations had nothing to do with our decisions. I didn't know much about that until it was over."

Mr. Bender said he nearly missed the birth of his granddaughter during the deliberations, and Mr. Cooper said he had to take a day off when his wife underwent knee surgery.

Now back at work, Mr. Cooper and Mr. Bender said they tried to avoid any questions from co-workers about the verdict. Mr. Bender said some of his co-workers had asked why they let Mr. Scrushy go.

"And then some said, 'What, they didn't have the evidence, right?' " Mr. Bender said. "And I said, 'Yep.' "

New Rules Make It Easier To Charge Executives, But Not To Send Them To Prison (NYT)

By Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Perhaps forcing top executives to certify regulatory filings is not quite the fix lawmakers might have expected.

The acquittal of the former chief executive of HealthSouth, Richard M. Scrushy, on charges that he signed false financial filings - one of several charges accusing him of orchestrating a $2.7 billion fraud - illustrates a weakness of the certification requirements, which compel chief executives and chief financial officers to attest to the accuracy of financial reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Investors might have expected that the certification requirement would make it easier to prosecute white-collar crimes. If all else fails, the reasoning went, at least the executive could be convicted of signing false filings.

DOJ_NMG_0000637

But, in fact, convicting an executive of knowingly violating the certification requirement involves proving the same facts necessary to support other more serious criminal charges.

So while the law may be an easy way to increase prison time, it is not an easier way to lock up executives.

Corporate lawyers said Mr. Scrushy's acquittal on Tuesday was not a setback to enforcement of the certification requirement, which was included in a law passed in 2002 after the collapse of Enron and WorldCom because of accounting scandals.

The requirement is a powerful incentive for executives to do the right thing - violations can result in criminal and civil liabilities. But because of how it is drafted, the requirement has not instilled the fear that lawmakers, regulators and investors might have hoped.

"Effectively, you're going to have to prove an underlying fraud and then prove that the executive knew about it" in order to convict, said David Fine, head of the federal securities and public companies group at Ropes & Gray in Boston. "They effectively have to prove the same general case."

The certification provision, Section 906 of the law known as the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, calls for a prison term of up to 10 years and a fine of up to $1 million for any executive who certifies a regulatory filing and who knows that the filing does not "fairly present, in all material respects, the financial condition and results" of the company. Any executive who willfully - that is worse than knowingly - certifies such false filings faces up to 20 years in prison and a $5 million fine. Section 302 of the law opens up such executives to civil liability.

These are harsh terms, but the crucial element is knowledge, and proving that an executive knew of a fraud is what is often most challenging. If a prosecutor can do that, there are plenty of other criminal charges available in addition to Section 906 - securities fraud, for example, or conspiracy, both of which were charges against Mr. Scrushy.

Once jurors did not find Mr. Scrushy guilty of securities and accounting fraud, Mr. Fine said, it was not surprising that they did not convict him on the certification charge; convicting on one type of charge would require the jury to convict on the other.

"I can't imagine a case where you couldn't prove that the person had engaged in fraud, so you found them not guilty on that count, but then found him guilty" for certifying false filings, Mr. Fine said. "Once you reach that conclusion, you've reached the conclusion on the fraud too."

But the certification requirement can help prosecutors by preventing defendants from arguing that they had no role in preparing a false document, said John T. Bostelman, a partner at Sullivan & Cromwell and the author of a reference on the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

"Certification creates a link between the person and the document," Mr. Bostelman said.

Lance D. Myers, a partner in the New York office of Holland & Knight, said Sections 302 and 906, which certainly grabbed the attention of executives, also emphasize a responsibility in preventing fraud and raising the potential penalty for participating in fraud. The acquittal of Mr. Scrushy, he said, "is not going to have the effect of saying, now C.E.O.'s can go back and act with impunity."

But there is still plenty of uncertainty about what constitutes a violation of Section 906, lawyers said.

"Here's my question, Is reckless disregard the equivalent of knowing?" Mr. Myers said. "Can you put your head in the sand and say I didn't know? Is there a duty to inquire?"

Lawyers have advised executives for years not to focus too much on the certification requirement, Mr. Fine said.

"We're certainly counseling our clients to be careful, to be honest, upright, all the rest," he said, "but we're also telling them that it's not a new and unique liability that's been imposed."

Besides, Mr. Fine added, top executives are supposed to be comfortable that their companies' regulatory filings are accurate. "The C.E.O. and the C.F.O. were supposed to be doing that anyway."

US SEC Warns Investors On Internet 'Auto-trading' (REU-Y2)

Reuters, July 2, 2005

U.S. market regulators warned investors on Friday to be wary of a new type of online investment vehicle and filed civil fraud charges against a small Internet investment advisory firm called Terry's Tips Inc.

The Securities and Exchange Commission accused Terry's Tips, based in Vermont, and its founder Terry Allen of promising clients misleadingly large investment returns in marketing the firm's auto-trading programs.

Auto-trading is a new investment vehicle that is spreading fast on the Internet, said Kenneth Israel, district administrator of the SEC's Salt Lake district office.

Investors typically are asked to subscribe to online newsletters and open trading accounts at a brokerage chosen by the newsletter's publisher. Investors are then asked to give the publisher authority to automatically direct trades in the their brokerage accounts, the SEC said.

DOJ_NMG_0000638

Both the newsletter subscription and the auto-trading arrangement typically involve the investor paying fees to the publisher, the commission said.

After an account is set up, the publisher sends trading instructions by e-mail or fax to the brokerage and only tells investors about trades after they have been executed.

The SEC charged Terry's Tips in U.S. District Court in Vermont with violating antifraud laws. The agency alleged that as recently as September 2004, the firm had 1,200 auto-trading clients with total assets of over $14 million.

An attorney for Allen and the firm declined to comment.

"In this case, what we allege is Terry's Tips was promising returns of about 100 percent a year when they were actually losing substantial amounts of money," Israel said.

The SEC action seeks a permanent injunction against the firm, repayment of ill-gotten gains and a monetary penalty.

"Investors should be careful when they give this kind of authority to trade in their account to anyone," Israel said.

Banker Convicted In Enron Barge Fraud Is Ordered To Prison (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

HOUSTON, July 1 (AP) - The former head of investment banking at Merrill Lynch & Company, who was convicted last year in Enron's bogus sale of power barges to the brokerage, must report to prison for a two-and-a-half-year term later this month, a judge has ruled.

The executive, Daniel Bayly, of Darien, Conn., the most prominent figure among the four former Merrill executives and a former midlevel Enron executive convicted last year, will be the first to begin his sentence. He must report July 14 to a federal prison in Hopewell, Va., according to a judge's order filed Friday.

The order came after Judge Ewing Werlein of Federal District Court denied a request that Mr. Bayly remain free on bond pending an appeal of his conviction of conspiracy and fraud.

Mr. Bayly and four others were convicted of helping push through Enron's sale of power plants mounted on barges in 1999 to help Enron appear to have met earnings goals.

Jurors determined the sale was a loan because Enron had promised to buy back or find another buyer for the barges within six months.

Enron kept that promise when a partnership run by the former Enron finance chief, Andrew S. Fastow, bought out Merrill's interest in the barges.

One of Mr. Bayly's co-defendants, James A. Brown, also of Darien, Conn., had been scheduled to report to prison this month to serve a term of 3 years and 10 months.

But his surrender date was moved to Aug. 12 after his 22-year-old son was critically injured in a car accident.

The judge has yet to set surrender dates for the other defendants - the former Merrill executives, Robert Furst and William Fuhs, and the former Enron executive, Dan Boyle.

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Lawyer Companies Love To Hate (NYT)

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

SITTING in the back of a town car this past Wednesday, as his driver pulled away from the federal courthouse and headed toward his hotel in Midtown Manhattan, William S. Lerach reached for a ringing cellphone in the pocket of his natty suit. How had his day gone, asked the person on the other end. "We went two for two," said Mr. Lerach, the most aggressive, feared and controversial plaintiffs' lawyer in the land. "It was a good day."

No, he didn't mean he'd won two cases - but what he'd won was almost as important. In two hearings, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, Mr. Lerach's San Diego-based firm, had been named lead counsel. For Mr. Lerach - indeed, for every big-time lawyer who makes his living suing companies on behalf of an aggrieved "class" of shareholders - being named lead counsel is the key to everything. The lead counsel controls the case. He negotiates the fees. And best of all, the lead counsel takes most of the lawyer's cut: 20 percent to 30 percent of whatever he ultimately extracts from the big bad corporation.

Of course you can't become lead counsel in a securities fraud case unless you're representing some shareholders who have been hurt by a company's misdeeds. And it now appears that Mr. Lerach's courting of shareholder plaintiffs has landed him in hot water with the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0000639

Late last week, a federal grand jury indicted Seymour M. Lazar, who had long been - how to put this nicely? - a regular in the stable of Mr. Lerach's former firm, Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach. (Last year, Mr. Lerach and Melvin I. Weiss, a co-founder of Milberg Weiss, split the firm in two. Mr. Weiss's firm, based in New York, is now known as Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman.) The government contends that over the years, Mr. Lazar received some $2.4 million in kickbacks from Milberg Weiss for lending his name to literally dozens of stockholder class-action lawsuits brought by the firm. Mr. Lazar's lawyer maintains that his actions were "ethical and appropriate." While neither has been charged, both Mr. Lerach and Milberg Weiss have denied any wrongdoing. Typically, though, Mr. Lerach's camp has been the more aggressive in pushing back.

The people in Mr. Lerach's camp have been quick to cast the investigation as politically motivated, an example of a pro-business Republican administration going after a scourge of corporate wrongdoing - and a big contributor to the Democrats to boot. Besides, doesn't Mr. Lerach currently have a shareholder suit against Halliburton, one that even points the finger at its former chief executive, Vice President Dick Cheney? Hasn't he extracted so far $4.7 billion for the beleaguered shareholders of Enron, the company once run by President Bush's old friend "Kenny Boy?"

Mr. Lerach's lawyer, John Keker, said in a statement that "Bill Lerach has done more to protect shareholders than this S.E.C. and the Department of Justice combined"- and made ominous references to Mr. Lerach's "powerful enemies."

While I have no way of knowing whether Mr. Lerach is innocent of the charges he may soon face - or whether the investigation is politically inspired - I do know that Mr. Lerach is hardly a candidate for canonization. For much of his career, he made his living playing a dirty game.

He would watch for the stocks of companies to drop, especially volatile high-technology stocks that missed their earnings estimate, and then he would round up a small shareholder like Mr. Lazar and race to the courthouse to be first in line to file a suit seeking class-action status. And then, usually with little else to go on, he would essentially torture the company with discovery motions and deposition requests and legal filings until it finally settled to make him go away.

And he was so gleeful about it! And so taunting! And so vindictive! He sued 3Com five times. Intel, too. He would tell executives of the companies he was suing, "I'm going to take away every penny you own." Once when Alan Shugart, the C.E.O. of Seagate Technology, which was being sued by Mr. Lerach, started a campaign against "abusive litigation," Mr. Lerach sent him a note that said, "Dear Al: More is coming."

John Doerr, the Silicon Valley venture capitalist, has called Mr. Lerach "a cunning economic terrorist."

In 1995, Congress passed the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, whose purpose, in part, was to put Mr. Lerach out of business. Under the new law, in order to be named lead counsel, it no longer mattered if you arrived at the courthouse first with a suit; what mattered was whether your client was a big shareholder who had lost a lot of money. The law also made it much more difficult to sue companies simply because they reported bad news and their stock prices went down. Plaintiffs' pleadings had to have some, you know, facts.

For a while Mr. Lerach floundered. Other firms quickly forged alliances with big pension funds and stopped filing frivolous lawsuits, searching instead for actual fraud. Mr. Lerach, meanwhile, had his own troubles to deal with, especially a lawsuit brought by an expert witness who testified for the defense in shareholder lawsuits, and who asserted that Mr. Lerach had tried to litigate him out of business. Milberg Weiss wound up paying $50 million to settle the case.

But Mr. Lerach eventually figured out how to make his way in this new environment. Which is why, when Enron came along, a real fraud by any reckoning, he could claim the University of California Regents as his client, and land the coveted lead counsel spot.

If Mr. Lerach's pre-1995 behavior shows him at his worst, the Enron case shows him at his best. Put aside his flamboyant histrionics - Mr. Lerach surrounded by cameras, holding a box of "the shredded evidence," as he called it. Focus instead on his legal tactics. The money Mr. Lerach has won for shareholders has come largely from the banks and investment banks - including Citicorp and J. P. Morgan Chase, which recently settled with Mr. Lerach for $4.2 billion combined - that did Enron's bidding. (And there are more banks, including Deutsche Bank and Credit Suisse, that will probably be settling with Mr. Lerach in the not-too-distant future.)

Yet he has won this money despite a clear-cut 1994 Supreme Court decision that banks cannot be held liable for aiding and abetting a securities fraud - something they clearly did in the Enron fraud. Knowing this, Mr. Lerach cleverly wrote a 500-page complaint that never once used the words "aiding" or "abetting," but asserted instead that the banks and Enron had "schemed" together to defraud investors.

Larry E. Ribstein, a law professor at the University of Illinois, called Mr. Lerach's brief "a masterpiece: he made the most convincing case that could be made." By the time all the banks he's suing have settled, Mr. Lerach will have probably generated upward of $6 billion for shareholders, and he'll keep 8 percent of that. (He cut his usual fees to get the case.)

DOJ_NMG_0000640

In his town car, I asked Mr. Lerach about the effect of the 1995 law. His answer was not surprising. "I think the law contributed to the scandals," he said flatly. "When the new law was passed, some very fine cases got thrown out. That emboldened executives."

To which I say, "Baloney." The 1995 law did exactly what it was supposed to do. It made it much more difficult to win the kind of lawsuits that used to be Mr. Lerach's stock and trade: the ones that were never about corporate wrongdoing, but were about cost-benefit analysis. Much of the fraud now being prosecuted took place because we were in a bubble, and greed overtook fear. And strangely, the law wound up helping Mr. Lerach, because when the big cases like Enron came along, he had one of the few plaintiffs' firms with the money and talent and wherewithal to run with them. He finally got to play the good guy for real.

And yet I couldn't help noticing that even now, Mr. Lerach's firm files a lot of lawsuits that seem to be based on not much more than some bad news and a big drop in the stock price. Eastman Kodak, OfficeMax, DreamWorks SKG and dozens more companies are facing that kind of lawsuit from him. He also has a new version of the small shareholders he used to have in his hip pocket: various plumbers' and pipe fitters' unions in places like Tennessee and Kentucky.

Mr. Lerach gave an unapologetic shrug when I asked him about these suits. "We like to have a lot of cases," he said. "That's our business model. It keeps you sharp. It's good training for your young lawyers." He described some of his competitors in the plaintiffs' bar, the ones who stick to big institutional clients and only file lawsuits against the likes of American International Group and WorldCom - as "living off the low-hanging fruit."

With that, Mr. Lerach hopped out of the car and walked into the hotel. The old dog knows some new tricks. He really does. His problem now is that he can't stop using the old ones.

Government Sues Maker Of Body Armor (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

The government on Friday sued the top U.S. supplier of bullet-resistant police vests and the Japanese manufacturer of the vests' protective synthetic fiber, contending they conspired to hide evidence that the body armor could be defective.

Second Chance Body Armor Inc. of Central Lake, Mich., and Toyobo Co. knew that the vests' ability to stop bullets was overstated, but Second Chance sold them anyway to local, state and federal police, according to the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Washington.

The government also alleged that the companies kept silent for nearly three years in the face of mounting evidence that the Zylon fabric degraded faster than they acknowledged when it was exposed to light, heat and humidity.

Only after an Oceanside, Calif., police office was killed and a Forest Hills, Pa., officer was seriously wounded while wearing Second Chance vests made of Zylon in June 2003 did the company stop selling certain models and disclose safety problems, the lawsuit said.

Second Chance executives also ordered the destruction of internal memos, including one that urged the company to take corrective action and not wait until an officer was killed, the lawsuit said.

Second Chance and Toyobo blamed each other Friday for problems with the vests. "Second Chance was the bad actor, not Toyobo," said Kent Jarrell, a spokesman for Toyobo.

Mary Ann Sabo, a Second Chance spokeswoman, said Second Chance has been working closely with the Justice Department and expects to be vindicated. Sabo said Toyobo "is ultimately responsible for the problems with Zylon."

Questions about the vests, initially praised for their strength and light weight, were first raised by a whistle-blower, Second Chance's former director of research and development.

Second Chance is facing more than a dozen suits by states, police agencies and individuals. Last week, the company acknowledged that the Zylon vests may not be safe and urged its customers to replace nearly 100,000 vests that had not previously been recalled.

A company lawyer has said Second Chance did not recall its remaining Zylon vests because the company did not have the money to replace them. The lawyer said it was possible the company could tap a federal body-armor fund to replace the vests.

The company, now going through reorganization in federal bankruptcy court, earlier recalled more than 130,000 vests.

Second Chance also is suing Toyobo, which is a defendant in some of the other suits.

Toyobo has acknowledged that the fiber loses up to 20 percent of its durability within two years of manufacture. But the company has said Zylon works well in body armor that is properly constructed, and it contends it is not to blame for any problems with Second Chance vests.

___

On the Net:

DOJ_NMG_0000641

Second Chance Body Armor: http://www.secondchance.com
Toyobo Co.: http://www.toyobo.co.jp/e/
Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov

Cianci Asking U.S. Supreme Court To Review His Conviction (PROJO)

By Tracy Breton, Journal Staff Writer
The Providence Journal, July 2, 2005

PROVIDENCE -- Two weeks after losing his bid to have his sentence reduced, former Providence Mayor Vincent A. Cianci Jr. is asking the U.S. Supreme Court to review his conviction for racketeering conspiracy, his lawyer said.

The petition was mailed to the nation's highest court today, according to his lawyer, John A. "Terry" MacFayden. It is the last legal recourse Cianci has to try to void his conviction.

Digital extra

Read Cianci's petition to the U.S. Supreme Court

Cianci, who was convicted three years ago in the wake of a federal probe into corruption at City Hall, attacks his conviction on two grounds.

He claims that the RICO indictment against him, as worded, was fatally flawed.

He also argues that Chief U.S. District Court Judge Ernest C. Torres should have allowed the jury to hear a 1995 tape recording in which Cianci rejects the overtures of an undercover agent for the FBI who was posing as an air-conditioning businessman trying to get a city contract.

Cianci tells the agent that anyone who tried to shake him down would be castrated and arrested. But Torres ruled the tape inadmissable, saying he had doubts about the mayor's sincerity and it amounted to irrelevant hearsay.

The U.S. Supreme Court rejects most of the petitions for review that it receives, taking only those cases that it considers of "gravity and general importance."

Cianci is serving a 64-month prison term at a prison at Fort Dix, N.J., for his conviction on the single count of racketeering conspiracy. With good behavior, the 64-year-old is scheduled to be released in July 2007. His request for a reduced sentence was denied last month.

During the trial, U.S. Justice Department prosecutors argued that Cianci headed a criminal enterprise with wide-ranging tentacles that took bribes in exchange for tax breaks, favors and city jobs.

The FBI's investigation, code-named "Operation Plunder Dome," relied heavily on testimony from corrupt former city officials. The star witness was the air conditioning contractor, Antonio Freitas, who posed undercover to ensnare some of Cianci's closest aides.

Freitas carried a hidden video camera, making several surveillance tapes, including Cianci's top aide, Frank Corrente, taking a $1,000 cash bribe. Corrente was convicted of several counts, including racketeering.

-- With reports from The Associated Press

Agents Search Homes, Yacht Of Contractor, Congressman (WP)

By Renae Merle and R. Jeffrey Smith
WP, July 2, 2005

Federal agents armed with search warrants descended on the California house of Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham yesterday, the latest step in a criminal investigation into his relationship with the owner of a District-based government contracting firm.

Agents from the FBI, Internal Revenue Service and Defense Criminal Investigative Service of the Pentagon inspector general's office participated in the search of Cunningham's house near San Diego, as well as the Washington home, office and boat of Mitchell J. Wade. Wade was until recently the chief executive of MZM Inc., which does intelligence work for the Pentagon.

Cunningham, a California Republican who was a fighter pilot in Vietnam and an instructor at the Navy's Top Gun school, is a member of the House Intelligence Committee and defense appropriations subcommittee.

The investigation began three weeks ago after news reports that Wade had purchased Cunningham's home in late 2003 for $1.675 million and then sold it months later at a $700,000 loss. Cunningham also was living rent-free on Wade's 42-foot yacht at the Capital Yacht Club on the Potomac River. But he has not stayed on the yacht for about two weeks, according to a source close to the congressman.

Cunningham acknowledged last week that he showed "poor judgment" in selling his house to Wade but denied he had improperly helped MZM obtain government contracts to work on intelligence programs.

Cunningham's lawyers, K. Lee Blalack II and Mark Holscher, issued a statement calling the search of Cunningham's home in Rancho Santa Fe "an appalling abuse of government power" because the congressman agreed Monday to cooperate with a federal grand jury subpoena seeking essentially the same documents.

"They will apparently not take yes for an answer and have instead opted to use strong arm tactics that were designed to generate headlines," the lawyers said.

In Washington, around 10 a.m., more than a dozen federal agents entered the headquarters of MZM, a secure white brick building on New Hampshire Avenue NW, and ushered employees into the reception area, according to one person who was there but spoke on the condition of anonymity. The agents took the names and phone numbers of the 15 to 20 employees before allowing them to leave, then did not allow anyone to reenter, the source said.

Agents also searched Wade's Kalorama home and the yacht the contracting executive bought in late 2002 and soon renamed Duke-Stir, apparently after the congressman.

In an unsigned statement, MZM said that it was cooperating with the investigation and that its legal counsel, Steptoe & Johnson LLP, had been in contact with authorities.

"The search warrant process will not impede the ability of MZM's more than four hundred employees to continue to carry out critical national security support missions for our government," the statement said.

Attorneys at Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP who represent Wade declined to comment.

The search warrants were executed at the company's headquarters two weeks to the day after an MZM official who worked closely with Wade shredded a large stack of documents on the third floor of MZM's Washington headquarters, two sources with knowledge of the incident said independently yesterday. They said the official destroyed the documents on June 17 in a waist-high machine during Wade's final hours in the office, an act that one source described as "weird" because of the timing.

Wade and his attorneys agreed the previous evening that he would surrender control of the company to other senior MZM officials, and they also agreed that he could pack up his office papers at a set time on June 17, one of the sources said. But Wade angered the firm's new managers by arriving earlier than agreed, according to this source. Both sources said he was in the building when the shredding occurred.

The nature of the destroyed documents could not be learned, and the executive who did the shredding did not reply to phone calls and e-mails seeking his comment. The shredding was halted when it became apparent to the new company managers, the sources said. Another senior MZM official affixed a note to the door in mid-morning that day, ordering employees of the company not to enter the room where the machine was located, they added. Wade was eventually permitted to take other documents from the building in boxes, under the supervision of company attorneys, the sources said.

The sources spoke on the condition that they not be named because of the sensitivity of the matter.

The Navy says Wade entered the Naval Reserve in November 1987 and the Individual Ready Reserve in 1996. He resigned his commission in 1999. He reached the rank of lieutenant commander. Wade was a program manager at the office of the assistant secretary of defense for command, communications and intelligence from 1991 to 1993, according to his entry in Who's Who.

Wade started MZM in 1993, but it did not begin to grow until it was awarded a broadly written contract, called a blanket purchase order, in fall 2002. It did more than $163 million in work for a variety of Pentagon agencies until the Defense Information Systems Agency cut off new work orders 11 days ago, saying the inspector general's office ruled that the work was not competitively awarded.

Federal procurement records show one of MZM's first contracts was a $140,000 deal to provide office furniture to the Executive Office of President. In 2003, the Pentagon hired the firm to provide linguists in Iraq.

According to news reports, some former and current MZM employees have complained that they were pressured to contribute to the company's political action committee, which could be illegal. The PAC and MZM employees contributed $50,000 to the 2004 campaign of Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.), according to the Center for Responsive Politics, which monitors campaign spending.

Harris sent a letter to MZM employees this week, offering to return contributions if they were "pressured, overtly or tacitly, in making this gesture." According to Adam Goodman, Harris's campaign consultant, the letter was prompted by the news reports and the congresswoman had not been contacted by federal investigators.

FBI Raids Home Of Rep. Cunningham (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000643

Federal agents Friday raided the home of Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham as part of a grand jury probe of the congressman's links to a defense contractor.

Agents also served search warrants on the Washington offices of the contractor, MZM Inc., and at the Duke Stir, the 42-foot yacht owned by MZM founder Mitchell Wade where Cunningham (R-San Diego) has been living for more than a year.

K. Lee Blalack, Cunningham's lawyer, called the raid "an appalling abuse of government power."

The federal investigation centers on the sale of Cunningham's house in November 2003 to Wade for $1,675,000. Investigators appear to be looking at whether the price was inflated to allow Wade to funnel money to the congressman. Cunningham's position in Congress, where he sits on a committee that controls the Pentagon budget, could have allowed him to influence the flow of contracts to MZM.

The home was never offered publicly for sale. Months after buying it, Wade sold the home for $975,000, a $700,000 loss. Cunningham and his wife bought their current house, an 8,000-square-foot home in Rancho Santa Fe, for $2.5 million soon after selling the Del Mar Heights house to Wade.

Cunningham says he offered to sell the house to Wade after the contractor said he needed a place near Miramar Marine Corps Air Station, where MZM has a project.

In a three-page statement issued last week, Cunningham said he showed poor judgment in selling the home to Wade but that he never gave preferential treatment to the defense contractor. He said he had paid $13,000 in berthing fees and maintenance costs related to his stay on Wade's yacht, which is berthed at a yacht club on the Potomac River.

Cunningham also has said the price of the Del Mar Heights house was determined by comparing sales of similar-sized homes in the neighborhood. He said the work was done by real estate agent Elizabeth Todd, a longtime friend and contributor.

Todd has also received a subpoena from investigators.

Cunningham and his wife, Nancy, were not in when agents arrived at the house in Rancho Santa Fe, an exclusive community 25 miles north of San Diego.

Blalack said that Cunningham had earlier offered to cooperate fully with FBI authorities probing the sale of his house in Del Mar Heights to Wade in 2003.

"They will apparently not take 'yes' for an answer and have instead opted to use strong-arm tactics that were designed to generate headlines," Blalack said.

An attorney from Blalack's law firm arrived at the Rancho Santa Fe house during the search, which was authorized by a secret affidavit issued by a federal grand jury in San Diego. FBI officials declined to say what agents were searching for.

Cunningham, 63, an eight-term member of Congress, is scheduled to return to his northern San Diego County district this weekend for Fourth of July celebrations, his first home visit since the controversy began.

According to the Defense Information Systems Agency, MZM has received $163 million in federal contracts, mostly for classified projects involving the gathering and analysis of intelligence.

Last month the agency halted the awarding of new contracts to MZM as part of a change in federal regulations requiring more competitive bidding. The change is not related to the investigation, and MZM will be allowed to bid for new projects, said Mike Thiem, spokesman for the Defense Information Systems Agency.

According to the Washington Post, an MZM official who worked closely with Wade shredded a large stack of documents on the third floor of MZM's Washington headquarters two weeks ago. The Post said it based its account on two sources with knowledge of the incident who spoke to its reporters Friday. They said the official destroyed the documents June 17 in a waist-high machine during Wade's final hours in the office.

The federal probe into the relationship between Wade and Cunningham involves the FBI, the U.S. attorney's office, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service and the Internal Revenue Service, according to Jan Caldwell, spokeswoman for the FBI office in San Diego.

FBI Probe Targets Congressman (WT)

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

FBI agents searched the California home of Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham yesterday, and served warrants at the yacht in the District where he has been living, a Justice Department official said.

Agents also searched the offices of a defense firm whose founder bought the congressman's previous home, leading to a federal investigation, the official said on the condition of anonymity.

Mr. Cunningham, 63, has said that he showed poor judgment in selling the house, but said he acted honestly and predicted that an investigation would prove that.

The former Navy "top gun" fighter pilot and eight-term Republican congressman sold his home in November 2003 to Mitchell Wade, a campaign contributor and close friend.

Mr. Wade paid $1.7 million for the 3,826-square-foot house in wealthy, seaside Del Mar, just north of San Diego. He put it back on the market soon after and eventually took a $700,000 loss when he resold it in October 2004. During that span, home prices in San Diego County rose an average of nearly 25 percent.

Meanwhile, Mr. Wade's little-known company, District-based MZM Inc., was increasing its federal contracting business. In 2004, MZM tripled its revenue and nearly quadrupled its staff, according to the company's Web site.

Mr. Cunningham has lived part-time on Mr. Wade's boat, docked on the Potomac River.

The congressman is a member of the House Appropriations Committee's defense subcommittee and the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, both of which oversee the kind of classified intelligence work MZM does for the military.

The Defense Department halted orders this month on a five-year contract that provided MZM with $163 million of revenue over its first three years after the department's inspector general found that it did not satisfy rules on competitiveness.

This week, MZM announced that James King, a retired three-star Army general, was taking over as president and chief executive -- a role held for years by Mr. Wade, who founded the company in 1993.

Cunningham Questioned Over Commercial Use Of Congressional Seal (SDUT)

By Marcus Stern And Jerry Kammer, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, July 2, 2005

WASHINGTON – Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, already in legal and political hot water over his dealings with a defense contractor, might have run afoul of the law by using a likeness of the congressional seal for commercial purposes.

Cunningham, a highly decorated Navy pilot in Vietnam and former instructor at the Navy's Top Gun academy, has operated a commercial Web site for years that sells memorabilia, including a $595 "Randy 'Duke' Cunningham Fighter Ace Kalinga Style Buck Knife."

The blade of the 10-inch knife is emblazoned with three emblems etched in gold, according to the Web site, including the "Official Seal of the United States Congress."

A chorus of still-unanswered questions has been raised in Washington this week about the legality of the Rancho Santa Fe Republican's use of the congressional seal for commercial purposes.

Cunningham and his attorney have refused to comment on the matter, but, after four days of questions from Copley News Service, the Web site's commercial operations were shut down yesterday afternoon with a message stating that a new Web site is under construction.

Under federal law, any member of Congress can be fined and imprisoned for up to six months if he or she "knowingly uses, manufactures, reproduces, sells, purchases for resale . . . any likeness of the seal of the United States Congress" without the approval of the clerk of the House.

When asked if the clerk had approved Cunningham's use of the seal, his office referred calls to his attorney, Lee Blalack, who declined to comment. Numerous calls to the clerk's office this week either went unanswered or were referred to the House ethics committee. Calls to the ethics committee also went unanswered or resulted in no comment.

However, a source close to Cunningham said that the likeness of the seal on the knife wasn't, as advertised, the "Official Seal of the United States Congress."

Instead, the source said, it was an unofficial seal not subject to the criminal statute barring commercial use. The source declined to be identified because of the ongoing FBI and federal grand jury investigations into Cunningham's dealings with defense contractor Mitchell Wade, founder of MZM Inc.

Wade purchased Cunningham's Del Mar-area house in November 2003 and later sold it at a $700,000 loss. At the same time, MZM was growing its federal contracting business and Cunningham, who sits on the defense appropriations subcommittee, was supporting MZM's efforts to get tens of millions of dollars in contracts.

Questions have also been raised about Wade's purchase of a yacht that he has allowed Cunningham to live aboard while in Washington.

The Library of Congress, in a written statement that it keeps on file, confirmed yesterday that there is no current official seal of Congress. Instead, the House and Senate each have their own seals.

The official House seal depicts the House side of the U.S. Capitol. But the House also has an "unofficial" seal created for members "to use on stationery and other office-related items."

The unofficial seal depicts an eagle and stars in gold with a blue border and cream background, which is similar to the image emblazoned on the 1,000 collector knives Cunningham offered for sale.

However, congressional ethics experts expressed doubts about the legality of Cunningham's use of the likeness, even if it was the unofficial seal of the House.

DOJ_NMG_0000645

"You can't use the seal for commercial purposes," said Jan Witold Baran, a Washington lawyer who specializes in ethics and has represented members of the Senate and House before their respective ethics committees.

While the issue of the seal being used on a collector's knife hasn't arisen before, as far as Baran knows, he said questions have arisen in the past over use of the unofficial seal on stationery.

"In the '80, some political party organizations used something that looked like the Great Seal (of the United States). The Justice Department said, 'Stop it,' and they did," said Baran, who served as the general counsel to the Republican National Committee from 1989 to 1992 and worked on the 1988 presidential campaign of former President George H.W. Bush.

The Great Seal of the United States, like the unofficial seal of the House, depicts an eagle.

Although the law carries criminal penalties, including fines and prison time, Baran could recall no instance in which a case was prosecuted.

"I don't know of anyone who has gone to jail for it," he said. "It is a statute that has been on the books a long time . . . I have never heard of the Department of Justice bringing a case against someone criminally under the statute."

The Web page still features a picture of Cunningham, a fighter ace in Vietnam, striking a pose in his flight jacket with his helmet under one arm and a likeness of his fighter jet underneath.

Cunningham has always listed Top Gun Enterprises on the annual financial disclosure form he is required to file as a member of Congress. During Cunningham's years in Congress, the company has always been valued on the form at up to $500,000. But the form Cunningham released recently for 2004 valued Top Gun Enterprises at up to $1 million.

Cunningham's office referred questions on the company's increase in value to his attorney, who declined to comment.

MSNBC Analyst Says Cooper Documents Reveal Karl Rove As Source In Plame Case (EaP)

Editor & Publisher, July 2, 2005

Now that Time Inc. has turned over documents to federal court, presumably revealing who its reporter, Matt Cooper, identified as his source in the Valerie Plame/CIA case, speculation runs rampant on the name of that source, and what might happen to him or her. Tonight, on the syndicated McLaughlin Group political talk show, Lawrence O'Donnell, senior MSNBC political analyst, claimed to know that name--and it is, according to him, top White House mastermind Karl Rove.

Here is the transcript of O'Donnell's remarks:

"What we're going to go to now in the next stage, when Matt Cooper's e-mails, within Time Magazine, are handed over to the grand jury, the ultimate revelation, probably within the week of who his source is.

"And I know I'm going to get pulled into the grand jury for saying this but the source of...for Matt Cooper was Karl Rove, and that will be revealed in this document dump that Time magazine's going to do with the grand jury."

Other panelists then joined in discussing whether, if true, this would suggest a perjury rap for Rove, if he told the grand jury he did not leak to Cooper.

Reporters Facing Jail Time Submit Preferences (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Matthew Cooper of Time magazine and Judith Miller of The New York Times, who have been held in contempt for refusing to testify about their confidential sources, filed court papers yesterday asking to be sentenced to home confinement or to particular federal prisons if they must be jailed.

Time Inc. also filed a brief statement saying it had complied with a grand jury subpoena by supplying documents to the special prosecutor in the case, Patrick J. Fitzgerald. Mr. Fitzgerald is looking into the possibly unlawful disclosure of the identity of a covert C.I.A. operative, Valerie Plame.

The documents held by Time disclose the identities of Mr. Cooper's confidential sources and the substance of what they told him, Mr. Cooper has said. Their release gives the reporters some fresh arguments in their efforts to avoid jail.

In October, Judge Thomas F. Hogan of Federal District Court in Washington held the reporters and the magazine in civil contempt. He ordered the reporters jailed and the magazine fined but suspended the sanctions while they pursued appeals.

On Monday, the United States Supreme Court declined to hear the case.

On Wednesday, Judge Hogan indicated that he would send the reporters to jail for up to 120 days and impose large fines on Time Inc. as soon as next Wednesday. Time Inc., a division of Time Warner, announced on Thursday that it would comply with the subpoena for the documents.

Mr. Cooper, who opposed the disclosure of the documents and continues to refuse to comply with a subpoena calling for his testimony, argued that "the nature and volume of the materials released" should render his testimony "duplicative and unnecessary."

DOJ_NMG_0000646

One of Mr. Cooper's lawyers, Richard A. Sauber, said, "We are very hopeful that Mr. Fitzgerald will drop his demand for Matt's testimony after reviewing the documents provided to him by Time magazine."

Ms. Miller's lawyers have voiced similar hopes in recent days.

Mr. Cooper asked not to be sent to the default facility for people held in civil contempt in Washington, the District of Columbia jail. "Confinement in the D.C. jail," Mr. Cooper's lawyers wrote, "would subject Mr. Cooper, a non-violent, non-criminal journalist, to a dangerous maximum security lockup already overcrowded with a mix of convicted offenders and other detainees awaiting criminal trials."

Mr. Cooper asked to be sent to the federal prison camp in Cumberland, Md., if home confinement is not an option.

Mr. Cooper attached nine letters from family members and friends. They emphasized that he acted from principle and that jail time for Mr. Cooper would be very hard on his 6-year-old son, Ben.

In her papers, Ms. Miller argued that it was pointless to imprison her because she will never talk. She provided Judge Hogan with letters from soldiers with whom she was embedded during the war in Iraq attesting to that.

Ms. Miller asked for "very restrictive home detention" if confinement is required, including an electronic bracelet and excluding Internet access and cellular phones.

In the alternative, she asked to be sent to the federal prison camp for women in Danbury, Conn.

Mr. Fitzgerald will respond to the papers on Tuesday, and Judge Hogan has scheduled a hearing to consider the issues on Wednesday.

Reporters Ask Judge For Home Detention (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

Lawyers for Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper yesterday urged a federal judge not to jail him for refusing to discuss his confidential sources with a prosecutor, arguing in a court filing that there is no need for his testimony now that his employer has turned over his notes, which identify the sources.

Attorneys for New York Times reporter Judith Miller, who, like Cooper, faces four months in jail for defying Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan's order to cooperate with a special prosecutor's investigation, also urged Hogan yesterday not to jail her. In papers filed yesterday, her lawyers said that because she intends to go to jail rather than disclose the name of her source, incarceration would be "merely punitive" and would not cause her to obey the court.

Both reporters said in the documents that if Hogan insists on incarceration, they will propose being detained under restrictive conditions at home. They said the cost of electronic bracelets and other monitoring equipment would be borne by private entities, not taxpayers, and that they would give up much of their contact with the outside world

If jailed, however, Cooper suggested he should be sent to a federal prison camp in Cumberland, in close proximity to Washington, where he lives with his wife, Mandy Grunwald, and their 6-year-old son. Miller proposed a federal women's prison camp in Danbury, Conn., which her lawyers described as "safe" and "near to Ms. Miller's 76-year-old husband," retired book publisher Jason Epstein, in New York City.

Most people found in contempt by a federal court in the District serve their time in the D.C. jail.

Hogan held Miller, Cooper and Time in contempt of court in October for refusing to identify their sources to special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who is investigating whether senior administration officials knowingly identified covert CIA operative Valerie Plame to the media.

Plame's name first appeared in a July 2003 syndicated column by Robert D. Novak, shortly after Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, published an opinion piece in the Times that accused the Bush administration of twisting intelligence to justify going to war with Iraq.

Fitzgerald wants to talk to Miller and Cooper about conversations they had with specific government officials. A spokesman for Fitzgerald declined to comment yesterday on the filings or the reporters' detention proposals. Fitzgerald has until Tuesday to reply to Hogan.

Over Cooper's objections, Time yesterday turned over notes and e-mails of Cooper's that were stored in a computer. The magazine, which faces a $1,000-a-day fine that had reached $270,000, said it hoped that by complying it would keep Cooper out of jail.

Time editor-in-chief Norman Pearlstine said Thursday that after the Supreme Court refused on Monday to hear the reporters' appeals of the case, he believed that the magazine had to obey Hogan's order.

In the court papers, the two reporters laid out their final arguments as they prepare for a hearing Wednesday at which Hogan could order them incarcerated.

"Mr. Cooper submits that his testimony would be duplicative and unnecessary, and he respectfully requests the court to inquire of the Special Counsel whether the grand jury still needs Mr. Cooper's testimony," Cooper's attorneys wrote.

In arguing for home confinement, Miller's attorneys said in the filings that Miller would suffer from giving up such tools as her cell phone and Internet access, because "impairing her unrestricted ability to do her job as an investigative journalist . . . would present the strictest form of coercion to her."

They said Miller is not in ill health but contended that home detention is more "suitable" for a 54-year-old woman.

20-year Sentence For Man With Grudge Against Judge (AP)

By RON WORD, Associated Press Writer

AP, July 2, 2005

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. -- A man with a grudge against a judge was sentenced Friday to the maximum 20 years in prison for holding a lawyer hostage and threatening to blow up an downtown office tower last summer.

John Knight, who was armed with two guns and claimed to have a bomb, "had planned to take his own personal vengeance against the system," said Circuit Judge Michael Weatherby. "None of this was the act of a madman."

"What were you thinking? Weatherby said. "I cannot discern any plausible or palpable reason that someone would commit the crimes that he committed."

Knight, 37, a copy machine salesman from Fort Wayne, Ind., wearing a green jump suit, did not speak in the 15-minute hearing. He had taken attorney John Hazelip hostage in his office and threatened to blow up the building last August because he wanted to force the resignation of a judge who had sentenced him to a day in jail five years earlier.

Knight, who pleaded guilty in March, was sentenced to 15 years on a charge of false imprisonment; 20 years for armed fake impersonation of a law enforcement officer; five years for aggravated assault; five years for carrying a concealed firearm and 15 years for perpetrating a bomb hoax. All the sentences will run concurrently.

Hazelip, who Knight held for three hours, did not attend the hearing, but said later in a telephone interview, "I have forgiven him and hold no grudge against him. I hope he finds hope for the despair in his life."

Carrying a 9mm handgun in an envelope, he entered the Hazelip's law office in the 28-story Riverplace Tower by claiming to be an agent of the Justice Department last August.

For the next three hours, the two sat alone in his office while Knight made threats to kill Hazelip and demanded to talk to Jacksonville Mayor John Peyton, whose family owns the office tower. Knight ordered Peyton to secure the resignation of Duval County Judge Sharon Tanner, who had sentenced Knight in a 1999 domestic violence case.

As Peyton negotiated with Knight, police evacuated the office tower, fearing Knight might have a bomb. Children from a day care center were led to a nearby hotel lobby, while workers sweltered in the hot sun.

The standoff ended after Tanner pretended to resign on live television, although Hazelip testified earlier this month that Knight surrendered without knowing whether Tanner had resigned because there was no television in his office.

When Knight surrendered, police found he was carrying two 9mm pistols and 69 bullets. He did not have a bomb.

Tanner said she was pleased Weatherby sentenced Knight to the maximum sentence under his plea agreement.

"I doesn't give me any pleasure to see someone go to jail for 20 years, but I do believe the people of Jacksonville can rest assured that what Judge Weatherby has done today is completely appropriate," Tanner said after the hearing, tears welling in her eyes. "Judge Weatherby has assured the people of our town that people who take matters into their own hands and threaten public officials and threaten our system of government will be dealt with appropriately."

She said she faked her resignation to save lives.

"The thought that something that had happened in my courtroom might have led to the death of innocent people has haunted me night and day," Tanner said. "I will never ever get over that, never."

Assistant State Attorney Melissa Williamson Nelson was pleased the Weatherby imposed the maximum sentence.

"John Knight took the whole legal system of this community hostage when he chose to take Chris Hazelip hostage," she said. "I am thrilled with the outcome."

Knight's attorney, Assistant Public Defender Ann Finnell, did not comment and did not return a telephone call.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Judge Cancels His Order That Justice Official Must Testify (SLT)

By Pamela Manson

Salt Lake Tribune, July 2, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000648

A federal judge in Utah has canceled his order requiring a top Justice Department official to testify why it is taking so long for the department to review records connected to the death of a prison inmate.

U.S. District Judge Bruce Jenkins had set a July 13 date for Noel Hillman, chief of the department's public integrity section, to come to his courtroom and explain, under oath, the delay in deciding which documents can be released under the Freedom of Information Act.

On Friday, he rescinded the order, noting that the official has said his review is complete. However, the judge warned that the reprieve is temporary and said the government ultimately will have to produce the records.

Hillman had been determining which documents could be withheld.

The records are being sought by Jesse Trentadue, the inmate's brother and a Salt Lake City attorney. He contends that Hillman began his review in 2001 and was taking too long.

The records request concerns the August 1995 death of Kenneth Trentadue, an ex-convict who had been placed in a federal prison in Oklahoma on an alleged parole violation. Prison authorities contend the 44-year-old committed suicide, but the man's relatives believe he was slain.

Trentadue is investigating a theory that Kenneth, who had served time for bank robbery, was killed during an interrogation gone awry. The lawyer believes authorities mistakenly suspected his brother was part of a gang that robbed banks to finance attacks on the government, possibly including the Oklahoma City bombing that killed 168 people.

Profiling Study Sparks Debate Among Police (CHIT)

By Scott Goldstein, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, July 2, 2005

The first-year results of a state-mandated study on racial profiling to be released Friday suggest that some police departments in the northwest suburbs are stopping a relatively high number of minority motorists.

But law-enforcement officials in the region say the study is flawed and warn that the statistics don't tell the true story, exposing some departments to potentially dangerous misperceptions about how they treat minority drivers.

"First of all, I'm terribly concerned about what's going to happen next because when anyone looks at these numbers, it's not going to tell them anything," said Mt. Prospect Police Chief Richard Eddington. "It's much more important the rapport a police department has with its community than this math problem."

Statistics from Mt. Prospect police show that nearly 31 percent of the drivers stopped in 2004 were minorities. About 24 percent of the village's driving population was estimated to be minorities.

In 2000 the Mt. Prospect Police Department settled discrimination lawsuits with three former officers who accused the department of ethnic profiling of Hispanics. As a result of the settlement, the Justice Department now monitors Mt. Prospect, and it found no reason for concern in the 2004 numbers, Eddington said.

Statistics from Elgin, Lake in the Hills and Des Plaines also appear to indicate that police stopped a disproportionate number of minorities last year.

Under a state law adopted in 2003, police officers are required to record the names, addresses, gender and races of all drivers stopped for traffic offenses through 2007. They must also record what led to the stop, what action resulted and whether a search was conducted.

The percentage of traffic stops involving minority drivers is measured against an estimate for the percentage of minority drivers in each suburb.

That number, or benchmark, is a point of debate for some departments, which argue that it was set too low.

For most departments, the benchmark was based on 2000 census data by Northwestern University's Center for Public Safety, which is overseeing the study, said Alexander Weiss, the center's director.

The center is doing the study for the Illinois Department of Transportation, which will release a report Friday on the first year of the study. Many police departments, including Chicago's and those in DuPage County, already have released data.

Chicago police stopped African-Americans at a higher rate than their percentage of the population, according to department statistics. Officials said that might have been a result of targeting street gangs in minority communities. And about two-thirds of the police departments in DuPage County stopped a disproportionately large number of minority drivers, according to statistics.

In Lakewood in McHenry County, nearly 11 percent of those stopped in 2004 were minorities--in a community where the number of minority motorists was estimated at 9 percent. Though the disparity was small, Lakewood Police Chief Larry Howell, president of the McHenry County Police Chiefs Association, said he also has concerns about the accuracy of the benchmarks and how the data will be interpreted.

DOJ_NMG_0000649

"I don't know that anyone knows how this is going to be used, No. 1, and specifically what are they saying is acceptable and what's unacceptable," Howell said. "That is something that no one has ever said with this whole thing."

Weiss said that the benchmarks were a reasonable estimate of the driving population and that departments that did not agree were able to argue for a different number.

What is important, Weiss said, is that each department uses the statistics as a point of discussion in the community.

David Harris, a professor at the University of Toledo College of Law and author of books on racial profiling, said conscientious police departments would have engaged the community on the issue of racial profiling long before the raw data were released.

"The way that a police department deals with this successfully is to get people on board with them from the get-go," Harris said. "They knew a good long time ago that they'd face this day, and the smart police departments got out in front of it."

Schaumburg police seem to have taken that approach.

Lt. Dennis Carroll said Schaumburg police had no qualms about the study or the benchmark.

According to Schaumburg's statistics, about 33 percent of the driving population were minorities, while 24 percent of those stopped last year were minorities. Police in Arlington Heights, Crystal Lake, Woodstock and the town of McHenry also stopped minorities at a rate that was proportional to their driving populations, according to statistics.

And even among the harshest critics, most agree the initiative has forced discussion of an important issue.

"The only thing that the law, in my opinion, has done well is to create good, honest, hard-thought-out dialogue, and that's a good thing," said Rolling Meadows Police Chief Steven Williams. "We want to look at our work from a very critical perspective. I just don't think this study gives us any good valid data to work on."

---

sgoldstein@tribune.com

Study: Greater Percentage Of Police Stops Are Minorities (SLPD)

By From Staff Reports, Of the Post-Dispatch

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 2, 2005

Minority drivers in Illinois - including some parts of the Metro East area - are more likely to be pulled over than white drivers, according to state data released Friday.

The survey by the Illinois Department of Transportation showed 33 percent of drivers who were pulled over statewide were minorities although only 28 percent of the state's drivers are minorities.

The disparities were worse in some Metro East cities. Minority drivers make up less than 9 percent of the minority population in Granite City, for example, but the study reported minorities accounted for nearly 19 percent of all traffic stops.

The study also reported minority drivers were more likely than whites to be stopped in Alton - where they made up 24 percent of the driving population but 35 percent of traffic stops. In Fairview Heights, where minorities were nearly 30 percent of the driving population, 40 percent of people police pulled over there last year were minorities.

Granite City Police Chief Dave Reubhausen said in a faxed statement that the study's figures are drastically skewed.

"I believe the study to be flawed in this respect: No independent traffic study was conducted to determine the minority driving population in Granite City," he wrote.

Reubhausen said the percentage for minority drivers used in the study was based on the average number of minority drivers in all of Madison County and not reflective of Granite City specifically.

Other cities, such as Collinsville, fared better in the study. Although minority drivers accounted for nearly 30 percent of Collinsville's driving population, the study reported less than 20 percent of people Collinsville police pulled over last year were minorities.

Minority drivers were also less likely to be stopped than whites in East. St. Louis and O'Fallon but slightly more likely to be stopped in Belleville and Edwardsville.

Minorities statewide received tickets 68 percent of the time they were pulled over, compared with whites being ticketed in 60 percent of stops.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Agents Said To Dismantle A Korean Sex Ring (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000650

Federal agents raided scores of brothels and businesses and arrested more than two dozen people here in the dismantling of an international sex trafficking and human smuggling ring that lured Korean women to the United States and forced them to work as captive prostitutes, the authorities said on Friday.

The crackdown on human smuggling was set in motion late on Thursday, when about 400 federal and state law enforcement officials searched 50 brothels and other businesses in San Francisco and the Bay Area, stemming from the indictment of 29 men who were subsequently charged with sex trafficking, money laundering and harboring illegal aliens. The men are also charged with conspiracy to transport women from South Korea and force them to work as prostitutes, said the United States attorney, Kevin V. Ryan.

The arrests here, along with the arrests of 18 people in Los Angeles in a related case, stem from a nine-month investigation by federal, state and local law enforcement agents looking into a human smuggling and sex trafficking ring that the authorities said may be one of the largest and most sophisticated ever.

"This investigation is aimed at stopping the horrific, demeaning and oftentimes brutal practice of smuggling and trafficking of human beings," Mr. Ryan said at a law enforcement press conference on Friday.

During the raids in San Francisco on Thursday, federal agents found about 100 Korean women, who have been taken to an undisclosed nondetention facility to receive medical care and participate in interviews. The agents also seized at least $2 million in cash and several A.T.M.'s and shuttered about a dozen massage parlor brothels.

In a separate but related investigation, the authorities also charged 23 people in Los Angeles.

In Los Angeles 46 women were escorted out of brothels on Thursday and to safety, the authorities said. The authorities said they believed that the San Francisco and Los Angeles operations, although separate businesses, worked in tandem to transport the women.

The cases, investigated by numerous government agencies including the F.B.I., the Internal Revenue Service, immigration and customs enforcement agencies, and the local police, were discussed at separate press conferences on Friday, one here and one in Los Angeles.

Some of the 29 men charged in San Francisco appeared in federal court on Friday. The authorities said they did not yet know whether the defendants are Korean, but all but one man are of Asian descent. The authorities singled out two people they said were major players in the trafficking scheme, Young Joon Yang, 37, and Sung Yong Kim, 39, each charged with two counts of sex trafficking, along with other charges including fraud and coercion.

The indictment in San Francisco said that from September 2001 to October 2004 the defendants "recruited and enticed female Korean nationals to illegally enter the United States." The women, in their 20's, were held captive and forced to work as prostitutes.

The indictment also said that between Feb. 22 and June 23, 2005, the defendants operated a taxi company and a travel agency, both used to transport the women. The taxi company often transported women from brothel to brothel, and in some cases the cabs were used to move women from San Francisco to Los Angeles, an F.B.I. spokeswoman said. The travel agency made international and interstate transport possible. The women were typically flown from an undisclosed location in South Korea to Canada and then to San Francisco.

Brad Schlozman, acting assistant attorney general for the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department, called the operation "morally repugnant and a truly evil crime" and "a modern-day form of slavery."

At the press briefing in Los Angeles on Friday, the United States attorney, Debra Wong Yang, said that the brothels were concealed by supposedly legitimate massage parlors and that the women were managed by what she called an underground Korean taxi service.

Raids On Brothel Rings Net 45 Arrests (LAT)

By David Rosenzweig And K. Connie Kang

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

Two criminal syndicates suspected of smuggling hundreds of South Korean women into the United States to work at brothels in the Los Angeles and San Francisco areas have been broken up with the arrest of 45 people, including the ringleaders, federal authorities announced Friday.

In raids on massage parlors, chiropractic offices and apartments at both ends of the state, federal agents and local law enforcement officers took into custody nearly 150 suspected prostitutes as material witnesses.

U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang said there was no firm evidence that the women were coerced into working as prostitutes, although some were found to have been sexually abused.

Yang said federal agents were in the process of interviewing the women to learn how they got here and how they were treated.

"This type of criminal organization exploits the hopes and dreams of immigrants," the Los Angeles federal prosecutor said.

Law enforcement officials said the two networks operated independently, although they sometimes traded prostitutes.

The Los Angeles organization was headquartered in Koreatown, home of the largest Korean population outside Asia. Koreatown community leaders reacted to the arrests with surprise and shame.

"This is so embarrassing," said Kenny Shin, president of the Korean American Chamber of Commerce. Shin said he feared that notoriety would hurt Koreatown businesses that are finally recovering from the effects of the 1992 Los Angeles riots.

The Southern California investigation was launched two years ago by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation division and the Los Angeles County sheriff's vice squad.

Using court-authorized wiretaps and undercover informants, investigators said, they were able to track the activities of the organization's leaders for months.

Among the 18 people arrested in Southern California late Thursday and early Friday on prostitution-related conspiracy charges was the alleged ringleader, Young Joon Jung, about 40, a resident of Koreatown. Investigators also seized more than $1 million.

Yang said the Jung organization was a "top to bottom" criminal enterprise. The organization smuggled women into the United States via Canada and Mexico, usually after they agreed to pay as much as $16,000 from their earnings as prostitutes, she said.

The women were then turned over to an underground network of Korean "taxi" services that assigned and transported them each day to various brothels. Authorities said the brothels operated under the guise of being massage parlors, chiropractic clinics and businesses offering aromatherapy, acupressure, acupuncture and the like.

According to an affidavit, some of those brothels paid chiropractors $600 to $1,500 a month to use their licenses.

Koreatown businesspeople Friday expressed surprise that health services were involved, even though only a few of the area's many chiropractors and acupuncturists were implicated. Across the street from one Koreatown establishment raided by investigators, clothing store owner Jong Soon Kang said Friday she could hardly believe that people would pay to lease professional licenses to engage in prostitution.

"I have heard about things like that happening in some massage parlors," she said. "But medical offices? This is very, very serious."

"I just hope this will not harm the Korean community's reputation," she said. "Most Korean immigrants are like me — we work hard and are good citizens. I hope the mainstream will understand that and not think badly of all of us."

The suspected brothels were not limited to Koreatown. Some were located in the San Fernando Valley, South Gate, Santa Monica, Redondo Beach and Anaheim, the affidavit said.

The taxi services, which allegedly were run by members and associates of Jung's organization, occasionally sent the women to work at brothels in Texas, Colorado and Northern California, according to the affidavit.

In one wiretapped conversation recorded in April, one of Jung's associates was overheard complaining about the arrest of 16 women by U.S. Border Patrol officers as they were being taken across the Canadian border in a recreational vehicle rented in El Monte.

Another alleged ring member lamented a crackdown by Mexican officials in Mexicali, saying the police there were arresting everyone who looked Korean. He said he found a way around the problem by sending the women to Tijuana, where he claimed to have a friendly Mexican immigration officer on his payroll.

In the San Francisco-area roundup, about 400 federal and local officers arrested 27 suspects. Five others charged in a grand jury indictment were still at large. The raid, dubbed Operation Gilded Cage, netted $2 million in cash.

By morning, more than 100 Korean women detained at 11 separate massage parlors had been taken to an undisclosed location. They appeared to be about 20 to 27 years old. Victim assistance workers were living among them in an effort to coax their cooperation, and more than half a dozen local social service and legal groups dispatched aid.

The nine-month Northern California investigation was hailed as a coordinated effort, involving the U.S. attorney's office, the U.S. Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division, the FBI, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the San Francisco Police Department, the Internal Revenue Service and the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service.

Officials said the operation successfully dismantled a "large criminal organization" headed by Young Joon Yang, 37, of Pleasant Hill, Calif.

Brad Schlozman, acting assistant attorney general for civil rights, said the still-unfolding investigation appeared to be "one of our biggest" nationwide. Officials said the San Francisco investigation unraveled a "sophisticated criminal enterprise" and therefore was a more serious case than the one brought in Los Angeles.

DOJ_NMG_0000652

According to the indictment, two defendants -- Wu Sang Nah and Sung Yong Kim -- are believed to have smuggled at least two female Korean nationals across the U.S. border from Canada. The women were then taken to Virginia, Los Angeles and eventually San Francisco to work as prostitutes.

The indictment alleges that Young Joon Yang operated a taxi service and travel agency dedicated to transporting those two women as well as many others to and from brothels throughout San Francisco as well as to other prostitution engagements in Las Vegas and other cities.

Many of those arrested worked as drivers or support staff for Young Joon Yang. The more than two dozen men and women indicted face charges of conspiring to bring in and harbor aliens, sex trafficking, money laundering conspiracy, and transporting women in interstate commerce to engage in prostitution.

The indictment does not specify whether the women were working off smuggling debts or engaging in prostitution against their will. Advocates said 20% to 30% of women in such situations typically are coerced into prostitution and that the rest are working as prostitutes voluntarily.

Kevin Ryan, U.S. attorney in San Francisco, said information about the circumstances of their prostitution will probably emerge in the coming days.

"There's a belief that San Francisco is a major player in human trafficking," he said. "It's a gateway to the Pacific, and this is a city where many of the women are brought."

Friday afternoon, several dozen shocked family members and friends crowded into a federal courtroom to await the first court appearances of the detained, as defense attorneys milled about to pair with potential clients.

"It's a very broad sweep," San Jose criminal-defense attorney Tak Chang said of the raids. "I suspect some of these people will be very minor players -- drivers and receptionists. This might be a tactic to get the bigger fish."

Taking The Prostitution Pledge (NYT)

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Since 2003, the Bush administration has required foreign groups fighting AIDS overseas to pledge their opposition to prostitution and sex trafficking before they get money from Washington. Last month, the administration expanded the requirement to American groups. On its face, this law seems innocuous. Who supports prostitution?

But in countries like India, controlling AIDS among prostitutes and their clients is the key to keeping the disease from exploding into the general population. So some very effective programs are built around trying to make sure that prostitutes and their customers use condoms. The groups who run these programs try to gain the trust of prostitutes by providing them with health care and teaching them about safe sex. They argue that being forced to state their opposition to prostitution would limit their ability to do that. Brazil turned down a $40 million grant from the United States because it did not want to imperil successful programs.

The Bush administration and some of its supporters disagree. They argue that anything that makes life more tolerable for prostitutes encourages prostitution. That would include organizing sex workers in India to stand up to abusive clients, or helping Bangladeshi prostitutes get shoes so they can leave the brothel to visit a health clinic. Initially, the Justice Department ruled that the prostitution pledge could not be required of American groups because the American Constitution guarantees the right to free speech. The administration's turnabout would seem vulnerable to a constitutional challenge.

The new anti-prostitution requirement may have a hidden purpose: to take away the right of American groups working on family planning overseas to counsel abortions. On his first day in office, President Bush signed a reinstatement of President Ronald Reagan's policy blocking American funds for overseas family-planning groups that so much as mention abortion. Both restrictions are the work of Representative Christopher Smith, a New Jersey Republican. The abortion gag rule has never applied to American groups, for the same First Amendment reasons that the prostitution pledge did not. But the decision to strip Americans of their First Amendment right to speak as they please on prostitution opens the way to an attempt to keep them silent on abortion, too.

Justice Clears Ohio In Voting Booth Bias (WP/AP)

By Sarah Anderson, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

COLUMBUS, Ohio -- The Department of Justice says it found no evidence of discrimination in the distribution of voting machines in two Ohio counties in the 2004 presidential election.

The department began investigating after voters complained of long voting lines and alleged discrimination in Franklin and Knox counties. Investigators wanted to determine if elections officials had intentionally skewed the placement of machines to favor Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0000653

The Justice Department said, however, the distribution in Franklin County narrowly favored black voters. Because turnout in predominantly black precincts was lower than in white ones, machines in those districts averaged fewer votes, according to a report released Wednesday.

An unanticipated 76 percent turnout _ with many first-time voters _ contributed to the long lines in the Kenyon College precinct in Knox County _ with some people forced to wait until 4 a.m. to vote on just two available machines, officials found.

Distribution of voting machines is determined by county boards of elections, made up of two Democrats, two Republicans and two nonvoting members.

Franklin County, which includes Columbus, had 2,904 machines on hand for 535,575 people who showed up to vote.

In the Knox County precinct, the number of registered voters more than doubled to 1,607 between March and November of 2004. But by the time those numbers were available, the Knox County board already had decided on the distribution of voting machines.

The election turned on Ohio's 20 electoral college votes, and not until preliminary results were available early Nov. 3 did Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry concede. President Bush defeated Kerry by about 118,000 votes in the state.

Think Locally, Ask Globally (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

D.C. voting rights activists took their case to an unusual constituency yesterday, calling on European legislators at an international meeting to lean on the U.S. government to give Washingtonians full representation in Congress.

"O-S-C-E, free D.C.!" chanted scores of demonstrators parading in front of the J.W. Marriott on Pennsylvania Avenue NW, where legislators from countries in the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe were opening their annual meeting.

The 55-member OSCE includes countries from Europe and the former Soviet Union, as well as the United States. The OSCE grew out of the Helsinki process of the Cold War period, which established human rights as a global foreign policy concern and tried to spur greater freedom in the Soviet bloc.

The current OSCE meeting, which lasts through Tuesday, will address such issues as gender equality and human rights. But to local activists, nothing matters more than a proposed amendment that calls on the U.S. government to give D.C. residents "equal voting rights in their national legislature." The measure is expected to be considered today or tomorrow.

Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), the District's non-voting delegate in Congress, introduced the amendment with the support of four other legislators in the 12-member U.S. delegation to the OSCE meeting. Delegates from Canada and Switzerland also were sponsors.

At a noontime rally yesterday in Freedom Plaza, in front of the Marriott, Norton assured a spirited crowd that she would press European parliamentarians to back the measure.

"I will be telling them, 'Do not let the United States government get away with pushing around every other country, insisting on democracy, then coming home and pushing us out when we insist on democracy,' " she said.

Cheers rose from the audience of about 200, including perspiring office workers in shirtsleeves, mothers clutching babies and Faith, an exotic ballet dancer and six-time mayoral candidate, who was clad in a U.S. flag, fishnet stockings and red boots.

The activists hoisted signs in French, German, Russian and other languages demanding the right to full representation for the District. In case the message did not get through, however, organizers set up four voting booths enclosed by a chain-link fence in one corner of the plaza. The fence was festooned with yellow-and-black signs warning: "DC Residents Out! By Order of Congress."

"Our hope is that passage of the resolution will further the cause by putting international pressure on the Congress," said Ilir Zherka, executive director of DC Vote.

Andreas Baker, a spokesman for the OSCE, said that if the D.C. measure passed, it would not have the force of law. It would, however, be included in a final document distributed to the member countries.

"It's essentially the voice of parliamentarians from the 55 [countries]. So it's a recommendation which tends to carry a bit of weight," he said.

An OSCE mission that monitored last year's U.S. presidential election issued a report recently that stated that the U.S. government denies full representation and voting rights to residents of the District.

It was not clear whether the D.C. voting-rights measure would be supported by the entire U.S. delegation, which is composed of six Democratic and six Republican members of Congress. A phone call to the office of Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), the head of the U.S. delegation, was not returned.

DOJ_NMG_0000654

Voting rights activists were scrambling yesterday to make sure the approximately 300 OSCE delegates were aware of the District's special status. They handed out leaflets, marched with signs outside the Marriott and even buttonholed individual legislators.

David Bardin, 72, a retired D.C. attorney, grabbed a Spanish official, Gustavo Pallares, outside the Marriott and quickly filled him in about the local voting situation.

"So you don't have a representative in the U.S. Congress?" said Pallares, puzzled by the idea.

Many legislators simply ignored the protesters. But not Jean-Claude Lefort, a parliamentarian from France. Slapping a "Taxation Without Representation" sticker onto his suit jacket, he walked up and down the line of protesters, shaking hands.

"I support them," he said, explaining his feelings with the French national motto: " Liberté, Egalité, Fraternit é."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft To Pay I.B.M. $775 Million In Settlement (NYT)

By John Markoff

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Microsoft agreed on Friday to pay I.B.M. $775 million to settle claims growing out of the antitrust lawsuit brought by the Justice Department against Microsoft in 1995. I.B.M. will also receive a $75 million credit toward the use of Microsoft software.

The settlement is one of the largest in a series of settlements Microsoft has struck in its effort to resolve its legal troubles after Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson of Federal District Court in Washington ruled in 2000 that it had engaged in anticompetitive practices.

I.B.M., in negotiating a settlement with Microsoft, held back from filing a separate lawsuit. Indeed, the two rivals have recently become partners in some areas. For example, Microsoft will use I.B.M. microprocessor chips in its new game console, the Xbox 360, which is scheduled to be introduced this fall.

Microsoft executives said the settlement with I.B.M. addressed all discriminatory pricing and overcharge claims growing from the federal antitrust case, including claims related to the I.B.M. OS/2 operating system and SmartSuite products. Under the deal, I.B.M. agreed to defer consideration of filing claims related to I.B.M.'s server hardware and server software business for two years.

"It's an important milestone for us that marks the end of a significant effort," Microsoft's chief counsel, Brad Smith, said.

An I.B.M. spokesman, Scott Brooks, said the company was pleased to "resolve this amicably without having to go to greater extremes and we're looking ahead."

Executives at the companies said settlement negotiations began in November 2003 and were stepped up in the last two months because "tolling agreements" that extended the statue of limitations on claims related to the federal antitrust case were set to expire this month.

The claims first emerged in the late 1980's when Microsoft and I.B.M. agreed to develop the OS/2 operating system, which was intended as a replacement for MS-DOS, the original operating system for the I.B.M. PC.

In November 1989, the two companies publicly agreed to develop OS/2 first for high-end computing systems with more than four megabytes of memory. Microsoft, however, proceeded to develop its Windows operating system as an alternative for business customers, undercutting the agreement.

Microsoft's strategy affected not only I.B.M, but software makers like Lotus Development, which initially developed its software for OS/2 and not Windows.

Judge Jackson's ruling found that "from 1994 to 1997 Microsoft consistently pressured I.B.M. to reduce its support for software products that competed with Microsoft's offerings, and it used its monopoly power in the market for Intel-compatible PC operating systems to punish I.B.M. for its refusal to cooperate."

Andrew I. Gavil, a law professor at Howard University, said that Microsoft had managed to resolve many of its legal troubles without radically altering its conduct.

"It's paying for peace," Professor Gavil said, "but it's not changing its behavior in any significant way."

In recent years, Microsoft has spent more than $3 billion settling lawsuits by its rivals, including a $1.6 billion deal with Sun Microsystems in 2004 and a $750 million deal with America Online, part of Time Warner, in 2003.

In April Microsoft agreed to settle claims with Gateway Computer arising out of the government's antitrust suit for $150 million. Microsoft said earlier this year that it would place $550 million in reserve for further antitrust-related claims.

The company said Friday that it would describe how it would account for the I.B.M. settlement when it reports its quarterly financial results in July.

DOJ_NMG_0000655

"This is just cleaning up the remaining mess on the floor," said Robert E. Litan, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and a former Justice Department prosecutor.

Mr. Litan also noted that while Microsoft's software monopoly in the home PC market has remained durable despite the federal antitrust ruling, the rise of the open-source Linux operating system, which is freely distributed, has proven a powerful counterweight to Microsoft's power in the corporate server market.

"You cannot underestimate the impact of Linux" on the computing industry in recent years, he said.

Microsoft also settled with Novell in November 2004 for $536 million for claims related to the antitrust case; however, Novell has since filed a second antitrust suit against Microsoft related to its WordPerfect word-processing software application.

Microsoft is also facing a lawsuit by RealNetworks over its Windows Media Player software and is appealing a $600 million antitrust ruling brought by European regulators.

As part of the ruling in 2000, Judge Jackson ordered that Microsoft be broken into two companies to curb its monopolistic practices. But the next year, the new Bush administration decided not to seek a breakup and the Justice Department settled in 2002.

Shares of I.B.M. shares rose 47 cents on Friday, to close at $74.67. Microsoft shares declined 13 cents, to close at $24.71.

Microsoft To Pay To Settle IBM Claims (LAT)

By Joseph Menn, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

Microsoft Corp. said Friday that it agreed to give $775 million in cash and $75 million worth of software to IBM Corp. to resolve one of the largest remaining antitrust claims against the world's biggest software maker.

The settlement is the latest in a string of arrangements with customers and longtime business rivals that began after Microsoft resolved a long-running antitrust case with the Justice Department.

Including the IBM accord, Microsoft has now agreed to pay $4.5 billion to settle class-action consumer suits and business cases brought by Time Warner Inc., owner of the vanquished Netscape Web browser, as well as by Sun Microsystems Inc. and others. It takes Microsoft less than a month to earn what it's paying IBM.

"Over the last few years we have been focused on resolving our disputes with other companies, and today's announcement takes another significant step towards achieving that goal," Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith said in a statement issued jointly with IBM. "With these antitrust issues behind us, both Microsoft and IBM can move ahead."

Still pending against Microsoft is a suit by RealNetworks Inc., which makes a video and music player for computers. RealNetworks is seeking $1 billion in damages.

Unlike Microsoft's settlements with Time Warner and Sun, the Microsoft-IBM agreement makes no reference to any broader framework for cooperation. IBM reserved the right to take action against Microsoft over other alleged improper behavior in the computer market.

Microsoft's stock slipped 13 cents to $24.71, while IBM shares rose 47 cents to $74.67.

IBM was seeking restitution for misbehavior by Microsoft identified in 1999 by U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson. Jackson ruled that IBM and Gateway Inc. had to pay more than other firms to install Microsoft's Windows operating system on the computers they sold because those two companies wouldn't help Microsoft suppress competition.

Jackson found that Microsoft retaliated against IBM because of Big Blue's promotion of its own operating system and its decision to install its SmartSuite bundle of productivity applications, which competed with Microsoft's Office programs.

When IBM refused to stop promoting its competing products, Jackson wrote in his decision, Microsoft "punished" IBM by charging higher prices, delaying the license IBM needed to install the crucial Windows 95 operating system on its computers, and withholding technical and marketing support.

"Microsoft did not grant IBM a license to pre-install Windows 95 [on its computers] until 15 minutes before the start of Microsoft's official launch event," Jackson wrote. That was five weeks after other manufacturers got their copies of Windows.

IBM lost large accounts worth about $180 million in revenue during that period because those computer buyers worried that the tension between the two tech giants would keep Microsoft software from performing as well on IBM machines, the judge said.

IBM didn't sue Microsoft, but Jackson's findings significantly increased the odds that Big Blue and others who Jackson said suffered from the hardball tactics could win in court.

Microsoft and IBM began negotiating a settlement shortly after a group backed by IBM asked for permission in April to make arguments during Microsoft's appeal of European antitrust sanctions.

The animosity between the two giants goes back even further, to one of the great strategic blunders of the technology era.

In the early 1980s, IBM allowed Microsoft to sell the operating system it designed for IBM to other companies as well, a step that eventually made the operating system, ubiquitous and indispensable while reducing the importance of the computer it ran on. In that way, IBM helped create the monopoly it later accused Microsoft of exploiting.

Since then, the companies have cooperated in some areas, such as setting standards for programs that operate over the Internet, while squaring off in markets for databases and for operating systems, where IBM promotes Linux over Windows.

"They're huge competitors, but they have an understanding of one another," said Matt Rosoff, an analyst with independent research firm Directions on Microsoft.

Microsoft To Pay I.B.M. $775 Million To Settle Antitrust Claims (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And John Markoff

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Microsoft said today that it would pay I.B.M., which it displaced as the world's premier technology purveyor, $775 million to settle a number of outstanding antitrust claims.

The settlement stems from the Justice Department's antitrust case against Microsoft in the mid-1990's, in which Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson found the giant software company's practices harmed the International Business Machines Corporation, based in Armonk, N.Y. That case was settled in 2001.

Under the agreement announced today, I.B.M. will also receive a $75 million credit toward using Microsoft software. It is the latest, and one of the largest, in a string of antitrust settlements totaling more than $3 billion between Microsoft, based in Redmond, Wash., and its rivals. In April, Microsoft said it would pay Gateway $150 million. Last year, it agreed to pay Sun Microsystems $1.6 billion, Microsoft's largest such payout.

I.B.M. and Microsoft, which issued a joint statement today, came to an agreement just weeks before a deal to extend the statute of limitations on the claims was to expire in July. The companies said they had been negotiating for the last two months.

"It's good that our two companies worked out something of this magnitude without having to go to court," Microsoft's general counsel and senior vice president, Bradford Smith, said in a telephone interview. "This is significant for an industry that has been marked by more than its share of its litigation over past decade."

He said I.B.M. was one of four rivals that approached Microsoft to start settlement talks at the end of 2003, just before the statute of limitations on Judge Jackson's ruling were expiring. The other three were Gateway, Novell and an undisclosed fourth company. With this latest agreement, Microsoft has reached deals with all four companies.

I.B.M.'s general counsel and senior vice president, Ed Lineen, said, "I.B.M. is pleased that we have amicably resolved these long standing issues."

The settlement includes claims related to I.B.M.'s OS/2 operating system and SmartSuite software package, neither of which ever established more than a toehold in the personal computer market dominated by Microsoft's Windows and Office software. In the agreement announced today, Microsoft also dropped antitrust claims against I.B.M.

But the agreement did not cover claims of damage to I.B.M.'s server hardware and software business. I.B.M. has agreed, with some unspecified limitations, not to seek damages on harm to its server business before June 30, 2002. An I.B.M. spokesman, Scott Brooks, declined to say which, if any, of those claims the company planned to pursue.

The latest settlement will have little direct bearing on I.B.M.'s business, aside from providing a few hundred million dollars in extra profits. The company has moved away from building and selling personal computers and related software, largely ceding those businesses to Microsoft and hardware makers like Dell. I.B.M. now makes most of its money by providing computer services to large businesses and governments.

An antitrust expert who has closely followed the Microsoft cases said the I.B.M. and other settlements did not, and will not, have much impact on the personal computer industry.

"They are not in any way agreeing to fundamentally change how they do business," the expert, Andrew I. Gavil, a law professor at Howard University, said of Microsoft. "The only case where anyone is really holding out is the RealNetworks case. To them, if they can't get a change in that business model" - a reference to Microsoft's practices - "the cash doesn't do them much good."

In a lawsuit filed in 2003, RealNetworks contends that Microsoft has illegally stifled the growth of software that competes with Windows Media Player utility, which comes bundled together with Microsoft's operating system. RealNetworks is seeking $1 billion in damages.

The accord announced today is also unlikely to have any impact on Microsoft's appeal of a European antitrust judgment against it from last year.

DOJ_NMG_0000657

In March 2004, the European Commission fined Microsoft 497 million euros (about $613 million at the time) and ordered the company to share details of its desktop operating system with rivals. That judgment also demanded that the company make available to personal computer makers a stripped-down version of its software without its media-playing software.

Just last month, the company and the European Commission agreed to limit access to the software details that Microsoft is disclosing to a select group of rivals. The deal was fashioned specifically to prohibit open-source developers, who provide their software free, from seeing the details at least until Microsoft's appeal of the original ruling works its way through European courts.

Shortly before the close, I.B.M.'s shares were trading up 42 cents, to $74.62, on the New York Stock Exchange. Microsoft's shares were down 6 cents, to $24.78, in Nasdaq trading.

Microsoft Pays IBM $775m To Settle Suit (FT)

By Simon London In San Francisco

Financial Times, July 2, 2005

Microsoft is paying $775m to International Business Machines in the latest stage of its campaign to settle claims of anti-competitive behaviour.

The deal brings to about $4.5bn the total paid by Microsoft to settle private and class-action suits in the US. The largest software company has also paid a $600m fine to the European Commission.

IBM was among the personal computer companies found during the US government's 1998 antitrust case against Microsoft to have been harmed by anti-competitive practices. The finding paved the way for the company to pursue claims against Microsoft. It did so privately, without filing a suit.

Earlier this year, Microsoft paid $150m to Gateway, another PC maker identified in the 1998 case, based on claims that the software group used its monopoly over PC operating systems to overcharge for software and squeeze out rivals.

While the IBM settlement resolves most of the legal claims between two of the largest US technology companies, they are expected to remain fierce rivals. IBM retains the right to pursue claims relating to its server hardware and software business, although it has agreed not to do so for at least two years.

Last year, Microsoft settled outstanding litigation with Sun Microsystems by paying $1.6bn and agreeing to co-operate closely with the troubled IT systems group. The deal with IBM does not include a technology alliance.

In addition to cash payments, Microsoft has agreed to give IBM $75m of free software. Microsoft has now settled the majority of claims arising from the 1998 antitrust case.

Still pending is a $1bn suit by RealNetworks, whose multimedia software is at the centre of action against Microsoft by the European Union. Also in the pipeline is a second suit filed by Novell, which in November settled a separate case with Microsoft for $536m. A further six class action law suits backed by US states remain outstanding.

In its most recent quarter, Microsoft took a $768m charge to cover the Gateway settlement and other legal costs.

The company said it would disclose its accounting treatment for the IBM settlement when it announced quarterly earnings on July 21.

Microsoft To Settle IBM Antitrust Suit (WP/AP)

By Brian Bergstein, Associated Press

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

BOSTON, July 1 -- Microsoft Corp. will pay $775 million in cash and $75 million in credit for software to International Business Machines Corp. to settle claims that resulted from the federal government's antitrust case against Microsoft in the 1990s, the companies announced Friday.

The payout is one of the largest that Microsoft has made since U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson ruled in 2000 that Microsoft engaged in anticompetitive practices. Jackson's ruling cited IBM as a company that Microsoft had forced to "desist from certain technological innovations and business initiatives."

For example, Microsoft did not charge all computer makers the same amount for its Windows operating system, allegedly using higher prices as a cudgel against PC companies that did not comply with Microsoft's wishes.

IBM irked Microsoft in the '90s by pushing its own OS/2 operating system as a Windows alternative and putting its SmartSuite productivity software on IBM PCs, cutting into the market for Microsoft Office programs. IBM also was an early supporter of Java, a programming language that does not need Windows to run.

IBM had not sued Microsoft, but still pressed for retribution for the behavior cited by Jackson. Microsoft reached a similar deal with Gateway Inc. for $150 million in April.

Separately, Microsoft has spent more than $3 billion in recent years settling lawsuits by rivals, including a $1.6 billion deal with Sun Microsystems Inc. in 2004 and a $750 million truce with America Online Inc., part of Time Warner Inc., in 2003.

Redmond, Wash.-based Microsoft still faces other legal challenges, including a lawsuit by RealNetworks Inc. and an appeal of a $600 million antitrust ruling against it by European regulators.

City Not Affected By Price-fixing (EC&P)

By TOM RAITHEL, Courier & Press staff writer

Evansville (IN) Courier & Press, July 2, 2005

A representative for Irving Materials Inc. in Southwestern Indiana said Friday that the price-fixing activity for which the company was fined $29.2 million this week did not extend to the Evansville area.

Kevin Swaidner, general manager for the Southwestern Division of Irving Materials, said that the U.S. Department of Justice had made inquiries into the company's activities in Southwestern and Southeastern Indiana, and concluded that the price-fixing was confined to the central part of the state.

"We know there to be no problems with this issue" outside of Indianapolis, Swaidner said.

Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Department of Justice, said Friday that the department's investigation into concrete price-fixing was continuing.

Irving Materials Inc. (IMI) was given the largest fine in U.S. antitrust history Wednesday for conspiring to inflate the price of concrete in Central Indiana between July 2000 to May 25, 2004. Four company executives pleaded guilty to price-fixing and agreed to pay fines ranging from $100,000 to $200,000 and serve five months in prison followed by five months of home detention.

Scott Hammond, chief of criminal enforcement for the Justice Department, said that the price-fixing scandal could expand to other companies. "IMI did not commit this crime on its own. It's just the first company to fess up, plead guilty and cooperate," Hammond said.

The Indiana Department of Transportation has moved to immediately halt all dealings with Irving Materials Inc. The department said it was contacting the state attorney general's office to determine what legal recourse it might have against the company. Representatives of the department could not be reached for additional comment Friday.

Meanwhile, Boyle Construction Co. of Indianapolis has filed suit against Irving Materials to recover costs. In a related case CWE Concrete Construction of Hamilton County has filed suits against American Concrete Co. of Indianapolis and Builder's Concrete & Supply Co. of Fishers, alleging the two conspired to fix prices.

Swaidner said that the Southwestern Indiana office of Irving Materials in Evansville was a separate division from the Indianapolis office, and the Evansville office made its own pricing decisions.

Concrete made in the Indianapolis area is unlikely to be used in the Evansville area. Concrete is generally made within a 20-mile radius of where it is delivered, Swaidner said.

Irving Materials, based in Greenfield, has branch offices in Louisville, Ky. and Nashville, Tenn., as well as Evansville. The company is a large supplier of concrete. In the Evansville area, the company provided concrete for both the Old National Bancorp and Vectren buildings.

Chinese Company Asks U.S. To Review Its Bid For Unocal (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

The Chinese oil company fighting for control of Unocal said yesterday that it had asked a top government panel in the United States to formally review its $18.5 billion takeover offer, even as political opposition to the bid was growing in Washington.

The Chinese company, the China National Offshore Oil Corporation, or Cnooc, said it had filed a notice with the Treasury Department's Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States to look into the proposed acquisition and requested that the review be conducted "in an expeditious manner."

The recent bid by Cnooc topped an offer of $16.8 billion made in April by Chevron, but threatens to be derailed by American lawmakers opposed to oil and gas assets being snapped up by a Chinese company.

Cnooc is racing against an Aug. 10 deadline, when Unocal shareholders get to vote on the Chevron offer. Cnooc hopes that by pressing for a quick review by the government it can assuage concerns that the takeover will drag on for months and persuade Unocal shareholders to turn down Chevron's bid. While Cnooc and Unocal's management are currently in talks, Unocal's board is still recommending Chevron's offer to its shareholders.

"It's a political decision for Cnooc to file for review," said Nancy McLernon, the deputy director of the Organization for International Investment, a business association that represents American subsidiaries of foreign companies, but does not represent Cnooc.

DOJ_NMG_0000659

"They want the clock to start as soon as possible," she said, "and are actually responding to the concerns on Capitol Hill. This is not typically done in M.& A. activities."

Separately yesterday, the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Representative Joe Barton, Republican of Texas, said he would hold a hearing on Cnooc's bid after Congress returns from the Independence Day recess. His comments came a day after Representative Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, Democrat of Michigan, won passage of an amendment to the annual appropriations bill that would prevent the committee from reviewing the bid.

That committee, headed by the secretary of the Treasury, looks at foreign acquisitions that have national security implications for the United States and can make a recommendation to the president to block the purchase. Since 1988, 1,500 cases were filed, but only one was blocked on national security grounds - the 1990 sale of a Seattle-based airplane parts maker, Mamco Manufacturing, to a military-related agency of the Chinese government.

Cnooc said yesterday that "once all the facts are known and the commercial purpose and terms of the transaction are fully understood, many initial misimpressions will be corrected, and many doubts and questions will be favorably resolved."

Chinese Firm Gives U.S. Details Of Bid To Buy Unocal (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

China's CNOOC Ltd. energy company submitted its $18.5 billion bid for Unocal Corp. to the federal government for a national security review yesterday, hoping to jump-start the regulatory process while it allays political concerns in Washington.

Typically, such reviews -- carried out by the interagency Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS -- do not begin until a takeover bid is accepted. But by making its request quickly, CNOOC, which is 70 percent owned by the Chinese government, hoped to signal wary U.S. lawmakers that the company recognizes their concerns and is ready to cooperate. Company officials also hope to convince Unocal shareholders that U.S. regulatory requirements would not unduly delay a deal's completion.

CNOOC's unsolicited bid last week to wrest Unocal from it U.S. suitor, Chevron Corp., has deepened anti-Chinese animosity in Washington. By a vote of 333 to 92, the House on Thursday passed an amendment to an appropriations bill that would bar the Treasury Department -- which leads CFIUS -- from spending any money to approve the CNOOC takeover.

CNOOC has shored up its political position, retaining the law firm Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld LLP to handle its lobbying, and Public Opinion Strategies, a firm with ties to the Bush White House, to lead its public relations. Chevron has been at least as active, mobilizing its Washington office and its large number of contract lobbyists, according to corporate lobbyists familiar with the oil giant's effort.

Chevron, which has offered Unocal shareholders $16.5 billion in cash and stock, yesterday revealed it had already offered promotions to 25 top Unocal executives, available if shareholders accept Chevron's offer. Of those, 20 have already accepted, said Chevron spokesman Charles R. Stewart.

In an interview this week, Chevron Vice Chairman Peter J. Robertson said few Unocal workers outside the company's Southern California headquarters would lose their jobs in an acquisition, implying that CNOOC could make no such promise. The promotions could entice senior Unocal executives to pressure shareholders, while signaling again that a Chevron takeover would be quick and seamless.

Unocal shareholders cannot consider the CNOOC bid until after Aug. 10, when they are scheduled to vote on Chevron's offer, Robertson said. If Chevron is rejected, then CNOOC would begin its regulatory process and security review.

"They're in for a long and drawn-out process," Robertson said.

But Mark Palmer of Public Opinion Strategies said the process would be faster than Chevron depicts. A CFIUS review that finds no threat to national security in a foreign takeover can take less than 30 days, and there is precedent for the process to begin before a takeover bid is formally accepted, he said.

"We want to provide timing and certainty to Unocal stockholders for our superior offer," Palmer said, "and we want the committee to begin the process as soon as possible."

CNOOC Seeks US Review Of Unocal Bid (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington And Joe Leahy In Hong Kong

Financial Times, July 2, 2005

China National Offshore Oil Corporation said on Friday it had filed notice on its proposed $18.5bn merger with Unocal with the US government committee that reviews foreign acquisitions.

DOJ_NMG_0000660

The move to alert the committee on foreign investments, an interagency panel chaired by the Treasury department, is a significant step for CNOOC in its attempt to take over Unocal, a California-based energy group that has accepted a lower offer from Chevron, the US oil giant.

It is not clear whether the CFIUS will proceed with the review because Unocal has so far indicated it continues to favour Chevron's bid.

"A review begins when the committee has received the requisite filings from both parties in the proposed transaction and has made a judgment that the acquisition will be successful - that it is likely," the Treasury department said.

CNOOC's approach to CFIUS emerged as both bidders said they had agreed to retain Unocal executives after any merger.

Although the discussions between CNOOC and Unocal took place before Chevron's offer in April, it is understood that key figures would be willing to remain in place if CNOOC's bid were successful.

Chevron is also wooing Unocal executives. Peter Robertson, Chevron's vice-chairman, said it had offered 20 Unocal executives jobs in a merged entity and they had accepted, indicating the two rivals are keen to secure management talent as well as the backing of shareholders.

Mr Robertson also raised the prospect of referring CNOOC's bid to the World Trade Organisation on the grounds that support from the Chinese government meant the proposed deal was not a purely commercial transaction.

In response, CNOOC on Friday said: "The process of regulatory review for this takeover is entirely clear. We're expecting to proceed to a CFIUS review which will give us the opportunity to fully explain our offer."

CFIUS, whose members include representatives from the Justice Department, Commerce, Defense and Homeland Security, is mandated by law to examine foreign acquisitions of US assets or companies on national security grounds.

CNOOC said the committee's regulations required that Unocal respond to questions on the proposed transaction within seven days of a CFIUS request.

"We have given Unocal certainty with regard to our proposal . . . and assurances with regard to the regulatory approval process," said Yang Hua, CNOOC's chief financial officer.

If CFIUS agrees to review the proposed bid, the committee can examine the deal for 30 days.

If it determines that the deal should be investigated, the probe must be completed within 45 days. CFIUS then makes a recommendation to the US president, who has 15 days to act.

CNOOC Asks U.S. Panel To Review Unocal Bid (REU-Y2)

By Ben Berkowitz

Reuters, July 2, 2005

China's CNOOC Ltd. on Friday said it asked a top-level U.S. government panel to review its proposed merger with oil and gas producer Unocal Corp. in an effort to advance its politically charged $18.5 billion bid.

The Chinese oil company's offer topped a $16 billion-plus cash and stock offer from San Ramon, California-based Chevron Corp., which Unocal has accepted.

A spokesman for Unocal, which is headquartered in El Segundo, California, told Reuters the company was not involved in CNOOC's request for a review from the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States. He added that the two sides do not have an agreement that would necessarily spur CNOOC to request a review.

"What Unocal is doing is saying -- look we're not going to be party to help (CNOOC) in their efforts to try to get clearance," said James Halloran, an analyst with National City Private Client Group which manages $33 billion in assets. His firm has 18,400 Unocal shares and 2.1 million shares of Chevron. "It's more money but management must show good faith .... they signed an agreement."

CNOOC, whose largest shareholder is the Chinese government, has said from the outset of its offer that it wanted a review. The interagency committee, known as CFIUS, considers proposed acquisitions of U.S. corporations by foreigners where national security might be a concern.

CFIUS will not begin its work until it has received what it calls a complete notification. If the panel accepts the application for review, it has 30 days to decide whether to launch a full investigation.

"If one party, either side, thinks it's in the interest to either get over the CFIUS hurdle or, perhaps in some cases, fend off an unwelcome offer through raising the CFIUS hurdle, the law and regulations permit them to do that," said Cecil Hunt, a lawyer at Harris, Wiltshire & Grannis LLP in Washington who worked on CFIUS matters at the Commerce Department.

A person close to the deal with expertise on CFIUS said CNOOC's filing included significant information about Unocal, but that it was ultimately up to the committee to decide whether the notification was complete.

"I have every reason to believe they will follow their own regulations and turn around and send a letter to Unocal asking them for information," the person said.

POLITICAL BACKLASH

CNOOC's bid for Unocal has become a complicating factor in the diplomatic jostling between China and the United States over currency and trade issues. It also comes at a sensitive time when oil is trading near record highs, and both countries are intent on securing energy resources.

The U.S. House of Representatives voted overwhelmingly Thursday to add an amendment to an appropriations bill that would bar the Treasury Department from spending any money to recommend approval of the CNOOC bid for Unocal. If signed into law, the measure would not take effect until Oct. 1.

The House also passed a nonbinding resolution calling on President Bush to request an immediate review of the deal. Rep. Joe Barton (news, bio, voting record), the chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee and co-sponsor of the resolution, called for a hearing on the CNOOC bid.

Barton, a Texas Republican, called CNOOC "a front company for the Communist Chinese government."

CNOOC's request for the government review was made before the two House votes.

Late Friday, Chevron denied what it said were media reports it was going to seek intervention from the World Trade Organization on the CNOOC bid.

VOTE APPROACHING

Unocal shareholders are set to vote Aug. 10 on the offer from Chevron. Until then, Chevron says, CNOOC and Unocal cannot sign a deal unless Chevron is paid a $500 million breakup fee.

As of Friday afternoon the Chevron offer valued Unocal at about $60 per share compared with a $67 offer from CNOOC. Unocal shares were up 26 cents at $65.31.

Given that the CNOOC offer is more attractive financially, many investors have said the only real hurdle is political opposition that could slow down the acquisition. Chevron's offer already has all the necessary regulatory approvals.

"If the shareholders vote to approve the Chevron deal, which we hope and think they won't, then there's nothing left for the committee to review," the person familiar with the deal said.

(Additional reporting by Jeremy Pelofsky and Chris Baltimore in Washington and David Brinkerhoff in New York)

ENVIRONMENT:

Future Of Salmon Leads To Dispute Over Federal Dams (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

Behold the slab of concrete called Little Goose -- ground zero in the salmon wars that are escalating across the Pacific Northwest.

Little Goose has turbines for power, locks for river transport and a Rube Goldberg device for distilling young salmon out of the river, sorting them by size, and hosing them into trucks and barges for passage downriver.

This hulking gizmo has become part of the "environmental baseline" here on the Snake River. At least that is how the Bush administration characterizes Little Goose and 13 other federal dams on the Snake and Columbia rivers.

This characterization, though, has stuck in the craw of a federal judge. In his courtroom in Portland, Ore., U.S. District Judge James A. Redden described the administration's 2004 biological opinion -- it says dams are an ineluctable part of the river's environmental baseline -- as a document written "more in cynicism than in sincerity."

The sincerity of the administration's policy is also being questioned by some scientists who work for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Fisheries Service, according to a survey of agency employees released Tuesday by the Union of Concerned Scientists and Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility. It found that about two-thirds of those surveyed did not believe the agency, responsible for protecting endangered fish and their habitat, was effectively doing its job. More than half of respondents said they knew of cases in which "commercial interests" or senior administration officials have "inappropriately" influenced agency decisions.

Results of the survey, which went to 460 science professionals and had a response rate of 27 percent, are similar to those of a survey early this year of scientists at the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

The chief science adviser at NOAA Fisheries challenged the latest survey, saying it obtained responses from only 6 percent of more than 2,000 agency scientists. Steven Murawski said the survey itself is poor science because it was not sent to "the overwhelming number of our science professionals."

DOJ_NMG_0000662

In Portland, Redden has tossed out as "legally flawed" the administration's 2004 biological opinion for the Columbia and Snake. He declared that it "ignored the reality of past, present and future effects" of dams on 12 species of endangered fish. Before the dams were built, these rivers were conduits for the world's premier salmon run.

"As currently operated, I find that the DAMS strongly contribute to the endangerment of the listed species and irreparable injury will result if changes are not made," Redden wrote.

To that end, he supported a request from the National Wildlife Federation and other salmon advocates, ordering that water be spilled over Little Goose Dam and other dams in the lower Snake. The spill started June 20. Spilling water over dams keeps migrating juvenile fish in the river, while keeping them out of turbines that often kill them. When less water goes through its turbines, though, Little Goose produces less electricity. Through the end of August, this dam will spill water that would be worth $267,288 a day, if it had been fed into turbines to generate electricity, said Carl Knaak, operations manager at the dam.

The total tab for the spill ordered by Redden will come to about $67 million, according to the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA), which sells power from federal dams in the Northwest and adamantly opposes the spill. For the average electricity customer whose utility buys all its power from BPA, the cost will be relatively low. It will require an increase of about 1.2 percent in the monthly bill (about 87 cents), said Ed Sheets, a private consultant with expertise in the Northwest hydro system.

The spill -- and Redden's coruscating language in tossing out the government's approach to running the river -- appears to have angered the Bush administration. The Justice Department tried last month -- and failed -- to persuade the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit in San Francisco to issue an emergency order to stop the spill. Last week that court also ruled against the administration on another salmon dispute, upholding a Seattle federal court ruling that the Environmental Protection Agency violated the Endangered Species Act by failing to protect salmon from harmful pesticides.

In the dispute over the spill, the 9th Circuit has ordered an expedited hearing on the government's appeal to the Redden ruling.

The Justice Department argues in its appeal that keeping endangered salmon in the dammed-up river -- rather than barging or trucking them around federal dams -- is "judicial experimentation."

"A federal judge just isn't in a position to step in and decide how to operate the system," said Fred Disheroon, special litigation council for the Justice Department on the salmon issue. "The judge is ordering something that is untested and in our view puts the fish at greater risk."

Research has shown that nearly all fish transported around the dams survive the ride, but it has not conclusively shown that trucking or barging them is better or worse for the longtime survival of salmon as compared with letting them swim in the river and negotiate the dams.

Dams kill juvenile salmon in a number of ways: in turbines; in the slow-moving, relatively warm reservoirs between dams; and by stunning them in a way that makes them vulnerable to predators.

If the government does not win its appeal, Disheroon said, it might invoke a rarely used provision of the Endangered Species Act, which would convene a Cabinet-level committee informally called the "God Squad." After a lengthy public process, the committee could decide that economic concerns justify the extinction of endangered fish.

Given the judge's decision, Disheroon said, "it may not be possible to come up with a way to avoid jeopardy for these fish."

Lawyers for the environmental groups that sued the government argue that it is absurd for the Bush administration to argue that keeping salmon in the river is an untested and risky plan.

"The science is clear. If we want to bring the salmon back, we have to be willing to make the hydrosystem work more like a natural river," said Todd True, a staff attorney for Earthjustice. "The Bonneville Power Administration thinks it owns the river, and they don't want to give it up -- not one drop."

Behind the legal arguments that are swirling this summer around the river system lie two long-held and diametrically opposed views about what should happen to Little Goose and three other dams in the lower Snake River.

Environmental groups, some state fish agencies and many salmon biologists argue that removing the dams is the only possible way to prevent wholesale extinction of Snake River salmon. It is an argument that dates back six decades -- well before Little Goose and its sister dams were built in the 1960s and '70s.

In 1946, the chief of fisheries for the Oregon Fish Commission warned about what the four Snake River dams would do: "All western biologists with whom I have talked agree that this plan, if followed, will spell the doom of salmon and steelhead migration up the Snake."

But the dams are now embedded into the economic status quo of the Northwest -- producing power and enabling river transport and irrigation. The federal government has promised to spend billions of dollars in coming years to find better mechanical fixes for moving salmon around dams.

At the top of the Bush administration, the signal is clear: President Bush has himself come to the lower Snake and pledged that dams such as Little Goose will never be removed.

DOJ_NMG_0000663

Proposals Stiffen Standards On Air (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

Environmental Protection Agency staff members proposed tightening the nation's air pollution standards yesterday, a move that environmentalists said could save the lives of thousands of Americans.

Aides to EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson outlined two scenarios in their report on what should be the acceptable nationwide level for "fine particulate matter," the soot that invades people's lungs and causes respiratory ailments. Both scenarios would slash the amount of small particles in the air, although one proposal would go significantly further than the other.

Under standards set in 1997, soot levels should not exceed 15 micrograms per cubic meter of air on an annual basis, or 65 micrograms during a single 24-hour period. EPA aides said yesterday that the agency could either maintain the annual soot standard but reduce the daily level to between 25 and 35 micrograms, or reduce the annual limit to as low as 12 to 15 micrograms per cubic meter of air and cap the 24-hour level at between 25 and 40 micrograms.

Public health advocates, who back the more stringent proposal, hailed the EPA for moving to curb harmful air pollution. According to the EPA, fine particulate matter, which is one-thirtieth the width of a human hair, accounts for 5,000 premature deaths each year in nine cities: Boston, Detroit, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Phoenix, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, San Jose and Seattle.

"These standards could provide the Bush administration with a historic opportunity to protect public health," said Frank O'Donnell, who heads the advocacy group Clean Air Trust.

Cities and communities across the country have to meet the air standards or risk facing a series of penalties, including lost federal highway funds. The federal government also tailors new rules, such as the recently unveiled Clean Air Interstate Rule, to conform with national soot standards.

Some industry groups, however, oppose tightening the standards on the grounds that they can hamper economic growth.

Bryan Brendle, director of air quality issues at the National Association of Manufacturers, said state and local officials tend to target manufacturers in an effort to comply with stricter standards, which "imposes compliance costs on industry." He added: "At NAM, we try to balance environmental quality with increased economic growth."

Many communities are still struggling to meet the nation's 1997 guidelines. According to a recent EPA report, about 88 million Americans are breathing air that fails to meet federal standards.

George Thurston, an associate professor at New York University Medical Center, said researchers have learned enough over the past decade to insist that federal officials need to adopt stricter air pollution standards.

"While it sounds like an academic debate, it provides protection for all of us across the country," Thurston said.

In a statement issued yesterday, the agency did not say which approach Johnson, who is required to make a decision on the final air quality proposal by Dec. 20, would adopt. It did say, "The reduction of fine particle pollution is a critical element of the administration's comprehensive national clean air strategy."

The new standards are supposed to take effect by Sept. 27, 2006.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Book On Watergate Fleshes Out Deep Throat (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

From start to finish, W. Mark Felt was a bureau guy, a true believer, an officer sworn to uphold the security of the country against all manner of enemies, whether they were bank robbers, domestic terrorists, foreign spies - or, as Bob Woodward writes in his latest book, the highest official in the land.

And so, Mr. Woodward concludes in "The Secret Man," a chronicle of his sometimes tense relationship with Mr. Felt, it was not the 1972 burglary of the Democratic National Committee office in the Watergate apartments that compelled Mr. Felt to become a secret source for Mr. Woodward and his Washington Post reporting partner, Carl Bernstein. It was President Richard M. Nixon.

Mr. Felt, then the second-ranking official at the Federal Bureau of Investigation, "never really voiced pure outrage to me about Watergate or what it represented," Mr. Woodward writes in the book, which is scheduled for release next week. "The crimes and abuses were background music. Nixon was trying to subvert not only the law but the bureau. So Watergate became Felt's instrument to reassert the bureau's independence and thus its supremacy. In the end, the bureau was damaged, seriously but not permanently, while Nixon lost much more, maybe everything."

"By surviving and enduring his hidden life," Mr. Woodward adds, "in contrast and in his own way, Mark Felt won."

DOJ_NMG_0000664

Mr. Woodward's book adds little to the basic story line of the Watergate case, even as it continued with the disclosure last month by Vanity Fair magazine that Mr. Felt was the source who became known as Deep Throat. But it does provide texture regarding the lengths to which Mr. Felt, now 91, and Mr. Woodward would go to maintain their secret.

Mr. Woodward, an assistant managing editor at The Post, also writes of efforts, starting in 2000, to reconnect with his source to learn his motivations of decades before. Mr. Woodward describes telephone calls and visits to Mr. Felt in Santa Rosa, Calif., that, owing to Mr. Felt's failing memory, left his most burning questions unanswered.

While the 249-page book is clearly Mr. Woodward's, he gives Mr. Bernstein modest room at the end for "A Reporter's Assessment," allowing him to share the spotlight after Mr. Felt's identity was disclosed. Mr. Bernstein, a contributing editor to Vanity Fair who admits he knew nothing of the magazine's scoop, offers his own view of how assiduously the pair worked to keep Mr. Felt's identity a secret.

And it was a secret well kept, as Mr. Woodward writes, with only rare instances when it was threatened - once by Mr. Felt himself.

Mr. Woodward recalled learning from an assistant attorney general, Stanley Pottinger, in 1976 that Mr. Felt seemed to betray himself during testimony before a grand jury. By Mr. Woodward's account, Mr. Pottinger said that after he and other lawyers had finished their questions, a member of the jury asked Mr. Felt if he was Deep Throat.

Mr. Pottinger told Mr. Woodward that Mr. Felt "looked so stunned, he seemed to go white."

Mr. Felt answered that he was not, but Mr. Pottinger's suspicions were aroused. He approached Mr. Felt and asked him in a whisper if he would prefer that the juror's question be withdrawn.

"Withdraw the question," Mr. Felt replied quickly, convincing Mr. Pottinger of his secret role.

After hearing the account from Mr. Pottinger, Mr. Woodard wrote, "I was jumping out of my skin."

Much of what Mr. Woodward learned from Mr. Felt came from meetings at an otherwise ordinary underground parking lot in Rosslyn, Va., just across the Potomac River from Georgetown.

By prior arrangements, Mr. Woodward would move a flower pot on his apartment balcony, a signal to Mr. Felt that he needed to ask him questions, and Mr. Felt would indicate a time by writing it on page 20 of Mr. Woodward's home-delivered copy of The New York Times.

That usually meant a wee-hours rendezvous at the bottom level of the garage. Always concerned about disclosure and the possibility that someone might follow Mr. Woodward to learn the identity of his source, Mr. Felt advised Mr. Woodward how to travel.

"Take the alley," he said, as Mr. Woodward writes. "Don't use your own car. Take a taxicab to a point several blocks from a hotel where there are cabs after midnight. Get dropped off and then walk to get a second cab to Rosslyn. Don't get dropped off directly at the parking garage. Walk the last several blocks. If you're being followed, don't go down to the garage. I'll understand if you don't show."

IMMIGRATION:

U.S. Extends Work Permits For Some (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 2, 2005

Immigration officials announced Friday that they will extend work permits for Hondurans and Nicaraguans with temporary protected status.

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services said the automatic, 90-day extension will apply to employment authorization documents with a Jan. 5, 2005, expiration date and a category of "A-12" or "C-19." Affected people do not need to report to or call a CIS office.

Officials first offered temporary protected status in 1998 to illegal immigrants from Honduras and Nicaragua after their countries were devastated by Hurricane Mitch. The immigrants' protected status has been renewed several times since.

In November 2004, CIS extended work permits for people from those two countries through July 5, 2005. Protected immigrants were required to get new documents by the beginning of July, but CIS said in a statement Friday that the agency would not be able to process all the forms by then because of the unexpectedly large number of applicants. The new Oct. 5 deadline will give CIS time to get through more paperwork.

___

On the Net:

U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services: http://uscis.gov

DOJ_NMG_0000665

TAX:

3 Yahweh Defendants Sentenced To Prison (ACP)

By ANDREW JOHNSON, Staff Writer

Atlantic City (NJ) Press, July 2, 2005

CAMDEN - Facing their fate in front of a federal judge, Joseph and Inge Donato stood side by side, holding hands, with Inge resting her head slightly against her husband's shoulder.

To the end, members of the Restored Israel of Yahweh remained united in faith and with each other.

A federal judge said he was impressed with the sincerity of the group's beliefs but less impressed with their sincerity in trying to obey the law.

U.S. District Court Judge Jerome B. Simandle sentenced Joseph Donato to 27 months and Inge Donato to six months in prison for their conviction on numerous tax-related charges Friday. Another senior member of the Hamilton Township biblical sect, Kevin McKee, received a prison sentence of 24 months.

All three defendants had fines levied against them and will have to file delinquent tax returns when they leave prison for the years they never paid the government.

A jury found in December that the members of the religious sect were guilty on 19 counts of conspiracy to defraud the government, tax evasion and failure to file taxes. The three say they do not pay federal taxes because they do not support war. McKee, in a pre-sentence report, indicated that a prison sentence was not likely to significantly alter that position.

There was little reaction after the sentencing in the courtroom filled with followers of the religion or from the defendants themselves.

Inge Donato alone received a sharply reduced sentence that departed from federal guidelines because of a mental condition she suffers from. After interviewing the 44-year-old Mays Landing woman, a social worker recommended the reduced sentence. The nature of the condition was never discussed in open court. Allusions were made to a childhood trauma and a subsequent fragile nature.

McKee's attorney, Rocco Cipparone, said afterward that his client was disappointed about the prison sentence. "It was not his intention or goal." That said, he was not surprised. Cipparone said that he will file an appeal on McKee's behalf with the same court.

Post-sentence commentary from Internal Revenue Service spokesman Al Drucker was short and to the point: "The taxpayer does not have the right to disobey tax law."

Although the jury took roughly four hours to convict all three defendants, Simandle took two days to handle their sentencing, saying that he was determined to get it right.

Simandle said he never doubted the religious members' convictions, and more than one defendant thanked the judge for his conduct during the trial.

In the end, though, Simandle did not cut the two male defendants a break, and said that he had mixed feelings about the group's actions.

Members of the sect believe God will destroy the Earth and set up a holy kingdom of resurrected souls. They also believed that their deceased spiritual leader Leo Volpe was the prophet Jeremiah.

"I have strong reservations about the way the belief was acted on," Simandle said.

The judge said that there are many ways to protest war, as others have shown. Simandle said the Yahweh group chose to ignore all taxes, including state taxes, and monies set aside for social programs such as Workman's Compensation and Social Security.

In his closing argument, Andy Kameros, a trial attorney with the Tax Division at the Justice Department, said that by not paying taxes for war, the group essentially pocketed the money for themselves.

"It is neither pure or unpure," Simandle said about the group's motive to not pay taxes.

McKee and Inge Donato must report to prison Aug. 8. Joseph Donato is allowed to report a week later and say goodbye to his wife before she is incarcerated.

Economic Growth, Tax Receipts Combine To Reduce Deficit (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

An unanticipated surge of tax payments may push the 2005 federal budget deficit as much as $100 billion below official forecasts, leaving Republicans to claim vindication in their theory that lowering tax rates actually boosts tax receipts.

DOJ_NMG_0000666

In addition, this week the Commerce Department reported a solid economic growth rate of 3.8 percent for the first three months of 2005, an improvement on the earlier 3.5 percent estimate and more ammunition for Republican boasts that their tax cuts are the cause of this performance.

"Sustained, strong . . . growth confirms that our policies continue to boost the economy and tax revenues," said Rep. Jim Nussle (R-Iowa), chairman of the House Budget Committee.

But senior budget analysts, including the Republican who heads the Congressional Budget Office, cautioned this week that higher tax revenues may be a one-time phenomenon that in no way addresses the nation's grave deficit challenge.

Much of the increase could stem from temporary factors, said CBO director Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former Bush White House economist. The major corporate tax cut of 2004 provided a one-year "tax holiday" for multinational corporations to bring home overseas profits at a reduced tax rate, and companies may be responding aggressively. Also, a large tax break for business investment ended Dec. 31, effectively raising some corporate tax rates this year, Holtz-Eakin said.

Finally, strong stock market gains last year, coupled with lingering jitters from the market swoon of 2000, may have produced strong executive bonuses and a rush to cash in stocks and stock options, other economists said.

"I find it difficult to get as excited about this as some people" are, Holtz-Eakin said.

For longtime champions of supply-side economic theory, the excitement is palpable. Since the political rise of Ronald Reagan, such conservative economists have contended that cuts in income tax rates and in taxes on investment income would generate economic growth that would in turn produce more revenue, possibly enough to pay for the tax cuts. The theory was popularized by economist Arthur Laffer and his Laffer curve.

The government's take this tax season validates that theory, conservatives say. On a single day, June 15, the Treasury took in a record $61 billion. Through June 30, three-quarters of the way through the fiscal year, receipts indicate the Treasury will reap $80 billion to $100 billion more in taxes than the CBO predicted in January. Individual tax payments have risen 21 percent beyond their level at this time last year. Corporate tax receipts are 48 percent ahead.

Despite slightly higher-than-expected spending, the federal deficit could come in at $325 billion to $350 billion, significantly better than the White House's $427 billion projection or the CBO's $400 billion forecast. Some Wall Street economists say the deficit could be as low as $300 billion.

"The numbers are an eye-popping vindication of the Laffer curve and the Bush tax cut's real economic value," anti-tax activist Stephen Moore wrote in the Wall Street Journal.

Michael T. Darda, chief economist of the Connecticut equity firm MKM Partners LLC, estimated that economic growth generated by the Bush tax cuts would generate $1.5 trillion in tax receipts over the next decade, nearly enough to recoup all the revenue loss expected due to lower rates. Writing for the conservative National Review, Darda blasted the "no-growth neo-Malthusian Democrats" and the "root-canal contingent" of the GOP who continue to fret over the budget impact of tax cuts.

Still, if the tax cuts are now yielding a rising tax take, the effect was certainly not immediate. The major tax cut of 2001 and further cuts in each of the last three years were followed by an unprecedented three-year decline in nominal tax revenues, from $2 trillion in 2000 to $1.8 trillion in 2003. Revenues recovered last year, reaching nearly $1.9 trillion. But at 16.3 percent of the gross domestic product, last year's revenue total, measured against the size of the economy, was the lowest level since 1959.

Robert Carroll, the deputy assistant Treasury secretary for tax analysis, was cautious about attributing this year's rising tax receipts to any single factor. It will be some time before the Treasury can decipher how much of the rush is attributable to capital gains and dividend taxes directly related to the Bush tax cut of 2003, Carroll said. But he did indicate the increased tax flow will be reflected not only in the administration's updated deficit forecast for 2005 but also in its long-term forecast when that is released July 15.

That has Democrats -- and some economists -- worried.

"My concern is you're going to have exactly this kind of talk, and what it does is undermine the real need, which is to cut the deficit," said Edward McKelvey, an economist and federal budget analyst at Goldman Sachs in New York. "That's dangerous."

Even a $300 billion deficit would be the third largest ever in nominal dollars, said John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.), the ranking Democrat on the House Budget Committee. Moreover, the major budget challenges are yet to come. The Medicare prescription drug benefit goes into effect next year. The alternative minimum tax, which was created to ensure that the rich pay taxes but is now taking an ever larger bite out of the middle class, has yet to be permanently fixed. And war costs have still not been counted in future deficit projections.

"It's good news," Spratt said of the improving deficit picture, "but no one should assume it's going to continue, and above all nobody should get euphoric and assume we're going to grow our way out of this deficit."

Business investment and stock-price gains have slowed from last year, Holtz-Eakin cautioned, possibly indicating that the government is not seeing the kind of sustained tax gains that drove the deficit into surplus in the late 1990s. CBO is not likely to project the 2005 gains too far into the future, Holtz-Eakin said, especially considering that the huge liabilities of Medicare and Social Security remain unaddressed.

"I do hope people are taking this with a grain of salt and not thinking this is 1998 all over again," Holtz-Eakin said. "There's simply no question if you take yourself to 2008, 2009 or 2010, that vision is the same today as it was two months ago."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Gets First Chance For Court Nominee (AJC/AP)

By Deb Riechmann

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 2, 2005

President Bush said Friday he would nominate his first Supreme Court justice quickly enough that the vacancy of retiring Sandra Day O'Connor could be filled by the time the court resumes work in the fall.

The White House said there would be no announcement before he returns from Europe next Friday.

"I will be deliberate and thorough in this process," said Bush in the Rose Garden where he praised O'Connor's 24 years on the court.

Bush will consult with Republican and Democratic senators about his selection, said presidential spokesman Scott McClellan. The president plans to review briefing material on potential nominees on the flight to Denmark next Tuesday and during his stay Wednesday through Friday at a summit of leading industrialized nations in Scotland.

The White House got the first indication of the retirement on Thursday when the Supreme Court's head marshal, Pamela Talkin, called White House Counsel Harriet Miers to make arrangements to deliver a sealed envelope the next morning. Miers informed Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, who were having lunch together, that a letter was coming.

Talkin told the White House around 9 a.m. Friday that the letter was from O'Connor, and Miers alerted Bush.

After receiving word that the letter had been delivered to the White House, Supreme Court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg handed out copies to reporters who were gathered outside her office at 10:20 a.m.

By then, Bush was chatting on the phone with O'Connor.

"For an old ranching girl, you turned out pretty good," he told O'Connor, who grew up on an Arizona ranch. It was an emotional, five-minute call, McClellan said.

He quoted Bush as telling O'Connor, "You're one of the great Americans" and "I wish I were there to hug you."

After talking with O'Connor and before going to the Rose Garden, Bush held a meeting with senior advisers to talk about the selection process. The meeting included Cheney; Miers; Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the vice president's chief of staff; Attorney General Alberto Gonzales; Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and Counselor Dan Bartlett. Chief of Staff Andy Card participated by telephone from Maine.

"We have had a plan in place ... just in case there was a vacancy," McClellan said.

Anticipating what could be a tough battle in the Senate when he returns from Europe, Bush called for civility in the confirmation process.

"The nation deserves and I will select a Supreme Court that Americans can be proud of," Bush said. "The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate — characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

McClellan said the White House would consult with Majority Leader Bill Frist and Minority Leader Harry Reid as well as leaders of the Judiciary Committee, and he expressed hope that Democrats would not block a vote on the president's pick.

"I can't imagine that the Democrats would want to engage in controversial tactics when it comes to a nominee for the Supreme Court," he said.

In the Rose Garden, Bush praised O'Connor as "a discerning and conscientious judge and a public servant of complete integrity." He said he would pick her successor in a timely manner so the vacancy could be filled by the time the court resumes work in October.

He pledged to consult with senators about his choice.

There had been speculation that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist would step down. Now, the White House has to re-examine its thinking because it faces a vacancy caused by the resignation of a moderate conservative woman instead of the more conservative Rehnquist.

A short list of candidates distributed in the White House within the past week did not include the names of any women or minorities, said one official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the private nature of the selection process. But Bush has said in the past he would like to name a Hispanic to the court.

DOJ_NMG_0000668

Bush will have an opportunity to consider his choice during the July Fourth holiday weekend at the presidential retreat at Camp David in Maryland's Catoctin Mountains.

"I have directed my staff, in cooperation with the Department of Justice, to compile information and recommend for my review potential nominees who meet a high standard of legal ability, judgment and integrity, and who will faithfully interpret the Constitution and laws of our country," he said.

Bush has said in the past that he favors the judicial philosophy of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. The president has said repeatedly that judges should not "legislate from the bench," meaning that their opinions should not be swayed by social or cultural trends.

Bush Revisits Options (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

The White House was caught off guard yesterday when Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement, forcing top administration officials, who had been readying for the departure of the court's conservative chief justice, to reconsider its options.

Bush administration officials already have interviewed some top candidates for the nation's highest court, but the group of contenders were front-runners to replace the ailing, 80-year-old Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, not to fill the seat of the court's first female justice, who is considered moderate.

Now the small group of top candidates, which includes Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, 49, and three appeals court judges, Samuel Alito, 55, J. Michael Luttig, 51, and John Roberts, 50, is expected to expand to contain more women.

Court authorities consider Edith Hollan Jones, 56, and Edith Brown Clement, 57, both judges on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, as possible contenders, and also think White House Counsel Harriet Miers, a longtime Bush confidante, is in the mix.

Besides possible pressure to nominate a woman to the court, Mr. Bush's political base will lobby to replace Justice O'Connor, whose swing vote supported abortion and affirmative action, with a more conservative voice.

The White House got the first indication of Justice O'Connor's retirement about noon on Thursday. Pamela Talkin, the Supreme Court's head marshal, called Mrs. Miers to tell her that she had a sealed envelope to deliver the next morning.

The marshal did not say who the envelope was from or what it contained. After the notification, Mrs. Miers told Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, who were having lunch together, that a letter was coming from the Supreme Court the next day.

About 9 a.m. yesterday, Mrs. Talkin told the White House that the letter was from Justice O'Connor, and Mrs. Miers alerted the president.

A few minutes later, the president spoke with Justice O'Connor in what the White House described as a brief but emotional phone call.

"For an old ranching girl, you turned out pretty good," he told the El Paso, Texas, native, who grew up on an Arizona ranch. She laughed, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said.

After talking with Justice O'Connor and before going to the Rose Garden, Mr. Bush held a meeting with senior advisers to talk about the selection process.

The meeting included Mr. Cheney; Mrs. Miers; Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the vice president's chief of staff; Mr. Gonzales; Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and Senior Counselor Dan Bartlett. Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. participated by telephone from Maine.

Mr. Bush yesterday pledged to seek input from Congress on his nomination and said "the nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote. I will choose a nominee in a timely manner so that the hearing and the vote can be completed before the new Supreme Court term begins."

Mr. McClellan said Mr. Bush spoke yesterday with Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, and committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. The president spoke this week about the Supreme Court with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and yesterday tried unsuccessfully to reach him, the spokesman said.

He added optimistically: "I just can't imagine that Democrats are going to want to engage in controversial tactics when it comes to a nominee for the Supreme Court."

Yesterday's retirement does put the White House in another bind -- and a well-documented one, at that. In 1987, President Reagan nominated Robert Bork for the high court. He was lambasted by liberal activist groups throughout the summer and his nomination was all but dead on arrival when the Senate returned from its August recess.

DOJ_NMG_0000669

With Congress set to take nearly all of August off this year, the White House must decide quickly when to make the nomination. There are just 90 days until the gavel falls to open the fall Supreme Court term on Oct. 3, and it typically takes 70 to 75 days from the time a justice announces retirement until the Senate Judiciary Committee is ready to hold confirmation hearings.

The White House said yesterday that Mr. Bush will not make a nomination until at least next Friday, when he returns from a trip to Denmark and Scotland. But he will use the long flights to and from Europe to review material about possible replacements, Mr. McClellan said.

The president made clear that he will not rush a decision in hopes of moving a nomination through the Senate before the August recess.

"I will be deliberate and thorough in this process. I have directed my staff, in cooperation with the Department of Justice, to compile information and recommend for my review potential nominees who meet a high standard of legal ability, judgment and integrity and who will faithfully interpret the Constitution and laws of our country," Mr. Bush said.

Newsview: Battle Looms Over Court Nominee (AP-Y2)

By Tom Raum, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

President Bush's choice to fill the vacancy of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is all but certain to ignite a political inferno no matter whom he picks. Her departure gives Bush an opportunity to transform the dynamics of the high court.

But that opportunity for Bush also raises the stakes. Democrats indicate they will wage a mammoth Senate battle if the president caters to his conservative base and attempts to replace the moderate O'Connor with a jurist they consider to be out of the judicial mainstream.

On the other hand, if the president nominates someone with views similar to O'Connor's, he could face a right-wing rebellion within his own party from conservatives still fuming over the Senate rejection of Robert H. Bork in 1987.

Well-bankrolled interest groups on the political right and left are already in action in an effort to influence the outcome.

"Her replacement will have a monumental impact on the lives and freedoms of Americans for decades to come," said Ralph G. Neas, president of People for the American Way, a liberal group that is planning a major role in a political debate expected to dominate the summer.

The announcement appeared to catch the White House by surprise. It had prepared for the retirement of another court member, Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who is battling thyroid cancer.

Since Rehnquist was one of the more conservative members of the court, replacing him with another conservative would not have shifted the balance of power.

The same can't be said of O'Connor, who for a quarter century has been the crucial swing vote on a host of 5-4 votes on abortion and other divisive legal issues. The court is closely divided between a narrow conservative majority and a more liberal bloc. Her retirement may also put more pressure on Bush to name a woman.

In a brief Rose Garden appearance, Bush pledged to be "deliberate and thorough" in naming a replacement. He expressed hope for a "dignified" confirmation process and for "fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote" for his nominee, an apparent reference to brutal battles with Democrats over appellate court nominations.

While a simple Senate majority is needed to confirm a nominee, 60 votes are required to end a filibuster. Republicans hold 55 of the 100 Senate seats.

Thus, Bush faces a crucial choice: Does he replace O'Connor with a like-minded moderate who might be able to attract bipartisan support or at least not be filibustered by Democrats? Or does go with a strict conservative and risk a difficult confirmation fight that might result in defeat?

"This appointment is the moral equivalent of a presidential election," said historian Allan Lichtman of American University.

Lichtman said Bush should opt for a "moderate conservative" like Attorney General Alberto Gonzales because "such a nomination would get through the Senate and also move the court to the right." But will he? "Not necessarily," said Lichtman.

Interest groups, still pumped up from the 2004 presidential race, have been preparing for this battle for months. They've taken to skilled — and sometimes massive — use of the airwaves and the Internet to get their messages across, from e-mail outpourings to broadcast ads and appearances on 24-hour cable news and talk radio shows.

Republican groups have said they will spend more than $18 million.

Passions are running so high that "there is going to be a presumption against any presidential nominee on the part of the Democrats, which is too bad," said Charles Black, a longtime GOP consultant who is close to the Bush family. "I think he could nominate Ted Kennedy, and they'd still go into full battle mode against him."

DOJ_NMG_0000670

But Democratic consultant Joe Lockhart, former press secretary to Clinton, said there doesn't have to be a battle royal if Bush will confer with Senate leaders of both parties before submitting his choice — a practice Lockhart said was utilized successfully by both Presidents Reagan and Clinton.

"There no inevitability of a big fight. But if he chooses to go it alone, it increases the likelihood that this will get caught up in partisan back-and-forth," said Lockhart, who is helping People for the American Way run a "war room."

Both sides are mindful that Rehnquist, 80, might also retire in the near future, giving Bush yet another vacancy to fill, and an even greater chance to leave his mark on the court.

"Supreme Court justices are the living legacies of the presidents who appointed them," said Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University. "Of course, they often pull surprises and become very different kinds of judges."

___

EDITOR'S NOTE — Tom Raum has covered Washington for The Associated Press since 1973, including five presidencies.

O'Connor To Retire, Touching Off Battle Over Court (NYT)

By Richard W. Stevenson

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman to serve on the United States Supreme Court and a critical swing vote on abortion and a host of other divisive social issues, announced Friday that she was retiring, setting up a tumultuous fight over her successor.

After months in which speculation about the Supreme Court focused on the likelihood of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's stepping down, the retirement of Justice O'Connor, 75, caught much of Washington, including the White House and her colleagues on the court, off guard.

Even so, the armies of ideological activists from both sides who had massed in anticipation of a battle over replacing the chief justice, a reliable conservative, quickly pivoted to what they agreed was an even greater struggle for control of a seat that could alter the court's balance on an array of polarizing topics.

Justice O'Connor's decision creates the first vacancy on the court in 11 years, ending the longest period without a change in the lineup of justices since the 1820's, and it provides President Bush with his first opportunity to name a Supreme Court justice.

The White House spokesman, Scott McClellan, said the president would not make a selection until after returning from a summit meeting next week in Scotland. Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said he had been invited to the White House to talk about the vacancy on July 11.

Also invited to the meeting, Mr. Specter said, are Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the Republican majority leader, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic minority leader, and Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

The names most frequently mentioned as potential nominees include Judges J. Harvie Wilkinson III and J. Michael Luttig of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Richmond, Va.; Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who sits on the appeals court based in Washington; and Judge Michael W. McConnell of the Tenth Circuit, who sits in Salt Lake City.

Should Mr. Bush want to choose a woman to succeed Justice O'Connor, the candidates are likely to include Judge Edith Brown Clement and Judge Edith H. Jones, both of the Fifth Circuit, based in New Orleans. Other potential candidates include two Hispanic men, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Emilio M. Garza, a federal appellate judge in Texas.

It is not clear whether Chief Justice Rehnquist, who is battling thyroid cancer, will step down this summer, expanding the confirmation battle to two fronts.

In an appearance in the Rose Garden on Friday morning a little more than two hours after getting word of Justice O'Connor's resignation, Mr. Bush said he would be "deliberate and thorough" in selecting a nominee to succeed her. He said his intention was to make a nomination in time for the new justice to be in place for the start of the court's next term in October. Justice O'Connor said she would stay on the bench until her successor arrived.

With memories still fresh among many conservatives of the Democrats' success in blocking the nomination of Robert H. Bork to the court in 1987, and with Capitol Hill still embittered over this spring's confrontation over the use of filibusters in judicial nominations, Mr. Bush effectively put the Democratic leadership on notice not to go to extreme lengths to reject his choice or turn the confirmation proceedings into a partisan free-for-all.

"The nation deserves, and I will select, a Supreme Court justice that Americans can be proud of," Mr. Bush said. "The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

DOJ_NMG_0000671

Mr. Specter indicated that he would most likely hold confirmation hearings in September, though he did not rule out August, when Congress is scheduled to be in recess. Some conservatives have expressed concern about delaying confirmation hearings for too long, out of worry that it would give liberal groups more time to gather ammunition for an attack.

Since joining the court in 1981, succeeding Justice Potter Stewart, Justice O'Connor has been at the very center of the court in almost every sense, and has held or helped define the balance of power on many of the issues of broadest concern to the nation, including affirmative action, the death penalty and religion.

But it was her stance on abortion, and in particular her role in reaffirming Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 ruling that put the court on the side of abortion rights, that placed her most squarely in the middle of the culture wars that have increasingly dominated not just the courts but political discourse in general.

Replacing her with an opponent of abortion rights would not by itself be enough to overturn Roe v. Wade; it would take a shift of two votes in the court's current composition to do so. But it would change the balance of power on the court when it comes to lesser restrictions on abortion, like bans on the procedure that its opponents call partial birth abortion. It would also move the court that much closer to overturning Roe, the long-held goal of many social conservatives.

Justice O'Connor did not specify her reasons for stepping down beyond a brief statement relayed by a spokeswoman for the Supreme Court in which the justice referred to being 75 and to wishing to spend more time with her husband. Her husband, John, is said to have Alzheimer's disease.

In her resignation letter to Mr. Bush, she said she would leave the court as soon as her successor was named and confirmed.

"It has been a great privilege, indeed, to have served as a member of the court for 24 terms," she said in the three-sentence letter. "I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure."

The first inkling the White House had of her decision came around midday on Thursday when Pamela Talkin, the head marshal of the Supreme Court, called Harriet E. Miers, the White House counsel, to make arrangements to hand-deliver a letter on Friday morning. Ms. Talkin did not say which justice the letter was from, according to an account provided by Mr. McClellan, the White House spokesman.

Ms. Miers then informed Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, who were having lunch in the president's private dining room just off the Oval Office.

On Friday just before 9 a.m., Ms. Talkin called back to say the letter was from Justice O'Connor. Ms. Miers then told Mr. Bush by telephone. Mr. Bush relayed the news to his inner circle, including Mr. Cheney; Karl Rove, the president's senior adviser and deputy chief of staff; and Dan Bartlett, his longtime communications adviser.

After the White House formally received the justice's resignation letter in a manila envelope, Mr. Bush held a five-minute phone conversation with her starting at 10:18 a.m., telling her, "For an old ranching girl, you turned out pretty good," a reference to her roots in El Paso and her upbringing on a ranch in Arizona.

Mr. Bush later called a staff meeting to discuss the process of settling on a successor, Mr. McClellan said. Mr. McClellan said Mr. Bush had not yet "given any serious consideration to any nominee because he has not reviewed any material relating to potential nominees in any serious way."

Mr. McClellan said Mr. Bush would start reading through material about potential nominees over the weekend, which he will spend at Camp David, and during his trip next week to Denmark and Scotland.

A senior administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to describe internal deliberations, said that Mr. Bush would be reviewing "more than half a dozen" potential candidates and that the list would include people with a broad array of backgrounds.

The official suggested that the list might include one or more women. The list, the official said, was assembled by a group including Mr. Cheney; Mr. Rove; Mr. Bartlett; Ms. Miers; Mr. Gonzales; Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff; and I. Lewis Libby, Mr. Cheney's chief of staff.

The official said the list given to Mr. Bush might have been somewhat different if it had been Chief Justice Rehnquist who had stepped down, because a chief justice nominee would have benefited from managerial qualifications that are less relevant for an associate justice. But over all, the official said, the candidate pools to replace the justices were quite similar.

But even allies of the White House said Mr. Bush was facing a tricky task in nominating a successor for Justice O'Connor.

"This is clearly a different jigsaw puzzle than what they were expecting," said Kenneth M. Duberstein, who was White House chief of staff under President Ronald Reagan and managed the Supreme Court nominations of Clarence Thomas and David H. Souter for the first President Bush.

"Everyone was expecting a conservative replacing Rehnquist," he said. "Now you have the question of a woman or a minority for the swing vote on the Supreme Court. That's a sensitivity the White House will really have to grapple with."

DOJ_NMG_0000672

Mr. Bush placed calls on Friday afternoon to Mr. Specter and Mr. Leahy. Mr. Bush had spoken earlier with Dr. Frist, who is turning to a close ally of Mr. Bush, Ed Gillespie, the former chairman of the Republican National Committee, to help manage the nomination fight in the Senate, Republicans said.

Mr. McClellan said the president had tried but failed to reach Mr. Reid, the Democratic leader.

On Capitol Hill, many senators, including Mr. Reid, had already scattered for the long holiday weekend. As word of the retirement buzzed through Congress, members of both parties moved quickly to stake out their positions in a rapid-fire sequence of floor speeches and news conferences.

Republicans immediately sought to pre-empt the prospect of a Democratic filibuster, the procedural tactic that had been employed against 10 of Mr. Bush's federal appeals court candidates. They said the nominee's fate should be decided by a simple Senate majority, not the 60-vote threshold the filibuster requires.

"The person either goes on the Supreme Court or they don't go on the Supreme Court by 51 votes," said Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas. "That's what it should be."

Democrats urged the president to make good on his promise to consult with members of both parties in the Senate in choosing his nominee, a dialogue they said could avert a bitter fight over the court vacancy.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said, "I sincerely hope that the president will be true to tradition and true to the best interests of the nation and he'll consult meaningfully with both Democratic and Republican senators before making such a momentous decision." Mr. Schumer, a member of the Judiciary Committee, raced back to Washington from New York after the announcement.

Senator John Warner of Virginia, a senior Republican who was instrumental in crafting a compromise in May that averted a Senate showdown over judicial filibusters, urged Mr. Bush to choose a nominee that could attract broad bipartisan support.

"This nomination of the first Supreme Court justice by this distinguished president gives him an opportunity to be a uniter, not a divider," Mr. Warner said.

Within minutes of the news that Justice O'Connor would retire, liberal groups were portraying the coming confirmation fight as a momentous event that could go a long way toward determining whether abortion remains legal and how the nation deals with a host of other issues on which conservative pressure and legal reasoning are being brought to bear.

"Justice O'Connor has been the most important figure on the court in recent years," said Ralph G. Neas, president of People for the American Way, a liberal group. "Her replacement will have a monumental impact on the lives and freedoms of Americans for decades to come."

Social conservatives said they were primed for a battle to support any nominee who is to their liking on issues including abortion and religion in public life. It is a promise they say they believe Mr. Bush has implicitly made every time he has praised Justices Antonin Scalia and Thomas as models.

"You have to realize," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a conservative social policy organization, "seven of the nine were appointed by Republicans, and David Souter in particular has been against us on everything. We do not want another wolf in sheep's clothing."

For months, the White House has been running the names of potential nominees by conservative groups like Focus on the Family, an evangelical ministry based in Colorado Springs, and the Family Research Council, said Jordan Lorence, a lawyer for the Alliance Defense Fund, a legal group established by a consortium of conservative Christian organizations.

"The White House has been contacting other groups, like Focus on the Family and the Family Research Council," Mr. Lorence said, "and we get calls about what do you think of this name and that name? What do you think of Emilio Garza? What do you think of Alberto Gonzales?"

Surprise Move: After 24 Years, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor Retiring (PPG)

By Ann Mcfeatters

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 2, 2005

Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, 75, the first woman to sit on the nation's highest court, surprised President Bush, her colleagues and millions of Americans yesterday by issuing a three-sentence letter saying she will retire from the bench as soon as her successor is confirmed.

A longtime Republican legislator, activist and judge in Arizona, she became one of the most well-known women in America during her 24-year tenure on the court. She had a reputation in legal circles as a centrist and a swing vote, often breaking the tie for the 5-4 rulings that have marked the court in recent years. She was regarded not as a legal theoretician, but rather as a pragmatist, searching for practical, workable solutions in nearly every aspect of human life.

DOJ_NMG_0000673

Bush did not learn of O'Connor's resignation until 9 a.m. yesterday. After what he called a "warm conversation" with her on the telephone, the president went before TV cameras in the White House Rose Garden to praise her as a "discerning and conscientious judge and a public servant of complete integrity."

When Chief Justice William Rehnquist, 80, developed throat cancer last autumn, causing him to miss 11 oral arguments and leaving him increasingly frail, many thought that he would be the first to depart from the current court, which has not had a new member in 11 years.

With liberals and conservatives braced for a bruising battle over the person Bush chooses to replace O'Connor, the president promised to select someone who would make America proud and who would meet "a high standard of legal ability, judgment and integrity, and who will faithfully interpret the Constitution and laws of our country."

Bush has said little about the type of person he might nominate, except that he has mentioned he would like to name the first Hispanic. His former general counsel and good friend, Alberto Gonzales, who is now the attorney general, is Hispanic. But if Gonzales were nominated to the court, he would run into opposition both from liberals, over his advice to the administration regarding the treatment of detainees in the war on terror, and from conservatives, because they think he might be moderate regarding abortion.

There are a number of appellate court judges, such as Emilio Garza Emilio Garza and Edith Jones, both of the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, who are now being vetted by the Justice Department as well as Bush's current counsel, Harriet Miers, and Karl Rove, his deputy chief of staff and political guru. The advantage of nominating an appellate court judge is that they already have been confirmed once by the Senate.

O'Connor grew up on her parents' ranch, the Lazy B, a 260-square-mile spread straddling the Arizona-New Mexico border. Because of her lifelong love for Arizona as well as her need to care for her husband, John, who is in the early stages of Alzheimer's disease, some court watchers have long thought that she might be ready to retire.

O'Connor's three sons, Scott, Brian and Jay, and her grandchildren live in Arizona, and she loves playing golf there. She has kept her sprawling home in Paradise Valley, outside Scottsdale, in addition to a Georgian-style brick home in Washington.

Duquesne University Law School professor Ken Gormley, who got to know O'Connor after she gave an address at the school, said what had struck him about her, aside from her intellectual curiosity, was that she was "very much a Western girl" who loved to have fun. Just as she enjoyed taking five years off from her law career to stay home with her children in the late 1950s and early '60s, Gormley said, she is looking forward to spending more time home in Arizona with her husband and family.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., will be in charge of confirmation hearings for the next justice, even though he himself is fighting cancer. Specter also presided over the contentious hearings for the confirmation of Justice Clarence Thomas, the court's youngest member and a controversial conservative.

Specter yesterday said his committee was prepared to proceed on the nomination at any time.

One of Congress' leading Democrats, Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., yesterday said he hoped that Bush would consult with the Senate and nominate a moderate, as he described O'Connor. Kennedy warned that, while it is Bush's job to make the nomination, the Senate will take seriously its responsibility to decide whether the president's choice is the right one.

The major issue at the confirmation hearings is certain to be the nominee's stance regarding the legality of abortion, possibly the most politically divisive issue in the nation. Groups both favoring and opposing the procedure yesterday immediately went into hyperdrive, preparing for battle.

Nancy Northup, president of the Center for Reproductive Rights, said pressing for the eventual nominee to declare whether he or she supports the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision, which said the Constitution protects the right to an abortion, will be her most important agenda.

Tony Perkins, head of the Family Research Council, which strongly opposes abortion, said his group often disagreed with O'Connor and would mobilize 20,000 churches to demand that Bush choose a nominee whose views are similar to those of Justices Antonin Scalia and Thomas, the court's most conservative members.

Asked if he would vote to confirm any nominee who does not support Roe v. Wade, Kennedy said he would look at the prospect's support for a variety of civil liberties, but would not make the abortion stance a litmus test. "I will reserve judgment," he said.

Bush strongly opposes abortion but also has said he was not certain that the country was ready to have Roe v. Wade overturned.

Not everyone praised O'Connor yesterday. Robert Bork -- a conservative who, like O'Connor, was nominated to the court by former President Ronald Reagan, but whose confirmation the Senate rejected in 1987 -- said he hoped that Bush would nominate a less-activist judge than O'Connor has been. Interviewed on CNN, Bork said O'Connor "didn't have a firm judicial philosophy" and "lined up with the liberal side" on social issues. There are some judges who depart from a strict construction of the Constitution and others who stick with it, he said. "She departed from the actual Constitution," Bork asserted. "I wouldn't call that moderate; I call it unfortunate."

DOJ_NMG_0000674

Throughout her tenure as a justice, O'Connor has been considered a trailblazer, saluted as much for her discipline and hard work as for her opinions. Her name is consistently on lists of the most admired American women. When she had a bout with breast cancer in 1988, she missed no oral arguments. George Mason University law professor Nelson Lund said he had never worked harder in his life than when he was O'Connor's law clerk in 1987-1988, but it was the most rewarding professional experience of his life.

When O'Connor graduated in only two years from Stanford Law School in 1952, placing third in a class that also included Rehnquist, she couldn't initially find a job as a lawyer. She recalled that moment vividly in a recent speech:

"I was shocked. I think I was naive. I had never stopped to think that it might be hard to get a job. [One law firm] partner who interviewed me said, 'Miss Day, how do you type?' And I said, 'Well, fair, not great. I can get by.' And he said, "Well, if you type well enough, I might be able to get you a job as a legal secretary. But we have never hired a woman as a lawyer here. And we don't anticipate doing it."

She found work instead as a deputy county attorney in San Mateo, Calif., until her husband graduated from Stanford a year after she had. He went to Germany as an Army lawyer for three years, and she was a civilian lawyer in the Quartermaster Corps. His service completed, the O'Connors moved to Phoenix, had three sons, and she became a full-time volunteer for many causes, including Republican politics, before founding her own law firm with another lawyer.

When her second son was 5, she became assistant state attorney general and was appointed to fill a vacant seat in the state Senate, eventually becoming the first woman majority leader in the United States.

In 1974, she was elected to the Maricopa County Superior Court. In 1979, then-Arizona Gov. Bruce Babbitt, a Democrat, put her on the state Court of Appeals, and on June 20, 1981, at age 51, she met at the White House with Reagan and found herself nominated to the nation's highest court.

When O'Connor was called to answer questions before the Senate Judiciary Committee, she refused to say how she would decide abortion cases that were certain to confront her on the court. Anti-abortion activists were uneasy about her, but she was confirmed by a vote of 99-0 -- the strongest acclamation any Supreme Court nominee had ever received.

She and her husband, who went to work for a Washington law firm, were immediate hits on the social circuit, sometimes attending several parties a week as she struggled to feel less like an outsider. She founded an early-morning exercise club for women who worked at the Supreme Court, and regularly cooked Saturday brunch for law clerks. She continued to take an annual "adventure" trip with women friends from her college years, hiking, fishing and exploring rough terrain, and she also made numerous trips abroad. She gave dozens of speeches, often to groups of young people, urging more civility within the legal profession.

In the early 1990s, when rumors surfaced that she was thinking of retiring, she batted them down. She decided not to retire during the 2004 presidential election year, partly because she feared that the debate over her successor might be too partisan during an election year.

She has written two books, "The Majesty of the Law," a consideration of current legal issues, and the autobiographical "Lazy B: Growing Up on a Cattle Ranch in the American Southwest," with her brother, Alan Day. In 1999, her granddaughter Courtney, then age 9, collaborated with her to write a book, "Meet My Grandmother ... She's a Supreme Court Justice."

O'Connor has often said she was proud that she hadn't needed to give up "life" to be the first female legislative majority leader in U.S. history and the first woman on the U.S. Supreme Court bench.

When O'Connor was undergoing her Senate confirmation process, she was asked how she would like her epitaph to read. "Ah," she said. "The tombstone question. I hope it says, 'Here lies a good judge.' "

Bush Asks Senate For Fairness On High Court Opening (REU-Y2)

Reuters, July 2, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - President Bush, given his first chance to name a Supreme Court justice, held off on Friday on naming a replacement for the retiring Sandra Day O'Connor but urged lawmakers not to block what is likely to be a contentious nominee.

Foreshadowing a confirmation battle in the Senate, Bush called for "a fair vote," for his choice as successor to the moderate conservative, as he has frequently during a prolonged dispute with lawmakers over Democratic efforts to block other nominees.

"The nation deserves and I will select a Supreme Court justice that Americans can be proud of. The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote," he said in the White House Rose Garden.

DOJ_NMG_0000675

Bush gave no indication who he was considering to replace O'Connor who resigned after 24 years on the bench other than to repeat his conservative philosophy that he would pick someone who will interpret the U.S. Constitution and not legislate from the bench.

"I directed my staff in cooperation with the Department of Justice to compile information and recommend for my review potential nominees who meet a high standard of legal ability, judgment and integrity and who will faithfully interpret the constitution and laws of our country," Bush said.

The White House said he would not name a potential successor to the retiring O'Connor for at least a week.

Bush said his goal was to have a new justice in place by the time the court reconvenes in October. O'Connor's resignation is effective once the Senate confirms her successor.

The White House has been preparing for a vacancy since Bush took office in 2001 and has compiled materials on a number of candidates.

Bush appeared in the Rose Garden to offer praise for O'Connor an hour after she announced her pending retirement. Earlier, in what the White House called an emotional phone call, Bush told O'Connor, who was raised on an Arizona ranch, that, "For an old ranching girl, you turned out pretty good."

Bush's nomination may test a bipartisan truce reached in May that declared Democrats would retain their right to block judicial nominees with procedural hurdles known as filibusters but only "extraordinary circumstances."

Democrats, and some Republicans, complain that Bush has not sufficiently consulted them on judicial nominees.

With Democrats bracing for a fight and interest groups on both sides already energizing their followers, Bush promised to consult with senators on the vacancy but was not specific.

TALKS WITH SENATORS

McClellan said Bush spoke to Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada about the high court in recent days and would do so again.

He said Bush would also talk to Vermont Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record), ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, as well as Republicans like Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee.

"I just can't imagine that Democrats are going to want to engage in controversial tactics" like a filibuster, McClellan said. "I hope that all members of the Senate would want to elevate the discourse."

Senate Democrats, who blocked 10 of Bush's appeals court nominees during his first term, urged the president to consult with them before picking a Supreme Court candidate.

"The Constitution gives the president and the Senate shared responsibility to fill this vacancy," Reid said. "With this nomination the president should choose to unite the country, not divide it."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, who will oversee the confirmation hearing, said his "instinct is we will not have a filibuster here. That is only my hope."

McClellan said Bush would read materials on potential nominees this weekend at his Camp David presidential retreat and on a trip to Denmark and Gleneagles, Scotland, next week. Bush returns from that trip on July 8.

"There will be no decision before returning from the G8," McClellan said. "This will be a thorough process."

Bush has often railed against what he calls "activist judges" who he says legislate from the bench, and says he wants justices to "strictly and faithfully interpret the law."

O'Connor, First Woman Named To Supreme Court, Is Retiring (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman to serve on the Supreme Court and its decisive voice on such critical issues as abortion, affirmative action and religion, announced Friday she was retiring.

Her husband, John, is suffering from Alzheimer's disease, her friends report, and O'Connor said in a brief statement that she needs to spend more time with him.

O'Connor, 75, often has been called the most powerful woman in America because of her influence on the Supreme Court, and her surprise departure gives President Bush a chance to reshape its direction.

It will mark the first vacancy on the court in 11 years.

Activists on the right and left were preparing for what could be an epicbattle over her successor. The president's staunchest supporters want to eliminate the right to abortion, which the departing justice has helped to maintain.

On Friday, Bush said he first wanted to praise the Arizona cow girl who rose to become "one of the most admired Americans of our time. . . . Justice O'Connor's great intellect, wisdom and personal decency have won her the esteem of her colleagues and our country," the president said shortly after speaking with O'Connor by phone.

Bush said he "will be deliberate and thorough" in picking her successor, and he pledged to consult with members of the Senate on his choice.

"The nation deserves, and I will select, a Supreme Court justice that Americans can be proud of," Bush said. He said he hoped his nominee would undergo "a dignified process of confirmation" in the Senate.

Spokesman Scott McClellan said Bush did not plan to make a decision on O'Connor's successor until late next week, after he returns from a trip to Denmark and Scotland.

Until Friday, the White House and much of Washington had been focused on who might replace the ailing 80-year-old Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who was widely expected to step down.

When the court handed down its last opinions of the term Monday morning, O'Connor looked worried and saddened as a visibly weak Rehnquist, her former Stanford Law School classmate, rose from his seat. She reached out to steady him as they turned to walk back through the red velvet curtain.

But it turned out that was her last day on the bench -- and not necessarily his.

While Rehnquist has said nothing in public of his plans, the justices and court staff who have watched him closely would not be surprised if he retired, too.

However, O'Connor's announcement took the White House, other Supreme Court justices and even one of her sons by surprise. The president didn't learn of it until Friday morning.

A tireless worker, O'Connor once said the heavy workload of the Supreme Court had been her "salvation" in the late 1980s, when she underwent treatment for breast cancer.

She travels with piles of court briefs in her suitcases, and most of her friends and colleagues expected she would stay in her job for as long as possible. In recent years, her husband has come with her to the court and spent his days in her chambers.

The couple recently sold their home in suburban Maryland and bought a condominium in Washington, but none of her friends saw this as a sign of her impending retirement.

The White House counsel's office, charged with finding candidates for an expected vacancy, had to switch gears Friday.

Because of O'Connor's role as a swing vote, the impending vacancy could set off a fierce fight, particularly if Bush chooses a staunch conservative to replace her.

For the past two decades, O'Connor has decided the Supreme Court's biggest cases. She has been neither a predictable conservative nor a true liberal. Rather, she set out to redefine the middle.

But the political battle over the next court nominee is likely to focus on abortion and religion.

O'Connor nearly single-handedly saved the constitutional right to abortion, even though she was an early critic of the Roe vs. Wade ruling that legalized it. She believed the court made a mistake in the 1970s by taking on the issue, and she said states should have more authority to regulate abortion.

In 1989, however, she refused to go along with Rehnquist and three others in overturning Roe vs. Wade in a pending Missouri case. When the issue returned three years later, O'Connor fashioned a 5-4 majority to affirm the abortion right. States may regulate abortion providers to ensure the health and safety of their patients, but they may not put an "undue burden" on the woman's decision whether or not to have an abortion, O'Connor said.

A year later, Justice Byron R. White, a firm abortion-rights foe, retired; President Clinton replaced him Ruth Bader Ginsburg, a women's rights lawyer who favors abortion rights. Today, the basic right to abortion has a 6-3 majority in the Supreme Court.

In recent years, however, the court has split 5-4 on whether states can outlaw a mid-term abortion procedure that critics label "partial-birth abortion." Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who joined O'Connor in the 1992 decision, believes states can regulate abortion by banning certain procedures such as partial-birth abortion.

O'Connor also frustrated conservatives on affirmative action and religion cases.

She was a critic of race-based programs, and wrote a series of rulings that struck down such set-asides in government contracts, as well as electoral districts drawn along racial lines.

But O'Connor refused to close the door to affirmative action in colleges and universities. "In a society like our own, race unfortunately still matters," she said in a 5-4 ruling that upheld the admissions policy at the University of Michigan Law School. While schools may not use quotas or fixed percentages to admit more minorities, they may take race into account as a plus factor, she said.

She also fashioned a middle position on religion. She cast the fifth vote to uphold Ohio's school voucher programs three years ago. With these grants, parents in Cleveland could use tax money to send their children to religious schools. This is not an "establishment of religion," O'Connor said, but rather an education program that gives parents freedom of choice.

But she joined with her liberal colleagues to strike down school-sponsored prayers or religious displays on public property, including Monday's Ten Commandments ruling. The government may not "endorse" religion, she said.

She wrote movingly in Monday's opinion on the importance of preserving religious freedom -- including freedom from government-sponsored religion.

"At a time when we see around the world the violent consequences of the assumption of religious authority by the government, Americans may count themselves fortunate: Our regard for constitutional boundaries has protected us from similar travails, while allowing private religious exercise to flourish," she said.

But she also had her disputes with the court's liberals.

Two weeks ago, she wrote a pungent dissent when the court upheld a city's seizure of private homes to make way for business development. "The specter of condemnation hangs over all property. Nothing is to prevent the state from replacing a Motel 6 with a Ritz-Carlton, any home with a shopping mall, or any farm with a factory," she said.

For her part, O'Connor became a historic figure upon her arrival in 1981 to join what had been known as "the brethren." At first, the focus was on her status as the first woman. But by the mid-1980s, she had emerged as a justice who brought a distinctive perspective -- not just as a woman, but as former state legislator and former state trial judge. She sought practical, middle-ground solutions to complicated problems.

By the 1990s, she was the single most important member of the Supreme Court, the justice who could be counted upon to decide the hardest cases.

She was widely praised Friday for having brought grace, wisdom and common sense to her job.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer, the court's junior justice, said he had admired her greatly.

"The court, the law and my life have been immeasurably enriched by her dedicated service. She has taught us all," he said.

"Any jurist would consider it a high honor to be a colleague of Justice O'Connor," wrote Kennedy. "Any person would consider it a privilege to be her friend."

Her rise to prominence was an unlikely one. She grew up on a cattle ranch in the desert along the border of New Mexico and Arizona. Her childhood home on the Lazy B ranch had no electricity, and it was 25 miles to town.

But she was able to attend Stanford University, first as an undergraduate and then as a law student. She placed third in the class of 1952, two spots behind a tall, lanky World War II vet named William H. Rehnquist.

She also met John O'Connor, and after they married, they settled in Phoenix. She rose to be a state legislator and the first female majority leader of the Arizona Senate. She was a state appeals court judge when Reagan chose her for the Supreme Court.

Bush harkened back to her childhood Friday, during what aides called an emotional conversation for both. "For an old ranch girl, you turned out pretty good," the president told her.

Future Of Abortion Could Be At Issue (BSUN)

By Stephanie Desmon

The Baltimore Sun, July 2, 2005

The surprise retirement of Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor - considered a key vote in keeping abortion widely legal in the United States - throws into question the future of the procedure's availability and re-ignites a long-simmering and emotionally charged debate.

In losing O'Connor, the moderate voice who created the current legal standard that restrictions on abortion should not place an "undue burden" on women, the stage is set for someone cut from more conservative cloth to take her place.

Those on the front lines of the battle over abortion say her retirement has an even greater impact than would the resignation of the ailing Chief Justice William Rehnquist, an abortion opponent whose potential replacement would be an "even exchange," as one advocate said.

O'Connor's absence will be felt immediately. The court has already agreed to hear two abortion cases next fall.

"We're not talking theory. We're talking reality," said the Rev. Patrick J. Mahoney, director of the Washington-based Christian Defense Coalition. "By January of next year, decisions will come out of the court on abortion. ... Status quo in the Supreme Court has really gone out the window."

"It could change everything for women," said Wendy Royalty, a spokeswoman for Planned Parenthood of Maryland.

Advocacy groups sprang into action quickly yesterday.

Within minutes of the news that O'Connor would retire, NARAL Pro-Choice America's Web site had been transformed into a campaign headquarters for the fight ahead, asking visitors to donate money and write to their senators "to vote NO on anti-choice nominees!" News releases were flying; e-mails were sent by the thousands. The National Organization for Women planned an "emergency rally to save women's lives" in Nashville for this afternoon.

Anti-abortion groups were gearing up, too. Mahoney, for one, has already planned vigils, rallies and demonstrations outside the court building to coincide with the as-yet-unnamed nominee's confirmation hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0000678

"Nobody's wasting any time getting on this," said Kathy Kleeman with the nonpartisan Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. "This issue is going to be right in the middle of it."

It is unlikely, even with O'Connor's retirement and another, that Roe would be overturned - a majority of the remaining justices still favors letting the decision stand. Besides Rehnquist, only two other justices, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, have said Roe v. Wade should be overturned.

But even if the majority of the court is unwilling to completely reverse Roe, it doesn't mean that more limits won't be placed on it. The court with O'Connor has upheld waiting periods and parental notification provisions in the past. And a court without O'Connor is more likely to outlaw "partial-birth" abortions, an issue that is making its way through the courts again.

O'Connor, a Reagan appointee, was never really embraced by those on the right, who picketed her confirmation hearings. After Reagan left office, she made some of her crucial decisions on abortion.

In Planned Parenthood v. Casey, the 1992 case that largely reaffirmed abortion rights, O'Connor was one of those who wrote for the majority. In 2000, the last time the court took up a major abortion case, she was a member of the 5-4 majority that struck down a Nebraska ban on a late-term abortion procedure that opponents call "partial-birth," mainly because it did not make an exception for women's health.

Many on both sides of the abortion question say they want to know where a nominee stands on Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 case that effectively legalized abortion.

Those on the right feel they have been burned in the past by nominees - such as Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and David H. Souter - who turned out not to share some of the key views of the Republican presidents who nominated them.

Members of the religious right, who feel responsible for returning Bush to office for a second term, will not be satisfied by a nominee with soft or fuzzy credentials on abortion rights, observers said. Conservative blogs are already teeming with worries about putting Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, who they don't think is a big enough opponent of abortion, on the bench. Advocates for abortion rights will insist on someone who shares their desire to maintain the "right to choose."

"We should not have the senators playing Russian roulette, guessing where a nominee stands on critical constitutional protections," said Nancy Northup, president for the Center for Reproductive Rights, a legal advocacy group that argued against the "partial-birth" abortion ban before the court in 2000.

Steve Elmendorf, a Washington-based Democratic strategist, said Bush's decision on who should replace O'Connor will be a difficult one. For years, Elmendorf said, Bush has tried to straddle a line, calling himself a "compassionate conservative" while also playing to his party's right wing. Some might like to see a nominee without an easily defined position on abortion, while others will insist on a strong position against.

"For years the Republicans have tried to have it both ways on this issue," he said. "Their ability to have it both ways is going to be severely compromised."

Douglas Johnson, legislative director of the National Right to Life Committee, said he doesn't think a nominee should have to answer the question head on. Finding out if the nominee will strictly follow the U.S. Constitution is enough, he said.

Nominees, he said, "are not supposed to predict how they're going to rule on future cases that will come before them."

Even without Roe, abortion wouldn't automatically be illegal everywhere. The decision would revert to the states. Nineteen states have laws that would outlaw abortion if Roe were overturned and another 19 are poised to do so, said Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America. Maryland law would keep abortion legal.

According to a June poll by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press, 63 percent of those surveyed rejected the idea of completely overturning Roe. That margin has remained stable for more than a decade.

Even before the possibility of a court vacancy became a reality yesterday, the debate over abortion had bubbled back to the surface, returning with its customary fervor and intensity to the national political landscape.

There was the court's decision to take the two abortion cases after five years of silence on the issue. In April, the U.S. House of Representatives passed its first major bill on abortion in two years, one that would prohibit minors from being taken across state lines without parental permission for the procedure. While the Senate hasn't voted, Republican leaders have called a similar bill a priority.

Meanwhile, state legislatures have continued unabated in long-running efforts to place a variety of limits on abortion. And in some parts of the country there have been reports that pharmacists have refused to fill legal prescriptions for birth control, a step toward preventing unwanted pregnancies, on moral grounds.

Now, though, the focus is squarely on the court - and what it will look like when it begins its next session in October.

"It's going to be a battle royal," said Joseph Scheidler, president of the Chicago-based Pro-Life Action League.

The Battle To Shape American Society (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

DOJ_NMG_0000679

Financial Times, July 2, 2005

Friday was the first day of the new American culture war. The resignation of Sandra Day O'Connor has precipitated the battle of a generation over the future of what is arguably America's most influential branch of government.

Unique among the democratic world's ruling institutions, the US Supreme Court occupies a special place in American life. It can strike down laws and even slap down a president, all in the name of upholding the US constitution. At a time when US politics is paralysed by division, the court is often the only institution that steps in to tackle the people's disputes. Americans look to it for the last word on many of the most difficult questions in national life, from race to abortion to presidential elections. Most Americans know nothing at all about the highly secretive court but it plays a huge role in shaping the society they live in.

At key moments in the last century, the court has played a powerful liberalising role, banning segregation in schools and guaranteeing women the right to choose abortion. Even under the 18-year reign of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, a conservative, the court championed gay rights and affirmative action, and reined in the death penalty.

Now America faces a once-in-a-generation opportunity to reshape this institution and political activists from both ends of the spectrum are grasping that chance with both hands. Republicans hope to mount a conservative takeover that could transform American social policy for the first half of the new century. Liberals will spend tens of millions of dollars trying to stop them.

President George W. Bush is shortly expected to nominate a replacement for Justice O'Connor, and the Senate will then go to battle over whether to confirm the nominee. The argument is likely to be ugly, and could dominate US politics and stymie progress on other important issues for weeks or months to come.

And that may not be the end of it. The retirement of the 75-year-old Mrs O'Connor the first woman justice in American history is unlikely to be the only departure. Chief Justice William Rehnquist is 80 and ill with thyroid cancer. Altogether, three or even four justices could leave the court in the next few years.

Mr Bush has made no secret of the fact that he sees the appointment of Supreme Court justices as one of his most important legacies. He is determined to transform the mostly centrist Rehnquist court into a conservative institution. If he fills three or four vacancies on the nine-person court, he could well get his way.

So the battle is on for the heart and soul of this 200-year-old institution. Justice O'Connor's role on the court was pivotal: she provided the winning fifth vote for some of the court's most important rulings, including a 2003 decision upholding the constitutionality of affirmative action in higher education. And crucially, she supports a woman's right to choose, so replacing her with an opponent of abortion as Mr Bush is almost certain to do could have a big impact on the court's rulings in this explosive area.

The conservative bloc on the court would still have no realistic hope of overturning the court's 1973 landmark ruling on abortion, Roe v Wade: abortion supporters would still have five votes on the court, against four who oppose it. But with a slender 5:4 majority, the court could change some of the conditions under which abortion is permitted, in ways that might make it substantially harder in practice to get an abortion.

According to Tom Goldstein, Supreme Court expert at Goldstein & Howe law firm, the resignation of Mrs O'Connor makes it possible that there could be a “fundamental shift in the court's direction. . . On an array of basic social issues eg affirmative action, religion, and the death penalty”. He notes that Justice O'Connor has been a vital swing voter on the closely divided court. Predicting the impact of replacing Justice O'Connor can be difficult, though, because she was a consummate “one case at a time” judge whose jurisprudence could be very unpredictable. She did not always vote in line with the president who appointed her Ronald Reagan. According to Walter Dellinger, former acting US solicitor general, the real split on the Rehnquist court is between “legalists” and “pragmatists” Mrs O'Connor was one of the pragmatists. Replacing her with a legal fundamentalist like Justice Antonin Scalia, whom Mr Bush has held up as a model justice, could have a big impact on the court's rulings on a wide range of issues.

Replacing a conservative pragmatist with a conservative ideologue could make an especial difference on business issues, where pragmatic justices are generally more pro-corporate.

Stanton Anderson of the National Chamber Litigation Centre, the US Chamber of Commerce's legal arm, said before the retirement that appointing a “different type of conservative” perhaps a social conservative rather than an economic one could have big consequences for US business. “Just because you are a conservative does not mean you will be pro-business.” And over the longer term, predicting the impact of a new justice can be even harder. If the nominee is in his 50s (as the conservative right hopes he will be), he might serve for two or three decades. No one can predict with accuracy the legal issues that will come before him in that time or for that matter how he will vote on them.

Justice David Souter is infamous among conservatives for morphing from an apparent conservative to a committed liberal after his appointment by President George H.W. Bush. Justice O'Connor represents a kind of “split the baby” jurisprudence, which toes a careful line between right and left.

DOJ_NMG_0000680

Professor Jeffrey Rosen of George Washington University Law School credits her with giving the Rehnquist court its centrist character. He argues that she has done more to represent the moderate majority in American politics than the polarised politicians in Congress. If she were to be replaced by a far-right ideologue, America would lose a very powerful moderating influence.

For liberals, the nightmare scenario would be the resignation of all three justices and their replacement by jurists in the mould of Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the court's most conservative judicial fundamentalists. “A court majority sharing the Scalia and Thomas judicial philosophies could overturn more than 100 Supreme Court precedents concerning civil rights enforcement, privacy and reproductive choice, religious liberty, environmental protection, workers' rights, consumer safety, and much more,” says the liberal group People for the American Way.

Prof Rosen thinks the real threat of such a re-engineered court would be not social but economic: he believes Mr Bush's long-term goal is not to outlaw abortion but to roll back the regulatory state and dismantle the New Deal, by appointing jurists who believe the US constitution does not permit the federal government to meddle in matters such as workplace regulation or environmental protection.

There are precious few supporters of that view on the current court; but some potential nominees are openly antithetical to a powerful federal government.

Lists of rumoured nominees have been circulating in Washington for months, in some cases years. Mr Bush is understood to want to name the first Hispanic justice, though it is not clear whether that might be Alberto Gonzales, the attorney general, who is viewed as too moderate by the conservative base, or one of a couple of more radical Hispanic appeals court judges. He may also want to replace a woman with a woman. Other potential nominees include conservative hard-liners such as J. Michael Luttig, an appeals court judge who supports limiting the powers of the federal government. Soon enough, America will know whom Mr Bush has chosen and then the cultural war can really begin. Activists on both sides have been preparing for this moment for years: they know this may be the chance of a lifetime to change American society, by changing the people who judge it.

Justice O’Connor Retires From Supreme Court (FT)

By Edward Alden, Caroline Daniel And Holly Yeager In Washington

Financial Times, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O’Connor, the first female US Supreme Court justice, announced her retirement on Friday, opening the door for President George W. Bush to nominate a successor who could strengthen conservative control over the nine-person court for a generation.

The resignation will launch an epic struggle over the direction of the top US court. Justice O’Connor was often the crucial swing vote on a court where many of the biggest rulings have come on 5-4 decisions.

Potentially at stake in the succession are the future of legal abortions, affirmative action for minority groups, government aid to religious schools and other issues that have divided US liberals and conservatives.

Mr Bush called Justice O’Connor, who served 24 years, “a discerning and conscientious judge and a public servant of complete integrity”.

He promised to consult the Senate before choosing a nominee who would “faithfully interpret the Constitution and laws of our country”.

The president called for “fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote” and warned he did not want any nominee to be sidetracked by filibustering.

Mr Bush is likely to appeal to his electoral base by choosing a reliably conservative judge. Justice O’Connor helped send Mr Bush to the White House by voting to shut down the Florida recount in the 2000 election. But some conservatives have attacked her votes to uphold affirmative action, protect minority voting rights, maintain bans on government-sponsored prayer at public schools and protect abortion rights.

Arlen Specter, Republican chairman of the Senate judiciary committee, who will lead the Senate hearings to confirm Mr Bush’s nominee, said Justice O’Connor’s “pivotal role on the court as a centrist” meant the fight could be even more contentious than that for any replacement for Chief Justice Rehnquist, a more stalwart conservative.

The Senate debates may prove more divisive than those over Judge Robert Bork, a conservative rejected by the Senate in 1987, and Justice Clarence Thomas, who became the Supreme Court’s most conservative judge after winning narrow Senate confirmation in 1991.

Retirement Yields First Opening In 11 Years (HC)

By Julie Mason

DOJ_NMG_0000681

Houston Chronicle, July 2, 2005

SANDRA DAY O'CONNOR

AGE-BIRTH DATE — 75; March 26, 1930, in El Paso, Texas.

EDUCATION — BA, Stanford University, 1950; LLB, Stanford University, 1952.

EXPERIENCE — Appointed by President Ronald Reagan to the Supreme Court in 1981, confirmed by the Senate 99-0; judge, Arizona Court of Appeals, 1979-81; judge, Maricopa County Superior Court, 1975-79; majority leader, Arizona Senate, 1973-74; Arizona state senator, 1969-75; assistant attorney general, Arizona, 1965-69; practiced law in Maryvale, Arizona, 1958-60; civilian attorney for Quartermaster Market Center, Frankfurt, Germany, 1954-57; deputy county attorney, San Mateo County, Calif., 1952-53.

FAMILY — Husband, John Jay O'Connor III; three sons, Scott, Brian and Jay.

O'Connor Retires From Supreme Court (MH)

By David Espo

The Miami Herald, July 2, 2005

Sandra Day O'Connor stepped down unexpectedly from the Supreme Court on Friday, closing out a career as the first female justice and the anchor of a shaky majority for abortion rights. President Bush pledged to name a successor quickly as the costliest confirmation battle in history took shape.

O'Connor's decision to retire created the first vacancy at the high court in 11 years, and marked the departure of the justice who had become the majority maker in a stream of 5-4 cases covering abortion, affirmative action, the death penalty and more over a quarter-century.

Bush, under pressure from some conservatives to name an outright foe of abortion, said he would appoint a successor who "will faithfully interpret the Constitution and laws of our country." He said he would make his selection in time to have a full court in place before the new term opens in October.

"The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate," he added.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Judiciary Committee that will hold hearings on Bush's candidate, said he doubted there would be a filibuster.

Democrats said that was up to Bush. "Above all, Justice O'Connor has been a voice of reason and moderation on the court," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "It is vital that she be replaced by someone like her."

O'Connor, 75 and a breast cancer survivor, kept her retirement a surprise even from her son, and it was not until Friday morning that she dispatched her letter, hand-delivered to the president.

It seemed to catch Bush's team off guard. The president and his staff had long been anticipating a retirement letter from Chief Justice William Rehnquist, 80 and ailing with thyroid cancer.

The Rehnquist guessing game continued. "If we haven't heard from him by now, the chances are you won't hear from him for some time," predicted Specter. The last time there were two simultaneous vacancies at the court was 1971; Rehnquist was picked for one of them.

Whatever the chief justice's plans, the short list of contenders, exclusively male, may have to be expanded in view of O'Connor's retirement, according to one White House official. That officials spoke only on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the discussions.

Speculation has included Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and J. Michael Luttig, John Roberts, Samuel A. Alito Jr., Michael McConnell, Emilio Garza and James Harvie Wilkinson III, all federal appeals court judges.

O'Connor's decision capped a pioneer's career. President Reagan broke nearly 200 years of tradition in 1981 when he named her - a top-ranked graduate of Stanford law school - as the first woman to wear the robes of a justice.

"As the first woman to be appointed to this court, Sandra Day O'Connor was thrust into the spotlight as no new justice has ever been," Justice Antonin Scalia said in a written statement issued by the court.

Aware by her own account of the historical burden, she evolved into a moderate conservative, but more importantly, the consistent center of a fractured court.

In her first term, she cast the deciding vote and wrote a 5-4 ruling that said a Mississippi all-women college must allow a male student to study nursing.

It was the first of many such cases.

She voted with the majority on three significant 5-4 cases in recent years: the disputed 2000 presidential election that went to Bush, a 2003 decision that upheld an affirmative action program at the University of Michigan law school and a ruling last year that said the war on terrorism did not give the government a blank check to hold terror suspects in legal limbo.

DOJ_NMG_0000682

Nowhere was her legal thinking more carefully scrutinized than when it came to abortion, an issue that divides the court as it does the country.

O'Connor balked at letting states outlaw most abortions, refusing in 1989 to join four other justices who were ready to reverse the landmark 1973 decision that said women have a constitutional right to abortion.

In 1992, she helped forge a five-justice majority that reaffirmed the core holding of the 1973 ruling. Then, in 2000, she provided the fifth and decisive vote that struck down a Nebraska law that was aimed at banning a procedure critics call "partial-birth abortions."

In her opinion, she wrote that to be constitutional, a ban must include "an exception to preserve the life and health of the mother."

Last week, she sided with a 5-4 majority in a ruling that threw out the sentence of a death row inmate and warned state courts that shoddy legal defense representation wouldn't be tolerated.

She expressed her views tartly at times.

Last week, in a dissent to a 5-4 ruling that let local governments take personal property to build malls and other businesses, she wrote that the majority had unwisely handed more power to the powerful.

"The specter of condemnation hangs over all property," O'Connor wrote. "Nothing is to prevent the state from replacing ... any home with a shopping mall, or any farm with a factory."

Alone among the current justices, O'Connor ran for office. In 1975, she was elected judge of the Maricopa County Superior Court. She served until 1979, when she was appointed to the appellate bench in Arizona. Reagan named her to the high court two years later, and she won Senate confirmation unanimously.

In a one-sentence written statement on Friday, O'Connor cited her age and said she "needs to spend time" with her family.

Her official resignation letter was brief.

"It has been a great privilege indeed to have served as a member of the court for 24 terms," the 75-year-old justice wrote to Bush. "I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure."

"For an old ranching girl, you turned out pretty good," Bush told her in a private call not long after receiving her letter, an aide said.

Then, in the Rose Garden outside the Oval Office, he praised her as "a discerning and conscientious judge and a public servant of complete integrity."

Lawmakers in both parties hastened to praise her, often taking note of her place in history. "She has been a wonderful role model for girls," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas.

In a Senate that narrowly avoided a meltdown over judicial nominations earlier in the year, much of the speechmaking seemed framed by the coming confirmation struggle.

"America needs judges who are fair, independent, unbiased and committed to equal justice under the law," said Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. "I look forward to working with my colleagues to ensure a fair confirmation process in the Senate that will ensure the Supreme Court is at full strength to start its next term in October.

Liberal Democrats said they understood Bush would name a conservative, and signaled a willingness to go along, up to a point.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said he hoped Bush would name a replacement who was a "a conservative ... who is in the mainstream of judicial thinking."

The remark stirred echoes of Democratic filibusters against several of Bush's appeals court nominees whom Democrats had attacked for years as outside the mainstream.

Partisans on both sides have been preparing for a vacancy for months. Given her opinions on abortion, O'Connor's decision to step down raised the stakes for partisans on both sides of the issue.

Senate aides of both parties held strategy meetings during the day.

Republicans were instructed to say Bush's choice deserved an "up or down vote," and that no litmus test should be applied, whether on abortion or any other issue.

Bush pledged to consult with Senate leaders. He later talked with Frist, Specter and Sen. Pat Leahy, D-Vt., the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Officials said they expected the Judiciary Committee to hold hearings three to six weeks after Bush submits a nomination, perhaps beginning in August when Congress is customarily gone.

Three to five days of testimony are likely, during which the panel would hear from the nominee as well as outside interest groups both for and against him or her.

Search For Justice O'Connor Retirement Opens Seat On Supreme Court (AJC)

By Ken Herman

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 2, 2005

With a three-sentence letter delivered Friday to the White House, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement from the Supreme Court and set off what many expect to be a bitter battle over the future of the nation's highest court.

O'Connor, appointed by President Ronald Reagan and the court's first female member, turned out to be the main swing vote on a court with a penchant for 5-4 decisions in high-profile cases involving civil rights, religion and affirmative action — and even, in 2000, the awarding of the presidential election to George W. Bush.

"She has occupied a pivotal role on the court as a centrist," said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

In the letter announcing her intention to retire when a successor is confirmed, O'Connor, 75, told President Bush, "It has been a great privilege, indeed, to have served as a member of the court for 24 terms. I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure." Her husband is battling Alzheimer's disease.

Praise for O'Connor prefaced all talk Friday about a replacement.

"For an old ranching girl, you turned out pretty good," Bush told O'Connor during a phone call, said White House press secretary Scott McClellan.

After speaking to O'Connor, Bush said in a Rose Garden address that the country deserved a new justice it can be proud of.

"The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote," he said. He promised to make a nomination in time for the Senate to confirm his choice before the court reconvenes in October.

The confirmation process recently has been anything but smooth. Bush's nomination of John Bolton as U.N. ambassador is stuck in the Senate, with Democrats refusing to let it go to the floor for a vote. And some appellate court nominations were approved only after a brutal battle in which Republican senators threatened to eradicate the filibuster, used by the Democratic minority to block some of Bush's nominees.

"I can't imagine they are going to want to get into controversial tactics such as that," McClellan said of the potential for a filibuster of Bush's nominee to replace O'Connor.

But Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) moved quickly to put Bush on notice about a replacement.

"If the president abuses his power and nominates someone who threatens to roll back the rights and freedoms of the American people, then the American people will insist that we oppose that nominee, and we intend to do so," Kennedy said.

Kennedy said "serious consultation with the Senate in the nomination process is the key to a successful confirmation process."

McClellan said Bush always consulted with senators on judicial nominees, "but I think this will be an even more thorough process."

The White House is working with a list that McClellan would quantify only as "a group of potential nominees." Most often cited on lists making the rounds in Washington are Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a longtime Bush aide who said recently his only goal was to return to Texas in the coming years, and six solidly conservative federal appellate judges: J. Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson of the 4th Circuit court in Richmond, John Roberts of the District of Columbia court, Samuel Alito Jr. of the 3rd Circuit in New Jersey, William Pryor of the 11th Circuit in Atlanta, and Emilio Garza of the 5th Circuit in Texas.

Friday's announcement followed weeks of anticipation of a court retirement that had centered on 80-year-old Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who is battling thyroid cancer. Also on the watch list has been the court's oldest justice, John Paul Stevens, 85.

Though O'Connor was a relatively little-known

Arizona state judge when she was appointed in 1981 to replace the retiring Potter Stewart, her status as the court's first female made her an instant celebrity and the court's most recognized member.

"People saw it as a signal that there are virtually unlimited opportunities for women," she said once in an interview. "It's important to parents for their daughters, and to daughters for themselves."

In the Senate, Specter did not understate the task of finding a consensus replacement.

"This is a very polarized country when it comes to the issues which will come to the Supreme Court of the United States," he said. "Everybody can't have their own way."

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said he expected a dogfight.

"During the past four years we have seen unprecedented obstruction, partisanship — and venomous personal attacks dominate the Senate's judicial confirmation process," said Cornyn, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Bush promised to announce a nominee in a "timely manner," but said he would be "deliberate and thorough in this process" as he reviewed potential appointees "who will faithfully interpret the Constitution and laws of our country."

McClellan said no appointment would be made until Bush's return Friday from the G-8 conference of world leaders in Scotland. He said Bush had not reviewed any records concerning potential nominees, but acknowledged that a list of names was ready for presidential review.

"This is something we have been preparing for over the last few years," McClellan said.

After meeting with administration officials Friday about O'Connor's retirement, Bush called Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). McClellan said Bush had discussed the Supreme Court on Wednesday with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Reid on Friday called for a nominee "whose views are within the broad constitutional mainstream and who will make all Americans proud."

"With this nomination the president should choose to unite the country, not divide it," said Reid.

While players on both sides called for a calm, measured replacement process, outside groups quickly mobilized.

People for the American Way, a left-leaning organization that has opposed Bush's judicial nominees, quickly issued an urgent appeal, telling supporters it expected Bush to name "someone who threatens our rights and liberties."

"If O'Connor is replaced by a justice in the mold of justices [Antonin] Scalia and [Clarence] Thomas, as President Bush has suggested and right-wing leaders are demanding, the consequences would be disastrous for many of the legal and social justice victories achieved over recent decades," said Ralph Neas, the group's president.

On the other side, the Christian Defense Coalition also moved quickly to rally its backers.

"We are keenly aware that it was judges who removed prayer from the public schools and decriminalized abortion, which resulted in the deaths of 45,000,000 children," said the Rev. Patrick Mahoney, the group's director. "It was the courts that attempted to remove 'One nation under God' from the Pledge of Allegiance, and it is now courts that are trying to redefine marriage and the family."

Mahoney predicted a "bruising confirmation process."

Much Is At Stake With Bush's Choice (BSUN)

By Paul West

The Baltimore Sun, July 2, 2005

On a quiet, muggy, pre-holiday Friday morning, word of a Supreme Court retirement finally arrived - and with a stunning twist.

This was the Big One, the departure of Sandra Day O'Connor, the first female justice and the pivotal jurist on a closely divided court. The aftershocks from her announcement will be felt far into the future, in the realms of law, politics and, quite conceivably, American culture.

Most immediately, her resignation sharply raises the stakes - and ferocity - of a much-anticipated clash over the court's direction, legal scholars and political analysts said yesterday. It also creates a series of important decisions for President Bush and his advisers, from the selection of a replacement to the timing of that nomination.

"This is a vastly more consequential choice now for the president than replacing the chief justice would have been," said David Garrow of Emory University law school.

The ailing chief justice, William H. Rehnquist, whose departure had been more widely predicted than O'Connor's, is a fairly reliable member of the court's conservative bloc. By contrast, O'Connor has often been the justice whose vote decided cases, and her departure could well tilt a conservative court further to the right.

"This is probably the most significant appointment for the court" in nearly two decades, said Dennis J. Hutchinson, a University of Chicago law professor who edits The Supreme Court Review there.

"She's been the balance wheel of the court for at least the last half-decade. She's the one who has had the deciding vote or moderating vote on so many hot-button issues, whether it's affirmative action, abortion, states' rights and, to some extent, the religion clauses."

The confirmation fight in the Senate, which must approve her replacement, will be unlike any other.

"You have the 24-hour news cycle, the blogosphere, the incredible organizing by groups, for and against, with both sides literally raising millions of dollars. Their own legitimacy and power status in Washington is at stake here in ways that it wasn't in the past," said Hutchinson.

Analysts are already forecasting a long, hot Washington summer - and possibly autumn - in the struggle over replacing O'Connor, a story that figures to dominate attention during a period when the nation's capital is normally quiet.

DOJ_NMG_0000685

"You really get the feeling that you're standing in the open field of Gettysburg, shortly before the action," said Jonathan Turley, a George Washington University law professor. "We've got two well-funded armies in Washington. Whenever you have this degree of preparation, money and personnel, something bad tends to happen. There's a certain sense of dread."

Bush and his advisers have been preparing for a Supreme Court vacancy for months, if not years. But the timing of the nomination could be almost as important as the choice of a nominee.

The president said yesterday that he would announce the appointment "in a timely manner." But he also promised to consult in advance with members of Congress, and his spokesman signaled that a nominee was unlikely to be announced before mid-July, at the earliest.

Delaying an announcement might be in Bush's best interest.

