Sheik Ghuraifi was gunned down on Friday in the capital, in another sign of worsening sectarian tensions. It was unclear whether his funeral procession, which was headed to the Shiite holy city of Najaf, was the target of the bombing in Mahmudiya.

"The problem of sectarian tension is real," a senior American official told reporters on Friday evening, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of government protocol. "It requires calm heads on all sides. It requires all sides to make a commitment against violence."

Despite the large numbers of Shiite civilians and security officers killed during the Sunni-led insurgency, the grand clerics of Najaf, and in particular Ayatollah Sistani, have not publicly urged violent reprisals.

Instead, they have promoted a quick advancement of the political process, so that religious Shiite parties can take the reins of power in the government. Now, those parties have control of institutions like the Interior Ministry and are populating the security forces with fighters loyal to them.

In recent weeks, an increasing number of Sunni Arabs have expressed concern about operations carried out by those forces. They also accuse Shiite militias like the Badr Organization, which was formed and trained in Iran during the years Saddam Hussein was in power, of carrying out assassinations of Sunni figures.

A Sunni political group, the National Dialogue Council, released a statement on Saturday denouncing an American-led military operation in Anbar Province, west of Baghdad.

The military sweep began early last week and has focused on the towns of Hit and Haditha in the Euphrates River corridor. The operation is being led by the Second Marine Division.

In its statement, the National Dialogue Council said the American-led forces had engaged in "the most horrible kinds of killing and destruction," including the killing of civilians.

Capt. Jeffrey Pool, a spokesman for the Second Marine Division, has maintained that the marines have conducted themselves properly during the operation.

But on Friday, an Iraqi ambassador to the United Nations, Samir Sumaidaie, sent out an e-mail message saying a cousin of his, Muhammad al-Sumaidaie, had been shot dead by marines recently while the marines searched a house near Haditha. The killing took place in "cold blood," the e-mail message said. The marines said they were investigating.

Suicide Bomber Kills 12 In Iraq (WP)

By Andy Mosher And Naseer Nouri

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

Thwarting security measures set up to protect a police recruiting center already hit by vehicle bombs, an attacker wearing explosives walked into the midst of a group of men applying for police jobs Saturday and detonated his charge, killing himself and at least 12 others, police and witnesses said.

The 9 a.m. attack on the police commando base in Baghdad's Yarmouk district "was not very loud. It sounded like the explosion of a tire," said Mays Naib, 32, who lives nearby.

Police initially put the death toll at 20, but the number was revised downward to 12, said police Col. Adnan Abdul Rahman, an Interior Ministry spokesman. He said 14 people were wounded.

Over the course of a nearly two-year-old insurgency in which assaults on Iraqi and U.S. security forces have been frequent, attackers repeatedly have targeted places where men stand in line to apply for jobs with the police and Iraqi army. Because would-be recruits typically are made to wait outside fortified bases and recruiting centers, they have proved to be easy targets for often-deadly bombings.

After previous attacks on the base in Yarmouk, the surrounding street had been blocked to provide greater security, Naib said. "So they send a suicide bomber to do this attack. Because of this recruiting center, we feel like we live in a battlefield," she said.

Despite the dangers that the job-seekers pose to the neighborhood, Naib said she felt sorry for "those poor people."

"What are they supposed to do?" she said. "They came here to look for a job and protect the country. Isn't that better than being without a job and turning to crime to make money to live?"

The dead and wounded were carried to Yarmouk Hospital, a few hundred yards from the attack. Outside the hospital, Khalid Hamza, 42, was trying to find a friend who had come to Baghdad from the southern town of Hilla to find work with the police. "His father is an old man; that is why he decided to join the police," Hamza said. "He did not tell his mother that he is going to join the police. She would never let him do that."

Al Qaeda in Iraq, the guerrilla organization led by Abu Musab Zarqawi, asserted responsibility for the bombing in a statement posted on the Internet. The authenticity of the claim could not be verified.

Meanwhile in Hilla, a mostly Shiite city 60 miles south of Baghdad, a suicide bomber detonated a belt of explosives at a police checkpoint in the city center, killing six policemen and the attacker, said Police Capt. Muthana Khalid Ali, according to the Associated Press.

About 10 minutes later, a second attacker blew himself up in a crowd of police officers and civilians who had rushed to the scene of the first blast, Ali said. Twenty-six people were injured, the AP reported. There was no immediate assertion of responsibility for either attack in Hilla.

On Friday, Zarqawi's radical Sunni Muslim group claimed to have carried out the drive-by shooting of a prominent Shiite Muslim cleric, Kamaleddin Ghuraifi, on a street in central Baghdad. On Saturday, a bomb exploded at a police checkpoint in Mahmudiyah, 15 miles south of Baghdad, shortly after Ghuraifi's funeral procession had passed by, according to the Reuters news agency.

The bomb, which police said was hidden in a vegetable cart, killed five people and wounded 12. It was not clear whether the bomb had been intended to hit the procession, which was taking Ghuraifi's body to be buried in the holy city of Najaf, 90 miles south of the capital.

Ghuraifi had been a Baghdad representative of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's most prominent Shiite religious leader, who has his headquarters in Najaf. On Saturday, the walls around Najaf's ornate Imam Ali shrine were filled with banners denouncing the recent assassinations of prominent Shiite religious and political figures and blaming them on Sunni insurgent groups. One of the banners demanded: "Can't the Sunni wise men stop the criminals?"

Meanwhile, another influential Shiite cleric's top lieutenant was released from detention Saturday after a year in U.S. military custody. The Najaf office of Moqtada Sadr, the rebel cleric whose militia twice battled U.S. forces last year, announced that Muhammed Tabatabei had been freed from Abu Ghraib prison, where he had been held without being charged. Tabatabei returned to Najaf, where he met with Sadr, the announcement said.

Two Suicide Attacks Kill 26 In Iraq (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Suicide bombers struck Saturday in Baghdad and a Shiite Muslim city south of the capital in attacks that killed 26 people and injured nearly 50, Iraqi officials said. One of the attackers targeted bystanders and police officers who had rushed to the scene of an earlier blast.

In the first attack, a bomber blew himself up outside a recruiting station for police special forces in west Baghdad, killing at least 16 people, including 11 recruits, police and hospital officials said. Twenty-two people were injured.

The other attacks occurred in Hillah, a mostly Shiite city 60 miles south of Baghdad. Police Capt. Muthana Khalid Ali said the first blast occurred when a suicide bomber detonated an explosives belt at a police checkpoint in the city center.

Six policemen were killed, Ali said.

About 10 minutes later, a second suicide bomber blew himself up in the crowd of police and civilians who had rushed to the scene, Ali said. Twenty-six people were injured, but only the attacker died, said Dr. Hashim Suleiman of Hillah General Hospital.

On Feb. 28, a suicide car bomber struck a crowd of police and army recruits at a health center in Hillah, killing 125 and wounding more than 140 in one of the deadliest attacks since the 2003 fall of Saddam Hussein.

In other violence Saturday, three Iraqi soldiers were killed in a roadside bombing northeast of Baghdad, their commander said. Gunmen also assassinated a police lieutenant colonel in the northern city of Mosul, officials said.

Two other people were killed when a bomb hidden in a vegetable cart exploded Saturday in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad.

The blast occurred a few minutes after mourners passed by with the body of an aide to Shiite Muslim leader Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, who was slain Friday outside a Baghdad mosque. The body of Kamal Ghuraifi was being carried through the town en route to burial in the holy city of Najaf.

Also Saturday, a policeman and a female relative traveling in a civilian car were killed in a drive-by shooting in the northern city of Kirkuk, authorities said.

Insurgent attacks have raised tensions among Iraq's varied ethnic and religious groups and raised fears of civil war. In a statement Saturday, the leader of Iraq's largest Shiite political party warned against sectarian conflict and called on the Iraqi government to step up efforts to fight militants.

"We stress the importance of being alert and cautious not to be carried away toward the sectarian strife that our enemies want for us," said Abdelaziz Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. "We ask the Iraqi government, particularly the security apparatuses, to exert more efforts to strike these terrorist groups."

The Metrics Of Success In Iraq (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

President Bush is facing an early legal deadline to deliver what he has been most resistant to providing: a set of specific benchmarks for measuring progress toward military and political stability in Iraq.

Under a little-noticed provision of the defense spending bill passed by Congress in May, Defense Secretary Don Rumsfeld has until July 11 to send Capitol Hill a "comprehensive set of performance indicators and measures of stability and security" two years after the fall of Saddam Hussein.

A Pentagon spokeswoman, responding to my inquiry, said last week, "We are working toward completing the report by the due date."

If and when it comes in, it could do much more than the president's Tuesday night speech at Fort Bragg to provide a factual basis for judging how close we may be to reaching our goals in Iraq.

In that address, Bush once again demolished a straw man, denouncing any talk of a deadline for withdrawal of U.S. and coalition forces and any timetable for phasing them out. While public support for a pullout has grown, almost no one in Congress is advocating such a step.

What serious people are asking of the administration is a set of yardsticks by which the situation in Iraq can be realistically measured -- and accountability established for a strategy to reach those goals. That is something the president has refused to provide, beyond his cliched declaration that "the United States will stay as long as necessary -- and not one day longer."

It is hard to understand his resistance to this perfectly reasonable demand for a set of metrics by which all concerned -- Congress and the administration, service members and their families, and the general public -- could judge what is happening.

This is our first MBA president, a business school grad who generally operates on the principle that if you can't measure something, you are flying blind. He insists that his Office of Management and Budget keep score on how well each department and agency is meeting its program responsibilities. Why not measure the enormously expensive investment in Iraq?

Metrics are exactly what the serious critics in Congress say have been lacking. In a thoughtful speech on June 21, Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, a Democrat who supported the invasion and vehemently opposes an early withdrawal, said continued public support depends on "a new compact between the administration and Congress to secure the informed consent of the American people, so that they give the president the time we need to succeed in Iraq."

"Specifically," Biden said, "the administration should develop with Congress clear benchmarks or goals in key areas: security, governance and politics, reconstruction and burden-sharing. We in Congress should aggressively assert our oversight responsibility by insisting that the administration report on progress toward those goals every month in public testimony."

Last week Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, the ranking Democrat on the defense Appropriations subcommittee, pointed to language in the report accompanying May's Iraq funding bill that would satisfy most of those demands. It orders the first detailed status report on July 11 and follow-ups every 90 days thereafter.

The information required is specific and detailed. It includes such measures of the security environment as the number of engagements per day, the count of trained Iraqi forces, the estimated strength of the Iraqi insurgency and the role of foreign fighters.

It orders up indicators of economic activity, including unemployment levels, electricity, water and oil production rates, and hunger and poverty levels.

It requires detailed information on the training of Iraqi military and security forces, their equipment, and their capabilities -- and the timetables for achieving full readiness.

It aims to end the confusion over Iraq's forces by asking specifically which Iraqi battalions are capable of operating independently, which can fight if supported by coalition forces and which are not ready to conduct counterinsurgency operations even with help. It also requires documentation on their absentee rates and calls for similar information on the Iraqi police forces and their training.

Finally, it directs Rumsfeld to provide -- either in public or in classified annexes -- an estimate of U.S. military forces needed in Iraq through the end of calendar 2006 and the criteria the administration will use to determine when it is safe to begin withdrawing forces from that country.

As a senior congressional aide told me, "if the Pentagon takes the law seriously and responds as robustly as it is capable of doing," we may finally begin to learn where we stand. Candid answers could restore the trust required to sustain the effort in Iraq. Bush's speeches don't meet that need.

Shiites Question U.S. Overtures To Sunni Rebels (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

It didn't take long for fresh reports of U.S. talks with Sunni Arab insurgents to stir cries of an impending sellout.

"The Americans and everyone else must understand that the Iraqi people will never accept any talks with the criminals who have blood on their hands," Sheik Jalaluddin Saghir, a prominent Shiite Muslim cleric and member of parliament, declared during Friday prayers.

A senior U.S. official here sought to provide damage control. There was no intent, he declared, to undermine the fledgling Shiite-run government, which meets behind U.S.-fortified blast walls.

"In the end, we are not going to hand to the insurgency the head of the Iraqi government on a platter," the U.S. official told reporters Friday. "It isn't going to happen."

The exchange underscored the fragility of the political compromise that the Bush administration is seeking to facilitate in Iraq, even as the complementary military strategy — turning more and more responsibility over to fledgling Iraqi forces — has yet to prove a success.

U.S. commanders say they hope a drawdown of the 140,000-strong American force in Iraq can begin sometime next year. But no one will publicly say how many of Iraq's 100-plus U.S.-trained battalions are ready to wage a difficult counterinsurgency campaign without U.S. assistance.

"That information is classified," Brig. Gen. Don Alston, chief spokesman for the multinational forces, said here last week. "I wouldn't want to reveal something that could be an advantage to the enemy."

Things are no less murky on the political front, where reports of U.S. overtures to the Sunni Arab-driven insurgency immediately sparked a backlash last week among the long-repressed Shiite majority.

Much hinges on a two-part premise. First, that disaffected Sunni Arabs can be brought into the political process, and second, that participating Sunni representatives can sway militants, who have denounced the government, to put down their arms.

There is certainly reason to believe that Sunni Arabs, who largely boycotted the Jan. 30 election, will be more involved now.

Victorious Shiites and Kurds have reached out to bring Sunni Arabs into the committee drafting a constitution. Many Sunni Arabs now rue the decision to not vote. Plans are progressing on a new electoral law that would require the next set of lawmakers to be elected by provincial districts, probably ensuring greater Sunni Arab representation.

But few believe that these developments, however positive, will soon defuse the insurgency, which even in U.S. assessments is no weaker than it was six months ago.