"History has shown that nominees left to twist in the summer wind of Washington tend to suffer from the exposure," said Turley. "This town is like an armed camp, and any nominee that comes forward will suffer in the process."

By most estimates, the fight over replacing O'Connor will be more intense than the one over a Rehnquist successor would have been.

"O'Connor has long been an icon for both sides. For conservatives, she's viewed as an unreliable justice, in terms of conservative values," said Turley. "For Democrats, she's viewed as part of that thin black line of justices protecting them from a conservative sweep."

If Bush sticks to his stated goal of choosing a justice in the mold of Clarence Thomas, he "could have the most lasting impact on American law of any president in history," the professor added. "After decades of 5-4 votes, there are a dozen different areas that currently dangle by a single vote."

At the top of the list of legal issues, for many on both sides of the judicial fight, is abortion. O'Connor, a supporter of abortion rights, has often cast the swing vote in abortion cases.

Regardless of who replaces her, though, there will still be a majority on the court that supports abortion rights, which were guaranteed by the landmark 1973 decision in Roe v. Wade that overturned state laws outlawing abortion.

A conservative spokesman in the fight over judicial nominees stressed that point in an effort to play down the emotional importance of abortion in the confirmation battle.

The Supreme Court "has a 6-3 majority favoring Roe v. Wade, so replacing her will not challenge Roe's core," said C. Boyden Gray, former White House counsel to the first President George Bush and chairman of the Committee for Justice, part of a $20 million conservative effort to defend Bush's nominee.

University of Chicago's Hutchinson also said that O'Connor's replacement "isn't going to change the status of Roe v. Wade." Eleven of the last 13 appointments to the Supreme Court have been made by Republican presidents, "and Roe v. Wade is still solidly in place," he pointed out.

Instead, Bush's first decision will be "how much of a fight does he want to wage? Is he going to fight for symbolism, with an Hispanic, or the ideological fight, where he's getting pressed" from conservative groups, said Hutchinson.

Organizations representing religious and social conservatives are demanding a solidly conservative nominee in return for their help in Bush's re-election last year, preferably one who will move the court a step closer to overturning Roe.

Professor Garrow speculated that filling the O'Connor vacancy first, rather than the Rehnquist seat, will make it easier for Bush to name a close associate, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, "replacing the first woman with the first Hispanic, rather than with an extremely conservative white male."

Conservative groups, who doubt Gonzales' zeal for the anti-abortion cause, oppose Gonzales. But the path-breaking selection of a Hispanic "would offer Bush some insulation from unhappy right-wingers," said Garrow, author of a history of Roe and the evolution of abortion rights.

He added that he "found it highly ironic this morning that the president so effusively praised [O'Connor], the justice who's done more to protect Roe v. Wade than anyone else. A president intent on naming an opponent of abortion wouldn't necessarily have made those remarks."

In the 2000 campaign, Bush said he wouldn't make abortion a litmus test for his court picks. But a legal adviser from that campaign, Ben Ginsberg, said that regardless of the eventual nominee's views, Democratic opposition is inevitable.

"O'Connor was a true conservative who stuck to her own positions and beliefs. And while she was perceived as being an ideological soulmate of Rehnquist's, which she was, there were some differences," he said. "That will gin up the liberal groups in a way that a Rehnquist resignation wouldn't have."

Conservatives, meantime, expect Bush to put a reliably conservative vote on the bench.

"The problem is that both sides are so firm that there's not a lot of room for compromise. It's all going to depend on the president. I think conservatives and liberals are not just ready but eager for a fight," said Turley. "In this environment, compromise will be viewed by both sides as weakness. It may be a battle that is inevitable."

At White House, Surprise Is Borne Out In Name Only (NYT)

By Douglas Jehl

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

In retrospect, there were ambiguous hints that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor might be preparing to step down.

Last June, for the court term that begins this October, Justice O'Connor hired just three clerks, one shy of her usual complement. Early last month, Justice O'Connor's husband, John, told another guest at a dinner party that while his wife had been the most powerful woman in America, now "we're out of here."

But within the White House and the rest of official Washington, none of those signals made it any less surprising early Friday morning when the Supreme Court sent word that it was Justice O'Connor, and not Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who was stepping down.

At the White House, the moment presents Mr. Bush with an opportunity to define at last, more than four years into his presidency, whether he is a pragmatic, flexible conservative, as he has portrayed himself in two campaigns, or a more ideological one, determined to move the court much further rightward. It is a juncture officials have been planning for.

Still, the first real expectations of an impending vacancy were prompted by a telephone call placed before noon on Thursday by a marshal at the court, said the White House spokesman, Scott McClellan. But the marshal had sent word to the White House only that she had a sealed envelope that needed to be delivered on Friday, he said.

Some White House officials had privately speculated that Justice O'Connor could well resign, though almost certainly in tandem with Chief Justice Rehnquist, who was seen as far more likely to depart. He is 80 and ill with thyroid cancer.

It was not until shortly before 9 a.m. on Friday that Harriet Miers, the White House counsel, learned which of the nine justices was leaving the court, Mr. McClellan said. Ms. Miers had spoken by telephone again to the marshal and was told that "she now had the authority to say that this letter was in reference to Justice O'Connor."

That meant that it would fall to Mr. Bush to fill not a seat held by a solid conservative, but one held by a justice who for most of her 24 years on the court has been one of its least predictable swing votes. By 10:30 a.m., Mr. Bush had spoken briefly by phone with Justice O'Connor and had met with advisers for the first strategy session about her replacement.

Mr. McClellan acknowledged that Thursday's call had been sufficient to prompt Ms. Miers to alert Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff, as well as Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Asked if any speculation in the White House had focused on Mr. Rehnquist, Mr. McClellan just smiled.

The White House has been preparing for months to fill a seat on the court, but people involved in the process said the main focus had been on finding a new chief justice to replace Mr. Rehnquist. It was only in recent weeks, some conservatives said, that the White House began to consider seriously the prospect of Justice O'Connor's departure.

"It means a different nominee," C. Boyden Gray, the founder of a conservative group organized to back a Bush nominee, said as he rushed out the door of his Georgetown home on Friday morning to prepare for a day of back-to-back news media interviews and strategy sessions with his conservative troops.

"It's more difficult because it requires a vote change," said Mr. Gray, the former White House counsel under President Bush's father. "I'm not sure we are as prepared for an O'Connor vacancy."

However unprepared, Mr. Gray's conservative allies responded immediately. Progress for America, one of several groups steeled for a court vacancy, sent out a mass e-mail message shortly after 10 a.m., suggesting that their liberal opponents were poised to wage a bruising partisan battle. "The president's nominee deserves genuine consideration - not instant attacks," Brian McCabe, president of the group, was quoted as saying in the e-mail message. "The Left has been huddling for the last 11 years, plotting strategy to derail any nominee to the Supreme Court."

The group has said it will spend $18 million to defend Mr. Bush's Supreme Court nominee, and it quickly released a Web-exclusive advertisement to 8.7 million conservative constituents in 21 states contending that liberal advocacy groups would block Benjamin Franklin and George Washington if they were nominated to the court today. A mock news report in the advertisement reported that Democrats were attacking Franklin because of his ties to the energy industry and Washington for an environmental record tarnished by chopping down cherry trees.

At roughly the same moment, People for the American Way, one of the main liberal groups working on the judicial issue, sent out its own e-mail memo to about 10,000 journalists and 4,000 activists, calling the O'Connor resignation a "critical moment for the Constitution."

"Replacing the conservative Justice O'Connor with a right-wing ideologue would be a constitutional catastrophe," Ralph G. Neas, president of the group, said. "A right-wing appointment could turn back the clock seven decades."

Among those in Washington notified at least a few hours before Justice O'Connor's decision became public were at least some of her fellow justices, according to people who talked by telephone with the justices on Friday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0000687

An aide to Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, said that the senator had been given "strong indications" that Justice O'Connor would step down, and that party leaders were sufficiently prepared that they had positioned themselves on the Senate floor for the moment when word became known. Dr. Frist's tribute to Justice O'Connor appeared to have been prepared in advance.

News A Surprise To Family, Bush (DMN/AP)

Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor even surprised her family.

Her son, Scott, a Phoenix businessman, said he didn't find out about his mother's retirement until after the Washington announcement.

"She was a little teary-eyed," he said after talking to her Friday. "That is a tough decision."

Justice O'Connor has two other sons, Brian and Jay, and several grandchildren. One granddaughter wrote a book with her, about a child's visit to the court.

President Bush called Justice O'Connor before he appeared in the Rose Garden to express appreciation for her 24 years of service.

"For an old ranching girl, you turned out pretty good," he told Justice O'Connor, who grew up on an Arizona ranch.

"You're one of the great Americans," Mr. Bush said. "I wish I were there to hug you."

The White House got the first hint Thursday when the court's head marshal called White House counsel Harriet Miers to arrange delivery of a sealed envelope Friday morning.

The administration had been preparing for Chief Justice William Rehnquist to step down and had been mulling how to replace the court's conservative anchor.

"We have had a plan in place," White House press secretary Scott McClellan said, "just in case there was a vacancy."

Nomination Could Be Defining Moment For Bush (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

There are few genuine earthquakes in American politics, but yesterday's announcement by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor easily qualifies as one. Her retirement is likely to trigger one of the most consequential confirmation battles in a generation, with the ideological balance of the Supreme Court and the future of contentious social issues now firmly in the hands of President Bush.

For more than three decades, the right has been ascendant in America. A Republican Party fueled by the energy and activism of its religious and social conservatives has seized control of the executive and legislative branches of government in Washington and has seen its strength widen and deepen across the country.

The Supreme Court is the lone branch of government where conservatives have been unable to gain the dominant voice, to the great frustration of those on the right. Among the most ardent conservatives, there is no better evidence of the need to change the court than two decisions that marked the end of the term this summer, which limited displays of the Ten Commandments on government property and gave local governments the power to seize private property for commercial development.

The choice ahead for Bush in selecting a successor to O'Connor may prove to be the most important domestic decision of his presidency, given its potential impact on abortion and other issues and rivaling Iraq in its ability to split the country. He will soon decide just how far to try to push the court in a different direction. The bolder he is, the more likely he will touch off a battle that will consume Washington and much of the country for the rest of the summer and whose impact could be felt in the 2006 elections and beyond.

There are huge risks for Bush no matter which way he moves. He faces enormous pressure from the right to appoint someone more conservative than O'Connor. But such a move risks a potentially bruising battle with Senate Democrats and a backlash among voters in the middle of the ideological spectrum, who may worry about the GOP's social and cultural agenda.

But leading Republicans said Bush must move decisively to remake the court. "Given the disastrous decisions of the last few days on private property rights, the Ten Commandments and violent criminals, I think the majority that elected Bush and the House and Senate clearly expects a very conservative nomination," said former House speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia.

The coming decision will prove a defining moment for Bush's presidency. His political strategy is founded on the assiduous courtship of his conservative base, and on big issues he has rarely chosen to disappoint them. But it has never been clear how comfortable the president is in pushing a sharply conservative social agenda. He opposes abortion but has resisted championing the cause of overturning Roe v. Wade . He pushed a constitutional amendment barring same-sex marriages, but at a time when it was clear it could never pass Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0000688

Bush has been forthright, however, in trying to change the complexion of the courts, a political project that he shares with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove and other top advisers. Bush has nominated a series of conservatives to fill federal district and, especially, appellate courts, locking horns with Democrats, whose filibusters of those nominations only heightened the White House's determination to keep pushing forward.

But the president also has a contrarian streak, and in personnel decisions he often likes to go with his instincts. Only a handful of people know the full range of calculations he and his advisers are bringing to this decision, but there is no more important issue to social and religious conservatives than the Supreme Court, and there aren't many ways for Bush to fudge on his intentions in the selection of a successor to O'Connor.

"The court is the pivot point on social policy, and O'Connor's seat is the pivot point on the court," said William Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard, who had predicted O'Connor's retirement. "So it's a pretty dramatic moment."

Both sides believe the political landscape tilts in their direction in a Supreme Court battle, reflecting sharply contrasting philosophies about the role of the courts.

Democrats think Bush has been hurt by Republican-led intervention in the Terri Schiavo case and by the comments of House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and others warning that they intend to do whatever they can to rein in the courts. In their estimation, moderate voters, particularly women, recoil at the prospect of a Republican Party that already controls the White House and Congress gaining control of the majority at the Supreme Court. Instead, they want a court system that provides a check and balance rather than a ratification of the conservative agenda.

But conservatives argue, and key White House officials agree, that the public sees the courts as out of touch with their values. They believe that voters want the courts to act as impartial referees in the political battles between the major parties. Conservatives believe a majority of Americans see the courts dominated by judges who are legislating on issues such as gay rights and abortion. They argue that the high court's rulings run wildly counter to public opinion.

The shockwaves of O'Connor's announcement began to reverberate immediately as word began to circulate yesterday morning that it was the court's most celebrated swing justice, and not the ailing chief justice, William H. Rehnquist, who is stepping down.

Combatants on both sides had widely anticipated a Rehnquist retirement and were gearing up for a confirmation fight over his successor. But there was something ritualistic about the preparations for that battle, since the departure of Rehnquist, one of the staunchest conservatives among the nine justices, would offer no real chance to move the court to the right.

The departure of O'Connor changed all that, bringing conservatives to a moment they have long dreamed about and liberals to a moment they have long feared. No one was exaggerating yesterday when they talked about the potential consequences involved in the choice of an O'Connor successor.

"This totally raises the stakes," said Democratic pollster Geoffrey Garin. He added: "Obviously we've had battles over particular nominees, but this is a battle about the court itself rather than any one seat. As a result, so much more hangs in the balance. There's no question that all sides will see this as a very high-stakes, high-consequence battle."

It is possible that predictions of a pitched battle in the Senate this summer may prove exaggerated. "I understand both sides are well armed and ready for war and everyone's got their battle plans drawn," said Ron Klain, who was chief of staff to then-Vice President Al Gore. "But it ultimately does come down to whom he selects. If he does what Ronald Reagan did and veers off and picks someone more from the center, then we might not have a fight. If not, we're much more likely to have a fight."

That could mean the choice of someone such as Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, a personal favorite of the president, who is seen as less rigidly conservative than some others on lists of possible nominees.

But among conservatives still angry about the choice by Bush's father of Justice David H. Souter, who has voted regularly with the court's liberals, Gonzales is seen as insufficiently opposed to abortion, and his nomination would be viewed by them as a betrayal. "There are many pro-family groups who are opposed to his being nominated," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel of Concerned Women for America.

Depending on the outcome of the upcoming battle, the courts could become central issues in next year's midterm elections and in the next presidential campaign. After the uproar over the confirmation of Justice Clarence Thomas came what was called the "Year of the Woman," in 1992, when Democrats elected a number of women to the Senate. After the high court's 1989 abortion decision in the Webster case from Missouri, abortion became a mobilizing issue on both the right and the left.

In the larger context, conservatives see the upcoming battle as a chance to recoup from the failure to confirm Robert H. Bork to the Supreme Court during the Reagan administration, which they regard as a major setback for their movement. In Bush they have the most conservative president since Reagan and one who, as his advisers say, likes to swing for the fences. Which is why his next move is awaited by all sides with such great expectation.

Groups Poised To Swing Left And Right (DMN)

By David Jackson

The Dallas Morning News, July 2, 2005

The long-anticipated battle for the Supreme Court is finally here, but it's not the one many people expected.

It might be bloodier.

Washington prepared for the retirement of conservative Chief Justice William Rehnquist; instead, the more moderate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement Friday – giving President Bush the opportunity to pull the court to the right on such issues as abortion, gay rights, affirmative action and religion in public life.

Rather than swapping one conservative for another, as he would have with Justice Rehnquist, Mr. Bush gets to replace the justice who often provided the swing vote in 5-4 rulings.

"Her replacement will have a monumental impact on the lives and freedoms of Americans for decades to come," said Ralph Neas, president of the liberal group People for the American Way.

His organization is one of many prepared to campaign against any Bush nominee that they consider out of the mainstream. Those efforts will be opposed by conservative groups still smarting from the rough treatment given past GOP nominees Robert Bork, rejected by the Senate in 1987, and Clarence Thomas, who was barely confirmed after sexual harassment allegations surfaced in 1991.

"We know they will attack almost any nonliberal nominee in hysterical terms," said C. Boyden Gray, a former White House counsel whose organization, The Committee for Justice, will promote the president's pick.

Another conservative group, Progress for America, has already begun running television ads on behalf of Mr. Bush's nominee, whoever that person will be.

Mr. Bush said he will fill the first vacancy in 11 years with "a Supreme Court justice that Americans can be proud of."

Don't expect a nomination next week, aides said, as Mr. Bush travels to Scotland for the annual Group of Eight summit.

Woman, or Hispanic?

Justice O'Connor's announcement forced a reassessment at the White House, where officials had been more focused on a possible Rehnquist retirement because of his thyroid cancer.

Her retirement puts pressure on Mr. Bush to consider nominating a woman, or at least a more moderate nominee in the O'Connor mold, analysts said. It also opens the door for a possible historic pick, such as the court's first Hispanic member, possibly Attorney General Al Gonzales.

In recent days, conservatives have discussed a Gonzales-for-O'Connor trade. They have also criticized the possibility, calling the former White House counsel insufficiently opposed to abortion rights and affirmative action.

On the other side, Mr. Gonzales, a former White House counsel, would face liberal opposition over his role in setting policy for treatment of war prisoners.

Asked about the Supreme Court this week, Mr. Gonzales said his sole focus is "to defend America against domestic attacks and to make our community safer."

As for potential female nominees, administration officials have reviewed the record of New Orleans-based appeals Judge Edith Brown Clement. Another possibility is Edith Jones of Houston, who, like Judge Clement, sits on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Both are considered pro-business conservatives and would likely be opposed by liberals.

Conservatives, meanwhile, are expected to continue pushing judges who had been promoted for Chief Justice Rehnquist's slot. That list includes appeals judges Michael Luttig of Virginia, Samuel Alito of New Jersey and John Roberts of Washington, D.C. They too would likely draw Democratic opposition.

Retirement announcement

The text of Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement letter to President Bush:

Dear President Bush:

This is to inform you of my decision to retire from my position as an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States effective upon the nomination and confirmation of my successor. It has been a great privilege, indeed, to have served as a member of the court for 24 terms. I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure.

Sincerely,

Sandra Day O'Connor

Mr. Bush is being bombarded with advice, including a push from conservatives to consider Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and a write-in campaign on behalf of San Antonio-based appeals Judge Edward Prado. Both are considered long shots.

DOJ_NMG_0000690

White House officials said the Bush legal team has spent years looking at possible nominees, but they indicated that Mr. Bush's interviews with the finalists would be decisive.

During a 2004 election debate, Mr. Bush said he would pick justices "who would not allow their personal opinion to get in the way of law. I would pick somebody who would strictly interpret the Constitution of the United States."

Many legal analysts have cited Mr. Bush's praise for justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the court's most conservative members, as an indicator of the type of person he might select.

Roe vs. Wade

As groups gear up for what will be a multimillion-dollar battle, abortion is probably the biggest fault line. Conservatives have long sought a reversal of Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 decision that made abortion a constitutional right.

Nancy Keenan, the president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, promised a "real fight" if Mr. Bush nominates an anti-Roe judge: "The 60 percent of Americans who want Roe v. Wade left alone will not be silent this time."

Abortion rights opponent Ed Meese, attorney general for President Reagan, urged Mr. Bush to seek a judge who interprets laws, "rather than making up the law to reach some policy objective or personal preference."

Liberals fear a conservative court would render decisions that favor businesses over consumers, environmentalists and unions; that restrict affirmative actions and gay rights; that give police more power over civilians; and that expand the role of religion in government.

Conservatives said they want a court that will protect the rights of religious believers, business people and property owners from expanding government control.

A simple Senate majority may not be enough to confirm Mr. Bush's nominee, who would need 60 votes to override a Democratic filibuster, a strategy many Bush critics are prepared to advocate.

In pledging to move expeditiously, Mr. Bush said, "the nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing, and a fair vote."

Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, top Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said Mr. Bush could avoid past divisions by tapping a jurist in the O'Connor mold.

"Justice O'Connor is a sterling example of what can happen when a president nominates a justice not from the right or the left wing of one of the political parties," he said, "but an independent judge capable of making up her own mind."

Adding 1 Involves A Lot Of Variables (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

As President Bush weighs a successor for retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, he will face pressure to name a Latino, a woman, an African American or someone who would help overturn the landmark case that legalized abortion.

But White House allies and advisors said Friday that the toughest choice facing Bush was whether to pick a nominee who would probably coast to Senate confirmation — such as his longtime friend, Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales — or one who would please the conservative Republican base but also spark a protracted partisan battle that could stall other priorities.

That quandary came into focus with O'Connor's surprise announcement, which all but assured White House allies that Bush would get the chance to make at least two Supreme Court appointments. The second would replace ailing Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who until Friday had been considered the sure bet to create the first opening.

Now, White House advisors are trying to draw lessons from the experience of President Reagan, who took the easy route first in winning confirmation for Justice Antonin Scalia but then paid a heavy price when a more controversial nominee, Robert H. Bork, was defeated.

"It's a fairly sophisticated choice to be facing," said C. Boyden Gray, White House counsel under President George H.W. Bush and now a strategist on court nominees for the current administration. Bush "really does want to appoint Gonzales. So does he appoint Gonzales now, or does he wait for the second opening? Gonzales would be the first Hispanic and would be easier to confirm" than other contenders considered to be more conservative.

Further complicating matters for the White House, said Gray and other administration allies, was the fact that O'Connor made her announcement on the eve of the president's trip to Scotland for the summit of the Group of 8 industrial nations. That means Bush will not announce his nominee until at least the end of next week, giving Democrats and liberal interest groups more time to frame the debate and talk about potential picks.

"It's going to put pressure on people like us on the outside to get on TV and fill the airwaves," Gray said.

For Bush, the O'Connor announcement opened the door to one of the most highly anticipated decisions of his presidency. His approach to a Supreme Court vacancy has been the source of speculation among activists on all sides of major issues since he said during his 2000 campaign that his ideal court picks would mirror conservative heroes Scalia and Justice Clarence Thomas.

DOJ_NMG_0000691

But his course of action is unpredictable. Bush won the White House by shoring up his party's conservative base, but he is also fiercely loyal to friends such as Gonzales and eager to expand the Republican base by drawing more Latino voters.

Religious conservatives signaled Friday that they would not be satisfied with Gonzales or any nominee viewed as potentially soft on overturning the Roe vs. Wade abortion decision and on other social issues. O'Connor's departure is thought to leave a narrow court majority supporting a right to abortion, and leading conservative activists relished the prospect of moving one vote closer to overturning the 1973 decision that legalized the procedure.

Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention noted that O'Connor had been part of the majority in several cases that had "dismayed social conservatives," including several abortion decisions and this week's ruling limiting the display of the Ten Commandments in public buildings. Land said Bush's legacy as a president would probably turn on whether he picked a sufficiently conservative nominee.

Similar thoughts came from other evangelical leaders, such as Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, and Gary Bauer, president of American Values. Bauer cautioned the White House to avoid the temptation to "pander to the whims of political correctness."

Gonzales has been a particular concern to conservatives because of moderate stances he took on abortion rights and affirmative action while a justice on the Texas Supreme Court and as White House counsel. Some conservatives said they were counting on Bush to hold off on appointing his friend.

"I know he respects [Gonzales], and he could come up later," said the Rev. Louis P. Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition. "But I think out of the chute, the president wants someone who will have 100% support from the grass roots."

But as Bush considers various nominees, there are reasons he may bypass the most conservative names and focus instead on Gonzales or other candidates considered more moderate.

The president may want to avoid a bitter confirmation battle that could hamper the rest of his agenda in Congress by tying up the Senate and inflaming partisan passions. Already, Bush's signature domestic proposal — restructuring Social Security — is in jeopardy, and a confirmation vote on John R. Bolton, his nominee to be U.N. ambassador, has been stalled by Senate Democrats.

Recent polls have put Bush's popularity below 50% amid growing concerns about the war in Iraq, and a further erosion may scare Republican lawmakers from following his lead on a range of issues.

Moreover, the fact that the president will be choosing a successor to O'Connor, a moderate, "makes it easier for Bush to appoint someone who is more of a moderate," said UC Berkeley law professor John Yoo, a former Justice Department official.

In fact, Bush may have signaled this week that pleasing social conservatives by pushing to overturn Roe vs. Wade was not necessarily weighing on his mind.

"Abortion ought to be illegal with the exception of rape, incest or life of the mother," he said on Danish television Wednesday. "But look, I'm a realist as well. I mean, this is an issue that has polarized the American political society. And in order to get good policy in place that protects the life of a child, we're going to have to change hearts."

O'Connor's retirement raises the prospect that Bush will nominate someone who has a diverse background, but not necessarily a woman, said some who watch the court. "The fact that it is Justice O'Connor may marginally hurt the chances of the white males in the pool and help the chances of those who are perceived to be more readily confirmable," said Bradford Berenson, a former White House lawyer.

Bush has never hidden his affection for his longtime aide Gonzales, a son of migrant workers. Bush has placed him in a series of increasingly important jobs since Gonzales became Bush's legal advisor in Texas in the 1990s.

If chosen for the high court, Gonzales is considered likely to be approved. Not only did he already win confirmation as attorney general, but also lawmakers from both parties would be wary of opposing him for fear of offending Latino voters.

"There is no doubt in my mind that Al Gonzales will be nominated for the Supreme Court. The only question is whether it will be for the first or the second opening," said Gonzales' longtime acquaintance Roland Garcia, a Houston lawyer who was a law partner of White House Counsel Harriet Miers.

Miers, a Texas lawyer who has known Gonzales and Bush for years, is helping vet potential nominees. Gonzales huddled Friday with Miers, Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, White House political strategist Karl Rove and several others to discuss O'Connor's resignation. The attorney general has made a point recently of opening dialogue with conservative activists, leading some to conclude he was in essence interviewing for the job.

Gonzales was unavailable to comment Friday, but issued a written statement calling O'Connor a "role model for a generation of young lawyers."

Should Bush choose to avoid a battle with his own base over Gonzales and opt for a candidate thought to be more reliably conservative, there are many contenders believed to be on his short list.

Another possible Latino nominee is Judge Emilio M. Garza, 57, who sits on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. Garza has written opinions that are skeptical of the right to abortion set out in Roe vs. Wade.

If the White House concludes that O'Connor's departure means Bush must choose another woman, the possibilities include Edith H. Jones, who sits with Garza on the 5th Circuit; Edith Brown Clement, who also sits on that court; and former California Supreme Court Justice Janice Rogers Brown, who was recently confirmed as a judge on the federal appeals court in Washington, D.C.

Jones and Brown have endeared themselves to the GOP's conservative wing. Jones has written opinions openly questioning the rationale in Roe vs. Wade and suggesting that it should be reexamined based on research raising new questions about the effect of abortions on women's health.

Brown has a long record as a conservative-minded state court jurist on issues including property rights, affirmative action and government power. Born into a sharecropper's family in Alabama, she has the sort of personal story that Bush appears to admire in his Cabinet and judicial picks. She would also be the first African American woman on the court.

Clement was named to the federal bench by the first President Bush and was elevated to the appellate court in 2001.

Should Bush decide to forgo considerations of diversity and focus solely on finding a conservative, he may tap Judge J. Michael Luttig, an appellate judge in Virginia; Judge Samuel A. Alito of the U.S. Court of Appeals in Philadelphia, whose conservative voice has invited comparisons to Scalia; or Judge John G. Roberts Jr., a cautious Bush appointee to the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C.

Candidates whose confirmations would probably be relatively less confrontational include J. Harvie Wilkinson III, a scholarly veteran judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., and Michael W. McConnell, a former University of Chicago law professor who sits on the U.S. Court of Appeals in Denver and has drawn support from both liberal and conservative academics.

*

VACANCY ON THE SUPREME COURT

10 potential successors

Samuel A. Alito Jr., 55

Son of an Italian immigrant has been likened to Justice Antonin Scalia because of his legal philosophy. A staunch conservative on the generally liberal U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals. Has written conservative dissents in abortion, gun control and 1st Amendment cases.

*

Janice Rogers Brown, 56

Brown was confirmed in June to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia after a nearly two-year political battle focused on her conservative judicial philosophy. She took some liberal positions as a California Supreme Court justice.

*

Emilio Garza, 58

Appointed a district judge in 1988, Garza was promoted to the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1991 by George H.W. Bush. A conservative Catholic, he would be the court's first Latino. He has suggested that he would vote to overturn the constitutional protection for abortion rights.

*

Alberto R. Gonzales, 49

U.S. attorney general drew fire from Democrats during confirmation hearings. Some conservatives view the longtime Bush advisor as too moderate on issues such as abortion rights and affirmative action. He is the son of Mexican American migrant farm-workers.

*

Edith Hollan Jones, 55

A smart, hard-nosed conservative, Jones has sat on the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals since 1985. She has a long track record on a wide range of issues, including abortion. She has characterized the Roe vs. Wade decision as a "raw exercise in judicial power."

*

J. Michael Luttig, 51

DOJ_NMG_0000693

Has been on U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in Virginia since 1991. Clerked for Justice Antonin Scalia on a federal appeals court, and for Chief Justice Warren Burger in 1983-84. Has a conservate reputation, but some see him as more moderate than others on Bush's list.

*

Michael W. McConnell, 50

Judge on the U.S. 10th Circuit Court of Appeals since 2002 has been criticized from the right and the left. Liberals suspect he opposes abortion, though he has said the issue is "completely settled." Opposed the Clinton impeachment and the 2000 presidential election ruling.

*

John G. Roberts Jr., 50

A judge with the D.C. Circuit Court since 2003, he was a law clerk for Chief Justice William Rehnquist and served under the first President Bush. A sought-after private litigator in Supreme Court cases, he has generally avoided weighing in on disputed social issues.

*

J. Harvie Wilkinson III, 60

Wilkinson has served in the armed forces, taught law and is a former editorial page editor of the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot. He has been consistently conservative since he was nominated to the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals by President Reagan in 1984.

*

Edith Brown Clement, 57

Clement was nominated by President George H.W. Bush to a seat on the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana in 1991. She served for 10 years, including two as chief judge, until President George W. Bush elevated her to the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Supreme Court Justice O'Connor Resigns (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a self-described "simple cowgirl" who became the first woman on the Supreme Court, announced her retirement yesterday after nearly a generation as the court's pivotal voice on society's most burning issues, from abortion and race to capital punishment and terrorism.

O'Connor, 75, stunned the capital with her simple three-sentence letter hand-delivered to the White House yesterday morning, touching off what both parties expect to be a media-saturated struggle to choose her successor. The consequences could hardly be greater, given the precarious ideological balance on the court and O'Connor's role for many years as the deciding vote.

Her announcement threw off balance the political and legal establishment in Washington, which had expected Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist to retire when the court's term ended Monday and then stood down after he did not. President Bush first got word Thursday that a sealed envelope from the court would arrive the next morning but did not know from which justice, and he kept even that news secret from everyone in the West Wing but Vice President Cheney and two aides.

Within minutes of the letter's arrival, all manner of activists, lawmakers and administration officials -- many heading off for the holiday weekend -- scrambled to activate long-prepared battle plans. Bush and senators from both parties rushed to the microphones to lay down markers. Interest groups launched television advertising and sent millions of e-mail messages.

The coming nomination will be the first in 11 years and the first of the Internet era, an opportunity for Bush to remake the court in a decisive fashion. Scheduled to fly Tuesday to Europe for an international summit, Bush will not name a nominee until after he returns Friday, the White House said, but advisers have already produced a list of more than half a dozen candidates for him to consider, mainly conservative federal appellate judges.

Appearing in the Rose Garden an hour after receiving her letter, Bush praised O'Connor as "a discerning and conscientious judge" and promised to pick a successor "who will faithfully interpret the Constitution." Bush, whose selections of lower-court nominees provoked a bitter months-long standoff in the Senate, pledged to consult lawmakers and called Senate Democratic leaders yesterday with a promise to meet after his European trip.

"The nation deserves, and I will select, a Supreme Court justice that Americans can be proud of," the president said. "The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

DOJ_NMG_0000694

But liberal critics wasted no time going on the attack even without a nominee identified. The advocacy group MoveOn.org released a television ad asking, "Will George Bush choose an extremist who will threaten our rights?"

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), whose early opposition to Robert H. Bork helped doom his nomination to the Supreme Court in 1987, threatened to do the same to a Bush candidate. "If the president abuses his power and nominates someone who threatens to roll back the rights and freedoms of the American people," Kennedy said, "then the American people will insist that we oppose that nominee, and we intend to do so."

Conservative allies of the president responded with their own media onslaught, including a webcast mocking Democrats in a satirical news show reporting that they were opposing George Washington and Benjamin Franklin after Bush named them to the court. "Today the battle is joined," said a statement from the Committee for Justice, a group founded to support the White House, singling out 12 Senate Democrats from conservative states "who will be held accountable" if their party blocks Bush's choice.

"This is the most important resignation and nomination . . . in our lifetime and probably more than that," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel to the American Center for Law and Justice, an advocacy group founded by evangelist Pat Robertson. "It's very, very significant. Justice O'Connor is the pivotal vote on so many key cases. This has got gargantuan" implications, Sekulow said.

The nominee could reshape not only the court but also the president's place in history. "The person will serve for life and long outlive" Bush's presidency, said C. Boyden Gray, who was White House counsel to Bush's father and founded the Committee for Justice. "Presidents are in some cases defined by their nominations."

At the same time, the nomination could overshadow the rest of Bush's domestic agenda for months, particularly his plan for Social Security, which has foundered upon rock-solid Democratic opposition and Republican ambivalence. Some allies suggested it could even provide a way to quietly drop the Social Security effort until after next year's midterm elections.

The nomination battle could be the first of two, if Rehnquist, who is 80 and has thyroid cancer, decides to retire. The earliest Bush is likely to name a nominee to replace O'Connor is July 11, advisers said, and some think he might wait until after the Senate's August recess to avoid leaving a nominee as a target for opponents.

Former attorney general Edwin Meese III, one of four outside advisers who plotted strategy with top White House officials last week, said in an interview yesterday that Bush has three options on timing: name a nominee as quickly as possible and ask senators to remain in August, request that the Senate Judiciary Committee come back from recess early to begin hearings, or wait until the end of the recess to announce a nominee. "That's one thing I know will be discussed very carefully," Meese said.

Bush gave no indication of his plans except to say he will "choose a nominee in a timely manner" in hopes of filling the vacancy by the court's next term, which begins Oct. 3. O'Connor said she will remain on the court until her replacement is confirmed. Senate aides said hearings could begin in late July, with senators recalled in August.

Aides said Bush plans to bring files on candidates to study during his European trip and will interview finalists when he returns. He will also meet with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), the committee's ranking Democrat.

Bush and his team have prepared for a Supreme Court vacancy for four years and the field of candidates has long been vetted. The most heavily favored candidates, outside White House advisers said, are Judges J. Michael Luttig of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit and John G. Roberts of the District of Columbia Circuit. Senior officials said Bush has not ruled out his longtime friend and adviser Alberto R. Gonzales, the current attorney general, who would be the nation's first Hispanic justice but is viewed with suspicion by some conservatives, who see him as too moderate on abortion and affirmative action.

Because Bush will be filling O'Connor's seat rather than Rehnquist's, some outside advisers said he may want to focus on appointing another woman, such as Judges Edith B. Clement and Edith Hollan Jones of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit. Some conservatives are promoting two appellate judges who were just confirmed in the past few weeks after much controversy, Priscilla R. Owen of the 5th Circuit and Janice Rogers Brown of the D.C. Circuit.

Other appellate judges believed to be possible candidates include Samuel A. Alito Jr. of the 3rd Circuit, Michael W. McConnell of the 10th Circuit, Emilio M. Garza of the 5th Circuit and J. Harvie Wilkinson III of the 4th Circuit.

Almost all of the known candidates are thought to be more conservative than O'Connor, who made her mark in the middle of the court as a pragmatist balancing the two extremes. A former Arizona state legislator, O'Connor was appointed to the high court by President Ronald Reagan in 1981 and cast the deciding vote in cases that banned state-sponsored prayer at high school graduations, preserved narrowly drawn affirmative action in university admissions, overturned a ban on late-term abortions known as "partial birth" by foes, and required the Bush administration to grant hearings to detainees in the terrorism fight.

By virtue of her position on so many 5 to 4 cases, she became perhaps the most influential woman in public office in U.S. history and was regularly named in public surveys as one of the most admired women in the United States. Yet her rulings often infuriated conservatives, who had hoped for more fidelity to Reagan's views.

DOJ_NMG_0000695

"She shaped law in a number of very important areas through a very pragmatic approach of deciding the cases as they came to her," said Stuart Delery, a former O'Connor clerk. "The idea that she wasn't applying the law is wrong. She was not making decisions for decisions' sake. But at the same time, whether it was because of her background in politics or not, she had a sense of what the consequences would be" of her rulings.

O'Connor offered no public explanation for her decision to step down after 24 years on the bench, but court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg cited age and family considerations. "She's 75 years old, and she needs to spend time now with her husband," Arberg said. O'Connor has told friends that her husband, John Jay O'Connor III, has Alzheimer's disease. Once off the bench, she will have more time to care for him and more opportunities to make money on the lecture circuit and corporate boards.

O'Connor participated in a regular Friday exercise class at the court's gym between 8 and 9 a.m. yesterday and gave not a hint to the bombshell that was about to drop.

White House officials said they did not know O'Connor's plans until yesterday morning. Pamela Talkin, the marshal of the Supreme Court, called White House counsel Harriet Miers about noon Thursday to say she would be delivering a sealed envelope the next day but did not say who the envelope was from or what its contents were. Miers, according to a White House account, called Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. -- on vacation in Maine -- to tell him, then interrupted Bush's lunch with Vice President Cheney to inform them.

No one else in the White House, including Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, was told until yesterday, officials said. Talkin told Miers by telephone shortly before 9 a.m. that the letter related to O'Connor. Miers informed Bush, who met with Cheney, Rove and counselor Dan Bartlett. The letter arrived at 10:15 a.m.

"It has been a great privilege, indeed, to have served as a member of the Court for 24 Terms," O'Connor wrote. "I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the Court and its role under our Constitutional structure."

Bush then called O'Connor at 10:18 a.m., and they had what aides described as an emotional conversation. "For an old ranching girl, you turned out pretty good," Bush told O'Connor, according to spokesman Scott McClellan. As they talked, Bush also told her, "I wish I was there to hug you."

But O'Connor declined to come to the White House, telling Bush she was heading to the airport for a flight out of town, according to another senior administration official, and she disappeared from public view.

Bush Says He'll Pick Replacement Quickly (AP-Y2)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

AP2, July 2, 2005

President Bush, facing a momentous battle over a Supreme Court vacancy, said Friday he would pick a candidate in a timely manner and urged the Senate to give his nominee "fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

The White House said it would be at least a week before he decides. More than a half dozen candidates are under consideration, an administration official said, and Bush will review names during a trip to Europe beginning Tuesday.

After waiting more than four years for a chance to strengthen conservatives' influence on the court, Bush was presented with the surprise decision of Justice Sandra Day O'Conner to step down after 24 years. White House officials had anticipated that if anyone retired, it would have been Chief Justice William Rehnquist, 80 years old and ailing with thyroid cancer.

The departure of O'Connor, the first woman on the high court, could increase pressure on Bush to name another woman. It also could bring demands from the right for a more reliable conservative to replace O'Connor, who had been a swing vote and was on the winning side when the court upheld the right of women to have abortions if their health was in danger.

O'Connor's resignation was a closely held secret — even from Bush — until Friday morning.

The Supreme Court's head marshal, Pamela Talkin, had called White House Counsel Harriet Miers on Thursday to inquire about how to deliver a sealed envelope the next day. When she called back on Friday before 9 a.m., Talkin said the letter was from O'Connor.

The news was relayed to Bush and he alerted Vice President Dick Cheney, deputy chief of staff Karl Rove and counselor Dan Bartlett. When the letter arrived around 10:15 a.m., it was in a letter-size manila envelope. Miers took it to Bush, and the president talked by telephone with O'Connor.

"For an old ranching girl, you turned out pretty good," the president told O'Connor, who grew up on an Arizona ranch. It was an emotional, five-minute call, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said.

He quoted Bush as telling O'Connor, "You're one of the great Americans" and "I wish I were there to hug you."

The vacancy adds another major issue to an already bulging agenda Bush has presented to Congress. Administration officials expressed confidence about getting energy, highway and Central American trade measures passed and are crossing their fingers in hopes that lawmakers will have enough time and energy to deal with a complicated overhaul of Social Security.

DOJ_NMG_0000696

Bush, in a late-morning appearance in the Rose Garden, promised to consult with Senate members on his high court selection.

"The nation deserves, and I will select, a Supreme Court justice that Americans can be proud of," Bush said. "The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

He said he would choose his candidate in time for the confirmation hearings and vote to be completed before the new Supreme Court term begins the first Monday in October.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid said he, too, hoped the confirmation process would be a smooth one — despite the heated battles between the White House and Democrats over judicial nominations.

"There is no reason for this to be a knockdown, drag-out fight in the Senate," he said at a brief news conference at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. "How easy this is, is up to the president."

Bush has said in the past that he favors the judicial philosophy of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, two of the court's most conservative members. The president has said repeatedly that judges should not "legislate from the bench," meaning that their opinions should not be swayed by social or cultural trends.

Bush held a strategy session at midmorning to talk about the selection process. McClellan said, "A lot of the preparation has been done by staff over the last few years," he said.

One senior administration official said a list of potential candidates circulated in the White House last week did not include any women. But another official disputed that. Both spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the selection process.

Bush said he had directed his staff to work with the Justice Department to compile dossiers and recommend nominees. Spending the weekend at the presidential retreat at Camp David, Bush was expected to talk by telephone with his advisers about the process.

After O'Connor's resignation, Bush spoke on the telephone with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist; Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and the panel's ranking Democrat, Patrick Leahy of Vermont. No names were discussed, McClellan said.

The president plans to review briefing material on potential nominees on his flight to Denmark next Tuesday and during his stay Wednesday through Friday at a meeting of leading industrialized nations in Scotland. McClellan said Bush would make no decisions before his return.

'The Gloves Are Off' (NSWK)

By Brian Braiker

Newsweek, July 2, 2005

The retirement announcement came later than Supreme Court watchers expected. And when it was made—four days after the court ended its term with a series of landmark decisions—it was from Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman to sit on the country's highest bench. "It has been a great privilege indeed to have served as a member of the court for 24 terms," the 75-year-old justice wrote in a one-paragraph letter to President George W. Bush. "I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure."

The centrist-right leaning O'Connor, who was appointed by President Ronald Reagan in 1981, earned a reputation as the most powerful woman in America because she often cast the court's swing vote on politically touchy cases concerning issues such as affirmative action, abortion, gay rights, campaign finance and more. The vacancy she has left on the court was only a modest surprise, given that both she and 80-year-old Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who has thyroid cancer, had been expected to announce last Monday their plans to step down. Rehnquist has made no announcement yet, and the White House has indicated that it will not announce its pick to succeed O'Connor until after the president returns from the G8 summit in Scotland next week.

NEWSWEEK's Brian Braiker spoke with Tom Goldstein, founding editor of the nonpartisan SCOTUS blog (scotusblog.com) and cofounder of the D.C. law firm Goldstein & Howe, about O'Connor's legacy and the coming brutal political fight that will likely surround the appointment of her successor. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: How will this be different from a Chief Justice William Rehnquist vacancy, which is what most people were expecting?

Tom Goldstein: Confirmation hearings to replace Rehnquist were going to be hard fought because it was going to be a dress rehearsal for the O'Connor nomination. Now it's going to be thermonuclear war because she is a symbol of a closely divided court, and the reality of it when it comes to issues like affirmative action and abortion. Now the gloves are entirely off. In political Washington there is no more important question to the left or the right [than the composition of the Supreme Court].

DOJ_NMG_0000697

It has suddenly the air of a presidential campaign to it, and there will be unbelievable pressures to support or oppose the president's nominee. We're about to see a real fundamental choice from the president about whether or not he wants to invest a huge amount of capital in a very conservative nominee.

Is there anyone he could pick that would not result in a dogfight?

Yes. There are different kinds of dogfights, and the true dogfight is: is there anybody he can pick that wouldn't result in a filibuster? And the answer to that question is, yes.

Who would that be?

Probably [Attorney General] Alberto Gonzales. If it were done right by the administration, because at some point the Democrats would realize it's not going to get any better that this. The question is: will they fight anybody to the death when they might get somebody that they like less afterward?

Is it too early to say how Sandra Day O'Connor will be remembered?

No, it's not too early to say. She will be remembered as conservative. She will be remembered as the first woman Supreme Court justice. Then she will be remembered as among the most influential and powerful Supreme Court justices, [despite not having served] at a time when the Supreme Court had its greatest influence on American society—that was probably 40 or 50 years ago when we went through an even greater set of social change. Nonetheless, she will be remembered in some ways incorrectly as the swing justice.

Is she not? We're already hearing that a lot today.

She certainly [was] on a lot of important issues. But as this term showed, in any given case in a closely divided court, anybody can end up as the swing justice. And she always denied that she was the most important or the swing justice. She always recognized that she was just one of nine. She hated that reputation.

O'Connor was a pivotal justice on everything from affirmative action to abortion to gay rights, though. Where do you see the big fights going now?

Everything's back on the table. Everything that had been settled over the previous few years had been settled in no small part because Sandra Day O'Connor had put the court in the center-right. Now those questions, because the Supreme Court can reverse itself, are all open to reconsideration.

Because of this reputation as the swing voter, she's been called the most powerful woman in America. Was she?

For several years I called her the most powerful woman in the universe. Merely America doesn't quite cut it.

Is there talk of a potential third vacancy coming up after Rehnquist?

Not seriously. Justice [John Paul] Stevens this week started hiring his 2006-07 law clerks, so he's not going anywhere.

Best Laid Plans Of Presidents Can Come To Nought (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, July 2, 2005

One of the greatest powers of any US president is the power to appoint Supreme Court justices. Or is it?

Conventional wisdom holds that Supreme Court appointments are the best way to guarantee a president's political legacy. George W. Bush wants his bequest to be a court dominated by conservatives for decades to come.

But history teaches that things often do not work out the way the nominating president intended: either the Senate refuses to confirm the president's ideological favourite; or, surprisingly often, the new justice does not vote as the president thought he or she would; or the country moves on and the issues before the court are not the ones the president could have foreseen. The best laid plans of presidents can come to nought, once the nominee assumes his seat for life on the high court dais.

Republicans are keenly aware of this danger. One of their most recent nominees Justice David Souter surprised everyone by emerging as one of the court's most consistently liberal members, soon after his appointment by Mr Bush's father in 1990.

But Supreme Court experts point out that Justice Souter is far from the only nominee to have disappointed his benefactor: seven of the nine justices of the Rehnquist court were appointed by Republican presidents, including John Paul Stevens, the court's oldest and most liberal member. Yet despite the notional 7:2 majority for Republicans, the court pursued a centrist agenda on most issues, and issued decidedly liberal rulings in areas such as affirmative action, gay rights and the death penalty.

Conservative critics point out that 11 of the past 13 justices have been appointed by Republican presidents but bemoan what they see as a process of liberalisation that affects new justices as they are exposed to "elite" opinion at the court.

As Michael Comiskey, a legal historian, argues in his new book, Seeking Justices: the Judging of Supreme Court Nominees, changing the ideological balance of the court can be very difficult. He points out that, statistically, a president has only a 37 per cent probability of filling more than two seats in one term and many successful nominees are not the president's preferred choice in any case, either because the Senate will not confirm the favourite or because the president had to balance the ideology of the nominee against other factors such as age and ethnicity.

DOJ_NMG_0000698

And presidents may fail to predict the crucial issues of the future, he writes. Dwight Eisenhower did not foresee the importance of desegregation in choosing as chief justice Earl Warren who went on to write the landmark decision Brown v Board of Education, which abolished school segregation; and the Senate did not ask any of President Richard Nixon's nominees about abortion, just a few years before the landmark Roe v Wade decision legalising the practice.

"President Nixon's public crusade to reverse the direction of the Warren court and the mixed results he achieved despite his appointment of four justices illustrate the difficulties presidents face in trying to pack the court," he concludes.

Mr Bush may well face the same problems even if, as expected, he is faced with a further one or two more Supreme Court vacancies before he leaves office.

Justice O'Connor (NYT)

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement is going to trigger an enormous political collision. This is one time when it's not an overstatement to say that the choice of her successor could have an effect on the nation for generations to come. But as critical as the coming fight is, it would be a shame for the combatants to come out swinging before Americans had a chance to reflect on the career and contribution of the woman who is leaving the bench. In fact, the more time we spend thinking about this sensible, pragmatic jurist, the better. Perhaps it will convince President Bush that he can best serve the country, and his own party, by nominating a new justice with the same values.

When Justice O'Connor, who grew up on an Arizona ranch, joined the Supreme Court in 1981, she instantly became famous as the first woman justice in history. But before long, her sex was eclipsed by the pivotal role she assumed in the court's deliberations: she frequently found herself lodged between two four-member ideological blocs. Many a lawyer arrived at the Supreme Court for an oral argument convinced that the key to winning was winning over Justice O'Connor.

The list of cases in which Justice O'Connor cast the decisive vote is long and, given yesterday's announcement, sobering. On affirmative action, she joined conservatives in striking down one University of Michigan program and joined liberals in upholding another to reach a careful middle ground. On abortion, she showed a willingness to accept limited restrictions, but a commitment to Roe v. Wade - a position that closely matches the American public's. This week, in a Kentucky Ten Commandments case, she provided the fifth vote for defending the wall between church and state.

Justice O'Connor holds some strong views that this page does not share. She was fiercely protective of states' rights, and joined federalism decisions that unduly restricted Congress's power to protect people against discrimination, pollution and other ills. And history will have to judge her role in Bush v. Gore, in which she joined a bare majority of the court in overturning the Florida Supreme Court - in conflict with her oft-expressed deference to the states - and ordering that Florida's recounting of ballots in the 2000 presidential election be stopped.

Mainly, however, Justice O'Connor will be remembered for her skepticism about doctrinal and ideological absolutes, and her concern about the effect of her decisions on real people. Given her strong support for federalism, lawyers for the State of Tennessee might have expected to win her vote last year when they argued that the Americans with Disabilities Act could not require them to make their courtrooms more accessible. But people familiar with Justice O'Connor were not surprised when her vote swung the case to George Lane, a severely disabled man who sued after he was ordered to crawl up the stairs, or allow himself to be carried, to get to a courtroom.

She was sometimes called the most powerful person in America. That seems like a huge overbilling for a woman who toiled at legal writing in a modest office with a small staff, and whose vote was only one of nine. But on issue after crucial issue, it was her swing vote that decided what kind of nation America would be. Justice O'Connor's America is one that hews to conservative principles, but it is tempered by a compassion for individuals and an unwillingness to follow ideology blindly to unreasonable places.

When Justice O'Connor joined the court 24 years ago, there was no way of knowing how sorely she would be missed when she left. We are, in fact, beginning to miss her already as we envision the bitter confirmation battle that will take place if President Bush nominates a hard-line conservative to replace her. Senate Democrats, who have been willing to block ideologues nominated to the lower courts, will certainly do everything they can to prevent a right-wing ideologue from joining the nation's highest court.

Before that fight begins, Mr. Bush should ask himself whether Americans want to live in a country where the handicapped cannot find a champion in the law, where women are stripped of all abortion rights, where universities are barred from offering a hand up to deserving minority students. Then he should ask himself how much of his own party's current success has been due to Justice O'Connor's ability to save the right wing from the worst consequences of its extremism.

DOJ_NMG_0000699

If he is thinking clearly, the president will understand how much he owes this quiet jurist who consistently looked for common ground. Perhaps he will also realize that the best way to repay the debt is to choose a replacement from the same mold.

Editorial Comment: The Battle For The Supreme Court (FT)

Financial Times, July 2, 2005

The resignation of Sandra Day O'Connor from the US Supreme Court is likely to provoke a culture war of historic proportions in America. The US Supreme Court plays a central role in American life tackling many of the most sensitive political and social questions left unanswered by America's deeply divided politics. Political activists from both ends of the spectrum have been gearing up for years already to fight an almighty battle over who should take over at the helm of the world's most powerful court. On Friday, that battle was joined in earnest.

Justice O'Connor has arguably been the most powerful justice on the Court for much of the past decade more important even than William Rehnquist, the chief justice. On issues from abortion, to affirmative action, to religion in public life, she has delivered the deciding vote on a Court that has regularly split 5-4. Since 1995, she has cast the crucial fifth vote in 148 out of 193 close cases.

On the kind of issues that energise the Christian right such as abortion she has frequently sided with liberals. Largely because of her, the Rehnquist court has ended up being one of the most moderate and pragmatic in US history. President Bush would like to shift it decidedly to the right. He wants to leave his mark on posterity by ensuring a strong conservative voice to lead the court for decades to come.

America has been expecting a resignation for months or years already but not this one. Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who is ill with thyroid cancer, was viewed as most likely to retire. But the resignation of Justice O'Connor is far more important than the departure of the chief justice:she has given the Court its centristcharacter; replacing her with amore conservative justice could shift the court profoundly to the right.

It could also have a big impact on business. Justice O'Connor has been, on the whole, pro-business. Business leaders were already bemoaning her loss yesterday, with the US Chamber of Commerce saying she had been “a strong judicial voice for a commonsense application of the law”, and a key vote for restraining excessive punitive damages and a commonsense definition of disability under federal law.

Justice O'Connor is deeply pragmatic, and always concerned with the real-world consequences of her rulings. She is an economic conservative in the mould of the man who appointed her to the Court Ronald Reagan. If she is replaced by a social conservative, it could be bad news for big business.

The battle to confirm her replacement will focus on abortion but more is at stake. Justice O'Connor supports a woman's right to choose, so replacing her with a pro-life vote would alter the voting balance on this crucial issue; but there would still be a 5:4 majority on the Court in favour of abortion.

For that reason, the Senate should not allow itself to get bogged down over the views of the nominee on abortion. The Senate should rather examine the views of the candidate on a wide range of issues: what does he or she think the constitution says about gay rights? Or economic regulation? Or the role of judges themselves? Or the role of copyright and patent law in fuelling the innovation economy?

It has been a generation since Americans have had a chance to debate the direction of the US Supreme Court arguably the most powerful judicial body in the world. They should take it very seriously, and probe the judicial philosophy of the eventual nominee on all the issues that are likely to confront the court in the 21st century.

Justice O'Connor Retires (WT)

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

The announcement yesterday that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor will retire from the Supreme Court will touch off a bruising political fight over her successor, who President Bush expects to nominate some time after he returns from the G-8 summit later this month. The stakes are great.

Over a generation the Supreme Court has delivered opinions on such volatile issues as racial preferences, sodomy, the death penalty and abortion that are grounded more in a desire to advance a political agenda than in interpreting the Constitution. The justices, including on occasion Justice O'Connor, have even cited the opinions of foreign courts as the basis for deciding.

Nevertheless, in the 24 years since President Reagan nominated her as the first woman to serve on the court, Justice O'Connor has conducted herself with grace and dignity. We have disagreed with certain of her decisions, particularly those dealing with racial preferences, limits on abortion and the death penalty. But she has frequently agreed with her more conservative colleagues on important cases, and she has been was one of the staunchest defenders of federalist principles.

DOJ_NMG_0000700

Justice O'Connor evolved into a pivotal swing vote on the high court. She was "open to persuasion," she once said, when others were not. Her departure offers Mr. Bush the opportunity to nominate as her replacement a jurist with a judicial philosophy similar to that of Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas. The president must seize this opportunity. By nominating such a person to the court, he will incur the wrath of the left led by Sens. Ted Kennedy, Christopher Dodd and Joseph Biden and organizations such as People For the American Way and the Alliance for Justice. These ideologues, who cannot prevail when the issue is honestly drawn, will attempt to do to a Bush nominee precisely what they did to Robert Bork 18 years ago -- distort his record with false accusations to caricature him as an extremist.

From President Eisenhower's nomination of Earl Warren onward, every Republican president has put someone on the court whom those most devoted to the true meaning of the Constitution have come to regret. Richard Nixon gave us Harry Blackmun, for example; the president's father gave us David Souter. As George W. Bush deliberates on his his first nominee to the high court, he must keep in mind that millions of Americans who voted for him in both 2000 and 2004 did so precisely because they believed that he would nominate judges, and particularly Supreme Court justices, determined to be faithful to the Constitution as it was written, judges not so open to persuasion where first principles are concerned.

The President must understand that if he does not choose wisely he will disappoint these friends and supporters, probably beyond reconciliation. His staunchest friends and allies are prepared to join with him in the trenches to get a principled constitutionalist confirmed.

The O'Connor Court (WP)

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

THE ANNOUNCEMENT yesterday of the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor brings to an end the career of one of modern America's most important jurists. Justice O'Connor came to the Supreme Court in 1981 as its first female member, and she has served the court since with honor and distinction. In that time, she has become -- in part because of her own evolution and in part because of the court's -- a pivotal vote, oftentimes the pivotal vote, in a large swath of the court's caseload. To garner Justice O'Connor's vote has often meant securing a majority; to lose it is often to lose a case. The court today represents the sensibilities and preferences of no other justice more consistently. Her impending departure is not merely the end of a deeply important career in American law and life but a major turning point for the Supreme Court itself.

Uniquely among current members of the court, Justice O'Connor was a politician -- an Arizona legislative leader and later a judge -- before she was appointed by President Ronald Reagan. Her background has given her an unusual political sophistication and savvy both in her substantive jurisprudence and in her role on the court. Allergic to the sort of broad principles that excite more ideological justices of both the left and right, her opinions generally lacked lively or stirring rhetoric. Her instincts were pragmatic. She had a pronounced tendency to decide cases on their facts, leaving herself room to shift gears when facts were different.

These traits often exposed her to charges of judging with insufficient analytical rigor or consistency, charges that were sometimes justified. Though certainly a conservative, she has not been a reliable enough conservative to develop much of a following within the conservative movement. Yet because she has been wedged between the court's liberal and conservative flanks, her attitudes took on enormous importance. Many of the most significant tendencies and rulings of the court during Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's tenure reflect them: its adjustment of the balance between state and federal power back toward state authority; its deference to state court convictions and criminal proceedings even where they produce manifest flaws; its ultimate refusal to overturn federal abortion rights even while granting states somewhat greater leeway to regulate abortion; its decisions to defer to states on affirmative action in higher education and to Congress on the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law; and its expansion of judicial power in a host of areas.

Putting aside the notable exception of the court's recent rewriting of the rules of criminal sentencing -- from which Justice O'Connor has been a vociferous dissenter -- it's hard to think of major areas of modern jurisprudence not affected by her thinking. As a consequence, her departure will leave a dramatic hole and a no less dramatic opportunity for a new justice to nudge the court in a different direction across a significant array of hot-button issues. President Bush's coming choice may therefore prompt an ugly political fight. No sooner had Justice O'Connor announced her retirement than the distasteful jockeying among any number of interest groups began: conservative groups demanding satisfaction; liberal groups pretending they get to dictate the president's choice. Everyone should take a deep breath.

Mr. Bush ran for and won election as a conservative who would name justices who share his philosophy, and he can be expected to name a conservative in this case. In doing so, however, Mr. Bush needs to bear in mind the fractious state of American politics and the capacity of a divisive nominee to trigger an all-out war that would hurt the court and the country as a whole. The president should consult as broadly as possible and seek a nominee who would satisfy his requirements while also garnering broad support from moderates of both parties. It is not too much to ask of Mr. Bush that he work for consensus in replacing a justice who, in a very real sense, had come to represent a bridge between left and right.

DOJ_NMG_0000701

... A Challenge For Bush (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

Both sides have been gearing up for a brawl, and now it appears that it will be a double bill. In coming months, President Bush and the Senate will probably be filling two Supreme Court seats: those of Sandra Day O'Connor, who resigned Friday, and Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, whose health is in peril. This makes it doubly important to establish some ground rules. They have been in flux since the bitter fight over President Reagan's failed nomination of Robert H. Bork almost two decades ago. Here, though, is what they should be.

First, advise and consent means advise and consent. Senators are entitled to make a full, independent judgment on the merits of a president's Supreme Court nominee. This is a lifetime appointment to a separate branch of government, not a president's choice for a job in his own administration. The president takes judicial philosophy into account in making his choice, and senators should do the same. The president's choice is owed no special deference.

Second, judicial philosophy means judicial philosophy. It does not mean political ideology. What's the difference? Judicial philosophy is about process: how a judge interprets the law to reach a conclusion. Political ideology is about the result: what policy gets implemented. A judge should have a coherent judicial philosophy and follow it even to a conclusion he or she would not prefer.

Third, judicial philosophy reveals itself through specific cases. Senators have the right to ask about specific cases, real and theoretical, and to expect an answer. The notion that nominees shouldn't "prejudge" issues they could face on the court is a red herring. Every sitting member of the Supreme Court, and of lower courts, has prejudged dozens or hundreds of issues in the course of his or her job. No one thinks this disqualifies them from continuing to judge.

Fourth, senators are entitled to take their time on what may be the most important votes they will cast, but the president is ultimately entitled to a yes or no on his nominee. In other words, no filibusters. They are an insult to democracy and will come back to haunt the party that misuses parliamentary process in this way.

Bush starts this battle in a seemingly towering position, with his party in control of the Senate. But not every Republican will support anyone Bush might nominate. If he overreaches, he will be forced to compromise. The president's plummeting approval ratings also offer a caution about the perils of governing from the far right. Especially if he has two seats at his disposal, Bush may decide to compromise on at least one before the battle. That would be wise of him. But we are in no position to insist, unfortunately.

Well, take that back. We do insist on one thing: Bush should not nominate Justice Clarence Thomas for chief justice. Thomas purposely misled the Senate at his original confirmation hearing 14 years ago, insisting he had no opinion on the hot-button Roe vs. Wade decision. Since then he has repeatedly shown his deep opposition to Roe. For the Senate to confirm him as chief justice now would say to the world that the contempt Thomas showed for that institution was fully justified.

In List Of Potential Justices, Many Kinds Of Conservative (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

President Bush is expected to select a nominee to the Supreme Court from a list of candidates that is, with few exceptions, a small roster of sitting federal appeals court judges, Republican and former White House officials have said. And while all of the candidates may be described as conservative, each brings a different political and philosophical profile to the table.

Mr. Bush and his small circle of advisers may spring a surprise choice to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who resigned on Friday. But it is more likely that the nominee will come from a field of candidates identified by these former White House officials and well-connected Republicans outside the administration who have been consulted by White House officials.

At the top of most lists are four federal appellate judges: J. Harvie Wilkinson III and J. Michael Luttig, both on the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, based in Richmond, Va.; John G. Roberts Jr., who sits on the appeals court based in Washington; and Michael McConnell of the 10th Circuit, who sits in Salt Lake City.

That compilation was prepared with the assumption that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist would retire and create the vacancy, not Justice O'Connor, which could change the political calculations. It may oblige Mr. Bush to add a woman or two to the candidate mix, a former administration official said. That could include Judges Edith Brown Clement and Edith H. Jones, both of the Fifth Circuit, based in New Orleans.

Although friends of Mr. Bush have said he would like to name the first Hispanic justice to the court, some said the resignation of Justice O'Connor made it less likely this time.

DOJ_NMG_0000702

Both current and former officials have said Mr. Bush would like to place Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales on the court, but would do so now only if he believed he had just one chance.

One senior Republican adviser said the surprise resignation of Justice O'Connor meant Mr. Bush could have a high degree of confidence that he would have another vacancy to fill before his term ended. That could be used for Mr. Gonzales, a former Texas Supreme Court justice who has been a trusted legal adviser going back to their days together in the Texas statehouse. Some lists include the name of Judge Emilio Garza, of the Fifth Circuit, if Mr. Bush were to seek a Hispanic candidate now.

Although Judges Luttig and Wilkinson are indisputably conservatives, they have markedly different approaches. They have clashed, sometimes strongly, when they have sat together on the same case. They are regularly measured and even defined in contrast to each other.

Both have ruled in favor of restrictions on abortion. Judge Luttig (pronounced LOO-tig) is renowned for being sought out by Virginia officials when they wanted a sympathetic judge to issue an emergency order blocking a lower court ruling that invalidated the state's ban on what it called partial-birth abortion. He granted the order in 1998 and then wrote a full opinion upholding the law.

But when the Supreme Court rejected his analysis and the case came his way again, he acknowledged his obligation to reverse course.

"Our responsibility is to faithfully follow its opinions," he wrote, adding that the Supreme Court's ruling on abortion deserved a special respect from lower court judges.

That approach could be interpreted as similar to Justice O'Connor's in declining to overturn precedents that have been upheld by the Supreme Court over the years.

Judge Luttig, 51, has also been in the forefront of what is called the new federalism, limiting Congress's power to enact legislation binding the states.

In a June 2000 case, the two Fourth Circuit judges clashed over the Endangered Species Act. Judge Wilkinson, writing for the majority, upheld the law's application to prevent a landowner from killing red wolves on his property in North Carolina. Judge Luttig said in dissent that there were only an estimated 41 red wolves in the whole state and that it was a stretch to contend their presence involved any interstate commerce, which would give the federal government authority. Judge Wilkinson said that such an approach would cripple "the entire federal regulatory scheme for wildlife and natural resource conservation."

Judge Luttig also wrote the opinion declaring unconstitutional the Violence Against Women Act, saying it was not a federal matter, a view that was upheld by the Supreme Court. He is a close friend of Justice Antonin Scalia, for whom he clerked, and Justice Clarence Thomas, whose nomination he helped pilot through rough waters in 1991.

Judge Wilkinson's life and legal career have been heavily influenced by his close association with the late Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. Judge Wilkinson's father, J. Harvie Wilkinson Jr., was a Richmond banker, and Mr. Powell was his lawyer. They were the closest of friends and partners in many civic enterprises.

When Mr. Powell was named to the court in 1974 as a surprise compromise candidate, the young Mr. Wilkinson served as his clerk. Prof. John Jeffries of the University of Virginia Law School, a biographer of Justice Powell, said the young man was more a partner than a clerk because Justice Powell, as a corporate lawyer, had little experience in the constitutional issues he suddenly had to contend with.

Judge Wilkinson, who is known for his courtly ways, has written a handful of books, including a political history of Virginia that won wide acclaim even though he wrote it as a senior at Yale.

In another book, "How Ethnic Separatism Threatens America" (1985), he argued that some affirmative action programs increased racial division. In 1987, he wrote the majority opinion striking down an affirmative action program in Richmond that set aside 30 percent of municipal contracts for minority-owned businesses.

Judge Wilkinson is a core conservative but has also sided with environmentalists on issues, like in the red wolf case from North Carolina, and the First Amendment.

In 1986 he dissented from a judgment that said the Rev. Jerry Falwell could collect damages from Hustler magazine for what he acknowledged was a repugnant cartoon depicting the evangelist. "Nothing is more thoroughly democratic than to have the high and mighty lampooned and spoofed," he wrote.

He ruled in favor of the administration in the case of Yaser Esam Hamdi, a United States citizen detained as an enemy combatant, saying the judicial branch had no role in second-guessing the president in the fight against terrorism. He was reversed by the Supreme Court.

Judge Roberts, 50, has been on the appeals court since May 2003. Before that appointment, he was widely viewed as one of the leading lawyers arguing before the Supreme Court, winning more than two dozen cases. Although he is considered a reliable conservative, he has written little commentary, has not taken any public position on abortion rights and has yet to rule on any major cases from the bench.

DOJ_NMG_0000703

As a result, some conservatives have worried that his profile is similar to Justice David H. Souter when he was named to the Court in 1990 by President Bush's father, after having served briefly on a federal appeals court.

The elder Mr. Bush's aides assured conservatives that he would be to their liking. Instead, he has become one of the court's relatively liberal voices, angering conservatives who say they are determined not to be misled again about a potential justice's leanings.

Judge McConnell, also 50, has been on the appeals court since November 2002. He spent most of his career as a law professor and was the leading scholar advocating a more porous wall between church and state. When he was first nominated to the court, his fellow law professors, including many prominent liberals, signed a petition saying that he was a brilliant scholar and deserved to sit on the federal bench.

He is likely to be supported by social conservatives for his fierce opposition to abortion and his personal religious lifestyle, which has included home-schooling his three children.

Judge Clement, 57, has been on the appeals court since 2001 but has not been involved in any major decisions, nor has she written any articles, that would attract ardent support or opposition.

Judge Jones, who has been on the appeals court since 1985, is widely admired by conservatives, including several officers of the Federalist Society, the conservative lawyers' organization that has been influential in promoting judicial careers.

Potential Nominees For The High Court (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, July 2, 2005

A look at some likely candidates for the vacancy on the Supreme Courrt:

SAMUEL A. ALITO:

Dubbed "Scalito" or "Scalia-lite" by some lawyers because his judicial philosophy invites comparisons to Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia, Alito, 55, has been a strong conservative voice in his 15 years on the Philadelphia-based 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which is considered to be among the most liberal.On one hot-button issue, Alito was a lone dissenter in a case striking down a Pennsylvania law requiring women seeking abortions to inform their husbands. Alito argued that the Pennsylvania legislature "could have rationally believed" that married women might seek abortions because of perceived problems such as finances or a husband's prior opposition that could be rectified if the couple talked before an abortion.

The case was appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which struck down the spousal notification requirement and reaffirmed the Roe v. Wade decision that legalized abortion.

Alito also has written a majority opinion holding that a city's holiday display that had a menorah did not violate the First Amendment's establishment clause -- which bars the federal government from declaring a national religion -- because it included secular symbols such as Frosty the Snowman.

He dissented in cases that loosened the legal standards for bringing a sex discrimination lawsuit.

In a dissent to a ruling that upheld the constitutionality of a federal law banning the possession of machine guns, Alito argued for greater state rights in reasoning that Congress had no authority to regulate private gun possession.

On the bench, Alito is known to be probing but more polite than the often-caustic Scalia.

Before President George H. W. Bush nominated Alito to the federal appeals court in 1990, he served as U.S. attorney for the District of New Jersey (1987-1990), where his first assistant was Michael Chertoff, now the Homeland Security Department secretary.

Alito was the deputy assistant attorney general in the Reagan administration (1985-87) and assistant to the solicitor general (1981-85).

His New Jersey ties run deep. The son of an Italian immigrant, Alito was born in Trenton and graduated from Princeton University. He headed to Connecticut and Yale University, where he received his law degree in 1975.

In a 1999 case, Fraternal Order of Police v. City of Newark, the 3rd Circuit ruled 3-0 that Muslim police officers in the city can keep their beards. The police had made an exemption in its facial hair policy for medical reasons (a skin condition known as pseudo folliculitis barbae) but not for religious reasons.

Alito wrote the opinion, saying, "We cannot accept the department's position that its differential treatment of medical exemptions and religious exemptions is premised on a good-faith belief that the former may be required by law while the latter are not."

In a May 2005 profile in The Newark (N.J.) Star-Ledger, Alito said, "Most of the labels people use to talk about judges, and the way judges decide (cases) aren't too descriptive. ... Judges should be judges. They shouldn't be legislators, they shouldn't be administrators."

ALBERTO GONZALES:

Every time -- and there have been five so far -- that George W. Bush has asked Alberto Gonzales to accept top jobs in his government, Gonzales has said yes. A possible nomination to the Supreme Court, for which Gonzales is believed to be in the running, could make it six.

Such a nomination would make him the first Hispanic to serve on the nation's highest court. He achieved another first in February when he was sworn in to office as the nation's 80th attorney general and the first Hispanic to lead the Department of Justice.

The decade-old friendship between Bush and Gonzales dates to 1995 when, as Texas governor, Bush plucked Gonzales from a corporate law firm in Houston and named him the governor's general counsel. Since then, Gonzales' fortunes have risen in tandem with Bush's.

In 1997, Bush named Gonzales to the post of Texas secretary of state, making him the state's top elections official. Two years later, Bush nominated for a seat on the Texas Supreme Court.

After Bush became president in 2001, Gonzales left the court to become White House counsel, where he provided legal advice to the president and helped him fill vacancies on the federal bench.

It was in this position that Gonzales wrote a legal memo in 2002 contending that Bush had the right to waive anti-torture laws and international treaties that provide protections to prisoners of war. Critics have said the memo helped lead to abuses of the type seen at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

Gonzales also drafted rules for the military war tribunals created after terrorist attacks.

Soft-spoken and known as "the judge" to his White House colleagues or "Al" to friends, Gonzales also has critics on the right, who think he is too much of a moderate. The mistrust stems from his time on the Texas Supreme Court when he joined with the majority to affirm a pregnant teenager's right to seek an abortion without telling her parents.

Gonzales accused two dissenters in that case of "unconscionable judicial activism" -- words that came back to haunt him after Bush nominated one of the judges, Priscilla R. Owen, to a seat on the federal appeals court. Democrats threw Gonzales' words back at the White House.

If nominated to the high court, Gonzales' advice to Bush regarding the treatment of prisoners in the war on terror is certain to be a source of questioning during Senate confirmation hearings, as was the case during hearings on his nomination to be attorney general.

Gonzales, 49, has an up-from-the-bootstraps story that President Bush is fond of telling. He is the son of Pablo and Maria, migrant farm workers from Mexico, neither of whom finished elementary school, and he grew up near Houston in a two-bedroom house with his parents and seven siblings.

Gonzales graduated from high school in the 1970s and, with little thought of going on to college, he joined the Air Force. He also spent two years at the Air Force Academy before he changed his mind and decided to pursue a legal career instead of his dream of becoming a pilot.

He graduated from Rice University and Harvard Law School before launching his career.

Critics of Gonzales' qualifications for a seat on the Supreme Court would highlight his limited judicial experience -- two years on the high court in Texas. But the thin paper trail gives opponents scant insight into his judicial philosophy and thinking on major issues of the day to use against him.

Critics also may question his close relationship with Bush and whether that might jeopardize his independence or influence his court rulings.

During an online chat the White House sponsored earlier this year, Gonzales' answer to a question about his new job suggested an awareness of his changed role within the administration.

"While I was counsel to the president, I served as the president's lawyer. As attorney general, my primary allegiance is now to the Constitution and the American people," he replied.

Described as not being ambitious, Gonzales told senators at his confirmation hearing in January: "Let me make clear. I'm not a candidate for the Supreme Court."

EMILIO GARZA:

A former Marine and Texas state judge, Garza, 58, sits on the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and was considered for a Supreme Court seat by the first President Bush.

Appointed a federal judge by President Reagan and elevated to the 5th Circuit in 1991, he has become best known for his views that Roe v. Wade should be overturned and that abortion regulation should be decided by state legislatures.

In 1992, for example, he voted to strike down a Louisiana law criminalizing abortion in deference to Supreme Court precedent. But in his opinion, Garza made clear his disdain for Roe v. Wade.

DOJ_NMG_0000705

"Two essential facts seem apparent: The Constitution says absolutely nothing about abortion and ... the long-standing traditions of American society have permitted abortion to be legally proscribed," he wrote. "Because the decision to permit or proscribe abortion is a political choice, I would allow the people of the state of Louisiana to decide this issue for themselves."

In 1997, Garza voted with the majority to strike down a Louisiana law allowing judges to deny abortion to a minor and notify her parents. He criticized Roe's legal reasoning in a concurrence.

His opinions in those two cases have drawn the ire of women's and abortion rights groups, who fear that if elevated to the high court Garza would be a reliable vote to overturn Roe v. Wade.

An avid questioner in oral arguments, Garza's written opinions tend to be clear and scholarly.

In other cases:

--Garza dissented from a 5th Circuit decision in 2001 affirming a lower court decision to grant a prisoner's habeas corpus petition. The prisoner established that his attorney had slept through major portions of his trial. Garza argued that the claim of ineffective counsel was insufficient because the prisoner failed to show that the trial's outcome was prejudiced by the sleeping lawyer.

--Garza wrote for the 5th Circuit majority in a 1999 case upholding a district court's summary judgment in favor of the police and city of Lago Vista, Texas, in a civil rights case in which a woman alleged her Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures were violated when she was arrested for driving without wearing a seat belt, a violation of state law. Her children also were not wearing seat belts, another violation of Texas law. Garza said there was probable cause for the arrest and that it was not conducted in an "extraordinary manner" harmful to the woman's privacy interests. Such a violation is a misdemeanor, typically punishable by a fine.

Garza was born in San Antonio, Texas, and received his bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of Notre Dame. He returned to Texas and earned his law degree from the University of Texas in 1976.

EDITH HOLLAN JONES:

President Bush's father considered Edith Hollan Jones for a vacancy on the Supreme Court in 1990 but instead nominated David H. Souter. The announcement of Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement raises the possibility that the president would nominate a woman -- and the brainy, hard-line conservative Jones could be his choice.

Jones espouses a judicial philosophy that underscores the adage that less is more.

"The federal judiciary has an important but ultimately limited role in society," she said in an interview with Douglas K. Moll in the November/December 2001 issue of the Houston Lawyer. "I favor legislative authority over judicial authority. We have an obligation to make law as clear as possible. It is law to guide all of the people."

Jones, 55, has served on the New Orleans-based 5th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals since 1985 when President Reagan tapped her for the post. She has ruled and written on a range of cases, including states' rights, abortion, endangered species act and sexual harassment.

Among her notable opinions:

--McCorvey v. Hill in 2004. Norma McCorvey was Roe in the landmark 1972 case that legalized abortion. She asked the court to overturn the ruling, arguing that abortion has a detrimental effect on women's long-term emotional state.

The court dismissed the motion, but Jones wrote.

"If the courts were to delve into the facts underlying Roe's balancing scheme with present-day knowledge, they might conclude that the woman's 'choice' is far more risky and less beneficial, and the child's sentence far more advanced, that the Roe court knew."

She called the Roe decision an "exercise of raw judicial power."

In a speech sponsored by the Federalist Society in January 2003, Jones said the Supreme Court's decisions since the 1960s have been at odds with American values. She talked of the "modish, untested philosophical notions and extreme libertarianism that would have left the (Constitution's) framers aghast."

The Warren Court "extravagantly assumed the power to dictate new 'rights' not expressly stated in the Constitution and in so doing foisted its philosophical vision on the United States with consequences far beyond the Court's imagining," Jones said.

Born in Philadelphia, her family moved to San Antonio where she competed on the debate team and participated in extemporaneous speaking at Alamo High School.

She headed north -- way north -- to Ithaca, N.Y., to attend Cornell University and then got her law degree from the University of Texas. Upon graduation in 1974, she worked at the law firm of Andrews, Kurth, Campbell & Jones in Houston, handling bankruptcy work. She was the firm's first woman partner, an achievement that occurred while she was on maternity leave. She has two sons.

DOJ_NMG_0000706

J. MICHAEL LUTTIG:

The 51-year-old Luttig is considered a solid conservative choice. The Texas native worked in the Justice Department during the first Bush administration and has served on the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va.

The self-described legal nerd wrote the 1999 4th Circuit decision that struck down a key provision of 1994 Violence Against Women Act. The Supreme Court agreed on a 5-4 vote that Congress overstepped its bounds in giving rape victims the right to sue their attackers for monetary damages.

In that ruling and others, Luttig has been a defender of states' rights to set their own policies -- a hallmark of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's jurisprudence.

Criminal cases and rendering justice are more than theoretical exercises for Luttig, whose father was murdered in a carjacking more than a decade ago.

In 1994, Napoleon Beazley, 17, confronted businessman John Luttig in the driveway of his Tyler, Texas, home and shot him twice in the head. Luttig's wife, Bobbie, was shot at and crawled beneath the couple's Mercedes Benz and played dead.

In an interview with the Tyler Morning Telegraph, the younger Luttig said his father was a compassionate man who would have given his car to Beazley. He also testified at Beazley's trial, saying, "My dad was my hero. He still is my hero. I worshipped the ground he walked on. I still do."

Beazley was executed in 2002 after the Supreme Court deadlocked 3-3 on his appeal to stop the execution. A tie allows an execution to proceed.

Three justices recused themselves from the case -- Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and David Souter.

The younger Luttig had clerked for Scalia from 1982-83 when Scalia was a member of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. In 1991, during the rancorous Supreme Court nomination fight over Thomas, Luttig helped shepherd the nominee through the process.

The Supreme Court is familiar territory for Luttig.

He served as a law clerk to Chief Justice Warren Burger from 1983-84 and a special assistant to the chief justice from 1984-85. After four years in private practice, Luttig worked in the Justice Department in the first Bush administration and was assistant attorney general, Office of Legal Counsel.

The Virginia resident graduated from Washington and Lee University and received his law degree from the University of Virginia. In 1991 President Bush made him the youngest federal appeals court judge -- at age 37.

MICHAEL McCONNELL:

A respected conservative legal scholar, McConnell, a judge on the Denver-based 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, enjoys bipartisan support in the academic community. He opposed President Clinton's impeachment and the Supreme Court's 2000 ruling in Bush v. Gore that made George W. Bush the president.

Liberal interest groups are wary of McConnell because he is personally opposed to abortion. He has criticized the legal reasoning in Roe v. Wade and as a law professor, used Life magazine photos of fetuses to spark student discussion of whether abortion amounts to a taking of human life.

During his 2002 Senate confirmation hearing for the federal appeals court, however, McConnell insisted he would follow precedent in upholding Roe.

"The abortion question is completely settled," he told senators. "The only avenue for change is through constitutional amendment. ... It is not going to happen." At another point, he stated: "It is settled law. I am committed to enforcing and obeying that."

After McConnell was questioned by the Senate Judiciary Committee, Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer of New York said that while he disagreed with many of McConnell's positions, the nominee "showed himself to be more of an iconoclast than an ideologue" in his candid discussion of his views.

His writings advocate ending the rigid separation of church and state that prevailed in the 1970s, and he thus supports school vouchers. That shift to a more "neutral" state approach to religion is central to the Bush administration's goal to funnel more government money to religious social service programs.

The self-described theologically conservative Christian, however, opposed government-sponsored prayer in schools.

McConnell, 50, also is a strong supporter of judicial restraint, arguing that Congress and not the courts should be the authority on defining and enforcing civil rights.

McConnell is not without critics from the political right. Lawyer Andy Schlafly, the son of longtime conservative activist Phyllis Schlafly, recently wrote that McConnell is "every bit as hostile to conservative legal principles as (David) Souter turned out to be." Souter was named to the Supreme Court by the first President Bush and has disappointed conservatives by repeatedly siding with its more liberal members. Schlafly cited McConnell's refusal to say Roe v. Wade should be overturned, as well as a legal philosophy that "hostile to government expressions of faith."

DOJ_NMG_0000707

JOHN G. ROBERTS:

Roberts, who has been on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit since June 2003, was one of President Bush's least contentious picks for the bench.

A former Rehnquist clerk, Roberts was associate counsel to President Reagan from 1982-86 and then served in the first Bush administration, arguing cases before the Supreme Court from 1989-93.

During the Clinton administration, Roberts became a highly sought-after private lawyer in Supreme Court cases, representing clients such as the National Collegiate Athletic Association in a discrimination case, and carmaker Toyota in winning limits on a disabled workers claims.

Roberts had been in line to join the appeals court in 1992, but his nomination during the first Bush administration died in a Democratic-controlled Senate.

Roberts, 50, has generally avoided weighing in on disputed social issues. Abortion rights groups, however, have maintained that he tried during his days as a lawyer in the first Bush administration to overturn Roe v. Wade.

Roberts did help write a brief that stated "we continue to believe that Roe was wrongly decided and should be overruled." Pressed during his 2003 confirmation hearing for his own views on the matter, Roberts said: "Roe v. Wade is the settled law of the land. ... There's nothing in my personal views that would prevent me from fully and faithfully applying that precedent."

Roberts' nomination to the appellate bench attracted support from both ends of the ideological spectrum.

Some 146 members of the D.C. Bar signed a letter urging his confirmation, including officials from the Clinton administration. The letter stated: "He is one of the very best and most highly respected appellate lawyers in the nation, with a deserved reputation as a brilliant writer and oral advocate. He is also a wonderful professional colleague both because of his enormous skills and because of his unquestioned integrity and fair-mindedness.

A native of Buffalo, N.Y., Roberts received his undergraduate and law degrees from Harvard.

J. HARVIE WILKINSON III:

Wilkinson, 60, another prospect from the 4th Circuit, has been consistently conservative in his rulings since being put on the court by President Reagan in 1984.

For example, he was part of a panel that ruled in 2003 that the government could indefinitely detain without legal rights American citizens captured overseas in the war on terror. The Supreme Court reversed that decision, with moderate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's blistering statement, "A state of war is not a blank check for the president when it comes to the rights of the nation's citizens."

The Supreme Court agreed with Wilkinson, however, in his 1987 ruling that struck down a city minority set-aside program.

In his book, "One Nation Indivisible: How Ethnic Separatism Threatens America," Wilkinson explains his opposition to affirmative action, which he says is "the most dangerous of policy prescriptions for a multi-ethnic nation." He argues that such policies separate rather than unite the many races, and advocates for a celebration of multiculturalism and diversity.

He has less clear-cut views on the issue of reproductive rights.

Those who argue that Wilkinson supports Roe v. Wade point to a decades-old article he co-wrote in which he said that "although Roe has been severely criticized, the decision is not an illogical extension of the court's earlier decisions in matters of intimate association."

But in 1998, Wilkinson joined an opinion upholding a Virginia parental notification law for minors seeking abortions. Wilkinson called the law "a very mild and moderate form of regulation."

Unlike many other judges, Wilkinson frequently speaks and writes about his views on affirmative action and other subjects. Before his court career, he was editorial page editor of the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot and taught law at the University of Virginia.

While in law school he ran for Congress as a Republican and lost in 1970.

Wilkinson also:

--Wrote the majority 4th Circuit opinion in 1996 upholding the "don't ask, don't tell" policy that barred gays serving in the military from revealing their sexual orientation.

--Says judicial activism is frequently practiced by both liberal and conservative judges, which he seems to blame on a lawsuit culture that has shifted power from people to the judges (Michigan Law Review article, May 2000).

--Frowns upon what he says is a trend by the Supreme Court of relying on international law or looking to what other countries do when deciding cases. Wilkinson said that while comparisons to other countries cannot be avoided in an age of globalism, "the court's legitimacy must ultimately rest on reliance and reference to the American Constitution and to American democratic outcomes."

DOJ_NMG_0000708

--Dissented on a panel of three judges that in 1986 upheld an emotional distress award for the Rev. Jerry Falwell, who was publicly lampooned in Hustler magazine. While criticizing the ad itself, Wilkinson said "nothing is more thoroughly democratic than to have the high and mighty lampooned and spoofed." The Supreme Court later overturned the emotional distress award.

Supreme Court: Possible Nominees (FT)

Financial Times, July 2, 2005

¦ Janice Rogers Brown was recently confirmed by the Senate, after a bitter battle, as a federal appeals court judge. She is an outspoken conservative whom liberals condemn as an ideologue rather than a jurist.

¦ Edith Brown Clement is a federal appeals court judge who made headlines by sharply reducing a jury verdict for pain and suffering to a mother and three-year-old daughter killed in a car accident.

¦ Edith Hollan Jones is also a federal appeals court judge and is conservative on abortion.

¦ J. Michael Luttig, a federal appeals court judge and former clerk to Justice Antonin Scalia, is a committed conservative and a firm supporter of federalism.

¦ John Roberts, another federal appeals court judge, was a law clerk to Chief Justice William Rehnquist. He is well respected by both liberal and conservative lawyers and is viewed as more of a jurist than an ideologue.

¦ Michael McConnell, serves on the tenth circuit court of appeals, and is a conservative legal scholar respected across party lines, but as a vocal foe of the Roe v Wade decision which legalised abortion, liberal groups would vehemently oppose him

¦ Alberto Gonzales: America's first Hispanic attorney general, he is close to President Bush, who might want to make him America's first Hispanic Chief Justice. He could probably get enough Democratic votes for confirmation, but many conservatives consider him too moderate

¦ Emilio Garza: another Hispanic, Garza, a federal appeals court judge, is viewed as an alternative to Gonzales. He has criticised Roe v Wade.

¦ Samuel Alito, is an alternate Hispanic candidate. Also a federal appeals court judge, he is described as an exceptionally bright ideologue who favours restrictions on a woman's right to choose.

¦ J. Harvie Wilkinson is a courtly conservative who is well respected across the political spectrum but at 61, he may be viewed as too old to ensure a long and uninterrupted period of conservative service.

Amid Vows Of Opposition, Senate Braces For Disarray (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

The Senate braced on Friday for a Supreme Court confirmation fight that threatens to strain a tenuous new agreement on handling court nominations and plunge the chamber back into partisan strife.

Even though President Bush has not announced a nominee, some leading Democrats made clear that they would oppose any candidate whom they judged too conservative, particularly because the candidate would replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate.

"If the president abuses his power and nominates someone who threatens to roll back the rights and freedoms of the American people, then the American people will insist that we oppose that nominee, and we intend to do so," Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, said on the Senate floor.

In a move intended to prod Mr. Bush into consulting with them, Democrats repeatedly invoked President Ronald Reagan, a staunch conservative whose nominee Justice O'Connor was confirmed 99 to 0.

Republicans, trying to avoid a fight, called for "a fair confirmation process," in the words of the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist of Tennessee.

Republicans said they hoped to avoid the bitterness that has permeated the Senate over the last few years, as Democrats blocked 10 of Mr. Bush's nominees for federal appeals courts, and Dr. Frist pushed the Senate to bar such tactics.

A confrontation was averted in late May when 14 senators struck their own compromise. But each side said Friday that a Supreme Court confirmation would push the long-running debate over the federal judiciary into a new, and ever more divisive, level.

"If history is the guide, our record is pretty checkered," Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, said. "It hasn't always been dignified. While I'm not optimistic, I am hopeful."

It has been more than a decade since the Senate grappled with a Supreme Court nomination, Justice Stephen G. Breyer's, so long ago that, according to Dr. Frist's office, only 56 of the current members were here for it. Though confirmation hearings have traditionally been in September, Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, would not rule out hearings next month.

DOJ_NMG_0000709

As the court seat opened, attention on Capitol Hill turned immediately to the 14 senators - 7 Republicans and 7 Democrats - who struck the compromise in May. Under it, the Democrats promised to use the filibuster to block court nominees only in "extraordinary circumstances," while Republicans said in exchange that they would not support efforts to bar such a procedural tactic.

Members of the so-called Gang of 14 promised to meet soon after Congress returned from its Fourth of July break. Democrats and Republicans in the group said they expected their agreement to hold and, perhaps, to ease the confirmation process.

"I am optimistic that it will be not meet the 'extraordinary circumstances' issue," said Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, a leader in reaching the compromise.

Mr. McCain said the fact that the vacancy was created by a centrist could not be interpreted as such a circumstance.

"We operated on principle, not individuals," he said.

Another senator in the compromise said he hoped that the consideration of the coming nominee would be so smooth that the agreement would never come into play. But that senator, John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, said the prospect of a vote to prohibit filibusters, called the nuclear option, remained a possibility, although an unfortunate one.

"The nuclear option is definitely on the table," Mr. Warner said. "We recognize that."

"If we did," he added, "and that were the process by which this body gave advice and consent on that Supreme Court justice, that justice would be tattooed with the nuclear option for the rest of his or her life on that court."

With the possible exception of Dr. Frist, whose aides said they had "strong indications" of the retirement early Friday morning, most senators, like Mr. Specter, were caught off guard by Justice O'Connor's announcement.

Many had already scattered for the weeklong Fourth of July recess.

The retirement sent them scrambling back to the Capitol for news conferences and speeches, setting into motion plans that Congressional aides in both parties have been working on for months.

Dr. Frist was on the Senate floor delivering a speech on pharmaceutical advertising. His aides entered the chamber and handed him a sheaf of papers. After a brief pause, he delivered a prepared tribute to Justice O'Connor.

He and the president spoke by telephone about 11 a.m., shortly before Mr. Bush made his remarks in the Rose Garden and just as Mr. Specter arrived to brief the news media.

Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, the minority leader, was on his way to Nevada. Within minutes of the announcement, Mr. Reid's aides were lining up leading Democrats to appear on the weekend talk shows and issuing talking points to press secretaries.

Democrats emphasized the theme of consultation, harking frequently to the 14 senators' compromise, which centered on the Constitution's advise and consent clause.

"President Bush should use this opportunity to bring the country together, not to tear us apart," Mr. Reid said. "It's what President Reagan did when he nominated Justice O'Connor."

Mr. Reid did say that Mr. Bush had tried to contact him and that the president had spoken with Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Leahy, an aide said, had a 14-minute talk with the president that interrupted a news conference in the senator's office in Burlington, Vt. The senator would not discuss the call, but he has pushed for more consultation on judicial nominations.

Republicans made clear that they believed it was up to Mr. Bush to decide how to consult with the Senate, if at all.

Mr. Warner distributed a memorandum quoting Alexander Hamilton, saying there would be "no exertion of choice on the part of the Senate."

Mr. Specter said he thought long and hard about proposing names to Mr. Bush, but decided against it.

"I wasn't asked - don't ask, don't tell," Mr. Specter said.

The confirmation hearings will be a crucial test both for Mr. Specter, who nearly lost his chairmanship after the elections in November when he angered conservatives with remarks about abortion, and for Dr. Frist, a likely presidential candidate, whose Senate leadership has been questioned.

Aides to Dr. Frist have been preparing for a Supreme Court vacancy since last winter. Now they will ramp up that effort. By Friday afternoon their new "Supreme Court Confirmation Center" had issued statements by various senators. Republican aides said Ed Gillespie, the former chairman of the Republican National Committee, would be a consultant to Dr. Frist, as he was in the recent fight over filibusters.

Mr. Specter said he thought that the Senate had "learned a lot" from that confrontation.

DOJ_NMG_0000710

He added, "And we retained the right to filibuster, which is vital, as the Senate has played such an historic role in dissenting."

Though senators retain the ability to filibuster judicial nominees under the compromise, its architects said they realized from the start that a Supreme Court vacancy could put the pact under incredible stress.

"We always knew that the first kind of test of this agreement, the real test, was going to come on the Supreme Court," said Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio, a Republican who had intended to vote to bar the filibuster but ultimately signed onto the accord.

Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska, a Democratic architect of the compromise, said in a statement that the 14 senators would convene after a nominee had been named.

"Any speculation on potential nominees is obviously premature," Mr. Nelson said. "We will cross that bridge when we get there."

After the president names a nominee, the Senate confirmation process starts, long before hearings begin. Judiciary Committee aides will pore over the candidate's speeches and writings and, eventually, take custody of critical documents, the F.B.I. background check on the nominee.

The file will be closely guarded, Republicans say. They cite a memorandum of understanding between the Senate and the White House, drafted when the first President Bush was in office, that limits access to members of the Judiciary Committee and a handful of senior aides.

Controlling leaks, Republicans say, will be essential. Douglas H. Ginsburg, for instance, withdrew his Supreme Court nomination in 1987 after it was disclosed that he had smoked marijuana, information that the F.B.I. turned up.

"The Supreme Court will be the test now," Mr. Cornyn of Texas said. "Everything we have been doing for the last two years has been a warm-up to the main event."

Senate Prepares For Fierce Judicial Battle (AP-Y2)

By Jesse J. Holland, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

With the loss of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's swing vote, senators are readying a fierce battle over President Bush's first Supreme Court nominee — a person who could determine the fate of several important court precedents in the future.

While the Senate is in a holding pattern until President Bush makes a nomination — which the White House said won't be until after he returns from Europe next Friday — Republicans and Democrats already are jockeying for advantage in a confirmation battle they say will reshape the courts.

"This is the first Supreme Court vacancy in more than a decade, and Justice O'Connor's replacement will greatly influence the future of this country," Sen. Russ Feingold (news, bio, voting record), D-Wis., a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said after O'Connor announced her retirement Friday.

Bush said he will consult with senators of both parties about his selection, something Democrats asked for repeatedly for months. The GOP-run Judiciary Committee is expected to start hearings within a month to six weeks after Bush sends the nomination to the Senate.

Democrats are resigned to Bush nominating a conservative, but they are hoping to push him into picking someone like O'Connor, who showed an independent streak on the court despite being a lifelong Republican and a Reagan appointee.

O'Connor has been a crucial vote in holding the middle ground on landmark rulings from abortion to abuses in money and politics. Sen. Christopher Dodd (news, bio, voting record), D-Conn., called her "a conservative, but who is in the mainstream of judicial thinking."

"Justice O'Connor has been a voice of reason and moderation on the court," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "It is vital that she be replaced by someone like her, someone who embodies the fundamental American values of freedom, equality and fairness."

Republicans used the same buzzwords, with Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., calling for a nominee who is "fair, independent, unbiased and committed to equal justice under the law" like O'Connor. But other Republicans took pains to point out that she wasn't as moderate as Democrats portrayed.

"She has provided the critical fifth vote in case after case after case, involving the important role that states play in our federalist system of government, and in the protection of religious liberties and religious expression in the public square," said Sen. John Cornyn (news, bio, voting record), R-Texas, a Judiciary Committee member.

Bush has said in the past that he favors the judicial philosophy of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas but never has mentioned O'Connor. And he has said repeatedly that judges should not "legislate from the bench," meaning that their opinions should not be swayed by social or cultural trends.

DOJ_NMG_0000711

Republicans also immediately began pushing Democrats to not consider filibustering a Bush Supreme Court nominee. America "deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate — characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote," Bush said.

"My instinct is that there will not be a filibuster here," Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., declared minutes after the retirement announcement. Sen. Sam Brownback (news, bio, voting record), R-Kan., added: "The person either goes on the Supreme Court or they don't go on the Supreme Court by 51 votes. That's what it should be."

Democrats have successfully filibustered six of Bush's lower-court picks, so far with several withdrawing their nominations because they couldn't reach the 60-vote threshold for overcoming the blockade.

But seven Democrats and seven Republicans signed a pact last month pledging not to filibuster judicial nominees except in extraordinary circumstances. At the same time, they agreed to oppose attempts by GOP leaders to change filibuster procedures and allowed the confirmation five of those blocked Appeals Court nominees.

Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and Mark Pryor, D-Ark., two of the "Gang of 14," called for Bush to pick a consensus nominee so they won't have to test their agreement.

"I believe the White House working together with the Senate, as a co-equal branch of government, will be able to find a consensus nominee who will faithfully uphold the Constitution and represent the best of our justice system," Pryor said. Warner added: "This nomination ... gives him the opportunity to be a uniter, not a divider."

Specter also is pushing for the confirmation process to be completed before the new term begins on Oct. 3 to ensure that the court does not split 4-4 on any case. "I think it is an important objective and I think we can reach it," he said.

But Democrats say they won't be rushed, considering O'Connor said she will serve until her replacement is confirmed — whenever that may be.

"We have plenty of time," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y.

Senate Already Squaring Off (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, July 2, 2005

The Senate barely averted a meltdown this spring over judicial nominations. And markers thrown down Friday suggest an all-out partisan brawl is looming.

One Democrat after another demanded a "mainstream conservative" to replace Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Republicans called for a "fair and independent" jurist.

The gap between these code phrases could foreshadow a battle royal as fierce as any in Senate history.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., warned that "if the president abuses his power and nominates someone who threatens to roll back the rights and freedoms of the American people, then the American people will insist that we oppose that nominee, and we intend to do so."

Texas Sen. John Cornyn, a GOP member of the Judiciary Committee, said he's not optimistic the process will be "dignified," as President Bush and other Republicans called for Friday. He noted that Democrats have gone to great lengths to stymie a number of appellate court picks in recent years.

"I don't see any real reason necessarily to try to find a nominee that will provoke a filibuster," Mr. Cornyn said. But he added, "Obviously everything we've been doing for the last few years has been a warm-up to the main event."

Thus were battle lines drawn.

How the summer plays out could depend on the Gang of 14 – the centrist senators who averted a "nuclear" showdown over filibusters and appeals court nominees. The group plans to meet after the July Fourth recess.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he's ready to begin hearings as soon as the White House sends him a name. And he insisted that, litmus tests and outside pressure aside, the president isn't obliged to replace a centrist with a centrist.

"This is a very polarized country when it comes to the issues which will come to the Supreme Court of the United States," he said. "Everybody can't have their own way."

A key Democrat on the panel, Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, urged Mr. Bush to hold a "summit" with leaders of both parties. "We should replace Sandra Day O'Connor with a consensus candidate, not an ideologue," he said. "Nothing would make me happier than a nominee that passes 100 to nothing, or 98 to 2."

But, as Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., put it, "elections have consequences," and voters gave Mr. Bush a second term.

TWO SENATORS TO WATCH

These two senators will play key roles in the confirmation of the next Supreme Court justice:

Arlen Specter

As chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the Pennsylvania Republican will control the potentially confrontational hearings. Some conservatives worry about Mr. Specter's moderate politics and maverick style.

Patrick Leahy

The panel's senior Democrat, he has been in bruising confirmation fights before, including Clarence Thomas in 1991. Of late, Mr. Leahy of Vermont has tried to derail some of the president's judicial picks as being too conservative.

BATTLE LINES ARE DRAWN

"One thing is very clear – if the president makes this vacancy an opportunity to push his personal ideology, you can bet your last dollar he's got a real fight on his hands. The 60 percent of Americans who want Roe v. Wade left alone will not be silent this time."

– Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, which supports abortion rights

"It is inevitable that this confirmation battle will revolve around values. The administration should not be afraid of such a debate. ... The sense among ordinary Americans is that the courts ... are out of balance and unreflective of the ideals and concerns of most citizens."

–Gary Bauer, president of American Values, a conservative advocacy group

O'Connor's Decision Opens Way For Court Shift Rightward (SLPD)

By Jon Sawyer

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 2, 2005

The waiting game over a long-expected Supreme Court vacancy ended dramatically on Friday when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman to serve on the nation's highest court, announced that she was stepping down.

O'Connor, 75, had become an increasingly important swing vote in the court's moderate center since her appointment in 1981 by President Ronald Reagan. She cast key votes upholding abortion rights, affirmative action and the separation of church and state.

Her resignation, the first from the court in 11 years, gives President George W. Bush the opportunity to tilt the court more to the right - and sets the stage for an epic battle for confirmation in the Senate.

"The nation deserves, and I will select, a Supreme Court justice that Americans can be proud of," Bush said in a Rose Garden appearance after the announcement that O'Connor plans to retire as soon as a replacement is confirmed.

"The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the U.S. Senate," Bush added, "characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

But while Bush reached out immediately to promise consultation with senior Senate Democrats, and they responded in kind, the war drums could be heard of likely battle to come.

Democrats control 45 seats in the 100-seat body but have vowed to do everything they can, including a possible filibuster, to block any nominee that they view as out of the mainstream. Republican activists are just as primed, praising O'Connor's service but at the same time making clear that they want Bush to name a replacement who will be more reliably conservative.

Ralph Neas, president of the liberal interest group People for the American Way, said that with war abroad and many divisions at home, it was important for Bush to reach across partisan lines. "At a time when so many things confront us, why can't we have a candidate of unity?" he said. "Why can't we have a consensus candidate?"

Thor Hearne, a national counsel for the Bush-Cheney campaign last year, noted that Bush had made clear to the country then the sort of justice he would choose and that there was no reason to back down now.

"The president's clear desire is to pick someone who's going to be true to interpreting the Constitution, as opposed to seeing an opportunity on the bench to legislate," said Hearne, now with the St. Louis office of Lathrop & Gage.

"That's the criteria he's consistently articulated, and following that course, he'll invite the opposition that the groups on the left have already promised to launch," he added. "They're out there sharpening their knives, no matter who he picks."

Taking DC by surprise

Official Washington had been in suspended animation since Monday, the last day of the court's current term, expecting the retirement of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who is undergoing treatment for thyroid cancer.

But it was O'Connor, his Stanford University Law School classmate and for 24 years, often - but not always - a soulmate on the court, who ended up stepping down first.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the White House got word of a possible retirement Thursday, when Supreme Court Head Marshal Pamela Talkin called White House Counsel Harriet Miers to say that on Friday morning, she would hand-deliver a sealed envelope.

Shortly before 8 a.m. St. Louis time on Friday, Talkin informed Miers that the letter concerned O'Connor. Miers informed Bush, who placed a call to O'Connor shortly before praising her publicly at a hastily called Rose Garden event.

DOJ_NMG_0000713

McClellan described the conversation with O'Connor as "emotional," with Bush praising her service and saying "I wish I was there to hug you."

Bush discussed the court vacancy in a meeting with Vice President Dick Cheney, senior aides and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who has himself been touted as a leading candidate for the post.

No nomination is expected until after Bush returns from Europe July 8, McClellan said. Consultations with senators from both parties have already begun, he noted, among them a general discussion Wednesday, before O'Connor's announcement, with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

In her three-sentence letter of resignation, O'Connor told Bush, "It has been a great privilege, indeed, to have served as a member of the court for 24 terms. I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure."

Swing voter

A state legislator and judge before her appointment, O'Connor cast the decisive vote in rulings that upheld affirmative action programs (2003), outlawed government-sponsored prayer at graduations and other public school events (1992), and upheld the McCain-Feingold ban on political parties using unrestricted soft-money contributions (2003).

She voted repeatedly to uphold Roe v. Wade, the 1973 ruling that legalized abortion, most significantly in 1989 and 1992 cases where four other justices were prepared to toss out Roe. In 2000, she cast the key vote that overturned a state ban on so-called partial birth abortion.

On the current court, there are still five pro-Roe votes besides O'Connor, said Neil Richards, a former clerk under Rehnquist who teaches now at the Washington University School of Law.

"Even if you get a committed anti-abortion rights jurist to replace O'Connor, I don't think Roe is in immediate danger," he said. "But it would be a court more tolerant of laws that infringe on a broad view of abortion rights."

The Battle For The Court Begins (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman on the Supreme Court, resigned yesterday, setting the stage for a fierce battle over who will succeed her.

President Bush praised Justice O'Connor as a "discerning and conscientious judge" and vowed to offer a nominee who "will faithfully interpret the Constitution." The White House said it would not offer a candidate until after Mr. Bush returns from Europe on July 8.

While her retirement leaves Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, a liberal appointed by President Clinton, the lone woman on the court, few names mentioned have been those of women. Among the most mentioned are Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, thought to be a particular favorite of the president, and federal appeals court judges J. Michael Luttig and John G. Roberts.

In a note to the White House, Justice O'Connor, 75, was brief. She said she will stay on until a successor is confirmed and that she was leaving "with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under the constitutional structure." Court officials said she spoke of a need to spend more time with her husband of 53 years.

A moderate conservative when President Reagan appointed her in 1981, Justice O'Connor delivered tie-breaking votes in more than dozen landmark cases affecting civil rights, environmental protection, abortion and the 2000 presidential election among others. She became less conservative as the years went on.

While there had been speculation Justice O'Connor might step down, the timing of her announcement was a mild surprise, because Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was espected to retire first, at the end of the court's term ending June 30.

At 80 and recovering from thyroid cancer, the chief justice's condition during recent months had prompted the mention of several prospective replacements, who are now considered as successors to Justice O'Connor. Court watchers said her retirement indicates Justice Rehnquist will probably not step down this year, honoring a tradition of not having more than one vacancy per term.

Justice O'Connor will leave a legacy for women lawyers. Those who worked for or with her cite her intellect and scholarship.

"She's very smart, very dedicated and very savvy, but she's also extremely charming," said Jeffrey Lamken, a partner with Houston-based law firm Baker Botts, who clerked for Justice O'Connor in 1992 and 1993. "There is not going to be another Justice O'Connor. I think anyone who ever worked for her would tell you that."

It was her seriousness that made her a target for humor over the years, such as an incident at a White House Correspondents Dinner in the mid-1980s when a tipsy Washington Redskins running back, John Riggins, memorably called across a table to her: "Come on, Sandy baby, loosen up." Mr. Riggins was beseiged by calls yesterday, but declined to talk about it.

DOJ_NMG_0000714

Lawmakers on Capitol Hill paid tribute yesterday.

"Today marks a great loss for America, but it's also a day to reflect on all that we have gained because of Justice O'Connor's service to our country," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said. "For nearly 24 years, Justice O'Connor lent America her brilliant mind and her fair and impartial judgement."

The Senate, which the Constitution tasks with confirming the president's nominee to succeed a justice, is preparing for a summer-long battle over Justice O'Connor's replacement. Democrats, who have led filibusters against lower court nominations by Mr. Bush, said the president has an obligation to preserve the precarious balance of the court with whomever he chooses to replace Justice O'Connor.

Republicans said the president should not be constrained. "Elections have consequences," said Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican. "The president clearly stated when he ran for re-election that he would be appointing conservative nominees to the Supreme Court. It comes as no surprise if a conservative nominee comes over."

Born in 1930 in El Paso, Texas, Justice O'Connor earned undergraduate and law degrees at Stanford University, where she married classmate John Jay O'Connor III. Despite graduating third in her law school class, few law firms were willing to hire a woman lawyer during the early 1950s, so she took a job as deputy county attorney of San Mateo County in California.

After two years, she took a job as a civilian attorney for a firm in Frankfurt, Germany, and by the late 1950s had returned to the United States, to Arizona, where a private firm hired her. By 1965, she was emerging as a leading lawyer, later becoming the assistant attorney general of Arizona.

Beginning in 1969, she served three terms in the Arizona state Senate, and in 1973 became the first woman to serve as a state senate majority leader. Two years later she was elected judge of the Maricopa County Superior Court, where she served until being appointed to the Arizona Court of Appeals in 1979.

In 1981, President Reagan nominated her to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Potter Stewart. She was unanimously confirmed and, at the time, quickly became a conservative ally of Chief Justice Warren E. Burger.

But in the years after, she was criticized by conservatives on some issues and hailed by them on others. Perhaps the most important case of her tenure came in December 2000, when she joined Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Anthony M. Kennedy overrule a decision by the Florida Supreme Court, which had overruled a Florida state circuit judge, finally tipping the election to George W. Bush.

Supreme Court Justice O'Connor Retires (REU-Y2)

By James Vicini

Reuters, July 2, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman on the U.S. Supreme Court and a moderate conservative who often cast the decisive vote on abortion and other contentious issues, announced her retirement on Friday, and a political battle immediately began over her successor.

"This is to inform you of my decision to retire from my position as an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, effective upon the nomination and confirmation of my successor," O'Connor, 75, said in a letter to President Bush.

O'Connor gave no reason why she was resigning from the nine-member court, whose decisions play a central role in shaping the social, cultural and political fabric of the United States. It has been closely divided on such hot-button issues as abortion, the death penalty and church-state separation.

A court spokeswoman cited O'Connor's age and said the justice, who is one of America's most powerful women, needed to spend time with her husband. He has Alzheimer's disease, people close to the family have said.

"It has been a great privilege, indeed, to have served as a member of the court for 24 terms," O'Connor said in the one-paragraph letter released by the Supreme Court.

Her resignation was announced four days after the end of the court's term. There had been widespread speculation that Chief Justice William Rehnquist, 80, who has thyroid cancer, would resign at the end of the term, and even some of her colleagues did not think O'Connor would be leaving.

Her resignation allows Bush to make his first appointment to the high court, which must be confirmed by the U.S. Senate. Bush held off naming a replacement for at least a week but urged lawmakers to give his nominee "fair treatment."

Who Bush nominates could trigger a fierce fight between Republicans and Democrats and threaten a shaky truce over judicial nominations that has kept intact the minority's ability to block a controversial candidate.

Foreshadowing the likely battle over her successor, Bush came out into the White House Rose Garden with a message for lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0000715

"The nation deserves and I will select a Supreme Court justice that Americans can be proud of. The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote," he said.

O'Connor's departure, the first in more than a decade, could shift the balance of power on the court, which has been closely divided between the conservative majority and a more liberal faction. Her announcement immediately set off a flurry of comment and activity among interest groups and lawmakers on both sides of the aisle.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), a leading liberal in the Democratic Party, immediately challenged Bush.

"If the president nominates someone who threatens to roll back the rights and freedom of the American people, the American people will insist we oppose that nominee, and we will do so," the Massachusetts lawmaker said.

O'Connor has been a key vote to preserve the constitutional right to abortion and to allow race to remain a factor to be considered in admissions at universities.

BUSH TO BE 'DELIBERATE, THOROUGH'

Bush pledged to be "deliberate and thorough" in naming a replacement and said he would announce a nominee in a timely manner in hopes of having the new justice start work when the court reconvenes for its new term in October.

One possibility is Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the former White House counsel and a longtime Bush aide dating back to when Bush was governor of Texas. Bush may want to make history by selecting the first Hispanic American for the Supreme Court.

Other possible candidates are conservative U.S. Appeals Court judges J. Harvie Wilkinson, J. Michael Luttig, Michael McConnell, John Roberts, Samuel Alito and Emilio Garza.

If Bush wants to name a conservative woman, possibilities include federal appeals court judges Edith Jones and Edith Brown Clement and Judge Janice Rogers Brown of the California Supreme Court, who was recently confirmed as a U.S. appeals court judge.

O'Connor's resignation triggered dueling news conferences and speeches by Senate Democrats and Republicans as they jockeyed for position in the pending confirmation contest.

Simultaneously, special interest groups from the right and left revved up their multimillion-dollar radio, TV and Internet campaigns that will seek to shape public opinion and thus Senate votes on whoever Bush ultimately picks.

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), the Republican head of the Senate Judiciary Committee that will take up the nomination, said he would hold hearings in August if necessary. "The judiciary committee is prepared to proceed at any time," he said.

Senate Democrats, who blocked 10 of Bush's appeals court nominees during his first term, urged the president to consult with them before picking a Supreme Court candidate. Bush promised to consult with senators but was not specific.

Traveling in the Midwest, O'Connor got off a flight at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport, preceded by Republican U.S. Rep. Jim Ramstad (news, bio, voting record), who told her, "I hate to see you go."

"I hate to go too," she replied. "It's been a real privilege." (Additional reporting by Steve Holland and Thomas Ferraro)

Democrats Warn Bush To Consult (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

Capitol Hill braced yesterday for the first Supreme Court confirmation fight in nearly 11 years, and Democrats warned President Bush to consult them "face-to-face" before offering a replacement for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

"If the president abuses his power and nominates someone who threatens to roll back the rights and freedoms of the American people, then the American people will insist that we oppose that nominee -- and we intend to do so," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and member of the Judiciary Committee, said.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat and a member of the committee, told reporters it would be "a shame" if Mr. Bush makes his nomination "without real face-to-face, back-and-forth consultation." Democrats argue that this is the correct meaning of the Senate's constitutional "advice and consent" role.

A group of liberal activists reserved a room across the hall from the Senate chamber yesterday to add their warnings, calling the abortion rights as upheld by Justice O'Connor the most fundamental American freedom.

"On Independence Day weekend -- as we all celebrate the freedoms that make America so special -- there is no freedom more fundamental to our rights than the ability for women to decide whether and when to parent," said Karen Pearl, interim president of Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

Amid all the threats, lawmakers on both sides joined in lauding the first woman named to the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0000716

"Throughout her 24 years of service on the nation's highest court, Justice O'Connor worked to restore common sense to our criminal justice system and due regard for the power reserved to the states under the Constitution and to limit restrictions on faith in the public square," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican and member of the Judiciary committee. "Thanks to Sandra Day O'Connor, victims of crime are more likely to receive justice, and inner city children are no longer constitutionally barred from access to school choice programs."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid agreed: "Justice O'Connor has been a voice of reason and moderation on the court."

The warm remarks put several Democrats in the unlikely position of urging Mr. Bush to go about nominating a replacement in the same manner as President Reagan, who nominated Justice O'Connor 24 years ago.

"Ronald Reagan was, arguably, the most conservative president of our time, and he chose someone who was confirmed with a vote of 99 to nothing," said Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Connecticut Democrat. "This president ought to use the Reagan standard in choosing a nominee."

Mr. Reagan also nominated Justice Antonin Scalia to the high court and elevated William H. Rehnquist to chief justice. Justice Rehnquist anchors the conservatives on the court, and Justice Scalia has become the left's favorite "bad" conservative.

Justice O'Connor's announcement comes after the Senate narrowly averted a showdown in May over 10 Democratic filibusters of Mr. Bush's judicial nominations to lower federal courts.

Seven Democrats agreed to surrender most of the remaining filibusters in exchange for seven Republicans' promise not to support a leadership effort to employ the so-called "nuclear option," which would have prevented such judicial filibusters.

One of those Democratic signers, Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska, said he expects the deal to stick. "Once a nominee is put forward, I'm sure the 'Gang of Fourteen' senators will meet and begin discussions about the nominee to ensure that the agreement we reached will remain intact," he said. "Any speculation on potential nominees is obviously premature. We will cross that bridge when we get there."

Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican and one of the Gang of Fourteen, reiterated yesterday that the "nuclear option is definitely on the table" but spoke against confirming a nominee in that manner. "For, if we did, and that were the process by which this body gave advice and consent on that Supreme Court justice, that justice would be tattooed with the nuclear option for the rest of his or her life on that court," he said.

Mr. Warner joined Democrats in warning Mr. Bush to find a nominee Democrats find acceptable. President Bush's first Supreme Court nomination "gives him an opportunity to be a uniter, not a divider," he said.

Democrats Press For Another Just Like O'Connor - Or Else (SLPD)

By Jon Sawyer

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 2, 2005

Call them "O'Connor Democrats."

In the wake of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement announcement Friday, Democrats were competing so hard to sing her praises that Republicans could barely find a television camera free.

The reason is simple:

O'Connor is the swing-vote centrist on the current court. Her retirement gives President George W. Bush the opportunity to name a full-throated conservative. Democrats are hoping he won't.

O'Connor "is a sterling example of what can happen when a president nominates a justice not from the right or the left wing of one of the political parties, but an independent judge, capable of making up her own mind," said Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., praised O'Connor as "a wise judge who served the nation and the Constitution well." He urged Bush to nominate someone similar - or else.

"If the president abuses his power and nominates someone who threatens to roll back the rights and freedoms of the American people," he told reporters, "then the American people will insist that we oppose that nominee, and we intend to do so."

Kennedy and other Democrats refused to rule out the possibility of a filibuster, the parliamentary maneuver of unlimited debate that requires a super majority of 60 votes to stop. After Republicans threatened this spring to eliminate the filibuster, an agreement among Senate centrists to block that action included a pledge from Democrats to use filibusters only in "extraordinary" circumstances.

Senate Republicans stressed that there's nothing extraordinary about a conservative Republican president naming a like-minded justice.

The carefully phrased statements by other congressional Republicans warned Democrats to avoid the sort of all-out war that characterized the 1987 confirmation battle over Robert H. Bork, who was defeated, and the 1991 confirmation of Justice Clarence Thomas.

DOJ_NMG_0000717

"I trust that the president's choice to replace Justice O'Connor will receive full, fair and objective consideration followed by a simple majority vote on the Senate floor," said Sen. Christopher "Kit" Bond, R-Mo.

Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., voiced similar views, adding that, "I also hope that everyone will treat the president's nominee with respect and avoid personal attacks."

Not to worry, said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., so long as Bush follows the lead of President Ronald Reagan by choosing someone like O'Connor.

"That's the standard this president ought to use, the Reagan standard," Dodd said. "If the president does nominate someone along the lines of Sandra Day O'Connor, I think the issue of a filibuster would be moot."

Stage Set For Clash Over Social Issues (BOS)

By Peter S. Canellos

The Boston Globe, July 2, 2005

With new cases on abortion, capital punishment, and physician-assisted suicide already on the docket for the next term, and the chance that gay marriage could find its way to the Supreme Court, the battle over the replacement for Sandra Day O'Connor could become the epic clash over social issues that conservative and liberal activists have been anticipating for decades.

Conservatives have wanted to overturn Roe v. Wade for 32 years, and while a more conservative replacement for O'Connor may not be enough to guarantee a reversal of Roe, many on the religious right yesterday sensed an opportunity to move the court sharply to the right on abortion and other social issues.

But for activists who have fought for abortion rights for decades, only to see some of their supporters lapse into complacency, the prospect of a fight over O'Connor's replacement was both terrifying and energizing -- a potentially transforming moment in the nation's culture wars.

Both sides seemed to agree on one thing: No judicial confirmation battle, from Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas to the recent disputes over Democratic filibusters of 10 of President Bush's appeals court nominees, carried anything like the stakes in the upcoming confirmation battle.

"This is where the fight will be," said Doug Schoen, a Democratic strategist and pollster for former president Bill Clinton.

Schoen, like many others involved in national politics, expected that the next Supreme Court replacement would be for ailing Chief Justice William Rehnquist, a reliable vote on the conservative side of most social issues.

But the news that the more moderate O'Connor is retiring dramatically raises the stakes for social liberals.

Nancy Northrup, president of the Center for Reproductive Rights, called O'Connor's departure a "monumentally important" moment in the battle for abortion rights, noting that O'Connor was the swing vote in the 2000 case of Stenberg v. Carhart, which struck down a law banning the late-term procedure that opponents call partial-birth abortion.

O'Connor has been a moderate supporter of abortion rights, preserving the core protections of Roe v. Wade while giving states more leeway to regulate the procedures. If she were replaced by a more conservative justice, the court would almost certainly allow greater restrictions. But the core right could still be preserved by a five-vote majority of Justices Anthony Kennedy, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen Breyer, and John Paul Stevens.

Since the Roe v. Wade decision in 1973, the "right to privacy" has become the linchpin for an expanding array of social issues that now includes the right to die and the right to some forms of assisted reproduction. Conservative anger over what they see as judicial activism also extends to Supreme Court recognition of gay rights and affirmative action, and the tightening web of restrictions on the death penalty.

Cases bearing on all these issues are likely to bubble up from lower federal courts in the next few years. The Supreme Court is already slated to hear a challenge to a New Hampshire statute requiring parental notification for minors seeking abortions, with no exception for the health of the mother; a challenge to prosecutors' use of racketeering statutes to bring charges against antiabortion extremist groups; and three challenges to capital punishment.

Unlike many other issues that wind up before the court, these fundamental social issues send waves of passionate support and opposition across the country. And both Northrup of the Center for Reproductive Rights and conservative activist Gary Bauer have insisted that Bush's nominee answer questions about key social issues directly.

Many past nominees declined to voice views on specific rights or possible cases, leading to some unwelcome surprises for activists on both sides. Antonin Scalia had an easy confirmation while refusing to answer questions on abortion rights. Many liberals gave him their support, but Scalia has since voted against abortion rights in numerous cases. Souter also declined to talk about specific cases, and surprised many conservatives with liberal votes on the bench, including support of abortion rights.

DOJ_NMG_0000718

The prospect of a nomination fight directly based on the right to privacy both scares and intrigues observers of past confirmation battles. Schoen, for one, believes an open battle over incendiary social issues could arouse even some voters who are usually unmoved by such topics, potentially changing the dynamic in congressional elections next year.

But for passionate activists on both sides, the confirmation of the next justice will be about more than politics. Law, religion, and morality will be the loudly clanking coins of the realm.

"I guess I've been preparing for this moment since my first day on the Judiciary Committee staff in 2001," said Manuel Miranda, a conservative activist now with the Heritage Foundation. "But how long have I really been preparing for this? This is an issue that's been at my family dinner for a long time."

O'Connor Resignation Triggers High-Stakes Battle (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

It's apocalypse. Now.

When Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement this morning, White House aides, Senate Democrats and interest groups mobilizing on the left and right instantly agreed on one point: the stakes in the struggle over her successor amounted to nothing less than control of the Supreme Court.

Because O'Connor has so often been the decisive swing vote on a closely divided court, her replacement could shift the balance between left and right on a wide range of controversial economic and social issues.

That virtually guarantees her departure will provoke a more intense fight, with even greater political consequences for the two parties, than the event most in Washington had anticipated this week: the retirement of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. Because Rehnquist is already a reliably conservative vote, replacing him with another conservative would not significantly change the court's alignment.

"More than one analyst has said in recent years that we are basically a country governed by Sandra Day O'Connor," said social conservative leader Gary Bauer in a view echoed by many liberals. "She has been the swing vote on a host of issues. So the choice, the vacancy, is much more significant even than if Rehnquist stepped down."

Both President Bush and congressional Democrats now face high-profile choices in a fight that is likely to eclipse all other issues, at least through this fall — and potentially could define each side for the 2006 election as much as any other decision they make in the next 18 months.

The departure of the moderate O'Connor offers Bush an opportunity to shift the court to the right — and to energize the conservative base that has been at the center of his political strategy.

But if Bush chooses a nominee opponents can portray as extreme, he risks further erosion of his support among centrist voters — which has already sagged in his second term amid dissatisfaction with the war in Iraq and controversies such as the congressional intervention in the case of Terry Schiavo.

"It is a defining moment in his presidency," said presidential historian Robert Dallek.

But the fight could define Democrats, too. While Senate Democrats will face intense pressure from their base to oppose virtually any Bush nominee, if they try to block a choice most Americans see as reasonable, they risk further alienating the culturally conservative and rural voters that many in the party consider critical to their prospects in 2006 and 2008.

"If Bush comes out with a moderate conservative, then I think Democrats have to be very careful not to oppose just for the sake of opposing, especially if they want to reach some of those centrist and religious voters in the next election," said Furman University political scientist James Guth, an expert on religion and politics.

All of these calculations will play out amid the cacophony of what could become the largest and loudest interest group campaign in modern times. During the last two heavily contested Supreme Court nominations — those of Robert Bork in 1987 and Clarence Thomas in 1991 — talk radio was in its infancy, the Internet was used almost solely by scientists, CNN was the only cable news network, and issue advertising was rarely employed in lobbying campaigns.

This fight may mark as great an advance over those tactics as the mechanized blitzkrieg of World War II did over the grinding trench warfare of World War I. Coalitions of left and right have already stockpiled huge sums for massive advertising and organizing efforts on the vacancy. In states with senators considered persuadable, the efforts could approach the levels seen in presidential campaigns.

"It is going to be huge," said Eli Pariser, executive director of the political action committee associated with MoveOn.org, the giant online liberal advocacy group.

Further unsettling the environment is the controversy still surrounding the deal on judicial nominations reached this spring by the so-called "gang of 14" senators. In that accord, seven Republicans blocked an effort by GOP leaders to exempt judicial nominations from the filibuster, a tool that allows a minority of 40 senators to prevent a vote on an issue. In return, seven Democrats agreed to employ the tool only in "extraordinary circumstances."

DOJ_NMG_0000719

If Democrats filibuster Bush's choice for O'Connor's successor, the seven Republicans who approved the deal are likely to face enormous pressure to recant and support a filibuster ban.

"They will have heat like never before if they fail to do that," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel for Concerned Women for America, a leading social conservative group.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of the deal's principal architects, sent a warning shot today across the Democrats' bow.

McCain told CNN that Bush deserved deference in his choice after the 2004 election and he did not believe any Bush nominee to the court "will meet the bar of a 'extraordinary circumstance.'"

Civility, Consensus Will Likely Be Scarce In Fight Over New Justice (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

KRT – Cong Civility, July 2, 2005

The fight for Sandra Day O'Connor's swing seat on the Supreme Court probably will be an ugly one in which consensus and comity are all but impossible.

First, her seat is the pivot point of a closely divided court. A more conservative replacement could change decisions on abortion rights, the place of religious expression in public life, and environmental regulation, all emotional flash points in a politically polarized country.

Second, religious conservatives as well as supporters of abortion rights demand a litmus test on abortion, a stance unheard-of in earlier nominations.

Finally, the contest is the first since the opinion-a-minute world of bloggers and the Internet have joined cable TV and talk radio in stirring the passions of both right and left. It's a political echo chamber that demands confrontation, not compromise, to keep people tuning in or contributing money.

"It will not be pretty," said Dennis Goldford, a political scientist at Drake University in Iowa and author of a recent book on the ways courts interpret the Constitution.

O'Connor's decision on a hazy hot Friday before a holiday weekend surprised official Washington, which had been gearing up for the possible retirement of ailing Chief Justice William Rehnquist. That may come soon as well, but his departure would trade a conservative for a conservative, meaning little substantive change.

O'Connor was a swing vote, however. She sometimes sided with the conservatives, sometimes with liberals. If President Bush follows through with his campaign promise to name someone in the purely conservative vein of Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas, he'd shift the court to the right.

Many Democrats urged Bush on Friday to consult them before making a pick. They said Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton did that and then nominated candidates whom both parties could back. Their choices won broad support.

Bush aides said the president has consulted Sen. Harry Reid (news, bio, voting record), D-Nev., the party leader in the Senate, and would speak with Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record), D-Vt., the senior Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

But listening to Democrats is one thing; heeding their advice is another. Especially when Bush and both political parties are barraged by interest groups whose demands, particularly on abortion, make consensus all but unreachable.

Christian conservatives insisted Friday that Bush nominate someone who'd vote to restrict or outlaw abortion. They noted that they voted for him in large numbers in 2004 - the so-called values vote - and want their due.

"It is time to make good on those campaign promises, Mr. President," said Troy Newman, the president of the anti-abortion group Operation Rescue.

"You have been given a mandate to end abortion in our nation by the American people who cast their votes for you. You have been placed in power for such a time as this. Now it is time to fulfill your obligation to God and to those who elected you, and appoint a staunchly pro-life judge to the Supreme Court."

The Rev. Patrick Mahoney, the director of the Christian Defense Coalition, said O'Connor's retirement was a chance to roll back abortion that shouldn't be missed. " If she's gone, there is an opportunity to get a ban on partial-birth abortion," he said. "Now there may be an opportunity to make some inroads in the abortion debate."

The left insists on an abortion benchmark for any nominee from the opposite perspective.

"We can never let her be replaced by a justice who does not respect the right to privacy and Roe v. Wade," said Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., his party's 2004 presidential nominee.

The Center for Reproductive Rights also insisted that senators ask the eventual nominee how he or she would rule on cases involving abortion. "They need to vote with eyes wide open," said Nancy Northrup, the center's president.

DOJ_NMG_0000720

Egging on the atmosphere of confrontation will be the bloggers, talk radio hosts, cable TV anchors and interest groups who depend on fireworks for attention, ratings and money.

From the left, liberal activist David Sirota sent out an e-mail Friday charging that Bush would nominate a "wild-eyed lunatic." NARAL Pro-Choice America, an abortion rights group, said "the battle over the future of the Supreme Court could be won or lost within the next two weeks," and sought contributions from $50 to $1,000.

From the right, C. Boyden Gray, a former White House counsel who heads a group that backs conservative judicial nominees, charged that liberals would attack almost any Bush nominee "in hysterical terms" in part because they're backed by the pornography industry. Another group, Progress for America, vows an $18 million campaign to back a Bush nominee and seeks contributions ranging from $100 to $5,000.

"Grass-roots advocacy groups on both sides have been mobilizing," said Goldford, of Drake University, adding that "this will be the first major Supreme Court appointment in the cable TV talk show, Internet blog era." The result, he said, "is going to be horrible."

Supreme Court Vacancy Puts Pressure On Senate Deal-makers (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

KRT – Cong Dealmakers, July 2, 2005

With Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement, Democrats and Republicans dusted off their weapons of choice - the filibuster and the "nuclear option" - in case they feel a need to block or clear the way for the nominee to succeed her.

O'Connor's retirement is destined to cause a contentious debate in the Senate because her replacement is almost certain to alter the delicate balance she maintained on the court. Replacing O'Connor, in fact, is likely to cause more fireworks than would replacing Chief Justice William Rehnquist, a member of the court's conservative wing.

The vacancy puts the spotlight anew on seven Democrats and seven Republicans in the Senate who brokered an agreement in May that averted a partisan showdown over judicial appointments.

It also will test President Bush's relations with the Senate and whether he'll take the advice of those 14 senators to consult with Democrats and Republicans before he announces a nominee.

Pressure could be especially strong on the seven Democrats, who agreed that they wouldn't block judicial nominees except in an "extraordinary circumstance." No doubt, that phrase will be put to the test. The deal didn't define the term so it becomes a standard for each senator to determine.

Sen. John Warner (news, bio, voting record), R-Va., one of the 14 who brokered the deal, called on Bush to select a consensus candidate not only to avoid a partisan fight, but also to foster national unity.

"This nation of ours is troubled today and somewhat divided - the war on terrorism and other strong issues," Warner said. "And this nomination of the first Supreme Court justice by this distinguished president gives him an opportunity to be a uniter, not a divider."

Both Democrats and Republicans said they wanted to avoid repeating the showdowns over 10 of President Bush's circuit court nominees during his first term. Democrats blocked those nominations using a filibuster, a parliamentary delaying tactic that requires 60 out of the 100 senators to overcome.

When Bush asked the Senate again to confirm seven of those 10 nominees this year, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., threatened to use his own tactics to eliminate filibusters on judicial nominations. That plan, considered a last resort that could devastate Senate traditions, was labeled the "nuclear option."

Earlier this week, Frist said he hoped that the agreement by the 14 senators had placed the filibuster and nuclear option "back in their cages."

But Sen. Mark Pryor (news, bio, voting record) of Arkansas, one of the seven Democrats in the deal, warned if Bush names a "very, very conservative nominee" and doesn't seek advice from the Senate, some of the seven Democrats could view that as an "extraordinary circumstance" that would trigger a filibuster.

"The more that President Bush and the White House consults with the Senate, particularly the Judiciary Committee, the less likely it is there will be a filibuster," Pryor said.

The issue of abortion figures to be a significant factor in the confirmation process and is likely to fuel the tug of war between conservative and liberal groups. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., a leading Senate liberal, said he wouldn't apply an abortion "litmus test" on the nominee, but that "I will not vote for someone unless they demonstrate, before the Judiciary Committee, a core commitment to the fundamental constitutional values of the Constitution, and they include a variety of different rights, including privacy."

In the end, the focal point in the Senate will be the deal-makers who stopped the meltdown.

DOJ_NMG_0000721

"I'm optimistic that the president will not send over someone who reaches the extraordinary-circumstances level," said Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., one of the 14. "We only made an agreement with seven Democrats ... so it's their view that matters, not that of - in all due respect - their more liberal colleagues."

In addition to Warner and McCain, the agreement affects Republican Sens. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island. Democrats in addition to Pryor are Robert Byrd of West Virginia, Ben Nelson of Nebraska, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, Ken Salazar of Colorado, Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Daniel Inouye of Hawaii.

After A Brief Shock, Advocates Quickly Mobilize (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Around 9:30 Friday morning, C. Boyden Gray, founder of the Committee for Justice, a conservative group that is a leading ally of President Bush, was sipping coffee at his Georgetown residence and confessing mild frustration to a reporter for The New York Times about the waiting game for a Supreme Court retirement. Suddenly he got a text message and expressed that emotion rare for stage-managed Washington: surprise.

"An O'Connor resignation was not one we took seriously," Mr. Gray said, rushing out the door to begin deploying his troops.

At the abortion rights group Naral Pro-Choice America, organizers were sending e-mail alerts to 800,000 activists within 15 minutes after the announcement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's resignation. "Don't let Bush take away your choice!" they declared.

On Capitol Hill, senators of both parties quickly made their way to the floor and the galleries for a morning of speeches and briefings, hailing Justice O'Connor and trying to frame the debate to come - Democrats stressing a need for consultation and consensus, Republicans emphasizing a need for a fair process.

By midday, nothing less than a national political campaign had begun.

The retirement of Justice O'Connor, a moderate who has been a crucial vote for a constitutional right to abortion, began a struggle with incalculable political implications - for the interest groups, for the parties and for the president.

"This is the pivotal appointment," said Senator Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat who sits on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Advocates on the left and the right, who had prepared for this moment since the last Supreme Court vacancy was filled 11 years ago, agreed that the ideological balance of the court was up for grabs. Advocacy groups bought advertising on television and the Internet, and issued millions of e-mail alerts, waves of direct-mail fund-raising appeals and pre-emptive blasts at those viewed by the groups as either obstructionist Democrats or extremist Republicans.

"This is one of those moments in American history," said Ralph G. Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way. "No matter what side you're on, everything you've believed in, everything you've cared about, everything you've fought for is at stake. It's such a closely divided court."

Social conservatives saw a chance finally to translate their political successes - the election of allies to the White House and the top of the Congress - into greater influence on the court. They immediately reminded Mr. Bush of his campaign promise to appoint judges in the mold of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. They roused the grass roots, reminding their constituents of the court's decisions on the display of the Ten Commandments in public places, on gay rights and, most of all, on abortion.

"Today marks a watershed moment in American history," declared Dr. James C. Dobson, founder and chairman of the conservative Focus on the Family, "the resignation of a swing-vote justice on the Supreme Court and the opportunity to change the court's direction."

Lest there be any doubt about the high expectations of religious conservatives, Dr. Richard Land, president of the Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission of the Southern Baptist Convention, declared, "For President Bush, social conservatives and the senators they helped elect, the moment of truth has arrived."

Liberal advocacy groups found themselves confronting what they had feared and warned about since the 2000 election: the prospect of a Bush court. They called on the president to nominate a consensus moderate, someone ideologically and judicially close to Justice O'Connor. But they were preparing for something else.

Nancy Keenan, president of Naral, asserted that there could be no "stealth candidates" - that any nominee must be asked for a position on Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision declaring a constitutional right to abortion, and that any nominee must answer.

Notwithstanding much of the rhetoric, Justice O'Connor's retirement will not end the court's majority for Roe, which stands at 6 to 3.

DOJ_NMG_0000722

But her successor could narrow that majority, and open the door to new abortion restrictions. For example, the Supreme Court ruled by only 5 to 4 that a "partial birth abortion" ban was unconstitutional; Justice O'Connor's vote was among the five in the majority.

Another version of that ban, which applies to a type of abortion performed in the second or third trimester, is being challenged in lower courts and may end up before the justices.

Justice O'Connor's successor could change the balance on other issues as well, among them affirmative action and legislative redistricting. But it is abortion that will drive many activists in this nomination struggle.

A recent poll by the Pew Research Center found that dissatisfaction with the Supreme Court among Republicans was closely tied to their views about Roe v. Wade; those who want to see the decision overturned are twice as likely to give the court an unfavorable rating.

Nothing mobilized the modern religious conservative movement more than Roe, said John C. Green, an expert on religion and politics at the University of Akron.

"If you talk about judicial tyranny with any of the Christian conservatives, Roe v. Wade comes up immediately," Dr. Green said. "Some will talk about school prayer, but that was a long time ago."

The issue has a painful history for many opponents of abortion, who have felt betrayed by the string of Republican appointees, including Justices O'Connor, David H. Souter and Anthony M. Kennedy, who have ruled for abortion rights. Indeed, while much of Washington was awash in praise for Justice O'Connor on Friday, Carol Tobias, political director of the National Right to Life Committee, said in an interview that "Justice O'Connor has not been good for unborn children, so we do see any change as being positive."

Abortion rights groups are hopeful that the coming struggle will re-energize their supporters. They note that the last great surge of abortion rights activism occurred in the early 1990's, when it appeared that the court might be moving to overturn abortion's constitutional protections.

Most Americans support legalized abortion, polls show, though many would also like to see more restrictions on it. "This will take the issue back to the fundamentals," said Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster who works for Naral.

This struggle over fundamentals - another battle in the culture wars - poses challenges for both parties. Many Democrats have tried to moderate their party's image in recent months, especially on values-related issues like abortion. Many Republicans, meanwhile, have tried to return to bread-and-butter economic issues, worried about polls showing that large numbers of voters see the party as out of touch with their concerns, after months dominated by fights over judicial filibusters.

But this judicial campaign will not be stopped, all sides agree, and there is a sense of foreboding about it.

"This is enormous," said Senator Feinstein, one of many trying to adjust to retirement by Justice O'Connor rather than Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. "It's different from Rehnquist. It is enormous."

A Look At Senate Judiciary Committee (AP-Y2)

By Darlene Superville, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

Republican Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, the panel's senior Democrat, will play key roles in confirmation of a successor to Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Here are brief thumbnail sketches of the two senators.

___

SPECTER:

As chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Specter will control the upcoming confirmation hearings, a task his staff has been working on for months.

But the five-term senator almost missed getting the assignment.

Shortly after winning re-election last fall, Specter angered conservatives long suspicious of him by warning a newly re-elected President Bush that anti-abortion judges would have a difficult time winning Senate confirmation, given Democratic opposition.

The comment sparked an outcry from social conservatives, who waged a campaign to pressure Republican Senate leaders to deny Specter the judiciary committee chairmanship he'd long coveted.

Conservatives eager to see more like-minded judges elevated to the federal courts worry about Specter's moderate politics and maverick style, but Specter ultimately survived that challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0000723

The 75-year-old senator, known for a quick mind, sharp tongue and blunt manner, has faced a different challenge of late. He announced in February that he has Hodgkin's disease and has been receiving chemotherapy treatments in Philadelphia. It is the latest in a series of health problems Specter has faced over the years, including a brain tumor.

Specter recently said he expected to complete his cancer treatments later this month.

If Specter becomes unavailable for the task, Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record), R-Utah, a former judiciary committee chairman, would step in to do it.

Specter, who has a law degree from Yale, first made a name for himself in the 1960s as a top aide on the Warren Commission investigating the assassination of President Kennedy.

He twice was elected district attorney in Philadelphia. He was elected to the Senate in 1980.

In his second term, Specter attracted national attention and angered women's groups and voters by aggressively questioning law professor Anita Hill during the confirmation hearings for Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas, who remains on the high court.

___

LEAHY:

As the senior Democrat on the judiciary committee, Leahy has led the party through several high-profile confirmation battles, from Thomas for the Supreme Court in 1991 to former Sen. John Ashcroft's nomination to be attorney general in 2001.

He'll play that role again as soon as Bush names his choice for O'Connor's successor.

During the Thomas confirmation hearings, it was Leahy who pressed him to reveal his positions on several issues, including abortion rights. Under that line of questioning, Thomas said he never had discussed Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion — a statement Thomas' critics seized upon as proof of his evasiveness.

Of late, Leahy has been the main thorn in Bush's side during a series of filibusters of the president's nominees for the federal courts, whom the senator has judged as being too conservative for lifetime appointments to the bench.

When Republicans complain about Democratic stalling, Leahy often points out that the GOP did the same thing to dozens of judicial nominees during President Clinton's administration.

Leahy, 65, was elected last fall to his sixth term. He was chairman of the judiciary committee at the time of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

He has a law degree from Georgetown University, and was the state's attorney in Chittenden County, Vt., before his election to the Senate in 1974.

Surprise Retiree Raises The Stakes Of Battle To Come (WP)

By Charles Babington And Mike Allen

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

After preparing for months for a battle to replace Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, conservative and liberal groups were caught by surprise yesterday and immediately began reworking their strategies for a fight that they believe will be even more ferocious and carry higher stakes.

Activists on both sides said the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who has been a crucial swing vote compared with Rehnquist's reliable conservatism, gives conservatives an unexpected chance to shift the court rightward. Liberals, anxious to prevent such a move, said they must pour more money and energy into a campaign to educate Americans about the role O'Connor played and the importance of replacing her with a fellow centrist.

The multimillion-dollar campaigns, which activists say will nearly rival presidential candidacies in their scope and sophistication, kicked off within an hour of O'Connor's announcement. Both sides launched ads designed to build momentum for their causes before President Bush names his nominee, which some senators expect during the week of July 11.

The liberal MoveOn PAC began airing a television ad in five states recalling the president's role in the Terri Schiavo case and asking, "Will George Bush choose an extremist who will threaten our rights?"

The conservative group Progress for America, which spent $45 million on Bush's reelection, sent an e-mail to 8.7 million people about 45 minutes after the news broke, urging them to distribute a Web video mocking anticipated Democratic attacks. The group said it is rethinking its plan to refrain from airing TV ads next week.

Tony Perkins, president of the conservative Family Research Council, said his group plans to spend millions of dollars on the fight and will increase the budget and intensity because of the O'Connor opening. "To replace Justice Rehnquist with a nominee who respects the Constitution would be the status quo," Perkins said. "To replace Justice O'Connor with a nominee who respects the Constitution would change the composition of the court."

Nan Aron, head of the liberal coalition Alliance for Justice, said, "It's hard to overstate the stakes now with Justice O'Connor's resignation." Liberal activists, she said, must embark on a crash education course to tell Americans about potential changes in rulings on abortion, the environment, workers' rights and many other issues. "We need to share with the American people the importance of her seat . . . and secure their engagement in this national debate," Aron said.

DOJ_NMG_0000724

The timing of O'Connor's announcement was awkward for senators, who will vote -- presumably in the early fall -- on whether to confirm Bush's pick to succeed her. Senators had met late into the night Thursday to begin their week-long Fourth of July recess yesterday, and most were gone or about to leave Washington when the word came at 10:30 a.m. At least one, Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), quickly jetted back to hold a Capitol news conference, where he urged the president to convene "a summit" of senior Republican and Democratic senators to consult on a possible nominee.

The White House said Bush will meet with a few top Republican and Democratic leaders, including those on the Senate Judiciary Committee, before announcing his choice. Bush placed a 14-minute call to Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), the committee's ranking Democrat, that forced the senator to interrupt his news conference in Burlington, Vt. But White House aides stopped far short of promising a "consensus" nominee, which Democrats and liberals called for throughout the day.

Several Democrats noted that President Ronald Reagan, a conservative icon, had nominated O'Connor, who was approved by the Senate 99 to 0. "This president should follow the Reagan standard," said Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.).

"President Bush should use this opportunity to bring the country together, not to tear us apart," said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). "It's what President Reagan did when he nominated Justice O'Connor." But some Republicans urged Bush to nominate a strong conservative, even if it means a bruising confirmation fight in the Senate, where the GOP holds 55 of the 100 seats.

"While it may seem expedient to nominate people who can easily be confirmed by the U.S. Senate, history shows that is not the proper course of action," said Rep. Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.). Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) said: "I would hope that President Bush's nominee will swing the court back toward the Constitution and away from an era of self-indulgent judicial activism."

Activists on both sides will closely watch the seven Senate Democrats and seven Republicans who crafted a deal in May that ended Democratic filibusters of several appellate court nominees and thwarted a bid by Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to outlaw such filibusters. The Democrats have promised not to filibuster a Supreme Court nominee except in "extraordinary circumstances." The seven Republicans have promised to block any effort to ban such filibusters as long as the Democrats keep their bargain.

The pact has prompted widespread debate on the meaning of "extraordinary circumstances," with liberals defining it loosely in hopes of giving themselves maximum leeway to combat a staunchly conservative nominee.

Sen. Ben. Nelson (D-Neb.), who helped to shape the agreement, said in a statement: "Once a nominee is put forward, I'm sure the 'Gang of Fourteen' senators will meet and begin discussions about the nominee to ensure that the agreement we reached will remain intact. Any speculation on potential nominees is obviously premature."

Another member of the group, Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.), told reporters in a conference call that the 14 senators knew their pact would be sternly tested. "If President Bush wants to test the agreement by sending a very, very conservative nominee without consulting with senators," he may do so, Pryor said. But he added: "We do not want to see 'extraordinary circumstances.' "

Activists in both camps maintained a frantic pace of conference calls, e-mails and meetings to frame their messages and coordinate their campaigns. Frist's chief of staff, Eric Ueland, met with conservative interest groups in a Senate office building and laid out the Republicans' strategy and proposed timetable, which anticipates committee hearings this month and floor debate in September.

Conservatives, saying they have been cowed at times in the past by the left's tactics and rhetoric, vowed to be immediately aggressive. Sean Rushton, executive director of the conservative Committee for Justice, said that a victory in the battle to succeed O'Connor "would really buck up the movement and thrill and enhance our base."

The Independent Women's Forum, which is conservative but does not take a position on abortion, announced that it will work closely with the pro-Bush coalition to put women on television who will portray the president's choice as mainstream. "We know NOW [the National Organization for Women] will be everywhere," said Barbara Comstock, a consultant and legal strategist for the group. "They have been crying wolf for 20 years, and we're going to counter them."

All the time and money spent on campaigns may have little influence on the outcome, said several senators, because they and their colleagues see a Supreme Court vote as a deeply personal and principled decision. When a reporter asked Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) how public expectations might influence the battle, he replied: "There are so many publics, and so many expectations."

Interest Groups Mobilize For Court Push (AP-Y2)

By JESSE J. HOLLAND, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000725

All News
Yahoo! News Only
News Photos
Audio/Video Advanced
, Fri Jul 1, 7:54 PM ET

WASHINGTON - Conservative and liberal groups sprang into action with the word of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement, telephoning supporters and firing off e-mails to mobilize help for a high-stakes Senate confirmation battle.

O'Connor was a swing vote on many cases, and interest groups are watching keenly to see whether President Bush replaces her with a more conservative justice to push the high court more to the right.

"Justice O'Connor played a pivotal role on the court, and the nation has a tremendous amount at stake with her resignation," said Debra L. Ness, president of the liberal National Partnership for Women & Families.

With O'Connor's announcement Friday representing a test of these organizations' clout in the Internet Age, people on both ends of the political spectrum flooded their backers around the country with e-mail and pager alerts, telling them about the retirement and calling for their help.

People for the American Way, which set up a war room for the Supreme Court battle in downtown Washington, sent out thousands of e-mails to its supporters and was setting up phone banks to make calls around the nation to build up support for Senate Democrats.

"The American people must be part of this great debate over our future," president Ralph Neas said.

Other groups were planning to work the old-fashioned way with protests, rallies and marches on the Supreme Court and the Capitol. "We will not go silently into the night concerning the appointment of Supreme Court justices and plan a major presence outside the court and halls of Congress," said Rev. Patrick J. Mahoney, director of the Christian Defense Coalition.

Other conservative Christian groups also signaled their interest.

Focus on the Family founder James Dobson, whose political action group rallied evangelical Christians in November's elections called the resignation a watershed mark in the nation's history.

"It's a wonderful opportunity," said Carrie Gordon Earll, a policy analyst with Focus, a ministry and worldwide broadcasting and publishing concern in Colorado Springs, Colo. "It could be a return to a justice who takes the Constitution at its written word and not scribble in the margins with what they think should be added."

MoveOn PAC announced a cable television ad campaign — $280,000, a relatively small amount — in Maine, Nebraska, South Carolina, Virginia, New York City and Washington, D.C., trying to discourage Bush from picking a strict conservative.

"Will George Bush pick an extremist who will threaten our rights?" the commercial asks.

Abortion-rights groups like Planned Parenthood already are scheduling rallies in an effort to influence Bush's choice. "With so much at stake, Planned Parenthood will be on the front lines of the Supreme Court battles to ensure women's health is protected," said interim president Karen Pearl.

"Progress for America stands ready to defend whomever President Bush nominates from the left's character assassination campaign," said Brian McCabe, PFA's president. "The president's nominee deserves real consideration, not instant attacks."

Progress for America has said it expects to spend $18 million to get Bush's nominee confirmed to the Supreme Court, and has already started running television and radio ads around the nation.

Contentious Hearings Ahead As O'Connor Resigns (FT)

By Holly Yeager In Washington
Financial Times, July 2, 2005

Most politicians and political activists were quick to praise Justice Sandra Day O'Connor on Friday, but their reaction to her retirement left little doubt about the intensity of the battle to come over who succeeds her.

Arlen Specter, chairman of the Senate judiciary committee, said he had already spoken with Bill Frist, the majority leader, about the timetable for confirmation hearings on her successor and said his committee was “prepared to proceed at any time”.

But he acknowledged that, given Justice O'Connor's frequent status as a centrist and a swing vote in the court, the fight to replace her could be more contentious than that for any replacement for the William Rehnquist, the reliably conservative chief justice.

Senate Democrats renewed a chord they have been striking in recent weeks, as expectations of a Supreme Court retirement grew, calling on Mr Bush to consult them before making his choice. Their case seemed to be more urgent given that the vacancy was not created by Mr Rehnquist, as had been widely expected.

Edward Kennedy, Democratic senator from Massachusetts, said that while different presidents had consulted the Senate in different ways, “People know it when they're being consulted and they know it when they're being told.”

DOJ_NMG_0000726

Mr Kennedy recalled how Ronald Reagan, former president, whom he called “the number one conservative of our time”, had acted when he nominated Justice O'Connor, who was confirmed by a 99-0 vote of the Senate.

Senate leaders are well aware that 56 of the body's 100 members were not in the Senate 11 years ago, when the last Supreme Court vacancy was filled. They have already begun briefings for staff members about what to expect as the process moves forward. Congressional aides point to two changes in the political landscape: the arrival of the internet and the growing influence of outside political groups.

MoveOn, the liberal advocacy group, said its political action committee would spend almost $280,000 on a new television advertisement designed to encourage key senators to reject what they call “an extremist nominee”.

“The president should honour O'Connor and appoint a moderate Supreme Court justice,” said Ben Brandzel of MoveOn PAC.

On the other end of the political spectrum, the Family Research Council, a socially conservative group, said it frequently disagreed with Justice O'Connor's decisions and called on Mr Bush to choose a committed conservative to replace her.

“I am confident that President Bush will name a replacement. . . who has the same judicial philosophy as Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, as he indicated he would in his re-election campaign,” said Tony Perkins, president of the group.

The departure of Justice O'Connor may also increase pressure on Mr Bush to appoint a woman.

Mr Specter called it “very important” that there be “gender balance” on the court, saying that if her successor was not a woman, he hoped a future court vacancy would be filled with a woman.

The judiciary committee, which will handle the confirmation hearings on a successor, is prepared to begin hearings on a nominee within three to six weeks of a formal nomination.

The panel expects three to five days of hearings, including time for public comment and a closed session, with just senators and the nominee, to discuss any sensitive matters that may arise.

But even the conduct of those hearings, the types of questions posed, is expected to be confrontational. Speaking on the Senate floor on Friday, John Cornyn, Republican senator from Texas, said the confirmation process should focus on a nominee's qualifications, and “not on personal political beliefs”.

Battle Begins For O'Connor's Successor (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen And Dan Wascoe

Minneapolis Star Tribune, July 2, 2005

The first U.S. Supreme Court vacancy in 11 years unleashed huge and emotional grass-roots campaigns in Minnesota and across the country Friday that ultimately could decide the future of abortion, affirmative action and an array of other volatile social issues.

After years of preparation, all sides in those debates began rushing to raise and spend millions of dollars and assemble armies of activists to influence the votes of U.S. senators once President Bush submits a nominee to replace retiring justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

"The American people are focused -- the games have begun," said Andrea Lafferty, executive director of the Traditional Values Coalition.

Opening-day activity was fast and fierce.

For Tim Stanley, the battle was officially engaged at 9:15 a.m. Friday.

He was crossing a street in St. Paul when his cell phone rang with news that O'Connor was retiring. Within minutes, Stanley had 500 "rapid responders" ready to organize for the fight over her successor. There were 100,000 doors to start knocking on, senators to call, petitions to gather and immediate plans for a rush-hour "visibility" event for their effort Friday at Interstate Hwy. 94 and Snelling Avenue.

"Roe versus Wade has been kept alive by Sandra Day O'Connor," said Stanley, executive director of NARAL Pro-Choice Minnesota.

"The only way it's not going to disappear is if pro-choice Americans and pro-choice Minnesotans stand up and scream loudly," Stanley said.

Call to prayer

Religious groups, meanwhile, began calling on Christians to pray outside the Supreme Court and Capitol when hearings begin on a replacement for O'Connor, who angered groups opposed to abortion.

"We are already praying and working for a nominee that will not waffle, as she did," said the Rev. Rob Schenck, president of the National Clergy Council.

At the liberal MoveOn PAC, e-mail alerts were sent to 3.5 million members, including more than 77,000 in Minnesota.

DOJ_NMG_0000727

"Some of our basic freedoms are at stake here," said Ben Brandzel, the group's advocacy director. "The balance on the court is basically up in the air."

The NAACP announced plans for rallies throughout the country. It urged its 500,000 members to write letters to the White House and phone their senators.

"We're very concerned right now," said Hilary Shelton, director of the NAACP's Washington bureau. He praised O'Connor's views on affirmative action and the death penalty but worried a more "extremist" justice would not follow suit.

'War room'

People for the American Way, which has led the opposition to Bush's judicial nominees, said it plans to open a "war room" in Washington, D.C., for the nomination battle. The group is conducting oppositional research on prospective court nominees, with more than 60 staff members working in its D.C. office alone.

Progress for America, a leading conservative advocacy group, said it has pledged $18 million to combat any challenges to the nominee Bush selects to fill the court vacancy. The group is presenting a $700,000 advertising campaign to warn the public that a nominee could face "distorted" attacks from the left.

"We urge liberals to give genuine consideration instead of instant attacks to any potential U.S. Supreme Court nominee," president Brian McCabe said.

While abortion-rights advocates called on Bush to appoint a moderate judge and to consult with Democratic senators, the Rev. Louis Sheldon, founder and chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, dismissed the idea. The group is the nation's largest grass-roots church lobby.

Sheldon said the president is not legally required to consult with anyone. Minnesota's leading organization against abortion, Minnesota Citizens Concerned for Life (MCCL), said it will be rallying its members and lobbying hard to win the votes of Minnesota senators in the months ahead. Abortion-rights supporters, who had been preparing for a resignation from Chief Justice William Rehnquist, feared that Bush would move quickly to appoint a judge opposed to abortion who could help overturn the Roe vs. Wade ruling that legalized abortion in 1973.

Robynne Curlee, organizing director for NARAL Pro Choice Minnesota, said losing O'Connor rather than Rehnquist "was really shocking and distressful" and "adds that little bit of extra urgency" to the group's efforts. She positioned a small group of sign-wavers late Friday near I-94 and Snelling Avenue.

"We had the signs ready to whip out" whenever a Supreme Court justice resigned, she said. The signs read, "Protect Roe v. Wade," and "Choose Justice/No Freedom without Choice."

Meanwhile, Candice Johnson was among a dozen canvassers for the group who got to work in south Minneapolis on Friday evening. As they went door-to-door with a fundraising pitch, they offered cell phones to residents and asked them to make immediate calls to their senators. "This is big," Stanley said. "It's going to galvanize our constituency all summer. ... We've got to be on high alert here now for another retirement, as well. Anything is possible."

Corporate America, Organized Labor Have Own Views On Vacancy (KRT)

By Kevin G. H

KRT – Interest Groups, July 2, 2005

The Supreme Court's rulings on abortion and religion capture the headlines, but much of the business before the high court deals with the conduct of business. In the court's term that ended this week, for instance, about 30 percent of the rulings involved business issues.

So corporate America and organized labor are gearing up to influence the debate over President Bush's nominee to fill the high court vacancy.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the nation's largest business organization, has quietly provided information to the White House about the pro-business voting records of judges over the last year. The group began its assessment when Chief Justice William Rehnquist announced last October that he had thyroid cancer.

"I think it's fair to say that once the chief's health issues came up, we probably engaged in that with a bit more intensity than we had in the past," said Stan Anderson, the executive vice president and chief legal officer for the Chamber of Commerce.

The chamber's litmus test: Does a judge support limits on corporate liability?

"What we fundamentally look at is whether they are a liability expander or a liability contractor," Anderson said.

Organized labor seeks the opposite in a nominee.

"The high court decides cases involving workplace rights and protections, such as the right to a safe workplace, to minimum wages and overtime pay, to a workplace free of discrimination and the right to join with others to form a union," said John Sweeney, the president of the AFL-CIO. "So it is more important than ever for the president to nominate a mainstream candidate, whose opinions will have a tremendous impact on the constitutional rights and legal protections of our children and grandchildren."

DOJ_NMG_0000728

The National Association of Manufacturers is creating a special judicial-review committee to pore over nominees' previous rulings. The association has ranked the votes of congressmen, but will wade into Supreme Court politics for the first time.

"The mantra for us has been: We want a judge who interprets the law, who doesn't make it. A judge who says this is what the contract provided for, not what it should have provided," said Pat Cleary, a spokesman. "We've seen far too many statutes get on the book and grow through regulation and judicial interpretation."

Business issues before the court aren't sexy but they're vital to the lives of Americans, said Donald Falk, a Palo Alto, Calif.-based lawyer who argues before the high court for Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw.

"What really affects people's lives - their economic lives - are things like the regulatory scope of the state, the ability of the federal government to intrude into other areas of life and how far states can go within constitutional constraints," Falk said.

Process Won't Be Business As Usual (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

The nation's leading business lobbies are poised for the first time to campaign for the confirmation of a Supreme Court nominee, marking a historic change for the confirmation process, the perception of courts and business activism.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Assn. of Manufacturers say they have put structures in place to review and consider endorsement of President Bush's nominee and, if necessary, to launch a campaign on the candidate's behalf.

"If the nominee is controversial, then we can make a judgment that we want to activate our vast grass-roots network, engage our lobbying power and there could be paid media as well," said Stan Anderson, executive vice president of the Chamber of Commerce.

In the current climate in Washington, he said, the nomination is likely to be controversial, meaning business would be immersed in a nomination battle.

Historically, judicial nomination fights have been the province of social activists and the American Bar Assn., and have not drawn active participation from business. There have been partisan fights over nominees, most famously the Reagan-era rejection of Robert H. Bork by Democratic senators and the organized left.

But never before have interest groups prepared to spend millions of dollars on television and direct-mail campaigns for or against a particular nominee.

The addition of big business to the mix coincides with a shift in the way the judiciary is viewed by the public and leading interest groups. Federal courts once were largely exempt from the hurly-burly of political invective, and judges were considered above the fray for the most part. Now, judges and their decisions are routinely attacked from the right amid cries for "judicial reform" from talk radio, church pulpits and corporate board rooms.

In response, left-leaning organizations have become unusually unified, urging the president to consult with Democrats and offer a "consensus nominee." But their request — a plea for consultation and compromise — contrasts with more combative vows of the past to fight objectionable nominees. Despite a compromise last month that preserved the right to judicial filibusters, liberals had felt steamrolled by the president's judicial nominations to date and had stood by as some nominees once viewed as among the most objectionable were confirmed.

"There is now a completely unified right and a completely unified left," said conservative activist Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform. "Both teams will be at full strength, and the court nominations will be an incredible test of that strength."

Within hours after Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's decision to retire from the bench was announced Friday morning, liberal and conservative groups vowed to spend millions to communicate their views to voters and lawmakers.

The Republican-oriented Progress for America pledged to spend $18 million on the Supreme Court vacancy campaign. A spokeswoman for the organization, Jessica Boulanger, said the group had "operatives in 21 states across the country who are working aggressively at the grass-roots level." Within 45 minutes of O'Connor's resignation, "we had our Web ads sent to 8.7 million Americans," Boulanger said.

Meanwhile, the liberal People for the American Way will "definitely be spending millions of dollars" if necessary to fight an objectionable nominee, vice president Elliot Mincberg said. The National Abortion Rights Action League transformed its website Friday so that visitors could donate time and money to a Supreme Court vacancy campaign.

Business may well be countering liberal messages with positive comments on a White House nominee. Business lobbyists said it was likely that business and social conservatives would find themselves on the same side of a nomination battle but noted they are not always allies. Justices who are heroes to social conservatives, such as Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, also have taken stands opposed by business, as in a 2003 case on punitive damages in which the two dissented from a court majority in favor of limiting awards.

DOJ_NMG_0000729

"The point is that 'conservative' doesn't necessarily mean 'pro-business,' " Anderson said. Despite some decisions that rile business, Norquist is urging executives and owners to recognize that socially conservative judges are likely to be pro-business overall.

"We are trying to make sure that every part of the center-right coalition is correctly focused on why this [judicial confirmation battle] is important," he said. "The same judge who will make Pastor Jones happy will make the Chamber of Commerce happy."

Even though business leaders may take an active part in an upcoming nomination fight, the prospect of a protracted battle is disconcerting to them.

"The concern we have is that a drawn-out fight ties down the Senate for months on end and our agenda doesn't get acted on," the Chamber's Anderson said.

There are other concerns for business, including the sense from shareholders or customers that business should not engage in political fights over polarizing social issues.

But the head of the National Assn. of Manufacturers, former Michigan Gov. John Engler, a Republican, has long argued that business should pay more attention to the courts.

"We can't sit on the sidelines with the third branch of government" making so many decisions affecting business, he has said.

Patrick Cleary, a vice president of the manufacturers' association, calculated that 80% of a federal judge's civil cases "concerns issues that we care about" — liability, contract and employment law.

"All the hard-fought gains business has made in the executive and legislative branches could be lost" by the decision of a single judge, Cleary said.

Engler has said he would like to see the Business Industry Political Action Committee, an organization created decades ago by the manufacturers' association and other groups to mobilize the grass-roots, engaged in federal judicial confirmations.

The head of that organization, Greg Casey, said there had been no formal request to engage the group, which encouraged companies to provide specially prepared information to their employees about political candidates and their stand on issues that affected business. In the last campaign, BIPAC took credit for registering and providing educational material to millions of pro-business voters.

Casey said that BIPAC could quickly gear up to launch an educational campaign on a Bush nominee, provided that member companies agreed to the idea and were willing to fund the effort. He said a national campaign could be launched for less than $1 million.

The Chamber has forwarded to the White House its review of federal judges from each circuit, with ratings of each judge based on rulings that concern business. But Anderson said the review was not intended as a complete manual for picking a future justice because it did not include a review of people who were not currently on the bench, such as Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales.

Since 1998, the Chamber has had a process for reviewing the records of Supreme Court nominees. It endorsed Thomas, Scalia, Ruth Bader Ginsberg and Stephen G. Breyer but did not see the need to campaign for those nominees.

This year, however, the organization is likely to be in campaign mode. At both the Chamber and National Assn. of Manufacturers offices, officials said the decision would be based on a candidate's overall fitness for the job. However, a candidate's past position on issues such as labor law, punitive damages, tort reform and regulation also would be reviewed.

O'Connor Held Balance Of Power (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

The phrase has been used so many times over so many years to describe the Supreme Court that it is nearly a cliché. Yet the simple words capture an equally simple truth: to find out where the court is on almost any given issue, look for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

If you are a lawyer with a case at the court, pitch your arguments to her. If your issue is affirmative action, or religion, or federalism, or redistricting, or abortion, or constitutional due process in any of its many manifestations, you can assume that the fate of that issue is in her hands. Don't bother with doctrinaire assertions and bright-line rules. Be meticulously prepared on the facts, and be ready to show how the law relates to those facts and how, together, they make sense.

And it is because Justice O'Connor has played such a pivotal role on the court for much of her 24-year tenure that her unexpected retirement is such a galvanizing event. Much more than the widely anticipated retirement of the predictably conservative Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, her departure creates an opportunity for President Bush to shape the court.

DOJ_NMG_0000730

The last such defining moment occurred with the retirement in 1987 of Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., whose position on the court then resembled Justice O'Connor's today. President Ronald Reagan nominated a polarizing conservative, Robert H. Bork, whose defeat by a Democratic-controlled Senate after a protracted battle still resonates today.

A list of the issues on which Justice O'Connor has held the balance of power goes far to explain why holiday weekend preparations screeched to a halt in Washington on Friday morning as word spread of her decision to retire.

Just two years ago, she wrote the opinion for the 5-to-4 majority that upheld affirmative action in university admissions. Earlier, in a series of decisions interpreting the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection, she led or joined 5-to-4 majorities that viewed with great suspicion government policies that took account of race in federal contracting, employment and electoral redistricting. Her view was that the government should not be in the business of counting by race.

But in Grutter v. Bollinger, the University of Michigan case decided in 2003, she became persuaded that affirmative action in university admissions was still justified. "Effective participation by members of all racial and ethnic groups in the civic life of our nation is essential if the dream of one nation, indivisible, is to be realized," she wrote.

Until the pair of Ten Commandments decisions this week, which found her in dissent from the ruling that upheld a Ten Commandments monument on the grounds of the Texas Capitol, she had occupied a central position on the role of religion in public life.

Beginning with her earliest years on the court, Justice O'Connor adopted her own test for evaluating whether government policy amounted to an unconstitutional establishment of religion. Instead of a three-part test that the court used, she asked whether the government policy under review conveyed to nonadherents the message that they were "outsiders, not full members of the political community."

This led her to vote to prohibit public prayer at high school graduations and football games, but to insist on equal access for student religious publications and clubs. In 2002, she voted with the 5-to-4 majority that upheld the use of publicly financed tuition vouchers at religious schools. In her opinion this week concurring with the 5-to-4 majority that declared framed copies of the Ten Commandments hanging in Kentucky courthouses to be unconstitutional, she said the Constitution's religion clauses "protect adherents of all religions, as well as those who believe in no religion at all."

On the other most intensely fought social issue of the day, abortion, Justice O'Connor's successor will not be in a position to move the court away from its support of the core right to abortion, now at 6 to 3. But in the court's last major abortion ruling, five years ago, Justice O'Connor provided the crucial fifth vote to strike down Nebraska's ban on what were called "partial birth" abortions.

She has been a loyal ally of her Stanford Law School classmate Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist in the court's continuing reappraisal of the relationship between the states and the federal government, joining the five-member majority in a series of cases that have insisted on greater respect for the sovereignty of the individual states while limiting the role of Congress.

One of the few federalism cases in which she and Justice Rehnquist parted company came last year in Tennessee v. Lane, on whether states were immune from being sued for failing to make their courthouses accessible to people with disabilities. Justice O'Connor provided a fifth vote against immunity, while Chief Justice Rehnquist dissented. The plaintiff was a man who used a wheelchair and who had been forced to crawl up the stairs to reach the courtroom in a Tennessee county courthouse.

To the extent that Justice O'Connor had an overall judicial philosophy, she might have expressed it most directly in an opinion dissenting from a 1995 decision that authorized public school districts to subject student athletes to drug testing without any suspicion of individual wrongdoing. The policy was justified to deal with rampant student drug use, the district had argued in Vernonia School District v. Acton.

In her dissenting opinion, Justice O'Connor warned that judges should be wary of overreacting to such arguments.

"Some crises are quite real" but some are not, she said. "The only way for judges to mediate these conflicting impulses is to do what they should do anyway: stay close to the record in each case that appears before them, and make their judgments based on that alone."

Sandra O'Connor's pragmatic approach to life and the law was probably born in the stark and isolated desert of the Southwest that she described in vivid detail in "Lazy B," a childhood memoir she published three years ago. The Day family ranch, 250 arid square miles straddling the Arizona-New Mexico border, "was no country for sissies," she wrote.

The house, 35 miles from the nearest town, had neither electricity nor running water. Her companions were horses and ranch hands, and her goal as the first-born child was to be useful around the place and to please her hard-driving, perfectionist father. When things broke, they needed to be fixed. There was little room for discussion and none for theorizing.

Fulfilling her father's own ambition that had been thwarted by the lack of money, she attended Stanford University and Stanford Law School, where she graduated third in the class of 1952 at the age of 22. The top honors in the class went to a

DOJ_NMG_0000731

World War II veteran more than five years her senior, William H. Rehnquist. He went on to a Supreme Court clerkship. As a woman, she could not get a job with the law firms to which she applied, receiving offers of secretarial jobs instead.

She turned to the public sector as a lawyer for state and local governments, while raising three sons with her husband, John, who had been a fellow law-review editor at Stanford. The couple settled in Phoenix, where civic activities led her to a career in Republican politics. The Arizona governor appointed her to a vacant seat in the State Senate in 1969, and she later twice won election. She became majority leader, the first woman in the country to hold such a high leadership position in a state legislature.

In 1974, she was elected to a seat on the state trial court. Five years later, Gov. Bruce Babbitt, a Democrat, appointed her to the state appeals court, where she was serving when President Reagan, who had promised to appoint a woman to the Supreme Court, chose her in July 1981 for the first vacancy to occur during his term. She was confirmed unanimously, forever to be known as the first woman on the Supreme Court, or F.W.O.T.S.C., as she has put it dryly.

Although hardly a feminist in terms of political activism, Justice O'Connor demonstrated from her earliest years on the court a sensitivity to issues of sex discrimination that she maintained throughout her tenure.

One of her first majority opinions, in 1982, came in Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan. The 5-to-4 decision declared unconstitutional the exclusion of a male applicant from a state-supported, women-only nursing school. Her opinion warned against using "archaic and stereotypic notions" about proper roles for men and women.

On several occasions, including this year, she joined the four more liberal justices to uphold a broad interpretation of a federal statute addressing sex discrimination. In 1999, for example, she wrote the opinion for a 5-to-4 majority in Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education, holding public school districts accountable for one student's sexual harassment of another student.

And during the term that just ended, she wrote the majority opinion in another 5-to-4 decision, Jackson v. Birmingham Board of Education, that expanded the scope of the sex discrimination law known as Title IX to provide protection against retaliation for whistle-blowers who complain about discriminatory practices in schools and colleges.

One exception came in 2000, when she joined Chief Justice Rehnquist's 5-to-4 majority opinion in United States v. Morrison, invalidating a provision of the Violence Against Women Act on the ground that Congress had lacked the constitutional authority to enact the law.

The most famous, or notorious, 5-to-4 opinion in 2000 was, of course, Bush v. Gore, which ended the Florida recount and effectively called the presidential election for George W. Bush. Justice O'Connor joined the unsigned opinion that declared the conditions of the recount to violate the constitutional guarantee of equal protection.

While Mr. Bush was undoubtedly pleased by that decision, he was just as undoubtedly displeased last year when the court refused to accept his administration's position that the federal courts lacked jurisdiction to hear challenges to the open-ended detention of those being held both at the United States naval base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, and in military custody in the United States.

"A state of war is not a blank check for the president," Justice O'Connor wrote for the court in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld. She said "history and common sense teach us that an unchecked system of detention carries the potential to become a means for oppression and abuse of others." In a second case decided at the same day last June, Rasul v. Bush, she joined the majority opinion extending federal jurisdiction to the Guantánamo detainees.

During the term that ended on Monday, Justice O'Connor was on the losing side in two major cases: Kelo v. City of New London, which upheld governmental power to use eminent domain for economic development, and Gonzales v. Raich, upholding the federal government's power to enforce federal drug laws in states that permit marijuana to be used for medical purposes.

Justice O'Connor learned she had breast cancer early in the court's 1988 term and underwent a mastectomy and follow-up treatment. She never missed a day that the court was on the bench, and only years later did she reveal publicly, in a talk to other cancer survivors, how stressful the period had been. She also bounced back quickly from an emergency appendectomy.

In recent years, she has maintained an active schedule of public speaking and foreign travel, in addition to writing two books. It was her husband's deteriorating health, not her own brushes with illness, that finally wore down a woman who still proudly refers to herself as a cowgirl.

"She has taught us all," her friend and colleague Stephen G. Breyer said Friday in a statement released by the court.

In The Center, Hers Was The Vote That Counted (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement leaves a hole at the center of the Supreme Court and, in a sense, at the center of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0000732

During her 24-year tenure, the Republican and Democratic parties came increasingly under the influence of their ideological cores, and Washington grew deeply polarized between left and right.

But O'Connor remained something of a throwback: a moderate Republican, known as a broker of compromises during her long-ago tenure as Arizona's Senate majority leader, who used her pivotal position on the court to keep the law under which all Americans must live from veering toward any extreme.

On a nine-member court that often mirrored the liberal-conservative split of the larger society, O'Connor repeatedly cast the fifth and deciding vote, not to establish sweeping new constitutional principles but to make law that she thought would make sense to the American people.

The first woman on the court thus became the most powerful woman in the United States -- a fact that was acknowledged even by her conservative rival on the court, Antonin Scalia, who said in a statement yesterday that "she has become a star. The statistics show that during her tenure she shaped the jurisprudence of this Court more than any other Associate Justice."

O'Connor was guided not only by her political fingertips. She had a deep-rooted pragmatic sensibility that owed much to her upbringing on a desolate western cattle ranch -- and rather less to the fixed doctrinal principles contained in law books.

"Justice Scalia said the rule of law is the law of rules," said Eugene Volokh, a former law clerk to O'Connor who teaches constitutional law at UCLA. "Justice O'Connor's view was that the work of the law is making the law work."

Or, as O'Connor put it in dissenting from a ruling by liberal and conservative colleagues who teamed up to strike down state sentencing guidelines in a 2004 decision, "If indeed the choice is between adopting a balanced case-by-case approach . . . and adopting a rigid rule that destroys everything in its path, I will choose the former."

But when they were not angling for her vote, lawyers of both the left and the right would sometimes complain that her approach introduced too much instability into the law and made too many important issues into guessing games about her intentions.

"We have a living Constitution. Her name is Sandra Day O'Connor, and thank God she's retiring," Kevin J. "Seamus" Hasson, founder and president of the conservative Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, said yesterday.

"Her support for separation of church and state was not consistent," said Barry W. Lynn, executive director of the liberal Americans United for Separation of Church and State.

In his 1980 GOP presidential campaign, Ronald Reagan, concerned about the pro-Democrat "gender gap" that had opened up among voters, promised that he would name a woman "to one of the first Supreme Court vacancies in my administration."

When Justice Potter Stewart informed the White House in 1981 that he planned to retire, President Reagan asked aides for a list of possible replacements that included women. At the time, there were few women with significant experience on the bench, and not many of them were Republicans. O'Connor, then a little-known 51-year-old judge on Arizona's appeals court, filled the bill.

Though she had been active in the ill-fated 1964 presidential bid of Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) and she had been friends since law school with William H. Rehnquist, the conservative who would later sit next to her on the court, O'Connor was widely known in her home state as a middle-of-the-roader.

In fact, she was elevated to the court of appeals in 1979 by a Democratic governor, Bruce Babbitt.

In the Arizona Senate, she had voted against busing for school integration and opposed gun control. After the Supreme Court overturned state death penalty laws in 1972, O'Connor was a leader of an effort to write a new one for Arizona.

But she had also supported bilingual education, opposed state aid to private religious schools and was a strong advocate of the proposed federal Equal Rights Amendment.

On abortion, she had voted against a ban on state funds for abortions for poor women, and opposed a bill prohibiting abortions at the University of Arizona hospital. At the same time, she voted to give hospital personnel the right to refuse to participate in abortions.

Conservative warnings that this record made her an unreliable vote against Roe v. Wade, the 1973 decision that recognized a constitutional right to abortion, were outweighed by the historical impact of putting a woman on the court, and she won unanimous confirmation in the Senate.

O'Connor was surprised by her selection and, initially, daunted by the challenges of a court where she had never so much as witnessed an argument before her first day at work in October 1981.

"One of my most poignant memories in life was the day her commission was read to her in the presence of the president and the members of Congress and she put on her robe and ascended to the bench," said Theodore B. Olson, who argued many cases before O'Connor as a private lawyer and as solicitor general of the United States under President Bush.

But, characteristically for a woman who had overcome law firms' refusal to hire her after graduation from Stanford Law School in the early 1950s, she plunged into the work and quickly made a mark.

DOJ_NMG_0000733

She became a close friend of Justice Lewis F. Powell, then a moderate conservative on the court who, three years before O'Connor's arrival, had tried to define a centrist answer to the bitterly disputed Bakke affirmative-action case, suggesting that racial quotas in university admissions were unconstitutional but that using race as a "plus factor" to help qualified minorities was not.

The hallmark of O'Connor's style was what University of Chicago law professor Cass R. Sunstein called "judicial minimalism." She would decide cases incrementally, making no more law than was necessary to deal with the particular set of facts before her.

Her opinions were an exercise in keeping her options open; they would often contain qualifications or exceptions that reappeared in later cases as her rationale for reaching a seemingly different result on a similar issue.

And, when she was the fifth member of a majority, she sometimes issued a concurring opinion that articulated a narrower basis for the decision -- and became the de facto controlling precedent.

In 1985, O'Connor articulated a case-by-case "endorsement" test for deciding whether a given governmental action in support of religion violated the Constitution. According to O'Connor, the First Amendment's ban on the establishment of an official religion meant that governments could not advance or endorse religion.

The phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance, and a Cleveland program that gave parents government money to send their children to parochial schools, passed constitutional muster with her, while the posting of the Ten Commandments in a county courthouse or on the Texas Capitol grounds could not.

She generally voted for conservative positions on crime, economic regulation and, especially, states' rights. Among the federal laws O'Connor voted to strike down as violating state sovereignty were one that barred the carrying of a firearm within 1,000 yards of a school, a provision of the Americans With Disabilities Act permitting disabled state employees to sue their bosses for discrimination, and a provision of the Violence Against Women Act that let rape victims sue their attackers in federal court.

In her last term on the court, O'Connor dissented in a 6 to 3 ruling that gave the federal government the power to override California's state law permitting the use of homegrown "medical marijuana."

Noting that she would have voted against legal marijuana if she were a Californian herself, O'Connor faulted the court for "stifl[ing] an express choice by some States, concerned for the lives and liberties of their people, to regulate medical marijuana differently."

Yet O'Connor's backing for states' rights was not unlimited. She would not let it become a means to roll back what she saw as the core social advancements of the 1960s and '70s.

Two years ago, she voted with the majority to uphold the right to sue state employers for violating the federal Family and Medical Leave Act, in a case widely seen as a test of gender equality in the workplace.

In 2004, she joined the liberals in a 5 to 4 ruling that said states could be sued under the disabilities act if they fail to make their courthouses accessible to the handicapped.

And on abortion and race, O'Connor, after expressing many Americans' second thoughts about the social changes of the '60s and '70s, ultimately decided not to undo them.

In 1983, the court, citing Roe v. Wade , struck down an Akron, Ohio, ordinance that put regulations on abortion, including a required 24-hour waiting period. O'Connor dissented, offering some critical words about Roe .

She heartened conservatives again in 1986 and 1989, when she voted to uphold abortion regulations in Pennsylvania and Missouri.

But in 1992, when appointees of Reagan and President George H.W. Bush seemed to have a majority to overturn Roe , O'Connor hesitated.

She invoked an alternative constitutional balancing test that she had hinted at in early opinions: that the right to abortion could be limited only as long as the state did not impose an "undue burden" on it.

She voted to reaffirm Roe , striking down the Pennsylvania law's requirement that wives notify their husbands before an abortion.

In 2000, O'Connor was also in the majority when the court ruled, 5 to 4, that a Nebraska law banning late-term abortion violated O'Connor's "undue burden" test. Yet she issued a separate concurring opinion suggesting she would not rule out all efforts to legislate against a procedure that opponents call "partial-birth" abortion.

Justice Harry A. Blackmun, the author of Roe , concluded it was no surprise the Supreme Court's first woman had voted to affirm Roe .

"She is a believer in states' rights in the sense that she feels an issue of this general nature should be left to the state legislatures and not be federally constitutionalized," Blackmun said in an oral history of his years on the court that was published early last year. But, he added, "she is a woman and may fear somewhat any accusation of being a traitor to her sex. Some women's organizations would so conclude."

DOJ_NMG_0000734

Whatever her private motivations, O'Connor's ambivalent embrace of Roe was consistent with the American public's. According to Gallup polls going back to 1992, a significant majority opposes "completely" overturning Roe ; according to a 2004 Washington Post-ABC News poll, only 17 percent of Americans think abortion should always be illegal, while only 21 percent think it should always be legal.

During the 1980s and '90s, O'Connor helped the court establish the rule that affirmative action should be subjected to the same "strict scrutiny" as discrimination against minorities. As O'Connor saw it, only "compelling" governmental goals could justify affirmative action, and even then programs would have to be "narrowly tailored."

Yet for all her reservations about affirmative action, O'Connor never ruled it out. In her 1995 opinion enshrining "strict scrutiny" of affirmative action, for example, she insisted that the "unhappy persistence of both the practice and the lingering effects of racial discrimination against minority groups in this country is an unfortunate reality, and government is not disqualified from acting in response to it."

In 2003, when white students challenged their denial of admission in favor of black students with lower test scores at the University of Michigan, O'Connor backed the university.

Diversity in higher education could, indeed, qualify as a compelling state interest, she wrote for a five-member majority consisting of her and the court's four most liberal members. As long as a school did not mechanically assign minorities' applications extra points, but gave all students individualized consideration, its approach would be constitutional under Powell's opinion in Bakke .

Her opinion took sympathetic note of the views of large corporations, university deans and retired military officers whose friend-of-the-court briefs called affirmative action necessary to educate a racially integrated elite -- and, by implication, to preserve the stability and legitimacy of the American meritocracy. Her only nod to critics of the programs was her expressed wish that they might no longer be necessary in 25 years.

Once again, O'Connor's position -- diversity, yes, quotas, no -- was roughly in line with public opinion.

In a Fox News poll published shortly after the affirmative-action decision, O'Connor ranked as the Supreme Court justice Americans "most admire or agree with."

Analysis: Last Day Reflected O'Connor's Legacy (PPG)

By Michael Mcgough

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 2, 2005

On Monday, likely her last day on the Supreme Court bench, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor served as the fifth vote for the court's holding that two counties in Kentucky violated the First Amendment by posting the Ten Commandments in their courthouses.

But in addition to signing the majority opinion of Justice David H. Souter, one of the court's staunchest advocates of a strict separation of church and state, O'Connor wrote a separate concurring opinion, in which she emphasized that the court was ruling as it did "for the same reason that guided the Framers -- respect for religion's special role in society. ...

"Voluntary religious belief and expression may be as threatened when government takes the mantle of religion upon itself as when government directly interferes with private religious practices."

O'Connor's role in the Ten Commandments case -- providing that fifth vote for the majority while writing separately in softer tones -- exemplified the influential role she has played in her 24 years on the court.

It is a cliche that O'Connor is a swing vote -- sometimes voting with liberals, sometimes with conservatives -- but she has been more than a whimsical wild card. Her case-by-case approach and penchant for separate concurrences have prevented the court from embracing extreme positions.

To the consternation of more ideological colleagues, especially Justice Antonin Scalia, O'Connor has become the arbiter of entire areas of constitutional law, including the role of religion in public life.

She is the author of what is called the "endorsement test" for determining whether government involvement with religion violates the First Amendment. Under that test, the court asks whether a "reasonable observer" would consider, say, a Nativity scene in a courthouse to be an endorsement of religion.

"O'Connor has been remarkably consistent and consistently influential," said Nancy Maveety, a Tulane University associate professor political science and author of "Sandra Day O'Connor: Strategist on the Court."

Maveety, who has analyzed O'Connor's voting patterns over many years, described the justice as "contextually conservative," which means she is "comparatively restrained when it comes to revising or overturning precedent and is likely to reason by exception when faced with a case not adequately covered by an existing rule."

DOJ_NMG_0000735

Maveety described O'Connor's approach to judging as "judicial accommodationism," and said O'Connor had made it a practice to join "minimum-winning collations" on the court, enhancing her influence further by writing either "regular" concurring opinions (in cases in which she also signed the majority opinion) or "special" concurrences, in which she concurred only in the result.

The result of O'Connor's "accommodationism," Maveety said, is that the court as a whole often will embrace a "common-sense" position in tune with public opinion.

That's the problem, O'Connor's critics have charged. They accuse her of being unprincipled and acting like the legislator she once was.

In reacting yesterday to O'Connor's retirement, Derek Gaubatz, director of litigation of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, praised the justice for her generous view of the First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause but complained about her approach to another part of the First Amendment, which bars the "establishment" of religion by government.

"She was stubbornly resistant to any sort of categorization." Gaubatz said.

"Her 'reasonable observer' test for government display of religious symbols led the court away from any principled interpretation of what counts as an 'establishment of religion' to a subjective test that varied with the whims (including frequently O'Connor herself) of the individual justices."

But the case-by-case approach that O'Connor's critics see as a vice is regarded as a virtue by some legal observers.

"In any given era, you're likely to find someone occupying that middle position on the court," said Edward B. Foley, an Ohio State University law professor and former state solicitor of Ohio. "Like Justice Lewis Powell [in the 1970s and '80s], Justice O'Connor was a balancer, and it's not surprising that a balancer ends up as a swing vote."

Ken Gormley, a Duquesne University law professor who is close to O'Connor, offered a similar description: "I think she really made her name in recent years as a pragmatist; she found practical solutions to impossible problems."

Upon O'Connor's departure, the court's position on several issues could be up for grabs now, depending on the philosophy of the women or man who President Bush chooses to succeed her. This would not have been so true had it been Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist who announced his retirement, a prospect that was widely expected because of his poor health.

"The stakes are much higher after an O'Connor retirement than after a Rehnquist retirement," said Michael Comiskey, associate professor of political science at Penn State's Fayette campus and author of "Seeking Justices: The Judging of Supreme Court Nominees."

"If [Bush] chooses someone in the mold of Justice [Antonin] Scalia or [Clarence] Thomas, I think we would have another situation like the one involving Robert Bork," Comiskey said, referring to former President Ronald Reagan's controversial and eventually unsuccessful nominee for justice in 1987. "On the other hand, if he chose someone who was perceived as only a moderate conservative, confirmation would be easier."

Within hours of O'Connor's announcement yesterday, e-mails were flying in Washington filled with interest groups' litanies of the decisions in which she had cast the crucial vote favoring a liberal position -- holdings that might be undone by a more ideologically conservative successor.

* Religion. In addition to her votes this week to strike down Ten Commandments monuments on public property in Kentucky and in Texas (she was in the minority on the latter case), O'Connor was part of a 5-4 majority that ruled in the 1992 case of Lee v. Weisman that a prayer at a public-school graduation was unconstitutional.

* Abortion. O'Connor joined the majority in the 1992 Planned Parenthood of Southeast Pennsylvania v. Casey decision that reaffirmed the essential holding of Roe v. Wade by a 5-4 vote. In 2000, she was part of a 5-4 majority in Stenberg v. Carhart striking down a Nebraska law banning so-called "partial-birth" abortions. A similar federal law is moving up the appeals process.

* Affirmative action. O'Connor wrote the majority opinion in the 2003 case of Grutter v. Bollinger upholding an affirmative-action program at the University of Michigan Law School and reaffirming a principle first enunciated in the 1978 Bakke case that state universities may consider race as one factor in admissions.

* Civil rights. Although critical in earlier cases of "racial gerrymandering" designed to maximize minorities' voting power, O'Connor was part of a 5-4 majority in the 2001 case of Hunt v. Cromartie allowing legislators to take race into account in redistricting. Last year, in Tennessee v. Lane, O'Connor joined with four liberal justices to uphold the right of disabled people to sue state governments under the Americans with Disabilities Act.

Although much attention yesterday was focused on swing votes in which O'Connor supported a liberal result, she often swung in the conservative direction.

Along with Rehnquist, Scalia, Thomas and Anthony Kennedy, O'Connor was a member of the "Federalism Five," a bare majority that struck down part or all of two federal laws -- the Gun-Free School Zones Act and the Violence Against Women Act -- on the grounds that they infringed on states' rights.

DOJ_NMG_0000736

University of Pittsburgh law professor Arthur Hellman noted yesterday that O'Connor remained an ardent supporter of states' rights through her final term. For example, she vigorously dissented from last month's 6-3 decision in Gonzales v. Raich upholding the right of the federal government to prosecute users of medical marijuana in California, despite the fact that the state allows use of the drug by cancer patients.

Hellman cited that dissent and O'Connor's equally astringent dissent in last week's 5-4 Kelo v. City of New London decision upholding use of eminent domain as evidence that this term she has been "going back to her roots," voting conservatively.

O'Connor Leaves Bench In Limbo (DMN)

By Allen Pusey

The Dallas Morning News, July 2, 2005

Sandra Day O'Connor, who provided the critical vote in some of the most controversial cases of the last quarter-century, primed the U.S. Supreme Court for a major shift in ideology with her retirement from the bench Friday.

AP Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor promised to stay until a successor is confirmed, a process that is sure to be contentious.

In a letter to the White House, the 75-year-old justice gave no reason for her departure, though it is widely known that she has been concerned about her husband's failing health.

Justice O'Connor was appointed in 1981 as the first woman on the court, and her instinctively practical jurisprudence was decisive in cases involving abortion, affirmative action, sexual privacy and the death penalty. Though she promised to stay until a successor is confirmed, her departure sets up a high-stakes battle for control of the nation's highest court.

In her letter to President Bush, she said: "It has been a great privilege indeed to have served as a member of the court for 24 terms. I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure."

Mr. Bush praised Justice O'Connor as "a discerning and conscientious judge and a public servant of complete integrity." He said he would recommend a replacement who would "faithfully interpret the Constitution and laws of our country."

A quick choice for her successor is anticipated, perhaps within a week. But the White House, which had been poised to name a successor for ailing Chief Justice William Rehnquist, now faces the politically sensitive task of replacing not only the court's first woman but its most visible moderate.

Mark Tushnet, a constitutional scholar at Georgetown University said her departure would likely have a more dramatic effect than the widely anticipated resignation of the chief justice.

"Her retirement and replacement provides the opportunity for an appointment that might dramatically change the court's direction – or accelerate its transformation into a much more conservative court," Mr. Tushnet said.

1st vacancy in 11 years

Justice O'Connor's retirement creates the court's first vacancy in 11 years. The current group of justices has been together longer than any other since 1823.

Appointed by President Ronald Reagan, the Texas-born justice was routinely conservative in many of her votes. But her pragmatic approach made her an unexpected light for reproductive rights advocates, civil rights groups and death penalty opponents.

Though her crucial vote in Bush vs. Gore, the case that helped decide the 2000 election, ushered in the current administration, her perceived inconsistency frustrated conservatives who saw contradiction and politics in many of her high-profile decisions.

·In 1992, her vote preserved the right to abortion but seriously narrowed that right as first granted in Roe vs. Wade.

·Though she supported the death penalty, she persistently voted to prohibit its use against the mentally retarded and juveniles.

·Two years ago, she voted to preserve the use of affirmative action but limited its use in college admissions.

·Though she helped ban prayer at high school events, she didn't support a recent decision to block displays of the Ten Commandments in two Kentucky courthouses.

So pivotal was her swing vote that experienced Supreme Court litigators often tailored their arguments to her best-known views.

Sen. John Cornyn, who argued two cases before the high court as Texas attorney general, said he tailored his arguments to Justice O'Connor and fellow moderate Anthony Kennedy. "You virtually ignore the rest of the justices in terms of your strategy, because if you can get a Kennedy and an O'Connor, then you're going to win," he said.

Historian David J. Garrow said that kind of power speaks more to the balance of the court than her philosophy as a jurist. He said her narrowly tailored opinions often determined the outcome of a case but sometimes left issues unsettled.

FILE/AP Chief Justice Warren Burger (left) swore in Sandra Day O'Connor, with her husband, John O'Connor III.

DOJ_NMG_0000737

"Her importance derived from the fact that she was in the middle," Mr. Garrow said.

Justice O'Connor usually dismissed such analyses as irrelevant.

She responded recently to an author who had concluded that her opinions varied from her colleagues in ways that were "peculiarly feminine."

"I would guess that my colleagues on the Court would be as surprised as I am by these conclusions," she wrote.

Early days on ranch

Justice O'Connor has long credited her background as the key to her jurisprudence. Her early life on a ranch, the professional barriers she faced as a woman, and her experience as the only justice to have held an elective office are critical to understanding her view of the law, she has suggested.

FILE/AP Sandra Day O'Connor testified on her nomination to the high court in 1981. Her nomination came less than two years after she joined the Arizona Court of Appeals.

Born as the first of three children in El Paso on March 26, 1930, the young Sandra Day spent her earliest winters attending Radford, a small school for girls in El Paso, and her earliest summers at her grandfather's ranch in Arizona, where she learned to mend fences, ride horses and shoot a rifle.

The Lazy B in southeast Arizona was a working cattle ranch of nearly 200,000 acres founded decades before Arizona became a state. Justice O'Connor often recounted that the diligent work required to maintain it was a powerful influence on the values she carried through her life.

She graduated from high school at 16 to enter Stanford University, where she graduated magna cum laude in 1950 with a degree in mathematics. In 1952, she graduated third in her class of 102 students at Stanford Law School. Graduating first in that class was William Rehnquist.

Shortly after graduation, she married law review colleague John O'Connor III. Mr. O'Connor, who graduated law school a year behind his wife, stayed at Stanford while Mrs. O'Connor left for Phoenix. She was unable to find work as a lawyer in Phoenix because private firms would not hire women. The only work she was offered was that of a legal secretary, which she declined in favor of a job with the county attorney's office in San Mateo, Calif.

FILE/AP President Ronald Reagan made Sandra Day O'Connor the first woman on the Supreme Court in 1981.

While her husband was in the service, Mrs. O'Connor worked as a civilian lawyer overseas for the Army, then returned to Phoenix to open her own firm. She stopped working when her second child was born to concentrate on motherhood. Through volunteer and charity work, however, she built an impressive public service résumé. She became an active Republican and, in 1969, was appointed by a Democrat to an open seat in the Arizona state Senate.

In 1974, Mrs. O'Connor was elected to the Maricopa County Superior Court and five years later to the Arizona Court of Appeals. Less than two years later, President Reagan – who had vowed to appoint a woman to the Supreme Court – appointed her to the vacancy left by the retirement of Justice Potter Stewart.

Her nomination was confirmed in the U.S. Senate, 99-0.

Dubbed the "Arizona Twin" of Justice Rehnquist during her first term on the court, she voted as he did in all but four of 31 decisions decided by a single vote. But as years passed, she became better identified with Justice Lewis Powell, whose narrow opinions she began to imitate. As a former state legislator, the approach seemed to fit her philosophy and her temperament, and she has been unapologetic for considering the practical outcome of court decisions.

Justice O'Connor had been rumored to retire since she had breast cancer since 1988. Recent reports that her husband has Alzheimer's disease gave those rumors more credence, and Friday's announcement did not come as a total surprise.

She gave no indication of her plans after she leaves the court. In recent months, however, she has been re-establishing a presence in Arizona, and her eldest son, Scott O'Connor, said she would likely return there. He said his mother would probably write, teach and perhaps hear cases by special appointment to federal appeals courts.

Justice O'Connor Had Pivotal Role In Big Rulings (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor provided the critical swing vote on a series of important 5-4 decisions during her tenure, essentially setting the current legal standard on issues from abortion to religion to affirmative action.

"Justice O'Connor has been the pivot on most of the major decisions that were decided 5-4," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican. "I argued two cases to the United States Supreme Court when I was [Texas] attorney general and, as every lawyer will tell you who argues to the United States Supreme Court, you argue to get Justice O'Connor, and Justice [Anthony M.] Kennedy, in close decisions. You virtually ignore the rest of the justices in terms of your strategy, because if you can get a Kennedy and an O'Connor, you win."

DOJ_NMG_0000738

With four solidly liberal justices, three solidly conservative justices and one conservative leaner in Justice Kennedy, Justice O'Connor's vote was usually the tie-breaker between the two positions.

She wrote the majority opinion in a 5-4 case upholding the University of Michigan law school's affirmative action policy in 2003. Earlier this week, she sided with the liberal justices in a 5-4 case prohibiting a display of the Ten Commandments in a Kentucky courtroom.

Kevin J. Hasson, founder of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, a conservative group that defends free expression of religion, said he is happy to see Justice O'Connor go.

"We have a living Constitution, her name is Sandra Day O'Connor and thank God she's retiring," Mr. Hasson said, adding that whoever replaces her will bring "clarity" to constitutional law on religion. "Right, left or center, the law will be clearer, and that in itself is a good thing."

Justice O'Connor was also part of the 5-4 majority that upheld the severe restrictions on donations to federal political campaigns that were part of the McCain-Feingold Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002. And she was part of the 5-4 majority that overturned a ban on a late-term abortion procedure commonly called partial-birth abortion.

But she sided with the court's conservatives in limiting federal power on cases such as overturning the 1994 Violence Against Women Act. That ruling prevents rape victims from suing their attackers in federal court.

And on the death penalty, she usually sided with the conservatives in upholding it, though she acknowledged in a 2001 speech that "serious questions are being raised" about its implementation.

With Republicans in control of the confirmation process, her retirement provides them with a chance to solidify the rulings in which she sided with the other conservatives on the court. Democrats find themselves playing defense in trying to preserve the balance when she sided with the court's liberals.

Nelson Lund, a former clerk to Justice O'Connor and now a law professor at George Mason University, said she didn't set out to be the key vote.

"She has been a pragmatic judge, and also a cautious judge, disinclined to make sweeping theoretical pronouncements," he said. "I think just by chance it's turned out there were enough people on either end of the ideological spectrum of the court that are willing, that that makes her the swing vote."

Justice O'Connor was a leader on the court on the issue of federalism, siding with the conservatives on the court in limiting the extent of federal power. Still, true to form, Mr. Lund said, she often wrote concurring opinions that "could be read as suggesting a little more caution" than the rest of the majority.

O'Connor's Independent Voice Made Her A Pivotal Figure (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

KRT – Independent Swing Vote, July 2, 2005

In her best-selling memoir about growing up on a dusty cattle ranch in Arizona, Sandra Day O'Connor said that her childhood had endowed her with three pivotal values: openness, independence and generosity.

ADVERTISEMENT

If you had to sum up O'Connor's 24-year tenure on the Supreme Court - first woman justice, key decider of every major social controversy for a quarter century, confounder of both the far right wing and the nation's most liberal elements, the public face of the high court to millions at home and abroad - you wouldn't need to look further than those three words.

O'Connor's hard-scrabble upbringing on the Lazy B ranch is the perfect prism through which to view her work as one of the nation's most influential jurists. Practical and deliberative. Tough but moderate - and willing to change her mind. Hard working and independent, but mindful of the barriers that hinder some Americans' progress.

O'Connor embodies the kind of conservatism championed by Ronald Reagan, the president who nominated her to the court, and Barry Goldwater, the senator from her native Arizona who pioneered a revolution in libertarian thought. But she has shied from the more shrill conservatism of the modern Republican Party, alienating her from some of its current leaders.

"We're very fortunate that she was the first woman to serve on the court because she has been an absolutely independent voice, strong minded and strong willed," said Marci Hamilton, a professor at the Benjamin Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University and a clerk for O'Connor during the 1989-90 term. "She has her own internal moral compass, and she's not sitting around waiting to see what everyone else thinks before she makes up her mind. That's how she wound up in the center of the court. We laugh about it because she is now called liberal. But that's not who she is."

Nor was that what Reagan intended O'Connor to be when he nominated her in 1981.

Then, the court was dominated by Democratic appointees, and it tilted toward the expansive federal power and progressive legislation that had flowered in the past three decades.

DOJ_NMG_0000739

O'Connor was Reagan's first appointment, fulfilling a promise he'd made during his campaign to put the first woman on the court, and she was expected to provide an important conservative counterbalance.

She did that most notably by joining William Rehnquist and other conservatives in championing a more delicate balance between the reach of the federal government and the rights of the states.

By the early 1990s, with a Republican majority on the court, O'Connor became a crucial voice in landmark decisions that formed the contours of the Rehnquist court's legacy. Federalism, or the idea that many questions should be left to states, is now a fundamental part of the court's legacy. In a 1992 opinion, in a case about Congress requiring states to provide for disposal of radioactive waste, O'Connor made the issue clear.

"The constitutional question is as old as the Constitution: It consists of discerning the proper division of authority between the Federal Government and the States," O'Connor wrote for the majority in New York v. United States.

In another case about whether a Virginia death-row inmate could raise claims - including one of innocence - in federal court after having them dismissed in state court, O'Connor was just as blunt.

"This case is about federalism," she wrote in the opening line of her opinion. "This Court will not review a question of federal law decided by a state court if the decision of that court rests on a state law ground that is independent of the federal question and adequate to support the judgment."

O'Connor also helped the court pare back the reach of some federal gun laws and congressional legislation aimed at helping battered women. She has been instrumental in Rehnquist-led efforts to limit federal review of search-and-seizure requirements during traffic stops and the ways in which death-row defendants can challenge their sentences.

But as tough as O'Connor can be on federalism questions, she also has shown a penchant for compassion and sympathy on many social issues - and a tendency to soften some positions over time. Her social pragmatism has put her at odds with other justices and conservative politicians who favor a more ideological approach.

Initially a critic of the landmark abortion case Roe v. Wade, for example, O'Connor eventually turned away attempts to overturn it. Instead, she has pushed for - and won - court rulings that call for permissible restrictions that are judged by whether they impose "undue burdens" on women seeking abortions.

In the 1989 case, Webster v. Reproductive Health Systems, O'Connor voted to uphold a Missouri provision that prevented public employees from performing abortions, but she insisted that Roe was law and shouldn't be revisited.

By 1992, her view was carrying the day, in Planned Parenthood v. Casey. The majority opinion in that case made it clear that the right to abortion wouldn't be threatened soon by the court.

"Liberty finds no refuge in a jurisprudence of doubt," O'Connor wrote. "Yet, 19 years after our holding that the Constitution protects a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy in its early stages, that definition of liberty is still questioned. ... The essential holding of Roe v. Wade should be retained and once again reaffirmed."

Similarly, O'Connor has refined her position on affirmative action.

In a 1989 case, she called a Richmond, Va., effort to boost minority contractors unconstitutional because it didn't meticulously document the past discrimination it was trying to remedy. O'Connor was central in developing the court practice of closely scrutinizing any race preferences, and she has tended to frown on them.

But in the key 2003 case challenging the constitutionality of race preferences in admissions at the University of Michigan Law School, O'Connor cast the deciding vote to retain the practice.

"Attaining a diverse student body is at the heart of the Law School's proper institutional mission, and its `good faith' is `presumed' absent a showing to the contrary," O'Connor wrote in Grutter v. Bollinger.

O'Connor has also confounded conservatives with thoughts about separation of church and state.

In a 1997 case about public schools providing services to poor children in sectarian schools, O'Connor led the charge in overturning a hard separation of church and state, saying an earlier ruling was too strict.

She also voted with the court majority to approve public vouchers for Cleveland students to attend religious schools.

But just last week, O'Connor voted to have two Ten Commandments monuments removed from courthouses in Kentucky and the state capitol grounds in Texas, arguing that both were improper entanglements of government and religion. Though most of the court's conservatives voted to uphold the more benign Texas monument, O'Connor balked, saying such symbolism was more divisive than helpful.

The separation of church and state has "kept religion a matter for the individual conscience, not for the prosecutor or bureaucrat," O'Connor said. "At a time when we see around the world the violent consequences of the assumption of religious authority by government, Americans may count themselves fortunate: Our regard for constitutional boundaries has protected us from similar travails, while allowing private religious exercise to flourish."

That kind of opinion inspired this quote about O'Connor, from Kevin J. "Seamus" Hasson, who founded the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, a Washington-based interest group.

DOJ_NMG_0000740

"Her approach to religion law questions made everything a matter of what an imaginary, objective observer would think. But there was no way to know what this imaginary person would think, until Justice O'Connor imagined it," Hasson said. "She was well-intentioned, but she was slowly but surely reinventing monarchy."

Nathaniel Persily, a constitutional expert and professor at the University of Pennsylvania's law school, said O'Connor is an easy target for those who support strict interpretations of the Constitution, but it's her ability to compromise that also gave rise to her prominence.

"Books will be written on her influence on the court and her approach as a justice," he said. "She not only became the decisive voice, but the lighthouse that lawyers look at to see where the court is going."

Sandra Day O'Connor To Retire (TIME)

By PATRICK STACK

Time, July 2, 2005

Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, nominated as the first woman on the Supreme Court 24 years ago and a key swing vote throughout her term, announced her retirement today. Her appointment to the Supreme Court in 1981 ended the Court's 191 years as an exclusively male institution.

O'Connor, 75, came up as a graduate of Stanford law and judge in the Arizona Court of Appeals. With the retirement of Justice Potter Stewart in 1981, Ronald Reagan kept a campaign promise of nominating a woman to the Supreme Court for the first time in U.S. history, as TIME noted in a cover story, "The Brethren's First Sister". She was confirmed 99-0 in the Senate and took her seat on the Court in a wave of celebration ("A New Order in the Court", 1981).

Though she had been nominated by a Republican president, O'Connor did not always hold the conservative line in Supreme Court decisions. She had a reputation of approaching each decision on a case-by-case basis, rather than through a sweeping judicial philosophy (see "Establishing Her Independence", 1986). She was the critical swing vote in upholding Roe v. Wade in the 1992 Planned Parenthood v. Casey decision, but voted to end the presidential ballot recount in 2000's Bush v. Gore.

Now, President Bush will nominate her replacement, with a Senate vote to confirm. Some of the potential choices: Attorney General Alberto Gonzales (see "Bush's Supreme Challenge", 2003) and federal appeals Judges J. Michael Luttig and John G. Roberts. Gonzales, who would be the first Hispanic justice on the court, is seen as the most moderate of the bunch and could face opposition from within Bush's party. Luttig is a conservative similar to Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas, and has been a strong proponent of federalism. Roberts served in the Justice Departments of both Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

O'Connor Known For Pragmatic Style (AP-Y2)

By Anne Gearan, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

For many years, transcripts of Supreme Court arguments did not identify which justice had asked a given question. Nonetheless, it was usually easy to tell Sandra Day O'Connor's questions apart.

They were short, sometimes just one word, such as "Why?" And she often challenged lawyers arguing cases big or small to tell her the real-world effect that a Supreme Court ruling on the matter would have.

O'Connor, who announced her retirement Friday at age 75, was a pragmatist among ideologues, a centrist whose vote could often be a tiebreaker on the court's most contentious issues. Off the bench, she was both generous and demanding, and fully aware of the intimidating effect she had on other people.

The toughness and independence of her upbringing on an Arizona a ranch showed in O'Connor. She could be short-tempered and blunt, and she did not suffer pesky reporters lightly. She was accustomed to asking the questions, not answering them.

Her gaze, with cool blue eyes, is direct and uncompromising. When asked a question she disliked, such as when she would retire, she sometimes said nothing at all.

She often told interviewers and law students that she was stunned when President Reagan picked her as the first woman nominee to the high court.

"My concern was whether I could do the job of a justice well enough to convince the nation that my appointment was the right move," she said in during a discussion at Cardozo law school in 2000. "If I stumbled badly in doing the job, I think it would have made life more difficult for women, and that was a great concern of mine and still is."

She was outwardly comfortable with that powerful role, and with the social and professional obligations that came with the job. She traveled widely to give speeches, was a regular on the Washington social circuit and wrote a best-selling autobiography about growing up on an Arizona cattle ranch.

DOJ_NMG_0000741

In a one-sentence statement, O'Connor cited her age and said she "needs to spend time" with family. She and her husband, John, a former classmate at Stanford, have three sons, Scott, Brian and Jay.

John O'Connor has been in declining mental and physical health for several years. For a time, he accompanied his wife to court nearly every day, sitting quietly in a reserved section near the front of the courtroom or in a chair near a window in her airy chambers.

Although she has probably made more public appearances than her colleagues on the court, and gave dozens of interviews about her book, she and her husband have maintained their privacy about his health and what effect it might have on her work.

O'Connor Leaves Legacy As Key Swing Vote (AP-Y2)

By PETE YOST

AP2, July 2, 2005

WASHINGTON - Sandra Day O'Connor's legacy is in the key votes she cast on such divisive issues as abortion rights, religion and affirmative action. The Supreme Court's pragmatist often was the pivotal voter in decisions that could shape the legal landscape for generations.

The 75-year-old grandmother, who calls herself a simple "cowgirl from Arizona," staked out the middle ground on a court that is often polarized on major social subjects.

In her nearly 24 years as a justice, O'Connor was wooed by conservatives and liberals on the court, but neither side could always count on her vote. Her decisions revealed a practical side, concerned most with the impact of rulings on everyday life.

"As the first woman to be appointed to this court, Sandra Day O'Connor was thrust into the spotlight as no new justice has ever been. And she has become a star," Justice Antonin Scalia said. "She shaped the jurisprudence of this court more than any other associate justice."

To the consternation of conservatives, she joined court liberals in 2000 in upholding the right of women to have abortions if their health is in danger. Later that year, she voted with conservatives in awarding the disputed presidential election to George W. Bush.

In recent years her influence has been obvious. She wrote the 2004 decision that said the war on terrorism did not give the government a "blank check" to hold terror suspects in legal limbo. She also led a 5-4 court in 2003 in upholding an affirmative action program at the University of Michigan's law school.

"Justice O'Connor is kind of like Ted Williams. Hit a home run the last time up and head off into the sunset," said Tom Walsh, a former colleague of O'Connor's lawyer husband, John.

In retirement, she will teach a law class at the University of Arizona and probably continue writing. She already has two books: "The Majesty of the Law; Reflections of a Supreme Court Justice," published in 2003, and the 2002 "Lazy B," about her childhood on a cattle ranch in Arizona.

She is the most recognized and popular of the justices. She received more than 60,000 letters in her first year, more than any other member in the court's history. Fierce bidding broke out last year on e-Bay for an O'Connor bobblehead doll.

Former Solicitor General Theodore Olson said O'Connor will be remembered for her "charm, grace, kindness, poise, character and intelligence."

"She's been one of the most influential justices in U.S. history," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel of the American Center for Law and Justice.

President Reagan broke nearly 200 years of tradition when he chose a woman for the high court.

O'Connor was 51 when she replaced the retired Potter Stewart. A virtual unknown on the national scene until her appointment, she had been an Arizona state judge.

She showed an independent streak from the beginning. In her first term, she cast the deciding vote and wrote a 5-4 ruling that said a Mississippi all-women college must let a male student study nursing.

In the years since, she often played down her role as a pivotal voter, but lawyers arguing appeals considered her vote so crucial that they often tailored arguments for her.

O'Connor generally favored states in disputes with the federal government.

She supported allowing a public Christmas display including a creche, but voted to bar a public Christmas display of a creche alone. Her view was that the Constitution prohibits any government action that is intended to send a message endorsing religion. Her vote determined the outcome in both cases.

This year has brought her some wins and losses. She wrote a strong dissent to a 5-4 ruling that let local governments take people's homes to build malls and other businesses. "The specter of condemnation hangs over all property," O'Connor wrote. "Nothing is to prevent the state from replacing ... any home with a shopping mall, or any farm with a factory."

DOJ_NMG_0000742

She also disagreed with decisions that barred states from executing juveniles and allowed federal drug agents to get around state medical marijuana laws.

She joined liberals in a 5-4 votes to overturn a death sentence and expand the scope of a landmark gender equity law.

Justice Clarence Thomas said O'Connor has been "civil in dissent and gracious when in the majority."

"She has taught us all," Justice Stephen Breyer said.

O'Connor had been a top student at Stanford Law School, where she dated then-classmate William H. Rehnquist, even hosting him in Arizona during a summer break. She married another law student and experienced her first discrimination, when no law firm was interested in hiring her, except as a secretary.

O'Connor has said she was surprised by the reaction to her nomination to the Supreme Court.

"I had no idea when I was appointed how much it would mean to many people around the country," she said. "It affected them in a very personal way. People saw it as a signal that there are virtually unlimited opportunities for women. It's important to parents for their daughters, and to daughters for themselves."

O'Connor Leaves ... (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

One fact sums up Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's pivotal role on the Supreme Court and the enormity of her resignation — she alone was in the majority of every one of the court's 13 5-4 decisions this last term.

The Democrats' genuine sorrow in seeing O'Connor leave 24 years after being picked by President Reagan is a tribute to her moderating influence. Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the minority leader, urged President Bush on Friday to appoint someone else "like O'Connor" to the court.

O'Connor, the first woman to serve on the nation's highest court, is an inspiration not only to female lawyers but to pioneers in other fields. She is in other ways a throwback — a former politician on a court that is no longer that welcoming to politicians. Among current justices, O'Connor is the only one who served in a legislature, back in Arizona.

That political experience helped shape O'Connor's jurisprudence, and the fact that she rarely seemed intent on building something as haughty-sounding as a "jurisprudence." O'Connor is less interested in all-encompassing principles than in the case before her, and its practical, nitty-gritty facts.

The result could be maddening to lower courts and scholars looking for clear guidance. Some areas of the law, especially church-state relations and voting rights, remain muddled because O'Connor's answer to every constitutional question seemed to be a cautious "depends." In another area of the law, O'Connor upheld the University of Michigan Law School's affirmative action program but voted to strike down the same university's undergraduate affirmative action plan because they differed in their details.

The positive side of O'Connor's pragmatic approach to judging is that it applied a brake to the ideologically driven conservative counterrevolution. No one engaged with real-world facts, for instance, could allow Roe vs. Wade to be overturned.

In affirming the Michigan law school's program, O'Connor did indulge in soaring rhetoric: "Effective participation by members of all racial and ethnic groups in the civic life of our nation is essential if the dream of one nation, indivisible, is to be realized."

O'Connor's own biography no doubt contributed to her tolerance. She graduated third in her Stanford Law School class but could not get hired by a major law firm. Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, the Los Angeles blue-chip firm, insultingly offered her a secretarial job.

Born in West Texas and raised on an Arizona ranch, she espoused a Western version of conservatism tinged with libertarianism. She voted to strike down state sodomy laws and wrote the opinion chastising President Bush for thinking he could indefinitely detain people without judicial oversight in the war on terrorism. Her levelheaded common sense on the bench will be missed.

A Dedication To Excellence From A Jurist Without Precedent (WP)

By Ann Gerhart And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

When Supreme Court justice Potter Stewart announced his retirement in 1981, President Reagan summoned a former Republican activist and lawmaker, a judge sitting on the Arizona Court of Appeals, to the Oval Office. Sandra Day O'Connor was a wife, married for almost 30 years at that point to a law school classmate; a mother, whose three boys were nearly grown; and a daughter of the West, whose rancher daddy taught her to brand cattle and brandish a .22 by the time she was 8.

Reagan said later she charmed him immediately with her passion for horses, which he shared. They chatted about judicial issues; he never mentioned the Supreme Court opening.

DOJ_NMG_0000743

She said later she "got on the airplane and sat down and took a big breath and said, 'My, that was an interesting time to go to Washington. But thank goodness I don't have to do that job.' "

O'Connor, 75, yesterday announced she is giving up "that job," which she held for nearly a quarter-century. For much of that time, she has been described as the most influential woman in America, a designation that always stuck in her craw. The way she was raised, and the way she has lived, is simply to work hard and attentively in all the realms of her life, from the law to the Arizona Senate to court trials, from the Junior League to her golf game, from her friendships to her 1988 battle with breast cancer.

"All her life, whatever she did, whether it was important, or unimportant, or semi-important, or very important, she just would do it to perfection," her younger brother, H. Alan Day, told The Post years ago. "If you said, 'The job is to wash dishes well,' she would do it better than anyone else."

The very nature of her vaunted position has allowed her to blend and balance all these realms with a grace and dignity many powerful women never achieve. Outside the publicity glare that descends on first ladies and female politicians, O'Connor in Washington created quite a modern model for any women who hope to fashion lives both professionally and personally full. She is her own mix of frontier woman and distinguished jurist, able both to mug in a cowboy hat and to cast the crucial swing vote in more than a dozen 5-4 decisions.

Friends and family members have said she is a down-to-earth woman, generous and funny, given to throwing birthday celebrations for her clerks and sending thank-you notes seemingly written as soon as she arrived home.

But she is also reserved and private; her own son told the Associated Press that yesterday's resignation caught him by surprise. In her letter to President Bush, the justice made no mention of why she was ending her lifetime appointment. Supreme Court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg said O'Connor said she "needs to spend more time with her husband," John, 75. The justice has told close friends that he is suffering from Alzheimer's. None of the couple's three sons and six grandchildren lives in the area.

Her husband has been a full partner in her life from their days at Stanford Law School, where they were editors on the law review. Sandra Day graduated third in her class (first in the class was William Rehnquist, now the chief justice). The two of them dated, "a few movies and one thing or another," as O'Connor explained it, but once she accepted a date from John O'Connor, they had dates the next 39 nights in a row, "until he decided he needed to get some rest," she said.

When she brought O'Connor back to the 198,000-acre ranch straddling Arizona and New Mexico, her father tormented him by taking a piece of baling wire, skewering the testicles of the bull he had just castrated and grilling them in the branding fire. Then he held out the delicacy, standard cocktail-hour fare on the Day ranch, and said, " 'Here, John, try these.' " O'Connor recalled. "And poor John, he had to take one and gulp, 'Very good, Mr. Day.' " With that test passed, the couple wed as soon as she graduated law school. She was 22.

None of the law firms in California would hire her as a lawyer, although she did get an offer to be a secretary, "depending on my typing," she likes to recall, and not with total amusement, even all these years later.

She took a job as a deputy county attorney. After her husband's military tour of duty in Germany, he got a well-paying corporate job in Phoenix and she hung out a shingle with another attorney. When her second child was born in 1960, she decided to stay at home. She threw herself into volunteer work, becoming president of the Phoenix Junior League, and kept her hand in the law with the occasional appointment as trustee in a bankruptcy case and juvenile court referee.

During the '60s, she was an assistant attorney general in Arizona, then served out the term of a state senator who stepped down. She won two elections on her own, and became the first woman in the country to be a Senate majority leader in 1973. A year later she moved to the bench and was appointed to the state's appeals court in 1979.

She had not fixed herself to a particular life course. "I don't think it would be fair to say that, for Sandra, drive was one of those things that meant she must get to a specific goal," Hattie Babbitt, an attorney, told The Post in 1986. She urged her husband, Arizona Gov. Bruce Babbitt, to appoint O'Connor to the state court. "The kind of drive she has is she's very smart, and very organized, and she would always want to be very good at what she does. You can do that and not be in the right place at the right time. But she did and she was."

It was John O'Connor to whom she turned when President Reagan called and asked if she would accept his nomination to the Supreme Court. She hesitated, not sure what to do. A move for her meant career upheaval for him. "You cannot say no to the president," he told her.

But the woman whose style is to make decisions and resolutely never look back arrived in the nation's capital scared to death. "I felt intimidated by Washington and everything there," she told George Vradenburg, chairman of the Phillips Collection. She loved her Arizona, and the way the expanse of limitless sky and land kept a person humble. Frequently, she evoked author Wallace Stegner to describe her feelings for the West: "There is something about exposure to that big country that not only tells an individual how small he is, but steadily tells him who he is."

DOJ_NMG_0000744

She and her husband eventually settled in Chevy Chase and joined the exclusive Chevy Chase Club. She took up golf with her usual perseverance bordering on obsession, taking lessons with a pro and hitting buckets of balls every Saturday for four years before she ever set foot on the course. Her first outing, she broke 90.

Over the years, O'Connor and her husband maintained a social schedule that could seem almost frenzied. They are sought-after guests at A-list parties, popping up often at the Kennedy Center, the National Gallery of Art and embassies around town. "She and John were often the very first on the dance floor," said Walter Cutler, president of Meridian International Center. "They just love to dance. They had a unique dance step -- I wouldn't call it a Charleston, but it has that same festive air."

In 1985, O'Connor was seated at the head table at the Washington Press Club's annual dinner, where Redskins star John Riggins drunkenly told her, "Loosen up, Sandy baby. You're too tight!" Then he passed out on the floor. An embarrassed Riggins sent apologies and roses the next day. Seven years later, Riggins appeared in a play at a suburban Washington theater, and O'Connor presented him with a dozen roses during the curtain call.

When asked for a comment yesterday about the infamous incident, Riggins, with his characteristic politesse, hung up on a reporter.

O'Connor, on the other hand, is well known as a great dinner partner: curious, lively, engaged, with a dry sense of humor and knack for telling stories.

Her ranch upbringing had isolation, deprivation and years of financial distress, but her parents were highly cultivated people. They subscribed to the Wall Street Journal, the Los Angeles Times, the New Yorker, Vogue and Time. Her mother was a college graduate who ordered her clothes from Neiman Marcus and Saks; when she drove her daughter into town, 25 miles away, to get the mail, the residents would crowd around just to see what Ada Mae Day was wearing.

Her daughter has taken full advantage of what can be fascinating and stimulating in the capital city.

"I've watched her in social situations, and what you find is that there is no limit to her interests," said philanthropist Catherine Reynolds. "She is interested in everything . She just embraces life and all it curiosities." Reynolds seated country singer Dwight Yoakam next to O'Connor at a dinner in March. "He must have thanked me a dozen times. He said it was the most interesting night of his life. He just enjoyed her tremendously."

Two years ago, Reynolds and her husband, Wayne, brought more than 200 graduate students to Washington to meet with politicians, scientists, historians, businessmen and artists. They asked O'Connor to speak to the group, and they were all invited to the Supreme Court chambers, where they heard O'Connor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg talk about the court, the Constitution and the decision that gave the 2000 election to George W. Bush.

"She is so special," said Reynolds. "She is a great inspiration for young people from all around the world, but especially young women. She's very forthcoming in talking about her experiences and her struggles. . . . When she talks to you, you get that sense of authenticity, how real she is. You feel a connection with her."

O'Connor seemed especially solicitous of female clerks with children. University of Florida law professor Barbara Bennett Woodhouse, who was a 40-year-old mom when she clerked 20 years ago, recalls how the justice insisted that Woodhouse fly to Connecticut to see her 11th-grade daughter perform Gilbert & Sullivan.

"She said, 'This is a must-attend event.' She picked up the phone, called her travel agent and told me about the flights," said Woodhouse. "She had a very strong appreciation for the importance of our families."

Twenty-three years ago, she summoned yoga and aerobics instructors to hold 8 a.m. classes for women working in the Supreme Court; they're still going strong, and O'Connor joins in. "She was a big believer in the well-rounded life," said another former clerk, Marci Hamilton, now a Cardozo School of Law professor. "She is the opposite of the 24-7 law partner. . . . A very human person. . . . She never let anyone believe that law was the beginning and end of your life."

As hard on her clerks as she was on herself, she counterbalanced her demands for excellence and long hours with warm gestures: they recall how she'd swoop into the office and announce an impromptu afternoon jaunt to see the cherry blossoms or, on one occasion, a new Degas exhibit at the National Gallery. She also set up weekend field trips: horseback riding in Rock Creek Park, rafting in West Virginia, a visit to Harpers Ferry.

She even cooked lunch for Saturday sessions at which she and her clerks discussed upcoming oral arguments. "That was my introduction to green chili casserole," recalled Phoenix lawyer Scott Bale, an O'Connor clerk in 1984-85. "It left me with a long-term affection for green chili."

As she has nurtured relationships on the court, keeping her ties with Rehnquist and playing bridge with justices Anthony Kennedy and Stephen Breyer, she has built "deep and lasting friendships," said Lynda Webster. She and her husband, former FBI and CIA director William Webster, are close friends of the O'Connors and share a passion for fly-fishing, tennis and golf. "She's a go-getter," said Webster. "She's game for anything. She really has an incredible zest for life."

The couple told some friends they were giving up their Chevy Chase home and purchasing an apartment on New Mexico Avenue.

DOJ_NMG_0000745

The Websters and the O'Connors had dinner together last week, but Webster said neither she nor any other of O'Connor's friends had a hint of the pending resignation. "None of us knew, but then again, we would never ask."

Timeline: Sandra Day O'Connor's Key Decisions (WP)

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

The following are key decisions and events in the career of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.March 29, 2005: Jackson v. Birmingham Board of Education

Decision allows a male teacher to bring a Title IX claim if he complains about sex discrimination.

Findlaw Case DocumentsApril 28, 2004: Hamdi v. Rumsfeld

This decision rejected the Bush administration's position on enemy combatants and rules that a citizen held in the United States must be given an opportunity to challenge the factual basis of the detention before a neutral decison maker.

Findlaw Case Documents

Post: U.S. Allows Lawyer for Citizen Held as 'Enemy Combatant'Dec. 10, 2003: McConnell v. FEC

The ruling, which O'Connor co-authored with Justice John Paul Stevens, declares the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law constitutional.

Findlaw Case Documents

Post: Justices Uphold Campaign Finance Law June 23, 2003: Grutter v. Bollinger, Gratz v. Bollinger

Findlaw Case Documents (Grutter v. Bollinger)

Findlaw Case Documents (Gratz v. Bollinger)

Post Article: Affirmative Action for Diversity Is Upheld

Post Article: O'Connor Questions Foes of U-Michigan Policy April 8, 2003

O'Connor publishes her second book, The Majesty of the Law: Reflections of a Supreme Court Justice.

Post Article: Bench Marks

Post Article: A Cowgirl's Sense of the Constitution and the Court March 5, 2003: Ewing v. California and Lockyer v. Andrade

O'Connor affirms California's "3-Strikes" law that long prison terms for repeat offenders are legal

FindLaw Case Documents

Post Article: California '3-Strikes' Law UpheldJan. 22, 2002

Post Profile: The O'Connor FactorJuly 3, 2001

Post Article: O'Connor Expresses Death Penalty DoubtDec. 12, 2000: Bush v. Gore

O'Connor votes with the 5 to 4 majority that effectively makes George W. Bush the 43rd president of the United States.

Findlaw Case Documents

Post Article: Opinion Is Sharply Divided on Ruling's Consequences

Post Article: Court May Have Mapped New Territory June 28, 2000: Stenberg, Attorney General of Nebraska v. Carhart

Stenberg, Attorney General of Nebraska v. Carhart Findlaw Case Documents

Hill v. Colorado Findlaw Case Documents

Post Article: Supreme Court Upholds Two Key Abortion Rights May 16, 1999

O'Connor calls on judges nationwide to ensure fairness for all.

Post Article: Justice O'Connor Calls for 'Concrete Action' to Fight Bias June 24, 1997: Agostini v. Felton

O'Connor delivers the decision allowing public school teachers to enter parochial schools to provide remedial education.

Findlaw Case Documents

Post Excerpts From Ruling: 'We Have Departed From the Rule' June 29, 1992: Planned Parenthood of Southeastern PA v. Casey

Justices O'Connor, Anthony M. Kennedy and David Hackett Souter reaffirm what they called the "central holding" of the Supreme Court's 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade.

Findlaw Case Documents

Post Article: 5-4 Court Declines to Overrule Roe June 26, 1990

O'Connor votes to strike down a portion of an antiabortion law that would have required a minor, virtually without exception, to notify both parents before obtaining an abortion.

Post Article: O'Connor Breaks Ranks With Reagan Appointees June 11, 1990: United States v. Eichman

O'Connor dissents when the court rules that flag-burning is protected by the First Amendment.

Findlaw Case Documents June 21, 1989: Texas v. Johnson

DOJ_NMG_0000746

O'Connor dissents as the court protects a citizen's right to make a political statement by burning s privately owned U.S. flag.

Findlaw Case Documents

April 29, 1989

Post Article: Justice O'Connor's Question Oct. 22, 1988

Post Article: Justice O'Connor Has Breast Cancer Surgery April 22, 1987: McCleskey v. Kemp

O'Connor joins with the court in upholding capital punishment law.

Findlaw Case Documents

Post Article: Capital Punishment Law Upheld June 4, 1985: Wallace v. Jaffree

O'Connor concurs in the court's judgment that moments of silence in public schools are in and of themselves constitutional, but may not "characterize prayer as a favored practice."

Findlaw Case Documents July 1, 1982: Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan

O'Connor rules in favor of a male applicant seeking admission to the Mississippi University for Women nursing school.

Findlaw Case Documents Sept. 25, 1981

O'Connor takes the oath of office. Sept. 22, 1981

O'Connor is confirmed by the Senate. July 7, 1981

O'Connor is nominated by President Reagan as the first woman associated justice of the Supreme Court.June 28, 2000

The Supreme Court upholds two key abortion rights, with O'Connor voting with the majority. Stenberg, Attorney General of Nebraska v. Carhart * Findlaw Case Documents Hill v. Colorado * Findlaw Case Documents * Post Article: Supreme Court Upholds Two Key Abortion Rights

&ovar14=May 16, 1999 O'Connor calls on judges nationwide to ensure fairness for all. * Post Article: Justice O'Connor Calls for 'Concrete Action' to Fight Bias

&ovar13=June 24, 1997 Agostini v. Felton O'Connor delivers the decision allowing public school teachers to enter parochial schools to provide remedial education. * Findlaw Case Documents * Post Excerpts From Ruling: 'We Have Departed From The Rule'

&ovar12=June 29, 1992 Planned Parenthood of Southeastern PA v. Casey O'Connor, Kennedy and Souter, reaffirmed what they called the "central holding" of the Supreme Court's 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade. * Findlaw Case Documents * Post Article: 5-4 Court Declines to Overturn Roe

&ovar11=June 26, 1990 O'Connor votes to strike down a portion of an antiabortion law that would have required a minor, virtually without exception, to notify both parents before obtaining an abortion. * Findlaw Case Documents * Post Article: O'Connor Breaks Ranks With Reagan Appointees

&ovar10=June 11, 1990 United States v. Eichman O'Connor dissents when the court rules that flag-burning is protected by the First Amendment. * Findlaw Case Documents

&ovar9=June 21, 1989 TX v. Johnson O'Connor dissents, as the court protects a citizen's right to make a political statement by burning s privately-owned U.S. flag. * Findlaw Case Documents

&ovar8=April 29, 1989 O'Connor voices reservations about Roe and about abortion itself, as well as concerns about individual liberty. * Post Article: Justice O'Connor's Question

&ovar7=October 22, 1988 O'Connor undergoes breast cancer surgery * Post Article: Justice O'Connor Has Breast Cancer Surgery

&ovar6=April 22, 1987 McCleskey v. Kemp O'Connor joins with the court in upholding capital punishment law. * Findlaw Case Documents * Post Article: Capital Punishment Law Upheld &ovar5=June 4, 1985 Wallace v. Jaffree O'Connor concurs in the court's judgment that moments of silence in public schools are in and of themselves constitutional, but may not "characterize prayer as a favored practice." * Findlaw Case Documents &ovar4=July 1, 1982 Mississippi University for Women V. Hogan O'Connor rules in favor of a male applicant seeking admission to the Mississippi University for Women nursing school. * Findlaw Case Documents

&ovar3=July 7, 1981 O'Connor is nominated by President Reagan as the first woman associate justice of the Supreme Court.

&ovar2=September 25, 1981. O'Connor takes the oath of office.

&ovar1=September 22, 1981 O'Connor is confirmed by the Senate. &checkLoad=1&

Opinions By Justice Sandra Day O'Connor (NYT)

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Excerpts from opinions by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor:

DOJ_NMG_0000747

From her 1992 plurality opinion Planned Parenthood v. Casey, which upheld a woman's constitutional right to an abortion, but gave states more flexibility to impose limited restrictions:

"We reject the trimester framework, which we do not consider to be part of the essential holding of Roe. Measures aimed at ensuring that a woman's choice contemplates the consequences for the fetus do not necessarily interfere with the right recognized in Roe, although those measures have been found to be inconsistent with the rigid trimester framework announced in that case.

"... The abortion right is similar. Numerous forms of state regulation might have the incidental effect of increasing the cost or decreasing the availability of medical care, whether for abortion or any other medical procedure. The fact that a law which serves a valid purpose, one not designed to strike at the right itself, has the incidental effect of making it more difficult or more expensive to procure an abortion cannot be enough to invalidate it. Only where state regulation imposes an undue burden on a woman's ability to make this decision does the power of the State reach into the heart of the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause."

Full Text of Opinion

From her 2003 majority opinion in Grutter v. Bollinger, which ruled the nation's public universities, for now, can take race partly into account in their admissions policies:

"We have repeatedly acknowledged the overriding importance of preparing students for work and citizenship, describing education as pivotal to "sustaining our political and cultural heritage" with a fundamental role in maintaining the fabric of society. This court has long recognized that "education is the very foundation of good citizenship." For this reason, the diffusion of knowledge and opportunity through public institutions of higher education must be accessible to all individuals regardless of race or ethnicity.

" ...We take the law school at its word that it would "like nothing better than to find a race-neutral admissions formula" and will terminate its race-conscious admissions program as soon as practicable. It has been 25 years since Justice Powell first approved the use of race to further an interest in student body diversity in the context of public higher education. Since that time, the number of minority applicants with high grades and test scores has indeed increased. We expect that 25 years from now, the use of racial preferences will no longer be necessary to further the interest approved today."

Full Text of Opinion

From her 2004 majority opinion in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, ruling a U.S. citizen seized on the Afghanistan battlefield can challenge his detention in U.S. courts:

"We have long since made clear that a state of war is not a blank check for the President when it comes to the rights of the Nation's citizens. ... (It) would turn our system of checks and balances on its head to suggest that a citizen could not make his way to court with a challenge to the factual basis for his detention by his government, simply because the Executive opposes making available such a challenge.

"... Any process in which the executive's factual assertions go wholly unchallenged or are simply presumed correct without any opportunity for the alleged combatant to demonstrate otherwise falls constitutionally short. ... We have no reason to doubt that courts faced with these sensitive matters will pay proper heed both to the matters of national security that might arise in an individual case and to the constitutional limitations safeguarding essential liberties that remain vibrant even in times of security concerns."

Full Text of Opinon

From her 1984 concurrence in Lynch v. Donnelly on nativity scenes that sets the legal standard for determining which displays violate the Constitution's prohibition on government establishment of religion:

"The Establishment Clause prohibits government from making adherence to a religion relevant in any way to a person's standing in the political community. Government can run afoul of that prohibition in two principal ways. One is excessive entanglement with religious institutions, which may interfere with the independence of the institutions, give the institutions access to government or governmental powers not fully shared by nonadherents of the religion, and foster the creation of political constituencies defined along religious lines.

"The second and more direct infringement is government endorsement or disapproval of religion. Endorsement sends a message to nonadherents that they are outsiders, not full members of the political community, and an accompanying message to adherents that they are insiders, favored members of the political community. Disapproval sends the opposite message."

Full Text of Opinion

DOJ_NMG_0000748

From her 2005 dissent in Kelo v. New London, a ruling that gives local governments broad authority to seize people's homes and businesses against their will for private development:

"The specter of condemnation hangs over all property. Nothing is to prevent the State from replacing any Motel 6 with a Ritz-Carlton, any home with a shopping mall, or any farm with a factory. ... Any property may now be taken for the benefit of another private party, but the fallout from this decision will not be random. The beneficiaries are likely to be those citizens with disproportionate influence and power in the political process, including large corporations and development firms.

"As for the victims, the government now has license to transfer property from those with fewer resources to those with more. The Founders cannot have intended this perverse result. 'That alone is a just government,' wrote James Madison, 'which impartially secures to every man, whatever is his own.'

Full Text of Opinion

From her majority opinion in 1984 Strickland v. Washington, setting a higher burden for death row inmates to successfully overturn their convictions based on mistakes by their attorneys:

"An error by counsel, even if professionally unreasonable, does not warrant setting aside the judgment of a criminal proceeding if the error had no effect on the judgment. ... Judicial scrutiny of counsel's performance must be highly deferential. It is all too tempting for a defendant to second-guess counsel's assistance after conviction or adverse sentence, and it is all too easy for a court, examining counsel's defense after it has proved unsuccessful, to conclude that a particular act or omission of counsel was unreasonable.

"A fair assessment of attorney performance requires that every effort be made to eliminate the distorting effects of hindsight, to reconstruct the circumstances of counsel's challenged conduct, and to evaluate the conduct from counsel's perspective at the time. Because of the difficulties inherent in making the evaluation, a court must indulge a strong presumption that counsel's conduct falls within the wide range of reasonable professional assistance; that is, the defendant must overcome the presumption that, under the circumstances, the challenged action "might be considered sound trial strategy."

Full Text of Opinion

A Look At Major Decisions In Which O'Connor Played Key Role (KRT)

By Michael Barnett and Andres R. Martinez

KRT – O'Connor Key Votes, July 2, 2005

The following are some of the major cases in which Sandra Day O'Connor played a significant role.

Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan

Decided: July 1, 1982

Voted: With majority

Decision: 5-4

O'Connor voted with the majority to strike down a rule that blocked men from attending Mississippi University's nursing school.

Lynch v. Donnelly

Decided: March 5, 1984

Voted: With majority

Decision: 5-4

The court ruled that the Pawtucket, R.I., government didn't violate the separation of church and state by sponsoring a Christmas display in a shopping district.

Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier

Decided: Jan. 13, 1988

Voted: With majority

Decision: 5-3

O'Connor agreed with the majority that schools had the right to block students from publishing anything they deemed inappropriate.

Texas v. Johnson

Decided: June 21, 1989

DOJ_NMG_0000749

Voted: With minority
Decision: 5-4
The Supreme Court upheld that burning the American flag was a protected form of speech.

Planned Parenthood v. Casey
Decided: June 29, 1992
Voted: With majority
Decision: 5-4
The court upheld a Pennsylvania law requiring a 24-hour waiting period before abortions and that minors get the permission of at least one parent before getting abortions.

Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co.
Decided: Jan. 23, 1989
Voted: With majority
Decision: 6-3
The court struck down a Richmond, Va., law mandating that construction companies working with the city subcontract work to minority-run businesses.

Bush v. Gore
Decided: Dec. 12, 2000
Voted: With majority
Decision: 5-4
The court agreed with President George Bush's argument that Florida's recount method in the 2000 presidential election was unconstitutional because the procedure was inconsistent across the state.

Grutter v. Bollinger
Decided: June 23, 2003
Voted: With majority
Decision: 5-4
O'Connor joined the majority in saying that the Michigan School of Law didn't violate any laws by using race as a factor in admission to that school.

Lawrence and Garner v. Texas
Decided: June 26, 2003
Voted: With majority
Decision: 6-3
The court struck down Texas law that made sodomy illegal.

Rasul v. Bush
Decided: June 28, 2004
Voted: With majority
Decision: 6-3
In a case brought by detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, O'Connor voted with the majority that detainees held at the U.S. military base could appeal their detentions.

Roper v. Simmons
Decided: March 1, 2005
Voted: With minority
Decision: 5-4
O'Connor dissented from the court's ruling that the death penalty couldn't be applied to cases where the accused was a minor when the crime was committed.

A Look At How Justice O'Connor Voted (AP-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0000750

AP2, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor has been the swing vote on many important decisions in the 24 years since President Reagan appointed her.

In her first term, O'Connor voted with conservative Justice William Rehnquist on 27 of 31 decisions that were decided by a 5-4 vote.

But early on, she showed an independent streak. In her first term, the liberal wing of the court joined O'Connor in a 5-4 ruling declaring that a state-supported university in Mississippi could not exclude men from its nursing school.

O'Connor's role in some other cases:

_1984: O'Connor wrote a concurring opinion on nativity scenes that set the legal standard for determining which displays violate the Constitution's prohibition on government establishment of religion. She also wrote the majority opinion that set a higher burden for death row inmates seeking to overturn their convictions based on mistakes by their attorneys.

_1989: O'Connor's opinion for the court declared that government programs violate equal protection if they set aside a fixed percentage of public contracts for minority businesses.

_1992: O'Connor and Justice Anthony Kennedy joined a plurality opinion by Justice David Souter that criticized the constitutional foundation for legalized abortion, while declining to overturn the 1973 decision that legalized it.

_2003: O'Connor co-authored the majority opinion upholding 5-4 the broadest restrictions on campaign donations in nearly 30 years. She also wrote the majority opinion ruling that public universities, for now, can take race partly into account in admissions policies.

_2004: O'Connor wrote the majority opinion that a U.S. citizen seized on the battlefield in Afghanistan can challenge his detention in U.S. courts.

_2005: O'Connor dissented from a ruling that gave local governments broad authority to seize private property for private development.

Reaction To O'Connor Resignation (AP-Y2)

By The Associated Press

AP2, July 2, 2005

Reaction to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's announcement Friday that she was retiring from the Supreme Court:

>

"For over 23 years, Justice O'Connor has been one of the Supreme Court's finest justices. As the first female justice, this simple cowgirl from Arizona has been a trailblazer for women and rightfully earned her place in history." — Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn.

___

"She is a longtime friend and valued colleague. I shall miss her greatly." — Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist.

___

"Above all, Justice O'Connor has been a voice of reason and moderation on the court. It is vital that she be replaced by someone like her, someone who embodies the fundamental American values of freedom, equality and fairness." — Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

___

"She has enhanced the national and international reputation of the court, and has established — to the point where it now goes almost without notice — the role of her sex in the administration of justice." — Justice Antonin Scalia.

___

"As a senior member of the Judiciary Committee, I'll be looking forward to hearing from a nominee who understands that the role of the courts is to interpret the law, not create the law." — Sen. Charles Grassley (news, bio, voting record), R-Iowa.

___

"Justice O'Connor has made a splendid contribution to the law and to the court." — Justice Anthony M. Kennedy.

___

"Justice O'Connor played an indispensable and pivotal role in preserving our civil liberties and constitutional rights, including a woman's right to choose. ... As the president nominates a successor, he has an opportunity to unify the country by seeking meaningful consultation with legislators of both parties and choosing a respected nominee in the manner of Sandra Day O'Connor." — House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

___

"Justice O'Connor has authored some of the most influential precedents over the last quarter-century and has been the deciding vote on some of the most contentious issues of our time. Justice O'Connor has earned the respect of her colleagues and the entire legal community for her intellectual ability, evenhandedness and judicial restraint." — Sen. Olympia Snowe (news, bio, voting record), R-Maine.

DOJ_NMG_0000751

___

"She has been an outstanding colleague, civil in dissent and gracious when in the majority." — Justice Clarence Thomas.

___

"Justice O'Connor was a mainstream conservative. ... I hope the president will select someone who meets the high standards that she set and that can bring the nation together as she did." — Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass.

___

"She has been a trailblazer and role model for many. Her resignation leaves a void that won't easily be filled." — House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

___

"The court, the law and my life have been immeasurably enriched by her dedicated service. She has taught us all." — Justice Stephen G. Breyer.

___

"A quarter-century ago, Ronald Reagan enthusiastically accepted the recommendation of Barry Goldwater and nominated a mainstream conservative who came to the court with an open mind and true judicial temperament. It is my hope the president will consult with Senate leaders, and that ultimately his choice honors Justice O'Connor by choosing someone in her mold." — Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record), D-Del.

___

"When my husband had his first opportunity to make a nomination to the Supreme Court, he very much wanted to appoint a woman. He saw in Sandra Day O'Connor a sense of fairness and devotion to the public good, and she has certainly lived up to his expectations." — Former first lady Nancy Reagan.

___

She has "been one of the few moderates on the Supreme Court, not always in our favor, but frequently in favor of civil rights and women's rights. What we fear is there will be a nominee along the lines of some of the extremist judges that have been put on the appellate court by George Bush." — Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women.

___

"This is another opportunity for President Bush to appoint a conservative jurist to the federal judiciary who will interpret and apply the Constitution properly instead of legislating from the bench and relying on international opinion and public polls." — Republican South Carolina Attorney General Henry McMaster.

Personal And Political Concerns In A Closely Held Decision (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

When his mother was nominated for the Supreme Court in July 1981, it came as a surprise to Brian O'Connor. He had been off skydiving, and only learned the historic news along with the rest of the nation when he got home.

On Friday morning, he had much the same experience, turning on the television to discover that his mother had announced her retirement. Mr. O'Connor, 45, said he waited a while before calling his parents at home in suburban Maryland, noting that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor had once again confounded not only the political pundits but also her own children.

"I was as surprised as anyone - but then again, not surprised," said Mr. O'Connor, a real-estate developer in Phoenix and the justice's middle child. "Publicly, there's been a lot of speculation, and there has been in the family, as well. We had our hunches. But no one knew for sure."

In their 10-minute phone conversation, Mr. O'Connor said, he congratulated his mother, but commented that the decision must have been bittersweet.

"I said, 'Well, you must have some tears as well as a smile on your face,' and she said, 'Oh, I think there were more tears,' " he said. "I think she will miss it."

His mother used a mountain-climbing metaphor to describe her feelings to her son, who scaled Mount Everest two years ago.

"I feel like I'm starting to climb down off the summit," she said.

Several factors compelled Justice O'Connor to vacate her seat, according to her son, former clerks and friends. Her husband, John Jay O'Connor III, has suffered from Alzheimer's disease and grown increasingly dependent on his wife of more than 50 years. He often spent days with her at the court, resting in her office while she sat on the bench.

DOJ_NMG_0000752

Kathleen Arberg, the court's public information officer, said the justice told her that after 24 years, at age 75, it was "time now to spend time with my husband."

Brian O'Connor would not talk about his father, a retired lawyer, out of respect for his parents' privacy. The couple met at Stanford Law School, where the future Supreme Court justice was in the same class as William H. Rehnquist, the future chief justice, whom she briefly dated.

"That she needs to spend more time with John O'Connor strikes me as entirely credible," said Gerhard Casper, the former president of Stanford University and a friend of Justice O'Connor's for two decades. "He's hanging in there. Sometimes it is better, and sometimes it is worse."

The O'Connors plan to move to a townhouse they recently bought in northwest Washington from their home in Chevy Chase, Md., a move that was one factor fueling speculation that Justice O'Connor was not planning retirement any time soon. Her friends had long speculated that one reason she would step down would be to move back to Arizona, where the couple still own a home.

But Brian O'Connor said that, on the contrary, his parents enjoyed their active lives in Washington, and intended to split their time evenly between the capital and Phoenix. Like past retired justices, she will keep an office at the Supreme Court.

Aside from Justice O'Connor's personal concerns, her son said that political calculations were almost certainly at play in her decision to step down. In a week consumed with speculation about whether the ailing Justice Rehnquist would retire, Justice O'Connor waited until Friday to announce her plans.

Brian O'Connor said he did not know whether his mother had put off resigning out of deference to a possible Rehnquist departure or whether the two old friends had consulted.

"There's no telling who will be our next president, and I just think, like so many of her decisions, it just kind of made sense," her son said.

"And I think in some regards, the stars aligned, and it was just kind of time," he said. "I don't think she would want to be an old 'hanger-oner.' And if she didn't do it now, she might have been there another 10 years, if you do the math, depending on what happens down the road with future presidential elections."

His mother made no public comment about her coming departure beyond the one-paragraph resignation letter to President Bush.

Justice O'Connor was seen getting off a flight Friday at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport, preceded by Representative Jim Ramstad, Republican of Minnesota, according to The Associated Press. He told her, "I hate to see you go."

"I hate to go, too," she replied. "It's been a real privilege."

O'Connor, First Female Justice, Retires From Supreme Court (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson and Stephen Henderson

KRT – O'Connor Retires, July 2, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman and a key swing vote on the Supreme Court, announced her resignation Friday, touching off a fierce battle over her replacement.

Her surprise decision to retire after 24 years on the high court was a political thunderbolt because of her role in moderating the court's conservative wing. A staunchly conservative replacement could tip the court's balance on a host of issues, including abortion rights, gay rights, civil liberties, the death penalty, racial preferences and the government's regulatory powers.

On Capitol Hill, the Senate braced for the possibility of a bitter, divisive and distracting confirmation debate that could sidetrack other legislative business for months.

O'Connor's resignation creates the first Supreme Court vacancy in 11 years, and the confirmation process will play out in the relatively new world of 24-hour news, Internet interest groups, ideologically driven bloggers and polarized politics.

O'Connor, 75, said she was stepping down to spend more time with her husband, John, who has SEARCH

News | News Photos | Images | Web" /> Alzheimer's disease.

"It has been a great privilege, indeed, to have served as a member of the court for 24 terms," she said in a short note that was delivered to

President Bush on Friday morning. "I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure."

Bush praised the departing justice and promised to name a replacement in time for the court's next term, which begins in October. White House aides said he wouldn't announce his choice until after July 8, when he returns from a trip to Europe.

The list of possible candidates includes Attorney General

Alberto Gonzales, who'd be the first Hispanic on the court. The most likely female nominees appear to be appellate court Judges

DOJ_NMG_0000753

Edith Jones and Edith Brown Clement, both on the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans.

Other appellate judges who could be tapped for promotion are J. Harvie Wilkinson of the 4th Circuit in Richmond, Va.; J. Michael Luttig, also of the 4th Circuit; Michael McConnell of the 10th Circuit in Denver; Samuel Alito of the 3rd Circuit in Philadelphia;

Emilio Garza of the 5th Circuit; and John Roberts of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

"The nation deserves, and I will select, a Supreme Court justice that Americans can be proud of," Bush said in a brief statement from the White House

Rose Garden. "The nation also deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

The president said he'd consult the Senate before making his choice, but he offered no clues about his intentions with regard to the court's philosophical balance.

O'Connor specified that her resignation wouldn't take effect until her replacement is confirmed.

Her fellow justices paid tribute to her in statements issued by the court.

Clarence Thomas, two stalwart conservatives who often disagreed with O'Connor, praised her temperament.

Scalia called her "a star" who "shaped the jurisprudence of this court more than any other associate justice." Thomas said she was "civil in dissent and gracious when in the majority," and always "warm and courteous."

Ruth Bader Ginsburg, the court's only other woman, recalled O'Connor's surprise appearance in a 1996 theatrical production of Shakespeare's "Henry V." O'Connor's character uttered the line "Hap'ly, a woman's voice may do some good."

"Sandra Day O'Connor's voice has done enormous good in the pursuit of justice for all in our land and the world," Ginsburg said.

Activists at both ends of the political spectrum swung into action within minutes of her announcement. O'Connor's planned departure gave groups that had been on alert for a possible resignation by Rehnquist a new, even more pressing reason to rally supporters.

"Her replacement will turn the direction of this court," said the Rev. Rob Schenck, the president of Faith and Action, a conservative Christian group. "We are already praying and working for a nominee that will not waffle as she did."

The liberal group MoveOn began airing a new television ad urging Bush to avoid an "extremist" nominee.

"The president should honor O'Connor and appoint a moderate Supreme Court justice," said Ben Brandzel, the organization's advocacy director. "If President Bush nominates an extremist, it will be up to senators to say no, and the American people will make sure that they do just that."

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said: "This is a very polarized country when it comes to the issues which will come to the Supreme Court. I would expect people to want their choice. And everybody can't have their own way."

Specter said he expected to hold confirmation hearings in September but didn't rule out action in August if Bush submitted a name to the Senate.

A resignation announcement from Rehnquist would roil the waters even more, but that doesn't seem as likely as it did earlier this year. The 80-year-old chief justice has thyroid cancer but seems to have rallied recently and looks much less feeble than he did when he delivered the oath of office to Bush in January.

Democrats said they'd consider a filibuster, a parliamentary tactic that involves unlimited debate, to block any nominee they considered extremist. Although Senate confirmation requires a bare majority - 51 votes in the 100-member Senate - it takes 60 votes to end a filibuster.

In a deal negotiated with Republicans in May, centrist Democrats had said they'd use the filibuster against judicial nominees only under "extraordinary circumstances."

"That's an option,"

Sen. Christopher Dodd (news, bio, voting record), D-Conn., said when he was asked Friday about filibustering. "I hope we can avoid that. I don't think any of us relish the idea."

O'Connor's decision to retire capped a remarkable career that mirrored the changing role of women in American life. After graduating third in her class from Stanford University law school in 1950 - two notches behind her classmate Rehnquist - the only job offer she received was a chance to become a legal secretary.

Three decades later,

DOJ_NMG_0000754

Ronald Reagan named her to the nation's highest court. The appointment, approved in a unanimous Senate vote, transformed one of the last all-male bastions in government and made O'Connor a reluctant feminist icon.

"I think that I bring to the court differences in background that are more germane than my gender," she told Ladies' Home Journal in 1982. "I think the important fact about my appointment is not that I will decide cases as a woman, but that I am a woman who will get to decide cases."

O'Connor came to the court as a conservative, but she brought an independence that seemed consistent with her background as a rancher's daughter who grew up in relative isolation in Arizona.

She sided with the court's conservative wing in the ruling that decided the 2000 election for Bush, and was a strong advocate of state's rights. She sought a middle ground on abortion, refusing to join conservatives in banning the practice but permitting various restrictions.

O'Connor was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1988, but her swift return to the bench after treatment helped quiet resignation rumors then.

Admirers praised her flexibility. Critics accused her of substituting personal opinion and political considerations for the law.

"We have a living Constitution. Her name is Sandra Day O'Connor, and thank God she's retiring," said

Kevin Hasson, the chairman of The Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, an organization that favors more religious expression in government institutions.

O'Connor has taken issue with suggestions that her ideological independence made her the court's power broker.

"I'm no more powerful than anyone else on this court. That's for sure," she told CNN two years ago. "Collectively, we do render opinions that matter to people, but I've never looked upon myself or the role of the court as being all-powerful."

Rehnquist's Future Still In Question (AP-Y2)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

The future of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, ailing with cancer and the focus of retirement speculation, is still up in the air.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, 75, announced Friday that she was retiring from the Supreme Court, surprising many who had expected that the 80-year-old chief justice would be the one stepping down.

There was no word from the court on Rehnquist's plans. Some court watchers suggested he might stay for another term, health permitting, based on an informal understanding among justices to avoid two retirements in the same term if possible.

One theory is that Rehnquist made clear to O'Connor that he was not planning an imminent retirement, perhaps so that he could reassess his condition over the court's three-month summer recess.

David Garrow, a Supreme Court historian and law professor at Emory University, said he believes that Rehnquist intends to stay another full term. Otherwise, he would have made an announcement by now to avoid a vacancy after the new fall term begins.

"If there is one person whom Justice O'Connor told ahead of time, in addition to her husband, I think it would be the chief justice," Garrow said. "Barring a medical emergency, I think it's certain the chief justice is planning to return in October and believes he'll be fully capable of returning."

Rehnquist announced last October he had thyroid cancer, but after treatment he has been working at the court full-time. The chief justice walks under his own power with a cane, but he has difficulty talking and breathing at times.

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said after visiting Rehnquist recently he didn't believe the chief justice was ready to retire. Specter, who has Hodgkin's disease, a cancer of the lymph system, said he could relate to Rehnquist's health problems.

"Speaking as someone who likes to get up in the morning with something important to do, I wouldn't say that it's keeping the chief alive but I think he likes his job," said Specter, R-Pa. "And if we haven't heard from him by now, the chances are you won't hear from him for some time."

Bill Clinton Poses Social Security Remedy (AP-Y2)

By David Hammer, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

Legalizing more immigrants would help bolster the Social Security system, former President Bill Clinton told the nation's largest Hispanic-rights organization Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0000755

"Those of you who want immigration reform should use Social Security more," Clinton said to about 1,300 members of the League of United Latin American Citizens. "If we legalize just 250,000 more immigrants a year, it would solve half of the shortfall in the Social Security Trust Fund."

More legalized immigrants would put more young people in the system to help support the deluge of baby boomer retirees, Clinton said.

During his 48-minute speech, Clinton didn't mention President Bush's plan to privatize some Social Security accounts, but he did criticize the administration indirectly.

Clinton said Hispanics experienced economic and educational gains under his presidency, but have since faltered, and it was time to figure out "where do we go from here?"

Clinton was greeted by an extended standing ovation and cries of "Viva Clinton!" to which he replied, "You need to calm down. Otherwise, I might think I'm president again."

Also Friday, Democratic National Committee chairman Howard Dean and his GOP counterpart, Ken Mehlman, both spoke before the league convention.

Dean said he would make sure Democrats do more to include Hispanics in state party systems, particularly in Texas.

"In Texas, I don't think there are more than one or two Hispanics in the employ of the state party; that will change and it will change dramatically," Dean said. "We will change our party, but not what we believe in. But we need your help."

Mehlman said President Bush has put more Hispanics in key leadership positions than Clinton, and the GOP exceeded its expectations among Hispanics in the 2004 presidential election. Bush claimed more than 40 percent of the Hispanic vote, according to Associated Press exit polls.

___

On the Net:

League of United Latin American Citizens: http://www.lulac.org

Democratic Group Plans Quirky Campaigns (AP-Y2)

By GLEN JOHNSON, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

WASHINGTON - Rep. Bob Beauprez (news, bio, voting record) of Colorado will be confronted by waffles, be it breakfast, lunch or dinner. Rep. Nancy Johnson (news, bio, voting record) of Connecticut will see her face plastered on an oversize milk carton. When Rep. Jerry Weller (news, bio, voting record) of Illinois marches in a parade, he'll be tailed by someone in a duck costume.

As House Republicans move ahead with plans to vote on Social Security changes this summer, a Democratic opposition group will use the July Fourth recess to pressure GOP lawmakers it believes are undecided about the legislation or susceptible to criticism from their constituents.

The tactics will be far removed from the customs and decorum normally observed on the House floor.

"Beauprez is planning to run for governor; he cares about people all over the state. ... Bring waffles to all events," reads a plan drafted by Americans United to Protect Social Security, a copy of which was obtained by The Associated Press.

"Johnson is missing when it comes to defending Social Security. She refuses to take a stand. ... Major tactics: milk carton — 'Where is Johnson?' 'Johnson Missing,'" it also says.

The plan adds: "July 2-4, tailing Weller with duck costume (as in, stop 'ducking' the issue) at public events/parades."

The congressmen targeted are all members of the House Ways and Means Committee, which will be the first panel in the House to review the legislation. Rep. Bill Thomas, R-Calif., the committee's chairman, expects a vote before Congress takes its summer recess at the end of the month.

While the panel is split 24-17 in favor of the GOP, and Thomas is known to rule it with an iron fist, even some of his fellow Republicans have been slow to embrace the changes proposed by President Bush, or outlined in recent weeks by four Republican committee members, Reps. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, Clay Shaw of Florida, Sam Johnson of Texas and Paul Ryan of Wisconsin.

"The Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, many of whom have straddled the fence, waffled or flip-flopped on the issue of privatization, are having their arms twisted nearly off by Thomas and the House Republican leadership to support this new privatization bill," Americans United writes in its battle plan.

The group proposes to fight back by picketing Shaw's congressional office with signs accusing him of forgetting about less-wealthy constituents. It also focuses on a fellow Florida Republican on the committee, Rep. Mark Foley (news, bio, voting record), with unusually brusque language.

DOJ_NMG_0000756

"Foley is not as concerned (as Shaw) about an electoral challenge, but has many seniors," it reads. "Thin-skinned squealer."

The congressman, who is undecided about any of the plans, said during an interview the campaign smacks of desperation by Democrats and their allies.

Democrats have pointedly refused to offer an alternative until the president drops his accounts proposal. They argue that establishing the accounts is part of an overall effort to transform the program from one providing a guaranteed benefit check to one that provides benefits subject to the ups and downs of the stock market.

"If you're describing a program that has such an impact on seniors, which Social Security is, and your rallying cry is to make such pejorative statements about members, I think you're starting off on the wrong foot," Foley said. "It's so juvenile that they're engaging in a debate without an option, an answer, but they're using a vernacular that indicates they're nothing more than a ragtag group of rebels."

Jordan Stoick, spokesman for Beauprez, said he expects his boss to chuckle when he sees the waffles.

"He's not politically naive and will take this for what it's worth: a ploy by liberal Washington, D.C., special-interest groups," Stoick said.

Drug Lobby Got A Victory In Trade Pact Vote (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

The sidewalk between the drug industry's headquarters in Washington and the United States trade representative's office has been taking a pounding from the wingtips of industry lobbyists.

The work of these drug industry courtiers, who represent what is arguably Washington's biggest and wealthiest lobby, appears to have succeeded in the Central American Free Trade Agreement. The agreement would extend the monopolies of drug makers and, critics say, lead to higher drug prices for the mostly impoverished people of the six Latin American countries it covers.

The accord cleared the Senate on Thursday but faces a difficult floor vote in the House of Representatives this month. The agreement's pharmaceutical provisions are a sideshow in the Congressional debate, eclipsed by concerns of the textile and sugar industries and the labor unions that their interests would not be protected.

In contrast, the agreement's pharmaceutical provisions, which provide five years of market exclusivity to brand-name drugs, have been front and center in Guatemala, where poor AIDS patients have marched in the streets to protest.

The six countries affected by the pact "understand that the net effect of these pharmaceutical provisions will be to raise the price of medicine," said Frederick M. Abbott, a professor of international law at Florida State University. "The way they have to view it is that they're getting something out of the agreement that will give them a net trade benefit."

The problem with such an analysis, Professor Abbott said, is that the textile employers and agricultural producers gain, but the economic benefits may never flow down to the people who cannot afford medicines.

According to Representative Sherrod Brown, Democrat of Ohio, the trade agreement is an example of how the pharmaceutical lobby rarely loses on trade issues, often by quietly working behind the scenes.

"A voter walking down the street would never think of the pharmaceutical industry's influence in another country through the U.S. trade representative," said Mr. Brown, who has criticized how the industry and other corporate interests shaped the trade accord.

The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the drug industry association, is the single biggest influence group at the trade office, according to a new analysis by the Center for Public Integrity, a government watchdog group. The analysis is based on the sheer number of reports, 59, filed by lobbyists for the group since 1998.

The reports do not have to disclose how many individual contacts the lobbyists made.

The industry's primary interest at the trade office is protecting its intellectual property, which Peter R. Dolan, the chief executive of Bristol-Myers Squibb, recently called the "lifeblood" of the industry.

Like movies and software, pharmaceuticals require a lot of time, money and creativity to develop, yet they are fairly simple to replicate. The industry association estimates that intellectual property infringement in 21 countries costs its members $7 billion a year. Therein lies the problem for drug makers, and the reason they are fighting a global war to protect their patents.

In defending their efforts to extend intellectual property protection abroad, industry officials point out that pharmaceutical companies subsidize treatment for millions of people in developing countries. Bristol-Myers, for example, has invested $150 million to set up AIDS clinics and other charitable programs in Africa, a figure that does not include the low-cost drugs the company distributes there.

DOJ_NMG_0000757

The industry association also argues that extending its patent protections worldwide will result in greater access to medications by encouraging drug makers to enter those markets.

"It provides certainty for companies to be able to market and sell their medicines in those particular markets," said Mark Grayson, a spokesman for the trade association.

The certainty, according to Professor Abbott of Florida State, results from the agreement's "highly restrictive market exclusivity rules which allow the originator companies to block any registration."

One of the most contentious provisions in the trade pact is a requirement that gives brand-name manufacturers market exclusivity for five years after a drug is registered in the countries, even if the 20-year patent has expired. A similar five-year period exists in the United States, but the trade agreement would require countries to enforce the five-year period even if the exclusivity period in the United States has already expired.

During that period, manufacturers who ultimately wanted to register a generic equivalent to the drug in that country would be barred from using the animal and human test data submitted for the drug's approval, a provision that critics say could delay the approval of generics beyond the five-year period.

By protecting marketing exclusivity, the industry says, the trade agreement would also spur innovation and encourage pharmaceutical companies to register drugs in the small countries, ultimately helping deliver those drugs to the needy.

It is a philosophical argument that the United States trade representative's office has embraced.

"Trade rules that protect innovation and research foster a system that produces the types of medicines American health consumers and health consumers around the world use and need to fight diseases," said Richard Mills, a spokesman for the trade office. Former Representative Rob Portman, an Ohio Republican, was sworn in to the cabinet-level trade post that runs the trade office in May.

The issue of intellectual property protection for pharmaceuticals has been highlighted in the last week with the Brazilian government's threat to break Abbott Laboratories' patent for the AIDS drug Kaletra by authorizing one of its domestic drug manufacturers to make a copy at roughly half the cost.

The Brazilian government currently buys Kaletra for about 180,000 citizens with AIDS. Abbott Laboratories charges Brazil $2,500 a patient annually. That represents a special price break from the company, which charges $6,000 to $7,000 for the drug in other developed countries, according to figures supplied by the company. Despite the special deal his government is getting, Brazil's president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, wants the drug cheaper.

If President Lula goes through with his threat, he would invoke rarely used "compulsory licensing" provisions of a 1994 World Trade Organization agreement on intellectual property. The agreement forced countries to adopt American-style patent rules for pharmaceuticals, but allowed flexibility in cases of overriding public health issues by giving countries the right to order compulsory licenses.

Citing the Brazilian example, Representative Pete Stark, a California Democrat, referring to the industry trade group, said, "My guess is that Pharma's worry is that one of these countries will say, ' To hell with you,' and start making their own drugs."

Critics of the trade agreement say it sets up barriers to compulsory licensing in the countries it covers - the Dominican Republic as well as Nicaragua, Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras and Costa Rica. The combined gross domestic product of the six countries amounts to a third of the annual revenues of major drug makers.

The pharmaceutical industry has also been successful in influencing trade "priority lists" and "watch lists" issued by the trade representative in recent years, according to the Center for Public Integrity analysis, released this week. Inclusion on the trade watch lists constitutes the first salvo in a trade war.

Last year, the pharmaceutical trade group requested action against 38 countries for infringing on American patents, producing counterfeit drugs and releasing confidential test data. Of those, 31 found their way onto some level of the trade watch list, according to the center's analysis.

The report for 2005, released in May, again showed the extent of the industry's influence. Of 41 companies recommended for inclusion by the industry, 32 made it onto one of the trade lists, the center said.

The trade representative's office disputes the analysis, however, saying the office complies with exact pharmaceutical industry requests involving the priority and watch lists only about half the time.

The 59 reports filed by lobbyists for the pharmaceutical association do not count dozens of reports filed by individual companies. The analysis revealed that Pfizer lobbyists had filed reports about lobbying the trade office 32 times during the same period; Bristol-Myers, 27 times; and Wyeth, 19 times.

Over all, the various representatives of the pharmaceutical association and its individual companies filed 289 reports of lobbying at the trade representative's office since 1998, making pharmaceuticals the fourth-largest lobbying interest group, behind miscellaneous manufacturing, business associations and agriculture, according to the center's analysis.

Mr. Grayson said extensive lobbying efforts by his industry were a good sign.

"If we're not doing a lot, we're not doing our job," Mr. Grayson said.

Bush Names Kelliher To Head Energy Panel (LAT/BLOOM)

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

Joseph Kelliher, an advocate of expanded authority for regulators to police power markets, was named by President Bush to succeed Pat Wood as chairman of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

Kelliher, 44, was on Bush's transition team before joining the commission in November 2003.

Lawmakers Agree On Road Spending (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

House and Senate negotiators have agreed to a level of spending for highway and transit projects that is acceptable to the White House. The agreement clears a major hurdle in the two-year effort to develop a new federal transportation plan.

Negotiators "have been working on a compromise for a transportation bill that would make much-needed improvements to federal highways," House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said in a midnight speech on the House floor Thursday. "Tonight they came to an agreement . . . to move that bill forward."

Hastert provided no details. Congressional aides said the two sides have agreed on spending $286.5 billion over the six-year period ending in September 2009. The aides said the administration would accept that level.

Yesterday, President Bush signed an extension of the previous transportation bill for the eighth time since it expired in 2003. The program was funded at $218 billion over six years.

Congress has been unable to come up with a new bill, in part because lawmakers have sought significant increases in spending for transportation projects, drawing a veto threat from the White House over the cost of the bill.

This year the White House has warned that President Bush would veto any bill that went over $284 billion, the level approved in the House bill passed last March.

The Senate in May passed a $295 billion bill. Its sponsors proposed increasing revenues by cracking down on tax fraud and other measures so that it would not add to the federal deficit.

Money for highway and transit spending is derived from the Highway Trust Fund, which comes from the 18.4-cent-a-gallon federal tax that drivers pay at the gasoline pump.

The latest extension goes through July 19, giving negotiators several weeks after they return from the Independence Day recess to work out details of the legislation, including the formula that determines how much states get in federal grants in relation to their contributions to the trust fund.

Pentagon Is Asked To Justify Parts Of Base-Closing Plan (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

The independent commission assessing the Pentagon's proposed list of domestic base closings directed Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Friday to justify more than a dozen of the recommendations, the first clear signal that the panel may alter some of the military's choices.

In one case, the panel asked the Pentagon to explain why it did not recommend closing the naval shipyard at Pearl Harbor in Hawaii even though it is less efficient and had a lower military value than the military's choice for closure, the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard in Maine.

The commission's requests, contained in a seven-page letter from the panel chairman, Anthony J. Principi, came as federal investigators cautioned in a report issued on Friday that the Pentagon may have overstated the plan's estimated savings of $48.8 billion over 20 years.

The review of the Pentagon's proposal by the Government Accountability Office found that 80 percent of the Pentagon's projected savings from base closings and consolidations came from only 10 percent of the recommendations and that nearly half the projected savings were from cuts in military jobs that in many cases would simply be reassigned to other areas.

"This could create a false sense of savings available for other purposes," the report said.

Members of the commission have visited dozens of installations and held several public hearings in communities that are pulling out all the stops to persuade the commission to reverse the Pentagon's plans. The panel's request for more information resulted from questions raised in those visits and hearings, and from other public comments.

Mr. Principi, a former secretary of veterans affairs, said in May that the panel would not be "a rubber stamp" for the Defense Department. The four previous base-closing commissions endorsed 85 percent of the military's recommendations.

DOJ_NMG_0000759

Lawmakers from some states that would suffer deep cuts under the Pentagon's plan, including Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, said that the panel's challenge to the military's recommendations reinforced many of the arguments they have been making. The commission will hold a hearing in Boston on Wednesday, where the fate of the Maine shipyard will be the hot topic.

In a separate letter to Ms. Snowe, Mr. Principi warned that the panel was "inquiring, not deciding," and that his letter to Mr. Rumsfeld was simply a request for more information. When the commission meets on July 19, it will need the vote of seven of its nine members to add a base to the Pentagon's list for consideration. At least two commission members would then be required to visit the site and hold a public hearing.

At the panel's final deliberations, which are scheduled for the week of Aug. 22, at least seven members would have to vote to close one of the bases added to the list. The commission must submit its findings to President Bush by Sept. 8. The president and Congress have until Nov. 7 to reject or accept the entire package.

In addition to Portsmouth, the commission asked why the Pentagon did not recommend consolidating the Marine Corps' recruiting depots on the East and West Coasts, and why it did not suggest closing Pope Air Force Base in North Carolina. It also asked the Pentagon to justify its decision to shrink, but not close, Grand Forks Air Base in North Dakota and why it did not consolidate the headquarters for the armed services' surgeons general at a new national medical center in Bethesda, Md.

The Government Accountability Office report found that the cost to carry out the proposed closures and consolidations in this round alone was $24.4 billion, compared with a total of $22 billion for the four previous rounds combined, as of 2001. This increase was due largely to the proposed cost of building new housing for troops returning from Europe ($2.3 billion) and the expense of building new facilities ($1.3 billion) for personnel who would move out of leased space, much of it in the Washington area that was deemed to be vulnerable to terrorist attack.

The report said that 22 percent of the recommendations would not yield savings within six years and a handful would produce no savings. The investigators said that savings could be difficult to track, and urged Mr. Rumsfeld to establish mechanisms to monitor savings estimates.

A Pentagon spokesman, Glenn Flood, said officials there were pleased with the G.A.O.'s report, and would supply the requested information before the July 19 hearing.

Panel Targets More Bases For Closure (AP-Y2)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

Military bases in Hawaii and California are among several a commission is considering adding to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's list of proposed closures.

In a letter sent Friday to the Pentagon chief, commission Chairman Anthony Principi identified additional bases the commission may recommend closing and seeks explanations for why the Pentagon decided to leave those facilities open.

Specifically, the letter asks why Marine Corps Recruit Depot and the Navy Broadway Complex, both in San Diego, Calif., and the U.S. Naval Shipyard at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, were not slated for closure.

It also questions the Pentagon's decisions to downsize, rather than close, the Naval Air Station in Brunswick, Maine, Pope Air Force Base in North Carolina, and Grand Forks Air Force Base in North Dakota.

And, the letter asks for more explanation about the proposed reorganization of Air National Guard facilities across the country and the downsizing of several other small facilities.

In May, the Pentagon proposed closing or reducing forces at 62 major bases and hundreds of smaller installations to save money and streamline the services. Dozens of other facilities would grow, absorbing troops from domestic and overseas bases slated for closure or downsizing.

The law that authorized the first round of base closings in a decade requires the Pentagon to answer such questions before the commission can recommend closing or downsizing a facility that wasn't on Rumsfeld's original list.

In another letter to members of Congress on Friday, Principi said, "Please be assured that the commission has not decided to close or realign any installations."

"We are in the early stages of a multistep process," he continued, adding that the commission simply is seeking more information from Rumsfeld before decided whether to add bases to the list. "The commission is inquiring, not deciding."

The commission will conduct a public hearing on July 19 in Washington to decide whether bases left off the list should be added. It takes seven of nine votes to add a base. Public hearings and base visits would follow.

Bases, including any added to the list in July, can be removed from the list later, but the commission won't make those decisions until August.

DOJ_NMG_0000760

The commission must send its revised list to the president in September. He must approve it in its entirety or send it back to the commission for more work. Once the president signs off on it, the list goes to Congress, which must accept it or reject it as a whole.

The Pentagon says it will save $49 billion over 20 years by streamlining services across the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps and shutting down bases deemed inefficient.

On Friday, the Government Accountability Office released a report that found upfront costs will total $24 billion and questioned the Pentagon's projected savings.

"We believe the recommendations overall, if approved, would produce savings," the report said. However, it added, "there are clear limitations associated with the projected savings, such as the lack of military end-strength reductions and uncertainties associated with other savings estimates."

The report said eliminating jobs held by military personnel would make up about half of the annual recurring savings. However, the report said much of that money won't be available for other uses because the jobs — and salaries — simply will be relocating to other areas.

"Without recognition that these are not dollar savings that can be readily applied elsewhere, this could create a false sense of savings available for other purposes," the report said.

____

On the Net:

BRAC: http://www.brac.gov

Government Accountability Office: http://www.gao.gov/

In Mississippi, Soaring Costs Force Deep Medicaid Cuts (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Starting Friday, most Medicaid recipients in Mississippi will be limited to five prescription drugs at a time, with no process for appeal. The cap appears to be the most restrictive in the nation, but is just one of many measures being taken by states seeking to rein in soaring Medicaid costs.

It will hit hard for people like Erainna Johnson, 42, left legally blind by a stroke in 1997. She takes 19 medications - already more than the previous Medicaid limit of seven - relying on family members, her church and free samples from doctors to make up the difference. "Sometimes I just crack my pills in half, honestly," she said, sitting in the living room of her trailer here.

Mississippi is among many states moving aggressively to contain Medicaid costs, saying severe measures are necessary if the program is to continue. In Missouri, new cuts also took effect Friday in an effort to reduce the rolls; for example, a single mother of three in Missouri is now ineligible if she makes more than $350 a month. About a dozen states limit the number of prescriptions offered to adult patients, but almost all provide for an appeal process or allow doctors to override the limit.

In Mississippi, where more than a quarter of the population is on Medicaid, the cap includes a limit of two name-brand drugs. The only patients exempt from the rule are children, people in nursing homes and patients with H.I.V., who were given an 11th-hour reprieve because virtually none of the anti-viral drugs used were available in generic form.

Gov. Haley Barbour, a Republican who backed steeper cuts to Medicaid than those enacted, said the Legislature had come up with the limit on prescription drugs on its own. But, he added, "states are limited in their options as far as cost control."

The cost of Medicaid, financed jointly by the federal government and the states, has risen 63 percent in five years and is now more than $300 billion a year. Governors from both parties have asked the federal government to allow them more latitude in restricting Medicaid spending.

Advocates for the ill and the disabled in Mississippi say many patients require more medicine than the new restrictions allow. Others who could be affected include diabetics, the mentally ill and cancer patients. Of the 768,000 Medicaid patients in 2004, 80,000 used more than five prescriptions a month.

Mary Troupe, the executive director of the Mississippi Coalition for Citizens with Disabilities, said the policy amounted to state control of medical decisions that only doctors were qualified to make. If a patient is already taking five medications, Ms. Troupe said, "what happens when they're needing a particular antibiotic or any other medications for any complications?"

Ms. Troupe said the fact that nursing home residents were exempt would push more people into institutional care, which is generally far more expensive for the state and far worse for a patient's quality of life.

Ms. Johnson said that she and her doctor had reviewed her medications to see if there were any she could live without. Not the female hormones, because she had just had a hysterectomy to remove fibroid tumors. Not the asthma medicine or the eyedrops that preserve her little remaining sight. Not the pills to compensate for her removed gallbladder, those for angina relief or the pills that tame her irritable bowel syndrome.

DOJ_NMG_0000761

"I've tried it myself, to pull myself off," she said, adding that she had even changed her diet to include more vegetables and fruit. "And I've become very ill, very sick."

This year, Mississippi lawmakers borrowed $240 million from the state's health care trust fund to cover a Medicaid budget gap. The measures that took effect Friday, which also include higher co-payments and hospital bed taxes and cut home care visits to 25 a year from 60, will save an estimated $120 million a year.

The current plan came after a judge temporarily blocked an effort, backed by Mr. Barbour, to cut 65,000 people from Medicaid rolls last year. The 65,000 fell into a category known as Poverty-Level Aged and Disabled that states are not required to cover. States are also not required to provide a prescription drug benefit.

Maxine Mahoney, 82, of Jackson, was one of those who would have been cut. Saved by the judge's injunction, she must now contend with the new cuts. She lives on $605 a month and takes 12 prescriptions, the most expensive of which is $330 a month, for ailments that include heart disease, high blood pressure and a nerve dysfunction. A prescription drug benefit under Medicare, the federal program that covers people 65 and older, begins in January.

Asked what politicians should do about the costs, Ms. Mahoney shrugged. "The Bible tells us we must pray for those in authority," she said. "And I do pray for them. I'm 82 years old, what more can I do?"

State Representative Stephen Holland, a Democrat on the House's Medicaid committee, said he had argued against proposals from the State Division of Medicaid for deeper cuts, like a limit of three drugs.

"The reality was we had to ratchet it down some or run the risk of losing the whole program because of the spiraling costs," Mr. Holland said.

Sweeping Medicaid Cuts Hit Missourians (REU-Y2)

By Carey Gillam

Reuters, July 2, 2005

Fending off a late courtroom challenge, Missouri implemented sweeping cuts in Medicaid on Friday, reducing benefits so sharply that critics called the moves among the most severe in the nation.

The new Medicaid standards, championed by Missouri's new Republican Gov. Matt Blunt to avoid tax increases, trimmed Missouri's budget by $231 million, but are expected to cut more than 68,000 Missourians out of the Medicaid program over the next year.

Under the new standards, a single mother of two children is deemed ineligible if she makes more than $350 a month, for instance. Previously, the income line was drawn at $1,050 a month. An estimated 24,000 children are expected to lose their benefits, dental coverage is being cut for adults, and disabled people are losing coverage for crutches and other aids.

An analysis by the nonprofit Center on Budget Priorities and Policies said Missouri's Medicaid expenditures were already below the national norm before the cuts and the new program is among the harshest "that any state has ever instituted."

"It is pretty draconian," said Marc Cohan, director of litigation for the Welfare Law Center in New York, which filed a lawsuit against Missouri on Wednesday, along with the National Health Law Program in Washington. "Missouri has made a choice ... to balance the budget on the backs of the poor," Cohan said.

The suit alleges the state is rushing the cuts into effect and in the process cutting off people who should remain eligible. U.S. District Judge Nanette Laughrey denied a request for a temporary injunction on Thursday.

Besides Missouri, several other states are moving aggressively to rein in Medicaid spending and Congress is considering a plan to cut federal contributions to Medicaid by $10 billion over five years.

Missouri, which spends about $2 billion annually in state money on Medicaid, has defended its actions and calls the previous Medicaid level of benefits "unsustainable."

"We continue to provide a very generous Medicaid program," said Missouri Department of Social Services director Gary Sherman in a statement issued on Friday.

Medicaid Cuts Hit Missourians (KCS)

By Kit Wagar And Debra Skodack The Kansas City Star

The Kansas City Star, July 2, 2005

Medical coverage for more than 23,000 Missourians lapsed as planned Friday after a federal judge denied a request to delay the changes.

The delay was sought by two public-interest law firms that sued the Department of Social Services on Wednesday, alleging that Medicaid recipients had received inadequate notice of the cutoff and were not given the proper chance to appeal the state's ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0000762

But U.S. District Judge Nanette Laughrey issued an order late Thursday night denying the request for an injunction that would have allowed Medicaid coverage to continue. Laughrey said she would file her ruling outlining the reasons for her order at a later date.

State officials were pleased with the ruling. Gary Sherman, Missouri's director of social services, praised Gov. Matt Blunt and lawmakers for moving to rein in "a rate of program expansion that was absolutely unsustainable."

"We are confident that the needed reforms … will ensure the program remains solvent while a new, more viable system is crafted," Sherman said in a written statement. "We continue to provide a very generous Medicaid program, committing over 29 percent of the state's total budget to provide medical services to needy Missourians."

Marc Cohan, who argued the case for the Welfare Law Center of New York, one of the groups that challenged the state's actions, said he would continue trying to convince the judge that the state's methods are causing people to be thrown off the program even though they still are eligible.

He pointed to the three St. Louis women in the lawsuit who were told they were losing Medicaid coverage. After the lawsuit was filed, the state acknowledged that those determinations were erroneous.

"We have no faith that the department's review process will catch those cases," Cohan said. "The three named plaintiffs are not the only ones. We will continue to fight to make sure that anyone still eligible gets their eligibility restored as quickly as possible."

Those dropped from the Medicaid program are mostly low-income parents who have not worked enough during the last six months to qualify for temporary coverage while they gain work experience.

Deborah Scott, spokeswoman for social services, said the department's review and appeals process restored coverage for 488 who at first had been determined ineligible under Friday's new rules.

The cutoff in coverage — part of Gov. Matt Blunt's plan to restructure and downsize Medicaid — was authorized by Missouri lawmakers when they adopted a budget that dramatically lowered the maximum income an adult was allowed to have and still remain eligible.

Scott said 22,020 persons lost coverage Friday because their income exceeded 23 percent of the federal poverty level. Previously, they qualified with income up to 75 percent of the poverty level.

An additional 1,560 persons on Friday exhausted temporary coverage intended to help make the transition from welfare to work.

For about 44,200 other people, the clock began ticking Friday on Medicaid coverage. Those people moved from the regular Medicaid program to transitional status that will last six months to a year.

Organizations that provide health care to Kansas City's indigent said they noticed some changes Friday but no signs of panic.

Sheri Wood, executive director of the Kansas City Free Health Clinic, said the Medicaid changes prompted several calls Thursday and Friday to the mental health clinic. People who had lost Medicaid coverage were making appointments at her clinic so their treatment and medications could continue uninterrupted.

Shelly Phinney, corporate manager of the financial consulting center at Truman Medical Center, said pregnant women came into Truman on Friday thinking they were no longer covered.

The women did not realize that pregnant women qualify for Medicaid at much higher income levels than for regular Medicaid coverage for most adults. Coverage for pregnant women was not changed.

Some nonemergency patients were unaware they no longer had coverage. "They were shocked," Phinney said. "We did treat them."

Phinney said some patients were eligible for transitional benefits but had not applied for them. She said her office was fairly calm.

"A lot of it might be because it is a day before a holiday (weekend)," Phinney said. "I do imagine it will be a lot busier, maybe next week."

Kelvin Simmons, vice president of development at Swope Health Services, said that facility was noticeably busier. "I am not sure whether it is busy because it is a day before the holiday or it being D-Day," Simmons said. He said it was likely to become even busier.

"I don't think it's sunk in," he said of the Medicaid changes.

First glance

¦ Because their income exceeds 23 percent of the federal poverty level, thousands of Missouri residents lost their Medicaid coverage Friday.

¦ Those dropped from the program are mostly low-income parents.

DOJ_NMG_0000763

Tutors' Zeal Based On Faith (WT)

By Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

Maryland's only faith-based tutoring service has found a home in a Bladensburg church where teachers are helping needy students improve their reading, writing and math skills.

As about 100 elementary-school students yesterday concluded a two-week tutorial inside the St. Luke's Episcopal Church, Eileen Dowd said her Mrs. Dowd's Teaching Service is a worldwide network of Christian teachers but the curriculum focuses on helping children, not preaching.

"We teach secular math and reading," she said. "I was a teacher for more than 30 years, and we feel a real responsibility to teach solid math and reading skills. We do it with kindness and compassion, but we don't teach religion. That's not our goal."

Mrs. Dowd said the program works one on one or in small groups with children of all backgrounds, cultures and religions.

President Bush signed an executive order in December 2002 allowing federal money to be awarded to faith-based organizations through grants and contracts.

Mrs. Dowd's service receives about $1,700 per student, so those who qualified for free or reduced school-lunch programs can receive the free tutoring.

"The community is behind us and involved all the way," Mrs. Dowd said.

She said the roughly 40 certified teachers, student teachers and teachers' assistants have also taken a "big leap of faith" because the paperwork for them to get paid is still incomplete.

Most of the students at St. Luke's attend Bladensburg Elementary School and were split this summer into either the 8 a.m.-to-11:30 a.m. or the 1 p.m.-to-4 p.m. session.

"The good part about this program is that the students deal with an actual face rather than a computer," said Rhonda Pitts, the Bladensburg school principal. "I recommended it because of the personal touch."

Yesterday, the students got an anatomy lesson using the brain, heart and lungs of a sheep.

"It was slimy to touch, but I learned that the heart never stops pumping blood." said 8-year-old Ronald Coello.

Michael Lidner, a 17-year-old who was home-schooled, taught the class.

"The tutoring helps them learn what they didn't learn during the school year, finding weaknesses and what they can improve on," he said.

Michael, who studied anatomy and physiology, said teaching the children was initially "pretty difficult" but gradually became fun as the children got used to him.

"It was interesting to see them open up more as time went on," he said. "It's definitely been a new experience for me."

The program also fine-tuned the students' addition and subtraction skills.

"I got better on multiplication and fractions," said Justyce Nicholson, an 8-year-old from Bladensburg. Quizzed about the sum of two halves, she quickly and confidently answered correctly.

"Math is my favorite subject," said Kenneth Evans, an 8-year-old from Bladensburg whose mother signed him up for the program.

Senate Keeps 'Bunker-Buster' Program Alive (AP-Y2)

By H. JOSEF HEBERT, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration may get another chance to try to develop an earth-penetrating nuclear warhead. The Senate on Friday agreed to revive the "bunker-buster" program that Congress last year decided to kill.

Administration officials have maintained that the country needs to try to develop a nuclear warhead that would be capable of destroying deeply buried targets including bunkers tunneled into solid rock.

But opponents said that its benefits are questionable and that such a warhead would cause extensive radiation fallout above ground killing thousands of people. And they say it may make it easier for a future president to decide to use the nuclear option instead of a conventional weapon.

The Senate early Friday voted 53-43 to include $4 million for research into the feasibility of a bunker-buster nuclear warhead. Earlier this year, the House refused to provide the money, so a final decision will have to be worked between the two chambers.

The money is included in a $31.2 billion spending measure for the Energy Department and other programs. Last year Congress killed the program, but the Bush administration asked that it be revived.

DOJ_NMG_0000764

Supporters of the program said the $4 million does not signal development of any new warheads. They argue that the money would be used to see whether a sufficiently hardened casing could be developed for an existing warhead so that it can penetrate beneath the earth before exploding and destroy reinforced underground bunkers.

But Sen. Dianne Feinstein (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif., one of Congress' most vocal opponents of the bunker-buster, said the program "sends the wrong signals to the rest of the world by reopening the nuclear door and beginning the testing and development of a new generation of nuclear weapons."

"A bunker-buster cannot penetrate into the Earth deeply enough to avoid massive casualties and the spewing of millions of cubic feet of radioactive materials into the atmosphere," said Feinstein.

Last April, a panel of the National Academy of Sciences, concluded that an earth-penetrating nuclear device would likely cause the same casualties as a surface burst if the weapons are of the same size. Such a bomb could cause from several thousand to 1 million casualties depending on its yield and location, according to the report requested by Congress.

At a congressional hearing earlier this year, Linton Brooks, head of the National Nuclear Security Administration, which oversees nuclear weapons programs, acknowledged that there is no way to avoid significant fallout of radioactive debris from use of a bunker-buster warhead.

He said the administration never intended to suggest "that it was possible to have a bomb that penetrated far enough to trap all fallout. I don't believe the laws of physics will ever let that be true."

Nevertheless, Brooks and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld have argued that a nuclear weapon that can destroy hardened, deeply buried targets is needed in the U.S. arsenal.

When challenged by Feinstein over the bunker buster at a hearing in April, Rumsfeld said there are many potential U.S. adversaries that are capable of putting hardened facilities deep underground, often in solid rock, that conventional weapons cannot reach.

Senate Votes To Shut Down Laser Meant For Fusion Study (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

The Senate voted early yesterday morning to stop construction of the nation's costliest science project, a laser roughly the size of a football stadium that is meant to harness fusion, the process that powers the Sun.

The project, the National Ignition Facility, or NIF (pronounced niff), is at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory in California and has cost $2.8 billion. About 80 percent complete, NIF is scheduled to be finished in 2009 at a cost of $3.5 billion and operate for three decades at an annual cost of $150 million, for a total of $8 billion.

The Senate's action, part of the $31 billion energy and water appropriations bill, prompted warnings from the project's leaders that its demise could damage the nation's leadership in a field important to confronting energy shortages. This week, an international consortium picked France as the site of the world's first large-scale, sustainable nuclear fusion reactor, a project with an estimated cost of $10 billion.

"What's at stake here is the opportunity to meet one of the grand challenges of science," Michael R. Anastasio, director of the Livermore laboratory, said in an interview. "It's essential for investigating fusion, which will help sustain confidence in our nuclear stockpile and inform our future thinking about fusion energy."

Other Livermore officials warned of a parallel to the Superconducting Supercollider, a proposed 54-mile particle accelerator that Congress killed in 1993 after spending $2 billion. Some physicists regard its fate as a symbol of the erosion of the nation's scientific standing.

The Bush administration backs the National Ignition Facility, and the Senate action could be reversed or modified later this summer in conference with the House.

"There's going to be some meeting of the minds," said Greg Mello, director of the Los Alamos Study Group, a private organization in Albuquerque that monitors the nation's nuclear laboratories. "I think NIF will be hurt, but I doubt that it will come to a complete standstill."

In nuclear fusion, atoms merge and release bursts of energy, as in the sun or in hydrogen bombs.

The facility's powerful laser beams are intended to produce blistering hot conditions similar to those in exploding nuclear arms, helping scientists ensure the reliability of the nation's nuclear stockpile without the need for underground tests. Less directly, scientists want to use the beams to explore laser fusion as a way of producing commercial power.

But last month, Senator Pete V. Domenici, the New Mexico Republican who heads the Subcommittee on Energy and Water, proposed to delete all construction money, $146 million, from the administration's request for the coming year.

The bill does provide $314 million for limited research. Livermore scientists have built 4 of NIF's planned 192 laser beams and are firing them at targets the size of a BB, producing the first scientific insights.

DOJ_NMG_0000765

Mr. Domenici, whose state includes both the Los Alamos and Sandia National Laboratories, in recent statements has accused the administration of "single-mindedly" supporting the California project at the expense of other worthy efforts. The ignition facility "is just one of many tools that must be supported," he said.

"The Senate bill will correct this imbalance," he said.

Senate Leader Calls For Limits On Drug Ads (NYT)

By Stephanie Saul

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

The Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, called yesterday on the pharmaceutical industry to limit drug advertising directed at consumers, increasing the pressure on companies to curb such marketing.

Senator Frist, a Tennessee Republican, embraced an increasingly popular idea, a delay in advertising after a drug is introduced. He called for a two-year restriction.

Proponents of a delay say it will give doctors time to understand how drugs work before patients begin asking for them, sometimes based on inflated claims.

"This advertising can lead to inappropriate prescribing and fuel prescription drug spending," Senator Frist said. "It can also oversell benefits and minimize risks."

He also said he would ask the Government Accountability Office to examine whether the Food and Drug Administration should review drug advertising before its publication or broadcast.

The senator's remarks, delivered yesterday on the Senate floor and posted on his Web site, add a politically powerful voice to the growing support for some limits on the quality and quantity of drug ads aimed at consumers.

Such advertising has grown to a $3.8 billion industry since 1997, when the F.D.A. lifted limits on it.

Consumer drug advertising has prompted a reaction in recent months. Some critics say it contributed to an excessive, unnecessary use of cox-2 painkillers, which were later shown to cause serious cardiovascular problems in some patients. Others criticized the drug industry for prime-time erectile dysfunction drug ads that are laden with sexual innuendo.

The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, a trade association, is formulating guidelines for advertising and is likely to adopt them this month. It is unlikely that the guidelines will require a moratorium on advertising new drugs, said Ken Johnson, a spokesman for the association.

"We believe as an industry that there should be an appropriate way to educate doctors and health care providers before advertising begins," Mr. Johnson said. "But we also believe strongly that patients have a right to know about new drugs that could save and improve the quality of their lives."

Last month, Bristol-Myers Squibb became the first company to embrace a self-imposed lag time - 12 months - between the introduction of a drug and consumer advertising. Also last month, the American Medical Association decided to conduct a study of consumer drug advertising after several medical groups proposed that the association recommend limits on ads.

U.S. Economy: Factory Index, Confidence Increase (BLOOM)

By Joe Richter

Bloomberg, July 2, 2005

U.S. manufacturing accelerated in June for the first time in seven months, consumer confidence rose and auto sales surged, supporting the Federal Reserve's view that the economy is weathering higher energy prices.

The Institute for Supply Management said today that its factory index rose to 53.8 from 51.4 in May. Manufacturing remains in an uninterrupted expansion that began in June 2003, marked by readings higher than 50. The University of Michigan said today its sentiment index reached a six-month high in June.

U.S. Treasury notes tumbled after the factory report, which showed orders are picking up as companies work off inventories that swelled in the first quarter. The Fed raised its benchmark interest rate for a ninth time yesterday to head off faster inflation and said in a statement that ``although energy prices have risen further, the expansion remains firm."

``It's clear that consumers are beginning to feel much better, and manufacturing is coming out of its soft patch," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight Inc., a forecasting firm in Lexington, Massachusetts. ``This is certainly one more piece of evidence that the Fed has the picture right."

The university's index increased to 96 last month from a preliminary estimate of 94.8 two weeks ago and the 86.9 reading in May. The rise suggests Americans will be in the mood to spend. A measure of current conditions, which reflects people's perception of their financial situation and whether it's a good time to buy, rose to the highest level since November 2000.

Auto Sales

DOJ_NMG_0000766

General Motors Corp., the world's biggest automaker, said today that extending employee discounts to all buyers sparked a 47 percent jump in sales last month, the most since August 1999. Sales also increased at Toyota Motor Corp., Nissan Motor Co., Ford Motor Co. and DaimlerChrysler AG, resulting in a 16 percent gain for the industry from the year-earlier month.

A separate report from the Commerce Department showed construction spending fell 0.9 percent in May, the third straight decrease. Government revisions switched four of the first five months of this year from gains to declines. Even so, construction in May was up 7 percent from the same time last year.

U.S. Treasuries tumbled, pushing the yield on the 10-year note above 4 percent for the first time since June 22, after institute's report bolstered speculation the Fed is no closer to ending a series of interest-rate increases, as some investors expect. The yield on the benchmark note, which moves opposite to the price, rose 13 basis points to 4.04 percent at 5:31 p.m. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index rose 3.1 points, or 0.3 percent.

Federal Reserve

The central bank yesterday boosted its target rate to 3.25 percent from 3 percent and said it can continue to lift short-term borrowing costs at a ``measured'' pace.

A reading of 51.4 was forecast for the June ISM report, based on the median estimate of 72 economists in a Bloomberg News survey. The institute, based in Tempe, Arizona, surveys more than 400 companies in 20 industries, including clothing, printing, transportation and plastics to compile its index.

The institute's new orders gauge, which makes up about a third of the total, rose to 57.2, the highest this year, from 51.7 in May. The production index, a measure of work being performed, increased to 55.6 from 54.9.

``Demand continues to be strong and robust for our business,'' said Matt Szulik, chief executive officer at Red Hat Inc., in an interview. Red Hat, the world's biggest distributor of the Linux computer-operating system, said sales rose 46 percent in the first quarter.

Inventories

The prices paid index fell to 50.5, the lowest since February 2002, from 58 in May. The backlog of orders gauge rose to 51.5 from 51. The index of supplier deliveries, which measures how long it takes to get materials, increased to 53.1 from 50.5.

The factory institute's employment index rose to 49.9 from 48.8 in May. The inventories index held at 47.8. The new export orders index fell to 50.4.

Inventories in the first quarter grew by $66.8 billion, the most since the second quarter of 2000, the Commerce Department said this week. There are signs that companies are starting to have some success in drawing down excess inventories, which bodes well for second-half growth, according to some economists.

``That is encouraging because manufacturing has been the weak link in the economy,'' said John Miller, a Chicago-based portfolio manager at Nuveen Asset Management, in an interview. ``There has been a draw down in excess inventories over the second quarter and that should bode well for future quarters in terms of building the inventories back up.''

Inventories

GM's offer of incentives, set to end July 5, helped pare the company's inventory to a 64-day supply of vehicles from 81 days in May, analyst Robert Barry of Goldman Sachs estimated.

The increase in new orders in the ISM report ``reduces the concern over inventories,'' said Norbert Ore, chairman of the ISM manufacturing survey, in a conference call with reporters. ``We can't proclaim that inventories are no longer a problem, but it gives us some hope that things are looking better than they did last month.''

The economy will probably expand at a 3.3 percent annual rate in the current quarter that ends tomorrow, according to a Bloomberg News survey of economists last month. That's down from 3.8 percent in the first quarter and 4.4 percent for all of last year. It still exceeds the 3 percent annual average during the past three decades.

In Europe, manufacturing in the dozen nations sharing the euro contracted for a third straight month in June because of higher crude oil prices. The 49.9 reading in the factory gauge followed a 22-month low of 48.7 a month earlier, according to a survey of about 3,000 purchasing managers, compiled by NTC Research Ltd. for Reuters Group Plc.

Energy Costs

Rising energy prices may still limit growth at the nation's factories. Crude oil closed above $60 a barrel for the first time on the New York Mercantile Exchange this week and traded at about $58 a barrel today. ISM's Ore said that oil prices at this level will make it ``hard to maintain'' the expansion in manufacturing.

``Oil prices are an issue, and companies would rather go into the summer a little lean on inventories than fat,'' said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors in Holland, Pennsylvania. ``It's just a logical decision for businesses when uncertainty sets in.''

DOJ_NMG_0000767

Alcoa Inc., the world's biggest aluminum maker, said June 23 it will shed 6,500 jobs and close plants because of a drop in prices and higher energy costs. The plant shutdowns will include a factory in Kentucky that makes auto parts, the Pittsburgh-based company said.

Heating Demand Pushes Oil Up $2.25 (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Crude oil rose more than $2 a barrel in New York yesterday, pulled higher by record heating-oil prices created by concern that refiners will not be able to meet peak demand during the winter.

Demand for distillate fuel, a category that includes heating oil and diesel, has surged because of a growing global economy.

"It's unusual to see heating oil lead the complex in the middle of the summer," said Jason Schenker, an economist at the Wachovia Corporation in Charlotte, N.C. "There are two things leading the heating-oil rally, concern about heating-oil supplies this winter and strong diesel demand."

He said a report from the Institute for Supply Management showing an increase in manufacturing in June indicated that industrial consumption would continue to grow strongly.

Crude oil for August delivery rose $2.25, or 4 percent, to close at $58.75 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, the biggest gain since June 1.

Heating oil for August delivery rose 7.5 cents, or 4.6 percent, to close at $1.7111 a gallon in New York. Gasoline for August delivery increased 8.27 cents, or 5.3 percent, to $1.6485 a gallon in New York, the biggest gain it has seen since Nov. 19.

U.S. Stocks Gain On Manufacturing Report; Shares Of GM Advance (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, July 2, 2005

U.S. stocks rose as a stronger-than- expected manufacturing report reinforced the Federal Reserve's suggestion that the economy can withstand higher interest rates.

``Business continues to do well," said Tom Wirth, who manages $1.3 billion at Chemung Canal Trust Co. in Elmira, New York. ``Earnings will be as good or better than expected and we'll see some nice growth. I expect the market to find some support."

General Motors Corp., the world's biggest automaker, advanced after posting its largest monthly sales increase since 1999. Energy shares including Exxon Mobil Corp. got a lift from higher oil prices.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 3.11, or 0.3 percent, to 1194.44. The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 28.47, or 0.3 percent, to 10,303.44. The Nasdaq Composite Index was little changed, up 0.41 at 2057.37.

Gains in benchmark indexes were restrained by oil prices, which rebounded from a three-day decline. Crude oil for August delivery surged 4 percent to $58.75 a barrel in New York.

For the week, the S&P 500 rose 0.2 percent. It gained 0.9 percent in the second quarter ended yesterday for the smallest quarterly move in three years. The Dow average finished this week 0.1 percent higher after completing the April through June period with a 2.2 percent drop. The Nasdaq Composite, up 0.2 percent for the week, climbed 2.9 percent in the quarter.

`Firm' Expansion

A private survey showed the pace of manufacturing growth accelerated in June for the first time in seven months. The Institute for Supply Management's factory index climbed to 53.8 from 51.4 in May, supporting the Fed's view that the economic expansion ``remains firm" even as oil holds close to a record.

The central bank yesterday lifted its target rate to 3.25 percent, the ninth boost in as many meetings. Policy makers also restated their intention to make future rate increases at a ``measured" pace.

``There were no surprises out of the Fed," said Art Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies & Co. in Boston. ``Earnings will be the next big market mover and my guess is that we'll again be low on our estimates."

Another report today showed consumer confidence increased for the first time this year. The University of Michigan's index climbed to 96 in June from 86.9 in May.

Slower Trading

Trading slowed as investors got an early start on the three-day weekend. Exchanges will be shut on July 4 for Independence Day. The bond market closed at 2:00 p.m.

Thirteen stocks rose for every six that dropped on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.2 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board in the slowest activity since June 6.

DOJ_NMG_0000768

GM gained 65 cents to $34.65. Sales last month jumped 47 percent from a year earlier for the biggest increase since August 1999. The company sold 558,092 vehicles, the most of any month since September 1996, thanks to an extension of employee discounts to all buyers.

Shares of Ford Motor Co., GM's smaller rival, added 7 cents to $10.31. Its sales last month rose 0.7 percent to 289,449 from a year ago.

The rally in oil prices gave energy stocks the best performance in the S&P 500 among 10 industry indexes. The stocks advanced 1.9 percent as a group.

ConocoPhillips, the No. 3 U.S. oil producer, climbed $1.61 to $59.10. The company said it raised its stake in Russia's OAO Lukoil to 12.6 percent as of yesterday from 11.3 percent three months earlier. Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's biggest publicly traded oil company, increased 84 cents to $58.31.

Intel

Intel Corp. added 19 cents to $26.21. The company's second- quarter revenue will be $9.3 billion, at the high end of its forecast, wrote Prudential Equity Group Inc. analyst Mark Lipacis.

Computer-chip makers may beat analysts' expectations because inventories are at ``low levels'' and ``utilization rates'' are bottoming, which will improve margins, Lipacis wrote in a note yesterday.

Red Hat Inc., the world's biggest distributor of the Linux computer-operating system, rose $1.21 to $14.31. The company reported first-quarter profit of 7 cents a share, exceeding the 5-cent average estimate of analysts surveyed by Thomson.

Profit among S&P 500 companies is expected to increase 6.6 percent in the second quarter, based on Bloomberg's analysis of analyst estimates compiled by Thomson Financial. Earnings growth will probably climb to 14.6 percent in the third quarter.

Alcoa Inc., the world's biggest aluminum maker, kicks off the reporting season for companies in the Dow average on July 7. General Electric Co., the No. 2 company by market value, will announce results on July 15.

Sears Holdings

Sears Holdings Corp. climbed $1.88 to $151.75. Shares of the third-largest U.S. retailer may get a boost from ``significant cash flow generation'' and share buybacks, wrote Deutsche Bank AG analyst Bill Dreher in a report. He rated the shares ``buy'' in new coverage by Deutsche Bank AG analyst Bill Dreher.

Pixar dragged the Nasdaq lower. Shares of the computer- animation film studio dropped $6.99 to $43.06. Second-quarter net income will be 10 cents a share because of disappointing sales of ``The Incredibles'' home videos, the company said. That's compared with the 15 cents Pixar predicted in May and the 19 cents analysts were expecting.

Pfizer Inc., the world's biggest drugmaker, slid 48 cents, or 1.7 percent, to $27.10 for the second-worst performance in the Dow average. Pfizer and Germany's Altana AG ended a partnership to develop Daxas, an experimental treatment for smokers' lung that failed to meet a goal in a clinical study.

QQQQs, Spiders

The S&P 500 shares, called Spiders, advanced 35 cents to $119.53. Nasdaq-100 tracking shares, known by their QQQQ symbol, fell 6 cents to $36.73.

S&P 500 futures expiring in September gained 4.5 to 1200 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Nasdaq-100 Index futures slid 3 to 1500.

The Russell 2000 Index, which tracks companies with a median market value of $519 million, added 0.5 percent to 643.04. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares climbed 39.59, or 0.3 percent, to 11,896.26. Based on changes in the Wilshire, the value of stocks increased by $49.5 billion.

ConocoPhillips (COP US) Exxon Mobil Corp. (XOM US) Ford Motor Co. (F US) General Motors Corp. (GM US) Intel Corp. (INTC US) Pfizer Inc. (PFE US) Pixar (PIXR US) Red Hat Inc. (RHAT US) Sears Holdings Corp. (SHLD US) To contact the reporter on this story: Ari Levy in New York at alevy5@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: July 1, 2005 18:07 EDT

Dollar Hits High Against Euro On Strong U.S. Economic Data (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

The dollar reached a 13-month high against the euro yesterday after faster-than-expected expansion in manufacturing reinforced the view that the Federal Reserve would continue to raise interest rates.

Manufacturing has now registered 25 consecutive months of expansion, according to figures from the Institute for Supply Management. The June increase followed six straight months of slowing growth, the group said.

DOJ_NMG_0000769

In Washington, the Fed raised its federal funds rate on Thursday by one-quarter percentage point to 3.25, as was widely expected. The increase was the ninth since June 2004 and policy makers reiterated that rates would probably continue to rise at a measured pace.

Higher interest rates lift the return on investments denominated in a particular currency, raising its allure.

In late trading in New York, the 12-country euro traded for $1.1947, after falling as low as $1.1941 earlier in the day. It was down from $1.2083 in New York late Thursday.

The dollar strengthened further against the Japanese yen, trading at 111.70 yen after hitting a high of 111.78, up from 110.95 yen late Thursday.

The British pound traded at $1.7694 late yesterday after falling as low as $1.7685, down from $1.7887 Thursday, after the British economy grew just 0.4 percent during the first quarter. That raised fears the Bank of England may step in next week and cut interest rates from the 4.75 percent they have been at for nine months.

Dollar Surges As U.S. Factory, Consumer Indexes Top Forecasts (BLOOM)

By Mark Tannenbaum

Bloomberg, July 2, 2005

The dollar surged to the highest in more than a year against the euro and rose against 14 other actively traded currencies as gauges of U.S. manufacturing strength and consumer confidence both exceeded expectations.

``We are seeing heavy, heavy dollar buying across the board," said John McCarthy, a director of currency trading in New York at ING Financial Markets LLC. ``People are just more optimistic on the U.S. economy in general vis-a-vis everybody else."

The dollar advanced to $1.1959 per euro at 5 p.m. in New York, from $1.2108 late yesterday, according to electronic currency-dealing system EBS. It was the euro's first close below $1.20 since May 18, 2004. The dollar rose to 111.78 yen, the highest since August, and is 2.5 percent higher this week, the most since a 3.01 percent gain for the week ended Dec. 10.

The Institute for Supply Management's factory index rose to 53.8 last month from 51.4. The median estimate in a Bloomberg survey was for an unchanged index. A reading higher than 50 shows net growth. Separately, the University of Michigan said its consumer confidence index rose to 96 in June, the first increase this year.

Gains in the dollar began earlier today on signs the Federal Reserve will keep raising interest rates while central banks in Europe and Japan leave rates unchanged. The yen declined even after the Bank of Japan's Tankan survey showed business confidence rose more than expected.

``Europe's economy's going one way and our economy and our rates are going the other way," said Enrico Caruso, chief trader at currency hedge fund Tempest Asset Management in Newport Beach, California. ``We're long dollars. I'm still looking for $1.1850."

European Manufacturing

Measured by the Fed's Trade-Weighted Major Currency Dollar Index, the dollar climbed 5.1 percent in the second quarter, the most since 1997.

The euro earlier today briefly pared some losses after an industry report showed manufacturing in the dozen nations sharing the currency shrank less than expected in June. An index based on responses from about 3,000 purchasing managers, compiled by NTC Research Ltd. for Reuters Group Plc, rose to 49.9 from 48.7 in May.

Economists expected a figure of 49, according to the median of estimates in a Bloomberg survey. A reading below 50 indicates a contraction.

``We're getting some better news out of Europe, and that can help stop the slide of the euro," said Adam Cole, a currency strategist in London at RBC Capital Markets Ltd.

U.S. Rates

Yesterday's rate increase by the Fed, to 3.25 percent from 3 percent, brought its target rate to the highest since August 2001. Policy makers said they intend to keep increasing the rate at a ``measured" pace. The European Central Bank has kept its rate at 2 percent for the last two years, while the BOJ has kept borrowing costs near zero since 2001.

``Rising U.S. interest rates have been a positive for the dollar," said Shahab Jalinoos, a currency strategist at ABN Amro Holding NV in London. ``There's still a discussion of an ECB cut going forward. We don't think they will cut, but there could well be continued speculation."

The spread between two-year U.S. Treasury notes and similar-maturity German government bonds was about 166 basis points, the most since 2000. A basis point is 0.01 percentage point.

Japan's currency reached as strong as 110.62 immediately after the Tankan survey was released, before resuming its decline. Finance Minister Sadakazu Tanigaki said today a widening rate gap between the U.S. and Japan is helping weaken the yen.

DOJ_NMG_0000770

Tankan

The Tankan index of confidence among large manufacturers rose to 18 points in June from 14 in March, above the median forecast of 16 in a Bloomberg News survey of economists. A positive number means optimists outnumber pessimists.

``The yen is going to weaken," said Toru Umemoto, chief currency strategist at Barclays Plc. ``The Tankan wasn't enough. Rates are going up in the U.S. and the BOJ's doing nothing. Oil remains a problem as well."

The yen may fall to 112 per dollar next week, he said. The Japanese currency rose to 133.65 per euro today from 134.23.

The Tankan indicates the economy has yet to recover from a period of stagnation, Japan's government spokesman said. ``The situation of stagnation remaining has not changed," Hiroyuki Hosoda said at a press briefing in Tokyo.

Support for Japan's currency has waned on concern near- record oil prices will crimp growth. Movements in crude prices may be affecting the exchange rate, Tanigaki told reporters, adding that Japan must closely monitor the oil and currency markets. Japan imports almost all its oil.

``The Fed is still the only major central bank raising rates, and there are no signs it's getting closer to a stopping point," said Richard Yetsenga, a currency strategist in Hong Kong at HSBC Holdings Plc. ``The dollar still has a fair degree of upside momentum."

OTHER NEWS:

Jury Awards Family $1.95 Million In Dick Schaap's Death (NYT)

By Andrew Jacobs

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

A jury found a cardiologist at Lenox Hill Hospital liable yesterday for the death of the sports journalist Dick Schaap after hip replacement surgery and awarded his family $1.95 million in compensatory damages.

The jury found that two other doctors at the hospital on the Upper East Side of Manhattan were not responsible even though they had been accused of failing to follow standard medical practice in caring for Mr. Schaap, who went into respiratory distress after the operation to replace his left hip. Mr. Schaap, 67, died on Dec. 21, 2001, three months after the surgery, having never left the hospital. His family had sought $21 million.

"This case was never about the money," his widow, Trish, said after the verdict. "We felt that this was the only way to get hospitals to pay attention and to not sweep their mistakes under the rug."

The jury in State Supreme Court in Manhattan deliberated for nine days before finding that the cardiologist, Dr. Neil L. Coplan, was negligent. A lawyer for Dr. Coplan, Mark Aaronson, called the Schaap case "junk science" and said he would appeal. "The jury worked very, very hard, but they made a mistake," he said. "Dr. Coplan will be exonerated completely."

The three-week trial focused on whether the medication that Mr. Schaap had been taking for years to treat an irregular heartbeat, amiodarone, had caused so much lung damage that his surgery should have been postponed. Thomas A. Moore, the Schaap family's lawyer, argued that Dr. Coplan never looked at a presurgery X-ray that, Mr. Moore said, hinted at the lung damage. The defense argued that no damage was evident.

The other doctors named in the suit were Dr. Nicholas T. Skipitaris, an electrophysiology specialist, and Dr. Chitranjan S. Ranawat, the chief orthopedic surgeon at Lenox Hill. They had been accused of failing to properly diagnose and treat the syndrome, known as amiodarone pulmonary toxicity, a relatively rare side effect of the drug. Despite the verdict, Mr. Aaronson insisted yesterday that Mr. Schaap's death was not due to amiodarone toxicity but to fragments of bone marrow dislodged during surgery that ended up in the lungs.

A juror, Robin Joseph, 26, said the four women and two men on the panel were initially divided on the verdict but ultimately decided that Dr. Coplan was "100 percent to blame" for Mr. Schaap's death. "He had a lot of tools at his disposal, but he didn't use them," she said.

Mr. Moore said he would appeal an earlier decision by Justice Karen S. Smith to remove Lenox Hill from the lawsuit. He also expressed some disappointment with the jury's monetary award, saying it failed to consider Mr. Schaap's future earnings. "He was at the zenith of his career when he died," he said.

Climate Plan Splits U.S. And Europe (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

To hear President Bush's top environmental adviser tell it, Europe is coming around to the administration's approach to confronting global warming.

DOJ_NMG_0000771

"We are all working at the same realistically aggressive pace," James L. Connaughton said in an interview this week. "The world is coming to a more sustainable, collective vision of how to address climate change."

As the eight major industrialized nations struggle to reach an agreement on global warming policy before next week's Group of Eight summit, however, many European officials have a different take on the matter.

"I wish I could believe it was true," said Barbara Young, chief executive of Britain's Environment Agency. When it comes to Bush's climate change policy, she added, "the amount of energy that goes into denying the case and not getting on with the job is just criminal."

This clash of visions between the other seven industrialized nations and the United States will come to a head when their leaders meet at Scotland's Gleneagles resort starting Wednesday to outline how they plan to address global warming and poverty in Africa. Summit organizers hastily arranged a last-minute round of talks in London this weekend to try to forge a joint statement on the environment, but so far that has eluded them.

The Bush administration's success so far in resisting its allies' calls for bolder measures to mitigate global warming -- such as mandatory emissions limits for greenhouse gases, concrete dollar commitments to new technology and specific energy efficiency targets -- is a testament to America's continuing power to shape the international agenda on climate change. In a consensus-oriented process, the most skeptical -- and most economically and politically powerful -- player, the United States, is largely dictating the terms of the debate.

Other industrialized nations acknowledge they have yet to win serious concessions from Bush. A week ago, British Prime Minister Tony Blair -- who as the current G-8 president placed climate change atop the group's agenda this year -- told reporters that when it came to reaching a summit agreement, "climate change is obviously very difficult." French President Jacques Chirac said Thursday that he welcomed Blair's efforts to bring Washington "back on board" in terms of an international pact but that "results have been modest."

The other G-8 members are Canada, Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia. In addition, Brazil, China, India, Mexico and South Africa will participate in next week's summit.

The most recent draft of the G-8 text on climate change, obtained by The Washington Post this week, shows that U.S. negotiators helped pare down a lengthy statement on scientific and policy details by two-thirds, in some cases inserting quotes directly from Bush's past speeches.

The language of previous texts called for specific funding to promote such things as clean energy research and creating sustainable energy markets in developing nations; the new statement includes no dollar amounts. Earlier drafts started with the sentence "Our world is warming"; that wording is now in dispute. European negotiators initially pushed for specific targets on energy efficiency and the sharing of emissions trading practices; the new document is now silent on these points.

Negotiators this weekend will debate whether to adopt a new sentence -- emphasizing the "need to slow, stop and then reverse the growth in greenhouse gases" -- that is lifted almost verbatim from the president's Feb. 14, 2001, speech on climate change.

A European Union official familiar with the negotiations -- and who asked not to be identified for fear of jeopardizing the final talks -- said Europeans were trying unsuccessfully to open up "a process, through whatever means possible, to jointly identify a series of next steps."

"There is a great reluctance on the part of the U.S. to accept anything meaningful," the official said. "There's still an effort to water down language on the science."

The administration's success in resisting pressure from the Europeans has won it praise from conservatives at home and criticism from environmental groups.

Myron Ebell, who directs the free-market Competitive Enterprise Institute's global warming and international environmental programs, said he and his colleagues are "pleased with the firm and consistent position Bush is taking on climate change." He added: "On the issue of climate change, Blair is going to make no progress in hoping the U.S. will accede." The institute gets funding from oil companies that oppose mandatory carbon emissions curbs.

By contrast, Jeff Fiedler, a climate policy specialist at the environmentalist Natural Resources Defense Council, said administration officials are seeking to craft "a fig leaf for the real action that's needed."

"The olive branch has been extended to find some effective policies that are acceptable to the White House, and as far as we can see, they have just slapped that branch away," Fiedler said.

Connaughton, the chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality, and other administration officials said they are focused on obtaining practical commitments industrialized countries can meet without damaging their economies. He said that although some G-8 countries are struggling to meet their goal of bringing greenhouse gas emissions down to 1990 levels by 2012, the United States is on track to fulfill its pledge to reduce its carbon intensity -- how much emissions are rising relative to overall economic growth -- 18 percent by 2012.

DOJ_NMG_0000772

On Thursday, the Energy Information Administration announced that the nation's carbon emissions rose 1.7 percent in 2004 -- but that amounted to a 2.6 percent drop in carbon intensity, because the U.S. economy grew 4.4 percent that year. The rate of increase in U.S. carbon emissions more than doubled from 2003 to 2004 because of heightened economic activity.

"Our whole focus has been we need to get past these policy differences and get to deployment and implementation of these clean-technology opportunities," Connaughton said of the G-8 negotiations. "Perhaps I'm a Pollyanna, but this discussion is going to be historic."

But Europeans interviewed this week delivered a less sanguine assessment of the ongoing talks. Robert May, who served as Britain's chief scientist from 1995 to 2000 and now heads the Royal Society, the United Kingdom's independent scientific academy, said the Bush administration is resisting "scientific fact" and is trying to superimpose "one fundamentalist ideology . . . on the rest of the G-8."

Philip Clapp, who heads the U.S. advocacy group National Environmental Trust and will be an observer at next week's summit, said Bush's approach might backfire if other G-8 nations start negotiating a new global warming treaty to take effect in 2012 "and the U.S. will just sit on the sidelines as a spectator, not a participant."

But some British officials held out hope they can reach a compromise with the United States by the summit's end.

"We need to focus on the ground we have in common and not split hairs over differences," said one, who asked not to be identified out of deference to negotiators. "The G-8 is a massive opportunity. You have the world's richest economies taking practical measures to deal with the issue, and it's not just the world's richest economies, it's the world's emerging economies."

Scotland Awaits Global Chieftains (FT)

By Andrew Bolger

Financial Times, July 2, 2005

For the host, can it really be worth it? Scotland is distinctly nervous as it awaits the arrival of the Group of Eight circus, with its rock stars, demonstrators and attendant passions, for next week's summit at the five-star luxury of Gleneagles Hotel.

Tony Blair has no doubts.

The prime minister not only hopes for big things on aid and debt relief for Africa and climate change. He also thinks the gathering in glorious Perthshire scenery will showcase Britain, and Scotland in particular, while demonstrating the UK's leadership in tackling global problems.

Jack McConnell, first minister in Scotland's devolved executive, describes the summit as an opportunity for a confident, modern Scotland – one the whole country should get behind. But Donald Anderson, Labour leader of Edinburgh City Council, admits there is a tense atmosphere in the Scottish capital.

Some newspapers – particularly the Scottish editions of London-based tabloids – have carried lurid tales about the havoc that could be wreaked by a small minority of anarchists among the expected masses of demonstrators.

Police and politicians are confident about the arrangements for today's Make Poverty History march in Edinburgh, but admit to greater concern about unauthorised demonstrations outside financial institutions in Edinburgh on Monday by groups that have not identified themselves.

A five-mile security fence has been erected around Gleneagles. Steel barriers have also been put around the Scottish parliament and Holyrood Palace in Edinburgh, causing the Queen to change her holiday plans so as not to be in the city.

Scottish police say they will not use tear gas or water cannon – unlike the Italian riot squads whose heavy-handed tactics provoked much of the violence that marred the Genoa summit in 2001.

Much could depend on the weather. Scotland in summer sunshine can be delightful but heavy rain is also possible, and could dampen the enthusiasm of demonstrators heading for the countryside around Gleneagles. Not to mention midges, the tiny blood-sucking insects that can make any Scottish campsite a misery in summer.

Rudyard Kipling is seldom cited in Scotland these days, perhaps because the English writer's association with British jingoism sits ill with Scots' sense of a post-imperial national identity. There is certainly no chance of his "twin imposters", triumph and disaster, being treated just the same.

If the G8 turns out well, there will be crowing and self-congratulation about how Scotland's international image has been burnished. If things go badly, there will be a tidal wave of recrimination, and a search for scapegoats.

To that extent at least, Scotland's reaction to the summit will faithfully reflect the proceedings behind the barricades at Gleneagles.

Scottish Police Heighten Security Ahead Of Group Of 8 Summit (LAT)

By Sarah Price Brown

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000773

With a security operation named after a tree that local folklore says can ward off evil, police were making final preparations Friday for the arrival in Scotland of eight world leaders and tens of thousands of protesters.

By Sunday, about 10,600 officers will be available as part of Operation Sorbus to provide security for President Bush, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and other leaders of the Group of 8 leading industrial nations as they gather Wednesday in Gleneagles, Scotland.

Police have erected a 5-mile fence around the Gleneagles Hotel, where the meeting will take place. Security cameras line the fence, and anyone who tries to bypass the barrier will be arrested, said a spokeswoman from Tayside Police, the local office responsible for the summit's security.

Five roads near the hotel will be closed to keep traffic away from the conference site, about 40 miles northwest of Edinburgh, Scotland's capital.

Officers will patrol the area around the meeting by foot and car. Mounted police will guard the streets, and security dogs will be deployed. A surveillance blimp with video cameras will relay images to a command center. Helicopters with loudspeakers and video cameras also will survey the area.

Should any breach in security occur at the hotel, the summit would be moved 20 miles to the Tulliallan Castle, Scotland's police college, the Times of London reported. Local police would not comment on the plan but also said they would not deny it.

"We're putting a very broad range of contingencies in place," said the Tayside spokeswoman, adding that department policy required that she not to be named. "We're planning for all eventualities."

More than 100,000 activists are expected to descend on Edinburgh today for a march called "Make Poverty History," which is being organized by charities and was approved by the City Council.

About 2,500 officers will police the march, said Kevin Smith, spokesman for Lothian and Borders Police, the Edinburgh-area agency in charge of monitoring the protest. Police are taking a nonconfrontational approach to the demonstration, he said. Officers will wear their usual uniforms, for example, though police in riot gear will be on hand in case of violence.

"We will be working hard to balance the rights of free speech and lawful protest," said Paddy Tomkins, chief of Lothian and Borders Police.

One member of the board of the Lothian and Borders Police said he would join the demonstrators at the march.

"If the cause of ending world poverty is achieved," said Eric Milligan, "it will be due as much to those who planned for months and worked on these demanding days, as to the demonstrators and the world leaders."

Protesters have set up campsites near Edinburgh in anticipation of a number of rallies. The Stop the War Coalition will hold a march Sunday and demonstrate Monday outside Scotland's Faslane nuclear submarine facility, about 50 miles northwest of Edinburgh. Police are bracing for what they fear will be a chaotic demonstration Monday: the Carnival for Full Enjoyment, arranged by an anarchist group.

Rock star Bob Geldof, who organized the Live 8 concerts taking place worldwide today to raise awareness about poverty in Africa, has urged 1 million people to descend on Edinburgh on Wednesday to show their support for Africa. The leaders from the Group of 8 — the United States, Britain, Germany, France, Italy, Japan, Canada and Russia — are expected to take up the issue at their meetings.

Police fear that the influx of so many people into a city of nearly 450,000 will cause problems.

"We are concerned that people may come up and have nowhere to stay and nothing to do," a Lothian and Borders police spokeswoman told the media. "We are trying to discourage them."

Peter Wilson, chief of the Fife Police, was quoted by the Scotsman newspaper as saying he was prepared for violence of the magnitude seen at the G-8 summit four years ago in Genoa, Italy. There, a protester died and hundreds of police and demonstrators were injured in clashes.

Wilson warned potential troublemakers that they would be under surveillance. "We know where to find you," he said.

G8 Officials In Last-ditch Bid On Africa, Climate (REU)

By Madeline Chambers

Reuter, July 2, 2005

LONDON (Reuters) - Officials from the world's major industrialized nations launched last-ditch talks on Friday to try to help their leaders end differences and strike deals next week to lift Africa out of poverty and act on climate change.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who holds the Group of Eight presidency and will host a G8 heads of state summit at Gleneagles in Scotland from July 6-8, is also seeking an initiative to inject new impetus into Middle East peacemaking.

Previous British initiatives have had little success and Blair was cautious on the latest.

"I hope but I can't yet be sure that there will be a specific initiative on the Israeli-Palestinian issue," Blair told a news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0000774

"I've set aside time within the summit now to do this because there have been developments over the past few days that lead me to believe we may be able to make some progress," he said.

Blair has put African poverty relief and climate change at the center of his G8 presidency, but Britain is worried that any deals on the two issues will fail to live up to expectations.

STARKEST DIFFERENCES

The starkest differences are between the United States and other G8 countries on climate change.

The G8 nations have been unable to agree on its severity, causes or how to tackle it, according to a leaked text of the latest draft declaration seen by Reuters.

Environmentalists are calling on Blair to signal an open rift with Washington rather than agree to a watered down text.

"No deal is better than a deal on this (draft) document," said Tony Juniper of Friends of the Earth.

"Rather than trying to paper over the differences with Bush, Blair should publicly signal a rift with the United States."

Blair has acknowledged a deal on climate change would be very difficult at the summit of G8 nations -- the United States, Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia.

"What I am trying to do at the G8 is say 'America is not going to sign the Kyoto Treaty, let's leave that to one side'," Blair said in an MTV interview to be broadcast later on Friday.

He argues there are other issues, such as the need to develop clean energy technology, that can be agreed upon.

"Can I get agreement on that? I don't know but I'm going to try," he said.

PROGRESS ON AFRICA

Blair has made more progress on easing poverty in Africa, although there is still some way to go.

Campaigners want the G8 to increase aid for Africa, cut the continent's debt and dismantle trade barriers.

Last month, G8 finance ministers agreed to cut about $40 billion worth of impoverished nations' debt and the European Union and Washington have agreed to boost aid spending.

But the United States opposes a more ambitious plan to increase aid by $50 billion by issuing bonds using future development budgets as collateral.

Blair, widely known to be keen to make progress on major international issues in his third and final term as prime minister, would seize on any accord to put momentum into Middle East peacemaking.

The United States, traditionally the main broker in Middle East peace efforts, says Israel's planned withdrawal from the Gaza Strip could help revive talks on a long stalled U.S.-backed "road map" for peace and Palestinian statehood.

The G8 summit will take place a month before Israeli soldiers and settlers are due to pull out of Gaza, home to 1.3 million Palestinians.

After a week of turmoil in which pro-settler radicals clashed with troops and blocked roads, fears are mounting that the pullout will be overshadowed by violence.

Officials said G8 leaders would discuss a plan by former World Bank President James Wolfensohn, now an international envoy for the so-called Gaza "disengagement."

Charged with reviving the Palestinian economy after the pullout, he is seeking support for Palestinan aid packages.

Live 8 Concerts Seek To Change Policies Of Leading Countries (KRT)

By Matthew Schofield

Knight Ridder, July 2, 2005

Twenty years ago, Bob Geldof, then a member of the Boomtown Rats rock band, organized a pair of concerts known as Live Aid that raised $150 million for African charitable work and helped redefine rock stars from bad boys to charitable agents.

Saturday, Geldof is back, with a star-studded slate of concerts in 10 cities around the world. But raising money isn't the goal; changing the policy of the world's most powerful countries is.

"This is not Live Aid 2," Geldof has noted.

Timed to coincide with next week's meeting of the so-called Group of 8, a gathering of American, European and Asian leaders that begins Wednesday in Scotland, Live 8 is aimed at persuading them to cancel billions in African debt, increase aid to Africa by at least $50 billion and rewrite trade regulations to be more favorable to poor nations.

Organizers also hope to flood Scotland with protesters in the coming week, beginning with as many as 150,000 Saturday in Edinburgh, an hour's drive from Gleneagles, where the G-8 leaders, including President Bush, will meet.

"We need proper grown-up politics and people need to be serious," Geldof said at a recent news conference.

The concert venues were picked in G-8 countries to maximize political influence on the leaders: London, Philadelphia, Berlin, Moscow, Paris, Rome, Tokyo and Barrie, Canada, about 60 miles north of Toronto. Concerts also are set for Johannesburg, South Africa, and Edinburgh. The Edinburgh show will be Wednesday, as the summit begins.

DOJ_NMG_0000775

More than 100 performers will appear, among them Madonna, P. Diddy and Elton John.

The motto this time is "We Don't Want Your Money - We Want You," and the concerts are free.

There's some nostalgia attached to Saturday's festivities. Paul McCartney is expected to kick off London's concert by singing "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band," which begins with the words "It was 20 years ago today." (In fact, it's about two weeks early for the 20th anniversary).

"This is not an issue of politics, it's an issue of morality," Geldof said recently. " I think it will have deep political resonance."

Kate Norgrove, a spokeswoman for the Global Call to Action Against Poverty, acknowledged that the concerts have done quickly what she and other have spent years trying to do: Draw attention to African debt relief and trade issues.

"Rock 'n' roll has upped the ante considerably," she said. "It's pushed from the background into the limelight, and we hope that it means we're entering a new phase in working for Africa, one where we're not struggling to find the money to get done what needs to be done."

The numbers that move the movement are a constant in newspapers and newscasts around Europe: 291 million Africans survive on less than $1 a day each, 30,000 children die every day because of poverty, 26 million Africans are HIV-positive.

Already, the pressure from the worldwide effort is given credit for helping to get the United States and Great Britain to agree to $40 billion - possibly rising to $55 billion - in debt relief for Africa and Latin America.

Still, not everyone is convinced that the concerts will have long-term impact.

"We wish them luck, but we've seen this before," said Onyekachi Wambu, the information officer for the London-based African Foundation for Development.

Wambu's organization has been criticized for planning a conference on African development that runs at the same time that an expected 200,000 people will be attending the Live 8 concert in London's Hyde Park, criticism that Wambu said showed how little was known about African aid programs.

"We hold this conference on creating jobs and wealth - the real answer to development - on the first Saturday of July every year," he said. "Someone who drops in on the issue wouldn't pay attention to that, I guess."

Tom Cargill, the Africa program coordinator for Chatham House, an English research group, offered similar sentiments.

"I do believe Africa will sort itself out, but it will do so in spite of what the rest of the world is doing," he said. "But these big-bang ideas on making poverty history all of a sudden are a bit optimistic."

African aid should be focused on creating jobs and a middle class, he said.

Of course, a recent London Mail on Sunday column noted that there certainly will be some who benefit from the Live 8 efforts.

"Once again, the hungry, terrorized children of Africa are pooling their efforts to help others," it began. "They will, once more, perform on our TV screens to help rescue the sagging reputations of that needy and deprived group of balding, clapped-out rock stars who long for the crowds that once listened to them."

HIGHLIGHTS OF THE CONCERTS

Philadelphia - Where: The Museum of Art. Audience expected: 250,000. Artists: Black Eyed Peas, Dave Matthews Band, P. Diddy, Stevie Wonder.

London - Hyde Park. 200,000. U2, Coldplay, Madonna, Snoop Dogg, Elton John, Pink Floyd (reunion).

Barrie, Canada - Park Place. 150,000. Bare Naked Ladies, Deep Purple, Simple Plan, Run DMC.

Berlin - Tiergarten. 250,000. Brian Wilson, Die Toten Hosen, Crosby Stills & Nash.

Johannesburg - Newtown. 40,000. Malaika, Zola.

Moscow - Red Square. 50,000-200,000. Pet Shop Boys.

Paris - Palais de Versailles. 220,000. The Cure, Dido, Youssou N'Dour.

Rome - Circus Maximus. 250,000. Duran Duran, Tim McGraw.

Tokyo - Makuhari Messe Arena. 10,000. Bjork, McFly.

Edinburgh - Wednesday, as the G-8 summit begins, Murrayfield Stadium. Number expected is unknown. Annie Lennox, Bob Geldof, the Proclaimers.

The EU Problem (KRT)

By Matthew Schofield

Knight Ridder, July 2, 2005

In 2004, the European Union agreed on a new European Constitution to be sent to each member nation for approval. Under EU law, the constitution had to be approved by every nation or it could not be activated. Nations were given the choice of adopting it by either Parliamentary vote or popular referendum. The first binding referendum, however, came late May in France, where it was defeated 55 percent to 45 percent. A few days later, almost two-thirds of Dutch voters rejected it.

DOJ_NMG_0000776

Because the votes were seen as a rejection of European policy, the recent expansion, plans for future expansion and the implementation of the euro, member nation heads of state in June agreed to put any efforts to pass the constitution on hold for a year and declared that "Europe is in a profound crisis."

The History Of The European Union (KRT)

By Matthew Schofield

Knight Ridder, July 2, 2005

In 1950, as Europe was rebuilding after the devastation of World War II, French Foreign Minister Robert Schuman suggested integrating the coal and steel industries of western Europe. He was speaking on May 9, what is now called Europe Day, considered the birth of the European Union.

But the beginning of what is now called the European Union is not traced so much to a single event, but through an evolution that lasted about 50 years.

Schuman's speech led to the formation of the European Coal and Steel Community. The formation wasn't so much for economic reasons as because of the backdrop of animosity between nations.

Beginning with the Napoleonic Wars in the early 19th century, through the Franco-Prussian War and World War I and to the end of World War II in 1945, about 60 million Europeans were killed through the effects of warfare.

As the official history of the European Union states, "A number of European leaders became convinced that the only way to secure a lasting peace between their countries was to unite them economically and politically."

What this meant was while the nations involved would remain independent, they would increase the level to which they were reliant upon each other. This has meant giving up pieces of national sovereignty to the union, such as monetary policy, agriculture and fisheries policy, and product standards.

The first European Community formed in 1954 and included six nations: Belgium, Germany, France, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands.

Pleased with the way that agreement worked, the six founder nations in 1957 signed the Treaties of Rome, one to regulate atomic energy and the other to remove the trade barriers existing at their borders, forming a "common market," although a true open and common market did not appear until 1992.

In 1967, administration of the three treaties was merged under a single body, and a European Commission, Council of Ministers and Parliament were created.

In 1973, the original six were joined by three new members, Denmark, Ireland and the United Kingdom. In 1981, Greece joined, followed by Portugal and Spain in 1986 and Austria, Finland and Sweden in 1995.

By that time, the community in 1992 had passed the Treaty of Maastricht, which increased cooperation in areas such as defense, justice and "home affairs," and officially named the group the European Union.

Two of the biggest changes to the union were yet to come, however. The first was the introduction of the euro, a single currency for the European Union, in 2002. Denmark, Sweden and the United Kingdom decided against replacing their national currencies, but the other 12 members formed the eurozone, an economic union with a single interest rate.

The second change came in 2004, when the Union expanded from 15 mostly western European nations to include 10 new, mostly eastern European nations. The new nations were Czech Republic, Estonia, Cyprus, Latvia, Lithuania, Hungary, Malta, Poland, Slovenia and Slovakia. The new additions created a Union of 25 nations. Bulgaria and Romania are expected to be the next nations to join. Croatia and Turkey also are being considered.

Film About Despair In South Africa, And School That Offers Hope (NYT)

By Richard Sandomir

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Charlie Ebersol's need to tell the story of the Ithuteng Trust school in Soweto - where traumatized and violent teenagers learn to overcome their young lives' horrors - began with a visit to the South African township two years ago and has produced a new documentary, "Ithuteng (Never Stop Learning)."

"I have a great life, and I felt I had a responsibility to tell this story," said Mr. Ebersol, 22, who was a film major at the University of Notre Dame and graduated in May.

The documentary, which was honored in May as best humanitarian film at the MountainFilm festival in Telluride, Colo., is a raw but inspiring journey into the lives of teenagers ravaged by abuse, crime and AIDS. All were recruited by Jacqueline Maarohanye, a fiercely devoted teacher known as "Mama Jackey" who set up the school in 1999. Although some students board there, most come from their own schools around Johannesburg for after-hours and Saturday programs that combine academics, culture, sports, peer counseling, therapeutic dramatizations of the teenagers' own lives and outings to a maximum-security prison.

DOJ_NMG_0000777

Mr. Ebersol, who now lives in Los Angeles and recently completed a stint as a production assistant on the film "Yours, Mine and Ours," produced the documentary with a friend, Kip Kroeger, also 22, with whom he had made music videos. They hired Mr. Ebersol's brother, Willie, 18 and a student at the University of Southern California, to direct a 17-day shooting schedule in the summer of 2003 because they admired a short student film he had made on a classmate's dating problems.

"I should have been intimidated, but I wasn't," Willie Ebersol said. "He came back from South Africa, gave me a blanket as a gift and asked me to direct."

The students provided brutally candid narratives of their lives to the young American filmmakers, none more than Lebo, a girl who described being raped twice and contracting H.I.V.

"They poured out their lives and didn't hold back," Mr. Kroeger, a North Carolina State University graduate, said in a telephone interview. "It sears right into you. Here's a girl you met two hours and ago she's telling us about being raped? How can she sit there and tell us that?"

In another scene from the film, an orphan named Dineo, who is described as having been sexually abused by her foster father, the head of an anti-abuse charity, confronts an older girl whose behavior toward her had made her want to give up the program.

"I thought you were a bad person," Dineo says to the older girl. "I hated you so much, but now I'm going to be your mother and you're going to be my mother."

While they embraced, Mama Jackey tried to hold back her tears.

"Here are these kids, who are not taught about love, teaching each other to love," Charlie Ebersol said in an interview. "They will learn to love and share it because Mama said you have a chance now, you have a way to dream."

Although the film does not yet have a distributor, it is winning notice beyond the award. Oprah Winfrey had already known about Ithuteng (pronounced IT-uh-teng) and Mama Jackey, but it was watching a DVD of the documentary during a flight to Johannesburg in June that prompted her to donate a total of $1.14 million to the school, said Gayle King, editor at large of O, the Oprah Magazine.

When Ms. King told Charlie Ebersol of the donation, she said: "He was incoherent with joy. He said, 'Oh, my God, Gayle, I was just trying to raise $10,000 to keep Mama's electricity on.' "Ms. Winfrey's gift was the largest to the school so far, but it has received support from numerous groups, including the National Basketball Association, which built a reading center there, and from Dikembe Mutombo, the Congolese player for the Houston Rockets, who donated $150,000 to build two dormitories.

Kathy Behrens, a senior vice president of the N.B.A., said: "I was with Charlie when he first showed the film to Mama. It was very emotional for her. It was very hard for her to watch Lebo, who had died of AIDS."

The lessons of Ithuteng resonated with unexpected power for the Ebersol brothers. Until last year, theirs had been a charmed life, as the older sons of Dick Ebersol, the chairman of NBC Universal Sports and the retired actress Susan Saint James.

Dick Ebersol bankrolled the film for about $90,000, after Charlie Ebersol and Mr. Kroeger began raising money on their own. Their father gave them guidance on the documentary and helped find film veterans to help his sons in Soweto. Their mother helped edit the film.

But last Nov. 28, a private jet carrying Dick, Charlie and the youngest Ebersol son, Teddy, crashed after takeoff in Montrose, Colo., near the family's winter home in Telluride. Teddy, 14, was killed; Charlie suffered a broken wrist, and eye and back injuries; Dick broke several ribs, his sternum, his pelvis, his coccyx and several vertebrae.

"I walked off the plane with my father in my arms, and my brother behind me," Charlie Ebersol recalled. "I said, 'Oh, God, how can I get through this without my father, and then I had to find Ted. In talking to God, I said: 'How can you empower me, and take away my father's power? I need him.' "

He said the openness of the students at Ithuteng helped him deal with his grief. "Mama believes you must cry yourself dry," he said of Ms. Maarohanye, "and that people shouldn't prevent you from crying. Willie and I employed what Mama taught us in the context of real tragedy."

Willie Ebersol said: "South Africa taught me that I can talk about what's eating me up inside. We learned from the kids that it's O.K. to be sad. If you've been raped, it's O.K. to say you've been raped. You don't bury your grief if you speak about it. You open up."

The film also underwent a transformation after the crash, becoming more overtly emotional with additional music to underscore the painful pasts and altered lives of the students.

DOJ_NMG_0000778

"We had a fear of exploiting the emotion," Mr. Kroeger said of their initial framing of the material. "But after the crash, we realized we weren't tapping into our emotions. We had to make changes."

Now, Charlie Ebersol said, the film "represents our trying to find hope in the face of loss."

Russia, China Team Up To Assail U.S. Foreign Policy (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

Teaming up in a thinly veiled attack on perceived U.S. efforts to dominate the world, Russia and China on Friday issued a declaration demanding respect for the right of all countries to develop free of outside interference.

Signed by Russian President Vladimir V. Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao on the second day of a summit here, the statement denounces "the aspiration for monopoly and domination in international affairs" and calls for an end to "attempts to divide nations into leaders and those being led."

While not mentioning the United States directly, the Declaration on World Order in the 21st Century leaves no doubt that Washington is its main target.

Russian-Chinese ties have been steadily warming, boosted by the signing last year and ratification this spring of the final settlement of a prolonged border dispute. The two countries plan to hold their first joint military maneuvers this year in China.

Putin and Hu offered each other support in Moscow's war against separatist rebels in the republic of Chechnya and Beijing's effort to assert control over Taiwan, which it considers a renegade province.

"Any actions aimed at splitting sovereign states and kindling ethnic discord are inadmissible," the statement says.

"The declaration reflects similar approaches by Russia and China to fundamental world policy issues," Putin told reporters after the signing ceremony. "We understand well the importance of good-neighborly relations based on partnership between Russia and China, both for our own peoples and for the entire world."

Hu told reporters that the two sides had discussed cooperation concerning Taiwan and Chechnya, promotion of stability in Central Asia, reform of the United Nations and "the nuclear problem of the Korean peninsula."

The declaration shows that Moscow and Beijing "don't quite believe the sincerity of the second Bush administration's attempts to break its image of being a proponent of unilateral actions and decisions," said Andrei Kortunov, president of the New Eurasia Foundation in Moscow.

"It is confirmation that Washington's attempts to somehow draw various countries into cooperation on a whole number of issues doesn't seem very convincing to China and Russia," Kortunov said.

"This may be connected with the unilateral actions of Washington in the Middle East, its latest decisions on increasing its defense budget and some others."

The declaration endorses a stronger United Nations role in global affairs and rejects attempts "to impose models of social and political development from outside."

The accord also prominently recycles language that China has pushed in international agreements for decades: "All countries of the world should strictly observe the principles of mutual respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity, mutual nonaggression, noninterference in each other's internal affairs, equality and mutual benefit, and peaceful coexistence."

Vasily Mikheyev, deputy director of the Institute of Far Eastern Studies at the Russian Academy of Sciences, said the declaration was "to some extent counterproductive because it is composed in an old diplomatic style, in the spirit of the Cold War. That is, the declaration is full of cliches from Cold War times."

He added: "The language of this declaration has very little to do with the diplomacy of globalization. It is neither in Russian nor in Chinese interests to spoil relations with the United States. That is why no country is named by name in the declaration, which makes it sound even more like a bureaucratic Cold War document."

The two sides also signed economic agreements Friday, including one between the Russian oil company Rosneft and China National Petroleum Corp. that paves the way for increased Russian oil exports to China. Rosneft announced in a news release that the firms would begin discussing cooperation in exploring and developing oil and gas fields on Sakhalin Island, off Russia's east coast.

Other agreements involve cooperation in electric power and banking.

Trade between Russia and China jumped by one-third in 2004, to $21 billion, and has continued to expand rapidly this year, Putin told reporters.

"There are promising projects in such sectors as metallurgy, the modernization of transport infrastructure, inter-bank ties and space exploration," Putin said. "We intend to develop military-technical ties and cooperation between defense ministries."

White House Renews Contact With N. Korea (AP-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0000779

By Barry Schweid, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

The United States has resumed contact with North Korea, but the talks at a security conference in New York have not produced a decision to reopen negotiations on Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program, the State Department said Friday.

The same two American diplomats who met secretly in May with North Korean counterparts in New York, State Department envoy Joseph DeTrani and James Foster, were involved, spokesman Sean McCormack said. Foster is in charge of the department's office of Korean affairs.

He described it as a "contact" and said there was no negotiating between the two sides at the conference held by the National Committee on American Foreign Policy.

The conference dealt primarily with the Korean peninsula, and customarily at such events "there is a natural exchange among the attendees," McCormack said.

"I am not going to characterize it beyond that," the U.S. official said, but added: "We are still waiting to hear from North Korea a date when they will return to the six-party talks and engage in those talks in a constructive manner."

In fact, McCormack said, "all the members of the six-party talks are still waiting to hear from North Korea a date when they will return" to the talks.

After the May meeting surfaced, McCormack said North Korea had registered an interest in reopening the negotiations, last held a year ago. No date or location has been set since, and McCormack declined to say whether the North Koreans had expressed interest again in the latest encounter.

"What matters is that they return to the talks and engage in a constructive manner," he said.

China, Russia, South Korea and Japan are aligned with the United States in the negotiations, trying to persuade North Korea to halt a nuclear weapons program that U.S. intelligence is convinced already has produced at least two bombs.

Last week, Undersecretary of State Robert Joseph suggested that China put economic pressure on North Korea to induce it to reopen nuclear weapons negotiations.

Joseph, who has succeeded John R. Bolton as the department's top arms control official, said, "We think China can do more to get them to eliminate their nuclear weapons program."

China shares with the United States and other nations an interest in a nuclear-free Korean peninsula, Joseph said. "It is very much in China's interest to exert as much influence as it can," he said.

"My sense is that the North Koreans will come back," he said. "I hope in the near term."

US, North Korea Have Contacts (AFP)

AFP, July 2, 2005

US and North Korean officials had rare direct discussions Thursday on efforts to resolve the dispute over Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program, the State Department said.

Spokesman Sean McCormack said Joseph DeTrani, the US envoy to six-party talks on the nuclear issue, conferred with senior North Korean diplomat Ri Gun at an academic conference in New York.

"Yesterday, in the context of the seminar, there was contact between Mr. DeTrani and Mr. Ri Gun," McCormack said. But he added, "This was not a negotiation."

McCormack would not discuss any details of the latest exchange between the two countries, which have no diplomatic relations but occasionally make contact via Pyongyang's UN mission in New York.

But a senior State Department official implicitly confirmed the two had discussed efforts to resume the nuclear negotiations that have been stalled for a year.

"That probably would be the only reason why we would have contact with them. That's the issue before us," said the official, who asked not to be named.

But McCormack made it clear that any substantive negotiations could come only within the framework of the multilateral talks that also include China, Japan, South Korea and Russia.

"All the members of the six-party talks are still waiting to hear from North Korea a date when they will return to the six-party talks and engage in those talks in a constructive manner," he said.

Word of the New York discussions came after South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-Moon said Friday that Christopher Hill, the top US negotiator with North Korea, could visit the insular communist country.

Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, said recently he would be prepared to make the trip.

"He has already visited South Korea, China, Japan and Russia, which are involved in the talks. There is no reason for him to skip North Korea," Ban said in an interview with the Hankyoreh newspaper in Seoul.

DOJ_NMG_0000780

The news also came as South Korea's Yonhap news agency said that US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would visit China, Japan and South Korea later this month. The State Department declined to confirm the report.

The encounter between DeTrani and Ri Gun, Pyongyang's number-two man in the nuclear negotiations, came after McCormack announced Thursday that he expected no substantive contact between the men.

The pair were in New York for a conference on the Korean Peninsula also attended by Jim Foster, who heads the State Department's office of Korean affairs, and other participants in the six-party process.

North Korea boycotted the fourth round of the talks in September after rejecting a US-led aid-for-disarmament offer. Pyongyang has also demanded that Washington end its "hostile" attitude before discussions can resume.

Although the negotiations have been deadlocked for a year, optimism has grown in recent weeks that North Korea might be willing to come back to the table sometime this month.

North Korea Wants U.S. To Withdraw Remark (AP-Y2)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

North Korea told the United States that it must withdraw its description of the communist nation as an "outpost of tyranny" and treat Pyongyang as a friend if it wants nuclear talks to resume, a senior North Korean official said Friday.

North Korea's director general of North American affairs, Li Gun, told reporters after a two-day conference on northeast Asian security that the next step is up to the Americans.

Speaking in English, Li said, "We told them (the U.S.) to just withdraw the words `outpost of tyranny.' We demand it."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called North Korea one of the world's "outposts of tyranny" during her confirmation hearings in January. She defended the characterization last month, telling Pyongyang if it wants economic help it must give up its nuclear weapons and return to the six-party talks.

The State Department confirmed that Joseph De Trani, the top U.S. official to the six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear weapons program, and James Foster, who is in charge of the department's office of Korean affairs, resumed contact with the North Koreans at the conference.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said there were no negotiations between the two sides at the closed meeting.

"We are still waiting to hear from North Korea a date when they will return to the six-party talks and engage in those talks in a constructive manner," he said.

De Trani told reporters it was a good meeting but would not elaborate.

Speaking in Korean, Li said the two sides exchanged positions and that he told the Americans "the United States has to treat us friendly, not as enemy, if they want us to take part in the six-party talks."

Li said it wasn't the right time to talk about when the talks would reopen.

"We have to watch the Americans, what kind of steps the Americans take," he said.

Li's remarks in Korean were translated by the correspondent for South Korea's main daily newspaper, Chosun Ilbo.

Later, Li told the correspondent for the Japanese daily, Tokyo Shinbun, that the conference was useful.

"We are ready for resuming the six-party talks, and we told them that," he said in English. "The U.S. must create some justification to enter into the six-party talks."

"We never deny or oppose to six-party talks. Our position is that once they give us justification, we can enter any time into six-party talks," Li said.

"I think they heard our voices, and it's up to them. We will see it," he said.

The multilateral talks — involving North and South Korea, the United States, China, Japan and Russia — have been stalled since June 2004. Since then, North Korea declared it has nuclear weapons, claiming they are a deterrent against a possible attack by the United States.

The State Department announced North Korea's agreement to resume talks on June 6 following a meeting in New York between De Trani, Foster and senior North Korean diplomats, but no date has been set.

___

AP Diplomatic Writer Barry Schweid contributed to this report from Washington.

Glimpses Of A Hermit Nation (LAT)

By Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000781

His day begins at 4:30 a.m. The 64-year-old retired math teacher doesn't own a clock or even a watch, but the internal alarm that has kept him alive while so many of his fellow North Koreans have starved to death tells him he had better get out to pick grass if his family is to survive.

Soon the streets of his city, Chongjin, will be swarming with others doing the same. Some cook the grass to eat. The teacher feeds it to the rabbits his family sells at the market.

At 10 a.m., he eats a modest meal of corn porridge. A late breakfast is best as it allows him and his wife to skip lunch. Then he goes with a hand cart to collect firewood. He has to walk two hours from Chongjin, mostly uphill, to find a patch that has not been stripped bare of vegetation.

"There is no time for rest. If you stand still, you will not survive," said the teacher, a lean, soft-spoken man with salt-and-pepper hair who could be described as elegant if not for his threadbare trousers and his fingernails, as gnarled as oyster shells from chronic malnutrition.

Later, if it is one of the rare evenings when there is electricity, he might indulge in reading Tolstoy. More often than not, he collapses for a few hours of sleep before the routine is replayed for yet another day.

Such is the quest for survival in North Korea, an impoverished country that is the most closed in the world.

Although North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons has captured the world's attention, outsiders know relatively little about its people or the miseries they have endured since a famine in the mid-1990s wiped out an estimated 2 million people. In the rare instances in which foreigners are admitted to the totalitarian country, it is on strictly escorted tours of the capital, Pyongyang, and a few other carefully selected sites.

To penetrate the secrecy, the Los Angeles Times spoke at length in China and South Korea with more than 30 people from Chongjin, North Korea's third-largest city. Their stories from the streets, homes and workplaces present a portrait of the city and of daily life in a nation struggling with deprivation and change.

Most of the factories in Chongjin, a former industrial port, are rusting into ruin. Those still operating can barely pay salaries; the average worker's wage amounts to $1 per month at current exchange rates.

Even with international aid, many people go to bed wondering whether they will eat the next day. Residents, along with officials of the United Nations World Food Program, say food shortages have grown worse again in the last year.

U.S.: Photo Not Of Iran Chief (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

U.S. investigators have concluded that Iranian president-elect Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is not the glowering Islamic militant seen escorting an American hostage in a 1979 photograph that was widely publicized this week, officials said Friday.

The conclusion casts doubt on what had been considered a key piece of evidence indicating that Iran's new president was among the leaders of the group of students who seized control of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and went on to hold 52 Americans hostage for 444 days.

A U.S. official familiar with the investigation of Ahmadinejad's role said that analysts had found "serious discrepancies" between the figure in the 1979 photo and other images of the Iranian president. The discrepancies included differences in facial structure and features, the official said.

If there is a case to be made that Ahmadinejad was among the hostage takers in 1979, the official said, "it doesn't look as if it will be done on the basis of those photographs."

The official stressed that the investigation was continuing and that it was "still an open question" whether Ahmadinejad was involved in the hostage crisis. Analysis of the photos was just one of many avenues in what has become a multi-agency inquiry, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Friday that those involved in the inquiry were "searching through all the information at their disposal," and planned to interview former hostages. McCormack also said that the intelligence community was involved in the inquiry.

He did not elaborate, but other officials said the CIA was among the agencies playing a leading role.

The Bush administration launched the investigation this week after several former hostages said they recognized Ahmadinejad as one of their captors.

Those claims appeared to be bolstered by the 1979 photo, which was in the archives of Associated Press. It depicts two militants, one of whom bears a striking resemblance to Ahmadinejad, on either side of a blindfolded American.

The picture has been widely circulated on the Internet, and was carried on the front pages of major newspapers across the country, including Friday's editions of The Times.

DOJ_NMG_0000782

William J. Daugherty, a former CIA officer who was one of the hostages, said Friday that he was not positive that Ahmadinejad is the bearded man depicted in the 1979 photo, but said he remained convinced that Ahmadinejad was among the hostage takers.

Daugherty, who lives in Savannah, Ga., said he and other former hostages "did not make our identification based on that AP photo from 1979. We made it looking at the guy today."

When the Associated Press contacted him this week to show him the 1979 photo, Daugherty said that his initial reaction was that Ahmadinejad and the militant in the picture "could be the same guy."

After closer examination, he said, "I see some differences," though he noted that comparing the two was difficult because the smiling politician exhibits a very different demeanor from the young militant in the picture who he said is "deliberately trying to look fierce and menacing."

Daugherty said that the blindfolded American in the photo is Jerry J. Miele, who was a communications officer at the embassy. The Iranian who resembles Ahmadinejad has not been positively identified.

The allegations about Ahmadinejad have deepened long-standing tensions between the United States and the Islamic Republic, which have not had diplomatic relations in more than a quarter-century. President Bush has declared Iran part of an "axis of evil," and administration officials have refused to rule out military intervention to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

Ahmadinejad, the former mayor of Tehran, is an Islamic hard-liner whose recent victory over better-known presidential candidates defied predictions. Officials close to Ahmadinejad, as well as some Iranians who are known to have helped orchestrate the seizure of the American Embassy in 1979, have said in recent days that Ahmadinejad was not actively involved.

White House Waiting On Iran Leader Facts (AP-Y2)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP2, July 2, 2005

The White House said Friday it would not be surprised if the newly elected Iranian president turns out to have been a main participant in the holding of American hostages in Tehran a quarter century ago. But the administration said it was still trying to determine the facts.

Five former U.S. hostages who saw Iranian president-elect Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in photos or on television said they believe he was among the hostage-takers. One said he was interrogated by Ahmadinejad.

"I don't think it should be surprising to anyone if it turns out to be true," presidential spokesman Scott McClellan said. "This is a regime run by an unelected few that only allowed its handpicked candidates to run in an election that was well short of free and fair."

U.S. officials have found serious discrepancies in photographs of one hostage-taker that have gotten attention in recent days and those of Ahmadinejad, said one official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because reviews are still under way. But, the official added, other information still must be assessed.

The administration has acknowledged that it has followed Ahmadinejad's career in Iranian politics, so it was unclear why the United States could not say if he were a hostage-taker or whether the issue had been explored before. "Given the nature of the regime and his own past, I don't think it should be surprising," McClellan said.

In Tehran on Friday, a reporter for The New York Times asked Ahmadinejad if he was one of the hostage-takers.

"It is not true," Ahmadinejad said. "It is only rumors."

If Ahmadinejad turns out to have been a participant, he wouldn't be the first top Iranian official with a role in the 1979 crisis.

The current Iranian vice president and head of the Environment Department, Massoumeh Ebtekar, was the chief interpreter and spokeswoman for the radical students who took over the U.S. Embassy and held 52 Americans hostage for 444 days.

Dubbed "Sister Mary" by the American press because her heavy head scarf resembled a nun's habit, Ebtekar gave almost nightly interviews during the standoff, denouncing the hostages as spies and accusing the United States of committing crimes.

Some of the former students have said Ahmadinejad opposed the takeover and played no role in it, even though he was a member of the hard-line Islamic student group that seized the embassy.

Ebtekar, who is also one of Iran's six vice presidents, has been the highest-ranking woman in the moderate-leaning government of President Mohammad Khatami.

She acknowledged her part in the U.S. Embassy takeover in remarks to reporters in 1998.

"The generation that is in executive and policy-making jobs is a revolutionary generation that played an active role in every stage of the revolution," Ebtekar said then.

A report in The New York Times that year had detailed her involvement, which was not listed on Ebtekar's biography.

DOJ_NMG_0000783

She was an 18-year-old freshman at Polytechnic University in Tehran when she became the public voice of the student takeover. She spoke English better than others in the student group because she had lived in suburban Philadelphia as a child and had attended American schools.

She once told an ABC News reporter that she could imagine being provoked into killing the hostages.

"Yes," she said. "When I've seen an American gun being lifted up and killing my brothers and sisters in the streets, of course."

In the turbulent early days of Iran's Islamic Revolution, Ahmadinejad was more concerned with putting down leftists and communists at universities than striking at Americans, former students said. During the long standoff, he was writing and speaking against leftist students, they said.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley said Thursday that the United States has followed his career. "Obviously, one of the things you do when you get a report like this is look back and see what you have in the files and that's the process that's going on now," he said.

Hadley said the White House was looking into the photographs and had not reached any conclusions. "They are allegations at the present time," he said. "We need to get the facts."