The Sunni Arab representatives willing to take part in writing the constitution have acknowledged little leverage with the men with guns, and there is no broad Sunni call to lay down arms.

"The Iraqi resistance is not seeking a solution but defending a cause," said Sheik Khalaf Duleimi of the National Dialogue Council, a Sunni group involved in writing the constitution. "The government should seek a solution."

U.S. officials often point out that violence in Iraq is largely confined to four of the 18 provinces. Much of the Shiite south and Kurdish north is relatively quiet. But those four battleground provinces are home to about 40% of the population and include Mosul and Kirkuk, the multiethnic hubs of the north, and the capital, Baghdad, where sectarian-tinged bombings, assassinations and abductions are daily events.

Early Saturday, the bodies of 11 police recruits, covered with light-purple sheets, were placed inside the morgue at the capital's Yarmouk Hospital. They were the victims of the latest bombing at a police recruiting center, this one by an attacker wearing an explosives-laden vest laced with ball bearings that burst out in a fusillade of deadly shrapnel.

"Oh, my son Malik!" cried a sobbing father seated outside the morgue, in a scene that has become agonizingly familiar. "I saw you get married and start your new life. Why did it have to end like this? Why?"

Although most of the slain recruits have been Shiites, Sunnis accuse militias and police squads associated with Shiites of retaliatory attacks on Sunni clerics and civilians.

The latest rumor sweeping Baghdad is that the Badr Brigade, an Iranian-trained Shiite militia, is targeting Iraqi pilots who bombed Iran during the 1980s war between the two nations.

Amid so much uncertainty, hostility and bloodshed, American officials are expressing confidence that Iraqis will meet three impending deadlines: Aug. 15, when a draft constitution is supposed to be ready; Oct. 15, when a constitutional referendum is to be held; and Dec. 15, when a permanent government is to be elected.

The State Department is pressuring Iraqis to get everything done on time, fearful that any delay will provoke even more instability.

The Bush administration views all three deadlines as crucial guideposts on the road to an exit strategy from a war in which the U.S. death toll is approaching 2,000.

But other milestones — the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003, the return of sovereignty a year ago, the landmark January election — have all passed without the anticipated letup in violence. In each case, exhilaration turned to disappointment.

In November, Marine Lt. Gen. John F. Sattler declared that the invasion of the former rebel-held enclave of Fallouja had "broken the back" of the insurgency. Yet the last two months saw 155 U.S. troops killed in Iraq, among the highest monthly death tolls of the war. Among the dead were six Americans, including three women, killed by a suicide bomber in Fallouja, which remains a trouble spot despite the continued presence of thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops who have in effect sealed off the city.

There simply aren't enough troops and police to watch over every stretch of volatile terrain. In the vast Sunni homeland of western Iraq, Marines have launched a series of offensives that seem destined to repeat the war's numbing pattern: Thinly stretched U.S. troops clear out a rebel town and return to their bases, allowing fighters to filter back in.

"We cannot defend everywhere," Col. Bob Chase, chief of operations for the 2nd Marine Division in western Iraq, said recently. Insurgents "will attempt to fill the vacuum."

U.S. officials, who have acknowledged that military superiority is not enough to win the war in Iraq, are keen to know what it will take to get the guerrillas to put down their arms — hence the ongoing exploratory talks with Sunni sheiks and community leaders thought to have links to the insurgency.

The ultimate U.S. approach is a classic divide-and-conquer strategy: separate "nationalist" elements of the fragmented insurgency from religious militants and foreign jihadists, who are regarded as irredeemable.

"It is credible that parts of this disparate group of insurgents and terrorists would consider finding a way to participate in a political process," another senior U.S. official here said recently.

U.S. commanders even seem prepared to consider some kind of Sunni-dominated force in volatile Al Anbar province, despite the disastrous experience last year with the Fallouja Brigade, a U.S.-armed unit that ultimately sided with the insurgents and was disbanded.

"You want the Americans out of Al Anbar?" a senior U.S. commander asked rhetorically in a recent interview. "Then get … to the table, create an environment where we can provide some basic security for Iraq, and we'll get 'em out. That ain't hard to do."

But the Sunni religious militants and their Iraqi nationalist allies have, by all accounts, cooperated closely and may be harder to separate than many believe.

And it seems clear that the guerrillas, who have proved to be determined and crafty, are insisting on at least one clear concession — a timetable for U.S. withdrawal — that the Bush administration has no intention of granting, at least for now.

"We will stay in the fight until the fight is won," President Bush said in a radio address Saturday, echoing his message in a prime-time address last week.

"In the end," said the senior U.S. official who spoke Friday, "the Sunni Arab community that fuels the insurgency is going to get more out of the political process than out of a military confrontation that it cannot hope to win."

Commanders in the field here often point out a thorny reality: The "bad guys" don't have to win. They only have to make headlines.

The most likely scenario this year, many agree, is the birth of both a new constitution and a new government — even as the fighting, and dying, continues. It is not a cheerful prognostication, but it is the state of affairs to which Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld alluded when he said recently that the fighting could continue for a dozen years.

Beat The Insurgents By Talking To Them (LAT)

By Larry J. Diamond

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

In his speech last week, President Bush correctly said that the United States had a vital interest in remaining in Iraq until a viable, secure and hopefully democratic state emerged. He also appropriately noted evidence of democratic progress in Iraq — an elected government in Baghdad and a more representative constitution drafting committee set to begin its work. But if the United States is to avoid defeat in Iraq, Bush must recognize what our military leaders have repeated for more than a year: There is no purely military solution to the insurgency. It will only be extinguished by a combination of military might, good intelligence, reliable policing and — crucially — effective politics.

A political strategy to defeat the insurgency, which the administration has been inching toward but has not fully articulated and embraced, requires six elements.

First, the U.S. must know who and what we are dealing with. Radical Islamists from other countries are the ones blowing themselves and civilians to bits and slaughtering cops and elected Iraqi leaders — and there is no negotiating with these zealots.

Similarly, Saddam Hussein's top loyalists, who finance and orchestrate much of the destruction from safe houses in Syria, have nowhere to go in the new order but jail (and probably the hangman's noose). These two groups must be killed, captured or cut off from their bases of support and operation in Iraq.

A wider circle of Iraqis tolerates, uses and supports these groups in their violent resistance to the U.S.-led coalition and the new Iraqi government. These mostly Sunni Arab Iraqis believe that they have been shafted and humiliated by the emerging political order — and they want in. They feel their country is under indefinite occupation — and they want it back. The U.S. needs to separate the jihadists and Hussein's cronies from the Iraqis who feel left out.

The administration deserves credit for drawing Sunnis into the political process, but it must do more to incorporate them politically into the new Iraq, the second element of a winning political strategy. It has done too little to address their nationalist anxiety.

That bring us to the third element. Many Iraqis (including essentially all those in the insurgency) believe that we are there to establish permanent military bases and gain control of their oil. This suspicion feeds the intense nationalism underlying the violent resistance. In fact, it is the only factor uniting its disparate elements.

To douse the nationalist fire, Bush must tell the Iraqi people, directly and unequivocally, that the United States does not seek long-term military bases in their country. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told Congress as much recently, but unless the message comes from the president, it will not register in Iraq.

If Bush's assurance is to be credible, it must be coupled to a fourth strategic element. Bush is right to reject a fixed timetable for withdrawal, which would only embolden the terrorists. But Iraqi insurgents must be able to envision a time when foreign troops will be gone.

To this end, the administration should set a time — not a deadline, but a goal — when it hopes to be militarily out of Iraq, provided insurgents opted for peaceful politics instead of violence. This would shift the burden to the Sunni-based insurgents to demonstrate their nationalist credentials by altering their strategies and methods so order can return to Iraq, the new Iraqi armed forces can gain strength and the United States can make good on its withdrawal pledge.

If these four elements are to defeat the insurgency, they have to be part of direct negotiations with political and tribal forces "associated with" the insurgency, the fifth essential of a successful strategy. For almost two years, some insurgents have been sending signals through international intermediaries that they want to talk directly to the United States.

Initially wary and defiant, the administration has become more pragmatic about the overtures and discussions have occurred. But the talks have involved only low-level operatives and have left some Iraqi insurgents feeling that the United States is more interested in gaining tactical intelligence than negotiating a political deal.

Any agreement with insurgents will have to include concessions on access to and release of some detainees, as well as what are America's long-term intentions in Iraq. If these issues are on the table, higher-level insurgents appear ready to talk.

Finally, we need to talk directly to the insurgents, but we cannot do so alone. The Iraqi government must be involved because it will need to make concessions of its own. And if trust is to be created and hostilities tempered by a pragmatic search for common ground, mediation will be needed. There is no better institution to play this role than the United Nations, and no better individual than the negotiator who brokered the handover of power last year, special envoy Lakhdar Brahimi.

Critics lambasted Bush's speech for its lack of new initiatives. But the indigenous core of the Iraqi insurgency may be ripe for resolution if the administration will craft and carry out a political strategy to defeat the insurgency.

This will not miraculously end the violence in Iraq. But it may enable us — and the Iraqi people — to turn the corner toward a peaceful and inclusive political order in which the zealots meet the fate they deserve.

A Town That Bled Under Hussein Hails His Trial (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The scars of what happened after an assassination attempt on Saddam Hussein, on July 8, 1982, are painfully evident in this mainly Shiite town 35 miles north of Baghdad.

People lower their voices when they speak of fathers, brothers and sons who went to the gallows, their fates unknown until Mr. Hussein's overthrow 21 years later set off the ransacking of a secret police headquarters in Baghdad that uncovered records of the executions. The landscape around Dujail is mostly barren scrubland, stark testament to the bulldozing of thousands of acres of date palms and fruit orchards after plotters fired on Mr. Hussein's convoy from thickets on the edge of town.

Now, the events at Dujail have come full cycle for Mr. Hussein.

Officials at the Iraqi Special Tribunal set up to try the former dictator and his top aides have said they expect to put him on trial by the end of the year in the deaths of nearly 160 men and boys from Dujail, all Shiites, some in their early teens. Some were shot dead in the immediate aftermath of the assassination attempt, but 143 - 9 of them ages 13 through 15 - were executed three years later by Mr. Hussein's revolutionary court. Townspeople say that many others remain missing - at least 200, by some counts - and that they hope the trial will reveal at least something of their fate.

For now, their families have only fading photographs of their lost menfolk at weddings, school graduations and summer outings, and tales of the moments they disappeared, seized on the streets or pulled from their homes by secret police squads that descended on Dujail in the days that followed the attack on Mr. Hussein.

Along the sun-blasted streets and alleyways of the town, a nondescript, impoverished sprawl of single- and double-storied concrete structures and makeshift, domeless mosques beside the main highway to Iraq's oil-rich north, the prospect of seeing Mr. Hussein, 68, facing a possible death sentence has brought relief - at least to the three-quarters of the population who are Shiites, though not to many in the Sunni Arab minority in the town, where there are still fierce loyalties to Mr. Hussein.

"Having Saddam on trial for what he did here will be good for Dujail, and for all of Iraq, because many people in this country, and in Dujail, still think of him as some kind of a god," said Ali Haj Hussein, a 37-year-old Shiite who lost seven brothers in the executions that followed the assassination attempt, including one, Hussein, 19, who confessed to his father before he died that he was one of those who had shot at the Iraqi ruler.

The visit to Dujail amounted to a venture into enemy territory for Saddam Hussein. In 1982, he was in his third year as president, still consolidating his power, and many in this town, with a population of about 75,000, despised him for starting a war with Iran, Iraq's Shiite neighbor, two years earlier. Shiites here say that Mr. Hussein had long distrusted the presence of a large Shiite enclave, including Dujail and the nearby town of Balad, deep inside Iraq's Sunni Arab heartland - and beside the main highway from Baghdad to Tikrit, Mr. Hussein's hometown.

A conservative Shiite religious party, Dawa, with an armed wing that had mounted terrorist attacks against Mr. Hussein's government, had strong support in Dujail, and saw in his visit a chance to avenge the government's killings of hundreds of Dawa leaders and sympathizers. The plotters named the mission Operation Bint Huda, after the sister of Dawa's founder, Ayatollah Muhammad Bakr al-Sadr, a prominent Shiite cleric. The two were executed in 1980.

Other crimes for which Mr. Hussein is likely to face eventual prosecution, in separate trials, include the Anfal campaign - the Arabic word means spoils - of the late 1980's, in which as many as 150,000 Kurds were killed, many shot and dumped into mass graves, others killed in poison-gas attacks; the chemical weapons attack on the Kurdish town of Halabja in March 1988 that killed about 5,000, which is likely to be treated as a separate case, like Dujail; and the repression of a Shiite rebellion in southern Iraq in 1991, in which 150,000 people are believed to have been killed. Also under investigation by the tribunal are the executions of more than 200 Baath Party leaders after Mr. Hussein seized power in 1979.

But the Dujail trial will set the pattern for the others, and lawyers for Mr. Hussein have made it clear they plan to use every legal recourse to expose the proceedings as a show trial, manipulated by the American lawyers who run the Regime Crimes Liaison Office, an American Embassy agency that has been the legal and financial mainstay of the tribunal.

"All over the world, people know Saddam Hussein as the man who said 'No!' to America, and it will be so in court," said Ziad Najdawi, a Jordanian who is part of an international team of defense lawyers.

"They can talk as they want, about executions and chemical weapons and mass graves, but we will say, 'It is all lies, nothing but lies. Everything here is tainted by America.' "

On the summer afternoon 23 years ago when Mr. Hussein came to Dujail, he was greeted with gunfire from the palm groves on the north side of town, survivors say. The first to rush to the streets were the youths; they had heard rumors for days that something important was about to happen. Army helicopters had been circling near the town, and official vehicles from Baghdad had been coming and going from the Baath Party headquarters in a grim, guarded compound along the road leading into Dujail from the main north-south highway.