Hadley stressed that the United States would have to deal with Ahmadinejad, even if the administration did not approve of the way he was elected. President Bush denounced the election, saying it was designed to maintain power in the hands of an unelected few who denied ballot access to more than 1,000 people who wanted to run.

___

On the Net:

State Department: http://www.state.gov

Iranian Leader Denies He Was Among Radicals At Embassy (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

A shiny black Peugeot rolled to a stop, and there he was, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the president-elect of Iran, smiling through an open window, ready to greet a few of the people who have been coming to his street as a sort of pilgrimage since he won.

The security men tried to keep a cordon around the car, but the president-elect gave his casual smile, and told them to let the people through. He also let this reporter and an interpreter approach.

When asked the question preoccupying many Americans about him just now - Had he been among the students who sacked the United States Embassy in 1979 and held American hostages for 444 days? - his driver started to pull out, but Mr. Ahmadinejad stopped him and said he would answer.

"It is not true," he said. "It is only rumors."

The security men began to push again, and three women draped in flowing black chadors made their way up to the car.

One woman handed Mr. Ahmadinejad a blank piece of paper on which he wrote: "Stick to your Islamic values. God will help you."

And with that, he closed the window and was driven off.

Since the election a week ago, it has been nearly impossible to get a feel for Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, to take the measure of the man. He has refused all interviews, though he did hold one hourlong news conference. His spokesman has insisted that he was not among the students at the embassy.

He is generally described as an ultra-conservative. He has been a member of the Basij militia, which is made up of young bearded men who ride through the streets on motorcycles enforcing strict codes of behavior and dress, often brutally. He was also a member of the Revolutionary Guard during the war with Iraq. And of course he has recently been accused of being one of the student leaders who stormed the American Embassy in Tehran on Nov. 4, 1979, keeping 52 hostages.

Yet friends, supporters and neighbors here describe the diminutive, bearded man as humble and caring. Mr. Ahmadinejad has a small circle of aides, one that appears a bit overwhelmed by all the demands and preparations ahead. Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political science professor at Tehran University, said that he had known the president-elect since childhood and that Mr. Ahmadinejad was not involved with the student hostage takers. He said they grew up together in East Tehran, and Mr. Hadian-Jazy described his old classmate as among the brightest in the neighborhood.

He called Mr. Ahmadinejad "self-confident, committed and absolutely incorruptible." He said he is very religious, but modern in his thinking. If there is a negative quality, Mr. Hadian-Jazy said, it is that he is very set in his views, and can be hard to persuade otherwise.

"If you can force him to sit down and listen, he has the capability to understand," the professor said.

DOJ_NMG_0000784

While Mr. Ahmadinejad maintained a humble life style as the appointed mayor of Tehran, that is likely to change, if for no other reason than security. He lives at the end of a dead-end street, more of an alley that runs alongside a school. The alley opens onto a circle, with a small park in the middle with benches and a field of grass that now attracts those who come to ask favors of the president-elect, and serves as a spot for neighbors to socialize. These days, cars packed with sightseers drive around the circle, stopping to look down the alley, a far cry from the palatial and off-limit homes of other Iranian leaders.

On Friday, the day of prayer and rest in most Muslim countries, some of Mr. Ahmadinejad's neighbors sat on a bench, talking about their favorite son. It is almost a rule that when someone is asked about Mr. Ahmadinejad, the first thing said is that he is a modest person who has never lost touch with his roots. Security is very tight in the neighborhood, and with soldiers and plainclothes agents around, the neighbors were afraid to give their names.

One older man, who said he had lived in the neighborhood for 15 years, said that every year for the Iranian New Year, Mr. Ahmadinejad invited the neighbors over for a celebration. He is described as a devout man who lives in a three-bedroom house with two sons and a daughter. His family has little furniture, they said, and has machine-made carpets, not the more expensive hand-woven ones commonly owned by the better-off.

One son is finishing high school, and the two other children are studying in the university, the neighbors said.

Since he became mayor of Tehran, the city has had a driver pick Mr. Ahmadinejad up for work every day. But on his days off, neighbors said, he still drives the same 1977 Peugeot, without air-conditioning, that is parked in the alleyway beside the house.

People are quick to offer stories about Mr. Ahmadinejad, almost as if he was a religious figure. They say, for example, that he always brought his own lunch to work because he did not want the city to have to pay for his meals.

At the municipal building, Ahmad Esmali's job is to deliver tea to the offices. "This mayor was better than the others," he said recently. "He saw managers and workers with one eye."

In the park on Friday, one neighbor said the mayor had given money to the local butcher, at a shop called Zand, so the butcher could give poor and needy people meat at a discount. Two young men working in the butcher shop said they believed it was true.

It is a common practice in many Middle Eastern cultures for leaders to have audiences with citizens seeking help, or to accept their petitions for assistance. Mr. Ahmadinejad appears to take that custom to heart.

A small security booth sits at the mouth of the alley leading to his house. As Mr. Ahmadinejad's car pulled out, a security agent handed the president-elect a pile of letters that had been delivered that morning, from people seeking some kind of help.

Ali Ghorbani, 29, had just driven up to deliver a letter to the guard booth when Mr. Ahmadinejad pulled up. Mr. Ghorbani wanted to ask for a loan so he and a friend could open a cultural center in Tehran. He was allowed to hand the letter directly to the president-elect. "I didn't have the faintest idea I would see him," Mr. Ghorbani said as he walked away. "He took the letter and told me I would have a reply in two weeks."

Legacy Of Embassy Seizure Fades (WT)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

The Washington Times, July 2, 2005

For Iranians, fervor over the 1979 U.S. Embassy takeover -- a central event in their stormy Islamic Revolution -- has faded. If the country's new president participated, he would be one of many former hostage-takers who entered politics.

Many of the organizers of the embassy seizure are now leading advocates of democratic reform and closer ties with the United States.

In fact, the election of hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad marks the end of an era in which former hostage-takers held key positions in the government and parliament. Most of them have already lost their posts in the backlash by Iran's clerical regime or will leave with the outgoing pro-reform president.

The official Iranian media outlets were silent yesterday about U.S. demands that the new president explain his role in the embassy seizure. Six former hostages, after seeing Mr. Ahmadinejad in photos or on television, said they believe he was among the hostage-takers.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's aides have denied he had a role.

The students who carried out the embassy takeover said Mr. Ahmadinejad didn't participate in the taking or holding of 52 American hostages for 444 days.

If he had been involved, Mr. Ahmadinejad likely would have played it up in his presidential campaign to increase his appeal to hard-liners, the only ones who might still be impressed, said Abbas Abdi, one of the student leaders.

"If he had played any sort of role in any part of it, he would have used that 1,000 times in the past 25 years to take advantage of it," Mr. Abdi said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0000785

While a traumatic event for Americans, the embassy seizure and the revolution that surrounded it were, for Iranians, similar to the 1960s in the U.S. and Europe: a turbulent period that forged today's leaders.

And, like many post-baby boomers in the United States sick of hearing about the 1960s, many young Iranians have little interest in the capture of the "den of spies," as the revolutionaries called the U.S. Embassy.

"I was a little kid when the embassy seizure happened," said Reza Hosseinpour, a Tehran shopkeeper in his late 20s. "I don't want to hear about it anymore. It's part of the past history. There has been enough hostility between Iran and America."

In past years, the annual celebrations to mark the Nov. 4, 1979 seizure of the embassy have attracted crowds only in the hundreds -- many of them children bused in for the event.

The students who carried out the takeover were vehement supporters of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the Shi'ite theologian who became Iran's supreme leader and imposed an Islamic government. The students seized the embassy to protest the U.S. refusal to hand over Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, the Iranian leader who had been ousted from power that year.

Over the past decade, many of the students formed the core of the Iranian reform movement that sought the loosening of the theocracy's hold on power and contacts with the United States.

Many, like Mr. Abdi, are members of the Islamic Iran Participation Front, the largest reformist party, which helped bring outgoing pro-reform President Mohammad Khatami to power in 1997.

Mr. Khatami's brother, Mohammad Reza Khatami, was also a hostage-taker but now leads the party and was vice speaker of parliament after his brother took office.

Mr. Abdi was jailed in November 2002 after conducting a poll showing strong public support for dialogue with the United States. He was sentenced to eight years in prison but freed in May after the Supreme Court overturned his conviction.

At least two former hostage-takers will be leaving office with Mr. Khatami's government: Energy Minister Habibollah Bitaraf and Vice President Masumeh Ebtekar, the highest woman in the Iranian leadership.

Miss Ebtekar was the 19-year-old spokeswoman for the students who seized the embassy.

Known sarcastically among the American captives as "Sister Mary," she learned English as a child in Philadelphia and became a fixture on American television. On an almost nightly basis, she vigorously defended the embassy takeover and the Iranian Revolution.

For Former Tehran Hostages, A Tangle Of Anger At Both Captors And The U.S. (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer And Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

For Thomas Schaefer, being held hostage in Iran for 444 days was a transformative experience but largely a solitary one. It was rare for him, a former Air Force attaché, to see any of his fellow hostages during captivity, and he saw few afterward.

These days, he said in an interview on Friday, "there are still about four or five guys I keep in touch with," but "we're scattered around the world." Large gatherings or other occasions are rare for the surviving 41 hostages, who were taken captive by Iranian militants in November 1979.

This week, however, was one of those occasions, prompted by the election of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a student radical at the time of the embassy takeover, as the new president of Iran.

Five of the former hostages, seeing photographs of Mr. Ahmadinejad, said they remembered him as a virulently anti-American figure during the takeover who supervised other militants and urged them to be tougher on captives. The president-elect and former leaders of the hostage takers have denied that he was among the militants.

The memories evoked by that debate have stirred other feelings, too - including the betrayal felt by some when their lawsuit against Iran's government was blocked by the State and Justice Departments, which argued that compensation would violate the 1981 treaty that was the basis for the hostages' release.

Some of the men who stepped forward this week have incorporated badges of their ordeal into their everyday lives - for instance, by building e-mail addresses around the number "444." Most of them have also been in the forefront of a series of unsuccessful class-action lawsuits seeking monetary compensation for their ordeal. They remain in close e-mail contact.

Other former captives still work in the diplomatic world, some of them employed by the State Department. They have been more aloof from the disputes over the past, though they are among the 130 people - former hostages, spouses and children - who could benefit.

But in public, when controversies like this week's arise, they say nothing against their fellows. Those former hostages who, in interviews, could not corroborate the memories of the five who identified Mr. Ahmadinejad - Charles Scott, Donald Sharer, William J. Daugherty, Kevin J. Hermening and David M. Roeder - pointedly did not contradict them.

DOJ_NMG_0000786

For example, Richard H. Morefield, the American consul general at the embassy when it was seized, said in a telephone interview from his home in Springfield, Va., that "it's not surprising that I don't recognize" the new president as a onetime militant. "I was not one of those on which they spent a lot of time."

The publicity about the election energized small, informal networks of former captives. Steven Kirtley, 46, an information systems consultant for a small Washington, D.C., company who was a Marine guard at the embassy, received an e-mail note from another former hostage, Paul Lewis, on Monday or early Tuesday, with a link to a Web site that showed the new president's photograph.

The face looked familiar, he said in an interview, but he could not be sure. "I can't pin him down to a specific time or place as one of the hostage takers," he said.

Another thing that unites the hostages is their refusal to speak for one another. Most were newcomers to the embassy before the takeover; most were held alone or in very small groups. All of the 50 men and 2 women who emerged incorporated the ordeal into their lives differently. Some bonded with one another; many did not.

The ordeal was defining for Mr. Schaefer, the former Air Force attaché, who lives in Phoenix. He said he was deeply offended when the State Department stepped in to block the former captives' successful federal lawsuit against Iran in 2001, just as the judge was about to award damages, which would have been paid out of the Iranian government money in American banks that was frozen in 1979.

The State Department has said it was unaware of the lawsuit until a legal officer stumbled upon it just before its scheduled conclusion. Hastily, the department argued that the suit conflicted with the agreement the government made with Iran in 1981 and that neither the courts nor Congress had the right to abrogate international treaties.

In what was known as the Algiers accord, the United States agreed to preclude the prosecution of any claim against Iran arising out of the hostages' seizure and detention.

Several acts of Congress in later years appeared to open the door to lawsuits against Iran despite the agreement. A group of hostages filed a class-action suit in 2000. Then, in 2001, shortly after President Bush took office, the State Department and the Justice Department intervened.

This week, Sean McCormack, the department spokesman, punctuated his comments about the hostages' allegations on Thursday with one expression of concern that caught their attention: "I do want to say one thing, and that is to underscore the fact that we have not forgotten - we have not forgotten - the fact that 51 of our diplomats were held for 444 days, that they were taken hostage."

Mr. Daugherty, a former hostage, responded Friday: "Of course they haven't forgotten. They have challenged us at three levels of the federal court system and have challenged every piece of legislation that would allow us to sue Iran or to receive compensation in some way."

Asked about that, Mr. McCormack simply referred to his statement on Thursday, adding: "I'm not going to comment. What am I going to say?"

Abbas Seeks Cabinet Post For Hamas (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has made overtures to the Islamic militant group Hamas about joining his Cabinet in the near future, Palestinian officials said Friday.

Hamas has not yet said whether it is willing to accept such an invitation. However, in recent months the group has made clear its interest in mainstream electoral politics, and it intends to field candidates in parliamentary balloting this year.

That election, originally set for mid-July, is now expected sometime after Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, which is scheduled to begin in mid-August.

The idea of approaching Hamas to participate in the government prior to the voting has been raised in several recent meetings of Abbas' Fatah faction, Palestinian officials said, including talks currently underway in Amman, Jordan.

Fatah's Central Committee, which sets the movement's policy, is meeting in the Jordanian capital to accommodate exiled leaders such as Farouk Kaddoumi, a Palestine Liberation Organization hard-liner who refuses to enter the Palestinian territories because he would have to submit to Israeli border formalities.

"The spirit of this meeting involves participation of all Palestinian factions in a national unity government," said Nabil Shaath, a Palestinian deputy prime minister and the minister of information.

In Gaza, Hamas spokesman Sami abu Zuhri said the militant group would announce its position on joining the government "at a suitable time."

DOJ_NMG_0000787

Palestinian and Israeli media reports said that Hamas had previously demanded that Abbas set up a special authority to oversee the hand-over of Gaza that would include the militant group but that the Palestinian leader had refused. Israeli plans call for evacuating all 21 Jewish settlements in Gaza and four smaller ones in the northern West Bank.

At the Amman talks, Fatah officials reportedly are also weighing candidates, including Kaddoumi, for deputy to Abbas. The Palestinian president endorsed the idea of having a deputy after undergoing a coronary procedure last month in the Jordanian capital.

Hamas, which has scored strongly in municipal elections in the West Bank and Gaza, is expected to do well in parliamentary balloting. Last week, respected Palestinian pollster Khalil Shikaki told reporters that the latest numbers indicated the group could easily win a third of the seats on the Palestinian Legislative Council.

Both Hamas and Fatah officials in the Gaza Strip said Hamas might be willing to accept a Cabinet position or positions before the pullout to help ensure that the hand-over of Gaza, where the group has great influence, goes smoothly.

Hamas has a large and loyal following in Gaza, particularly among the seaside enclave's poorer residents. The group's popularity stems largely from the social services it provides and from its image of incorruptibility, which contrasts sharply with the graft-ridden history of the Palestinian Authority.

Israel and the Palestinian Authority have been locked in dispute about how Abbas ought to deal with Hamas. The group's military wing carried out dozens of suicide bombings during more than four years of fighting, and it has never abandoned an ideology that calls for the destruction of Israel.

Until now, Hamas has declined to take part in the Palestinian government, citing objections in principle to the interim peace accords that brought the Palestinian Authority into being more than a decade ago.

Hamas, together with other armed factions, agreed in March to observe a period of calm until the end of the year, refraining from attacks against Israelis. Its militants have violated that informal accord by firing mortar shells and rockets at Jewish settlements and Israeli communities, but only Islamic Jihad has mounted major attacks during the ad hoc truce.

On the Israeli side, polls Friday suggested that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was again rallying public support for his Gaza pullout plan. Previous surveys had shown backing for the withdrawal slipping below 50%.

However, this week's violent actions by extremists opposed to the pullout, including a widely publicized incident in which settler youths beat a Palestinian in front of news photographers, apparently have swayed opinion against the settlers.

A survey published in Friday's editions of the daily newspaper Yediot Aharonot indicated that support for Sharon's plan had climbed to 62%.

A poll in the Maariv newspaper said 54% backed the withdrawal.

Germany's Parliament Votes Out Coalition (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

A grim and tired-looking Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder pleaded Friday with the German Parliament to dissolve his government, arguing that his ruling coalition had lost the ability to fix the German economy, the largest in Europe but hobbled by years of stagnation and joblessness.

After a two-hour debate, lawmakers approved Schroeder's request to disband and hold national elections in September. If the president and Supreme Court sign off on the plan -- and that is not at all certain -- the elections would take place a year earlier than necessary; opinion polls predict that Schroeder and his coalition will lose.

The next chancellor would likely be Angela Merkel, leader of the opposition Christian Democrats. She would be the first woman to hold the office, and the first person from the former communist East to lead the reunified Germany.

The sense of defeatism that lingered in the Reichstag building in the capital reflected the political mood across Germany, where a majority of voters say they lack confidence in any of their leaders to address a host of pressing social and economic issues. These include the highest unemployment rate since World War II and a failure to erase cultural and income gaps between eastern Germany and the wealthier west.

Schroeder won reelection three years ago, in large part by vociferously opposing U.S. policy toward Iraq. Like President Jacques Chirac of France, he has seen his popularity plummet at home because of economic concerns and anti-globalization sentiment, as well as anxiety over immigration and his country's role in the expanded European Union.

In an address to lawmakers, Schroeder said his ruling coalition of Social Democrats and Greens was hopelessly divided over his policies to rejuvenate the economy with a mixture of spending cuts and hiring incentives. "Without a new mandate, my political program cannot be carried forward," Schroeder said.

DOJ_NMG_0000788

The unusual maneuver of seeking a vote of no confidence on his own rule grew from provisions in the German constitution that make it difficult to dissolve a government. These measures were drafted after World War II in an effort to avoid the political instability that helped the Nazis rise to power.

But Parliament's no-confidence vote must be upheld by President Horst Koehler, who has indicated that he will not rubber-stamp the move.

Koehler has three weeks to make his decision. He has said he will take into account arguments from some legal scholars and members of Schroeder's coalition that it is unconstitutional for a ruling party to disband a government unless there is a genuine political crisis that prevents it from operating.

Opponents of Friday's vote have already served notice that they will file a challenge with the German Supreme Court.

Otto Depenheuer, a law professor at the University of Cologne, said Schroeder carefully crafted his call for a no-confidence vote by stressing that rebels in the governing coalition were making it impossible for him to continue effectively, rather than blaming the opposition.

"He clearly stated that he was lacking support from his own party," Depenheuer said. "This is a clear sign for the federal president that the chancellor is no longer in a position to carry out his politics. "

Lawmakers in the lower house of Parliament voted 296 to 151 against the government, with 148 abstentions. Nearly all the abstentions came from Schroeder's coalition.

Opinion polls show the opposition Christian Democrats far ahead of Schroeder's party. In May, the Christian Democrats won a regional election in the populous state of North Rhine-Westphalia, an industrial region that had strongly favored the Social Democrats for 40 years.

Merkel, the Christian Democratic leader, told members of Parliament that early elections were necessary. "The people are fed up with being governed by a zigzag course," she said.

In remarks aimed directly at Schroeder, she reminded the chancellor of a campaign promise he made in 1998 to add jobs. "You said it yourself, 'If we do not lower unemployment significantly, we do not deserve to be reelected,' " Merkel said. "Mr. Chancellor, you cannot argue that the figure of almost 5 million unemployed people is not almost exactly the opposite of what you anticipated."

While Schroeder's reelection chances look bleak, political analysts said he concluded that an early election was his only chance. By looking resolute and boldly admitting that he needs a popular mandate to administer unpleasant reforms, he hopes to win back voters who had soured on his party, they said.

Others suggested that Schroeder was resigned to losing. Klaus von Beyme, a political science professor at the University of Heidelberg, said the chancellor would rather be remembered as someone who stepped down early for the good of the country than a weak leader who dragged out his term in office.

"If he is now going to lose, which I think he will, he will go down in history as the man who acted like a hero and took the country on the right road," von Beyme said. "He has very much calculated what posterity will think of him. I don't think he will necessarily be sad if he loses. There's a certain tiredness of governing."

Schröder Loses Confidence Vote; Early Election Is Likely (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

Chancellor Gerhard Schröder cleared a crucial hurdle in his quest to hold an early election in Germany this fall, deliberately losing a confidence vote in Parliament on Friday.

Mr. Schröder, gambling that a quick election is the only way to break Germany's political stalemate and rescue his own faded fortunes, watched somberly from his seat as lawmakers heeded his call to vote against the coalition that has governed Germany since 1998.

The carefully orchestrated defeat allowed him to petition the German president to dissolve Parliament, which would set the stage for elections in September, a year earlier than scheduled.

"Without a new mandate, it is impossible to continue with my policies," he said before the vote. "If we want to continue with the reforms, and we must, we need to seek a new mandate through elections."

With polls showing the chancellor's Social Democrats trailing the conservative opposition by nearly 20 percentage points, Mr. Schröder is already viewed by many here as a lame duck. The no-confidence vote added to the sense of a country on the cusp of a political change.

Angela Merkel, the conservative leader who is set to face Mr. Schröder in the election, supported his call for an early election. "This country needs cohesive politics," she said, delivering a feisty attack on the chancellor's record. "It is not enough to say we'll carry on as before."

DOJ_NMG_0000789

Mr. Schröder's win-by-losing strategy still faces two potential roadblocks. The German president, Horst Köhler, still must decide whether to dissolve Parliament. He has 21 days to make up his mind and his judgment must pass muster with the federal constitutional court.

Typically, German presidents accede to these requests. This case, though, could be different.

Legal scholars say Mr. Schröder's success in engineering the vote undermines his contention that he can no longer govern effectively - a claim he must prove to meet the constitutional test for dissolving Parliament. At least one legislator, Werner Schulz of the Green Party, said he planned to challenge the vote in court, calling it an "an absurdity."

Germany's Constitution makes it difficult to dissolve Parliament, largely to avoid the kind of instability that plagued the Weimar Republic from 1919 to 1933. There has been one prior confidence vote - called by Helmut Kohl in 1982 - in which the chancellor conspired to lose.

"My opinion, which is shared by most constitutional scholars, is that the president is not in a position to dissolve the Parliament," said Dieter Grimm, a former judge on the constitutional court.

Mr. Köhler, who assumed the largely ceremonial post of president in 2004 after being head of the International Monetary Fund, called the issues "complex," and said he would not be rushed into a decision.

There is little dispute that Mr. Schröder has lost much of his political credibility in the last year. He first called for elections to be moved up in May, after the Social Democrats were dealt a humiliating defeat in a state election in North Rhine-Westphalia, a traditional stronghold.

It was the latest in a string of defeats, and it underscored the depth of hostility that many Germans feel for Mr. Schröder's campaign to overhaul the country's sclerotic economy. Most notably, he has cut back benefits aimed at forcing long-term unemployed people back into the job market.

That provoked howls of protest and has not yet yielded tangible economic benefits. The number of people out of work still hovers around five million, and economic growth in Germany has trailed that of most of its neighbors, earning it the sobriquet "sick man of Europe."

The defeats have opened fissures in the Social Democratic Party, with left-wing factions calling for the chancellor to shelve his reform plans. The party's chairman, Franz Müntefering, started a populist campaign against foreign investors, describing them as "locusts."

"Schröder knows he can't pursue his reform politics without a majority behind him," said Jürgen Falter, a professor of political science at the University of Mainz. "He is a street fighter, so he thought, 'It's better to go into the last battle, than to give up and flee.' "

Mr. Schröder is a resilient campaigner, who fought back from a weak position to win re-election in 2002, in part by refusing to commit German troops to the American-led war in Iraq.

The battle lines for the campaign were already being drawn under the glass dome of the Reichstag on Friday. While Mr. Schröder sought to portray his government as a spent force, his coalition allies, like Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, lined up to poke holes in the opposition.

"You strike me as a magnificent-looking soufflé in the oven," Mr. Fischer said to Mrs. Merkel. "We'll see in the final three weeks, when the voters prick it, what's really left of this splendor. I can't wait."

Mr. Müntefering, the Social Democratic chairman, went a step further, declaring that the chancellor still enjoys the support of a majority in Parliament - a claim that seemed ill timed on the day that Mr. Schröder was trying to arrange the dismantling of his government.

Although Mr. Schröder did lose by a comfortable margin - 296 to 151, with 148 abstentions - political analysts were surprised that 105 members of Mr. Schröder's party voted in favor of the chancellor. They had been encouraged to abstain, as part of the plan to lose the vote.

"It's not so easy to say to your own chancellor that you don't have confidence in him," said Gernot Erler, a Social Democrat. "But we all have the same purpose, which is to open the path for an election."

Lawmakers lingered after the vote to assess a topsy-turvy day in German politics. Mr. Fischer likened it to the budget standoff between President Bill Clinton and Newt Gingrich that shut down the government in 1995. But he disputed the suggestion that the vote was staged.

"This was not theater," he said. "This was serious."

Schroeder Orchestrates His Exit As His Party Flounders (LAT)

By Christian Retzlaff

The Los Angeles Times, July 2, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000790

Facing high unemployment and an inability to reform the welfare state, German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder deliberately lost a confidence vote in Parliament on Friday, opening the way for early elections that are expected to push his liberal coalition from power.

Schroeder called for the vote after a series of political defeats and widening divisions within his Social Democratic Party over how to reform one of Europe's most generous welfare systems. President Horst Kohler is expected to dissolve Parliament in the coming weeks, and new elections are likely by mid-September, a year before Schroeder's term was to expire.

With an 18% approval rating, Schroeder's party has been viewed by most Germans as unable to stem high unemployment and enact social and economic programs to improve the nation's global competitiveness.

The conservative Christian Democrat Union, led by Angela Merkel, is well-positioned to win in new elections, according to recent polls.

Schroeder acknowledged his party's failures when he addressed the lower house of Parliament moments before the vote: "The reform program, known as Agenda 2010, has led to disputes between the parties and within the parties. My party, I can't deny it, has suffered most from the disputes."

Only 151 of 601 members of the lower house voted for Schroeder on Friday. The defeat was largely orchestrated by the chancellor, who asked his own party members and supporters to cast ballots of no confidence.

Analysts called it an indication that Schroeder believed his party and its allies were not unified enough to weather another year of economic problems while attempting to persuade Germans to accept significant social cuts.

Schroeder's Agenda 2010 program, announced two years ago and intended to prepare Germany's welfare system for economic globalization, failed to reduce the country's unemployment rate of almost 12%, the highest since the modern republic was formed in 1949.

Schroeder's political maneuverability was further curtailed by the Christian Democrats, who, in controlling the upper house of Parliament, blocked many of the chancellor's efforts.

"The urgent problems of our country, the continuation of reforms, the crisis of the European Union, the challenge of globalization and the danger for peace, security and stability do not allow a state of paralysis," Schroeder said in his speech. "We need clarity."

Germany's Constitution does not allow Parliament to dissolve itself, but after a lost confidence vote by the lower house, the president may call for early elections. It is still not certain whether Kohler will disband Parliament, or whether legal challenges will force the Constitutional Court to rule against the balloting.

Schroeder announced his strategy six weeks ago after his party lost an important regional vote in North Rhine-Westphalia, the Social Democratic heartland.

Merkel, who would be Germany's first female chancellor, supported Schroeder's decision to hold the no-confidence vote but denied that her party had obstructed reform.

"The Agenda 2010 was a right step in the right direction," Merkel said. Pointing toward Schroeder, she continued: "You were unable to tell the voters why the changes are necessary. That's why you have lost the last [regional] elections."

Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer of Schroeder's junior coalition partner, the Greens, used the session to criticize Merkel's party. He said the Christian Democrats had failed to present an alternative program for change.

"Ms. Merkel, at the moment you and your opinion polls come across like a beautiful souffle in the oven," he said. "Let's see what's really left of this splendor when the voter has pricked into it" in the run-up to elections.

Kohler must decide within 21 days whether he agrees with Schroeder that the current government cannot continue to function. In such a case, he would call elections within an additional 60 days.

Political analysts expect that Kohler will approve the new balloting.

"A president who urges every day to hurry up will be the last one to say: Let's muddle on for another year," wrote Robert Leicht, a commentator for the weekly newspaper Die Zeit.

Bild, a major tabloid and frequent critic of Schroeder, has already bid him an ironic farewell. In its Friday issue, the paper wrote "Thank You, Chancellor" in large letters on the front page.

The Constitutional Court could still block early elections. Werner Schulz, a Greens lawmaker, announced Friday that he would file suit to keep the current Parliament in office until autumn 2006.

Several small parties announced last week that they also would file suit.

Chinese Harassed U.S. Activist (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, July 2, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000791

Chinese authorities tried last week to detain an American human rights activist at an international conference in Beijing, prompting a tense standoff that ended after state security agents interrogated the woman in front of U.S. diplomats and two European ambassadors for more than an hour.

The European Union has lodged a protest with the Chinese government over the incident, which occurred June 21 and disrupted a two-day seminar on human rights. The activist, Sharon Hom, had been invited by China to the conference organized by the E.U. and the Chinese Foreign Ministry, according to Hom and diplomats familiar with what happened.

The government's decision to allow Hom to participate in the seminar appeared at first to be a diplomatic breakthrough because she is executive director of Human Rights in China, a New York-based advocacy group that the governing Communist Party has repeatedly condemned. The Beijing government also agreed to host representatives of Amnesty International and Article 19, a London group that campaigns for freedom of speech.

But during the banquet on the last night of the conference, plainclothes agents of the Ministry of State Security stopped Hom outside her hotel room and demanded she leave with them. Even after the protests of U.S. diplomats, the E.U. ambassador to China and its ambassador for human rights, the agents insisted on questioning her, Hom said.

The episode is the latest sign that Chinese President Hu Jintao has granted the country's security services greater authority to act against perceived threats to the party's grip on power. In recent months, police have detained several mainland dissidents and activists, as well as a prominent Hong Kong journalist employed by a Singapore newspaper. Propaganda officials have also ordered a general tightening of controls on the Internet and in state media.

The incident also suggests there may be a rift within the Chinese government about how to deal with pressure from the United States and Europe for progress on human rights issues and the release of political prisoners. Hom said Chinese diplomats and other officials treated her with respect during the seminar but none came to her defense when the state security agents arrived.

"One of the lessons of this incident is that while you can engage up to a point with the more progressive elements in the government, sooner or later you have to deal with the reality of the state security apparatus and the fact it can trump the others," Hom said by phone from New York. "One way to do that is to not to be intimidated and to insist on the inclusion of civil society and independent voices in China when engaging the government."

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy and another for the State Department said they were unable to immediately comment on the incident. E.U. diplomats in Beijing declined to comment, and the Chinese Foreign Ministry also did not respond to questions.

Hom said she waited until Friday to go public because the E.U. filed strong protests with the Chinese and she wanted time to analyze the situation carefully.

She said the incident began when she left the banquet early and returned to her hotel room, where she found that her key card no longer worked. Suddenly, two men and a woman surrounded her, identified themselves as state security agents and said they wanted to ask her a few questions, she said.

Hom said she agreed to go downstairs with them and offered to answer their questions in the lobby. But the agents insisted she go with them to a nearby location where it would be "more convenient" to talk. They pressed her to go for nearly 20 minutes, and their demands grew more threatening, Hom said.

One of eight agents in the lobby grabbed her arm when she began walking away, Hom said, but she made it back to the banquet and requested help from European diplomats there.

After a stalemate that lasted two hours, the agents eventually agreed to interrogate Hom in the presence of the U.S. deputy chief of mission and the two European ambassadors, she said. For more than an hour, she answered questions about her identity, her participation in the seminar, her activities in Beijing and her opinion of the changes in China over the past two decades.

Hom, who was born in Hong Kong, said one of the agents argued that though she is an American citizen, she is also "still Chinese." He then implied that she therefore could participate only in organizations approved under Chinese law, she said.

The interrogation ended shortly before midnight, Hom said, after she complained she was tired.

Hom said she was unsure why the agents targeted her. She said she did not meet with any Chinese outside the seminar. She also said she had visited China twice before while in her current job without a problem, as a tourist and a visiting law professor.

DOJ_NMG_0000792

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, July 5, 2005 8:05 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing 7/3/05
Attachments:	agnb050703.pdf; agnb050703.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JULY 3, 2005 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

US-French Anti-Terrorism Cooperation Is Often Hid From Public View. 2
Subject Of CIA Italy Rendition Being Held In Egypt. 2
Suspected Terrorist Obtained US Visa Easily. 3

Patriot Act:

New Jersey County Urges Patriot Act Revisions. 3

Homeland Response:

Analysts Say Overhaul Of Intelligence System Could Take 10 Years. 4
Artists Express Support for New York Professor Under Federal Probe. 5
Minutemen Plan New Patrols For Fall. 5
Fighter Jets Force Small Plane To Land After Violating Airspace. 5
Independence Day Crowds Will Participate In Emergency Response Training. 5

War News:

Bush Ties War On Terror To Fourth Of July Celebration. 6
Hagel Says He Hopes US Doesn't Repeat Mistakes Made During Vietnam Era. 7
Suicide Bombings Targeting Iraqi Police Kill At Least Twenty. 7
Shiites Protest US Overtures To Sunni Insurgents. 7
Shiite Town Ravaged By Hussein Looks Forward To His Trial. 8
US Suffers Worst Week In Afghanistan Since 2001. 8
US Releases 57 Held At Bagram For Months Or Years Without Being Charged. 9
Attack On UN Convoy Kills Six Afghans. 9
Wounded Soldiers Provided With Trip To Gettysburg. 9

Corporate Scandals:

Kinsley Examines Scrushy Acquittal. 9

Criminal Law:

White House Reportedly Concerned That Fitzgerald Is Focusing On Rove. 10
Cunningham Foregoes Public Appearances After Returning To District. 10
St Louis Public Defender Rules To Change. 10
California Weighs Bullet Marking Proposals. 11

Civil Rights:

Human Smuggling Investigation Focused On "Jung Organization". 11
California AG Asks For Review Of Decision On Same-Sex Marriages. 11
California Redistricting Proposal Compared With DeLay-Engineered Campaign In Texas. 12
Romney Urged To Speak More Clearly On Abortion. 12
Frist Accused Of Changing His Position On Stem Cell Research. 12
Gordon Looks To Repair NAACP's Relationship With Bush. 12

Environment/Indian Affairs:

St. Louis Mayor Expresses Support For Eminent Domain Decision. 13
Maryland Gubernatorial Candidates Trade Shots Over Environmental Protection Policies. 13
Portland Said To Have Cut Emissions While Improving Its Economy. 13
Wisconsin Reservation Dealing With Gang Crime. 13

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Federal Agents Seize Human Growth Hormone In Denver. 13
Florida Drug Case Chilled US-Colombia Relations. 14
Gangs Moving Into Hampton Roads, VA, Area. 14
Reyna Says He Was Not Pressured To Resign As US Marshals Head. 14

Tax:
IRS Data Shows More Wealthy Americans Pay Little Or No Federal Taxes. 15

Congress-Administration:
Bush Reviewing Potential SCOTUS Nominees. 15
Interest Groups Gear Up For Fight Over SCOTUS Nominee. 17
Specter Remains Noncommittal As He Prepares To Play Pivotal Role 19
Supreme Court To Address Tough Issues In Next Term. 20
O'Connor Seen As Key Moderating Influence 20
Amount Of Classified Government Documents Has Almost Doubled Since 2001 21

Other News:
Rally For The Poor Held In Scotland 21
Media Highlights Live 8 Concert. 23
American Businesses Have "Vested Interest" In China Success 24
Abbas Attempts To Co-Opt Hamas 24
Iranian Pres-Elect Refuses Interviews. 24

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington. 25

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 25

TERRORISM NEWS:

US-French Anti-Terrorism Cooperation Is Often Hid From Public View. NBC Nightly News (7/2, story 4, 3:00, Seigenthaler) reported, "Washington Post reporter and NBC news analyst Dana Priest is investigating worldwide terrorism. One facet she's uncovered in the current global battle is the extraordinary behind-the-scenes cooperation between the United States and France." Priest noted, "While some Americans protested by insisting oh freedom fries, diplomats say the French are among their most effective in tracking terrorists and have put 200 of its special forces under U.S. Command in Afghanistan." According to NBC, "Shortly after 9/11, the C.I.A. and French security services set up a counterterrorism clearinghouse somewhere in Paris. Its operations and its very existence remain a closely guarded secret even today. This is the senior French terrorism judge who's ordered the arrest of more than 500 suspected terrorists, inclusion six French citizens released from Guantanamo."

Adding more details to the report on US-French counterterrorism cooperation, the Washington Post (7/3, A1, Priest) in a front page story reports, "Funded largely by the CIA's Counterterrorist Center, Alliance Base analyzes the transnational movement of terrorist suspects and develops operations to catch or spy on them." The Post continues, "Alliance Base demonstrates how most counterterrorism operations actually take place: through secretive alliances between the CIA and other countries' intelligence services. This is not the work of large army formations, or even small special forces teams, but of handfuls of U.S. intelligence case officers working with handfuls of foreign operatives, often in tentative arrangements." Their efforts have been "responsible for identifying, tracking and capturing or killing the vast majority of committed jihadists who have been targeted outside Iraq and Afghanistan since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, according to terrorism experts."

DHS Official Seeks To Increase International Counterterrorism Cooperation. The Washington Times (7/3, Taylor) reports DHS director of international affairs Cresencio Arcos "says the United States must do more to spark action among its foreign allies in fighting the global war on terrorism in their own countries." He said, "We need to be more creative in how we engage our allies in the war on terror." The US "has made great progress working with Britain, Canada and Mexico -- the latter two making up about 60 percent of joint-U.S. homeland security efforts -- said Mr. Arcos." But DHS sources "say they are 'circumspect' about forming joint working groups with governments outside those three nations. 'We can't possibly have them with every country in the world,' one official said, on the condition of anonymity."

Subject Of CIA Italy Rendition Being Held In Egypt. The Houston Chronicle (7/3) reports, "Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, the man at the center of an international controversy over an alleged CIA abduction, is being held in Damanhour prison outside Alexandria though he has not been accused of a crime, according to his lawyer, Muntassir al-Zayyat, a Cairo attorney who defends many Islamists." In contrast to the public uproar in Italy, "in Egypt, where such renditions of wanted fugitives are relatively common, the dramatic seizure of Abu Omar in Milan drew little attention."

DOJ_NMG_0000796

Columnist Questions Value Of Rendition Policy. Jim Hoagland in his column in the Washington Post (7/3, B7) writes, "America's spy agencies need more money, a sleeker bureaucratic structure, fluent Arabic speakers and a host of other reforms and gimmicks to protect the United States and its allies from harm. Add one more urgent need: a sense of proportion." In substance and style, the exposure of the 'extraordinary rendition' -- Bush-era legalese for kidnapping -- of a radical Egyptian cleric off a Milan street in 2003 reveals a crushing inability by higher-ups here to ask and answer sensibly this question: Is this covert act really worth the likely consequences?"

More Commentary. The Washington Post (7/3, B6) editorializes, "The practice of rendition began before the Bush administration, and in some cases it is a necessary tool in the fight against terrorism. … But renditions should be rare, and they should have clear rules and oversight. No terrorist suspect should be turned over to a government likely to use torture -- and Egypt, among other Middle Eastern countries, is a well-documented abuser. The CIA should not use illegal means to capture suspects in democratic countries with a strong rule of law, especially if they are allies of the United States. It may make it quicker or easier to get one extremist sheik off the street, but as the Italian case shows, the damage caused by such highhandedness is too great."

Suspected Terrorist Obtained US Visa Easily. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Tempest) reports, "As Shabbir Ahmed sits in the county jail on immigration charges connected to an FBI terrorism investigation, federal officials are at a loss to explain how a man who publicly demonstrated his rage against the United States and advocated violence against the U.S.-backed regime in Pakistan could slip so easily through the State Department visa system." Despite media reports about his demonstrations against the US, in J2002 Ahmed "walked into the consular section of the heavily fortified U.S. Embassy compound, where he was granted an uncontested three-year 'religious worker' visa to the United States."

PATRIOT ACT:

New Jersey County Urges Patriot Act Revisions. The East Brunswick (NJ) Home News Tribune (7/3, Loyer) reports, "The Middlesex County (NJ) Human Relations Commission is joining the growing list of communities and legislators from around the country taking a stance against the USA Patriot Act." The Tribune continues, "The commission will issue a formal resolution to lawmakers, municipal governments and local organizations on Tuesday urging them to petition the executive level of the federal government to rescind or modify any law or executive order that diminishes protected civil rights. … 'We definitely want to protect our country, our neighbors and our homes, but there are potential dangers in such acts as the Patriot Act,' said commission Chairman Bruce S. Morgan. 'We take exception to any act or order that erodes the rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution and Bill of Rights.'" The Tribune adds, "According to the resolution, the act and several federal executive orders go beyond legitimate measures of protection against terrorism and lead to infringe on such rights as freedom of speech, religion, assembly and privacy, the right to counsel and due process in judicial proceedings, protection from unreasonable searches and seizure and equal protection under the law. … Morgan said he believes the act was passed by lawmakers because 'they were given so little time to review it and a lot of things may have been missed. We're hoping to get it tailored so it does not erode the rights guaranteed by the Constitution,' he said. … The Highland Park Borough Council passed a similar resolution in February 2004. The New Brunswick City Council adopted a similar resolution in May."

More Patriot Act Commentary. In a letter to the editor of the Lansing (MI) State Journal (7/3), Hagen W. Frank, an assistant U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids, writes, "On June 10 and 17, the LSJ ran editorials strongly criticizing the USA Patriot Act. While the articles demonstrated the LSJ's commitment to privacy rights in the face of purported infringements by the Patriot Act, they also demonstrated the editors' unfamiliarity with the constitutional and statutory law that governs federal law enforcement and intelligence investigations. … Both articles focused primarily on section 215 of the act, which expanded the types of materials that may be ordered produced by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (the 'FISA Court') in domestic intelligence investigations of foreign powers or international terrorism." Frank continues, "Described by critics as a provision that allows the FBI to go on fishing expeditions of citizens' reading habits - as if the FBI were looking for 'busy work' - the provision in fact simply gave the FISA Court the same authority in intelligence and international terrorism investigations to order production of materials that a prosecutor can obtain by grand jury subpoena in a domestic criminal investigation. …. According to the June 17 editorial, this is bad because the FISA Court is secret and because the government already had the power to get these materials by search warrant. Secrecy, however, is essential to the kinds of investigations overseen by the FISA Court, i.e., classified intelligence investigations into the activities of foreign powers, suspected agents of foreign powers and international terrorism." Frank adds, "Similarly, the June 10 editorial complains about the Senate Intelligence Committee's endorsement of a proposal to give the FBI administrative subpoena authority in terrorism investigations. According to the LSJ, this would empower the FBI to 'investigate citizens without judicial oversight.' This complaint assumes incorrectly that every government investigative tool requires judicial oversight. … However, whether judicial pre-approval is required depends upon how intrusive something is and on constitutional, statutory and regulatory provisions that the editorial ignores. Further, administrative subpoenas have long been used by a wide variety of federal agencies. … The FBI already has such authority in health care fraud and child sexual-exploitation investigations, and the proposed measure would simply expand that authority to terrorism investigations. … Every citizen and every media organization has the right to question and criticize government. However, the LSJ also has the responsibility not to mislead the public on important issues of the day."

DOJ_NMG_0000797

The Washington Times (7/3), Senator Christopher 'Kit' Bond (R-MO) writes, "As July Fourth approaches, some Americans appear to suffer from amnesia. … With dramatic headlines such as 'Ripping Pages from the Book of Civil Liberties,' 'Patriot Act Fosters Secrecy, Government Abuse' and 'Keep Big Brother at Bay,' editorial writers and columnists unfairly criticize legislation that has helped keep America safe since September 11, 2001." Bond continues, "A few weeks ago, the U.S. House of Representatives rejected a proposal to make it easier for the FBI to obtain information on suspected terrorists that could help prevent a future attack. … What is going on here? … It appears some editorial writers and members of Congress have forgotten. And they are not alone. Fewer Americans -- only 35 percent -- now fear another terrorist attack in the near future than at any time since September 11, a recent USA Today/CNN/Gallup poll found. Despite their complacency, the threat of terrorism continues. … And surely there is no more important public purpose than keeping America safe from another catastrophic terrorist attack on U.S. soil. To do so, Congress should reauthorize the Patriot Act quickly and expand it to give law enforcement more tools to go after suspected terrorists and prevent attacks." Bond concludes, "The September 11 attacks showed the failure of a number of legal and regulatory policies that kept intelligence and law enforcement communities from talking to each other and sharing information on investigations of suspected terrorists."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Analysts Say Overhaul Of Intelligence System Could Take 10 Years. The Baltimore Sun (7/3, Gorman) reports, "Though the White House announced its intelligence overhaul Wednesday with promises that it would make the country safer, the changes it outlined could take a decade to complete, according to longtime intelligence analysts, including a member of the presidential commission that proposed the reforms. … 'The whole process will take five to 10 years,' said Adm. William O. Studeman, a member of the commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led the administration to conclude that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction." The Sun continues, "Studeman characterized that time frame as an optimistic estimate - one assuming that every part of the intelligence community endorses the changes. … The White House said it embraced 70 of 74 recommendations of the commission, led by U.S. Circuit Judge Laurence Silberman and former Sen. Charles S. Robb of Virginia. The most significant reform would be creation of a domestic intelligence service within the FBI." The Sun adds, "Other changes are aimed at slowing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, improving the quality of human intelligence and integrating the efforts of all 15 U.S. intelligence agencies. … But the future of the reforms is in doubt, as Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III have begun maneuvering to regain control over the design of the FBI's intelligence service, said an intelligence veteran responsible for helping the White House implement the plan. … The president set a 60-day deadline for having a detailed outline of the new domestic intelligence service. The Justice Department is arguing that the planning should begin immediately, while White House aides want to wait until the head of the service is appointed, the intelligence veteran said. … If the deadline is suspended until the White House appoints a chief of the domestic intelligence service, the FBI will lose considerable control over that service's shape."

DOJ_NMG_0000798

Artists Express Support for New York Professor Under Federal Probe. The San Diego Union-Tribune (7/3, Pincus) reports, "Imagine this scenario: You are a well-established artist and respected university professor. You wake up one morning to find your spouse of 25 years isn't breathing. You call 911. Paramedics arrive, accompanied by police. … There are a few petri dishes in the house, because your conceptually oriented work involves scientific-style installations and issues. So, one of those workers decides you just might be a terrorist and calls the FBI." The Union-Tribune continues, "The next day, as you are on the way to the funeral home, you are detained by the FBI and the Joint Terrorist Task Force. You are held for 22 hours without having your Miranda rights read to you. Your home and even part of your block is cordoned off; your computer, books, manuscripts and anything else deemed suspicious are confiscated by workers in hazmat suits. Even your spouse's body is held for further analysis. … Sound like the outline of a compelling novel or film about governmental abuse of power? Sure. But this story isn't imaginary. It is what University of Buffalo professor Steven Kurtz, a member of the artists' collaborative called Critical Art Ensemble (CAE), experienced in May 2004 when someone who answered his 911 call decided to make a call to the FBI." The Union-Tribune adds, "This tale doesn't end there; Kurtz is now facing charges that could result in a 20-year prison sentence. … Artists across the United States and beyond have taken up Kurtz's cause, because they feel it is their cause, too. Following an earlier fundraiser in London, an auction to raise money for his defense was held at the esteemed Paula Cooper Gallery in New York in April. … While there apparently wasn't enough evidence to bring bioterrorist charges, the government is pursuing wire and mail fraud charges against Kurtz and Robert Ferrell, a former head of the Department of Genetics at the University of Pittsburgh's School of Public Health. … 'These laws (on fraud) have been on the books for more than a century. Whether it (the bacteria) is or isn't harmful isn't an element of the offense. The case centers on property acquired by fraud or misstatement,' said U.S. Assistant District Attorney William Hochul on Thursday. He's the prosecutor on the case, which is being tried in New York."

Minutemen Plan New Patrols For Fall. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Gold) reports, "As the second act to its civilian border patrol in Arizona, the organization known as the Minutemen has pledged to launch a massive patrol of the entire U.S.-Mexico border this fall." They "are holding community meetings throughout the South and Southwest to marshal thousands of volunteers. Leaders hope to amass in October to try to block illegal immigration routes in four states." Yet, "the organization is finding that such an ambitious plan will not come together as easily as the April patrol in Arizona that covered 23 miles of the border. That is particularly true in Texas, which has 1,254 miles of the 2,000-mile border." That is because "most of the land along the border in Texas is privately owned, except for the Big Bend region in the western tip of the state."

Fighter Jets Force Small Plane To Land After Violating Airspace. The AP (7/3) reports, "A small plane entered restricted air space in the Washington area before two fighter jets forced it to land at an airport here, authorities said." The AP adds, "Two F-16 fighter jets were deployed and they forced the small plane to land at Frederick Municipal Airport. Officials were questioning a man and a woman Saturday, according to the News-Post. There were no arrests."

Independence Day Crowds Will Participate In Emergency Response Training. The Washington Post (7/3, C1, Markon) reports, "The first test of Washington's downtown emergency evacuation plan is expected to clear the Mall of most Fourth of July revelers tomorrow and speed them on their way within an hour, officials said yesterday." The Post adds, "The plan, which calls for police to direct the hundreds of thousands of pedestrians and motorists to seven evacuation routes, where green and red traffic signals will run longer, was developed two years ago in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. City officials have tried to publicize it, even painting special signs on streets along the routes directing drivers to the Capital Beltway, but they acknowledged that a major test is needed to tell people how they should flee if terrorists were to strike the city."

DOJ_NMG_0000799

WAR NEWS:

Bush Ties War On Terror To Fourth Of July Celebration. The AP (7/3) reports, "President Bush paid tribute to America's military forces Saturday, saying that Independence Day is an occasion for the nation to express thanks by flying the flag, sending letters to troops and reaching out to their families. 'At posts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and around the world, our men and women in uniform are taking the fight to the terrorists overseas, so that we do not have to face the terrorists here at home,' Bush said in his weekly radio address. He said U.S. forces have freed millions of people from oppression, in keeping with the principle of the Declaration of Independence 'that all are created equal and all are meant to be free."

Bush Seen As Unable To Inspire Insecurity As Easily As He Could After 9/11. The New York Times' Frank Rich (7/3) writes "As we saw on Tuesday night, doomsday isn't the surefire hit it used to be for Mr. Bush. Now that the rhetorical arsenal of W.M.D.'s and mushroom clouds is bare, he had little choice but to bring back that oldie but goodie, 9/11, as the specter of the doom that awaits us if we don't stay the course - his course - in Iraq. By the fifth time he did so, it was hard not to think of that legendary National Lampoon cover: 'If you don't buy this magazine, we'll kill this dog.'"

US Said To Have Failed To Promote Democracy Effectively In The Past. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (7/3, B4) Richard Kohn, former chief of history for the U.S. Air Force, writes, "Contrary to the rosy picture of our past so prevalent in Washington today, this country possesses a rich and often troubled history of intervention and nation building, and even empire. We succeeded in building democracy at home but largely failed in planting it abroad, which ought to make all of us, the president included, wary of so vague a goal in Iraq, and exceedingly careful in crafting a strategy to set that country on the road to stability and independence."

President Bush's Radio Address Receives Light Local Television Coverage. President Bush's radio address, in which he praised American troops and their families, received extremely light local television coverage. The President was quoted by one station as having said, "The burden of war falls especially hard on military families and I thank them for their support they give our troops in their vital work." Senator Patty Murray issued the Democratic response, saying that Independence Day is also a good time for President Bush to "give us the facts about the war and lay out a plan."

Some examples: WGCL-TV Atlanta (7/2, 11:09PM) reported that "President Bush says Independence Day is a time for the nation to express thanks to the military. During the weekly radio address Bush asked all Americans to show their gratitude by flying the flag, sending letters to troops, and reaching out to families. 'Those who serve are taking their rightful place among the greatest generations that have worn our nation's uniform. The burden of war falls especially hard on military families and I thank them for their support they give our troops in their vital work.'"

WCCB-TV Charlotte (7/2, 10:12PM) said that "Bush compared the current military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan to the American battles of the 19th and 20th centuries. The President also urged Americans to use the holiday as an opportunity to reach out to military families." Meanwhile, "Democratic senator Patty Murray also looked to veterans as an example of how the Bush administration has failed. She pointed out budget shortfalls for the Veterans Administration. Senator Murray says President Bush needs to give Americans the facts and lay out a plan for Iraq."

KHWB-TV Houston (7/2, 9:03PM) reported, "President Bush uses his weekly radio address to say the best way to celebrate Independence Day is to give thanks to American troops. 'At posts in Afghanistan and Iraq and around the world, our men and women in uniform are taking the fight to the terrorists overseas so that we do not have to face the terrorists here at home.' Democrats responded by saying Independence Day is also a good time for President Bush to, quote, 'give us the facts about the war and lay out a plan.' They accuse the President of failing veterans."

Democrats Contend Administration Has Underfunded Veterans Affairs. The AP (7/3) reports that in the weekly Democratic radio address Sen. Patty Murray "said President Bush's recent denials concerning the financial straits of the Veterans Affairs Department represented another administration failure to level with Americans about the costs of the Iraq war." Murray and other Democrats "had long questioned whether the department would have enough money to pay medical costs for veterans returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. The administration repeatedly denied it, but the VA acknowledged last week it was short at least $1 billion this year. On Wednesday, the Senate voted 96-0 to spend an extra $1.5 billion to cover the politically sensitive shortfall.

DOJ_NMG_0000800

'We're still working to find out the exact size of the shortfall, but one thing is clear: It results from either deliberate misdirection or gross incompetence,' Murray said."

Hagel Says He Hopes US Doesn't Repeat Mistakes Made During Vietnam Era. In an interview with the New York Times Magazine's Deborah Solomon (7/3) Sen. Chuck Hagel says, "If someone says I am a disloyal Republican because I am not supporting my party, let them say it. War is bigger than politics." When it is noted that Hagel and John Kerry "are the only current U.S. senators who served in Vietnam," Hagel comments, "I got to Vietnam in December of 1967, and I was wounded twice with my brother Tom, who was with me. I still have some shrapnel in my chest that the doctors never took out. The second time my face was burned pretty bad, and I had both eardrums blown out." Asked to compare "the situation in Iraq with the one in Vietnam," Hagel replies, "Congress was absent during the Vietnam War, and they didn't ask the tough questions, and consequently we lost 58,000 Americans and lost a war and humiliated this nation. It took a generation to get over it. As long as I am here as a U.S. senator, I am going to do whatever I can to make sure that isn't going to happen."

Suicide Bombings Targeting Iraqi Police Kill At Least Twenty. The New York Times (7/3, Wong) reports, "Three suicide bombers blew themselves up on Saturday in two separate attacks aimed at Iraqi security forces, killing at least 20 people and wounding at least 59, police officials said. The first explosion took place at a recruiting center in western Baghdad. The blast killed at least 12 people and wounded at least 23. Those killed were all men trying to get jobs with the security forces, said Maj. Gen. Rasheed Flayeh, the commander of the Interior Ministry's commando units. … The second attack took place at 10 p.m. at a restaurant beside the police commando headquarters in the town of Hilla, south of Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. Two suicide bombers detonated their explosives, killing at least eight police officers and wounding at least 36 others."

Bombings Disrupt Relatively Calm Week In Iraq. CBS Evening News (7/2, story 4, :10, Mitchell) reported, "In the battle for Iraq, rebel attacks around Baghdad shattered six days of relative calm. A suicide bomber killed at least 16 Iraqis at a police recruiting center. Another bomb killed six people at a checkpoint. Millions of Baghdad residents are scrounging for water in 100- degree heat after a rebel attack disabled water works."

ABC's World News Tonight (7/2, story 2, 0:10, Moran) reported, "Now we turn to Iraq. The attack in Baghdad hurt more than 20 others, and killed 17. It was more than several assaults that killed more than 30 Iraqis today."

The Washington Post (7/3, A15, Mosher, Nouri) reports, "Over the course of a nearly two-year-old insurgency in which assaults on Iraqi and U.S. security forces have been frequent, attackers repeatedly have targeted places where men stand in line to apply for jobs with the police and Iraqi army. Because would-be recruits typically are made to wait outside fortified bases and recruiting centers, they have proved to be easy targets for often-deadly bombings."

Several Other Iraqis Killed In Incidents Across The Country. The Los Angeles Times/AP (7/3) reports, "In other violence Saturday, three Iraqi soldiers were killed in a roadside bombing northeast of Baghdad, their commander said. Gunmen also assassinated a police lieutenant colonel in the northern city of Mosul, officials said. Two other people were killed when a bomb hidden in a vegetable cart exploded Saturday in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad. … Also Saturday, a policeman and a female relative traveling in a civilian car were killed in a drive-by shooting in the northern city of Kirkuk, authorities said."

Columnist Urges Rumsfeld To Provide Congress With Overview Of Security Situation In Iraq. The Washington Post's David Broder (7/3) writes, "President Bush is facing an early legal deadline to deliver what he has been most resistant to providing: a set of specific benchmarks for measuring progress toward military and political stability in Iraq. Under a little-noticed provision of the defense spending bill passed by Congress in May, Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld has until July 11 to send Capitol Hill a 'comprehensive set of performance indicators and measures of stability and security' two years after the fall of Saddam Hussein. … If and when it comes in, it could do much more than the president's Tuesday night speech at Fort Bragg to provide a factual basis for judging how close we may be to reaching our goals in Iraq."

Shiites Protest US Overtures To Sunni Insurgents. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Mcdonnell) reports, "It didn't take long for fresh reports of U.S. talks with Sunni Arab insurgents to stir cries of an impending sellout. … A senior U.S. official here sought to provide damage control.

DOJ_NMG_0000801

There was no intent, he declared, to undermine the fledgling Shiite-run government, which meets behind U.S.-fortified blast walls." The Times continues, "The exchange underscored the fragility of the political compromise that the Bush administration is seeking to facilitate in Iraq, even as the complementary military strategy — turning more and more responsibility over to fledgling Iraqi forces — has yet to prove a success. … Reports of U.S. overtures to the Sunni Arab-driven insurgency immediately sparked a backlash last week among the long-repressed Shiite majority. Much hinges on a two-part premise. First, that disaffected Sunni Arabs can be brought into the political process, and second, that participating Sunni representatives can sway militants, who have denounced the government, to put down their arms."

The Los Angeles Times (7/3) Larry Diamond, senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes, "if the United States is to avoid defeat in Iraq, Bush must recognize what our military leaders have repeated for more than a year: There is no purely military solution to the insurgency. It will only be extinguished by a combination of military might, good intelligence, reliable policing and — crucially — effective politics. … The administration deserves credit for drawing Sunnis into the political process, but it must do more to incorporate them politically into the new Iraq, the second element of a winning political strategy. It has done too little to address their nationalist anxiety."

Shiite Town Ravaged By Hussein Looks Forward To His Trial. The New York Times (7/3, Burns) reports, "Officials at the Iraqi Special Tribunal set up to try [Saddam Hussein] and his top aides have said they expect to put him on trial by the end of the year in the deaths of nearly 160 men and boys from Dujail, all Shiites, some in their early teens. Some were shot dead in the immediate aftermath of [an] assassination attempt, but 143 - 9 of them ages 13 through 15 - were executed three years later by Mr. Hussein's revolutionary court. Townspeople say that many others remain missing - at least 200, by some counts - and that they hope the trial will reveal at least something of their fate."

US Suffers Worst Week In Afghanistan Since 2001. CBS Evening News (7/2, story 5, 2:00, Mitchell) reported, "In his weekly radio address, President Bush said the best way to honor Americans killed in the war is 'to complete the mission.' The bodies of sixteen U.S. commandos killed in this week's helicopter crash in Afghanistan were flown home this weekend. But the commando unit they were sent to rescue is still missing in the escalating afghan violence." CBS' Randall Pinkston continues, "This has been the deadliest week for U.S. Troops in Afghanistan since the overthrow of the Taliban regime and their al Qaeda allies in 2001. With the missing unit, the death toll could go higher. Tuesday's rocket- propelled grenade attack brought down a Chinook helicopter. The deaths of eight navy seals and eight army special forces service members sent to aid the missing unit were a deadly reminder for the U.S. And today, a flare-up in the south east. A United Nations official reported a bomb attack on a 25- vehicle convoy of U.S. and U.N. Troops in Paktika province. No American injuries, but four Afghan troops were killed."

ABC's World News Tonight (7/2, story 3, 2:00, Moran) reported, "In Afghanistan, the U.S. military has launched fresh attacks on suspected Taliban fighters as the search for a missing team of elite American commandos intensifies." ABC's John Yang continues, "That team of commandos has been missing for five days. today, the military said they're using every available resource to search for them. In the rugged mountains of remote eastern Afghanistan, U.S. warplanes use precision-guided bombs to hit a suspected Taliban compound, near where the elite unit went missing. Fewer than ten lightly armed commandos hunting insurgent fighters. Today, U.S. officials said there's no evidence to support Taliban claims that they captured some of them."

US Aircraft Target Compound Near Where Soldiers Went Missing. The Washington Post (7/3, A21, Aizenman) reports, "U.S. aircraft bombarded a suspected insurgent compound in a mountainous area of northeastern Afghanistan where a military team has been missing since Tuesday, military officials said Saturday. A purported spokesman for the ousted Islamic Taliban militia called news organizations and claimed that 25 civilians had died in the airstrike on the compound in Konar province, a rugged region near the Pakistani border. Lt. Col. Jerry O'Hara, a U.S. military spokesman, said American troops were still assessing the impact of the Friday night bombing. … The purported Taliban spokesman, Abdul Latif Hakimi, told news agencies by telephone Friday that Taliban fighters had captured one of the missing men and killed seven of them. But U.S. military officials have said there was no evidence to support the claim.

Taliban Claims To Have Captured One American. The Washington Times/AP (7/3, Cooney) reports Hakimi

DOJ_NMG_0000802

claimed Friday that militants had captured one of the men and said he was a 'high-ranking American' caught in the same area as where the helicopter went down. He reiterated the claim yesterday in a phone call with the Associated Press. 'The soldier is being held in Kunar. Taliban leaders will decide what to do with him,' Mr. Hakimi said. 'He is being kept in a home. His health is all right.' When asked to provide evidence that the soldier was in captivity, he said, 'Tomorrow we will give proof.'" The AP adds, "Hakimi, who also claimed insurgents shot down the helicopter, often calls news organizations to take responsibility for attacks, and the information frequently proves exaggerated or untrue. His exact tie to the Taliban leadership is not clear."

The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Kazem) reports, "Hundreds of U.S. and Afghan forces have since been scouring the area's deep ravines in the hope of finding the special reconnaissance team, which has been out of contact for several days. … 'There is a good chance that the soldiers are being held hostage by the rebel fighters,' said Gov. Asadullah Wafa of Kunar."

US Releases 57 Held At Bagram For Months Or Years Without Being Charged. The Washington Post (7/3, A21, Aizenman) reports, "In Kabul, U.S. military officials released 57 Afghans who had been held at a detention facility at Bagram air base for many months on suspicion of being armed Muslim extremists. They were taken to the office of a government program that reintegrates former Taliban members and released to the custody of tribal elders. … In May, President Hamid Karzai called for all Afghan prisoners to be turned over to Afghan government custody in the wake of reports of past abuse by U.S. guards at Bagram and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Several of the released men complained bitterly of being detained for several years without charge.

Attack On UN Convoy Kills Six Afghans. The Washington Post (7/3, A21, Aizenman) reports, "on Saturday, guerrilla fighters in eastern Paktika province detonated a roadside bomb under a passing convoy of more than 20 vehicles carrying officials from the United Nations as well as Afghan leaders and security forces. The attack killed as many as six Afghan policemen and soldiers, and wounded at least two others, including a local police chief, according to news services and the U.N. spokesman here, Adrian Edwards.

Wounded Soldiers Provided With Trip To Gettysburg. The Washington Post (7/3, C6, Ruane) reports on three wounded soldiers from Walter reed who visited A weekend reenactment at Gettysburg. The n outing was "hosted by a soldiers support agency called Operation Second Chance Inc."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Kinsley Examines Scrushy Acquittal. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, B7), Michael Kinsley writes, "God works in mysterious ways, but his or her decision to acquit Richard Scrushy, former CEO of HealthSouth Corp., on all charges of financial fraud is especially inscrutable. Five consecutive HealthSouth chief financial officers admitted to cooking the books and copped a plea. They all fingered Scrushy. But jurors chose to believe that the man on top knew nothing about what was going on directly below him." Kinsley continues, "That kind of ignorance doesn't come cheap. No one denies there was massive fraud at HealthSouth. The government estimates that Scrushy made almost $300 million from the alleged fraud, and he'll get to keep it minus lawyer's fees. Other prominent business defendants have tried the ignorance defense but found that juries tend to think that the more you're paid, the more you ought to know about what's going on around you. Bernard Ebbers of Worldcom Corp., apparently the most convincing of the recent CEO ignoramus wannabes, is facing prosecutors' request for a life sentence." Kinsley adds, "Experts say the Scrushy prosecution should have been a slam-dunk. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial page seemed amazed that he got off. The Journal approved, of course, but couldn't really explain why. Meanwhile, jurors quoted in the papers said they were bothered by things like the lack of Scrushy fingerprints on copies of the crucial documents. … Only one word can describe Scrushy's acquittal. It is a miracle. … When Scrushy was indicted, he hired God. Less inspired defendants might have settled for the late Johnnie Cochran or Jack Abramoff. Scrushy, though, went straight to the top. … He left his suburban evangelical church and joined a predominantly black congregation in a blue-collar neighborhood. He bought a half-hour of local TV for a morning prayer show featuring himself and his wife, and frequent guest spots by black ministers. He had a prayer group praying for him every day at the trial. All this was in Birmingham, Ala., where HealthSouth was located and where the trial occurred."

DOJ_NMG_0000803

CRIMINAL LAW:

White House Reportedly Concerned That Fitzgerald Is Focusing On Rove. Newsweek (7/3, Isikoff) reports that Time's Matthew Cooper's e-mails and computer notes turned over to special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald investigating the leak of CIA agent Valerie "show that one of Cooper's sources was White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, according to two lawyers who asked not to be identified because they are representing witnesses sympathetic to the White House. Cooper and a Time spokeswoman declined to comment. But in an interview with NEWSWEEK, Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, confirmed that Rove had been interviewed by Cooper for the article. It is unclear, however, what passed between Cooper and Rove. … According to Luskin…Rove spoke to Cooper three or four days before Novak's column appeared. Luskin told NEWSWEEK that Rove 'never knowingly disclosed classified information' and that 'he did not tell any reporter that Valerie Plame worked for the CIA.' Luskin declined, however, to discuss any other details." Newsweek adds that one of the two lawyers representing a witness sympathetic to the White House "told NEWSWEEK that there was growing 'concern' in the White House that the prosecutor is interested in Rove."

Attorney Says Rove Never Revealed Secrets To Cooper. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Schmitt) reports, "In confirming the conversation between Rove and Cooper, Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, emphasized that the presidential advisor did not reveal any secrets. But the disclosure raised new questions about Rove and the precise role of the White House in the apparent national security breach." Rove "testified before a grand jury investigating the Plame case on three occasions. His latest appearance was in October 2004, about the same time the prosecutor investigating the case said his probe was complete with the exception of testimony from Cooper and Miller." Luskin "said Rove had been assured by prosecutors that he was not a target of the investigation. 'We were advised recently that his status has not changed,' he added.

The Washington Post (7/3, A7, Leonnig) reports Luskin said, "Karl did nothing wrong. Karl didn't disclose Valerie Plame's identity to Mr. Cooper or anybody else." Luskin "said the question remains unanswered: 'Who outed this woman? It wasn't Karl.'"

Journalists See Growing Threat Of Reporters Being Subpoenaed. The New York Times (7/3, Seelye) reports, "Lawyers for the news media say that the legal climate for those seeking to protect confidential sources is turning chillier, with more subpoenas being issued to reporters. There is no database that tracks such subpoenas, and some prosecutors dispute that they are on the rise. But a series of high-profile cases involving confidential sources has the news media on edge. … 'It does feel like open season,' said Laura Handman, a First Amendment lawyer based in Washington. 'There are more instances of courts ordering confidential sources to be disclosed,' she said, adding that she believed the Bush administration's emphasis on secrecy was partly to blame. 'This leads to more leak inquiries, which, in turn, leads to more subpoenas.'" The Times adds, "In the last year, more than two dozen reporters across the country have been subpoenaed or questioned about their confidential sources in cases before federal courts, according to the Newspaper Association of America. Paul J. Boyle, senior vice president of the association, said he believed that 'the filing of subpoenas, as well as the letters and phone calls that media companies receive from prosecutors and civil litigants, is on the rise.'"

Cunningham Foregoes Public Appearances After Returning To District. The AP (7/3, Hettena) reports Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham "whose dealings with a defense contractor are under investigation was taking a 'personal day' Saturday and not commenting on federal authorities' searches a day earlier of his home and a yacht where he stayed while in Washington, a spokesman said." Cunningham "didn't plan a public appearance until a Monday pancake breakfast in Encinitas. … Cunningham's attorney, K. Lee Blalack, released a statement saying he told the government Thursday the congressman would cooperate with the investigation."

St Louis Public Defender Rules To Change. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/3, Patrick) reports, "The St. Louis public defender's office - the last legal hope for those too poor to afford their own lawyer - will, for the first time in at least 20 years, refuse to represent certain people in court starting Tuesday, state officials said last week." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Those people are on the misdemeanor confined docket, which means they've been arrested on misdemeanor charges, or are named on the assessed docket because they've been arrested for failing to pay fines or court costs." The Post-Dispatch adds, "State and local representatives of the public defender's office say they're making the move because it's unethical and unprofessional to try to represent defendants with only minutes to familiarize themselves with the cases. … J. Marty Robinson, director of the Missouri State Public Defender system, calls it "meet 'em and greet 'em and plead 'em." … 'I'm just flabbergasted that there are people that think this is OK,' he said. … Robinson said many people were probably misled into thinking they had a lawyer, but public defenders were simply 'filling out the court's paperwork.' … Public defenders also say that under recently revised state laws, guilty pleas to two of certain misdemeanors can lead to a felony charge and serious prison time for the third offense, along the lines of state three-strikes laws. That could mean defendants who plead guilty to minor crimes to stay out of jail are unknowingly increasing their chance of greater future penalties."

DOJ_NMG_0000804

California Weighs Bullet Marking Proposals. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Rau) reports, "With a zealot's enthusiasm, Randy Rossi has been firing bullets into lots of things lately. Car doors, Sheetrock, wood walls, gelatin with the consistency of human bodies. … On the base of each mashed slug is a series of tiny, mostly legible numbers that have been inscribed by a laser. To Rossi, head of Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer's firearm division, these markings represent a solution for one of law enforcement's most trying problems: the anonymity of ammunition." The Times continues, "With 45% of the state's homicides unsolved in 2003, the most recent data available, the California Legislature is moving ahead with two potentially landmark measures that would require that identifying marks be embedded on projectiles from guns. … One proposal would have all bullets sold in the state marked during manufacture with codes. The other would mandate that guns be equipped with stamping mechanisms that would hammer telling marks onto every cartridge fired. That could allow investigators to link the cartridge to the gun's purchaser even if they could not find the firearm." The Times adds, "The approaches depart from law enforcement tactics elsewhere in the country, which have focused on creating computer registries of fired bullets. Those allow for investigators to match projectiles from different crimes, linking ones committed with the same weapon. … The issue of marking ammunition has become the most contested law enforcement topic in Sacramento this year. One of the bills has split California's law enforcement community and infuriated the nation's ammunition manufacturers, weapons sellers and firearms enthusiasts, including the National Rifle Assn. Several police groups in California are also opposed. … The hyperbolic debate has even ricocheted into Congress. In April, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Committee on Armed Services, warned Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger that requiring serial numbers on ammunition would increase the cost of bullets so much that the military would scale back target practice. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, also a Republican, is also against the proposal, which he said would hurt manufacturers in his state."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Human Smuggling Investigation Focused On "Jung Organization". The Washington Times (7/3, Seper) reports on last week's raid "that targeted a sophisticated human-smuggling operation" in California. US Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman Dean Boyd "said the investigation focused on a criminal organization called the 'Jung Organization,' which reportedly smuggled South Korean women into the United States and then provided them to brothel operators. The brothels were concealed behind businesses that purported to be massage parlors and 'out-call service' operations. He said the prostitutes were managed by an underground network of Korean 'taxi' services operated by members and associates of the Jung Organization."

California AG Asks For Review Of Decision On Same-Sex Marriages. The Washington Times/AP (7/3) reports California attorney general Bill Lockyer "urged the state Supreme Court to decide whether homosexual 'marriage' is permitted under the state constitution." Lockyer "asked the justices to review a trial judge's decision in March that said state laws limiting marriage to heterosexual couples is unconstitutional. The ruling had been stayed pending appeal. The attorney general, however, wants California's top court to remove the pending case from a San Francisco appellate court."

DOJ_NMG_0000805

California Redistricting Proposal Compared With DeLay-Engineered Campaign In Texas. The Dallas Morning News (7/3, Becker) reports, "Amid recent polls showing Arnold Schwarzenegger's star power dropping from the top of California's political marquee, the governor's push to redraw congressional and legislative district lines mid-decade isn't looking like this summer's Republican blockbuster. It's a very different scenario from the redistricting deal that House Majority Leader Tom DeLay…orchestrated in Texas two years ago. … What exactly Mr. Schwarzenegger seeks from redistricting reform isn't clear, pundits say. While it could help Republicans acquire congressional seats in the long term, the initiative hasn't brought wide party support."

Interest Groups Prepare For California's Special Election. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Barabak) reports, "California's special election is drawing money and attention from interest groups and political partisans across the country who see the campaign as a way to invigorate their efforts in 2006 and beyond. … Conservative activists see an opportunity to defang a longtime nemesis — organized labor — by making it harder to collect union dues for political purposes. Eight initiatives have qualified for the statewide ballot, which will bring voters to the polls for the fourth time in as many years. The measures deal with a variety of issues, including parental consent for abortions, teacher tenure and electricity re-regulation, as well as union dues, redistricting, prescription drugs and the state budget." Schwarzenegger "has embraced three of the measures as part of a package designed to circumvent the Democrat-run Legislature and diminish the clout of lawmakers in Sacramento. Those measures would lengthen the time teachers work before receiving tenure, give the governor greater control over state spending and give legislators' political line-drawing power to a panel of retired judges."

Romney Urged To Speak More Clearly On Abortion. The Boston Globe (7/3, Ebbert) reports, "Advocates on both sides of the abortion debate say they are confused over Governor Mitt Romney's position on abortion and are seeking to understand the meaning of recent comments he has made, in light of the positions he outlined during the 2002 gubernatorial campaign. Last week, the Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts and NARAL Pro-Choice Massachusetts provided the Globe a copy of a letter sent earlier this month in which they asked Romney to explain his current abortion philosophy and to confirm that he supports emergency contraception and other measures he embraced while running for governor. Similarly, a leading antiabortion group is puzzled: "We honestly don't know where he stands on this issue,' said Marie Sturgis, executive director and legislative director for Massachusetts Citizens for Life."

Frist Accused Of Changing His Position On Stem Cell Research. The Washington Post (7/3, A5, Connolly) reports Sen. Bill Frist "is again at the center of the stem cell battle. Unlike four years ago, when he sought an influential role, the Senate majority leader has shied away from the issue, frustrating once-admiring researchers and patient advocates who now accuse him of exchanging sound medical thinking for with political calculations." According to the Post, the House passage of stem cell research legislation succeeded in "placing additional pressure on Frist to stand by a policy that falls far short of the approach he envisioned four years ago. … But if Frist is maneuvering to attract Republican primary voters in pursuit of the 2008 presidential nomination, he is doing so at the risk of angering loyal Tennessee supporters." The Post notes, "Over a period of three days, Frist aides did not respond to multiple interview requests."

Gordon Looks To Repair NAACP's Relationship With Bush. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (7/3, Sykes, Thomas-Lynn) reports, "With Bruce S. Gordon's stellar background in corporate America, his installation as executive director of the NAACP at its 96th annual convention in Milwaukee could herald a new beginning for the venerable civil rights organization's relationship with the Bush administration. … Gordon already has indicated he wants to improve the NAACP's relationship with the Bush administration, a radical departure for a group known for its criticism of the president. But in doing so, the 59-year-old retired Verizon Communications executive may run the risk of pitting himself against some members who supported the NAACP's confrontational style with President Bush. Delegates will get a chance to witness Gordon's style for the first time, as well as hear an array of speakers from across the political and religious spectrum." Sen. Barack Obama, the Rev. Jesse Jackson and former NAACP chief Benjamin Hooks" are among the scheduled speakers."

DOJ_NMG_0000806

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

St. Louis Mayor Expresses Support For Eminent Domain Decision. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/3) reports, "In Kelo vs. New London, Conn., the Supreme Court ruled that the city could not take land simply to confer a private benefit on a particular private property. However, the decision said the taking would be executed based on a carefully considered development plan, which would have a public benefit. The decision pleased Mayor Francis Slay. 'It's very difficult rebuilding an older city with the environmental issues and with the issues of assembling sites for redevelopment to help improve the quality of life for people in our neighborhoods,' Slay said."

Maryland Gubernatorial Candidates Trade Shots Over Environmental Protection Policies. The Washington Post (7/3, C4, Wagner) reports, "Debate in the run-up to Maryland's race for governor was dominated last week by talk about the environment. Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley , a Democratic hopeful, sought to spotlight his record in a sprawling address that included heavy criticism of Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. 's environmental stewardship." O'Malley "accused Ehrlich of lacking commitment to preserving parkland, improving water quality and protecting children from lead paint, among other shortcomings. … Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan , another Democrat interested in being governor, moved aggressively to insert himself into the debate by questioning O'Malley's record."

Portland Said To Have Cut Emissions While Improving Its Economy. The New York Times Nicholas Kristof (7/3) writes, "Newly released data show that Portland, America's environmental laboratory, has achieved stunning reductions in carbon emissions. It has reduced emissions below the levels of 1990, the benchmark for the Kyoto accord, while booming economically. What's more, officials in Portland insist that the campaign to cut carbon emissions has entailed no significant economic price, and on the contrary has brought the city huge benefits: less tax money spent on energy, more convenient transportation, a greener city, and expertise in energy efficiency that is helping local businesses win contracts worldwide."

Wisconsin Reservation Dealing With Gang Crime. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (7/3, Zielinski) reports from Hayward, WI, where "23-year-old Cody Badbear Wade was shot five times, once in the head. Police searched a nearby cranberry marsh for the murder weapon. … A police report said Wade had proclaimed himself a 'King killer,' but it turned out differently the night of May 30, 2002. … After trading harsh words with Wade at the Snowshoe Bar, Robert G. 'Bobby' Smith, an avowed member of the Almighty Latin King Nation, the violent Hispanic street gang with a significant presence in Milwaukee, would ambush and kill Wade after he approached a clearing in his truck." The Sentinel continues, "Smith, the son of a former Sawyer County sheriff's deputy, told investigators that one of the admitted leaders of the Latin Kings on the Lac Courte Oreilles Indian reservation, Charles Gokey, ordered members to "light up" on Wade. Smith later was sentenced to 13 years in prison for Wade's murder. … Earlier this year, Gokey, in turn, was sentenced in a federal court in Madison to almost 20 years for crack cocaine distribution. U.S. District Judge John C. Shabaz said the harsh punishment was meant 'to assist the government's mission to substantially reduce the impact of drug and drug-related crime on the Lac Courte Oreilles reservation.' … The two were part of more than 50 prosecutions and a continuing multi-headed investigation that were set in motion by the events in the pine plantation in an attempt to rid the reservation of the Latin Kings."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Federal Agents Seize Human Growth Hormone In Denver. The Denver Post (7/3, Caldwell, Briggs) reports, "Agents with the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the Postal Inspection Service are investigating a shipment of human growth hormone worth up to $400,000 to the home of a Denver substance-abuse counselor, records show." The Post continues, "Authorities in March seized 400 vials of Chinese hGH and are investigating clinic owner Tamea Rae Sisco and two people involved in a Hawaiian osteopathic center on suspicion that they illegally imported the drugs for use in anti-aging treatments, according to a federal search- warrant affidavit and federal sources." The Post adds, 'Sisco denies any wrongdoing and said she was an intermediary for a legitimate shipment. No charges have been brought as a result of the raid. … While the national debate on performance-enhancing drugs swirls around sports superstars, federal agents are waging a local battle away from the limelight. They're intercepting hGH doses meant for everyday people who are hoping to look younger and leaner. It's all part of a surging anti-aging phenomenon in which hGH is king. … Law enforcement officials step in when hGH is illegally pitched as a youth elixir. HGH can be legally prescribed only under narrow circumstances, including the treatment of AIDS wasting disease. HGH also is obtained illegally by some athletes seeking to build muscle and cut fat. … 'I can't comment on ongoing investigations, but I can state that there is a problem in general,' said Jeff Dorschner, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Colorado. 'The illegal trafficking of human growth hormones remains a concern of the Justice Department.'"

DOJ_NMG_0000807

Florida Drug Case Chilled US-Colombia Relations. The Tampa Tribune (7/3) reports, "U.S. relations with Colombia were briefly strained in March because of a federal prosecutor's court filing in Tampa in the case of an alleged leader of the Cali drug cartel." The Tribune continues, "Colombian officials even threatened to halt all extraditions to the United States, but U.S. officials retracted the court filing, averting a crisis." The Tribune adds, "The flare-up exposed a nerve in Colombia and highlighted the troubled, violent and corrupt recent history of efforts to stem the country's illegal drug exports. … The controversy involved a Colombian Constitution provision that allows extraditions, but only for crimes committed after Dec. 17, 1997, when the constitutional amendment, Article 35, was enacted. … A defense attorney for Joaquin Mario Valencia-Trujillo filed a motion to enforce that restriction and strike from Valencia's indictment charges that preceded the 1997 constitutional amendment. … Federal investigators say Valencia was a politically connected, if little noticed, leader in the notorious drug cartel as far back as 1988. He is the biggest catch in 'Operation Panama Express,' a wide-ranging, long-term investigation, based in Tampa, of Colombian maritime drug traffickers. … Part of a 2002 indictment against Valencia alleges a conspiracy to use drug money to 'make payments to influence political and judicial decisions in Colombia, the United States and elsewhere.' … Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph K. Ruddy filed a response to the defense motion alleging that Article 35 is part of the conspiracy mentioned in Valencia's indictment. 'It represents the product of the successful bribery of then-Colombian President Ernesto Samper and the Colombian Congress by the Cali cartel to immunize them from extradition to the United States,' Ruddy wrote."

Gangs Moving Into Hampton Roads, VA, Area. The Norfolk (VA) Virginian-Pilot (7/3, Kimberlin, Heinatz) reports, "A warning has come from the feds. … An FBI informant says MS-13, a notorious street gang with ties to El Salvador, recently issued an order for its members to kill someone — anyone — wearing a badge in Hampton Roads." The V-P continues, "The hit was discussed during a meeting of gang leaders held in Norfolk. … The purpose: To send a message to local law enforcement trying to stop the machete-wielding gang from moving to town. … The message: Stay out of our business. Stay out of our way." The V-P adds, "The alert arrived in a May 23 bulletin from the Department of Homeland Security. Both the department and the FBI have refused to comment, but state and federal gang experts confirmed the warning – which has since been put on hold. … 'The gangs call it a "green light,"' said Mindy Grizzard, spokeswoman for the Virginia Gang Investigators Association. … In the urban underbellies of Los Angeles, Chicago, Detroit or New York, such a threat might not raise even an eyebrow. … In Hampton Roads, it's met with an odd mix of shock and shhh. … Shock that such things could happen here. … Shhh because gangs are dirty laundry – the scent of which can derail a city's redevelopment plan, shred a school's reputation and cause decent folks to pull out of a neighborhood."

Reyna Says He Was Not Pressured To Resign As US Marshals Head. The Brownsville (TX) Herald (7/3, Perez-Treviño) reports, "U.S. Marshals Service Director Ben Reyna never bought a house in Washington, D.C. … 'My intention was not to stay,' Reyna said last week after submitting his resignation from the Marshals Service effective July 31." The Herald continues, "He was not pressured to resign from the post he's held since 2001, he says, and will return to his hometown of Brownsville for personal reasons and without regrets. … 'I would not have done anything differently. It's been a great experience and a great honor,' Reyna told The Brownsville Herald in an exclusive interview." The Herald adds, "The Marshals Service is charged primarily with protecting judges and courts. Its performance is under scrutiny and criticism, seemingly prompted by the slaying of U.S. District Judge Joan Humphrey Lefkow's mother and husband in their Chicago home. … Less than a month after the Lefkow murders, Superior Court Judge Rowland Barnes was killed when a prisoner wrestled a gun from a sheriff's deputy in the Fulton County Courthouse in Atlanta, Ga., on March 11. … The back-to-back tragedies shined an unflattering light on the Marshals Service and started a buzz among judges and lawmakers in Washington, D.C. … In a letter dated March 14, U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, wrote to Reyna inquiring about security measures and what would be instituted in response to the attack on the Lefkows. … Reyna said protecting the judiciary has always been and should always be the priority: 'That is what allows us to maintain the rule of law.' … He also noted that in the agency's 215-year history, no federal judge has been murdered in a courtroom or courthouse."

DOJ_NMG_0000808

TAX:

IRS Data Shows More Wealthy Americans Pay Little Or No Federal Taxes. The New York Times (7/3, Johnston) reports, "The number of affluent individuals and married couples who paid no federal income taxes jumped more than 15 percent in 2002, to 5,650, government data released last week showed. … About one in every 436 high-income Americans paid no taxes in 2002, up from one in 531 in 2001 and one in 1,010 in 2000. Over all, the top 2 percent of earners - the 2.5 million filers with income of $200,000 or more - paid almost 27 cents in taxes for each dollar of income they reported in 2002, other I.R.S. data showed. … Among that high-income group, however, almost 83,000, or one in 33, paid less than a dime in taxes for every dollar of income. An additional 79,000 paid less than 15 cents."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Reviewing Potential SCOTUS Nominees. President Bush is reviewing potential nominees for the Supreme Court while preparing to attend the G-8 summit next week. While the President has many options, the consensus in the media is that Bush will likely to be able to get a conservative nominee passed, and the question now is what sort of conservative that nominee will be. Media coverage of the impending political battle over Bush's nominee continued to receive significant media coverage. Meanwhile, President Bush's radio address praising US troops received light coverage.

While all three network news programs reported on how liberal and conservative activists were preparing for the political battle, NBC Nightly News (7/2, story 2, 1:30, Seigenthaler) first focused on Bush's selection process, reporting, "President Bush is preparing to submit his nominee for the court." NBC (Jordan): "Former presidential advisors say this is a process that just can't be rushed. There's a reason why President Bush says he'll take his time replacing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor because Bush is building a part of his legacy, that from a former aide to President Reagan who was on hand for the O'Connor nomination."

The AP (7/3, Riechmann) reports, "Regardless of whom he picks, the closely divided court…will very well end up with a more conservative bent." Key factors in Bush's decision will be "Intellect. Character. Judicial philosophy. The prospect of being able to win Senate confirmation. Those are the overriding issues that several legal experts and advocates on both the right and left think will guide the president, who is facing intense pressure from both sides of the political aisle."

The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Brownstein, Chen) notes, "While promising to consult, the aide signaled that the White House did not believe that Bush faced an obligation to replace O'Connor with a justice who shared her relatively moderate views, as some Democrats and liberal groups have suggested." One senior Bush aide said, "The notion that there is…a narrow band of people who are appropriate to replace Justice O'Connor is wrong. … The president will consult, but the president will make a decision."

The Chicago Tribune (7/3, Tackett) reports, "The news was about Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But the story is about President Bush. How Bush manages that story, by the person he nominates to replace O'Connor, by the words he chooses to frame that debate, by the way he deals with Congress, could define his presidency almost as much as terrorism and the war in Iraq." Bush, "even with sagging approval ratings and diminishing support for the war and his handling of the economy, finds himself in an extraordinarily powerful position with Republicans controlling the executive branch and Congress. Now he will be extending that leverage to the Supreme Court."

The Boston Globe (7/3, Milligan) notes that Democratic senators, civil libertarians, and liberal groups "agree with conservatives that…the president will use his first appointment to the high court to establish a conservative legacy with a nominee similar to those Bush has publicly touted as his favorite justices." And experts "note that Bush -- unlike his predecessor, President Clinton --has consistently stuck to his guns on both policy decision and nominees, no matter how much heat he has gotten from the public, the international community, or Capitol Hill."

DOJ_NMG_0000809

And Knight Ridder (7/3, Hutcheson) quotes the Rev. Patrick Mahoney, director of the Christian Defense Coalition saying, "If 9/11 was the defining moment of his first term, the composition of the Supreme Court is the defining moment of the second."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (7/3, Doyle, O'Rourke) reports, "Bush will be confronting a multiplicity of choices," including whether to nominate a Hispanic, a woman, a consensus candidate or a senator like Sen. John Cornyn. Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter "said that two women are 'a minimum' on the court." But it is considered more likely "that Bush will scour the appeals court benches."

Meanwhile, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/3, Shesgreen) says "what both sides fear most is the unknown: a so-called 'stealth' nominee who has a thin paper trail and offers ambiguous answers in the Senate grilling that is sure to come." USA Today Biskupic (7/3) also reports on O'Connor's retirement.

Bush Aides To Solicit Bipartisan Advice. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Brownstein, Chen) reports while Bush is in Europe "senior White House officials plan to canvass Democratic and Republican Senators for recommendations to fill" the Supreme Court vacancy. But, "Democrats and their allies…reacted cautiously to the signal from White House." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's spokesman Jim Manley said, "Their track record of even consulting with Republicans on Capitol Hill is very poor. … It remains to be seen if this is an encouraging first step or is just going to be a one-way dialogue." The Times notes, "Both sides are trying to position themselves as reasonable and conciliatory to strengthen their hands for the full-scale combat most suspect will erupt."

Bush May Face Difficulties Satisfying GOP Base With Conservative Nominee. Highlighting the difficulties Bush may face is satisfying the GOP base, the New York Times (7/3, Rosen) in a "Week in Review" article examining the different types of judicial conservatism represented by those likely to be on Bush's short list says "the crucial question for the country is what kind of judicial conservative." The judicial conservative movement is not "monolithic" and represents "very different approaches to constitutional interpretation that often lead to dramatically different results in cases ranging from affirmative action to abortion and states' rights." Some "of the leading candidates said to be on Mr. Bush's short list…defy easy categorization. But it's clear that justices from each philosophical camp would reach very different decisions in the cases Americans care most about." After describing the different approaches to judicial conservatism Bush's potential nominees represent, the Times notes that it's clear that Mr. Bush will have an opportunity to satisfy and infuriate conservatives of many stripes. Whatever choice he makes will define not only the Supreme Court but his own conservative legacy."

Women Split Over Necessity To Choose Woman To Succeed O'Connor. The Washington Post (7/3, A12, Argetsinger, Williamson) notes that "for all the significance they place on her sex, women are split on the question of whether O'Connor should be succeeded by another woman. Although some of their leaders and members have expressed hope that the next appointee will be a woman, most women's organizations, liberal and conservative, are no longer making a person's sex an official priority, instead holding up O'Connor's reputation for open-mindedness as the characteristic they most want to see replicated."

New Justice Could Come From Fifth Circuit. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (7/2, Schleifstein) reports, "The list of potential replacements for retiring U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first female member of the high court, includes three judges on the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans -- two of them women." According to John Baker, a constitutional law professor at the Louisiana State University Law Center "Jones would draw the greatest opposition…because of signals she has given over the years that she would be an 'originalist,' closely following the Constitution's original meaning instead of expanding its interpretation in light of modern events." Yet, "New Orleans defense lawyer Bruce Waltzer said Clement may actually be more conservative than either of the other two."

Expert Warns Conservative Pick May Drive Justice Kennedy Leftwards. The AP (7/3, Riechmann) reports, "There's no doubt a confirmation fight would be contentious if Bush nominates" the conservatives "thought to be on his short list." Yet, "American University historian Allan J. Lichtman says naming an extremely conservative nominee could backfire on the president because it might prompt Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate conservative who also has been a swing vote on the court, to inch away from the right." Lichtman said, "That could push Kennedy into the O'Connor slot."

DOJ_NMG_0000810

Knight Ridder (7/3, Henderson) reports "the injection of a new personality into" the dynamics of the relationship between Supreme Court justices "could have unpredictable -- and, for the White House, undesirable -- effects." Some observers "say the arrival of another hard-line conservative to the bench…could embolden moderate conservative Anthony Kennedy." Court historian David Garrow said, "Replacing a moderate with a conservative automatically magnifies the center." A new conservative justice "would empower Kennedy, whose shift to the court's middle has seemed dramatic over the past few terms, and has been decisive in a number of cases that have left conservatives reeling."

And Orin Kerr, an associate professor at George Washington University Law School who once clerked for Justice Kennedy, in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (7/3) writes the replacement of O'Connor's vote "may not have a dramatic effect on the outcomes of the court's biggest cases" because "Kennedy often votes with the more liberal justices to form a liberal majority in major cases. He has voted to uphold Roe vs. Wade, and he wrote the opinions that struck down sodomy laws and invalidated the death penalty for juveniles. All these decisions would remain intact."

Loss Of O'Connor Unlikely To Hurt Liberal Bloc On Court. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Savage) reports that "the conservative Supreme Court led by Chief Justice William Rehnquist" faded away last term as it was replaced by "a moderate-to-liberal court led by John Paul Stevens." The Times notes, "By forming alliances with O'Connor or Justice Anthony M. Kennedy -- and sometimes even with Justice Antonin Scalia -- Stevens has been able to forge a majority in some of the biggest Supreme Court cases." Losing "O'Connor's vote might mean Stevens' sway over the court has reached its high-water mark. But with Kennedy and four liberals still in place, the Stevens bloc isn't likely to dissolve overnight."

Controversial Nominee Could Impact 2006 Elections. Knight Ridder (7/3, Hutcheson) reports, "In today's politically polarized world, with 24-hour cable news, 30-second attack ads, Internet interest groups and ideologically driven bloggers, a contentious nomination battle could drive a deeper wedge between Americans on opposite sides of the political divide." The impact of "a bitter confirmation battle could easily spill into next year's congressional elections, when Republican control of Congress will be tested at the polls."

Bush Urged To Choose Politician For Court. AEI resident scholar Norman Ornstein in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, B7) writes, "Most of the names the White House has floated as possible Supreme Court nominees are, predictably, judges on federal appeals courts. It is time to expand the field to seriously consider people with political backgrounds. Former senators John Danforth and Warren Rudman would be superb choices. At least two current senators, John Cornyn of Texas and Jon Kyl of Arizona, fit the ideological criteria of the White House. Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, has mentioned other capable Republican senators, including Mike DeWine of Ohio and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. … The court, and the country, would be well served to have a politician or two on the bench."

Interest Groups Gear Up For Fight Over SCOTUS Nominee. The preparations and concerns of liberal and conservative activists were covered extensively by the media, as NBC Nightly News (7/2, story 3, 1:30, Seigenthaler) reported, "The battle of the next Supreme Court nominee could in some ways reflect the political and cultural battle that is brewing in this country."

CBS Evening News (7/2, story 3, 2:30, Mitchell) reported that "the gloves are off in the fight over who will replace" O'Connor. CBS (Chen): "In their war room, liberal activists are in full battle mode in their effort to head off the nominee, though no one knows who the nominee is yet. What are you afraid of?" Ralph Neas, of People for the American Way, was shown saying, "What we are afraid of is that George W. Bush will replace a mainstream conservative like Sandra Day O'Connor with a right wing ideologue, someone like Clarence Thomas or Scalia." Chen: "Conservative groups aim to stop what they see as judicial activism, and openly name justices they see as having let them down." Wendy Long, of the Judicial Confirmation Network said, "I think that justices Souter and Justice Kennedy are regarded by the Republican base as disappointments." Chen continues, "Likewise, Justice O'Connor, a Reagan appointee, has often frustrated more hard-line conservatives."

DOJ_NMG_0000811

The Chicago Tribune (7/3, James, Dorning) notes, "Liberal and conservative efforts Friday were driven by fear on one side, hope on the other. Liberals feared decisions favorable to them on affirmative action, abortion rights, the environment and a host of other hot-button issues could be reversed in new rulings. Conservatives hoped a new justice would deliver just such reversals."

The Baltimore Sun (7/3, Woestendiek, Little) reports, "Ruptures over gay marriage, flag burning or displaying the Ten Commandments will feel like mere tremors compared with the cultural quake sure to erupt when the nation's differences become the weapons with which the Supreme Court's future is determined, political analysts say. Expect the 'red' and the 'blue' to go at it fiercely enough to leave the nation purple, or at least with some long-lingering bitter feelings."

The Washington Post (7/3, A11, Milbank) reports that "beneath the official posturing" on Friday "was a simple truth: O'Connor is the tiebreaking vote on a range of hot-button social issues, and the battle to replace her will be in many ways a referendum on legal abortion. So it's no surprise that, starting at mid-morning, the O'Connor succession fight became the only game in town." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/3, Reston) also reported on the efforts of activists to influence Bush's choice and the Dallas Morning News (7/3, Pusey) includes a brief description of the key players in the upcoming debate.

Conservatives Prepared To Launch Effort To Influence Bush. The Washington Post (7/3, A1, Edsall, Milbank) in a front page story reports that "the conservative movement has something it lacked during its losing battle for the confirmation of Robert H. Bork to the court 18 years ago: a highly coordinated movement that has fused the big dollars of economic conservatives with the grass-roots clout of millions of religious conservatives." Conservatives believe that "will prevent the defeat of another nominee such as Bork and will inoculate Bush from pressure to appoint a moderate such as Kennedy or Souter. And if it works with O'Connor's replacement, conservatives say, they will have found a formula that will allow them gradually to control the judiciary and revisit the full range of precedents regarding abortion, affirmative action, church-state matters and regulations of business and the environment."

And the New York Times (7/3, Rosenbaum, Clemetson) reports that the "last time Ralph G. Neas and C. Boyden Gray went head to head as commanding generals in a war over a Supreme Court confirmation was in 1991, when Clarence Thomas was the nominee." Although Gray "won the Thomas battle," Neas "had the superior operation: a unified battalion of labor unions, civil rights groups, women's organizations, civil libertarians and environmentalists that had more money, more energy and more firepower than had ever been used in a Supreme Court fight." After the battle Gray "vowed he would never be outgunned again." Now as chairman of the Committee for Justice, Gray has organized "outside forces that would be up to the fight." Gray said, "We haven't leveled the playing field. … But at least we're on the field and we're able to engage."

Conservatives Express Opposition To Gonzales Nomination. Conservative opposition to AG Alberto Gonzales was noted in a number of articles Sunday morning. Providing in depth coverage, the Washington Post (7/3, A1, Baker, Glasser) in a front page story reports, "Many of President Bush's conservative supporters lined up in staunch opposition yesterday to the candidate he might personally most want to name to the Supreme Court, his longtime friend and adviser, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales." With Bush leaving for Europe, leaves "Republicans a short time to influence his decision. If the broader nomination battle will resemble a presidential campaign, as both sides predict, then the next week or two could amount to a primary." The Post notes, "The one candidate who unifies most conservatives -- in opposition -- is Gonzales."

The New York Times (7/3, A1, Nagourney, Purdum, Kirkpatrick) in a front page story adds, "Administration officials discounted the conservative uprising against Mr. Gonzales, saying that Mr. Bush was already aware of the objections and was not convinced by them." One senior Administration official said, "The president is going to pick someone who is a true constructionist and who is correct in interpreting the law." The official said "Gonzales fit that description, but also that Mr. Bush might be wary of moving him to a new position so shortly after he was confirmed as attorney general." Yet, "the swift and vociferous opposition to Mr. Gonzales reflected the intensity of concern on the right over just what kind of conservative Mr. Bush will choose, as he moves toward a decision that will go a long way toward settling any question about what kind of conservative he is, and how his presidency will be remembered."

Both Sides Of Abortion Debate Accused Of Using Hyperbole. ABC's World News Tonight (7/2, story 4, 3:00, Moran) reported that "both sides of the abortion issue are turning up the volume in the debate. The President of the National Organization for Women, for instance, has declared a 'state of emergency' for women's rights." ABC (Morrell): "But some legal analysts say both sides are misleading the public. They say her departure almost certainly opens the door for further restrictions on abortion. She was a decisive fifth vote in a 2000 case. Striking down a state ban on so-called partial birth abortions. And this fall, for the first time in five years, the court will hear an abortion case, one that could allow states to pass tougher parental notification laws. While the left may be overselling the risk to abortion rights, some on the right are underselling it, trying to convince Americans that with or without O'Connor, Roe v. Wade is safe. Some on the right fear if abortion becomes the central issue in this debate, it could hurt their chances of replacing the moderate O'Connor with a true conservative."

DOJ_NMG_0000812

Public May Tune Out Partisan Battle Over Nominee. But the Los Angeles Times (7/3, McManus) says, "in the middle of the storm, like civilians caught on a battlefield, much of the nation may wish that the whole thing would just go away." Pew Research Center pollster Andrew Kohut said that "for most of the country, it may just look like another partisan battle in Washington." The Times notes, "Abortion, gay marriage and religion may be 'hot button' issues, prized by interest groups and political consultants for their ability to mobilize people to vote and donate money. But most Americans consider those issues less pressing than the war in Iraq or the state of the economy, and recoil from the acrimony of the debate."

NOW Members Rally For Abortion Rights. The AP (7/3, Gerome) reports, "Chanting 'Not the church, not the state; women must choose their fate,' hundreds of members of the National Organization for Women rallied for abortion rights Saturday as President Bush prepares to select a new U.S. Supreme Court justice." They "shifted the agenda for its three-day annual convention following the announcement Friday that Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was retiring.

Conservatives Restrain Happiness Over O'Connor Resignation. The Washington Times (7/3, A1, Hurt) in a front page story reports that some conservative activists "chuckled with delight over their turn of good fortune." After she announced her intention to retire, "many conservatives chose to applaud the service of Justice O'Connor, but to otherwise keep quiet. White House aides and Senate Republicans sent out the word that there should be no public relief that it was Justice O'Connor, rather than Chief Justice Rehnquist, who was retiring." One conservative activist said, "Nobody wants to get into gloating here. … We're all too aware of what's at stake."

More Commentary. Expressing his concern that the political battle over Bush's nominee will hurt the Supreme Court, Yale law professor Stephen Carter in an op-ed in the New York Times (7/3) writes, "Perhaps President Bush could say to his most strident supporters on the right that it is not appropriate for them to behave with the triumphalism of conquerors who believe that the retirement of Justice O'Connor signals the moment to take control of the court. Perhaps the activists on the left, gearing up for a fight, could go back and read the speech made on the Senate floor by Edward Kennedy, during the vicious 1967 campaign over the nomination of Thurgood Marshall. Senator Kennedy warned his colleagues to reject the view that the Senate should reject potential justices who possess a judicial philosophy with which they disagree."

And the Washington Post (7/3, B6) in an editorial predicting the fierce political battle writes that "we take this moment, when nobody knows how excellent or terrible the next nominee will be, to emphasize that a judicial nomination is not a political campaign and should not be treated as one. A nominee's record is almost never a simple affair, because good legal reasoning doesn't always render the most politically congenial answer. Demagogic attacks on almost any nominee are easy, and knee-jerk defenses equally so. But a reasonable assessment of the president's choice, whoever it is, will not emerge from such a shouting match."

Specter Remains Noncommittal As He Prepares To Play Pivotal Role. The New York Times (7/3, Stolberg) reports, "Perhaps more than any other senator," Sen. Arlen Specter "will be the pivotal figure as he tries to manage his bitterly divided committee, his own uneasy relationship with the White House and the intense pressure that is already bearing down on him from both the left and right at a time when both sides are deeply suspicious of him." He "said that he and Mr. Bush had not named names in any of their conversations. He said he had thought 'long and hard' about suggesting possible candidates but decided not to, believing that 'the wiser course' would be to remain uncommitted to anyone in particular. As to whether he would advise Mr. Bush against nominating judges who might be perceived as likely to overturn Roe v. Wade, Mr. Specter was noncommittal." Specter said, "I'm going to listen to the president…and see how it goes."

DOJ_NMG_0000813

Senate Republicans Expected To Focus On Nominee's Legal Credentials. The Washington Post (7/3, A1, Baker, Glasser) in a front page story also notes that although some Republicans "focused on whom Bush's choice will be, others mapped out strategy for the period after he decides. Senate Republicans made plans to begin hearings as quickly as possible after the nomination, focused not on the candidate's positions on hot-button issues but on legal credentials."

And the Washington Post (7/3, A13, Allen) reports, "The two parties have begun outlining their strategies for confirmation hearings once President Bush nominates a successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, with Senate Republicans planning a rapid and rigid schedule designed to prevent Democrats from pinning the nominee down on divisive issues such as abortion." Senate Judiciary Committee Republican planning document "says the nominee will be counseled to avoid disclosing 'personal political views or legal thinking on any issue' in an effort to put a focus on qualifications rather than specific issues, including same-sex marriage and the government's treatment of suspected terrorists."

Sen. John Cornyn in a letter to the editor in the Washington Post (7/2, A29) wrote, "when evaluating the nominee, I will not be asking for commitments as to how he or she will rule on cases involving such contentious issues as abortion, affirmative action, same-sex marriage, the war on terrorism or any other specific issue on which the nominee might eventually rule." Cornyn stresses, "It's crucial that judges approach every case free from political commitments. They must be free to disappoint their supporters and surprise their opponents and critics. Judges must be free to do their jobs -- to listen to the facts, to carefully divine the law and to be faithful to the Constitution."

Supreme Court To Address Tough Issues In Next Term. The AP (7/3, Holland) reports, "Abortion, assisted suicide, gay rights, the death penalty. Some of the toughest issues in the land confront the Supreme Court in its new term in the fall." And whoever Bush nominates "will immediately face cases involving the Bush administration." For example, "the court will decide if law schools may restrict military recruiters as a way of protesting the Pentagon's 'don't ask, don't tell' policy." The AP notes, "The abortion cases involve a parental notification law from New Hampshire and a long-running fight over the liability of people who protest outside clinics."

The Baltimore Sun (7/3, Gibson) also reports "the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor could have almost immediate implications." In addition to other issues, the death penalty "could hang in the balance. O'Connor, who in 2001 publicly questioned how fairly capital punishment was administered, sided in recent years with a majority that struck down the death penalty for the mentally retarded, but dissented this year from a 5-4 decision banning juvenile executions." Recently the court agreed "to hear the appeal of a death row inmate from Tennessee who claims that new DNA evidence could exonerate him in the 1985 rape and murder." The Dallas Morning News (7/3, Jackson, Pusey) adds, "The justices have already agreed to review a federal law banning doctors from using drugs to assist suicides. Oregon officials claim the rule infringes on their Death with Dignity Act."

Observers Believe Rehnquist Will Remain On Court. The Chicago Tribune (7/3, Neikirk) reports that "some analysts say that if" Chief Justice William Rehnquist "waits much longer, it is less likely that he will resign." Marquette law professor Scott Moss said, "I would doubt it at this point. … If a justice is going to retire, he probably isn't going to wait until midway through the summer." And Georgetown law professor Susan Low Bloch "said she had heard that Rehnquist 'doesn't want to get off' the court while O'Connor 'did want to get off,' adding that 'I just know he loves the court and has all his life. Once his wife died, that became everything to him.'"

O'Connor Seen As Key Moderating Influence. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (7/3, Doyle) reports, "More pragmatic than philosophical, more centrist than hard-line conservative, the former Arizona state senator left a distinctive stamp on American justice that surpassed her initial ground-breaking appointment."

Linda Ross Meyer, professor of law at Quinnipiac University School of Law and a law clerk for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor during the 1991-1992 Supreme Court term, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, B1) says, "O'Connor believed that judging is not policy analysis or scholarship or ideology. Justice doesn't come from a book. The difficult decisions come in shades of gray, not black and white, and the view from the Supreme Court bench can be a narrow one.

DOJ_NMG_0000814

She looked to the pragmatic consequences of the court's decisions for everyday citizens, and she tried to do justice in the case while leaving play in the constitutional joints so as not to tie the hands of those closer to the facts and the people."

Viet Dinh, a former law clerk to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, B7) concludes, "I could go on and identify Justice O'Connor's indelible stamp in every area of the law spanning property rights, race relations, privacy, employment contracts, retirement benefits and so on. But that would be missing the point of her life, work and worth. She is not a crusader, a reformer or a philosopher. She has always tried to be a good judge, and by succeeding she has been a pioneer, sage and icon."

The Dallas Morning News (7/3, Nelson) reports O'Connor "opened doors for women at the highest levels of the legal profession. But when the justice who once aspired to be a cattle rancher graduated from Stanford Law School, she found that even low-level jobs weren't options for female lawyers. Many law firms simply didn't hire women. One offered the graduate, who finished third in her class, a secretarial position." Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, "who also struggled to find work after law school, said that despite the rejections that Justice O'Connor faced, 'she kept that positive spirit, and she has been a leader in everything she's done.'"

Feminists Reflect On O'Connor's Legacy. The Washington Post (7/3, D1, Rosin) reports, "The feminist movement kicked into action immediately when it lost O'Connor. She may not have been a reliable ally on their pet causes (she voted to invalidate the Violence Against Women Act, for example), but she came through as the critical vote on cases involving abortion and affirmative action. But there were no heartfelt personal reminiscences. No honoring of a fellow suffragette's guts and glory. Just the legal issues and the facts, with all the emotional warmth of a legal brief. It was understood that O'Connor herself wouldn't be caught dead at such a rally."

Amount Of Classified Government Documents Has Almost Doubled Since 2001. The New York Times (7/3, Shane) reports, "Driven in part by fears of terrorism, government secrecy has reached a historic high by several measures, with federal departments classifying documents at the rate of 125 a minute as they create new categories of semi-secrets bearing vague labels like 'sensitive security information.' A record 15.6 million documents were classified last year, nearly double the number in 2001. … Meanwhile, the declassification process, which made millions of historical documents available annually in the 1990's, has slowed to a relative crawl, from a high of 204 million pages in 1997 to just 28 million pages last year." According to the Times, "The increasing secrecy - and its rising cost to taxpayers, estimated by the office at $7.2 billion last year - is drawing protests from a growing array of politicians and activists, including Republican members of Congress, leaders of the independent commission that studied the Sept. 11 attacks and even the top federal official who oversees classification." Sens. John Cornyn and Patrick Leahy cosponsored a bill that "requires that any legislation creating new exemptions to the Freedom of Information Act explicitly disclose them. It is only part of overhaul efforts proposed by the two."

The AP (7/3, Freking) reports, "The numbers come from the Information Security Oversight Office in its latest annual report to the president. … An increase in the number of documents being classified has raised concerns that the government is being too secretive, and the report notes that overclassification of documents has been a consistent issue for decades. However, the report stops short of saying that the trend runs counter to the nation's interest."

OTHER NEWS:

Rally For The Poor Held In Scotland. The New York Times (7/3, Alvarez) reports that "more than 225,000 demonstrators encircled the heart of" Edinburgh "and demanded an end to abject poverty around the world." All types of people "poured into the streets here to deliver their message to the powerful leaders who will arrive at Gleneagles Hotel in Perthshire, nearby, for the Group of 8 summit meeting that starts Wednesday." The activists and demonstrators say "the world's richest countries should forgive the debts of the poorest countries, with no strings attached, equalize trade and put an end to harmful export subsidies and increase aid to poor countries while ensuring it gets funneled to the right people." The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Depasquale) issued a similar report.

The Washington Times (7/3) added, "At the head of the march was Zimbabwean campaigner Amadou Kanoute, one of the few Africans in the overwhelmingly white crowd." The

DOJ_NMG_0000815

Times said that "organizers estimated the day's turnout at more than 200,000 people making the demonstration the biggest in Scotland yet for a political cause."

G-8 Unlikely To Agree On Global Warming Specifics. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (7/3, Melvin) reports on various aspects of the upcoming G-8 conference, including the history and security concerns. The Journal notes that Tony Blair "seems unlikely to be able to get an agreement from all his guests to take specific steps to curb global warming. Bush does not agree that science has demonstrated that climate change poses a near-term problem or that it is caused by humans." However, "it does seem possible" that the leaders "will agree in Scotland to support the development of new technologies that do not produce greenhouse gases." Nicholas Bayne, a former British diplomat, said "I think Blair's objective was to bring the United States back into the international discussion of what to do about climate change."

G-8 Under Pressure To Admit China. The AP (7/3, Raum) says that the G-8 partnership "is under pressure to open the door to new members," among which "China, India and South Korea come to mind. Doing so would reflect the rapidly changing global economy and maintain the strategic role for which the group was organized in the first place." However, "not one of the current members seems to want to make the first move toward expansion." Grant Aldonas, who was commerce undersecretary in Bush's first term, "said a strong case could be made for bringing in other nations with fast-growing economies." Aldonas also said, "It's hard to talk meaningfully about the world economy any more without China being included." AP notes that by 2050, "the countries with the top economies are expected to be the U.S., China, India, Japan, Britain, France, Germany and South Korea. Current club members Italy and Russia would not rank in the top 10."

Past Africa Aid Failures. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Dixon) says that "like the untouched land, Nigeria, and much of Africa, has not been transformed by the donor aid that has washed in during recent decades, most of which was stolen or wasted. Despite billions of dollars in grants and loans, Africa is the only continent sliding backward, worse off than it was 25 years ago." In some African countries, "such as corruption-plagued Nigeria, people agree that debt relief rarely trickles down to those who need it most." However, "many economists and anti-poverty activists counter that lifting the yoke of debt is the only way to reduce hardship in the poorest nations. The World Bank is beginning to favor grants, not loans, for the neediest countries to prevent them from getting buried in debt."

To Ordinary Africans, G-8 Seems Out Of Touch. In a front-page piece, the Washington Post (7/3, Wax) reports on Africans' feelings about the G-8 summit and associated activities. Africans interviewed this week, "from farmers to artists to health workers, say they are grateful for the outpouring of sentiment, and glad to hear that glamorous musicians and actors are championing their cause," but they "also said there was a dangerous disconnect between what the industrialized nations see as solutions and what Africans believe they need. Instead of debt relief and more aid, many Africans said they wanted the G-8 to focus on ending corruption and on improving roads, courts, banking and secondary education." Many Africans said that "another useful step" would be "to end Western countries' trade subsidies for their own farmers, which make it impossible for African industries to do much more than survive."

NYTimes Mag Says International Community Belongs In Congo. The New York Times Magazine (7/3, Traub) in a lengthy piece on Democratic Republic of the Congo, notes that at the G-8 summit "we may well be hearing a great deal about promising African countries like Ghana or Malawi," but "that great swaths of the continent are occupied by countries -- Sudan, Sierra Leone, Burundi and, not least, Congo -- that, left to their own devices, are very likely to eat themselves up, and their neighbors as well." The international community "has no choice but to intervene in these places." One argument "we will be hearing from the Bush administration at the Gleneagles G-8 summit meeting is that corrupt countries have to change their own political culture before the world starts pouring in aid," which the writer describes as true, "but rather facile."

NYTimes Credits, Challenges Bush In Fight Against Poverty. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "If Mr. Bush is truly the compassionate conservative he says he is, he will not let the moment pass with the United States continuing to contribute far less than its share to the international effort to include Africa in the prosperity of the 21st century." President Bush, "to his great credit," has been "more attentive to the problems of Africa than his recent predecessors. He has increased overall assistance, stepped up spending on H.I.V./AIDS programs and created the Millennium Challenge Account to reward Africa's best-governed countries. Last week he promised further increases, including a program to fight malaria, and new teacher training and scholarship money to help girls attend school." But so far "there has been a discouraging gap between Mr. Bush's generous declarations and the money Washington has actually made available to Africa. The White House has failed to push the Republican-controlled Congress to fully finance Mr. Bush's aid programs and failed to spur its own aid appointees to get the money flowing to where it is most urgently needed."

DOJ_NMG_0000816

Administration Promise To Work With Other Governments "A Good Sign". The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes that President Bush's "announcement last week of a $1.2-billion package to fight malaria in Africa over the next five years showed an awareness of the disease's economic and human toll. That's progress; the United States has essentially ignored its devastating effects on Africa for decades, throwing in token sums that have enriched U.S. aid contractors but done next to nothing to reduce mortality from a plague that kills from 1 million to 3 million people a year." Bush's malaria initiative "is an inspirational commitment that — if implemented properly and fully funded by Congress — could save thousands of lives. Unfortunately, those are big 'ifs.'" The administration "promises to work with other governments and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Malaria and Tuberculosis, and that's a good sign. Bush should see this initiative as an experiment in distributing aid without USAID's involvement."

EU Urged To Remain Committed To Expansion. Ivo Daalder, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, and James Goldgeier a professor of political science at George Washington University, have written an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, Daalder, Goldgeier) that notes "from the beginning, Europeans have greeted President Bush's 'transformational diplomacy' with disdain. To them, the mess in Iraq demonstrates the failure of a policy that relies on speaking loudly and carrying a big stick. Instead of pursuing a policy of invasion, Western Europe has used the prospect of membership in the European Union to help transform the countries of Central and Eastern Europe into stable market democracies, thus continuing a process that saw Greece, Spain and Portugal join after they too pursued a democratic path." However, "the crisis in Europe that has emerged in recent weeks, first with the rejection of the European constitution by voters in France and the Netherlands and then with the breakdown of budget negotiations at last month's E.U. summit, has put the brakes on talk of continuing the enlargement process." Unless "the door to Europe is kept ajar, the instability that continues to bedevil Europe's periphery in the broader Middle East and the former Soviet Union will come to plague Europe itself and all that has been accomplished there. The consequences would be bad not just for Europe, but also for the United States, which needs a strong partner to address challenges emanating from Northern Africa, the Middle East and Eurasia."

Media Highlights Live 8 Concert. The Live 8 concert's message urging G-8 leaders to help reduce poverty in Africa was highlighted by the media. While coverage focused on the bands, music and crowds, all three network news broadcasts led with coverage of the Live 8 concert and it was covered by most of the nation's major dailies. NBC Nightly News (7/2, lead story, 3:00, Seigenthaler) reported, "Specifically Live 8 calls for rich nations to erase more than $200 Billion in African debt, aid doubled and better trade deals for Africa. Many insist President Bush's initiatives this week to fight malaria and improve education on the continent shows…" Sir Elton John was shown singing but the audio was garbled. Sir Elton John: "There are a lot of naysayers and it provoked a lot of, well, it's not going to make that much difference. Well, you have to try. You have to try and do something positive."

CBS Evening News (7/2, lead story, :10, Palmer) reported, "In Edinburgh, where the G-8 leaders are due to meet, marchers have already begun what organizers are calling the long march to justice. But experts in development say this feel-good popular movement isn't likely to change the minds of G-8 leaders on crucial issues that might help Africa but wouldn't be popular with voters."

Knight Ridder (7/3, Schofield) reports that organizer Bob Geldof "had billed this not as a fund-raiser, but a consciousness raiser." Later, during the performance, Geldof "would describe Saturday's concerts as part of the 'long, long walk to justice.'" In Philadelphia, "in a scene that was broadcast to concerts around the world, actor/singer Will Smith urged people around the world to snap their fingers at three-second intervals, noting that the pace represented the death rate for African children from poverty." Un Secretary-General Kofi Annan said, "On behalf of the poor, the voiceless and the weak, I say thank you."

The Washington Post (7/3, Lac, Wiltz) focused primarily on the artistic aspects of the Philadelphia concert, noting that organizer Bob Geldof's goal "was to make a social statement so grand, so loud, that the leaders of the industrialized world simply could not ignore it." Actor Don Cheadle "urged everybody to sign an online petition to pressure the G-8 participants…to help Africa out of abject poverty."

DOJ_NMG_0000817

The Washington Times (7/3) reports that Geldof "requested that performers ratchet down the kind of partisan rhetoric that characterized celebrities' involvement in the presidential election last year. Artists here complied for the most part, but, occasionally, lips loosened." The New York Times (7/3, Lyall) quotes South African pop star Zola, speaking of Europe: "They owe us. … They are the ones who brought slavery, killed our ancestors. If anybody must pay, they must pay us back so that we can have jobs and education."

The Los Angeles Times (7/3) reports that German punk rocker Campino "told the Berlin audience, 'We have to get Africa out of USA's headlock.'"

Op-ed Argues For Piecemeal Efforts To Aid Africa. In an op-ed piece appearing in the New York Times (7/3, Easterly) New York University professor of economics William Easterly, says "it's great that so many are finally noticing the tragedy of Africa. But sadly, historical evidence says that the solutions offered by big plans are not so easy. From 1960 to 2003, we spent $568 billion (in today's dollars) to end poverty in Africa. Yet these efforts still did not lift Africa from misery and stagnation." The "sensible alternative" Campino argues, "is to concentrate on piecemeal solutions to poor people's problems. You can evaluate the results of a specific intervention by comparing them with conditions in another group without the intervention, and you can get feedback from those affected and hold an individual aid agency accountable." Piecemeal fixers "do not promise the miracles that planners do; they just quietly deliver results."

American Businesses Have "Vested Interest"In China Success. The New York Times (7/3, Porter) says that "China has set out to snap up everything from Unocal to Maytag, not to mention a steady diet of United States Treasury bonds. And many of the leading voices who worried about Japan in the 1980's are warning that China presents a much bigger and more complex conundrum." Even those most concerned about China's rise up the economic, political and military ladder, however, "recognize another, perhaps more important difference between China and 1980's Japan. The United States has a vested interest in China's success." Whereas Japan's success at the time "was inevitably seen as America's failure, today American businesses are all rooting for China to succeed. Because they own a lot of it."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Americans needn't fear the prospect of the world's largest country joining the global middle class. This -- or the more prosaic possibility that some country might definitively unseat the United States as the world's richest country -- is not some tragic possibility that Americans must acknowledge with good grace or world-weary resignation (like the British waving farewell to their empire). The wealth of other nations is good for Americans in the narrowest selfish terms."

Abbas Attempts To Co-Opt Hamas. The Washington Times/AP (7/3, Daraghmeh) reports that Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas "has asked his most formidable rival, the militant Islamic group Hamas, to join his Cabinet in advance of Israel's Gaza pullout, and the group is considering the offer." Israel "denounced the idea of Hamas' joining the Palestinian government, calling the group 'a murderous terrorist organization.'" Israel and the US "have demanded that Mr. Abbas disarm Hamas and other militants, a step he has refused to take for fear it would provoke bloodshed among Palestinians. He has chosen instead to co-opt militants."

Some Gaza Settlers Dig In As Pullout Nears. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Ellingwood) reports that "rather than packing up, Sanur's 31 families are busily fortifying their hold on the West Bank hilltop in anticipation of a last stand." Sanur "is one of four settlements in the northern West Bank scheduled to be abandoned by Israel this summer, along with all 21 Jewish communities in the Gaza Strip." Although "Sanur and the three other isolated West Bank settlements, Homesh, Ganim and Kadim, have been largely overlooked in the turbulent national drama over the planned withdrawal," military officials "say settler resistance may prove especially tough in Sanur and Homesh." Settlers in Sanur "say they expect 10,000 or more supporters to sweep in to help thwart the evacuation."

Iranian Pres-Elect Refuses Interviews. The New York Times (7/3, Slackman) says that since the election a week ago, "it has been nearly impossible to get a feel for Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, to take the measure of the man. He has refused all interviews, though he did hold one hourlong news conference." Friends, supporters and neighbors "describe the diminutive, bearded man as humble and caring." Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political science professor at Tehran University, "said that he had known the president-elect since childhood and that Mr. Ahmadinejad was not involved with the student hostage takers."

DOJ_NMG_0000818

Ahmadinejad A Suspected Accomplice In 1989 Austrian Attack. The Washington Times/AP (7/3, Kole) reports that Austria's daily, "Der Standard." quoted a prominent Austrian politician "as saying authorities have 'very convincing' evidence linking" Ahmadinejad to attacks in Vienna," in which Kurds were killed in 1989." Der Standard reported yesterday that a top official with Austria's Green Party, accused Ahmadinejad "of traveling to Vienna a few days before the slayings to deliver the weapons to the Iranian commandos who carried out the killings. He said he wants a warrant issued for Mr. Ahmadinejad's arrest."

Ahmadinejad Campaign Message Of Economic Hope Aided Victory. The New York Times (7/3, Slackman) reports on Ahmadinejad's election campaign "promising to redistribute the nation's wealth, hold down prices, raise salaries and lift state-supported benefits for the poor. He infused those pledges with the theme of social justice, which resonated in a society where aiding the poor is considered an obligation for the faithful." Iran is "awash in oil money, as the price of crude topped $60 a barrel this week, pumping billions into the government treasury. But this country's economy is still tied down by a system in which the state and a shadowy collection of foundations controlled by clerics monopolize the vast bulk of its industries, including oil." The Ahmadinejad campaign message of "economic hope - as well as social justice - captured the hearts…of middle-class families. Parts of the middle class have trouble meeting their own financial needs, although their support for Mr. Ahmadinejad also stems from having grown used to buying subsidized food, even if they can afford to pay market prices."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No schedule available.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No schedule available.

US Senate: -- No events scheduled.

US House: -- No events scheduled.

Other: ALL DAY

June 30 - July 3. SCHOOL NURSES CONFERENCE _ The National Association of School Nurses (NASN) holds its 37th Annual Conference. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road, NW. Contacts: n/a, 207-883-2117

July 1 - 5. OSCE PARLIAMENTARY ASSEMBLY _ The 14th Annual Session of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) Parliamentary Assembly, whose participating states span the geographical area from Vancouver to Vladivostok, is held with the theme, ``30 Years Since Helsinki: Challenges Ahead." Highlights: 12 p.m. The World Jewish Congress, Institute on Religion and Public Policy, and Foundation for Ethnic Understanding host a roundtable luncheon, ``Legislative Responses to Anti-Semitism," with parliamentarians from across Europe, North America, and the former Soviet Union. The program includes Rep. Alcee Hastings, D-Fla., president, OSCE Parliamentary Assembly; co-chairs Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., co-chairman, U.S. Helsinki Commission, and Prof. Gert Weisskirchen, German Bundestag, OSCE-PA vice president and personal representative of the Chairman-in-Office of the OSCE on Combating Anti-Semitism; and presentations from leading members of national parliaments from the OSCE region. Willard Intercontinental Hotel. Location: JW Marriott Hotel, 14th St. and Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

CAPITAL FOURTH-REHEARSAL _ Open dress rehearsal for accredited media only of the 25th Annual PBS Capitol Fourth concert. Highlights: 11:50 a.m. - 12:50 p.m. The O'Jays 2 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. Kimberley Locke 2:30 p.m. - 3:25 p.m. Ronan Tynan 3:25 p.m. - 5:20 p.m. Gloria Estefan, Jimmy Smits 5:20 p.m. - 6 p.m. Barry Bostwick 7:40 p.m. - 10 p.m. Full concert dress rehearsal Location: U.S. Capitol, West Lawn Contacts: Anne Maginnis, 202-554-4620

July 3 - 8. IEEE CONFERENCE _ The Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers (IEEE) holds the 2005 IEEE Antennas and Propagation Society International Symposium and URSI National Radio Science Meeting. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW. Contacts: Prof. Amir Zaghloul, 703-535-3465

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"State Ballot, Wider Impact"

DOJ_NMG_0000819

"Glimpses Of A Hermit Nation"
"High Noon For High Court"
"How Visa System Failed To Flag Lodi Imam"
"Junior Miss Bows Out True To Tradition – Gracefully"
"Start to Make It Better, Live 8 Urges"

New York Times:

"Conservative Groups Rally Against Gonzales As Justice"
"Profit, Not Jobs, in Silicon Valley"
"A Town That Bled Under Hussein Hails His Trial"
"Confirmation Battle In Senate Could Define Specter's Career"
"In An Epic Wimbledon Final, Williams Prevails"
"For The Poor In Iran, Voting Was About Making Ends Meet"

Washington Post:

"Activists Gear Up For Nominee Fight"
"Help From France Key In Covert Operations"
"The Right's Moment, Years In The Making"
"Among The Poor Of Africa, G-8 Seems Out of Touch"
"One Man's Fight Against E-Mail Spam"

Washington Times:

"Liberals Gird For Supreme Struggle"
"Iranian Accused In Killing Of Kurds"
"A Present Built On The Past"
"NASA Plans Big Bang For Fourth"
"Live 8 Concerts Rock The Globe For Africa"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Old Glory's Preservation"
"A Musical Message"
"Noodlin' Away A Summer Afternoon"
"Conservatives Relish Chance To Seize Court"

Dallas Morning News:

"A Mystery In Boots And Beard"
"Gen X Marks Its Spot"
"Microbiologist Claimed Aloe Vera Fights Cancer, AIDS"
"Shaky Science: Experts Question Anthrax Lotion"

Houston Chronicle:

"Mad cow Puts Role Of USDA In Question"
"How NASA Would Save Shuttle Crew In Danger"
"Authorities Little Help, Hope To Families Of Missing"
"Conservatives Lobby Against Gonzales"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Live8; Iraq Bombings; Missing And Dead Soldiers In Afghanistan; SCOTUS/Abortion; Missing Girl; Arizona Wildfire; House Insurance; Wimbledon; Tour De France; Miss America.

CBS: Live8; Missing Girl; SCOTUS Nominee; Iraq Bombings; Soldiers' Deaths In Afghanistan; Wimbledon; Tour De France; Ballroom Dancing.

NBC: Live8; SCOTUS Nomination; SCOTUS/Interest Groups; Missing Girl; French Anti-Terrorism; NASCAR; Wimbledon.

Copyright 2005 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JULY 3, 2005 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
US-French Anti-Terrorism Cooperation Is Often Hid From Public View. ... 2
Subject Of CIA Italy Rendition Being Held In Egypt. ... 2
Suspected Terrorist Obtained US Visa Easily. ... 3

Patriot Act:
New Jersey County Urges Patriot Act Revisions. ... 3

Homeland Response:
Analysts Say Overhaul Of Intelligence System Could Take 10 Years. ... 4
Artists Express Support for New York Professor Under Federal Probe. ... 4
Minutemen Plan New Patrols For Fall. ... 4
Fighter Jets Force Small Plane To Land After Violating Airspace. 5
Independence Day Crowds Will Participate In Emergency Response Training. ... 5

War News:
Bush Ties War On Terror To Fourth Of July Celebration. ... 5
Hagel Says He Hopes US Doesn't Repeat Mistakes Made During Vietnam Era. ... 6
Suicide Bombings Targeting Iraqi Police Kill At Least Twenty. ... 6
Shiites Protest US Overtures To Sunni Insurgents. ... 7
Shiite Town Ravaged By Hussein Looks Forward To His Trial. ... 7
US Suffers Worst Week In Afghanistan Since 2001 ... 7
US Releases 57 Held At Bagram For Months Or Years Without Being Charged. ... 8
Attack On UN Convoy Kills Six Afghans. ... 8
Wounded Soldiers Provided With Trip To Gettysburg. ... 8

Corporate Scandals:
Kinsley Examines Scrushy Acquittal. ... 8

Criminal Law:
White House Reportedly Concerned That Fitzgerald Is Focusing On Rove. ... 8
Cunningham Foregoes Public Appearances After Returning To District. ... 9
St Louis Public Defender Rules To Change. ... 9
California Weighs Bullet Marking Proposals. ... 9

Civil Rights:
Human Smuggling Investigation Focused On "Jung Organization". ... 10
California AG Asks For Review Of Decision On Same-Sex Marriages. ... 10
California Redistricting Proposal Compared With DeLay-Engineered Campaign In Texas. ... 10
Romney Urged To Speak More Clearly On Abortion. ... 10
Frist Accused Of Changing His Position On Stem Cell Research. 11
Gordon Looks To Repair NAACP's Relationship With Bush. ... 11

Environment/Indian Affairs:
St. Louis Mayor Expresses Support For Eminent Domain Decision. ... 11
Maryland Gubernatorial Candidates Trade Shots Over Environmental Protection Policies. ... 11
Portland Said To Have Cut Emissions While Improving Its Economy. ... 11
Wisconsin Reservation Dealing With Gang Crime. ... 11

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Federal Agents Seize Human Growth Hormone In Denver. ... 12
Florida Drug Case Chilled US-Colombia Relations. ... 12
Gangs Moving Into Hampton Roads, VA, Area. ... 12
Reyna Says He Was Not Pressured To Resign As US Marshals Head. ... 13

Tax:
IRS Data Shows More Wealthy Americans Pay Little Or No Federal Taxes. ... 13

Congress-Administration:
Bush Reviewing Potential SCOTUS Nominees ... 13
Interest Groups Gear Up For Fight Over SCOTUS Nominee. ... 15
Specter Remains Noncommittal As He Prepares To Play Pivotal Role. ... 17
Supreme Court To Address Tough Issues In Next Term. ... 17
O'Connor Seen As Key Moderating Influence. ... 18
Amount Of Classified Government Documents Has Almost Doubled Since 2001. ... 18

Other News:
Rally For The Poor Held In Scotland. ... 19
Media Highlights Live 8 Concert. ... 20

American Businesses Have "Vested Interest"In China Success. 21
Abbas Attempts To Co-Opt Hamas. 21
Iranian Pres-Elect Refuses Interviews. 21

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington. 22

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 22

TERRORISM NEWS:

US-French Anti-Terrorism Cooperation Is Often Hid From Public View. NBC Nightly News (7/2, story 4, 3:00, Seigenthaler) reported, "Washington Post reporter and NBC news analyst Dana Priest is investigating worldwide terrorism. One facet she's uncovered in the current global battle is the extraordinary behind-the-scenes cooperation between the United States and France." Priest noted, "While some Americans protested by insisting oh freedom fries, diplomats say the French are among their most effective in tracking terrorists and have put 200 of its special forces under U.S. Command in Afghanistan." According to NBC, "Shortly after 9/11, the C.I.A. and French security services set up a counterterrorism clearinghouse somewhere in Paris. Its operations and its very existence remain a closely guarded secret even today. This is the senior French terrorism judge who's ordered the arrest of more than 500 suspected terrorists, inclusion six French citizens released from Guantanamo."

Adding more details to the report on US-French counterterrorism cooperation, the Washington Post (7/3, A1, Priest) in a front page story reports, "Funded largely by the CIA's Counterterrorist Center, Alliance Base analyzes the transnational movement of terrorist suspects and develops operations to catch or spy on them." The Post continues, "Alliance Base demonstrates how most counterterrorism operations actually take place: through secretive alliances between the CIA and other countries' intelligence services. This is not the work of large army formations, or even small special forces teams, but of handfuls of U.S. intelligence case officers working with handfuls of foreign operatives, often in tentative arrangements." Their efforts have been "responsible for identifying, tracking and capturing or killing the vast majority of committed jihadists who have been targeted outside Iraq and Afghanistan since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, according to terrorism experts."

DHS Official Seeks To Increase International Counterterrorism Cooperation. The Washington Times (7/3, Taylor) reports DHS director of international affairs Cresencio Arcos "says the United States must do more to spark action among its foreign allies in fighting the global war on terrorism in their own countries." He said, "We need to be more creative in how we engage our allies in the war on terror." The US "has made great progress working with Britain, Canada and Mexico -- the latter two making up about 60 percent of joint-U.S. homeland security efforts -- said Mr. Arcos." But DHS sources "say they are 'circumspect' about forming joint working groups with governments outside those three nations. 'We can't possibly have them with every country in the world,' one official said, on the condition of anonymity."

Subject Of CIA Italy Rendition Being Held In Egypt. The Houston Chronicle (7/3) reports, "Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, the man at the center of an international controversy over an alleged CIA abduction, is being held in Damanhour prison outside Alexandria though he has not been accused of a crime, according to his lawyer, Muntassir al-Zayyat, a Cairo attorney who defends many Islamists." In contrast to the public uproar in Italy, "in Egypt, where such renditions of wanted fugitives are relatively common, the dramatic seizure of Abu Omar in Milan drew little attention."

Columnist Questions Value Of Rendition Policy. Jim Hoagland in his column in the Washington Post (7/3, B7) writes, "America's spy agencies need more money, a sleeker bureaucratic structure, fluent Arabic speakers and a host of other reforms and gimmicks to protect the United States and its allies from harm. Add one more urgent need: a sense of proportion." In substance and style, the exposure of the 'extraordinary rendition' -- Bush-era legalese for kidnapping -- of a radical Egyptian cleric off a Milan street in 2003 reveals a crushing inability by higher-ups here to ask and answer sensibly this question: Is this covert act really worth the likely consequences?"

More Commentary. The Washington Post (7/3, B6) editorializes, "The practice of rendition began before the Bush administration, and in some cases it is a necessary tool in the fight against terrorism. … But renditions should be rare, and they should have clear rules and oversight. No terrorist suspect should be turned over to a government likely to use torture -- and Egypt, among other Middle Eastern countries, is a well-documented abuser. The CIA should not use illegal means to capture suspects in democratic countries with a strong rule of law, especially if they are allies of the United States. It may make it quicker or easier to get one extremist sheik off the street, but as the Italian case shows, the damage caused by such highhandedness is too great."

DOJ_NMG_0000822

Suspected Terrorist Obtained US Visa Easily. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Tempest) reports, "As Shabbir Ahmed sits in the county jail on immigration charges connected to an FBI terrorism investigation, federal officials are at a loss to explain how a man who publicly demonstrated his rage against the United States and advocated violence against the U.S.-backed regime in Pakistan could slip so easily through the State Department visa system." Despite media reports about his demonstrations against the US, in J2002 Ahmed "walked into the consular section of the heavily fortified U.S. Embassy compound, where he was granted an uncontested three-year 'religious worker' visa to the United States."

PATRIOT ACT:

New Jersey County Urges Patriot Act Revisions. The East Brunswick (NJ) Home News Tribune (7/3, Loyer) reports, "The Middlesex County (NJ) Human Relations Commission is joining the growing list of communities and legislators from around the country taking a stance against the USA Patriot Act." The Tribune continues, "The commission will issue a formal resolution to lawmakers, municipal governments and local organizations on Tuesday urging them to petition the executive level of the federal government to rescind or modify any law or executive order that diminishes protected civil rights. … 'We definitely want to protect our country, our neighbors and our homes, but there are potential dangers in such acts as the Patriot Act,' said commission Chairman Bruce S. Morgan. 'We take exception to any act or order that erodes the rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution and Bill of Rights.'" The Tribune adds, "According to the resolution, the act and several federal executive orders go beyond legitimate measures of protection against terrorism and lead to infringe on such rights as freedom of speech, religion, assembly and privacy, the right to counsel and due process in judicial proceedings, protection from unreasonable searches and seizure and equal protection under the law. … Morgan said he believes the act was passed by lawmakers because 'they were given so little time to review it and a lot of things may have been missed. We're hoping to get it tailored so it does not erode the rights guaranteed by the Constitution,' he said. … The Highland Park Borough Council passed a similar resolution in February 2004. The New Brunswick City Council adopted a similar resolution in May."

More Patriot Act Commentary. In a letter to the editor of the Lansing (MI) State Journal (7/3), Hagen W. Frank, an assistant U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids, writes, "On June 10 and 17, the LSJ ran editorials strongly criticizing the USA Patriot Act. While the articles demonstrated the LSJ's commitment to privacy rights in the face of purported infringements by the Patriot Act, they also demonstrated the editors' unfamiliarity with the constitutional and statutory law that governs federal law enforcement and intelligence investigations. … Both articles focused primarily on section 215 of the act, which expanded the types of materials that may be ordered produced by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (the 'FISA Court') in domestic intelligence investigations of foreign powers or international terrorism." Frank continues, "Described by critics as a provision that allows the FBI to go on fishing expeditions of citizens' reading habits - as if the FBI were looking for 'busy work' - the provision in fact simply gave the FISA Court the same authority in intelligence and international terrorism investigations to order production of materials that a prosecutor can obtain by grand jury subpoena in a domestic criminal investigation. …. According to the June 17 editorial, this is bad because the FISA Court is secret and because the government already had the power to get these materials by search warrant. Secrecy, however, is essential to the kinds of investigations overseen by the FISA Court, i.e., classified intelligence investigations into the activities of foreign powers, suspected agents of foreign powers and international terrorism." Frank adds, "Similarly, the June 10 editorial complains about the Senate Intelligence Committee's endorsement of a proposal to give the FBI administrative subpoena authority in terrorism investigations. According to the LSJ, this would empower the FBI to 'investigate citizens without judicial oversight.' This complaint assumes incorrectly that every government investigative tool requires judicial oversight. … However, whether judicial pre-approval is required depends upon how intrusive something is and on constitutional, statutory and regulatory provisions that the editorial ignores. Further, administrative subpoenas have long been used by a wide variety of federal agencies. … The FBI already has such authority in health care fraud and child sexual-exploitation investigations, and the proposed measure would simply expand that authority to terrorism investigations. … Every citizen and every media organization has the right to question and criticize government. However, the LSJ also has the responsibility not to mislead the public on important issues of the day."

The Washington Times (7/3), Senator Christopher 'Kit' Bond (R-MO) writes, "As July Fourth approaches, some Americans appear to suffer from amnesia. … With dramatic headlines such as 'Ripping Pages from the Book of Civil Liberties,' 'Patriot Act Fosters Secrecy, Government Abuse' and 'Keep Big Brother at Bay,' editorial writers and columnists unfairly criticize legislation that has helped keep America safe since September 11, 2001." Bond continues, "A few weeks ago, the U.S. House of Representatives rejected a proposal to make it easier for the FBI to obtain information on suspected terrorists that could help prevent a future attack. …

DOJ_NMG_0000823

What is going on here? … It appears some editorial writers and members of Congress have forgotten. And they are not alone. Fewer Americans -- only 35 percent -- now fear another terrorist attack in the near future than at any time since September 11, a recent USA Today/CNN/Gallup poll found. Despite their complacency, the threat of terrorism continues. … And surely there is no more important public purpose than keeping America safe from another catastrophic terrorist attack on U.S. soil. To do so, Congress should reauthorize the Patriot Act quickly and expand it to give law enforcement more tools to go after suspected terrorists and prevent attacks." Bond concludes, "The September 11 attacks showed the failure of a number of legal and regulatory policies that kept intelligence and law enforcement communities from talking to each other and sharing information on investigations of suspected terrorists."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Analysts Say Overhaul Of Intelligence System Could Take 10 Years. The Baltimore Sun (7/3, Gorman) reports, "Though the White House announced its intelligence overhaul Wednesday with promises that it would make the country safer, the changes it outlined could take a decade to complete, according to longtime intelligence analysts, including a member of the presidential commission that proposed the reforms. … 'The whole process will take five to 10 years,' said Adm. William O. Studeman, a member of the commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led the administration to conclude that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction." The Sun continues, "Studeman characterized that time frame as an optimistic estimate - one assuming that every part of the intelligence community endorses the changes. … The White House said it embraced 70 of 74 recommendations of the commission, led by U.S. Circuit Judge Laurence Silberman and former Sen. Charles S. Robb of Virginia. The most significant reform would be creation of a domestic intelligence service within the FBI." The Sun adds, "Other changes are aimed at slowing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, improving the quality of human intelligence and integrating the efforts of all 15 U.S. intelligence agencies. … But the future of the reforms is in doubt, as Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III have begun maneuvering to regain control over the design of the FBI's intelligence service, said an intelligence veteran responsible for helping the White House implement the plan. … The president set a 60-day deadline for having a detailed outline of the new domestic intelligence service. The Justice Department is arguing that the planning should begin immediately, while White House aides want to wait until the head of the service is appointed, the intelligence veteran said. … If the deadline is suspended until the White House appoints a chief of the domestic intelligence service, the FBI will lose considerable control over that service's shape."

Artists Express Support for New York Professor Under Federal Probe. The San Diego Union-Tribune (7/3, Pincus) reports, "Imagine this scenario: You are a well-established artist and respected university professor. You wake up one morning to find your spouse of 25 years isn't breathing. You call 911. Paramedics arrive, accompanied by police. … There are a few petri dishes in the house, because your conceptually oriented work involves scientific-style installations and issues. So, one of those workers decides you just might be a terrorist and calls the FBI." The Union-Tribune continues, "The next day, as you are on the way to the funeral home, you are detained by the FBI and the Joint Terrorist Task Force. You are held for 22 hours without having your Miranda rights read to you. Your home and even part of your block is cordoned off; your computer, books, manuscripts and anything else deemed suspicious are confiscated by workers in hazmat suits. Even your spouse's body is held for further analysis. … Sound like the outline of a compelling novel or film about governmental abuse of power? Sure. But this story isn't imaginary. It is what University of Buffalo professor Steven Kurtz, a member of the artists' collaborative called Critical Art Ensemble (CAE), experienced in May 2004 when someone who answered his 911 call decided to make a call to the FBI." The Union-Tribune adds, "This tale doesn't end there; Kurtz is now facing charges that could result in a 20-year prison sentence. … Artists across the United States and beyond have taken up Kurtz's cause, because they feel it is their cause, too. Following an earlier fundraiser in London, an auction to raise money for his defense was held at the esteemed Paula Cooper Gallery in New York in April. … While there apparently wasn't enough evidence to bring bioterrorist charges, the government is pursuing wire and mail fraud charges against Kurtz and Robert Ferrell, a former head of the Department of Genetics at the University of Pittsburgh's School of Public Health. … 'These laws (on fraud) have been on the books for more than a century. Whether it (the bacteria) is or isn't harmful isn't an element of the offense. The case centers on property acquired by fraud or misstatement,' said U.S. Assistant District Attorney William Hochul on Thursday. He's the prosecutor on the case, which is being tried in New York."

Minutemen Plan New Patrols For Fall. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Gold) reports, "As the second act to its civilian border patrol in Arizona, the organization known as the Minutemen has pledged to launch a massive patrol of the entire U.S.-Mexico border this fall." They "are holding community meetings throughout the South and Southwest to marshal thousands of volunteers. Leaders hope to amass in October to try to block illegal immigration routes in four states." Yet, "the organization is finding that such an ambitious plan will not come together as easily as the April patrol in Arizona that covered 23 miles of the border. That is particularly true in Texas, which has 1,254 miles of the 2,000-mile border." That is because "most of the land along the border in Texas is privately owned, except for the Big Bend region in the western tip of the state."

DOJ_NMG_0000824

Fighter Jets Force Small Plane To Land After Violating Airspace. The AP (7/3) reports, "A small plane entered restricted air space in the Washington area before two fighter jets forced it to land at an airport here, authorities said." The AP adds, "Two F-16 fighter jets were deployed and they forced the small plane to land at Frederick Municipal Airport. Officials were questioning a man and a woman Saturday, according to the News-Post. There were no arrests."

Independence Day Crowds Will Participate In Emergency Response Training. The Washington Post (7/3, C1, Markon) reports, "The first test of Washington's downtown emergency evacuation plan is expected to clear the Mall of most Fourth of July revelers tomorrow and speed them on their way within an hour, officials said yesterday." The Post adds, "The plan, which calls for police to direct the hundreds of thousands of pedestrians and motorists to seven evacuation routes, where green and red traffic signals will run longer, was developed two years ago in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. City officials have tried to publicize it, even painting special signs on streets along the routes directing drivers to the Capital Beltway, but they acknowledged that a major test is needed to tell people how they should flee if terrorists were to strike the city."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Ties War On Terror To Fourth Of July Celebration. The AP (7/3) reports, "President Bush paid tribute to America's military forces Saturday, saying that Independence Day is an occasion for the nation to express thanks by flying the flag, sending letters to troops and reaching out to their families. 'At posts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and around the world, our men and women in uniform are taking the fight to the terrorists overseas, so that we do not have to face the terrorists here at home,' Bush said in his weekly radio address. He said U.S. forces have freed millions of people from oppression, in keeping with the principle of the Declaration of Independence 'that all are created equal and all are meant to be free."

Bush Seen As Unable To Inspire Insecurity As Easily As He Could After 9/11. The New York Times' Frank Rich (7/3) writes "As we saw on Tuesday night, doomsday isn't the surefire hit it used to be for Mr. Bush. Now that the rhetorical arsenal of W.M.D.'s and mushroom clouds is bare, he had little choice but to bring back that oldie but goodie, 9/11, as the specter of the doom that awaits us if we don't stay the course - his course - in Iraq. By the fifth time he did so, it was hard not to think of that legendary National Lampoon cover: 'If you don't buy this magazine, we'll kill this dog.'"

US Said To Have Failed To Promote Democracy Effectively In The Past. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (7/3, B4) Richard Kohn, former chief of history for the U.S. Air Force, writes, "Contrary to the rosy picture of our past so prevalent in Washington today, this country possesses a rich and often troubled history of intervention and nation building, and even empire. We succeeded in building democracy at home but largely failed in planting it abroad, which ought to make all of us, the president included, wary of so vague a goal in Iraq, and exceedingly careful in crafting a strategy to set that country on the road to stability and independence."

President Bush's Radio Address Receives Light Local Television Coverage. President Bush's radio address, in which he praised American troops and their families, received extremely light local television coverage. The President was quoted by one station as having said, "The burden of war falls especially hard on military families and I thank them for their support they give our troops in their vital work." Senator Patty Murray issued the Democratic response, saying that Independence Day is also a good time for President Bush to "give us the facts about the war and lay out a plan."

Some examples: WGCL-TV Atlanta (7/2, 11:09PM) reported that "President Bush says Independence Day is a time for the nation to express thanks to the military. During the weekly radio address Bush asked all Americans to show their gratitude by flying the flag, sending letters to troops, and reaching out to families. 'Those who serve are taking their rightful place among the greatest generations that have worn our nation's uniform. The burden of war falls especially hard on military families and I thank them for their support they give our troops in their vital work.'"

WCCB-TV Charlotte (7/2, 10:12PM) said that "Bush compared the current military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan to the American battles of the 19th and 20th centuries. The President also urged Americans to use the holiday as an opportunity to reach out to military families." Meanwhile, "Democratic senator Patty Murray also looked to veterans as an example of how the Bush administration has failed. She pointed out budget shortfalls for the Veterans Administration. Senator Murray says President Bush needs to give Americans the facts and lay out a plan for Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0000825

KHWB-TV Houston (7/2, 9:03PM) reported, "President Bush uses his weekly radio address to say the best way to celebrate Independence Day is to give thanks to American troops. 'At posts in Afghanistan and Iraq and around the world, our men and women in uniform are taking the fight to the terrorists overseas so that we do not have to face the terrorists here at home.' Democrats responded by saying Independence Day is also a good time for President Bush to, quote, 'give us the facts about the war and lay out a plan.' They accuse the President of failing veterans."

Democrats Contend Administration Has Underfunded Veterans Affairs. The AP (7/3) reports that in the weekly Democratic radio address Sen. Patty Murray "said President Bush's recent denials concerning the financial straits of the Veterans Affairs Department represented another administration failure to level with Americans about the costs of the Iraq war." Murray and other Democrats "had long questioned whether the department would have enough money to pay medical costs for veterans returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. The administration repeatedly denied it, but the VA acknowledged last week it was short at least $1 billion this year. On Wednesday, the Senate voted 96-0 to spend an extra $1.5 billion to cover the politically sensitive shortfall. 'We're still working to find out the exact size of the shortfall, but one thing is clear: It results from either deliberate misdirection or gross incompetence,' Murray said."

Hagel Says He Hopes US Doesn't Repeat Mistakes Made During Vietnam Era. In an interview with the New York Times Magazine's Deborah Solomon (7/3) Sen. Chuck Hagel says, "If someone says I am a disloyal Republican because I am not supporting my party, let them say it. War is bigger than politics." When it is noted that Hagel and John Kerry "are the only current U.S. senators who served in Vietnam," Hagel comments, "I got to Vietnam in December of 1967, and I was wounded twice with my brother Tom, who was with me. I still have some shrapnel in my chest that the doctors never took out. The second time my face was burned pretty bad, and I had both eardrums blown out." Asked to compare "the situation in Iraq with the one in Vietnam," Hagel replies, "Congress was absent during the Vietnam War, and they didn't ask the tough questions, and consequently we lost 58,000 Americans and lost a war and humiliated this nation. It took a generation to get over it. As long as I am here as a U.S. senator, I am going to do whatever I can to make sure that isn't going to happen."

Suicide Bombings Targeting Iraqi Police Kill At Least Twenty. The New York Times (7/3, Wong) reports, "Three suicide bombers blew themselves up on Saturday in two separate attacks aimed at Iraqi security forces, killing at least 20 people and wounding at least 59, police officials said. The first explosion took place at a recruiting center in western Baghdad. The blast killed at least 12 people and wounded at least 23. Those killed were all men trying to get jobs with the security forces, said Maj. Gen. Rasheed Flayeh, the commander of the Interior Ministry's commando units. … The second attack took place at 10 p.m. at a restaurant beside the police commando headquarters in the town of Hilla, south of Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. Two suicide bombers detonated their explosives, killing at least eight police officers and wounding at least 36 others."

Bombings Disrupt Relatively Calm Week In Iraq. CBS Evening News (7/2, story 4, :10, Mitchell) reported, "In the battle for Iraq, rebel attacks around Baghdad shattered six days of relative calm. A suicide bomber killed at least 16 Iraqis at a police recruiting center. Another bomb killed six people at a checkpoint. Millions of Baghdad residents are scrounging for water in 100- degree heat after a rebel attack disabled water works."

ABC's World News Tonight (7/2, story 2, 0:10, Moran) reported, "Now we turn to Iraq. The attack in Baghdad hurt more than 20 others, and killed 17. It was more than several assaults that killed more than 30 Iraqis today."

The Washington Post (7/3, A15, Mosher, Nouri) reports, "Over the course of a nearly two-year-old insurgency in which assaults on Iraqi and U.S. security forces have been frequent, attackers repeatedly have targeted places where men stand in line to apply for jobs with the police and Iraqi army. Because would-be recruits typically are made to wait outside fortified bases and recruiting centers, they have proved to be easy targets for often-deadly bombings."

Several Other Iraqis Killed In Incidents Across The Country. The Los Angeles Times/AP (7/3) reports, "In other violence Saturday, three Iraqi soldiers were killed in a roadside bombing northeast of Baghdad, their commander said. Gunmen also assassinated a police lieutenant colonel in the northern city of Mosul, officials said. Two other people were killed when a bomb hidden in a vegetable cart exploded Saturday in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad. … Also Saturday, a policeman and a female relative traveling in a civilian car were killed in a drive-by shooting in the northern city of Kirkuk, authorities said."

Columnist Urges Rumsfeld To Provide Congress With Overview Of Security Situation In Iraq. The Washington Post's David Broder (7/3) writes, "President Bush is facing an early legal deadline to deliver what he has been most resistant to providing: a set of specific benchmarks for measuring progress toward military and political stability in Iraq. Under a little-noticed provision of the defense spending bill passed by Congress in May, Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld has until July 11 to send Capitol Hill a 'comprehensive set of performance indicators and measures of stability and security' two years after the fall of Saddam Hussein. … If and when it comes in, it could do much more than the president's Tuesday night speech at Fort Bragg to provide a factual basis for judging how close we may be to reaching our goals in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0000826

Shiites Protest US Overtures To Sunni Insurgents. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Mcdonnell) reports, "It didn't take long for fresh reports of U.S. talks with Sunni Arab insurgents to stir cries of an impending sellout. … A senior U.S. official here sought to provide damage control. There was no intent, he declared, to undermine the fledgling Shiite-run government, which meets behind U.S.-fortified blast walls." The Times continues, "The exchange underscored the fragility of the political compromise that the Bush administration is seeking to facilitate in Iraq, even as the complementary military strategy — turning more and more responsibility over to fledgling Iraqi forces — has yet to prove a success. … Reports of U.S. overtures to the Sunni Arab-driven insurgency immediately sparked a backlash last week among the long-repressed Shiite majority. Much hinges on a two-part premise. First, that disaffected Sunni Arabs can be brought into the political process, and second, that participating Sunni representatives can sway militants, who have denounced the government, to put down their arms."

The Los Angeles Times (7/3) Larry Diamond, senior fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes, "if the United States is to avoid defeat in Iraq, Bush must recognize what our military leaders have repeated for more than a year: There is no purely military solution to the insurgency. It will only be extinguished by a combination of military might, good intelligence, reliable policing and — crucially — effective politics. … The administration deserves credit for drawing Sunnis into the political process, but it must do more to incorporate them politically into the new Iraq, the second element of a winning political strategy. It has done too little to address their nationalist anxiety."

Shiite Town Ravaged By Hussein Looks Forward To His Trial. The New York Times (7/3, Burns) reports, "Officials at the Iraqi Special Tribunal set up to try [Saddam Hussein] and his top aides have said they expect to put him on trial by the end of the year in the deaths of nearly 160 men and boys from Dujail, all Shiites, some in their early teens. Some were shot dead in the immediate aftermath of [an] assassination attempt, but 143 - 9 of them ages 13 through 15 - were executed three years later by Mr. Hussein's revolutionary court. Townspeople say that many others remain missing - at least 200, by some counts - and that they hope the trial will reveal at least something of their fate."

US Suffers Worst Week In Afghanistan Since 2001. CBS Evening News (7/2, story 5, 2:00, Mitchell) reported, "In his weekly radio address, President Bush said the best way to honor Americans killed in the war is 'to complete the mission.' The bodies of sixteen U.S. commandos killed in this week's helicopter crash in Afghanistan were flown home this weekend. But the commando unit they were sent to rescue is still missing in the escalating afghan violence." CBS' Randall Pinkston continues, "This has been the deadliest week for U.S. Troops in Afghanistan since the overthrow of the Taliban regime and their al Qaeda allies in 2001. With the missing unit, the death toll could go higher. Tuesday's rocket- propelled grenade attack brought down a Chinook helicopter. The deaths of eight navy seals and eight army special forces service members sent to aid the missing unit were a deadly reminder for the U.S. And today, a flare-up in the south east. A United Nations official reported a bomb attack on a 25- vehicle convoy of U.S. and U.N. Troops in Paktika province. No American injuries, but four Afghan troops were killed."

ABC's World News Tonight (7/2, story 3, 2:00, Moran) reported, "In Afghanistan, the U.S. military has launched fresh attacks on suspected Taliban fighters as the search for a missing team of elite American commandos intensifies." ABC's John Yang continues, "That team of commandos has been missing for five days. today, the military said they're using every available resource to search for them. In the rugged mountains of remote eastern Afghanistan, U.S. warplanes use precision-guided bombs to hit a suspected Taliban compound, near where the elite unit went missing. Fewer than ten lightly armed commandos hunting insurgent fighters. Today, U.S. officials said there's no evidence to support Taliban claims that they captured some of them."

US Aircraft Target Compound Near Where Soldiers Went Missing. The Washington Post (7/3, A21, Aizenman) reports, "U.S. aircraft bombarded a suspected insurgent compound in a mountainous area of northeastern Afghanistan where a military team has been missing since Tuesday, military officials said Saturday. A purported spokesman for the ousted Islamic Taliban militia called news organizations and claimed that 25 civilians had died in the airstrike on the compound in Konar province, a rugged region near the Pakistani border. Lt. Col. Jerry O'Hara, a U.S. military spokesman, said American troops were still assessing the impact of the Friday night bombing. … The purported Taliban spokesman, Abdul Latif Hakimi, told news agencies by telephone Friday that Taliban fighters had captured one of the missing men and killed seven of them. But U.S. military officials have said there was no evidence to support the claim.

Taliban Claims To Have Captured One American. The Washington Times/AP (7/3, Cooney) reports Hakimi

DOJ_NMG_0000827

claimed Friday that militants had captured one of the men and said he was a 'high-ranking American' caught in the same area as where the helicopter went down. He reiterated the claim yesterday in a phone call with the Associated Press. 'The soldier is being held in Kunar. Taliban leaders will decide what to do with him,' Mr. Hakimi said. 'He is being kept in a home. His health is all right.' When asked to provide evidence that the soldier was in captivity, he said, 'Tomorrow we will give proof.'" The AP adds, "Hakimi, who also claimed insurgents shot down the helicopter, often calls news organizations to take responsibility for attacks, and the information frequently proves exaggerated or untrue. His exact tie to the Taliban leadership is not clear."

The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Kazem) reports, "Hundreds of U.S. and Afghan forces have since been scouring the area's deep ravines in the hope of finding the special reconnaissance team, which has been out of contact for several days. … 'There is a good chance that the soldiers are being held hostage by the rebel fighters,' said Gov. Asadullah Wafa of Kunar."

US Releases 57 Held At Bagram For Months Or Years Without Being Charged. The Washington Post (7/3, A21, Aizenman) reports, "In Kabul, U.S. military officials released 57 Afghans who had been held at a detention facility at Bagram air base for many months on suspicion of being armed Muslim extremists. They were taken to the office of a government program that reintegrates former Taliban members and released to the custody of tribal elders. … In May, President Hamid Karzai called for all Afghan prisoners to be turned over to Afghan government custody in the wake of reports of past abuse by U.S. guards at Bagram and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Several of the released men complained bitterly of being detained for several years without charge.

Attack On UN Convoy Kills Six Afghans. The Washington Post (7/3, A21, Aizenman) reports, "on Saturday, guerrilla fighters in eastern Paktika province detonated a roadside bomb under a passing convoy of more than 20 vehicles carrying officials from the United Nations as well as Afghan leaders and security forces. The attack killed as many as six Afghan policemen and soldiers, and wounded at least two others, including a local police chief, according to news services and the U.N. spokesman here, Adrian Edwards.

Wounded Soldiers Provided With Trip To Gettysburg. The Washington Post (7/3, C6, Ruane) reports on three wounded soldiers from Walter reed who visited A weekend reenactment at Gettysburg. The n outing was "hosted by a soldiers support agency called Operation Second Chance Inc."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Kinsley Examines Scrushy Acquittal. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, B7), Michael Kinsley writes, "God works in mysterious ways, but his or her decision to acquit Richard Scrushy, former CEO of HealthSouth Corp., on all charges of financial fraud is especially inscrutable. Five consecutive HealthSouth chief financial officers admitted to cooking the books and copped a plea. They all fingered Scrushy. But jurors chose to believe that the man on top knew nothing about what was going on directly below him." Kinsley continues, "That kind of ignorance doesn't come cheap. No one denies there was massive fraud at HealthSouth. The government estimates that Scrushy made almost $300 million from the alleged fraud, and he'll get to keep it minus lawyer's fees. Other prominent business defendants have tried the ignorance defense but found that juries tend to think that the more you're paid, the more you ought to know about what's going on around you. Bernard Ebbers of Worldcom Corp., apparently the most convincing of the recent CEO ignoramus wannabes, is facing prosecutors' request for a life sentence." Kinsley adds, "Experts say the Scrushy prosecution should have been a slam-dunk. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial page seemed amazed that he got off. The Journal approved, of course, but couldn't really explain why. Meanwhile, jurors quoted in the papers said they were bothered by things like the lack of Scrushy fingerprints on copies of the crucial documents. … Only one word can describe Scrushy's acquittal. It is a miracle. … When Scrushy was indicted, he hired God. Less inspired defendants might have settled for the late Johnnie Cochran or Jack Abramoff. Scrushy, though, went straight to the top. … He left his suburban evangelical church and joined a predominantly black congregation in a blue-collar neighborhood. He bought a half-hour of local TV for a morning prayer show featuring himself and his wife, and frequent guest spots by black ministers. He had a prayer group praying for him every day at the trial. All this was in Birmingham, Ala., where HealthSouth was located and where the trial occurred."

CRIMINAL LAW:

White House Reportedly Concerned That Fitzgerald Is Focusing On Rove. Newsweek (7/3, Isikoff) reports that Time's Matthew Cooper's e-mails and computer notes turned over to special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald investigating the leak of CIA agent Valerie "show that one of Cooper's sources was White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, according to two lawyers who asked not to be identified because they are representing witnesses sympathetic to the White House. Cooper and a Time spokeswoman declined to comment. But in an interview with NEWSWEEK, Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, confirmed that Rove had been interviewed by Cooper for the article. It is unclear, however, what passed between Cooper and Rove. … According to Luskin…Rove spoke to Cooper three or four days before Novak's column appeared. Luskin told NEWSWEEK that Rove 'never knowingly disclosed classified information' and that 'he did not tell any reporter that Valerie Plame worked for the CIA.' Luskin declined, however, to discuss any other details." Newsweek adds that one of the two lawyers representing a witness sympathetic to the White House "told NEWSWEEK that there was growing 'concern' in the White House that the prosecutor is interested in Rove."

DOJ_NMG_0000828

Attorney Says Rove Never Revealed Secrets To Cooper. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Schmitt) reports, "In confirming the conversation between Rove and Cooper, Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, emphasized that the presidential advisor did not reveal any secrets. But the disclosure raised new questions about Rove and the precise role of the White House in the apparent national security breach." Rove "testified before a grand jury investigating the Plame case on three occasions. His latest appearance was in October 2004, about the same time the prosecutor investigating the case said his probe was complete with the exception of testimony from Cooper and Miller." Luskin "said Rove had been assured by prosecutors that he was not a target of the investigation. 'We were advised recently that his status has not changed,' he added.

The Washington Post (7/3, A7, Leonnig) reports Luskin said, "Karl did nothing wrong. Karl didn't disclose Valerie Plame's identity to Mr. Cooper or anybody else." Luskin "said the question remains unanswered: 'Who outed this woman? It wasn't Karl.'"

Journalists See Growing Threat Of Reporters Being Subpoenaed. The New York Times (7/3, Seelye) reports, "Lawyers for the news media say that the legal climate for those seeking to protect confidential sources is turning chillier, with more subpoenas being issued to reporters. There is no database that tracks such subpoenas, and some prosecutors dispute that they are on the rise. But a series of high-profile cases involving confidential sources has the news media on edge. … 'It does feel like open season,' said Laura Handman, a First Amendment lawyer based in Washington. 'There are more instances of courts ordering confidential sources to be disclosed,' she said, adding that she believed the Bush administration's emphasis on secrecy was partly to blame. 'This leads to more leak inquiries, which, in turn, leads to more subpoenas.'" The Times adds, "In the last year, more than two dozen reporters across the country have been subpoenaed or questioned about their confidential sources in cases before federal courts, according to the Newspaper Association of America. Paul J. Boyle, senior vice president of the association, said he believed that 'the filing of subpoenas, as well as the letters and phone calls that media companies receive from prosecutors and civil litigants, is on the rise.'"

Cunningham Foregoes Public Appearances After Returning To District. The AP (7/3, Hettena) reports Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham "whose dealings with a defense contractor are under investigation was taking a 'personal day' Saturday and not commenting on federal authorities' searches a day earlier of his home and a yacht where he stayed while in Washington, a spokesman said." Cunningham "didn't plan a public appearance until a Monday pancake breakfast in Encinitas. … Cunningham's attorney, K. Lee Blalack, released a statement saying he told the government Thursday the congressman would cooperate with the investigation."

St Louis Public Defender Rules To Change. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/3, Patrick) reports, "The St. Louis public defender's office - the last legal hope for those too poor to afford their own lawyer - will, for the first time in at least 20 years, refuse to represent certain people in court starting Tuesday, state officials said last week." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Those people are on the misdemeanor confined docket, which means they've been arrested on misdemeanor charges, or are named on the assessed docket because they've been arrested for failing to pay fines or court costs." The Post-Dispatch adds, "State and local representatives of the public defender's office say they're making the move because it's unethical and unprofessional to try to represent defendants with only minutes to familiarize themselves with the cases. … J. Marty Robinson, director of the Missouri State Public Defender system, calls it "meet 'em and greet 'em and plead 'em." … 'I'm just flabbergasted that there are people that think this is OK,' he said. … Robinson said many people were probably misled into thinking they had a lawyer, but public defenders were simply 'filling out the court's paperwork.' … Public defenders also say that under recently revised state laws, guilty pleas to two of certain misdemeanors can lead to a felony charge and serious prison time for the third offense, along the lines of state three-strikes laws. That could mean defendants who plead guilty to minor crimes to stay out of jail are unknowingly increasing their chance of greater future penalties."

California Weighs Bullet Marking Proposals. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Rau) reports, "With a zealot's enthusiasm, Randy Rossi has been firing bullets into lots of things lately. Car doors, Sheetrock, wood walls, gelatin with the consistency of human bodies. … On the base of each mashed slug is a series of tiny, mostly legible numbers that have been inscribed by a laser. To Rossi, head of Atty. Gen.

DOJ_NMG_0000829

Bill Lockyer's firearm division, these markings represent a solution for one of law enforcement's most trying problems: the anonymity of ammunition." The Times continues, "With 45% of the state's homicides unsolved in 2003, the most recent data available, the California Legislature is moving ahead with two potentially landmark measures that would require that identifying marks be embedded on projectiles from guns. … One proposal would have all bullets sold in the state marked during manufacture with codes. The other would mandate that guns be equipped with stamping mechanisms that would hammer telling marks onto every cartridge fired. That could allow investigators to link the cartridge to the gun's purchaser even if they could not find the firearm." The Times adds, "The approaches depart from law enforcement tactics elsewhere in the country, which have focused on creating computer registries of fired bullets. Those allow for investigators to match projectiles from different crimes, linking ones committed with the same weapon. … The issue of marking ammunition has become the most contested law enforcement topic in Sacramento this year. One of the bills has split California's law enforcement community and infuriated the nation's ammunition manufacturers, weapons sellers and firearms enthusiasts, including the National Rifle Assn. Several police groups in California are also opposed. … The hyperbolic debate has even ricocheted into Congress. In April, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Committee on Armed Services, warned Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger that requiring serial numbers on ammunition would increase the cost of bullets so much that the military would scale back target practice. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, also a Republican, is also against the proposal, which he said would hurt manufacturers in his state."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Human Smuggling Investigation Focused On "Jung Organization". The Washington Times (7/3, Seper) reports on last week's raid "that targeted a sophisticated human-smuggling operation" in California. US Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman Dean Boyd "said the investigation focused on a criminal organization called the 'Jung Organization,' which reportedly smuggled South Korean women into the United States and then provided them to brothel operators. The brothels were concealed behind businesses that purported to be massage parlors and 'out-call service' operations. He said the prostitutes were managed by an underground network of Korean 'taxi' services operated by members and associates of the Jung Organization."

California AG Asks For Review Of Decision On Same-Sex Marriages. The Washington Times/AP (7/3) reports California attorney general Bill Lockyer "urged the state Supreme Court to decide whether homosexual 'marriage' is permitted under the state constitution." Lockyer "asked the justices to review a trial judge's decision in March that said state laws limiting marriage to heterosexual couples is unconstitutional. The ruling had been stayed pending appeal. The attorney general, however, wants California's top court to remove the pending case from a San Francisco appellate court."

California Redistricting Proposal Compared With DeLay-Engineered Campaign In Texas. The Dallas Morning News (7/3, Becker) reports, "Amid recent polls showing Arnold Schwarzenegger's star power dropping from the top of California's political marquee, the governor's push to redraw congressional and legislative district lines mid-decade isn't looking like this summer's Republican blockbuster. It's a very different scenario from the redistricting deal that House Majority Leader Tom DeLay…orchestrated in Texas two years ago. … What exactly Mr. Schwarzenegger seeks from redistricting reform isn't clear, pundits say. While it could help Republicans acquire congressional seats in the long term, the initiative hasn't brought wide party support."

Interest Groups Prepare For California's Special Election. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Barabak) reports, "California's special election is drawing money and attention from interest groups and political partisans across the country who see the campaign as a way to invigorate their efforts in 2006 and beyond. … Conservative activists see an opportunity to defang a longtime nemesis — organized labor — by making it harder to collect union dues for political purposes. Eight initiatives have qualified for the statewide ballot, which will bring voters to the polls for the fourth time in as many years. The measures deal with a variety of issues, including parental consent for abortions, teacher tenure and electricity re-regulation, as well as union dues, redistricting, prescription drugs and the state budget." Schwarzenegger "has embraced three of the measures as part of a package designed to circumvent the Democrat-run Legislature and diminish the clout of lawmakers in Sacramento. Those measures would lengthen the time teachers work before receiving tenure, give the governor greater control over state spending and give legislators' political line-drawing power to a panel of retired judges."

Romney Urged To Speak More Clearly On Abortion. The Boston Globe (7/3, Ebbert) reports, "Advocates on both sides of the abortion debate say they are confused over Governor Mitt Romney's position on abortion and are seeking to understand the meaning of recent comments he has made, in light of the positions he outlined during the 2002 gubernatorial campaign. Last week, the Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts and NARAL Pro-Choice Massachusetts provided the Globe a copy of a letter sent earlier this month in which they asked Romney to explain his current abortion philosophy and to confirm that he supports emergency contraception and other measures he embraced while running for governor. Similarly, a leading antiabortion group is puzzled: "We honestly don't know where he stands on this issue,' said Marie Sturgis, executive director and legislative director for Massachusetts Citizens for Life."

DOJ_NMG_0000830

Frist Accused Of Changing His Position On Stem Cell Research. The Washington Post (7/3, A5, Connolly) reports Sen. Bill Frist "is again at the center of the stem cell battle. Unlike four years ago, when he sought an influential role, the Senate majority leader has shied away from the issue, frustrating once-admiring researchers and patient advocates who now accuse him of exchanging sound medical thinking for with political calculations." According to the Post, the House passage of stem cell research legislation succeeded in "placing additional pressure on Frist to stand by a policy that falls far short of the approach he envisioned four years ago. … But if Frist is maneuvering to attract Republican primary voters in pursuit of the 2008 presidential nomination, he is doing so at the risk of angering loyal Tennessee supporters." The Post notes, "Over a period of three days, Frist aides did not respond to multiple interview requests."

Gordon Looks To Repair NAACP's Relationship With Bush. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (7/3, Sykes, Thomas-Lynn) reports, "With Bruce S. Gordon's stellar background in corporate America, his installation as executive director of the NAACP at its 96th annual convention in Milwaukee could herald a new beginning for the venerable civil rights organization's relationship with the Bush administration. … Gordon already has indicated he wants to improve the NAACP's relationship with the Bush administration, a radical departure for a group known for its criticism of the president. But in doing so, the 59-year-old retired Verizon Communications executive may run the risk of pitting himself against some members who supported the NAACP's confrontational style with President Bush. Delegates will get a chance to witness Gordon's style for the first time, as well as hear an array of speakers from across the political and religious spectrum." Sen. Barack Obama, the Rev. Jesse Jackson and former NAACP chief Benjamin Hooks" are among the scheduled speakers."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

St. Louis Mayor Expresses Support For Eminent Domain Decision. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/3) reports, "In Kelo vs. New London, Conn., the Supreme Court ruled that the city could not take land simply to confer a private benefit on a particular private property. However, the decision said the taking would be executed based on a carefully considered development plan, which would have a public benefit. The decision pleased Mayor Francis Slay. 'It's very difficult rebuilding an older city with the environmental issues and with the issues of assembling sites for redevelopment to help improve the quality of life for people in our neighborhoods,' Slay said."

Maryland Gubernatorial Candidates Trade Shots Over Environmental Protection Policies. The Washington Post (7/3, C4, Wagner) reports, "Debate in the run-up to Maryland's race for governor was dominated last week by talk about the environment. Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley , a Democratic hopeful, sought to spotlight his record in a sprawling address that included heavy criticism of Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. 's environmental stewardship." O'Malley "accused Ehrlich of lacking commitment to preserving parkland, improving water quality and protecting children from lead paint, among other shortcomings. … Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan , another Democrat interested in being governor, moved aggressively to insert himself into the debate by questioning O'Malley's record."

Portland Said To Have Cut Emissions While Improving Its Economy. The New York Times Nicholas Kristof (7/3) writes, "Newly released data show that Portland, America's environmental laboratory, has achieved stunning reductions in carbon emissions. It has reduced emissions below the levels of 1990, the benchmark for the Kyoto accord, while booming economically. What's more, officials in Portland insist that the campaign to cut carbon emissions has entailed no significant economic price, and on the contrary has brought the city huge benefits: less tax money spent on energy, more convenient transportation, a greener city, and expertise in energy efficiency that is helping local businesses win contracts worldwide."

Wisconsin Reservation Dealing With Gang Crime. The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (7/3, Zielinski) reports from Hayward, WI, where "23-year-old Cody Badbear Wade was shot five times, once in the head. Police searched a nearby cranberry marsh for the murder weapon. … A police report said Wade had proclaimed himself a 'King killer,' but it turned out differently the night of May 30, 2002. … After trading harsh words with Wade at the Snowshoe Bar, Robert G. 'Bobby' Smith, an avowed member of the Almighty Latin King Nation, the violent Hispanic street gang with a significant presence in Milwaukee, would ambush and kill Wade after he approached a clearing in his truck." The Sentinel continues, "Smith, the son of a former Sawyer County sheriff's deputy, told investigators that one of the admitted leaders of the Latin Kings on the Lac Courte Oreilles Indian reservation, Charles Gokey, ordered members to "light up" on Wade. Smith later was sentenced to 13 years in prison for Wade's murder. … Earlier this year, Gokey, in turn, was sentenced in a federal court in Madison to almost 20 years for crack cocaine distribution. U.S. District Judge John C. Shabaz said the harsh punishment was meant 'to assist the government's mission to substantially reduce the impact of drug and drug-related crime on the Lac Courte Oreilles reservation.' … The two were part of more than 50 prosecutions and a continuing multi-headed investigation that were set in motion by the events in the pine plantation in an attempt to rid the reservation of the Latin Kings."

DOJ_NMG_0000831

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Federal Agents Seize Human Growth Hormone In Denver. The Denver Post (7/3, Caldwell, Briggs) reports, "Agents with the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the Postal Inspection Service are investigating a shipment of human growth hormone worth up to $400,000 to the home of a Denver substance-abuse counselor, records show." The Post continues, "Authorities in March seized 400 vials of Chinese hGH and are investigating clinic owner Tamea Rae Sisco and two people involved in a Hawaiian osteopathic center on suspicion that they illegally imported the drugs for use in anti-aging treatments, according to a federal search- warrant affidavit and federal sources." The Post adds, 'Sisco denies any wrongdoing and said she was an intermediary for a legitimate shipment. No charges have been brought as a result of the raid. … While the national debate on performance-enhancing drugs swirls around sports superstars, federal agents are waging a local battle away from the limelight. They're intercepting hGH doses meant for everyday people who are hoping to look younger and leaner. It's all part of a surging anti-aging phenomenon in which hGH is king. … Law enforcement officials step in when hGH is illegally pitched as a youth elixir. HGH can be legally prescribed only under narrow circumstances, including the treatment of AIDS wasting disease. HGH also is obtained illegally by some athletes seeking to build muscle and cut fat. … 'I can't comment on ongoing investigations, but I can state that there is a problem in general,' said Jeff Dorschner, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Colorado. 'The illegal trafficking of human growth hormones remains a concern of the Justice Department.'"

Florida Drug Case Chilled US-Colombia Relations. The Tampa Tribune (7/3) reports, "U.S. relations with Colombia were briefly strained in March because of a federal prosecutor's court filing in Tampa in the case of an alleged leader of the Cali drug cartel." The Tribune continues, "Colombian officials even threatened to halt all extraditions to the United States, but U.S. officials retracted the court filing, averting a crisis." The Tribune adds, "The flare-up exposed a nerve in Colombia and highlighted the troubled, violent and corrupt recent history of efforts to stem the country's illegal drug exports. … The controversy involved a Colombian Constitution provision that allows extraditions, but only for crimes committed after Dec. 17, 1997, when the constitutional amendment, Article 35, was enacted. … A defense attorney for Joaquin Mario Valencia-Trujillo filed a motion to enforce that restriction and strike from Valencia's indictment charges that preceded the 1997 constitutional amendment. … Federal investigators say Valencia was a politically connected, if little noticed, leader in the notorious drug cartel as far back as 1988. He is the biggest catch in 'Operation Panama Express,' a wide-ranging, long-term investigation, based in Tampa, of Colombian maritime drug traffickers. … Part of a 2002 indictment against Valencia alleges a conspiracy to use drug money to 'make payments to influence political and judicial decisions in Colombia, the United States and elsewhere.' … Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph K. Ruddy filed a response to the defense motion alleging that Article 35 is part of the conspiracy mentioned in Valencia's indictment. 'It represents the product of the successful bribery of then-Colombian President Ernesto Samper and the Colombian Congress by the Cali cartel to immunize them from extradition to the United States,' Ruddy wrote."