"It was about 2:30 p.m. when we heard people saying that Saddam had arrived, so we ran into the streets to see him, and right away his bodyguards started shooting at us, and they killed three of my friends," said Ghalib Hussein Abbas, a 42-year-old tractor driver now, then an unemployed youth of 19.

Fleeing to their homes, the townspeople saw the helicopters return, firing at villages amid the palm groves from which the plotters had attacked.

Two days later, survivors said, a 24-hour curfew was eased when loudspeakers announced that those missing relatives should go to the Baath headquarters and search among rows of bodies laid out in the building's forecourt. For some, it was a trap. According to witnesses' statements to the tribunal, four of the men set to go on trial with Mr. Hussein had gathered at the building to direct vengeance on the town: his half-brother, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, deputy head of the Mukhabarat secret police in 1982; Taha Yasin Ramadan, a deputy prime minister and later Baath Party vice chairman; and the two local Baathist officials, Abdullah al-Musheikhi and his son, Mizher al-Musheikhi. Another defendant will be Awad Hamad al-Bandr al-Sadoon, former chief judge of the revolutionary court.

In small groups at first, then in larger roundups, about 1,500 townspeople were arrested, as many as 30 from single families, and started on a journey into Mr. Hussein's gulags - first at a detention center in Tikrit, later at a secret police detention center in Baghdad, and finally, to the Nugra as-Salman prison, an old British-built fort in the desert along the Saudi Arabian border. Some survivors, who were released in 1986, say that the appalling conditions at the prison caused several dozen deaths, including women, children and nursing infants. The 143 who were hanged never got beyond detention in Baghdad, where Mr. Sadoon, the chief of the revolutionary court, sent them to the execution chambers at the Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad.

Accounts from local Shiites say Mr. Hussein outwitted the Dujail plotters from the start. On his entry to the town, those accounts say, tribal leaders made him a gift of a car, and marked it, in tribal tradition, with hands dipped in the blood of slaughtered sheep. Mr. Hussein, though, Shiites in Dujail say, saw the gift as a possible harbinger of assassination and returned the car, insisting that the tribal leaders and some of his aides travel in it - to their deaths, as the accounts have it, when the plotters fired on the car.

A few hours after the shooting, Mr. Hussein took to the flat roof of the town's main clinic and told a crowd that he was "not a coward who can be chased from your town," but assured his listeners there would be no reprisals. "He told us that the people who had attempted to kill him were a small band of traitors, and that we don't want to confuse them with the good people of Dujail," said Kassem Aalbuhaider, a shopkeeper now, then only 12.

But even as Mr. Hussein spoke, Mr. Aalbuhaider said, the secret police were at work. "They took whole families, even old people, women and small children," he said.

Within weeks, the razing of the palm groves and the orchards began, continuing until more than 250,000 acres had been bulldozed. In 1992, after the first Persian Gulf war, Mr. Hussein returned to Dujail for the first time, and told tribal leaders that the wastelands could be replanted, with grain crops, but not with palms and orchards. But it took 12 more years, and the overthrow of Mr. Hussein, before the town could begin in other ways to recover from what townspeople now refer to simply as "al karitha," the disaster.

Now, the plinths where Mr. Hussein's statues and portraits once stood at the town's major intersections are bare, and the streets are hung with portraits of the white-bearded clerics who are the icons of religious Shiites. The Baath Party headquarters serves now as a Shiite mosque. But the totems that seem to matter most are the date palms that some townspeople began planting discreetly in the mid-1990's as memorials to those who died.

On a recent evening, Mr. Hussein, the townsman who lost seven brothers to the gallows, led a visitor to the family's fields outside the town and through a grove of half-grown palms dedicated to them: Faleh, Hussein, Mahmud, Mohsen, Muhammad, Saad and Salim. "Here, I feel like a king," he said, smiling broadly as he reached out to touch the palm trees' drooping fronds. "Like these trees, Iraq is reborn. We are just at the beginning, but once Saddam has been tried and executed, we believe Dujail will begin to rise again."

Afghan Rebel Site Bombed, U.S. Says (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

U.S. aircraft bombarded a suspected insurgent compound in a mountainous area of northeastern Afghanistan where a military team has been missing since Tuesday, military officials said Saturday.

A purported spokesman for the ousted Islamic Taliban militia called news organizations and claimed that 25 civilians had died in the airstrike on the compound in Konar province, a rugged region near the Pakistani border.

Lt. Col. Jerry O'Hara, a U.S. military spokesman, said American troops were still assessing the impact of the Friday night bombing. However, he said that precision weapons had been used and that it was unlikely civilians were killed.

"We don't target civilians," he said. "We put a lot of effort into ensuring we minimize any type of collateral damage. . . . Our operations are intelligence-driven."

A Special Operations helicopter carrying U.S. troops to rescue the missing team crashed amid enemy fire Tuesday, killing all 16 people aboard. Late Friday, their bodies were flown from the U.S. air base in Bagram, north of Kabul, en route to Dover, Del., for identification, O'Hara said. He described throngs of soldiers lining the long road running through the base, saluting as vehicles passed carrying flag-draped containers to the airstrip.

"When there's a departure ceremony, everybody who is not actively involved in a mission comes out to show their respect," O'Hara said. "But this was much more emotional because you have many more that were lost in this incident."

Also on Saturday, guerrilla fighters in eastern Paktika province detonated a roadside bomb under a passing convoy of more than 20 vehicles carrying officials from the United Nations as well as Afghan leaders and security forces.

The attack killed as many as six Afghan policemen and soldiers, and wounded at least two others, including a local police chief, according to news services and the U.N. spokesman here, Adrian Edwards.

Other violence included a battle between Taliban and Afghan government forces in the central province of Uruzgan in which 18 insurgents were killed, according to news services. The militia members appeared to be part of the same group of fighters who kidnapped and killed a group of tribal elders Thursday.

In Kabul, U.S. military officials released 57 Afghans who had been held at a detention facility at Bagram air base for many months on suspicion of being armed Muslim extremists. They were taken to the office of a government program that reintegrates former Taliban members and released to the custody of tribal elders.

Since January, 220 detainees have been released from the U.S.-run prison at Bagram, and 142 more are slated to be released shortly, according to a U.S. military statement. In May, President Hamid Karzai called for all Afghan prisoners to be turned over to Afghan government custody in the wake of reports of past abuse by U.S. guards at Bagram and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Several of the released men complained bitterly of being detained for several years without charge. "There was no beating or torturing, but they were disrespectful of our culture and we didn't have good food for a long time," Ghulam Mustafa, 21, told the Reuters news agency.

In Konar, a massive five-day hunt for the missing U.S. team continued without success Saturday, O'Hara said.

The purported Taliban spokesman, Abdul Latif Hakimi, told news agencies by telephone Friday that Taliban fighters had captured one of the missing men and killed seven of them. But U.S. military officials have said there was no evidence to support the claim.

The missing team was made up of fewer than 10 Special Operations troops and was participating in a mission against al Qaeda fighters, U.S. officials have said.

The Chinook helicopter sent to extract the team appeared to have been downed by a rocket-propelled grenade, military officials said.

The air attack on the compound Friday night was part of an ongoing military mission in the area, O'Hara said. "That operation was still ongoing all the while we were conducting search and recovery for our 16 that we lost, and while searching for the missing service members that haven't been accounted for," he said.

Edwards, the U.N. spokesman, said the team in Paktika was on its way to negotiate with tribes in the area about security matters. He said that after the roadside bombing, the group may have come under small-arms fire, and that Afghan security forces subsequently detained several men suspected of taking part in the attack. The U.S. military said it was not aware of any small-arms fire.

Edwards said the ambush was the latest in a string of attacks on military forces, government officials, aid workers and civilians by gunmen intent on disrupting parliamentary elections scheduled for September. The violence has contributed to a growing climate of pessimism and fear.

"The thinking of the United Nations is that there is a serious problem with security and that with the elections coming up we, like most people, want this addressed," said Edwards.

U.S. Planes Bomb Suspected Taliban Mountain Base (WT)

By Daniel Cooney

Warplanes pounded a suspected Taliban compound in the Afghan mountains near where an elite U.S. military team disappeared last week, and violence elsewhere left 38 rebels and Afghan security forces dead as fighting rose ahead of fall elections.

A transport plane flew home the bodies of 16 U.S. troops -- eight Navy SEALs and eight other troops -- killed when their helicopter was shot down while trying to rescue the missing team, U.S. officials said yesterday.

It was not clear if there were any casualties in the air strike late Friday in mountains near Asadabad town in Kunar province, close to the Pakistani border. U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Jerry O'Hara said a "battle damage assessment is ongoing."

"We conducted an air strike on a target we deemed we had to hit immediately. The target was an enemy compound in Kunar province," he said. "The bombing was done using precision guided munitions. The target objective was intelligence driven."

Col. O'Hara declined to say whether the air strike was directly related to the missing military team, which was last heard from in the same area Tuesday.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Mullah Latif Hakimi, claimed Friday that militants had captured one of the men and said he was a "high-ranking American" caught in the same area as where the helicopter went down. He reiterated the claim yesterday in a phone call with the Associated Press.

"The soldier is being held in Kunar. Taliban leaders will decide what to do with him," Mr. Hakimi said. "He is being kept in a home. His health is all right."

When asked to provide evidence that the soldier was in captivity, he said, "Tomorrow we will give proof."

Mr. Hakimi, who also claimed insurgents shot down the helicopter, often calls news organizations to take responsibility for attacks, and the information frequently proves exaggerated or untrue. His exact tie to the Taliban leadership is not clear.

Col. O'Hara said the downed Chinook helicopter had been trying to extract the soldiers when it went into the mountains.

"All our hopes are that we find our missing service members. On top of those hopes are actions on the ground looking for them," Col. O'Hara said. "It's a very demanding area: very mountainous, very wooded and the likelihood of enemy contact is probable."

The bodies of 16 soldiers killed in the helicopter crash were loaded in flag-draped caskets onto a C-17 transport plane during a memorial ceremony Friday night and flown to Dover, Del., Col. O'Hara said.

The loss of the 16 was the deadliest single blow to American forces who ousted the Taliban in 2001 and are now fighting the escalating insurgency.

In three months of unprecedented fighting, about 502 suspected insurgents, 57 Afghan police and soldiers, 45 Americans and 134 civilians have been killed. Only eight months ago, Afghan and U.S. officials were hailing a relatively peaceful presidential election as a sign that the Taliban rebellion was finished.

U.S. Attacks Near Copter Crash Site (LAT)

By Halima Kazem

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

American fighter planes bombed a suspected insurgent compound in the same eastern area of Afghanistan where a team of U.S. soldiers has gone missing, military officials said Saturday.

A Taliban spokesman said more than 25 militants were killed in the airstrikes Friday, but U.S. military officials said it was too soon to estimate casualties.

"We do not know the results of the airstrikes. The battle assessments are ongoing," said Lt. Cindy Moore, a U.S. spokeswoman.

The airstrikes were a continuation of operations in mountainous Kunar province, where a Chinook helicopter was shot down Tuesday by rebel forces, killing all 16 service personnel on board.

The Chinook had been called in to assist the ground team in fighting Al Qaeda and Taliban militants but crashed into a mountainside after being targeted by rocket-propelled grenades.

On Saturday, the Pentagon identified the eight Navy SEALs on board the Chinook as Chief Petty Officer Jacques J. Fontan, 36, of New Orleans; Senior Chief Petty Officer Daniel R. Healy, 36, of Exeter, N.H.; Lt. Cmdr. Erik S. Kristensen, 33, of San Diego; and Petty Officer 1st Class Jeffery A. Lucas, 33, of Corbett, Ore.

Also, Lt. Michael M. McGreevy Jr., 30, of Portville, N.Y.; Petty Officer 2nd Class Eric S. Patton, 22, of Boulder City, Nev.; Petty Officer 2nd Class James Suh, 28, of Deerfield Beach, Fla.; and Petty Officer 1st Class Jeffrey S. Taylor, 30, of Midway, W. Va.

Hundreds of U.S. and Afghan forces have since been scouring the area's deep ravines in the hope of finding the special reconnaissance team, which has been out of contact for several days.

Moore did not comment on reports that rebels had captured members of the missing team.

"There is a good chance that the soldiers are being held hostage by the rebel fighters," said Gov. Asadullah Wafa of Kunar. "These rebels have an agenda."

Also Saturday, in the mountains of central Oruzgan province, Afghan soldiers attacked a Taliban hide-out where about 100 insurgents are thought to have been camped, Afghan security forces said. Two soldiers and 18 rebels were killed, they said.

The attack was in response to the kidnapping and killings of nine Oruzgan tribal leaders by Taliban militants. More than 45 people have been slain in the area in four days.

In Paktika province, meanwhile, six local United Nations security personnel were killed when their convoy was hit by a roadside bomb, according to early reports.

With landmark parliamentary elections scheduled for September, violence has surged in the last three months. About 500 suspected insurgents, 49 Afghan police and soldiers, 140 civilians, and 45 U.S. troops have been killed since March.

The instability has spread fear through the country, especially in southern provinces with Pushtun majorities, the same ethnic group as the Taliban.

Many believe that Taliban and Al Qaeda militants have joined forces with other rebel groups to destabilize election preparations and prevent a long-term U.S. military presence in Afghanistan.

Veterans Confront A Taste Of Battle (WP)

By Michael E. Ruane

The petite young woman with the ponytail, hoop earrings and little red knapsack holds her fingers in her ears and shudders with each crash of the cannon.

One by one, the line of Civil War-era artillery pieces goes off -- shh-BOOM! -- each one a little closer, and each one a little more jarring. As the shots come near, the woman has both hands covering the sides of her face, and with the final blast, about 30 feet distant, she turns away in pain as if she has just been slapped.

The firing is, of course, make-believe war -- a masquerade attended by perspiring men and women in gaudy period costume. But as Army Spec. Kristina Steinmetz, 23, looks on here during a visit from Walter Reed Army Medical Center, she is having trouble separating the pretend war from the real thing.

The occasion is a sprawling weekend reenactment of the battle of Gettysburg staged across freshly mowed farmland in the fields north of town. Steinmetz, who is recovering from combat stress at Walter Reed, had come to the reenactment with two wounded comrades on an outing hosted by a soldiers support agency called Operation Second Chance Inc.

Steinmetz, of Phillipsburg, N.J., Michael Oreskovic, 23, of Eugene, Ore., and Harold Peckenpaugh, 19, of Attica, N.Y., had been eager to make the trip. The three are close friends, and it had been their idea: a three-day weekend away from the hospital. Peckenpaugh had been a reenactor before entering the Army, and his old Civil War outfit was going to be in the battle. Steinmetz and Oreskovic, a military history buff, had never been to Gettysburg.

But Friday morning, as they were driven to the make-believe war by Operation Second Chance founder Cindy McGrew, each of the young soldiers bore the scars of the real one that is underway in Iraq.

Steinmetz, who looks much younger than her years, had been a convoy truck driver -- one of the most harrowing assignments in Iraq. She told of convoys being attacked daily by roadside bombs, of never knowing what might blow up -- an animal carcass, a pile of garbage -- and of never knowing who in the convoy would survive and who wouldn't. Peace of mind came only at night, she said, under the stars.

Partway through her tour at Tikrit, she began blacking out without warning and developed heart problems. She was taken to Walter Reed, where, she said, she was treated for syncope, a temporary loss of consciousness that can be stress-related, and for post-traumatic stress disorder, from which she has substantially recovered.

Peckenpaugh, a rangy Humvee gunner who wears his Purple Heart pinned to the bill of his blue baseball cap, has a long pink scar down the right side of his neck. On Dec. 4, near Ramadi, he was at his gun when an improvised bomb went off, sending shrapnel into his neck, breaking his jaw and slicing his carotid artery. He lost so much blood that he suffered a stroke and, for a time, was partially paralyzed.

Oreskovic was a scout with an Army cavalry unit. He had spent months on hazardous house searches, "hunter-killer" missions and recons. "It was fun," he said. "I enjoyed it." He had been wounded once by a car bomb, on Oct. 5, and six days later he was hit again, just a week before he was scheduled to come home.

This time it was a huge device, made of mortars and artillery rounds, in a truck full of fruit that blew up near his Stryker vehicle in Mosul. He was exposed from the waist up, manning a grenade launcher in the turret.

"I saw a blue flash, " he recalled. "Turned to red. Got real hot." His squad leader, in the vehicle in front of him, was killed. And the blast tore off Oreskovic's left arm at the elbow. "There was nothing left of it," he said.

He arrived a few days later at Walter Reed, where for the first few months of his recovery he couldn't watch TV or movies about war, and certain sounds made him jumpy and emotional. Gradually, he got over that, and this weekend -- his interest in history piqued -- he did not expect trouble at the reenactment. "I can separate myself from it," he said.

The four arrived at a campground about 11 a.m. Friday, unloaded their gear at the cabin where they planned to stay and headed for the battlefield, where the reenactment continued yesterday and is scheduled to conclude today.

It was the 142nd anniversary of the battle, where thousands perished over July 1, 2 and 3, 1863.

At first glance, the modern-day soldiers looked like anyone in the crowd of onlookers who came to watch the battles and browse under the tents where merchants sold reproductions of 1860s-era clothing and firearms.

Oreskovic's artificial left arm was barely noticeable, protruding from his long-sleeved shirt, though he did fumble a bit getting money from his wallet using only his right hand. Steinmetz and Peckenpaugh each bought cap guns, which they fired at each other playfully. And when Peckenpaugh purchased a reproduction 1858 Army revolver, the clerk asked, "How old are you?" He showed his Army ID card.

But there was a seriousness about the trio as they strolled anonymously among people wearing "Support Our Troops" T-shirts or clad as soldiers from a bygone era. When Steinmetz emerged from one merchant's tent with a feathery blue dream catcher, she muttered to Peckenpaugh, "I need something to take the damn nightmares away."

As the day wore on, the weather grew more sultry. Oreskovic and Peckenpaugh dressed up temporarily in period garb provided by Peckenpaugh's reenactor friends. All three drank bottled water and ate ice cream cones to stay cool.

But by mid-afternoon, the heat and the artillery fire had become too much for Steinmetz. Her hands trembled as she clutched her small digital camera. McGrew held her tightly around the waist during the demonstration.

"It was a little hard," Steinmetz said afterward. "Just flashback memories. You just start thinking. . . . The jump is always going to be there. But just visions, you know."

That evening, as distant bugles sounded and drumfire again echoed among the fields here, she packed her things, caught a ride back to the hospital and left Gettysburg, with an old-fashioned band playing in the town square.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Op-Ed by Michael Kinsley: The Lord And Richard Scrushy (WP)

By Michael Kinsley, Post

God works in mysterious ways, but his or her decision to acquit Richard Scrushy, former CEO of HealthSouth Corp., on all charges of financial fraud is especially inscrutable. Five consecutive HealthSouth chief financial officers admitted to cooking the books and copped a plea. They all fingered Scrushy. But jurors chose to believe that the man on top knew nothing about what was going on directly below him.

That kind of ignorance doesn't come cheap. No one denies there was massive fraud at HealthSouth. The government estimates that Scrushy made almost $300 million from the alleged fraud, and he'll get to keep it minus lawyer's fees. Other prominent business defendants have tried the ignorance defense but found that juries tend to think that the more you're paid, the more you ought to know about what's going on around you. Bernard Ebbers of Worldcom Corp., apparently the most convincing of the recent CEO ignoramus wannabes, is facing prosecutors' request for a life sentence.

Experts say the Scrushy prosecution should have been a slam-dunk. Even the Wall Street Journal editorial page seemed amazed that he got off. The Journal approved, of course, but couldn't really explain why. Meanwhile, jurors quoted in the papers said they were bothered by things like the lack of Scrushy fingerprints on copies of the crucial documents.

Only one word can describe Scrushy's acquittal. It is a miracle.

Miracles happen, just like that other stuff. But miracles don't just happen. They require work. Money doesn't hurt, either. When Scrushy was indicted, he hired God. Less inspired defendants might have settled for the late Johnnie Cochran or Jack Abramoff. Scrushy, though, went straight to the top.

He left his suburban evangelical church and joined a predominantly black congregation in a blue-collar neighborhood. He bought a half-hour of local TV for a morning prayer show featuring himself and his wife, and frequent guest spots by black ministers. He had a prayer group praying for him every day at the trial. All this was in Birmingham, Ala., where HealthSouth was located and where the trial occurred.

Cynics have suggested that Scrushy and his advisers might have been trying to influence the local jury with these tactics. This, if I might say so, is a typical example of the anti-Christian bias that so many folks complain about in the liberal media. Why can't a man turn to God in his moment of trial (or, indeed, in his actual criminal trial) without being accused of ulterior motives? Scrushy prayed, and his prayers were answered. "God is good," he said on the courthouse steps after the jury verdict. And well he might think so.

The Post got in trouble a million years ago for an article that described evangelical Christians as "poor, undereducated and easily led." The paper apologized almost immediately and many times afterward. And, like every major paper in those cesspools of secularism that are America's big cities, The Post now seizes any opportunity to slobber over religion and to show respect to religious people, especially evangelical Christians.

But with their cynical suggestion that Richard Scrushy and his defense team might have been using religion to con the jury, the liberal media reveal that they are still heathens. Not only do they still secretly think that devoutly religious people in the Deep South are "poor, undereducated and easily led," but they imply that Richard Scrushy and his defense team may think so, too. What could be a bigger insult to a godly man who has now been acquitted of all wrongdoing?

The obvious lesson of the Scrushy verdict is that prayer works. What do the cynics say now? Even Martha Stewart, who keeps thousands of people out of church every Sunday because they are too busy searching for fresh kale or folding their handkerchiefs and whose obsessive celebration of the material world makes her possibly the least spiritual figure in American public life (though no worse for that, in my opinion), might well wish she had fallen to her knees before it was too late.

To anybody but Scrushy, his acquittal doesn't necessarily prove that there is a God. To some HealthSouth investors, it may even suggest the opposite. And the view of those five former HealthSouth CFOs may be even bleaker. But if there is a God, it is hard to see the Scrushy acquittal as anything but the result of divine intervention.

So there is no puzzle about Scrushy's motives. The intriguing question is, what were God's motives? Being all-knowing, He or She doesn't need fingerprints and has no doubts, reasonable or otherwise. Are we supposed to conclude that prayer, if suitably ostentatious, can be an acceptable substitute for goodness, rather than a reflection of it?

Or is this a demonstration of God's powers? A good defense attorney can get an innocent man off, but it takes a great defense attorney to get a guilty man off. Maybe it's the same with deities.

All we can say is, God knows.

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Rove Factor? (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, July 3, 2005

Its legal appeals exhausted, Time magazine agreed last week to turn over reporter Matthew Cooper's e-mails and computer notes to a special prosecutor investigating the leak of an undercover CIA agent's identity. The case has been the subject of press controversy for two years. Saying "we are not above the law," Time Inc. Editor in Chief Norman Pearlstine decided to comply with a grand-jury subpoena to turn over documents related to the leak. But Cooper (and a New York Times reporter, Judith Miller) is still refusing to testify and faces jail this week.

At issue is the story of a CIA-sponsored trip taken by former ambassador (and White House critic) Joseph Wilson to investigate reports that Iraq was seeking to buy uranium from the African country of Niger. "Some government officials have noted to Time in interviews... that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, is a CIA official who monitors the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction," said Cooper's July 2003 Time online article.

Now the story may be about to take another turn. The e-mails surrendered by Time Inc., which are largely between Cooper and his editors, show that one of Cooper's sources was White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, according to two lawyers who asked not to be identified because they are representing witnesses sympathetic to the White House. Cooper and a Time spokeswoman declined to comment. But in an interview with NEWSWEEK, Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, confirmed that Rove had been interviewed by Cooper for the article. It is unclear, however, what passed between Cooper and Rove.

The controversy began three days before the Time piece appeared, when columnist Robert Novak, writing about Wilson's trip, reported that Wilson had been sent at the suggestion of his wife, who was identified by name as a CIA operative. The leak to Novak, apparently intended to discredit Wilson's mission, caused a furor when it turned out that Plame was an undercover agent. It is a crime to knowingly reveal the identity of an undercover CIA official. A special prosecutor was appointed and began subpoenaing reporters to find the source of the leak.

Novak appears to have made some kind of arrangement with the special prosecutor, and other journalists who reported on the Plame story have talked to prosecutors with the permission of their sources. Cooper agreed to discuss his contact with Lewis (Scooter) Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's top aide, after Libby gave him permission to do so. But Cooper drew the line when special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald asked about other sources.

Initially, Fitzgerald's focus was on Novak's sourcing, since Novak was the first to out Plame. But according to Luskin, Rove's lawyer, Rove spoke to Cooper three or four days before Novak's column appeared. Luskin told NEWSWEEK that Rove "never knowingly disclosed classified information" and that "he did not tell any reporter that Valerie Plame worked for the CIA." Luskin declined, however, to discuss any other details. He did say that Rove himself had testified before the grand jury "two or three times" and signed a waiver authorizing reporters to testify about their conversations with him. "He has answered every question that has been put to him about his conversations with Cooper and anybody else," Luskin said. But one of the two lawyers representing a witness sympathetic to the White House told NEWSWEEK that there was growing "concern" in the White House that the prosecutor is interested in Rove. Fitzgerald declined to comment.

In early October 2003, NEWSWEEK reported that immediately after Novak's column appeared in July, Rove called MSNBC "Hardball" host Chris Matthews and told him that Wilson's wife was "fair game." But White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters at the time that any suggestion that Rove had played a role in outing Plame was "totally ridiculous." On Oct. 10, McClellan was asked directly if Rove and two other White House aides had ever discussed Valerie Plame with any reporters. McClellan said he had spoken with all three, and "those individuals assured me they were not involved in this."

Rove Talked But Did Not Tattle, Attorney Says (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

WASHINGTON — Karl Rove, one of President Bush's closest advisors, spoke with a Time magazine reporter days before the name of a CIA operative surfaced in the press, but did not leak the confidential information, a lawyer for Rove said Saturday in a new admission in the case.

Rove spoke to Time reporter Matthew Cooper in July 2003, before a syndicated column revealed the identity of operative Valerie Plame, the wife of Bush administration critic and former U.S. Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV.

Cooper is one of two reporters who has been held in contempt of court for not cooperating with a federal investigation into who leaked Plame's identity. Although Wilson once said he suspected that Rove had played a role in destroying his wife's CIA cover, the White House dismissed questions about Rove's actions as "totally ridiculous."

In confirming the conversation between Rove and Cooper, Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, emphasized that the presidential advisor did not reveal any secrets. But the disclosure raised new questions about Rove and the precise role of the White House in the apparent national security breach as Cooper and another reporter, Judith Miller of the New York Times, faced imminent jail terms.

Time Inc., under pressure from a federal judge and over Cooper's objections, turned over e-mail records and other internal documents to a special prosecutor Friday, identifying sources that Cooper used to report and write on the politically charged case. A Time spokeswoman declined to say Saturday whether Rove was among sources mentioned in the documents.