Gangs Moving Into Hampton Roads, VA, Area. The Norfolk (VA) Virginian-Pilot (7/3, Kimberlin, Heinatz) reports, "A warning has come from the feds. … An FBI informant says MS-13, a notorious street gang with ties to El Salvador, recently issued an order for its members to kill someone — anyone — wearing a badge in Hampton Roads." The V-P continues, "The hit was discussed during a meeting of gang leaders held in Norfolk. … The purpose: To send a message to local law enforcement trying to stop the machete-wielding gang from moving to town. … The message: Stay out of our business. Stay out of our way." The V-P adds, "The alert arrived in a May 23 bulletin from the Department of Homeland Security. Both the department and the FBI have refused to comment, but state and federal gang experts confirmed the warning – which has since been put on hold. … 'The gangs call it a "green light,"' said Mindy Grizzard, spokeswoman for the Virginia Gang Investigators Association. … In the urban underbellies of Los Angeles, Chicago, Detroit or New York, such a threat might not raise even an eyebrow. … In Hampton Roads, it's met with an odd mix of shock and shhh. … Shock that such things could happen here. … Shhh because gangs are dirty laundry – the scent of which can derail a city's redevelopment plan, shred a school's reputation and cause decent folks to pull out of a neighborhood."

DOJ_NMG_0000832

Reyna Says He Was Not Pressured To Resign As US Marshals Head. The Brownsville (TX) Herald (7/3, Perez-Treviño) reports, "U.S. Marshals Service Director Ben Reyna never bought a house in Washington, D.C. … 'My intention was not to stay,' Reyna said last week after submitting his resignation from the Marshals Service effective July 31." The Herald continues, "He was not pressured to resign from the post he's held since 2001, he says, and will return to his hometown of Brownsville for personal reasons and without regrets. … 'I would not have done anything differently. It's been a great experience and a great honor,' Reyna told The Brownsville Herald in an exclusive interview." The Herald adds, "The Marshals Service is charged primarily with protecting judges and courts. Its performance is under scrutiny and criticism, seemingly prompted by the slaying of U.S. District Judge Joan Humphrey Lefkow's mother and husband in their Chicago home. … Less than a month after the Lefkow murders, Superior Court Judge Rowland Barnes was killed when a prisoner wrestled a gun from a sheriff's deputy in the Fulton County Courthouse in Atlanta, Ga., on March 11. … The back-to-back tragedies shined an unflattering light on the Marshals Service and started a buzz among judges and lawmakers in Washington, D.C. … In a letter dated March 14, U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, wrote to Reyna inquiring about security measures and what would be instituted in response to the attack on the Lefkows. … Reyna said protecting the judiciary has always been and should always be the priority: 'That is what allows us to maintain the rule of law.' … He also noted that in the agency's 215-year history, no federal judge has been murdered in a courtroom or courthouse."

TAX:

IRS Data Shows More Wealthy Americans Pay Little Or No Federal Taxes. The New York Times (7/3, Johnston) reports, "The number of affluent individuals and married couples who paid no federal income taxes jumped more than 15 percent in 2002, to 5,650, government data released last week showed. … About one in every 436 high-income Americans paid no taxes in 2002, up from one in 531 in 2001 and one in 1,010 in 2000. Over all, the top 2 percent of earners - the 2.5 million filers with income of $200,000 or more - paid almost 27 cents in taxes for each dollar of income they reported in 2002, other I.R.S. data showed. … Among that high-income group, however, almost 83,000, or one in 33, paid less than a dime in taxes for every dollar of income. An additional 79,000 paid less than 15 cents."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Reviewing Potential SCOTUS Nominees. President Bush is reviewing potential nominees for the Supreme Court while preparing to attend the G-8 summit next week. While the President has many options, the consensus in the media is that Bush will likely to be able to get a conservative nominee passed, and the question now is what sort of conservative that nominee will be. Media coverage of the impending political battle over Bush's nominee continued to receive significant media coverage. Meanwhile, President Bush's radio address praising US troops received light coverage.

While all three network news programs reported on how liberal and conservative activists were preparing for the political battle, NBC Nightly News (7/2, story 2, 1:30, Seigenthaler) first focused on Bush's selection process, reporting, "President Bush is preparing to submit his nominee for the court." NBC (Jordan): "Former presidential advisors say this is a process that just can't be rushed. There's a reason why President Bush says he'll take his time replacing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor because Bush is building a part of his legacy, that from a former aide to President Reagan who was on hand for the O'Connor nomination."

The AP (7/3, Riechmann) reports, "Regardless of whom he picks, the closely divided court…will very well end up with a more conservative bent." Key factors in Bush's decision will be "Intellect. Character. Judicial philosophy. The prospect of being able to win Senate confirmation. Those are the overriding issues that several legal experts and advocates on both the right and left think will guide the president, who is facing intense pressure from both sides of the political aisle."

The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Brownstein, Chen) notes, "While promising to consult, the aide signaled that the White House did not believe that Bush faced an obligation to replace O'Connor with a justice who shared her relatively moderate views, as some Democrats and liberal groups have suggested." One senior Bush aide said, "The notion that there is…a narrow band of people who are appropriate to replace Justice O'Connor is wrong. … The president will consult, but the president will make a decision."

The Chicago Tribune (7/3, Tackett) reports, "The news was about Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But the story is about President Bush. How Bush manages that story, by the person he nominates to replace O'Connor, by the words he chooses to frame that debate, by the way he deals with Congress, could define his presidency almost as much as terrorism and the war in Iraq." Bush, "even with sagging approval ratings and diminishing support for the war and his handling of the economy, finds himself in an extraordinarily powerful position with Republicans controlling the executive branch and Congress. Now he will be extending that leverage to the Supreme Court."

DOJ_NMG_0000833

The Boston Globe (7/3, Milligan) notes that Democratic senators, civil libertarians, and liberal groups "agree with conservatives that…the president will use his first appointment to the high court to establish a conservative legacy with a nominee similar to those Bush has publicly touted as his favorite justices." And experts "note that Bush -- unlike his predecessor, President Clinton --has consistently stuck to his guns on both policy decision and nominees, no matter how much heat he has gotten from the public, the international community, or Capitol Hill."

And Knight Ridder (7/3, Hutcheson) quotes the Rev. Patrick Mahoney, director of the Christian Defense Coalition saying, "If 9/11 was the defining moment of his first term, the composition of the Supreme Court is the defining moment of the second."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (7/3, Doyle, O'Rourke) reports, "Bush will be confronting a multiplicity of choices," including whether to nominate a Hispanic, a woman, a consensus candidate or a senator like Sen. John Cornyn. Senate Judiciary Committee chairman Arlen Specter "said that two women are 'a minimum' on the court." But it is considered more likely "that Bush will scour the appeals court benches."

Meanwhile, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch (7/3, Shesgreen) says "what both sides fear most is the unknown: a so-called 'stealth' nominee who has a thin paper trail and offers ambiguous answers in the Senate grilling that is sure to come." USA Today Biskupic (7/3) also reports on O'Connor's retirement.

Bush Aides To Solicit Bipartisan Advice. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Brownstein, Chen) reports while Bush is in Europe "senior White House officials plan to canvass Democratic and Republican Senators for recommendations to fill" the Supreme Court vacancy. But, "Democrats and their allies…reacted cautiously to the signal from White House." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's spokesman Jim Manley said, "Their track record of even consulting with Republicans on Capitol Hill is very poor. … It remains to be seen if this is an encouraging first step or is just going to be a one-way dialogue." The Times notes, "Both sides are trying to position themselves as reasonable and conciliatory to strengthen their hands for the full-scale combat most suspect will erupt."

Bush May Face Difficulties Satisfying GOP Base With Conservative Nominee. Highlighting the difficulties Bush may face is satisfying the GOP base, the New York Times (7/3, Rosen) in a "Week in Review" article examining the different types of judicial conservatism represented by those likely to be on Bush's short list says "the crucial question for the country is what kind of judicial conservative." The judicial conservative movement is not "monolithic" and represents "very different approaches to constitutional interpretation that often lead to dramatically different results in cases ranging from affirmative action to abortion and states' rights." Some "of the leading candidates said to be on Mr. Bush's short list…defy easy categorization. But it's clear that justices from each philosophical camp would reach very different decisions in the cases Americans care most about." After describing the different approaches to judicial conservatism Bush's potential nominees represent, the Times notes that it's clear that Mr. Bush will have an opportunity to satisfy and infuriate conservatives of many stripes. Whatever choice he makes will define not only the Supreme Court but his own conservative legacy."

Women Split Over Necessity To Choose Woman To Succeed O'Connor. The Washington Post (7/3, A12, Argetsinger, Williamson) notes that "for all the significance they place on her sex, women are split on the question of whether O'Connor should be succeeded by another woman. Although some of their leaders and members have expressed hope that the next appointee will be a woman, most women's organizations, liberal and conservative, are no longer making a person's sex an official priority, instead holding up O'Connor's reputation for open-mindedness as the characteristic they most want to see replicated."

New Justice Could Come From Fifth Circuit. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (7/2, Schleifstein) reports, "The list of potential replacements for retiring U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first female member of the high court, includes three judges on the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans -- two of them women." According to John Baker, a constitutional law professor at the Louisiana State University Law Center "Jones would draw the greatest opposition…because of signals she has given over the years that she would be an 'originalist,' closely following the Constitution's original meaning instead of expanding its interpretation in light of modern events." Yet, "New Orleans defense lawyer Bruce Waltzer said Clement may actually be more conservative than either of the other two."

Expert Warns Conservative Pick May Drive Justice Kennedy Leftwards. The AP (7/3, Riechmann) reports, "There's no doubt a confirmation fight would be contentious if Bush nominates" the conservatives "thought to be on his short list." Yet, "American University historian Allan J. Lichtman says naming an extremely conservative nominee could backfire on the president because it might prompt Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate conservative who also has been a swing vote on the court, to inch away from the right." Lichtman said, "That could push Kennedy into the O'Connor slot."

DOJ_NMG_0000834

Knight Ridder (7/3, Henderson) reports "the injection of a new personality into" the dynamics of the relationship between Supreme Court justices "could have unpredictable -- and, for the White House, undesirable -- effects." Some observers "say the arrival of another hard-line conservative to the bench…could embolden moderate conservative Anthony Kennedy." Court historian David Garrow said, "Replacing a moderate with a conservative automatically magnifies the center." A new conservative justice "would empower Kennedy, whose shift to the court's middle has seemed dramatic over the past few terms, and has been decisive in a number of cases that have left conservatives reeling."

And Orin Kerr, an associate professor at George Washington University Law School who once clerked for Justice Kennedy, in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (7/3) writes the replacement of O'Connor's vote "may not have a dramatic effect on the outcomes of the court's biggest cases" because "Kennedy often votes with the more liberal justices to form a liberal majority in major cases. He has voted to uphold Roe vs. Wade, and he wrote the opinions that struck down sodomy laws and invalidated the death penalty for juveniles. All these decisions would remain intact."

Loss Of O'Connor Unlikely To Hurt Liberal Bloc On Court. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Savage) reports that "the conservative Supreme Court led by Chief Justice William Rehnquist" faded away last term as it was replaced by "a moderate-to-liberal court led by John Paul Stevens." The Times notes, "By forming alliances with O'Connor or Justice Anthony M. Kennedy -- and sometimes even with Justice Antonin Scalia -- Stevens has been able to forge a majority in some of the biggest Supreme Court cases." Losing "O'Connor's vote might mean Stevens' sway over the court has reached its high-water mark. But with Kennedy and four liberals still in place, the Stevens bloc isn't likely to dissolve overnight."

Controversial Nominee Could Impact 2006 Elections. Knight Ridder (7/3, Hutcheson) reports, "In today's politically polarized world, with 24-hour cable news, 30-second attack ads, Internet interest groups and ideologically driven bloggers, a contentious nomination battle could drive a deeper wedge between Americans on opposite sides of the political divide." The impact of "a bitter confirmation battle could easily spill into next year's congressional elections, when Republican control of Congress will be tested at the polls."

Bush Urged To Choose Politician For Court. AEI resident scholar Norman Ornstein in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, B7) writes, "Most of the names the White House has floated as possible Supreme Court nominees are, predictably, judges on federal appeals courts. It is time to expand the field to seriously consider people with political backgrounds. Former senators John Danforth and Warren Rudman would be superb choices. At least two current senators, John Cornyn of Texas and Jon Kyl of Arizona, fit the ideological criteria of the White House. Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, has mentioned other capable Republican senators, including Mike DeWine of Ohio and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. … The court, and the country, would be well served to have a politician or two on the bench."

Interest Groups Gear Up For Fight Over SCOTUS Nominee. The preparations and concerns of liberal and conservative activists were covered extensively by the media, as NBC Nightly News (7/2, story 3, 1:30, Seigenthaler) reported, "The battle of the next Supreme Court nominee could in some ways reflect the political and cultural battle that is brewing in this country."

CBS Evening News (7/2, story 3, 2:30, Mitchell) reported that "the gloves are off in the fight over who will replace" O'Connor. CBS (Chen): "In their war room, liberal activists are in full battle mode in their effort to head off the nominee, though no one knows who the nominee is yet. What are you afraid of?" Ralph Neas, of People for the American Way, was shown saying, "What we are afraid of is that George W. Bush will replace a mainstream conservative like Sandra Day O'Connor with a right wing ideologue, someone like Clarence Thomas or Scalia." Chen: "Conservative groups aim to stop what they see as judicial activism, and openly name justices they see as having let them down." Wendy Long, of the Judicial Confirmation Network said, "I think that justices Souter and Justice Kennedy are regarded by the Republican base as disappointments." Chen continues, "Likewise, Justice O'Connor, a Reagan appointee, has often frustrated more hard-line conservatives."

The Chicago Tribune (7/3, James, Dorning) notes, "Liberal and conservative efforts Friday were driven by fear on one side, hope on the other. Liberals feared decisions favorable to them on affirmative action, abortion rights, the environment and a host of other hot-button issues could be reversed in new rulings. Conservatives hoped a new justice would deliver just such reversals."

The Baltimore Sun (7/3, Woestendiek, Little) reports, "Ruptures over gay marriage, flag burning or displaying the Ten Commandments will feel like mere tremors compared with the cultural quake sure to erupt when the nation's differences become the weapons with which the Supreme Court's future is determined, political analysts say. Expect the 'red' and the 'blue' to go at it fiercely enough to leave the nation purple, or at least with some long-lingering bitter feelings."

DOJ_NMG_0000835

The Washington Post (7/3, A11, Milbank) reports that "beneath the official posturing" on Friday "was a simple truth: O'Connor is the tiebreaking vote on a range of hot-button social issues, and the battle to replace her will be in many ways a referendum on legal abortion. So it's no surprise that, starting at mid-morning, the O'Connor succession fight became the only game in town." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/3, Reston) also reported on the efforts of activists to influence Bush's choice and the Dallas Morning News (7/3, Pusey) includes a brief description of the key players in the upcoming debate.

Conservatives Prepared To Launch Effort To Influence Bush. The Washington Post (7/3, A1, Edsall, Milbank) in a front page story reports that "the conservative movement has something it lacked during its losing battle for the confirmation of Robert H. Bork to the court 18 years ago: a highly coordinated movement that has fused the big dollars of economic conservatives with the grass-roots clout of millions of religious conservatives." Conservatives believe that "will prevent the defeat of another nominee such as Bork and will inoculate Bush from pressure to appoint a moderate such as Kennedy or Souter. And if it works with O'Connor's replacement, conservatives say, they will have found a formula that will allow them gradually to control the judiciary and revisit the full range of precedents regarding abortion, affirmative action, church-state matters and regulations of business and the environment."

And the New York Times (7/3, Rosenbaum, Clemetson) reports that the "last time Ralph G. Neas and C. Boyden Gray went head to head as commanding generals in a war over a Supreme Court confirmation was in 1991, when Clarence Thomas was the nominee." Although Gray "won the Thomas battle," Neas "had the superior operation: a unified battalion of labor unions, civil rights groups, women's organizations, civil libertarians and environmentalists that had more money, more energy and more firepower than had ever been used in a Supreme Court fight." After the battle Gray "vowed he would never be outgunned again." Now as chairman of the Committee for Justice, Gray has organized "outside forces that would be up to the fight." Gray said, "We haven't leveled the playing field. … But at least we're on the field and we're able to engage."

Conservatives Express Opposition To Gonzales Nomination. Conservative opposition to AG Alberto Gonzales was noted in a number of articles Sunday morning. Providing in depth coverage, the Washington Post (7/3, A1, Baker, Glasser) in a front page story reports, "Many of President Bush's conservative supporters lined up in staunch opposition yesterday to the candidate he might personally most want to name to the Supreme Court, his longtime friend and adviser, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales." With Bush leaving for Europe, leaves "Republicans a short time to influence his decision. If the broader nomination battle will resemble a presidential campaign, as both sides predict, then the next week or two could amount to a primary." The Post notes, "The one candidate who unifies most conservatives -- in opposition -- is Gonzales."

The New York Times (7/3, A1, Nagourney, Purdum, Kirkpatrick) in a front page story adds, "Administration officials discounted the conservative uprising against Mr. Gonzales, saying that Mr. Bush was already aware of the objections and was not convinced by them." One senior Administration official said, "The president is going to pick someone who is a true constructionist and who is correct in interpreting the law." The official said "Gonzales fit that description, but also that Mr. Bush might be wary of moving him to a new position so shortly after he was confirmed as attorney general." Yet, "the swift and vociferous opposition to Mr. Gonzales reflected the intensity of concern on the right over just what kind of conservative Mr. Bush will choose, as he moves toward a decision that will go a long way toward settling any question about what kind of conservative he is, and how his presidency will be remembered."

Both Sides Of Abortion Debate Accused Of Using Hyperbole. ABC's World News Tonight (7/2, story 4, 3:00, Moran) reported that "both sides of the abortion issue are turning up the volume in the debate. The President of the National Organization for Women, for instance, has declared a 'state of emergency' for women's rights." ABC (Morrell): "But some legal analysts say both sides are misleading the public. They say her departure almost certainly opens the door for further restrictions on abortion. She was a decisive fifth vote in a 2000 case. Striking down a state ban on so-called partial birth abortions. And this fall, for the first time in five years, the court will hear an abortion case, one that could allow states to pass tougher parental notification laws. While the left may be overselling the risk to abortion rights, some on the right are underselling it, trying to convince Americans that with or without O'Connor, Roe v. Wade is safe. Some on the right fear if abortion becomes the central issue in this debate, it could hurt their chances of replacing the moderate O'Connor with a true conservative."

Public May Tune Out Partisan Battle Over Nominee. But the Los Angeles Times (7/3, McManus) says, "in the middle of the storm, like civilians caught on a battlefield, much of the nation may wish that the whole thing would just go away." Pew Research Center pollster Andrew Kohut said that "for most of the country, it may just look like another partisan battle in Washington." The Times notes, "Abortion, gay marriage and religion may be 'hot button' issues, prized by interest groups and political consultants for their ability to mobilize people to vote and donate money. But most Americans consider those issues less pressing than the war in Iraq or the state of the economy, and recoil from the acrimony of the debate."

DOJ_NMG_0000836

NOW Members Rally For Abortion Rights. The AP (7/3, Gerome) reports, "Chanting 'Not the church, not the state; women must choose their fate,' hundreds of members of the National Organization for Women rallied for abortion rights Saturday as President Bush prepares to select a new U.S. Supreme Court justice." They "shifted the agenda for its three-day annual convention following the announcement Friday that Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was retiring.

Conservatives Restrain Happiness Over O'Connor Resignation. The Washington Times (7/3, A1, Hurt) in a front page story reports that some conservative activists "chuckled with delight over their turn of good fortune." After she announced her intention to retire, "many conservatives chose to applaud the service of Justice O'Connor, but to otherwise keep quiet. White House aides and Senate Republicans sent out the word that there should be no public relief that it was Justice O'Connor, rather than Chief Justice Rehnquist, who was retiring." One conservative activist said, "Nobody wants to get into gloating here. … We're all too aware of what's at stake."

More Commentary. Expressing his concern that the political battle over Bush's nominee will hurt the Supreme Court, Yale law professor Stephen Carter in an op-ed in the New York Times (7/3) writes, "Perhaps President Bush could say to his most strident supporters on the right that it is not appropriate for them to behave with the triumphalism of conquerors who believe that the retirement of Justice O'Connor signals the moment to take control of the court. Perhaps the activists on the left, gearing up for a fight, could go back and read the speech made on the Senate floor by Edward Kennedy, during the vicious 1967 campaign over the nomination of Thurgood Marshall. Senator Kennedy warned his colleagues to reject the view that the Senate should reject potential justices who possess a judicial philosophy with which they disagree."

And the Washington Post (7/3, B6) in an editorial predicting the fierce political battle writes that "we take this moment, when nobody knows how excellent or terrible the next nominee will be, to emphasize that a judicial nomination is not a political campaign and should not be treated as one. A nominee's record is almost never a simple affair, because good legal reasoning doesn't always render the most politically congenial answer. Demagogic attacks on almost any nominee are easy, and knee-jerk defenses equally so. But a reasonable assessment of the president's choice, whoever it is, will not emerge from such a shouting match."

Specter Remains Noncommittal As He Prepares To Play Pivotal Role. The New York Times (7/3, Stolberg) reports, "Perhaps more than any other senator," Sen. Arlen Specter "will be the pivotal figure as he tries to manage his bitterly divided committee, his own uneasy relationship with the White House and the intense pressure that is already bearing down on him from both the left and right at a time when both sides are deeply suspicious of him." He "said that he and Mr. Bush had not named names in any of their conversations. He said he had thought 'long and hard' about suggesting possible candidates but decided not to, believing that 'the wiser course' would be to remain uncommitted to anyone in particular. As to whether he would advise Mr. Bush against nominating judges who might be perceived as likely to overturn Roe v. Wade, Mr. Specter was noncommittal." Specter said, "I'm going to listen to the president…and see how it goes."

Senate Republicans Expected To Focus On Nominee's Legal Credentials. The Washington Post (7/3, A1, Baker, Glasser) in a front page story also notes that although some Republicans "focused on whom Bush's choice will be, others mapped out strategy for the period after he decides. Senate Republicans made plans to begin hearings as quickly as possible after the nomination, focused not on the candidate's positions on hot-button issues but on legal credentials."

And the Washington Post (7/3, A13, Allen) reports, "The two parties have begun outlining their strategies for confirmation hearings once President Bush nominates a successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, with Senate Republicans planning a rapid and rigid schedule designed to prevent Democrats from pinning the nominee down on divisive issues such as abortion." Senate Judiciary Committee Republican planning document "says the nominee will be counseled to avoid disclosing 'personal political views or legal thinking on any issue' in an effort to put a focus on qualifications rather than specific issues, including same-sex marriage and the government's treatment of suspected terrorists."

Sen. John Cornyn in a letter to the editor in the Washington Post (7/2, A29) wrote, "when evaluating the nominee, I will not be asking for commitments as to how he or she will rule on cases involving such contentious issues as abortion, affirmative action, same-sex marriage, the war on terrorism or any other specific issue on which the nominee might eventually rule." Cornyn stresses, "It's crucial that judges approach every case free from political commitments. They must be free to disappoint their supporters and surprise their opponents and critics. Judges must be free to do their jobs -- to listen to the facts, to carefully divine the law and to be faithful to the Constitution."

Supreme Court To Address Tough Issues In Next Term. The AP (7/3, Holland) reports, "Abortion, assisted suicide, gay rights, the death penalty. Some of the toughest issues in the land confront the Supreme Court in its new term in the fall." And whoever Bush nominates "will immediately face cases involving the Bush administration." For example, "the court will decide if law schools may restrict military recruiters as a way of protesting the Pentagon's 'don't ask, don't tell' policy." The AP notes, "The abortion cases involve a parental notification law from New Hampshire and a long-running fight over the liability of people who protest outside clinics."

DOJ_NMG_0000837

The Baltimore Sun (7/3, Gibson) also reports "the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor could have almost immediate implications." In addition to other issues, the death penalty "could hang in the balance. O'Connor, who in 2001 publicly questioned how fairly capital punishment was administered, sided in recent years with a majority that struck down the death penalty for the mentally retarded, but dissented this year from a 5-4 decision banning juvenile executions." Recently the court agreed "to hear the appeal of a death row inmate from Tennessee who claims that new DNA evidence could exonerate him in the 1985 rape and murder." The Dallas Morning News (7/3, Jackson, Pusey) adds, "The justices have already agreed to review a federal law banning doctors from using drugs to assist suicides. Oregon officials claim the rule infringes on their Death with Dignity Act."

Observers Believe Rehnquist Will Remain On Court. The Chicago Tribune (7/3, Neikirk) reports that "some analysts say that if" Chief Justice William Rehnquist "waits much longer, it is less likely that he will resign." Marquette law professor Scott Moss said, "I would doubt it at this point. … If a justice is going to retire, he probably isn't going to wait until midway through the summer." And Georgetown law professor Susan Low Bloch "said she had heard that Rehnquist 'doesn't want to get off' the court while O'Connor 'did want to get off,' adding that 'I just know he loves the court and has all his life. Once his wife died, that became everything to him.'"

O'Connor Seen As Key Moderating Influence. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (7/3, Doyle) reports, "More pragmatic than philosophical, more centrist than hard-line conservative, the former Arizona state senator left a distinctive stamp on American justice that surpassed her initial ground-breaking appointment."

Linda Ross Meyer, professor of law at Quinnipiac University School of Law and a law clerk for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor during the 1991-1992 Supreme Court term, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, B1) says, "O'Connor believed that judging is not policy analysis or scholarship or ideology. Justice doesn't come from a book. The difficult decisions come in shades of gray, not black and white, and the view from the Supreme Court bench can be a narrow one. She looked to the pragmatic consequences of the court's decisions for everyday citizens, and she tried to do justice in the case while leaving play in the constitutional joints so as not to tie the hands of those closer to the facts and the people."

Viet Dinh, a former law clerk to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, B7) concludes, "I could go on and identify Justice O'Connor's indelible stamp in every area of the law spanning property rights, race relations, privacy, employment contracts, retirement benefits and so on. But that would be missing the point of her life, work and worth. She is not a crusader, a reformer or a philosopher. She has always tried to be a good judge, and by succeeding she has been a pioneer, sage and icon."

The Dallas Morning News (7/3, Nelson) reports O'Connor "opened doors for women at the highest levels of the legal profession. But when the justice who once aspired to be a cattle rancher graduated from Stanford Law School, she found that even low-level jobs weren't options for female lawyers. Many law firms simply didn't hire women. One offered the graduate, who finished third in her class, a secretarial position." Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, "who also struggled to find work after law school, said that despite the rejections that Justice O'Connor faced, 'she kept that positive spirit, and she has been a leader in everything she's done.'"

Feminists Reflect On O'Connor's Legacy. The Washington Post (7/3, D1, Rosin) reports, "The feminist movement kicked into action immediately when it lost O'Connor. She may not have been a reliable ally on their pet causes (she voted to invalidate the Violence Against Women Act, for example), but she came through as the critical vote on cases involving abortion and affirmative action. But there were no heartfelt personal reminiscences. No honoring of a fellow suffragette's guts and glory. Just the legal issues and the facts, with all the emotional warmth of a legal brief. It was understood that O'Connor herself wouldn't be caught dead at such a rally."

Amount Of Classified Government Documents Has Almost Doubled Since 2001. The New York Times (7/3, Shane) reports, "Driven in part by fears of terrorism, government secrecy has reached a historic high by several measures, with federal departments classifying documents at the rate of 125 a minute as they create new categories of semi-secrets bearing vague labels like 'sensitive security information.' A record 15.6 million documents were classified last year, nearly double the number in 2001. … Meanwhile, the declassification process, which made millions of historical documents available annually in the 1990's, has slowed to a relative crawl, from a high of 204 million pages in 1997 to just 28 million pages last year." According to the

DOJ_NMG_0000838

Times, "The increasing secrecy - and its rising cost to taxpayers, estimated by the office at $7.2 billion last year - is drawing protests from a growing array of politicians and activists, including Republican members of Congress, leaders of the independent commission that studied the Sept. 11 attacks and even the top federal official who oversees classification." Sens. John Cornyn and Patrick Leahy cosponsored a bill that "requires that any legislation creating new exemptions to the Freedom of Information Act explicitly disclose them. It is only part of overhaul efforts proposed by the two."

The AP (7/3, Freking) reports, "The numbers come from the Information Security Oversight Office in its latest annual report to the president. … An increase in the number of documents being classified has raised concerns that the government is being too secretive, and the report notes that overclassification of documents has been a consistent issue for decades. However, the report stops short of saying that the trend runs counter to the nation's interest."

OTHER NEWS:

Rally For The Poor Held In Scotland. The New York Times (7/3, Alvarez) reports that "more than 225,000 demonstrators encircled the heart of" Edinburgh "and demanded an end to abject poverty around the world." All types of people "poured into the streets here to deliver their message to the powerful leaders who will arrive at Gleneagles Hotel in Perthshire, nearby, for the Group of 8 summit meeting that starts Wednesday." The activists and demonstrators say "the world's richest countries should forgive the debts of the poorest countries, with no strings attached, equalize trade and put an end to harmful export subsidies and increase aid to poor countries while ensuring it gets funneled to the right people." The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Depasquale) issued a similar report.

The Washington Times (7/3) added, "At the head of the march was Zimbabwean campaigner Amadou Kanoute, one of the few Africans in the overwhelmingly white crowd." The Times said that "organizers estimated the day's turnout at more than 200,000 people making the demonstration the biggest in Scotland yet for a political cause."

G-8 Unlikely To Agree On Global Warming Specifics. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (7/3, Melvin) reports on various aspects of the upcoming G-8 conference, including the history and security concerns. The Journal notes that Tony Blair "seems unlikely to be able to get an agreement from all his guests to take specific steps to curb global warming. Bush does not agree that science has demonstrated that climate change poses a near-term problem or that it is caused by humans." However, "it does seem possible" that the leaders "will agree in Scotland to support the development of new technologies that do not produce greenhouse gases." Nicholas Bayne, a former British diplomat, said "I think Blair's objective was to bring the United States back into the international discussion of what to do about climate change."

G-8 Under Pressure To Admit China. The AP (7/3, Raum) says that the G-8 partnership "is under pressure to open the door to new members," among which "China, India and South Korea come to mind. Doing so would reflect the rapidly changing global economy and maintain the strategic role for which the group was organized in the first place." However, "not one of the current members seems to want to make the first move toward expansion." Grant Aldonas, who was commerce undersecretary in Bush's first term, "said a strong case could be made for bringing in other nations with fast-growing economies." Aldonas also said, "It's hard to talk meaningfully about the world economy any more without China being included." AP notes that by 2050, "the countries with the top economies are expected to be the U.S., China, India, Japan, Britain, France, Germany and South Korea. Current club members Italy and Russia would not rank in the top 10."

Past Africa Aid Failures. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Dixon) says that "like the untouched land, Nigeria, and much of Africa, has not been transformed by the donor aid that has washed in during recent decades, most of which was stolen or wasted. Despite billions of dollars in grants and loans, Africa is the only continent sliding backward, worse off than it was 25 years ago." In some African countries, "such as corruption-plagued Nigeria, people agree that debt relief rarely trickles down to those who need it most." However, "many economists and anti-poverty activists counter that lifting the yoke of debt is the only way to reduce hardship in the poorest nations. The World Bank is beginning to favor grants, not loans, for the neediest countries to prevent them from getting buried in debt."

To Ordinary Africans, G-8 Seems Out Of Touch. In a front-page piece, the Washington Post (7/3, Wax) reports on Africans' feelings about the G-8 summit and associated activities. Africans interviewed this week, "from farmers to artists to health workers, say they are grateful for the outpouring of sentiment, and glad to hear that glamorous musicians and actors are championing their cause," but they "also said there was a dangerous disconnect between what the industrialized nations see as solutions and what Africans believe they need. Instead of debt relief and more aid, many Africans said they wanted the G-8 to focus on ending corruption and on improving roads, courts, banking and secondary education." Many Africans said that "another useful step" would be "to end Western countries' trade subsidies for their own farmers, which make it impossible for African industries to do much more than survive."

DOJ_NMG_0000839

NYTimes Mag Says International Community Belongs In Congo. The New York Times Magazine (7/3, Traub) in a lengthy piece on Democratic Republic of the Congo, notes that at the G-8 summit "we may well be hearing a great deal about promising African countries like Ghana or Malawi," but "that great swaths of the continent are occupied by countries -- Sudan, Sierra Leone, Burundi and, not least, Congo -- that, left to their own devices, are very likely to eat themselves up, and their neighbors as well." The international community "has no choice but to intervene in these places." One argument "we will be hearing from the Bush administration at the Gleneagles G-8 summit meeting is that corrupt countries have to change their own political culture before the world starts pouring in aid," which the writer describes as true, "but rather facile."

NYTimes Credits, Challenges Bush In Fight Against Poverty. The New York Times (7/3) editorializes, "If Mr. Bush is truly the compassionate conservative he says he is, he will not let the moment pass with the United States continuing to contribute far less than its share to the international effort to include Africa in the prosperity of the 21st century." President Bush, "to his great credit," has been "more attentive to the problems of Africa than his recent predecessors. He has increased overall assistance, stepped up spending on H.I.V./AIDS programs and created the Millennium Challenge Account to reward Africa's best-governed countries. Last week he promised further increases, including a program to fight malaria, and new teacher training and scholarship money to help girls attend school." But so far "there has been a discouraging gap between Mr. Bush's generous declarations and the money Washington has actually made available to Africa. The White House has failed to push the Republican-controlled Congress to fully finance Mr. Bush's aid programs and failed to spur its own aid appointees to get the money flowing to where it is most urgently needed."

Administration Promise To Work With Other Governments "A Good Sign". The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes that President Bush's "announcement last week of a $1.2-billion package to fight malaria in Africa over the next five years showed an awareness of the disease's economic and human toll. That's progress; the United States has essentially ignored its devastating effects on Africa for decades, throwing in token sums that have enriched U.S. aid contractors but done next to nothing to reduce mortality from a plague that kills from 1 million to 3 million people a year." Bush's malaria initiative "is an inspirational commitment that — if implemented properly and fully funded by Congress — could save thousands of lives. Unfortunately, those are big 'ifs.'" The administration "promises to work with other governments and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Malaria and Tuberculosis, and that's a good sign. Bush should see this initiative as an experiment in distributing aid without USAID's involvement."

EU Urged To Remain Committed To Expansion. Ivo Daalder, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, and James Goldgeier a professor of political science at George Washington University, have written an op-ed in the Washington Post (7/3, Daalder, Goldgeier) that notes "from the beginning, Europeans have greeted President Bush's 'transformational diplomacy' with disdain. To them, the mess in Iraq demonstrates the failure of a policy that relies on speaking loudly and carrying a big stick. Instead of pursuing a policy of invasion, Western Europe has used the prospect of membership in the European Union to help transform the countries of Central and Eastern Europe into stable market democracies, thus continuing a process that saw Greece, Spain and Portugal join after they too pursued a democratic path." However, "the crisis in Europe that has emerged in recent weeks, first with the rejection of the European constitution by voters in France and the Netherlands and then with the breakdown of budget negotiations at last month's E.U. summit, has put the brakes on talk of continuing the enlargement process." Unless "the door to Europe is kept ajar, the instability that continues to bedevil Europe's periphery in the broader Middle East and the former Soviet Union will come to plague Europe itself and all that has been accomplished there. The consequences would be bad not just for Europe, but also for the United States, which needs a strong partner to address challenges emanating from Northern Africa, the Middle East and Eurasia."

Media Highlights Live 8 Concert. The Live 8 concert's message urging G-8 leaders to help reduce poverty in Africa was highlighted by the media. While coverage focused on the bands, music and crowds, all three network news broadcasts led with coverage of the Live 8 concert and it was covered by most of the nation's major dailies. NBC Nightly News (7/2, lead story, 3:00, Seigenthaler) reported, "Specifically Live 8 calls for rich nations to erase more than $200 Billion in African debt, aid doubled and better trade deals for Africa. Many insist President Bush's initiatives this week to fight malaria and improve education on the continent shows…" Sir Elton John was shown singing but the audio was garbled. Sir Elton John: "There are a lot of naysayers and it provoked a lot of, well, it's not going to make that much difference. Well, you have to try. You have to try and do something positive."

CBS Evening News (7/2, lead story, :10, Palmer) reported, "In Edinburgh, where the G-8 leaders are due to meet, marchers have already begun what organizers are calling the long march to justice. But experts in development say this feel-good popular movement isn't likely to change the minds of G-8 leaders on crucial issues that might help Africa but wouldn't be popular with voters."

DOJ_NMG_0000840

Knight Ridder (7/3, Schofield) reports that organizer Bob Geldof "had billed this not as a fund-raiser, but a consciousness raiser." Later, during the performance, Geldof "would describe Saturday's concerts as part of the 'long, long walk to justice.'" In Philadelphia, "in a scene that was broadcast to concerts around the world, actor/singer Will Smith urged people around the world to snap their fingers at three-second intervals, noting that the pace represented the death rate for African children from poverty." Un Secretary-General Kofi Annan said, "On behalf of the poor, the voiceless and the weak, I say thank you."

The Washington Post (7/3, Lac, Wiltz) focused primarily on the artistic aspects of the Philadelphia concert, noting that organizer Bob Geldof's goal "was to make a social statement so grand, so loud, that the leaders of the industrialized world simply could not ignore it." Actor Don Cheadle "urged everybody to sign an online petition to pressure the G-8 participants…to help Africa out of abject poverty."

The Washington Times (7/3) reports that Geldof "requested that performers ratchet down the kind of partisan rhetoric that characterized celebrities' involvement in the presidential election last year. Artists here complied for the most part, but, occasionally, lips loosened." The New York Times (7/3, Lyall) quotes South African pop star Zola, speaking of Europe: "They owe us. … They are the ones who brought slavery, killed our ancestors. If anybody must pay, they must pay us back so that we can have jobs and education."

The Los Angeles Times (7/3) reports that German punk rocker Campino "told the Berlin audience, 'We have to get Africa out of USA's headlock.'"

Op-ed Argues For Piecemeal Efforts To Aid Africa. In an op-ed piece appearing in the New York Times (7/3, Easterly) New York University professor of economics William Easterly, says "it's great that so many are finally noticing the tragedy of Africa. But sadly, historical evidence says that the solutions offered by big plans are not so easy. From 1960 to 2003, we spent $568 billion (in today's dollars) to end poverty in Africa. Yet these efforts still did not lift Africa from misery and stagnation." The "sensible alternative" Campino argues, "is to concentrate on piecemeal solutions to poor people's problems. You can evaluate the results of a specific intervention by comparing them with conditions in another group without the intervention, and you can get feedback from those affected and hold an individual aid agency accountable." Piecemeal fixers "do not promise the miracles that planners do; they just quietly deliver results."

American Businesses Have "Vested Interest"In China Success. The New York Times (7/3, Porter) says that "China has set out to snap up everything from Unocal to Maytag, not to mention a steady diet of United States Treasury bonds. And many of the leading voices who worried about Japan in the 1980's are warning that China presents a much bigger and more complex conundrum." Even those most concerned about China's rise up the economic, political and military ladder, however, "recognize another, perhaps more important difference between China and 1980's Japan. The United States has a vested interest in China's success." Whereas Japan's success at the time "was inevitably seen as America's failure, today American businesses are all rooting for China to succeed. Because they own a lot of it."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (7/3) editorializes, "Americans needn't fear the prospect of the world's largest country joining the global middle class. This -- or the more prosaic possibility that some country might definitively unseat the United States as the world's richest country -- is not some tragic possibility that Americans must acknowledge with good grace or world-weary resignation (like the British waving farewell to their empire). The wealth of other nations is good for Americans in the narrowest selfish terms."

Abbas Attempts To Co-Opt Hamas. The Washington Times/AP (7/3, Daraghmeh) reports that Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas "has asked his most formidable rival, the militant Islamic group Hamas, to join his Cabinet in advance of Israel's Gaza pullout, and the group is considering the offer." Israel "denounced the idea of Hamas' joining the Palestinian government, calling the group 'a murderous terrorist organization.'" Israel and the US "have demanded that Mr. Abbas disarm Hamas and other militants, a step he has refused to take for fear it would provoke bloodshed among Palestinians. He has chosen instead to co-opt militants."

Some Gaza Settlers Dig In As Pullout Nears. The Los Angeles Times (7/3, Ellingwood) reports that "rather than packing up, Sanur's 31 families are busily fortifying their hold on the West Bank hilltop in anticipation of a last stand." Sanur "is one of four settlements in the northern West Bank scheduled to be abandoned by Israel this summer, along with all 21 Jewish communities in the Gaza Strip." Although "Sanur and the three other isolated West Bank settlements, Homesh, Ganim and Kadim, have been largely overlooked in the turbulent national drama over the planned withdrawal," military officials "say settler resistance may prove especially tough in Sanur and Homesh." Settlers in Sanur "say they expect 10,000 or more supporters to sweep in to help thwart the evacuation."

Iranian Pres-Elect Refuses Interviews. The New York Times (7/3, Slackman) says that since the election a week ago, "it has been nearly impossible to get a feel for Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, to take the measure of the man. He has refused all interviews, though he did hold one hourlong news conference." Friends, supporters and neighbors "describe the diminutive, bearded man as humble and caring." Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political science professor at Tehran University, "said that he had known the president-elect since childhood and that Mr. Ahmadinejad was not involved with the student hostage takers."

DOJ_NMG_0000841

Ahmadinejad A Suspected Accomplice In 1989 Austrian Attack. The Washington Times/AP (7/3, Kole) reports that Austria's daily, "Der Standard." quoted a prominent Austrian politician "as saying authorities have 'very convincing' evidence linking" Ahmadinejad to attacks in Vienna," in which Kurds were killed in 1989." Der Standard reported yesterday that a top official with Austria's Green Party, accused Ahmadinejad "of traveling to Vienna a few days before the slayings to deliver the weapons to the Iranian commandos who carried out the killings. He said he wants a warrant issued for Mr. Ahmadinejad's arrest."

Ahmadinejad Campaign Message Of Economic Hope Aided Victory. The New York Times (7/3, Slackman) reports on Ahmadinejad's election campaign "promising to redistribute the nation's wealth, hold down prices, raise salaries and lift state-supported benefits for the poor. He infused those pledges with the theme of social justice, which resonated in a society where aiding the poor is considered an obligation for the faithful." Iran is "awash in oil money, as the price of crude topped $60 a barrel this week, pumping billions into the government treasury. But this country's economy is still tied down by a system in which the state and a shadowy collection of foundations controlled by clerics monopolize the vast bulk of its industries, including oil." The Ahmadinejad campaign message of "economic hope - as well as social justice - captured the hearts…of middle-class families. Parts of the middle class have trouble meeting their own financial needs, although their support for Mr. Ahmadinejad also stems from having grown used to buying subsidized food, even if they can afford to pay market prices."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No schedule available.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No schedule available.

US Senate: -- No events scheduled.

US House: -- No events scheduled.

Other: ALL DAY

June 30 - July 3. SCHOOL NURSES CONFERENCE _ The National Association of School Nurses (NASN) holds its 37th Annual Conference. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road, NW. Contacts: n/a, 207-883-2117

July 1 - 5. OSCE PARLIAMENTARY ASSEMBLY _ The 14th Annual Session of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) Parliamentary Assembly, whose participating states span the geographical area from Vancouver to Vladivostok, is held with the theme, ``30 Years Since Helsinki: Challenges Ahead." Highlights: 12 p.m. The World Jewish Congress, Institute on Religion and Public Policy, and Foundation for Ethnic Understanding host a roundtable luncheon, ``Legislative Responses to Anti-Semitism," with parliamentarians from across Europe, North America, and the former Soviet Union. The program includes Rep. Alcee Hastings, D-Fla., president, OSCE Parliamentary Assembly; co-chairs Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., co-chairman, U.S. Helsinki Commission, and Prof. Gert Weisskirchen, German Bundestag, OSCE-PA vice president and personal representative of the Chairman-in-Office of the OSCE on Combating Anti-Semitism; and presentations from leading members of national parliaments from the OSCE region. Willard Intercontinental Hotel. Location: JW Marriott Hotel, 14th St. and Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

CAPITAL FOURTH-REHEARSAL _ Open dress rehearsal for accredited media only of the 25th Annual PBS Capitol Fourth concert. Highlights: 11:50 a.m. - 12:50 p.m. The O'Jays 2 p.m. - 2:30 p.m. Kimberley Locke 2:30 p.m. - 3:25 p.m. Ronan Tynan 3:25 p.m. - 5:20 p.m. Gloria Estefan, Jimmy Smits 5:20 p.m. - 6 p.m. Barry Bostwick 7:40 p.m. - 10 p.m. Full concert dress rehearsal Location: U.S. Capitol, West Lawn Contacts: Anne Maginnis, 202-554-4620

July 3 - 8. IEEE CONFERENCE _ The Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers (IEEE) holds the 2005 IEEE Antennas and Propagation Society International Symposium and URSI National Radio Science Meeting. Location: Omni Shoreham Hotel, 2500 Calvert St. NW. Contacts: Prof. Amir Zaghloul, 703-535-3465

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"State Ballot, Wider Impact"
"Glimpses Of A Hermit Nation"
"High Noon For High Court"
"How Visa System Failed To Flag Lodi Imam"
"Junior Miss Bows Out True To Tradition – Gracefully"
"Start to Make It Better, Live 8 Urges"

New York Times:

"Conservative Groups Rally Against Gonzales As Justice"
"Profit, Not Jobs, in Silicon Valley"
"A Town That Bled Under Hussein Hails His Trial"

DOJ_NMG_0000842

"Confirmation Battle In Senate Could Define Specter's Career"
"In An Epic Wimbledon Final, Williams Prevails"
"For The Poor In Iran, Voting Was About Making Ends Meet"

Washington Post:
"Activists Gear Up For Nominee Fight"
"Help From France Key In Covert Operations"
"The Right's Moment, Years In The Making"
"Among The Poor Of Africa, G-8 Seems Out of Touch"
"One Man's Fight Against E-Mail Spam"

Washington Times:
"Liberals Gird For Supreme Struggle"
"Iranian Accused In Killing Of Kurds"
"A Present Built On The Past"
"NASA Plans Big Bang For Fourth"
"Live 8 Concerts Rock The Globe For Africa"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Old Glory's Preservation"
"A Musical Message"
"Noodlin' Away A Summer Afternoon"
"Conservatives Relish Chance To Seize Court"

Dallas Morning News:
"A Mystery In Boots And Beard"
"Gen X Marks Its Spot"
"Microbiologist Claimed Aloe Vera Fights Cancer, AIDS"
"Shaky Science: Experts Question Anthrax Lotion"

Houston Chronicle:
"Mad cow Puts Role Of USDA In Question"
"How NASA Would Save Shuttle Crew In Danger"
"Authorities Little Help, Hope To Families Of Missing"
"Conservatives Lobby Against Gonzales"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Live8; Iraq Bombings; Missing And Dead Soldiers In Afghanistan; SCOTUS/Abortion; Missing Girl; Arizona Wildfire; House Insurance;
Wimbledon; Tour De France; Miss America.
CBS: Live8; Missing Girl; SCOTUS Nominee; Iraq Bombings; Soldiers' Deaths In Afghanistan; Wimbledon; Tour De France; Ballroom Dancing.
NBC: Live8; SCOTUS Nomination; SCOTUS/Interest Groups; Missing Girl; French Anti-Terrorism; NASCAR; Wimbledon.

Copyright 2005 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0000843

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Tuesday, July 05, 2005 8:06 AM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: Department of Justice News Clips 7/3/05
Attachments: dojclips050703.pdf; dojclips050703.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JULY 3, 2005 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Help From France Key In Covert Operations (WP) 3
U.S. Seen Prodding Allies In Terror War (WT) 6
Man Allegedly Abducted By CIA In Egypt, Lawyer Says (HC) 7
Pricey Rendition (WP) 7
A Roman Mess (WP) 8
How Visa System Failed To Flag Lodi Imam (LAT) 9

Patriot Act:

County Commission Cites Patriot Act Concerns (EBHNT) 11
Hagen W. Frank: Patriot Act Not Threat As LSJ Says (LSJ) 12
Senator Christopher "Kit" Bond: Strong Patriot Act Required (WT) 13

Homeland Response:

Overhaul Of U.S. Intelligence System May Take 10 Years, Analysts Say (BSUN) 13
Art World Comes To The Cause Of Arrested Artist (SDUT) ... 14
Border Watchers Gear Up For Expanded Patrol (LAT) 16
Small Plane Violates Washington Air Space (KCS) 18
D.C. Ready To Assess Evacuation Strategy (WP) 18

War News:

Bush Salutes Military In Radio Address (AP-Y2) 19
The Two Wars Of The Worlds (NYT) 20
Democracy Has Its Own Timetable, Mr. Bush (WP) 22
Dems: Bush Administration Has Failed Vets (AP-Y2) 23
Fighting Words (NYT) 24
Bombers In Iraq Kill 20; Security Forces Are Targets (NYT) .. 25
Suicide Bomber Kills 12 In Iraq (WP) 26
Two Suicide Attacks Kill 26 In Iraq (LAT/AP) 27
The Metrics Of Success In Iraq (WP) 27
Shiites Question U.S. Overtures To Sunni Rebels (LAT) 29
Beat The Insurgents By Talking To Them (LAT) 31
A Town That Bled Under Hussein Hails His Trial (NYT) 32
Afghan Rebel Site Bombed, U.S. Says (WP) 34
U.S. Planes Bomb Suspected Taliban Mountain Base (WT) 35
U.S. Attacks Near Copter Crash Site (LAT) 36
Veterans Confront A Taste Of Battle (WP) 37

Corporate Scandals:

Op-Ed by Michael Kinsley: The Lord And Richard Scrushy (WP) 38

Criminal Law:

The Rove Factor? (NSWK) 39
Rove Talked But Did Not Tattle, Attorney Says (LAT) 40
Lawyer Says Rove Talked To Reporter, Did Not Leak Name (WP) 41
Journalists Say Threat Of Subpoena Intensifies (NYT) 42
Congressman Mum After FBI Searches Home (AP-Y2) 44
Public Defender Rules Are Set To Change (SLPD) 45
State Weighs 2 Bills Requiring Bullet Marking (LAT) 48

Civil Rights:

18 Nabbed In Human-smuggling Scheme (WT) 50
California Court Faces Gay Unions (WT) 50
Recall Star Takes A Remap Risk (DMN) 51
State Ballot, Wider Impact (LAT) 52
Clarity Sought On Romney's Abortion Stance (BOS) 54
Frist Again At The Center Of Stem Cell Fight (WP) 56
NAACP Considers A New Approach (MJS) 58

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Court's Eminent Domain Decision Hailed As Victory For Cities (SLPD) 59
Some Political Give-and-Take On Matters Ecological (WP) .61
A Livable Shade Of Green (NYT) 62
Gang Plunges Tribe Into Turmoil (MJS) 63

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Agents Probing Hormone Shipment (DENP) 65
Drug Case Chilled U.S., Colombia Tie (TAMPTRIB) 66
Gang Busters In Hampton Roads (V-P) 69
Reyna Says 'no Pressure' To Resign (BROWNHER) 71

Tax:

In 2002, More Wealthy People Paid No Tax (NYT) 73

Congress-Administration:

Bush Faces Pivotal Choice For High Court (AP-Y2) 74
White House Promises Bi-Partisan Input From Senate (LAT) 75
For Bush, A Defining Moment (CHT) 76
Court Pick To Test Bush Promise (BOS) 78
Bush Faces Choice Of Advancing Agenda Or Bridging Political Divide (KRT) 79
Bush Has Numerous Constituencies To Consider (MINNST) 81
Both Sides Fear "stealth" Nominee, Observers Say (SLPD) ... 82
O'Connor Resignation Ignites Political Firestorm (DeN) 84
So What's The 'Right' Pick? (NYT) 88
O'Connor Successor Debated (WP) 90
5th Circuit Has Likely Candidates (NOTP) 92
Court's Internal Dynamics - A Factor In Decisions - May Change (KRT) 93
O'Connor's Replacement Is Likely To Be A Swinger (LAT) 94
Court's Liberal Bloc Stands Firm (LAT) 95
More Politicians For The Court (WP) 98
Left And Right, Groups Gear Up (CHT) 99
Fears Of Battle Over High Court (BSUN) 100
Word From O'Connor Sets Off Pre-Fourth Fireworks (WP) .. 102
Interest Groups Gear Up On Court (PPG) 104
Nominee Battle Lines Drawn (DMN) 105
The Right's Moment, Years In The Making (WP) 106
In Battle To Confirm A New Justice, Both Sides Get Troops Ready Again (NYT) 108
Activists Gear Up For Nominee Fight (WP) 110
Conservative Groups Rally Against Gonzales As Justice (NYT) 112
High Noon For High Court (LAT) 115
NOW Marches In Support Of Abortion Rights (AP-Y2) 116
Liberals Gird For Supreme Struggle (WT) 117
Disorder In The Court (NYT) 118
Not A Campaign (WP) 120
Confirmation Battle In Senate Could Define Specter's Career (NYT) 120
Parties Line Up Strategies For Hearings On Nomination (WP) 122
Justice For The Next Justice (WP) 124
High Court's Next Term Full Of Big Cases (AP-Y2) 125
Justice's Exit Could Produce Seismic Shift On High Court (BSUN) 126
One Justice, Many Cases, Lots Of Power (DMN) 128
O'Connor Bow Puts New Focus On Rehnquist (CHT) 130
O'Connor Made Her Mark As Pragmatic Centrist (MINNST) 131
Supreme Difference (WP) 133
Justice O'Connor's Indelible Stamp (WP) 134
Justice Forged A Path For Women (DMN) 135
Feminists On O'Connor: A Mixed Verdict (WP) 136
Increase In The Number Of Documents Classified By The Government (NYT) 137
Feds Increasingly Classify Documents (AP-Y2) 139

Other News:

Vast Crowd Attends Rally For The Poor In Scotland (NYT) .. 140
'Make Poverty History' Protest Draws Tens Of Thousands (LAT) 140
Marchers Rally For G-8 Action On African Poverty (WT) 141
G-8 A Study In Power, Seclusion (AJC) 142
Awakening Economic Powerhouses Eye G-8 (FLSUNSEN/AP) 143
Failure Of Past Efforts Cloud The West's Attempt To Help (LAT) 145
Among Ordinary Africans, G-8 Seems Out Of Touch (WP) .. 146
The Congo Case (NYT) 148
Africa At The Summit (NYT) 154
A Promise, And Pitfalls (LAT) 155
Now's Not The Time For Europe To Go Wobbly (WP) 155
Music, Politics Merge In Live 8 Concerts Across The Globe (KRT) 157
City Of Brotherly Love Brings It On Home (WP) 158
Live 8 Concerts Rock The Globe For Africa (WT) 161
Musical Cry To Help Africa's Poor Is Heard Around Globe (NYT) 162
Start To Make It Better, Live 8 Urges (LAT) 163
Tone Deaf On Africa (NYT) 165
O.K., Japan Isn't Taking Over The World. But China... (NYT) 166
The Chinese Invasion (LAT) 167
Hamas Weighs Abbas' Offer To Join Cabinet (WT) 168
Some West Bank Settlers Dig In Their Heels As Pullout Looms (LAT) 169
Iranian Leader Denies He Took Embassy Hostages (NYT) . 171
Iranian Accused In Killing Of Kurds (WT) 172
For The Poor In Iran, Voting Was About Making Ends Meet (NYT) 173

DOJ_NMG_0000846

TERRORISM NEWS:

Help From France Key In Covert Operations (WP)

By Dana Priest

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

When Christian Ganczarski, a German convert to Islam, boarded an Air France flight from Riyadh on June 3, 2003, he knew only that the Saudi government had put him under house arrest for an expired pilgrim visa and had given his family one-way tickets back to Germany, with a change of planes in Paris.

He had no idea that he was being secretly escorted by an undercover officer sitting behind him, or that a senior CIA officer was waiting at the end of the jetway as French authorities gently separated him from his family and swept Ganczarski into French custody, where he remains today on suspicion of associating with terrorists.

Ganczarski is among the most important European al Qaeda figures alive, according to U.S. and French law enforcement and intelligence officials. The operation that ensnared him was put together at a top secret center in Paris, code-named Alliance Base, that was set up by the CIA and French intelligence services in 2002, according to U.S. and European intelligence sources. Its existence has not been previously disclosed.

Funded largely by the CIA's Counterterrorist Center, Alliance Base analyzes the transnational movement of terrorist suspects and develops operations to catch or spy on them.

Alliance Base demonstrates how most counterterrorism operations actually take place: through secretive alliances between the CIA and other countries' intelligence services. This is not the work of large army formations, or even small special forces teams, but of handfuls of U.S. intelligence case officers working with handfuls of foreign operatives, often in tentative arrangements.

Such joint intelligence work has been responsible for identifying, tracking and capturing or killing the vast majority of committed jihadists who have been targeted outside Iraq and Afghanistan since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, according to terrorism experts.

The CIA declined to comment on Alliance Base, as did a spokesman for the French Embassy in Washington.

Most French officials and other intelligence veterans would talk about the partnership only if their names were withheld because the specifics are classified and the politics are sensitive. John E. McLaughlin, the former acting CIA director who retired recently after a 32-year career, described the relationship between the CIA and its French counterparts as "one of the best in the world. What they are willing to contribute is extraordinarily valuable."

The rarely discussed Langley-Paris connection also belies the public portrayal of acrimony between the two countries that erupted over the invasion of Iraq. Within the Bush administration, the discord was amplified by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who has claimed the lead role in the administration's "global war on terrorism" and has sought to give the military more of a part in it.

But even as Rumsfeld was criticizing France in early 2003 for not doing its share in fighting terrorism, his U.S. Special Operations Command was finalizing a secret arrangement to put 200 French special forces under U.S. command in Afghanistan. Beginning in July 2003, its commanders have worked side by side there with U.S. commanders and CIA and National Security Agency representatives.Organizing Alliance Base

Alliance Base, headed by a French general assigned to France's equivalent of the CIA -- the General Directorate for External Security (DGSE) -- was described by six U.S. and foreign intelligence specialists with involvement in its activities. The base is unique in the world because it is multinational and actually plans operations instead of sharing information among countries, they said. It has case officers from Britain, France, Germany, Canada, Australia and the United States.

The Ganczarski operation was one of at least 12 major cases the base worked on during its first years, according to one person familiar with its operations.

"It's really an effort to come up with innovative ideas and deal with some of the cooperation issues," said one CIA officer familiar with the base. "I don't know of anything like it."

Factions within the intelligence services of several countries opposed a multinational approach, according to current and former U.S. and European government officials who described its inception. The CIA's Counterterrorist Center did not want to lose control over all counterterrorism operations; the British service did not want to dilute its unique ties to Washington; Germany was not keen to become involved in more operations.

And no country wanted to be perceived as taking direction from the CIA, whose practice of extraordinary renditions -- secretly apprehending suspected terrorists and transferring them to other countries without any judicial review -- has become highly controversial in Europe. In Italy, 13 alleged CIA operatives are accused of kidnapping a radical Egyptian cleric off the streets of Milan in 2003.

To play down the U.S. role, the center's working language is French, sources said. The base selects its cases carefully, chooses a lead country for each operation, and that country's service runs the operation.

The base also provides a way for German case officers to read information from their own country's law enforcement authorities, sources said. German law bars criminal authorities from sharing certain information directly with their intelligence agencies.

French law, by contrast, encourages intelligence sharing among its police and security services. In fact, since the Napoleonic Code was adopted in 1804, French magistrates have had broad powers over civil society. Today, magistrates in the French Justice Department's anti-terrorism unit have authority to detain people suspected of "conspiracy in relation to terrorism" while evidence is gathered against them.

The top anti-terrorism magistrate, Judge Jean-Louis Bruguiere, has said that in the past decade, he has ordered the arrests of more than 500 suspects, some with the help of U.S. authorities. "I have good connections with the CIA and FBI," Bruguiere said in a recent interview.

In France, which has a Muslim population reaching 8 percent -- the largest in Europe -- U.S. and French terrorism experts are desperate to take terrorist-group recruiters and new recruits off the streets, and have been willing to put their own anti-terrorism laws into the service of allies to lure suspects such as Ganczarski from abroad.

"Yes, without a doubt there are some cases where we participate that way," one senior French intelligence official said.

France sent its interrogators to Guantanamo Bay to gather evidence that could be used in French court against the French detainees the United States was holding there. France is the only one of six European nations that continues to imprison detainees returned to it from the U.S. military facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Bruguiere and other French intelligence officials like to note dryly that France first realized it had become a target of al Qaeda-style jihadists when a group of Algerian radicals hijacked an airliner with the intent of crashing it into the Eiffel Tower in 1994. They viewed the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon as another, if much larger, part of the jihadist campaign against Western civilization.

So it did not surprise many intelligence officers when, in the days after the attacks, President Jacques Chirac issued an edict to French intelligence services to share information about terrorism with the U.S. intelligence agencies "as if they were your own service," according to two officials who read it.

The steady, daily flow of encrypted messages increased. "We saw a quantitative and qualitative difference in the degree of detail in the information," said Alejandro Wolff, the second-in-charge at the U.S. Embassy here, whose portfolio includes fighting terrorism.

One CIA veteran with knowledge of the U.S.-French intelligence work estimates that the French have detained about 60 suspects since the end of 2001, some with the help of the CIA. "They do as much for us as the British and in some ways more -- if you ask them," said a recently retired senior intelligence official who worked closely with France and other European countries.

France was also an early and willing collaborator in other parts of the world, allowing the CIA to fly its top-secret, armed Predator drone, still controversial inside the Pentagon, from France's air base in the former French colony of Djibouti. Its mission was to kill al Qaeda figures on a classified CIA list of "high-value targets." On Nov. 3, 2002, CIA officers operating remote controls from the air base took their first shot, killing Abu Ali al-Harithi, the mastermind of the October 2000 attack on the destroyer USS Cole, and six others, including Ahmed Hijazi, a naturalized U.S. citizen, in a Yemeni desert.

DOJ_NMG_0000848

The broader cooperation between the United States and France plays to the strengths of each side, according to current and former French and U.S. officials. The CIA brings money from its classified and ever-growing "foreign liaison" account -- it has paid to transport some of France's suspects from abroad into Paris for legal imprisonment -- and its global eavesdropping capabilities and worldwide intelligence service ties. France brings its harsh laws, surveillance of radical Muslim groups and their networks in Arab states, and its intelligence links to its former colonies.

"There's an easy exchange of information," said Pierre de Bousquet de Florian, director of France's domestic CIA, the Directorate of Territorial Surveillance, who declined to comment on specifics of the relationship. "The cooperation between my service and the American service is candid, loyal and certainly effective."

France's willingness to share its dossiers on terrorists has helped the United States make some of its most significant convictions, including those of Ahmed Ressam, who was stopped at the Canadian border on his way to attempt to blow up Los Angeles International Airport in 1999, and Zacarias Moussaoui, a Moroccan who once lived in France and is the only person in the United States to have pleaded guilty in the Sept. 11 hijacking plot.Tension Over Iraq

In the run-up to the Iraq war, the White House drew the battle lines between countries that were tough on terrorists -- the administration included Iraq in the mix -- and those that were not. France's government believed U.N. inspections had successfully contained Saddam Hussein's development of weapons programs, and Bruguiere saw no connection between Iraq and al Qaeda. At the Defense Department, on Capitol Hill and elsewhere, many cast France's opposition to war as evidence it was a slacker when it came to fighting terrorism.

French fries became "freedom fries" on Air Force One and in congressional cafeterias. Rumsfeld prohibited general officers from telephoning their French counterparts, grounded U.S. planes at the Paris Air Show and disinvited the French from Red Flag, a major U.S. military exercise in which they had participated for decades.

Three months into the dispute, the State Department and the CIA made a case for France, citing its intelligence cooperation. Bush eventually told Rumsfeld to desist, according to two former State Department officials. Then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell wrote a memo saying that punishing the French was not U.S. policy. A. Elizabeth Jones, the assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, kept it on top of her desk. "I frequently needed to be able to pull it out and quote it to my Pentagon colleagues," Jones said.

But Rumsfeld persisted a year later, excluding the French Air Force from the Red Flag exercise in 2004.

Rumsfeld's symbolic jabs baffled some officials inside the Bush administration. "Most things the secretary of defense did I could understand, even if I disagreed with him," said Lawrence B. Wilkerson, former chief of staff to Powell. "On this one, it was totally irrational, even dumb."

The intelligence services tried to insulate themselves from the public fray.

"The French were very keen on demonstrating there was no drop-off at all," said Wolff, the U.S. diplomat here. "There was never any sense of this spilling over. There was an effort on both sides to compartmentalize" the differences.

The same was true for the CIA and other U.S. intelligence agencies, which report a steady, daily flow of encrypted messages on terrorism between the CIA and its French counterpart.

"The relations between intelligence services in the United States and France has been good, even during the transatlantic dispute over Iraq, for practical reasons," Bruguiere said. "If you want to have a better grasp of a difficult situation, you have to share intelligence real time."The Ganczarski Operation

Ganczarski, a metallurgist from the industrial Ruhr district in Germany, had been radicalized by a Saudi cleric touring European mosques in the early 1990s, studied Islam on a religious scholarship in the kingdom, traveled to Afghanistan four times, trained in al Qaeda camps, met Osama bin Laden, and returned to Germany from his last trip nine days before Sept. 11, 2001.

Intelligence officials say he was part of a patient, post-9/11 al Qaeda plan to activate European converts, including failed British "shoe-bomber" Richard Reid. Ganczarski's cell phone was the last number that a suicide bomber who killed 21 people on the island of Djerba called in April 2002. Some of the casualties were French, which gave Bruguiere legal grounds to arrest Ganczarski.

DOJ_NMG_0000849

On May 20, 2003, an urgent bit of intelligence was fed into Alliance Base: Ahmed Mehdi, an associate of Ganczarski, had just booked a 14-day vacation to the French island of Reunion in the Indian Ocean.

Mehdi, then a 34-year-old Moroccan who had lived near Ganczarski in Germany, was under surveillance and showing a worrisome interest in remote-control detonators. German authorities, who did not have enough evidence to arrest him or Ganczarski, believed Mehdi was planning an attack on Reunion.

Mid-level case officers working at Alliance Base met to devise a plan: They would entice first Mehdi, then Ganczarski, to France. Bruguiere would lock them up on suspicion of associating with terrorists.

The CIA arranged for an asset to suggest that Mehdi stop in Paris on his way to Reunion to surveil targets. Mehdi, Alliance Base learned from wiretaps, worried that France would not give him a visa, which he needed because he is Moroccan. On cue, the French services arranged for a visa. The Germans monitored calls and contacts there for a change of plans.

On June 1, French authorities apprehended Mehdi at Charles de Gaulle International Airport in Paris. He was sent to Fresnes Prison outside Paris. Two days later, on June 3, 2003, Ganczarski was there, too.

Unbeknownst to the two men, they were held in cells just yards from each other. Authorities used the information gained from one to question the other. Within days, Mehdi told Bruguiere's investigators about the plot, the network and Ganczarski. Investigators now believe that Mehdi has links to al Qaeda's Hamburg cell that plotted the Sept. 11 attacks and that Ganczarski associated directly with Sept. 11 architect Khalid Sheikh Mohammed.

Alliance Base's role in the operation was noted obliquely on June 11, 2003, by Interior Minister Nicholas Sarkozy. Speaking before Parliament, he said, "This arrest took place thanks to the perfect collaboration between the services of the great democracies."

U.S. Seen Prodding Allies In Terror War (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

The top foreign-affairs adviser to the Department of Homeland Security says the United States must do more to spark action among its foreign allies in fighting the global war on terrorism in their own countries.

In an interview while attending a terrorism-law conference here this week, Cresencio S. Arcos, the department's director of international affairs, said: "We need to be more creative in how we engage our allies in the war on terror."

The United States has made great progress working with Britain, Canada and Mexico -- the latter two making up about 60 percent of joint-U.S. homeland security efforts -- said Mr. Arcos.

Department sources, however, say they are "circumspect" about forming joint working groups with governments outside those three nations. "We can't possibly have them with every country in the world," one official said, on the condition of anonymity.

On June 1, DHS officials convened a semiannual conference with British officials to discuss information- and technology-sharing practices in the war on terrorism.

A key topic, said department officials, was how better to involve the European Union in multinational air-security efforts, such as creating more extensive passenger information. The next meeting with Britain is scheduled for December.

Meanwhile, Mr. Arcos, a former senior State Department official who once served as ambassador to Honduras, said perhaps the biggest challenge in engaging allies in Europe and other parts of the world is that the war on terrorism "costs a lot."

Most countries are less willing than the United States to embrace the high price of beefing up security in such places as international airports.

"Increasingly, as we move away from September 11, one of the concerns that we must all be mindful of is that we don't want to let the guard down," Mr. Arcos said. "We need to keep funding up."

Spending by the 22 agencies that form DHS has ballooned in the four years since the hijackings killed nearly 3,000 people in New York, at the Pentagon and in Pennsylvania.

With spending on contracts by homeland security agencies climbing from around $2.5 billion a year in 2001 to nearly $5.8 billion this year, Mr. Arcos said even Congress "is becoming very pricklish" about funding homeland security efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0000850

The bulk of the increased funding, he said, has gone toward private contract firms providing Internet security systems and personnel management services to help ease the transition of nearly two dozen separate agencies into a single, more coherent umbrella department.

"The biggest concern," Mr. Arcos said, "is that we don't lose focus, that we don't just become like a pork barrel."

Man Allegedly Abducted By CIA In Egypt, Lawyer Says (HC)

Houston Chronicle, July 3, 2005

Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, the man at the center of an international controversy over an alleged CIA abduction, is being held in Damanhour prison outside Alexandria though he has not been accused of a crime, according to his lawyer, Muntassir al-Zayyat, a Cairo attorney who defends many Islamists.

In Italy, lawmakers are enraged at what many regard as a flagrant abuse of Italian laws by the U.S. government. Italian authorities who have charged 13 CIA operatives with his abduction say they don't know the whereabouts of Nasr, also known as Abu Omar, and that their requests for information from Egyptian authorities have gone unanswered.

But in Egypt, where such renditions of wanted fugitives are relatively common, the dramatic seizure of Abu Omar in Milan drew little attention.

There are 10,000 to 20,000 political prisoners being held in Egypt, and the case of just one is unlikely to attract much interest, said Hafez Abu Saeda, a lawyer who heads the Egyptian Organization of Human Rights.

The Egyptian government has cracked down on fundamentalist groups for decades.

At the Nasr family's modest apartment in the working-class Alexandria neighborhood of Moharem Bek, his brother Hisham and mother, Safinaz, were too afraid to speak about Abu Omar and threatened to call police when approached by a reporter.

Hisham Nasr later apologized in a telephone interview, though he still refused to discuss his brother's whereabouts beyond saying he is still in prison and that the family is in regular contact with him.

"Please don't make trouble for us," he said. "He is in prison. I can't talk about it. Please forgive me."

For more than a decade, the Egyptian authorities have been hunting down suspected extremists abroad and bringing them back to Egypt, where they are routinely tortured and detained without trial, according to a Human Rights Watch report last month that documented 63 such cases.

Pricey Rendition (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

America's spy agencies need more money, a sleeker bureaucratic structure, fluent Arabic speakers and a host of other reforms and gimmicks to protect the United States and its allies from harm. Add one more urgent need: a sense of proportion.

In substance and style, the exposure of the "extraordinary rendition" -- Bush-era legalese for kidnapping -- of a radical Egyptian cleric off a Milan street in 2003 reveals a crushing inability by higher-ups here to ask and answer sensibly this question: Is this covert act really worth the likely consequences?

It certainly seemed worth it to the spies who lived in five-star luxury hotels while setting up the snatch -- and briefly afterward to rest up, it seems -- as long as the operation was never discovered and publicized. I hear the Hotel Principe di Savoia in Milan makes an unforgettable cappuccino.

But their incredibly sloppy tradecraft in bundling Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr onto a CIA-chartered jet and flying him to Cairo for interrogation virtually guaranteed that the operation would surface and be used against the United States and -- more consequentially -- against Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, one of President Bush's staunchest allies in the war on terrorism.

In the "timing is everything" department, Berlusconi announced Wednesday that he would seek reelection next year, only to be hit on Thursday with a Post exclusive quoting unnamed "CIA veterans" asserting that the Italian government was in on the operation all along.

DOJ_NMG_0000851

The story goaded a tardy, unconvincing denial from Rome of any involvement in the grab. But the earlier total silence from Berlusconi's office and its now overtaken orders to Italian officials not to discuss the matter publicly lend substantial weight to the account of the "veterans."

The quickness of CIA officials to give up sources makes reporters Judith Miller and Matt Cooper look even more heroic for stubbornly resisting the disclosure of theirs to another overzealous, judgment-impaired official, special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald. Cooper and Miller opposed Thursday's decision by Time Inc. to give some documents to Fitzgerald.

Unlike those two journalists, the "veterans" rushed to break a CIA pledge to the Italians never to confirm the incident if it became public -- which it did on June 23 when an Italian magistrate issued arrest warrants for 13 U.S. intelligence agents.

Berlusconi, like other foreign leaders who cooperate intimately with the Bush administration, will have to fend for himself against this embarrassment, which comes after one of his own ace secret operatives was killed in a tragic error by U.S. troops in Iraq. The Italian magistrates -- who have long been convinced that their national chief is a crook -- will make sure the kidnapping story does not go away.

Americans should focus on what this incident reveals about the lack of effective restraints and review placed by the Bush administration

on covert operations. To paraphrase Lord Acton, absolute secrecy corrupts absolutely.

This gung-ho administration has elevated secrecy to a positive end in itself, an attitude that gives extraordinary license to spooks, knuckledraggers and other contract employees of the agency to exceed the normal limits of lying, cheating and breaking other countries' laws.

Knuckle-draggers? It is, I gather, a term of art for a growing number of contract employees who accompany full-time CIA agents on risky missions and who have greater latitude to get physical if need be. The descriptions of the Milan operation suggest that some such outsourcing occurred there.

This is not to say that physicality is not at times required in vital operations, or that renditions should be automatically removed from the kit bag of U.S. foreign policy. The Bush team did not invent rendition. It was inherited and reauthorized by Bill Clinton in a 1995 policy directive and used more extensively during his administration than is generally recognized.

But a look at 18 confirmed renditions from 1987 to 2001 that are documented in FBI, Government Accountability Office and other public records provides an immediate understanding in almost all those cases of why they were ordered, and of the value they held for law enforcement and national security purposes.

The available facts about the abduction in broad daylight of the cleric Nasr, who is still missing, do not provide such prima-facie reassurance -- especially when weighed against the now-apparent costs.

In the current climate of secrecy and fear, there will be no limits on such damaging behavior unless Bush and his new director of national intelligence, John Negroponte, clearly establish them. If they do not, then Congress should. Even a war on terrorism needs to take into account the words spoken by Talleyrand two centuries ago: Above all, not too much zeal.

A Roman Mess (WP)

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

IT IS NOT KNOWN, and may never be, what benefit to U.S. security resulted from the reported CIA seizure of a radical Egyptian cleric on a street in Milan in 2003 and his delivery to Cairo for detention in an Egyptian prison. But the price of the extraordinary operation is all too apparent: from the more than $100,000 some 18 operatives allegedly blew on luxury hotels to the kidnapping charges an Italian prosecutor has brought against 13 of them, to the understandable uproar in Italy and the damage it could cause to future Italian-American cooperation in the war on terrorism. Was the sudden disappearance of Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr and any intelligence it yielded -- allegedly under torture so severe that he lost hearing in one ear -- worth it? It's hard to believe so, especially since Italian authorities are telling journalists that the Bush administration had an workable alternative to its lawless behavior: allowing the security services of a close NATO ally to complete their own legal operation against Mr. Nasr and his associates.

DOJ_NMG_0000852

The botched Italian job is but one example of how the CIA's greatly expanded use of the extralegal practice of "rendition" since 2001 has caused collateral damage to U.S. interests. The repeated and extensive exposure of clumsy and not-so-covert operations to grab terrorism suspects and transport them to foreign prisons has tied the United States to abduction and torture, in some cases of persons who may have been innocent of any crime or extremist connection. It has hurt the Bush administration's relations and ability to cooperate on intelligence and law enforcement with several close U.S. allies, including Canada, Germany and Sweden, as well as Italy. Though the CIA apparently cooperated with counterparts in several of those countries, the exposure of the operations has led to high-profile official investigations in all of them and a damaging political backlash. The refusal of the CIA or other administration spokesmen to respond to the uproar or cooperate with the inquiries has made the problem only worse.

The practice of rendition began before the Bush administration, and in some cases it is a necessary tool in the fight against terrorism. Some terrorists, such as Mir Amal Kansi, the Pakistani who killed two people outside CIA headquarters in 1993, have been captured in relatively lawless regions abroad and returned to the United States for trial. In other cases, where militants have been detained in unstable places but have no intelligence value or legal culpability, it may make sense for the United States to deliver them to their home countries, rather than free them or transport them to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for an indefinite term of detention. But renditions should be rare, and they should have clear rules and oversight. No terrorist suspect should be turned over to a government likely to use torture -- and Egypt, among other Middle Eastern countries, is a well-documented abuser. The CIA should not use illegal means to capture suspects in democratic countries with a strong rule of law, especially if they are allies of the United States. It may make it quicker or easier to get one extremist sheik off the street, but as the Italian case shows, the damage caused by such highhandedness is too great.

How Visa System Failed To Flag Lodi Imam (LAT)

By Rone Tempest

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

As Shabbir Ahmed sits in the county jail on immigration charges connected to an FBI terrorism investigation, federal officials are at a loss to explain how a man who publicly demonstrated his rage against the United States and advocated violence against the U.S.-backed regime in Pakistan could slip so easily through the State Department visa system.

In October 2001, after U.S. military aircraft began bombing Al Qaeda bases and Taliban strongholds in Afghanistan, Ahmed — then a 35-year-old imam of a small mosque in Islamabad — was one of the main speakers at an anti-U.S. demonstration at a market near the U.S. Embassy in the Pakistani capital.

While demonstrators burned American flags and effigies of President Bush, Pakistan Press International news service reported that the slight, bearded Muslim cleric exhorted the crowd to join a jihad, or holy war, against the United States.

A month later at another rally, the Boston Globe quoted Ahmed as calling for a rebellion against Pakistan's president, U.S. ally Gen. Pervez Musharraf: "Whoever is against Islam," said Ahmed, "we will destroy him. If this is rebellion, we are not afraid of rebellion. Blood is going to be spilled in Pakistan."

These events were widely reported by Pakistani and foreign media. But a short time later, probably in January 2002, Ahmed walked into the consular section of the heavily fortified U.S. Embassy compound, where he was granted an uncontested three-year "religious worker" visa to the United States.

He arrived in San Francisco on Jan. 23, 2002, and immediately assumed a position as imam of a Lodi, Calif., mosque that is the center of religious life for that San Joaquin Valley city's large Pakistani American immigrant community. Since then he has made at least two trips back to his native Pakistan.

At an immigration hearing June 24 in San Francisco, Ahmed admitted making the anti-American speeches but said he had since completely changed his opinion about the United States, which he said he now loves and respects.

"He now regrets that he made those statements," said his attorney, Saad Ahmad.

But federal prosecutors, who allege links between Ahmed and Pakistan's banned Harkat-ul-Moujahedeen political party, are not convinced. They have asked Immigration Judge Anthony Murry to deny bail to Ahmed pending a deportation hearing later this year.

DOJ_NMG_0000853

After reading reports about the Islamabad speeches, the leadership of the Lodi mosque where Ahmed worked fired him at a special meeting June 26. "We don't want that kind of person who has spoken against the United States," mosque President Mohammed Shoaib told Associated Press.

The man who sponsored Ahmed for the Lodi job — former Imam Mohammad Adil Khan — is also jailed without bond on immigration charges, as is Khan's 22-year-old son, Mohammad Hassan Adil.

All three men came into the country on R-1 or R-2 religious worker visas. R-2 visas are for spouses and children of R-1 visa holders.

How Ahmed's public pronouncements against the United States went unnoticed remains an unanswered question.

Before his name surfaced as part of an FBI investigation of people in the Lodi area with alleged terrorist ties, Ahmed had had at least four encounters with U.S. officials without setting off any alarms.

The first was with U.S. consular officers at the embassy in Islamabad.

Obtaining a religious worker visa requires a sponsor in the U.S. who promises such a job for the applicant and guarantees a steady source of income.

In Ahmed's case the sponsor was the Lodi mosque, then under the direction of Mohammad Adil Khan. Khan was Ahmed's teacher for many years at Jamia Farooqia, a madrasa, or Islamic school, in Karachi, Pakistan.

Like many madrasas across that nation, Jamia Farooqia had strong connections to the Taliban movement in Afghanistan. "Taliban," in fact, means "religious students."

The school, founded by Khan's father, Salimullah Khan, also has at least a historical connection to Harkat-ul-Moujahedeen. The party had fought Soviet troops in Afghanistan from 1980 to 1988 but by 2001 had been listed as a terrorist organization by the U.S. government.

None of this background appears to have reached consular officers when they considered Ahmed's visa request in early 2002.

Likewise, if intelligence agents or political officers at the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad had noted Ahmed's active participation in anti-U.S. rallies in October and November 2001, they failed to pass the information on to the consular officers.

"In every instance in which we have specific information when an individual intends to do harm to the U.S. or to U.S. citizens, we deny the visa," said Angela Aggelar, spokeswoman for the State Department's Bureau of Consular Affairs. "But in order for a person not to be eligible for a visa, they have to have done something that was reported to us by law enforcement."

Ahmed was also screened by airport immigration and customs officials at the San Francisco airport when he first entered the country and each time he returned from trips to Pakistan.

But it was not until Nov. 15, 2004 — when the Lodi mosque applied for a two-year extension of Ahmed's visa — that his name showed up on a watch list. This was after the FBI's Sacramento office had launched an investigation of alleged terrorist links in Lodi.

By the time federal immigration attorneys arrived in court for the June 24 hearing, they had a complete dossier on Ahmed, including his writings in the Jamia Farooqia magazine and his speeches before the Islamabad crowds.

"Did you encourage people in Pakistan at least five times to go to Afghanistan and kill Americans?" federal attorney Paul Nischiie asked Ahmed. "Did you encourage people to defend Osama bin Laden?"

At the hearing, Ahmed initially answered no to both questions, but he later admitted to making anti-U.S. statements.

Officials in Washington with Homeland Security, Citizenship and Immigration Services, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the State Department had no explanation for why the same questions were not asked three years earlier when Ahmed first presented himself at the U.S. Embassy seeking a visa.

Part of the problem, noted in the 9/11 Commission Report, was that different federal agencies did not communicate well with each other. The Department of Homeland Security was not created until March 2003.

Russ Knocke, a spokesman for Homeland Security, said someone with a similar background would be much more likely to be identified today.

"It shows you how much has changed," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0000854

Consular Affairs spokeswoman Aggelar pointed to the limited resources available to the embassy at the time of Ahmed's first visa request.

In the months immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Aggelar said, the consular database contained 7 million names. The watch list has expanded to more than 20 million names under a new heightened security system in which many more people are likely to be flagged.

This explanation is unlikely to satisfy congressional critics of the consular screening process.

"The State Department's excuse that they didn't have a functioning terrorist list is inadequate," said Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), a critic of immigration policy. "If State thought it was important enough, they would have relayed the message by phone, e-mail, smoke signal or carrier pigeon."

Tancredo, a former Denver schoolteacher, believes that terrorists enter the country using a network that includes imams granted entry on R-1 religious worker visas.

In the 15 years since the R-1 category was established in 1990, more than 145,000 religious worker admissions have been recorded by U.S. immigration authorities.

In fiscal year 2002, the same year that Ahmed came into the country, immigration records show 53 R-1 admissions from Pakistan.

Only relatively recently have federal law enforcement agencies begun to concentrate on investigations of Muslim clerics holding religious worker visas.

Last fall, 62-year-old Muhammad Khalil, imam of a basement mosque in Brooklyn, N.Y., was convicted in federal court of fraudulently sponsoring more than 200 applications for Pakistani religious workers for his Dar Ehya Essunah mosque.

In January, Wagdy Mohammed Ghoneim, the Egyptian head of an Orange County mosque, left the country with his wife and seven children rather than face deportation hearings on immigration charges.

PATRIOT ACT:

County Commission Cites Patriot Act Concerns (EBHNT)

By SUSAN LOYER, STAFF WRITER

East Brunswick (NJ) Home News Tribune, July 3, 2005

NEW BRUNSWICK — The Middlesex County Human Relations Commission is joining the growing list of communities and legislators from around the country taking a stance against the USA Patriot Act.

The commission will issue a formal resolution to lawmakers, municipal governments and local organizations on Tuesday urging them to petition the executive level of the federal government to rescind or modify any law or executive order that diminishes protected civil rights.

"We definitely want to protect our country, our neighbors and our homes, but there are potential dangers in such acts as the Patriot Act," said commission Chairman Bruce S. Morgan. "We take exception to any act or order that erodes the rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution and Bill of Rights."

The USA Patriot Act (Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism) was passed in October 2001 in response to the events on Sept. 11. The act is designed to deter and punish terrorist acts in the United States and around the world and enhance law enforcement investigatory tools.

But some groups, including the Middlesex County Human Relations Commission, believe the act infringes on the rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

According to the resolution, the act and several federal executive orders go beyond legitimate measures of protection against terrorism and lead to infringe on such rights as freedom of speech, religion, assembly and privacy, the right to counsel and due process in judicial proceedings, protection from unreasonable searches and seizure and equal protection under the law.

"The act impedes on our rights of free speech and also allows people to be held without a trial and even without their family's knowledge," said Morgan. "In general, we object to the portions of the act that pertain to human rights. I am hoping that by issuing the resolution, other Americans will take up the banner and bring lawmakers' attention to the portions of the Patriot Act, which I believe are antithetical to the Constitution and Bill of Rights, so they will be repealed."

DOJ_NMG_0000855

Morgan said he believes the act was passed by lawmakers because "they were given so little time to review it and a lot of things may have been missed. We're hoping to get it tailored so it does not erode the rights guaranteed by the Constitution," he said.

The Highland Park Borough Council passed a similar resolution in February 2004. The New Brunswick City Council adopted a similar resolution in May.

Portions of the Patriot Act are due to expire at the end of the year, unless they are renewed by federal officials.

Hagen W. Frank: Patriot Act Not Threat As LSJ Says (LSJ)

Lansing (MI) State Journal, July 3, 2005

Hagen W. Frank is an assistant U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids.

On June 10 and 17, the LSJ ran editorials strongly criticizing the USA Patriot Act. While the articles demonstrated the LSJ's commitment to privacy rights in the face of purported infringements by the Patriot Act, they also demonstrated the editors' unfamiliarity with the constitutional and statutory law that governs federal law enforcement and intelligence investigations.

Both articles focused primarily on section 215 of the act, which expanded the types of materials that may be ordered produced by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (the "FISA Court") in domestic intelligence investigations of foreign powers or international terrorism.

Described by critics as a provision that allows the FBI to go on fishing expeditions of citizens' reading habits - as if the FBI were looking for "busy work" - the provision in fact simply gave the FISA Court the same authority in intelligence and international terrorism investigations to order production of materials that a prosecutor can obtain by grand jury subpoena in a domestic criminal investigation.

According to the June 17 editorial, this is bad because the FISA Court is secret and because the government already had the power to get these materials by search warrant. Secrecy, however, is essential to the kinds of investigations overseen by the FISA Court, i.e., classified intelligence investigations into the activities of foreign powers, suspected agents of foreign powers and international terrorism.

Also, the assertion that search warrants are required to get such materials in domestic criminal investigations is incorrect. Those materials are routinely obtained through grand jury subpoenas, issued by federal prosecutors based only upon a belief that relevant evidence may be found. The Fourth Amendment's probable cause warrant requirement protects reasonable expectations of privacy, not public records of public use of a public facility.

Similarly, the June 10 editorial complains about the Senate Intelligence Committee's endorsement of a proposal to give the FBI administrative subpoena authority in terrorism investigations. According to the LSJ, this would empower the FBI to "investigate citizens without judicial oversight." This complaint assumes incorrectly that every government investigative tool requires judicial oversight.

However, whether judicial pre-approval is required depends upon how intrusive something is and on constitutional, statutory and regulatory provisions that the editorial ignores. Further, administrative subpoenas have long been used by a wide variety of federal agencies.

The FBI already has such authority in health care fraud and child sexual-exploitation investigations, and the proposed measure would simply expand that authority to terrorism investigations.

Even though obtaining evidence through subpoena is not a Fourth Amendment "search," and even though administrative subpoena power is unremarkable, the editorial still warns that this would "give the FBI the power to conduct searches without the approval of any court or grand jury."

Every citizen and every media organization has the right to question and criticize government. However, the LSJ also has the responsibility not to mislead the public on important issues of the day.

The USA Patriot Act presents important issues that call for well-informed debate. The LSJ's recent editorials did not contribute to such a debate.

DOJ_NMG_0000856

Senator Christopher "Kit" Bond: Strong Patriot Act Required (WT)

By Christopher "Kit" Bond

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

As July Fourth approaches, some Americans appear to suffer from amnesia.

With dramatic headlines such as "Ripping Pages from the Book of Civil Liberties," "Patriot Act Fosters Secrecy, Government Abuse" and "Keep Big Brother at Bay," editorial writers and columnists unfairly criticize legislation that has helped keep America safe since September 11, 2001.

A few weeks ago, the U.S. House of Representatives rejected a proposal to make it easier for the FBI to obtain information on suspected terrorists that could help prevent a future attack.

What is going on here? Consider the lyrics of country music artist Darryl Worley's song titled "Have You Forgotten?"

Have you forgotten how it felt that day?

To see your homeland under fire

And her people blown away.

Have you forgotten when those towers fell?

We had neighbors still inside going thru a living hell.

It appears some editorial writers and members of Congress have forgotten. And they are not alone. Fewer Americans -- only 35 percent -- now fear another terrorist attack in the near future than at any time since September 11, a recent USA Today/CNN/Gallup poll found. Despite their complacency, the threat of terrorism continues.

And surely there is no more important public purpose than keeping America safe from another catastrophic terrorist attack on U.S. soil. To do so, Congress should reauthorize the Patriot Act quickly and expand it to give law enforcement more tools to go after suspected terrorists and prevent attacks.

The September 11 attacks showed the failure of a number of legal and regulatory policies that kept intelligence and law enforcement communities from talking to each other and sharing information on investigations of suspected terrorists.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Overhaul Of U.S. Intelligence System May Take 10 Years, Analysts Say (BSUN)

By Siobhan Gorman, Sun National Staff

The Baltimore Sun, July 3, 2005

WASHINGTON - Though the White House announced its intelligence overhaul Wednesday with promises that it would make the country safer, the changes it outlined could take a decade to complete, according to longtime intelligence analysts, including a member of the presidential commission that proposed the reforms.

"The whole process will take five to 10 years," said Adm. William O. Studeman, a member of the commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led the administration to conclude that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction.

Studeman characterized that time frame as an optimistic estimate - one assuming that every part of the intelligence community endorses the changes.

The White House said it embraced 70 of 74 recommendations of the commission, led by U.S. Circuit Judge Laurence Silberman and former Sen. Charles S. Robb of Virginia. The most significant reform would be creation of a domestic intelligence service within the FBI.

Other changes are aimed at slowing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, improving the quality of human intelligence and integrating the efforts of all 15 U.S. intelligence agencies.

But the future of the reforms is in doubt, as Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III have begun maneuvering to regain control over the design of the FBI's intelligence service, said an intelligence veteran responsible for helping the White House implement the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0000857

The president set a 60-day deadline for having a detailed outline of the new domestic intelligence service. The Justice Department is arguing that the planning should begin immediately, while White House aides want to wait until the head of the service is appointed, the intelligence veteran said.

If the deadline is suspended until the White House appoints a chief of the domestic intelligence service, the FBI will lose considerable control over that service's shape.

This early battle for control is symptomatic of the kinds of cultural and turf battles National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte will continually contend with.

President Bush also set a 60-day deadline for the Justice Department to develop a plan for consolidating its three anti-terrorism divisions into one. Negroponte has 30 days to produce plans for his human intelligence management office housed at the CIA.

Once the plans are drafted, the organizations should be up and running within six months, "if people are not dragging their feet," said John MacGaffin, who spent 31 years at the CIA and six at the FBI. He testified before the presidential commission and the 9/11 commission, which investigated the Sept. 11 attacks.

MacGaffin said that the full impact of the reforms would not be felt for "a long time." He said that progress would be "incremental" but that some changes could occur immediately.

He pointed to a large number of intelligence reports on terrorism that the FBI did not pass along to policy-makers on a timely basis because they weren't familiar with intelligence reporting. Instead of seeking assistance from the CIA, he said, "the FBI took refuge in bureaucratic ownership of the information and declined to let the CIA distribute the reports on their behalf."

The greater the direct authority given to Negroponte and others responsible for instituting the president's plans, the faster the changes will take hold, said John Gannon, former chairman of the National Intelligence Council. "Consensus in the intelligence community means status quo."

Skeptics, though, predict that any positive results are much more than 10 years away.

Clark Kent Ervin, former inspector general of the Homeland Security Department, likened the intelligence agencies to the military services circa 1945. He said it took 40 years for the branches to learn - or be forced - to work together. The intelligence agencies are embarking on a similarly long road to reform, he said.

Ervin pointed to the State Department's negotiations with the FBI to gain full access to terrorist watch lists. "It was shocking to learn that as a matter of course, the State Department does not have access to that information," said Ervin, who was the inspector general at the State Department before he moved to Homeland Security.

Ervin also worries that the continual organizational changes could prove self-defeating: Policy-makers have been unwilling to wait to see the effects of one new organization before they start another with a similar mission.

"You've got to have a score card, but the intelligence community has never really had one," MacGaffin said. "The problem is that scorekeeping in intelligence does not lend itself to more traditional metrics. ... If the DNI [Negroponte] can't establish such a system, we'll never know whether we are successful or not."

In the first months, the success of the latest reforms can best be gauged by whom the president appoints to the myriad positions that Bush's plan creates, says former 9/11 commission member John Lehman, who was secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration. The intelligence agencies need new blood to force a change of culture that is largely wedded to Cold War-era rules and processes, he said.

"The administration seems to have an almost childlike faith in the career bureaucracy," he said of Bush's appointments in the office of the director of national intelligence.

Art World Comes To The Cause Of Arrested Artist (SDUT)

By Robert L. Pincus, Union-tribune Art Critic

The San Diego Union-Tribune, July 3, 2005

Imagine this scenario: You are a well-established artist and respected university professor. You wake up one morning to find your spouse of 25 years isn't breathing. You call 911. Paramedics arrive, accompanied by police.

DOJ_NMG_0000858

There are a few petri dishes in the house, because your conceptually oriented work involves scientific-style installations and issues. So, one of those workers decides you just might be a terrorist and calls the FBI.

The next day, as you are on the way to the funeral home, you are detained by the FBI and the Joint Terrorist Task Force. You are held for 22 hours without having your Miranda rights read to you. Your home and even part of your block is cordoned off; your computer, books, manuscripts and anything else deemed suspicious are confiscated by workers in hazmat suits. Even your spouse's body is held for further analysis.

Sound like the outline of a compelling novel or film about governmental abuse of power? Sure. But this story isn't imaginary. It is what University of Buffalo professor Steven Kurtz, a member of the artists' collaborative called Critical Art Ensemble (CAE), experienced in May 2004 when someone who answered his 911 call decided to make a call to the FBI.

This tale doesn't end there; Kurtz is now facing charges that could result in a 20-year prison sentence.

Artists across the United States and beyond have taken up Kurtz's cause, because they feel it is their cause, too. Following an earlier fundraiser in London, an auction to raise money for his defense was held at the esteemed Paula Cooper Gallery in New York in April. Those donating work included some of the best-known contemporary artists – Chris Burden, Ann Hamilton, Barbara Kruger, Sol Lewitt, Louise Lawler, Brice Marden and Kiki Smith, among others.

"We feel that artists' and intellectuals' First Amendment rights are in serious jeopardy under this administration," stated Helen Molesworth, one of the auction's co-organizers, shortly before the event opened. "It's so important, for all of us, that our abilities to be creative thinkers are not hampered by government." (Molesworth is chief curator for exhibitions at the Wexner Center for the Arts in Columbus, Ohio.)

For some years, Kurtz has been a pivotal member of the CAE, a collaborative of artists that, through books, writings on the Web and exhibitions, has reflected on such subjects as what it calls "the flesh machine" (the scientific/medical establishment) and on genetically engineered food. And the group's installations have incorporated bacteria and food testing because of its broader interest in demystifying science for the lay person.

The argument could be made that the FBI and the Terrorist Task Force were being reasonable when they followed up on a phone call and sampled the materials in Kurtz's petri dishes. But the government has continued to pursue prosecution, even after the Commissioner of Public Health for the state of New York declared that the samples of bacteria in the petri dishes were harmless.

While there apparently wasn't enough evidence to bring bioterrorist charges, the government is pursuing wire and mail fraud charges against Kurtz and Robert Ferrell, a former head of the Department of Genetics at the University of Pittsburgh's School of Public Health.

"These laws (on fraud) have been on the books for more than a century. Whether it (the bacteria) is or isn't harmful isn't an element of the offense. The case centers on property acquired by fraud or misstatement," said U.S. Assistant District Attorney William Hochul on Thursday. He's the prosecutor on the case, which is being tried in New York.

Ferrell's crime was to have helped Kurtz obtain $256 worth of benign bacteria, which means he didn't follow the fine print of his contract with a company called American Type Culture Collection. The firm itself has taken no legal action against either Kurtz or Ferrell. Yet if convicted of the government's charges, artist and scientist could serve up to 20 years in prison.

Kurtz, himself, tries to be philosophical about his situation.

"When you stand up to authoritarian parts of the culture, stuff like this will happen," says Kurtz. "People I know say it's inevitable.

"I would temper that point and say it could happen to lots of people, and somehow I got picked. I certainly got the booby prize on this."

Standing up, in CAE terms, means confronting troublesome subjects. As part of The Free Range Project, the CAE lets people have the opportunity to bring in food to be tested for genetic modifications. It had been presented in a European venue but couldn't go on view at the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art in May 2004 because much of the materials were confiscated from Kurtz's home.

"Molecular Invasion" was the CAE's companion book on this subject, which argued that some science can be scrutinized by everyone.

DOJ_NMG_0000859

"Amateur discourse clearly has a place in the transgenic debates since some levels of study can be reviewed by nonexperts," they write. "The stakes are too high for product safety testing to be left solely in the domain of corporate and scientific experts."

One can speculate that the government isn't sympathetic to the latest Critical Arts Ensemble project either, which looks at the history of germ warfare and issues of American policy about biological warfare and bioterrorism. Toward this end, Kurtz had acquired three bacteria that have been used as educational tools in schools. They were in his home at the time of the search.

Having to deal with the case has forced him to work a lot slower, he says. But, he adds, "The FBI is not going to stop us. If anything, we're more committed to what we do, not less."

Looking at the government's goals, he speculated, "They are trying to develop an internal enemy that fits into their canon of fear. Bob (Ferrell) looks like a friendly grandpa. And if they can convince people that even he could be a terrorist, then who isn't a potential terrorist?"

The Critical Art Ensemble Defense Fund has raised enough money to defend him adequately. In May, at the most recent hearing before a judge in Buffalo, Kurtz's attorney, Paul Cambria, asked that the case be dismissed. He argued that the government intentionally misled the judge when obtaining the original search warrant. Any ruling on this won't likely happen until late July or August. Still, if events don't go the government's way, it can appeal, of course, forcing Kurtz to raise more funds for his defense.

He believes that his irreplaceable materials won't ever be returned.

"Even if the case concludes," he says, "they'll probably think of some way to keep the investigation going."

While hearings about the wire and mail-fraud charges have gone forward, a Buffalo grand jury subpoenaed CAE member Steven Barnes. After testifying, Barnes told a reporter, "It seems apparent that the prosecution is still trying to pursue some kind of biological weapons charge."

On what basis they might bring charges is unclear, though initially the Justice Department's Assistant District Attorney William Hochul was trying to use a section of the Patriot Act, which expanded the earlier Biological Weapons Statute.

"Apparently," writes the CAE in a recent essay, "the U.S. Justice Department is now trying to make CAE into an example of what can happen to citizens whose only 'crime' is having thoughts of dissent enacted within the sphere of legality and the alleged protection of constitutional rights."

Whether Kurtz and Ferrell's fraud charges are dismissed or not is only one reason for attention to be paid to this case. The larger issue centers on whether the government's "war on terror" is having a corrosive effect on artistic expression.

Border Watchers Gear Up For Expanded Patrol (LAT)

By Scott Gold

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

As the second act to its civilian border patrol in Arizona, the organization known as the Minutemen has pledged to launch a massive patrol of the entire U.S.-Mexico border this fall.

To protest what they call inadequate security along the border, Minuteman leaders are holding community meetings throughout the South and Southwest to marshal thousands of volunteers. Leaders hope to amass in October to try to block illegal immigration routes in four states.

But the organization is finding that such an ambitious plan will not come together as easily as the April patrol in Arizona that covered 23 miles of the border. That is particularly true in Texas, which has 1,254 miles of the 2,000-mile border.

Unlike Arizona, where patrols operated primarily on public land, most of the land along the border in Texas is privately owned, except for the Big Bend region in the western tip of the state.

Activists would need permission to patrol on private property. But despite the Minutemen's meetings in recent weeks with ranchers and other landowners, many of the owners said they remained torn about the project — supportive of its message, for the most part, but wary of its practical implications.

Many landowners said they were concerned about the potential for a violent exchange between Minutemen and so-called coyotes or, worse, drug traffickers who used some of the same corridors as human smugglers.

DOJ_NMG_0000860

"We're worried about the liability of a confrontation occurring on our ranch," said Dr. Michael Vickers, owner of three cattle ranches, and a rural veterinarian in 10 south Texas counties. "Having them out on some of these ranches may be a dangerous situation."

Vickers said he had attended several of the meetings and remained conflicted. The 1,000-acre ranch he uses as his residence, south of a town called Falfurrias, is about four miles from a U.S. Border Patrol checkpoint. Illegal immigrants frequently bypass the checkpoint by sneaking across his land; they leave behind holes cut in fences, and trash.

"You walk outside and you feel like there are eyes watching you, and most of the time there are," Vickers said. "This is every night, sometimes a hundred or more in a night. And I'm not the only one. This is every ranch in south Texas."

Still, Vickers said he thought the Minutemen might be better off sticking to public areas, such as roadside parks where immigrants were often picked up after crossing.

Minutemen organizers, however, continue to push for access to private property.

"Those that love their country will surely come around to letting us use their land," said Wanda Schultz, a spokeswoman for Americans for Zero Population Growth, a Houston group that expects to play a role in the Texas border campaign.

Organizers in Texas also disagree over whether volunteers should be allowed to confront and even detain illegal immigrants. That dispute is significant because some fear it could threaten the air of legitimacy the Minutemen have captured after the Arizona patrol.

Self-appointed border patrols have long operated in small, ragtag posses and been maligned as vigilantes. Under the umbrella of a unifying organization — and because of the media attention group leaders have generated — they suddenly have a voice in immigration policy.

Though the Minutemen remain controversial — they have been condemned by President Bush and the American Civil Liberties Union, among others — their leaders have testified on Capitol Hill and made numerous television appearances. They attribute their public relations victory in part to a rule rule prohibiting patrollers from any interaction with immigrants.

Volunteers in Arizona were ordered to report their discoveries to the official Border Patrol, which would make arrests.

But with plans underway for a broader watch, some Texas activists are questioning those restrictions.

J.C. Hernandez, a third-generation Texan, is the founder and president of Americans for Zero Immigration. Hernandez was working with Minutemen organizers in Texas and said he expected to play a leading role in the upcoming patrol. He also wants the right, he said, to make a citizen's arrest of suspected illegal immigrants.

"When you fight a war you don't fight it with rhetoric," Hernandez said. "When you fight a war, man, you go in and kill the enemy…. A signal has to be sent to Mexico and all those countries that we are tired of it and we're not going to put up with it. I would handcuff them and walk them physically back to their country."

The two founders of the movement, Jim Gilchrist of Aliso Viejo, Calif., and Chris Simcox of Arizona, said any change to the group's "standard operating procedure" could be devastating to the image that leaders have cultivated.

Gilchrist said he declined to carry a weapon during the Arizona patrol, and he said organizers there determined that volunteers could be charged with kidnapping if they tried to apprehend immigrants.

"This is a bloodless revolution. It has to be," Gilchrist said. "There are a lot of wannabe soldiers. They think that this is a call to literally defend their country with arms…. But this is not a war. We can't look like a bunch of Rambos."

Simcox, who was in Texas recently to plan strategy, said veering from his script would feed criticism from government officials and human rights groups.

"They are just waiting for someone to make a mistake and break the law," Simcox said. "This is the only model that will work. If there are groups out there advocating citizen's arrests, they are treading on dangerous territory. They could ruin this entire movement."

Some activists contend that a careful reading of Texas law, however, would permit a more aggressive response. State law says a police officer or "any other person" may arrest someone when a felony is committed in that person's presence or "within his view."

"It is under discussion," Schultz said. "I agree that it might be legal under the law."

DOJ_NMG_0000861

Discussions with landowners and the debate over confronting immigrants are not the only problems that have arisen since plans for a broader campaign were announced.

The group's two founders have gone their separate ways since Arizona. Volunteers who worked alongside them said the two clashed over management tactics and strategy, though both have played down reports of tension.

Gilchrist has left the patrol operation and is instead marshaling forces to investigate companies that hire illegal immigrants. Simcox has taken the helm of the border patrol campaign.

As a result, there is considerable confusion over who controls the "Minuteman" name. Gilchrist and Simcox share a dual Internet portal used to spread the group's message and recruit volunteers. Gilchrist controls the "Minuteman Project" name, he said, and Simcox controls the parallel Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, which includes the border patrol campaign.

There are numerous splinter groups; at least seven organizations affiliated with the Minuteman Project have separate plans for smaller border patrols in Texas. The division has fueled renewed criticism from some officials in southern Texas, who have asked the Minutemen to stay away.

"It tells you something," said Laredo Mayor Betty Flores, whose border town would be an anchor of the Texas campaign.

"When that happens to a private business, when you don't know who the CEO is, things go wrong. Can you imagine if the same thing happens to an organization like this? It's very dangerous."

Small Plane Violates Washington Air Space (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, July 3, 2005

A small plane entered restricted air space in the Washington area before two fighter jets forced it to land at an airport here, authorities said.

U.S. Secret Service spokesman Jonathan Cherry would not say what air space the small Cessna passenger plane violated on Saturday, the Frederick News-Post reported.

There is a 16-mile restricted zone in each direction from the Washington Monument and Camp David, near Thurmont, where President Bush was spending the weekend, is also off limits.

Two F-16 fighter jets were deployed and they forced the small plane to land at Frederick Municipal Airport. Officials were questioning a man and a woman Saturday, according to the News-Post. There were no arrests.

On Wednesday, the White House briefly went to a red alert when a plane entered restricted airspace around Washington.

In that incident, President Bush was hurried from his residence to a safer location and lawmakers were evacuated from the Capitol. Two fighter jets intercepted a twin-engine, propeller-driven plane eight miles northeast of the Capitol and escorted it to Winchester, Va.

The White House press office did not return calls for comment early Sunday.

D.C. Ready To Assess Evacuation Strategy (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

The first test of Washington's downtown emergency evacuation plan is expected to clear the Mall of most Fourth of July revelers tomorrow and speed them on their way within an hour, officials said yesterday.

"A good majority of people will be out of there in that time span," said Douglas Noble, chief traffic engineer for the D.C. Department of Transportation.

The plan, which calls for police to direct the hundreds of thousands of pedestrians and motorists to seven evacuation routes, where green and red traffic signals will run longer, was developed two years ago in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. City officials have tried to publicize it, even painting special signs on streets along the routes directing drivers to the Capital Beltway, but they acknowledged that a major test is needed to tell people how they should flee if terrorists were to strike the city.

"We are trying to educate people that in the event of an unfortunate emergency, these are the routes you would use," DOT spokesman Bill Rice said. "The idea is to see in a limited situation how our systems respond, how motorists and pedestrians respond, and work the kinks out on a smaller scale and hopefully never have to use it on a larger scale."

DOJ_NMG_0000862

Experts said yesterday that they knew of no other major U.S. city that has recently tested emergency evacuation routes. "It makes perfect sense," said Brian Jenkins, a terrorism expert who co-wrote a report on how transportation, primarily in New York City, functioned on Sept. 11. "There are two ways of learning," Jenkins said. "One is you produce a theoretical plan, put it on the shelf and wait for a real incident. The other is to run a test, see how it works and make corrections. Mistakes are free."

The routes in what is being billed as Operation Fast Forward include Constitution Avenue between 15th and 23rd streets NW; Independence Avenue between Third Street and Washington Avenue SW; and 14th Street between Pennsylvania Avenue NW and C Street SW.

City officials yesterday provided additional details about the test. They said it was designed to start 15 minutes after the fireworks end because planners believe that will give most pedestrians enough time to walk from the Mall to Metro stations while drivers retrieve their cars from garages. Cars will then flood the streets right about the time pedestrian volume is decreasing, which the city hopes will avoid massive tie-ups.

"Typically, you get a big clearance off the Mall right after the fireworks," Noble said. "Waiting 15 minutes allows people to get out of the Mall, get up into town, get to Metro stations, get to parking garages, and then this gets deployed as people actually leave the garages.

"If we did this right at the start," Noble added, "it would be just a mess."

D.C. police officers will direct people from the Mall to the seven evacuation routes, although they will not stop drivers and pedestrians from using other routes if they choose. Along the emergency routes, streetlights will operate on extended cycles of three minutes green followed by one minute red. Planners believe the extra green-light time will speed cars out of town while a minute of red will allow lingering pedestrians to cross streets. At rush hour, D.C. traffic lights typically run 70 seconds green followed by 30 seconds red.

Transportation officials will observe the evacuation from the command center in the Reeves Municipal Center on 14th Street NW, watching televised images from about 50 traffic cameras at the intersections.

City officials chose the evacuation routes, known as E-routes, two years ago as part of the government's massive response to the Sept. 11 attacks. Officials have struggled with how to evacuate Washington during a terrorist attack and have concluded that the region's roads and transit network cannot handle a citywide evacuation. Instead, officials have focused on moving smaller groups from specific locations.

Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) yesterday questioned whether the test was poorly timed because it will ensnare tourists, rather than educating the many residents who are out of town for the holiday weekend.

"I'm also not sure exactly what it will prove," she said. "It may be something of a test of mass transportation, but there will be little test of what really stopped us on 9/11, which was lots and lots of cars going the same way."

But law enforcement and Metro officials yesterday said they support the evacuation plan. "This is a twofer," U.S. Capitol Police Chief Terrance W. Gainer said. "We need to move the people off the Mall anyway. Why not use this opportunity to drill your plan and make sure it is working?"

About 125,000 vehicles are expected to travel downtown for the festivities, according to AAA Mid-Atlantic. Metro estimates that more than 300,000 spectators rode trains to last year's Fourth of July celebration, which was marred by rain. More than 500,000 people took Metro to the fireworks display the year before.

The other downtown evacuation routes are Ninth Street between Pennsylvania Avenue NW and Interstate 395; South Capitol Street between Washington Avenue and M Street; Washington Avenue between Independence Avenue SW and South Capitol Street; and Third Street between Constitution Avenue NW and Independence Avenue SW.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Salutes Military In Radio Address (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 3, 2005

President Bush paid tribute to America's military forces Saturday, saying that Independence Day is an occasion for the nation to express thanks by flying the flag, sending letters to troops and reaching out to their families.

DOJ_NMG_0000863

"At posts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and around the world, our men and women in uniform are taking the fight to the terrorists overseas, so that we do not have to face the terrorists here at home," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

He said U.S. forces have freed millions of people from oppression, in keeping with the principle of the Declaration of Independence "that all are created equal and all are meant to be free.

"Those who serve today are taking their rightful place among the greatest generations that have worn our nation's uniform," the president said.

He will celebrate July Fourth with a visit to Morgantown, W.Va.

"In this time of testing, all our troops and their families can know that the American people are behind them," Bush said. "On this Fourth of July weekend, I ask every American to find a way to thank men and women defending our freedom — by flying the flag, sending letters to our troops in the field, and helping the military family down the street."

He said other methods of tribute are outlined on a Pentagon Web site, http://www.AmericaSupportsYou.mil.

The Two Wars Of The Worlds (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

ON the morning after George W. Bush spoke to the nation from Fort Bragg, Americans started marching off to Steven Spielberg's "War of the Worlds." Both halves of this double feature invoked 9/11, perfectly timed for this particular holiday. Ever since "Jaws," a movie set on the July Fourth weekend, broke box office records 30 summers ago, Independence Day has come to stand for terror as much as for freedom.

Decide for yourself if "War of the Worlds" is more terrifying than "Jaws." Either way, it's scarier than the president's speech. Yet the discrepancy between Mr. Spielberg's ability to whip up fear and Mr. Bush's inability isn't merely a matter of aesthetics. On Independence Day 2005, this terror gap is an ideal barometer for gauging the waning political power of a lame-duck president waging what increasingly looks like a lame-duck war.

As we saw on Tuesday night, doomsday isn't the surefire hit it used to be for Mr. Bush. Now that the rhetorical arsenal of W.M.D.'s and mushroom clouds is bare, he had little choice but to bring back that oldie but goodie, 9/11, as the specter of the doom that awaits us if we don't stay the course - his course - in Iraq. By the fifth time he did so, it was hard not to think of that legendary National Lampoon cover: "If you don't buy this magazine, we'll kill this dog."

Planned or not, the sepulchral silence of Mr. Bush's military audience was the perfect dazed response to what was literally a summer rerun. The president gave almost the identical televised address, albeit with four fewer 9/11 references, at the Army War College in Pennsylvania in May 2004. It's so tired that this time around even the normally sympathetic Drudge site gave higher billing to reviews of "War of the Worlds." Fewer TV viewers tuned in than for any prime-time speech in Mr. Bush's presidency. A good thing too, since so much of what he said was, as usual, at odds with reality. The president pledged to "prevent Al Qaeda and other foreign terrorists from turning Iraq into what Afghanistan was under the Taliban" a full week after Newsweek and The New York Times reported on a new C.I.A. assessment that the war may be turning Iraq into an even more effective magnet and training ground for Islamic militants than Afghanistan was for Al Qaeda in the 1980's and 90's.

"War of the Worlds" makes as many references to 9/11 as Mr. Bush did. The alien attack on America is the work of sleeper cells; the garments of the dead rain down on those fleeing urban apocalypse; poignant fliers are posted for The Missing. There is also a sterling American military that rides to the rescue. Deep in the credits for "War of the Worlds" is a thank-you to the Department of Defense and some half-dozen actual units that participated in the movie, from the Virginia Army National Guard to a Marine battalion from Camp Pendleton, Calif. Indeed, Mr. Spielberg seems to have had markedly more success in recruiting extras for his film than the Pentagon has had of late in drumming up troops for Iraq.

That's not the only way that "War of the Worlds" shows up Mr. Bush. In not terribly coded dialogue, the film makes clear that its Americans know very well how to distinguish a war of choice like that in Iraq from a war of necessity, like that prompted by Al Qaeda's attack on America. Tim Robbins - who else? - pops up to declare that when aliens occupy a country, the "occupations always fail." Even Tom Cruise's doltish teenage screen son is writing a school report on "the French occupation of Algeria."

DOJ_NMG_0000864

Mr. Spielberg's movie illuminates, too, how Mr. Bush has flubbed the basic storytelling essential to sustain public support for his Iraq adventure. The president has made a tic of hammering in melodramatic movie tropes: good vs. evil, you're with us or you're with the terrorists, "wanted dead or alive," "bring 'em on," "mission accomplished." When you relay a narrative in that style, the audience expects you to stick to the conventions of the genre; the story can end only with the cavalry charging in to win the big final battle. That's how Mr. Spielberg deploys his platoons, "Saving Private Ryan"-style, in "War of the Worlds." By contrast, Mr. Bush never marshaled the number of troops needed to guarantee Iraq's security and protect its borders; he has now defined "mission accomplished" down from concrete victory to the inchoate spreading of democracy. To start off sounding like Patton and end up parroting Woodrow Wilson is tantamount to ambushing an audience at a John Wayne movie with a final reel by Frank Capra.

Both Mr. Bush's critics and loyalists at times misunderstand where his failure leaves America now. The left frets too much that the public just doesn't get it - that it is bamboozled by the administration and won't see the light until it digests the Downing Street memo. But even if they couldn't bring themselves to vote for John Kerry, most Americans do get it. A majority of the country view the Iraq war as "not worth it" and going badly. They intuitively sense that as USA Today calculated on Friday, there have been more U.S. military deaths (roughly a third more) in the year since Iraq got its sovereignty than in the year before. Last week an ABC News/Washington Post survey also found that a majority now believe that the administration "intentionally misled" us into a war - or, in the words of the Downing Street memo, that the Bush administration "fixed" the intelligence to gin up the mission.

Meanwhile, the war's die-hard supporters, now in the minority, keep clinging to the hope that some speech or Rovian stunt or happy political development in the furtherance of democratic Iraqi self-government can turn public opinion around. Dream on. The most illuminating of all the recent poll numbers was released by the Pew Research Center on June 13: the number of Americans who say that "people they know are becoming less involved emotionally" with news of the war has risen from 26 percent in May 2004 to 44 percent now. Like the war or not, Americans who do not have a relative or neighbor in the fight are simply tuning Iraq out.

The president has no one to blame but himself. The color-coded terror alerts, the repeated John Ashcroft press conferences announcing imminent Armageddon during election season, the endless exploitation of 9/11 have all taken their numbing toll. Fear itself is the emotional card Mr. Bush chose to overplay, and when he plays it now, he is the boy who cried wolf. That's why a film director engaging in utter fantasy can arouse more anxiety about a possible attack on America than our actual commander in chief hitting us with the supposed truth.

If anything, we're back where we were in the lazy summer of 2001, when the president was busy in Crawford ignoring an intelligence report titled "Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States" and the news media were more preoccupied with a rash of "Jaws"-like shark attacks than with Al Qaeda. The sharks are back, and the "missing girl" drama of Natalee Holloway has echoed the Chandra Levy ur-text. Even the World Trade Center is making a comeback, if we are to believe that the new Freedom Bunker unveiled for ground zero might ever be built.

AS those on all sides of the Iraq argument have said, the only way for Mr. Bush to break through this torpor is to tell Americans the truth. Donald Rumsfeld did exactly that when he said a week ago that the insurgency in Iraq might last as long as 12 years. If that's so, then what? Go ahead and argue that pulling out precipitously or setting a precise exit timetable is each a bad option, guaranteeing that Iraq will become even more of a jihad central than this ill-conceived war has already made it. But what is Plan C?

Mr. Bush could have addressed that question honestly on Tuesday night. Instead of once more cooking the books - exaggerating the number of coalition partners, the number of battle-ready Iraqi troops, the amount of non-American dollars in the Iraq kitty - he could have laid out the long haul in hard facts, explaining the future costs in manpower, money and time, and what sacrifices he proposes for meeting them. He could have been, as he is fond of calling himself, a leader.

It was a blown opportunity, and it's hard to see that there will be another chance. Iraq may not be Vietnam, but The Wall Street Journal reports that the current war's unpopularity now matches the Gallup findings during the Vietnam tipping point, the summer of 1968. As the prospect of midterm elections pumps more and more genuine fear into the hearts of Republicans up for re-election, it's the Bush presidency, not the insurgency, that will be in its last throes. Is the commander in chief so isolated in his bubble that he does not realize this? G.W.B., phone home.

DOJ_NMG_0000865

Democracy Has Its Own Timetable, Mr. Bush (WP)

By Richard H. Kohn

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

"America's mission in Iraq," the president proclaimed in his speech at Fort Bragg on Tuesday, "is . . . a free, representative government that is an ally . . . and a beacon of hope in a part of the world that is desperate for reform." And it should be a nation, he continued, "that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself."

A tall order. Contrary to the rosy picture of our past so prevalent in Washington today, this country possesses a rich and often troubled history of intervention and nation building, and even empire. We succeeded in building democracy at home but largely failed in planting it abroad, which ought to make all of us, the president included, wary of so vague a goal in Iraq, and exceedingly careful in crafting a strategy to set that country on the road to stability and independence.

From the very beginning, we were nation builders. At the same time as they created a republic, the Founders themselves spoke enthusiastically and confidently about a rising American empire. 19th-century successors expanded over the continent (our "Manifest Destiny"), conquering and then ultimately forcing the Indians onto reservations. End-of-century colonization of foreign lands in the Caribbean and western Pacific was followed by 20th-century occupations in Europe and Asia. And our own generation has overthrown governments in Panama and Haiti, sent troops into Somalia, Bosnia, Kosovo and elsewhere, and now has embarked on nation building in Afghanistan and Iraq.

It is clear from looking back over these many attempts that when the president claimed on Tuesday that we have "made progress, but we have a lot of -- a lot more work to do," he spoke a larger truth than even he perhaps realizes.

We seem to have forgotten just how difficult our own struggle at home for democracy, freedom, social justice and national security has been. Our liberties grew over time, in fits and starts, with periods of violence -- race riots, labor strife, domestic bombings, veterans' protests, the upheavals of the 1960s. It took nearly a century and a catastrophic civil war to abolish slavery. It took another 60 years to enfranchise women. Sometimes liberty regressed, for example in time of war -- a possibility expressed frequently today as Congress debates renewing the Patriot Act and the courts struggle with definitions of freedom of the press.

Abroad, the American experience has been marked by decidedly less success. Over the course of our history, we have occupied defeated enemies (Mexico in the 1840s, Japan in the late 1940s and Germany -- twice -- after the two World Wars), sent troops into countries where our interests were threatened, assisted nations under attack, and overthrown regimes that threatened us in some way. The few times that the United States has attempted to defeat insurgencies or build viable democratic regimes, it has sometimes met with temporary success but ultimately, almost always failed.

Between 1898 and the early 1930s, American soldiers and Marines intervened in or occupied countries in the Caribbean and Central America almost 20 different times to protect U.S. economic interests or to develop the countries or simply to suppress revolts and provide order. Democracy was rarely if ever the result. Interventions during the Cold War -- whether overt or covert -- usually propped up unsavory undemocratic governments in an effort to combat communism. And while some interventions -- Nicaragua and Panama in the 1980s -- fostered democracy, others, like Chile, had the opposite result.

While nation building in Asia has been more successful, it was marked by notable failures. In the Philippines, after suppressing the insurrection against American rule between 1899 and 1903, the United States maintained permanent garrisons to support a colonial administration, didn't relinquish control until the mid-1940s, had assisted in defeating a communist insurgency in the 1950s, then watched the country slip back into dictatorship before democracy took hold in the late 1980s. Japan was perhaps the most dramatic success, but South Korea suffered Syngman Rhee's autocracy and then decades of military authoritarianism before democracy emerged. The United States never succeeded in liberalizing Ngo Dinh Diem's government in South Vietnam before acquiescing in military rule and then North Vietnamese victory in 1975.

Since the Cold War, the record has been ambiguous. Progress in Bosnia has been painfully slow, 10 years after American troops arrived intending to stay but a year, and few would count that country -- or its Kosovo neighbor -- as a free, democratic regime able to defend itself. Twice U.S. troops have been sent to Haiti without even stabilizing that troubled nation, much less solidifying democracy. None of this bodes well for the continuing conflicts in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Each example, of course, stands alone -- the product of place and time, the individual experience of a country and its population, and the actions undertaken by the governments and groups involved. But the historysuggests that democracy, freedom and liberty take root slowly and face formidable obstacles even in a country such as ours that inherited a reverence for law, and after 1815 grew for over a century without significant foreign threats to national security.

DOJ_NMG_0000866

Few would suggest that today, with American and others' experience to draw upon, democratization needs to be as slow as it was in the United States and Europe. Indeed democratization has advanced dramatically in many places in the last 25 years. But in societies less blessed with the advantages of the United States and other western democracies, the challenges are immense and sometimes the push for democracy can actually slow or even reverse freedom and liberty.

In a country where there is a history of colonial subjugation and autocratic rule, clan or ethnic rivalries and religious hatreds, discrimination against minorities and women, and underdeveloped or dependent economies, the obstacles are all the greater. The absence of such norms as the respect for equality, religious freedom, civil liberty, civilian control of the military and political compromise -- even when no foreign or domestic foes are threatening force -- indicates that the United States will have to make some very difficult choices in Iraq during the next few months.

Withdrawal while the insurgency rages even at a slower tempo will invite chaos and civil war, and clearly a defeat of the president's intentions. Staying for many years, with a large American military presence, is likely not only to weaken the Iraqi government but to stimulate jihadi recruitment and attacks, undermining the larger war on terrorism.

The moderate course in between, which the administration is pursuing, possesses dangers of its own. The fighting must be turned over largely to the Iraqis and quickly -- in a year or two. Explicit milestones and a reduced American footprint will have many advantages: revealing our strategy and marking its progress in order to maintain American patience and gain international support; diluting enemy propaganda about our motives; and removing a major impulse behind the insurgency.

More important will be the progress of Baghdad's government, on which all else rests. Here history suggests that we will have to assess its character with a more realistic standard of what's possible. "The mission" must be defined with greater precision than the president offered last Tuesday if the American people are to accept continuing expenditures of blood and money. Sooner or later we will need a realistic rendering of what "success" involves. Squishy generalities won't suffice; the public has a keen nose for fakery and fraud. The president knows "that Americans want our troops to come home as quickly as possible." If, as he says, "So do I," he may have to accept a less robust definition of a free and democratic government in Iraq -- and its analogue elsewhere in the Middle East -- than he asserted this past week. If he won't, then the American people will have to force an outcome more in keeping with historical reality.

Richard Kohn, a military historian and former chief of history for the U.S. Air Force, chairs the Curriculum in Peace, War, and Defense at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Dems: Bush Administration Has Failed Vets (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 3, 2005

President Bush's recent denials concerning the financial straits of the Veterans Affairs Department represented another administration failure to level with Americans about the costs of the Iraq war, Sen. Patty Murray (news, bio, voting record), D-Wash., said Saturday.

"Due to their failures, we saw troops using scrap metal to armor their Humvees," Murray said in the weekly Democratic radio address.

"Due to their failures, we saw families raising funds to buy bulletproof vests for soldiers fighting in Iraq. And now, due to their failures, we see that the VA doesn't have the money to provide the needed medical care when our troops return home."

Murray and other Democrats had long questioned whether the department would have enough money to pay medical costs for veterans returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. The administration repeatedly denied it, but the VA acknowledged last week it was short at least $1 billion this year.

On Wednesday, the Senate voted 96-0 to spend an extra $1.5 billion to cover the politically sensitive shortfall.

"We're still working to find out the exact size of the shortfall, but one thing is clear: It results from either deliberate misdirection or gross incompetence," Murray said.

DOJ_NMG_0000867

"The president has an obligation to our troops, their families and to the American people to tell the truth about the costs and sacrifices necessary to win the war in Iraq," she said. "There's no better time than now, as we celebrate our country's independence and all that is great about this nation, for the president to give us the facts and lay out a plan."

Fighting Words (NYT)

By Interview By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Q: You're one of a growing number of Republicans who have lately accused President Bush of botching the war in Iraq.

If someone says I am a disloyal Republican because I am not supporting my party, let them say it. War is bigger than politics.

You, John McCain and John Kerry are the only current U.S. senators who served in Vietnam.

I got to Vietnam in December of 1967, and I was wounded twice with my brother Tom, who was with me. I still have some shrapnel in my chest that the doctors never took out. The second time my face was burned pretty bad, and I had both eardrums blown out.

Are you saying you are deaf?

Eardrums heal, but I did lose some hearing.

Did you kill anyone in the war?

Well, I am sure I did.

How would you compare the situation in Iraq with the one in Vietnam?

Congress was absent during the Vietnam War, and they didn't ask the tough questions, and consequently we lost 58,000 Americans and lost a war and humiliated this nation. It took a generation to get over it. As long as I am here as a U.S. senator, I am going to do whatever I can to make sure that isn't going to happen.

What do you suggest that the president do?

For starters, we don't have enough troops. But I don't think the answer to increasing manpower is to pursue some of the things the Pentagon is doing, such as doubling and tripling bonuses for those in the military. Kids do not serve their country because they are in it to make money.

Many serve to help pay for school and because they see it as a career.

Of course. But you aren't going to attract the kind of people we have been able to attract just by incentives. When you try to project military recruitment through bonuses, you are going to get people signing up for the wrong reasons.

On the other hand, with our deficit now exceeding $400 billion, aren't we sort of out of money?

In terms of the deficit, we have blown the top right off. We're a bunch of Democrats.

I've never heard anyone call President Bush a Democrat.

That's my point. We're less honest about it. We built the biggest government history has ever seen under a Republican government. The Democrats are better because they are honest about it. They don't pretend. I admire that. They'll say: "We want more money. We need more money."

Where do you think the Republican Party needs to go?

I'd take it back to the party of Eisenhower, Goldwater and Reagan. It was a pretty simple party in those days. It was all about limited government, fiscal responsibility, strong national defense and pro-trade foreign policy.

Will that be your message in your 2008 presidential campaign?

Well, first of all, I haven't said I am running.

You are rumored to be a candidate.

As John McCain has said to me, Anyone who is not in detox is rumored to be a candidate.

Well, you're not too old to run.

I'll be 59 in October. I'm a puppy. I think it's young. I'm really happy with my age, and I can't do anything about it.

Actually, I think it's warped to talk about 2008 so much. Pundits care too much about betting on the next winner, and then they lose interest once the contest is over.

DOJ_NMG_0000868

That's because there's a dynamic to politics that has lately been overtaken by show business. Politics is show business. It's just show business for the ugly. It's Hollywood without all the beautiful people.

Bombers In Iraq Kill 20; Security Forces Are Targets (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Three suicide bombers blew themselves up on Saturday in two separate attacks aimed at Iraqi security forces, killing at least 20 people and wounding at least 59, police officials said.

The first explosion took place at a recruiting center in western Baghdad. The blast killed at least 12 people and wounded at least 23. Those killed were all men trying to get jobs with the security forces, said Maj. Gen. Rasheed Flayeh, the commander of the Interior Ministry's commando units.

The attack occurred at 8:50 a.m., as men waiting outside the center were being called in small numbers to enter the building. Each group was searched at a checkpoint about 600 feet from the building. The bomber blew himself up at that checkpoint, apparently because he would not have been able to pass through undetected with his load of explosives, General Flayeh said.

he second attack took place at 10 p.m. at a restaurant beside the police commando headquarters in the town of Hilla, south of Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. Two suicide bombers detonated their explosives, killing at least eight police officers and wounding at least 36 others.

The separate attacks on Saturday were the latest in a long series of deadly bombings at recruiting centers and police stations. Insurgents have struck such places to discourage Iraqis from joining the security forces. Yet Iraqis continue to line up in large numbers at the centers, largely because few jobs are available in the ravaged economy here.

In the northern city of Mosul, a police colonel was shot dead on his way to work, the police said, according to The Associated Press.

South of the capital, in an area heavily populated by insurgents, a bomb exploded in a vegetable cart in the town of Mahmudiya, killing two people and wounding 10 others.

The explosion took place a few minutes after mourners had passed by with the body of Sheik Kamaleddin al-Ghuraifi, a senior aide to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the most revered Shiite cleric in Iraq.

Sheik Ghuraifi was gunned down on Friday in the capital, in another sign of worsening sectarian tensions. It was unclear whether his funeral procession, which was headed to the Shiite holy city of Najaf, was the target of the bombing in Mahmudiya.

"The problem of sectarian tension is real," a senior American official told reporters on Friday evening, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of government protocol. "It requires calm heads on all sides. It requires all sides to make a commitment against violence."

Despite the large numbers of Shiite civilians and security officers killed during the Sunni-led insurgency, the grand clerics of Najaf, and in particular Ayatollah Sistani, have not publicly urged violent reprisals.

Instead, they have promoted a quick advancement of the political process, so that religious Shiite parties can take the reins of power in the government. Now, those parties have control of institutions like the Interior Ministry and are populating the security forces with fighters loyal to them.

In recent weeks, an increasing number of Sunni Arabs have expressed concern about operations carried out by those forces. They also accuse Shiite militias like the Badr Organization, which was formed and trained in Iran during the years Saddam Hussein was in power, of carrying out assassinations of Sunni figures.

A Sunni political group, the National Dialogue Council, released a statement on Saturday denouncing an American-led military operation in Anbar Province, west of Baghdad.

The military sweep began early last week and has focused on the towns of Hit and Haditha in the Euphrates River corridor. The operation is being led by the Second Marine Division.

In its statement, the National Dialogue Council said the American-led forces had engaged in "the most horrible kinds of killing and destruction," including the killing of civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0000869

Capt. Jeffrey Pool, a spokesman for the Second Marine Division, has maintained that the marines have conducted themselves properly during the operation.

But on Friday, an Iraqi ambassador to the United Nations, Samir Sumaidaie, sent out an e-mail message saying a cousin of his, Muhammad al-Sumaidaie, had been shot dead by marines recently while the marines searched a house near Haditha. The killing took place in "cold blood," the e-mail message said. The marines said they were investigating.

Suicide Bomber Kills 12 In Iraq (WP)

By Andy Mosher And Naseer Nouri

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

Thwarting security measures set up to protect a police recruiting center already hit by vehicle bombs, an attacker wearing explosives walked into the midst of a group of men applying for police jobs Saturday and detonated his charge, killing himself and at least 12 others, police and witnesses said.

The 9 a.m. attack on the police commando base in Baghdad's Yarmouk district "was not very loud. It sounded like the explosion of a tire," said Mays Naib, 32, who lives nearby.

Police initially put the death toll at 20, but the number was revised downward to 12, said police Col. Adnan Abdul Rahman, an Interior Ministry spokesman. He said 14 people were wounded.

Over the course of a nearly two-year-old insurgency in which assaults on Iraqi and U.S. security forces have been frequent, attackers repeatedly have targeted places where men stand in line to apply for jobs with the police and Iraqi army. Because would-be recruits typically are made to wait outside fortified bases and recruiting centers, they have proved to be easy targets for often-deadly bombings.

After previous attacks on the base in Yarmouk, the surrounding street had been blocked to provide greater security, Naib said. "So they send a suicide bomber to do this attack. Because of this recruiting center, we feel like we live in a battlefield," she said.

Despite the dangers that the job-seekers pose to the neighborhood, Naib said she felt sorry for "those poor people."

"What are they supposed to do?" she said. "They came here to look for a job and protect the country. Isn't that better than being without a job and turning to crime to make money to live?"

The dead and wounded were carried to Yarmouk Hospital, a few hundred yards from the attack. Outside the hospital, Khalid Hamza, 42, was trying to find a friend who had come to Baghdad from the southern town of Hilla to find work with the police. "His father is an old man; that is why he decided to join the police," Hamza said. "He did not tell his mother that he is going to join the police. She would never let him do that."

Al Qaeda in Iraq, the guerrilla organization led by Abu Musab Zarqawi, asserted responsibility for the bombing in a statement posted on the Internet. The authenticity of the claim could not be verified.

Meanwhile in Hilla, a mostly Shiite city 60 miles south of Baghdad, a suicide bomber detonated a belt of explosives at a police checkpoint in the city center, killing six policemen and the attacker, said Police Capt. Muthana Khalid Ali, according to the Associated Press.

About 10 minutes later, a second attacker blew himself up in a crowd of police officers and civilians who had rushed to the scene of the first blast, Ali said. Twenty-six people were injured, the AP reported. There was no immediate assertion of responsibility for either attack in Hilla.

On Friday, Zarqawi's radical Sunni Muslim group claimed to have carried out the drive-by shooting of a prominent Shiite Muslim cleric, Kamaleddin Ghuraifi, on a street in central Baghdad. On Saturday, a bomb exploded at a police checkpoint in Mahmudiyah, 15 miles south of Baghdad, shortly after Ghuraifi's funeral procession had passed by, according to the Reuters news agency.

The bomb, which police said was hidden in a vegetable cart, killed five people and wounded 12. It was not clear whether the bomb had been intended to hit the procession, which was taking Ghuraifi's body to be buried in the holy city of Najaf, 90 miles south of the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0000870

Ghuraifi had been a Baghdad representative of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's most prominent Shiite religious leader, who has his headquarters in Najaf. On Saturday, the walls around Najaf's ornate Imam Ali shrine were filled with banners denouncing the recent assassinations of prominent Shiite religious and political figures and blaming them on Sunni insurgent groups. One of the banners demanded: "Can't the Sunni wise men stop the criminals?"

Meanwhile, another influential Shiite cleric's top lieutenant was released from detention Saturday after a year in U.S. military custody. The Najaf office of Moqtada Sadr, the rebel cleric whose militia twice battled U.S. forces last year, announced that Muhammed Tabatabei had been freed from Abu Ghraib prison, where he had been held without being charged. Tabatabei returned to Najaf, where he met with Sadr, the announcement said.

Two Suicide Attacks Kill 26 In Iraq (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Suicide bombers struck Saturday in Baghdad and a Shiite Muslim city south of the capital in attacks that killed 26 people and injured nearly 50, Iraqi officials said. One of the attackers targeted bystanders and police officers who had rushed to the scene of an earlier blast.

In the first attack, a bomber blew himself up outside a recruiting station for police special forces in west Baghdad, killing at least 16 people, including 11 recruits, police and hospital officials said. Twenty-two people were injured.

The other attacks occurred in Hillah, a mostly Shiite city 60 miles south of Baghdad. Police Capt. Muthana Khalid Ali said the first blast occurred when a suicide bomber detonated an explosives belt at a police checkpoint in the city center.

Six policemen were killed, Ali said.

About 10 minutes later, a second suicide bomber blew himself up in the crowd of police and civilians who had rushed to the scene, Ali said. Twenty-six people were injured, but only the attacker died, said Dr. Hashim Suleiman of Hillah General Hospital.

On Feb. 28, a suicide car bomber struck a crowd of police and army recruits at a health center in Hillah, killing 125 and wounding more than 140 in one of the deadliest attacks since the 2003 fall of Saddam Hussein.

In other violence Saturday, three Iraqi soldiers were killed in a roadside bombing northeast of Baghdad, their commander said. Gunmen also assassinated a police lieutenant colonel in the northern city of Mosul, officials said.

Two other people were killed when a bomb hidden in a vegetable cart exploded Saturday in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad.

The blast occurred a few minutes after mourners passed by with the body of an aide to Shiite Muslim leader Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, who was slain Friday outside a Baghdad mosque. The body of Kamal Ghuraifi was being carried through the town en route to burial in the holy city of Najaf.

Also Saturday, a policeman and a female relative traveling in a civilian car were killed in a drive-by shooting in the northern city of Kirkuk, authorities said.

Insurgent attacks have raised tensions among Iraq's varied ethnic and religious groups and raised fears of civil war. In a statement Saturday, the leader of Iraq's largest Shiite political party warned against sectarian conflict and called on the Iraqi government to step up efforts to fight militants.

"We stress the importance of being alert and cautious not to be carried away toward the sectarian strife that our enemies want for us," said Abdelaziz Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. "We ask the Iraqi government, particularly the security apparatuses, to exert more efforts to strike these terrorist groups."

The Metrics Of Success In Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

President Bush is facing an early legal deadline to deliver what he has been most resistant to providing: a set of specific benchmarks for measuring progress toward military and political stability in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0000871

Under a little-noticed provision of the defense spending bill passed by Congress in May, Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld has until July 11 to send Capitol Hill a "comprehensive set of performance indicators and measures of stability and security" two years after the fall of Saddam Hussein.

A Pentagon spokeswoman, responding to my inquiry, said last week, "We are working toward completing the report by the due date."

If and when it comes in, it could do much more than the president's Tuesday night speech at Fort Bragg to provide a factual basis for judging how close we may be to reaching our goals in Iraq.

In that address, Bush once again demolished a straw man, denouncing any talk of a deadline for withdrawal of U.S. and coalition forces and any timetable for phasing them out. While public support for a pullout has grown, almost no one in Congress is advocating such a step.

What serious people are asking of the administration is a set of yardsticks by which the situation in Iraq can be realistically measured -- and accountability established for a strategy to reach those goals. That is something the president has refused to provide, beyond his cliched declaration that "the United States will stay as long as necessary -- and not one day longer."

It is hard to understand his resistance to this perfectly reasonable demand for a set of metrics by which all concerned -- Congress and the administration, service members and their families, and the general public -- could judge what is happening.

This is our first MBA president, a business school grad who generally operates on the principle that if you can't measure something, you are flying blind. He insists that his Office of Management and Budget keep score on how well each department and agency is meeting its program responsibilities. Why not measure the enormously expensive investment in Iraq?

Metrics are exactly what the serious critics in Congress say have been lacking. In a thoughtful speech on June 21, Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, a Democrat who supported the invasion and vehemently opposes an early withdrawal, said continued public support depends on "a new compact between the administration and Congress to secure the informed consent of the American people, so that they give the president the time we need to succeed in Iraq."

"Specifically," Biden said, "the administration should develop with Congress clear benchmarks or goals in key areas: security, governance and politics, reconstruction and burden-sharing. We in Congress should aggressively assert our oversight responsibility by insisting that the administration report on progress toward those goals every month in public testimony."

Last week Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, the ranking Democrat on the defense Appropriations subcommittee, pointed to language in the report accompanying May's Iraq funding bill that would satisfy most of those demands. It orders the first detailed status report on July 11 and follow-ups every 90 days thereafter.

The information required is specific and detailed. It includes such measures of the security environment as the number of engagements per day, the count of trained Iraqi forces, the estimated strength of the Iraqi insurgency and the role of foreign fighters.

It orders up indicators of economic activity, including unemployment levels, electricity, water and oil production rates, and hunger and poverty levels.

It requires detailed information on the training of Iraqi military and security forces, their equipment, and their capabilities -- and the timetables for achieving full readiness.

It aims to end the confusion over Iraq's forces by asking specifically which Iraqi battalions are capable of operating independently, which can fight if supported by coalition forces and which are not ready to conduct counterinsurgency operations even with help. It also requires documentation on their absentee rates and calls for similar information on the Iraqi police forces and their training.

Finally, it directs Rumsfeld to provide -- either in public or in classified annexes -- an estimate of U.S. military forces needed in Iraq through the end of calendar 2006 and the criteria the administration will use to determine when it is safe to begin withdrawing forces from that country.

As a senior congressional aide told me, "if the Pentagon takes the law seriously and responds as robustly as it is capable of doing," we may finally begin to learn where we stand. Candid answers could restore the trust required to sustain the effort in Iraq. Bush's speeches don't meet that need.

DOJ_NMG_0000872

Shiites Question U.S. Overtures To Sunni Rebels (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

It didn't take long for fresh reports of U.S. talks with Sunni Arab insurgents to stir cries of an impending sellout.

"The Americans and everyone else must understand that the Iraqi people will never accept any talks with the criminals who have blood on their hands," Sheik Jalaluddin Saghir, a prominent Shiite Muslim cleric and member of parliament, declared during Friday prayers.

A senior U.S. official here sought to provide damage control. There was no intent, he declared, to undermine the fledgling Shiite-run government, which meets behind U.S.-fortified blast walls.

"In the end, we are not going to hand to the insurgency the head of the Iraqi government on a platter," the U.S. official told reporters Friday. "It isn't going to happen."

The exchange underscored the fragility of the political compromise that the Bush administration is seeking to facilitate in Iraq, even as the complementary military strategy — turning more and more responsibility over to fledgling Iraqi forces — has yet to prove a success.

U.S. commanders say they hope a drawdown of the 140,000-strong American force in Iraq can begin sometime next year. But no one will publicly say how many of Iraq's 100-plus U.S.-trained battalions are ready to wage a difficult counterinsurgency campaign without U.S. assistance.

"That information is classified," Brig. Gen. Don Alston, chief spokesman for the multinational forces, said here last week. "I wouldn't want to reveal something that could be an advantage to the enemy."

Things are no less murky on the political front, where reports of U.S. overtures to the Sunni Arab-driven insurgency immediately sparked a backlash last week among the long-repressed Shiite majority.

Much hinges on a two-part premise. First, that disaffected Sunni Arabs can be brought into the political process, and second, that participating Sunni representatives can sway militants, who have denounced the government, to put down their arms.

There is certainly reason to believe that Sunni Arabs, who largely boycotted the Jan. 30 election, will be more involved now.

Victorious Shiites and Kurds have reached out to bring Sunni Arabs into the committee drafting a constitution. Many Sunni Arabs now rue the decision to not vote. Plans are progressing on a new electoral law that would require the next set of lawmakers to be elected by provincial districts, probably ensuring greater Sunni Arab representation.

But few believe that these developments, however positive, will soon defuse the insurgency, which even in U.S. assessments is no weaker than it was six months ago.

The Sunni Arab representatives willing to take part in writing the constitution have acknowledged little leverage with the men with guns, and there is no broad Sunni call to lay down arms.

"The Iraqi resistance is not seeking a solution but defending a cause," said Sheik Khalaf Duleimi of the National Dialogue Council, a Sunni group involved in writing the constitution. "The government should seek a solution."

U.S. officials often point out that violence in Iraq is largely confined to four of the 18 provinces. Much of the Shiite south and Kurdish north is relatively quiet. But those four battleground provinces are home to about 40% of the population and include Mosul and Kirkuk, the multiethnic hubs of the north, and the capital, Baghdad, where sectarian-tinged bombings, assassinations and abductions are daily events.

Early Saturday, the bodies of 11 police recruits, covered with light-purple sheets, were placed inside the morgue at the capital's Yarmouk Hospital. They were the victims of the latest bombing at a police recruiting center, this one by an attacker wearing an explosives-laden vest laced with ball bearings that burst out in a fusillade of deadly shrapnel.

"Oh, my son Malik!" cried a sobbing father seated outside the morgue, in a scene that has become agonizingly familiar. "I saw you get married and start your new life. Why did it have to end like this? Why?"

Although most of the slain recruits have been Shiites, Sunnis accuse militias and police squads associated with Shiites of retaliatory attacks on Sunni clerics and civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0000873

The latest rumor sweeping Baghdad is that the Badr Brigade, an Iranian-trained Shiite militia, is targeting Iraqi pilots who bombed Iran during the 1980s war between the two nations.

Amid so much uncertainty, hostility and bloodshed, American officials are expressing confidence that Iraqis will meet three impending deadlines: Aug. 15, when a draft constitution is supposed to be ready; Oct. 15, when a constitutional referendum is to be held; and Dec. 15, when a permanent government is to be elected.

The State Department is pressuring Iraqis to get everything done on time, fearful that any delay will provoke even more instability.

The Bush administration views all three deadlines as crucial guideposts on the road to an exit strategy from a war in which the U.S. death toll is approaching 2,000.

But other milestones — the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003, the return of sovereignty a year ago, the landmark January election — have all passed without the anticipated letup in violence. In each case, exhilaration turned to disappointment.

In November, Marine Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler declared that the invasion of the former rebel-held enclave of Fallouja had "broken the back" of the insurgency. Yet the last two months saw 155 U.S. troops killed in Iraq, among the highest monthly death tolls of the war. Among the dead were six Americans, including three women, killed by a suicide bomber in Fallouja, which remains a trouble spot despite the continued presence of thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops who have in effect sealed off the city.

There simply aren't enough troops and police to watch over every stretch of volatile terrain. In the vast Sunni homeland of western Iraq, Marines have launched a series of offensives that seem destined to repeat the war's numbing pattern: Thinly stretched U.S. troops clear out a rebel town and return to their bases, allowing fighters to filter back in.

"We cannot defend everywhere," Col. Bob Chase, chief of operations for the 2nd Marine Division in western Iraq, said recently. Insurgents "will attempt to fill the vacuum."

U.S. officials, who have acknowledged that military superiority is not enough to win the war in Iraq, are keen to know what it will take to get the guerrillas to put down their arms — hence the ongoing exploratory talks with Sunni sheiks and community leaders thought to have links to the insurgency.

The ultimate U.S. approach is a classic divide-and-conquer strategy: separate "nationalist" elements of the fragmented insurgency from religious militants and foreign jihadists, who are regarded as irredeemable.

"It is credible that parts of this disparate group of insurgents and terrorists would consider finding a way to participate in a political process," another senior U.S. official here said recently.

U.S. commanders even seem prepared to consider some kind of Sunni-dominated force in volatile Al Anbar province, despite the disastrous experience last year with the Fallouja Brigade, a U.S.-armed unit that ultimately sided with the insurgents and was disbanded.

"You want the Americans out of Al Anbar?" a senior U.S. commander asked rhetorically in a recent interview. "Then get … to the table, create an environment where we can provide some basic security for Iraq, and we'll get 'em out. That ain't hard to do."

But the Sunni religious militants and their Iraqi nationalist allies have, by all accounts, cooperated closely and may be harder to separate than many believe.

And it seems clear that the guerrillas, who have proved to be determined and crafty, are insisting on at least one clear concession — a timetable for U.S. withdrawal — that the Bush administration has no intention of granting, at least for now.

"We will stay in the fight until the fight is won," President Bush said in a radio address Saturday, echoing his message in a prime-time address last week.

"In the end," said the senior U.S. official who spoke Friday, "the Sunni Arab community that fuels the insurgency is going to get more out of the political process than out of a military confrontation that it cannot hope to win."

Commanders in the field here often point out a thorny reality: The "bad guys" don't have to win. They only have to make headlines.

DOJ_NMG_0000874

The most likely scenario this year, many agree, is the birth of both a new constitution and a new government — even as the fighting, and dying, continues. It is not a cheerful prognostication, but it is the state of affairs to which Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld alluded when he said recently that the fighting could continue for a dozen years.

Beat The Insurgents By Talking To Them (LAT)

By Larry J. Diamond

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

In his speech last week, President Bush correctly said that the United States had a vital interest in remaining in Iraq until a viable, secure and hopefully democratic state emerged. He also appropriately noted evidence of democratic progress in Iraq — an elected government in Baghdad and a more representative constitution drafting committee set to begin its work. But if the United States is to avoid defeat in Iraq, Bush must recognize what our military leaders have repeated for more than a year: There is no purely military solution to the insurgency. It will only be extinguished by a combination of military might, good intelligence, reliable policing and — crucially — effective politics.

A political strategy to defeat the insurgency, which the administration has been inching toward but has not fully articulated and embraced, requires six elements.

First, the U.S. must know who and what we are dealing with. Radical Islamists from other countries are the ones blowing themselves and civilians to bits and slaughtering cops and elected Iraqi leaders — and there is no negotiating with these zealots.

Similarly, Saddam Hussein's top loyalists, who finance and orchestrate much of the destruction from safe houses in Syria, have nowhere to go in the new order but jail (and probably the hangman's noose). These two groups must be killed, captured or cut off from their bases of support and operation in Iraq.

A wider circle of Iraqis tolerates, uses and supports these groups in their violent resistance to the U.S.-led coalition and the new Iraqi government. These mostly Sunni Arab Iraqis believe that they have been shafted and humiliated by the emerging political order — and they want in. They feel their country is under indefinite occupation — and they want it back. The U.S. needs to separate the jihadists and Hussein's cronies from the Iraqis who feel left out.

The administration deserves credit for drawing Sunnis into the political process, but it must do more to incorporate them politically into the new Iraq, the second element of a winning political strategy. It has done too little to address their nationalist anxiety.

That bring us to the third element. Many Iraqis (including essentially all those in the insurgency) believe that we are there to establish permanent military bases and gain control of their oil. This suspicion feeds the intense nationalism underlying the violent resistance. In fact, it is the only factor uniting its disparate elements.

To douse the nationalist fire, Bush must tell the Iraqi people, directly and unequivocally, that the United States does not seek long-term military bases in their country. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told Congress as much recently, but unless the message comes from the president, it will not register in Iraq.

If Bush's assurance is to be credible, it must be coupled to a fourth strategic element. Bush is right to reject a fixed timetable for withdrawal, which would only embolden the terrorists. But Iraqi insurgents must be able to envision a time when foreign troops will be gone.

To this end, the administration should set a time — not a deadline, but a goal — when it hopes to be militarily out of Iraq, provided insurgents opted for peaceful politics instead of violence. This would shift the burden to the Sunni-based insurgents to demonstrate their nationalist credentials by altering their strategies and methods so order can return to Iraq, the new Iraqi armed forces can gain strength and the United States can make good on its withdrawal pledge.

If these four elements are to defeat the insurgency, they have to be part of direct negotiations with political and tribal forces "associated with" the insurgency, the fifth essential of a successful strategy. For almost two years, some insurgents have been sending signals through international intermediaries that they want to talk directly to the United States.

Initially wary and defiant, the administration has become more pragmatic about the overtures and discussions have occurred. But the talks have involved only low-level operatives and have left some Iraqi insurgents feeling that the United States is more interested in gaining tactical intelligence than negotiating a political deal.

DOJ_NMG_0000875

Any agreement with insurgents will have to include concessions on access to and release of some detainees, as well as what are America's long-term intentions in Iraq. If these issues are on the table, higher-level insurgents appear ready to talk.

Finally, we need to talk directly to the insurgents, but we cannot do so alone. The Iraqi government must be involved because it will need to make concessions of its own. And if trust is to be created and hostilities tempered by a pragmatic search for common ground, mediation will be needed. There is no better institution to play this role than the United Nations, and no better individual than the negotiator who brokered the handover of power last year, special envoy Lakhdar Brahimi.

Critics lambasted Bush's speech for its lack of new initiatives. But the indigenous core of the Iraqi insurgency may be ripe for resolution if the administration will craft and carry out a political strategy to defeat the insurgency.

This will not miraculously end the violence in Iraq. But it may enable us — and the Iraqi people — to turn the corner toward a peaceful and inclusive political order in which the zealots meet the fate they deserve.

A Town That Bled Under Hussein Hails His Trial (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

The scars of what happened after an assassination attempt on Saddam Hussein, on July 8, 1982, are painfully evident in this mainly Shiite town 35 miles north of Baghdad.

People lower their voices when they speak of fathers, brothers and sons who went to the gallows, their fates unknown until Mr. Hussein's overthrow 21 years later set off the ransacking of a secret police headquarters in Baghdad that uncovered records of the executions. The landscape around Dujail is mostly barren scrubland, stark testament to the bulldozing of thousands of acres of date palms and fruit orchards after plotters fired on Mr. Hussein's convoy from thickets on the edge of town.

Now, the events at Dujail have come full cycle for Mr. Hussein.

Officials at the Iraqi Special Tribunal set up to try the former dictator and his top aides have said they expect to put him on trial by the end of the year in the deaths of nearly 160 men and boys from Dujail, all Shiites, some in their early teens. Some were shot dead in the immediate aftermath of the assassination attempt, but 143 - 9 of them ages 13 through 15 - were executed three years later by Mr. Hussein's revolutionary court. Townspeople say that many others remain missing - at least 200, by some counts - and that they hope the trial will reveal at least something of their fate.

For now, their families have only fading photographs of their lost menfolk at weddings, school graduations and summer outings, and tales of the moments they disappeared, seized on the streets or pulled from their homes by secret police squads that descended on Dujail in the days that followed the attack on Mr. Hussein.

Along the sun-blasted streets and alleyways of the town, a nondescript, impoverished sprawl of single- and double-storied concrete structures and makeshift, domeless mosques beside the main highway to Iraq's oil-rich north, the prospect of seeing Mr. Hussein, 68, facing a possible death sentence has brought relief - at least to the three-quarters of the population who are Shiites, though not to many in the Sunni Arab minority in the town, where there are still fierce loyalties to Mr. Hussein.

"Having Saddam on trial for what he did here will be good for Dujail, and for all of Iraq, because many people in this country, and in Dujail, still think of him as some kind of a god," said Ali Haj Hussein, a 37-year-old Shiite who lost seven brothers in the executions that followed the assassination attempt, including one, Hussein, 19, who confessed to his father before he died that he was one of those who had shot at the Iraqi ruler.

The visit to Dujail amounted to a venture into enemy territory for Saddam Hussein. In 1982, he was in his third year as president, still consolidating his power, and many in this town, with a population of about 75,000, despised him for starting a war with Iran, Iraq's Shiite neighbor, two years earlier. Shiites here say that Mr. Hussein had long distrusted the presence of a large Shiite enclave, including Dujail and the nearby town of Balad, deep inside Iraq's Sunni Arab heartland - and beside the main highway from Baghdad to Tikrit, Mr. Hussein's hometown.

A conservative Shiite religious party, Dawa, with an armed wing that had mounted terrorist attacks against Mr. Hussein's government, had strong support in Dujail, and saw in his visit a chance to avenge the government's killings of hundreds of Dawa leaders and sympathizers. The plotters named the mission Operation Bint Huda, after the sister of Dawa's founder, Ayatollah Muhammad Bakr al-Sadr, a prominent Shiite cleric. The two were executed in 1980.

DOJ_NMG_0000876

Other crimes for which Mr. Hussein is likely to face eventual prosecution, in separate trials, include the Anfal campaign - the Arabic word means spoils - of the late 1980's, in which as many as 150,000 Kurds were killed, many shot and dumped into mass graves, others killed in poison-gas attacks; the chemical weapons attack on the Kurdish town of Halabja in March 1988 that killed about 5,000, which is likely to be treated as a separate case, like Dujail; and the repression of a Shiite rebellion in southern Iraq in 1991, in which 150,000 people are believed to have been killed. Also under investigation by the tribunal are the executions of more than 200 Baath Party leaders after Mr. Hussein seized power in 1979.

But the Dujail trial will set the pattern for the others, and lawyers for Mr. Hussein have made it clear they plan to use every legal recourse to expose the proceedings as a show trial, manipulated by the American lawyers who run the Regime Crimes Liaison Office, an American Embassy agency that has been the legal and financial mainstay of the tribunal.

"All over the world, people know Saddam Hussein as the man who said 'No!' to America, and it will be so in court," said Ziad Najdawi, a Jordanian who is part of an international team of defense lawyers.

"They can talk as they want, about executions and chemical weapons and mass graves, but we will say, 'It is all lies, nothing but lies. Everything here is tainted by America.' "

On the summer afternoon 23 years ago when Mr. Hussein came to Dujail, he was greeted with gunfire from the palm groves on the north side of town, survivors say. The first to rush to the streets were the youths; they had heard rumors for days that something important was about to happen. Army helicopters had been circling near the town, and official vehicles from Baghdad had been coming and going from the Baath Party headquarters in a grim, guarded compound along the road leading into Dujail from the main north-south highway.

"It was about 2:30 p.m. when we heard people saying that Saddam had arrived, so we ran into the streets to see him, and right away his bodyguards started shooting at us, and they killed three of my friends," said Ghalib Hussein Abbas, a 42-year-old tractor driver now, then an unemployed youth of 19.

Fleeing to their homes, the townspeople saw the helicopters return, firing at villages amid the palm groves from which the plotters had attacked.

Two days later, survivors said, a 24-hour curfew was eased when loudspeakers announced that those missing relatives should go to the Baath headquarters and search among rows of bodies laid out in the building's forecourt. For some, it was a trap. According to witnesses' statements to the tribunal, four of the men set to go on trial with Mr. Hussein had gathered at the building to direct vengeance on the town: his half-brother, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, deputy head of the Mukhabarat secret police in 1982; Taha Yasin Ramadan, a deputy prime minister and later Baath Party vice chairman; and the two local Baathist officials, Abdullah al-Musheikhi and his son, Mizher al-Musheikhi. Another defendant will be Awad Hamad al-Bandr al-Sadoon, former chief judge of the revolutionary court.

In small groups at first, then in larger roundups, about 1,500 townspeople were arrested, as many as 30 from single families, and started on a journey into Mr. Hussein's gulags - first at a detention center in Tikrit, later at a secret police detention center in Baghdad, and finally, to the Nugra as-Salman prison, an old British-built fort in the desert along the Saudi Arabian border. Some survivors, who were released in 1986, say that the appalling conditions at the prison caused several dozen deaths, including women, children and nursing infants. The 143 who were hanged never got beyond detention in Baghdad, where Mr. Sadoon, the chief of the revolutionary court, sent them to the execution chambers at the Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad.

Accounts from local Shiites say Mr. Hussein outwitted the Dujail plotters from the start. On his entry to the town, those accounts say, tribal leaders made him a gift of a car, and marked it, in tribal tradition, with hands dipped in the blood of slaughtered sheep. Mr. Hussein, though, Shiites in Dujail say, saw the gift as a possible harbinger of assassination and returned the car, insisting that the tribal leaders and some of his aides travel in it - to their deaths, as the accounts have it, when the plotters fired on the car.

A few hours after the shooting, Mr. Hussein took to the flat roof of the town's main clinic and told a crowd that he was "not a coward who can be chased from your town," but assured his listeners there would be no reprisals. "He told us that the people who had attempted to kill him were a small band of traitors, and that we don't want to confuse them with the good people of Dujail," said Kassem Aalbuhaider, a shopkeeper now, then only 12.

DOJ_NMG_0000877

But even as Mr. Hussein spoke, Mr. Aalbuhaider said, the secret police were at work. "They took whole families, even old people, women and small children," he said.

Within weeks, the razing of the palm groves and the orchards began, continuing until more than 250,000 acres had been bulldozed. In 1992, after the first Persian Gulf war, Mr. Hussein returned to Dujail for the first time, and told tribal leaders that the wastelands could be replanted, with grain crops, but not with palms and orchards. But it took 12 more years, and the overthrow of Mr. Hussein, before the town could begin in other ways to recover from what townspeople now refer to simply as "al karitha," the disaster.

Now, the plinths where Mr. Hussein's statues and portraits once stood at the town's major intersections are bare, and the streets are hung with portraits of the white-bearded clerics who are the icons of religious Shiites. The Baath Party headquarters serves now as a Shiite mosque. But the totems that seem to matter most are the date palms that some townspeople began planting discreetly in the mid-1990's as memorials to those who died.

On a recent evening, Mr. Hussein, the townsman who lost seven brothers to the gallows, led a visitor to the family's fields outside the town and through a grove of half-grown palms dedicated to them: Faleh, Hussein, Mahmud, Mohsen, Muhammad, Saad and Salim. "Here, I feel like a king," he said, smiling broadly as he reached out to touch the palm trees' drooping fronds. "Like these trees, Iraq is reborn. We are just at the beginning, but once Saddam has been tried and executed, we believe Dujail will begin to rise again."

Afghan Rebel Site Bombed, U.S. Says (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

U.S. aircraft bombarded a suspected insurgent compound in a mountainous area of northeastern Afghanistan where a military team has been missing since Tuesday, military officials said Saturday.

A purported spokesman for the ousted Islamic Taliban militia called news organizations and claimed that 25 civilians had died in the airstrike on the compound in Konar province, a rugged region near the Pakistani border.

Lt. Col. Jerry O'Hara, a U.S. military spokesman, said American troops were still assessing the impact of the Friday night bombing. However, he said that precision weapons had been used and that it was unlikely civilians were killed.

"We don't target civilians," he said. "We put a lot of effort into ensuring we minimize any type of collateral damage. . . . Our operations are intelligence-driven."

A Special Operations helicopter carrying U.S. troops to rescue the missing team crashed amid enemy fire Tuesday, killing all 16 people aboard. Late Friday, their bodies were flown from the U.S. air base in Bagram, north of Kabul, en route to Dover, Del., for identification, O'Hara said. He described throngs of soldiers lining the long road running through the base, saluting as vehicles passed carrying flag-draped containers to the airstrip.

"When there's a departure ceremony, everybody who is not actively involved in a mission comes out to show their respect," O'Hara said. "But this was much more emotional because you have many more that were lost in this incident."

Also on Saturday, guerrilla fighters in eastern Paktika province detonated a roadside bomb under a passing convoy of more than 20 vehicles carrying officials from the United Nations as well as Afghan leaders and security forces.

The attack killed as many as six Afghan policemen and soldiers, and wounded at least two others, including a local police chief, according to news services and the U.N. spokesman here, Adrian Edwards.

Other violence included a battle between Taliban and Afghan government forces in the central province of Uruzgan in which 18 insurgents were killed, according to news services. The militia members appeared to be part of the same group of fighters who kidnapped and killed a group of tribal elders Thursday.

In Kabul, U.S. military officials released 57 Afghans who had been held at a detention facility at Bagram air base for many months on suspicion of being armed Muslim extremists. They were taken to the office of a government program that reintegrates former Taliban members and released to the custody of tribal elders.

Since January, 220 detainees have been released from the U.S.-run prison at Bagram, and 142 more are slated to be released shortly, according to a U.S. military statement. In May, President Hamid Karzai called for all Afghan prisoners to be turned over to Afghan government custody in the wake of reports of past abuse by U.S. guards at Bagram and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0000878

Several of the released men complained bitterly of being detained for several years without charge. "There was no beating or torturing, but they were disrespectful of our culture and we didn't have good food for a long time," Ghulam Mustafa, 21, told the Reuters news agency.

In Konar, a massive five-day hunt for the missing U.S. team continued without success Saturday, O'Hara said.

The purported Taliban spokesman, Abdul Latif Hakimi, told news agencies by telephone Friday that Taliban fighters had captured one of the missing men and killed seven of them. But U.S. military officials have said there was no evidence to support the claim.

The missing team was made up of fewer than 10 Special Operations troops and was participating in a mission against al Qaeda fighters, U.S. officials have said.

The Chinook helicopter sent to extract the team appeared to have been downed by a rocket-propelled grenade, military officials said.

The air attack on the compound Friday night was part of an ongoing military mission in the area, O'Hara said. "That operation was still ongoing all the while we were conducting search and recovery for our 16 that we lost, and while searching for the missing service members that haven't been accounted for," he said.

Edwards, the U.N. spokesman, said the team in Paktika was on its way to negotiate with tribes in the area about security matters. He said that after the roadside bombing, the group may have come under small-arms fire, and that Afghan security forces subsequently detained several men suspected of taking part in the attack. The U.S. military said it was not aware of any small-arms fire.

Edwards said the ambush was the latest in a string of attacks on military forces, government officials, aid workers and civilians by gunmen intent on disrupting parliamentary elections scheduled for September. The violence has contributed to a growing climate of pessimism and fear.

"The thinking of the United Nations is that there is a serious problem with security and that with the elections coming up we, like most people, want this addressed," said Edwards.

U.S. Planes Bomb Suspected Taliban Mountain Base (WT)

By Daniel Cooney

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

Warplanes pounded a suspected Taliban compound in the Afghan mountains near where an elite U.S. military team disappeared last week, and violence elsewhere left 38 rebels and Afghan security forces dead as fighting rose ahead of fall elections.

A transport plane flew home the bodies of 16 U.S. troops -- eight Navy SEALs and eight other troops -- killed when their helicopter was shot down while trying to rescue the missing team, U.S. officials said yesterday.

It was not clear if there were any casualties in the air strike late Friday in mountains near Asadabad town in Kunar province, close to the Pakistani border. U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Jerry O'Hara said a "battle damage assessment is ongoing."

"We conducted an air strike on a target we deemed we had to hit immediately. The target was an enemy compound in Kunar province," he said. "The bombing was done using precision guided munitions. The target objective was intelligence driven."

Col. O'Hara declined to say whether the air strike was directly related to the missing military team, which was last heard from in the same area Tuesday.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Mullah Latif Hakimi, claimed Friday that militants had captured one of the men and said he was a "high-ranking American" caught in the same area as where the helicopter went down. He reiterated the claim yesterday in a phone call with the Associated Press.

"The soldier is being held in Kunar. Taliban leaders will decide what to do with him," Mr. Hakimi said. "He is being kept in a home. His health is all right."

DOJ_NMG_0000879

When asked to provide evidence that the soldier was in captivity, he said, "Tomorrow we will give proof."

Mr. Hakimi, who also claimed insurgents shot down the helicopter, often calls news organizations to take responsibility for attacks, and the information frequently proves exaggerated or untrue. His exact tie to the Taliban leadership is not clear.

Col. O'Hara said the downed Chinook helicopter had been trying to extract the soldiers when it went into the mountains.

"All our hopes are that we find our missing service members. On top of those hopes are actions on the ground looking for them," Col. O'Hara said. "It's a very demanding area: very mountainous, very wooded and the likelihood of enemy contact is probable."

The bodies of 16 soldiers killed in the helicopter crash were loaded in flag-draped caskets onto a C-17 transport plane during a memorial ceremony Friday night and flown to Dover, Del., Col. O'Hara said.

The loss of the 16 was the deadliest single blow to American forces who ousted the Taliban in 2001 and are now fighting the escalating insurgency.

In three months of unprecedented fighting, about 502 suspected insurgents, 57 Afghan police and soldiers, 45 Americans and 134 civilians have been killed. Only eight months ago, Afghan and U.S. officials were hailing a relatively peaceful presidential election as a sign that the Taliban rebellion was finished.

U.S. Attacks Near Copter Crash Site (LAT)

By Halima Kazem

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

American fighter planes bombed a suspected insurgent compound in the same eastern area of Afghanistan where a team of U.S. soldiers has gone missing, military officials said Saturday.

A Taliban spokesman said more than 25 militants were killed in the airstrikes Friday, but U.S. military officials said it was too soon to estimate casualties.

"We do not know the results of the airstrikes. The battle assessments are ongoing," said Lt. Cindy Moore, a U.S. spokeswoman.

The airstrikes were a continuation of operations in mountainous Kunar province, where a Chinook helicopter was shot down Tuesday by rebel forces, killing all 16 service personnel on board.

The Chinook had been called in to assist the ground team in fighting Al Qaeda and Taliban militants but crashed into a mountainside after being targeted by rocket-propelled grenades.

On Saturday, the Pentagon identified the eight Navy SEALs on board the Chinook as Chief Petty Officer Jacques J. Fontan, 36, of New Orleans; Senior Chief Petty Officer Daniel R. Healy, 36, of Exeter, N.H.; Lt. Cmdr. Erik S. Kristensen, 33, of San Diego; and Petty Officer 1st Class Jeffery A. Lucas, 33, of Corbett, Ore.

Also, Lt. Michael M. McGreevy Jr., 30, of Portville, N.Y.; Petty Officer 2nd Class Eric S. Patton, 22, of Boulder City, Nev.; Petty Officer 2nd Class James Suh, 28, of Deerfield Beach, Fla.; and Petty Officer 1st Class Jeffrey S. Taylor, 30, of Midway, W. Va.

Hundreds of U.S. and Afghan forces have since been scouring the area's deep ravines in the hope of finding the special reconnaissance team, which has been out of contact for several days.

Moore did not comment on reports that rebels had captured members of the missing team.

"There is a good chance that the soldiers are being held hostage by the rebel fighters," said Gov. Asadullah Wafa of Kunar. "These rebels have an agenda."

Also Saturday, in the mountains of central Oruzgan province, Afghan soldiers attacked a Taliban hide-out where about 100 insurgents are thought to have been camped, Afghan security forces said. Two soldiers and 18 rebels were killed, they said.

The attack was in response to the kidnapping and killings of nine Oruzgan tribal leaders by Taliban militants. More than 45 people have been slain in the area in four days.

In Paktika province, meanwhile, six local United Nations security personnel were killed when their convoy was hit by a roadside bomb, according to early reports.

With landmark parliamentary elections scheduled for September, violence has surged in the last three months. About 500 suspected insurgents, 49 Afghan police and soldiers, 140 civilians, and 45 U.S. troops have been killed since March.

DOJ_NMG_0000880

The instability has spread fear through the country, especially in southern provinces with Pushtun majorities, the same ethnic group as the Taliban.

Many believe that Taliban and Al Qaeda militants have joined forces with other rebel groups to destabilize election preparations and prevent a long-term U.S. military presence in Afghanistan.

Veterans Confront A Taste Of Battle (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

The petite young woman with the ponytail, hoop earrings and little red knapsack holds her fingers in her ears and shudders with each crash of the cannon.

One by one, the line of Civil War-era artillery pieces goes off -- shh-BOOM! -- each one a little closer, and each one a little more jarring. As the shots come near, the woman has both hands covering the sides of her face, and with the final blast, about 30 feet distant, she turns away in pain as if she has just been slapped.

The firing is, of course, make-believe war -- a masquerade attended by perspiring men and women in gaudy period costume. But as Army Spec. Kristina Steinmetz, 23, looks on here during a visit from Walter Reed Army Medical Center, she is having trouble separating the pretend war from the real thing.

The occasion is a sprawling weekend reenactment of the battle of Gettysburg staged across freshly mowed farmland in the fields north of town. Steinmetz, who is recovering from combat stress at Walter Reed, had come to the reenactment with two wounded comrades on an outing hosted by a soldiers support agency called Operation Second Chance Inc.

Steinmetz, of Phillipsburg, N.J., Michael Oreskovic, 23, of Eugene, Ore., and Harold Peckenpaugh, 19, of Attica, N.Y., had been eager to make the trip. The three are close friends, and it had been their idea: a three-day weekend away from the hospital. Peckenpaugh had been a reenactor before entering the Army, and his old Civil War outfit was going to be in the battle. Steinmetz and Oreskovic, a military history buff, had never been to Gettysburg.

But Friday morning, as they were driven to the make-believe war by Operation Second Chance founder Cindy McGrew, each of the young soldiers bore the scars of the real one that is underway in Iraq.

Steinmetz, who looks much younger than her years, had been a convoy truck driver -- one of the most harrowing assignments in Iraq. She told of convoys being attacked daily by roadside bombs, of never knowing what might blow up -- an animal carcass, a pile of garbage -- and of never knowing who in the convoy would survive and who wouldn't. Peace of mind came only at night, she said, under the stars.

Partway through her tour at Tikrit, she began blacking out without warning and developed heart problems. She was taken to Walter Reed, where, she said, she was treated for syncope, a temporary loss of consciousness that can be stress-related, and for post-traumatic stress disorder, from which she has substantially recovered.

Peckenpaugh, a rangy Humvee gunner who wears his Purple Heart pinned to the bill of his blue baseball cap, has a long pink scar down the right side of his neck. On Dec. 4, near Ramadi, he was at his gun when an improvised bomb went off, sending shrapnel into his neck, breaking his jaw and slicing his carotid artery. He lost so much blood that he suffered a stroke and, for a time, was partially paralyzed.

Oreskovic was a scout with an Army cavalry unit. He had spent months on hazardous house searches, "hunter-killer" missions and recons. "It was fun," he said. "I enjoyed it." He had been wounded once by a car bomb, on Oct. 5, and six days later he was hit again, just a week before he was scheduled to come home.

This time it was a huge device, made of mortars and artillery rounds, in a truck full of fruit that blew up near his Stryker vehicle in Mosul. He was exposed from the waist up, manning a grenade launcher in the turret.

"I saw a blue flash, " he recalled. "Turned to red. Got real hot." His squad leader, in the vehicle in front of him, was killed. And the blast tore off Oreskovic's left arm at the elbow. "There was nothing left of it," he said.

He arrived a few days later at Walter Reed, where for the first few months of his recovery he couldn't watch TV or movies about war, and certain sounds made him jumpy and emotional. Gradually, he got over that, and this weekend -- his interest in history piqued -- he did not expect trouble at the reenactment. "I can separate myself from it," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0000881

The four arrived at a campground about 11 a.m. Friday, unloaded their gear at the cabin where they planned to stay and headed for the battlefield, where the reenactment continued yesterday and is scheduled to conclude today.

It was the 142nd anniversary of the battle, where thousands perished over July 1, 2 and 3, 1863.

At first glance, the modern-day soldiers looked like anyone in the crowd of onlookers who came to watch the battles and browse under the tents where merchants sold reproductions of 1860s-era clothing and firearms.

Oreskovic's artificial left arm was barely noticeable, protruding from his long-sleeved shirt, though he did fumble a bit getting money from his wallet using only his right hand. Steinmetz and Peckenpaugh each bought cap guns, which they fired at each other playfully. And when Peckenpaugh purchased a reproduction 1858 Army revolver, the clerk asked, "How old are you?" He showed his Army ID card.

But there was a seriousness about the trio as they strolled anonymously among people wearing "Support Our Troops" T-shirts or clad as soldiers from a bygone era. When Steinmetz emerged from one merchant's tent with a feathery blue dream catcher, she muttered to Peckenpaugh, "I need something to take the damn nightmares away."

As the day wore on, the weather grew more sultry. Oreskovic and Peckenpaugh dressed up temporarily in period garb provided by Peckenpaugh's reenactor friends. All three drank bottled water and ate ice cream cones to stay cool.

But by mid-afternoon, the heat and the artillery fire had become too much for Steinmetz. Her hands trembled as she clutched her small digital camera. McGrew held her tightly around the waist during the demonstration.

"It was a little hard," Steinmetz said afterward. "Just flashback memories. You just start thinking. . . . The jump is always going to be there. But just visions, you know."

That evening, as distant bugles sounded and drumfire again echoed among the fields here, she packed her things, caught a ride back to the hospital and left Gettysburg, with an old-fashioned band playing in the town square.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Op-Ed by Michael Kinsley: The Lord And Richard Scrushy (WP)

By Michael Kinsley, Post

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

God works in mysterious ways, but his or her decision to acquit Richard Scrushy, former CEO of HealthSouth Corp., on all charges of financial fraud is especially inscrutable. Five consecutive HealthSouth chief financial officers admitted to cooking the books and copped a plea. They all fingered Scrushy. But jurors chose to believe that the man on top knew nothing about what was going on directly below him.

That kind of ignorance doesn't come cheap. No one denies there was massive fraud at HealthSouth. The government estimates that Scrushy made almost $300 million from the alleged fraud, and he'll get to keep it minus lawyer's fees. Other prominent business defendants have tried the ignorance defense but found that juries tend to think that the more you're paid, the more you ought to know about what's going on around you. Bernard Ebbers of Worldcom Corp., apparently the most convincing of the recent CEO ignoramus wannabes, is facing prosecutors' request for a life sentence.

Experts say the Scrushy prosecution should have been a slam-dunk. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial page seemed amazed that he got off. The Journal approved, of course, but couldn't really explain why. Meanwhile, jurors quoted in the papers said they were bothered by things like the lack of Scrushy fingerprints on copies of the crucial documents.

Only one word can describe Scrushy's acquittal. It is a miracle.

Miracles happen, just like that other stuff. But miracles don't just happen. They require work. Money doesn't hurt, either. When Scrushy was indicted, he hired God. Less inspired defendants might have settled for the late Johnnie Cochran or Jack Abramoff. Scrushy, though, went straight to the top.

He left his suburban evangelical church and joined a predominantly black congregation in a blue-collar neighborhood. He bought a half-hour of local TV for a morning prayer show featuring himself and his wife, and frequent guest spots by black ministers. He had a prayer group praying for him every day at the trial. All this was in Birmingham, Ala., where HealthSouth was located and where the trial occurred.

DOJ_NMG_0000882

Cynics have suggested that Scrushy and his advisers might have been trying to influence the local jury with these tactics. This, if I might say so, is a typical example of the anti-Christian bias that so many folks complain about in the liberal media. Why can't a man turn to God in his moment of trial (or, indeed, in his actual criminal trial) without being accused of ulterior motives? Scrushy prayed, and his prayers were answered. "God is good," he said on the courthouse steps after the jury verdict. And well he might think so.

The Post got in trouble a million years ago for an article that described evangelical Christians as "poor, undereducated and easily led." The paper apologized almost immediately and many times afterward. And, like every major paper in those cesspools of secularism that are America's big cities, The Post now seizes any opportunity to slobber over religion and to show respect to religious people, especially evangelical Christians.

But with their cynical suggestion that Richard Scrushy and his defense team might have been using religion to con the jury, the liberal media reveal that they are still heathens. Not only do they still secretly think that devoutly religious people in the Deep South are "poor, undereducated and easily led," but they imply that Richard Scrushy and his defense team may think so, too. What could be a bigger insult to a godly man who has now been acquitted of all wrongdoing?

The obvious lesson of the Scrushy verdict is that prayer works. What do the cynics say now? Even Martha Stewart, who keeps thousands of people out of church every Sunday because they are too busy searching for fresh kale or folding their handkerchiefs and whose obsessive celebration of the material world makes her possibly the least spiritual figure in American public life (though no worse for that, in my opinion), might well wish she had fallen to her knees before it was too late.

To anybody but Scrushy, his acquittal doesn't necessarily prove that there is a God. To some HealthSouth investors, it may even suggest the opposite. And the view of those five former HealthSouth CFOs may be even bleaker. But if there is a God, it is hard to see the Scrushy acquittal as anything but the result of divine intervention.

So there is no puzzle about Scrushy's motives. The intriguing question is, what were God's motives? Being all-knowing, He or She doesn't need fingerprints and has no doubts, reasonable or otherwise. Are we supposed to conclude that prayer, if suitably ostentatious, can be an acceptable substitute for goodness, rather than a reflection of it?

Or is this a demonstration of God's powers? A good defense attorney can get an innocent man off, but it takes a great defense attorney to get a guilty man off. Maybe it's the same with deities.

All we can say is, God knows.

The writer is editorial and opinion editor of the Los Angeles Times.