Cooper and Miller could be jailed as soon as Wednesday for refusing to cooperate in the investigation. Time, which was separately held in contempt in the case, said that it hoped its cooperation meant that Cooper would not be incarcerated.

Rove, Bush's deputy chief of staff and longtime political strategist, testified before a grand jury investigating the Plame case on three occasions. His latest appearance was in October 2004, about the same time the prosecutor investigating the case said his probe was complete with the exception of testimony from Cooper and Miller.

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald is investigating the alleged outing of Plame by Robert Novak, a columnist and CNN pundit, on July 14, 2003. Some suspect that the White House leaked her name in retaliation for a July 6, 2003, op-ed piece in the New York Times written by Wilson, her husband. He accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq.

Fitzgerald interviewed many other White House officials and journalists, including Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney. Although Novak was the first to publish Plame's name, Fitzgerald has indicated that whoever leaked the information to Novak also might have revealed her identity to other journalists. That could constitute separate violations of a federal law that protects the identity of undercover CIA personnel.

Prosecutions are rare, however, because they require showing that the leak was intentionally disclosed and that the person leaking the information knew the government was trying to conceal it.

Fitzgerald asked Cooper and Time for documents and testimony relating to conversations Cooper had with official sources about Wilson, Plame or her ties to the CIA in the period before the publication of Novak's column. Cooper wrote about the case on Time's website after the Novak column appeared.

Luskin, Rove's attorney, acknowledged in an interview Saturday that Cooper and Rove had spoken days before Novak's column, in a conversation that was initiated by Cooper.

"What I can tell you is that Cooper called Rove during that week between the Wilson article and the Novak article, but that Karl absolutely did not identify Valerie Plame," Luskin said. "He did not disclose any confidential information about anybody to Cooper or to anybody else."

Luskin said he would not "characterize the substance of the conversation," which was covered in the testimony Rove provided to the grand jury investigating the leak. "The folks in Fitzgerald's office have asked us not to talk about what Karl has had to say," Luskin said.

Luskin said Rove had been assured by prosecutors that he was not a target of the investigation. "We were advised recently that his status has not changed," he added.

"It is certainly my understanding that Karl has testified absolutely truthfully about all his conversations about everybody that he has been asked about during that week," Luskin added. "Nobody has suggested to us ever that they think that there are any problems about whether they think he is being candid."

But Newsweek magazine reported on its website Saturday that Rove was one of Cooper's sources identified in notes that Time turned over to Fitzgerald. And separately, MSNBC political analyst Lawrence O'Donnell said in a taped TV program that he had information indicating Rove was one of Cooper's sources. O'Donnell's comments were made in a segment of "The McLaughlin Group" that was set to air in Los Angeles on PBS Saturday night.

Cooper's lawyer, Richard Sauber, declined to discuss Rove's role in Cooper's work, saying in response to an e-mail message, "We're not going to discuss one way or another what the [documents turned over by Time] say."

In court papers filed Friday arguing against his possible confinement, Cooper's lawyers said if he were to break promises of confidentiality, "his ability to continue as an effective reporter would be seriously jeopardized."

In letters to the court accompanying his plea, fellow journalists discussed this principle.

"Journalists must honor their promises which protect the bad along with the good," said Margaret Carlson, a Time columnist and colleague of Cooper. "We can't separate them like the darks and the whites in the laundry."

Lawyer Says Rove Talked To Reporter, Did Not Leak Name (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

Karl Rove, President Bush's chief political adviser, spoke with Time magazine's Matthew Cooper during a critical week in July 2003 when Cooper was reporting on a public critic of the Bush administration who was also the husband of a CIA operative, his lawyer confirmed yesterday.

Rove is identified in Cooper's notes from that time period, which Time turned over Friday to special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald -- under court order. Fitzgerald is investigating whether senior administration officials leaked CIA operative Valerie Plame's name to reporters in July 2003 as retaliation after her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, publicly accused the Bush administration of twisting intelligence to justify a war with Iraq.

Rove's lawyer said Rove never identified Plame to Cooper in those conversations. More significantly, Robert Luskin said, Fitzgerald assured him in October and again last week that Rove is not a target of his investigation.

"Karl did nothing wrong. Karl didn't disclose Valerie Plame's identity to Mr. Cooper or anybody else," Luskin said. Luskin said the question remains unanswered: "Who outed this woman? . . . It wasn't Karl."

Cooper has said that more than one confidential source is identified in his e-mails and the notes of interviews he conducted in July 2003 after Wilson's opinion piece appeared in the New York Times. Reporters were calling the White House with questions about Wilson's assertions, which senior government officials tried to discredit.

Plame's name first appeared in Robert D. Novak's syndicated column in July 2003, eight days after Wilson's opinion piece critical of the Bush administration appeared in the Times. Wilson was sent by the CIA in 2002 to investigate allegations that Iraq had sought to buy uranium in the African nation of Niger, and he reported that he found no proof. His opinion piece accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify going to war with Iraq

After the Novak column, Wilson said the White House had damaged his wife's career and had put all her contacts in jeopardy. He initially accused Rove of being behind the leak, then retracted that statement. It is a felony to knowingly identify a covert operative.

Rove answered questions under oath for about two hours before a grand jury on Oct. 15 as part of the special prosecutor's investigation. According to Luskin, the prosecutor said he believes Rove was candid and forthcoming about his contact with reporters.

"I've been assured by the prosecutor they have no reason to doubt the honesty of anything he's said," Luskin said.

Cooper and New York Times reporter Judith Miller face four months in jail as early as Wednesday for defying Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan's order to cooperate with Fitzgerald's investigation. The Supreme Court on Monday refused to hear the reporters' appeals of Hogan's order.

Journalists Say Threat Of Subpoena Intensifies (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

In 1991, when Timothy Phelps, a reporter for Newsday, and Nina Totenberg, a reporter for National Public Radio, broke the news that Anita Hill had accused Clarence Thomas, then a Supreme Court nominee, of sexual harassment, a special Senate counsel tried to subpoena the reporters' telephone records to unmask their confidential source.

The accusations prompted a second round of highly contentious confirmation hearings, but Senate leaders ultimately refused to give the special counsel permission to pursue the records, and eventually the matter was dropped.

Mr. Phelps, who is now Newsday's bureau chief in Washington, recalled his case last week after two courts, including the Supreme Court, ruled in two similar cases against journalists.

"We seemed to have pretty solid support for the stand we took, from the journalistic community, the legal community, the human rights community, the public," he said. "And I don't sense as much of that today, even in the journalistic community. The legal atmosphere, the corporate atmosphere, and the public atmosphere has changed."

Lawyers for the news media say that the legal climate for those seeking to protect confidential sources is turning chillier, with more subpoenas being issued to reporters. There is no database that tracks such subpoenas, and some prosecutors dispute that they are on the rise. But a series of high-profile cases involving confidential sources has the news media on edge.

"It does feel like open season," said Laura Handman, a First Amendment lawyer based in Washington. "There are more instances of courts ordering confidential sources to be disclosed," she said, adding that she believed the Bush administration's emphasis on secrecy was partly to blame. "This leads to more leak inquiries, which, in turn, leads to more subpoenas."

In the last year, more than two dozen reporters across the country have been subpoenaed or questioned about their confidential sources in cases before federal courts, according to the Newspaper Association of America. Paul J. Boyle, senior vice president of the association, said he believed that "the filing of subpoenas, as well as the letters and phone calls that media companies receive from prosecutors and civil litigants, is on the rise."

Kurt Wimmer, a media lawyer whose firm, Covington & Burling, represents 45 television stations in 40 states, said he had as many subpoenas against reporters in the first three months of this year as he had in all of last year.

He said those subpoenas were largely inspired by the looming prospect over the last several months that Judith Miller of The New York Times and Matthew Cooper of Time magazine would go to jail for refusing to testify in a grand jury investigation into the disclosure of the identity of a covert C.I.A. operative, Valerie Plame. The Supreme Court last week declined to hear the reporters' appeal, intensifying one of the biggest clashes between the news media and the courts in a generation.

"When the Supreme Court says there's nothing wrong with forcing reporters to testify and go to jail, other lawyers are looking at that and saying, 'Why shouldn't I subpoena a reporter?' " Mr. Wimmer said.

Others doubt that there have been more subpoenas recently, saying it may just seem that way because a handful of cases have become so prominent. They say that regardless of the numbers, there is nothing wrong with pursuing justice if a reporter has been manipulated by a source and published misleading information.

In another case last week, a federal appeals court in Washington upheld contempt orders against four reporters who had refused to disclose their confidential sources to Wen Ho Lee, an atomic scientist who had been suspected of passing secrets to the Chinese but pleaded guilty to a lesser charge. He is suing the government for giving information about him to those reporters, violating his privacy.

Brian A. Sun, a Los Angeles lawyer who represents Dr. Lee, said that while he did not see more subpoenas, just more publicity about them, he agreed that the Miller-Cooper case "could encourage other prosecutors to utilize the tools that they have had available to them." In Mr. Sun's view, what is behind these cases are leakers who have "less than altruistic motives" and are using reporters, while those reporters in turn are looking to break a big story.

The heightened interest in national security issues since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks has drawn attention to some cases, said Martin London, a New York lawyer who has litigated several media cases and subpoenaed nearly a dozen reporters in 1972 on behalf of Spiro T. Agnew, the former vice president. At the same time, he said, high-profile scandals at various news organizations, including The New York Times and CBS News, have undermined confidence in the news media.

"I don't buy that there is any increase in subpoenas," Mr. London said. "The Miller-Cooper case is very unusual, it has a lot of wrinkles that are just sort of extraordinary. But it's perfectly reasonable in a post-9/11 world for the government to be concerned about the security of C.I.A. information."

John Nowacki, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the department would not comment on the use of subpoenas against reporters.

Mr. Boyle and others said there was a change after a 2003 ruling written by Richard Posner, an influential federal appeals court judge in Chicago, who said that lower courts had been misreading a 1972 Supreme Court decision, Branzburg v. Hayes. That case in fact rejected the idea of First Amendment protections for reporters, but media lawyers over three decades managed to convince judges otherwise.

"He seems to have freed some of his colleagues to pull back on the privilege," said Sandra Baron, executive director of the Media Law Resource Center.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special prosecutor in the Miller-Cooper case, has served as something of a role model for those who are seeking information from reporters. Mr. Fitzgerald has employed a technique based on the idea that if a source no longer requires confidentiality, the reporter's pledge to keep it is moot. He has sought and obtained waivers from suspected sources releasing reporters of their confidentiality agreements, making it harder for reporters to claim they are bound by a pledge not to talk.

Through this approach, Mr. Fitzgerald obtained at least limited testimony from journalists including Tim Russert of NBC, Walter Pincus of The Washington Post and Mr. Cooper. Mr. Cooper was subpoenaed again and refused to testify, although Time Inc. has turned over his notes to the prosecutor, a decision with which Mr. Cooper said he disagreed. Mr. Cooper and Ms. Miller face another court hearing Wednesday to learn their fates.

Mr. Phelps, for one, lamented this turn of events and said it was only likely to chill potential sources in the future. "The fact that some news organizations have cooperated in this case is going to put a little seed of doubt in people's minds about whether they can really depend on reporters or not," he said.

And there is a rising concern among reporters that those people might be right.

"The biggest fear that most reporters have now is not having their mail taken or their phone records taken without their being told," said John Solomon, who oversees investigative reporting for the Associated Press and who had both of those things happen to him, in 2002 and 2001, respectively. "The biggest concern is that they'll write about something and will be forced to talk about it."

Representative Mike Pence, the Indiana Republican who is pushing, so far unsuccessfully, for Congress to pass a federal law to protect journalists, said that fear was justified. "No reporter, as the law has evolved in the last 30 years, can give absolute assurance to any source that at no time will their identity be disclosed," he said.

In addition to the Lee and Miller-Cooper cases, there have been several other high-profile cases involving confidential sources. Jim Taricani, a reporter with WJAR, a television station in Providence, R.I., refused to reveal the identity of the person who leaked him an F.B.I. videotape of a politician taking a bribe. He was sentenced to six months of home detention in December and was released after four months.

Nine news organizations have been subpoenaed in the case involving Steven J. Hatfill, a scientist, who sued federal officials under the privacy act for naming him as a "person of interest" in the 2001 anthrax investigations. As many as 100 federal agents have waived any confidentiality agreements they had with the media in that case.

Ms. Miller of The New York Times and a colleague, Philip Shenon, are under subpoena for their phone records by a grand jury investigating the leak of information about a planned F.B.I. raid on an Islamic charity suspected of funding terrorism. In February, a federal district judge in New York held that the reporters had a right to keep their phone records confidential.

The cases come as polls show the public has a deepening distrust of the news media, although a study by the Pew Research Center last month found that 76 percent of Americans think the use of confidential sources is at least sometimes justified.

Michael Getler, the ombudsman for The Washington Post, cautioned between linking what he agrees is a rise in the number of legal proceedings over sources and the low regard in which the news media is held. "There clearly is a more widespread ideological assault from both sides on the press these days, and that may well be feeding some of the prosecutorial zeal," he said. "But I don't know that that is really the case. I don't think we know enough to say exactly what is driving individual prosecutors."

Congressman Mum After FBI Searches Home (AP-Y2)

By Seth Hettena, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

A California congressman whose dealings with a defense contractor are under investigation was taking a "personal day" Saturday and not commenting on federal authorities' searches a day earlier of his home and a yacht where he stayed while in Washington, a spokesman said.

Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham didn't plan a public appearance until a Monday pancake breakfast in Encinitas, spokesman Mark Olson said.

Olson referred all questions about the investigation to Cunningham's attorney.

FBI agents on Friday searched Cunningham's $2.55 million mansion outside San Diego and a 42-foot yacht named Duke Stir, according to a bureau spokeswoman, who said agents from the Department of Defense and Internal Revenue Service assisted.

Cunningham's attorney, K. Lee Blalack, released a statement saying he told the government Thursday the congressman would cooperate with the investigation.

"They will apparently not take 'yes' for an answer and have instead opted to use strong-arm tactics that were designed to generate headlines," Blalack said.

Blalack said Saturday that Cunningham still intended to provide information requested.

Authorities also searched the Washington offices of defense firm MZM Inc. MZM's founder, Mitchell Wade, bought a home from the congressman in 2003 at what may have been an inflated $1.7 million price. Wade also owns the yacht where Cunningham said he has lived part-time since April 2004.

Cunningham pledged last month to release records on the boat payments but has yet to do so. If he was living on Wade's boat for free, that could be a violation of congressional ethics rules.

Blalack said Saturday that Cunningham still planned to release those records but did not say when. He declined to comment further on the case.

Cunningham, 63, a former Navy "Top Gun" fighter pilot and eight-term Republican congressman, has said that he showed poor judgment in selling the house but acted honestly and predicted that an investigation would prove that.

Public Defender Rules Are Set To Change (SLPD)

By Robert Patrick, Of the Post-Dispatch

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 3, 2005

The St. Louis public defender's office - the last legal hope for those too poor to afford their own lawyer - will, for the first time in at least 20 years, refuse to represent certain people in court starting Tuesday, state officials said last week.

Those people are on the misdemeanor confined docket, which means they've been arrested on misdemeanor charges, or are named on the assessed docket because they've been arrested for failing to pay fines or court costs.

State and local representatives of the public defender's office say they're making the move because it's unethical and unprofessional to try to represent defendants with only minutes to familiarize themselves with the cases.

J. Marty Robinson, director of the Missouri State Public Defender system, calls it "meet 'em and greet 'em and plead 'em."

"I'm just flabbergasted that there are people that think this is OK," he said.

Robinson said many people were probably misled into thinking they had a lawyer, but public defenders were simply "filling out the court's paperwork."

Public defenders also say that under recently revised state laws, guilty pleas to two of certain misdemeanors can lead to a felony charge and serious prison time for the third offense, along the lines of state three-strikes laws. That could mean defendants who plead guilty to minor crimes to stay out of jail are unknowingly increasing their chance of greater future penalties.

"Our representation on that docket was unethical, unprofessional and unconstitutional, and innocent and vulnerable people were being hurt," said St. Louis District Defender Eric Affholter. "And that's why we made our decision to participate differently on that docket."

The move is threatening to fill local jails and to clog courtrooms. Presiding Circuit Judge John Riley said he was going to tell city officials last week that city jails could be seeing more inmates for longer periods.

It also is angering judges. In legal paperwork filed late Friday, the public defender's office said one assistant public defender had been told by sheriff's deputies they had been ordered to arrest her and her colleagues if they didn't show up to interview clients at 9 a.m. Tuesday. But sheriff's spokesman Mike Guzy said Friday afternoon that he wasn't aware of any order to arrest public defenders.

The judges reportedly are striking back in other ways, including in ways public defenders say will punish those too poor to afford their own attorneys.

According to affidavits signed by Affholter and Assistant District Defender Laura O'Sullivan and filed Friday, Circuit Judge Michael Mullen called O'Sullivan and told her that he was changing policies in his courtroom in response to the public defender's move set for Tuesday. Mullen said he would no longer allow public defenders to postpone trials, would go with prosecutors' recommended sentences over public defenders' recommendations and would no longer reschedule hearings to avoid conflicts with the public defenders' schedules.

"When one arm of the criminal justice system flexes its muscle, the others must respond," Mullen told the public defender's office staff, according to Affholter. Mullen was on vacation last week and could not be reached for comment.

"We weren't trying to flex our muscle," Affholter responded last week. "Our intent really was to do the best lawyering we can."

The controversy began, according to legal filings, after two defendants pleaded guilty with the assistance of public defenders, then hired private attorneys who weeks later tried to withdraw those guilty pleas, alleging inadequate representation.

The public defender's office then began examining whether they should continue to represent certain defendants on the docket.

Public defender's officials met with a handful of judges on May 24 to discuss the problem and suggest solutions, Affholter said.

"Nothing came of that," he said.

A June 17 letter to Associate Circuit Judge Paula Bryant announced that as of July 5, the office would no longer automatically represent defendants the first time they appear in court after having been arrested on a misdemeanor charge.

From 15 to 50 people appear on that docket each morning, Affholter said. Public defenders have been representing those defendants without access to police reports or the criminal court file and with little time to consult, he said.

Robinson said those defendants have a constitutional right to "meaningful representation." He said, "It means an attorney that meets with me, hears my problems, finds out what the case is against me." The attorney "either presents my defense or knows enough about my situation to negotiate the best plea agreement. But you can't really do that unless you know what evidence the state has."

Defendants often were given a choice: Plead guilty or stay in jail until paying a $5,000 bond, Affholter said. "So, coercively, people were pleading guilty."

For certain misdemeanor crimes, the third charge can be prosecuted as a felony, Affholter said.

"So the implication of just pleading people out has a lot more serious impact," he said. "Driving while (license) revoked can now be a felony if you have enough priors." And that could mean up to five years in prison.

Pippa Barrett, in charge of misdemeanors for the St. Louis circuit attorney's office, said it would be "infrequent" for someone to qualify to be charged with a felony for that charge.

According to the June 17 letter and to state officials, starting Tuesday, public defenders in St. Louis, the state's busiest trial court, will not represent defendants who already have been convicted and sentenced but were arrested again because they failed to pay fines or fees.

Riley describes defendants in that category as "you didn't do what you were supposed to do or you didn't do it by a certain date."

And the office will represent poor defendants but will not represent them if they wish to immediately plead guilty.

"We are taking this position because it is not possible for us to render constitutional, ethical and professional assistance of counsel upon walking into court with no discovery, no opportunity for investigation and no opportunity to counsel the accused," the letter reads.

Similar rules elsewhere

Broward County, Fla., Public Defender Howard Finkelstein banned "meet, greet and plead" early last month over similar concerns.

Although some judges warned that the system would crumble and criminal defendants would miss out on good plea deals, Finkelstein said, "the public's reaction has been overwhelmingly supportive."

Finkelstein said he knows of two other public defenders in Florida that have instituted similar rules.

Riley said some judges see setting the start of the policy change on Tuesday - the end of a long holiday weekend that could result in a busy criminal docket - as a cynical way to boost pressure on the judges.

Others, including Affholter, said there have been accusations the move is in retaliation for Bryant's March 23 decision to overturn a guilty plea by a man accused of violating a protective order.

In a legal motion filed in that case, private attorney James Knappenberger said his client didn't have the capacity to understand the proceedings, couldn't comprehend what he read and was mentally and physically exhausted at the hearing.

"His assistant public defender did not raise his issues at or before the time of the plea. He only spoke to the assistant public defender the first time, when they appeared first in court, and entered his plea of guilty," the filing says.

Bryant did not give a reason in her ruling and declined an interview request. The man was later referred for a mental health evaluation.

"That happened to be a kid whose parents or someone had the wherewithal to look into it," Robinson said. "I wonder how many hundreds, if not thousands, don't have the ability to challenge it after the fact and have it set aside."

Affholter denied that his office was retaliating and said public defenders were not angry at Bryant. Affholter also denied accusations that the move was a bid for more money and staff. But state officials with the public defender's office have been crying for help.

Robinson said caseload was increasing at an average rate of 6.5 percent per year over the last 15 years.

"Their case files are too many, and they are too few," Robinson said of public defenders. Robinson calls it "assembly-line justice" that will inevitably send innocent people to jail.

Public defender's offices statewide are so understaffed, in fact, that the Missouri Bar announced June 20 that it is asking private attorneys to volunteer and help out by taking traffic, vehicle registration, licensing and other minor cases off the hands of public defenders.

"If the Public Defender System slips any further, Missouri's entire criminal justice system will falter," said Missouri Bar President Joe Whisler in a statement announcing the volunteer initiative.

Affholter said "the decision we made is 100 percent for representation."

Affholter also said the new policy would probably not be a big money saver. The office will most likely pick up many of the new cases anyway, he said.

In interviews last week, Riley was skeptical that handling the docket was very taxing.

"The guy didn't pay his costs on time? How much time do you need, counselor?" Riley asked.

An order and reply

The issue is likely to remain unresolved until at least Tuesday.

Presiding Judge Riley issued a one-page court order Monday that said public defenders would have to interview defendants on the confined docket at 9 a.m. to see whether they are eligible for representation by a public defender.

Robinson, director of the Missouri State Public Defender system, fired back Friday afternoon with a 22-page filing that contained many of the allegations against Mullen and other St. Louis judges.

Robinson's filing asks a judge to stay the order until a hearing could be scheduled. Robinson's filings also said Riley's order exceeded his authority by trying to take over management of the public defender's office, was vague and overly broad and would force public defenders to violate ethics rules.

The filing also asks St. Louis judges to recuse themselves from hearing the issue.

Barrett, who said prosecutors are just "bystanders" in the conflict, said public defenders once interviewed everybody for eligibility first.

"I think what's going on, and this is only my interpretation of events, is the judges think that's what could happen again," she said.

At 4:30 p.m. Friday, 90 minutes after most court staffers had left early for the holiday weekend, O'Sullivan and Ellen Blau, deputy trial division director of the public defender's office, tried to get Circuit Judge Michael Calvin to stay Riley's order until a hearing could be held.

Riley was on vacation Friday, and was two states away when Calvin reached him by phone to tell him of the filing. Calvin refused to question the presiding judge's order.

"I don't believe it is my place to rule one way or the other," Calvin told Blau.

Calvin said the assistant presiding judge could hear the case as early as Tuesday morning.

State Weighs 2 Bills Requiring Bullet Marking (LAT)

By Jordan Rau, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

SACRAMENTO — With a zealot's enthusiasm, Randy Rossi has been firing bullets into lots of things lately. Car doors, Sheetrock, wood walls, gelatin with the consistency of human bodies.

On the base of each mashed slug is a series of tiny, mostly legible numbers that have been inscribed by a laser. To Rossi, head of Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer's firearm division, these markings represent a solution for one of law enforcement's most trying problems: the anonymity of ammunition.

"This is nothing fancy, just simple technology," he said on a recent day, after proudly showing that the identification numbers on several slugs remained readable after the bullets were fired into a bulletproof vest.

With 45% of the state's homicides unsolved in 2003, the most recent data available, the California Legislature is moving ahead with two potentially landmark measures that would require that identifying marks be embedded on projectiles from guns.

One proposal would have all bullets sold in the state marked during manufacture with codes. The other would mandate that guns be equipped with stamping mechanisms that would hammer telling marks onto every cartridge fired. That could allow investigators to link the cartridge to the gun's purchaser even if they could not find the firearm.

The approaches depart from law enforcement tactics elsewhere in the country, which have focused on creating computer registries of fired bullets. Those allow for investigators to match projectiles from different crimes, linking ones committed with the same weapon.

The issue of marking ammunition has become the most contested law enforcement topic in Sacramento this year. One of the bills has split California's law enforcement community and infuriated the nation's ammunition manufacturers, weapons sellers and firearms enthusiasts, including the National Rifle Assn. Several police groups in California are also opposed.

The hyperbolic debate has even ricocheted into Congress. In April, Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon), chairman of the House Committee on Armed Services, warned Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger that requiring serial numbers on ammunition would increase the cost of bullets so much that the military would scale back target practice. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, also a Republican, is also against the proposal, which he said would hurt manufacturers in his state.

Nationwide, there were 347,705 crimes committed with firearms in 2003. In California, those included 44,466 robberies and aggravated assaults, and 1,733 murders.

Although handgun serialization has been a required practice for decades, forensic advances in tracking the sale of ammunition — which is far more likely to be left at a crime scene — have been limited.

Since 1994, law enforcement agencies have been experimenting with ballistics imaging technology that makes computer pictures of bullets recovered from crime scenes. Those images are compared in hopes of linking crimes in which the same weapon was used.

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives has established a database with 862,000 images that authorities say have led to 11,300 matches. Maryland and New York have established their own programs but have been criticized for failing to provide enough substantial leads. The first time Maryland's database contributed to a murder conviction was in April, four years after its creation.

California lawmakers debated the same strategy in 2000 but decided instead to study it. A 2003 report from Lockyer's office provided greater caution after concluding that constructing such a large database would be "impractical" and finding that it was often difficult to match images of bullets fired from the same gun.

The ammunition bill, SB 357 — numbered to correspond with a popular caliber — was introduced by Sen. Joe Dunn (D-Santa Ana) on Lockyer's behalf. It has passed the Senate and an initial Assembly panel. It is the one that has drawn the most intense opposition.

For any box of ammunition sold in California, the bill would require manufacturers to engrave each bullet with the same serial number, which would also be affixed to the box. Retailers would record who purchased each box and would provide that information to the state Department of Justice.

Ammunition Coding Systems, a Seattle company that provided demonstration bullets to California police, uses a laser to etch the number, but the bill does not specify what technology manufacturers would have to use.

Initial testing indicates that the serial numbers almost always survive impact. The San Bernardino County Sheriff's Department was able to identify serial numbers on 21 of 22 bullets it tested and recovered. The attorney general's office identified 180 serial numbers on 181 bullets.

The other, less cleverly numbered, bill, AB 352 by Assemblyman Paul Koretz (D-West Hollywood), has passed the Assembly and one Senate panel. The bill, sponsored by the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence, would require that semiautomatic pistols be equipped with technology that could imprint microscopic identifying information on each cartridge case fired from the gun.