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Rove Factor? (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, July 3, 2005

Its legal appeals exhausted, Time magazine agreed last week to turn over reporter Matthew Cooper's e-mails and computer notes to a special prosecutor investigating the leak of an undercover CIA agent's identity. The case has been the subject of press controversy for two years. Saying "we are not above the law," Time Inc. Editor in Chief Norman Pearlstine decided to comply with a grand-jury subpoena to turn over documents related to the leak. But Cooper (and a New York Times reporter, Judith Miller) is still refusing to testify and faces jail this week.

At issue is the story of a CIA-sponsored trip taken by former ambassador (and White House critic) Joseph Wilson to investigate reports that Iraq was seeking to buy uranium from the African country of Niger. "Some government officials have noted to Time in interviews... that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, is a CIA official who monitors the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction," said Cooper's July 2003 Time online article.

Now the story may be about to take another turn. The e-mails surrendered by Time Inc., which are largely between Cooper and his editors, show that one of Cooper's sources was White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, according to two lawyers who asked not to be identified because they are representing witnesses sympathetic to the White House. Cooper and a Time spokeswoman declined to comment. But in an interview with NEWSWEEK, Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, confirmed that Rove had been interviewed by Cooper for the article. It is unclear, however, what passed between Cooper and Rove.

DOJ_NMG_0000883

The controversy began three days before the Time piece appeared, when columnist Robert Novak, writing about Wilson's trip, reported that Wilson had been sent at the suggestion of his wife, who was identified by name as a CIA operative. The leak to Novak, apparently intended to discredit Wilson's mission, caused a furor when it turned out that Plame was an undercover agent. It is a crime to knowingly reveal the identity of an undercover CIA official. A special prosecutor was appointed and began subpoenaing reporters to find the source of the leak.

Novak appears to have made some kind of arrangement with the special prosecutor, and other journalists who reported on the Plame story have talked to prosecutors with the permission of their sources. Cooper agreed to discuss his contact with Lewis (Scooter) Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's top aide, after Libby gave him permission to do so. But Cooper drew the line when special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald asked about other sources.

Initially, Fitzgerald's focus was on Novak's sourcing, since Novak was the first to out Plame. But according to Luskin, Rove's lawyer, Rove spoke to Cooper three or four days before Novak's column appeared. Luskin told NEWSWEEK that Rove "never knowingly disclosed classified information" and that "he did not tell any reporter that Valerie Plame worked for the CIA." Luskin declined, however, to discuss any other details. He did say that Rove himself had testified before the grand jury "two or three times" and signed a waiver authorizing reporters to testify about their conversations with him. "He has answered every question that has been put to him about his conversations with Cooper and anybody else," Luskin said. But one of the two lawyers representing a witness sympathetic to the White House told NEWSWEEK that there was growing "concern" in the White House that the prosecutor is interested in Rove. Fitzgerald declined to comment.

In early October 2003, NEWSWEEK reported that immediately after Novak's column appeared in July, Rove called MSNBC "Hardball" host Chris Matthews and told him that Wilson's wife was "fair game." But White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters at the time that any suggestion that Rove had played a role in outing Plame was "totally ridiculous." On Oct. 10, McClellan was asked directly if Rove and two other White House aides had ever discussed Valerie Plame with any reporters. McClellan said he had spoken with all three, and "those individuals assured me they were not involved in this."

Rove Talked But Did Not Tattle, Attorney Says (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

WASHINGTON — Karl Rove, one of President Bush's closest advisors, spoke with a Time magazine reporter days before the name of a CIA operative surfaced in the press, but did not leak the confidential information, a lawyer for Rove said Saturday in a new admission in the case.

Rove spoke to Time reporter Matthew Cooper in July 2003, before a syndicated column revealed the identity of operative Valerie Plame, the wife of Bush administration critic and former U.S. Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV.

Cooper is one of two reporters who has been held in contempt of court for not cooperating with a federal investigation into who leaked Plame's identity. Although Wilson once said he suspected that Rove had played a role in destroying his wife's CIA cover, the White House dismissed questions about Rove's actions as "totally ridiculous."

In confirming the conversation between Rove and Cooper, Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, emphasized that the presidential advisor did not reveal any secrets. But the disclosure raised new questions about Rove and the precise role of the White House in the apparent national security breach as Cooper and another reporter, Judith Miller of the New York Times, faced imminent jail terms.

Time Inc., under pressure from a federal judge and over Cooper's objections, turned over e-mail records and other internal documents to a special prosecutor Friday, identifying sources that Cooper used to report and write on the politically charged case. A Time spokeswoman declined to say Saturday whether Rove was among sources mentioned in the documents.

Cooper and Miller could be jailed as soon as Wednesday for refusing to cooperate in the investigation. Time, which was separately held in contempt in the case, said that it hoped its cooperation meant that Cooper would not be incarcerated.

DOJ_NMG_0000884

Rove, Bush's deputy chief of staff and longtime political strategist, testified before a grand jury investigating the Plame case on three occasions. His latest appearance was in October 2004, about the same time the prosecutor investigating the case said his probe was complete with the exception of testimony from Cooper and Miller.

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald is investigating the alleged outing of Plame by Robert Novak, a columnist and CNN pundit, on July 14, 2003. Some suspect that the White House leaked her name in retaliation for a July 6, 2003, op-ed piece in the New York Times written by Wilson, her husband. He accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq.

Fitzgerald interviewed many other White House officials and journalists, including Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Although Novak was the first to publish Plame's name, Fitzgerald has indicated that whoever leaked the information to Novak also might have revealed her identity to other journalists. That could constitute separate violations of a federal law that protects the identity of undercover CIA personnel.

Prosecutions are rare, however, because they require showing that the leak was intentionally disclosed and that the person leaking the information knew the government was trying to conceal it.

Fitzgerald asked Cooper and Time for documents and testimony relating to conversations Cooper had with official sources about Wilson, Plame or her ties to the CIA in the period before the publication of Novak's column. Cooper wrote about the case on Time's website after the Novak column appeared.

Luskin, Rove's attorney, acknowledged in an interview Saturday that Cooper and Rove had spoken days before Novak's column, in a conversation that was initiated by Cooper.

"What I can tell you is that Cooper called Rove during that week between the Wilson article and the Novak article, but that Karl absolutely did not identify Valerie Plame," Luskin said. "He did not disclose any confidential information about anybody to Cooper or to anybody else."

Luskin said he would not "characterize the substance of the conversation," which was covered in the testimony Rove provided to the grand jury investigating the leak. "The folks in Fitzgerald's office have asked us not to talk about what Karl has had to say," Luskin said.

Luskin said Rove had been assured by prosecutors that he was not a target of the investigation. "We were advised recently that his status has not changed," he added.

"It is certainly my understanding that Karl has testified absolutely truthfully about all his conversations about everybody that he has been asked about during that week," Luskin added. "Nobody has suggested to us ever that they think that there are any problems about whether they think he is being candid."

But Newsweek magazine reported on its website Saturday that Rove was one of Cooper's sources identified in notes that Time turned over to Fitzgerald. And separately, MSNBC political analyst Lawrence O'Donnell said in a taped TV program that he had information indicating Rove was one of Cooper's sources. O'Donnell's comments were made in a segment of "The McLaughlin Group" that was set to air in Los Angeles on PBS Saturday night.

Cooper's lawyer, Richard Sauber, declined to discuss Rove's role in Cooper's work, saying in response to an e-mail message, "We're not going to discuss one way or another what the [documents turned over by Time] say."

In court papers filed Friday arguing against his possible confinement, Cooper's lawyers said if he were to break promises of confidentiality, "his ability to continue as an effective reporter would be seriously jeopardized."

In letters to the court accompanying his plea, fellow journalists discussed this principle.

"Journalists must honor their promises which protect the bad along with the good," said Margaret Carlson, a Time columnist and colleague of Cooper. "We can't separate them like the darks and the whites in the laundry."

Lawyer Says Rove Talked To Reporter, Did Not Leak Name (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000885

Karl Rove, President Bush's chief political adviser, spoke with Time magazine's Matthew Cooper during a critical week in July 2003 when Cooper was reporting on a public critic of the Bush administration who was also the husband of a CIA operative, his lawyer confirmed yesterday.

Rove is identified in Cooper's notes from that time period, which Time turned over Friday to special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald -- under court order. Fitzgerald is investigating whether senior administration officials leaked CIA operative Valerie Plame's name to reporters in July 2003 as retaliation after her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, publicly accused the Bush administration of twisting intelligence to justify a war with Iraq.

Rove's lawyer said Rove never identified Plame to Cooper in those conversations. More significantly, Robert Luskin said, Fitzgerald assured him in October and again last week that Rove is not a target of his investigation.

"Karl did nothing wrong. Karl didn't disclose Valerie Plame's identity to Mr. Cooper or anybody else," Luskin said. Luskin said the question remains unanswered: "Who outed this woman? . . . It wasn't Karl."

Cooper has said that more than one confidential source is identified in his e-mails and the notes of interviews he conducted in July 2003 after Wilson's opinion piece appeared in the New York Times. Reporters were calling the White House with questions about Wilson's assertions, which senior government officials tried to discredit.

Plame's name first appeared in Robert D. Novak's syndicated column in July 2003, eight days after Wilson's opinion piece critical of the Bush administration appeared in the Times. Wilson was sent by the CIA in 2002 to investigate allegations that Iraq had sought to buy uranium in the African nation of Niger, and he reported that he found no proof. His opinion piece accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify going to war with Iraq

After the Novak column, Wilson said the White House had damaged his wife's career and had put all her contacts in jeopardy. He initially accused Rove of being behind the leak, then retracted that statement. It is a felony to knowingly identify a covert operative.

Rove answered questions under oath for about two hours before a grand jury on Oct. 15 as part of the special prosecutor's investigation. According to Luskin, the prosecutor said he believes Rove was candid and forthcoming about his contact with reporters.

"I've been assured by the prosecutor they have no reason to doubt the honesty of anything he's said," Luskin said.

Cooper and New York Times reporter Judith Miller face four months in jail as early as Wednesday for defying Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan's order to cooperate with Fitzgerald's investigation. The Supreme Court on Monday refused to hear the reporters' appeals of Hogan's order.

Journalists Say Threat Of Subpoena Intensifies (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

In 1991, when Timothy Phelps, a reporter for Newsday, and Nina Totenberg, a reporter for National Public Radio, broke the news that Anita Hill had accused Clarence Thomas, then a Supreme Court nominee, of sexual harassment, a special Senate counsel tried to subpoena the reporters' telephone records to unmask their confidential source.

The accusations prompted a second round of highly contentious confirmation hearings, but Senate leaders ultimately refused to give the special counsel permission to pursue the records, and eventually the matter was dropped.

Mr. Phelps, who is now Newsday's bureau chief in Washington, recalled his case last week after two courts, including the Supreme Court, ruled in two similar cases against journalists.

"We seemed to have pretty solid support for the stand we took, from the journalistic community, the legal community, the human rights community, the public," he said. "And I don't sense as much of that today, even in the journalistic community. The legal atmosphere, the corporate atmosphere, and the public atmosphere has changed."

Lawyers for the news media say that the legal climate for those seeking to protect confidential sources is turning chillier, with more subpoenas being issued to reporters. There is no database that tracks such subpoenas, and some prosecutors dispute that they are on the rise. But a series of high-profile cases involving confidential sources has the news media on edge.

DOJ_NMG_0000886

"It does feel like open season," said Laura Handman, a First Amendment lawyer based in Washington. "There are more instances of courts ordering confidential sources to be disclosed," she said, adding that she believed the Bush administration's emphasis on secrecy was partly to blame. "This leads to more leak inquiries, which, in turn, leads to more subpoenas."

In the last year, more than two dozen reporters across the country have been subpoenaed or questioned about their confidential sources in cases before federal courts, according to the Newspaper Association of America. Paul J. Boyle, senior vice president of the association, said he believed that "the filing of subpoenas, as well as the letters and phone calls that media companies receive from prosecutors and civil litigants, is on the rise."

Kurt Wimmer, a media lawyer whose firm, Covington & Burling, represents 45 television stations in 40 states, said he had as many subpoenas against reporters in the first three months of this year as he had in all of last year.

He said those subpoenas were largely inspired by the looming prospect over the last several months that Judith Miller of The New York Times and Matthew Cooper of Time magazine would go to jail for refusing to testify in a grand jury investigation into the disclosure of the identity of a covert C.I.A. operative, Valerie Plame. The Supreme Court last week declined to hear the reporters' appeal, intensifying one of the biggest clashes between the news media and the courts in a generation.

"When the Supreme Court says there's nothing wrong with forcing reporters to testify and go to jail, other lawyers are looking at that and saying, 'Why shouldn't I subpoena a reporter?' " Mr. Wimmer said.

Others doubt that there have been more subpoenas recently, saying it may just seem that way because a handful of cases have become so prominent. They say that regardless of the numbers, there is nothing wrong with pursuing justice if a reporter has been manipulated by a source and published misleading information.

In another case last week, a federal appeals court in Washington upheld contempt orders against four reporters who had refused to disclose their confidential sources to Wen Ho Lee, an atomic scientist who had been suspected of passing secrets to the Chinese but pleaded guilty to a lesser charge. He is suing the government for giving information about him to those reporters, violating his privacy.

Brian A. Sun, a Los Angeles lawyer who represents Dr. Lee, said that while he did not see more subpoenas, just more publicity about them, he agreed that the Miller-Cooper case "could encourage other prosecutors to utilize the tools that they have had available to them." In Mr. Sun's view, what is behind these cases are leakers who have "less than altruistic motives" and are using reporters, while those reporters in turn are looking to break a big story.

The heightened interest in national security issues since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks has drawn attention to some cases, said Martin London, a New York lawyer who has litigated several media cases and subpoenaed nearly a dozen reporters in 1972 on behalf of Spiro T. Agnew, the former vice president. At the same time, he said, high-profile scandals at various news organizations, including The New York Times and CBS News, have undermined confidence in the news media.

"I don't buy that there is any increase in subpoenas," Mr. London said. "The Miller-Cooper case is very unusual, it has a lot of wrinkles that are just sort of extraordinary. But it's perfectly reasonable in a post-9/11 world for the government to be concerned about the security of C.I.A. information."

John Nowacki, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the department would not comment on the use of subpoenas against reporters.

Mr. Boyle and others said there was a change after a 2003 ruling written by Richard Posner, an influential federal appeals court judge in Chicago, who said that lower courts had been misreading a 1972 Supreme Court decision, Branzburg v. Hayes. That case in fact rejected the idea of First Amendment protections for reporters, but media lawyers over three decades managed to convince judges otherwise.

"He seems to have freed some of his colleagues to pull back on the privilege," said Sandra Baron, executive director of the Media Law Resource Center.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special prosecutor in the Miller-Cooper case, has served as something of a role model for those who are seeking information from reporters. Mr. Fitzgerald has employed a technique based on the idea that if a source no longer requires confidentiality, the reporter's pledge to keep it is moot. He has sought and obtained waivers from suspected sources releasing reporters of their confidentiality agreements, making it harder for reporters to claim they are bound by a pledge not to talk.

DOJ_NMG_0000887

Through this approach, Mr. Fitzgerald obtained at least limited testimony from journalists including Tim Russert of NBC, Walter Pincus of The Washington Post and Mr. Cooper. Mr. Cooper was subpoenaed again and refused to testify, although Time Inc. has turned over his notes to the prosecutor, a decision with which Mr. Cooper said he disagreed. Mr. Cooper and Ms. Miller face another court hearing Wednesday to learn their fates.

Mr. Phelps, for one, lamented this turn of events and said it was only likely to chill potential sources in the future. "The fact that some news organizations have cooperated in this case is going to put a little seed of doubt in people's minds about whether they can really depend on reporters or not," he said.

And there is a rising concern among reporters that those people might be right.

"The biggest fear that most reporters have now is not having their mail taken or their phone records taken without their being told," said John Solomon, who oversees investigative reporting for the Associated Press and who had both of those things happen to him, in 2002 and 2001, respectively. "The biggest concern is that they'll write about something and will be forced to talk about it."

Representative Mike Pence, the Indiana Republican who is pushing, so far unsuccessfully, for Congress to pass a federal law to protect journalists, said that fear was justified. "No reporter, as the law has evolved in the last 30 years, can give absolute assurance to any source that at no time will their identity be disclosed," he said.

In addition to the Lee and Miller-Cooper cases, there have been several other high-profile cases involving confidential sources. Jim Taricani, a reporter with WJAR, a television station in Providence, R.I., refused to reveal the identity of the person who leaked him an F.B.I. videotape of a politician taking a bribe. He was sentenced to six months of home detention in December and was released after four months.

Nine news organizations have been subpoenaed in the case involving Steven J. Hatfill, a scientist, who sued federal officials under the privacy act for naming him as a "person of interest" in the 2001 anthrax investigations. As many as 100 federal agents have waived any confidentiality agreements they had with the media in that case.

Ms. Miller of The New York Times and a colleague, Philip Shenon, are under subpoena for their phone records by a grand jury investigating the leak of information about a planned F.B.I. raid on an Islamic charity suspected of funding terrorism. In February, a federal district judge in New York held that the reporters had a right to keep their phone records confidential.

The cases come as polls show the public has a deepening distrust of the news media, although a study by the Pew Research Center last month found that 76 percent of Americans think the use of confidential sources is at least sometimes justified.

Michael Getler, the ombudsman for The Washington Post, cautioned between linking what he agrees is a rise in the number of legal proceedings over sources and the low regard in which the news media is held. "There clearly is a more widespread ideological assault from both sides on the press these days, and that may well be feeding some of the prosecutorial zeal," he said. "But I don't know that that is really the case. I don't think we know enough to say exactly what is driving individual prosecutors."

Congressman Mum After FBI Searches Home (AP-Y2)

By Seth Hettena, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

A California congressman whose dealings with a defense contractor are under investigation was taking a "personal day" Saturday and not commenting on federal authorities' searches a day earlier of his home and a yacht where he stayed while in Washington, a spokesman said.

Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham didn't plan a public appearance until a Monday pancake breakfast in Encinitas, spokesman Mark Olson said.

Olson referred all questions about the investigation to Cunningham's attorney.

FBI agents on Friday searched Cunningham's $2.55 million mansion outside San Diego and a 42-foot yacht named Duke Stir, according to a bureau spokeswoman, who said agents from the Department of Defense and Internal Revenue Service assisted.

DOJ_NMG_0000888

Cunningham's attorney, K. Lee Blalack, released a statement saying he told the government Thursday the congressman would cooperate with the investigation.

"They will apparently not take 'yes' for an answer and have instead opted to use strong-arm tactics that were designed to generate headlines," Blalack said.

Blalack said Saturday that Cunningham still intended to provide information requested.

Authorities also searched the Washington offices of defense firm MZM Inc. MZM's founder, Mitchell Wade, bought a home from the congressman in 2003 at what may have been an inflated $1.7 million price. Wade also owns the yacht where Cunningham said he has lived part-time since April 2004.

Cunningham pledged last month to release records on the boat payments but has yet to do so. If he was living on Wade's boat for free, that could be a violation of congressional ethics rules.

Blalack said Saturday that Cunningham still planned to release those records but did not say when. He declined to comment further on the case.

Cunningham, 63, a former Navy "Top Gun" fighter pilot and eight-term Republican congressman, has said that he showed poor judgment in selling the house but acted honestly and predicted that an investigation would prove that.

Public Defender Rules Are Set To Change (SLPD)

By Robert Patrick, Of the Post-Dispatch

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 3, 2005

The St. Louis public defender's office - the last legal hope for those too poor to afford their own lawyer - will, for the first time in at least 20 years, refuse to represent certain people in court starting Tuesday, state officials said last week.

Those people are on the misdemeanor confined docket, which means they've been arrested on misdemeanor charges, or are named on the assessed docket because they've been arrested for failing to pay fines or court costs.

State and local representatives of the public defender's office say they're making the move because it's unethical and unprofessional to try to represent defendants with only minutes to familiarize themselves with the cases.

J. Marty Robinson, director of the Missouri State Public Defender system, calls it "meet 'em and greet 'em and plead 'em."

"I'm just flabbergasted that there are people that think this is OK," he said.

Robinson said many people were probably misled into thinking they had a lawyer, but public defenders were simply "filling out the court's paperwork."

Public defenders also say that under recently revised state laws, guilty pleas to two of certain misdemeanors can lead to a felony charge and serious prison time for the third offense, along the lines of state three-strikes laws. That could mean defendants who plead guilty to minor crimes to stay out of jail are unknowingly increasing their chance of greater future penalties.

"Our representation on that docket was unethical, unprofessional and unconstitutional, and innocent and vulnerable people were being hurt," said St. Louis District Defender Eric Affholter. "And that's why we made our decision to participate differently on that docket."

The move is threatening to fill local jails and to clog courtrooms. Presiding Circuit Judge John Riley said he was going to tell city officials last week that city jails could be seeing more inmates for longer periods.

It also is angering judges. In legal paperwork filed late Friday, the public defender's office said one assistant public defender had been told by sheriff's deputies they had been ordered to arrest her and her colleagues if they didn't show up to interview clients at 9 a.m. Tuesday. But sheriff's spokesman Mike Guzy said Friday afternoon that he wasn't aware of any order to arrest public defenders.

The judges reportedly are striking back in other ways, including in ways public defenders say will punish those too poor to afford their own attorneys.

According to affidavits signed by Affholter and Assistant District Defender Laura O'Sullivan and filed Friday, Circuit Judge Michael Mullen called O'Sullivan and told her that he was changing policies in his courtroom in response to the public defender's move set for Tuesday. Mullen said he would no longer allow public defenders to postpone trials, would go with prosecutors' recommended sentences over public defenders' recommendations and would no longer reschedule hearings to avoid conflicts with the public defenders' schedules.

DOJ_NMG_0000889

"When one arm of the criminal justice system flexes its muscle, the others must respond," Mullen told the public defender's office staff, according to Affholter. Mullen was on vacation last week and could not be reached for comment.

"We weren't trying to flex our muscle," Affholter responded last week. "Our intent really was to do the best lawyering we can."

The controversy began, according to legal filings, after two defendants pleaded guilty with the assistance of public defenders, then hired private attorneys who weeks later tried to withdraw those guilty pleas, alleging inadequate representation.

The public defender's office then began examining whether they should continue to represent certain defendants on the docket.

Public defender's officials met with a handful of judges on May 24 to discuss the problem and suggest solutions, Affholter said.

"Nothing came of that," he said.

A June 17 letter to Associate Circuit Judge Paula Bryant announced that as of July 5, the office would no longer automatically represent defendants the first time they appear in court after having been arrested on a misdemeanor charge.

From 15 to 50 people appear on that docket each morning, Affholter said. Public defenders have been representing those defendants without access to police reports or the criminal court file and with little time to consult, he said.

Robinson said those defendants have a constitutional right to "meaningful representation." He said, "It means an attorney that meets with me, hears my problems, finds out what the case is against me." The attorney "either presents my defense or knows enough about my situation to negotiate the best plea agreement. But you can't really do that unless you know what evidence the state has."

Defendants often were given a choice: Plead guilty or stay in jail until paying a $5,000 bond, Affholter said. "So, coercively, people were pleading guilty."

For certain misdemeanor crimes, the third charge can be prosecuted as a felony, Affholter said.

"So the implication of just pleading people out has a lot more serious impact," he said. "Driving while (license) revoked can now be a felony if you have enough priors." And that could mean up to five years in prison.

Pippa Barrett, in charge of misdemeanors for the St. Louis circuit attorney's office, said it would be "infrequent" for someone to qualify to be charged with a felony for that charge.

According to the June 17 letter and to state officials, starting Tuesday, public defenders in St. Louis, the state's busiest trial court, will not represent defendants who already have been convicted and sentenced but were arrested again because they failed to pay fines or fees.

Riley describes defendants in that category as "you didn't do what you were supposed to do or you didn't do it by a certain date."

And the office will represent poor defendants but will not represent them if they wish to immediately plead guilty.

"We are taking this position because it is not possible for us to render constitutional, ethical and professional assistance of counsel upon walking into court with no discovery, no opportunity for investigation and no opportunity to counsel the accused," the letter reads.

Similar rules elsewhere

Broward County, Fla., Public Defender Howard Finkelstein banned "meet, greet and plead" early last month over similar concerns.

Although some judges warned that the system would crumble and criminal defendants would miss out on good plea deals, Finkelstein said, "the public's reaction has been overwhelmingly supportive."

Finkelstein said he knows of two other public defenders in Florida that have instituted similar rules.

Riley said some judges see setting the start of the policy change on Tuesday - the end of a long holiday weekend that could result in a busy criminal docket - as a cynical way to boost pressure on the judges.

Others, including Affholter, said there have been accusations the move is in retaliation for Bryant's March 23 decision to overturn a guilty plea by a man accused of violating a protective order.

In a legal motion filed in that case, private attorney James Knappenberger said his client didn't have the capacity to understand the proceedings, couldn't comprehend what he read and was mentally and physically exhausted at the hearing.

"His assistant public defender did not raise his issues at or before the time of the plea. He only spoke to the assistant public defender the first time, when they appeared first in court, and entered his plea of guilty," the filing says.

Bryant did not give a reason in her ruling and declined an interview request. The man was later referred for a mental health evaluation.

"That happened to be a kid whose parents or someone had the wherewithal to look into it," Robinson said. "I wonder how many hundreds, if not thousands, don't have the ability to challenge it after the fact and have it set aside."

Affholter denied that his office was retaliating and said public defenders were not angry at Bryant. Affholter also denied accusations that the move was a bid for more money and staff. But state officials with the public defender's office have been crying for help.

Robinson said caseload was increasing at an average rate of 6.5 percent per year over the last 15 years.

"Their case files are too many, and they are too few," Robinson said of public defenders. Robinson calls it "assembly-line justice" that will inevitably send innocent people to jail.

Public defender's offices statewide are so understaffed, in fact, that the Missouri Bar announced June 20 that it is asking private attorneys to volunteer and help out by taking traffic, vehicle registration, licensing and other minor cases off the hands of public defenders.

"If the Public Defender System slips any further, Missouri's entire criminal justice system will falter," said Missouri Bar President Joe Whisler in a statement announcing the volunteer initiative.

Affholter said "the decision we made is 100 percent for representation."

Affholter also said the new policy would probably not be a big money saver. The office will most likely pick up many of the new cases anyway, he said.

In interviews last week, Riley was skeptical that handling the docket was very taxing.

"The guy didn't pay his costs on time? How much time do you need, counselor?" Riley asked.

An order and reply

The issue is likely to remain unresolved until at least Tuesday.

Presiding Judge Riley issued a one-page court order Monday that said public defenders would have to interview defendants on the confined docket at 9 a.m. to see whether they are eligible for representation by a public defender.

Robinson, director of the Missouri State Public Defender system, fired back Friday afternoon with a 22-page filing that contained many of the allegations against Mullen and other St. Louis judges.

Robinson's filing asks a judge to stay the order until a hearing could be scheduled. Robinson's filings also said Riley's order exceeded his authority by trying to take over management of the public defender's office, was vague and overly broad and would force public defenders to violate ethics rules.

The filing also asks St. Louis judges to recuse themselves from hearing the issue.

Barrett, who said prosecutors are just "bystanders" in the conflict, said public defenders once interviewed everybody for eligibility first.

"I think what's going on, and this is only my interpretation of events, is the judges think that's what could happen again," she said.

At 4:30 p.m. Friday, 90 minutes after most court staffers had left early for the holiday weekend, O'Sullivan and Ellen Blau, deputy trial division director of the public defender's office, tried to get Circuit Judge Michael Calvin to stay Riley's order until a hearing could be held.

Riley was on vacation Friday, and was two states away when Calvin reached him by phone to tell him of the filing. Calvin refused to question the presiding judge's order.

"I don't believe it is my place to rule one way or the other," Calvin told Blau.

Calvin said the assistant presiding judge could hear the case as early as Tuesday morning.

State Weighs 2 Bills Requiring Bullet Marking (LAT)

By Jordan Rau, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

SACRAMENTO — With a zealot's enthusiasm, Randy Rossi has been firing bullets into lots of things lately. Car doors, Sheetrock, wood walls, gelatin with the consistency of human bodies.

On the base of each mashed slug is a series of tiny, mostly legible numbers that have been inscribed by a laser. To Rossi, head of Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer's firearm division, these markings represent a solution for one of law enforcement's most trying problems: the anonymity of ammunition.

"This is nothing fancy, just simple technology," he said on a recent day, after proudly showing that the identification numbers on several slugs remained readable after the bullets were fired into a bulletproof vest.

With 45% of the state's homicides unsolved in 2003, the most recent data available, the California Legislature is moving ahead with two potentially landmark measures that would require that identifying marks be embedded on projectiles from guns.

One proposal would have all bullets sold in the state marked during manufacture with codes. The other would mandate that guns be equipped with stamping mechanisms that would hammer telling marks onto every cartridge fired. That could allow investigators to link the cartridge to the gun's purchaser even if they could not find the firearm.

The approaches depart from law enforcement tactics elsewhere in the country, which have focused on creating computer registries of fired bullets. Those allow for investigators to match projectiles from different crimes, linking ones committed with the same weapon.

The issue of marking ammunition has become the most contested law enforcement topic in Sacramento this year. One of the bills has split California's law enforcement community and infuriated the nation's ammunition manufacturers, weapons sellers and firearms enthusiasts, including the National Rifle Assn. Several police groups in California are also opposed.

The hyperbolic debate has even ricocheted into Congress. In April, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Committee on Armed Services, warned Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger that requiring serial numbers on ammunition would increase the cost of bullets so much that the military would scale back target practice. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, also a Republican, is also against the proposal, which he said would hurt manufacturers in his state.

Nationwide, there were 347,705 crimes committed with firearms in 2003. In California, those included 44,466 robberies and aggravated assaults, and 1,733 murders.

Although handgun serialization has been a required practice for decades, forensic advances in tracking the sale of ammunition — which is far more likely to be left at a crime scene — have been limited.

Since 1994, law enforcement agencies have been experimenting with ballistics imaging technology that makes computer pictures of bullets recovered from crime scenes. Those images are compared in hopes of linking crimes in which the same weapon was used.

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives has established a database with 862,000 images that authorities say have led to 11,300 matches. Maryland and New York have established their own programs but have been criticized for failing to provide enough substantial leads. The first time Maryland's database contributed to a murder conviction was in April, four years after its creation.

California lawmakers debated the same strategy in 2000 but decided instead to study it. A 2003 report from Lockyer's office provided greater caution after concluding that constructing such a large database would be "impractical" and finding that it was often difficult to match images of bullets fired from the same gun.

The ammunition bill, SB 357 — numbered to correspond with a popular caliber — was introduced by Sen. Joe Dunn (D-Santa Ana) on Lockyer's behalf. It has passed the Senate and an initial Assembly panel. It is the one that has drawn the most intense opposition.

For any box of ammunition sold in California, the bill would require manufacturers to engrave each bullet with the same serial number, which would also be affixed to the box. Retailers would record who purchased each box and would provide that information to the state Department of Justice.

DOJ_NMG_0000892

Ammunition Coding Systems, a Seattle company that provided demonstration bullets to California police, uses a laser to etch the number, but the bill does not specify what technology manufacturers would have to use.

Initial testing indicates that the serial numbers almost always survive impact. The San Bernardino County Sheriff's Department was able to identify serial numbers on 21 of 22 bullets it tested and recovered. The attorney general's office identified 180 serial numbers on 181 bullets.

The other, less cleverly numbered, bill, AB 352 by Assemblyman Paul Koretz (D-West Hollywood), has passed the Assembly and one Senate panel. The bill, sponsored by the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence, would require that semiautomatic pistols be equipped with technology that could imprint microscopic identifying information on each cartridge case fired from the gun.

NanoMark Technologies of Londonderry, N.H., has patented one technology that uses the firing pin to emboss the identification mark onto the chamber while it is in the breech of the gun. Although Ammunition Coding Systems' marks can be read with the aid of a regular magnifying glass, NanoMark's require more powerful imaging equipment used by forensic experts.

It remains unclear what Schwarzenegger will do if either measure makes it to his desk. Last year the governor proved himself unpredictable on gun legislation by banning .50-caliber BMG rifles — powerful hunting weapons that can penetrate thick surfaces from great distances — but rejecting a measure requiring ammunition vendors to keep records of all purchasers.

"Forensic testing of ammunition used in a crime is the most effective way of tracing criminal activity," Schwarzenegger wrote in that veto message.

Ammunition manufacturers, who together produce 8 billion rounds nationally each year, say Dunn's legislation would bankrupt them. The industry, which makes $626 million worth of wholesale civilian sales each year — on top of unknown amounts to law enforcement and the military — insists that marking each piece will slow their production and substantially drive up the cost of bullets. Some fear that using lasers in factories filled with gunpowder would be unsafe.

"The question is, 'Can it be done on a mass level?' and the answer is, 'No, not without building a new factory,' " said Lawrence Keane, general counsel for the Sporting Arms and Ammunition Manufacturers' Institute, the industry association.

Makers of coding equipment, which etches and reads serial numbers on hundreds of products, insist that it could be done for a penny or less per bullet.

Carl Rennard, a consultant from Lincoln, R.I., who owns several coding patents, said the ammunition industry "is really uninformed about the technology available, how unobtrusive it would be to the product line. They're just being afraid."

Advocates say the industry has been unwilling to meet with consultants who help integrate such technology into their production lines.

The debate has also incorporated a disagreement on the craftiness of criminals.

Opponents complain that criminals will refit their guns to get rid of firing pins that stamp codes onto cartridges and will shave numbers off bullets, even though that would require them to take the bullet out of its cartridge. More likely, they say, criminals will simply avoid these weapons and buy their wares out of state or use black market items.

"Criminal street gang members and other perpetrators of crime, who are often under the legal age for buying handguns and ammunition, would have no trouble getting both from sources other than retailers," Robert Baker, president of the Los Angeles Police Protective League, wrote in opposition to Dunn's bill.

Some forensics experts say that is giving too much credit to criminals who often do not bother to use gloves during crimes or take other precautionary measures.

"Yes, there would be ways to get around that, but it's not an easy thing to do," said Joe Vince, a former agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms who is now a forensics consultant in Frederick, Md. "In L.A. in particular, you have ghetto rounds, which is whatever you have in your pocket."

Lawrence Kobilinsky, a professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York City, said serializing ammunition was "probably something that should have been done long ago" but cautioned that its use would be limited so long as the requirement was limited to California.

"To have one state is well and good, but in order to be effective, it has to be national," he said.

But backers of the legislation hope that, as with many other California mandates, the state's market is so large that manufacturers will find it cheaper to adopt the practices for all their wares rather than just for California's.

DOJ_NMG_0000893

Advocates say they do not expect the technology to automatically solve every case but say they believe it would often provide a valuable clue.

"It's like any other tool, like fingerprints or copying down a license number," Rossi, the state firearms chief, said. "There are limitations, but it can still be valuable."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

18 Nabbed In Human-smuggling Scheme (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

Federal and state authorities in California arrested 18 persons during a series of overnight raids last week that targeted a sophisticated human-smuggling operation authorities said brought hundreds of South Korean women into the United States to work as prostitutes.

A criminal complaint filed in Los Angeles late Friday charged 23 persons with conspiracy. Five were listed as fugitives.

Those arrested, according to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Dean Boyd, were charged with harboring illegal aliens for an immoral purpose, harboring and transporting illegal aliens and violating the Travel Act, a federal statute that prohibits moving people across state lines for illegal sexual purposes, such as prostitution.

In addition to the criminal arrests, Mr. Boyd said, immigration officials took into custody 46 women who were working at brothels that were shut down. Agents are interviewing the women to learn more about the circumstances surrounding how they came to the United States and how they were treated once they arrived, he said.

"This type of criminal organization exploits the hopes and dreams of immigrants," said U.S. Attorney Debra Wong Yang in Los Angeles. "In this case, they exploited women, some of whom apparently suffered injuries as a result of their work. My office works very hard to eliminate these types of exploitation and to secure punishment for those who engage in them, seeking to profit at the expense of others."

Mr. Boyd said the investigation focused on a criminal organization called the "Jung Organization," which reportedly smuggled South Korean women into the United States and then provided them to brothel operators. The brothels were concealed behind businesses that purported to be massage parlors and "out-call service" operations. He said the prostitutes were managed by an underground network of Korean "taxi" services operated by members and associates of the Jung Organization.

The taxi services coordinated the prostitutes' daily schedules and worked hand-in-hand with the brothel operators.

An affidavit in the case said ringleaders Young Joon Jung and Ho Kyung Kim oversaw efforts to recruit prospective prostitutes in South Korea and then arranged for them to be brought to the United States. Some of the women were smuggled into the country across the Mexican and Canadian borders, it said.

The affidavit said the women paid up to $16,000 each to be smuggled into the country. Once they arrived, it said the women were expected to work as prostitutes, with a portion of their earnings going to repay their smuggling debts. As part of the scheme, some of the women were transported to Northern California, Colorado and Texas to work as prostitutes, the affidavit said.

An army of federal agents executed search warrants at 28 locations across the greater Los Angeles area. The targeted sites included suspected brothels and so-called human smuggling "drop houses." The brothels were housed in a variety of businesses, including chiropractic offices, acupuncture clinics, spas and massage parlors.

During the raids, agents seized nearly $300,000 in cash and more than $650,000 in bank accounts.

California Court Faces Gay Unions (WT)

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

California's attorney general urged the state Supreme Court to decide whether homosexual "marriage" is permitted under the state constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0000894

Attorney General Bill Lockyer asked the justices to review a trial judge's decision in March that said state laws limiting marriage to heterosexual couples is unconstitutional. The ruling had been stayed pending appeal.

The attorney general, however, wants California's top court to remove the pending case from a San Francisco appellate court.

"Same-sex couples should be given a prompt determination as to whether they can marry, and should not have to put their lives and affairs on hold indefinitely while this matter works its way through several levels of court proceedings," Mr. Lockyer said.

The move came two days after couples won a major legal victory before the state Supreme Court, which let stand a new law granting registered domestic partners many of the same rights and protections of heterosexual marriage.

But it's unclear whether the justices will decide the homosexual "marriage" question since they normally do not resolve cases until they have worked their way through the trial and appellate courts.

One of the last times they did involved same-sex "marriage."

In August, the seven justices ruled unanimously that San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom overstepped his authority by issuing same-sex "marriage" licenses last spring. On a 5-2 vote, the court also voided the 4,000 "marriages" of homosexual couples sanctioned by the city.

The court didn't resolve whether the California Constitution would permit a same-sex "marriage." In nullifying the "marriages," Justice Joyce Kennard wrote the court was not interested in deciding the hot-button issue of same-sex "marriage" until "the constitutionality of California laws restricting marriages to opposite-sex couples has been authoritatively resolved through judicial proceedings."

The court can make its decision any time.

Recall Star Takes A Remap Risk (DMN)

By Andrew Becker

The Dallas Morning News, July 3, 2005

Amid recent polls showing Arnold Schwarzenegger's star power dropping from the top of California's political marquee, the governor's push to redraw congressional and legislative district lines mid-decade isn't looking like this summer's Republican blockbuster.

It's a very different scenario from the redistricting deal that House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, orchestrated in Texas two years ago.

"You definitely haven't seen national Democrats or Republicans involved like in Texas with Tom DeLay," said Steven Hill of the New America Foundation, a nonpartisan Washington think tank. "It seems to me Schwarzenegger is pushing this, and even if he is successful, there's not a lot to gain."

Mr. DeLay's efforts boosted Texas Republicans' House delegation to a 21-11 advantage in the 2004 election, just two years after Democrats held a 17-15 edge.

What exactly Mr. Schwarzenegger seeks from redistricting reform isn't clear, pundits say. While it could help Republicans acquire congressional seats in the long term, the initiative hasn't brought wide party support.

No turnover in seats

At issue in California are fairness and competitiveness. California Republicans and Democrats agree redistricting reform is necessary. Lawmakers redraw lines every 10 years to reflect census-determined population changes.

The existing lines in California were laid out in 2001 after a deal was struck to protect Democratic and Republican incumbents in congressional and state legislative races. Of the 153 seats up for election in 2004, not one changed parties.

California's congressional delegation favors Democrats, 33-20. Similarly, Democrats dominate the Assembly, 48-32, and the state Senate, 25-15.

While Mr. DeLay worked with Texas state legislators to redraw congressional districts, Mr. Schwarzenegger doesn't have the political clout in Sacramento to effect the changes he seeks. Instead, he wants Californians to take away the state lawmakers' power to draw congressional and their own district lines so he can have a more pliable legislature.

DOJ_NMG_0000895

In June, the Republican governor called for a special election. Along with seven other initiatives on the November ballot, the Schwarzenegger-backed plan calls for an independent commission of three retired judges to redraw district lines. California Democrats floated their own independent commission proposal this week, but it wouldn't require new boundaries until after the 2010 census. Mr. Schwarzenegger hopes to initiate the change immediately.

In Texas, state Sen. Jeff Wentworth, R-San Antonio, has introduced a similar measure in every session since 1993 to create an independent redistricting commission. In the Legislature's regular meeting this year, his measure cleared the Senate before stalling in the House.

Other goals

California's budget is Mr. Schwarzenegger's ultimate target; it has been running a multibillion-dollar deficit for each of the last three years. He also wants to make public employee unions get written permission from members to spend fees or dues on political contributions. Some believe Mr. Schwarzenegger may compromise on redistricting – especially because his approval numbers and the voter support for redistricting are low – if he can get legislators' support for his other initiatives.

Recent Field Polls have shown that less than half of voters approve of midterm redistricting or would vote for Mr. Schwarzenegger next year.

Michael McDonald, a professor of public and international affairs at George Mason University in Virginia, sees Mr. Schwarzenegger ultimately trying to rejuvenate moderate Republicans in the state, where legislators have become more polarized.

From the Republican perspective, "California ... is hopelessly Democratic for a long time to come," said Joel Aberbach, director of the Center for American Politics and Public Policy and a professor at the University of California, Los Angeles. "This is a game that's being played with threats and counterthreats. Some of these [initiatives] are tradable – don't take them at face value."

In Texas, Mr. DeLay helped redraw congressional boundaries, including his own, in 2003 without facing the kind of risks Mr. Schwarzenegger does. With the election on the California governor's plan costing taxpayers at least $60 million, it becomes a referendum on Mr. Schwarzenegger, who rode into office in a recall vote in 2003.

"It's a crazy gamble," said Tony Quinn, a former redistricting adviser to Republicans in the California Assembly, who noted that at least eight attempts to put redistricting before the voters have failed. "The public would not approve reform proposed just by one party. They're very suspicious of this."

State Ballot, Wider Impact (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Even before the ballot is set, California's special election is drawing money and attention from interest groups and political partisans across the country who see the campaign as a way to invigorate their efforts in 2006 and beyond.

Democrats believe they have a chance this fall to make Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "a starring villain" in their attack on national Republican leaders, said Jenny Backus, a Democratic strategist in Washington.

Conservative activists see an opportunity to defang a longtime nemesis — organized labor — by making it harder to collect union dues for political purposes.

The pharmaceutical industry and consumer groups are waging a battle over prescription drugs that both sides consider a test case for fights in Congress and elsewhere.

"California's always a state that the rest of the nation looks to," said Michelle Korsmo, executive vice president of Americans for Prosperity, a Washington group that favors limited government. By approving a budget cap sponsored by Schwarzenegger, voters would demonstrate that "controlling the growth of state spending is not a red- or blue-state issue," Korsmo said, spurring limitation efforts in other states.

Eight initiatives have qualified for the statewide ballot, which will bring voters to the polls for the fourth time in as many years. The measures deal with a variety of issues, including parental consent for abortions, teacher tenure and electricity re-regulation, as well as union dues, redistricting, prescription drugs and the state budget.

DOJ_NMG_0000896

However, much about the election remains uncertain — including how vigorously the two major political parties will go at each other.

Schwarzenegger has embraced three of the measures as part of a package designed to circumvent the Democrat-run Legislature and diminish the clout of lawmakers in Sacramento. Those measures would lengthen the time teachers work before receiving tenure, give the governor greater control over state spending and give legislators' political line-drawing power to a panel of retired judges.

But with opinion polls showing both Schwarzenegger and the Legislature falling in public esteem — and the redistricting and budget measures opposed by most voters — talks have been underway on a possible deal to place alternative measures on the ballot with the blessing of both sides. Voters would then be urged to pass the bipartisan versions, the way they did last November when presented with a compromise initiative — supplanting an earlier draft — that made it harder for Sacramento to raid local government coffers.

A deal between lawmakers and the governor could quickly take the starch out of national Democrats' anti-Schwarzenegger efforts. It would also leave the two Democrats running for governor, Treasurer Phil Angelides and Controller Steve Westly, in a politically awkward position, caught between their ambitions and the party's legislators. That provides added incentive for the governor to deal, though he faces division between his more moderate advisors and administration conservatives who would prefer a fight.

Democrats outside Sacramento are not shying away from a scrap, seeing a chance to lump Schwarzenegger with Republicans in Washington and the GOP's pattern of "arrogance and abuse," in the words of Karen Finney, a national Democratic Party spokeswoman.

Taking down the high-profile celebrity governor would give Democrats nationwide a significant morale boost heading into the 2006 elections. "He's the hottest commodity in the country when it comes to riling up Republicans, and he's also one of the hottest commodities in the country when it comes to riling up Democrats," said Democratic strategist Backus.

With so much uncertainty surrounding the November vote — and the fight over a Supreme Court vacancy consuming Washington for the next few months — many outside interest groups are waiting to see the final ballot before committing money or personnel to California. Korsmo, for instance, said her organization — which claims 35,000 members in the state — would like to see an even tougher version of the spending limitation measure.

But even if a bipartisan deal is reached on the governor's proposals, that still leaves the two measures drawing the most interest from outside the state: the initiatives dealing with prescription drugs and union dues.

Already, the pharmaceutical industry has contributed more than $30 million to promote a ballot measure establishing a voluntary discount drug program, modeled on a deal negotiated with Schwarzenegger but rejected by the state Senate.

A rival measure, sponsored by Health Access California, a consumer group, would offer more extensive coverage and penalize drug companies that failed to offer discounts. It has been vigorously opposed by the pharmaceutical industry, which recently lost a court battle to keep the initiative off the ballot.

Anthony Wright, executive director of Health Access California, said lately he has had "at least one or two conversations a day with people in D.C. and other states" interested in the competing ballot measures.

"All of my colleagues in other states know a victory in California would have national implications in terms of the attempt to bring down the cost of prescription drugs," Wright said.

Similarly, both sides in the fight over union dues see a national stake in November's outcome.

The initiative, sponsored by conservative activist Lewis Uhler, would require the annual consent of any member of a California public employee union before a portion of his or her dues could be used for political campaigns.

The measure, dubbed "paycheck protection" by its proponents, has drawn widespread support from conservatives across the country, who believe the initiative could slash the money available to unions, which generally support Democratic candidates and causes.

"If it passes, it will be so significant and the effects will be so dramatic that you would see a dozen initiatives on the ballots [in other states] within two to four years," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, a Washington group, and one of the leading strategists on the political right.

DOJ_NMG_0000897

For some, such as proponents of school vouchers, approving a dues checkoff would be a first step toward achieving larger goals that have long been thwarted by union opposition. Vouchers would allow the use of some public education funds in private schools.

"It's no secret that for years one of the stumbling blocks to the implementation of voucher plans has been the war chest of teacher unions," said Lance Izumi, education director at the Pacific Research Institute, a conservative California think tank. A dues checkoff "has always been an issue on the radar screen for proponents of vouchers," he said.

For their part, unions and their Democratic allies are treating the initiative as a matter of political life and death. As part of their negotiations with Schwarzenegger, Democrats hope to persuade the governor to stay neutral on the initiative, which they call "paycheck deception." That would deny proponents the benefit of Schwarzenegger's considerable fundraising clout.

In the meantime, California union officials are appealing to national leaders to put their money and muscle behind efforts to defeat the ballot measure — even as the national labor movement is engaged in an unrelated fight between the AFL-CIO and dissident unions.

"Unions in California are very together about this goal," said Art Pulaski, head of the California Labor Federation.

Already, the National Education Assn. has committed more than $2 million to the opposition fight, and the special election is expected to be a topic of wide discussion when the group meets for its national convention in Los Angeles this week. Barbara Kerr, president of the California Teachers Assn., said the group has received checks — "some for $5, $10, some for $100" — from individuals across the country "who know what happens in California tends to spread."

By contrast, proponents of the dues checkoff have downplayed the influence and financial support of outside interests, mindful of the campaign waged to defeat a similar, albeit broader, initiative in 1998. Unions and their Democratic allies attacked Norquist and others as part of a movement by out-of-state conservatives to silence unions and promote an anti-worker agenda in California.

Norquist, who put up $440,000 to qualify the previous initiative, has not matched that contribution this time, nor does he plan to. There is plenty of money and support within California to pass the dues checkoff without his help, he said.

Clarity Sought On Romney's Abortion Stance (BOS)

By Stephanie Ebbert

The Boston Globe, July 3, 2005

Advocates on both sides of the abortion debate say they are confused over Governor Mitt Romney's position on abortion and are seeking to understand the meaning of recent comments he has made, in light of the positions he outlined during the 2002 gubernatorial campaign.

Last week, the Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts and NARAL Pro-Choice Massachusetts provided the Globe a copy of a letter sent earlier this month in which they asked Romney to explain his current abortion philosophy and to confirm that he supports emergency contraception and other measures he embraced while running for governor.

Similarly, a leading antiabortion group is puzzled: "We honestly don't know where he stands on this issue," said Marie Sturgis, executive director and legislative director for Massachusetts Citizens for Life.

When he ran for US Senate in liberal-leaning Massachusetts in 1994, Romney said abortion should be "safe and legal." As a candidate for governor in 2002, he said he would keep the state's abortion rights laws intact and has since said that he kept that promise. But this year, as he began preparing a potential run for president, Romney said he is "in a different place" than he was when he first ran for office in 1994 and has stressed that he is "personally prolife."

Romney was asked repeatedly by the Globe last week to elaborate on his abortion stance, and he refused. "I think I've said it a few hundred times through my campaign the same thing I'll say today, which is that I personally do not favor abortion. But as governor of Massachusetts, I will keep the laws as they exist," Romney said Wednesday.

That answer is unfulfilling to advocates on both sides of the polarizing issue at a time when the next president could shape the makeup of the US Supreme Court. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced Friday that she was stepping down, and more openings are expected in the coming years.

DOJ_NMG_0000898

Four weeks ago, the Globe reported that Joseph M. Scheidler, the national director of the Pro-Life Action League, detected that Romney was "coming around" to a firmer opposition to abortion. Soon after Scheidler's comments were published, however, the Chicago-based advocate heard from Massachusetts abortion opponents who were far more skeptical about their governor.

"I started getting a lot of calls saying, 'This guy is no good, he's just playing politics, he's trying to get both sides,' " Scheidler said in a telephone interview.

Sturgis, of the Massachusetts Citizens for Life, said Romney does not have regular contacts with her group. "If we could, we would," Sturgis said. When he ran for governor in 2002, she said, her group considered him an abortion rights supporter; Romney declined to complete the Citizens for Life questionnaire.

"He appears to be evolving," Sturgis said. "Where that goes, or to what degree he winds up with us, I can't say. But certainly, more than one politician has changed his mind on this issue."

By contrast, the Massachusetts Catholic Conference, which also opposes abortion, does not believe the governor's recent statements signify a change in his position.

"No matter how you position the governor, it looks to me like he's the more moderate choice, given what the Democrats may offer," said Daniel Avila, associate director for policy and research for the Massachusetts Catholic Conference. And, Avila believes, Romney will make his position clear when the time comes. "My experience is that when a particular issue solidifies, it hasn't taken too long for him to come forward with a concrete response," he said.

During the 2002 campaign for governor, most major abortion rights groups endorsed his Democratic opponent, Shannon O'Brien, because they said she would be a champion of their cause, even though Romney offered support for abortion rights. He picked up the backing of the Republican Pro-Choice Coalition.

"I respect and will protect a woman's right to choose. This choice is a deeply personal one," Romney wrote in answer to a NARAL questionnaire during the campaign. "Women should be free to choose based on their own beliefs, not mine and not the government's. The truth is, no candidate in the governor's race in either party would deny women abortion rights. So let's end this argument that does not exist and stop the cynical, divisive attacks made only for political gain."

Now, abortion rights activists contend he is backing away, citing his changing language on abortion rights and his positions on what they see as a related set of issues on family planning. This spring, Romney tried to direct federal abstinence-only federal funding toward classroom instruction, which abortion rights groups oppose. He trimmed $1 million for teen pregnancy prevention in budget vetoes Thursday, although he let some money remain.

Looking ahead, he has refused to commit to a pending bill providing emergency contraception, though he supported such pregnancy prevention during his campaign. He also tried unsuccessfully to insert language into the stem cell research bill stating that life begins at the moment of conception. Abortion opponents were heartened by that effort, but remain unsure.

Romney's declaration of support for abortion rights dates to his first campaign for political office, challenging US Senator Edward M. Kennedy in 1994. During a televised debate, Romney said he and his family were influenced by an experience that led both him and his mother, who ran for the US Senate in Michigan in 1970, to embrace abortion rights.

"Many years ago, I had a dear, close family relative that was very close to me who passed away from an illegal abortion," Romney said in a debate with Kennedy. "It is since that time my mother and my family have been committed to the belief that we can believe as we want, but we will not force our beliefs on others on that matter. And you will not see me wavering on that."

Last week, Romney's sister, Jane, recalled that the girl Romney cited in the debate was a teenager engaged to marry a relative of the Romneys' extended family. In a separate interview, Ronna Romney Kulp, the former wife of Romney's brother, Scott, remembered that the family was shaken by the girl's death.

"I do know it deeply impacted members of the family," Kulp said.

Jane Romney recalled that although the girl was not a close relative, her death shifted her family's perspective on a difficult political issue.

"With my mom, that was a personal thing because we had a tragedy close to us -- not in our immediate family, but a young girl who actually was engaged and had an illegal abortion and died," Jane Romney said in a telephone interview. "She was a beautiful, talented young gal we all loved. And it pretty much ruined the parents -- their only daughter. You would do anything not to repeat that."

DOJ_NMG_0000899

Romney has declined to discuss the episode involving the girl, and his aides were extremely sensitive to further examination of his record last week. Over his career, Romney has at times resisted characterization on abortion and he once objected to the Utah news media's characterization of him as a "prochoice" politician.

"I do not wish to be labeled prochoice," Romney wrote in a July 2001 Salt Lake Tribune letter to the editor. "I have never felt comfortable with the labels associated with the abortion issue."

If Romney would make his opposition clear, the 6,000-member Pro-Life Action League would be pleased to have him, Scheidler said.

"This would be the time," Scheidler said. "I can't fault him for that, if [the timing] looks a little suspicious. He's read the writing on the wall. The values voters are strong. And they're growing."

Frist Again At The Center Of Stem Cell Fight (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

On July 18, 2001, Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) stood on the Senate floor urging his colleagues to buck conservative orthodoxy and support federally funded research on embryonic stem cells. As the Senate's only physician, Frist made headlines -- and gave momentum to the controversial science -- with his endorsement.

The following month, however, President Bush announced a policy that was far more restrictive, limiting federal research to already existing embryonic stem cells, and Frist acquiesced.

A few weeks after Bush announced his policy, Frist said the differences between the two were minor because scientists at the National Institutes of Health had "informed the president that more than 60 cell lines exist and that this number is sufficient to provide ample opportunity to research the potential of embryonic stem cells."

Today, Frist is again at the center of the stem cell battle. Unlike four years ago, when he sought an influential role, the Senate majority leader has shied away from the issue, frustrating once-admiring researchers and patient advocates who now accuse him of exchanging sound medical thinking for with political calculations.

"We, as scientists, had great expectations for what he could do," said Mary Hendrix, president and scientific director of the Children's Memorial Research Center at Northwestern University. When she heard Frist's 2001 speech, Hendrix got "goose bumps" because the well-respected transplant surgeon had "put his credibility on the line."

Hendrix is puzzled and disappointed by what "appears to be a change in Senator Frist's position," she said in an interview. "I thought he was a staunch supporter."

As Congress begins its Fourth of July recess, activists on both sides of the stem cell divide are gearing up for what appears to be a fresh fight in the Senate, perhaps as early as the week lawmakers return.

On one side are scientists and patient groups who say the cells taken from days-old embryos hold enormous potential for treating a range of illnesses because they can grow into any type of cell or tissue in the body. Opponents object to the research because the process involves destroying the embryo.

When Bush announced his compromise in 2001, the White House said scientists would have more than 60 embryonic stem cell colonies, called "lines," to work on. But fewer than two dozen have materialized, reinvigorating the push to expand the policy.

In May, with 50 Republican votes, the House passed legislation that would permit federal research on tens of thousands of frozen embryos donated by couples at fertility clinics. Bush has threatened to veto the bill, placing additional pressure on Frist to stand by a policy that falls far short of the approach he envisioned four years ago.

"If he wants the Republican nomination, he may be worried that coming out for embryonic stem cell research funding would make conservatives angry, especially if it involves disagreeing with President Bush," said Harvard political scientist Michael J. Sandel. If stem cell legislation becomes Bush's first veto, "it would be a symbolic issue in the Republican primaries."

But if Frist is maneuvering to attract Republican primary voters in pursuit of the 2008 presidential nomination, he is doing so at the risk of angering loyal Tennessee supporters such as Anne Shockley.

DOJ_NMG_0000900

"I thought he was for stem cell research, but ever since Bush got involved, [Frist has] gone all wishy-washy," said Shockley, a volunteer for the Tennessee Parkinson's Action Network. "It makes no sense. He's a physician; he knows what stem cell research can be. It seems to me it's become a political football, and it's frustrating."

Shockley, who described herself as a "pro-life" Republican, said she has stopped donating to Frist's campaigns, even as he considers a run for the presidency in 2008.

"He became [Senate Majority] Leader," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), one of the leading advocates of a broad research policy. "He has a little different responsibility now with respect to the party approach."

Over a period of three days, Frist aides did not respond to multiple interview requests. Spokesman Nick Smith left a voice message indicating only that the majority leader is trying to schedule a Senate vote this month.

Frist's 10-point stem cell proposal in the summer of 2001 was the result of extensive research, soul-searching and "20 years in the field of medicine and in science," he said. Describing himself as the "Senate's only physician and only medical researcher," he said he knew the promise and pitfalls of cutting-edge science.

His 11-page speech on the "promising and important line of inquiry" addressed in detail a host of scientific and ethical questions, displaying an impressive command of the complex science and a doctor's ease with life-and-death issues.

Drawing comparisons to his experience as a transplant surgeon, Frist stressed that the stem cells are taken only from "spare" embryos "that would otherwise be discarded."

"It is critically important that we understand, and in our moral and ethical framework ensure, that this tissue otherwise would not be used," he said. "It is similar to the fact that when I do a heart transplant, that heart otherwise would not be used for anything useful."

On the question of whether the days-old blastocyst is a life, Frist said: "There is a continuum from a sperm and an egg, to a blastocyst, to a fetus, to a child, to an adolescent, to an adult."

He acknowledged that other types of stem cells appear to offer some therapeutic benefits but said they were insufficient.

"It appears clear that research using adult stem cells does not hold the same potential for medical advances as does the use of the more versatile embryonic stem cells," he said.

Hendrix, who at the time was immediate past president of the Federation of American Societies for Experimental Biology, said she will never forget the excitement Frist's stance sparked in the research community. "The credibility he brought was something that was just profound," she said.

Conservative and religious activists were displeased, recalled Wendy Wright, senior policy director of Concerned Women for America.

"That was something we didn't care for," she said. "It wouldn't have comported with what the president came up with."

Frist added several caveats, including an outright ban on therapeutic cloning, a process for growing embryonic cells; a thorough consent process for embryo donors; and strict ethical oversight. He advocated limiting the number of cell lines to be used as a way to guard against abuses. But he also explicitly rejected what would become the central plank in the Bush policy.

"This does not mean limiting it to research using stem cells that have already been derived to date," he said, foreshadowing the difficulties scientists are now encountering with the older, federally approved stem cell lines. In a Senate hearing that day, Frist noted that some experts suggested 100 or 200 embryonic stem cell colonies might be enough for federal researchers to "jump-start" the burgeoning field.

When Frist generally accepted Bush's position, Wright praised the senator's change of heart, saying he had an "opportunity to be reeducated."

Last summer, with Bush campaigning for a second term, Frist said in an appearance at the National Press Club that it would be appropriate to reassess the president's stem cell policy after Election Day.

Peggy Willocks, Tennessee state coordinator of the Parkinson's Action Network, has tried unsuccessfully to discuss the issue with Frist. Now, she is resigned to sending him a message through staff, she said. "I want to tell him this is the time he is going to have to take himself up by his own bootstraps and make a decision that's not following Bush," she said.

Two weeks ago, however, Frist said he did not see a need to expand the Bush restrictions, as the House-passed bill does. As he put it: "I agree with the president's policy."

DOJ_NMG_0000901

NAACP Considers A New Approach (MJS)

By Leonard Sykes Jr. And Felicia Thomas-Lynn

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, July 3, 2005

With Bruce S. Gordon's stellar background in corporate America, his installation as executive director of the NAACP at its 96th annual convention in Milwaukee could herald a new beginning for the venerable civil rights organization's relationship with the Bush administration.Or could it prove to be a risky, high-stakes gamble?

Delegates will have the final vote on Gordon's appointment as executive director of the nation's oldest civil rights organization when it holds its convention July 9-14 at the Midwest Airlines Convention Center. The vote on his nomination is expected July 14.

Gordon already has indicated he wants to improve the NAACP's relationship with the Bush administration, a radical departure for a group known for its criticism of the president. But in doing so, the 59-year-old retired Verizon Communications executive may run the risk of pitting himself against some members who supported the NAACP's confrontational style with President Bush.

Delegates will get a chance to witness Gordon's style for the first time, as well as hear an array of speakers from across the political and religious spectrum, including some who have been critical of Bush on issues ranging from Social Security reform to the war in Iraq.

U.S. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), the Rev. Jesse Jackson and former NAACP chief Benjamin Hooks are among the scheduled speakers.

Bush was invited to the group's national convention in Milwaukee, but the White House sent a letter to the NAACP indicating that he would not attend. But even with the rejection, it already is clear from Gordon's initial remarks that he wants to forge a new relationship between the NAACP and the Bush administration.

Repositioning image

That gesture alone is a strong indication that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is seeking to position its image in line with the National Urban League, which opened lines of communications with the White House a year ago.

Last year, Bush was one of the headline speakers at the Urban League's national convention in Detroit. He has received invitations to five consecutive NAACP national conventions, and rejected them all, mainly due to the organization's caustic language with his administration and its policies.

Former NAACP President Kweisi Mfume, a former U.S. representative who is now a candidate for the senate in Maryland, labeled Bush's black supporters "ventriloquist's dummies." NAACP board chairman Julian Bond has stridently attacked Bush's on his education, economic and Iraq policies. Last year, the Internal Revenue Service launched an investigation into the group's financial records.

In an interview Thursday, Gordon said although it is not necessary to agree on everything, a constructive relationship with the White House is in the interest of both sides.

Gordon said he has already taken steps to open the dialogue. "The process is in its very early stages, and I'm proceeding with a high level of optimism," he said.

But while Gordon is seeking common ground that "serves the mutual interests" of the administration and the NAACP, there are many within and outside of the organization who aren't so sure it is appropriate to extend an olive branch.

Searching for new role

NAACP observers think Gordon's gesture toward improved relations with Bush is a sign the organization is searching for its soul, and a new role in America.

"The NAACP has been adrift," said Walter C. Farrell Jr., a professor of social welfare and associate director of urban investment strategies in the Kenan-Flagler Institute at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and a former professor at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

"It's all over the place . . . It doesn't have any coherent focus. They're trying to get back in the game, and they're hurting for money. But what's going to happen with the NAACP and its new leadership is a class war.

DOJ_NMG_0000902

"Branches all over the country are basically run by the masses. The black middle class no longer provides its leadership. I think (Gordon) is going to try to track them to the mainstream, and there is a possibility there could be a fight, branch by branch."

Local branches

Jerry Ann Hamilton, president of the Milwaukee branch of the NAACP, said she believes the local branches will respect the choice of the organization's leadership.

"I would hope that Gordon would continue to reach out to the Bush administration as we always have," Hamilton said. "I hope the new president will be effective in getting (Bush) to do this."

DeWayne Wickham, a columnist with USA Today, said it's the NAACP establishment, particularly its chairman, that wants to see a better working relationship with the White House.

Wickham, author of "Bill Clinton and Black America," who is also working on a NAACP book, currently titled: "A House Divided: Politics, Sex and the Struggle for Power Inside the NAACP," said, "Mfume's departure signaled a swinging of the power pendulum in the direction of the chairman. Bond is the important power in this organization at this time."

Whether it is subtle or an outright difference in strategy between the NAACP branches and its new leader, one thing is already clear about Gordon, say those who know him: He is one of only a few not to come from a religious, political or civil rights background. And his record in the corporate world is impeccable.

Consensus builder

Gordon has been described as a consensus builder. And over a 35-year relationship with the telecommunication industry that steered Bell of Pennsylvania through a dizzying string of mergers that led to Verizon Communications, Gordon earned a reputation of becoming comfortable working within the system. Upon his retirement in 2003, Gordon was chief of Verizon's biggest division - retail markets.

One of the major themes of the NAACP will be a new economic thrust, Hamilton said.

The NAACP will take a position against Social Security reforms and a new aggressive push for economic justice. The theme of the convention will be "The Conscience of a Nation."

"That's the role that the NAACP has always played," she said. "And now we're making it known more than ever as we're going into more direct action all over the country. We're making it known that we have a presence and that our history speaks for itself.

"The major things that have been done for black people in this country have been done by the NAACP."

But how will the closer ties with Bush wash with the overall membership of the NAACP?"

Attorney Vel Phillips, a member of the NAACP for 62 years, isn't so sure it will be a clean sell. There may be a "smidgen" of truth to the fact that the organization should have dialogue with the White House, she said. At the same time, she isn't sold on the fact that the organization should abandon its role as the president's chief critic among African-Americans.

"I don't think it's that necessary to have a dialogue with a president who comes from a state that has the highest number (of death row inmates)," said Phillips, who in 1956 was the first African-American and woman elected to the Milwaukee Common Council.

"I don't know if it's important to have a relationship with him if the president has indicated that he really doesn't care, doesn't come to (our) conventions and doesn't want a relationship. We should keep doing what we're doing and have done for almost 100 years."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Court's Eminent Domain Decision Hailed As Victory For Cities (SLPD)

By Jim Merkel

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 3, 2005

South Side Journal

A Supreme Court decision handed down last week could influence a number of local cases involving eminent domain.

In a 5-4 vote, the high court upheld the right of a private company in New London, Conn. to take private land for private uses.

DOJ_NMG_0000903

In Kelo vs. New London, Conn., the Supreme Court ruled that the city could not take land simply to confer a private benefit on a particular private property. However, the decision said the taking would be executed based on a carefully considered development plan, which would have a public benefit.

The decision pleased Mayor Francis Slay.

"It's very difficult rebuilding an older city with the environmental issues and with the issues of assembling sites for redevelopment to help improve the quality of life for people in our neighborhoods," Slay said.

"The eminent domain has been a good tool for us to acquire property so that we can take older areas and redevelop them into something more positive for the entire city and for the entire region."

But Slay said it's important that officials use good judgment and compassion and only use the tool sparingly when other means of redevelopment aren't working.

One local development that would have been affected by a different decision is the planned Loughborough Commons shopping center at Interstate 55 and Loughbough Avenue. There, 19 homeowners agreed to sell to the developer but a 20th, June Thompson and her son Howard, refused,

Circuit Court Judge Timothy Wilson is now considering whether the Thompsons' home can be taken by eminent domain.

"The decision in the Kelo case takes away an argument that we had as to whether or not this was limited by the U.S. Constitution, said Michael Wolff, the Thompsons' attorney.

But Wolff also argued under a provision in the Missouri Constitution, which he said is more restrictive in allowing the taking of property for private use.

The Missouri Constitution allows the taking of property for blight, "the kind of blight that everybody thinks of," Wolff said. "Our argument is that the Thompsons' neighborhood is not blighted as originally understood back in 1945 (when the rule was originally established)," Wolff said.

"I think the decision from the U.S. Supreme Court is a terrible decision," Wolff said. "What the court is doing is writing out of the Fifth Amendment the term ‘public use.'"

The Fifth Amendment says private property can't be taken for public use without just compensation.

Especially at the local level, the local governments will be more influenced by wealthy members of the electorate, Wolff said.

A different view is held by Alderman Matt Villa, D-11th Ward, who pushed through legislation in the Board of Aldermen calling for Loughborough Commons and allowing eminent domain.

"If eminent domain did not exist, this development would not be going forward," Villa said. "If you did not have the eminent domain tool, one property owner could effectively kill development that is good for the entire region."

Eminent domain should be a tool that's only used in rare circumstances, Villa said. If more than 10 percent of property owners in a redevelopment area are made to sell through eminent domain, that tool shouldn't be used, he said.

If urban areas can't assemble land for development through eminent domain, developers will go to the edge of metropolitan areas, where a single farmer will sell them land, Villa said. This would increase urban sprawl, he said.

"Very little development would get done in the urban areas that are already built out," Villa said.

"Nothing would get developed," Villa said. "That doesn't serve the overall benefit of the city of St. Louis when you have one property owner that can basically say you're not going to do this development."

One landlord who has seen eminent domain used heavily against him is Jim Roos, who runs the landlord management company, Neighborhood Enterprises. Twenty-three apartment buildings managed by the company with 57 units of housing were taken for the Botanical Heights housing development in the McRee Town neighborhood.

Roos said he thinks he knows how the justices came to their decision.

"They've never substantially experienced how eminent domain can be abused. When you start approving eminent domain for private projects, that becomes a mindset for people in government," Roos said.

"People who are a little less popular, a little less affluent then become the ones who are abused by this," Roos said.

Homes of the affluent won't be taken, Roos said. "It's abusing the rights and the benefits of the poor people."

DOJ_NMG_0000904

Some Political Give-and-Take On Matters Ecological (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

Debate in the run-up to Maryland's race for governor was dominated last week by talk about the environment.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley , a Democratic hopeful, sought to spotlight his record in a sprawling address that included heavy criticism of Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. 's environmental stewardship.

With Baltimore's Inner Harbor as a backdrop, O'Malley accused Ehrlich of lacking commitment to preserving parkland, improving water quality and protecting children from lead paint, among other shortcomings. "While the people of Baltimore are moving forward, our state seems to be taking another course," O'Malley said.

Aides said that the speech was intended to signal O'Malley's commitment to the issue and that specific proposals would come later in a campaign that hasn't officially started. O'Malley announced plans for a summit on environmental matters and pointed Marylanders to his campaign Web site to share their thoughts on the subject in the meantime.

Ehrlich's office declined to respond, directing reporters to the state Republican Party, which sought to shift attention to Baltimore's big-city problems.

"Aren't the streets of Baltimore considered part of O'Malley's environment?" Maryland GOP Chairman John M. Kane said in a statement. "The people of the city would be better served if O'Malley would concentrate on the issues plaguing the city and get his head out of the clouds. . . . You are still six times more likely to be shot in Baltimore than New York City."

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan , another Democrat interested in being governor, moved aggressively to insert himself into the debate by questioning O'Malley's record.

In his speech, for example, O'Malley touted his city's investment of more than $900 million to upgrade its sewage system. Duncan's camp pointed out that the federal government pushed Baltimore in that direction and highlighted the increased fees residents have had to pay as a result.

"Lofty rhetoric and carefully staged photo opportunities can't hide the fact that when it comes to the environment, Martin O'Malley has been a follower, not a leader," Duncan campaign manager Scott Arceneaux said. "On the environment, the mayor's record is as clear as a polluted city stream."

The Men Who Came to Dinner

A dinner hosted by the Maryland Municipal League in Ocean City last week offered a stark contrast between Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan: O'Malley attended in a business suit; Duncan wore a bright yellow golf shirt.

The two Democratic gubernatorial prospects and the Republican incumbent, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., put in schmoozing time with local officials at the annual four-day conference.

Tuesday night's dinner, at which attire ranged from Sunday best to shorts and untucked shirts, seemed at times like a three-ring circus.

O'Malley hosted a pre-dinner reception that included appearances by several of Ehrlich's Cabinet secretaries. Other guests waited in line for a chance to greet the mayor, who wore a conference attendee badge proclaiming "Martin" in bold, black letters.

Duncan, who hosted a separate reception earlier in the week at Ocean City's fabled night spot, Seacrets, appeared most aggressive in working the dining room crowd once the doors opened.

Ehrlich hosted a dessert reception immediately after the dinner at which guests lined up for pictures with him and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R). O'Malley headed back to Baltimore before it started, but Duncan hung out, shook hands and appeared to enjoy several chocolate-covered strawberries.Busch Aide Departs

Tom Lewis , chief of staff to House Speaker Michael E. Busch , will leave late this month to become director of state affairs for the Johns Hopkins Institutions.

Lewis, who started working for the legislature in 1983, has been with Busch (D-Anne Arundel) for the past three years. He served former speaker Casper R. Taylor (D-Allegany) for eight years.

Busch said Lewis's duties would be assumed by two staff members, Kristin F. Jones and John Favazza .

DOJ_NMG_0000905

A Livable Shade Of Green (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

PORTLAND, Ore.

When President Bush travels to the Group of 8 summit meeting this week, he'll stiff Tony Blair and other leaders who are appealing for firm action on global warming.

"Kyoto would have wrecked our economy," Mr. Bush told a Danish interviewer recently, referring to the accord to curb carbon emissions. Maybe that was a plausible argument a few years ago, but now the city of Portland is proving it flat wrong.

Newly released data show that Portland, America's environmental laboratory, has achieved stunning reductions in carbon emissions. It has reduced emissions below the levels of 1990, the benchmark for the Kyoto accord, while booming economically.

What's more, officials in Portland insist that the campaign to cut carbon emissions has entailed no significant economic price, and on the contrary has brought the city huge benefits: less tax money spent on energy, more convenient transportation, a greener city, and expertise in energy efficiency that is helping local businesses win contracts worldwide.

"People have looked at it the wrong way, as a drain," said Mayor Tom Potter, who himself drives a Prius hybrid. "Actually it's something that attracts people. ... It's economical; it makes sense in dollars."

I've been torn about what to do about global warming. But the evidence is growing that climate change is a real threat: I was bowled over when I visited the Arctic and talked to Eskimos who described sea ice disappearing, permafrost melting and visits by robins, for which they have no word in the local language.

In the past, economic models tended to discourage aggressive action on greenhouse gases, because they indicated that the cost of curbing carbon emissions could be extraordinarily high, amounting to perhaps 3 percent of G.N.P.

That's where Portland's experience is so crucial. It confirms the suggestions of some economists that we can take initial steps against global warming without economic disruptions. Then in a decade or two, we can decide whether to proceed with other, costlier steps.

In 1993, Portland became the first local government in the United States to adopt a strategy to deal with climate change. The latest data, released a few weeks ago, show the results: Greenhouse gas emissions last year in Multnomah County, which includes Portland, dropped below the level of 1990, and per capita emissions were down 13 percent.

This was achieved partly by a major increase in public transit, including two light rail lines and a streetcar system. The city has also built 750 miles of bicycle paths, and the number of people commuting by foot or on bicycle has increased 10 percent.

Portland offers all city employees either a $25-per-month bus pass or car pool parking. Private businesses are told that if they provide employees with subsidized parking, they should also subsidize bus commutes.

The city has also offered financial incentives and technical assistance to anyone constructing a "green building" with built-in energy efficiency.

Then there are innumerable little steps, such as encouraging people to weatherize their homes. Portland also replaced the bulbs in the city's traffic lights with light-emitting diodes, which reduce electricity use by 80 percent and save the city almost $500,000 a year.

"Portland's efforts refute the thesis that you can't make progress without huge economic harm," says Erik Sten, a city commissioner. "It actually goes all the other way - to the extent Portland has been successful, the things that we were doing that happened to reduce emissions were the things that made our city livable and hence desirable."

Mr. Sten added that Portland's officials were able to curb carbon emissions only because the steps they took were intrinsically popular and cheap, serving other purposes like reducing traffic congestion or saving on electrical costs. "I haven't seen that much willingness even among our environmentalists," he said, "to do huge masochistic things to save the planet."

So as he heads to the summit meeting, Mr. Bush should get a briefing on Portland's experience (a full report is at www.sustainableportland.org) and accept that we don't need to surrender to global warming.

Perhaps eventually we will face hard trade-offs. But for now Portland shows that we can help our planet without "wrecking" our economy - indeed, at no significant cost at all. At the Group of 8, that should be a no-brainer.

DOJ_NMG_0000906

Gang Plunges Tribe Into Turmoil (MJS)

By GRAEME ZIELINSKI

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, July 3, 2005

Hayward - It is an unlikely venue for a gangland killing.

There are no damp alleys topped with garbage, there is no scream of siren or chugging hum of city life.

Here, the wind sighs through the red pines and wisps of spiderwebs hang pendent from the branches, amid patches of sandy soil. Not far away, herons glide across a necklace of pristine glacial lakes.

This pine plantation is where 23-year-old Cody Badbear Wade was shot five times, once in the head. Police searched a nearby cranberry marsh for the murder weapon.

A police report said Wade had proclaimed himself a "King killer," but it turned out differently the night of May 30, 2002.

After trading harsh words with Wade at the Snowshoe Bar, Robert G. "Bobby" Smith, an avowed member of the Almighty Latin King Nation, the violent Hispanic street gang with a significant presence in Milwaukee, would ambush and kill Wade after he approached a clearing in his truck.

Smith, the son of a former Sawyer County sheriff's deputy, told investigators that one of the admitted leaders of the Latin Kings on the Lac Courte Oreilles Indian reservation, Charles Gokey, ordered members to "light up" on Wade. Smith later was sentenced to 13 years in prison for Wade's murder.

Earlier this year, Gokey, in turn, was sentenced in a federal court in Madison to almost 20 years for crack cocaine distribution. U.S. District Judge John C. Shabaz said the harsh punishment was meant "to assist the government's mission to substantially reduce the impact of drug and drug-related crime on the Lac Courte Oreilles reservation."

The two were part of more than 50 prosecutions and a continuing multi-headed investigation that were set in motion by the events in the pine plantation in an attempt to rid the reservation of the Latin Kings.

The Lac Courte Oreilles (pronounced "la COO de ray") Band of Lake Superior Chippewa Indians of Wisconsin lives on a 78,000-acre reservation crisscrossed with more than 260 miles of roads. About 3,000 residents live there out of a total tribal enrollment of 6,000, arrayed in 20 distinct communities, some of which amount to four or five prefabricated homes.

These developments have names like Dry Town, New Post and Bacon Strip and bear the mark of economic depression, made especially vivid against the breathtaking natural beauty of the surrounding landscape, featuring the Chippewa River Flowage. Tribal figures estimate unemployment at more than 70%, despite a casino that has provided one stream of economic relief.

At the tribal headquarters, there are signs of progress. Construction crews are finishing a new administrative office. Just up Old School Road is a brand-new Head Start office, and in front of the tree farm where Wade was killed is another new building, housing a branch of the Boys & Girls Club where on a recent day, dozens of young tribal kids played basketball.

Whereas gang slayings in Milwaukee often barely makes the news, on the Lac Courte Oreilles (LCO) Indian reservation, it has been treated as epochal. And the presence of the Latin Kings, hundreds of miles from their traditional base, has been treated as more than a cross-cultural anomaly, but as a full-on peril to peace.

The prosecutions over the past three years on and near the reservation, including a sweeping round of federal charges that brought long prison terms for dozens of people and the evictions of several tribal members from reservation property, have left children without parents and a tribe with a wounded sense of pride - and a sense of relief.

Court documents and interviews reveal how a relationship developed over the years between Milwaukee and Sawyer County as tribal members spending time in the city imported criminality back to the reservation. Interviews there indicate that the Latin Kings may have been in Sawyer County as early as the 1980s.

"The influences come from cities like Milwaukee. We have a lot of tribal members all over. When they come back from the city, they bring a lot of the negative things with them," said Brian Bisonette, a member of the council that governs the tribe.

Gang members would drive to Milwaukee or the Twin Cities to acquire drugs, and sometimes guns, to be resold at big profits on the reservation, court records show.

DOJ_NMG_0000907

The LCO version of the gang was called the "Lion Tribe Set" and was proved, in close to 30 federal guilty pleas, to have kicked profits from crack and powder cocaine sales back to Milwaukee, with the gang going so far as to rent a home on the reservation to process the narcotics, according to court records.

People around the reservation prominently wore the "black and gold," gang colors. Graffiti featuring the crown associated with the Latin Kings began appearing on tribal-owned properties, on traffic signs and literally in the streets.

In some cases, the relationships grew as thick as blood, as Milwaukee gang members started families with LCO members and Latin Kings used the reservation as sort of a hideout, much as Al Capone did at a nearby retreat in the 1920s.

Names such as Acosta and Barragon and Zamora from Milwaukee began being linked with old names locally, such as Martinson, Lasieur and Rademacher.

"We live in a fish bowl," said Bisonette, the tribal council member. "Everyone knows everybody. So when something like this happens . . . "

Consider that Smith's girlfriend was Wade's first cousin. Or that William Morrow, the chief of the tribal police force, which was created in part as a response to the killing, was related to both Smith and Wade. Or that with the Wade killing and the vicious murder later in 2002 of an elderly Hayward couple, allegedly by another Latin King, Sawyer County (current population about 17,000) had the highest per capita murder rate in the state.

When Smith finally admitted in court in February 2005 to pulling the trigger, he said he spoke up partly at the insistence of an uncle familiar with tribal traditions. Smith said that it was the "Indian way" to accept responsibility so healing could begin.

A few weeks ago Smith again echoed that theme in a jail letter to a federal magistrate in Madison, seeking, as his lawyer put it in an accompanying letter, the "various accoutrements" needed to practice his native religion. Medicine bundles. Drums. An eagle feather.

One ritual "involves the ceremonial placing of a plate of food in the outdoors for the spirit of the victim," the lawyer wrote.

But the Wade killing was in many ways only the beginning of the troubles that came to the reservation with the Latin Kings.

In the tense days afterward, and following other gang-related violence on the reservation that included drive-by shootings, brutal beatings and a home arson, the tribal council in September 2002 declared a "state of emergency" and asked for outside help.

It came in the form of a task force made up of Sawyer County, federal and state agencies. It peaked last July, when a small army descended in the early morning hours to serve warrants in one of the largest law-enforcement actions in North Woods history.

"There's never been anything like that here," said Dan Ross, a Sawyer County Sheriff's Department investigator involved in the case. The closest may have been in the early 1900s, when posses were sent to subdue John F. Deitz, who became a national folk hero for defying logger barons at the Cameron Dam.

Beyond a small group, the Latin Kings are not seen in such a heroic light in LCO country.

One mother to a victim of Latin Kings violence, who feared reprisal if her name was used, put it this way: "We just want them gone."

The federal probe continues, with more arrests on the way, according to investigators. In the meantime, several residents on LCO land say that while the investigation may have shown a heavy hand, it caused a serious downtick in the presence of drugs, illegal guns and gang graffiti.

Tension lingers, but eases

"You can just feel it. The tension has gone down quite a bit," said Paul DeMain, managing editor and CEO publisher of News from Indian Country, a national publication he runs from a building on the reservation that includes an Internet café and a gift shop.

His son was a member of the Latin Kings and later dropped out, DeMain said.

Certain members of the tribe are reluctant to talk about the problems with drugs and gangs out of a sense of embarrassment, while others are reluctant to talk, or identify themselves, because they still fear the gang.

"He's getting out soon, so we're still afraid of what he may do," said a victim of Latin Kings violence, a middle-aged woman standing in her front lawn in the Dry Town community.

DOJ_NMG_0000908

In any case, the LCO tribe has seen relative peace in the days since the first indictments came down, but in some quarters the silence is seen as ominous.

"You still have the ingredients here," said Bill Cadotte, a tribal program specialist. "There is a lack of jobs, there is a lack of programming here for young people. It's a total problem here."

Morrow, the police chief, pointed to a disturbing sign when driving on a recent day near the site of the Wade killing.

"See those colors?" he said, pointing to teens wearing powder blue basketball jerseys. "Those are supposed to be 'The Players,' " another gang rumored to growing to fill the void created with the recent convictions. "There still are gangs here, but what they will do, we don't know."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Agents Probing Hormone Shipment (DENP)

By Alicia Caldwell and Bill Briggs, Denver Post Staff Writers

Denver Post, July 3, 2005

Agents with the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the Postal Inspection Service are investigating a shipment of human growth hormone worth up to $400,000 to the home of a Denver substance-abuse counselor, records show.

Authorities in March seized 400 vials of Chinese hGH and are investigating clinic owner Tamea Rae Sisco and two people involved in a Hawaiian osteopathic center on suspicion that they illegally imported the drugs for use in anti-aging treatments, according to a federal search- warrant affidavit and federal sources.

Sisco denies any wrongdoing and said she was an intermediary for a legitimate shipment. No charges have been brought as a result of the raid.

While the national debate on performance-enhancing drugs swirls around sports superstars, federal agents are waging a local battle away from the limelight. They're intercepting hGH doses meant for everyday people who are hoping to look younger and leaner. It's all part of a surging anti-aging phenomenon in which hGH is king.

Law enforcement officials step in when hGH is illegally pitched as a youth elixir. HGH can be legally prescribed only under narrow circumstances, including the treatment of AIDS wasting disease. HGH also is obtained illegally by some athletes seeking to build muscle and cut fat.

"I can't comment on ongoing investigations, but I can state that there is a problem in general," said Jeff Dorschner, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Colorado. "The illegal trafficking of human growth hormones remains a concern of the Justice Department."

The investigation is in its infancy, said federal law enforcement sources who still are threading together the intended use and eventual buyers for the 400 vials.

But federal agents suspect Sisco's house was "being used as a location to receive, store and distribute unapproved new drugs, misbranded drugs, and/or human growth hormone illegally introduced into the United States," according to a search-warrant affidavit filed by U.S. Food and Drug Administration special agent Russell Hermann.

Ties to steroid dealer

Agents also are exploring possible ties between the March shipment and Albert Celio, a now-disbarred doctor who supplied steroids and hGH to a local fitness club, according to federal court records.

The operation, which spanned 1999 and 2000, was described in federal records at the time as being the largest steroid-dealing ring in Denver. Investigative documents in that case list sales to a variety of customers, including Denver police officers.

Celio was sentenced Friday to 27 months in federal prison for prescription fraud - one of four cohorts convicted on various charges.

Celio declined to be interviewed for this story.

Now, federal investigators are probing the association between Celio and Sisco. A search-warrant affidavit said Celio co-owned a home with Sisco in 2001. And during the March 18 raid on Sisco's house, agents found a piece of mail addressed to him.

Sisco acknowledges once employing Celio at her clinic, Excel Treatment Program. In 2002, a federal prosecutor called his work at Excel "highly inappropriate" given the drug charges he faced. Sisco said she fired him after learning about the charges.

"We don't even want to be associated with him," Sisco said in an interview. "We treat people to not be affiliated with substance rather than be affiliated with it."

The hGH investigation began March 11 when customs and border protection officers working at the San Francisco international mail facility intercepted two packages from Hefei, China.

Advertisement

The parcels, labeled as mineral samples, were bound for Sisco's home in Aurora and addressed to Teresa Denney, an osteopath who works in Hawaii.

Twenty-three minutes after Sisco accepted the shipment, agents raided her home and seized the vials. On the street, one vial of hGH can sell for as much as $1,000, police say.

At least seven packages originating from overseas had been delivered to Sisco's home in the six months prior to the raid, a postal employee told federal authorities. Only 1 percent to 3 percent of inbound foreign packages are physically examined by customs and border agents, federal authorities say.

The Internet is littered with websites pushing hGH as the new wonder drug for an over-40 crowd seeking a lean, cut physique with little dieting or exercise. Some claim human growth hormone will restore lost hair or banish gray hair, enhance the immune system and even boost sexual performance.

Denney's Honolulu-based clinic offers growth hormone through its website, HGHPharm.com, which compares the drug to a "fountain of youth" and promises results in "as early as one week."

Denney did not return three phone messages left at her clinic in Honolulu.

Looking for links

When federal agents searched Sisco's house in March, they sought any information linking Denney, Sisco, Celio and Keith Skinner, a Hawaii man who once was married to Sisco and had business ties with Celio, court records show.

Skinner's truck, which contained two other boxes from Hefei, China, plus an array of pills and capsules, was parked in Sisco's driveway on the morning of the search.

In an interview, Sisco said the hGH was ordered from China by Denney, a friend, for use in anti- aging treatments on Denney's patients on "the East Coast." Sisco said her role was to keep the hGH chilled before repackaging it and sending the drug east.

"That was legitimate, with that package. They (the federal agents) just didn't know what it was for," said Sisco, also a licensed chiropractor.

Skinner, a former Colorado chiropractor, could not be reached for comment.

Last month, a Denver District Court judge entered a $2.3 million judgment in a medical malpractice case against a business with which Skinner was affiliated, records show. Front Range Management Group, which was doing business as Cellular Medicine Institute, "deceptively represented" Skinner as a licensed physician, according to a judge's order awarding damages.

Staff writer Alicia Caldwell can be reached at 303-820-1930 or acaldwell@denverpost.com.

Staff writer Bill Briggs can be reached at 303-820-1720 or bbriggs@denverpost.com.

Drug Case Chilled U.S., Colombia Tie (TAMPTRIB)

Tampa Tribune, July 3, 2005

TAMPA - - U.S. relations with Colombia were briefly strained in March because of a federal prosecutor's court filing in Tampa in the case of an alleged leader of the Cali drug cartel.

Colombian officials even threatened to halt all extraditions to the United States, but U.S. officials retracted the court filing, averting a crisis.

The flare-up exposed a nerve in Colombia and highlighted the troubled, violent and corrupt recent history of efforts to stem the country's illegal drug exports.

``The Colombians went nuts with this thing," said Bruce Bagley, a professor in international relations at the University of Miami. ``It certainly has created hiccups in the U.S.- Colombian relationship."

Former U.S. Ambassador to Colombia Myles Frechette said that based on his reading of reports in the Colombian media, ``I would suspect that Ambassador [William] Wood was told, `Get that fixed and get it fixed tonight.' ... I'm sure it energized Washington from the White House to the lowest levels of the Justice Department."

The controversy involved a Colombian Constitution provision that allows extraditions, but only for crimes committed after Dec. 17, 1997, when the constitutional amendment, Article 35, was enacted.

A defense attorney for Joaquin Mario Valencia-Trujillo filed a motion to enforce that restriction and strike from Valencia's indictment charges that preceded the 1997 constitutional amendment.

Federal investigators say Valencia was a politically connected, if little noticed, leader in the notorious drug cartel as far back as 1988. He is the biggest catch in ``Operation Panama Express," a wide-ranging, long-term investigation, based in Tampa, of Colombian maritime drug traffickers.

Part of a 2002 indictment against Valencia alleges a conspiracy to use drug money to ``make payments to influence political and judicial decisions in Colombia, the United States and elsewhere."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph K. Ruddy filed a response to the defense motion alleging that Article 35 is part of the conspiracy mentioned in Valencia's indictment. ``It represents the product of the successful bribery of then-Colombian President Ernesto Samper and the Colombian Congress by the Cali cartel to immunize them from extradition to the United States," Ruddy wrote.

Ruddy's filing said he plans to present testimony at Valencia's trial next year that the cartel ``jointly collected $5 million to pay President Samper to support Article 35 and make it law. Testimony will also establish that almost one-half of the entire Colombian Congress was similarly bribed by the Cali cartel to support the identical legislation."

Ruddy's allegations marked the first time Samper had been publicly accused of receiving traffickers' bribes during his 1994-98 term, The Associated Press reported. He had been accused of taking Cali money in his election campaign.

``I reject in the most categorical and absolute manner the accusation presented ... by a prosecutor in Florida," Samper told the AP.

Ruddy also argued in the filing that appeals courts have ``repeatedly and emphatically" held that a foreign government ``cannot dictate what evidence can or cannot be used to support a conviction on a criminal offense for which it has authorized extradition."

On March 17, the day The Tampa Tribune published a story about Ruddy's court filing, the prosecution withdrew the pleading and filed an ``amended response" to the defendant's motion. The new pleading eliminated references to allegations of bribery of Colombian officials.

The next day, the AP reported that Ambassador Wood held a late-night news conference in Colombia to try to repair the damage, insisting that the United States would comply with the extradition requirements from its key ally in Latin America.

``It made front-page headlines [in Colombia] for about two days," said Adam Isacson, senior associate at the Center for International Policy's Colombia program. ``Ambassador Wood smoothed it out. ... That made it disappear from the Colombian media immediately."

Ruddy would not discuss the international kerfuffle. ``I'm not permitted to comment on issues like that," he said.

`The Correct Position'

Ruddy said the new filing represents ``the correct position given all the circumstances." He said he intends to offer at Valencia's trial evidence cited in the first pleading.

On June 23, U.S. Magistrate Elizabeth A. Jenkins issued a report, recommending that District Judge Elizabeth Kovachevich strike the parts of the indictment that deal with crimes committed before Dec. 17, 1997. Such a ruling would eliminate 26 alleged actions in the conspiracy, leaving 10. The report reflects a suggestion made by Ruddy.

DOJ_NMG_0000911

Jenkins did not go as far as the defense wanted. She refused to bar prosecutors from presenting evidence pertaining to allegations that drug trafficking was a pattern that began as early as 1988.

Jenkins' order did not address the allegations filed in the withdrawn prosecution filing, leaving open the issue of bribery and Article 35.

Experts agree on one thing: In the years before the constitutional amendment was adopted, Colombia was rife with corruption.

In 1984, Medellin cartel kingpin Pablo Escobar killed the country's justice minister.

Bagley said intimidation from drug traffickers may be why the Colombian Supreme Court in the 1980s overturned laws allowing extradition of drug lords. In 1991, the constitution was amended to prohibit extradition.

The U.S. government pushed hard for extradition to be reinstated.

``The effort to get an extradition agreement with the United States cost hundreds of lives" and took many years, Isacson said. During that time, drug traffickers blew up planes in the air and the Colombian headquarters of the FBI, imposing ``a frightening rein of terror to try to keep an extradition agreement from happening," he added.

Politicians in Colombia lived in an environment in which they either accepted money from drug traffickers or risked being killed or seeing their families endangered.

``They call it in Spanish plata o plomo," Isacson said. ``You get silver or you get lead."

Article 35 ``was the best they could do after a lot of loss of life and an effort to overcome corruption," Isacson said. ``I think the United States was happy to get it."

Extradition A Top Priority

Frechette, ambassador from July 1994 to November 1997, said getting extradition was a top priority. Since Article 35 was enacted, ``we've been like a house afire on extraditions," he said. ``There have been over 200 just under" President Alvaro Uribe, who has been in office less than three years.

He said the Cali and Medellin cartels ``hired battalions of lawyers and legal people to oppose extradition" in the belief that ``better a grave in Colombia than prison in the United States."

He said he received threats, including a funeral wreath delivered to the U.S. Embassy with a card reading, ``Condolences on your death."

Frechette said many Colombian Congress members were bought off by drug lords. And there was a scandal after evidence turned up that Samper's 1994 presidential campaign had received $6 million from the Cali cartel. Samper was tried in impeachment proceedings but was cleared.

Frechette said Samper escaped conviction because he bought off members of Congress with legislation sending money to their districts. The U.S. government pressured Samper and took away his visa, Frechette said. ``We knew that Samper was always trying to diddle us and trying to introduce amendments [in Congress] that would gut legislation that we wanted, like strengthening sentencing and more cooperation with the U.S. government," he said.

But Frechette was skeptical of Ruddy's allegation that a bribe to Samper was responsible for the extradition restriction. He thinks it's more likely members of Congress were bribed to get the limitation.

Even with the restriction, Frechette said U.S. officials ``thought we produced a great victory, because despite all the money and the threats, extradition was re-established."

Attempts to get around the limitation could undermine the hard-won extradition agreement, he said. ``The prosecutor was out of line and should have been rebuked."

Added Bagley, ``I think your prosecutor is way out on a limb. ... Tell the guy to put up or shut up. ... If he can go forward and have admitted into court evidence [of such a bribe], I would be surprised."

U.S. Attorney Paul Perez, Ruddy's boss, defended the initial filing, saying it was based on public record, including 1997 testimony of Guillermo Pallomari, a former Cali accountant. The AP reported he testified the cartel bribed Colombian officials to get a constitutional ban on extradition and spent $5 million to pick a president they liked.

Perez said U.S. officials sent a transcript of Pallomari's testimony to Colombia after the stir about Ruddy's filing. But Bagley said U.S. officials ``tried to put the lid on this because neither side wants to upset the apple cart and damage this ... relationship."

DOJ_NMG_0000912

President Uribe ``is one of President Bush's closest allies in all of Latin America. Upsetting that relationship on this issue is simply not worth it."

Reporter Elaine Silvestrini can be reached at (813) 259-7837.

Gang Busters In Hampton Roads (V-P)

By JOANNE KIMBERLIN AND STEPHANIE HEINATZ, The Virginian-Pilot

The Norfolk (VA) Virginian-Pilot, July 3, 2005

A warning has come from the feds.

An FBI informant says MS-13, a notorious street gang with ties to El Salvador, recently issued an order for its members to kill someone — anyone — wearing a badge in Hampton Roads.

The hit was discussed during a meeting of gang leaders held in Norfolk.

The purpose: To send a message to local law enforcement trying to stop the machete-wielding gang from moving to town.

The message: Stay out of our business. Stay out of our way.

The alert arrived in a May 23 bulletin from the Department of Homeland Security. Both the department and the FBI have refused to comment, but state and federal gang experts confirmed the warning – which has since been put on hold.

“The gangs call it a 'green light,' ” said Mindy Grizzard, spokeswoman for the Virginia Gang Investigators Association.

In the urban underbellies of Los Angeles, Chicago, Detroit or New York, such a threat might not raise even an eyebrow.

In Hampton Roads, it’s met with an odd mix of shock and shhh.

Shock that such things could happen here.

Shhh because gangs are dirty laundry – the scent of which can derail a city’s redevelopment plan, shred a school’s reputation and cause decent folks to pull out of a neighborhood.

Such stigma results in a battle that’s often waged as quietly as possible. It’s fought from the region’s green countryside to the shadows of its grittiest asphalt. It’s marked by code words, muffled blows, silent losses and whispered wins.

No one is suggesting citizens hit the panic button. In fact, some officials insist gangs aren’t a problem in Hampton Roads.

But others say locals need to wake up. In many quarters, gangs are getting serious attention:

- Every Hampton Roads police department now has a gang unit or gang officers.
- State authorities are doling out millions to communities that admit they have a gang problem.
- Former Attorney General Jerry Kilgore, the Republican candidate for governor, has made the gang issue a bedrock of his campaign.
- Gov. Mark R. Warner recently ordered state police to gauge the scope of gangs in Virginia.
- Local school officials get regular gang updates from police.
- Businesses are even getting involved – police plan to educate employees at the meat-packing plants in Smithfield on how to spot members of MS-13, among their ranks.

And as of Friday, when the latest legislation out of Richmond became law, the Old Dominion took on a title that, at first glance, seems out of keeping with the state’s genteel image:

Virginia now has what it says are the toughest gang laws in the nation.

Destiney Butler, 15, drew a portrait of her brother, Kyron, an 8-year-old who was killed in his bed when a stray bullet from an apparent gang shootout entered the family’s Smithfield apartment in 2003. “There is no more innocent victim than a child,” said Kyron’s mother, Rhonda Butler, shown in the background.

MS-13 violence in Northern Virginia spurred most of the new laws. In recent years, the gang’s ranks have mushroomed to an estimated 3,000 members in the Washington suburbs. They’ve been implicated in a number of machete attacks and grisly murders.

With police pressure increasing in Northern Virginia, Mara Salvatrucha 13 may be looking for new turf. In Hampton Roads, it would not find wide-open territory.

DOJ_NMG_0000913

A 2004 survey by the state gang association counted 13 other national gangs already in the region, along with an assortment of homegrown cliques. An estimated 50 gangs operate in Newport News alone. Many regularly cross the river to South Hampton Roads.

Gangs are hardly new, but police are seeing disturbing changes. Pushed by the desire to expand, big-city gangs, such as Bloods and Crips, have sent scouts into the area – recruiting homegrown groups into their fold, ratcheting up the rivalry and organizing their crimes into money-making enterprises.

Gangs are also cropping up in surprising places. In historic Smithfield, a country oasis known best for its ham biscuits and antique shops, one homegrown gang claims the neighborhood behind the meat-packing plants. Another rules two streets of houses rising from the surrounding farm fields. Another stakes its turf in the Jersey Park apartment complex.

An apparent beef between the Jersey Park boys and a gang from nearby Windsor sent a stray bullet into one of the apartments in 2003, killing 8-year-old Kyron Butler as he slept.

No one knows how many gang members are in Hampton Roads. Or how many crimes they commit. Or how many lives are lost to their violence. No one records or collects those numbers.

The U.S. Justice Department believes 25,000 gangs are operating across the country, in more than 3,000 jurisdictions, with more than 750,000 members – more manpower than the U.S. Army.

But that's only a best-guess. Outside the nation's major gang hubs, most police departments use a standardized form that doesn't include a box that can be checked when an incident is gang-related. Without the box, that detail doesn't find its way into the computers, which makes it tough to track gang activity.

Police do know what they see: More gangsters, more graffiti and more weeping mothers, such as Norfolk's Antoinette Boyd. In May 2004, her 25-year-old son wound up dead after men who called themselves Bloods opened fire in the street.

"Something's got to change," Boyd said. "Something's got to be done."

Randy Crank, a Norfolk gang investigator, says "gangbangers" seem to be getting younger and younger.

"We're seeing more 8-, 9- and 10-year-olds," Crank said. "I went to four elementary schools last month that were having trouble."

Roughly 80 suspected gangsters sit in cells in the Norfolk city jail, where deputies try to keep known rivals apart, while at the same time limiting the number of allies placed in each block, said Cpl. Jerry Warner of the Norfolk Sheriff's Department. The bars have held members of MS-13, the Bloods, the Crips, Gangster Disciples, a Puerto Rican gang called NETA, a California set known as South 13, and the Aryan Nation.

Still, the lack of hard statistics supports what's known as "the denial."

"No one wants to be the place pointed to as the one with the gang problem," said George Knox of the National Gang Crime Research Center. "It can be kind of convenient not to know how bad it really is. And if you do know, you don't really want to tell anybody else."

Denial can leave police fighting a two-front battle: on the street and in city hall, where the reluctance of officials to go public with the problem can be a roadblock to getting more officers and money.

According to a 2005 national survey, denial is one the "greatest contributing factors in the alarming increase in the number, size and strength of gangs."

Until recently, Knox said, Virginia has been among the most closed-mouth.

"Cooperation there has been pathetic in the past," he said.

Knox said the national center conducts annual surveys of state prisons to keep its finger on the pulse of gangs behind bars. In Virginia, Knox said, "one bureaucrat waylaid the questionnaires every year. He kept saying, 'We don't have to provide this.' "

Now, Knox said, the state is cooperating: "We had no problem getting the information this year."

In Portsmouth, Sharon Harris, spokeswoman for the city's schools, said: "We don't have any activity that we know to be gang activity."

But some students say gangs have carved out turf on campus.

"It's real tough," said Jamarty Bradshaw, who just graduated from Norcom High School. "There are certain places you can't walk in school because you'll get in trouble."

DOJ_NMG_0000914

Still, most school officials insist they're holding their own. They say they maintain close ties with police, keep a sharp eye out for gang signs, and use a strong hand when trouble erupts. In Virginia Beach, faculty is regularly clued in on the latest gang signs, colors, graffiti and clothing.

"I know our coordinator speaks three or four times a week with police," said Richard Ponti, Virginia Beach's director of safe schools and risk management. "We need them to keep us apprised of what they see on the streets."

Schools are required to report gang-related incidents every year to the state's Department of Education. For the 2003-04 school year, Suffolk reported six incidents, Norfolk four, Virginia Beach three, Portsmouth two and Chesapeake one.

But Randy Forbes, a Republican congressman from Chesapeake, said schools fret about their images and have more gang trouble than they admit.

"You ask them and they say no," he said. "But then the superintendent calls me in, shuts the door and says, 'Randy, you've got to do something. If we don't get these people out of here, kids will be killed.' "

Scary labels make some folks queasy. Many agencies use the term "strategic threat group" instead of "gang."

Until lately, Richmond police officers "weren't even allowed to use the word 'gang' in their reports," said Grizzard of the state gang association.

By last year, it was obvious that the city was in the path of a southern migration by gangs out of Northern Virginia. Richmond accepted a $2.5 million grant to fight gang violence – part of more than $8 million being spread across the commonwealth. In May, the city held a news conference to acknowledge its growing troubles with nearly two dozen gangs, including Bloods, Crips and MS-13.

"I hate to put it this way," Grizzard said, "but it's sort of like the money bought the word."

The debate continues in Smithfield. After the shootout that killed Kyron Butler, town detectives reached a quick conclusion.

"There's no question in my mind that it was gang-related," Lt. Kurt Beach said.

But the sheriff of Isle of Wight, the county Smithfield folds into, sees it differently.

"There are bad people everywhere, and, in this case, some bad people got together and did a bad thing," Sheriff Charles Phelps told reporters afterward. "But that doesn't necessarily make them a gang."

Gang violence means business for Shaukat Hagimalik, owner of a custom T-shirt shop in Norfolk. He creates memorial shirts for slain gangsters.

Their memorials hang on a wall in the T-shirts Unlimited & Airbrush shop in The Gallery at Military Circle: 60-plus shirts with computer-scanned photos, all framed by the letters "R.I.P."

The photos are a reflection of the gang scene in Hampton Roads. Gangs span races and cultures. National breakdowns say 49 percent of gang members are Hispanic, 34 percent are black, 10 percent Caucasian, 6 percent Asian, and 1 percent other.

But on this particular wall, nearly all of the photos are of young black men. Nearly every one, says shop owner Shaukat Hagimalik, died from gang violence over the past six or seven years. He says the customers who order the shirts to wear to the funerals tell him so.

"I ask them, 'What happened to him?'" Hagimalik said. "They say, 'Oh, he got shot.'"

From each order, Hagimalik keeps one shirt to hang on the wall.

"I've had fathers bring their sons in here and say, 'Look! Look at them. Do you want to end up on that wall?'"

Police, Hagimalik said, are more interested in his customers – and what he might know about them. He waved a fresh summons to Norfolk court.

"I get these all the time," he said. "They're driving me crazy. They expect me to close up my shop and come there all the time."

Reyna Says 'no Pressure' To Resign (BROWNHER)

By EMMA PEREZ-TREVIÑO, The Brownsville Herald

Brownsville (TX) Herald, July 3, 2005

U.S. Marshals Service Director Ben Reyna never bought a house in Washington, D.C.

DOJ_NMG_0000915

"My intention was not to stay," Reyna said last week after submitting his resignation from the Marshals Service effective July 31.

He was not pressured to resign from the post he's held since 2001, he says, and will return to his hometown of Brownsville for personal reasons and without regrets.

"I would not have done anything differently. It's been a great experience and a great honor," Reyna told The Brownsville Herald in an exclusive interview.

"I am very, very pleased, very happy and very grateful for the opportunity to serve the U.S. Marshals Service, but there are also greater things and very important things for me in Brownsville — my family," he said.

Reyna's parents Benigno and Carmen Torres Reyna reside here, where Reyna was born, raised and began his law enforcement career.

But the sequence of events that led to Reyna stepping down may have begun in February with the shooting death of a federal judge's family in Illinois.

The Marshals Service is charged primarily with protecting judges and courts. Its performance is under scrutiny and criticism, seemingly prompted by the slaying of U.S. District Judge Joan Humphrey Lefkow's mother and husband in their Chicago home.

"A litigant who was angry with me shot him in the head, and shot my aged mother, on February 28, 2005, for no reason other than that they were in his way on his road to murder me," Lefkow testified in a Judiciary Commission hearing. "He could have easily added my 16-year-old daughter and me."

Less than a month after the Lefkow murders, Superior Court Judge Rowland Barnes was killed when a prisoner wrestled a gun from a sheriff's deputy in the Fulton County Courthouse in Atlanta, Ga., on March 11.

The back-to-back tragedies shined an unflattering light on the Marshals Service and started a buzz among judges and lawmakers in Washington, D.C.

In a letter dated March 14, U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, wrote to Reyna inquiring about security measures and what would be instituted in response to the attack on the Lefkows.

Reyna said protecting the judiciary has always been and should always be the priority: "That is what allows us to maintain the rule of law."

He also noted that in the agency's 215-year history, no federal judge has been murdered in a courtroom or courthouse.

The Judicial Conference of the United States — with policy-making functions in the administration of U.S. courts — adopted a resolution March 15, calling on the U.S. Department of Justice Department and Marshals Service to review judicial security in a time of "crisis" of the "gravest concern."

Specter has said the U.S. Department of Justice responded on April 11 to indicate that off-site security was under review, "but nothing more than that." He also said that legislators appropriated nearly $12 million for judicial security in an emergency allocation for home alarm systems.

On May 6, Specter met with U.S. Judge Jane R. Roth of Delaware, who chairs the judicial conference's committee on security and facilities. A Senate Judiciary Committee hearing happened on May 18.

The committee heard from several witnesses, including Roth and Lefkow, who made her first public address about the killings and subsequent security concerns.

They aired grievances against Reyna's agency that they said is inadequately funded, unresponsive, lacks manpower, leadership, and questioned the agency's capability to properly assess threats.

Lefkow could not be reached for comment. Specter and Roth did not respond to requests for comments on Reyna's resignation; neither did judiciary committee member U.S. Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas.

Their testimony came a little more than a year after a critical assessment questioning the agency's ability to protect judges. The U.S. Department of Justice's Office of the Inspector General conducted the study in March 2004.

"The decision for me to resign was totally independent of that (criticism and scrutiny)," Reyna told The Herald last week.

"There is never, I guess, such a thing as a perfect time for anything."

Reyna was nominated director of the Marshals Service by President Bush and confirmed by the Senate in 2001.

He said he agrees with much of what those concerned about the agency have said of its resources. The U.S. Marshals Service needs more funding and personnel, he said.

In testimony to the judiciary committee, Reyna said that the president's budget to Congress asked for 993 positions for fiscal years 2001 through 2005, but only 531 were appropriated.

He also referred to a statement from Roth's committee that the Marshals Service "never gets the resources it needs to get the job done."

"I wish that things would move forward a lot faster," he said of bureaucracy and the complex budgetary process.

"It is important to recognize that in government, nobody has unlimited budgets. When I was with the (Brownsville) Police Department, we had to work with what we had. It is the same in the federal government and state government.

"But we want everybody to understand that judges are protected."

Reyna said he doesn't consider the criticism heaped on the agency a personal attack on his work.

"I think that it is totally appropriate for members of Congress and the judiciary to ask questions about how we serve the Marshals Service. I think that we should be able to point out what we have done and what we need (in order) to do a better job."

He said the Marshals Service is but one component of the U.S. Department of Justice that also includes the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Drug Enforcement Administration among other departments.

Praise from U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was aimed at Reyna's work.

In a prepared statement issued June 24, Gonzales, head of the USDoJ, said Reyna served with "integrity and skill" and demonstrated "steadfast leadership" throughout his tenure.

He also recognized Reyna's work with state and local law enforcement in this year's "Operation Falcon," which resulted in arrests of more than 10,000 criminal fugitives.

"I am grateful for his service and wish him every success in his future endeavors," Gonzales said.

Gonzales noted that Reyna improved the agency's ability to carry out its protective missions and its information technology infrastructure; streamlined the allocation of resources; achieved a record level of employment; expanded national and international law enforcement cooperative efforts; and assisted in achieving a significant increase in the apprehension of violent fugitives.

"There are a lot of positive things that have happened here," Reyna said from his office in Washington, D.C.

"We have a great team of marshals and deputy marshals throughout the United States and its territories. We have highly dedicated employees. I will miss working alongside some very dedicated individuals."

Since announcing his resignation, Reyna said he does not know if Gonzales was contacted or urged to secure his removal as has been suggested in national media reports.

"Whether they spoke to him or not, I don't know and he never indicated to me that anyone did," Reyna said.

"Leaving is a normal part of the process. This is the way the job is."

TAX:

In 2002, More Wealthy People Paid No Tax (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

The number of affluent individuals and married couples who paid no federal income taxes jumped more than 15 percent in 2002, to 5,650, government data released last week showed.

The chances of having a large income but not paying taxes on any of it are growing, according to the data, issued in the Internal Revenue Service's annual report to Congress on well-to-do Americans who live tax free.

About one in every 436 high-income Americans paid no taxes in 2002, up from one in 531 in 2001 and one in 1,010 in 2000.

Over all, the top 2 percent of earners - the 2.5 million filers with income of $200,000 or more - paid almost 27 cents in taxes for each dollar of income they reported in 2002, other I.R.S. data showed. This group accounted for 53.5 percent of the income tax paid by all Americans.

Among that high-income group, however, almost 83,000, or one in 33, paid less than a dime in taxes for every dollar of income. An additional 79,000 paid less than 15 cents. The average for all Americans was 13 cents.

Congress taxes Americans on their worldwide income. Of the 5,650 individuals and couples who paid no income taxes to the United States, only 728 paid any to a foreign government, while 4,922 lived completely free of income tax.

The I.R.S. measured income in two ways.

One was by adjusted gross income, the last line on the front page of the Form 1040 tax return. By this measure, 2,959 affluent individuals and married couples paid no federal income tax, down from 3,385 in 2001, but up from 2,328 in 2000. There were 60 such examples in 1977, when a dollar was worth three times as much as in 2002.

On a worldwide basis, 2,551 such individuals and couples paid no tax in 2002, down from 2,875 in 2001, but up from 2,022 in 2000. There were 37 such examples in 1977, the first year the agency disclosed such data.

The second measure, giving a fuller picture, was expanded income, which also includes money from sources like tax-exempt interest and untaxed Social Security benefits. By this measure, 5,650 well-to-do individuals and married couples paid no federal income tax in 2002, up from 4,910 in 2001 and 2,766 in 2000. There were 85 such examples in 1977.

Worldwide on this basis, there were 4,922 individuals and couples who lived tax free in 2002, up from 4,119 in 2001 and 2,320 in 2000. There were 64 such examples in 1977.

The I.R.S. report said that "the most important item in eliminating tax" was taking income in the form of tax-exempt interest on state and municipal bonds.

Nearly two-thirds of those who lived tax-free reported income from such bonds.

The four largest items that reduced income subject to taxation, the I.R.S. said, were miscellaneous deductions; interest paid on borrowing to finance investments; various tax credits; and large medical bills, which can be deducted once they exceed either 7.5 percent or 10 percent of adjusted gross income, depending on the taxpayer's circumstances.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Faces Pivotal Choice For High Court (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

President Bush could rein the court to the right by nominating a bedrock conservative to replace the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. He could make history — and perhaps pick up votes for the GOP — by naming the first Hispanic to the court. Or he could choose a woman and keep intact the court's current balance of seven men and two women.

Bush has had nearly five years to consider how to burn the "G.W.B" brand on the bench of the highest court in the land.

Regardless of whom he picks, the closely divided court, which often splits 5-4 on key decisions, will very well end up with a more conservative bent.

The question is, how far to the right will the post-O'Connor court be? And how much farther to the right will it lean once the 80-year-old Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who is sick with thyroid cancer, retires and possibly gives Bush a second chance to shape the court?

Legal experts on both sides speculate that the retirement of O'Connor raises the prospect that Bush will name Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He is not a favorite of conservatives, who continued to target the White House this weekend in their anti-Gonzales campaign, saying his views on issues such as abortion and affirmative action are not aligned far enough to the right.

"When the right looks at Judge Gonzales, they have tended to worry they are getting another David Souter," Brad Berenson, a White House lawyer during Bush's first term, said about how conservatives were disappointed when Justice Souter sides with the court's more liberal members. "I don't personally think that's fair, but that is their view."

Gonzales' confirmation hearing for the Justice Department job focused on his role in developing the administration's policy on the interrogation and treatment of suspected terrorists. It is an issue sure to dominate hearings should he turn out to be Bush's first nominee to the Supreme Court.

Yet, Gonzales is a loyal friend of the president's — and Hispanic, a member of one of the fast-growing voting blocs. Bush might be willing to accept a chilly reception from his far-right constituency to make history, reward a friend and lessen the chance of having a more conservative nominee blocked in the Senate.

Bush's options were rearranged when it was O'Connor, not Rehnquist, who announced she was stepping down last week.

"Will politics be considered?" said Berenson, a former Supreme Court clerk. "Will factors like the diversity of the court and a justice's life story be considered? Sure. But I don't think those things are going to drive the decision."

Intellect. Character. Judicial philosophy. The prospect of being able to win Senate confirmation. Those are the overriding issues that several legal experts and advocates on both the right and left think will guide the president, who is facing intense pressure from both sides of the political aisle.

Because Rehnquist sits on the conservative side of the court, replacing him with another conservative would not have shifted the balance of power on the nine-member court.

The same cannot be said of O'Connor. She has been the critical fifth vote on abortion and other contentious issues involving privacy, equal opportunity, the environment and religious rights.

"It is dramatically different with O'Connor retiring," Ralph Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way, said Saturday. "Replacing the conservative O'Connor with a right-wing ideological would be a constitutional catastrophe.

"A right-wing appointment could turn back the clock seven decades on so many fundamental rights and liberties and legal protections that most Americans think are theirs forever," Neas said. "These are rights and liberties and protections that could disappear overnight if a right-wing majority takes control of the court."

Both the liberals and conservatives, who say Neas is exaggerating the potential change to the court, think they have the upper hand in persuading Bush to see it their way. Yet the president's independent streak might make him impossible to sway.

Advocates on the right argue that he must make good on a pledge to name a justice who would vote in the same way as conservative Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. They believe in a strict interpretation of the Constitution that is not affected by cultural or social trends.

Liberals say that given O'Connor's swing position on the court, Bush must choose a moderate conservative — a move that would risk alienating his far-right base but would avoid a nasty confirmation battle with Democrats.

Indeed, Democratic senators might be uneasy about voting against a woman or a minority such as Gonzales or Samuel Garza, a Hispanic on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

There's no doubt a confirmation fight would be contentious if Bush nominates individuals thought to be on his short list: conservative federal appellate court judges Samuel Alito, J. Michael Luttig, Michael McConnell, John Roberts Jr. and J. Harvie Wilkinson III.

But American University historian Allan J. Lichtman says naming an extremely conservative nominee could backfire on the president because it might prompt Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate conservative who also has been a swing vote on the court, to inch away from the right.

"That could push Kennedy into the O'Connor slot," Lichtman said.

White House Promises Bi-Partisan Input From Senate (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein And Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

The White House plans to solicit opinions this week from senators in both parties, a senior White House aide said Saturday, as the two sides began early maneuvers in the summer battle over President Bush's first Supreme Court nomination.

While Bush will spend most of the week at meetings in Europe, senior White House officials plan to canvass Democratic and Republican Senators for recommendations to fill the vacancy opened when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement Friday, said the aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

DOJ_NMG_0000919

"It will be senior White House staff consulting with senators in both parties," the official said. "White House staff will be asking senators for their ideas about good candidates to be nominated."

Democrats and their allies who have emphasized that they want to be consulted reacted cautiously to the signal from White House.

"Their track record of even consulting with Republicans on Capitol Hill is very poor," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "It remains to be seen if this is an encouraging first step or is just going to be a one-way dialogue."

The maneuvering by the White House, senators of both parties and the interest groups underscores the priority each side places on shaping the debate. Both sides are trying to position themselves as reasonable and conciliatory to strengthen their hands for the full-scale combat most suspect will erupt.

In his remarks after O'Connor announced her resignation Friday, Bush pledged that he and his advisers would consult with the Senate. Democrats and even some Republican senators such as Susan Collins of Maine have accused the White House this year of failing to consult sufficiently on Bush's nominees for the federal district and appellate courts.

Speaking with reporters Friday, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the administration would undertake "more thorough consulting" on the Supreme Court vacancy.

The president spoke Friday with Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, and placed a call to Reid, although they did not connect, according to White House and congressional officials. The White House aide said Bush has also scheduled a meeting for July 11 with Reid, Leahy, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

O'Connor's announcement surprised many in the capital who had been girding for a resignation from ailing Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. Because O'Connor has so often functioned as the decisive fifth vote in a divided court, her retirement instantly ignited intense lobbying campaigns from groups on the left and the right who believe her successor could determine the court's balance of power.

While promising to consult, the aide signaled that the White House did not believe that Bush faced an obligation to replace O'Connor with a justice who shared her relatively moderate views, as some Democrats and liberal groups have suggested.

"The notion that there is . . . a narrow band of people who are appropriate to replace Justice O'Connor is wrong," the official said. "The president will consult, but the president will make a decision."

Given Bush's repeated declarations that he intended to appoint justices with similarities to Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, two of the Court's most conservative members, many liberals remain skeptical that he would genuinely consider Democrats' views before naming his choice.

"There will be activities that constitute an appearance of bipartisan consultation, but it will not be what is actually happening," predicted Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, a leading liberal group.

Bush leaves Tuesday for Denmark and then Scotland, where he will attend the annual meeting of the Group of 8 industrialized nations. White House officials have indicated that he would not announce his nominee to replace O'Connor until after he returned.

Bush himself seemed to be one of the few people still in Washington for the holiday weekend who Saturday was not focused on the O'Connor vacancy. The White House aide said the president was at Camp David preparing for the G-8 meeting and was not reviewing materials on potential nominees.

Another senior White House official, who asked not to be identified while discussing the internal deliberations, said Bush would likely begin to seriously examine the contenders when he flew to Europe on Tuesday.

For Bush, A Defining Moment (CHT)

By Michael Tackett

CHT – Bush Focus, July 3, 2005

The news was about Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But the story is about President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0000920

How Bush manages that story, by the person he nominates to replace O'Connor, by the words he chooses to frame that debate, by the way he deals with Congress, could define his presidency almost as much as terrorism and the war in Iraq.

And the impact on American life could last a generation. The most contentious, difficult and profound issues facing the country--life and death, science and faith, global commerce and crime--are likely now to be shaped by a court that has Bush's signature.

The president, even with sagging approval ratings and diminishing support for the war and his handling of the economy, finds himself in an extraordinarily powerful position with Republicans controlling the executive branch and Congress. Now he will be extending that leverage to the Supreme Court.

O'Connor's resignation was a surprise, to be sure, but not entirely unexpected, and yet it forces a different kind of decision-making for the president. In many respects, naming a replacement for Chief Justice William Rehnquist--considered far more predictably conservative than O'Connor--would have been easier, a judicial form of a zero sum game.

The argument simply would have been over whether the nominee was too conservative. And given Rehnquist's failing health, Bush might get the chance anyway.

Replacing O'Connor forces the president to confront not merely judicial philosophy but also the court's diversity. Bush's support among suburban women has been ebbing since the election. And it is likely that, because O'Connor was largely seen as the swing vote that preserved abortion rights, her proposed successor's views on abortion could become a central issue during Senate confirmation hearings.

If so, Bush would face unrelenting pressure from both sides of the divide.

Social conservatives have often felt betrayed by none other than President Ronald Reagan (who appointed O'Connor) when it came to abortion. And though Bush has sided with them on nearly every issue of concern--from prohibiting embryonic stem cell research to interceding in the Terri Schiavo case to winning passage of a ban on certain late-term abortions--the president's rhetoric about support for a "culture of life" will be put to an ultimate test.

Tug from left, right

He will face pressure from the left as well, with at least equal zeal, as liberals try to frame the debate as the ultimate fight over a woman's right to make a choice on abortion. And he will face pressure from the moderate center, particularly in the GOP, that favors abortion rights but doesn't really like a discussion of it in the public square.

It has been clear for some time that by a ratio of greater than 2-to-1 Americans don't want to see the landmark Roe vs. Wade ruling completely overturned. And Bush has never specifically said that it should be, either.

"I think there will be a fight, because the partisans on both sides will be looking--on the conservative side, for somebody who's really going to be pretty predictably in favor of dramatic cutbacks in Roe v. Wade, and those on the left who are going to want somebody who at least will think about what Roe v. Wade means," said Drew Days, a professor at Yale Law School and former solicitor general in the Clinton administration.

To some degree, Bush's decision is a gut check, and his thought process can't be predicted.

"Tell me what he wants to be remembered as," said Abner Mikva, a former judge and White House counsel for President Bill Clinton. "If he is thinking about his legacy, I am a lot more comfortable than if he is trying to show how tough he is."

Generally, Americans have paid little attention to Senate confirmation hearings on Supreme Court nominees, with the notable exception of the battle over Clarence Thomas in 1991, and to a lesser extent the fight over Robert Bork. But the tension in the Thomas hearings was over an allegation of sexual harassment, not so much over his legal views.

Climate change

This time promises to be different because the political context has so changed in the last decade. The dividing lines have been more sharply drawn. The cleavage that was driven home in the 2000 presidential race, in which the Supreme Court ultimately ratified Bush's election, has shown no sign of healing.

Interest groups are now far better funded and empowered by technology to try to shape the public debate. Both sides are stoked for a passionate fight.

The president might have a fight that he would rather avoid, despite all the strong signals he has sent to conservatives that their cause is his as well.

DOJ_NMG_0000921

But if the sense of certitude that he has brought to his other decisions is on display with his choice of a nominee for the court, it might be a battle he embraces. From the day Bush took office, it was no secret that several of the justices were ailing and a retirement was almost certain. The president's team has been war-gaming its options on the court for years.

The only surprise was that it took this long.

Court Pick To Test Bush Promise (BOS)

By Susan Milligan

The Boston Globe, July 3, 2005

President Bush is likely to deliver to the Senate exactly what he promised in both presidential campaigns and displayed in his lower-court nominations: a Supreme Court pick who is conservative, antiabortion, and a believer in a strict interpretation of the Constitution, according to political operatives and activists in close contact with the White House.

Democratic senators, civil libertarians, and liberal groups are holding out hope Bush will offer a nominee who is uncontroversial and somewhat centrist, someone they say would fill the void created by retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who became a moderating voice on the court. But they agree with conservatives that the prospect is unlikely, and that the president will use his first appointment to the high court to establish a conservative legacy with a nominee similar to those Bush has publicly touted as his favorite justices, conservatives Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

In a nation already deeply polarized by two divisive presidential elections, interest groups are readying for a battle not so much to sway Bush's decision but to fight over just how conservative an acceptable nominee will be.

The Republican Main Street Partnership, comprising centrist Republican lawmakers, is nudging Bush to select a more moderate conservative so he can avoid a nasty confirmation battle in the Senate. Several Senate moderates signaled privately that they would accept Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who, as a member of the Texas Supreme Court, once sided with the majority in ruling that a 17-year-old girl should get an exemption to the parental notification law prior to having an abortion.

But hard-line conservatives are demanding a very conservative, antiabortion judge, and they say they won't be happy with a choice, such as Gonzales, that could appease Democrats and moderates on Capitol Hill. Conservative groups started a concerted effort Friday to pressure the White House to choose someone other than Gonzales, whom they consider questionable on abortion.

"This is the payoff, in an ideological sense. This is why they worked so hard in 2000 and '04," said Daron Shaw, an associate professor at the University of Texas, who advised both Bush presidential campaigns. "To say to them, 'we're nominating a moderate because we don't want to make the Democrats mad' " isn't going to work, Shaw said.

Even before Bush has named a new justice, interest groups are already gearing up for a heated and expensive lobbying campaign over the nominee. The group MoveOn.org on Friday announced a $280,000 TV ad buy urging the naming of a justice who will "protect our rights" by upholding the right to privacy, which is an argument for abortion rights. Paul Schenck, executive director of the National Pro-Life Action Center, said the group has sent out 5,000 letters to members to mobilize support for a conservative nominee and will send out 10,000 more by tomorrow.

With the atmosphere so charged, the White House is expecting a fight on Capitol Hill over any nominee; because of that Bush may select a staunch conservative and reject any notion of appeasing critics, said Mike Carver, a former Reagan administration deputy assistant attorney general who is close to Bush administration officials.

"I don't think this is a power issue, or a testosterone issue. It's a question of living up to your campaign pledges. This president does that," Carver said. "I think he's made it clear he prefers judges in the longstanding tradition of Republican presidents who [strictly] interpret the law. I don't see any reason why he would depart from that."

For religious conservatives, the Supreme Court selection represents a defining moment in Bush's presidency, his most potent opportunity yet to create a legacy that reflects their values. The religious and antiabortion activists, who labored mightily to twice elect Bush, say they aren't ready to accept a moderate nominee in the name of placating an intensely partisan Senate -- and Bush insiders say there's no reason they should.

Conservative lobbyists who meet regularly with White House officials said they don't know who the nominee will be, but they are working to make sure the selection will live up to the promises Bush has made on the matter. Bush has frequently discussed his commitment to a "culture of life," and he said during the 2004 campaign that he "wouldn't pick a judge who said that the Pledge of Allegiance couldn't be said in a school because it had the words `under God' in it."

DOJ_NMG_0000922

"That's an example of a judge allowing personal opinion to enter into the decision-making process as opposed to strict interpretation of the Constitution," Bush said during an October debate against Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry.

The lobbyists say they are deeply disappointed with Justice David Souter, the first Supreme Court justice confirmed during the presidency of Bush's father, George H.W. Bush. Souter revealed very little in his confirmation hearings about how he would rule, and he has turned out to be a moderate voice on the Supreme Court. They will fight to see that the current president doesn't make a similar pick, and instead selects someone with the same views as the elder Bush's second Supreme Court appointee -- Clarence Thomas.

O'Connor's departure creates an opening to build a solid conservative voice on the court, said Tom Minnery, vice president of public policy for the Colorado-based group Focus on the Family.

"This is a wonderful opportunity to reshape the court, and the court badly needs reshaping," he said, referring to what he called the "nutty" split decisions recently on the display of religious symbols on public property. In separate 5-4 decisions last week, the court said that Texas may keep a Ten Commandments monument on Capitol grounds, but that Kentucky courthouses must remove Ten Commandments displays in the buildings. In both cases, O'Connor thought the displays should be removed.

"We're confident the president will keep his campaign pledge to send up a nominee who will interpret the constitution as it was written, rather than as the latest fads legal theorists dictate," Minnery said.

Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, which has led the fight against many of Bush's conservative lower-court nominees, said she was not hopeful that Bush would pick a more moderate, less controversial justice.

"While the alliance urges president Bush to nominate a consensus candidate, we don't expect that he'll do so. We expect that he'll spark a fight, and we're hoping that he defies expectations," she said.

Ellen Malcolm, president of EMILY's List, which promotes female, Democratic candidates who favor abortion rights, is so certain Bush will name a very conservative nominee that she is already assessing the galvanizing impact the selection could have for the Democrats in general and female candidates in particular.

"If they make this a partisan ramrodding of a nominee, I think there will be tremendous political consequences" for conservative candidates, Malcolm said.

The activists and political analysts note that Bush -- unlike his predecessor, President Clinton --has consistently stuck to his guns on both policy decision and nominees, no matter how much heat he has gotten from the public, the international community, or Capitol Hill.

Clinton, for example, asked Lani Guinier to withdraw as his nominee as assistant attorney general for civil rights following an outcry over some of her writings, even though Guinier offered to defend herself in front of a highly skeptical Senate Judiciary Committee. Bush, meanwhile, has refused to withdraw his nominee for ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, in the face of heavy opposition from Democrats and at least one Republican in the Senate.

Bush has so far been unable to get Bolton confirmed, and some Republicans are suggesting that he do a "recess appointment" of Bolton, putting him in the job while Congress is out of session, to get his way. Bush used that tactic to get former Alabama attorney general William Pryor a recess appointment in February 2004 to a US appeals court slot, getting around a Democrat-led filibuster that had kept Pryor off the bench since 2003. Democrats considered Pryor an "extremist" and questioned whether he improperly solicited campaign funds from corporations subject to lawsuits by his office.

Under a shaky truce senators brokered last month, Bush got Pryor and two other controversial, conservative judges confirmed by the Senate.

Bush is likely to display the same resolve on a Supreme Court pick, said Bruce Buchanan, a government professor at the University of Texas.

"That's been part of the general strategy: The way you bolster your position across the board is you solidify your base," Buchanan said. "And that part of the base will be very insistent" on a conservative, he said.

Bush Faces Choice Of Advancing Agenda Or Bridging Political Divide (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

KRT – Bush Political Divide, July 3, 2005

President Bush started his search for a new Supreme Court justice Saturday, gearing up for a decision that could have a lasting impact on his presidency, his political party and the nation.y picking a staunch conservative to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Bush could do more to advance the conservative agenda than he has been able to accomplish in five years in the White House. But he also would risk a divisive battle in the Senate and a potential backlash from Americans who favor a middle-ground approach to abortion, gay rights, affirmative action and other hot-button social issues. In today's politically polarized world, with 24-hour cable news, 30-second attack ads, Internet interest groups and ideologically driven bloggers, a contentious nomination battle could drive a deeper wedge between Americans on opposite sides of the political divide.

Democrats have already served notice that they would use a nomination fight to cast Republicans as extremists who are out of touch with average Americans. Republicans say they would paint Democrats as obstructionists.

Any fallout from a bitter confirmation battle could easily spill into next year's congressional elections, when Republican control of Congress will be tested at the polls.

Replacing O'Connor with a like-minded jurist also carries some political risk for Bush, who owes his re-election to strong support from his conservative base. The president's conservative supporters view her retirement as an ideal opportunity to rein in a judiciary that they consider hostile to their values. To them, the vacancy is a test of their faith in Bush, and, by extension, the Republican Party.

"This is going to be a defining moment for President Bush," said the Rev. Patrick Mahoney, director of the Christian Defense Coalition, a conservative group. "If 9/11 was the defining moment of his first term, the composition of the Supreme Court is the defining moment of the second."

Bush has spent most of his political career trying to balance his conservative views against his desire to win support from Americans who might not agree with him. For example, he opposes abortion, but he concedes that most Americans are not ready to outlaw the practice.

"I've always believed that abortion ought to be illegal with the exception of rape, incest or life of the mother. But, look, I'm a realist, as well," the president told a Danish journalist last week.

The stakes at the Supreme Court, the final word on abortion rights and all other legal issues, make it harder to find the middle ground. Conservative groups have made it clear that they expect Bush to select a new ally for Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia, the court's most conservative members.

Bush expressed admiration for both men during the presidential campaign.

"Now it is time to make good on those campaign promises, Mr. President," Troy Newman, the president of the anti-abortion group Operation Rescue, said in a statement issued after O'Connor's resignation announcement Friday. "Now it is time to fulfill your obligation to God and to those who elected you, and appoint a staunchly pro-life judge to the Supreme Court."

It seems unlikely that replacing O'Connor with a stalwart anti-abortion justice would spell the end of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court ruling legalizing abortion. O'Connor voted with a 6-3 majority in the last clear test of that ruling, so shifting one vote is not likely to make a difference at the court.

But the addition of anti-abortion justice would probably make it easier for states to restrict the procedure. And it isn't just abortion that's at stake. O'Connor cast the deciding vote against the court's conservative wing in cases involving the death penalty for minors, affirmative action for law school admission and the display of the Ten Commandments inside Kentucky courts.

"Supreme Court nominees are a president's most important legacy," said Neil Siegel, a law professor at Duke University in North Carolina. "He's got two roads before him, and they are rather stark choices. One is to try to put through the most conservative person that he can. The other is to go for a more moderate-type conservative.

"No matter who he chooses, the court is going to move to the right," Siegel added. "The question is how far."

White House spokesman Trent Duffy said Bush began considering his options on Saturday during a holiday weekend visit to the presidential retreat in Camp David, Md. He will take a stack of information on possible nominees with him Tuesday when he flies to Europe for a three-day trip to Denmark and Scotland.

DOJ_NMG_0000924

Although White House aides began looking at possible court nominees in Bush's first term, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Bush has not looked his options in any detail.

McClellan said Bush would not announce a decision until after he returns from Europe on Friday. The president has pledged to visit with congressional leaders from both parties when he gets back.

"He has not, at this point, given any serious consideration to any nominee," McClellan told reporters Friday. Bush has offered no clues to his leanings, saying only that he will find a nominee that Americans can be proud of.

Bush Has Numerous Constituencies To Consider (MINNST)

By Michael Doyle And Lawrence M. O'rourke

Minneapolis Star Tribune, July 3, 2005

As President Bush prepares for what may become a history-changing appointment to the Supreme Court, one thing appears near-certain: Bush's pick will be a conservative whose vote could shift the balance of power on the evenly divided court.

Beyond that, Bush will be confronting a multiplicity of choices as he arrives at a successor to Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her surprise resignation from the court on Friday.

Will he appoint the first Hispanic to the court? Will he select another woman? Will he seek a far-to-the-right conservative who will touch off a titanic confirmation battle in the Senate? Or will he opt for more of a consensus candidate who could win easier confirmation, thereby enhancing prospects for other elements of his second-term agenda?

However Bush decides, his choice could offer the greatest insight on how he wants to leave his mark on the Supreme Court and the country for possibly many years after his term expires in 2009.

Competing agendas

The jockeying for Bush's attention was underway minutes after O'Connor disclosed she was ending her 24-year career on the court.

"We should replace Sandra Day O'Connor with a consensus candidate, not an ideologue," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who called for a summit of the White House and Democratic leaders.

But Republican Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma said now is the time for Bush to make a pick that will decisively change the court's direction. "I would hope that President Bush's nominee will swing the court back toward the Constitution and away from an era of self-indulgent judicial activism," he said.

Already, White House advisers have sifted endless court opinions, law review articles and other background documents. It's painstaking work, as officials seek out the kind of killer detail that might unravel a candidate.

Bush's team has already been able to do much of this preliminary work because at least one Supreme Court vacancy has been anticipated almost from the day he took office.

Only one woman?

The resignation of O'Connor, the first woman to serve on the Supreme Court, interjected a new factor for Bush to consider: Should he make certain that the court is not left with Ruth Bader Ginsburg as the only female member?

Sen. Arlen Specter, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said that two women are "a minimum" on the court. "The gender of the nominee is a "dimension that is very, very important to consider," said Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who will preside over the confirmation hearings.

Specter, a moderate who favors abortion rights and embryonic stem cell research, noted, however, that the eventual retirement of 80-year-old Chief Justice William Rehnquist will almost certainly give Bush another opening to fill.

Appointing the first Hispanic Supreme Court justice is also believed to have Bush's attention. A natural could be Alberto Gonzales, who is a longtime Bush ally from Texas, the former White House counsel and was recently installed as U.S. attorney general.

Another possibility is appellate Judge Emilio Garza, known to have stronger appeal to conservatives than does Gonzales.

Moving to the middle

DOJ_NMG_0000925

The closer Bush moves toward the perceived middle, the lower the resistance is likely to be from Senate Democrats. Moving to the middle, however, would anger Bush's conservative base, many of whom see the O'Connor vacancy as a chance to move the court more emphatically rightward.

But fully satisfying conservatives could allow Democrats to characterize the candidate as the kind of "extraordinary" circumstance that, under a recent Senate deal, justifies reinvoking a Senate filibuster. That, in turn, would raise the bar for Senate approval to 60 votes -- unless Republicans made good on a threat to waive the 60-vote requirement.

Should that happen, the Senate could dissolve into a partisan quagmire, raising questions about Bush's ability to achieve many of his domestic priorities.

Bush has already pledged to consult with two key Democrats: Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Avoiding a battle

Some say Bush could also skirt a nasty fight by nominating a member of the Senate. Texas Republican John Cornyn, a former elected member of the Texas Supreme Court, stands as one option. Also mentioned are Utah Republican Orrin Hatch, a former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and Arizona Republican Jon Kyl.

Considered more likely is that Bush will scour the appeals court benches. Among appellate judges with high reputations among conservative activists are Michael Luttig and Harvie Wilkinson of the 4th Circuit in Richmond, Va., and Samuel Alioto of the 2nd Circuit in Philadelphia.

If Bush opts to keep two women on the court, he could choose from two reliable conservatives now serving on the New Orleans-based 5th Circuit Court of Appeals: Edith Clement and Edith Hollan Jones.

Some suggest Bush could get a conservative justice and simultaneously make history with a Hispanic appointment, choosing either Gonzales or Garza. The two candidates, however, offer competing appeals.

The 49-year-old son of Mexican immigrants, Gonzales enjoys a close relationship with Bush, who has appointed him to a variety of sensitive positions. But Gonzales worries activists, who consider him insufficiently conservative. Gonzales told senators during his attorney general confirmation hearing that he considers the Roe vs. Wade decision upholding a woman's right to an abortion to be "the law of the land." As a Texas Supreme Court judge in 2000, he voted to uphold a 17-year-old girl's right to obtain an abortion without notifying her parents.

Garza enjoys a more down-the-line conservative record. Garza, 57, a University of Texas Law School graduate and former Marine officer, has used his position on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals to criticize the Roe vs. Wade decision.

But there's also the issue of personal chemistry when a president is nominating someone who may define his legacy.

On that score, the edge could go to Gonzales and also to Theodore Olson, a former U.S. solicitor general. Olson successfully represented the president in the epic battle after the 2000 election that culminated in the 5-4 Supreme Court decision that chose Bush for the White House over Democrat Al Gore.

Both Sides Fear "stealth" Nominee, Observers Say (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 3, 2005

With the Supreme Court battle now under way, what both sides fear most is the unknown: a so-called "stealth" nominee who has a thin paper trail and offers ambiguous answers in the Senate grilling that is sure to come.

Already, activists on the right and left are calculating how to divine the true ideology of any candidate the White House might put forward, especially on politically explosive subjects like abortion. While in the past, nominees have been able to duck and dodge dicey questions, this time the president's pick for the high court won't be let off so easily, court observers say.

The apprehension about a blank-slate candidate is all the more intense on both sides of the aisle because it is Sandra Day O'Connor - herself an unpredictable swing vote - leaving the court, rather than Chief Justice William Rehnquist, a reliable conservative whose retirement had been the subject of speculation.

DOJ_NMG_0000926

With a Rehnquist vacancy, President George W. Bush might have felt freer to appoint a strong conservative - and Senate Democrats might have felt more willing to accept such a choice - because it wouldn't have tipped the balance of the court. Now, however, the pressure on Bush to appoint a moderate will be more intense, say those on both sides of the fight.

Indeed, within hours of O'Connor's announcement, Democrats were calling on Bush to nominate someone in her mold - a "voice of reason and moderation," as Sen. Daniel Akaka, D- Hawaii, put it at a news conference here Friday.

Some conservatives, meanwhile, immediately began plotting strategy to head off the most obvious such choice on Bush's short list - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales - in part because they are worried about what they don't know about his views.

"Conservatives are looking for someone with a paper trail that shows their views, as is the left," said Manuel Miranda, head of the Third Branch Conference, a conservative activist group, and former Republican aide to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Miranda said he fears Gonzales' name may shoot to the top of Bush's list because Gonzales would be the first Latino Supreme Court justice, a move all the more symbolic because he would replace O'Connor, the court's first woman.

Some on the right oppose Gonzales because of a decision the former Texas Supreme Court judge wrote in a case upholding a 17-year-old girl's quest for an exception to a Texas law requiring minors to notify their parents or guardians before undergoing an abortion.

But Miranda voiced much broader concerns, pointing to public comments by the attorney general in which he appeared to espouse a view of the Constitution as a living document whose meaning changes with time as evidence that he would be an unreliable vote on the court.

"This is an unformed mind," said Miranda, who helped organize the sending of a letter to Bush on Friday from a coalition of Latino clergy who said they'd love to see a Hispanic nominee - unless it's Gonzales.

Word watch

Just how liberal and conservative activists - and the U.S. senators they're trying to influence - will smoke out a prospective candidate's views on controversial issues like abortion, gay marriage, or affirmative action is unclear.

In this politically charged environment, court observers say, any nominee is going to do his or her best to be evasive. So the public may be in for a confusing game of Washington semantics.

Take, for instance, the answer from Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., when asked Friday whether he would filibuster a nominee who opposed Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court opinion that established a woman's right to have an abortion.

Kennedy said he wouldn't impose a "litmus test" on any nominee. But he added, he would vote against anyone who doesn't express a "core commitment to constitutional values," including a right to privacy, the foundation of the majority's opinion in Roe v. Wade.

On the other side of that issue, Jan LaRue, chief counsel of the conservative Concerned Women for America, said: "We have one litmus test. Is the nominee pro-Constitution? Is he an originalist?"

Those who adhere to such a view believe there is no right to an abortion spelled out in the Constitution.

In the past, candidates who have directly answered such couched questions - or even more direct ones - have not fared well. Exhibit A is Robert Bork, the highly controversial 1987 Supreme Court nominee who went down in defeat after being more candid than his supporters wished.

"What was so exciting about the Bork debate was that ... he was really willing to sit down and talk about his notion of the Constitution," said Howard Gillman, a political science professor at the University of Southern California and an expert on Supreme Court nominations. "You really had this very thoughtful debate about different constitutional visions."

Since Bork's defeat, however, "people have learned there are disadvantages to being completely honest and elaborative about your vision," Gillman said. "Nominees feel it's safer territory to cloak themselves in generalities and to talk about respect for precedent. We're really talking about nominees who are not going to want to engage in that kind of substantive conversation."

By contrast, Justice David Souter, nominated by the first President George Bush in 1990, "ducked and parried and answered almost nothing directly and was easily confirmed," noted David Yalof, a political science professor at the University of Connecticut and expert on the judicial selection process.

Similarly, Justice Anthony Kennedy, nominated by Reagan after Bork's defeat, provided careful and circumspect answers and sailed through the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0000927

But once on the court, those two justices turned out to be much more liberal than their supporters had hoped. And conservatives say they have learned a hard lesson from those easy confirmations.

"No one will be happy ... with a kabuki dance of no substance," said Miranda. "On the right, people will always have this sense that they're being had - because they've been had before."

Showdown

Those on the left say they will be just as skeptical of anything short of full and direct answers.

"We think it's critical that there not be any stealth nominees to the court, and by that I mean nominees like Scalia and Thomas who would not discuss their positions on Roe v. Wade (during their confirmations) and have turned out to be staunch opponents who call for the reversal of Roe," said Nancy Northup, president of the Center for Reproductive Rights, an abortion-rights group. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas are seen as the two most conservative members of the court.

Said Elliot Mincberg, of the liberal group People for the American Way: "The Senate is not required to accept a pig in a poke."

A refusal to answer questions about legal precedents such as Roe v. Wade "should not be accepted," Mincberg said. "This is a lifetime seat on the Supreme Court, and that person ought to be required to completely fill out their job application, which includes explaining their judicial philosophy."

Those kinds of demands create a showdown with its own mysterious political puzzle.

"Both sides are going to demand answers, and the nominee is going to be as evasive as possible," Gillman said. "We're as close to a stalemate system as you can imagine. We don't really see the road from here to a successful confirmation."

O'Connor Resignation Ignites Political Firestorm (DeN)

By Joan Biskupic

DetroitNews, July 3, 2005

Sandra Day O'Connor's sudden resignation from the Supreme Court on Friday signals the departure of a pioneering justice who was the most influential member of a divided court. It also ignites a political firestorm over her successor and gives President Bush a chance to make a lasting imprint on the bench.

The departure of O'Connor, who became the first woman on the court when she was named to the bench by President Reagan in 1981, raises the possibility that Bush -- who has never made a high court appointment -- could get the chance to make two of them in short order.

Chief Justice William Rehnquist, 80, is battling thyroid cancer, and much of the talk about potential court retirements has focused on him. But Rehnquist concluded the court's term for 2004-05 this week without giving any indication that he planned to step down.

In a statement released by the court, O'Connor, 75, said she was leaving in part to spend more time with her husband. John O'Connor, 75, has been suffering from Alzheimer's disease. Her resignation creates the first opening on the Supreme Court in 11 years, the bench's longest period without a departure since 1812-1823. The former Arizona state senator was at the ideological center of the court and was its equilibrium, resisting moves by her colleagues to move the court too much to the left or to the right.

To the disappointment of many conservative Republicans, she cast key votes protecting abortion rights, an issue that is certain to be a key point in the Senate confirmation hearings for whoever Bush chooses as her replacement. In disputes over the separation of church and state, O'Connor generally supported limited government mingling with religion. She also took a lead role as the Rehnquist court boosted states' rights and curtailed congressional intervention in the affairs of local governments.

She often was criticized -- by conservative Justice Antonin Scalia, among others -- for seeming to have no hard-and-fast rules on the law, for compromising too much. But O'Connor, the only member of the current court who ever held elective office, favored real governmental action to come from elected legislators.

Because of her centrist approach, her departure could be far more significant than if Rehnquist had resigned. Bush -- who has expressed admiration for Scalia and another conservative justice, Clarence Thomas -- now could appoint someone whose vote could move the court to the right on abortion, affirmative action and other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0000928

Senate Democrats such as Minority Leader Harry Reid and interest groups such as the National Women's Law Center have vowed to protect abortion rights and fight any Bush nominee that seems "out of the mainstream." On Friday, they indicated that because it is O'Connor -- and not Rehnquist -- who is leaving, the stakes in the Senate nomination hearings would be particularly high.

In the White House's Rose Garden shortly after O'Connor's announcement, Bush praised her service to the country and said his nominee would be someone who meets "a high standard of legal ability, judgment and integrity."

Anticipating a political battle in a Senate that is sharply divided and that already has resisted his nominees to federal courts, he said, "The nation deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

Bush said he would choose a nominee "in a timely manner" in the hope that the nominee would be confirmed by the Senate before the Supreme Court's new term begins Oct. 3. Press secretary Scott McClellan said later that Bush wouldn't announce his choice until he returns from a four-day trip to Europe on July 8.

White House and Justice Department officials have been working quietly for weeks on a list of prospects. Some have been interviewed informally. But those candidates were being considered as possible replacements for Rehnquist. The departure of the more moderate O'Connor could mean a change in the administration's political calculus toward a more moderate candidate, as Reid and other Democrats have suggested.

A candidate whose stock could be up is Alberto Gonzales, a longtime friend of Bush who had a reputation as a moderate when he was on the Texas Supreme Court. Bush has expressed a desire to appoint the nation's first Hispanic justice, which also could work in Gonzales' favor.

Lower court judges who have been on the White House's radar as potential nominees include Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson, both based in Virginia, on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit; Emilio Garza and Edith Jones, both in Texas and on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit; John Roberts, of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; and Samuel Alito, based in New Jersey on the U.S. Court of Appeals 3rd Circuit.

Some past presidents, most recently Bill Clinton, have asked key members of the opposite party about Supreme Court prospects before nominating them, and Democrats are urging Bush to do the same. "Justice O'Connor has been a voice of reason and moderation on the court," said Reid, D-Nev. "It is vital that she be replaced by someone like her."

'I am 75 years old'

With so much of Washington's focus on a potential retirement by Rehnquist, O'Connor's name had surfaced only in the last few days in news reports about possible departures on the court.

Some of her fellow justices quietly had rejected the notion that O'Connor was leaving. Her work always has been her passion, and O'Connor has drawn strength from her job -- most poignantly in the late 1980s, when she was diagnosed with breast cancer. When she spoke about the experience, she said that work became even more important in her life to keep her going.

But O'Connor's husband, John, has been suffering from Alzheimer's for several years and apparently his condition forced her to change course. She told the other justices of her decision Friday morning.

"I am 75 years old," she said in a statement released through the court public information office. "I need to spend more time with my husband." O'Connor and her husband, who also is 75, met in law school at Stanford University where they were classmates with Rehnquist. The O'Connors have been married for 52 years.

The first hint of O'Connor's resignation came Thursday, when the Supreme Court's head marshal, Pamela Talkin, called White House counsel Harriet Miers to say that a sealed envelope would be delivered from the court on Friday morning. Miers told Bush and Vice President Cheney, who were having lunch. The letter arrived Friday morning, with a surprising message: It was O'Connor, not Rehnquist.

In O'Connor's letter to Bush, she wrote, "It has been a great privilege, indeed, to have served as a member of the court for 24 years. I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure."

Groups ready for 'heck of a fight'

DOJ_NMG_0000929

Interest groups stand ready to turn the political battle over O'Connor's replacement into as tough a tussle as the fights over the nominations of Clarence Thomas in 1991 and Robert Bork in 1987. Thomas won confirmation. Bork did not.

"It's hard to imagine anything more heated than those two," says C. Michael Comiskey, political science professor at Penn State Fayette and author of "Seeking Justices: The Judging of Supreme Court Nominees." But, "this could be one heck of a fight" because groups on both sides of the political aisle know that O'Connor was often a key swing vote on cases involving social issues and that Bush could make the court more conservative.

There are signs that the lobbying campaign over this court nomination will be far more sophisticated than any before it and that it likely will resemble a fall political campaign.

On the conservative side, interest groups have pledged to spend at least $20 million on ads, grass-roots lobbying here and elsewhere and other efforts. At least $18 million of that will be spent by one group alone, Progress for America. That group released its first TV/radio ad last week. It was a warning that Democrats would try to smear anyone Bush nominates.

On the liberal side, organizations such as People for the American Way and MoveOnPac.org also plan to spend millions. Within minutes of Bush's appearance Friday, MoveOn Pac announced it was releasing a TV ad warning that a too-conservative nominee could "undermine the rights of individuals and families."

"The moderating leadership of O'Connor must not be replaced with a far-right extremist," says Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, one of the groups that has been preparing to mount a campaign if Bush nominates a candidate they see as too conservative.

In a statement, the American Civil Liberties Union praised O'Connor as a centrist who "stood up for individual rights and against a radically conservative vision of the Constitution" on key cases involving abortion rights, affirmative action and the rights of foreign detainees to have access to the court system.

"We are gravely concerned that President Bush will use this opportunity to nominate someone whose judicial philosophy is hostile to civil liberties," said Steven Shapiro, the ACLU's legal director.

For Progress for America and other conservative groups, O'Connor's departure signals a once-a-generation opportunity to push for significant change on the high court, with restrictions for abortion chief among the goals. (The current court generally splits 6-3 in favor of abortion rights, with O'Connor in the majority.)

Boydon Gray, former counsel to the first President Bush and a strategist for various groups who are pushing the administration to make the Supreme Court more conservative, cited recent battles in the Senate over judicial nominees in warning Democrats to give Bush's nominee a fair chance.

"We call on Democrats to resist the temptation to use their attack machine against a qualified nominee," Gray said. "All parties should withhold judgment until a fair and sober analysis has occurred.

"We expect the president to choose the best person for this difficult job. We have no doubt that the nominee will be of the highest legal excellence and integrity, who follows the Constitution, defends property rights, and as the president suggested in his press conference, refrains from making law from the bench. Any such nominee deserves a respectful hearing and an up or down vote. They do not deserve to have their record distorted."

Specter under a spotlight

The nomination hearings will put a particular focus on Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who will be at the center of the wrangling over the nominee.

On Friday, Specter called O'Connor a "historic figure" who had "a pivotal role on the court as a centrist."

Specter said he has talked with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist about the timing of hearings and said his panel is prepared to "proceed at any time."

Specter acknowledged that O'Connor's retirement would "pose a somewhat different picture" than Rehnquist's would have. He said he anticipated that with O'Connor being a swing vote, hearings "could produce more controversy. But I don't want to prejudge anything."

He said he had not submitted any recommendations to Bush but had spoken several times to the president about consulting the Senate on a nomination. "I wasn't asked (who I liked). Don't ask, don't tell," he joked.

DOJ_NMG_0000930

Of the nominee, Specter said, "People will be expecting everything. This is a very polarized country. ...Everybody can't have their own way."

Specter said he expects abortion rights to "be a focal point" of the confirmation hearings. Specter, who supports abortion rights, said he would have no "litmus test" on that or other issues regarding a nominee. He said that for all the action by interest groups surrounding the nominations process, "the activities of the groups are vastly overstated, vastly overstated, and in many cases they are counterproductive."

As for Rehnquist, Specter -- who has two more chemotherapy treatments left to go for the Hodgkin's lymphoma that has left him bald -- said he saw the chief justice at a lunch a couple weeks ago. Specter said Rehnquist "looked infinitely better" than he had when he sworn in Bush in January.

"Speaking as someone who likes to get up in the morning with something important to do, I wouldn't say it's keeping the chief alive, but I think he likes his job," Specter said. "And if we haven't heard from him by now (concerning his retirement), the chances are you won't hear from him for some time."

A politician on the court

O'Connor's resignation brought an end to the public life of a woman whose rise to the nation's highest court was an inspirational story to women.

O'Connor was born March 26, 1930, in El Paso and grew up on her family's ranch, the Lazy B.

She grew up splitting her years between El Paso, where she lived with her grandmother and attended the Radford School, and the 162,000-acre ranch that her grandfather had established in southeastern Arizona. She graduated from high school at 16 and earned a degree in economics from Stanford in 1950.

She married John O'Connor, also a lawyer, and moved with him to Germany while he was in the Army. After his service, they settled in Phoenix in 1957 and had three sons.

Sandra Day O'Connor became active in Arizona politics and was appointed state senator in 1969 to fill out a vacancy. She later won election and then was elected by fellow Republicans to be the majority leader of Arizona's Senate. She was the first woman nationwide to hold the post.

She left the Legislature and soon after was elected to the Maricopa County Superior Court. In 1979, then-Gov. Bruce Babbitt appointed her to the Arizona Court of Appeals.

Through coincidence and mutual friends, O'Connor met U.S. Chief Justice Warren Burger on a vacation in late 1979. She stayed in touch with him and he eventually helped bring her name to the attention of the Reagan White House in the spring of 1981, before it began looking for a successor to retiring Justice Potter Stewart.

At the time, O'Connor's credentials did not make her an obvious candidate. She was not on a federal court or top state court, as many nominees in the recent past had been. Instead, she was a judge on an Arizona intermediate court handling criminal and civil appeals. But as a former state senator, she had deep and well maintained political connections to the Republican Party. She was a close friend of Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz.

For O'Connor, it was a matter of right place, right time. During his recent campaign for president, Ronald Reagan had promised to give the Supreme Court its first female justice.

O'Connor's nomination was embraced widely, although some opponents of abortion rights warned that she would vote against their cause. O'Connor ended up being confirmed by the Senate, 99-0, on Sept. 21, 1981. She took the judicial oath five days later.

O'Connor's political background ended up shaping her style on the high court. She turned out to be a consensus builder and learned over the years to be adept at counting votes among her colleagues.

Her imprint at the center was evident in 1992 as she, joining with Anthony Kennedy and David Souter, crafted a compromise ruling that affirmed abortion rights nationwide. In 2003, she was the pivotal fifth vote to uphold affirmative action in higher education, arising from a dispute at the University of Michigan. Earlier this term, she was the key fifth vote for a broad reading of the law known as Title IX, which protects girls and women from discrimination in school sports.

O'Connor's place at the center of the court's social milieu also was important. She was the one who ensured that all the justices ate lunch together after oral arguments, she arranged social outings and events for visiting dignitaries. The role she played at the court's social center reinforced her position of influence on the law. She often spoke about how important it was to have "agreeable" relations to minimize disagreements on substance.

DOJ_NMG_0000931

She was also the public face of the court internationally. In 2003, for example, as part of the Bush administration's effort to develop democratic structures of government in the Persian Gulf, the president asked O'Connor to represent the United States at an Arab Judicial Forum in Manama, Bahrain.

So What's The 'Right' Pick? (NYT)

By Jeffrey Rosen

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

WHEN Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her intention to resign from the Supreme Court, President Bush promised to nominate a successor who would "faithfully interpret the Constitution."

He is widely expected to appoint a judicial conservative, but the crucial question for the country is what kind of judicial conservative.

Judicial conservatism, after all, is not a monolithic movement: It is a catchphrase for very different approaches to constitutional interpretation that often lead to dramatically different results in cases ranging from affirmative action to abortion and states' rights.

Several of the leading candidates said to be on Mr. Bush's short list - like Judge J. Michael Luttig of Virginia and Judge John Roberts of Washington - defy easy categorization. But it's clear that justices from each philosophical camp would reach very different decisions in the cases Americans care most about. Consider abortion. "A traditionalist conservative might make his peace with Roe v. Wade, saying the country has accepted it," said Akhil Amar, a constitutional law professor at Yale University. "But an original intent person would say: Where does it say that in the Constitution? A deference person would say that legislatures can decide the optimal rate of change, and libertarians will divide based on their answer to a philosophical question about the beginning of life."

Affirmative action cases might be decided in similarly different ways by the various conservative camps. "O'Connor, the pragmatist, relied on the fact that the country had come to accept some affirmative action," Professor Amar said. "A libertarian like Justice Thomas might say affirmative action offends an idea of merit."

According to legal scholars and Supreme Court historians, at least five different types of judicial conservatism are represented on the current Supreme Court and on President Bush's short list. As he ponders his first Supreme Court nomination, President Bush can choose from the following menu:

Originalist Conservatives

Since the 1980's, the most influential movement in conservative legal circles has insisted that the text of the Constitution should be strictly interpreted as it was originally understood by its framers and ratifiers. The leading originalist (who also sometimes calls himself a textualist) is Justice Antonin Scalia, who insists that respect for original understanding is the only way of separating law from politics.

"When this president and this party talk about strict constructionism or faithfully interpreting the law, they mean textualism and originalism," says Jack Goldsmith of Harvard Law School, a former Bush administration official.

Many of the names of President Bush's shortlist, like Judge Michael McConnell of the United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit, are widely considered to be originalists, although not all of them embrace the label.

Libertarian/Constitution in Exile Conservatives

This strain of judicial conservatism is consistently anti-government and pro-individual liberties, especially including economic liberties. On the current court, the leading representative of these libertarian conservatives is Clarence Thomas.

"Sometimes, the libertarian conservatives are associated with originalism, because in many cases the original understanding comports with their conception of limited government," says Professor Goldsmith of Harvard. "But sometimes there is a conflict, and the real commitment of the libertarians is to individual liberty, not original understanding or judicial restraint."

DOJ_NMG_0000932

For this reason, libertarian conservatives like Justice Thomas are even more willing than traditional originalists like Justice Scalia to overturn decades of judicial precedents with which they disagree and to encourage judicial activism in cases protecting economic liberties.

The favorite Supreme Court candidate of the judicial libertarians is Janice Rogers Brown, recently confirmed by the Senate to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Liberals consider her one of the most radical potential nominees.

Traditionalist Conservatives

Traditionalist conservatives believe that judicial wisdom is built up slowly, and judges shouldn't depart radically in any direction from the Constitution as it has been interpreted in case law over the ages. "The traditionalist conservatives were in the judicial mainstream for at least half a century after the New Deal," says Professor David Strauss of the University of Chicago. Their leading representative during the Warren era was Justice John Marshall Harlan. On the current court, they are best represented by Justice David Souter.

Traditionalists are reluctant to overturn judicial precedents except in the exceptional cases, like Brown v. Board of Education, which outlawed school segregation. On Mr. Bush's shortlist, the leading traditionalist conservative is J. Harvie Wilkinson of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, whom some administration officials reportedly consider too moderate.

Pragmatic Conservatives

Judicial pragmatists believe in reaching practical decisions that will help the institutions of government function smoothly. They are less concerned with the text or history of the Constitution and more interested in empirical evidence about the effects of their decisions in everyday life.

"Lewis Powell, Sandra Day O'Connor's judicial mentor, followed the same trajectory as Justice O'Connor: they both began as tradition-minded conservatives and ended up as conservative-minded pragmatists," Professor Goldsmith says.

In addition to Justice O'Connor, other pragmatists on the current court are Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Justice Stephen Breyer. All voted last year to regulate the detention of enemy combatants over dissents by Justices Scalia and Thomas.

"From my perspective, Justice O'Connor didn't give enough weight to the role of text, history and principle in constitutional law," says Steven Calabresi of Northwestern University Law School, a leading conservative scholar. "I think one concern with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who is on President Bush's shortlist, is that he would be too much of a pragmatist as well."

Social conservatives in particular fear that Mr. Gonzales is too liberal (and too pragmatic) on questions involving affirmative action and abortion.

Deferential Conservatives

One of the oldest strains of judicial conservatism says that courts should play a very limited role in American politics and should rarely, if ever, strike down laws passed by the state legislatures and Congress. On the Supreme Court, the leading advocates of judicial deference to legislatures were Felix Frankfurter and, during the Warren era, Byron White.

During the postwar period, conservative presidents starting with Richard Nixon claimed to want to appoint justices who would allow political battles to be fought in legislatures, not courts. But today, few liberal or conservatives justices or judges consistently believe in judicial deference.

"There is no consistent devotion on the right or the left for judges who defer to the political process across the board," says John Yoo, a law professor at the University of California at Berkeley and a former Bush administration official. "I don't think any of the judge pickers believe in it either."

How will President Bush choose among a dizzying variety of judicial conservatives? "I think O'Connor's leaving makes Bush's job easier," Professor Yoo says. "He's now free to replace O'Connor with a like-minded pragmatist like Gonzales who will win political points with Hispanics but upset his base. Since Bush is likely to have a chance to replace Chief Justice Rehnquist, too, he could reassure social conservatives that they'll get a reliable originalist for the chief's slot."

Other conservative scholars think the game of musical chairs might lead to a different result. "I think Bush will focus on replacing Justice O'Connor with someone who shares his stated philosophical goals of originalism and textualism," said Professor Goldsmith of Harvard. "Once he does that, he can focus on what criteria he will use in selecting a chief."

DOJ_NMG_0000933

With one Supreme Court nomination imminent, and another very likely on the horizon, it's clear that Mr. Bush will have an opportunity to satisfy and infuriate conservatives of many stripes. Whatever choice he makes will define not only the Supreme Court but his own conservative legacy.

O'Connor Successor Debated (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

When she heard the name Sandra Day O'Connor for the first time in the fall of 1981, it meant almost nothing to Eleanor Smeal, then president of the National Organization for Women. All she knew was that O'Connor was the new Supreme Court nominee of a president she hotly opposed -- and that O'Connor was a woman.

That was enough. After a few quick calls to O'Connor acquaintances in Arizona, Smeal was on board. "We said, 'We believe she'll be there for women,' " Smeal recalled.

O'Connor's appointment galvanized women across the country in a way almost impossible to imagine nearly a quarter-century later. At a time when women were vastly underrepresented in professional schools and struggling for workplace equality, her ascension to the top ranks of federal power blasted down barriers and opened new horizons for younger generations.

More than just a symbol, she was cheered by women across an unusually wide political spectrum who believed the nation needed not just a female presence but a female perspective on its highest court. Years later, those supporters point to O'Connor's legal reasoning in several key rulings -- abortion rights, discrimination, affirmative action -- which, they are convinced, was informed by her personal experiences.

Yet for all the significance they place on her sex, women are split on the question of whether O'Connor should be succeeded by another woman. Although some of their leaders and members have expressed hope that the next appointee will be a woman, most women's organizations, liberal and conservative, are no longer making a person's sex an official priority, instead holding up O'Connor's reputation for open-mindedness as the characteristic they most want to see replicated.

"I think the mind is more important than the sex," said Jennifer Taylor, 48, a homemaker in Chevy Chase who described herself as liberal. "I just hope -- and I doubt -- that the person who replaces her is going to be as much of a centrist."

But lawyer Victoria Toensing, a Republican and a deputy assistant attorney general from 1984 to 1988, disagreed.

"One out of nine just doesn't do it," she said. "It is important for people to look at the Supreme Court and say there's someone on that court who represents who I am."

For many women who were beginning to make their way in law or politics in the 1970s and early '80s, the idea of a female Supreme Court justice was virtually inconceivable, almost until the moment it happened.

"It was still rare for a woman to be made a partner in a law firm," said Patricia A. McGuire, the president of Trinity College in Northeast. "We would hear horror stories -- if you want to be made partner, don't get married, don't have babies."

Jamie S. Gorelick, who would become deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration, recalled a constitutional law professor in the early 1970s posing hypothetical arguments to his students as if they were members of the Supreme Court and addressing her as "Mr. Justice Gorelick."

"There wasn't even a way to address a hypothetical female Supreme Court justice," recalled Gorelick, now a partner with Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr in the District.

Both women recalled the appointment of O'Connor as unexpected and electrifying. While some liberal women harbored doubts about a Republican appointee, NOW -- which had been pushing for a female justice for years -- quickly decided to support her.

Smeal's Arizona contacts told her "they felt she understood discrimination. She had been discriminated against as a woman," Smeal remembers.

O'Connor's personal history, in fact, became something of a touchstone, both for the activists seeking to predict how she would weigh in on key issues and for women seeking ways to balance career and family.

Although O'Connor graduated third in her Stanford law class, no law firm would hire her, except as a secretary. Ultimately, she started her own firm with her husband, and built a powerful career in law and in Arizona state government.

DOJ_NMG_0000934

Judith Areen, then a professor with a 1-year-old child, was another liberal with doubts about O'Connor's credentials. When they met upon O'Connor's arrival in Washington, she found herself impressed.

"I was very admiring of the fact that she had raised three sons and yet had done well enough to elevate herself to the court," said Areen, later the long-serving dean of Georgetown University's law school. Michelle Bernard, a high school senior that fall with notions of becoming a doctor, found herself riveted by the gender debates surrounding the appointment. Would a female jurist overturn Roe v. Wade ? What would she wear on the bench? She started reading everything she could about O'Connor -- and four years later headed for law school.

Once on the court, O'Connor almost immediately found herself the swing vote -- and often the deciding voice -- on issues of keen concern to women, such as abortion. A number cited one of her first opinions for the court, in favor of a male applicant seeking admission to the Mississippi University for Women nursing school, as evidence that she would not tolerate gender bias of any kind.

"She made it very clear in her very first decision [involving sex bias] that she believed you can't apply gender markers," said Judith L. Lichtman, former president of the National Partnership for Women and Families, which works for workplace equality for women. "Although she was very much a moderate conservative . . . she did not bring her own political views to her decisions."

To some, the opinions she wrote and the votes she cast were proof that having a woman on the bench made a difference. Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's Democratic delegate to Congress, cited O'Connor's majority decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey , in which she wrote that states may not put an "undue burden" on women seeking abortions before the fetus can survive on its own.

"Although this is a profoundly conservative justice who was not predictable on human rights and civil rights issues, she nevertheless made us understand why it was important to have a woman on the court," Norton said.

Bernard, now a vice president at the conservative Independent Women's Forum, cited O'Connor's decision in the case that allowed the University of Michigan to continue using race as one of many factors in admissions decisions.

"It takes a woman or a minority or someone who has been marginalized at some point in their lifetime to recognize the importance of our institutions of higher education not just being for the elite few," Bernard said. "You need to experience that in order to reason through that."

Yet Bernard and Norton, like many women on both sides of the spectrum , said they do not think it essential that O'Connor be succeeded by a woman.

"Forget gender," declared Gina Glantz, a longtime Democratic activist who managed former senator Bill Bradley's presidential campaign. "With the country as polarized as it is, to add someone to the court who would add another layer of acrimony to that playing field would be unhealthy for the country. . . . We need a balanced, thoughtful person, regardless of race or gender."

Marsha Greenberger, president of the National Women's Law Center, said that "diversity of experiences is critical, but not at the expense of having a justice who truly cares about equal protections and justice for women and upholding core rights."

Others disagreed. "If you can find a man who thinks like a woman and cares about women as much as women do, then fine, appoint a man," said Susan Ford Bales, a Republican who favors abortion rights and who succeeded her mother as chairman of the Betty Ford Center drug rehabilitation clinic.

But Bales, whose father, President Gerald R. Ford, appointed John Paul Stevens to the high court, added: "I just don't think a man can adequately represent women's fundamental right to equality in areas such as equal pay and health."

Smeal, now president of the Arlington-based advocacy group Feminist Majority, found herself at a NOW convention in Tennessee the day O'Connor announced her retirement. NOW's leadership put out a passionate demand that the next nominee "protect the civil liberties of all people" and pledged to fight anyone who "would turn back the clock on our civil, economic and reproductive rights" but stayed silent on the question of gender.

Not Smeal. She conducted a news conference with some other old-guard feminists, demanding O'Connor's successor be a woman. "We can't go back to the time of tokenism, one woman out of nine," she said. "Symbolism is very important. We're telling the world we have to eliminate the bias against women. There's no better way to do that than to practice what you preach."

DOJ_NMG_0000935

5th Circuit Has Likely Candidates (NOTP)

By Mark Schleifstein

New Orleans Times-Picayune, July 3, 2005

The list of potential replacements for retiring U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first female member of the high court, includes three judges on the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans -- two of them women.

Judges Edith Brown Clement, Edith Jones and Emilio Garza all have been cited as the type of conservative jurists President Bush would like to add to the bench. They also are likely to face opposition from many Democrats in the Senate, which confirms candidates.

Indeed, the fight over any Bush candidate is expected to be greater than usual because of O'Connor's status as a moderately conservative swing vote, said John Baker, a constitutional law professor at the Louisiana State University Law Center.

Among the likely 5th Circuit candidates, Jones would draw the greatest opposition, Baker said, because of signals she has given over the years that she would be an "originalist," closely following the Constitution's original meaning instead of expanding its interpretation in light of modern events.

Both Jones and Garza also have indicated they believe abortion is not justified under the Constitution, he said.

But New Orleans defense lawyer Bruce Waltzer said Clement may actually be more conservative than either of the other two.

"On civil rights and civil liberties issues, she would be to the right of the majority of the Supreme Court today," he said.

Baker said, however, that predicting what an appellate court judge will do when elevated to the Supreme Court is difficult. The job of district and appeals court judges is to interpret the law in the context of Supreme Court decisions, he said, a point that Garza has even cited in opinions in which he has criticized the high court's philosophy.

Edith Brown Clement

With the anticipated retirement of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, White House staffers already have interviewed Clement, 57, as part of their search for Supreme Court candidates, according to columnist Robert Novak.

Her confirmation process in 2001, when Bush elevated her from her U.S. District Court judgeship in New Orleans to the 5th Circuit, was uneventful. The vote for her was unanimous.

She was appointed a district judge in 1991 by the first President Bush.

Observers have said it's difficult to determine much about Clement's constitutional leanings based on the few decisions she's written while on the appeals court.

She did join a stinging dissent saying her fellow judges over-reached in applying the Endangered Species Act to protect insects found in a cave, in a case that blocked development of a Texas shopping mall. The Supreme Court recently declined an appeal of that decision.

A native of Birmingham, Clement received a bachelor of arts degree from the University of Alabama in 1969 and a law degree from the Tulane Law School in 1972. She clerked for U.S. District Judge Herbert Christenberry from 1973 to 1975 and was in private practice in New Orleans from 1975 until she was appointed to the bench.

Emilio Garza

Garza, a former captain in the Marine Corps, has been mentioned as a prominent Bush choice to be the Supreme Court's first Hispanic justice since Benjamin Cardozo was appointed in the 1930s, which could bolster the Republican Party's appeal to Hispanic voters in the 2006 midterm elections.

Garza followed existing Supreme Court precedents when he voted in 1992 to strike down a Louisiana law criminalizing abortion. But in a concurring opinion, Garza said that because the decision to regulate abortion is a political one, "I would allow the people of the state of Louisiana to decide this issue for themselves." He also wrote an opinion this year that found Congress' constitutional authority to regulate interstate commerce allowed it to limit access of protesters to abortion clinic entrances.

Garza, 58, was elevated from a federal district court bench in San Antonio, Texas, to the 5th Circuit by the elder Bush in 1991. He had been appointed to the district bench in 1988 by President Reagan, and had earlier served as a state district court judge in San Antonio. He had a private practice in San Antonio from 1976 to 1983.

DOJ_NMG_0000936

Garza graduated from the University of Texas School of Law in 1976, and received bachelor's and master's degrees from Notre Dame in 1969 and 1970.

Edith Jones

Jones, 56, first surfaced as a candidate for the high court in 1990, when she was on a short list considered by the elder Bush when he named David Souter to a seat opened by the death of Justice William Brennan.

She once served as the general counsel of the Texas Republican Party and was an attorney for 11 years in Houston, where she specialized in oil and real estate bankruptcy cases, before being elevated directly to the 5th Circuit by Reagan in 1985.

Jones has written several circuit opinions that have been reversed by the Supreme Court, including one earlier this year involving a death penalty case. She also was the author of the dissent Clement joined in the Endangered Species Act case.

A native of Philadelphia, she received a bachelor of arts degree from Cornell University in 1971 and graduated from the University of Texas School of Law in 1974.

THE CONTENDERS

Some other possible candidates for the upcoming vacancy on the Supreme Court:

SAMUEL A. ALITO: 55, has been a strong conservative voice in his 15 years on the Philadelphia-based 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which is considered to be among the most liberal.

ALBERTO GONZALES: 48, U.S. attorney general and former White House counsel. Critics argue that a memo he wrote on the treatment of terrorism detainees helped lead to abuses of the type seen at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

J. MICHAEL LUTTIG: 51, worked in the Justice Department during the first Bush administration and has served on the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. He was a law clerk to Chief Justice Warren Burger from 1983 to 1984.

MICHAEL McCONNELL: 50, a judge on the Denver-based 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, enjoys bipartisan support in the academic community. Based on his reading of the law, he opposed President Clinton's impeachment and the Supreme Court's 2000 ruling in Bush v. Gore that made George Bush president.

JOHN G. ROBERTS: 50, has been on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit since June 2003. A former clerk to Chief Justice William Rehnquist, Roberts was associate counsel to President Reagan from 1982 to 1986 and then served in the first Bush administration, arguing cases before the Supreme Court from 1989 to 1993.

J. HARVIE WILKINSON III: 60, also on the 4th Circuit appeals bench, has been consistently conservative in his rulings since being put on the court by Reagan in 1984. Wilkinson wrote the majority 4th Circuit opinion in 1996 upholding the "don't ask, don't tell" policy that barred gay men and lesbians serving in the military from revealing their sexual orientation.

Court's Internal Dynamics - A Factor In Decisions - May Change (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

KRT – Internal SCOTUS, July 3, 2005

With Sandra Day O'Connor poised to leave the Supreme Court soon, the talk among interest groups and politicians is about what change will be wrought What will happen with abortion? Affirmative action? Church and state separation?

Finding the answer is more complicated than simply subtracting O'Connor's vote in such cases, and adding another, presumably more conservative one. The court's internal dynamics - the way the justices work together, react to one another and shift over time - also play a pivotal role in how cases are decided. And the injection of a new personality into that dynamic could have unpredictable - and, for the White House, undesirable - effects.

Some court watchers say the arrival of another hard-line conservative to the bench, someone in the mold of Justices Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas, could embolden moderate conservative Anthony Kennedy.

"If you replace O'Connor with a justice like Scalia, there's no doubt it would change the dynamic inside the court," said Ed Lazarus, a court expert who clerked for former Justice Harry Blackmun. "O'Connor and Kennedy have held down the center of the court together. Now he'll be there by himself. A polarizing justice could add pressure to Kennedy to assert the middle."

Court historian David Garrow put it this way: "Replacing a moderate with a conservative automatically magnifies the center," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0000937

The current crop of nine justices, including O'Connor, held together for 11 years without a retirement or death - a record in the modern court era. And by all accounts, both inside the court and out, the justices are among the most collegial group in the court's history.

Under the even hand of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, they have largely avoided the acrimony that dominated courts that confronted issues such as Roosevelt's New Deal and the beginnings of the civil rights movement.

There is disagreement - sometimes bitter - over a number of issues, but the proceedings are cordial, and bad feelings don't bleed over from one case to the next.

Even Scalia's biting opinions, which sometimes take aim at other justices' take on the law or their intellect, are not a cause for extended bad feelings.

"You used to have courts where justices displayed open disrespect for the chief justice," Garrow said. When Louis Brandeis was appointed as the first Jewish justice, Justice James McReynolds, a notorious anti-Semite, refused to speak to him, or sit next to him for a court portrait. McReynolds retired in 1941.

"The court this last 11 years has probably been the happiest and most collegial in over a century," Garrow said.

At least partially on the strength of that collegiality, the court has settled into somewhat familiar patterns, revolving around the twin center of O'Connor and Kennedy.

A new face at the court - and the possibility of two, if the ailing Rehnquist leaves soon - means certain change to that stability.

If O'Connor's replacement is more consistently conservative than she is, but also takes to the court's air of cooperation, his or her vote could begin to prove decisive in close cases. But a more aggressive justice, given to extreme positions and derision for the court's other members, could have the opposite effect.

That would empower Kennedy, whose shift to the court's middle has seemed dramatic over the past few terms, and has been decisive in a number of cases that have left conservatives reeling.

Unlike Scalia and Thomas, Kennedy does not adhere to strict constitutional philosophy, and balances interests to come up with his rulings in the court's cases. That approach puts him more in league with O'Connor, Souter, John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. He has a strong penchant for individual liberty, and can be a stickler for procedure in criminal cases. He has been the target of far-right ire at least partially because he got the seat that was initially reserved by President Reagan for Robert Bork, whose approach to the court would have more closely mirrored Scalia's.

In the 2003 decision overturning gay sodomy laws, it was Kennedy who penned the most expansive ruling - one that even O'Connor declined to support. He did the same in the spring ruling that struck down the juvenile death penalty, again without O'Connor's support.