NanoMark Technologies of Londonderry, N.H., has patented one technology that uses the firing pin to emboss the identification mark onto the chamber while it is in the breech of the gun. Although Ammunition Coding Systems' marks can be read with the aid of a regular magnifying glass, NanoMark's require more powerful imaging equipment used by forensic experts.

It remains unclear what Schwarzenegger will do if either measure makes it to his desk. Last year the governor proved himself unpredictable on gun legislation by banning .50-caliber BMG rifles — powerful hunting weapons that can penetrate thick surfaces from great distances — but rejecting a measure requiring ammunition vendors to keep records of all purchasers.

"Forensic testing of ammunition used in a crime is the most effective way of tracing criminal activity," Schwarzenegger wrote in that veto message.

Ammunition manufacturers, who together produce 8 billion rounds nationally each year, say Dunn's legislation would bankrupt them. The industry, which makes $626 million worth of wholesale civilian sales each year — on top of unknown amounts to law enforcement and the military — insists that marking each piece will slow their production and substantially drive up the cost of bullets. Some fear that using lasers in factories filled with gunpowder would be unsafe.

"The question is, 'Can it be done on a mass level?' and the answer is, 'No, not without building a new factory,' " said Lawrence Keane, general counsel for the Sporting Arms and Ammunition Manufacturers' Institute, the industry association.

Makers of coding equipment, which etches and reads serial numbers on hundreds of products, insist that it could be done for a penny or less per bullet.

Carl Rennard, a consultant from Lincoln, R.I., who owns several coding patents, said the ammunition industry "is really uninformed about the technology available, how unobtrusive it would be to the product line. They're just being afraid."

Advocates say the industry has been unwilling to meet with consultants who help integrate such technology into their production lines.

The debate has also incorporated a disagreement on the craftiness of criminals.

Opponents complain that criminals will refit their guns to get rid of firing pins that stamp codes onto cartridges and will shave numbers off bullets, even though that would require them to take the bullet out of its cartridge. More likely, they say, criminals will simply avoid these weapons and buy their wares out of state or use black market items.

"Criminal street gang members and other perpetrators of crime, who are often under the legal age for buying handguns and ammunition, would have no trouble getting both from sources other than retailers," Robert Baker, president of the Los Angeles Police Protective League, wrote in opposition to Dunn's bill.

Some forensics experts say that is giving too much credit to criminals who often do not bother to use gloves during crimes or take other precautionary measures.

"Yes, there would be ways to get around that, but it's not an easy thing to do," said Joe Vince, a former agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms who is now a forensics consultant in Frederick, Md. "In L.A. in particular, you have ghetto rounds, which is whatever you have in your pocket."

Lawrence Kobilinsky, a professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York City, said serializing ammunition was "probably something that should have been done long ago" but cautioned that its use would be limited so long as the requirement was limited to California.

"To have one state is well and good, but in order to be effective, it has to be national," he said.

But backers of the legislation hope that, as with many other California mandates, the state's market is so large that manufacturers will find it cheaper to adopt the practices for all their wares rather than just for California's.

Advocates say they do not expect the technology to automatically solve every case but say they believe it would often provide a valuable clue.

"It's like any other tool, like fingerprints or copying down a license number," Rossi, the state firearms chief, said. "There are limitations, but it can still be valuable."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

18 Nabbed In Human-smuggling Scheme (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

Federal and state authorities in California arrested 18 persons during a series of overnight raids last week that targeted a sophisticated human-smuggling operation authorities said brought hundreds of South Korean women into the United States to work as prostitutes.

A criminal complaint filed in Los Angeles late Friday charged 23 persons with conspiracy. Five were listed as fugitives.

Those arrested, according to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokesman Dean Boyd, were charged with harboring illegal aliens for an immoral purpose, harboring and transporting illegal aliens and violating the Travel Act, a federal statute that prohibits moving people across state lines for illegal sexual purposes, such as prostitution.

In addition to the criminal arrests, Mr. Boyd said, immigration officials took into custody 46 women who were working at brothels that were shut down. Agents are interviewing the women to learn more about the circumstances surrounding how they came to the United States and how they were treated once they arrived, he said.

"This type of criminal organization exploits the hopes and dreams of immigrants," said U.S. Attorney Debra Wong Yang in Los Angeles. "In this case, they exploited women, some of whom apparently suffered injuries as a result of their work. My office works very hard to eliminate these types of exploitation and to secure punishment for those who engage in them, seeking to profit at the expense of others."

Mr. Boyd said the investigation focused on a criminal organization called the "Jung Organization," which reportedly smuggled South Korean women into the United States and then provided them to brothel operators. The brothels were concealed behind businesses that purported to be massage parlors and "out-call service" operations. He said the prostitutes were managed by an underground network of Korean "taxi" services operated by members and associates of the Jung Organization.

The taxi services coordinated the prostitutes' daily schedules and worked hand-in-hand with the brothel operators.

An affidavit in the case said ringleaders Young Joon Jung and Ho Kyung Kim oversaw efforts to recruit prospective prostitutes in South Korea and then arranged for them to be brought to the United States. Some of the women were smuggled into the country across the Mexican and Canadian borders, it said.

The affidavit said the women paid up to $16,000 each to be smuggled into the country. Once they arrived, it said the women were expected to work as prostitutes, with a portion of their earnings going to repay their smuggling debts. As part of the scheme, some of the women were transported to Northern California, Colorado and Texas to work as prostitutes, the affidavit said.

An army of federal agents executed search warrants at 28 locations across the greater Los Angeles area. The targeted sites included suspected brothels and so-called human smuggling "drop houses." The brothels were housed in a variety of businesses, including chiropractic offices, acupuncture clinics, spas and massage parlors.

During the raids, agents seized nearly $300,000 in cash and more than $650,000 in bank accounts.

California Court Faces Gay Unions (WT)

California's attorney general urged the state Supreme Court to decide whether homosexual "marriage" is permitted under the state constitution.

Attorney General Bill Lockyer asked the justices to review a trial judge's decision in March that said state laws limiting marriage to heterosexual couples is unconstitutional. The ruling had been stayed pending appeal.

The attorney general, however, wants California's top court to remove the pending case from a San Francisco appellate court.

"Same-sex couples should be given a prompt determination as to whether they can marry, and should not have to put their lives and affairs on hold indefinitely while this matter works its way through several levels of court proceedings," Mr. Lockyer said.

The move came two days after couples won a major legal victory before the state Supreme Court, which let stand a new law granting registered domestic partners many of the same rights and protections of heterosexual marriage.

But it's unclear whether the justices will decide the homosexual "marriage" question since they normally do not resolve cases until they have worked their way through the trial and appellate courts.

One of the last times they did involved same-sex "marriage."

In August, the seven justices ruled unanimously that San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom overstepped his authority by issuing same-sex "marriage" licenses last spring. On a 5-2 vote, the court also voided the 4,000 "marriages" of homosexual couples sanctioned by the city.

The court didn't resolve whether the California Constitution would permit a same-sex "marriage." In nullifying the "marriages," Justice Joyce Kennard wrote the court was not interested in deciding the hot-button issue of same-sex "marriage" until "the constitutionality of California laws restricting marriages to opposite-sex couples has been authoritatively resolved through judicial proceedings."

The court can make its decision any time.

Recall Star Takes A Remap Risk (DMN)

By Andrew Becker

The Dallas Morning News, July 3, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0001063

Amid recent polls showing Arnold Schwarzenegger's star power dropping from the top of California's political marquee, the governor's push to redraw congressional and legislative district lines mid-decade isn't looking like this summer's Republican blockbuster.

It's a very different scenario from the redistricting deal that House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land, orchestrated in Texas two years ago.

"You definitely haven't seen national Democrats or Republicans involved like in Texas with Tom DeLay," said Steven Hill of the New America Foundation, a nonpartisan Washington think tank. "It seems to me Schwarzenegger is pushing this, and even if he is successful, there's not a lot to gain."

Mr. DeLay's efforts boosted Texas Republicans' House delegation to a 21-11 advantage in the 2004 election, just two years after Democrats held a 17-15 edge.

What exactly Mr. Schwarzenegger seeks from redistricting reform isn't clear, pundits say. While it could help Republicans acquire congressional seats in the long term, the initiative hasn't brought wide party support.

No turnover in seats

At issue in California are fairness and competitiveness. California Republicans and Democrats agree redistricting reform is necessary. Lawmakers redraw lines every 10 years to reflect census-determined population changes.

The existing lines in California were laid out in 2001 after a deal was struck to protect Democratic and Republican incumbents in congressional and state legislative races. Of the 153 seats up for election in 2004, not one changed parties.

California's congressional delegation favors Democrats, 33-20. Similarly, Democrats dominate the Assembly, 48-32, and the state Senate, 25-15.

While Mr. DeLay worked with Texas state legislators to redraw congressional districts, Mr. Schwarzenegger doesn't have the political clout in Sacramento to effect the changes he seeks. Instead, he wants Californians to take away the state lawmakers' power to draw congressional and their own district lines so he can have a more pliable legislature.

In June, the Republican governor called for a special election. Along with seven other initiatives on the November ballot, the Schwarzenegger-backed plan calls for an independent commission of three retired judges to redraw district lines. California Democrats floated their own independent commission proposal this week, but it wouldn't require new boundaries until after the 2010 census. Mr. Schwarzenegger hopes to initiate the change immediately.

In Texas, state Sen. Jeff Wentworth, R-San Antonio, has introduced a similar measure in every session since 1993 to create an independent redistricting commission. In the Legislature's regular meeting this year, his measure cleared the Senate before stalling in the House.

Other goals

California's budget is Mr. Schwarzenegger's ultimate target; it has been running a multibillion-dollar deficit for each of the last three years. He also wants to make public employee unions get written permission from members to spend fees or dues on political contributions. Some believe Mr. Schwarzenegger may compromise on redistricting – especially because his approval numbers and the voter support for redistricting are low – if he can get legislators' support for his other initiatives.

Recent Field Polls have shown that less than half of voters approve of midterm redistricting or would vote for Mr. Schwarzenegger next year.

Michael McDonald, a professor of public and international affairs at George Mason University in Virginia, sees Mr. Schwarzenegger ultimately trying to rejuvenate moderate Republicans in the state, where legislators have become more polarized.

From the Republican perspective, "California ... is hopelessly Democratic for a long time to come," said Joel Aberbach, director of the Center for American Politics and Public Policy and a professor at the University of California, Los Angeles. "This is a game that's being played with threats and counterthreats. Some of these [initiatives] are tradable – don't take them at face value."

In Texas, Mr. DeLay helped redraw congressional boundaries, including his own, in 2003 without facing the kind of risks Mr. Schwarzenegger does. With the election on the California governor's plan costing taxpayers at least $60 million, it becomes a referendum on Mr. Schwarzenegger, who rode into office in a recall vote in 2003.

"It's a crazy gamble," said Tony Quinn, a former redistricting adviser to Republicans in the California Assembly, who noted that at least eight attempts to put redistricting before the voters have failed. "The public would not approve reform proposed just by one party. They're very suspicious of this."

State Ballot, Wider Impact (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

DOJ_NMG_0001064

Even before the ballot is set, California's special election is drawing money and attention from interest groups and political partisans across the country who see the campaign as a way to invigorate their efforts in 2006 and beyond.

Democrats believe they have a chance this fall to make Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "a starring villain" in their attack on national Republican leaders, said Jenny Backus, a Democratic strategist in Washington.

Conservative activists see an opportunity to defang a longtime nemesis — organized labor — by making it harder to collect union dues for political purposes.

The pharmaceutical industry and consumer groups are waging a battle over prescription drugs that both sides consider a test case for fights in Congress and elsewhere.

"California's always a state that the rest of the nation looks to," said Michelle Korsmo, executive vice president of Americans for Prosperity, a Washington group that favors limited government. By approving a budget cap sponsored by Schwarzenegger, voters would demonstrate that "controlling the growth of state spending is not a red- or blue-state issue," Korsmo said, spurring limitation efforts in other states.

Eight initiatives have qualified for the statewide ballot, which will bring voters to the polls for the fourth time in as many years. The measures deal with a variety of issues, including parental consent for abortions, teacher tenure and electricity re-regulation, as well as union dues, redistricting, prescription drugs and the state budget.

However, much about the election remains uncertain — including how vigorously the two major political parties will go at each other.

Schwarzenegger has embraced three of the measures as part of a package designed to circumvent the Democrat-run Legislature and diminish the clout of lawmakers in Sacramento. Those measures would lengthen the time teachers work before receiving tenure, give the governor greater control over state spending and give legislators' political line-drawing power to a panel of retired judges.

But with opinion polls showing both Schwarzenegger and the Legislature falling in public esteem — and the redistricting and budget measures opposed by most voters — talks have been underway on a possible deal to place alternative measures on the ballot with the blessing of both sides. Voters would then be urged to pass the bipartisan versions, the way they did last November when presented with a compromise initiative — supplanting an earlier draft — that made it harder for Sacramento to raid local government coffers.

A deal between lawmakers and the governor could quickly take the starch out of national Democrats' anti-Schwarzenegger efforts. It would also leave the two Democrats running for governor, Treasurer Phil Angelides and Controller Steve Westly, in a politically awkward position, caught between their ambitions and the party's legislators. That provides added incentive for the governor to deal, though he faces division between his more moderate advisors and administration conservatives who would prefer a fight.

Democrats outside Sacramento are not shying away from a scrap, seeing a chance to lump Schwarzenegger with Republicans in Washington and the GOP's pattern of "arrogance and abuse," in the words of Karen Finney, a national Democratic Party spokeswoman.

Taking down the high-profile celebrity governor would give Democrats nationwide a significant morale boost heading into the 2006 elections. "He's the hottest commodity in the country when it comes to riling up Republicans, and he's also one of the hottest commodities in the country when it comes to riling up Democrats," said Democratic strategist Backus.