Kennedy also supports limited use of racial preferences, though he voted to strike down two University of Michigan admissions policies in 2003. He has supported most state restrictions on abortion, but has resisted efforts to overturn Roe v. Wade - a key goal of some conservative groups.

On many issues, the court's conservatives would need to convince Kennedy to side with them to overturn liberal precedents, and the new justice could either ease that process, or aggravate it.

Kennedy joined the court in 1986, appointed by Reagan, and began his tenure as a reliable vote, nearly in the mold of Scalia. But as the court's truly liberal wing - composed of justices like Thurgood Marshall, William Brennan and Harry Blackmun - retired, Kennedy has shifted more to the center. Lazarus said he has adopted a role as the court's "moral conscience, from a conservative perspective," but it's a fair distance from where he started.

"O'Connor's absence could be an opportunity for change on some issues for conservatives, but if he's made more powerful by the new appointee, the impact could be much less," Lazarus said.

Garrow said if the White House is thinking strategically, it will appoint a new justice who, both philosophically and by his or her approach, might frequently entice Kennedy or one of the court's more liberal justices to the more conservative side.

"You want someone who might persuasively keep tugging on his shirt sleeve," Garrow said.

O'Connor's Replacement Is Likely To Be A Swinger (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0000938

By Orin S. Kerr

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Some court observers are predicting that the Supreme Court will be radically different without Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. I'm not so sure.

Every year, the court decides a handful of closely divided cases with important ramifications for American life. In many of these cases, the court has divided into three camps.

The first includes the four liberal justices: John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer. The second consists of the three conservatives: Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and William H. Rehnquist. The last camp covers the two moderate swing votes: O'Connor and Anthony M. Kennedy.

O'Connor's retirement removes a swing vote. But that may not have a dramatic effect on the outcomes of the court's biggest cases.

To see why, assume that O'Connor is replaced by a strong conservative, such as Judge J. Michael Luttig of the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals. The balance on the court would change, but only somewhat. Kennedy (for whom I clerked) would remain as a key swing vote.

Kennedy often votes with the more liberal justices to form a liberal majority in major cases. He has voted to uphold Roe vs. Wade, and he wrote the opinions that struck down sodomy laws and invalidated the death penalty for juveniles. All these decisions would remain intact.

This scenario assumes President Bush will nominate — and the Senate will confirm — a justice who consistently votes with the conservatives. That might not happen. Bush might nominate a moderate, or the Senate might not be able to confirm a conservative. In that case, O'Connor's replacement may end up voting in a way similar to O'Connor. Again, little would change.

The possible retirement of Rehnquist raises another important variable. The chief justice has been treated for thyroid cancer, and many expect him to announce his retirement soon.

Rehnquist's departure would drop the number of conservatives on the court from three to two. Bush would nominate two instead of one, but the new justices, taken together, may end up mirroring the would-be combined votes of Rehnquist and O'Connor.

Finally, the legal principle of stare decisis will limit the changes. By institutional tradition, the Supreme Court overturns prior decisions only rarely. The justices routinely decline to overrule old cases even if they would have reached a different result the first time.

In other words, once a case is decided, it tends to stick around. This practice helps explain why most of the major decisions of the liberal Warren Court from the 1960s remain on the books today. It also suggests that most of the decisions shaped by O'Connor will remain the law in the future.

Court's Liberal Bloc Stands Firm (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

WASHINGTON — The Rehnquist court did not come to an end last week as predicted, despite the illness of the chief justice.

But the conservative Supreme Court led by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist did fade away, a development as surprising as the retirement announced Friday by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

In its place at the end of the term stood a moderate-to-liberal court led by John Paul Stevens, the 85-year-old justice who sports bow ties and whose energy and influence seem to have grown with age.

By forming alliances with O'Connor or Justice Anthony M. Kennedy — and sometimes even with Justice Antonin Scalia — Stevens has been able to forge a majority in some of the biggest Supreme Court cases.

The loss of O'Connor's vote might mean Stevens' sway over the court has reached its high-water mark. But with Kennedy and four liberals still in place, the Stevens bloc isn't likely to dissolve overnight.

DOJ_NMG_0000939

He led a court this term that was determined to preserve the separation of church and state, increasingly willing to limit the death penalty, committed to removing racial bias from courtrooms and inclined to give cities broad power to regulate property.

In March, the justices struck down state executions of juvenile murderers as "cruel and unusual punishment," with Kennedy casting the key vote for a 5-4 majority; O'Connor was in dissent.

This followed a ruling in January that struck down the federal sentencing rules on the grounds that they gave judges too much power to add years to a defendant's prison term. In that 5-4 decision, Stevens formed an odd coalition that included Scalia and Justice Clarence Thomas. Again, O'Connor dissented.

On the final day of the term, a 5-4 ruling limited government-sponsored displays of the Ten Commandments. O'Connor joined Stevens in an opinion that said government officials could not promote or endorse religion.

Rehnquist was in dissent in all of these decisions.

This is not an entirely new trend. Indeed, this marks the third year in a row in which the liberal bloc has prevailed in the court's biggest cases.

In 2003, a liberal majority, led by Stevens and O'Connor, upheld affirmative action in colleges and universities, and held that gay couples deserved respect in their private lives, not criminal prosecution. That 6-3 ruling, in a Texas case, struck down the last of the laws that made sex between gays a crime. In the mid-1980s, Stevens had argued in a similar case for striking down such laws, but he had done so in dissent.

Last year, Stevens spoke for a narrow majority that rejected the Bush administration's contention that the president alone had the power to capture and hold "enemy combatants" — both foreign and domestic — for as long as he chose. The Constitution gives all individuals held by the government a right to go to court and to challenge the basis for holding them, Stevens said.

This term saw nearly a clean sweep for the liberal faction of the court.

The decision ending executions for young murderers followed in line with a Stevens opinion three years ago that ended state executions of mentally retarded criminals.

This year, the court also overturned two convictions of black men — one in Texas and one in California — because of racial bias in the makeup of the jury.

In what turned out to be one of the most controversial rulings, the court upheld the power of city officials to condemn private property, including homes, to make way for business development.

Stevens stressed that state legislatures may limit this power of "eminent domain," but federal judges should not take on the task, he said.

"This is the term where Justice Stevens became ascendant," Washington lawyer Mark I. Levy said. "It's been a dreadful term for the conservatives. I can't think of a single big case where the conservative side won."

Pepperdine law professor Douglas W. Kmiec, a former Reagan administration lawyer, said it was a "deeply troubling" term.

He pointed to "conservative losses on federalism and on property rights" as well as the "muddle" on religion and the Ten Commandments.

In all these areas, the high court this year rejected earlier opinions by Rehnquist that once held sway with the majority, Kmiec said.

For much of Rehnquist's tenure as chief justice, which began in 1986, the high court followed his lead. It gave more leeway to police and prosecutors. It rejected challenges to the death penalty. It restored support for state's rights and for property rights.

It also moved away from a strict church-state separation. Rehnquist once derided Thomas Jefferson's "wall of separation between church and state" as a "misguided metaphor … based on a bad history." Rehnquist said that from the days of George Washington, American officials had "acknowledged God" through solemn oaths, invocations and religious displays. He said he saw no problem with a "passive monument" of the Ten Commandments on public property.

The Bill of Rights, the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, commands that there can be "no laws respecting an establishment of religion." The Ten Commandments begin with the words, "I am the Lord thy God. Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Stevens said that if officials erected a monument of the Commandments at a government building, its message "is quite plain: This state endorses the divine code of the 'Judeo-Christian' God."

DOJ_NMG_0000940

In the court's private conferences, Rehnquist and Stevens have special roles. The chief justice sits at one of end of the table and speaks first. He describes the issues in a pending case and says how he would resolve them.

Stevens, a 1975 appointee of President Ford, is the senior associate justice. He sits at the other end of the table and speaks next. Since the two often take opposite sides in major cases, the outcome turns on whether the other justices vote with Rehnquist or Stevens.

Once the votes are tallied, the chief justice, if he is in the majority, decides who writes the opinion. If not, Stevens decides who writes the opinion.

In the juvenile death penalty case, Roper vs. Simmons, Stevens had a 5-4 majority and assigned the opinion to Justice Kennedy. In his opinion, Kennedy noted that around the world, other nations had abolished capital punishment for crimes committed by people younger than 18.

"The stark reality is the United States is the only country in the world that continues to give official sanction to the juvenile death penalty," Kennedy wrote.

That comment drew a sharp rebuke from Scalia. "I do not believe that the meaning of our [Constitution] should be determined by the subjective views of five members of this Court and like-minded foreigners." Rehnquist agreed with Scalia.

Facing a clash between federal and state power, Stevens spoke for a 6-3 majority in ruling that the federal drug laws trumped California's law allowing the use of medical marijuana.

Kennedy and Scalia joined him, but Rehnquist and O'Connor dissented in Gonzales vs. Raich.

In a test of the Title IX law that bolstered sports for women, Stevens assigned O'Connor to write a 5-4 ruling that held that coaches and teachers could not be punished for complaining about unequal treatment for girls' and women's teams. Rehnquist joined the dissenters in Jackson vs. Birmingham.

In the pair of cases on the Ten Commandments, the majority was split. In a Kentucky case, McCreary County vs. ACLU, Stevens had a 5-4 majority to rule that it was unconstitutional for officials to endorse religion by posting the Commandments in the county courthouse. Justice David H. Souter wrote the opinion, and Justices O'Connor, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer signed on.

In the Commandments case from Texas, the chief justice had a 5-4 majority, and he wrote an opinion that upheld the granite monument that had sat for 44 years on the grounds of the state capitol in Austin. Breyer agreed with the outcome, but he did not agree with Rehnquist's view, leaving the chief justice without a true majority opinion in Van Orden vs. Perry.

Pepperdine's Kmiec says Rehnquist's illness had an effect this year. In October, the chief justice announced he had thyroid cancer, and he underwent surgery to have a hole opened in his windpipe. In January, he returned to the court on a part-time basis. And though he continued to preside over the court's conferences, he spoke haltingly and with evident difficulty.

"His absence from the center chair [during many of the public arguments] could have shaped the dynamic in those close cases," Kmiec said.

Rehnquist and Stevens were not always divided. The justices were unanimous in a series of important business rulings. They held that Internet companies could be held liable for stealing copyrighted materials if they actively aided computer users in downloading free music or movies.

And they ruled that scientists could use patented drugs in research on new drugs. And they limited the reach of an obstruction of justice law in overturning the criminal conviction against the defunct accounting firm of Arthur Andersen.

As the court's only octogenarians, the two also share some old memories. It brought them together in a dissent from the ruling that was welcomed in California and in much of the nation. It was the 5-4 decision that struck down the state laws that banned the direct shipment of wine to consumers.

Stevens grew up during the 1920s in Chicago, where his father owned the city's largest hotel. It was dry during the era of Al Capone and the gangster wars over booze. Rehnquist, born in 1924, grew up in Milwaukee.

The national experiment in the prohibition of alcohol ended in 1933 with the adoption of the 21st Amendment. But the amendment said the "importation into any state … of intoxicating liquors, in violation of [their] laws, is hereby prohibited."

DOJ_NMG_0000941

"Today many Americans, particularly those members of younger generations who make policy decisions, regard alcohol as an ordinary article of commerce," Stevens said in a lecture to his younger colleagues, such as 68-year-old Kennedy and 69-year-old Scalia.

He recalled in his written opinion the "moral condemnation … of 'demon rum' in the 1920s and 1930s…. My understanding [and recollection] of the historical context reinforces my conviction" that the ban on cross-state sales of alcohol should be upheld as written.

Rehnquist agreed. So did O'Connor. The words of the 21st Amendment could not be clearer, agreed 57-year-old Thomas, showing again that neither ideology nor age was a sure predictor for a justice of the Supreme Court.

More Politicians For The Court (WP)

By Norman Ornstein

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

The resignation of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor means more than the loss of the most visible centrist on the Supreme Court. It also means the loss of the only justice who has been an elected politician. Before coming to the court in 1981, O'Connor had served in the Arizona Senate for five years, including time as majority leader.

Is that sort of experience important? Last year, at a remarkable seminar at Yale Law School, a group of former Supreme Court law clerks who served a half-century ago discussed the behind-the-scenes story of the 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education. That decision actually took two years to reach. It was unanimous in the end, spanning the full range of ideology on the court from William O. Douglas on the left to Felix Frankfurter on the right. It could easily have been 5 to 4, given the issues at stake, the intensity of views and the breathtaking change the decision represented.

Frankly, if the current court had been serving back then, the decision probably would have been 5 to 4, like so many other highly charged and controversial decisions of recent years. What is the difference? The Warren Court in 1954 had five members who had been politicians -- three former U.S. senators (one of whom had also been a mayor of Cleveland), one state legislator and a former governor, Chief Justice Earl Warren.

The former clerks talked about the way in which Warren, Justices Hugo Black, Sherman Minton, Frankfurter and others worked patiently to build consensus, not just a narrow majority. When it wasn't forthcoming the first time the case was up, they put it off to the next year. Liberals and conservatives alike understood how important it was for society, and for the credibility of the court, to find that consensus and put forward a united front. The fact that several of them had been schooled in an environment of coalition-building -- the legislative process -- was a key to that sensitivity and to the final result.

The Warren court of the 1950s was quite typical of American history up to that point, in that justices often came from political backgrounds. Only one of the nine justices in 1954, Minton, had served on a U.S. court of appeals, and he had been a senator before that. Contrast that with the current Supreme Court -- on which seven of the nine justices have served on a federal court of appeals and one other had service on a state court of appeals. The only current member without a background as a judge, interestingly, is Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

Why the change? Over the past 50 years, the federal courts have increasingly made public policy, from settling details on airborne emissions to intervening in disputes between telephone and cable companies to setting guidelines on abortion and sodomy. The increased policy role has come about in part because Congress has passed the buck on controversial decisions to the courts, and in part because judges, left and right, have been willing and eager to step in to fill vacuums. As our politics have become more ideological and more partisan, lifetime court appointments have thus become more important and valuable.

Choosing judges, especially at the Supreme Court level, has taken on a heightened importance -- and presidents and their partisans want to make sure they know what they are getting. A track record at the federal appeals court level is a much safer predictor of behavior at the next level up than service in the U.S. Senate, or as a governor or in other political office.

But having a court that consists largely or only of nonpoliticians has serious costs for the public. Not only are judges less inclined to think broadly of the country and its social and political divide, they are more likely to look at decisions with tunnel vision, not thinking through the problems of maintaining the court's standing with the public and of implementing difficult and divisive decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0000942

Moreover, since much of what the court does is to sort out legislative intent, those without political experience have no real sense of how a legislature works and no direct idea of what legislative intent really means in the crucible of the legislative process. Politicians who have run for office and been in campaigns also know how politics works; the ignorance of basic politics shows up in the court's decisions on political issues such as redistricting.

With O'Connor gone, the Supreme Court will have no politicians and only one member, Stephen Breyer, who has worked in a legislature, as a staffer. Most of the names the White House has floated as possible Supreme Court nominees are, predictably, judges on federal appeals courts. It is time to expand the field to seriously consider people with political backgrounds. Former senators John Danforth and Warren Rudman would be superb choices. At least two current senators, John Cornyn of Texas and Jon Kyl of Arizona, fit the ideological criteria of the White House. Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, has mentioned other capable Republican senators, including Mike DeWine of Ohio and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. There are many others, including present and former governors, senators and House members, who could also fit the bill. The court, and the country, would be well served to have a politician or two on the bench.

Left And Right, Groups Gear Up (CHT)

By Frank James and Mike Dorning

CHT – Senate Battle, July 3, 2005

At People for the American Way headquarters Friday, Ralph Neas, the liberal advocacy group's president, briefly stopped in the "war room" to rally staffers and volunteers who were contacting activists shortly after Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement.

"What's at stake is everything we care about," he told two dozen mostly young adults working phones and computers and filling envelopes. "We have to get the message out. If a right-winger replaces Sandra Day O'Connor, that right-winger can turn back the clock seven decades." Neas was between interviews and heading to a Capitol Hill news conference.

On the conservative side, the war room was more virtual than real. "Who needs a war room?" said Sean Rushton, executive director of The Committee for Justice. "We can all sit at our desks and e-mail."

Rushton spent the hours after the announcement in the office that his organization rents from a high-powered Republican lobbying firm, juggling conference calls among conservative activists and tapping away at his keyboard on press statements, talking points and a slew of e-mail.

"The message is, be magnanimous about Sandra Day O'Connor and speak about her as a conservative judge," he said.

A heated fight between interest groups on the political left and right over whom President Bush should name to fill a Supreme Court vacancy intensified sharply Friday, as both sides viewed O'Connor's retirement as a chance for Bush to significantly shift the nation's highest court to the right.

The announcement by O'Connor took virtually all the groups by surprise.

Raised stakes for all

For groups on both sides, O'Connor's retirement caused what already were high stakes to multiply because of her role as the court's main swing vote in 5-4 decisions. What had promised to be a major battle as Washington insiders speculated that ailing Chief Justice William Rehnquist might retire loomed as an even bigger fight with news that O'Connor is leaving the court.

Liberal and conservative efforts Friday were driven by fear on one side, hope on the other. Liberals feared decisions favorable to them on affirmative action, abortion rights, the environment and a host of other hot-button issues could be reversed in new rulings. Conservatives hoped a new justice would deliver just such reversals.

Neas and other leaders of the liberal coalition said they hoped the president would consult with Republican and Democratic senators about O'Connor's replacement and pick a consensus candidate. They said that is even more important now because the retirement was of a swing justice, as opposed to Rehnquist. A strong conservative replacement for the reliably conservative Rehnquist might be seen as retaining the philosophical mix among the nine justices.

Liberal advocates put the White House and Senate on notice that if the president wanted a contentious confirmation battle, he would get one.

DOJ_NMG_0000943

"If he chooses the more divisive route and names a candidate who is extreme, he will ignite a firestorm," promised Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice.

O'Connor's announcement set in motion activities both sides had planned for months, with thousands of phone calls and hundreds of thousands of e-mails going out to activists who in turn were being asked to reach out to others to lobby their senators. Web sites were updated with the O'Connor news and suggested actions.

For conservatives, the goal was to get supporters to tell senators they wanted O'Connor, whom they called a true conservative, to be replaced by another. Liberals asked supporters to flood senators' offices with the message that they want a nominee who would draw broad bipartisan support.

O'Connor's announcement seemed to especially stun liberals because they viewed her as the key vote for their issues.

A `state of emergency'

"We are declaring a state of emergency at this point, not only for Roe vs. Wade," said Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women. That 1973 decision determined that women had a constitutional right to abortion, a position that O'Connor upheld in various cases during her 24-year tenure on the court.

As much as many liberals were shocked, conservatives, especially Christian conservatives, had a sense of the possibilities created by the vacancy.

"Today marks a watershed moment in American history: the resignation of a swing-vote justice on the Supreme Court and the opportunity to change the court's direction," said James Dobson, founder and head of the Focus on the Family organization and host of a radio show by the same name.

Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a conservative Christian activist group, said the organization had sent an e-mail alert to members but would wait until Bush nominates a successor before asking them to take action.

"We're all ready to go once there's a nominee," Perkins said.

Fears Of Battle Over High Court (BSUN)

By John Woestendiek And Robert Little

The Baltimore Sun, July 3, 2005

It's going to be a bruiser.

If you thought election 2004 and Terri Schiavo's last days were nasty confrontations in the so-called culture wars, just wait for the fight over who will fill Sandra Day O'Connor's U.S. Supreme Court seat.

Ruptures over gay marriage, flag burning or displaying the Ten Commandments will feel like mere tremors compared with the cultural quake sure to erupt when the nation's differences become the weapons with which the Supreme Court's future is determined, political analysts say. Expect the "red" and the "blue" to go at it fiercely enough to leave the nation purple, or at least with some long-lingering bitter feelings.

"It's likely to be the political equivalent of the war of the worlds," said Marshall Wittman - once legislative director for the Christian Coalition, now a senior fellow at the Progressive Policy Institute. "Unless the president completely surprises everyone and picks a moderate, he will likely trigger an end-of-all-times cultural battle over this nomination."

The White House said Bush won't announce a nominee until at least July 8, after he returns from a trip to Europe, but the fight over that nominee is looking to be bloody.

Soon after word of O'Connor's retirement surfaced, Planned Parenthood announced a series of rallies and sent a message to supporters saying, "We cannot remain idle in the face of such a threat."

David Corn, Washington editor of the left-leaning periodical The Nation, quickly posted a column saying, "It should be ugly."

"There will be much at stake. But ugly is ugly," he wrote, adding, "A titanic fight over a Supreme Court nomination can really ruin a summer in Washington."

"The supply lines are being formed," Wittman said Friday, hours after O'Connor, the first woman on the Supreme Court and a swing vote on abortion, announced her retirement.

"Everyone is canceling their weekend vacations to hunker down. People are being deluged with political spam. Everyone's sharpening their sound bites. It's lock-and-load time in Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0000944

Those who believe in the concept of culture wars - the idea that the nation is increasingly divided into increasingly entrenched camps that are increasingly at odds over whether the government should legislate moral values - agree that this could be the mother of all of them.

Even before the 2004 election, which seemed to turn on the relatively new political theme of "moral values," the country's fractured conscience had grown apparent.

Disagreements over the balance of church and state have played out in debates over creationism in public schools or display of the Ten Commandments on public property, for instance. A rift over the definition of life and death, kept open by issues related to abortion, has been widened by debates in Congress and elsewhere about things like embryonic stem cell research and Schiavo's right to live or die.

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have provided more fuel, not only by spawning political opposition, but also by sparking disagreements over such matters as the treatment and rights of political prisoners, or whether individual rights should be sacrificed in the name of security.

Some see these culture wars as a concoction of the news media, think tank talking heads and TV producers who like everything to be, if not black and white, at least red and blue.

But even the cynics agree that O'Connor's resignation creates a prism through which the disagreements are likely to be concentrated, amplified and perhaps distorted, leading to the political skirmish of the fledgling century. No matter whom Bush nominates, Democrats are likely to put up a fight and, based on the high stakes and their losing record of late, it's likely to be an all-out one.

Some say another big, prolonged, values-laden battle in Washington will do little more than increase alienation and apathy among the masses, and even widen the rift between the right and left - that, when it comes to the national fabric, we might want to consider switching to Kevlar.

'A firestorm'

"The Democrats will see no downside to attacking this nominee mercilessly," said Richard Shenkman, editor of George Mason University's History News Network. "I don't see any way around it, really. It will be a firestorm."

The president could, of course, defuse the fireworks by appointing a moderate nominee, though few consider that likely. With his poll numbers down and his conservative core in need of a good soothing, he is more apt to rally supporters with a candidate of their ilk. And besides, the conservatives have been burned by the so-called moderates in the past.

While seven of the court's nine justices were appointed by Republicans, three of them - O'Connor, Anthony M. Kennedy and David H. Souter - have hardly been the conservative stalwarts that the party faithful might have expected. In perhaps the most telling example of the conservatives' laments, those three justices teamed up in 1992 to write the court's Planned Parenthood v. Casey decision, which reaffirmed abortion rights and dashed the hopes of the right wing.

"The conservatives have this history now of what they consider to be 20 years of betrayal," said Shenkman, an associate professor of history at George Mason. "They're demanding a true conservative, which will just fan the flames of the cultural war in this country.

"We're living through one of those periods in American history where there is great conflict, where society is not very settled. And I can't imagine things being any more settled after this."

Many expect Bush to choose a nominee who opposes legalized abortion to appease the conservative base of the party and to make up for his father's appointment in 1990 of Souter, whose votes have been more moderate than many expected.

"Consequently, it's payback time for the religious right," Wittman said.

"Ultimately, this fight will be about abortion," he said. "The No. 1 item on the agenda of social conservatives is to overturn Roe v. Wade."

Widening rift seen

Wittman believes the fallout from the battle will serve to widen the rift between those who vote based on their conservative moral values and those who think those values don't belong in the political arena.

"I think we will see the accelerated polarization of American politics, and quite possibly the further alienation of the American people from Washington," said Wittman, who was a Republican for 20 years.

DOJ_NMG_0000945

"Most Americans' concerns are about health care, gas prices, and all those will be going to the wayside while Washington engages in the cultural war. Many other important issues will be ignored because of the primary focus on abortion."

That, he says, was the case with the debate over whether Terri Schiavo's feeding tube should be disconnected - the latest flare-up of the culture wars. For more than a year, conservative Christian and anti-abortion groups lined up against civil liberties attorneys, with elected officials entering the fray as reinforcements.

James Davison Hunter, a professor of sociology and religious studies at the University of Virginia and author of Culture Wars: The Struggle to Define America, said the Schiavo case, like the election, served as a trigger.

"My position is that cultural conflict is deeply rooted in American society and has been for quite a while, though it typically remains below the surface of political life until certain events, different events, act like a trigger to bring them to the surface.

"Once they're on the surface, they become politicized. Special interest groups, political parties and activists of all sorts become involved and stake out a position. Where the majority of Americans would want a compromise - some kind of middling position - the special interest groups tend to polarize the issue into stark options, and those extremes tend to frame the public debate."

Bush 'inclusive'

Some think Bush, who is expected to have at least one more Supreme Court seat to fill before his term expires, might choose a less contentious candidate this time - someone who doesn't drive the nation's political extremes to blows.

"My guess is that Bush will nominate someone who is acceptable to his base but who will not be the hard-core ideologue that a lot of them would have liked," said Corwin Smidt, executive director of the Henry Institute for the Study of Christianity and Politics at Calvin College in Grand Rapids, Mich.

"In this climate you won't be able to escape the debates about things like abortion rights or the Ten Commandments," Smidt said. "But despite all the talk about Bush being this polarizing figure, I think there's a lot of evidence in his record to suggest that he's very inclusive, particularly with regards to religion."

Nevertheless, most suspect a battle is in the offing.

"Ordinary people, the average American, spends most of life far away from the battle lines and considers most of these issues irrelevant to their daily lives, but when these triggering events happen, people end up making decisions within the categories that have been given," said the University of Virginia's Hunter.

"We saw that in the last election. Americans divided very evenly but very contentiously. We saw it on a smaller scale with Schiavo. Even though her circumstances were fairly remote from the average American's everyday experience, when senators and presidents become involved, when it becomes politicized and stays in the newscast and on the front pages of newspapers for as long as that did, eventually people take sides."

"As contentious as this is likely to be, it won't divide the nation in ways that will be enduring and really threatening to political institutions," Hunter said. "What it will more likely do is create a disaffection of the average voter. ... People get tired and weary of it."

Word From O'Connor Sets Off Pre-Fourth Fireworks (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

As reporters filed into the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) yesterday afternoon for a briefing on the process to replace Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Frist aide Bob Stevenson called out cheerfully: "This is a great introduction to the Fourth of July weekend. Anybody have to cancel plans?"

Well, yes and no.

O'Connor's announcement caught just about everybody by surprise -- even the White House, which rushed to schedule a Rose Garden appearance for President Bush before his meeting with Kuwait's prime minister. Most people had expected the ailing chief justice, William H. Rehnquist, to be the one making the announcement, and even that seemed doubtful as the days passed. Reporters and staff on the Hill arrived for work in blue jeans, hoping to slip away early for the holiday.

DOJ_NMG_0000946

But in a sense, Washington could not have been better prepared for O'Connor's announcement. Liberals and conservatives alike have been drilling for months in preparation for the vacancy, and they responded with an impressive blend of logistical precision and ideological excess. Eighteen minutes after O'Connor's retirement became public, Frist was on the Senate floor reading a 1,600-word statement. Forty-nine minutes later, the first television ads were announced. Eighteen minutes after that, Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) became the first senator to disparage the Reagan-appointed O'Connor, for "self-indulgent judicial activism."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) caught a flight back to Washington to give a news conference. Within hours, hundreds of organizations and lawmakers had issued statements and news releases -- the liberal People for the American Way issued four -- with the choicest political hyperbole: "Devastating," "historic," "ominous," "critical," "freedoms hang in the balance," "reinventing monarchy," "state of emergency," "save the court."

And Bush hasn't even nominated a successor.

With exceptions such as Coburn, the politicians left most of the hysteria to interest groups and resorted to euphemistic talk. Bush said he would "consult" with the Senate on a nominee. Democrats pretended that they did not have a "litmus test" for prospective justices. Republicans pretended that their only desire for a successor was that the justice would "interpret the law" and wouldn't "make public policy."

But beneath the official posturing was a simple truth: O'Connor is the tiebreaking vote on a range of hot-button social issues, and the battle to replace her will be in many ways a referendum on legal abortion. So it's no surprise that, starting at mid-morning, the O'Connor succession fight became the only game in town.

10:21. The first Associated Press bulletin crosses the wire: "O'Connor, high court's first woman, retires."

10:30. The conservative Becket Fund for Religious Liberty announces that its lawyers are standing by "to discuss the legacy of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and the impact her leaving the court will have on religious liberties." Three hours later, a PR firm issues astatement from the group saying "thank God she's retiring."

10:31. People for the American Way, in its first release, calls for "a consensus nominee," not an "aggressively activist ideologue."

10:33. The White House -- which evidently knew nothing of O'Connor's intentions when Bush's press secretary briefed reporters at 8:30 a.m. -- announces that Bush will speak at 11:15.

10:34. Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) rushes out a preemptive attack on the opposition. "While some Democrats will attack anyone the president nominates, I hope others will give the nominee serious and fair consideration," he says.

10:39. Frist, on the Senate floor, makes no mention of abortion but uses the conservative refrain that a justice's role is "to interpret the law and not to make public policy."

10:40. Planned Parenthood issues a press release: "Departure of Justice O'Connor Creates Ominous Vacancy. . . . Reproductive Rights Hanging in the Balance."

11:01. Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid, stuck at home in Nevada, issues his statement: "Justice O'Connor has been a voice of reason and moderation. It is vital that she be replaced by someone like her."

11:07. The liberal Alliance for Justice steals Planned Parenthood's 27-minute-old line. "Individual rights and freedoms hang in the balance," the group says. Not to be outdone, the ACLU warns at 11:11 that "we are gravely concerned that President Bush will use this opportunity to nominate someone whose judicial philosophy is hostile to civil liberties."

11:16. Sweat-soaked journalists wait in the sweltering Rose Garden as television correspondents struggle for words to describe the drama to their viewers. Bush emerges, grinning, saying he will "be deliberate and thorough" but also "timely." He praises O'Connor without praising her judicial opinions. And he warns filibuster-minded Senate Democrats that he wants a "fair vote."

11:21. GOP Chairman Ken Mehlman bemoans "the inevitable protest from far-left special interest groups." Democratic Chairman Howard Dean answers 57 minutes later by saying a cordial process "will be up to President Bush."

12:41. Frist's office serves notice that Supreme Court vacancies over the past 30 years have been filled in 72 days on average. Experts assembled by Frist's staff tell journalists that Bush is under no obligation to consult with Democrats and that it is "inappropriate" for Democrats to ask a nominee about specific issues, such as abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0000947

12:49. The conservative Committee for Justice vows guilt by association. "We will be watching Senate Democrats and intend to link moderate and red states senators to their liberal Senate colleagues and outside groups," it announces.

1:42. The liberal Coalition for a Fair and Independent Judiciary weighs in, saying Bush should pursue a "consensus nominee" such as O'Connor, who was confirmed 99 to 0. Twenty minutes later, the conservative Family Research Council holds a news conference to call O'Connor's view on abortion "shocking" and to demand a successor in the mold of Rehnquist or Antonin Scalia. "We have been waiting over a decade," the group's chief, Tony Perkins, says. "We will seize this opportunity."

But he had better pace himself.

Interest Groups Gear Up On Court (PPG)

By Maeve Reston

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 3, 2005

Within minutes of Friday's announcement of the impending retirement of Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, interest groups on the right and left were fully engaged in long-drawn-up battle plans that promise to make this fight fiercer than any previous nomination.

As President Bush is expected to make an announcement regarding his choice to succeed O'Connor perhaps as soon as the end of this week, though possibly longer, groups were already firing off scores of e-mails that encouraged supporters to flood the White House with phone calls recommending the kind of nominee he should pick.

Organizations and coalitions on each side -- already immersed in plans and regular conference calls for several years, in some cases -- have scheduled news conferences and rallies across the nation throughout this week. The liberal group People For the American Way announced yesterday that it would begin running ads this week urging Bush to choose a nominee that could be approved with a broad bipartisan consensus.

One anti-abortion rights group, Generation Life, plans to hold vigils in front of the Supreme Court building before the confirmation hearings begin.

A pro-abortion rights group, Emily's List, was using the excitement of Friday's announcement to solicit those on its e-mail list to contribute to female Senate candidates who would protect abortion rights -- and potentially use minority-party power to block an anti-abortion rights nominee.

The fact that the court vacancy is the first in the era of Internet instant communication and mobilization had led many groups to speculate that thousands more Americans will become involved in the confirmation process as it winds through the summer.

But leaders on both sides say O'Connor's role as a critical swing vote on the high court has already brought a new level of intensity to the fight.

For many on the left, the loss of O'Connor's vote on the high court was the most feared prospect -- because it could lead to a reversal on some crucial abortion-rights cases and dozens of prior 5-4 decisions, ranging from affirmative action in college admissions processes to the recent ruling barring display of the Ten Commandments at courthouses.

"It intensifies everything that we were planning to do," said Elliot Mincberg, legal director at People for the American Way.

"She's been the swing vote in so many important areas -- civil rights, affirmative action, reproductive rights, environmental cases," he said. "So, literally, rights and liberties are at stake across the board depending on who her replacement will be."

For groups on the right, the vacancy is a chance to win appointment of a justice whose views are in line with the conservative justices whom Bush has said he admires most.

"The president has the historic opportunity to keep faith with the promise he has repeated numerous times, which is to name justices who are like Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel of the conservative Concerned Women for America.

She said it was ridiculous that Democrats including Sens. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut were already calling upon Bush to replace O'Connor with a justice of similarly moderate views. "They claim that you have to maintain the balance of the court," LaRue said. "That's irrelevant. ... It's not a constitutional requirement."

DOJ_NMG_0000948

Though Senate Judiciary Committee officials say it will be at least several weeks, if not more than a month, before their panel begins holding hearings on whether to recommend confirmation of the president's choice, strategies for interest groups on both sides are already well-established -- as was evident in the first wave of e-mails they sent out.

For more than a week, the conservative Progress for America, a pro-Bush group that has pledged to spend $18 million on the fight, has been running ads intended to discredit liberals' criticism of Bush's court nominees -- stating that their adversaries are committed to 'tar and feather' any choice the president makes.

C. Boyden Gray, White House counsel for former President George H.W. Bush but now head of the Committee for Justice, a group formed to support the president's nominees, said groups on the left need to "take a breath and resist their natural impulse towards exaggeration."

"We call on Democrats to resist the temptation to use their attack machine against a qualified nominee," Gray said. "All parties should withhold judgment until a fair and sober analysis has occurred."

As did Democratic senators, these liberal activists underscored that O'Connor, after being nominated by then-President Ronald Reagan, was confirmed unanimously by the Senate in 1981 during a polarized time. They are urging that Bush, too, should choose "a consensus nominee." Kennedy on Friday already was referring to the precedent of the O'Connor selection as the "Reagan standard."

Nan Aron, head of the progressive Alliance for Justice, a longtime player in confirmation battles, said that with O'Connor's retirement, "individual rights and freedoms hang in the balance."

Bush, said Aron, "can unite the country and consult with both parties in selecting a moderate, consensus nominee -- someone like Justice O'Connor -- or he can continue down the path he has taken with lower-court nominees and name a controversial candidate who will further divide the nation."

Nominee Battle Lines Drawn (DMN)

By Allen Pusey

The Dallas Morning News, July 3, 2005

A look at the key players in the looming fight over the next Supreme Court justice:

REPUBLICANS

Committee For Justice: Committee executive director Sean Rushton's job is to provide instant background and talking points. "It is important to respond very quickly to anything the liberal groups or the Democrats put out there," he said.

He works for C. Boyden Gray, a White House counsel during the first Bush administration who spent the last three years creating a vaguely vertical structure for the hundreds of business, religious and single-issue interest groups that have a stake in getting a conservative court nominee. They have amassed an estimated $18 million to pay for advertising on behalf of a Bush nominee.

American Center for Law and Justice: Televangelist Pat Robertson founded the center, which has offices near the Supreme Court. Jay Sekulow, the organization's chief counsel, is preparing to guide his audience of 1.5 million, most of them evangelical Christians, through the confirmation process. "It's my job to speak to those people, to explain the process to them and get them involved," he said.

Federalist Society: Once little more than a law school debating club, the Federalist Society has become a significant conservative talent pool for law firms, government posts and judicial nominations. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas were Federalists, and most of the names being suggested for the next Supreme Court vacancy are, or have been, members of the society.

Leonard Leo, the group's executive vice president, will seek to convince disparate conservatives that another Federalist voice on the high court will benefit their cause, even if the nominee's record is ambiguous or incomplete.

DEMOCRATS

People For The American Way: Hollywood producer Norman Lear founded People For The American Way for the specific purpose of blocking the nomination of appeals court judge Robert Bork in 1987.

DOJ_NMG_0000949

The group's executive director, Ralph Neas, former head of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, said the confirmation will represent a "titanic struggle over radically differing interpretations of the Constitution." His group has been conducting polling and focus groups to distill the most effective arguments against a conservative candidate and setting up a war room of more than 40 work stations to mobilize his troops.

Alliance For Justice: The alliance is a coalition of women's groups who see in any court nominee the potential loss of abortion rights. Nan Aron, its president, has been working to block some of the administration's federal appellate nominees.

"We're prepared to fight and to win if he sends up an individual who's a lightning rod," Ms. Aron said.

Leadership Conference on Civil Rights: Founded in 1950, the conference is a coalition of 180 rights organizations pooling their resources to affect legislation, civil rights litigation and, in this case, federal court nominations.

Executive director Wade Henderson's job is to mobilize and educate the vast array of rights groups under the conference umbrella, including organized labor, gay and lesbian groups, human rights activists and traditional civil rights organizations.

The Right's Moment, Years In The Making (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall And Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

With the Supreme Court vacancy left by the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the conservative movement has within its grasp the prize it has sought for more than 40 years: the control of all levers of the federal government.

From the ashes of Barry Goldwater's presidential campaign, conservatives have built an enduring governing majority, with Republicans winning seven of 10 presidential contests and holding unified control of Congress for 11 years.

The judiciary has until now been alone in clinging to liberalism and the remnants of the Democratic New Deal coalition. A series of Republican appointments to the Supreme Court -- John Paul Stevens, O'Connor, Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter -- have disappointed conservatives by frequently siding with the court's liberal bloc.

That could well happen again with O'Connor's replacement, but conservatives are cautiously hopeful it will not. President Bush has indicated that he will appoint a justice in the tradition of Antonin Scalia, a conservative stalwart. And the conservative movement has something it lacked during its losing battle for the confirmation of Robert H. Bork to the court 18 years ago: a highly coordinated movement that has fused the big dollars of economic conservatives with the grass-roots clout of millions of religious conservatives.

This, conservatives say, will prevent the defeat of another nominee such as Bork and will inoculate Bush from pressure to appoint a moderate such as Kennedy or Souter. And if it works with O'Connor's replacement, conservatives say, they will have found a formula that will allow them gradually to control the judiciary and revisit the full range of precedents regarding abortion, affirmative action, church-state matters and regulations of business and the environment.

"It is a moment of conclusion after years [in which] the conservative movement has moved very far," said Manuel Miranda, a former counsel to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) who leads a coalition of groups pushing for conservative jurists. "The resources on the right are so overwhelmingly different from what they were 11 years ago," when there was last a court vacancy.

Connie Mackey, of the conservative Family Research Council, said at a news conference Friday she sees "a tremendous amount of organization, unlike I'd ever seen" in past confirmation fights. "The social-issue groups as well as the fiscal conservative groups are determined that they're not going to see a Borking of any nominee that would be a good constitutionalist." That was a reference to the effective campaign by Democrats to demonize Bork and defeat his nomination by President Ronald Reagan to the high court.

The conservative bid to reshape the federal judiciary has been years in the making. Since the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision -- widely condemned by conservative legal thinkers -- groups such as the Federalist Society have sought to expand the ranks of young conservative lawyers. Dozens of conservative judicial appointments by Reagan and President George H.W. Bush have given the current president a broad pool of judges from which to choose for the high court.

DOJ_NMG_0000950

The prospect of a new Supreme Court vacancy has accelerated this campaign. With the blessings of the Bush White House, a team of conservative leaders self-dubbed "the four horsemen" formed in 2002 and has taken over much of the planning for the nomination fight.

These men are C. Boyden Gray, an establishment lawyer who chairs the Committee for Justice; Jay Alan Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice; Leonard A. Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society; and Edwin A. Meese III, attorney general during part of the Reagan administration.

Gray, in an interview, described a battle plan over two years in the making. The Federalist Society will provide research in support of the nominee. A group called Progress for America, which backed the reelection of Bush in 2004, will spend as much as $18 million on radio and television backing Bush's nominee; and the recently created Judicial Confirmation Network, run by a former Bush campaign coalitions director, is setting up a grass-roots network in the states of six key senators.

"We have been preparing for this for 2 1/2 years," Gray said.

What Gray and others have done is fuse the GOP's economic and social conservatives, much as Bush did in his two presidential races. Gray's Committee for Justice represents business conservatives and has on its board top corporate lawyers; members of the Republican lobbying firm Barbour, Griffith & Rogers; John Engler, head of the National Association of Manufacturers; and Frank A. Keating, president of the American Council of Life Insurers.

O'Connor was pro-business in her rulings, and economic conservatives are determined to keep the seat that way in cases involving class-action lawsuits, tough enforcement of corporate-fraud laws and bankruptcy legislation -- all of which have bottom-line consequences of billions of dollars.

The financial clout of such conservatives is being paired with the grass-roots power of the social conservatives, who have been dismayed by recent rulings of the court on abortion, the Ten Commandments and other polarizing issues. The social conservatives are represented by people such as Sekulow; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council; and James Dobson of Focus on the Family.

Perkins said Friday that his group "will be mobilizing over 20,000 churches" and is reaching "over a million people" daily through e-mail and the Internet.

The replacement of O'Connor with a more reliable conservative would, by itself, give conservatives a majority for the first time on church-state issues, affirmative action and such abortion issues as parental notification and what critics call "partial birth" procedures. Perhaps more significantly, it will bring the right within one vote of a solid conservative majority that could theoretically overturn the Roe v. Wade abortion ruling -- although some legal analysts say that could be years away.

Veterans of the culture wars of the past few decades see the shift of a couple of seats on the Supreme Court as the culmination of a long struggle.

"This fight has been going on for my entire adult lifetime," said Richard Land, president of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics & Religious Liberty Commission, who was first ordained in 1969, six years after the Supreme Court had barred school prayer.

Gary Bauer, of the Campaign for Working Families and a 2000 GOP presidential candidate, said: "The court is both the last holdout and the major instigator of the disturbing changes in the values arena over the last 30 years."

Miranda calls the vacancy left by O'Connor a "test case" for conservative clout and says the right will demand that any Bush nominee have a "paper trail" showing strong conservative views.

"The conservative movement is mobilized to prevent a Souter or even a Kennedy," Miranda said. And once a true conservative is nominated, he added, "The conservative movement is ready to fall on its sword for a presidential nominee, and that is in reaction to Bork."

Ralph G. Neas, who heads the liberal People for the American Way and has been involved in every confirmation battle since 1975, has grudging respect for conservatives' progress.

"They have taken efforts to enhance their organizational structure and be able to finance that structure in a way they haven't before," he said. "They're in many ways replicating what we have been doing for some time, and bringing in wads of new money through their corporate special-interest contacts. Their pockets are much deeper than ours."

DOJ_NMG_0000951

The first goal of the conservatives' newfound organizational power is to pressure Bush to nominate an ideologically acceptable judicial candidate. Perkins said Bush "has committed to nominate justices like Scalia and Thomas." Rush Limbaugh, in his radio broadcast, warned that there "is no longer any room" for a "stealth" nominee without a proven conservative record.

Bush said during the 2004 presidential campaign that he admires justices such as Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- a statement that prompts Shannen W. Coffin, a former official in Bush's Justice Department, to say "there's no doubt the president made a promise" to nominate like-minded judges.

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and an adviser to Karl Rove, Bush's chief political strategist, said that starting with the election of 1968, "the left discovered it could no longer hold the presidency, so it turned to Congress for protection." After Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994, "the left turned to the courts. This is all they have left."

In Battle To Confirm A New Justice, Both Sides Get Troops Ready Again (NYT)

By David E. Rosenbaum And Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

The last time Ralph G. Neas and C. Boyden Gray went head to head as commanding generals in a war over a Supreme Court confirmation was in 1991, when Clarence Thomas was the nominee. Now, with the resignation of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, they are adversaries again.

Mr. Gray, who was White House counsel for President George Bush, won the Thomas battle.

But by all accounts, Mr. Neas had the superior operation: a unified battalion of labor unions, civil rights groups, women's organizations, civil libertarians and environmentalists that had more money, more energy and more firepower than had ever been used in a Supreme Court fight. It was an expansion of the same force Mr. Neas mobilized successfully in 1987 to defeat the nomination of Robert H. Bork.

After the bruising Thomas conflict, Mr. Gray, surprised by the fervor of the opposition, vowed he would never be outgunned again.

"When I was counsel, there was nothing out there," he said in a recent interview at his law office. "We didn't have the infrastructure with Bork or Thomas. The other side existed, but this side did not."

This year, said Mr. Gray, chairman of the Committee for Justice, an organization he formed three years ago to work for the president's judicial nominees, he was mustering outside forces that would be up to the fight.

"We haven't leveled the playing field," Mr. Gray said. "But at least we're on the field and we're able to engage." There is no doubt that his side has been much fortified. Progress for America, a group with close ties to the Bush administration, has begun to spend a pledged $18 million on advertising and organizing for the confirmation battle. Christian conservatives, who are far better organized and sophisticated than they were when the first President Bush named Justice Thomas to the court, are springing into action. And Mr. Gray, like his opponent, expects to have far greater reserves of cash and armies of activists this time around.

Some familiar faces are assisting Mr. Gray, who talks regularly with the White House about judicial nominees, in the confirmation campaign. The growing clout of Christian conservatives has given him new allies. He works closely with Jay Sekulow, general counsel of the American Center for Law and Justice, a Christian conservative legal group founded by the televangelist Pat Robertson, and Leonard Leo, a top official of the conservative Federalist Society who doubles as director of Republican outreach to Catholics.

By contrast, Mr. Neas, now president of People for the American Way, is presiding over a liberal coalition that has stayed largely intact over the last 10 years, still led by the same handful of veterans.

After learning of the O'Connor resignation Friday, Mr. Neas joined Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, and representatives from three dozen groups - including the A.F.L.-C.I.O., the American Association of University Women and the Leadership Conference for Civil Rights - at a Capitol news conference to call for a "consensus nominee."

DOJ_NMG_0000952

Of the two generals, he is less likely to face dissension in his ranks. His coalition has worked with the Democratic leadership in the Senate all year on appellate court nominees, and Mr. Neas himself is so closely tied to the Democrats in Congress that Senator Edward M. Kennedy once called him "the 101st senator."

The conservatives, by contrast, are looser-knit and have a more contentious relationship with Republicans in the Senate. Mr. Gray's task is to hold them together despite their divergent interests.

Progress for America, for instance, can be counted on to support President Bush's choice. "Our focus as an organization all along has been to defend the president's nominee, no matter who that person is, from attacks from liberal interest groups," said Jessica Boulanger, a spokeswoman for the organization.

But the Christian conservatives say they will back only a nominee with a clear record of subscribing to their views on abortion, gay marriage and the role of religion in public life.

Meanwhile, business groups, which have largely sat out the fights over the president's appeals court nominees, have pledged support for Mr. Gray but will make no commitment until Mr. Bush's choice for the Supreme Court is known.

As in their previous confirmation battles, both sides will rely on advertising blitzes, barrages of mail and phone calls and media campaigns to deliver their messages. But this time they will have to compete to shape public opinion in the faster, more intense world of gossipy Web sites, political blogs and 24-hour news shows. Mr. Gray will be a regular television presence, agreeing to appear exclusively on the Fox network during the confirmation process.

He founded the Committee for Justice in 2002 at the request of Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's chief political adviser, and Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, then the Senate Republican leader, to work for the president's judicial nominees - and to expressly counter the voice and influence of Mr. Neas.

By Friday morning, Mr. Gray had convinced himself that any resignation would hold for the holiday weekend. When he got word of Justice O'Connor's plans, he left home in a flash and headed to his downtown office. Within minutes he was on the phone with allies - among them Edwin Meese III, former White House counsel and attorney general under President Ronald Reagan and now at the Heritage Foundation; former Gov. John Engler of Michigan, now president of the National Association of Manufacturers; and Mr. Sekulow.

He issued a statement imploring the left "to take a breath and resist their natural impulse toward exaggeration."

A few blocks away on M Street downtown, Mr. Neas had been in his office since 6 a.m. He had joined People for the American Way, a group founded by the Hollywood producer Norman Lear as a political antidote to the conservative Christian movement, in 2000. During the Bork and Thomas battles, he headed the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. At 8:30 a.m., Mr. Neas called his wife, Katy, and promised that this weekend, unlike the past several when he had spent all day devising strategies to respond to various potential court nominations, they would take their 5-year-old daughter, Maria, to the zoo and to see the animated movie "Madagascar."

Then the news broke. By 10 a.m., Mr. Neas had his armies in motion. E-mail messages were sent to the bulk of the group's 750,000 members and supporters, as well as 10,000 reporters. Volunteers streamed into what the organization calls its war room, a 2,500-square-foot space in downtown Washington with 40 computers and 75 phone lines .

At seven regional offices across the country - in California, Florida, Illinois, New York and Texas - staff members were rounding up supporters to bombard the Senate and White House with e-mail messages and petitions once a nominee is announced.

For Mr. Neas, the Supreme Court is the ultimate guardian of fundamental rights, from civil rights to reproductive rights. For Mr. Gray, the Supreme Court is the final arbiter of the Constitution's enduring meaning, with no business usurping decisions better left to voters. Beyond their judicial philosophies, the leaders of the two campaigns could hardly be more different in appearance, background and temperament.

Mr. Gray, 62, is 6-foot-6 and lanky with an angular face. An heir to the Reynolds tobacco fortune, he went to Harvard, clerked for Chief Justice Earl Warren and has more than a trace of his native North Carolina in his voice.

Divorced, he has a daughter, Eliza, who is now at Harvard, and he lives most of the year alone in his elegant, orchid-filled Georgetown house, a hub of the Washington social circuit, where he is host to near-weekly fund-raisers for everything from his judicial interests to a Washington voucher program. He has faced ethics queries in the past for skirting campaign finance laws in the 1990's by using his secretary to make campaign donations to Mr. Lott and, during the first Bush administration, for meeting with oil company representatives while serving on a regulatory task force.

DOJ_NMG_0000953

A partner at the traditionally Democratic law firm Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, Mr. Gray is said to be Mr. Bush's top pick for ambassador to the European Union. Business associates say he has been scaling back work with clients in his law practice, easing himself off the many boards on which he sits and making frequent trips to the State Department.

Mr. Neas, 59, is 5-foot-9 and compact, constantly in motion. He grew up outside Boston, graduated from Notre Dame and the University of Chicago Law School and cut his political teeth in the civil rights movement.

He was 42 when he married and did not become a father until he was 54. His family now lives in a three-bedroom home in Bethesda, Md., that he says is "almost large enough to take care of the three of us with room for a grandparent or two."

Paradoxically, both men switched parties well into adulthood.

Mr. Gray was a Democrat until 1978, when he became a Republican because, he says, he opposed the Carter administration's economic policies. Mr. Neas was a Republican and worked for Republican senators throughout the 1970's. He switched parties and ran unsuccessfully for Congress as a Democrat in 1998.

The two have not always been antagonists. In 1989, when Mr. Gray was White House counsel, they worked together on the Americans With Disabilities Act. But on the heels of that, they squared off as rivals once more on civil rights legislation.

"He's a very astute politician," Mr. Gray said of Mr. Neas. "He knows where all the pressure points are and he's a very serious adversary - or ally if you're on his side, which I have been."

Mr. Neas was more critical of his longtime opponent.

"President Bush and Trent Lott chose Boyden Gray to be the quarterback of the radical right," he said. "Boyden Gray has always been the consigliere for the Bush family and has always represented well corporate special interests, often at the expense of ordinary citizens across the country."

Activists Gear Up For Nominee Fight (WP)

By Peter Baker And Susan B. Glasser

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

Many of President Bush's conservative supporters lined up in staunch opposition yesterday to the candidate he might personally most want to name to the Supreme Court, his longtime friend and adviser, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, as battle lines were drawn for selection of the first new justice in more than a decade.

Bush has long been intrigued by the idea of making Gonzales the first Hispanic on the Supreme Court, according to advisers, a prospect that might seem especially tempting in replacing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the court's first woman. But a range of activists and congressional Republicans warned the White House against the move, saying they do not consider Gonzales a steadfast conservative.

"We would oppose him because we don't believe he has a philosophy that we can determine. We are not enthused," said Tom Minnery, vice president of public policy for Focus on the Family, a conservative advocacy group. "He is someone who is apparently still developing his philosophy, and that's not good enough," Minnery added, citing Gonzales's "lack of open commitment to interpret the Constitution as it was written."

The surge of pressure after O'Connor's retirement announcement Friday reflected the brief but intense struggle that will play out in Republican circles in coming days. Bush leaves Tuesday for an international summit in Europe and does not plan to name a nominee until the week of July 11 at the earliest, leaving Republicans a short time to influence his decision. If the broader nomination battle will resemble a presidential campaign, as both sides predict, then the next week or two could amount to a primary.

While some focused on whom Bush's choice will be, others mapped out strategy for the period after he decides. Senate Republicans made plans to begin hearings as quickly as possible after the nomination, focused not on the candidate's positions on hot-button issues but on legal credentials.

A Republican planning document provided to The Washington Post described the need to avoid disclosing the nominee's "personal political views or legal thinking on any issue."

DOJ_NMG_0000954

Democrats, by contrast, prepared a campaign to extend the process and portray anyone Bush selects as outside the mainstream. The liberal People for the American Way moved to claim O'Connor's mantle with a new television commercial that flashes her image and demands that Bush pick someone in her pragmatic tradition who "protects our fundamental rights and freedoms" or risk dividing the country.

Intent on preventing the other side from gaining the upper hand, liberals and conservatives spent the weekend in meetings, on conference calls and drafting talking points for Sunday talk shows -- and preparing for the wild-card possibility that a second seat would open if Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist steps down as well.

From Camp David, Bush consulted by telephone with Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. while lawyers at the White House assembled dossiers of candidates for him to take on the flight to Scotland, a senior administration official said.

Various activists and groups have lobbied for their favorites on the list of federal appellate judges under consideration. Appeals Judge J. Michael Luttig of the 4th Circuit is the choice of many conservatives who cite his sharp mind and sturdy track record after 14 years on the bench. The Christian Legal Society and other religious conservatives are promoting Judge Michael W. McConnell of the 10th Circuit, although his criticism of the Supreme Court's decision in the Bush v. Gore decision that ended the 2000 election recount left hard feelings at the White House.

Some activists also point to Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. of the 3rd Circuit, nicknamed by some "Scalito" for demonstrating the same sharp intellect and conservative views of Justice Antonin Scalia. If Bush wants a woman to replace O'Connor, conservatives have embraced Appeals Judges Edith Brown Clement and Edith Hollan Jones, both of the 5th Circuit. If he wants a Hispanic, they have recommended another 5th Circuit judge, Emilio M. Garza, instead of Gonzales.

Judge John G. Roberts of the D.C. Circuit, described as a front-runner by outside White House advisers, does not elicit as much enthusiasm from conservatives but has passed the test of key figures. "Everything I know about him would say he would fit that profile of Scalia and [Clarence] Thomas," said Jan LaRue, counsel to the Concerned Women for America, a conservative group.

Some conservatives yesterday advanced the strategy of naming Janice Rogers Brown, who was confirmed last month to the D.C. Circuit after a Senate battle. Having just confirmed Brown, activists reason, Senate Democrats would not be able to turn around and argue that she meets the criteria of "extraordinary circumstances" deserving a filibuster as defined by a recent bipartisan deal on judicial nominations. And as a black woman, she would be harder to vote against, these strategists reasoned.

"She's just been through the process," said Gary L. Bauer, president of the Christian organization American Values. "It's kind of hard to vote for her once and then turn around and say she's unacceptable."

The one candidate who unifies most conservatives -- in opposition -- is Gonzales. Gonzales occupies a spot on the innermost orbit of the Bush universe, having been a longtime adviser. He was appointed by Bush to the Texas Supreme Court, then he served as White House counsel before becoming attorney general.

Advisers both inside and outside the administration said Bush has not ruled him out for O'Connor's seat, although in his current capacity he is helping to direct the search, and friends say he is reluctant to join the high court, preferring the pace of the executive branch.

While Bush places enormous trust in him, Gonzales elicits groans and eye-rolling from conservatives who worry how he might rule on some issues and see him as another potential David H. Souter, the little-known New Hampshire judge put on the bench by Bush's father and who has turned out to be far too liberal for their taste.

Conservatives most often cite Gonzales's rulings on parental consent cases in Texas involving minors seeking abortions. Gonzales has publicly called Roe v. Wade , the case that established a woman's constitutional right to abortion, "the law of the land," once adding that "how I feel about it personally may differ with how I feel about it legally." Asked during a recent interview with PBS's Charlie Rose whether support for Roe would disqualify a prospective nominee, Gonzales said, "There are no litmus tests for this president."

"The only nomination that would cause the people that I really associate with consternation would be Gonzales," said Michael P. Farris, a prominent conservative constitutional lawyer. "The president's going to need all the help he can get no matter who he picks. I don't think many people in the socially conservative movement would openly oppose him, but the enthusiasm would be sufficiently dampened to the point that many would not participate."

DOJ_NMG_0000955

Out of deference to a Republican White House, other conservatives are not as open about their opposition to Gonzales, using code instead, such as urging the president to pick another Scalia or Thomas, whom he has described as his model jurists.

"Conservative groups strongly believe that the president should just do what he promised to do. He was crystal clear on his vision of the appropriate qualities of a judge," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) said in an interview yesterday. "He can't allow personal or short-term political factors to override his commitment."

Other conservatives have come up with a new line of argument to dissuade the White House from selecting Gonzales without offending the president. Because he helped fashion so many administration policies, they said, Gonzales would have to recuse himself if they ever came before the bench, including the highly emotional case of late-term abortions that opponents call "partial birth."

"I don't think the president wants to have a 4 to 4 vote when that comes up before the Supreme Court," said Wendy E. Long, counsel to the Judicial Confirmation Network, a group supporting conservative judicial nominees. "That's just not a good position for a justice to be in."

Yet some conservatives have resigned themselves to Gonzales. Robert H. Bork, whose Supreme Court nomination was defeated in 1987, said his friends believe Gonzales will be the nominee and that lobbying will not change that. "Already, people have been pushing various candidates, but I don't think that's going to have much effect on Bush," he said. "I think he already knows what he wants to do."

Bush advisers refused to discuss individual candidates yesterday but brushed off criticism of Gonzales.

"This is not the first time he has come under scrutiny," said a senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the selection process. "He's a well-centered person. His relationship with the president is strong enough that I don't think he worries too much about the chatter."

Indeed, Gonzales draws criticism from the left side of the political spectrum as well. During his confirmation as attorney general earlier this year, most Democrats voted against him, citing his authorship of detention policies that some blamed for leading to abuse of military detainees.

"We would have serious concern about Gonzales based on what we know of his record on issues pertaining to torture, executive privilege and his handling of death penalty clemency positions" in Texas, said Nan Aron, president of the liberal advocacy group Alliance for Justice. "On other issues about which the right is particularly concerned -- reproductive rights, civil rights -- it would be important for the Judiciary Committee to ask him to answer questions. It's very difficult to know where he stands."

Conservative Groups Rally Against Gonzales As Justice (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, Todd S. Purdum And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Within hours after Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's announced retirement from the Supreme Court, members of conservative groups around the country convened in five national conference calls in which, participants said, they shared one big concern: heading off any effort by President Bush to nominate his attorney general, Alberto R. Gonzales, to replace her.

Late last week, a delegation of conservative lawyers led by C. Boyden Gray and former Attorney General Edwin Meese III met with the White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., to warn that appointing Mr. Gonzales would splinter conservative support.

And Paul M. Weyrich, a veteran conservative organizer and chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, said he had told administration officials that nominating Mr. Gonzales, whose views on abortion are considered suspect by religious conservatives, would fracture the president's conservative backers.

The groundswell of opposition to Mr. Gonzales was just one sign of the conflicting forces suddenly swirling around Mr. Bush this weekend as he headed to Camp David to begin considering a replacement for Justice O'Connor, a decision his aides said would not be announced before he returned from a trip to Europe at the end of next week.

Senate Democrats demanded that he consult them before making a choice and appoint a pragmatist in Justice O'Connor's mold.

DOJ_NMG_0000956

Conservatives, flexing their muscles in a battle they have spent a decade preparing for, described the nomination as a test of Mr. Bush's convictions and past promises, and his biggest opportunity yet to assure that the Bush presidency will leave a conservative stamp for a generation to come.

And on Friday, the Rev. Miguel Rivera, president of the National Coalition of Latino Clergy and Christian Leaders, a group that represents more than 6,000 Latino evangelical churches, sent the president a letter urging consideration of "a true conservative Latino nominee," Emilio M. Garza, a federal appeals judge from Texas.

In a telephone interview late Friday, Mr. Rivera said he had received no response. "All the meetings we have had in all the different groups today we have not heard anything to reassure us that he is out of the loop," Mr. Rivera said of Mr. Gonzales.

Administration officials discounted the conservative uprising against Mr. Gonzales, saying that Mr. Bush was already aware of the objections and was not convinced by them.

"It is what it is," said one senior administration official, who insisted on anonymity in exchange for discussing the White House views of the criticism of the attorney general. "The president is going to pick someone who is a true constructionist and who is correct in interpreting the law." The official said that Mr. Gonzales fit that description, but also that Mr. Bush might be wary of moving him to a new position so shortly after he was confirmed as attorney general.

Mr. Bush planned to spend the weekend getting a head start on "homework" on a list of potential nominees and expected to "be on the phones with his advisers," said another senior administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity to describe internal deliberations. He said that the president had been briefed on his staff's preparations for a court vacancy, and that "he knows the orbit of names."

Other White House aides said they had canceled holiday plans to meet with supporters and prepare for a fight whose dimensions and intensity would be, to a considerable extent, dictated by the nominee Mr. Bush settles on.

Members of Congress and conservatives close to the White House said that they were confident that Mr. Bush would use the first Supreme Court vacancy of his tenure to nominate a judge in the mold of Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, as he has repeatedly promised to do.

"They don't need me lobbying on this stuff - they know what to do," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, a conservative group with close ties to the White House. "My only recommendation is that they nominate someone who is 12 or 13 years old," to ensure as long a conservative legacy as possible.

Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, a veteran and former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which will hold hearings on any nominee, said flatly of Mr. Bush: "He's going to appoint a conservative. I have no doubt about that."

But Mr. Hatch, breaking with fellow conservatives, suggested in an interview that he would support Mr. Gonzales.

"Let me not get into any nominee, but Gonzales is an excellent human being," Mr. Hatch said. "He's done an exceptional job as White House counsel. He's brought additional stability and peace to the Justice Department. I know the president is interested in trying to find people of diversity - he's really bent over to do that as president."

Mr. Gonzales is a longtime Bush aide and friend from Texas, and naming him could enhance the Republican Party's standing among Hispanics, one of the president's longtime political goals. Some conservatives acknowledged that they had stated their opposition to him with some delicacy to avoid provoking the White House, given Mr. Gonzales's friendship with the president.

But the swift and vociferous opposition to Mr. Gonzales reflected the intensity of concern on the right over just what kind of conservative Mr. Bush will choose, as he moves toward a decision that will go a long way toward settling any question about what kind of conservative he is, and how his presidency will be remembered.

Mr. Weyrich, while declining to disclose the specifics of a recent conversation with Ken Mehlman, the Republican Party chairman, said: "We have let the administration know through whatever channels we have that Gonzales would be an unwise appointment because of the opposition of some of the groups," some of which he said would actively oppose Mr. Gonzales, while "others like the Southern Baptists and myself would simply not help."

For many conservatives, who have seen Republican presidents nominate justices like Ms. O'Connor who then vote against them on pivotal issues, Mr. Gonzales epitomizes the fear of the unknown. But in other ways, and to some Democrats, he is very well known, confirmed by a vote of 60-to-36, along largely partisan lines, after unexpectedly contentious hearings and debate in which Democrats challenged his policies on the detention and treatment of prisoners in the administration's campaign against terror. In a 2002 legal memorandum, Mr. Gonzales characterized as "obsolete" the Geneva Conventions' limitations on questioning of enemy prisoners, and he said provisions in the conventions like commissary privileges and athletic uniforms were "quaint."

DOJ_NMG_0000957

"He would face stiff opposition from liberal groups," said Nan Aron, president of the liberal legal group Alliance for Justice. "He would have to answer tough questions about his role in the administration's war on terror."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York and a member of the Judiciary Committee, declined to say on Saturday how Senate Democrats might respond to a Gonzales nomination. "It's too early to tell - we're not talking about any specific judge," Mr. Schumer said.

He described the situation with Mr. Gonzales as "a real Rubicon for this president. The hard, hard right wants a true believer."

Even at a time when they have unprecedented influence in the nation's capital, many conservative leaders have become increasingly restive at their comparative lack of sway on the court and have described the selection of the next justice as the most important decision Mr. Bush will make - even if he has to force it through at the expense of his ambitious second-term agenda.

Some Republicans warned that a very conservative nomination by Mr. Bush would guarantee a protracted legislative battle that could doom any hope Mr. Bush had of pushing through a Social Security or tax reform bill.

At the same time, Kenneth M. Duberstein, who managed the Supreme Court nominations of Clarence Thomas and David H. Souter for Mr. Bush's father, said that the president could go only so far in replacing Justice O'Connor, a Reagan appointee who turned out to be a major disappointment to the right.

"Any nominee can be a notch or two to the right of Sandra Day O'Connor, but not 10 notches to the right," Mr. Duberstein said, noting that the political dynamics are different than if Mr. Bush were replacing Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who is ill with thyroid cancer and still widely expected to retire.

The National Review said in an editorial on its Web site: "Conservatives would be appalled and demoralized by a Gonzales appointment."

Phyllis Schlafly, a longtime conservative activist, said: "Bush was very clear, and certainly his constituents believed him, when he said he would appoint justices like Scalia and Thomas. We are not in favor of Gonzales." Reflecting a widely held view among conservatives, and one of the reasons for the intensity of the sentiment on the right, Mrs. Schlafly described Justice O'Connor as "a terrible disappointment."

But other conservatives said there was no reason to fear, given Mr. Bush's record of appointing conservatives as president, and noted Mr. Bush's unambiguous embrace of conservative ideals.

"Whatever else you say about President Bush, he is certainly the type of man who says what he means and means what he says," said Paul Rosenzweig, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative group. "I also think it's clear that the majority who elected him - and who elected 55 members of the Senate - is looking to him to fulfill that pledge. Just as President Clinton took the opportunity to name two very liberal judges, the president's constituency will be looking to him to appoint a conservative jurist."

White House officials declined to comment, saying that Mr. Bush would not make a final decision until he finished reviewing potential candidates and consulting with Senate leaders, and that they were making an orchestrated effort to avoid saying or doing anything that would feed what they feared could be a week of speculation. One Republican with close ties to the White House said administration officials assumed that Mr. Bush would have at least one other vacancy to fill, and that that could influence his thinking.

Among the names most frequently mentioned as likely candidates, besides Mr. Gonzales and Mr. Garza, are Judges J. Harvie Wilkinson III and J. Michael Luttig of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Richmond, Va.; Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who sits on the federal appeals court in Washington; and Judge Michael W. McConnell of the 10th Circuit, which is based in Denver. Should Mr. Bush consider a woman, the most likely candidates are Judges Edith Brown Clement and Edith H. Jones, both of the Fifth Circuit, based in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0000958

Republicans and Democrats agreed on the importance of the appointment for Mr. Bush's legacy, though they differed sharply - and predictably - over what kind of nominee he should choose.

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, said that he believed that Mr. Bush would pick "a qualified, mainstream nominee." But he acknowledged that "the problem is because of the contentious nature of the process, sometimes even mainstream nominees are caricatured in a way that makes them appear to be extreme."

Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona and a member of the Judiciary Committee, said in a telephone interview: "You know President Bush. You know the kind of person he is. You know the way he's approached personnel questions. He's going to be very straightforward about the kind of person he wants."

High Noon For High Court (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Like vast armies taking up positions on the eve of battle, interest groups of right and left are readying for a fight over President Bush's nomination of a successor to Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Both sides agree that the battle is likely to be fierce. The stakes are high: O'Connor has been one of the court's "swing votes" whose views determine how cases are decided. The debate over her replacement will focus on some of the most painful and divisive issues before the nation: abortion, gay marriage, religious symbols in public places. It will likely dominate Washington's agenda -- and the media's -- for two months or more.

But in the middle of the storm, like civilians caught on a battlefield, much of the nation may wish that the whole thing would just go away.

"This will be the Super Bowl of polarization for ideological interest groups," said pollster Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center. "But for most of the country, it may just look like another partisan battle in Washington."

Abortion, gay marriage and religion may be "hot button" issues, prized by interest groups and political consultants for their ability to mobilize people to vote and donate money. But most Americans consider those issues less pressing than the war in Iraq or the state of the economy, and recoil from the acrimony of the debate.

"The rhetoric is going to be terrible," predicted Patricia McDonald, a semi-retired lawyer in Leawood, Kan. "Cable television is filled with talking heads who get paid to talk like that, to take the most extreme viewpoints. . . . But in the end, we don't get to vote about this. Life will go on.

"I don't think this is going to be nearly as divisive as the presidential campaign," she added. "Even then, we had a lot of disagreement, but I don't think I met more than two people who really got upset about it."

An increasing number of political scientists agree with her. Americans, they argue, aren't as polarized as they look.

On Election Day, the United States may divide into a 50-50 nation -- or, in last November's choice between George W. Bush and Sen. John F. Kerry, 51-48. But even on the most hotly debated issues, most Americans prefer a position somewhere in the middle.

Most don't want to outlaw all abortions, polls show, but they'd like to see a few more restrictions. Most don't approve of gay marriage, but they're willing to consider other legal rights for homosexuals.

"There's a difference between division and polarization," said Morris Fiorina, a political scientist at Stanford University's Hoover Institution. "We are a closely divided nation -- but we aren't all that deeply divided. In a battle like this one, you're listening to 10 percent on each side scream at each other."

The problem, Fiorina and others say, is that the American political process has become polarized -- and it's increasingly forcing voters to choose between one extreme and the other, leaving out the middle.

The battle over Bush's impending Supreme Court nomination will combine several of the factors that have made politics so divisive. It will likely focus on controversial social, cultural and religious issues. It will culminate in a yes-or-no question -- should the nominee be confirmed, or not? -- without much room for middle ground. And the debate will be spearheaded by interest groups on both extremes -- groups that sometimes appear to have a vested interest in polarization because it increases their influence.

DOJ_NMG_0000959

"You've got large amounts of what we used to call issue advocacy money -- money that exists and waits to be deployed in the service of polarization," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania. "That's a new factor."

"It's an open question whether they are raising the money to fight the battles or fight the battles to raise the money," said William A. Galston, who was an aide to former President Clinton and now teaches at the University of Maryland. "This is an infernal machine that has taken on a life of its own."

The coming battle includes several other features that could make the conflict even sharper.

"You have at least two presidential prospects in the Senate . . . whose self-interest lies in gaining as much visibility as they can in a way that will activate their core constituencies," Jamieson said, citing Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., and Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del.

That's not all. This will be the first Supreme Court confirmation battle in 11 years -- which means it will be the first such battle of the Internet age, with its legions of bloggers, and the first of the current era of media polarization, with phalanxes of partisan commentators on competing all-news cable channels.

It will also be the first confirmation battle over a Supreme Court nominee during the current era of conservative Republican domination in both houses of Congress as well as the White House.

Many conservatives have targeted the judiciary as the last branch of the federal government they hope to dominate. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, has derided the federal courts as "the left's last legislative body."

"Conservatives want a conservative justice, and they feel betrayed by past nominees that weren't contentious," said Jamieson. "That sets up the likelihood that this is going to be hard-fought and divisive."

But Galston, a Democrat, said his party is partly to blame.

"Beginning in the 1950s, the Democratic Party convinced itself that, especially on social issues, the principal vehicle of advance would be the Court," he said. "As a result . . . the principal focus of many interest groups was centered on the Court. Well, there's a Newton's Law of politics: Every action generates a reaction -- frequently an equal and opposite one. The interest groups on the conservative side have become highly court-centered as well."

The history of the abortion issue -- especially the 1973 decision that states could not prohibit abortion -- is a case in point, he said. "Whatever its judicial merits, Roe v. Wade has led to an intensification of polarization and bitterness in American discourse over social issues," Galston said.

"In 1972," before Roe, "neither party platform even mentioned abortion," he noted. "In 1976, each mentioned it in a nuanced way. . . . By 1984, not only was all nuance gone, but people who disagreed with the established line of each party were anathematized."

Divisive partisan battles produce another unwelcome result, Galston said: alienated, disaffected citizens.

"There's a very large share of the American electorate that feels unrepresented by this polarized politics," he said. "The popularity of figures like (Sen. John) McCain, R-Ariz., and (former Secretary of State Colin L.) Powell represents a yearning for leadership by the underrepresented middle who always lose out to the extremes."

If Bush's nominee is a controversial hot-button conservative, he warned: "We could see an orgy of self-destruction. It will bring the rest of the nation's business to a halt for an extended period."

It doesn't have to be that way.

"It's not inevitable," said C. Michael Comiskey, a Supreme Court scholar at Pennsylvania State University at Fayette. "If you look at the confirmation process since (1987), three of the four have been consensual, not 'conflictual'. . . .It's up to presidents to decide whether Supreme Court nominees are conflictual."

In other words, he said, Bush could consult with senators in both parties and nominate a judge who would not polarize the debate.

And even a hard-fought confirmation fight doesn't need to be a bad experience, Jamieson suggested.

"Contentious isn't bad," she said. "What's bad is demagogic-contentious. What's bad is mindless polarization.

NOW Marches In Support Of Abortion Rights (AP-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0000960

By John Gerome, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

Chanting "Not the church, not the state; women must choose their fate," hundreds of members of the National Organization for Women rallied for abortion rights Saturday as President Bush prepares to select a new U.S. Supreme Court justice.

NOW shifted the agenda for its three-day annual convention following the announcement Friday that Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was retiring.

The first woman on the Supreme Court, O'Connor refused in 1989 to join four other justices who were ready to reverse the landmark 1973 decision that said women have a constitutional right to abortion.

In 1992, she helped forge a five-justice majority that reaffirmed the core holding of the 1973 ruling. Then, in 2000, she provided the fifth and decisive vote that struck down a Nebraska law that was aimed at banning a procedure critics call "partial-birth" abortions.

Her retirement gives the court its first vacancy since 1994 and leaves Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg as the only woman on the court.

Activist Eleanor Smeal told the crowd that if Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has any future presidential ambition, he can't be known as the lawmaker instrumental in rolling back abortion rights. Frist, R-Tenn., will be expected to guide Bush's choice to succeed O'Connor through Senate confirmation.

"What we have to do now is raise such a loud voice that Sen. Bill Frist (news, bio, voting record) hears it," said Smeal, former president of the National Organization of Women and current president of the Feminist Majority Foundation. "He has to understand we need a moderate, centrist Supreme Court."

Frist spokesman Nick Smith said it was "premature to be talking about who the president may or may not nominate."

He said the senator would do his best to see a thorough and fair confirmation process. Frist has said he will give up his Senate seat when his term ends next year, but he hasn't answered — or discouraged — speculation that he will run for president in 2008.

Demonstrator Kathy Miller, 58, of Philadelphia, said she wanted to see a moderate justice in the same vein as O'Connor replace her.

"It's not like we're asking to go in the extreme other direction," she said.

Members of NOW planned to elect their president Saturday night.

NOW president Kim Gandy, elected in 2001, is being challenged by Connecticut lawyer Rosemary J. Dempsey, who has held several national and state leadership roles since joining NOW in 1970.

___

On the Net:

NOW: http://www.now.org

Liberals Gird For Supreme Struggle (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

A group of the most influential liberal court lobbyists gathered in a high-ceilinged room across the hall from the Senate chamber, within hours of Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement announcement Friday.

With grave expressions on their faces, the activists stood somberly behind a lectern and one-by-one delivered impassioned pleas that Justice O'Connor be replaced with a jurist who will protect their particular interests.

"This is a watershed moment," said Ralph G. Neas, president of People for the American Way, noting that this fight will be even more momentous than the one for which they have been preparing for years, the successor to the chief justice.

Most active court watchers were expecting to see the resignation of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, an unwavering conservative on the court. With the surprise announcement from Justice O'Connor, often a swing vote on the court, liberal activists such as Mr. Neas rushed from playing offense on replacing a conservative to having to defend a vital vote.

DOJ_NMG_0000961

"Over the last 10 years, we have not had a Rehnquist Court; we've had an O'Connor Court," he said, arguing that replacing her with a reliable conservative would be a "constitutional catastrophe."

Less vocal last week -- but every bit as powerful and involved in the judicial-selection process -- were conservative activists, some of whom chuckled with delight over their turn of good fortune.

"The game hasn't changed, but the post-game celebration will be much bigger," said Manuel Miranda, chairman of the conservative Third Branch Conference. "Drinks will be on me."

On Friday, many conservatives chose to applaud the service of Justice O'Connor, but to otherwise keep quiet. White House aides and Senate Republicans sent out the word that there should be no public relief that it was Justice O'Connor, rather than Chief Justice Rehnquist, who was retiring.

"Nobody wants to get into gloating here," said one conservative activist. "We're all too aware of what's at stake."

Activists on both sides of the issue have marshaled thousands of people across the country and raised millions of dollars to wage this battle. About the only thing both sides seem to agree on is that much is at stake.

Karen Pearl, interim president of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, told reporters that "this may be one of the most critical and dangerous moments for the future of women's reproductive freedom that any of us have seen in our lifetime."

Few issues carry more voltage on both sides than abortion rights. Ms. Pearl noted the Independence Day weekend and said "there is no freedom more fundamental to our rights than the ability for women to decide whether and when to parent."

Already, she said, Planned Parenthood has alerted 1 million of its supporters, trained 50,000 local leaders and mobilized more than 170 campus groups to rally against any Supreme Court nominee deemed weak on supporting reproductive rights.

The issue is no less important to conservative activists, who are expecting President Bush to nominate someone who is unapologetically opposed to abortion rights.

"The president has the historic opportunity to keep faith with the promise he has repeated numerous times, which is to name justices who are like Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel for Concerned Women of America.

Many conservatives opposed to abortion have made clear that they would not, for instance, be satisfied with the nomination of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Mr. Gonzales is often discussed as a possibility for the high court, but has written opinions conservatives say give adolescents too much leeway to get abortions without notifying their parents.

But abortion won't be the only issue in the upcoming Supreme Court fight.

Justice O'Connor "served as a moderate voice of reason on the court," said Nancy Zirkin, deputy director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. "She played a pivotal role in protecting the right and liberty of all Americans in cases involving affirmative action, human rights, religious freedom, criminal justice and the rights of women -- including reproductive health -- people with disabilities, gays, lesbians and many other communities whose rights are often jeopardized."

She begged Mr. Bush to follow the "shining example of President Reagan" in naming Justice O'Connor's successor. Mr. Reagan also nominated U. S. Court of Appeals Judge Robert H. Bork for the District of Columbia Circuit, a staunch conservative, to the Supreme Court in 1987, but his nomination was ultimately rejected by the Senate.

Disorder In The Court (NYT)

By Stephen L. Carter

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

I KEENLY remember the excitement at the Supreme Court when President Ronald Reagan announced the nomination of the little-known Sandra Day O'Connor to replace the retiring justice, Potter Stewart, in 1981. At the time I was a law clerk for Justice Thurgood Marshall, and, although none of us knew who she was, all of us sensed that a new epoch had begun. We were right.

During her two and a half decades on the court, Justice O'Connor excited as rich a mixture of undeserved opprobrium and richly deserved encomiums as any sitting member. It is far too early to assess Justice O'Connor's legacy, for that is the task of the historians, when they are able to look back and see what part of the current court's work stands the test of time. We cannot predict the far future, but we can predict the near future: it is going to be a messy summer.

DOJ_NMG_0000962

What will make the summer messy is the certain controversy over Justice O'Connor's replacement. Mean-spirited idealists on the right and the left have been waiting years for this moment, and now it is upon them. Conservatives are demanding a true believer; worried liberals are gearing up to stop that from happening. The clash is likely to be ugly.

Had Chief Justice William Rehnquist stepped down, as widely expected (and as he still might), the battle would probably have been less severe. One conservative replaces another, liberal activists might have reasoned, so keep the powder dry. But Justice O'Connor's resignation is likely to excite even more attention than her appointment as the first woman on the Supreme Court: she is seen as a swing vote.

On issues from abortion to affirmative action to criminal procedure, it has often been Justice O'Connor's unpredictable vote that determines which bloc prevails. So the right will naturally see its chance to move the court further toward its agenda; and the left will battle to retain what pieces of its own agenda it can, a sort of holding action against the day when the Democrats again rule the White House and the Senate.

This path, so predictable, so frequently trod in recent decades, is carrying the Supreme Court, and the ideal of judicial review, toward disaster. There has been much talk lately of how the cruel posturing of politicians and commentators critical of various decisions hurts the reputation of the courts. And there is something to this notion. But the overwrought attacks by some critics do less harm to the notion of an independent judiciary than does the way activists gird themselves for battle each time a vacancy occurs, as if it is the obligation of the political branches to guarantee outcomes their supporters prefer.

We all claim to believe in judicial independence, but our definition of independence too often turns out to mean deciding cases according to our druthers. A court that rules in our favor displays integrity and independence. A court that rules against us shows its ideology and partisanship. Need evidence? Listen to anyone on the right discuss classroom prayer or abortion. Listen to anyone on the left discuss Bush v. Gore.

When we talk about decisions in this way - as if the only plausible results are the ones we like, a propensity that grows worse at election time and worst of all when a vacancy occurs - we obscure the proper relationship of the judiciary to the other branches of government, and of the Supreme Court justices to the larger society. When the news media survey the public for its view on decisions few people have ever read, interpreting constitutional provisions few people would recognize, the mischief intensifies, for the very act of surveying popular opinion on, say, the correctness of Roe v. Wade implies that the Supreme Court's highest duty is to do as it is told.

Confirmation hearings for nominees to the high court only make matters worse, for the would-be justices are forced to sit before the cameras, under oath, as senators ask them questions they cannot ethically answer, on how they would vote on cases that might come before them. This process began not in the early Republic but in the battle over Jim Crow. In the 1950's, the Southern Democrats who controlled the Senate Judiciary Committee decided to require every nominee to appear in person in order to grill them about Brown v. Board of Education. Before Brown, it was almost unheard-of for a nominee to testify. When the Dixiecrats changed the rules, the liberal position was that inquiries about such matters as judicial philosophy posed a threat to the independence of the judiciary.

The left of that era was correct. The spectacle we have made of confirmation hearings reinforces the public notion that the justices exist to decide cases the way political movements want them to. Liberals think the right started it, and conservatives think the left started it, but the important question is not who started it but who is going to stop it.

Perhaps President Bush could say to his most strident supporters on the right that it is not appropriate for them to behave with the triumphalism of conquerors who believe that the retirement of Justice O'Connor signals the moment to take control of the court. Perhaps the activists on the left, gearing up for a fight, could go back and read the speech made on the Senate floor by Edward Kennedy, during the vicious 1967 campaign over the nomination of Thurgood Marshall. Senator Kennedy warned his colleagues to reject the view that the Senate should reject potential justices who possess a judicial philosophy with which they disagree.

Or perhaps both sides should listen to the wisdom of Justice O'Connor herself. In 1992, she joined Justices David H. Souter and Anthony M. Kennedy in writing that the court, in deciding whether to overrule past decisions, must not "surrender to political pressure" and, indeed, that a reversal "under fire," except for the most compelling reasons, "would subvert the court's legitimacy beyond any serious question." These wise but often misunderstood words do not mean that the court should be above criticism; only that it is not up to politicians to decide when the court is wrong. This language occurred in the controversial decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey where the court declined an invitation from the United States government to overturn Roe v. Wade. But one need not think Roe (or any other precedent) correct to appreciate the larger point: when the court becomes a political plaything, there is less reason for any of us to respect it.

DOJ_NMG_0000963

Not A Campaign (WP)

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

SECONDS AFTER President Bush announces his choice to replace Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor -- whenever that happens and whoever the nominee is -- liberal interest groups will release a blast of e-mails promising a "rollback" of American liberties if the person is confirmed. Conservative groups, at the same moment, will blitz with e-mails proclaiming the nominee a modern John Marshall. Ads will appear on television. Journalists will be hit with distorted "reports" attacking or defending the nominee's "record," as groups release their opposition research or their defensive spin. Both camps, in short, will unleash the huge sums they have raised in what will be, for all intents and purposes, a political campaign -- a political campaign, unfortunately, for an office that is meant to be not merely apolitical but actively insulated from politics.

The campaign, in reality, began long ago. It began when both sides made the judgment that they had to invest in judicial appointments -- particularly Supreme Court appointments -- to make sure they got the results they wanted from the courts. At this point, the war has become a Washington industry, fed by both sides' wounds from the past, real and imagined, and fears for the future, realistic and fantastical. Barely had Justice O'Connor announced her retirement Friday when the liberal People for the American Way was promising to "help lead the fight against any terrible changes to the Supreme Court." The conservative Family Research Council vowed that the "public is primed for the fight it will take to confirm a nominee" and promised "significant grassroots support for the President's nominees." A lot of people on both sides actively want a fight.

The war is about money and fundraising as much as it is about jurisprudence and the judicial function. It elevates partisanship and political rhetoric over any serious discussion of law. In the long run, the war over the courts -- which teaches both judges and the public at large to view the courts simply as political institutions -- threatens judicial independence and the integrity of American justice.

So we take this moment, when nobody knows how excellent or terrible the next nominee will be, to emphasize that a judicial nomination is not a political campaign and should not be treated as one. A nominee's record is almost never a simple affair, because good legal reasoning doesn't always render the most politically congenial answer. Demagogic attacks on almost any nominee are easy, and knee-jerk defenses equally so. But a reasonable assessment of the president's choice, whoever it is, will not emerge from such a shouting match.

We say this not in hopes that the war rooms will shut down and the campaign atmosphere give way to a serious discussion of -- and with -- the eventual nominee. That won't happen. But somehow, the serious discussion needs to take place even in an atmosphere that so disfavors it. The only legitimate source of the power of the Supreme Court -- which is, after all, a group of unelected officials who serve for life -- is the premise that interpreting law is not the same as creating it, that the task of judging, in other words, is not a political function. The war rooms, the money and the rhetoric all speak to a loss of faith in that premise on the part of groups who are now fighting over political spoils. Those Americans who still believe in the Third Branch need to endeavor to tune those special interests out.

Confirmation Battle In Senate Could Define Specter's Career (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

In nearly 25 years on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, has sat through nine Supreme Court confirmation hearings, some short and polite, some ugly and drawn out. Now that he is the chairman, he is prepared for the next one to go either way.

"I'm not going to anticipate a bruising battle," Mr. Specter said in an interview on Friday after Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her resignation, "but I'm not going to run from one either."

DOJ_NMG_0000964

Although Mr. Specter may not anticipate a bruising battle, just about everyone else in Washington does, and the inevitable confirmation fight could be the defining moment in his long career. It comes as he faces a battle of a more personal sort, against Hodgkin's disease.

Perhaps more than any other senator, Mr. Specter will be the pivotal figure as he tries to manage his bitterly divided committee, his own uneasy relationship with the White House and the intense pressure that is already bearing down on him from both the left and right at a time when both sides are deeply suspicious of him.

Within hours of Justice O'Connor's announcement on Friday, Mr. Specter said he would probably hold confirmation hearings in September, a move that could upset conservatives, who would like to move a nominee along as quickly as possible in the hope of outflanking liberal groups that plan to use the summer months to prepare for a confirmation battle. Mr. Specter, though, says only that the Senate has "an obligation to confirm the justice by the 1st of October" and that he intends to meet that deadline.

Sharp-tongued and cagey, with an uncanny knack for parsing his words to wiggle his way out of tight spots, Mr. Specter is widely regarded as the Senate's brightest legal mind. A rare centrist in a Senate that has shifted increasingly to the right, he is reviled by conservatives for dooming the nomination of Robert H. Bork, and by liberals for assuring the confirmation of Justice Clarence Thomas with his aggressive questioning of Anita Hill, the law professor who had accused Justice Thomas of sexual harassment.

Now the vacancy created by the retirement of Justice O'Connor gives Mr. Specter a chance to rewrite his Judiciary Committee history, but it comes at a delicate time for him. He nearly lost his chairmanship last year amid an uproar from conservatives, who were furious when Mr. Specter, an unabashed supporter of abortion rights, suggested that the Senate would have difficulty confirming judges who would overturn Roe v. Wade.

He won the job after an all-out campaign that culminated with a carefully worded four-paragraph statement in which he pledged to "use my best efforts to stop any future filibusters," the tactic Democrats had been using to block President Bush's judicial nominees. The filibuster fight could re-emerge during a Supreme Court confirmation, and a big question is how Mr. Specter would handle it.

"I'll jump off that bridge when I come to it," he said.

So far, Mr. Specter has not been forced to jump. Last month, when Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, brought the Senate to the brink of a vote to bar judicial filibusters, Mr. Specter kept the chamber on tenterhooks, refusing to say how he would vote even as he urged party leaders to "liberate their caucuses to vote without party straitjackets." When 14 senators - 7 Democrats and 7 Republicans - struck a deal to avert the so-called nuclear option, Mr. Specter was not part of it. His critics were exasperated.

"Arlen Specter is as predictable as the sun rising in the east," Richard Viguerie, the conservative direct mail consultant, complained in an interview at the time. "He's not going to keep a deal he makes with anybody."

But Mr. Specter, whose brusque manner has earned him the nickname Snarlin' Arlen on Capitol Hill, said he was keeping his own counsel, a move he considers wise and one that will probably continue to confound Specter-watchers as the nomination process moves forward. "I've made people mad saying very little, so I'm not going to say very much," he said.

He added: "I think a senator, whether or not he is the chairman, ought to be circumspect in what he says."

That may be especially so for the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, whose members include some of the most powerful lawmakers in the Senate, including fellow Republicans Charles E. Grassley of Iowa and Orrin G. Hatch of Utah and Democrats Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Charles E. Schumer of New York.

But Mr. Specter was not circumspect on Friday about criticizing Democrats who were already vowing to use the filibuster against a nominee they find objectionable.

"I'm a little bit concerned about what I heard Senator Kennedy say on television tonight, that if the president does not nominate someone who meets Senator Kennedy's specifications, as he articulates it, the American people will expect a battle and they're prepared to do it," he said.

"I would hope that we would tone down the rhetoric," he added.

DOJ_NMG_0000965

Democrats have been pressing Mr. Bush to seek their advice on possible nominees, and Mr. Specter said he had urged the president to consult with him and three other senior senators - Dr. Frist, Harry Reid, who is the Democratic leader, and Mr. Leahy, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. The president apparently took Mr. Specter's advice and has invited the four men to the White House on July 11, after the Senate returns from recess.

Mr. Specter said that he and Mr. Bush had not named names in any of their conversations. He said he had thought "long and hard" about suggesting possible candidates but decided not to, believing that "the wiser course" would be to remain uncommitted to anyone in particular. As to whether he would advise Mr. Bush against nominating judges who might be perceived as likely to overturn Roe v. Wade, Mr. Specter was noncommittal.

"I'm going to listen to the president," he said, "and see how it goes."

Mr. Specter is not one to shun the limelight - he is scheduled to appear on three morning talk shows on Sunday - and he has never masked his moderate views. Last year, he survived a bitter primary challenge from the right, winning re-election with considerable help from Mr. Bush. In 1995, he made a brief ill-fated bid for the White House, running on the unusual platform of attacking Christian conservatives as an extremist "fringe."

The Supreme Court hearings come at a time of great personal challenge for Mr. Specter. His chemotherapy treatments have left him tired, he said, although he pushes himself to get up in the morning and play his regular squash game.

"Frankly," he said, "it's hard to get out of bed, hard to do the exercises and hard to get going, but once I'm on the squash court, I'm fine."

He has been very public about his illness - "I decided a long time ago: no toupee, no baseball hat, no shaved head," he said, referring to the baldness resulting from his treatment - and has become a symbol for cancer patients, who have been sending him cards and letters. He advises them to keep a busy schedule.

Perhaps for that reason, Mr. Specter may have been the only politician in Washington to publicly speculate that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who has thyroid cancer, would not retire.

"I think I have special insights into how he feels," Mr. Specter said, although he said they have not talked about it. "I think the chief likes to get up every day knowing he has important work to do, and I like to get up every day thinking I have important work to do."

A former prosecutor, Mr. Specter entered public life four decades ago as an ambitious young lawyer on the Warren Commission, which conducted the inquiry into the killing of President John F. Kennedy. He takes credit for producing the so-called single-bullet theory to explain how Kennedy was killed.

Mr. Specter was elected to the Senate in 1980 and immediately sought a seat on the Judiciary Committee, much to the chagrin of the chairman, Senator Strom Thurmond, the conservative Republican from South Carolina. Mr. Thurmond, concerned that Mr. Specter was too liberal, tried to keep him off the committee, but when no one else wanted the last remaining seat, Mr. Specter got it.

Although he will rely heavily on his aides - his chief counsel Michael E. O'Neill, a former clerk of Justice Thomas, is on leave from his job as an associate law professor at George Mason University - Mr. Specter has more experience than any of them. He has participated in the confirmation of every one of the current Supreme Court justices except John Paul Stevens, and he says he views himself as "a fact-finder" rather than a prosecutor.

He pledged to run the hearings "straight down the center, professionally," and added that he was eager to delve into a detailed examination of the nominee. But at 75, he says he is not looking at the coming hearings as any measure of his legacy.

"It's too early," he said, "to think about my legacy."

Parties Line Up Strategies For Hearings On Nomination (WP)

By Mike Allen

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

The two parties have begun outlining their strategies for confirmation hearings once President Bush nominates a successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, with Senate Republicans planning a rapid and rigid schedule designed to prevent Democrats from pinning the nominee down on divisive issues such as abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0000966

A planning document for Senate Judiciary Committee Republicans says the nominee will be counseled to avoid disclosing "personal political views or legal thinking on any issue" in an effort to put a focus on qualifications rather than specific issues, including same-sex marriage and the government's treatment of suspected terrorists.

Democrats signaled that whoever the nominee is, their three likely lines of attack will be to assert the White House did not consult them sufficiently, then paint the nominee as ideologically extreme and finally assert that the Senate had not received sufficient documents about the candidate. But Senate Democratic aides said they will focus for now on bipartisan consultation and not publicly prejudge the nominee.

Republican leaders said they are prepared to start Judiciary Committee hearings as soon as three weeks after Bush announces his choice, although they are more likely to begin in late August or early September. Party leaders said it is their goal to have the new justice on the bench when the court reconvenes Oct. 3. O'Connor said in her retirement letter to Bush that she will stay until her successor is confirmed.

Lawmakers and aides said leaders are conscious of the poor image of Congress in recent polls and are determined to avoid having the two to three days of nationally televised hearings come off like a trial. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) appealed for hearings marked by "dignity and respect."

That does not appear likely. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on courts, said an effort to choke off inquiries about specific issues would fail because Democrats believe they have "an obligation to our country and the Constitution to thoroughly vet the nominee."

"The number one thing we look for are the person's views," Schumer said. "The hard right wants to get it done with as few questions and as quickly as possible."

Republicans cited as precedent the hearings of justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg in 1993 and Stephen G. Breyer in 1994, when the nominees said it was inappropriate to give their views on legal issues that could come before the court.

With the nominee still unknown, the parties' plans are sketchy at points and could change. But to a remarkable degree, the contours of the strategies -- and the avenues down which lawmakers plan to steer debate in coming weeks -- have already emerged in interviews, floor statements and internal planning documents.

An instruction sheet prepared by Senate Republican leaders and given to conservative allies of the White House on Friday afternoon said in its first sentence, in a reference to the tough line taken by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), that the instructions place an "emphasis on taking the high road and avoiding the attacks that Kennedy et al. are implicitly threatening."

The sheet was distributed at a meeting where speakers urged the groups not to stress the abortion issue in their public statements. Eric Ueland, Frist's chief of staff, "urged them not to fall into the mainstream media trap of rhetorical or behavioral excess on behalf of a highly qualified nominee," according to an attendee.

Senate Democrats said they will insist on a more deliberative and candid process than Republicans appear to be contemplating, and called for an unprecedented amount of consultation with the White House before the announcement of a nominee. The Constitution says the president shall nominate judges to the Supreme Court and appoint them "with the Advice and Consent of the Senate," but it does not define the advising function.

Talking points distributed by e-mail by Senate Republican leaders state that consultation "does not mean co-nomination," hinting at the disputes that are likely to erupt even before the public hearings begin. "Consultation is a courtesy," said the talking points, which are guidelines for other senators. "The Constitution does not require it."

Senate Democrats said in their own e-mails that they plan exclusive interviews and briefings for bloggers and Hispanic news outlets throughout the confirmation fight. The party distributed talking points, used to guide lawmakers' news releases and sound bites, stating: "We hope this process will be one of consensus rather than confrontation, but that will be up to President Bush." The Democratic National Committee circulated a memo saying that Bush's sinking poll ratings mean that he "needs a win -- desperately" and that the nomination is "a chance to bring the country together."

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) said in an interview yesterday that his party will resist Democratic arguments for "ideological balance" on the court, a concept not in the writings of the Founding Fathers. And he said it is important to set "reasonable deadlines" for confirmation.

DOJ_NMG_0000967

"The longer a nominee is dangled out there, the more people are going to try to take a whack at him like a piñata," Cornyn said.

Senate Democrats said a more reasonable pace than that being contemplated by Republicans would be 75 days between the announcement of a vacancy and the start of hearings. (The hearings for the last two, Breyer and Ginsburg, were less than that.) Schumer said that confirming the nominee by Oct. 3 is "not going to be so easy to do, because it's hard to imagine how hearings would begin before Labor Day." He said to finish hearings, a committee vote and a floor vote by the first Monday in October would be "pretty rough."

Confirmation hearings did not become national spectacles until the television age: Before 1955, only two Supreme Court nominees appeared before the committee, according to court histories. The hearings, the first Supreme Court confirmation since Breyer's 11 years ago, are likely to be held in the Beaux-Arts splendor of the Russell Senate Office Building Caucus Room, site of hearings on the Teapot Dome oil reserves, the Watergate break-in, the Iran-contra affair and the confirmation of Justice Clarence Thomas.

The televised portion of the hearing would probably last two to three days, with an additional day or two for testimony from outside groups. The first day would be taken up mostly by introductions of the nominee and opening statements, so the second would likely be the most intense. Before the committee vote, senators also would be likely to hold a one-day, closed session to discuss confidential matters such as the contents of the FBI report on the nominee.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) is intent on moving expeditiously, Republican aides said. As soon as the nomination is announced, he and Frist will agree on a schedule. One topic of discussion might be limiting opening statements at the committee hearing to Specter and the top Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), to allow more time for questioning the nominee, the aides said.

Specter is to finish chemotherapy treatment for Hodgkin's disease on July 22, and Republican aides said he will show his resilience at the hearings by living up to his reputation for wielding a firm gavel. "You're not going to see him jam the Democrats at all," one of the aides said. "But he can see when they're being dilatory and will draw the line."

But other Judiciary Committee members said that for Specter, 75, the hearings are part of his legacy, as surely as the result will be part of Bush's. His aim is to be driven by objectivity and precedent, fellow Republicans said.

But former GOP senator Alan K. Simpson, who voted to confirm seven of the nine sitting justices, said from his home in Cody, Wyo., yesterday that he already sees the committee members "ripping into each other" and fears there is no way to head off contentious hearings because the groups on both sides are so galvanized.

"If this just turns into an issue of abortion and 'partial birth' abortion, gay marriage, homosexual issues," Simpson said, "it will be the disaster of the ages."

Justice For The Next Justice (WP)

By John Cornyn

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

This week marks a historic occasion, not only for the U.S. Supreme Court, but for America -- the retirement announcement of our nation's first female Supreme Court justice. The process in the U.S. Senate for considering her successor should reflect the best of the American judiciary -- not the worst of American politics.

Justice O'Connor has provided a voice of judicial restraint on a number of important issues on which the court was closely divided. Throughout her 24 years on the nation's highest court, Sandra Day O'Connor worked to restore common sense to our criminal justice system and foster due regard for the powers reserved to the states under the Constitution. Thanks to her, victims of crime are more likely to receive justice and inner-city children are no longer constitutionally barred from access to school choice programs. And although I have not always agreed with her rulings, I have always felt a deep and abiding respect for her commitment to public service and reverence for the law.

The announcement of Justice O'Connor's retirement has now set a familiar process in motion. Soon the president will nominate, and the Senate will have the responsibility to consider, an individual to serve a lifetime appointment to the Supreme Court. As a senator, I must decide whether to vote to confirm or reject this nomination. This is a responsibility not to be taken lightly.

DOJ_NMG_0000968

The president has the sole responsibility to pick his nominee. It is crucial that he do so with an eye toward character and temperament. The nominee must be intelligent and wise, thoughtful and careful, and always fair-minded and impartial. The nominee must have good moral character and demonstrated commitment to public service and the common good. And he or she must be open-minded and willing to consider all arguments before the court.

That is why, when evaluating the nominee, I will not be asking for commitments as to how he or she will rule on cases involving such contentious issues as abortion, affirmative action, same-sex marriage, the war on terrorism or any other specific issue on which the nominee might eventually rule.

To ask a judicial nominee how he or she will rule on future cases is to force the nominee to prejudge these cases. Imagine going before a judge whose mind was already made up concerning your case. Imagine a judge who had promised the president or some senator that he would rule against you -- no matter the merits of the case. That would not be a judicial process; it would be a political process.

It's crucial that judges approach every case free from political commitments. They must be free to disappoint their supporters and surprise their opponents and critics. Judges must be free to do their jobs -- to listen to the facts, to carefully divine the law and to be faithful to the Constitution.

As soon as the president announces his nominee, media reports and interest groups will probably attempt to demonize or paint the nominee as a right-wing extremist. Some Senate Democrats -- who often insist on asking nominees to prejudge cases and issues -- will subject the nominee to controversial questioning during the hearing process. The American people should recognize such questions for what they are: an attempt to politicize the process and badger the nominee to reveal personal feelings about any given issue. This is unfair to the nominee and the American people, and grossly distorts the Senate's role of providing advice and consent.

Before her service on the federal bench, Ruth Bader Ginsburg -- a distinguished jurist and liberal favorite -- served as general counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union, a liberal organization that has championed the abolition of traditional marriage laws. Before becoming a judge, Ginsburg expressed her belief that traditional marriage laws are unconstitutional but that prostitution is a constitutional right. She also wrote that the Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts are discriminatory institutions, and that courts must require the use of taxpayer funds to pay for abortions -- hardly views Americans would consider mainstream. Yet Senate Republicans and Democrats alike set aside such concerns and approved her nomination.

By contrast, we have seen during the past four years a partisan minority obstruct this president's judicial nominees -- who hold views shared by millions of Americans and enjoy bipartisan majority support in the Senate -- suffer vicious attacks and unprecedented obstruction at the behest of liberal interest groups.

Our role as senators is to ensure that the nominee is qualified and has the intelligence, character, and judicial temperament to perform the job, to guarantee that all senators have an opportunity to evaluate the nominee, to allow as much debate as is necessary to fully discuss the nomination, and then to come to a vote. Yet there are some who argue that the Senate can refuse to vote altogether, and that the Supreme Court should be forced to operate without a ninth justice.

While I am confident that the nominee to replace Justice O'Connor will be an able jurist, I am less confident in the treatment he or she will receive from the president's opponents.

The writer is a Republican senator from Texas.

High Court's Next Term Full Of Big Cases (AP-Y2)

By Gina Holland, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

Abortion, assisted suicide, gay rights, the death penalty. Some of the toughest issues in the land confront the Supreme Court in its new term in the fall.

A new lineup of justices — assuming the successor to influential Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is on the bench — makes the outcome of these cases more unpredictable than usual.

The high court has not had a new member since 1994, a modern-era record. That stability has made it easier to gauge what issues the court will take on and how they will be decided.

On major ones, the court frequently splits 5-4. O'Connor, a moderate put on the court by President Reagan, has been a key vote in death penalty, religion and abortion cases. Her view often became the final word.

Her retirement, announced Friday, shook up the world of Supreme Court lawyers who prepared cases with O'Connor in mind.

"She was widely viewed as the key by experienced and successful litigators. They'll have to figure some other way to win their cases," said Nelson Lund, a George Mason University law professor and former clerk to O'Connor.

O'Connor said that she will remain on the court until her successor is confirmed. Depending on President Bush's choice, there could be a lengthy fight that stretches into the fall.

If O'Connor is not able to continue serving, many major cases could leave the court split 4-4.

Also in doubt is the future of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who has cancer and could step down this summer, too. The last time there were two vacancies was 1971.

Justices already have a full lineup of cases for the nine-month term that begins the first Monday in October. The court has agreed to hear about 40 appeals, including four death penalty cases and two abortion-related cases. About 40 more appeals will be added later.

Whoever the president names to the court will immediately face cases involving the Bush administration.

In one, the court will decide if law schools may restrict military recruiters as a way of protesting the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy excluding openly gay people from military service.

Schools argue that their nondiscrimination policies apply to all recruiters that base hiring on race, gender or sexual orientation.

Justices will take up the administration's challenge to Oregon's law allowing physician-assisted suicide. In addition, there is a fight that tests freedom of religion, over a church's use of hallucinogenic tea in its religious services.

The abortion cases involve a parental notification law from New Hampshire and a long-running fight over the liability of people who protest outside clinics.

O'Connor's successor probably will be quizzed during Senate confirmation hearings about those subjects.

"I'd expect any of the nominees to duck answering," said Paul Schiff Berman, a law professor at the University of Connecticut.

Berman said that a major question is whether the new justice will be a pragmatist like O'Connor.

The 75-year-old former Arizona state senator and mother of three sons approached cases with a practical view.

"She always chose the least extreme solution, the compromise solution," Berman said. "She's kept the court very close to the American popular consensus on most issues."

Unlike the court's other conservatives, she believes that affirmative action has a place in government institutions, although limited. She believes that abortion should be legal. While she supports the death penalty, she has talked openly about concerns that it is being fairly imposed.

Among the death penalty cases in the next term is a potentially significant issue of allowing inmates to get a new chance to prove their innocence with DNA evidence.

"In many cases, Justice O'Connor's votes were to protect the rights of defendants," said Richard Dieter, executive director of the anti-capital punishment Death Penalty Information Center.

___

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/

Justice's Exit Could Produce Seismic Shift On High Court (BSUN)

By Gail Gibson

The Baltimore Sun, July 3, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000970

She was the deciding vote, again and again, on some of the most critical and contentious issues to reach the Supreme Court in the past two decades, including affirmative action, capital punishment and the disputed 2000 presidential election.

And if the court's next term gets under way in October with her replacement confirmed and on the bench, following the timetable that President Bush set out Friday, the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor could have almost immediate implications.

Already on the calendar for this fall is a string of politically charged cases which, under the court's current lineup, could well have come down to O'Connor's vote. The cases include the Bush administration's challenge to the nation's only right-to-die law, Oregon's Death with Dignity Act, and an appeal of a federal court order striking down as unconstitutional a New Hampshire law requiring parental notification when teenagers seek abortions.

The court has also agreed to decide in its coming term whether colleges and universities that receive federal funding may bar military recruiters, setting up a clash between government funding and free speech, and raising issues of gay rights.

A coalition of law schools has argued that they have a right to refuse to associate with military recruiters, pointing to the First Amendment and what they view as the Pentagon's discriminatory policies on gays and lesbians. The Pentagon contends that because the schools accept federal funding, they have an obligation to allow the military to recruit on campus.

The case is being closely watched by civil liberties groups, which praised O'Connor's willingness to distance herself from administration policies in such cases as Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, in which she ruled that a U.S. citizen seized as an "enemy combatant" in the fight against terror can challenge his detention in U.S. courts.

Capital punishment

Death penalty issues also could hang in the balance. O'Connor, who in 2001 publicly questioned how fairly capital punishment was administered, sided in recent years with a majority that struck down the death penalty for the mentally retarded, but dissented this year from a 5-4 decision banning juvenile executions.

The court agreed last week to hear the appeal of a death row inmate from Tennessee who claims that new DNA evidence could exonerate him in the 1985 rape and murder of a female neighbor whose husband also was a suspect in the crime.

O'Connor wrote a 2003 decision that threw out the death sentence of Maryland inmate Kevin Wiggins, saying trial lawyers in his 1989 case failed to present mitigating evidence about horrific childhood abuses.

Two of the court's other conservatives, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy and Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, joined the 7-2 decision.

The court's two most conservative members - and the judges that President Bush has said he would most want to replicate in appointing a new justice - wrote a scathing dissent. Saying that the majority's reasoning ranged from "the incredible up to the feeble," the dissent from Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas concluded: "Today's decision is extraordinary - even for our 'death is different' jurisprudence."

On such divisive questions, it was O'Connor during her 24 years on the nation's high court who was closely watched as the bellwether. Her retirement, court scholars say, could produce a seismic shift on some of the most high-profile constitutional questions to come before the court - regardless of who is nominated to her seat.

"Her departure is a huge loss to anyone who has wanted the court to continue restraining congressional power over the states," David Garrow, a law professor and Supreme Court historian with Emory University, said in offering an example of O'Connor's influence. "If I was the attorney general of Oregon, I would be very disappointed ... because I just lost a vote."

How great the court's shift will be in the coming years depends largely on who is named to replace O'Connor. But her departure is expected to leave a mark regardless, because of her unique case-by-case approach to the job and her efforts to decide cases on the narrowest, most fact-specific grounds.

That approach meant O'Connor never fit squarely with the court's most conservative or its most liberal members, and she moved between the two blocs often as she earned her reputation as the court's most critical swing vote.

"Justice O'Connor fully earned her reputation as a centrist; she was a conscientious jurist and, in a number of key cases, stood up for individual rights and against a radically conservative vision of the constitution," said Steven Shapiro, legal director for the American Civil Liberties Union.

DOJ_NMG_0000971

Sometimes, she switched camps in rapid succession. In 2003, she wrote the court opinion in its landmark, 5-4 decision that upheld the University of Michigan law school's policy of using race as a weighing factor in evaluating applicants. On the same day, she voted with a 6-3 majority that invalidated the school's affirmative action program for undergraduate applicants.

The difference for O'Connor was in the details. But she wrote a powerful endorsement of the importance of racial diversity on campuses: "In order to cultivate a set of leaders with legitimacy in the eyes of the citizenry, it is necessary that the path to leadership be visibly open to talented and qualified individuals of every race and ethnicity."

Sometimes, her decisions did not land in the win column. In the court's most recent term, which concluded last week, O'Connor was in the majority on 47 percent of the court's most high-profile cases - a lower percentage than any other justice on the court this term, according to an analysis by the Georgetown University Law Center's Supreme Court Institute.

She dissented, for instance, when the court this term voted to ban as unconstitutional executions for murderers who were under 18 when they committed their crimes, when it ruled that federal sentencing guidelines should be considered advisory rather than mandatory, and when it upheld as constitutional a 6-foot-tall granite monument displaying the Ten Commandments near the Texas Capitol.

One of the last dissents of her court career was among her most biting. Disagreeing with the court's decision to allow local governments to use eminent domain powers to seize private homes and small businesses to promote private economic development, O'Connor warned: "The specter of condemnation hangs over all property."

"Nothing is to prevent the state from replacing any Motel 6 with a Ritz-Carlton, any home with a shopping mall, or any farm with a factory," she wrote.

"'Independent' is really a good word for her," said Michael P. Van Alstine, a University of Maryland law professor. "She didn't toe the line. She was an independent thinker, and I think that really is what defined her."

It also is what makes the future position of the court so hard to predict on so many issues, some of which have reached the next term's docket.

For the first time in five years, the court will revisit next term the emotional debate over abortion with a review of New Hampshire's parental notification laws. The case could end up being as much about legal technicalities - specifically, what standard should be used to assess the constitutionality of state abortion laws - but it ensures that any questions about abortion rulings during confirmation hearings will be more than hypothetical.

In two key rulings, O'Connor had sided with the court's more liberal members in upholding the basic right to choose an abortion. Advocacy groups on both sides of the emotional debate launched aggressive campaigns over the weekend to influence the confirmation debate, with abortion rights advocates staging a rally in Tennessee - the home state of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

"Women who have the most to lose will be the strongest voice in the debate over this Supreme Court fight," said Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority advocacy organization.

Internal dynamics

O'Connor's retirement leaves one remaining swing vote on abortion, in Kennedy - as well as the unknown views of the yet-unnamed replacement. It is hard to predict, too, how any new arrival might tip the balance on any high-profile issue, said Herman Schwartz, a constitutional law scholar at American University who has written about the Rehnquist court.

"One of the things that's hard to figure is, each of these justices has some issue where they're not quite in line with their natural allies," Schwartz said.

That is especially true in a court that has gone more than a decade without a vacancy.

"It would change the internal dynamics greatly - it would have to," said Arthur Hellman, a University of Pittsburgh law professor who studies the court. "Everybody would be reassessing not only their relationship with the new person, but also their relationship with each other, because there is so much interdependence."

One Justice, Many Cases, Lots Of Power (DMN)

By David Jackson And Allen Pusey

The Dallas Morning News, July 3, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0000972

In these politically divided days, a single Supreme Court justice can settle a lot of issues.

One justice can decide whether your daughter has to tell you if she is having an abortion; whether law schools can bar military recruiters from their campuses; whether doctors can help terminally ill patients end their lives.The answers to these questions are uncertain – especially now that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is leaving the high court.

During her 24 years on the court, Justice O'Connor wound up making decisions that evenly split her colleagues – on issues ranging from access to abortion to how congressional districts are drawn.

"With many 5-to-4 decisions which the court has handed down, she has been the critical vote," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who, as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, will conduct hearings on a replacement to be nominated by President Bush.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a key Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, said Justice O'Connor's role as a "fulcrum, right at the center of the court" makes the choice of a new justice "all the more significant."

The divisive social issues at stake are fueling the many advocacy groups that plan to spend millions on the emerging judicial war.

Indeed, hostilities have already commenced.

On Saturday, the National Organization for Women, declaring "a state of emergency," conducted an impromptu abortion rights rally at its convention in Nashville, Tenn.

"Not the church, not the state; women must choose their fate," NOW members chanted.

Conservative religious groups, meanwhile, blasted e-mails to their members, asking them to contact the White House and urge Mr. Bush to appoint a jurist willing to overturn Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 decision that made abortion a constitutional right.

Some of these same groups have also registered objections to at least one high court candidate, Attorney General Al Gonzales, calling him wobbly on the abortion issue.

Reaffirming Roe

In assessing Justice O'Connor's influence – and a successor's potential power – consider that Roe vs. Wade might not have survived without her. She and Republican colleague Anthony Kennedy both signed on to a 1992 opinion reaffirming the basic holding of Roe.

Her vote was critical in many other cases:

In 2000, she made the difference in a 5-4 case to overturn a state ban on late-term abortions. Because of her vote, HMO patients in certain states have the right to a second medical opinion even if their health care plan disapproves of it. And another swing vote preserved the use of affirmative action.

Some conservatives have been critical of Justice O'Connor, claiming inconsistencies on such issues as the death penalty and religion in public life; liberals hailed as her as pragmatic and non-ideological – both arguments sure to echo as the process of replacing her moves forward.

More hard cases await the court when it resumes work in October with or without Justice O'Connor, who has agreed to stay on until a successor is confirmed.

The justices have already agreed to review a federal law banning doctors from using drugs to assist suicides. Oregon officials claim the rule infringes on their Death with Dignity Act.

The court is also scheduled to decide whether the government can withhold federal funds from law schools that refused to allow military recruiters on their campuses.

The Pentagon says it has the same rights as other job recruiters; schools say the military violates campus non-discrimination policies with its rules excluding openly gay troops.

A New Hampshire law requiring parental notification for minors before an abortion is also slated for the court's consideration. The justices must decide whether the law has adequate exemptions to protect the health of the minor. Similar laws apply in 33 states.

Many conservatives have eagerly anticipated replacing Justice O'Connor as part of their decades-long effort to shift the ideological direction of court.

DOJ_NMG_0000973

The conservative movement grew in large measure in response to the expansive Supreme Court rulings of the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s. The court integrated public schools, struck down school prayer, cut back on capital punishment, exercised control over some political redistricting, restricted police powers and expanded protections for defendants.

Reacting to what he called the court's liberal excesses, President Nixon appointed then-little-known assistant attorney general William Rehnquist in 1971. President Reagan elevated Mr. Rehnquist to chief justice in 1986.

Rehnquist's future

In recent weeks, court watchers thought Chief Justice Rehnquist would be the one retiring because of his thyroid cancer. His departure remains a possibility, which would give Mr. Bush and his conservative supporters another chance to shift the court to the right.

In the meantime, the battle to replace the court's most prominent swing vote is being fought by groups animated by the social issues Justice O'Connor decided.

Conservative organizations include religious activists, business interests, libertarians, and legal groups such as the Federalist Society. They include single-issue organizations ranging from gun owners to tax cutters.

One conservative coalition, Progress for America, has pledged to spend $18 million on the campaign. The group has already produced television ads, including one claiming that Democratic environmentalists would object if Mr. Bush nominated George Washington because he once chopped down a cherry tree.

Liberals groups ready to oppose Mr. Bush's nominee include feminists, unions, environmentalists, gay rights advocates and civil rights organizations. They are led in large part by People for the American Way, Alliance for Justice and the Leadership Council on Civil Rights.

The rhetoric on both sides is just getting started.

Justice O'Connor's retirement "places women's health at risk, endangering the future of reproductive rights in this nation," said Karen Pearl, interim president for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

"The public is primed for the fight it will take to confirm a nominee," said Tony Perkins, president of the socially conservative Family Research Council.

O'Connor Bow Puts New Focus On Rehnquist (CHT)

By William Neikirk

CHT – Rehnquist Focus, July 3, 2005

Chief Justice William Rehnquist might be next. Or will he?

Seemingly frail from his struggle with thyroid cancer, the chief justice defied expectations in the past week by not announcing his retirement. Instead, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor turned out to be the retiree who caused an explosion of Washington political buzz.

But Rehnquist is still considered a good candidate for retirement because of his poor health, possibly giving President Bush the rare opportunity of nominating two Supreme Court justices at about the same time.

But some analysts say that if Rehnquist waits much longer, it is less likely that he will resign.

"I would doubt it at this point," said Scott Moss, a law professor and Supreme Court expert at Marquette University. "If a justice is going to retire, he probably isn't going to wait until midway through the summer" because that would mean a successor might not be confirmed in time for the court's new term in October.

The 80-year-old chief justice has shown grit in his post, and despite being under treatment for cancer, he showed up on a cold January Inauguration Day to swear in Bush to a second term.

Susan Low Bloch, a law professor at Georgetown University, said she had thought that Rehnquist might have announced his resignation this week.

"But now I don't know what I think," she added. "Now, I sort of think he may wait."

She said she had heard that Rehnquist "doesn't want to get off" the court while O'Connor "did want to get off," adding that "I just know he loves the court and has all his life. Once his wife died, that became everything to him."

DOJ_NMG_0000974

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which considers Supreme Court nominees, weighed in on whether Rehnquist would retire.

"Speaking as someone who likes to get up in the morning with something important to do, I wouldn't say it's keeping the chief justice alive, but I think he likes his job," Specter said. "And if we haven't heard from him by now, the chances are you won't hear from him for some time."

Still, observers noted Rehnquist looked especially weak at the end of the current term.

"I still expect Rehnquist to resign soon, after a decent interval allowing discussion of O'Connor's legacy," said Thomas Mann, a Brookings Institution scholar. Some believe this could happen as early as next week.

If Bush has the chance to name two justices, said Mann, he could "couple a strong conservative with a more ambiguous, uncertain appointee. This might avoid a rancorous battle, which he doesn't need now given his weakened political position."

But if the Senate does have to consider two Supreme Court vacancies at the same time, it is almost certain to make for a bitter, stormy autumn.

Named to the high court by President Richard Nixon and elevated to chief justice by President Ronald Reagan, Rehnquist long has been a conservative mainstay there.

But, said Bloch, he is by no means as conservative as Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, and if he should retire, Bush could conceivably choose two justices that would align themselves more regularly with Scalia and Thomas.

In today's political climate, said Bloch, it is much harder to nominate a justice who has not firmly settled into one philosophical camp or another. When Reagan named O'Connor to the court, she said, the justice's legal background on issues was not as clear.

"It won't happen again," Bloch said. "The president will pick someone whose views are more known."

But analysts said that if Bush has the chance to name two justices and picks two arch-conservatives, it could set off a titanic battle in the Senate over their confirmation. Already, a major fight is expected when O'Connor's replacement is named.

The speculation about court retirements began when Rehnquist developed an aggressive form of throat cancer in late 2004. He underwent treatment and missed a number of oral arguments in late 2004 and early 2005. He returned to the bench on March 21. During his absence, he participated in deliberations and court decisions.

No one knows what the chief justice will do, but Moss said that "there is a long tradition of justices trying to stick it out" even when they are extremely ill.

O'Connor Made Her Mark As Pragmatic Centrist (MINNST)

By Michael Doyle

Minneapolis Star Tribune, July 3, 2005

Sandra Day O'Connor was a chief justice without the title.

The only experienced politician on the current Supreme Court, O'Connor has dominated decision-making for well over a decade. More pragmatic than philosophical, more centrist than hard-line conservative, the former Arizona state senator left a distinctive stamp on American justice that surpassed her initial ground-breaking appointment.

"If we didn't have a tradition of naming courts for the chief justice, this would be known as the O'Connor Court," said Washington attorney Ronald Klain, a former Supreme Court clerk and one-time chief of staff to Al Gore.

When the court has split, it has usually been O'Connor holding the center.

Early on, O'Connor wrote the 5-4 opinion requiring an all-female Mississippi nursing school to admit men. Two decades later, she penned the 5-4 opinion upholding affirmative action in university admissions. In between, the 1952 Stanford Law School graduate literally defined what middle-of-the-road meant for the late 20th century and early 21st century Supreme Court.

"She is somebody who brought a voice of moderation to the Supreme Court," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid told reporters.

Washington, D.C., attorney Masha Dabiza, author of a detailed assessment of O'Connor's jurisprudence, said Friday that "if you compare her to the rest of the Supreme Court, she would be considered a moderate, but I also think the court is further to the right than most people think."

DOJ_NMG_0000975

Numbers tell part of the story, starting with the unanimous 99-0 Senate vote by which O'Connor won confirmation in 1981.

The Supreme Court split 5-4 on 175 cases between 1994 and 2003. O'Connor was in the majority in 135 of those cases. This was more than any of the other justices, a 2004 Harvard Law Review statistical analysis found. Chief Justice William Rehnquist, for instance, was in the majority in 111 of the 5-4 cases.

In other words, labels like "The Great Dissenter" or the "Lone Ranger" -- terms once applied to justices Oliver Wendell Holmes and Rehnquist, respectively -- would never fit O'Connor. She was in the majority 89 percent of the time over the past decade, a Georgetown University Law Center analysis found.

Just a few days ago, for instance, O'Connor joined the slim majority in the McCreary vs. ACLU case, ordering removal of the Ten Commandments from a Kentucky courthouse. She was in a similarly slim majority upholding campaign finance reforms in the 2003 case called McConnell vs. Federal Election Commission, and she authored the 2003 opinion in Grutter vs. Bollinger upholding the University of Michigan Law School's use of race in admissions.

"Access to legal education, and thus the legal profession, must be inclusive of talented and qualified individuals of every race and ethnicity," O'Connor wrote for the 5-4 majority.

As her Grutter opinion suggested, simple ideological labels don't do O'Connor justice.

Just one week before striking down Kentucky's posting of the Ten Commandments, O'Connor vigorously argued on behalf of private property owners in her dissent from the ruling in Kelo v. City of New London. The Kelo majority ruling empowered cities to seize more property through eminent domain, and O'Connor's dissent amounted to a conservative's cautionary note.

"She is willing to exercise the court's power on behalf of both liberal and conservative ends," Thomas Keck, assistant professor of political science at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, said in an interview Friday.

Author of a recent book assessing the current court, Keck noted Friday that O'Connor has "regularly joined with conservative colleagues to enforce conservative constitutional principles like states' rights, and regularly joined with liberal colleagues to enforce liberal constitutional principles like gay rights."

Indeed, the gay rights issue illustrates just how O'Connor has evolved as a judge.

In her first term, O'Connor sided with then-associate justice William Rehnquist -- an old Stanford Law School classmate -- in 27 of the 31 decisions resolved by a 5-4 vote. Not long afterward, in the 1986 case called Bowers vs. Hardwick, O'Connor joined Rehnquist in the 5-4 majority opinion upholding Georgia's anti-sodomy law.

But by 2003, O'Connor played a different role. She joined the majority ruling in the Lawrence vs. Texas case that struck down statutes in Texas and other states that ban homosexual sodomy. Although O'Connor declared in a concurring opinion that she was not willing to explicitly overturn Bowers, as the five other majority justices would, she did give voice to a more liberal sentiment than she was expressing in the mid-1980s.

"Texas' sodomy law brands all homosexuals as criminals, thereby making it more difficult for homosexuals to be treated in the same manner as everyone else," O'Connor wrote.

Abortion cases

Such opinions could anger true-blue conservatives, and never more so than in cases involving abortion.

While telling senators during her 1981 confirmation hearing that she would neither "endorse or criticize" the 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision upholding abortion rights, O'Connor characterized abortion as "simply offensive" and repugnant." And in the 1989 case called Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services, O'Connor helped uphold various abortion restrictions.

Nonetheless, in the even more crucial 1992 case called Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania vs. Casey, O'Connor joined the narrow majority that sustained Roe vs. Wade's basic holding. It was, in some ways, a classic O'Connor cut straight down the middle.

The mother of three helped uphold Pennsylvania's 24-hour waiting period for women wanting abortions, while retaining the constitutional right to an abortion. It was an utterly pragmatic ruling; an effort, by some lights, to settle the core abortion question once and for all.

"Liberty," O'Connor and her fellow justices wrote, "finds no refuge in a jurisprudence of doubt."

DOJ_NMG_0000976

O'Connor's prose rarely soared, and she usually kept her opinions tightly focused on the technical facts of a particular case. In that respect, she was a conventional conservative compared to a more activist judge such as Scalia or Associate Justice Clarence Thomas.

All of which means it may not be her words that are remembered, but her votes and the concrete consequences that followed.

"Ah, the tombstone question," O'Connor said, according to an account by the Supreme Court Historical Society. "I hope it says, 'Here Lies a Good Judge.'"

Supreme Difference (WP)

By Linda Ross Meyer

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

Will the Supreme Court be different without Sandra Day O'Connor? You bet. But it will be different not only because she provided crucial votes for a right to privacy, against race-based redistricting, against state endorsement of religion and for affirmative action, etc. The court will be different without her because, if President Bush nominates a replacement on the basis of that person's position on constitutional theory, there will be no one to take the court on an outing from its ivory tower.

Justice O'Connor is known in court circles for organizing field trips for her clerks. She was determined to pry us clerks from behind our computers and from under our piles of briefs, and scoot us into the whirl of working Washington. Getting out into the real world, talking with real people, was a trial for some of her library-carrel-reared clerks, but these outings were not just matters of tourism. They gave us the foundational experience for understanding O'Connor's approach to jurisprudence and her place on the court. And they taught us what the court will lack when O'Connor leaves.

She would troop us around the District, taking in exhibits, touring postal facilities or wandering about historic ships, all the while peppering every docent or captain or postal worker with her questions and characteristic energy and enthusiasm. "Isn't this interesting!" she would exclaim over the concept of self-adhering postal stamps or machinery for dredging clams from the muck of Chesapeake Bay. We bleary-eyed bookworms would dutifully agree.

At the court itself, it seemed to us as if O'Connor kept her feet on the ground in a place often dominated by Grand Constitutional Theory -- a combination of theoretical absolutes and scholarly minutiae of the kind that law professors love. Justice Stephen Breyer's opinions, for example, often sound as though they came directly from the policy wonks at the nonprofit Rand Corp., complete with appendices and concordances. Justice Clarence Thomas, meanwhile, believes his job is to return the court to the constitutional law of the 18th century, according to the Framers' intent, and his opinions usually contain long historical discourses about the state of law in 1790, as capital defendants dance on the head of an historical pin.

Justice Antonin Scalia, likewise, believes in theoretical absolutes. The court should expunge all rights not explicitly articulated in the text. It should never look at legislative history. And it should establish neat, clear, interlocking rules that can be applied consistently for all areas of law (and without further judgment by presumably less-competent trial courts). "What distinguishes the rule of law from the dictatorship of a shifting Supreme Court majority is the absolutely indispensable requirement that judicial opinions be grounded in consistently applied principle," Scalia wrote in his dissent to last week's court decision limiting the display of the Ten Commandments on government property.

But O'Connor believed that judging is not policy analysis or scholarship or ideology. Justice doesn't come from a book. The difficult decisions come in shades of gray, not black and white, and the view from the Supreme Court bench can be a narrow one. She looked to the pragmatic consequences of the court's decisions for everyday citizens, and she tried to do justice in the case while leaving play in the constitutional joints so as not to tie the hands of those closer to the facts and the people.

As a former trial judge and state legislator, she knew firsthand that abstract rules can't always assure a just result, and so her legal "rules" took the form of balancing tests that allowed wiggle room for the vast and infinite variety of real life (much to chagrin of her more theoretical colleagues). State governments could regulate abortion as long as they didn't place an "undue burden" on women; governments could display religious symbols as long as they didn't "endorse" religion or make religious minorities feel excluded from citizenship. She was also one of the few justices willing to grant certiorari in (and review) death penalty cases not just when the constitutional theories needed to be clarified, but to fix mistakes in particular cases.

DOJ_NMG_0000977

Her jurisprudence was characterized by a deference for local knowledge and a practical humility about the Court's ability to construct or reconstruct a seamless theory of constitutional law. If people were treated unjustly -- arrested and handcuffed for a seatbelt violation, unfairly denied an equal vote by crazy-quilt redistricting, stripped of their property in order to increase the local tax base, discriminated against because of who they were and not what they had accomplished, or detained without a hearing -- then Grand Theory had to bend to Justice, not Justice to Grand Theory. Like her predecessor, Justice Potter Stewart, she didn't need a theory to know an injustice when she saw it.

Most of what we have been hearing about potential nominees is about their "judicial philosophy" or their "theory of the Constitution." During last year's presidential campaign debates, Bush said, "I would pick people that would be strict constructionists."

And now, in anticipation not of O'Connor's retirement but of Chief Justice William Rehnquist's departure, activist groups on the left and the right have raised millions of dollars to promote or fight against nominees depending on their judicial philosophies. We're asked to support Janice Rogers Brown because she is dedicated to "preserving the Constitution as ratified," Michael McConnell because of his theory of the establishment clause, Emilio Garza or Edith Jones because they are constitutional originalists, Alberto Gonzales because of his position on substantive due process and abortion rights.

But these positions and writings reveal just one part of what the president should know to make his next decision. Character and range of human experience should also matter. Does the nominee have truly practical wisdom -- an on-the-muddy-ground understanding of the sheer diversity of human aspiration, emotion, frailty, and passion? Does the nominee have a sense of justice to prevail where simple theory proves inadequate? O'Connor did, and a court without members of these qualities does not bode well for our future.

Justice O'Connor's Indelible Stamp (WP)

By Viet Dinh

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

In the coming days, many will no doubt tout Sandra Day O'Connor as the pioneering first female Supreme Court justice. Most will point to her importance as the pivotal middle justice on a divided court. And some will accuse her of squandering her influence by not articulating and hewing to a unified theory of the law of their liking. In all this, the pundits may well be right in the description, but many will be wrong in ascribing merit or blame. Justice O'Connor is, quite simply, a great judge.

In 1995 I and my three co-clerks to O'Connor engaged in a heated discussion over some small point of law whose importance seemed transcendental at the time. This was the mother of all debates, several days of intense silences punctuated by heated discussions. The justice knew, of course, having carried awkward luncheon conversations and having interrupted several of our closed-door shouting matches. But she let us continue without intervention. The next morning, she handed us a two-page draft opinion -- concisely crafted, beautifully written and articulating a clear answer based on her writings and intimations in previous cases. Each of us combatants saw our conflicting points considered, answered or accommodated in her elegant draft. All that was left to do was to check the spelling, fill in the citations and go on with our coffee.

That example encapsulates O'Connor's approach to her work.

Without fanfare she hones her craft, deciding individual cases, answering concrete questions and in the process providing clear and enduring answers to the most important questions of the day.

Take, for example, the recent cases articulating the division of governmental power between state and federal governments. For more than 50 years, the constitutional enumeration of (and therefore implicit limitation of) the powers of the federal government went unheeded. On the Supreme Court, O'Connor spent over a decade dissenting from what she considered the court's abdication of its constitutional responsibility to rein in Congress. The justices agreed in 1995 and placed limits on Congress's power to regulate interstate commerce. O'Connor takes these limits so seriously that last month, contrary to her law-and-order instincts, she voted against federal authority, in the name of commerce, to prohibit in-state marijuana possession.

Given her leadership, many were surprised when O'Connor in recent years voted to affirm Congress's power to regulate family leave policies and access to courthouses. But her votes were perfectly consistent, because these latter cases dealt not with Congress's power to regulate commerce but rather with its separate authority to redress disability and gender discrimination. They are surprising only to those who would view O'Connor through the lens of a states' rights ideologue or a lazy pundit.

DOJ_NMG_0000978

Likewise, O'Connor has decried the tendency to adopt a grand unified theory of church-state relations. Instead, she reads the Constitution as prohibiting governmental actions that a reasonable observer would construe as endorsing religious beliefs. This is no "I know it when I see it" test. Rather, it relies on a common legal standard, the reasonable objective person, to guide decisions in concrete cases according to their facts.

Last year O'Connor brought her practical brilliance to bear on the most interesting and vexing current question of constitutional law, military detention of enemy combatants in the war against terrorism. Structural purists would perhaps prefer Justice Clarence Thomas's categorical reliance on the president's exclusive power to wage war. And human rights advocates no doubt cheered Justice John Paul Stevens's characterization of executive detention as akin to mild torture.

O'Connor, however, wrote the controlling opinion for the court, which recognized the president's wartime power to detain enemy combatants who would kill American soldiers and civilians. But even in war there is law, and due process requires that the president afford combatants with some opportunity to challenge their detention before an impartial tribunal. She is mindful that generals fight war, not judges and lawyers, and she prescribed procedures that deferred to military judgment and necessities.

I could go on and identify Justice O'Connor's indelible stamp in every area of the law spanning property rights, race relations, privacy, employment contracts, retirement benefits and so on. But that would be missing the point of her life, work and worth. She is not a crusader, a reformer or a philosopher. She has always tried to be a good judge, and by succeeding she has been a pioneer, sage and icon.

Justice Forged A Path For Women (DMN)

By Colleen Mccain Nelson

The Dallas Morning News, July 3, 2005

When Sandra Day O'Connor was nominated to the Supreme Court, her confirmation hearings were must-see TV for Helen Perry Grimwood and her friends.

Ms. Grimwood, a clerk for the Arizona Court of Appeals in 1981, rushed home each evening to watch replays of the hearings late into the night. "I was absolutely glued [to the TV], and so was everybody I knew," said Ms. Grimwood, who has known Justice O'Connor for more than 30 years. "We were just so intrigued. If that's any indication of what a monumental event it was ... we watched every minute that we could."

During her clerkship, Ms. Grimwood had watched and learned from Justice O'Connor, who was a judge on the Arizona Court of Appeals when President Reagan announced her nomination.

Her mentor's ascension to become the first woman on the country's highest court was a milestone that some women had never dared consider, Ms. Grimwood said.

"Now, women can dream about being on the U.S. Supreme Court," said Ms. Grimwood of Phoenix, now president of the State Bar of Arizona.

Justice O'Connor, who announced her retirement Friday, opened doors for women at the highest levels of the legal profession. But when the justice who once aspired to be a cattle rancher graduated from Stanford Law School, she found that even low-level jobs weren't options for female lawyers. Many law firms simply didn't hire women. One offered the graduate, who finished third in her class, a secretarial position.

Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, who also struggled to find work after law school, said that despite the rejections that Justice O'Connor faced, "she kept that positive spirit, and she has been a leader in everything she's done."

Ms. Hutchison, a Republican, said Justice O'Connor was a role model for women in law.

"She had the spotlight shone on her at an early time in her career, and she handled it with such grace and integrity that I think it set the exact right tone," Ms. Hutchison said.

Regina Montoya of Dallas, a former congressional candidate who served in the Clinton White House, said Justice O'Connor's accomplishments signaled that women could be seen as equal to men.

DOJ_NMG_0000979

"She made it really clear that the legal profession was open to women and you could succeed at the highest level," she said.

Beyond limits

Justice O'Connor did not allow gender to define her.

"Yes, I will bring the understanding of a woman to the court, but I doubt that alone will affect my decisions," she once said. "The important thing about my appointment is not that I will decide cases as a woman, but that I am a woman who will get to decide cases."

Mary Spector, an associate professor of law at Southern Methodist University, said Justice O'Connor had to prove to a skeptical public that she was not a "fluke" and that she could thrive in a male-dominated world.

She accomplished that by establishing herself as an independent voice on the court.

"She wielded that middle-ground position with a lot of deliberateness and didn't just influence the court's decisions by her vote but by her opinions and the reasoning she relied upon to split the middle," said Lynne Rambo, a professor of constitutional law at Texas Wesleyan University.

Ms. Grimwood, who describes her mentor as no-nonsense and gracious, said Justice O'Connor has never been an ideologue. She set political agendas aside, simply considering the facts of every case.

Alternative view

And as a working woman with a family, Justice O'Connor brought a unique perspective to the Supreme Court. "She had lots of experience that other members of the court didn't have," Ms. Grimwood said. "Until she was on the court, half the population was just not represented."

Now, nearly 24 years after Justice O'Connor joined the high court, the path for women following in her footsteps will be smoother, Ms. Grimwood said. But she noted that if Justice O'Connor is succeeded by a man, only one woman, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, would remain on the Supreme Court.

"The difference between what it was like when Sandra Day O'Connor graduated from law school and what it's like now is profound," she said. "But we still have a lot of ground to cover."

Feminists On O'Connor: A Mixed Verdict (WP)

By Hanna Rosin

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

With her retirement, Sandra Day O'Connor did to many American feminists what she's done during her tenure as a Supreme Court justice: Eluded them. She left, in part, to spend more time with her husband, John O'Connor, who suffers from Alzheimer's disease and who has been known to spend his days in her chambers while she works.

Surely your average successful lawyer has faced this dilemma: give up a career or take care of the family. But not the Chief Woman Lawyer of America -- she shouldn't quit to take care of her family, should she? What kind of message does that send?

"I was on a radio show and someone called in to say, 'Would we ever see a man retire to take care of his spouse?' " says Suzanna Sherry, a law professor at Vanderbilt University who has written about O'Connor. "This is why she's never been considered a feminist's feminist. A feminist would say: 'Well, why would she do that?' " O'Connor was the first woman appointed to the Supreme Court, and that alone seals her place in American feminist history. It makes her arguably the most powerful American woman, one rung short of the first female American president. She was third in her Stanford law school class at a time when a woman was lucky to get a job as a secretary at a law firm. That's the job she was offered upon graduation, so she invented her own career path.

Still, she never quite fit the image of a modern feminist. She was appointed by Ronald Reagan. Although she ended up in a critical tie-breaking role on the court, it seemed as if by accident; legal analysts often criticized her for lacking a coherent judicial philosophy, an aggressive Grand Unified Theory that characterizes, say, Antonin Scalia.

In her autobiography, "Lazy B," she wrote about growing up on a remote cattle ranch in Arizona, rounding up wild colts and witnessing drunken bar fights. But the Annie Oakley image never stuck. She is better known for delaying her career until her three sons were in school. Her public persona in Washington was maternal, nurturing, genteel, soft. She let her granddaughter write a book about her featuring a picture on the cover of the two of them holding a teddy bear. On her clerks' door she left a Xerox of her hand with a note that read "For a pat on the back, lean here."

DOJ_NMG_0000980

Yesterday, during its convention, the National Organization for Women planned an impromptu march on the Tennessee state capitol in response to news of her retirement. "We are determined not to have an extremist who will roll back women's rights," Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority, said in an interview from the rally, with the crowd in the background shouting, "Hell no, we won't go." The feminist movement kicked into action immediately when it lost O'Connor. She may not have been a reliable ally on their pet causes (she voted to invalidate the Violence Against Women Act, for example), but she came through as the critical vote on cases involving abortion and affirmative action. But there were no heartfelt personal reminiscences. No honoring of a fellow suffragette's guts and glory. Just the legal issues and the facts, with all the emotional warmth of a legal brief. It was understood that O'Connor herself wouldn't be caught dead at such a rally.

Smeal testified for O'Connor when she was first nominated and, Smeal says, "I never regretted my testimony." Smeal's highest compliment: "She's obviously a conservative woman, but she did not turn her back on women's rights. It was the best we could do under the circumstances."

In the mid-'80s, feminist legal theorists made an attempt at embracing O'Connor. Sherry wrote an article describing the jurist as the archetype of "difference feminism," a theory popularized by feminist Carol Gilligan and which holds that men and women reason differently and write in different styles.

O'Connor, she wrote, had a uniquely "feminine perspective"; she consistently valued communities over individuals, moderation over confrontation, wrote in a way that's more contextual, less "abstract" and more "caring."

But many feminists "balked at the idea that difference feminism could explain a conservative woman," says Sherry.

O'Connor herself rejected the thesis as well.

"This 'new feminism' is interesting but troubling, precisely because it so nearly echoes the Victorian myth of the 'True Woman' that kept women out of law for so long," O'Connor said at a speech at New York University in 1991. "Asking whether women attorneys speak with 'a different voice' than men do is a question that is both dangerous and unanswerable."

In her generation, women competed on equal terms with men, and the updated feminism must have struck her as a cop-out of a kind.

Once Ruth Bader Ginsburg came on the court in 1993, feminists had an ally they could truly rely on. Ginsburg had dedicated her career to fighting for feminist causes; she had founded the American Civil Liberties Union Women's Rights Project to argue that the law discriminated between men and women; she sees the world through that lens. Now she is the one who wins honors with such names as the Athena Award. NOW named its annual lecture after her.

O'Connor then settled into a place with the feminist establishment that suited both sides better: as the spotty understudy. O'Connor became a favorite speaker at commencement events. She was invited to the types of places that give out crystal figurines, as Margaret Talbot pointed out recently in the New Yorker. (Last year she accepted $5,825 worth of gifts, the second highest amount after Clarence Thomas, "mostly in small crystal figurines," O'Connor said.)

These days O'Connor has a new status in women's circles. She is now the mother of "Sequencing," a new fancy word that means delaying your career until your children are in school. "Juggling Career and Home: Albright, O'Connor, and You," reads a recent article in Mothering magazine, explaining how you can take care of your family and have a stellar career. So maybe feminism has caught up with the Supreme Court justice after all.

Increase In The Number Of Documents Classified By The Government (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Driven in part by fears of terrorism, government secrecy has reached a historic high by several measures, with federal departments classifying documents at the rate of 125 a minute as they create new categories of semi-secrets bearing vague labels like "sensitive security information."

A record 15.6 million documents were classified last year, nearly double the number in 2001, according to the federal Information Security Oversight Office. Meanwhile, the declassification process, which made millions of historical documents available annually in the 1990's, has slowed to a relative crawl, from a high of 204 million pages in 1997 to just 28 million pages last year.

DOJ_NMG_0000981

The increasing secrecy - and its rising cost to taxpayers, estimated by the office at $7.2 billion last year - is drawing protests from a growing array of politicians and activists, including Republican members of Congress, leaders of the independent commission that studied the Sept. 11 attacks and even the top federal official who oversees classification.

The acceleration of secrecy began after the 2001 attacks, as officials sought to curtail access to information that might tip off Al Qaeda about America's vulnerabilities. Such worries have not faded; just this week the Department of Health and Human Services sought unsuccessfully to prevent publication of a scientific paper about the threat of a poisoned milk supply on the ground that it was "a road map for terrorists."

But across the political spectrum there is concern that the hoarding of information could backfire. Thomas H. Kean, chairman of the Sept. 11 commission and a former Republican governor of New Jersey, said the failure to prevent the 2001 attacks was rooted not in leaks of sensitive information but in the barriers to sharing information between agencies and with the public.

"You'd just be amazed at the kind of information that's classified - everyday information, things we all know from the newspaper," Mr. Kean said. "We're better off with openness. The best ally we have in protecting ourselves against terrorism is an informed public."

Mr. Kean said he could not legally disclose examples he discovered of unnecessary classification. But others cite cases of what they call secrecy running amok: the Central Intelligence Agency's court fight this year to withhold its budgets from the 1950's and 60's; the Defense Intelligence Agency's deletion of the fact that the Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet was interested in "fencing, boxing and horseback riding"; and the Justice Department's insistence on blacking out a four-line quotation of a published Supreme Court decision.

Secrecy has long been denounced by liberal watchdog groups like the American Civil Liberties Union. But more conservatives are emerging as skeptics, including Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, whose bill to strengthen the Freedom of Information Act passed the Senate last week. The bill, cosponsored by Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, requires that any legislation creating new exemptions to the Freedom of Information Act explicitly disclose them. It is only part of overhaul efforts proposed by the two.

Mr. Cornyn, a former state attorney general, said he had been trying to persuade his colleagues that freedom of information was not just a concern of the news media. "The people should get the information they need to see if government is doing what they want," he said.

He gets no argument from J. William Leonard, who in his three years as director of the Information Security Oversight Office has waged a lonely battle against overclassification. "I've seen information that was classified that I've also seen published in third-grade textbooks," Mr. Leonard said.

Such missteps may come in part from inexperience. Since 2001, President Bush has extended the power to classify documents to the heads of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Agriculture. At the Agriculture Department, where officials are concerned about agroterrorism, employees can visit the agency's Web site and easily print out a bright-yellow "sensitive security information" cover sheet.

Such labels for unclassified information deemed sensitive have multiplied in recent years, going beyond the traditional "for official use only" to "law enforcement sensitive," "homeland security sensitive" and other vague tags.

"We find there's such a proliferation of these bogus categories," which lack clear rules or definitions, said Lawrence J. Halloran, an aide to Representative Christopher Shays, a Connecticut Republican who held a hearing on excessive secrecy in March.

The secrecy wave has reached obscure outposts of federal power. Wes Addington, a lawyer in Prestonsburg, Ky., who represents mine workers filing safety complaints, said the Mine Safety and Health Administration now denied him documents under the Freedom of Information Act that a few years ago were routinely provided.

"Honestly, I don't understand the reason," Mr. Addington said. "I don't see how releasing this stuff would hurt the government."

DOJ_NMG_0000982

A spokeswoman for the safety agency, Suzanne Bohnert, said it began withholding inspectors' notes because their release could "harm ongoing enforcement matters."

Some opponents of secrecy say the Bush administration has created an atmosphere that discourages disclosure. Vice President Dick Cheney won a court battle to keep secret the records of his energy task force. Former Attorney General John Ashcroft issued a memorandum in October 2001 urging officials to be careful to protect sensitive information.

Thomas S. Blanton, director of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, said the administration viewed public access to information as encroaching on executive power.

But a spokesman for the National Security Council, Frederick L. Jones II, said the effect of the Ashcroft memorandum had been "greatly exaggerated" by critics. Mr. Jones blamed the increasing use of e-mail for the rapid rise in classified documents. He added that the president had nominated members for a planned Public Interest Declassification Board that would guard against excessive secrecy.

"The administration is proud of its record of openness," Mr. Jones said.

Mr. Blanton's group, which files hundreds of Freedom of Information requests each year, occasionally gets a glimpse of the arbitrariness of bureaucrats' decisions. In 1999, the Defense Intelligence Agency released its two-page Pinochet biography without deletions. Three years later, it released the same document with half the text deleted, including such comments as "Gen. Pinochet is conservative in his political thinking."

In a recent battle, Steven Aftergood, who directs the Project on Government Secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists, sought C.I.A. budgets for 1947 to 1970. A judge gave him only the 1963 budget, because it had already been released.

"I don't know any intelligence professional who says, 'I'll stake my integrity on the need to protect the 1962 intelligence budget,' " Mr. Aftergood said.

But a C.I.A. spokesman, Paul Gimigliano, said that releasing even old budgets could prove a slippery slope. "The budget remains classified to prevent America's adversaries from piecing together the national security priorities set for the C.I.A.," he said. "This is not secrecy for secrecy's sake."

Feds Increasingly Classify Documents (AP-Y2)

By KEVIN FREKING, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

WASHINGTON - Driven largely by ongoing military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, the federal government reports that the number of documents being classified jumped 10 percent last year to 15.6 million.

Free Music Downloads Register now, and choose from a wide variety of your favorite artists and songs www.ez-tracks.com

The numbers come from the Information Security Oversight Office in its latest annual report to the president.

Meanwhile, the number of pages that the government declassified continued to drop. Last year, 28.4 million pages were declassified, a 34 percent drop from the previous year.

An increase in the number of documents being classified has raised concerns that the government is being too secretive, and the report notes that overclassification of documents has been a consistent issue for decades. However, the report stops short of saying that the trend runs counter to the nation's interest.

"It cannot be said conclusively from this report's data that recent increases in the number of classification decisions were due substantially to the phenomenon of overclassification," the report states.

The report, dated March 31, notes that classifying information is an essential and proven tool for defending the nation, but says that it can be a double-edged sword. For example, it said limits on information can contribute to friendly fire deaths on the battle field, and failure to share information contributed to the government's failure to intercept the plot that led to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"Simply put, secrecy comes at a price. For classification to work, agency officials must become more successful in factoring this reality into the overall risk equation when making classification decisions," the report said.

OTHER NEWS:

DOJ_NMG_0000983

Vast Crowd Attends Rally For The Poor In Scotland (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Wearing white as a symbol of hope and justice, more than 225,000 demonstrators encircled the heart of this graceful medieval city on Saturday and demanded an end to abject poverty around the world.

The radical and the peaceful, the curious and the committed, all poured into the streets here to deliver their message to the powerful leaders who will arrive at Gleneagles Hotel in Perthshire, nearby, for the Group of 8 summit meeting that starts Wednesday.

"Thirty thousand children die every day as a result of extreme poverty," said Richard Bennett, the chairman of the Make Poverty History campaign, the work of a coalition of 500 groups in Britain. "That is one every three seconds. It's totally avoidable, and the fact that it is avoidable makes it unacceptable."

Their list of particulars is not long, Mr. Bennett said at the protest, the first of several scheduled over the week. The activists and demonstrators want the wealthy of the world to do more for the wretched of the world, most notably in Africa. Specifically, they say, the world's richest countries should forgive the debts of the poorest countries, with no strings attached, equalize trade and put an end to harmful export subsidies and increase aid to poor countries while ensuring it gets funneled to the right people. The aid, activists say, should not come attached to cumbersome, unworkable requirements.

Buoyed by the sunny weather, the demonstrators spoke of their newfound hope that the British prime minister, Tony Blair, President Bush and the other leaders of the eight major industrialized countries were beginning to take note of the widening gap between rich and poor. The jubilant crowd blew whistles, banged drums, waved placards that read "Water Not War" and "Drop the Debt," donned kilts and flashed their white wrist bands, a symbol of the anti-poverty campaign.

At 3 p.m., the marchers - and many others in the city - halted for a two-minute silence. Shortly afterward, the marchers formed a white-clad human chain around the city center. In London, St. Paul's Cathedral was wrapped in white, and similar installations were planned in other cities around the world.

"Half the world is dying to eat and the other half is eating itself to death," said Elizabeth Hodgson, 49, a modern studies teacher at a high school in Livingston, not far from Edinburgh, who went to the march with her teenage daughter. "It won't be solved overnight, but there is no point in saying it will never be solved."

Cardinal Keith O'Brien, the head of Scotland's Catholics, read a message from the Vatican. He said that Pope Benedict XVI had called upon the summit meeting's leaders to do more for the poor of the world. The pope, he said, holds "ardent hope that the scourge of global poverty may one day be consigned to history."

Sitting on the grass at the rally on the Meadows, the city's largest park, Mike Dewar, a retired firefighter, said he had gone to the rally to help draw attention to the poverty that is ravaging the world but gets short shrift among the world's most pampered countries.

"They have to realize we're unhappy," he said, of the Group of 8 leaders. "They seem to be immune in their ivory towers. We don't all need money. Just a decent way to earn a living."

On the stage at the Meadows, Kathy Galloway, a human rights advocate from Glasgow, put it bluntly.

"This isn't about charity," she said, to the cheering crowd. "This is about justice."

'Make Poverty History' Protest Draws Tens Of Thousands (LAT)

By Ron Depasquale

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Waves of anti-poverty protesters ringed Scotland's capital Saturday to demand more aid, debt relief and fair trade for poor nations, hoping to pressure world leaders ahead of this week's Group of 8 summit.

Colorfully costumed activists, parents carrying children on their backs and African immigrants massed together for the raucous "Make Poverty History" march, which lasted more than five hours. More than 200,000 people marched and gathered at the Meadows, a downtown park, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0000984

Musicians from around the world, including British folk singer Billy Bragg, sang politically charged songs, while activists and religious leaders urged crowds to demonstrate throughout the week of the G-8 summit, when leaders of eight of the wealthiest countries will meet north of the city.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the summit host, has placed African aid at the top of the agenda, along with global warming.

The Make Poverty History coalition, consisting of aid groups such as Oxfam and Christian Aid, coincided with Live 8 concerts around the world on a day that focused global attention on the developing world's plight. People in Edinburgh watched the concerts on a giant video screen.

Along the march, the sound of trumpets, drums and whistles mixed with chants like "Drop, drop, drop the debt!" A band of Kenyan immigrants — with "Fair Trade for Kenya" scrawled on their white T-shirts — danced and sang in Swahili, at one point linking together in a circle.

"We want fair trade — no more subsidies for American and European farmers," said Chege Wanjihia, a 31-year-old healthcare worker. "We don't want handouts. We're tired of handouts."

Brian Chiwara, a Zimbabwean immigrant in a synthetic leopard-skin cloak and feather headdress, said more aid should also bring added scrutiny of African leaders. He stood by a flag that read "Make Mugabe History," a reference to Zimbabwe's leader, Robert Mugabe, who has drawn global scorn for stifling political opposition.

"Just giving money to African governments without holding them accountable only enriches the ruling party," he said. "The U.K. and U.S. should empower Zimbabweans and help us become a democracy."

Aid organizations are working harder in African nations to make sure donated money is properly spent, said Make Poverty History coordinator Adrian Lovett of Oxfam. "We'll go there and count the number of schoolbooks in the schools if that's what it takes," he said.

At the rally, Bragg borrowed Bob Marley's song "One Love" and changed the chorus to "Let's drop the debt and it will be all right." Scottish Cardinal Keith Patrick O'Brien read a message from Pope Benedict XVI calling for the people of rich nations to "urge their leaders to fulfill the pledges made to reduce world poverty, especially in Africa."

British Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown endorsed the march at a Christian Aid rally and called the fight against poverty "the greatest moral crusade of our times."

"You are right to demand trade justice and you are right to say instead of being impoverished, Africa's poorest communities should be empowered," he said.

Edinburgh residents were supportive of the protesters' cause, if a bit nervous.

Some stores along the parade route were boarded closed, but many remained open.

"Hopefully they'll be only peaceful and joyful," said Robert Coulter, a 27-year-old barber. "But just in case they're not, we're putting up a 'Power to the People' sign."

Marchers Rally For G-8 Action On African Poverty (WT)

By Robert MacPherson

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

More than 200,000 people marched and linked arms yesterday in the streets of Edinburgh, calling for action on African poverty at this week's Group of Eight (G-8) summit in nearby Gleneagles.

The Make Poverty History rally formed a walking band of white, the color of solidarity with Africa's poor, around the heart of the Scottish capital. It coincided with the Live 8 series of rock concerts around the world.

Both high-profile events were aimed at pressuring the G-8 leaders' summit, taking place from Wednesday to Friday, to agree to a package of aid, debt relief and trade reform to help lift African nations out of poverty.

Blowing whistles and beating drums, with a few Scottish bagpipes thrown in for good measure, the good-natured crowd formed a ring in the streets that ran around Edinburgh's famous hilltop castle.

At 3:00 p.m., the marchers stopped and held hands, forming a giant human chain beneath the castle. Then they observed a minute's silence in memory of the many millions who have died in poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0000985

At the head of the march was Zimbabwean campaigner Amadou Kanoute, one of the few Africans in the overwhelmingly white crowd.

"We are at the front here today and that is the right place, because Africa has to be put at the front," he said. "It makes me feel so good to see the solidarity in the people here today."

Organizers estimated the day's turnout at more than 200,000 people making the demonstration the biggest in Scotland yet for a political cause. Local officials put their own figure at around 200,000 as well.

"This is way over our expectations," said Matt Phillips of Save the Children, a major British charity that is part of the Make Poverty History coalition. "It's been an amazing day with a sharp political edge."

Make Poverty History has three core demands: debt relief for Africa's poorest countries, significantly more and better aid from the West, and "trade justice" to enable Africa to sell more exports to rich countries.

The Associated Press reported that about 150 anarchists and anti-globalization protesters dressed in black joined the march, many wearing hoods or covering their faces with bandanas.

Some had T-shirts bearing the anarchist symbol of the letter "A" inside a circle; one had a placard that said "No nation, no order."

Some pushed over a barricade and charged a line of police before running away down side streets. One activist threw a bottle while another tipped over a garbage can. Police described the incident as minor and said no one had been arrested, the AP reported.

Police fear a repeat of violent anti-globalization protests that have marred past G-8 summits, such as the 2001 event in Genoa, Italy, where an officer fatally shot a protester.

G-8 A Study In Power, Seclusion (AJC)

By Don Melvin

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 3, 2005

This week, the leaders of the world's richest countries will gather at a posh golf resort in the cool of Scotland to tackle the issues of African poverty and global warming.

"Along with the threat from international terrorism and the spread of weapons of mass destruction, I believe they are the most serious problems facing the world today," British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the host and agenda-setter for the summit, wrote in The Economist magazine earlier this year.

The Group of Eight summit will bring him together with the heads of government of the United States, Canada, France, Japan, Russia, Germany and Italy. The meeting will begin Wednesday evening with a ceremonial dinner attended also by the leaders' wives and Queen Elizabeth II. It will end Friday afternoon with a news conference and what participants hope will be a joint statement of agreement.

The leaders will meet at the lush, 850-acre Gleneagles estate resort, where the amenities include a golf course, jogging and bicycling trails and guests can also ride horses, shoot, fish, play tennis and even engage in falconry. But the location has been chosen as much for its seclusion as its splendor, as with all the group's venues since police and protesters clashed violently at a World Trade Organization conference in Seattle in 1999.

Isolated site

Last year's G-8 summit was held on Georgia's Sea Island, where the surrounding water provided a natural barrier to protesters. Gleneagles lacks open water, but its rural isolation makes it easy to limit access to the site.

Though there are only eight official members of the G-8, many other officials from around the world will attend, including U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Jose Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission. Also, 11 other heads of government will be on hand.

And there will be sideshows aplenty. Tens of thousands of demonstrators are expected to descend on Edinburgh, an hour's drive away. Many, gathering under the slogan "Make Poverty History," support Blair's initiative. Other, unrulier groups may protest globalization or promote anarchy.

DOJ_NMG_0000986

Aides to the G-8 leaders have been meeting in London this weekend to try to hammer out, insofar as possible, the text of the communiqué their bosses will issue at the close of the conference.

Some areas of agreement are already known. G-8 finance ministers agreed last month to cancel as much as $55 billion in debt owed by 38 poor countries. Proponents of debt cancellation say the loans were often agreed to by corrupt leaders who are no longer in power and that the payment of debt service prevents those countries from spending on needs such as education, health care and infrastructure.

In addition, members of the European Union, largely at Britain's urging, agreed in May to double their annual development aid to $80 billion by 2010. Blair has been pressing the United States, Japan and Canada to do the same, and on Thursday, President Bush indicated that he wants to double U.S. aid to Africa.

But Blair seems unlikely to be able to get an agreement from all his guests to take specific steps to curb global warming. Bush does not agree that science has demonstrated that climate change poses a near-term problem or that it is caused by humans.

The United States has not ratified the Kyoto Protocol, an international agreement to reduce "greenhouse gas" emissions that was negotiated in Japan in 1997. More than 140 countries, including the other members of the G-8, have ratified the agreement.

It does seem possible, however, that the leaders will agree in Scotland to support the development of new technologies that do not produce greenhouse gases. That may be enough for Blair to claim success, said Nicholas Bayne, a former British diplomat who has written books about the G-8 summit process.

"I think Blair's objective was to bring the United States back into the international discussion of what to do about climate change," Bayne said. Scientists say the United States is the largest single emitter of greenhouse gases.

Blair host again

Blair is one of the few heads of state ever to lead a second G-8 summit, having hosted the event in Birmingham, England, in 1998. His skill this time lies not so much in his decision to focus the agenda very narrowly as in announcing the subjects on which he would concentrate nearly two years ahead of time. That allowed all the participants to "orient their thinking," said John Kirton, a G-8 expert at the University of Toronto.

The annual summits began 30 years ago, in 1975, when French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing invited the leaders of the United States, Japan, Germany, Britain and Italy to Rambouillet, near Paris, to discuss economic problems. The group expanded to include Canada in 1976 and Russia in 1998.

Unlike most international bodies, the G-8 does not have a fixed structure. It is up to the country that has the presidency to set the agenda and organize the annual summit.

This year's schedule includes a fair amount of free time, which will allow leaders to hold one-on-one talks with one another. Bush told a London newspaper that his agenda also includes walking hand in hand with his wife through the Scottish mist.

At the end of the summits, the leaders sometimes pose for pictures wearing local clothing. Bush, however, said he will not wear a kilt.

Bush also ruled out eating haggis, a traditional Scottish dish of sheep or calf organs mixed with suet and oatmeal and boiled in the animal's stomach.

"I was briefed on haggis," Bush told The Times of London. "No."

Awakening Economic Powerhouses Eye G-8 (FLSUNSEN/AP)

By Tom Raum

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, July 3, 2005

The exclusive club of world leaders, known as the Group of Eight, has an identity crisis. It often is described as a collection of the richest countries or largest industrial democracies. It is neither.

DOJ_NMG_0000987

The partnership is under pressure to open the door to new members; China, India and South Korea come to mind. Doing so would reflect the rapidly changing global economy and maintain the strategic role for which the group was organized in the first place.

Yet not one of the current members seems to want to make the first move toward expansion.

These strains will be on display in Gleneagles, Scotland, this week when President Bush meets with leaders from Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia for the group's 30th annual economic summit.

China's economy has surpassed Canada's and is racing to the front of the global pack. India, the world's largest democracy, is surging ahead, too.

Five other countries not in the G-8 club boast economies that are stronger than Russia's. They are Australia, Brazil, Mexico, South Korea and Spain.

"It's hard to talk meaningfully about the world economy any more without China being included," said Grant Aldonas, an international trade lawyer who was commerce undersecretary in Bush's first term. Aldonas said a strong case could be made for bringing in other nations with fast-growing economies.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, this year's summit host, has invited leaders from Brazil, China, India, Mexico and South Africa to attend the summit. They will participate in a discussion on relieving poverty, particularly in Africa, and on climate change.

A former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Richard Holbrooke, suggested in a speech to the Asia Society in New York last month that the annual G-8 summit had become "a complete anachronism" because it includes Russia, Italy and Canada but neither China nor India.

By 2050, the countries with the top economies are expected to be the U.S., China, India, Japan, Britain, France, Germany and South Korea. Current club members Italy and Russia would not rank in the top 10.

So is it time to adjust the membership?

"My preference would be to expand it. It's very hard to knock countries off," said Gary Hufbauer, a trade economist at the Washington-based Institute for International Economics. Perhaps expanded to as many as 18 countries, he said.

"I see it happening in stages. I don't think they can admit another country without admitting China first. And the problem then becomes, if they admit China, they will really have to concede that democracy is not a central criteria," Hufbauer said.

The problem with inviting China, critics say, is that all current members have open-market democracies.

Yet democratic India is excluded despite having a dynamic economy and the expectation it will be a major player on the world stage for years to come.

At the first economic summit in 1975, the participants were the U.S., Britain, France, Germany and Japan. It turned into the Group of Seven with invitations soon going out to Canada and Italy.

The European Union also sends a representative.

Russia became a full-fledged member in recent years. Earlier, Russian and Soviet presidents could attend the meetings as observers.

With Russian President Vladimir Putin hosting the 2006 summit, his G-8 partners have raised concerns about his recent steps to roll back democratic reforms. In addition, it has focused more attention on why Russia, No. 15 on the World Bank's most recent listing of world economies, is even a G-8 member.

The cloud of the Russian presidency and the rapid growth of many developing-world economies could bring enormous momentum to overhaul the G-8, said James Steinberg, deputy national security adviser in the Clinton administration.

"I see a kind of perfect storm coming together" that could set changes in motion beginning with the next summit, said Steinberg, who now works at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank. At a White House briefing on Thursday, the president's national security adviser sidestepped a question that dealt with the nature of Russia's participation and next year's meeting.

"Obviously, the question will be, what does President Putin want to try and accomplish under his chairmanship," said Stephen Hadley.

DOJ_NMG_0000988

"There will be some conversations, obviously, in that part with others, but basically, that's pretty much the prerogative of the chair," Hadley said.

Failure Of Past Efforts Cloud The West's Attempt To Help (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

It must have seemed a wonderful idea in the late 1970s: Build a modern carpet factory in Ihiala, in southeast Nigeria, putting in place one small cog in the country's hoped-for transition from a poor, backward nation to an African economic tiger.

The state of Anambra got a loan of $17 million from a Western bank, and a stretch of virgin land was selected. But not a single spadeful of dirt was ever turned. More than 25 years later, the loan is still being repaid.

Like the untouched land, Nigeria, and much of Africa, has not been transformed by the donor aid that has washed in during recent decades, most of which was stolen or wasted. Despite billions of dollars in grants and loans, Africa is the only continent sliding backward, worse off than it was 25 years ago.

Now, a combination of politics, goodwill and timing is giving Africa its biggest break on debt and aid in years. Finance ministers of the world's richest countries agreed last month to forgive $40 billion in debt in an attempt to lift 18 of the poorest countries out of poverty. Fourteen of those are in Africa.

A Group of 8 meeting in Gleneagles, Scotland, this week will finalize the debt deal and perhaps go further. If a British lobbying blitz succeeds, the G-8 could double total foreign aid to Africa.

So sweeping is the effort that no one can say whether it will work wonders or repeat mistakes of the past, when aid fostered dependency, not progress.

"We don't know. We don't really have a precedent for it," said Todd Moss, an analyst with the Washington-based Center for Global Development. The countries that have been most successful in reducing poverty, China and India, did so with little aid, he noted.

"The record of lots of aid leading to economic growth and transformation is an old idea from the '50s that's never been shown to work," Moss said. "I am very skeptical it will lead to sustained economic growth in Africa, absent of major changes inside some of these countries."

In some African countries, such as corruption-plagued Nigeria, people agree that debt relief rarely trickles down to those who need it most. "The common man will not benefit from any debt forgiveness by foreign creditors. It will be shared by the leadership," said Ernest Emefieh, 60, who runs an Internet cafe in Festac Town outside Lagos. "I do not support debt relief because we are not going to enjoy it."

But many economists and anti-poverty activists counter that lifting the yoke of debt is the only way to reduce hardship in the poorest nations. The World Bank is beginning to favor grants, not loans, for the neediest countries to prevent them from getting buried in debt.

"That's clearly the way we've got to go if we want to avoid building up another debt problem," said Max Lawson of Oxfam, one of the British aid agencies that strongly back 100% debt forgiveness for poor countries with good governance.

The aid recipients' record of responsibility is key. The 18 countries that qualify for the G-8 relief plan have instituted reforms to combat poverty and corruption, and the debt forgiveness should provide free education, schools and clinics for about 120 million people. Twenty-two other countries may qualify later, with debt forgiveness potentially reaching $55 billion.

Since 1980, Africa's per-capita income has declined 25% and life expectancy has sunk to 46 years, the British Commission for Africa wrote this year.

African nations received $540 billion in loans from 1970 to 2002, according to the United Nations. Many countries spend more on servicing their debt than on health and education. But much of the money also vanishes in a fog of graft and neglect.

Some analysts question how much the West can do to end African poverty when countries make their own economic decisions and set their own budget priorities. Most concur that massive infusions of aid will be effective only if they are accompanied by trade and investment.

DOJ_NMG_0000989

On the other hand, analysts such as Francis Kornegay of the Center for Policy Studies in Johannesburg argue that many more countries should have their debt wiped clean, even those with records of poor governance and entrenched corruption, including Nigeria, Angola, Congo and Sudan. These four do not now qualify for G-8 debt relief.

"These countries are very strategic. If they are stabilized, then the continent has a chance. If Nigeria becomes a failed state, which no one wants, you can imagine how that would set back West Africa and equatorial Africa," Kornegay said.

With $33 billion in foreign debt, Nigeria illustrates why there is widespread cynicism about forgiving African debt and pumping in aid. Why, critics ask, should creditors erase the debts of a country that brings in more than $25 billion annually from oil exports, while most of its people live on less than $1 a day? Won't the money be misused as it has been before?

Many Nigerians think it will. Father Gabriel Osu, spokesman for Lagos' Roman Catholic archdiocese, is angry that those who squandered loans have not been punished.

"As a patriot and on the basis of sentiment, we as a people need debt forgiveness. But on a reality basis, we don't deserve it," he said. "We took the loans, and we must pay them back. See … the vanity all around us. Does this support calls for debt relief?"

Nigeria is supposed to pay $2 billion a year to service its debt. It pays about half that, and officials lobbying for relief recently threatened to stop payments altogether in an Argentina-style default.

Such posturing might not seem likely to garner international sympathy, given Nigeria's oil wealth. But much of the revenue has been guzzled by mismanagement and corruption, leaving 95 million Nigerians in extreme poverty — out of a populace of 129 million. By comparison, about 120 million live in such conditions in the 18 countries chosen for debt relief by the G-8.

Moss and Kornegay argue that Nigeria merits a special deal because a small group of economic reformers, including President Olusegun Obasanjo and Finance Minister Ngozi Okonjo-Iweala, a former vice president of the World Bank, are struggling against powerful interests to put the country on the right track.

"You have an economic system that has deeply entrenched interests, where corruption, graft and patronage are part of the system, and their history of economic management has been awful. But … the country, which was a military dictatorship for 15 years, now has a fragile democracy," Moss said.

"And it has a very capable economic team in place that's trying desperately to reform the economy and to break the stranglehold of the thugs," he said. "If you want the reformers in Nigeria to succeed, we have to do something on debt."

The Western commitment to Africa will be tested when the World Trade Organization meets in Hong Kong in December. There is pressure on Europe and the U.S. to cut subsidies on cotton and sugar that make it nearly impossible for struggling African farmers to compete.

But substantial changes in agricultural subsidies are unlikely, and this could undermine efforts to fight poverty through debt relief. "This year for us is about aid, debt and trade," said Oxfam's Lawson. "If any one of those three falls through, it means their impact is lessened.

"If you've got debt relief and that releases money for you to process cotton, but because of subsidies in America you can't sell that cotton, then clearly the debt relief isn't as effective as it could have been," he said. "If aid is used to get kids into school for an education and when they get out there are no jobs, then clearly that's not going to work."

Moss says the key to raising Africa out of poverty is encouraging small farms and businesses.

"That's where the employment comes from, that's where the tax revenue comes from, that's where the wealth creation comes from," he said. "Now aid can play a role there and trade can play a role there and not having a debt burden can help, but none of those are magic bullets."

Among Ordinary Africans, G-8 Seems Out Of Touch (WP)

By Emily Wax

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

Peter Kanans, a coffee farmer whose house has no running water and a leaking roof, said he had a message for the leaders of the world's richest countries who will meet at the G-8 summit next week: Unfair trade practices are enriching African officials and international coffee chains while village farmers grow steadily poorer.

DOJ_NMG_0000990

"Like many hardworking Africans, I have a serious bone to pick with the G-8," said Kanans, a slender man of 60 who has a college education but wears shredded flip-flops. This year, Kanans said, his crop netted about $300 -- less than his brother in Delaware spends in two months on takeout cappuccinos.

"Even if they cancel the debt, even if they give our governments aid money, ordinary Africans will not benefit," he said. "That money will only make the corrupt people richer and Africans international beggars for decades to come."

The G-8 conference of the eight major industrialized nations, which starts Wednesday in Scotland under the leadership of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, hopes to address trade imbalances in Africa and endorse two major plans championed by Blair that would double aid to the continent and cancel the debt of 14 African countries so they can use the money for such needs as health and education.

This weekend, 10 massive rock concerts, called Live 8, are being held in major cities from Philadelphia to Berlin to Johannesburg to rally support for debt relief and aid to Africa. The celebrity-studded events (Bono, Paul McCartney, Stevie Wonder and Senegalese superstar Youssou N'Dourare are among the artists appearing) are similar to the Live Aid concerts that were held in 1985 to raise money for world famine relief.

On the world's poorest continent, however, feelings about debt relief and aid money are far more nuanced than many Westerners may realize. Africans interviewed this week, from farmers to artists to health workers, say they are grateful for the outpouring of sentiment, and glad to hear that glamorous musicians and actors are championing their cause and that college students are wearing bracelets with the slogan, "Make Poverty History."

But they also said there was a dangerous disconnect between what the industrialized nations see as solutions and what Africans believe they need. Instead of debt relief and more aid, many Africans said they wanted the G-8 to focus on ending corruption and on improving roads, courts, banking and secondary education.

Another useful step, many Africans said, would be to end Western countries' trade subsidies for their own farmers, which make it impossible for African industries to do much more than survive. Debt relief, some asserted, is actually hush money to get free trade advocates off the backs of European countries, the United States and Japan, which offer huge subsidies to their corn, cattle and cotton farmers and thus undercut African farmers' ability to enter the market.

Ousmane Sembene, the prominent Senegalese-born filmmaker, shocked a crowd of earnest young people in London during a talk in early June when he condemned the G-8 and the Live 8 concerts as "fake," and added: "African heads of state who buy into that idea of aid are all liars. The only way for us to come out of poverty is to work hard."

Sembene used the example of cotton, which African countries grow but none of the G-8 countries buy. Instead, he said, they subsidize their own cotton farmers and then dump used clothing on the African markets, crippling Africa's domestic clothing industries.

"We make great cotton in Africa, but the West won't buy it. Instead they are selling us rags," he said. "Everywhere you go in Africa, in the big cities, you would think that you were in a Salvation Army store."

Corruption is an issue that Africans raised repeatedly in discussions about aid and debt relief. In Kenya, many people said they felt betrayed by the new government, which was elected on an anti-corruption platform in 2002. After taking office in early 2003, some said, cabinet officials voted themselves a 172 percent salary increase, putting them among the world's highest-paid ministers.

"Anyone who has spent any real amount of time in Africa knows that corruption is the reality. It's a disservice to ordinary Africans to not be honest about that," said Rose Mucheke, 35, a Kenyan health care worker in Nairobi. While her salary is barely enough to meet her monthly bills, she said bitterly, "the aid money will go into the pockets of corrupt officials to buy their fully loaded Mercedes-Benzes."

Kenya, ironically, does not qualify for immediate G-8 debt relief, because it technically has enough cash to pay its debts -- even though the average citizen lives on $1 per day. The 14 countries due to receive the relief are considerably poorer.

While international pop stars sing to promote relief of poverty and debt, African intellectuals and civil society leaders said they were lobbying hard to shift world attention to other issues, such as the need to link aid to a reduction in corruption and to decrease Western subsidies on agriculture.

DOJ_NMG_0000991

"You can address poverty needs by filling someone's belly, giving them a doctor and clean water and a house. But that doesn't make them competitive in the world market," Ross Herbert, a researcher with the South African Institute of International Affairs, said from Johannesburg. "A strong element of aid is about national posturing. Then again, Africa needs so much help that we are taking what we can get. Debt relief is a start, but it's not a panacea."

Herbert said he would like to see G-8 leaders focus on ensuring that aid money goes to developing institutions such as courts and banks, to promote confidence in the rule of law and stability for investors, and on building roads to help cut Africa's onerous transport costs for crops and other products.

The story of Peter Kanans is a case study in how corruption can sabotage even the most ambitious African families. His father was once a successful coffee farmer who sent his sons to college and donated land and money to build a three-story church in their town, 40 miles northeast of the capital, Nairobi.

Kanans got a degree in criminal justice, and rose to become a senior police official and an expert on terrorist bombings. But in the late 1980s, he said, he was fired when he tried to stop a Kenyan official named Nicholas Biwott from smuggling in cheap sugar from abroad without paying taxes. Newspaper reports from that time confirmed Kanans's story. Since then, Biwott has been the subject of numerous corruption investigations.

Kanans went back to farming and took over his father's coffee business. But he said he soon found that government-controlled cooperatives, which acted as liaisons between farmers and the large Western coffee companies, were skimming profits while giving farmers a drastically lower price. He also observed that Kenya was relying more and more on aid, even as its leaders grew richer.

His wife, though a midwife herself, died in childbirth, he said, because the hospital had received little of the aid that supposedly had been donated by foreign countries. His brother, a professor at Kenyatta University, became frustrated with the low pay and left to teach in Delaware.

Back in Kanans's village, many people started to get sick with HIV/AIDS. Kanans and his new wife suddenly found themselves feeding 20 orphans. Aid groups said money was being sent, but he said little reached them.

"Now, I find myself poorer than my father ever was," Kanans said, pointing to a hole in his pants. "All I want to say to G-8 is: Spend some time with the real people of Africa. You're welcome at my home anytime, if you don't mind life without running water."

The Congo Case (NYT)

By James Traub

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

In the last days of 1962, United Nations peacekeepers under the command of Maj. Gen. Dewan Prem Chand of India launched an offensive, rakishly titled Operation Grand Slam, against the secessionist army of Moise Tshombe in the Congolese province of Katanga. Within days, Chand's jet bombers and fighters had smashed the Katangese Air Force, and his men had overrun the rebel strongholds. Tshombe surrendered, and his rebellion, which was among the things that had kept Congo in a state of continual chaos after independence in 1960, largely collapsed. The U.N. remained in Congo for another 18 months. When the troops withdrew, Secretary General U Thant explained that "the United Nations cannot permanently protect the Congo or any other country from the internal tensions and disturbances created by its own organic growth toward unity and nationhood."

Forty-one years later, it is safe to say that while Thant may have been brutally honest about the U.N.'s limitations, he was unduly optimistic about Congo's prospects. The Democratic Republic of the Congo, to use its current and sadly self-mocking name, is on life support, attended around the clock by aid organizations, international bankers, diplomats and, above all, by a vast U.N. civilian and military operation costing $1 billion a year. Congo has in many ways retrogressed since 1960: few Congolese have access to roads, electricity, clean water, medical care or almost any other public services; Congo is a state in name only. Of course, the U.N. doesn't fight wars these days, but even if it did, Congo's problems can no longer be solved by jet fighters. The real problem, of course, is that tangle of "internal tensions and disturbances," which in a happier day seemed like a transitory stage of nationhood.

There is a welcome sense of possibility, even of optimism, about much of Africa just now. At the Gleneagles summit of the world's leading economic powers, the G-8, to be held later this week in Scotland, we may well be hearing a great deal about promising African countries like Ghana or Malawi, which need only timely and well-directed help from the West to prosper. It is a persuasive argument, and an urgent one. But it is also true that great swaths of the continent are occupied by countries -- Sudan, Sierra Leone, Burundi and, not least, Congo -- that, left to their own devices, are very likely to eat themselves up, and their neighbors as well. The international community has no choice but to intervene in these places. While we may know how to stand up to warlords and militias, even if the U.N. has trouble mustering the force needed to do the job, we don't really know what it means to "intervene" against a political culture that is corrupt, mendacious and self-perpetuating. This is a pathology for which the U.N., and the international community, will be avidly seeking a cure for many years to come.

DOJ_NMG_0000992

n early May, I flew to South Kivu, an eastern province of Congo that borders Rwanda, in order to spend time with the Pakistani peacekeepers who patrol the area. South Kivu is one of the most heartbreaking regions of what is surely one of the world's most ill-starred nations. It is a startlingly lovely spot, more Hemingway than Conrad: green hills fading into distant, dark ridges; exceptionally well-fed cows grazing on the upper slopes; fields planted with corn, beans, cassava and bananas. South Kivu has abundant water and timber, gold and diamonds, copper and coltan (the mineral from which cellphone chips are made). And yet for all that -- in part because of all that -- the fundamental conditions of life are pitiful. As I was bouncing up a steep, rutted road, a soldier nudged me in the ribs and said, "Look, an ambulance." And there, momentarily stopped on the side of the road, were four weary men bearing on their shoulders a wooden cradle that held a woman wrapped in a thin blanket. It would be hours before they reached the nearest clinic, which was unlikely to have any medicine.

South Kivu was a victim of the same neglect that almost every part of Congo suffered during the 32-year kleptocracy of Mobutu Sese Seko. But the region has endured an extra measure of suffering owing to its proximity to Rwanda. In 1994, thousands of Rwandan Hutu génocidaires fled across the border before the advancing Tutsi forces, settling in the rural areas of South and North Kivu and living off smuggling, "taxes" on local markets, kidnapping and plunder. Starting in late 1966, the Rwandan Army poured over the border and massacred its Hutu adversaries as well as thousands of civilians. After the Hutu threat had been suppressed, the Rwandan Army remained in the Kivus, turning much of eastern Congo into an economic protectorate. And when the Rwandan troops finally left under international pressure, the 10,000 to 15,000 remaining members of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda, or F.D.L.R., as the Hutu militia called themselves, returned to their brutal exactions.

U.N. peacekeepers returned to Congo in 2000. Two years earlier, a savage civil war, which involved Congo's neighbors as well as myriad militia groups, had convulsed the entire Great Lakes region. The Security Council agreed to send 5,500 peacekeepers to enforce a very shaky cease-fire. It was a preposterously small number to clamp a lid on so immense a caldron -- the Kivus alone are three times as big as Sierra Leone, where the U.N. had more than twice the number of troops -- and I recall senior officials at the time grimly predicting that the U.N. Mission in Congo, known as Monuc after its French name, would disappear into the Congolese vastness and maybe take the whole peacekeeping enterprise with it. And their fears were soon validated. Peacekeepers were overwhelmed and humiliated on several occasions, most notoriously in Bunia, the chief city of the northeastern region of Ituri, in 2003. There, a small detachment of Uruguayan guards, who had been sent to protect the U.N. mission in the midst of a savage battle between rival militias, remained inside the U.N. compound while hundreds of civilians were murdered.

In May and June 2004, mutinous government troops affiliated with, and quite possibly aided by, the Rwandan government launched attacks on Bukavu, the capital of South Kivu. The city, like Bunia, was protected by poorly trained and equipped Uruguayan peacekeepers. Ordered to take up blocking positions, the Uruguayans instead surrendered the airport and allowed the rebels to take the city, where they indulged in rape, pillage and murder. The Uruguayans protected the hundreds of citizens who took shelter in their compound but refused to venture outside to halt the mayhem. A scathing report by a unit of the U.N. Department of Peacekeeping Operations blamed the civilian leadership of the mission no less than the peacekeepers themselves. William Lacy Swing, the veteran American diplomat who heads the U.N. mission in Congo, personally threatened to take military action if the rebels attacked the airport. But ultimately nothing was done.

The people of South Kivu loathed the Uruguayans, and thus the U.N. itself. When U.N. vehicles drove around Bukavu, local people glared at them and drew fingers across their throats. "The Uruguayans didn't come for peacekeeping," as one Bukavan told me. "They came for tourism." And that very much included sexual tourism. The Uruguayans were notorious for paying villagers -- including children -- for sex. But in this they were scarcely distinctive; U.N. investigations, which began only in the wake of news reports, found numerous instances of sexual abuse, including child prostitution, rape, the exchange of food for sex and other forms of exploitation, among both peacekeepers and civilian employees in Congo. The mission seemed to be a fiasco at every level.

DOJ_NMG_0000993

The fall of Bukavu recalled in miniature the most sickening chapters of U.N. peacekeeping, including the slaughter in Srebrenica; indeed, the whole mission, with its failure to come to grips with a chaotic and brutal environment, felt very much like Bosnia redux. But here there was no NATO to save the U.N. with a bombing campaign. Following a request from Secretary General Kofi Annan, the Security Council agreed last fall to add 5,900 troops, principally in the form of new "Kivu brigades," and to give them a stronger mandate. In the Kivus, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations was able to replace a patchwork of national contingents of varying degrees of competence and enthusiasm with brigades of Indians and Pakistanis, among the most professional armies available to the U.N. Early this year, the Uruguayans gave way to a 3,000-man Pakistani brigade.

The area I was driving up to, Walungu, had been terrorized by the F.D.L.R. with almost complete impunity despite the presence of a Uruguayan contingent. At the local peacekeeping headquarters, an island of immaculate landscaping amid dusty squalor, I was greeted by Gen. Shujaat Ali Khan, the new brigade commander. Shujaat, a bluff, garrulous character with a thick black mustache set in a round, pudgy face, gave the impression that, nationality aside, he would have been quite happy serving 40-odd years ago under Dewan Prem Chand. He bridled at the restrictive rules of engagement that have governed peacekeeping ever since the first Congo venture, which, despite its eventual success, provoked a widespread backlash against war-fighting by the U.N. "We are not permitted to fly the attack helicopters at night," he complained. "We cannot fly with the doors open and so on." He could not just go and shoot bad guys.

Shujaat was prepared to forcibly disarm the F.D.L.R., but the Security Council resolution that governed Monuc would not permit that. He had to leave disarmament to the Congolese government troops in the area, and that would be a very unequal fight. The F.D.L.R. was a highly disciplined army, while the Congolese Army was barely a fighting force. The troops who had initially been assigned to work with the Pakistanis had instead devoted themselves to plunder, frequently in collaboration with the F.D.L.R. Shujaat had reached a deal with the regional commander in which his men would transport all 2,200 soldiers out of the area in exchange for other government troops actually willing to fight. "Now," he said, "it is as per our desire."

For all his bluster, Shujaat understood that his job was not to attack the F.D.L.R. troops but to suppress their brigandage so that life could return to something like normal. He appeared to be succeeding. Since the Pakistanis had arrived, the population of a camp in Walungu for "internally displaced people" had dwindled from 2,500 to 800. The ultimate goal was to make life so uncomfortable for the Hutu rebels that they would go back home (though it was plain that the hard core of génocidaires would never leave without a fight). Here, too, the situation was improving: At the end of March, in a major breakthrough, the F.D.L.R.'s political arm had pledged to end its armed struggle against the Rwandan government and to return home as long as its members were guaranteed "political space." Paul Kagame, the Rwandan president, had promised them a safe homecoming though not the political space, a commodity almost unknown in Rwanda. Shujaat, a worrier as well as a blunt realist, found the whole enterprise somewhat doubtful. "These fellows are having an excellent life raping the women and so forth," he told me. "Why should they go back and go to prison?"

Later that afternoon, I drove out with a squad of soldiers in open transports with machine-gun mounts. We stopped at a plateau ringed by steep green hills. Here the men would stay for the next 12 hours: if word of an attack came from any of the government soldiers they had posted in the local villages, they would bounce down the rutted lanes and confront the rebels with gunfire if necessary. Maj. Mohammed Younis, the commanding officer, pointed out the local villages along the ridge lines and said, "When we first began, in late March, we had three to four incidents every week." An F..D.L.R. raiding party would wait until nightfall and then attack a village, stealing food and raping women; they frequently kidnapped villagers, took them back to the forest and threatened to kill them if relatives didn't pay ransoms. But Operation Night Flash, as the Pakistanis called their nocturnal vigil, had at least temporarily closed down the crime wave. Younis said that there hadn't been an incident for close to a week.

As an almost impenetrable fog rolled in, we drove down to the village of Kanyola and stopped in a plaza before the parish church. A group of villagers materialized; one of them stepped forward to say that they had just found the bodies of two victims of a notorious F.D.L.R. kidnapping. Would we like to see them? Several minutes later, an old woman came trudging up the dirt lane from the village, bearing what appeared to be a large child on her back. When she drew closer, we could see that the child was in fact a gray-haired man. The woman, who said she was 65, had the stony mien of the endlessly suffering; only when invited to do so did she rest the corpse on the tailgate of one of our vehicles. The man, she said, was her husband. He and seven others had been kidnapped three weeks earlier. She had paid, he had been released and then he had died from natural causes on the way home; she had stumbled across his corpse. The man standing silently next to her, with a bullet wound in his arm, was her husband's brother, who had avoided capture in the same incident. Having told her tale, she bent over double in order to yank her husband's corpse onto her back, staggered for a moment, righted herself and then stoically bore her burden to the steps of the church.

DOJ_NMG_0000994

Nothing else happened that night. Like a modern police force, the Pakistanis seemed to have reduced the crime rate by flooding the bad neighborhoods. And it wasn't only in South Kivu that peacekeepers had taken the fight to the enemy. In the Ituri region, scene of the most humiliating of Monuc's failures to protect civilians, peacekeepers in armored personnel carriers had conducted "cordon and search" operations that had led to the disarming of 12,000 of the estimated 15,000 militia members in the area. Violence continued both in Ituri and in South Kivu, but it was no longer apt to lead to another war or to derail the peace process. In the end, that was all peacekeeping could do. The rest was politics. And politics, it turned out, was much the harder part.

ongo's great problem is the same one that plagues so many African countries -- poor governance. But this technocratic term scarcely does justice to the self-perpetuating machine of immiseration that one Congolese leader after another has operated for over a century. King Leopold II of Belgium put the mechanism in motion in the 1880's when he reduced the tribes of the region to so many employees of companies devoted to sucking up Congo's treasures, principally ivory and rubber. The Belgians ultimately bequeathed the country a decent infrastructure, though they left it ludicrously unprepared for self-government. (At independence, none of Congo's 14 million citizens -- zero -- had university degrees in law, medicine or engineering.) Five years after independence, Mobutu toppled Congo's only elected president in a coup and instituted a home-grown version of Leopold's rapacity. Mobutu stole billions over the years, while the roads and hospitals and schools the Belgians had left behind disintegrated into the bush. Unlike the Belgian king, Mobutu lavished Congo's bounty on his collaborators, who frequently left a presidential audience with $5,000 or $10,000 in their pockets. Kabuya Lumuna, a former World Bank consultant who served as Mobutu's spokesman and deputy chief of cabinet in the last years, said: "Mobutu created an image for the Congolese people that enrichment through the state was normal practice. It is normal for a person to say: 'I have finished my studies. If I can't get a government post, I will live my entire life in poverty.'"

If the purpose of the state is to organize plunder, then a functioning civil service -- or for that matter, a private sector -- only makes the job harder. What Congo lacks is thus not only an effective apparatus -- customs officials, tax collectors, policemen -- but also a legitimate notion of politics. Something so deep-seated is almost by definition impossible for outsiders to import, yet a legitimate politics is unlikely to arise on its own, because the rewards of corruption are simply too lavish.

In 1997, Mobutu was overthrown by a guerrilla army originating in Katanga. The commander, Laurent Kabila, proved to be every bit as corrupt and brutal as Mobutu but lacked Mobutu's spirit of regal largess. And he was reckless: having gained the indispensable support of Rwanda as well as Uganda, he then shut them out of power. Kabila's former allies turned against him and were all too happy to support, and control, a Congolese militia force. What began as a war in the east in 1998 swelled into a Hobbesian war of all against all. Militias, pro- and antigovernment, rose up across the country. Angola and Zimbabwe entered on Kabila's side; whatever their strategic calculations, Congo's neighbors knew they could exploit the chaos to bite off their own chunk of the country's precious resources. It was civil war as mass plunder. Millions of peasants were forced to flee their villages, leading to as many as four million deaths, chiefly from malnourishment and disease. Kabila was murdered by one of his own bodyguards in 2001, and the Katangese entourage who had come to power replaced him with one of his sons, Joseph, then 29, a feckless character who had worked as a cabdriver in Tanzania and was considered acceptable to the outside world.

That outside world has not allowed the machinery of misery to simply grind on, as it would have until quite recently. In early 2003, after various truces had been signed and violated and hostilities had finally tapered off, President Thabo Mbeki of South Africa coaxed the combatants into forming a new government. Kabila's party, the People's Party for Reconstruction and he most unusual feature of Congo's power-sharing arrangement is that the warlords agreed to make diplomats from the major-donor countries as well as important African neighbors "co-responsible" for the transition, which is to say that outsiders would have the power to impede the inevitable attempts to corrupt the process. And just as the tribal militias and the F.D.L.R. in the east keep challenging the peacekeepers and forcing them to take a tougher line, so have the members of the transitional government confronted their diplomatic minders. Political failure has been, in fact, directly responsible for much of the continued violence and disorder. The parties to the power-sharing agreement had pledged to integrate their militias into a new national army. But since none of these parties had any real political base, the militias were their sole guarantee of power. And so army units, whatever their new name, tended to remain loyal to their old masters and prone to fighting one another -- as they had in Bukavu in 2004 -- rather than any supposedly common enemy. And since most of the $8 million a month that international donors gave the government to pay its soldiers disappeared in transit, the troops had few means of survival save predation, which in any case they were quite accustomed to from the civil-war period. William Swing, the American head of the U.N. mission, assured me that the chief figures in the government "recognize this, and they want to help." Others I spoke to took the view that it was precisely such heightened opportunities for graft that had lured the warlords into the government in the first place.

DOJ_NMG_0000995

Democracy, or P.P.R.D., would hold the presidency while vice presidencies and a portion of national and provincial offices would be parceled out among the major opposition forces, including the Congolese Rally for Democracy, or R.C.D., a party from the east essentially controlled by Rwanda; the Mayi-Mayi, an amorphous militia that had fought the R.C.D; and a party from the north organized by a wealthy businessman. The men who had provoked Congo's unspeakable civil war were thus given an opportunity to jockey for a share of its spoils. Through what is widely described as an adroit combination of horse trading and bribery, the P.P.R.D. succeeded in excluding Congo's one legitimate political party, which had formed in opposition to Mobutu, and in including two essentially compliant groups among the "opposition" parties.

The U.N., which holds a nonvoting position on the international committee supporting the process, exercises substantial influence over Congolese affairs owing to its size, the reach of its mission and its impartial status. And Swing has played a crucial role in reassuring foreign capitals that Congo is on the right track. He is a great believer in "the process," for which the U.N. provides technical expertise and political guidance. "Of all the peacekeeping transitions in Africa," he told me in his big office in the U.N. compound in Kinshasa, "I don't know of any that's going better than this one." Swing is a classically optimistic American abroad, a calm veteran of innumerable African upheavals who has stayed in improbably wonderful trim despite his 70 years. His optimism, however, can feel dangerously like nonchalance. U.N. officials tried to force him out of office after his failure in Bukavu and his sluggish response to the sexual-abuse scandal, but after he mounted a campaign in Washington, the Bush administration pressured told Kofi Annan to keep him. And with a mild public chastisement, he was retained. Peacekeeping officials in New York fear that Swing's upbeat salesmanship sends the worst possible message to the principal actors. "My feeling," says an official who works with Monuc and thus declined to speak for attribution, "is that we're spending a billion dollars, these people are a bunch of crooks and they're stealing the country blind. We have a responsibility to be pushy."

The question of pushiness has dogged the U.N. and its partners, who seem to shuffle back and forth over some imaginary line of acceptable intervention. When I arrived in Kinshasa in early May, a major crisis was brewing over the constitution. A committee of foreign and Congolese experts had drafted a constitution and submitted it to Parliament, but legislators -- all of them appointed to their posts by the various warlords -- kept changing the document to transfer more and more power to the office of the president, until the constitution had become a virtual blueprint for dictatorship. I had been told repeatedly that Kabila's party, the P.P.R.D., had bribed legislators to, in effect, surrender their own powers. When I met with Azarias Ruberwa, one of the opposition leaders and easily the most highly regarded of the four vice presidents, he said, "The corruption in our country has become so pervasive that these legislators were paid $500 to change their votes -- not $5,000, $500." Ruberwa was outraged not so much at the sale of votes as at the willingness to subvert the nation for peanuts.

The U.N. was then gearing up for a staggeringly expensive and complex national election process, and the prospect of collaborating in what looked like constitutionally sanctioned Mobutuism appalled a number of officials. "We could spend several hundred million to elect a dictator," said Ross Mountain, Monuc's deputy special representative. "Normally you can get a dictator cheaper than that." But diplomats in Kinshasa made no attempt to block the process. Jean-Marie Guehenno, the head of U.N. peacekeeping, went to the Security Council in late April to alert it to this looming catastrophe, but he was firmly rebuffed. The nearly unanimous view was that the Congolese should be free to write their own constitution; it was a matter of sovereignty. And there it would have rested had not Guehenno, deeply alarmed, immediately spoken to senior diplomatic officials in Europe. A few days later, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, came to Congo to personally deliver the message that the constitution was unacceptable. Diplomats in Kinshasa bestirred themselves at the 11th hour to drive home the same point. Kabila, who knows that he cannot survive without international support, finally relented, and on May 13 Parliament adopted a new, more democratic Constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0000996

The transition process has been agonizingly protracted. As originally envisioned, the election was to be held no later than June 30, but thanks to endless dithering, it probably won't be held before some time next year. Another opposition leader, Mbusa Nyamwisi, insisted that Kabila and his Katangese entourage, who effectively control Congo's public-sector companies and a range of mining operations, want to postpone the election as long as possible in order to keep the cash register ringing -- though the same can be said for the other leading parties, each with its own fiefs. No one can say for sure whether the Congolese people, who have been hearing for years that change is soon to come, will accept yet another promissory note.

Swing told me that he understands "the general frustration and impatience with the slowness of the transition," but said that he felt that the Congolese people will accept the delay in the electoral process as long as they see forward momentum. Swing's optimism may well prove justified, but when I relayed his views over lunch in a Kinshasa restaurant with a group of leading Congolese journalists and representatives of rights groups, I was greeted with hoots of derision. Belhard Mbuyi, a columnist for Soft, a local daily, said that when he had admonished villagers just outside of Kinshasa to be patient and to trust in the electoral process, they turned on him, saying, "That's what Kabila says; you must be for Kabila." It was, he said, all he could do to keep from being beaten to a pulp. "They've produced so many schedules in the past," Mbuyi said, "and none of them have been kept." Mbuyi fears an explosion of anger that no party will have the organization and legitimacy to control.

Even if the summer passes without incident and the Congolese go to the polls in due course, the election may do very little to legitimize the state in the eyes of the people. And the problem is not only Kabila and his party; few of the chief candidates will have any connection to the aspirations of the Congolese people. "That's why it's not enough to say to the people, 'Elections are coming,'" says a U.N. official based in Kinshasa who declined to be identified. "We have to say: 'We've heard your message that you can't stand these people who were in the bush for five years of war. They started the war, and now they're looting the money.'" The official says that the only way to prevent the election from deepening popular alienation is to sideline the current government, including Kabila, in favor of figures with greater legitimacy. Such conversations, he said, had not yet begun.

The optimistic view is that elections will bring to the fore a new generation of well-educated and forward-looking politicians. And in fact, I met several opposition leaders who seemed to be essentially free of the Mobutuist taint. But that, alas, cannot be said of Joseph Kabila, the likeliest winner of the election. (I was unable to meet with either Kabila or his senior advisers, who had decamped to Katanga in order to suppress an uprising that included members of Kabila's own elite security force.) Kabila has perpetrated no atrocities; he is plainly not the monster his father was. Congolese, including his own partners in government, tend to view him as an amiable nullity -- "The presidential space is absent," the leader of the Senate said -- but one who is answerable to the same men who surrounded his father after seizing power by brute force and who appear to have disposed of Kabila pere when he became a liability. Vice President Ruberwa, who says that he plans to run for president on a platform of good governance whether anyone pays attention or not, assumes that Kabila will use the vast wealth he has amassed to try to buy the election. "The danger," he said, "will come if the election is nevertheless seen by the world as legitimate. A thief can always be forced out of office, but if he is legitimized by an election, what can you say?"

Well, you could say, "That's sovereignty for you." The international community cannot force the Congolese people to choose the good guy, any more than they can bomb the bad guys into submission; those days are over. But the only Congolese official I met who talked about sovereignty was an unrepentant servitor to the Mobutu government. The Congolese I talked to want to be saved from themselves, or at least from their desperate predicament. Even those who accuse Monuc of spinelessness or complicity add immediately that of course the U.N. troops mustn't leave. They want more troops, not fewer, and more insistent political engagement. They want to see Kabila brought to heel, even if they aren't sure how.

What, then, is to be done? After all, the doctors of the international community, for all their wealth and know-how, cannot rid Congo of its poisons; this is the work of generations. And one argument we will be hearing from the Bush administration at the Gleneagles G-8 summit meeting is that corrupt countries have to change their own political culture before the world starts pouring in aid. That is true, but rather facile. For just as Monuc has begun demonstrating, at last, that there's plenty of space for action between passivity and warfare, so there is space between anticolonial deference and neocolonial dominion (though Congo presents a pretty strong case for the latter). And it is not just something that we owe to the Congolese. If we believe that in the post-9/11 world we can no longer afford to let failed states fester, then we plainly owe it to ourselves to stop the Congolese political class from preying on its people and to shape the nascent institutions of state in such a way as to give legitimate economic and political activity a decent shot at survival. Is that, in fact, a prescription for some kind of benevolent imperialism? If so, then bring it on.

DOJ_NMG_0000997

Africa At The Summit (NYT)

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

"There can be no excuse, no defense, no justification for the plight of millions of our fellow human beings in Africa today. And there should be nothing that stands in our way in changing it." That ringing summons was issued by Britain's prime minister, Tony Blair, earlier this year, when he presented the compelling findings and lucid recommendations of his Commission for Africa. Later this week, we will see whether President Bush has the vision and compassion to meet those challenges, and grasp a historic opportunity to radically improve the life prospects of millions of those fellow human beings.

An unusual and mutually reinforcing set of possibilities is converging around this week's summit meeting of the world's richest countries in Scotland. If Mr. Bush is truly the compassionate conservative he says he is, he will not let the moment pass with the United States continuing to contribute far less than its share to the international effort to include Africa in the prosperity of the 21st century.

Africa is not looking for handouts. It is looking for help in nurturing the human capital, physical infrastructure and governmental capacities that are indispensable to modern development. Africa's poor are asking the world's rich countries for an admission ticket to the modern world. America, the world's richest country, would betray its values and its humanity by holding back.

To his great credit, Mr. Bush has been more attentive to the problems of Africa than his recent predecessors. He has increased overall assistance, stepped up spending on H.I.V./AIDS programs and created the Millennium Challenge Account to reward Africa's best-governed countries. Last week he promised further increases, including a program to fight malaria, and new teacher training and scholarship money to help girls attend school.

But so far there has been a discouraging gap between Mr. Bush's generous declarations and the money Washington has actually made available to Africa. The White House has failed to push the Republican-controlled Congress to fully finance Mr. Bush's aid programs and failed to spur its own aid appointees to get the money flowing to where it is most urgently needed.

At this point, America's total worldwide spending on all forms of foreign aid still amounts to only a relatively stingy 0.16 percent of this country's gross national income, one of the lowest proportions in the developed world. Most European countries represented at this week's summit meeting are already giving substantially higher percentages of their smaller national incomes. Many have promised to double those percentages between now and 2010. Mr. Bush needs to commit Washington to a substantially faster rate of increase to make America once again a leader in global development.

A brighter future for Africa will require more than just increased aid. The other recommendations made by Mr. Blair's commission are just as important. Rich-world agricultural subsidies make it possible for high-cost American, European and Japanese farmers to undersell efficient African producers even in their home markets; they must be phased out. Attention and money must be devoted to strengthening peace agreements and preventing conflicts before they erupt - a far cheaper and more humane approach than waiting to send help only after genocide and other atrocities start appearing on international television screens.

Donors must also make certain that African governments are held accountable for how the money is spent. Western countries can fight corruption by urging their own companies to be more transparent about the money they pay to African governments for oil, diamonds and other valuable commodities and by pressing Western banks to better monitor and police suspicious deposits and fund transfers.

DOJ_NMG_0000998

There is a desperate need for greater policy coherence in a period when many national governments, including Washington, are sensibly exhorting African governments to spend more on primary health care and education while international financial institutions largely controlled by those same Western governments have been pressing African countries to shrink their government payrolls, including teachers and health care workers.

Africa comes to this week's summit meeting proclaiming its commitment to be a responsible and constructive partner in its own development. It has made significant accomplishments over the past decade or so. These include a rising trend of multiparty elections across the continent (tyrannies like Zimbabwe's are now the exception, not the rule), an important reduction in the number and scope of destructive civil wars (Darfur being a tragic counterexample), the spread of enlightened economic management (notably in South Africa, Uganda and Ghana) and brave governmental forays against corruption in places like Nigeria.

Nurturing these positive trends and providing hope for Africa's millions, is, as Mr. Blair unflinchingly put it, "the fundamental moral challenge of our generation." We beseech Mr. Bush to embrace that challenge on behalf of the American people.

A Promise, And Pitfalls (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

President Bush's announcement last week of a $1.2-billion package to fight malaria in Africa over the next five years showed an awareness of the disease's economic and human toll. That's progress; the United States has essentially ignored its devastating effects on Africa for decades, throwing in token sums that have enriched U.S. aid contractors but done next to nothing to reduce mortality from a plague that kills from 1 million to 3 million people a year.

Speaking at the Smithsonian Institution on Thursday, Bush announced a package of aid for Africa that also included a doubling of U.S. spending to $400 million for promoting education for girls and an additional $55 million over three years to improve legal protections for women. Welcome moves all, but also a defensive strategy. At the Group of 8 summit starting Wednesday in Gleneagles, Scotland, Bush will be asked to join an initiative by British Prime Minister Tony Blair to double overall aid to Africa. Bush now has a face-saving way to turn Blair down.

All that aside, Bush's malaria initiative is an inspirational commitment that — if implemented properly and fully funded by Congress — could save thousands of lives. Unfortunately, those are big "ifs."

Bush has made grand promises before on foreign aid but failed to wield his influence over the Republican-controlled Congress to get them funded, or to follow through to get the money used.

His biggest aid initiative, the Millennium Challenge Account, was initially touted as a sweeping commitment to Africa that would rise to $5 billion a year by 2006. For the 2006 budget, Bush requested $3 billion for the account, and last week a Senate subcommittee trimmed that to $1.8 billion. The previous year's commitment was less. Yet even that is misleading. To date only $400,000 from the account has actually been spent, though commitments have been signed to spend $610 million on four nations.

Assuming Bush can drum up the money to keep his $1.2-billion promise on malaria, there are serious questions about how it would be spent. At all costs, the administration should resist the traditional method of distributing foreign aid: giving it to the U.S. Agency for International Development.

In May, Senate hearings on USAID's anti-malaria spending turned up some shocking revelations, including the fact that just 5% of the agency's $90-million malaria budget is spent on concrete tools to fight the disease, such as insecticide-treated bed nets and drugs. The bulk of the money goes to nonprofit U.S. corporations that mostly provide high-priced consulting work to African governments or create public education campaigns to induce people to buy bed nets, which very few rural Africans can afford.

The administration promises to work with other governments and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Malaria and Tuberculosis, and that's a good sign. Bush should see this initiative as an experiment in distributing aid without USAID's involvement.

Now's Not The Time For Europe To Go Wobbly (WP)

By Ivo Daalder And James M. Goldgeier

DOJ_NMG_0000999

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

From the beginning, Europeans have greeted President Bush's "transformational diplomacy" with disdain. To them, the mess in Iraq demonstrates the failure of a policy that relies on speaking loudly and carrying a big stick. Instead of pursuing a policy of invasion, Western Europe has used the prospect of membership in the European Union to help transform the countries of Central and Eastern Europe into stable market democracies, thus continuing a process that saw Greece, Spain and Portugal join after they too pursued a democratic path.

The crisis in Europe that has emerged in recent weeks, first with the rejection of the European constitution by voters in France and the Netherlands and then with the breakdown of budget negotiations at last month's E.U. summit, has put the brakes on talk of continuing the enlargement process. The consequences of turning inward will not be temporary -- nor confined to Europe alone. Nations that had hoped to join instead face a future marked by economic decline, creeping authoritarianism, growing instability and possibly even violence. As for the European model of transformation -- recently heralded as the reason "Why Europe Will Run the 21st Century" -- it will lose its luster in other parts of the world, which looked to Europe's success as a way to direct their own future.

In the last 15 years, many east European countries reformed their economies, tackled corruption and opened their political systems in the expectation that E.U. membership would bring them the peace and prosperity their western neighbors had long enjoyed. That hope may now be lost for all remaining aspirants but Bulgaria and Romania, whose negotiations with the E.U. are far enough along that they may join in 2007. Turkey will have to rethink its assumption that the opening of formal accession talks on Oct. 3 would be the first sure step to membership down the road. The Balkan countries of Croatia, Macedonia and Bosnia will have to revise their hopes that the years of war could finally be put behind them as they joined Europe, paving the way perhaps for Serbia and Montenegro and a final resolution of the festering sore of Kosovo. And Ukrainians will have to think again about whether the 2004 Orange Revolution really heralded a new Euro-Atlantic orientation after years of increasingly corrupt and authoritarian rule.

For all of these countries, Europe's current crisis could not have come at a worse moment. Conflict over the future course of reform will be likely in them all, halting if not reversing the progress made to date. Europe's entire periphery will be that much more unstable -- with consequences for stability within the E.U. itself.

The growing resistance to enlargement is shortsighted. Let's remember what earlier enlargement did for Europe in just 15 years. A continent that produced World War I, World War II and the Cold War has been transformed into a Europe nearly whole and free and at peace. Never before have so many countries with so many people made such political and economic progress in such a short period of time as the countries imprisoned for decades behind the Iron Curtain. These gains are now being put at risk.

Take the Balkans. While the violence of the 1990s is behind us, the situation there remains fragile. For now, the ugly face of nationalism is being held in check as Bosnia, Croatia, Macedonia and Serbia have embarked on the reforms necessary to be considered for E.U. membership. Once that door closes, the political consensus in favor of reform will likely shatter as leaders fall back into their old ways. The situation in Kosovo remains particularly volatile -- with the only viable long-term solution being for both Kosovo and Serbia to join the larger Europe.

Turkey offers the more immediate challenge. While voters in France and the Netherlands made clear that they did not want Turkey to join their Union, can Europe really afford not to continue on a path that would lead to membership for the first primarily Muslim country? Consider what might be lost. Because of the need to satisfy the E.U.'s criteria, Ankara's leaders have already undertaken extraordinary reforms. On the political side, Turkey has abolished the death penalty, allowed much greater freedom of speech and introduced civilian control over military budgets. On the economic front, Ankara has slashed government subsidies. The government has reached out to the country's Kurdish minority and to neighboring Greece, with which relations are better than ever. All this might be lost if Europe fails to leave open the possibility of Turkey's membership.

Similarly, without the incentive of E.U. membership, Ukraine's new leaders may prove either not committed or not strong enough to root out corruption and reform the security services. These are tough challenges -- but ones that Ukraine's neighbors were determined to overcome once they realized this was the price they had to pay for entering Europe. If Ukraine fails to get a clear signal that its future lies with Europe, the hopes of the Orange Revolution will fade fast.

DOJ_NMG_0001000

The consequences for Europe of a failure to keep the enlargement process moving are grave. Failure in Turkey might well inflame Muslim populations throughout Europe. And while many Europeans fear that Turkish membership brings Europe to the borders of Iran, Iraq and Syria, Europe cannot hope to play a stabilizing role in the broader Middle East if it does not help Turkey succeed.

After the bright hopes of last year, failure in Ukraine would be disastrous for the former Soviet Union as a whole, producing a sense of crisis not only for Ukraine's neighbors in the east but also for some of its E.U. neighbors in the west, potentially increasing Moscow's leverage over these nations.

There is too much at stake for Europe to accept risks like these. Washington must help its European friends in developing policies that minimize the damage. NATO's expansion policy, which has languished as E.U. enlargement took center stage, should be put back on the front burner to address the fears and aspirations of countries like Ukraine, Serbia and Bosnia. The E.U. must also create new kinds of association arrangements that fall short of membership, and thus do not evoke the kind of public opposition that full membership now does.

Unless the door to Europe is kept ajar, the instability that continues to bedevil Europe's periphery in the broader Middle East and the former Soviet Union will come to plague Europe itself and all that has been accomplished there. The consequences would be bad not just for Europe, but also for the United States, which needs a strong partner to address challenges emanating from Northern Africa, the Middle East and Eurasia.

Music, Politics Merge In Live 8 Concerts Across The Globe (KRT)

By Matthew Schofield

Knight Ridder, July 3, 2005

The new era of celebrity diplomacy kicked up its volume Saturday, with rock concerts on four continents aimed at forcing world leaders to increase African aid, cancel existing debt and open up trade.

The concerts, the beginning first in Tokyo with the last of the day ending in Barrie, Canada, attracted more than a million in person, and a potential television audience of billions. The effort was called Live 8, a counterweight to the G-8 summit scheduled to begin Wednesday in Gleneagles, Scotland. The G-8 is a group of the world's eight most powerful leaders. At their meeting this week, they are scheduled to address African economic and global climate issues.

In addition to the concerts, almost a quarter million protesters marched in Edinburgh, the nearest large city to the summit site, calling for an end to poverty.

Summit participants, including President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, have already preliminarily agreed to cancel $40 billion of debt in the world's poorest nations, and to increase direct aid moving toward the $25 billion to $50 billion called for by Live 8 organizers.

Critics of the effort claim that it focuses too much on aid and too little on job creation in Africa, that it is too patriarchal and that too few Africans are involved in an effort aimed at helping Africa.

The focus Saturday, however, was on stage. The driving force behind the effort, Bob Geldof, formerly of the Boomtown Rats and the organizer 20 years ago of Live Aid - the concert that raised about $150 million for African aid, had billed this not as a fund-raiser, but a consciousness raiser.

In a tribute to the first effort, the London concert began with rock group U2 and former Beatle Paul McCartney singing "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Heart's Club Band," opening with the words, "It was 20 years ago today ... "

Before the London concert began in Hyde Park, as about 200,000 waited outside a quickly built stage framed by guitars with the body shaped like Africa and the necks twisted into figure eights, Geldof told reporters: "Everything that rock and roll is meant to be is happening now."

Later, during the performance, he would describe Saturday's concerts as part of the "long, long walk to justice."

Performers around the world mixed music with the political pleas, pop-star Madonna, in London, asked concertgoers, "Are you ready to start a revolution? Are you ready to change history?"

DOJ_NMG_0001001

In Philadelphia, in a scene that was broadcast to concerts around the world, actor/singer Will Smith urged people around the world to snap their fingers at three-second intervals, noting that the pace represented the death rate for African children from poverty.

Not all of those on stage were artists, however.

In Johannesburg, former South African leader Nelson Mandela - in a message broadcast to other venues - called the worldwide event an "historic opportunity," for "a better future for all ... It is within your power to prevent a genocide against humanity."

And Microsoft billionaire Bill Gates noted in London, "If you show people the problems and you show them the solutions, they will be moved to act."

The G-8 includes the United States, United Kingdom, Canada, France, Italy, Germany, Japan and Russia, and there was a concert in each nation.

United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan, in London to show support for Live 8, said that there was great value in turning the world's eyes toward the problems of global poverty.

"On behalf of the poor, the voiceless and the weak, I say thank you," he said.

Off stage, Bono, of the rock group U2, said that they weren't there to change the world, but to energize the audience to take up the cause.

"The rock stars and hip hop stars can't change anything," he said. "But the audience can. They can put the politicians who do something in and out of office."

City Of Brotherly Love Brings It On Home (WP)

By J. Freedom Du Lac And Teresa Wiltz

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

It's not every day that you see this: A prepubescent girl in the middle of a Million Fan Mosh, squealing in apparent ecstasy and holding up a hand-drawn sign that declares "I (Heart) Linkin Park!!!!!!" A few feet to her left, a woman old enough to be her mother wearing a Toby Keith T-shirt. And nearby, a solemn-looking man holding his own stenciled statement that says: "Make Poverty History."

That unlikely brew of cause and cacophony was the hallmark of Live 8, the politically motivated pop festival that was staged Saturday in 10 cities around the world. The only U.S. edition was here, on the Benjamin Franklin Parkway in front of the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

Mayor John Street announced that 1 million people packed the 60 acres on and around the mile-long boulevard. If that number is remotely accurate, Live 8 would rank as the largest concert ever staged in North America.

No question, hundreds of thousands of people turned out for a musical smorgasbord that had the multiethnic rap-rockers Linkin Park and the country boy Keith sharing a stage with neosoul singer Alicia Keys, hair-metal relics Def Leppard and rap star Kanye West. (Not all at once, though.) United in cause, if nothing else, the disparate group of stars provided the draw -- and, every few minutes, the message, too:

Dear world leaders,

Rid Africa of debt. Now.

Signed,

The Billboard Top 40

"This is one of the most important things we will collectively or individually be a part of," singer Rob Thomas told the crowd. A sheepish look washing over his face, Thomas then introduced a relationship song by noting that "it doesn't have anything to do with" the issues at hand.

At least he acknowledged what was becoming increasingly obvious and awkward: That few of the performers chose material even remotely related to the core Live 8 message. Organizers did have the good sense to fill the show-closing slot with Stevie Wonder, who has long addressed human suffering and injustice in song; yet even Wonder's set included off-message love songs, such as "Signed, Sealed, Delivered I'm Yours."

DOJ_NMG_0001002

The crowd was blessed with plenty of sunshine and relatively mild temperatures for July, although it didn't seem that way after a few hours in shoulder-to-shoulder formation. The show ran from a little before noon until nearly 7 p.m., about an hour longer than planned yet still relatively close to schedule for an event that came together in just 32 days.

By show's end, police reported four arrests for what were called minor incidents and five disorderly conduct citations. Thirty-eight people were transported to hospitals, primarily for heat-related problems, and about 300 concertgoers were treated and released at medical facilities at the concert site, according to Tom McNally, a spokesman for the city.

The technological difficulties of coordinating so many shows -- 10 on four continents -- became obvious early in the day, when the nine Jumbotrons in Philadelphia showed Paul McCartney and U2 performing "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band" in Hyde Park as audio bled in from Paris, where R&B singer Craig David was doing a severe disservice to the Beatles classic "Come Together." Throw in the distraction of a bass being sound-checked and you had a mash-up gone awry.

As if on cue, a mounted police officer's horse, trotting through the crowd, relieved itself at that very moment.

There were other glitches in Philadelphia, too. During the Black Eyed Peas' set, almost an entire verse of "Where Is the Love?" went unheard. Speakers popped and crackled during Destiny's Child's performance, appearing to strain under the weight of all that thunderous bass. (Or maybe that was the sound of all those jaws dropping when Beyonce Knowles sashayed onstage in a perilously short white skirt.)

The Jumbotrons were meant to connect concertgoers in the nether reaches of the parkway to the performers, but the screen operators often betrayed a wandering eye. The majority of West's electrifying set, for instance, was heard but not seen, as the screens flashed canned video images rather than the Chicago rapper-producer's actual performances of the smash hit "Jesus Walks" and the new anti-bling treatise, "Diamonds of Sierra Leone." It was a shame, as the set was one of the day's artistic high points.

Not that this was supposed to be about art.

Live 8 organizer Bob Geldof's goal was to make a social statement so grand, so loud, that the leaders of the industrialized world simply could not ignore it. So, with a few exceptions, Geldof booked the biggest artists, not necessarily the best.

How else to explain the ridiculous sight of Bon Jovi's Richie Sambora fretting over his anachronistic double-neck guitar? Or, worse: a choice slot for those piffle-rock masters, Maroon 5?

At least fans weren't ripped off. As with the other Live 8s, the Philadelphia concert was free.

"We're not asking for your money," actor Don Cheadle said from the stage. "We're asking for your voice."

Cheadle then urged everybody to sign an online petition to pressure the G-8 participants, meeting this week in Scotland, to help Africa out of abject poverty.

Said actor-rapper (and Philly native) Will Smith: "We're calling on the eight most powerful leaders to do what they can to end. This. Tragedy."

These being megalomaniacal pop stars, of course, there were also calls made in the name of far less noble causes.

Having been carried onto the stage on a throne, Smith instructed the crowd to scream "Will's house!" every time he asked just where we were. He also detonated various pyrotechnics in an apparent effort to mark his territory. (It didn't work, as he was overshadowed by several artists, including West, the rock-rap group Linkin Park performing an explosive set with rap icon Jay-Z; Australian heartthrob Keith Urban, whose country-pop performance was a revelation -- even Bon Jovi.)

The Black Eyed Peas weren't nearly as braggadocious as Smith. That's never been the boho-pop-rap group's style. The group did, however, show off at least a hint of crassness when lead vocalist will.i.am introduced the last part of the group's set by saying: "We're going to do a song off our new record, 'Monkey Business.' " In mentioning their product by name, the Peas stood virtually alone.

To their credit, the Peas -- like the other Live 8 performers here and around the world -- did not receive a penny for having performed. But it wasn't exactly a net loss. The artists got to perform their hit songs -- typically three to a set -- before a global TV audience that organizers predicted would number more than 2 billion.

Backstage, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer, every performer received a token of the organizers' appreciation: a $3,000 Hugo Boss duffel bag, along with access to an impressive spread of swag, from $2,000 Gibson guitars to Bertolucci watches worth as much as $6,000.

DOJ_NMG_0001003

Backstage, in the press tent, celebrities were shuttled in and out for a little picture-taking and a little espousing about the troubled state of affairs on the African continent.

Some didn't even bother with the espousing part. There was Anna Nicole Smith, she of the hyper-inflated chest and the newly Trimspa'd bod. It was announced that Ms. Smith would not be fielding questions. She was, however, more than happy to provide a photo op. Dressed in skinny jeans and a nearly absent pink top, she preened and posed, smiling and mute, her Mystic Tan gleaming. She shimmied and shook her implants, just as Jumbotrons began transmitting Will Smith's speech.

"Every three seconds, a child in Africa dies," he intoned onstage as the other Smith shook her investments.

The Rev. Al -- Sharpton, not Green -- was in the house, seemingly impervious to the heat with his shellacked hair and beige leisure suit. He came with a posse and an agenda: He and Mayor Street would be meeting the next day to form a "follow-up plan" to Live 8.

Someone from the press corps wanted to know how Sharpton remained so "fearless."

"You have to be committed," Sharpton said. "You have to be here for a reason, not just a season. I'm not always fearless."

Rita Marley, looking glam and way younger than her sixtysomething years in high heels and capris, was channeling her late husband, reggae giant Bob Marley. When asked a question, she spoke in lyric:

"Get up, stand up, stand up for your rights," she said, "Get up, stand up, don't give up the fight."

Kami, the HIV-positive puppet who appears on the South African version of "Sesame Street," was backstage, too. Reporters diligently asked the puppet questions and jotted down answers.

Out front, the show began 15 minutes before noon, when the British band Kaiser Chiefs bounded onstage after what seemed like endless hours of sound checks. Looking like they'd time-traveled from the first Live Aid (neck scarves! oh-so-'80s blazers! rolled-up jeans!), the group offered a rather ominous opener: "I Predict a Riot."

If nothing else, the show suggested a possible new Olympic sport: The 60-acre steeplechase. Police cleared the parkway overnight and kept eager fans at bay until daybreak, when the tree-lined boulevard was reopened to pedestrian traffic and a human autobahn materialized. "It was crazy -- totally insane," said Michael Lunt.

The 23-year-old had flown in from Salt Lake City overnight, arriving just in time to make a mad dash in the general direction of the stage. To get there, he had to avoid wires, fencing, vending trucks, 400 Port-a-Potties and tens of thousands of people along the way.

"There were already a ton of people here," said Lunt's friend, Jeff Johnson, 24, who had taken the train up from Washington's Union Station. "The floodgates opened, and everybody just started running. Whoever was fastest got up to the front."

The two Brigham Young University students must be fleet afoot, then: As the show began, Lunt and Johnson were positioned just behind the metal barricades 30 yards from the stage. They were the best spots in the house, at least for the hoi polloi. VIPs occupied the area immediately in front of the 60-by-120-foot stage and even got their own folding chairs.

Lunt and Johnson hadn't slept since Thursday, and they clearly hadn't prepared for the marathon event. Neither was wearing sunscreen (which became evident by noon, as their faces turned a bright pink). Nor had they eaten since Friday, when Lunt had a small bag of pretzels on the plane and Johnson had a hot dog -- and now there was no food within grabbing distance. "We'll feed off the music, I guess," Lunt said.

And then, there was the bathroom issue. As in: how to go without losing those spots near the stage?

"We're pretty much stuck here," Johnson said. "I guess we'll have to go easy on the water. But it's worth it. It's a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

As fans wedged onto the parkway sang along to Destiny's Child's "Say My Name," a couple performed an erotic pas de deux, grinding to the music as the man yelled, "Owwwwww! Owwwwwww!" and others looked on in bemusement. There were those who attempted to picnic, bravely spreading out blankets on the grass -- only to have them trampled by the crowd.

As Wonder closed the show, the air was ripe with the fragrant aroma of day-long sweat and sunburned skin. Everyone got to their feet.Young girls swathed in the latest in boho-chic peasant skirts clutched tiny American flags. A contingent of rollerbladers danced with their helmets on. They'd been on hand to help, running water to police and firefighters. Now they were taking advantage of their access to get closer to the stage.

DOJ_NMG_0001004

Backstage, singer Sarah McLachlan said that performing here was almost a "meditative" experience. "I've never gone by myself live in front of all these people," she said. "I almost started crying."

She said that as soon as she heard "a hint of a whisper" that Live 8 might be happening, she asked her manager to sign her up.

Wonder was the last to speak backstage, switching to a business suit emblazoned with gold brocade, evocative of Michael Jackson's court attire.

"How can you take the first continent of civilization, with all its natural resources, and not give back?" he said. "It's a joke."

Live 8 Concerts Rock The Globe For Africa (WT)

By Scott Galupo

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

Hundreds of thousands turned out here yesterday for the U.S. installment of Live 8, a worldwide cluster of concerts performed in advance of the July 6 summit of Group of Eight leaders and designed to raise awareness of poverty in the developing world.

The six-hour concert, staged in front of the Philadelphia Museum of Art and stretching across 60 acres of the Benjamin Franklin Parkway, featured top American artists, such as the rock band Bon Jovi, country musician Toby Keith, rapper Jay-Z and R&B group Destiny's Child.

"With the stroke of a pen, eight men can make a world of difference for billions of people," said rapper-actor and concert host Will Smith, referring to the world leaders who will meet Wednesday in Gleneagles, Scotland.

Live 8 organizer Bob Geldof requested that performers ratchet down the kind of partisan rhetoric that characterized celebrities' involvement in the presidential election last year. Artists here complied for the most part, but, occasionally, lips loosened.

Before his performance, rapper Kayne West said the Iraq war, the AIDS epidemic in Africa and the South Asian tsunami made him wonder, "Are all of Hitler's dreams coming true -- to only have one race left?"

In addition to pop musicians, the event drew black actors, such as Chris Tucker and "Hotel Rwanda" star Don Cheadle. And the scantily clad reality-TV star Anna Nicole Smith posed for reporters, but chose not to answer questions, such as "Why are you here?"

Elsewhere across the globe, more than a million fans attended concerts in Tokyo, Moscow, Johannesburg, Berlin, Rome, Paris, Toronto, London and the southwest England town of Cornwall, where a concert featured African-based musicians.

None of the Live 8 concerts yesterday raised funds for the blighted African nations. Instead, Mr. Geldof, the driving force behind the Live Aid famine-relief concerts 20 years ago, said Live 8 represented a post-charity phase of a global anti-poverty campaign.

Mr. Geldof and fellow Live 8 organizers U2 frontman Bono and screenwriter Richard Curtis aim to convince the world's eight leading industrialized nations to cancel the debt of Africa's poorest countries, increase foreign-aid spending and open their markets to African exports.

"Don't make Africa more pathetic," said Rick Warren, author of "The Purpose Driven Life." "Africa doesn't need a handout. It needs a hand up."

The Live 8 concerts, London's in particular, were criticized for excluding nonwhite musicians. Philadelphia's lineup, meanwhile, was heavy on black hip-hop and R&B artists, such as Mr. West, the Black Eyed Peas and Alicia Keys.

Record producer and Philadelphia event organizer Russell Simmons said "no big idea carries in America without hip-hop."

Benjamin Chavis of the Hip-Hop Summit Action Network said, "Hip-hop is a growing cultural phenomenon throughout Africa. We want to connect."

Attendance figures here were disputed primarily owing to the no-ticket, all-invitation nature of the event. (Concertgoers at London's Hyde Park, in contrast, were awarded tickets on a lottery basis.)

Thousands of people streamed through Philadelphia's center-city core -- which was closed to vehicle traffic -- just to be within reverberatory earshot of the music.

DOJ_NMG_0001005

Veteran local promoter Larry Magid reported "no surprises" about midway through the afternoon.

"Are we good or what?" said local disc jockey Cindy Drew, boasting of the city's capacity to handle large crowds.

Crane-hoisted hoses sprayed the crush of people on the parkway, whose carnival-like perimeter was dominated by freelance T-shirt hawkers and a bevy of food vendors.

In fact, a minor pre-concert controversy here revolved around the seemingly disproportionate share -- 17 percent -- of minority set-aside vending spaces that were given to Philadelphia Mayor John F. Street's brother, T. Milton Street.

"There was no special arrangement for him," a spokesman for a food company partnering with Mr. Street told the Philadelphia Inquirer.

In Johannesburg, former South African President Nelson Mandela received a five-minute ovation, according to wire reports. "History and the generations to come will judge our leaders by the decisions they make in the coming weeks," Mr. Mandela said. "I say to all those leaders: Do not look the other way. Do not hesitate ... . It is within your power to prevent a genocide."

In Hyde Park, Paul McCartney and U2 opened the show jointly with a rendition of the Beatles classic "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band." Aptly enough, the song's first line evoked the anniversary of the original Live Aid: "It was 20 years ago today ... ."

Organizers estimated that up to 85 percent of the world's population had access to the Live 8 concerts through television, radio or online broadcasts. In parts of Europe, the concerts could be viewed on mobile phones, according to Ralph Simon, head of the London-based Mobilium Group.

Asked in Philadelphia if artists felt they were competing with the $200-million-raising-legacy of Live Aid, Def Leppard frontman Joe Elliott said, "We're not competing with anybody. Everybody wins today."

Musical Cry To Help Africa's Poor Is Heard Around Globe (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Hundreds of thousands of people gathered here and in nine other spots around the world on Saturday for a series of free concerts meant to persuade world leaders to give more money to fight poverty in Africa.

The concerts, held in South Africa as well as in each of the eight countries whose leaders will gather at the Group of 8 summit meeting in Scotland starting on Wednesday, were a triumph of logistical flexibility, extravagant idealism and strange juxtapositions.

In London, the preternaturally scruffy Sir Bob Geldof, the former Boomtown Rat and the events organizer, performed an old favorite, "I Don't Like Mondays," while the clean-cut billionaire Bill Gates told the cheering crowd that "some day in the future, all the people in the world will be able to lead a healthy life."

Conceived only in May and organized in haste, with additions popping up at the last minute - concerts in Moscow and Japan were announced just a few days ago - the Live 8 shows were intended to send a loud message to the leaders of the eight countries before their meeting.

In Philadelphia, an estimated 1.5 million people heard the rapper and actor Will Smith relay the sobering statistic that in Africa, one child dies every three seconds. In Johannesburg some 40,000 people gathered to listen to the music and to denounce the selfishness of the world's richest countries.

"They owe us," said the South African pop star Zola, speaking of Europe. "They are the ones who brought slavery, killed our ancestors. If anybody must pay, they must pay us back so that we can have jobs and education."

Elsewhere, some of the stars seemed unsure of the statistics they were citing - in London, performers could not agree whether 50,000 Africans die of poverty every day, or just 20,000 - but the sentiment was there. "This is our moment; this is our time; this is our chance to stand up for what's right," Bono of U2 told the crowd in Hyde Park, saying 3,000 Africans die every day of bites from disease-carrying mosquitoes.

U2 led off the concert here, playing "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band" along with one of its composers, Sir Paul McCartney. The familiar opening line - "It was 20 years ago today" - was an affectionate reference to Live Aid, the multiact extravaganza staged in 1985, also by Sir Bob, to raise money directly for African famine relief.

DOJ_NMG_0001006

Expectations for Live 8 were high, as was on-the-scene euphoria. Chris Martin, the charismatic frontman of Coldplay, which performed in London, called the concerts "the greatest thing that's ever been organized, probably, in the history of the world."

According to Sir Bob, who sweet-talked, strong-armed and shamed politicians and musicians into endorsing and taking part in the 10 concerts, the collective gatherings constituted "the largest mandate for action in history."

Among his "demands" were that the Group of 8 leaders increase aid to Africa by $25 billion, as well as send an additional $25 billion to impoverished non-African countries.

The concerts included more than 200 musical acts scheduled to play more than 69 hours of music. Organizers said 5.5 billion people would be able to watch or listen on the Internet and over 182 television stations and 2,000 radio networks and stations.

Enormous crowds turned out for the concerts in London and in Philadelphia, where a diverse and mellow crowd withstood 85-degree heat to listen to bands including Destiny's Child and the Black-Eyed Peas. But some of the other concerts - held in Barrie, Canada; Berlin; Johannesburg; the Eden Project, an ecological theme park in Cornwall, southwestern England; Moscow; Versailles, France; Philadelphia; Rome; and Chiba, Japan - proved not as well-attended as expected.

The concert in Japan drew just 10,000 spectators, in a stadium that holds twice that many. At the Circus Maximus in Rome, the crowd was estimated at about 200,000, and enthusiasm was high. "I wanted to raise their awareness about issues like canceling the debt," Isabella Dandina, a 40-year-old housewife, said of her three teenage children. She said she thought the initiative would jolt the Group of 8 leaders into action. "We're all voters, if you want to put it in blackmail terms," she said.

The mood was festive at the Brandenburg Gate in Berlin, too. "I can feel a sense of community among all the people," said 31-year-old Peter Gabriel, a computer engineer, "and many of the band leaders actually seem very convincing in what they say."

Many Africans were not aware that concerts were being held on their behalf. "I hope it's going to help us Africans," said Jane Waisaka, a hairdresser in Nairobi, "but I really don't know how."

Sir Bob has certainly been doing his best to prod politicians into paying attention, publicly berating Italy and Canada, saying they do not spend enough money on foreign aid.

The call was taken up at the concert in Barrie, a town about an hour north of Toronto, where the Canadian musician Tom Cochrane said onstage that foreign aid should represent 0.7 percent of the country's gross domestic product.

But a poll published Saturday said most Canadians agreed with their prime minister, Paul Martin, that spending should be kept in check so as to preserve the country's budget surplus.

"I'm sure Bob Geldof means well," the commentator Connie Woodcock wrote recently in the Toronto Sun, "but where does this second-string musician get off telling Paul Martin he doesn't like our foreign aid spending?"

Start To Make It Better, Live 8 Urges (LAT)

By Randy Lewis and Vanora Bennett

LAT -- Live 8, July 3, 2005

The day began here with Paul McCartney and U2 joining forces, climaxed with the emotionally charged reunion of iconic '70s rock band Pink Floyd and wrapped with an all-star cast singing the Beatles' "Hey Jude."

And that was just on one of the 10 stages around the world that were part of Saturday's Live 8 concert extravaganza to raise awareness about poverty in Africa.

American rock band Green Day powered through Queen's "We Are the Champions" in Berlin, husband-wife country music stars Tim McGraw and Faith Hill topped the bill in Rome, and in Canada, Neil Young delivered a tenacious rendition of his sardonic anthem "Rockin' in the Free World" in his first public performance since a brain aneurysm in March.

About 900,000 people turned out in nine countries for the free concerts, which were broadcast live on TV, radio and over the Internet in 140 countries to a potential audience estimated at more than 1 billion.

"This is our moment, this is our time," U2 singer Bono, one of the driving forces behind Live 8 and 1985's Live Aid, said in front of an estimated 200,000 people at London's Hyde Park. "This is our chance to stand up for what's right. We're not asking for charity. We're asking for justice."

DOJ_NMG_0001007

Unlike the Live Aid concerts in London and Philadelphia two decades ago, at which fans were asked to open their hearts and their wallets to help famine victims in Africa, the thrust of Live 8 wasn't raising funds, but consciousness about the toll poverty is taking in Africa.

Musicians and celebrity speakers urged audiences to pressure President Bush, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and leaders of other wealthy nations to take swift action when they meet for the annual Group of 8 summit Wednesday near Edinburgh, Scotland. About 220,000 people gathered there Saturday for a rally timed to coincide with the summit and the concerts.

Live 8 supporters want the G-8 to adopt a three-pronged program mirroring recommendations by Britain's Commission on Africa, of which Bob Geldof, organizer of Live 8 and Live Aid, is a member. It calls for canceling debts, increasing foreign aid and ending trade tariffs for impoverished African nations.

McCartney and U2, who sang the Beatles' "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band" on Saturday, were joined in London by other Live Aid veterans, including the Who, Madonna, Elton John and Sting.

At other venues, Stevie Wonder, Jay-Z, Celine Dion and more than 100 pop, rock and rap performers took the stage in Philadelphia, Moscow, Tokyo, Berlin, Rome, Paris, Toronto, Johannesburg, South Africa, and Cornwall, England. Many of the musicians were children when Live Aid was staged, and many watching the Live 8 shows hadn't been born.

"This is really the United Nations," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan told the London audience on a warm afternoon. "The whole world has come together in solidarity with the poor. On the behalf of the poor, the voices of the weak have said thank you."

In Johannesburg, former South African President Nelson Mandela received a five-minute standing ovation from an audience of more than 8,000 after saying, "History and the generations to come will judge our leaders by the decisions they make in the coming weeks."

Anti-establishment rock stars even turned over stage time to one of the world's most famous capitalists and philanthropists, Microsoft Corp. co-founder Bill Gates, who received a hero's welcome. "We can do it," he said, "and when we do it, it will be the best thing humanity has ever done."

As chairman of this year's G-8 summit, Blair has promised to put the issue of poverty in Africa at the top of the group's agenda. Saturday's concerts were hastily mounted after being announced in May by Bono and Geldof.

In one of the day's most dramatic and emotional moments, Geldof addressed the skepticism directed at him about pop musicians and their fans attempting to influence world politics.

"Mahatma Gandhi freed a continent, Martin Luther King freed a people, Nelson Mandela freed a country," Geldof told the London crowd. "It does work — they will listen."

Then he brought out Birhan Woldu, a 24-year-old Ethiopian woman who he said was prominently featured in a documentary shown at Live Aid about the famine then gripping her country.

In that film, Woldu, then a toddler, had been wrapped in a burial shroud because nuns caring for the starving told her father she was within 15 minutes of death. She survived, and with the help of money and services generated by Live Aid, she grew up and recently took exams for a college degree in agricultural studies.

After she told the crowd, through an interpreter, "We Africans love you very much," Geldof defiantly said: "There — don't let them tell you this stuff doesn't work." He then introduced Madonna, who kissed Weldu.

In addition to Green Day, the Berlin lineup included Beach Boys founder Brian Wilson and rock band Audioslave. The concert in Johannesburg and a smaller event in Cornwall, heavy with African acts, were arranged after Geldof and other Live 8 organizers were criticized for including few black performers in London. Geldof noted the heavy rap and R&B contingent in Philadelphia, and said the priority was to get big-name acts that could draw a wide audience.

The Live 8 concert in France at the Palace of Versailles outside Paris featured the Cure, Italian tenor Andrea Bocelli, Latin pop star Shakira and numerous French pop acts that drew about 65,000 people. The show near Tokyo, added relatively late and headlined by Icelandic singer Björk and U.S. punk band Good Charlotte, pulled in about 10,000 people — half the capacity of the Makuhari Messe hall.

DOJ_NMG_0001008

"What we did in the Beatles really overtook us and our intentions," McCartney said ahead of Saturday's performances. "When it is remembered and loved that way, you can only appreciate that something mighty has happened, way beyond anything we set out to do. I think the same thing is happening with Live 8 now."

Geldof had asked performers to refrain from criticizing world leaders, which resulted in a minimum of pointedly politicized pronouncements. In Philadelphia, rapper Jay-Z alluded to "billions of dollars being spent to kill people," and German punk rocker Campino told the Berlin audience, "We have to get Africa out of USA's headlock."

Times staff writer Lewis reported from Los Angeles and special correspondent Bennett from London. Times staff writers Achrene Sicakyuz in Paris, Christian Retzlaff in Berlin and Natasha Yefimova in Moscow contributed to this report.

Tone Deaf On Africa (NYT)

By William Easterly

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

BONO, Jeffrey Sachs, Tony Blair, rock bands, finance ministers and aid agencies have been vowing to "make poverty history" in Africa as the Group of 8 summit meeting in Scotland begins this week. The proponents of a comprehensive plan to end Africa's poverty say the solutions are easy. For example, Gordon Brown, Britain's chancellor of the Exchequer, says preventing the deaths of five million children over the next 10 years would cost just $3 more for each new mother in the world's poorest countries. All told, Tony Blair's Commission for Africa calls for $25 billion more in aid to Africa per year.

It's great that so many are finally noticing the tragedy of Africa. But sadly, historical evidence says that the solutions offered by big plans are not so easy. From 1960 to 2003, we spent $568 billion (in today's dollars) to end poverty in Africa. Yet these efforts still did not lift Africa from misery and stagnation.

Why don't big plans work? Because they miss the critical elements of feedback and accountability. If consumers like a product, its maker prospers; if they don't, the company goes out of business. If voters complain about public services to their local politician, the politician either fixes the problem or gets voted out of office. It doesn't always work, but it works well enough for rich people to get potato chips and paved roads.

For the poor, Professor Sachs and the United Nations Millennium Project propose everything from nitrogen-fixing leguminous trees to replenish the soil, to rainwater harvesting, to battery-charging stations, for, by my count, 449 interventions. Poor Africans have no market or democratic mechanisms to let planners in New York know which of the 449 interventions they need, whether they are satisfied with the results, or whether the goods ever arrived at all.

Take the nitrogen-fixing leguminous trees that cure exhausted soils. As one study pointed out, the trees don't grow well in shade, they can proliferate as weeds and they can wind up competing for soil nutrients, especially in arid areas. It's easy to decree a solution at the top, but it will never work without the detailed local knowledge at the bottom - which planners in New York cannot possibly process.

To make it worse, the United Nations agencies, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and national aid agencies like the United States Agency for International Development are jointly responsible for these interventions to reach the Millennium Development Goals (which are various indicators of reduced poverty). Collective responsibility for big goals doesn't hold any one agency accountable if the effort fails; they can always point to others as the ones who are to blame.

Who took responsibility, for example, for missing the goal of universal primary school enrollment by 2000 set by a 1990 United Nations conference? Instead, it is now one of the Millennium Development Goals for 2015.

The sensible alternative is to concentrate on piecemeal solutions to poor people's problems. You can evaluate the results of a specific intervention by comparing them with conditions in another group without the intervention, and you can get feedback from those affected and hold an individual aid agency accountable.

The Dutch aid organization I.C.S. Africa distributed deworming drugs to schoolchildren in the Busia district of Kenya. Ninety-two percent of the children had intestinal worms that cause listlessness, malnutrition and pain. I.C.S. invited economists to evaluate its program, comparing those children who got the drugs with those who did not. The deworming drugs decreased school absenteeism by a quarter. "Pupils who had been miserable now became active and lifeful," said a schoolteacher.

DOJ_NMG_0001009

Piecemeal projects have led to progress in other areas as well. Twenty-five percent of the population in African countries had access to clean water in 1970; 60 percent do so today. The enrollment rate in secondary school has gone from less than 5 percent to more than 30 percent over the last 40 years; over the same period, increased vaccination helped infant mortality fall by more than a third. Aid agencies are more accountable on visible piecemeal steps like water pipes and wells, school buildings and vaccinations - where individual contributions can be measured - than they are on nebulous goals like African poverty reduction, which depends on many players and many factors.

Piecemeal fixers do not promise the miracles that planners do; they just quietly deliver results. Accountability for aid would transfer power from planners to fixers, both African and foreign. Maybe then we can hold some aid agency accountable to get the full value of those three additional dollars to each new mother.

O.K., Japan Isn't Taking Over The World. But China... (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

NOT even 20 years have passed since the apparently unstoppable Japanese economic juggernaut struck fear in the hearts of Americans, and now China has emerged to be seen as the new economic menace threatening the nation's vital strategic interests.

America's boom in the 1990's, coupled with Japan's decline into an economic quagmire through much of the decade, quelled most fears that the Japanese were going to eat our economic lunch.

But now China has set out to snap up everything from Unocal to Maytag, not to mention a steady diet of United States Treasury bonds. And many of the leading voices who worried about Japan in the 1980's are warning that China presents a much bigger and more complex conundrum.

"In retrospect I probably did overstate the nature of the Japanese challenge," said Chalmers Johnson, a prominent expert on Asia who in the early 1990's argued that Japan was "the only nation with real leverage over the United States." But, he added, "China is several orders of magnitude different from Japan."

China is not only much bigger and more populous. Its economy is likely to become the largest in the world at some point in the next 50 years. As China keeps growing at a rubber-burning pace, competition with the United States over energy resources alone could cause substantial tension.

Americans' fear of Japan's ascendancy in the 1980's was inspired by economics and pride. The growing bilateral trade deficit, as Japanese companies acquired leadership in industries that were once dominated by American businesses, cast a pall on America's self-confidence. The Japanese purchase of high-profile American assets, whether Columbia Pictures or the Pebble Beach golf course, just rubbed it in.

Relations with China have a more complex geopolitical dimension. Unlike Japan, China is likely to become a military power. And it is not an unconditional ally. From Taiwan to the Middle East, the strategic interests of China diverge from America's. As it throws its weight around, to secure supplies of energy, say, or to avail itself of strategic technology, China can cause American policy makers no end of discomfort.

For instance, if the United States government were to block the China National Offshore Oil Corporation from acquiring Unocal, it might just push China into cutting energy deals that the United States government would rather it did not make with countries like Russia or Iran.

"Clearly the relationship between the United States and China is much more ambivalent than that between the United States and Japan," said Clyde V. Prestowitz, a trade negotiator during the Reagan administration who in the 1980's warned that Japan's ascent could eclipse the United States' power and compromise its prosperity.

Those differences might warrant a more careful review of deals like the attempted purchase of Unocal by China's state run oil company.

Robert B. Reich, the former secretary of labor in the Clinton administration who as a Harvard professor in the early 1990's argued that big Japanese investments in the United States were not threatening, says today that a Chinese acquisition of a potentially strategic asset like Unocal could be problematic.

DOJ_NMG_0001010

"In economic terms there is no reason to block Chinese ownership of U.S. assets just as there was no reason to block Japan from buying U.S. assets in the 1980's," Mr. Reich said. "But in political terms in 2005 there may be a reason to take seriously the downside of China owning Unocal."

But even those most concerned about China's rise up the economic, political and military ladder recognize another, perhaps more important difference between China and 1980's Japan. The United States has a vested interest in China's success.

For starters, whereas Japan's success at the time was inevitably seen as America's failure, today American businesses are all rooting for China to succeed. Because they own a lot of it.

"It was virtually impossible for a foreigner to make an acquisition in Japan," Mr. Prestowitz said. "In China its 'y'all come.' American business is part of the China lobby, not the anti-China lobby."

Some of Japan's old foes view America's growing interdependence with China with suspicion. "Interdependence means dependence," said Susan J. Tolchin, a professor of public policy at George Mason University who in 1993 was the co-author of "Selling Our Security," which argued against allowing foreign investment in American technology companies. "If we lose our economic independence we are going to lose our independence of movement on foreign policy."

Yet most acknowledge that China's transformation from a struggling Communist state to a prosperous nation with a growing stake in the global system of market economies is in America's best interest. For example, if the Chinese central bank owns oodles of United States Treasury bonds, it has a reason not to want to destabilize the bond market.

"I cannot see how a rich bourgeois China could be not in our interest," Mr. Johnson said. "If we're interested in our security we should establish collaborative ties with China right now."

The difference in emphasis appears in a shift in Mr. Prestowitz's writing about Asia. In 1988, he published "Trading Places: How We Are Giving Our Future to Japan and How to Reclaim It." This year, he published "Three Billion New Capitalists: The Great Shift of Wealth and Power to the East."

Today, Mr. Prestowitz said, the biggest risk is not that China will succeed in rising to become an economic superpower. The biggest risk is that it will fail.

The Chinese Invasion (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Even some people who were not alarmed when Japanese companies started snapping up famous American businesses 15 years ago are succumbing to alarm about Chinese companies doing the same thing today. The alarmists were wrong the last time, and the please-remain-calm types were right. Are there good reasons to think that things are different this time around?

The Japan scare came with a lot of xenophobia, verging on racism, and foolish analogies between Japan's military imperialism of World War II and the so-called economic imperialism of half a century later. That earlier Japanese imperialism had involved killing millions of foreigners in an attempt to rule half the world by military force. The later Japanese so-called imperialism involved selling high-quality goods to millions of willing foreigners and then investing part of the proceeds in job-producing assets in those foreign countries.

Anti-Japanese hysteria also featured quite a bit of anthropological poppycock about how the basic laws of economics don't apply to cultures that emphasize production over consumption. Or to novel forms of organization (remember the keiretsu?) that combine all the evils of socialism and corporate capitalism into a production machine that is too efficient to be tolerated. Virtues morphed into cheating: They work hard and save while we spend and borrow — it's not fair!

The current and growing anti-Chinese sentiment has the same basic causes: resentment at another country's economic success and fear that it threatens our own well-being. But there are distinctions in flavor. Yesterday's Japanophobia and today's Sinophobia draw from different themes of classic Western prejudice against the East. Japan was the wily Oriental with his devilish plots. China is the Asian hordes. It's not that they're so smart, it's just that there are so darn many of them, and they are all being orchestrated by a fiendish Communist Party. Peasants pour out of the countryside into huge factories where they work 20 hours a day for $3.25 and produce enough of everything to fill an entire Wal-Mart every 7.3 minutes…. And we, like fools, buy this stuff. It's not fair!

DOJ_NMG_0001011

But it turned out that Japan was not one big, unstoppable economic machine. Its economy has been in the tank, while ours has thrived, for most of the period since the Japanophobia pandemic. The Japanese are not robots. A touching human weakness — vanity — caused them to overpay for prestigious American assets such as Rockefeller Center and Columbia Pictures, which they then managed badly. And who today feels humiliated because a major studio is named "Sony" — or even thinks of Sony as especially Japanese, or even foreign?

Old-fashioned economics has more to say about these episodes than cultural theorizing does. Economic point No. 1 is that if there is a problem, it's our fault, not theirs. When you spend more than you earn (or consume more than you produce), you go into debt. We've been doing that with a vengeance lately, both as individuals and as a society, through the government. Others then have your IOUs.

In international trade, these IOUs are known as "dollars," and they're ultimately only good for one thing: buying stuff from the United States. For misguided reasons of its own, China keeps its currency and consumer demand artificially low, resulting in a larger trade imbalance: We buy a lot more from them than they buy from us. But another way to look at it is that they send us all those lovely things on the shelves at Wal-Mart and we send them in exchange small pieces of paper. (Or actually not even that: just some electronic pulses representing pieces of paper called dollars.)

We complain about this. But when they start spending their dollars instead of hoarding them, we are horrified at what they are able to buy: IBM's ThinkPad computer line, the Maytag appliance brand name, an oil company (Unocal). But it is our own spendthrift ways that supply the dollars. If foreigners ever lost interest in accumulating or spending dollars, we would really be in trouble.

Economic point No. 2 is the golden oldie: Free trade is good, even if it is unilateral. The United States benefits from being open to anything China wishes to sell to us, whether or not China reciprocates. Trade is disruptive. But people tend to focus on the lost jobs and lose sight of the cheap shirts.

During the Japan fuss, this trade-off was often described as destroying a blue-collar worker's life so that a yuppie could drive a Lexus. But imports from China tend to be more down-market. They effectively raise the standard of living of the lowest-income Americans. The much smaller number of Americans who are hurt by trade deserve generous help from the vast majority who benefit from it. But restricting trade with China to help those few would harm the many.

Then there's globalization, the third economic reality. In the emerging world economy, American investors will own shares in Chinese companies that invest in Albania or Zambia, and so on. Already, much of what we are buying "from China" is being produced by U.S. companies there, and today's anti-Beijing chorus overlooks the extent to which our culture is changing China in our image.

Americans needn't fear the prospect of the world's largest country joining the global middle class. This — or the more prosaic possibility that some country might definitively unseat the United States as the world's richest country — is not some tragic possibility that Americans must acknowledge with good grace or world-weary resignation (like the British waving farewell to their empire). The wealth of other nations is good for Americans in the narrowest selfish terms.

Hamas Weighs Abbas' Offer To Join Cabinet (WT)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas has asked his most formidable rival, the militant Islamic group Hamas, to join his Cabinet in advance of Israel's Gaza pullout, and the group is considering the offer, officials on both sides said yesterday.

Israel denounced the idea of Hamas' joining the Palestinian government, calling the group "a murderous terrorist organization."

Hamas has strong grass-roots support in Gaza and has demanded to help rule the area after Israel's pullout, slated to begin in August. The group was expected to make a strong showing in Palestinian parliamentary elections later this year and recently won municipal elections in several West Bank and Gaza districts. By incorporating Hamas into his government, Mr. Abbas hopes to improve prospects of a smooth takeover at a time when violence in Gaza has heated up.

DOJ_NMG_0001012

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said this was not the first time Mr. Abbas has offered to bring the militant group into his Cabinet.

"Our policy is a policy of one authority, one gun, and we welcome all political parties to participate as such," Mr. Erekat said.

Mr. Abbas first invited Hamas to join his Cabinet two months ago, but Hamas rejected the offer because it was conditioned on the group's agreeing to a delay in parliamentary elections. The vote originally scheduled for July has been delayed until the end of the year.

Hamas' West Bank leader, Sheik Hassan Yousef, said the group was considering the latest offer from Mr. Abbas.

The United States considers Hamas a terrorist organization and refuses to deal with it.

Israel and the United States have demanded that Mr. Abbas disarm Hamas and other militants, a step he has refused to take for fear it would provoke bloodshed among Palestinians. He has chosen instead to co-opt militants.

"Hamas is a murderous terrorist organization responsible for countless acts of senseless violence against innocent civilians," Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said. "Hamas is no partner for us in any sort of political process."

The Palestinian leader has promised a smooth turnover in Gaza and a clampdown on militants who would fire on Israeli soldiers and about 8,500 Jewish settlers who will withdraw. He has also said he would not allow a land grab after the summer evacuation.

But a fragile truce Mr. Abbas reached with Israel in February has been unraveling as the pullout date approaches.

Mr. Abbas is to meet Palestinian militant leaders living in self-imposed exile in Damascus during a visit to Syria this week, his national security adviser, Jibril Rajoub, said yesterday.

Some West Bank Settlers Dig In Their Heels As Pullout Looms (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Tile by tile, a new synagogue is rapidly taking form just steps from an outdoor basketball court where five families have moved into a makeshift neighborhood of military tents.

On a recent afternoon, there was plenty of room nearby for more arrivals beneath huge canopies that shade a rectangular dirt lot, lending it the appearance of an American fairground. If this Jewish settlement is soon to be evacuated, and the Israeli government insists it is, there is little sign its residents plan to go easily. Rather than packing up, Sanur's 31 families are busily fortifying their hold on the West Bank hilltop in anticipation of a last stand.

Volunteers from Jewish religious academies have rushed to join in building the synagogue, which awaits a roof and the rest of the tile floor. Backers have come from other strongholds of Jewish nationalist ideology in the West Bank.

Sanur is one of four settlements in the northern West Bank scheduled to be abandoned by Israel this summer, along with all 21 Jewish communities in the Gaza Strip. So far, most of the attention has focused on the withdrawal from Gaza, home to the vast majority of the estimated 8,000 settlers who are to be uprooted from both areas. The pullout is set to begin in mid-August.

Sanur and the three other isolated West Bank settlements, Homesh, Ganim and Kadim, have been largely overlooked in the turbulent national drama over the planned withdrawal, but military officials say settler resistance may prove especially tough in Sanur and Homesh.

Ganim and Kadim, secular communities about 10 miles to the north with 60 families between them, aren't expected to present much of a problem because many residents have said they are willing to leave and have started hunting for new homes.

"Ninety-five percent of the people here will leave before August 15th," said Ganim resident Aharon Yarden, 40, who planned to move with his family to the Golan Heights.

Around Sanur and Homesh, a web of back roads, trails and canyons could make it difficult for the army to block the arrival of religious militants from other settlements in the northern West Bank, historically referred to by its biblical name, Samaria.

Settlers in Sanur say they expect 10,000 or more supporters to sweep in to help thwart the evacuation. Employing images of a dire military-style standoff, one right-wing Israeli lawmaker has compared Sanur to Stalingrad.

DOJ_NMG_0001013

The evacuation "will be impossible," said Miriam Adler, a Sanur resident and spokeswoman for the community. "They just won't succeed."

Adler, 28, moved to Sanur with her husband 2 1/2 years ago from Kiryat Arba, a Jewish enclave near the West Bank city of Hebron known for its hard-line ideology.

At the time, Sanur had been all but deserted. Once a military post under Ottoman and British rule, Sanur was settled by Jews in 1978 and served as an artists' colony. But most of the secular residents fled after violence erupted between Israel and the Palestinians in September 2000.

Taking their place in rows of low, bunker-like stucco houses were young families ardent about religion and unflinching in their belief that Jews are the rightful heirs of all the biblical land of Israel. Some attend colleges and universities in the West Bank or in Israel. All wear the skullcaps and head scarves of the religiously observant.

To these residents, the battle against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and his pullout plan hinges on passion and faith. Although Gaza has many settlers who are devout, it is the West Bank that has greater biblical significance and the lion's share of the 230,000 Jewish settlers, who draw extra fervor from being able to gesture across a valley to one site or another mentioned in the Old Testament.

"Sharon is temporary, and the land of Israel is eternal," Adler said, standing at the edge of the little tent village. "Whoever fights for ideology — and not interest — will win."

It is possible from here to gaze past a plain of Palestinian hay fields to Homesh, perched on a peak immediately above the Palestinian village of Burqa. From the backyard of a Jewish home in Homesh, one can hear a Palestinian vendor below touting his wares: tomatoes, oranges, apricots.

Homesh, with 55 families, is a collection of modest stucco houses hemmed by a wire security fence. Its residents are less uniformly religious than those in Sanur and more ambivalent about what to do next. Although all prefer to stay, a split has emerged between religious residents, who are determined to fight, and their secular neighbors, who say they will obey the government's edict.

A core of activists has organized protest events, including bringing in thousands of supporters during the springtime Passover holiday, and sought to make sure that backers will show up to thwart the withdrawal. Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz was heckled there during a recent meeting at which some residents had hoped to learn more about where they might move.

Menora Hazani, a devout, 28-year-old teacher and filmmaker in Homesh, said Sharon had deliberately focused attention on Gaza because pulling out of a slice of the West Bank, with scores of remaining settlements and relative proximity to large Israeli cities, was more problematic.

"Leaving the region here is much more catastrophic in security terms than leaving Gush Katif," Hazani said, referring to the main settlement block in Gaza.

Hazani, whose father, Benny Katsover, was a well-known settler leader, said she and her husband still hoped that the withdrawal would not take place. Hazani said, though, that if the police came to the door, officers would have to carry the family out. She said any resistance must be nonviolent.

Other Homesh residents say they are waiting for the government to tell them where to go and have no plans to put up a fight.

"I'm a law-abiding person," said Nina Korover, 58, who emigrated from Ukraine in 1992 and moved with her husband into a $30,000 house a year later.

She recalls how thirsty and drab the stony landscape appeared then. Now, Korover said, "there is nothing more beautiful than Homesh."

In one direction, the West Bank city of Nablus covers a hillside; in the other, Tel Aviv's skyscrapers punctuate the hazy glare of the Mediterranean.

Homesh has only three businesses, including a car parts factory. Most residents commute to work in Tel Aviv or coastal Netanya, about 30 miles away, or settlements in the West Bank.

DOJ_NMG_0001014

Korover said about 30 Homesh families, about half of them from the former Soviet Union, had concluded that it was time to prepare to leave. The government said last week that the families had signed an agreement to move as a group to a community in Israel, but residents said the matter was still being negotiated.

Korover's husband, Boris, died four years ago when a Palestinian driver steered a car into his. Leaving the home where the couple crafted a life after emigrating somehow feels like a betrayal, she said.

But Korover worries that religious hard-liners might be more interested in a confrontation with the government than in negotiation. "I don't want to leave my house, but if I have no choice — if they say I have to leave — I won't make a war," she said.

Iranian Leader Denies He Took Embassy Hostages (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

A shiny black Peugeot rolled to a stop, and there he was, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the president-elect of Iran, smiling through an open window, ready to greet a few of the people who have been coming to his street as a sort of pilgrimage since he won.

The security men tried to keep a cordon around the car, but the president-elect gave his casual smile, and told them to let the people through. He also let this reporter and an interpreter approach.

When asked the question preoccupying many Americans about him just now - Had he been among the students who sacked the United States Embassy in 1979 and held American hostages for 444 days? - his driver started to pull out, but Mr. Ahmadinejad stopped him and said he would answer.

"It is not true," he said. "It is only rumors."

The security men began to push again, and three women draped in flowing black chadors made their way up to the car.

One woman handed Mr. Ahmadinejad a blank piece of paper on which he wrote: "Stick to your Islamic values. God will help you."

And with that, he closed the window and was driven off.

Since the election a week ago, it has been nearly impossible to get a feel for Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, to take the measure of the man. He has refused all interviews, though he did hold one hourlong news conference. His spokesman has insisted that he was not among the students at the embassy.

He is generally described as an ultra-conservative. He has been a member of the Basij militia, which is made up of young bearded men who ride through the streets on motorcycles enforcing strict codes of behavior and dress, often brutally. He was also a member of the Revolutionary Guard during the war with Iraq. And of course he has recently been accused of being one of the student leaders who stormed the American Embassy in Tehran on Nov. 4, 1979, keeping 52 hostages.

Yet friends, supporters and neighbors here describe the diminutive, bearded man as humble and caring. Mr. Ahmadinejad has a small circle of aides, one that appears a bit overwhelmed by all the demands and preparations ahead. Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political science professor at Tehran University, said that he had known the president-elect since childhood and that Mr. Ahmadinejad was not involved with the student hostage takers. He said they grew up together in East Tehran, and Mr. Hadian-Jazy described his old classmate as among the brightest in the neighborhood.

He called Mr. Ahmadinejad "self-confident, committed and absolutely incorruptible." He said he is very religious, but modern in his thinking. If there is a negative quality, Mr. Hadian-Jazy said, it is that he is very set in his views, and can be hard to persuade otherwise.

"If you can force him to sit down and listen, he has the capability to understand," the professor said.

While Mr. Ahmadinejad maintained a humble life style as the appointed mayor of Tehran, that is likely to change, if for no other reason than security. He lives at the end of a dead-end street, more of an alley that runs alongside a school. The alley opens onto a circle, with a small park in the middle with benches and a field of grass that now attracts those who come to ask favors of the president-elect, and serves as a spot for neighbors to socialize. These days, cars packed with sightseers drive around the circle, stopping to look down the alley, a far cry from the palatial and off-limit homes of other Iranian leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0001015

On Friday, the day of prayer and rest in most Muslim countries, some of Mr. Ahmadinejad's neighbors sat on a bench, talking about their favorite son. It is almost a rule that when someone is asked about Mr. Ahmadinejad, the first thing said is that he is a modest person who has never lost touch with his roots. Security is very tight in the neighborhood, and with soldiers and plainclothes agents around, the neighbors were afraid to give their names.

One older man, who said he had lived in the neighborhood for 15 years, said that every year for the Iranian New Year, Mr. Ahmadinejad invited the neighbors over for a celebration. He is described as a devout man who lives in a three-bedroom house with two sons and a daughter. His family has little furniture, they said, and has machine-made carpets, not the more expensive hand-woven ones commonly owned by the better-off.

One son is finishing high school, and the two other children are studying in the university, the neighbors said.

Since he became mayor of Tehran, the city has had a driver pick Mr. Ahmadinejad up for work every day. But on his days off, neighbors said, he still drives the same 1977 Peugeot, without air-conditioning, that is parked in the alleyway beside the house.

People are quick to offer stories about Mr. Ahmadinejad, almost as if he was a religious figure. They say, for example, that he always brought his own lunch to work because he did not want the city to have to pay for his meals.

At the municipal building, Ahmad Esmali's job is to deliver tea to the offices. "This mayor was better than the others," he said recently. "He saw managers and workers with one eye."

In the park on Friday, one neighbor said the mayor had given money to the local butcher, at a shop called Zand, so the butcher could give poor and needy people meat at a discount. Two young men working in the butcher shop said they believed it was true.

It is a common practice in many Middle Eastern cultures for leaders to have audiences with citizens seeking help, or to accept their petitions for assistance. Mr. Ahmadinejad appears to take that custom to heart.

A small security booth sits at the mouth of the alley leading to his house. As Mr. Ahmadinejad's car pulled out, a security agent handed the president-elect a pile of letters that had been delivered that morning, from people seeking some kind of help.

Ali Ghorbani, 29, had just driven up to deliver a letter to the guard booth when Mr. Ahmadinejad pulled up. Mr. Ghorbani wanted to ask for a loan so he and a friend could open a cultural center in Tehran. He was allowed to hand the letter directly to the president-elect. "I didn't have the faintest idea I would see him," Mr. Ghorbani said as he walked away. "He took the letter and told me I would have a reply in two weeks."

Iranian Accused In Killing Of Kurds (WT)

By William J. Kole

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

Iran's newly elected president, already accused of taking American diplomats hostage 26 years ago, played a key role in the 1989 execution-style slayings of a Kurdish opposition leader and two associates in Vienna, an exiled Iranian dissident said yesterday.

Austria's daily Der Standard quoted a prominent Austrian politician as saying authorities have "very convincing" evidence linking Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to the attacks in Vienna, in which the Kurds were killed.

The reports follow recent accusations from some of the 52 Americans who were held hostage for 444 days in Iran beginning in 1979 that Mr. Ahmadinejad, a hard-line Islamist, was among the hostage-takers.

Neither Mr. Ahmadinejad nor his aides could be reached yesterday for comment on the claims about the Vienna killings, but the president-elect on Friday denied a role in the hostage-taking.

"It is not true," Mr. Ahmadinejad said. "It is only rumors."

Alireza Jafarzadeh, who runs Strategic Policy Consulting, a Washington-based think tank focusing on Iran and Iraq, said Mr. Ahmadinejad was a Revolutionary Guard commander who supplied the weapons used to gun down Iranian Kurdish politician Abdul-Rahman Ghassemlou and two colleagues on July 13, 1989, in Vienna.

Mr. Jafarzadeh is a former U.S. representative for the National Council of Resistance of Iran. The council is the political arm of the Mojahedin Khalq, a group that Washington and the European Union list as a terrorist organization.

DOJ_NMG_0001016

Mr. Ghassemlou, the principal target, was secretary-general of the Democratic Party of Iranian Kurdistan. His delegation had been in Vienna for secret talks with envoys from the Tehran regime.

Mr. Jafarzadeh said his assessment was based on Iranian government sources "who have provided accurate information in the past." He said Mr. Ahmadinejad helped organize the Vienna attack while serving in the Revolutionary Guard's Ramazan garrison near the western Iranian city of Kermanshah.

"While he was there, he became involved in terrorist operations abroad, and he led many, many operations," Mr. Jafarzadeh said.

In 2002, Mr. Jafarzadeh disclosed information about two hidden nuclear sites in Iran that helped uncover nearly two decades of secret atomic activity and stoked fears that Tehran was trying to build a nuclear bomb.

Der Standard reported yesterday that Peter Pilz, a top official with Austria's Green Party, accused Mr. Ahmadinejad of traveling to Vienna a few days before the slayings to deliver the weapons to the Iranian commandos who carried out the killings. He said he wants a warrant issued for Mr. Ahmadinejad's arrest

Mr. Pilz could not be reached for comment yesterday, and calls to Austria's Interior Ministry and the nation's federal counterterrorism agency went unanswered.

Mr. Pilz said an unidentified Iranian journalist living in France was contacted in 2001 by one of the reputed gunmen, described as a former revolutionary guard who has since died. The gunman's account -- which Mr. Pilz said strongly implicated Mr. Ahmadinejad -- was turned over to Austria's federal Office for Counterterrorism and Constitutional Protection.

In another development, a top Iranian former secret agent told the Associated Press in Tehran yesterday that the hostage-taker in a 1979 photograph that has come under intense scrutiny is not of Mr. Ahmadinejad, but a former militant who committed suicide in jail.

Saeed Hajjarian, a top adviser to departing President Mohammad Khatami, identified the man in the photo dating to the 1979 U.S. Embassy siege as Taqi Mohammadi.

Iran's newly elected president has been accused of being a major participant in the taking of American hostages at the embassy.

Six former U.S. hostages who saw the president-elect in photos or on television said they believe Mr. Ahmadinejad was among the hostage-takers. One said he was interrogated by Mr. Ahmadinejad.

The White House said it was taking their statements seriously. President Bush said "many questions" were raised by the accusations.

International media have compared photos of Mr. Ahmadinejad, who won a presidential runoff election the week before last, with a black-and-white picture of one of the hostage-takers, a young man with a thin, bearded face and dark hair that sweeps down across his forehead.

But Mr. Hajjarian said they were not the same person.

"This man is Taqi Mohammadi, a militant who later turned into a dissident and committed suicide in jail," he said, pointing to the 1979 photo.

Mr. Hajjarian's comment follows statements by a number of the former Iranian students who carried out the U.S. Embassy seizure and held Americans hostage that Mr. Ahmadinejad had no role in the operation.

For The Poor In Iran, Voting Was About Making Ends Meet (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

They had come from very different neighborhoods and backgrounds, but they were all there for the same reason: to buy government-subsidized food.

The line ran from the basement up the stairs and out the door.

Inside, sugar and rice were selling for about one-fifth of the retail price, a huge savings in a country where according to an opposition economist more than a quarter of the people live below the poverty line - which is defined as a family of five with an income of less than $278 a month.

DOJ_NMG_0001017

"I cannot make ends meet," said Hossein Ganji, 49, who works behind a counter in the food distribution center. Mr. Ganji supports his wife and three children on about $150 a month.

"I am the only person that works in my family," he said. "All the others are unemployed."

This distribution center in a crowded basement in southern Tehran and many others like it around the country represent the kind of government assistance that many people here want more of - and that Mahmoud Ahmadinejad promised to provide in his successful campaign to become the next president of Iran.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who catapulted to president-elect from near obscurity as the appointed mayor of Tehran, campaigned on a populist message, promising to redistribute the nation's wealth, hold down prices, raise salaries and lift state-supported benefits for the poor. He infused those pledges with the theme of social justice, which resonated in a society where aiding the poor is considered an obligation for the faithful.

His message came at the right time. In 1997 and again in 2001, voters focused their political will on social and democratic freedoms in electing Mohammad Khatami to the presidency. But his promised reforms were hardly carried out, and in the election last week voters appeared to have shifted focus to their pocketbooks. One candidate, Mehdi Karroubi, a former speaker of Parliament, just missed making it to the runoff election for president after promising to pay each family the equivalent of $60 a month if elected.

Average salaries run about $200 a month in Iran, with a salary of $300 to $500 considered generous. But costs are fast outstripping the ability to pay - government figures put annual inflation at about 15 percent, though on some products, merchants say prices rise far faster than that.

In a food store in central Tehran, the owner, Reza Karimi, said pomegranate paste had doubled in price to nearly $2; a bottle of olive oil rose to about $4 from $3, and in the last three months a little more than a pound of rice climbed to $1.80 from $1.30.

The price of dairy products sold by a state-owned company jumped 17 percent on Wednesday alone, he said. "The prices will jump again next month," he said. "And when one company raises their prices, they all do."

Khodabaksh Jalili, 30, is typical of many people in southern Tehran who supported Mr. Ahmadinejad. He moved to the city from Asadabad, a village 200 miles west of Tehran, when the farm that had supported his family for generations failed because of drought and a shortage of supplies, he said.

He has a wife and two children and earns about $200 a month working in a food store. His rent is $50 a month, and he makes extra money on his day off ferrying passengers on his scooter. If he is lucky, he said, he takes in another $20 a month.

"I have very little," he said. "I am married eight years. I have never been to the cinema with my children."

Iran is awash in oil money, as the price of crude topped $60 a barrel this week, pumping billions into the government treasury. But this country's economy is still tied down by a system in which the state and a shadowy collection of foundations controlled by clerics monopolize the vast bulk of its industries, including oil.

With all that money effectively locked up and a state budget weighed down by subsidies, there is little to spur the kind of private sector growth and development that would help provide someone like Mr. Jalili with a job that could support a family.

Past presidents have tried to move the economy away from its dependence on oil revenue and to open Iran to investment, but they have been thwarted by more conservative powers intent on preserving the vestiges of a welfare state.

The clerics - who control vast wealth and power through the foundations, known as bonyads - are also unwilling to give that up, and they answer to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, not to elected officials, limiting what any president can do.

The bonyads, which were set up after the 1979 revolution to control assets held by the former shah's family and associates, were to operate as nonprofit organizations dedicated to aiding the poor. Since then, they have amassed great wealth and now control a large swath of the nation's economy.

Though there has been some progress in the past eight years in opening the country to foreign investment, economists say the inability to change the fundamental structure of the economy has allowed unemployment and poverty to climb.

Rahim Oskui, who described himself as an opposition economist working for the Industrial Management Institute, a quasi-governmental agency, said the official figures of 10 percent unemployment and 27 percent living in poverty were most likely understated.

DOJ_NMG_0001018

"It is very natural, that when a candidate comes chanting slogans of justice and welfare, which belong to 400 years ago, this population will follow along," Mr. Oskui said.

Iran is a country still making the transition from a village-based agricultural economy to a more industrial economy, he said, with both controlled by the government and the foundations. That change has created a political force of millions who have left their homes and social support networks in villages and towns in search of work in big cities, only to find themselves poor and disenfranchised, Mr. Oskui said.

"They are looking for a source that can help them out," he said.

Hamid Shahrabi, 31, is the kind of person Mr. Oskui was talking about. Because of Mr. Ahmadinejad's economic message, he said, he got involved in politics for the first time. "I never voted in a presidential election before," Mr. Shahrabi said. "This guy put his hand on the Koran and said he would work for poor people - so I worked for him and voted for him."

Mr. Shahrabi lives with his wife, Azam, 30, and two small children in a one-room apartment in southeastern Tehran. There is no furniture in the living room, just a carpet on the concrete floor, a few pillows along the walls and a small television on a stand. They turned a walk-in closet into a separate bedroom, where their 12-year-old daughter sleeps and where they keep their bed cushions during the day. On any given day, the family's refrigerator is almost empty, but for a pot of traditional Iranian stew - a mix of rice, meat and vegetables - three-day-old bread and some tomatoes. They survive on their government rations.

Mr. Shahrabi moved to the city from Arak, a province in central Iran, when he was 15 years old, following his brothers in search of work when the family farm was no longer making enough money. He found a job with a state-owned oil company, which he kept until he was laid off four years ago. He has not found work since, and rides around the city on his battered motor scooter making deliveries and carrying passengers for about $5 a day. Of that he has to set aside $3 a day for rent.

"I feel really ashamed in front of my family," Mr. Shahrabi said, without a trace of self-pity. "My doctor said I need to feed my daughter better. I cannot afford to buy my wife new dresses. My son always feels dizzy. The landlord has asked me to find another place to live."

The Ahmadinejad campaign message of economic hope - as well as social justice - captured the hearts not only of people like Mr. Shahrabi but also of middle-class families. Parts of the middle class have trouble meeting their own financial needs, although their support for Mr. Ahmadinejad also stems from having grown used to buying subsidized food, even if they can afford to pay market prices.

At the distribution center in southern Tehran, Mohammed Javad Moradli, 50, said he backed Mr. Ahmadinejad because he was a religious man. His wife, Fatimeh Ghadani, 47, wrapped in a chador, nudged his arm. "It's also about the economy," she said. "We don't want slogans. We want deeds."

DOJ_NMG_0001019

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JULY 3, 2005 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Help From France Key In Covert Operations (WP) 2
U.S. Seen Prodding Allies In Terror War (WT) 5
Man Allegedly Abducted By CIA In Egypt, Lawyer Says (HC) 6
Pricey Rendition (WP) 6
A Roman Mess (WP) 7
How Visa System Failed To Flag Lodi Imam (LAT) 8

Patriot Act:
County Commission Cites Patriot Act Concerns (EBHNT) 10
Hagen W. Frank: Patriot Act Not Threat As LSJ Says (LSJ) 10
Senator Christopher "Kit" Bond: Strong Patriot Act Required (WT) 11

Homeland Response:
Overhaul Of U.S. Intelligence System May Take 10 Years, Analysts Say (BSUN) 11
Art World Comes To The Cause Of Arrested Artist (SDUT) 12
Border Watchers Gear Up For Expanded Patrol (LAT) 14
Small Plane Violates Washington Air Space (KCS) 15
D.C. Ready To Assess Evacuation Strategy (WP) 16

War News:
Bush Salutes Military In Radio Address (AP-Y2) 17
The Two Wars Of The Worlds (NYT) 17
Democracy Has Its Own Timetable, Mr. Bush (WP) 19
Dems: Bush Administration Has Failed Vets (AP-Y2) 20
Fighting Words (NYT) 21
Bombers In Iraq Kill 20; Security Forces Are Targets (NYT) 21
Suicide Bomber Kills 12 In Iraq (WP) 22
Two Suicide Attacks Kill 26 In Iraq (LAT/AP) 23
The Metrics Of Success In Iraq (WP) 24
Shiites Question U.S. Overtures To Sunni Rebels (LAT) 25
Beat The Insurgents By Talking To Them (LAT) 27
A Town That Bled Under Hussein Hails His Trial (NYT) 28
Afghan Rebel Site Bombed, U.S. Says (WP) 30
U.S. Planes Bomb Suspected Taliban Mountain Base (WT) 31
U.S. Attacks Near Copter Crash Site (LAT) 31
Veterans Confront A Taste Of Battle (WP) 32

Corporate Scandals:
Op-Ed by Michael Kinsley: The Lord And Richard Scrushy (WP) 33

Criminal Law:
The Rove Factor? (NSWK) 34
Rove Talked But Did Not Tattle, Attorney Says (LAT) 35
Lawyer Says Rove Talked To Reporter, Did Not Leak Name (WP) 36
Journalists Say Threat Of Subpoena Intensifies (NYT) 37
Congressman Mum After FBI Searches Home (AP-Y2) 39
Public Defender Rules Are Set To Change (SLPD) 39
State Weighs 2 Bills Requiring Bullet Marking (LAT) 41

Civil Rights:
18 Nabbed In Human-smuggling Scheme (WT) 43
California Court Faces Gay Unions (WT) 44
Recall Star Takes A Remap Risk (DMN) 44
State Ballot, Wider Impact (LAT) 45
Clarity Sought On Romney's Abortion Stance (BOS) 47
Frist Again At The Center Of Stem Cell Fight (WP) 49
NAACP Considers A New Approach (MJS) 50

Environment/Indian Affairs:
Court's Eminent Domain Decision Hailed As Victory For Cities (SLPD) 52
Some Political Give-and-Take On Matters Ecological (WP) 53
A Livable Shade Of Green (NYT) 54
Gang Plunges Tribe Into Turmoil (MJS) 55

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Agents Probing Hormone Shipment (DENP) 57
Drug Case Chilled U.S., Colombia Tie (TAMPTRIB) 58
Gang Busters In Hampton Roads (V-P) 60
Reyna Says 'no Pressure' To Resign (BROWNHER) 62

Tax:
In 2002, More Wealthy People Paid No Tax (NYT) 64

Congress-Administration:
Bush Faces Pivotal Choice For High Court (AP-Y2) 65
White House Promises Bi-Partisan Input From Senate (LAT) 66
For Bush, A Defining Moment (CHT) 67
Court Pick To Test Bush Promise (BOS) 68
Bush Faces Choice Of Advancing Agenda Or Bridging Political Divide (KRT) 69
Bush Has Numerous Constituencies To Consider (MINNST) 70
Both Sides Fear "stealth" Nominee, Observers Say (SLPD) 72

O'Connor Resignation Ignites Political Firestorm (DeN)..... 73
So What's The 'Right' Pick? (NYT) 76
O'Connor Successor Debated (WP)..... 78
5th Circuit Has Likely Candidates (NOTP) 80
Court's Internal Dynamics - A Factor In Decisions - May Change (KRT) 81
O'Connor's Replacement Is Likely To Be A Swinger (LAT) 82
Court's Liberal Bloc Stands Firm (LAT) 83
More Politicians For The Court (WP)..... 85
Left And Right, Groups Gear Up (CHT)..... 86
Fears Of Battle Over High Court (BSUN) 87
Word From O'Connor Sets Off Pre-Fourth Fireworks (WP)..... 89
Interest Groups Gear Up On Court (PPG)..... 90
Nominee Battle Lines Drawn (DMN)..... 91
The Right's Moment, Years In The Making (WP) 92
In Battle To Confirm A New Justice, Both Sides Get Troops Ready Again (NYT)..... 94
Activists Gear Up For Nominee Fight (WP)..... 96
Conservative Groups Rally Against Gonzales As Justice (NYT) 98
High Noon For High Court (LAT) 100
NOW Marches In Support Of Abortion Rights (AP-Y2) 101
Liberals Gird For Supreme Struggle (WT)..... 102
Disorder In The Court (NYT)..... 103
Not A Campaign (WP) 104
Confirmation Battle In Senate Could Define Specter's Career (NYT) 105
Parties Line Up Strategies For Hearings On Nomination (WP). 107
Justice For The Next Justice (WP) 108
High Court's Next Term Full Of Big Cases (AP-Y2) 109
Justice's Exit Could Produce Seismic Shift On High Court (BSUN)..... 110
One Justice, Many Cases, Lots Of Power (DMN) 112
O'Connor Bow Puts New Focus On Rehnquist (CHT) 113
O'Connor Made Her Mark As Pragmatic Centrist (MINNST) 114
Supreme Difference (WP)..... 116
Justice O'Connor's Indelible Stamp (WP)..... 117
Justice Forged A Path For Women (DMN)..... 118
Feminists On O'Connor: A Mixed Verdict (WP)..... 118
Increase In The Number Of Documents Classified By The Government (NYT) 120
Feds Increasingly Classify Documents (AP-Y2)..... 121

Other News:

Vast Crowd Attends Rally For The Poor In Scotland (NYT)..... 122
'Make Poverty History' Protest Draws Tens Of Thousands (LAT)122
Marchers Rally For G-8 Action On African Poverty (WT)..... 123
G-8 A Study In Power, Seclusion (AJC) 124
Awakening Economic Powerhouses Eye G-8 (FLSUNSEN/AP)125
Failure Of Past Efforts Cloud The West's Attempt To Help (LAT)126
Among Ordinary Africans, G-8 Seems Out Of Touch (WP)..... 127
The Congo Case (NYT) 129
Africa At The Summit (NYT) 134
A Promise, And Pitfalls (LAT) 135
Now's Not The Time For Europe To Go Wobbly (WP)..... 135
Music, Politics Merge In Live 8 Concerts Across The Globe (KRT) 137
City Of Brotherly Love Brings It On Home (WP)..... 138
Live 8 Concerts Rock The Globe For Africa (WT)..... 140
Musical Cry To Help Africa's Poor Is Heard Around Globe (NYT)141
Start To Make It Better, Live 8 Urges (LAT) 142
Tone Deaf On Africa (NYT)..... 143
O.K., Japan Isn't Taking Over The World. But China... (NYT) .. 144
The Chinese Invasion (LAT) 146
Hamas Weighs Abbas' Offer To Join Cabinet (WT)..... 147
Some West Bank Settlers Dig In Their Heels As Pullout Looms (LAT) 147
Iranian Leader Denies He Took Embassy Hostages (NYT)..... 149
Iranian Accused In Killing Of Kurds (WT) 150
For The Poor In Iran, Voting Was About Making Ends Meet (NYT) 151

TERRORISM NEWS:

Help From France Key In Covert Operations (WP)

By Dana Priest

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

When Christian Ganczarski, a German convert to Islam, boarded an Air France flight from Riyadh on June 3, 2003, he knew only that the Saudi government had put him under house arrest for an expired pilgrim visa and had given his family one-way tickets back to Germany, with a change of planes in Paris.

He had no idea that he was being secretly escorted by an undercover officer sitting behind him, or that a senior CIA officer was waiting at the end of the jetway as French authorities gently separated him from his family and swept Ganczarski into French custody, where he remains today on suspicion of associating with terrorists.

Ganczarski is among the most important European al Qaeda figures alive, according to U.S. and French law enforcement and intelligence officials. The operation that ensnared him was put together at a top secret center in Paris, code-named Alliance Base, that was set up by the CIA and French intelligence services in 2002, according to U.S. and European intelligence sources. Its existence has not been previously disclosed.

DOJ_NMG_0001021

Funded largely by the CIA's Counterterrorist Center, Alliance Base analyzes the transnational movement of terrorist suspects and develops operations to catch or spy on them.

Alliance Base demonstrates how most counterterrorism operations actually take place: through secretive alliances between the CIA and other countries' intelligence services. This is not the work of large army formations, or even small special forces teams, but of handfuls of U.S. intelligence case officers working with handfuls of foreign operatives, often in tentative arrangements.

Such joint intelligence work has been responsible for identifying, tracking and capturing or killing the vast majority of committed jihadists who have been targeted outside Iraq and Afghanistan since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, according to terrorism experts.

The CIA declined to comment on Alliance Base, as did a spokesman for the French Embassy in Washington.

Most French officials and other intelligence veterans would talk about the partnership only if their names were withheld because the specifics are classified and the politics are sensitive. John E. McLaughlin, the former acting CIA director who retired recently after a 32-year career, described the relationship between the CIA and its French counterparts as "one of the best in the world. What they are willing to contribute is extraordinarily valuable."

The rarely discussed Langley-Paris connection also belies the public portrayal of acrimony between the two countries that erupted over the invasion of Iraq. Within the Bush administration, the discord was amplified by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who has claimed the lead role in the administration's "global war on terrorism" and has sought to give the military more of a part in it.

But even as Rumsfeld was criticizing France in early 2003 for not doing its share in fighting terrorism, his U.S. Special Operations Command was finalizing a secret arrangement to put 200 French special forces under U.S. command in Afghanistan. Beginning in July 2003, its commanders have worked side by side there with U.S. commanders and CIA and National Security Agency representatives.Organizing Alliance Base

Alliance Base, headed by a French general assigned to France's equivalent of the CIA -- the General Directorate for External Security (DGSE) -- was described by six U.S. and foreign intelligence specialists with involvement in its activities. The base is unique in the world because it is multinational and actually plans operations instead of sharing information among countries, they said. It has case officers from Britain, France, Germany, Canada, Australia and the United States.

The Ganczarski operation was one of at least 12 major cases the base worked on during its first years, according to one person familiar with its operations.

"It's really an effort to come up with innovative ideas and deal with some of the cooperation issues," said one CIA officer familiar with the base. "I don't know of anything like it."

Factions within the intelligence services of several countries opposed a multinational approach, according to current and former U.S. and European government officials who described its inception. The CIA's Counterterrorist Center did not want to lose control over all counterterrorism operations; the British service did not want to dilute its unique ties to Washington; Germany was not keen to become involved in more operations.

And no country wanted to be perceived as taking direction from the CIA, whose practice of extraordinary renditions -- secretly apprehending suspected terrorists and transferring them to other countries without any judicial review -- has become highly controversial in Europe. In Italy, 13 alleged CIA operatives are accused of kidnapping a radical Egyptian cleric off the streets of Milan in 2003.

To play down the U.S. role, the center's working language is French, sources said. The base selects its cases carefully, chooses a lead country for each operation, and that country's service runs the operation.

The base also provides a way for German case officers to read information from their own country's law enforcement authorities, sources said. German law bars criminal authorities from sharing certain information directly with their intelligence agencies.

French law, by contrast, encourages intelligence sharing among its police and security services. In fact, since the Napoleonic Code was adopted in 1804, French magistrates have had broad powers over civil society. Today, magistrates in the French Justice Department's anti-terrorism unit have authority to detain people suspected of "conspiracy in relation to terrorism" while evidence is gathered against them.

The top anti-terrorism magistrate, Judge Jean-Louis Bruguiere, has said that in the past decade, he has ordered the arrests of more than 500 suspects, some with the help of U.S. authorities. "I have good connections with the CIA and FBI," Bruguiere said in a recent interview.

In France, which has a Muslim population reaching 8 percent -- the largest in Europe -- U.S. and French terrorism experts are desperate to take terrorist-group recruiters and new recruits off the streets, and have been willing to put their own anti-terrorism laws into the service of allies to lure suspects such as Ganczarski from abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0001022

"Yes, without a doubt there are some cases where we participate that way," one senior French intelligence official said.

France sent its interrogators to Guantanamo Bay to gather evidence that could be used in French court against the French detainees the United States was holding there. France is the only one of six European nations that continues to imprison detainees returned to it from the U.S. military facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Bruguiere and other French intelligence officials like to note dryly that France first realized it had become a target of al Qaeda-style jihadists when a group of Algerian radicals hijacked an airliner with the intent of crashing it into the Eiffel Tower in 1994. They viewed the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon as another, if much larger, part of the jihadist campaign against Western civilization.

So it did not surprise many intelligence officers when, in the days after the attacks, President Jacques Chirac issued an edict to French intelligence services to share information about terrorism with the U.S. intelligence agencies "as if they were your own service," according to two officials who read it.

The steady, daily flow of encrypted messages increased. "We saw a quantitative and qualitative difference in the degree of detail in the information," said Alejandro Wolff, the second-in-charge at the U.S. Embassy here, whose portfolio includes fighting terrorism.

One CIA veteran with knowledge of the U.S.-French intelligence work estimates that the French have detained about 60 suspects since the end of 2001, some with the help of the CIA. "They do as much for us as the British and in some ways more -- if you ask them," said a recently retired senior intelligence official who worked closely with France and other European countries.

France was also an early and willing collaborator in other parts of the world, allowing the CIA to fly its top-secret, armed Predator drone, still controversial inside the Pentagon, from France's air base in the former French colony of Djibouti. Its mission was to kill al Qaeda figures on a classified CIA list of "high-value targets." On Nov. 3, 2002, CIA officers operating remote controls from the air base took their first shot, killing Abu Ali al-Harithi, the mastermind of the October 2000 attack on the destroyer USS Cole, and six others, including Ahmed Hijazi, a naturalized U.S. citizen, in a Yemeni desert.

The broader cooperation between the United States and France plays to the strengths of each side, according to current and former French and U.S. officials. The CIA brings money from its classified and ever-growing "foreign liaison" account -- it has paid to transport some of France's suspects from abroad into Paris for legal imprisonment -- and its global eavesdropping capabilities and worldwide intelligence service ties. France brings its harsh laws, surveillance of radical Muslim groups and their networks in Arab states, and its intelligence links to its former colonies.

"There's an easy exchange of information," said Pierre de Bousquet de Florian, director of France's domestic CIA, the Directorate of Territorial Surveillance, who declined to comment on specifics of the relationship. "The cooperation between my service and the American service is candid, loyal and certainly effective."

France's willingness to share its dossiers on terrorists has helped the United States make some of its most significant convictions, including those of Ahmed Ressam, who was stopped at the Canadian border on his way to attempt to blow up Los Angeles International Airport in 1999, and Zacarias Moussaoui, a Moroccan who once lived in France and is the only person in the United States to have pleaded guilty in the Sept. 11 hijacking plot.Tension Over Iraq

In the run-up to the Iraq war, the White House drew the battle lines between countries that were tough on terrorists -- the administration included Iraq in the mix -- and those that were not. France's government believed U.N. inspections had successfully contained Saddam Hussein's development of weapons programs, and Bruguiere saw no connection between Iraq and al Qaeda. At the Defense Department, on Capitol Hill and elsewhere, many cast France's opposition to war as evidence it was a slacker when it came to fighting terrorism.

French fries became "freedom fries" on Air Force One and in congressional cafeterias. Rumsfeld prohibited general officers from telephoning their French counterparts, grounded U.S. planes at the Paris Air Show and disinvited the French from Red Flag, a major U.S. military exercise in which they had participated for decades.

Three months into the dispute, the State Department and the CIA made a case for France, citing its intelligence cooperation. Bush eventually told Rumsfeld to desist, according to two former State Department officials. Then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell wrote a memo saying that punishing the French was not U.S. policy. A. Elizabeth Jones, the assistant secretary of state for European and Eurasian affairs, kept it on top of her desk. "I frequently needed to be able to pull it out and quote it to my Pentagon colleagues," Jones said.

But Rumsfeld persisted a year later, excluding the French Air Force from the Red Flag exercise in 2004.

Rumsfeld's symbolic jabs baffled some officials inside the Bush administration. "Most things the secretary of defense did I could understand, even if I disagreed with him," said Lawrence B. Wilkerson, former chief of staff to Powell. "On this one, it was totally irrational, even dumb."

The intelligence services tried to insulate themselves from the public fray.

DOJ_NMG_0001023

"The French were very keen on demonstrating there was no drop-off at all," said Wolff, the U.S. diplomat here. "There was never any sense of this spilling over. There was an effort on both sides to compartmentalize" the differences.

The same was true for the CIA and other U.S. intelligence agencies, which report a steady, daily flow of encrypted messages on terrorism between the CIA and its French counterpart.

"The relations between intelligence services in the United States and France has been good, even during the transatlantic dispute over Iraq, for practical reasons," Bruguiere said. "If you want to have a better grasp of a difficult situation, you have to share intelligence real time."The Ganczarski Operation

Ganczarski, a metallurgist from the industrial Ruhr district in Germany, had been radicalized by a Saudi cleric touring European mosques in the early 1990s, studied Islam on a religious scholarship in the kingdom, traveled to Afghanistan four times, trained in al Qaeda camps, met Osama bin Laden, and returned to Germany from his last trip nine days before Sept. 11, 2001.

Intelligence officials say he was part of a patient, post-9/11 al Qaeda plan to activate European converts, including failed British "shoe-bomber" Richard Reid. Ganczarski's cell phone was the last number that a suicide bomber who killed 21 people on the island of Djerba called in April 2002. Some of the casualties were French, which gave Bruguiere legal grounds to arrest Ganczarski.

On May 20, 2003, an urgent bit of intelligence was fed into Alliance Base: Ahmed Mehdi, an associate of Ganczarski, had just booked a 14-day vacation to the French island of Reunion in the Indian Ocean.

Mehdi, then a 34-year-old Moroccan who had lived near Ganczarski in Germany, was under surveillance and showing a worrisome interest in remote-control detonators. German authorities, who did not have enough evidence to arrest him or Ganczarski, believed Mehdi was planning an attack on Reunion.

Mid-level case officers working at Alliance Base met to devise a plan: They would entice first Mehdi, then Ganczarski, to France. Bruguiere would lock them up on suspicion of associating with terrorists.

The CIA arranged for an asset to suggest that Mehdi stop in Paris on his way to Reunion to surveil targets. Mehdi, Alliance Base learned from wiretaps, worried that France would not give him a visa, which he needed because he is Moroccan. On cue, the French services arranged for a visa. The Germans monitored calls and contacts there for a change of plans.

On June 1, French authorities apprehended Mehdi at Charles de Gaulle International Airport in Paris. He was sent to Fresnes Prison outside Paris. Two days later, on June 3, 2003, Ganczarski was there, too.

Unbeknownst to the two men, they were held in cells just yards from each other. Authorities used the information gained from one to question the other. Within days, Mehdi told Bruguiere's investigators about the plot, the network and Ganczarski. Investigators now believe that Mehdi has links to al Qaeda's Hamburg cell that plotted the Sept. 11 attacks and that Ganczarski associated directly with Sept. 11 architect Khalid Sheikh Mohammed.

Alliance Base's role in the operation was noted obliquely on June 11, 2003, by Interior Minister Nicholas Sarkozy. Speaking before Parliament, he said, "This arrest took place thanks to the perfect collaboration between the services of the great democracies."

U.S. Seen Prodding Allies In Terror War (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

The top foreign-affairs adviser to the Department of Homeland Security says the United States must do more to spark action among its foreign allies in fighting the global war on terrorism in their own countries.

In an interview while attending a terrorism-law conference here this week, Cresencio S. Arcos, the department's director of international affairs, said: "We need to be more creative in how we engage our allies in the war on terror."

The United States has made great progress working with Britain, Canada and Mexico -- the latter two making up about 60 percent of joint-U.S. homeland security efforts -- said Mr. Arcos.

Department sources, however, say they are "circumspect" about forming joint working groups with governments outside those three nations. "We can't possibly have them with every country in the world," one official said, on the condition of anonymity.

On June 1, DHS officials convened a semiannual conference with British officials to discuss information- and technology-sharing practices in the war on terrorism.

A key topic, said department officials, was how better to involve the European Union in multinational air-security efforts, such as creating more extensive passenger information. The next meeting with Britain is scheduled for December.

Meanwhile, Mr. Arcos, a former senior State Department official who once served as ambassador to Honduras, said perhaps the biggest challenge in engaging allies in Europe and other parts of the world is that the war on terrorism "costs a lot."

DOJ_NMG_0001024

Most countries are less willing than the United States to embrace the high price of beefing up security in such places as international airports.

"Increasingly, as we move away from September 11, one of the concerns that we must all be mindful of is that we don't want to let the guard down," Mr. Arcos said. "We need to keep funding up."

Spending by the 22 agencies that form DHS has ballooned in the four years since the hijackings killed nearly 3,000 people in New York, at the Pentagon and in Pennsylvania.

With spending on contracts by homeland security agencies climbing from around $2.5 billion a year in 2001 to nearly $5.8 billion this year, Mr. Arcos said even Congress "is becoming very pricklish" about funding homeland security efforts.

The bulk of the increased funding, he said, has gone toward private contract firms providing Internet security systems and personnel management services to help ease the transition of nearly two dozen separate agencies into a single, more coherent umbrella department.

"The biggest concern," Mr. Arcos said, "is that we don't lose focus, that we don't just become like a pork barrel."

Man Allegedly Abducted By CIA In Egypt, Lawyer Says (HC)

Houston Chronicle, July 3, 2005

Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr, the man at the center of an international controversy over an alleged CIA abduction, is being held in Damanhour prison outside Alexandria though he has not been accused of a crime, according to his lawyer, Muntassir al-Zayyat, a Cairo attorney who defends many Islamists.

In Italy, lawmakers are enraged at what many regard as a flagrant abuse of Italian laws by the U.S. government. Italian authorities who have charged 13 CIA operatives with his abduction say they don't know the whereabouts of Nasr, also known as Abu Omar, and that their requests for information from Egyptian authorities have gone unanswered.

But in Egypt, where such renditions of wanted fugitives are relatively common, the dramatic seizure of Abu Omar in Milan drew little attention.

There are 10,000 to 20,000 political prisoners being held in Egypt, and the case of just one is unlikely to attract much interest, said Hafez Abu Saeda, a lawyer who heads the Egyptian Organization of Human Rights.

The Egyptian government has cracked down on fundamentalist groups for decades.

At the Nasr family's modest apartment in the working-class Alexandria neighborhood of Moharem Bek, his brother Hisham and mother, Safinaz, were too afraid to speak about Abu Omar and threatened to call police when approached by a reporter.

Hisham Nasr later apologized in a telephone interview, though he still refused to discuss his brother's whereabouts beyond saying he is still in prison and that the family is in regular contact with him.

"Please don't make trouble for us," he said. "He is in prison. I can't talk about it. Please forgive me."

For more than a decade, the Egyptian authorities have been hunting down suspected extremists abroad and bringing them back to Egypt, where they are routinely tortured and detained without trial, according to a Human Rights Watch report last month that documented 63 such cases.

Pricey Rendition (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

America's spy agencies need more money, a sleeker bureaucratic structure, fluent Arabic speakers and a host of other reforms and gimmicks to protect the United States and its allies from harm. Add one more urgent need: a sense of proportion.

In substance and style, the exposure of the "extraordinary rendition" -- Bush-era legalese for kidnapping -- of a radical Egyptian cleric off a Milan street in 2003 reveals a crushing inability by higher-ups here to ask and answer sensibly this question: Is this covert act really worth the likely consequences?

It certainly seemed worth it to the spies who lived in five-star luxury hotels while setting up the snatch -- and briefly afterward to rest up, it seems -- as long as the operation was never discovered and publicized. I hear the Hotel Principe di Savoia in Milan makes an unforgettable cappuccino.

But their incredibly sloppy tradecraft in bundling Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr onto a CIA-chartered jet and flying him to Cairo for interrogation virtually guaranteed that the operation would surface and be used against the United States and -- more consequentially -- against Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, one of President Bush's staunchest allies in the war on terrorism.

In the "timing is everything" department, Berlusconi announced Wednesday that he would seek reelection next year, only to be hit on Thursday with a Post exclusive quoting unnamed "CIA veterans" asserting that the Italian government was in on the operation all along.

DOJ_NMG_0001025

The story goaded a tardy, unconvincing denial from Rome of any involvement in the grab. But the earlier total silence from Berlusconi's office and its now overtaken orders to Italian officials not to discuss the matter publicly lend substantial weight to the account of the "veterans."

The quickness of CIA officials to give up sources makes reporters Judith Miller and Matt Cooper look even more heroic for stubbornly resisting the disclosure of theirs to another overzealous, judgment-impaired official, special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald. Cooper and Miller opposed Thursday's decision by Time Inc. to give some documents to Fitzgerald.

Unlike those two journalists, the "veterans" rushed to break a CIA pledge to the Italians never to confirm the incident if it became public -- which it did on June 23 when an Italian magistrate issued arrest warrants for 13 U.S. intelligence agents.

Berlusconi, like other foreign leaders who cooperate intimately with the Bush administration, will have to fend for himself against this embarrassment, which comes after one of his own ace secret operatives was killed in a tragic error by U.S. troops in Iraq. The Italian magistrates -- who have long been convinced that their national chief is a crook -- will make sure the kidnapping story does not go away.

Americans should focus on what this incident reveals about the lack of effective restraints and review placed by the Bush administration

on covert operations. To paraphrase Lord Acton, absolute secrecy corrupts absolutely.

This gung-ho administration has elevated secrecy to a positive end in itself, an attitude that gives extraordinary license to spooks, knuckledraggers and other contract employees of the agency to exceed the normal limits of lying, cheating and breaking other countries' laws.

Knuckle-draggers? It is, I gather, a term of art for a growing number of contract employees who accompany full-time CIA agents on risky missions and who have greater latitude to get physical if need be. The descriptions of the Milan operation suggest that some such outsourcing occurred there.

This is not to say that physicality is not at times required in vital operations, or that renditions should be automatically removed from the kit bag of U.S. foreign policy. The Bush team did not invent rendition. It was inherited and reauthorized by Bill Clinton in a 1995 policy directive and used more extensively during his administration than is generally recognized.

But a look at 18 confirmed renditions from 1987 to 2001 that are documented in FBI, Government Accountability Office and other public records provides an immediate understanding in almost all those cases of why they were ordered, and of the value they held for law enforcement and national security purposes.

The available facts about the abduction in broad daylight of the cleric Nasr, who is still missing, do not provide such prima-facie reassurance -- especially when weighed against the now-apparent costs.

In the current climate of secrecy and fear, there will be no limits on such damaging behavior unless Bush and his new director of national intelligence, John Negroponte, clearly establish them. If they do not, then Congress should. Even a war on terrorism needs to take into account the words spoken by Talleyrand two centuries ago: Above all, not too much zeal.

A Roman Mess (WP)

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

IT IS NOT KNOWN, and may never be, what benefit to U.S. security resulted from the reported CIA seizure of a radical Egyptian cleric on a street in Milan in 2003 and his delivery to Cairo for detention in an Egyptian prison. But the price of the extraordinary operation is all too apparent: from the more than $100,000 some 18 operatives allegedly blew on luxury hotels to the kidnapping charges an Italian prosecutor has brought against 13 of them, to the understandable uproar in Italy and the damage it could cause to future Italian-American cooperation in the war on terrorism. Was the sudden disappearance of Hassan Mustafa Osama Nasr and any intelligence it yielded -- allegedly under torture so severe that he lost hearing in one ear -- worth it? It's hard to believe so, especially since Italian authorities are telling journalists that the Bush administration had an workable alternative to its lawless behavior: allowing the security services of a close NATO ally to complete their own legal operation against Mr. Nasr and his associates.

The botched Italian job is but one example of how the CIA's greatly expanded use of the extralegal practice of "rendition" since 2001 has caused collateral damage to U.S. interests. The repeated and extensive exposure of clumsy and not-so-covert operations to grab terrorism suspects and transport them to foreign prisons has tied the United States to abduction and torture, in some cases of persons who may have been innocent of any crime or extremist connection. It has hurt the Bush administration's relations and ability to cooperate on intelligence and law enforcement with several close U.S. allies, including Canada, Germany and Sweden, as well as Italy. Though the CIA apparently cooperated with counterparts in several of those countries, the exposure of the operations has led to high-profile official investigations in all of them and a damaging political backlash. The refusal of the CIA or other administration spokesmen to respond to the uproar or cooperate with the inquiries has made the problem only worse.

DOJ_NMG_0001026

The practice of rendition began before the Bush administration, and in some cases it is a necessary tool in the fight against terrorism. Some terrorists, such as Mir Amal Kansi, the Pakistani who killed two people outside CIA headquarters in 1993, have been captured in relatively lawless regions abroad and returned to the United States for trial. In other cases, where militants have been detained in unstable places but have no intelligence value or legal culpability, it may make sense for the United States to deliver them to their home countries, rather than free them or transport them to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for an indefinite term of detention. But renditions should be rare, and they should have clear rules and oversight. No terrorist suspect should be turned over to a government likely to use torture -- and Egypt, among other Middle Eastern countries, is a well-documented abuser. The CIA should not use illegal means to capture suspects in democratic countries with a strong rule of law, especially if they are allies of the United States. It may make it quicker or easier to get one extremist sheik off the street, but as the Italian case shows, the damage caused by such highhandedness is too great.

How Visa System Failed To Flag Lodi Imam (LAT)

By Rone Tempest

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

As Shabbir Ahmed sits in the county jail on immigration charges connected to an FBI terrorism investigation, federal officials are at a loss to explain how a man who publicly demonstrated his rage against the United States and advocated violence against the U.S.-backed regime in Pakistan could slip so easily through the State Department visa system.

In October 2001, after U.S. military aircraft began bombing Al Qaeda bases and Taliban strongholds in Afghanistan, Ahmed — then a 35-year-old imam of a small mosque in Islamabad — was one of the main speakers at an anti-U.S. demonstration at a market near the U.S. Embassy in the Pakistani capital.

While demonstrators burned American flags and effigies of President Bush, Pakistan Press International news service reported that the slight, bearded Muslim cleric exhorted the crowd to join a jihad, or holy war, against the United States.

A month later at another rally, the Boston Globe quoted Ahmed as calling for a rebellion against Pakistan's president, U.S. ally Gen. Pervez Musharraf: "Whoever is against Islam," said Ahmed, "we will destroy him. If this is rebellion, we are not afraid of rebellion. Blood is going to be spilled in Pakistan."

These events were widely reported by Pakistani and foreign media. But a short time later, probably in January 2002, Ahmed walked into the consular section of the heavily fortified U.S. Embassy compound, where he was granted an uncontested three-year "religious worker" visa to the United States.

He arrived in San Francisco on Jan. 23, 2002, and immediately assumed a position as imam of a Lodi, Calif., mosque that is the center of religious life for that San Joaquin Valley city's large Pakistani American immigrant community. Since then he has made at least two trips back to his native Pakistan.

At an immigration hearing June 24 in San Francisco, Ahmed admitted making the anti-American speeches but said he had since completely changed his opinion about the United States, which he said he now loves and respects.

"He now regrets that he made those statements," said his attorney, Saad Ahmad.

But federal prosecutors, who allege links between Ahmed and Pakistan's banned Harkat-ul-Moujahedeen political party, are not convinced. They have asked Immigration Judge Anthony Murry to deny bail to Ahmed pending a deportation hearing later this year.

After reading reports about the Islamabad speeches, the leadership of the Lodi mosque where Ahmed worked fired him at a special meeting June 26. "We don't want that kind of person who has spoken against the United States," mosque President Mohammed Shoaib told Associated Press.

The man who sponsored Ahmed for the Lodi job — former Imam Mohammad Adil Khan — is also jailed without bond on immigration charges, as is Khan's 22-year-old son, Mohammad Hassan Adil.

All three men came into the country on R-1 or R-2 religious worker visas. R-2 visas are for spouses and children of R-1 visa holders.

How Ahmed's public pronouncements against the United States went unnoticed remains an unanswered question.

Before his name surfaced as part of an FBI investigation of people in the Lodi area with alleged terrorist ties, Ahmed had had at least four encounters with U.S. officials without setting off any alarms.

The first was with U.S. consular officers at the embassy in Islamabad.

Obtaining a religious worker visa requires a sponsor in the U.S. who promises such a job for the applicant and guarantees a steady source of income.

DOJ_NMG_0001027

In Ahmed's case the sponsor was the Lodi mosque, then under the direction of Mohammad Adil Khan. Khan was Ahmed's teacher for many years at Jamia Farooqia, a madrasa, or Islamic school, in Karachi, Pakistan.

Like many madrasas across that nation, Jamia Farooqia had strong connections to the Taliban movement in Afghanistan. "Taliban," in fact, means "religious students."

The school, founded by Khan's father, Salimullah Khan, also has at least a historical connection to Harkat-ul-Moujahedeen. The party had fought Soviet troops in Afghanistan from 1980 to 1988 but by 2001 had been listed as a terrorist organization by the U.S. government.

None of this background appears to have reached consular officers when they considered Ahmed's visa request in early 2002.

Likewise, if intelligence agents or political officers at the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad had noted Ahmed's active participation in anti-U.S. rallies in October and November 2001, they failed to pass the information on to the consular officers.

"In every instance in which we have specific information when an individual intends to do harm to the U.S. or to U.S. citizens, we deny the visa," said Angela Aggelar, spokeswoman for the State Department's Bureau of Consular Affairs. "But in order for a person not to be eligible for a visa, they have to have done something that was reported to us by law enforcement."

Ahmed was also screened by airport immigration and customs officials at the San Francisco airport when he first entered the country and each time he returned from trips to Pakistan.

But it was not until Nov. 15, 2004 — when the Lodi mosque applied for a two-year extension of Ahmed's visa — that his name showed up on a watch list. This was after the FBI's Sacramento office had launched an investigation of alleged terrorist links in Lodi.

By the time federal immigration attorneys arrived in court for the June 24 hearing, they had a complete dossier on Ahmed, including his writings in the Jamia Farooqia magazine and his speeches before the Islamabad crowds.

"Did you encourage people in Pakistan at least five times to go to Afghanistan and kill Americans?" federal attorney Paul Nischiie asked Ahmed. "Did you encourage people to defend Osama bin Laden?"

At the hearing, Ahmed initially answered no to both questions, but he later admitted to making anti-U.S. statements.

Officials in Washington with Homeland Security, Citizenship and Immigration Services, Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the State Department had no explanation for why the same questions were not asked three years earlier when Ahmed first presented himself at the U.S. Embassy seeking a visa.

Part of the problem, noted in the 9/11 Commission Report, was that different federal agencies did not communicate well with each other. The Department of Homeland Security was not created until March 2003.

Russ Knocke, a spokesman for Homeland Security, said someone with a similar background would be much more likely to be identified today.

"It shows you how much has changed," he said.

Consular Affairs spokeswoman Aggelar pointed to the limited resources available to the embassy at the time of Ahmed's first visa request.

In the months immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Aggelar said, the consular database contained 7 million names. The watch list has expanded to more than 20 million names under a new heightened security system in which many more people are likely to be flagged.

This explanation is unlikely to satisfy congressional critics of the consular screening process.

"The State Department's excuse that they didn't have a functioning terrorist list is inadequate," said Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), a critic of immigration policy. "If State thought it was important enough, they would have relayed the message by phone, e-mail, smoke signal or carrier pigeon."

Tancredo, a former Denver schoolteacher, believes that terrorists enter the country using a network that includes imams granted entry on R-1 religious worker visas.

In the 15 years since the R-1 category was established in 1990, more than 145,000 religious worker admissions have been recorded by U.S. immigration authorities.

In fiscal year 2002, the same year that Ahmed came into the country, immigration records show 53 R-1 admissions from Pakistan.

Only relatively recently have federal law enforcement agencies begun to concentrate on investigations of Muslim clerics holding religious worker visas.

Last fall, 62-year-old Muhammad Khalil, imam of a basement mosque in Brooklyn, N.Y., was convicted in federal court of fraudulently sponsoring more than 200 applications for Pakistani religious workers for his Dar Ehya Essunah mosque.

In January, Wagdy Mohammed Ghoneim, the Egyptian head of an Orange County mosque, left the country with his wife and seven children rather than face deportation hearings on immigration charges.

DOJ_NMG_0001028

PATRIOT ACT:

County Commission Cites Patriot Act Concerns (EBHNT)

By SUSAN LOYER, STAFF WRITER

East Brunswick (NJ) Home News Tribune, July 3, 2005

NEW BRUNSWICK — The Middlesex County Human Relations Commission is joining the growing list of communities and legislators from around the country taking a stance against the USA Patriot Act.

The commission will issue a formal resolution to lawmakers, municipal governments and local organizations on Tuesday urging them to petition the executive level of the federal government to rescind or modify any law or executive order that diminishes protected civil rights.

"We definitely want to protect our country, our neighbors and our homes, but there are potential dangers in such acts as the Patriot Act," said commission Chairman Bruce S. Morgan. "We take exception to any act or order that erodes the rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution and Bill of Rights."

The USA Patriot Act (Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism) was passed in October 2001 in response to the events on Sept. 11. The act is designed to deter and punish terrorist acts in the United States and around the world and enhance law enforcement investigatory tools.

But some groups, including the Middlesex County Human Relations Commission, believe the act infringes on the rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

According to the resolution, the act and several federal executive orders go beyond legitimate measures of protection against terrorism and lead to infringe on such rights as freedom of speech, religion, assembly and privacy, the right to counsel and due process in judicial proceedings, protection from unreasonable searches and seizure and equal protection under the law.

"The act impedes on our rights of free speech and also allows people to be held without a trial and even without their family's knowledge," said Morgan. "In general, we object to the portions of the act that pertain to human rights. I am hoping that by issuing the resolution, other Americans will take up the banner and bring lawmakers' attention to the portions of the Patriot Act, which I believe are antithetical to the Constitution and Bill of Rights, so they will be repealed."

Morgan said he believes the act was passed by lawmakers because "they were given so little time to review it and a lot of things may have been missed. We're hoping to get it tailored so it does not erode the rights guaranteed by the Constitution," he said.

The Highland Park Borough Council passed a similar resolution in February 2004. The New Brunswick City Council adopted a similar resolution in May.

Portions of the Patriot Act are due to expire at the end of the year, unless they are renewed by federal officials.

Hagen W. Frank: Patriot Act Not Threat As LSJ Says (LSJ)

Lansing (MI) State Journal, July 3, 2005

Hagen W. Frank is an assistant U.S. attorney in Grand Rapids.

On June 10 and 17, the LSJ ran editorials strongly criticizing the USA Patriot Act. While the articles demonstrated the LSJ's commitment to privacy rights in the face of purported infringements by the Patriot Act, they also demonstrated the editors' unfamiliarity with the constitutional and statutory law that governs federal law enforcement and intelligence investigations.

Both articles focused primarily on section 215 of the act, which expanded the types of materials that may be ordered produced by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (the "FISA Court") in domestic intelligence investigations of foreign powers or international terrorism.

Described by critics as a provision that allows the FBI to go on fishing expeditions of citizens' reading habits - as if the FBI were looking for "busy work" - the provision in fact simply gave the FISA Court the same authority in intelligence and international terrorism investigations to order production of materials that a prosecutor can obtain by grand jury subpoena in a domestic criminal investigation.

According to the June 17 editorial, this is bad because the FISA Court is secret and because the government already had the power to get these materials by search warrant. Secrecy, however, is essential to the kinds of investigations overseen by the FISA Court, i.e., classified intelligence investigations into the activities of foreign powers, suspected agents of foreign powers and international terrorism.

Also, the assertion that search warrants are required to get such materials in domestic criminal investigations is incorrect. Those materials are routinely obtained through grand jury subpoenas, issued by federal prosecutors based only upon a belief that relevant evidence may be found. The Fourth Amendment's probable cause warrant requirement protects reasonable expectations of privacy, not public records of public use of a public facility.

DOJ_NMG_0001029

Similarly, the June 10 editorial complains about the Senate Intelligence Committee's endorsement of a proposal to give the FBI administrative subpoena authority in terrorism investigations. According to the LSJ, this would empower the FBI to "investigate citizens without judicial oversight." This complaint assumes incorrectly that every government investigative tool requires judicial oversight.

However, whether judicial pre-approval is required depends upon how intrusive something is and on constitutional, statutory and regulatory provisions that the editorial ignores. Further, administrative subpoenas have long been used by a wide variety of federal agencies.

The FBI already has such authority in health care fraud and child sexual-exploitation investigations, and the proposed measure would simply expand that authority to terrorism investigations.

Even though obtaining evidence through subpoena is not a Fourth Amendment "search," and even though administrative subpoena power is unremarkable, the editorial still warns that this would "give the FBI the power to conduct searches without the approval of any court or grand jury."

Every citizen and every media organization has the right to question and criticize government. However, the LSJ also has the responsibility not to mislead the public on important issues of the day.

The USA Patriot Act presents important issues that call for well-informed debate. The LSJ's recent editorials did not contribute to such a debate.

Senator Christopher "Kit" Bond: Strong Patriot Act Required (WT)

By Christopher "Kit" Bond

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

As July Fourth approaches, some Americans appear to suffer from amnesia.

With dramatic headlines such as "Ripping Pages from the Book of Civil Liberties," "Patriot Act Fosters Secrecy, Government Abuse" and "Keep Big Brother at Bay," editorial writers and columnists unfairly criticize legislation that has helped keep America safe since September 11, 2001.

A few weeks ago, the U.S. House of Representatives rejected a proposal to make it easier for the FBI to obtain information on suspected terrorists that could help prevent a future attack.

What is going on here? Consider the lyrics of country music artist Darryl Worley's song titled "Have You Forgotten?"

Have you forgotten how it felt that day?
To see your homeland under fire
And her people blown away.
Have you forgotten when those towers fell?
We had neighbors still inside going thru a living hell.

It appears some editorial writers and members of Congress have forgotten. And they are not alone. Fewer Americans -- only 35 percent -- now fear another terrorist attack in the near future than at any time since September 11, a recent USA Today/CNN/Gallup poll found. Despite their complacency, the threat of terrorism continues.

And surely there is no more important public purpose than keeping America safe from another catastrophic terrorist attack on U.S. soil. To do so, Congress should reauthorize the Patriot Act quickly and expand it to give law enforcement more tools to go after suspected terrorists and prevent attacks.

The September 11 attacks showed the failure of a number of legal and regulatory policies that kept intelligence and law enforcement communities from talking to each other and sharing information on investigations of suspected terrorists.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Overhaul Of U.S. Intelligence System May Take 10 Years, Analysts Say (BSUN)

By Siobhan Gorman, Sun National Staff

The Baltimore Sun, July 3, 2005

WASHINGTON - Though the White House announced its intelligence overhaul Wednesday with promises that it would make the country safer, the changes it outlined could take a decade to complete, according to longtime intelligence analysts, including a member of the presidential commission that proposed the reforms.

DOJ_NMG_0001030

"The whole process will take five to 10 years," said Adm. William O. Studeman, a member of the commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led the administration to conclude that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction.

Studeman characterized that time frame as an optimistic estimate - one assuming that every part of the intelligence community endorses the changes.

The White House said it embraced 70 of 74 recommendations of the commission, led by U.S. Circuit Judge Laurence Silberman and former Sen. Charles S. Robb of Virginia. The most significant reform would be creation of a domestic intelligence service within the FBI.

Other changes are aimed at slowing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, improving the quality of human intelligence and integrating the efforts of all 15 U.S. intelligence agencies.

But the future of the reforms is in doubt, as Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III have begun maneuvering to regain control over the design of the FBI's intelligence service, said an intelligence veteran responsible for helping the White House implement the plan.

The president set a 60-day deadline for having a detailed outline of the new domestic intelligence service. The Justice Department is arguing that the planning should begin immediately, while White House aides want to wait until the head of the service is appointed, the intelligence veteran said.

If the deadline is suspended until the White House appoints a chief of the domestic intelligence service, the FBI will lose considerable control over that service's shape.

This early battle for control is symptomatic of the kinds of cultural and turf battles National Intelligence Director John D. Negroponte will continually contend with.

President Bush also set a 60-day deadline for the Justice Department to develop a plan for consolidating its three anti-terrorism divisions into one. Negroponte has 30 days to produce plans for his human intelligence management office housed at the CIA.

Once the plans are drafted, the organizations should be up and running within six months, "if people are not dragging their feet," said John MacGaffin, who spent 31 years at the CIA and six at the FBI. He testified before the presidential commission and the 9/11 commission, which investigated the Sept. 11 attacks.

MacGaffin said that the full impact of the reforms would not be felt for "a long time." He said that progress would be "incremental" but that some changes could occur immediately.

He pointed to a large number of intelligence reports on terrorism that the FBI did not pass along to policy-makers on a timely basis because they weren't familiar with intelligence reporting. Instead of seeking assistance from the CIA, he said, "the FBI took refuge in bureaucratic ownership of the information and declined to let the CIA distribute the reports on their behalf."

The greater the direct authority given to Negroponte and others responsible for instituting the president's plans, the faster the changes will take hold, said John Gannon, former chairman of the National Intelligence Council. "Consensus in the intelligence community means status quo."

Skeptics, though, predict that any positive results are much more than 10 years away.

Clark Kent Ervin, former inspector general of the Homeland Security Department, likened the intelligence agencies to the military services circa 1945. He said it took 40 years for the branches to learn - or be forced - to work together. The intelligence agencies are embarking on a similarly long road to reform, he said.

Ervin pointed to the State Department's negotiations with the FBI to gain full access to terrorist watch lists. "It was shocking to learn that as a matter of course, the State Department does not have access to that information," said Ervin, who was the inspector general at the State Department before he moved to Homeland Security.

Ervin also worries that the continual organizational changes could prove self-defeating: Policy-makers have been unwilling to wait to see the effects of one new organization before they start another with a similar mission.

"You've got to have a score card, but the intelligence community has never really had one," MacGaffin said. "The problem is that scorekeeping in intelligence does not lend itself to more traditional metrics. ... If the DNI [Negroponte] can't establish such a system, we'll never know whether we are successful or not."

In the first months, the success of the latest reforms can best be gauged by whom the president appoints to the myriad positions that Bush's plan creates, says former 9/11 commission member John Lehman, who was secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration. The intelligence agencies need new blood to force a change of culture that is largely wedded to Cold War-era rules and processes, he said.

"The administration seems to have an almost childlike faith in the career bureaucracy," he said of Bush's appointments in the office of the director of national intelligence.

Art World Comes To The Cause Of Arrested Artist (SDUT)

By Robert L. Pincus, Union-tribune Art Critic

The San Diego Union-Tribune, July 3, 2005

Imagine this scenario: You are a well-established artist and respected university professor. You wake up one morning to find your spouse of 25 years isn't breathing. You call 911. Paramedics arrive, accompanied by police.

There are a few petri dishes in the house, because your conceptually oriented work involves scientific-style installations and issues. So, one of those workers decides you just might be a terrorist and calls the FBI.

The next day, as you are on the way to the funeral home, you are detained by the FBI and the Joint Terrorist Task Force. You are held for 22 hours without having your Miranda rights read to you. Your home and even part of your block is cordoned off; your computer, books, manuscripts and anything else deemed suspicious are confiscated by workers in hazmat suits. Even your spouse's body is held for further analysis.

Sound like the outline of a compelling novel or film about governmental abuse of power? Sure. But this story isn't imaginary. It is what University of Buffalo professor Steven Kurtz, a member of the artists' collaborative called Critical Art Ensemble (CAE), experienced in May 2004 when someone who answered his 911 call decided to make a call to the FBI.

This tale doesn't end there; Kurtz is now facing charges that could result in a 20-year prison sentence.

Artists across the United States and beyond have taken up Kurtz's cause, because they feel it is their cause, too. Following an earlier fundraiser in London, an auction to raise money for his defense was held at the esteemed Paula Cooper Gallery in New York in April. Those donating work included some of the best-known contemporary artists – Chris Burden, Ann Hamilton, Barbara Kruger, Sol Lewitt, Louise Lawler, Brice Marden and Kiki Smith, among others.

"We feel that artists' and intellectuals' First Amendment rights are in serious jeopardy under this administration," stated Helen Molesworth, one of the auction's co-organizers, shortly before the event opened. "It's so important, for all of us, that our abilities to be creative thinkers are not hampered by government." (Molesworth is chief curator for exhibitions at the Wexner Center for the Arts in Columbus, Ohio.)

For some years, Kurtz has been a pivotal member of the CAE, a collaborative of artists that, through books, writings on the Web and exhibitions, has reflected on such subjects as what it calls "the flesh machine" (the scientific/medical establishment) and on genetically engineered food. And the group's installations have incorporated bacteria and food testing because of its broader interest in demystifying science for the lay person.

The argument could be made that the FBI and the Terrorist Task Force were being reasonable when they followed up on a phone call and sampled the materials in Kurtz's petri dishes. But the government has continued to pursue prosecution, even after the Commissioner of Public Health for the state of New York declared that the samples of bacteria in the petri dishes were harmless.

While there apparently wasn't enough evidence to bring bioterrorist charges, the government is pursuing wire and mail fraud charges against Kurtz and Robert Ferrell, a former head of the Department of Genetics at the University of Pittsburgh's School of Public Health.

"These laws (on fraud) have been on the books for more than a century. Whether it (the bacteria) is or isn't harmful isn't an element of the offense. The case centers on property acquired by fraud or misstatement," said U.S. Assistant District Attorney William Hochul on Thursday. He's the prosecutor on the case, which is being tried in New York.

Ferrell's crime was to have helped Kurtz obtain $256 worth of benign bacteria, which means he didn't follow the fine print of his contract with a company called American Type Culture Collection. The firm itself has taken no legal action against either Kurtz or Ferrell. Yet if convicted of the government's charges, artist and scientist could serve up to 20 years in prison.

Kurtz, himself, tries to be philosophical about his situation.

"When you stand up to authoritarian parts of the culture, stuff like this will happen," says Kurtz. "People I know say it's inevitable.

"I would temper that point and say it could happen to lots of people, and somehow I got picked. I certainly got the booby prize on this."

Standing up, in CAE terms, means confronting troublesome subjects. As part of The Free Range Project, the CAE lets people have the opportunity to bring in food to be tested for genetic modifications. It had been presented in a European venue but couldn't go on view at the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art in May 2004 because much of the materials were confiscated from Kurtz's home.

"Molecular Invasion" was the CAE's companion book on this subject, which argued that some science can be scrutinized by everyone.

"Amateur discourse clearly has a place in the transgenic debates since some levels of study can be reviewed by nonexperts," they write. "The stakes are too high for product safety testing to be left solely in the domain of corporate and scientific experts."

DOJ_NMG_0001032

One can speculate that the government isn't sympathetic to the latest Critical Arts Ensemble project either, which looks at the history of germ warfare and issues of American policy about biological warfare and bioterrorism. Toward this end, Kurtz had acquired three bacteria that have been used as educational tools in schools. They were in his home at the time of the search.

Having to deal with the case has forced him to work a lot slower, he says. But, he adds, "The FBI is not going to stop us. If anything, we're more committed to what we do, not less."

Looking at the government's goals, he speculated, "They are trying to develop an internal enemy that fits into their canon of fear. Bob (Ferrell) looks like a friendly grandpa. And if they can convince people that even he could be a terrorist, then who isn't a potential terrorist?"

The Critical Art Ensemble Defense Fund has raised enough money to defend him adequately. In May, at the most recent hearing before a judge in Buffalo, Kurtz's attorney, Paul Cambria, asked that the case be dismissed. He argued that the government intentionally misled the judge when obtaining the original search warrant. Any ruling on this won't likely happen until late July or August. Still, if events don't go the government's way, it can appeal, of course, forcing Kurtz to raise more funds for his defense.

He believes that his irreplaceable materials won't ever be returned.

"Even if the case concludes," he says, "they'll probably think of some way to keep the investigation going."

While hearings about the wire and mail-fraud charges have gone forward, a Buffalo grand jury subpoenaed CAE member Steven Barnes. After testifying, Barnes told a reporter, "It seems apparent that the prosecution is still trying to pursue some kind of biological weapons charge."

On what basis they might bring charges is unclear, though initially the Justice Department's Assistant District Attorney William Hochul was trying to use a section of the Patriot Act, which expanded the earlier Biological Weapons Statute.

"Apparently," writes the CAE in a recent essay, "the U.S. Justice Department is now trying to make CAE into an example of what can happen to citizens whose only 'crime' is having thoughts of dissent enacted within the sphere of legality and the alleged protection of constitutional rights."

Whether Kurtz and Ferrell's fraud charges are dismissed or not is only one reason for attention to be paid to this case. The larger issue centers on whether the government's "war on terror" is having a corrosive effect on artistic expression.

Border Watchers Gear Up For Expanded Patrol (LAT)

By Scott Gold

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

As the second act to its civilian border patrol in Arizona, the organization known as the Minutemen has pledged to launch a massive patrol of the entire U.S.-Mexico border this fall.

To protest what they call inadequate security along the border, Minuteman leaders are holding community meetings throughout the South and Southwest to marshal thousands of volunteers. Leaders hope to amass in October to try to block illegal immigration routes in four states.

But the organization is finding that such an ambitious plan will not come together as easily as the April patrol in Arizona that covered 23 miles of the border. That is particularly true in Texas, which has 1,254 miles of the 2,000-mile border.

Unlike Arizona, where patrols operated primarily on public land, most of the land along the border in Texas is privately owned, except for the Big Bend region in the western tip of the state.

Activists would need permission to patrol on private property. But despite the Minutemen's meetings in recent weeks with ranchers and other landowners, many of the owners said they remained torn about the project — supportive of its message, for the most part, but wary of its practical implications.

Many landowners said they were concerned about the potential for a violent exchange between Minutemen and so-called coyotes or, worse, drug traffickers who used some of the same corridors as human smugglers.

"We're worried about the liability of a confrontation occurring on our ranch," said Dr. Michael Vickers, owner of three cattle ranches, and a rural veterinarian in 10 south Texas counties. "Having them out on some of these ranches may be a dangerous situation."

Vickers said he had attended several of the meetings and remained conflicted. The 1,000-acre ranch he uses as his residence, south of a town called Falfurrias, is about four miles from a U.S. Border Patrol checkpoint. Illegal immigrants frequently bypass the checkpoint by sneaking across his land; they leave behind holes cut in fences, and trash.

"You walk outside and you feel like there are eyes watching you, and most of the time there are," Vickers said. "This is every night, sometimes a hundred or more in a night. And I'm not the only one. This is every ranch in south Texas."

Still, Vickers said he thought the Minutemen might be better off sticking to public areas, such as roadside parks where immigrants were often picked up after crossing.

DOJ_NMG_0001033

Minutemen organizers, however, continue to push for access to private property.

"Those that love their country will surely come around to letting us use their land," said Wanda Schultz, a spokeswoman for Americans for Zero Population Growth, a Houston group that expects to play a role in the Texas border campaign.

Organizers in Texas also disagree over whether volunteers should be allowed to confront and even detain illegal immigrants. That dispute is significant because some fear it could threaten the air of legitimacy the Minutemen have captured after the Arizona patrol.

Self-appointed border patrols have long operated in small, ragtag posses and been maligned as vigilantes. Under the umbrella of a unifying organization — and because of the media attention group leaders have generated — they suddenly have a voice in immigration policy.

Though the Minutemen remain controversial — they have been condemned by President Bush and the American Civil Liberties Union, among others — their leaders have testified on Capitol Hill and made numerous television appearances. They attribute their public relations victory in part to a rule rule prohibiting patrollers from any interaction with immigrants.

Volunteers in Arizona were ordered to report their discoveries to the official Border Patrol, which would make arrests.

But with plans underway for a broader watch, some Texas activists are questioning those restrictions.

J.C. Hernandez, a third-generation Texan, is the founder and president of Americans for Zero Immigration. Hernandez was working with Minutemen organizers in Texas and said he expected to play a leading role in the upcoming patrol. He also wants the right, he said, to make a citizen's arrest of suspected illegal immigrants.

"When you fight a war you don't fight it with rhetoric," Hernandez said. "When you fight a war, man, you go in and kill the enemy…. A signal has to be sent to Mexico and all those countries that we are tired of it and we're not going to put up with it. I would handcuff them and walk them physically back to their country."

The two founders of the movement, Jim Gilchrist of Aliso Viejo, Calif., and Chris Simcox of Arizona, said any change to the group's "standard operating procedure" could be devastating to the image that leaders have cultivated.

Gilchrist said he declined to carry a weapon during the Arizona patrol, and he said organizers there determined that volunteers could be charged with kidnapping if they tried to apprehend immigrants.

"This is a bloodless revolution. It has to be," Gilchrist said. "There are a lot of wannabe soldiers. They think that this is a call to literally defend their country with arms…. But this is not a war. We can't look like a bunch of Rambos."

Simcox, who was in Texas recently to plan strategy, said veering from his script would feed criticism from government officials and human rights groups.

"They are just waiting for someone to make a mistake and break the law," Simcox said. "This is the only model that will work. If there are groups out there advocating citizen's arrests, they are treading on dangerous territory. They could ruin this entire movement."

Some activists contend that a careful reading of Texas law, however, would permit a more aggressive response. State law says a police officer or "any other person" may arrest someone when a felony is committed in that person's presence or "within his view."

"It is under discussion," Schultz said. "I agree that it might be legal under the law."

Discussions with landowners and the debate over confronting immigrants are not the only problems that have arisen since plans for a broader campaign were announced.

The group's two founders have gone their separate ways since Arizona. Volunteers who worked alongside them said the two clashed over management tactics and strategy, though both have played down reports of tension.

Gilchrist has left the patrol operation and is instead marshaling forces to investigate companies that hire illegal immigrants. Simcox has taken the helm of the border patrol campaign.

As a result, there is considerable confusion over who controls the "Minuteman" name. Gilchrist and Simcox share a dual Internet portal used to spread the group's message and recruit volunteers. Gilchrist controls the "Minuteman Project" name, he said, and Simcox controls the parallel Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, which includes the border patrol campaign.

There are numerous splinter groups; at least seven organizations affiliated with the Minuteman Project have separate plans for smaller border patrols in Texas. The division has fueled renewed criticism from some officials in southern Texas, who have asked the Minutemen to stay away.

"It tells you something," said Laredo Mayor Betty Flores, whose border town would be an anchor of the Texas campaign.

"When that happens to a private business, when you don't know who the CEO is, things go wrong. Can you imagine if the same thing happens to an organization like this? It's very dangerous."

Small Plane Violates Washington Air Space (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, July 3, 2005

A small plane entered restricted air space in the Washington area before two fighter jets forced it to land at an airport here, authorities said.

U.S. Secret Service spokesman Jonathan Cherry would not say what air space the small Cessna passenger plane violated on Saturday, the Frederick News-Post reported.

There is a 16-mile restricted zone in each direction from the Washington Monument and Camp David, near Thurmont, where President Bush was spending the weekend, is also off limits.

Two F-16 fighter jets were deployed and they forced the small plane to land at Frederick Municipal Airport. Officials were questioning a man and a woman Saturday, according to the News-Post. There were no arrests.

On Wednesday, the White House briefly went to a red alert when a plane entered restricted airspace around Washington.

In that incident, President Bush was hurried from his residence to a safer location and lawmakers were evacuated from the Capitol. Two fighter jets intercepted a twin-engine, propeller-driven plane eight miles northeast of the Capitol and escorted it to Winchester, Va.

The White House press office did not return calls for comment early Sunday.

D.C. Ready To Assess Evacuation Strategy (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

The first test of Washington's downtown emergency evacuation plan is expected to clear the Mall of most Fourth of July revelers tomorrow and speed them on their way within an hour, officials said yesterday.

"A good majority of people will be out of there in that time span," said Douglas Noble, chief traffic engineer for the D.C. Department of Transportation.

The plan, which calls for police to direct the hundreds of thousands of pedestrians and motorists to seven evacuation routes, where green and red traffic signals will run longer, was developed two years ago in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. City officials have tried to publicize it, even painting special signs on streets along the routes directing drivers to the Capital Beltway, but they acknowledged that a major test is needed to tell people how they should flee if terrorists were to strike the city.

"We are trying to educate people that in the event of an unfortunate emergency, these are the routes you would use," DOT spokesman Bill Rice said. "The idea is to see in a limited situation how our systems respond, how motorists and pedestrians respond, and work the kinks out on a smaller scale and hopefully never have to use it on a larger scale."

Experts said yesterday that they knew of no other major U.S. city that has recently tested emergency evacuation routes. "It makes perfect sense," said Brian Jenkins, a terrorism expert who co-wrote a report on how transportation, primarily in New York City, functioned on Sept. 11. "There are two ways of learning," Jenkins said. "One is you produce a theoretical plan, put it on the shelf and wait for a real incident. The other is to run a test, see how it works and make corrections. Mistakes are free."

The routes in what is being billed as Operation Fast Forward include Constitution Avenue between 15th and 23rd streets NW; Independence Avenue between Third Street and Washington Avenue SW; and 14th Street between Pennsylvania Avenue NW and C Street SW.

City officials yesterday provided additional details about the test. They said it was designed to start 15 minutes after the fireworks end because planners believe that will give most pedestrians enough time to walk from the Mall to Metro stations while drivers retrieve their cars from garages. Cars will then flood the streets right about the time pedestrian volume is decreasing, which the city hopes will avoid massive tie-ups.

"Typically, you get a big clearance off the Mall right after the fireworks," Noble said. "Waiting 15 minutes allows people to get out of the Mall, get up into town, get to Metro stations, get to parking garages, and then this gets deployed as people actually leave the garages.

"If we did this right at the start," Noble added, "it would be just a mess."

D.C. police officers will direct people from the Mall to the seven evacuation routes, although they will not stop drivers and pedestrians from using other routes if they choose. Along the emergency routes, streetlights will operate on extended cycles of three minutes green followed by one minute red. Planners believe the extra green-light time will speed cars out of town while a minute of red will allow lingering pedestrians to cross streets. At rush hour, D.C. traffic lights typically run 70 seconds green followed by 30 seconds red.

Transportation officials will observe the evacuation from the command center in the Reeves Municipal Center on 14th Street NW, watching televised images from about 50 traffic cameras at the intersections.

City officials chose the evacuation routes, known as E-routes, two years ago as part of the government's massive response to the Sept. 11 attacks. Officials have struggled with how to evacuate Washington during a terrorist attack and have concluded that the region's roads and transit network cannot handle a citywide evacuation. Instead, officials have focused on moving smaller groups from specific locations.

Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) yesterday questioned whether the test was poorly timed because it will ensnare tourists, rather than educating the many residents who are out of town for the holiday weekend.

"I'm also not sure exactly what it will prove," she said. "It may be something of a test of mass transportation, but there will be little test of what really stopped us on 9/11, which was lots and lots of cars going the same way."

But law enforcement and Metro officials yesterday said they support the evacuation plan. "This is a twofer," U.S. Capitol Police Chief Terrance W. Gainer said. "We need to move the people off the Mall anyway. Why not use this opportunity to drill your plan and make sure it is working?"

About 125,000 vehicles are expected to travel downtown for the festivities, according to AAA Mid-Atlantic. Metro estimates that more than 300,000 spectators rode trains to last year's Fourth of July celebration, which was marred by rain. More than 500,000 people took Metro to the fireworks display the year before.

The other downtown evacuation routes are Ninth Street between Pennsylvania Avenue NW and Interstate 395; South Capitol Street between Washington Avenue and M Street; Washington Avenue between Independence Avenue SW and South Capitol Street; and Third Street between Constitution Avenue NW and Independence Avenue SW.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Salutes Military In Radio Address (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 3, 2005

President Bush paid tribute to America's military forces Saturday, saying that Independence Day is an occasion for the nation to express thanks by flying the flag, sending letters to troops and reaching out to their families.

"At posts in Afghanistan, Iraq, and around the world, our men and women in uniform are taking the fight to the terrorists overseas, so that we do not have to face the terrorists here at home," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

He said U.S. forces have freed millions of people from oppression, in keeping with the principle of the Declaration of Independence "that all are created equal and all are meant to be free.

"Those who serve today are taking their rightful place among the greatest generations that have worn our nation's uniform," the president said.

He will celebrate July Fourth with a visit to Morgantown, W.Va.

"In this time of testing, all our troops and their families can know that the American people are behind them," Bush said. "On this Fourth of July weekend, I ask every American to find a way to thank men and women defending our freedom — by flying the flag, sending letters to our troops in the field, and helping the military family down the street."

He said other methods of tribute are outlined on a Pentagon Web site, http://www.AmericaSupportsYou.mil.

The Two Wars Of The Worlds (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

ON the morning after George W. Bush spoke to the nation from Fort Bragg, Americans started marching off to Steven Spielberg's "War of the Worlds." Both halves of this double feature invoked 9/11, perfectly timed for this particular holiday. Ever since "Jaws," a movie set on the July Fourth weekend, broke box office records 30 summers ago, Independence Day has come to stand for terror as much as for freedom.

Decide for yourself if "War of the Worlds" is more terrifying than "Jaws." Either way, it's scarier than the president's speech. Yet the discrepancy between Mr. Spielberg's ability to whip up fear and Mr. Bush's inability isn't merely a matter of aesthetics. On Independence Day 2005, this terror gap is an ideal barometer for gauging the waning political power of a lame-duck president waging what increasingly looks like a lame-duck war.

As we saw on Tuesday night, doomsday isn't the surefire hit it used to be for Mr. Bush. Now that the rhetorical arsenal of W.M.D.'s and mushroom clouds is bare, he had little choice but to bring back that oldie but goodie, 9/11, as the specter of the doom that awaits us if we don't stay the course - his course - in Iraq. By the fifth time he did so, it was hard not to think of that legendary National Lampoon cover: "If you don't buy this magazine, we'll kill this dog."

Planned or not, the sepulchral silence of Mr. Bush's military audience was the perfect dazed response to what was literally a summer rerun. The president gave almost the identical televised address, albeit with four fewer 9/11 references, at the Army War College in Pennsylvania in May 2004. It's so tired that this time around even the normally sympathetic Drudge site gave higher billing to reviews of "War of the Worlds." Fewer TV viewers tuned in than for any prime-time speech in Mr. Bush's presidency. A good thing too, since so much of what he said was, as usual, at odds with reality. The president pledged to "prevent Al Qaeda and other foreign terrorists from turning Iraq into what Afghanistan was under the Taliban" a full week after Newsweek and The New York Times reported on a new C.I.A. assessment that the war may be turning Iraq into an even more effective magnet and training ground for Islamic militants than Afghanistan was for Al Qaeda in the 1980's and 90's.

DOJ_NMG_0001036

"War of the Worlds" makes as many references to 9/11 as Mr. Bush did. The alien attack on America is the work of sleeper cells; the garments of the dead rain down on those fleeing urban apocalypse; poignant fliers are posted for The Missing. There is also a sterling American military that rides to the rescue. Deep in the credits for "War of the Worlds" is a thank-you to the Department of Defense and some half-dozen actual units that participated in the movie, from the Virginia Army National Guard to a Marine battalion from Camp Pendleton, Calif. Indeed, Mr. Spielberg seems to have had markedly more success in recruiting extras for his film than the Pentagon has had of late in drumming up troops for Iraq.

That's not the only way that "War of the Worlds" shows up Mr. Bush. In not terribly coded dialogue, the film makes clear that its Americans know very well how to distinguish a war of choice like that in Iraq from a war of necessity, like that prompted by Al Qaeda's attack on America. Tim Robbins - who else? - pops up to declare that when aliens occupy a country, the "occupations always fail." Even Tom Cruise's doltish teenage screen son is writing a school report on "the French occupation of Algeria."

Mr. Spielberg's movie illuminates, too, how Mr. Bush has flubbed the basic storytelling essential to sustain public support for his Iraq adventure. The president has made a tic of hammering in melodramatic movie tropes: good vs. evil, you're with us or you're with the terrorists, "wanted dead or alive," "bring 'em on," "mission accomplished." When you relay a narrative in that style, the audience expects you to stick to the conventions of the genre; the story can end only with the cavalry charging in to win the big final battle. That's how Mr. Spielberg deploys his platoons, "Saving Private Ryan"-style, in "War of the Worlds." By contrast, Mr. Bush never marshaled the number of troops needed to guarantee Iraq's security and protect its borders; he has now defined "mission accomplished" down from concrete victory to the inchoate spreading of democracy. To start off sounding like Patton and end up parroting Woodrow Wilson is tantamount to ambushing an audience at a John Wayne movie with a final reel by Frank Capra.

Both Mr. Bush's critics and loyalists at times misunderstand where his failure leaves America now. The left frets too much that the public just doesn't get it - that it is bamboozled by the administration and won't see the light until it digests the Downing Street memo. But even if they couldn't bring themselves to vote for John Kerry, most Americans do get it. A majority of the country view the Iraq war as "not worth it" and going badly. They intuitively sense that as USA Today calculated on Friday, there have been more U.S. military deaths (roughly a third more) in the year since Iraq got its sovereignty than in the year before. Last week an ABC News/Washington Post survey also found that a majority now believe that the administration "intentionally misled" us into a war - or, in the words of the Downing Street memo, that the Bush administration "fixed" the intelligence to gin up the mission.

Meanwhile, the war's die-hard supporters, now in the minority, keep clinging to the hope that some speech or Rovian stunt or happy political development in the furtherance of democratic Iraqi self-government can turn public opinion around. Dream on. The most illuminating of all the recent poll numbers was released by the Pew Research Center on June 13: the number of Americans who say that "people they know are becoming less involved emotionally" with news of the war has risen from 26 percent in May 2004 to 44 percent now. Like the war or not, Americans who do not have a relative or neighbor in the fight are simply tuning Iraq out.

The president has no one to blame but himself. The color-coded terror alerts, the repeated John Ashcroft press conferences announcing imminent Armageddon during election season, the endless exploitation of 9/11 have all taken their numbing toll. Fear itself is the emotional card Mr. Bush chose to overplay, and when he plays it now, he is the boy who cried wolf. That's why a film director engaging in utter fantasy can arouse more anxiety about a possible attack on America than our actual commander in chief hitting us with the supposed truth.

If anything, we're back where we were in the lazy summer of 2001, when the president was busy in Crawford ignoring an intelligence report titled "Bin Laden Determined to Attack Inside the United States" and the news media were more preoccupied with a rash of "Jaws"-like shark attacks than with Al Qaeda. The sharks are back, and the "missing girl" drama of Natalee Holloway has echoed the Chandra Levy ur-text. Even the World Trade Center is making a comeback, if we are to believe that the new Freedom Bunker unveiled for ground zero might ever be built.

AS those on all sides of the Iraq argument have said, the only way for Mr. Bush to break through this torpor is to tell Americans the truth. Donald Rumsfeld did exactly that when he said a week ago that the insurgency in Iraq might last as long as 12 years. If that's so, then what? Go ahead and argue that pulling out precipitously or setting a precise exit timetable is each a bad option, guaranteeing that Iraq will become even more of a jihad central than this ill-conceived war has already made it. But what is Plan C?

DOJ_NMG_0001037

Mr. Bush could have addressed that question honestly on Tuesday night. Instead of once more cooking the books - exaggerating the number of coalition partners, the number of battle-ready Iraqi troops, the amount of non-American dollars in the Iraq kitty - he could have laid out the long haul in hard facts, explaining the future costs in manpower, money and time, and what sacrifices he proposes for meeting them. He could have been, as he is fond of calling himself, a leader.

It was a blown opportunity, and it's hard to see that there will be another chance. Iraq may not be Vietnam, but The Wall Street Journal reports that the current war's unpopularity now matches the Gallup findings during the Vietnam tipping point, the summer of 1968. As the prospect of midterm elections pumps more and more genuine fear into the hearts of Republicans up for re-election, it's the Bush presidency, not the insurgency, that will be in its last throes. Is the commander in chief so isolated in his bubble that he does not realize this? G.W.B., phone home.

Democracy Has Its Own Timetable, Mr. Bush (WP)

By Richard H. Kohn

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

"America's mission in Iraq," the president proclaimed in his speech at Fort Bragg on Tuesday, "is . . . a free, representative government that is an ally . . . and a beacon of hope in a part of the world that is desperate for reform." And it should be a nation, he continued, "that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself."

A tall order. Contrary to the rosy picture of our past so prevalent in Washington today, this country possesses a rich and often troubled history of intervention and nation building, and even empire. We succeeded in building democracy at home but largely failed in planting it abroad, which ought to make all of us, the president included, wary of so vague a goal in Iraq, and exceedingly careful in crafting a strategy to set that country on the road to stability and independence.

From the very beginning, we were nation builders. At the same time as they created a republic, the Founders themselves spoke enthusiastically and confidently about a rising American empire. 19th-century successors expanded over the continent (our "Manifest Destiny"), conquering and then ultimately forcing the Indians onto reservations. End-of-century colonization of foreign lands in the Caribbean and western Pacific was followed by 20th-century occupations in Europe and Asia. And our own generation has overthrown governments in Panama and Haiti, sent troops into Somalia, Bosnia, Kosovo and elsewhere, and now has embarked on nation building in Afghanistan and Iraq.

It is clear from looking back over these many attempts that when the president claimed on Tuesday that we have "made progress, but we have a lot of -- a lot more work to do," he spoke a larger truth than even he perhaps realizes.

We seem to have forgotten just how difficult our own struggle at home for democracy, freedom, social justice and national security has been. Our liberties grew over time, in fits and starts, with periods of violence -- race riots, labor strife, domestic bombings, veterans' protests, the upheavals of the 1960s. It took nearly a century and a catastrophic civil war to abolish slavery. It took another 60 years to enfranchise women. Sometimes liberty regressed, for example in time of war -- a possibility expressed frequently today as Congress debates renewing the Patriot Act and the courts struggle with definitions of freedom of the press.

Abroad, the American experience has been marked by decidedly less success. Over the course of our history, we have occupied defeated enemies (Mexico in the 1840s, Japan in the late 1940s and Germany -- twice -- after the two World Wars), sent troops into countries where our interests were threatened, assisted nations under attack, and overthrown regimes that threatened us in some way. The few times that the United States has attempted to defeat insurgencies or build viable democratic regimes, it has sometimes met with temporary success but ultimately, almost always failed.

Between 1898 and the early 1930s, American soldiers and Marines intervened in or occupied countries in the Caribbean and Central America almost 20 different times to protect U.S. economic interests or to develop the countries or simply to suppress revolts and provide order. Democracy was rarely if ever the result. Interventions during the Cold War -- whether overt or covert -- usually propped up unsavory undemocratic governments in an effort to combat communism. And while some interventions -- Nicaragua and Panama in the 1980s -- fostered democracy, others, like Chile, had the opposite result.

While nation building in Asia has been more successful, it was marked by notable failures. In the Philippines, after suppressing the insurrection against American rule between 1899 and 1903, the United States maintained permanent garrisons to support a colonial administration, didn't relinquish control until the mid-1940s, had assisted in defeating a communist insurgency in the 1950s, then watched the country slip back into dictatorship before democracy took hold in the late 1980s. Japan was perhaps the most dramatic success, but South Korea suffered Syngman Rhee's autocracy and then decades of military authoritarianism before democracy emerged. The United States never succeeded in liberalizing Ngo Dinh Diem's government in South Vietnam before acquiescing in military rule and then North Vietnamese victory in 1975.

DOJ_NMG_0001038

Since the Cold War, the record has been ambiguous. Progress in Bosnia has been painfully slow, 10 years after American troops arrived intending to stay but a year, and few would count that country -- or its Kosovo neighbor -- as a free, democratic regime able to defend itself. Twice U.S. troops have been sent to Haiti without even stabilizing that troubled nation, much less solidifying democracy. None of this bodes well for the continuing conflicts in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Each example, of course, stands alone -- the product of place and time, the individual experience of a country and its population, and the actions undertaken by the governments and groups involved. But the historysuggests that democracy, freedom and liberty take root slowly and face formidable obstacles even in a country such as ours that inherited a reverence for law, and after 1815 grew for over a century without significant foreign threats to national security.

Few would suggest that today, with American and others' experience to draw upon, democratization needs to be as slow as it was in the United States and Europe. Indeed democratization has advanced dramatically in many places in the last 25 years. But in societies less blessed with the advantages of the United States and other western democracies, the challenges are immense and sometimes the push for democracy can actually slow or even reverse freedom and liberty.

In a country where there is a history of colonial subjugation and autocratic rule, clan or ethnic rivalries and religious hatreds, discrimination against minorities and women, and underdeveloped or dependent economies, the obstacles are all the greater. The absence of such norms as the respect for equality, religious freedom, civil liberty, civilian control of the military and political compromise -- even when no foreign or domestic foes are threatening force -- indicates that the United States will have to make some very difficult choices in Iraq during the next few months.

Withdrawal while the insurgency rages even at a slower tempo will invite chaos and civil war, and clearly a defeat of the president's intentions. Staying for many years, with a large American military presence, is likely not only to weaken the Iraqi government but to stimulate jihadi recruitment and attacks, undermining the larger war on terrorism.

The moderate course in between, which the administration is pursuing, possesses dangers of its own. The fighting must be turned over largely to the Iraqis and quickly -- in a year or two. Explicit milestones and a reduced American footprint will have many advantages: revealing our strategy and marking its progress in order to maintain American patience and gain international support; diluting enemy propaganda about our motives; and removing a major impulse behind the insurgency.

More important will be the progress of Baghdad's government, on which all else rests. Here history suggests that we will have to assess its character with a more realistic standard of what's possible. "The mission" must be defined with greater precision than the president offered last Tuesday if the American people are to accept continuing expenditures of blood and money. Sooner or later we will need a realistic rendering of what "success" involves. Squishy generalities won't suffice; the public has a keen nose for fakery and fraud. The president knows "that Americans want our troops to come home as quickly as possible." If, as he says, "So do I," he may have to accept a less robust definition of a free and democratic government in Iraq -- and its analogue elsewhere in the Middle East -- than he asserted this past week. If he won't, then the American people will have to force an outcome more in keeping with historical reality.

Richard Kohn, a military historian and former chief of history for the U.S. Air Force, chairs the Curriculum in Peace, War, and Defense at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Dems: Bush Administration Has Failed Vets (AP-Y2)

AP2, July 3, 2005

President Bush's recent denials concerning the financial straits of the Veterans Affairs Department represented another administration failure to level with Americans about the costs of the Iraq war, Sen. Patty Murray (news, bio, voting record), D-Wash., said Saturday.

"Due to their failures, we saw troops using scrap metal to armor their Humvees," Murray said in the weekly Democratic radio address.

"Due to their failures, we saw families raising funds to buy bulletproof vests for soldiers fighting in Iraq. And now, due to their failures, we see that the VA doesn't have the money to provide the needed medical care when our troops return home."

Murray and other Democrats had long questioned whether the department would have enough money to pay medical costs for veterans returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. The administration repeatedly denied it, but the VA acknowledged last week it was short at least $1 billion this year.

On Wednesday, the Senate voted 96-0 to spend an extra $1.5 billion to cover the politically sensitive shortfall.

"We're still working to find out the exact size of the shortfall, but one thing is clear: It results from either deliberate misdirection or gross incompetence," Murray said.

"The president has an obligation to our troops, their families and to the American people to tell the truth about the costs and sacrifices necessary to win the war in Iraq," she said. "There's no better time than now, as we celebrate our country's independence and all that is great about this nation, for the president to give us the facts and lay out a plan."

DOJ_NMG_0001039

Fighting Words (NYT)

By Interview By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Q: You're one of a growing number of Republicans who have lately accused President Bush of botching the war in Iraq.

If someone says I am a disloyal Republican because I am not supporting my party, let them say it. War is bigger than politics.

You, John McCain and John Kerry are the only current U.S. senators who served in Vietnam.

I got to Vietnam in December of 1967, and I was wounded twice with my brother Tom, who was with me. I still have some shrapnel in my chest that the doctors never took out. The second time my face was burned pretty bad, and I had both eardrums blown out.

Are you saying you are deaf?

Eardrums heal, but I did lose some hearing.

Did you kill anyone in the war?

Well, I am sure I did.

How would you compare the situation in Iraq with the one in Vietnam?

Congress was absent during the Vietnam War, and they didn't ask the tough questions, and consequently we lost 58,000 Americans and lost a war and humiliated this nation. It took a generation to get over it. As long as I am here as a U.S. senator, I am going to do whatever I can to make sure that isn't going to happen.

What do you suggest that the president do?

For starters, we don't have enough troops. But I don't think the answer to increasing manpower is to pursue some of the things the Pentagon is doing, such as doubling and tripling bonuses for those in the military. Kids do not serve their country because they are in it to make money.

Many serve to help pay for school and because they see it as a career.

Of course. But you aren't going to attract the kind of people we have been able to attract just by incentives. When you try to project military recruitment through bonuses, you are going to get people signing up for the wrong reasons.

On the other hand, with our deficit now exceeding $400 billion, aren't we sort of out of money?

In terms of the deficit, we have blown the top right off. We're a bunch of Democrats.

I've never heard anyone call President Bush a Democrat.

That's my point. We're less honest about it. We built the biggest government history has ever seen under a Republican government. The Democrats are better because they are honest about it. They don't pretend. I admire that. They'll say: "We want more money. We need more money."

Where do you think the Republican Party needs to go?

I'd take it back to the party of Eisenhower, Goldwater and Reagan. It was a pretty simple party in those days. It was all about limited government, fiscal responsibility, strong national defense and pro-trade foreign policy.

Will that be your message in your 2008 presidential campaign?

Well, first of all, I haven't said I am running.

You are rumored to be a candidate.

As John McCain has said to me, Anyone who is not in detox is rumored to be a candidate.

Well, you're not too old to run.

I'll be 59 in October. I'm a puppy. I think it's young. I'm really happy with my age, and I can't do anything about it.

Actually, I think it's warped to talk about 2008 so much. Pundits care too much about betting on the next winner, and then they lose interest once the contest is over.

That's because there's a dynamic to politics that has lately been overtaken by show business. Politics is show business. It's just show business for the ugly. It's Hollywood without all the beautiful people.

Bombers In Iraq Kill 20; Security Forces Are Targets (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Three suicide bombers blew themselves up on Saturday in two separate attacks aimed at Iraqi security forces, killing at least 20 people and wounding at least 59, police officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0001040

The first explosion took place at a recruiting center in western Baghdad. The blast killed at least 12 people and wounded at least 23. Those killed were all men trying to get jobs with the security forces, said Maj. Gen. Rasheed Flayeh, the commander of the Interior Ministry's commando units.

The attack occurred at 8:50 a.m., as men waiting outside the center were being called in small numbers to enter the building. Each group was searched at a checkpoint about 600 feet from the building. The bomber blew himself up at that checkpoint, apparently because he would not have been able to pass through undetected with his load of explosives, General Flayeh said.

he second attack took place at 10 p.m. at a restaurant beside the police commando headquarters in the town of Hilla, south of Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. Two suicide bombers detonated their explosives, killing at least eight police officers and wounding at least 36 others.

The separate attacks on Saturday were the latest in a long series of deadly bombings at recruiting centers and police stations. Insurgents have struck such places to discourage Iraqis from joining the security forces. Yet Iraqis continue to line up in large numbers at the centers, largely because few jobs are available in the ravaged economy here.

In the northern city of Mosul, a police colonel was shot dead on his way to work, the police said, according to The Associated Press.

South of the capital, in an area heavily populated by insurgents, a bomb exploded in a vegetable cart in the town of Mahmudiya, killing two people and wounding 10 others.

The explosion took place a few minutes after mourners had passed by with the body of Sheik Kamaleddin al-Ghuraifi, a senior aide to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the most revered Shiite cleric in Iraq.