With so much uncertainty surrounding the November vote — and the fight over a Supreme Court vacancy consuming Washington for the next few months — many outside interest groups are waiting to see the final ballot before committing money or personnel to California. Korsmo, for instance, said her organization — which claims 35,000 members in the state — would like to see an even tougher version of the spending limitation measure.

But even if a bipartisan deal is reached on the governor's proposals, that still leaves the two measures drawing the most interest from outside the state: the initiatives dealing with prescription drugs and union dues.

Already, the pharmaceutical industry has contributed more than $30 million to promote a ballot measure establishing a voluntary discount drug program, modeled on a deal negotiated with Schwarzenegger but rejected by the state Senate.

A rival measure, sponsored by Health Access California, a consumer group, would offer more extensive coverage and penalize drug companies that failed to offer discounts. It has been vigorously opposed by the pharmaceutical industry, which recently lost a court battle to keep the initiative off the ballot.

Anthony Wright, executive director of Health Access California, said lately he has had "at least one or two conversations a day with people in D.C. and other states" interested in the competing ballot measures.

"All of my colleagues in other states know a victory in California would have national implications in terms of the attempt to bring down the cost of prescription drugs," Wright said.

Similarly, both sides in the fight over union dues see a national stake in November's outcome.

The initiative, sponsored by conservative activist Lewis Uhler, would require the annual consent of any member of a California public employee union before a portion of his or her dues could be used for political campaigns.

The measure, dubbed "paycheck protection" by its proponents, has drawn widespread support from conservatives across the country, who believe the initiative could slash the money available to unions, which generally support Democratic candidates and causes.

"If it passes, it will be so significant and the effects will be so dramatic that you would see a dozen initiatives on the ballots [in other states] within two to four years," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, a Washington group, and one of the leading strategists on the political right.

For some, such as proponents of school vouchers, approving a dues checkoff would be a first step toward achieving larger goals that have long been thwarted by union opposition. Vouchers would allow the use of some public education funds in private schools.

"It's no secret that for years one of the stumbling blocks to the implementation of voucher plans has been the war chest of teacher unions," said Lance Izumi, education director at the Pacific Research Institute, a conservative California think tank. A dues checkoff "has always been an issue on the radar screen for proponents of vouchers," he said.

For their part, unions and their Democratic allies are treating the initiative as a matter of political life and death. As part of their negotiations with Schwarzenegger, Democrats hope to persuade the governor to stay neutral on the initiative, which they call "paycheck deception." That would deny proponents the benefit of Schwarzenegger's considerable fundraising clout.

In the meantime, California union officials are appealing to national leaders to put their money and muscle behind efforts to defeat the ballot measure — even as the national labor movement is engaged in an unrelated fight between the AFL-CIO and dissident unions.

"Unions in California are very together about this goal," said Art Pulaski, head of the California Labor Federation.

Already, the National Education Assn. has committed more than $2 million to the opposition fight, and the special election is expected to be a topic of wide discussion when the group meets for its national convention in Los Angeles this week. Barbara Kerr, president of the California Teachers Assn., said the group has received checks — "some for $5, $10, some for $100" — from individuals across the country "who know what happens in California tends to spread."

By contrast, proponents of the dues checkoff have downplayed the influence and financial support of outside interests, mindful of the campaign waged to defeat a similar, albeit broader, initiative in 1998. Unions and their Democratic allies attacked Norquist and others as part of a movement by out-of-state conservatives to silence unions and promote an anti-worker agenda in California.

Norquist, who put up $440,000 to qualify the previous initiative, has not matched that contribution this time, nor does he plan to. There is plenty of money and support within California to pass the dues checkoff without his help, he said.

Clarity Sought On Romney's Abortion Stance (BOS)

By Stephanie Ebbert

The Boston Globe, July 3, 2005

Advocates on both sides of the abortion debate say they are confused over Governor Mitt Romney's position on abortion and are seeking to understand the meaning of recent comments he has made, in light of the positions he outlined during the 2002 gubernatorial campaign.

Last week, the Planned Parenthood League of Massachusetts and NARAL Pro-Choice Massachusetts provided the Globe a copy of a letter sent earlier this month in which they asked Romney to explain his current abortion philosophy and to confirm that he supports emergency contraception and other measures he embraced while running for governor.

Similarly, a leading antiabortion group is puzzled: "We honestly don't know where he stands on this issue," said Marie Sturgis, executive director and legislative director for Massachusetts Citizens for Life.

When he ran for US Senate in liberal-leaning Massachusetts in 1994, Romney said abortion should be "safe and legal." As a candidate for governor in 2002, he said he would keep the state's abortion rights laws intact and has since said that he kept that promise. But this year, as he began preparing a potential run for president, Romney said he is "in a different place" than he was when he first ran for office in 1994 and has stressed that he is "personally prolife."

Romney was asked repeatedly by the Globe last week to elaborate on his abortion stance, and he refused. "I think I've said it a few hundred times through my campaign the same thing I'll say today, which is that I personally do not favor abortion. But as governor of Massachusetts, I will keep the laws as they exist," Romney said Wednesday.

That answer is unfulfilling to advocates on both sides of the polarizing issue at a time when the next president could shape the makeup of the US Supreme Court. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced Friday that she was stepping down, and more openings are expected in the coming years.

Four weeks ago, the Globe reported that Joseph M. Scheidler, the national director of the Pro-Life Action League, detected that Romney was "coming around" to a firmer opposition to abortion. Soon after Scheidler's comments were published, however, the Chicago-based advocate heard from Massachusetts abortion opponents who were far more skeptical about their governor.

"I started getting a lot of calls saying, 'This guy is no good, he's just playing politics, he's trying to get both sides,' " Scheidler said in a telephone interview.

Sturgis, of the Massachusetts Citizens for Life, said Romney does not have regular contacts with her group. "If we could, we would," Sturgis said. When he ran for governor in 2002, she said, her group considered him an abortion rights supporter; Romney declined to complete the Citizens for Life questionnaire.

"He appears to be evolving," Sturgis said. "Where that goes, or to what degree he winds up with us, I can't say. But certainly, more than one politician has changed his mind on this issue."

By contrast, the Massachusetts Catholic Conference, which also opposes abortion, does not believe the governor's recent statements signify a change in his position.

"No matter how you position the governor, it looks to me like he's the more moderate choice, given what the Democrats may offer," said Daniel Avila, associate director for policy and research for the Massachusetts Catholic Conference. And, Avila believes, Romney will make his position clear when the time comes. "My experience is that when a particular issue solidifies, it hasn't taken too long for him to come forward with a concrete response," he said.

During the 2002 campaign for governor, most major abortion rights groups endorsed his Democratic opponent, Shannon O'Brien, because they said she would be a champion of their cause, even though Romney offered support for abortion rights. He picked up the backing of the Republican Pro-Choice Coalition.

"I respect and will protect a woman's right to choose. This choice is a deeply personal one," Romney wrote in answer to a NARAL questionnaire during the campaign. "Women should be free to choose based on their own beliefs, not mine and not the government's. The truth is, no candidate in the governor's race in either party would deny women abortion rights. So let's end this argument that does not exist and stop the cynical, divisive attacks made only for political gain."

Now, abortion rights activists contend he is backing away, citing his changing language on abortion rights and his positions on what they see as a related set of issues on family planning. This spring, Romney tried to direct federal abstinence-only federal funding toward classroom instruction, which abortion rights groups oppose. He trimmed $1 million for teen pregnancy prevention in budget vetoes Thursday, although he let some money remain.

Looking ahead, he has refused to commit to a pending bill providing emergency contraception, though he supported such pregnancy prevention during his campaign. He also tried unsuccessfully to insert language into the stem cell research bill stating that life begins at the moment of conception. Abortion opponents were heartened by that effort, but remain unsure.

Romney's declaration of support for abortion rights dates to his first campaign for political office, challenging US Senator Edward M. Kennedy in 1994. During a televised debate, Romney said he and his family were influenced by an experience that led both him and his mother, who ran for the US Senate in Michigan in 1970, to embrace abortion rights.

"Many years ago, I had a dear, close family relative that was very close to me who passed away from an illegal abortion," Romney said in a debate with Kennedy. "It is since that time my mother and my family have been committed to the belief that we can believe as we want, but we will not force our beliefs on others on that matter. And you will not see me wavering on that."

Last week, Romney's sister, Jane, recalled that the girl Romney cited in the debate was a teenager engaged to marry a relative of the Romneys' extended family. In a separate interview, Ronna Romney Kulp, the former wife of Romney's brother, Scott, remembered that the family was shaken by the girl's death.

"I do know it deeply impacted members of the family," Kulp said.

Jane Romney recalled that although the girl was not a close relative, her death shifted her family's perspective on a difficult political issue.

"With my mom, that was a personal thing because we had a tragedy close to us -- not in our immediate family, but a young girl who actually was engaged and had an illegal abortion and died," Jane Romney said in a telephone interview. "She was a beautiful, talented young gal we all loved. And it pretty much ruined the parents -- their only daughter. You would do anything not to repeat that."

Romney has declined to discuss the episode involving the girl, and his aides were extremely sensitive to further examination of his record last week. Over his career, Romney has at times resisted characterization on abortion and he once objected to the Utah news media's characterization of him as a "prochoice" politician.

"I do not wish to be labeled prochoice," Romney wrote in a July 2001 Salt Lake Tribune letter to the editor. "I have never felt comfortable with the labels associated with the abortion issue."

If Romney would make his opposition clear, the 6,000-member Pro-Life Action League would be pleased to have him, Scheidler said.

"This would be the time," Scheidler said. "I can't fault him for that, if [the timing] looks a little suspicious. He's read the writing on the wall. The values voters are strong. And they're growing."

Frist Again At The Center Of Stem Cell Fight (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

On July 18, 2001, Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) stood on the Senate floor urging his colleagues to buck conservative orthodoxy and support federally funded research on embryonic stem cells. As the Senate's only physician, Frist made headlines -- and gave momentum to the controversial science -- with his endorsement.

The following month, however, President Bush announced a policy that was far more restrictive, limiting federal research to already existing embryonic stem cells, and Frist acquiesced.

A few weeks after Bush announced his policy, Frist said the differences between the two were minor because scientists at the National Institutes of Health had "informed the president that more than 60 cell lines exist and that this number is sufficient to provide ample opportunity to research the potential of embryonic stem cells."

Today, Frist is again at the center of the stem cell battle. Unlike four years ago, when he sought an influential role, the Senate majority leader has shied away from the issue, frustrating once-admiring researchers and patient advocates who now accuse him of exchanging sound medical thinking for with political calculations.

"We, as scientists, had great expectations for what he could do," said Mary Hendrix, president and scientific director of the Children's Memorial Research Center at Northwestern University. When she heard Frist's 2001 speech, Hendrix got "goose bumps" because the well-respected transplant surgeon had "put his credibility on the line."

Hendrix is puzzled and disappointed by what "appears to be a change in Senator Frist's position," she said in an interview. "I thought he was a staunch supporter."

As Congress begins its Fourth of July recess, activists on both sides of the stem cell divide are gearing up for what appears to be a fresh fight in the Senate, perhaps as early as the week lawmakers return.

On one side are scientists and patient groups who say the cells taken from days-old embryos hold enormous potential for treating a range of illnesses because they can grow into any type of cell or tissue in the body. Opponents object to the research because the process involves destroying the embryo.

When Bush announced his compromise in 2001, the White House said scientists would have more than 60 embryonic stem cell colonies, called "lines," to work on. But fewer than two dozen have materialized, reinvigorating the push to expand the policy.

In May, with 50 Republican votes, the House passed legislation that would permit federal research on tens of thousands of frozen embryos donated by couples at fertility clinics. Bush has threatened to veto the bill, placing additional pressure on Frist to stand by a policy that falls far short of the approach he envisioned four years ago.

"If he wants the Republican nomination, he may be worried that coming out for embryonic stem cell research funding would make conservatives angry, especially if it involves disagreeing with President Bush," said Harvard political scientist Michael J. Sandel. If stem cell legislation becomes Bush's first veto, "it would be a symbolic issue in the Republican primaries."

But if Frist is maneuvering to attract Republican primary voters in pursuit of the 2008 presidential nomination, he is doing so at the risk of angering loyal Tennessee supporters such as Anne Shockley.

"I thought he was for stem cell research, but ever since Bush got involved, [Frist has] gone all wishy-washy," said Shockley, a volunteer for the Tennessee Parkinson's Action Network. "It makes no sense. He's a physician; he knows what stem cell research can be. It seems to me it's become a political football, and it's frustrating."

Shockley, who described herself as a "pro-life" Republican, said she has stopped donating to Frist's campaigns, even as he considers a run for the presidency in 2008.

"He became [Senate Majority] Leader," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), one of the leading advocates of a broad research policy. "He has a little different responsibility now with respect to the party approach."

Over a period of three days, Frist aides did not respond to multiple interview requests. Spokesman Nick Smith left a voice message indicating only that the majority leader is trying to schedule a Senate vote this month.

Frist's 10-point stem cell proposal in the summer of 2001 was the result of extensive research, soul-searching and "20 years in the field of medicine and in science," he said. Describing himself as the "Senate's only physician and only medical researcher," he said he knew the promise and pitfalls of cutting-edge science.

His 11-page speech on the "promising and important line of inquiry" addressed in detail a host of scientific and ethical questions, displaying an impressive command of the complex science and a doctor's ease with life-and-death issues.

Drawing comparisons to his experience as a transplant surgeon, Frist stressed that the stem cells are taken only from "spare" embryos "that would otherwise be discarded."

"It is critically important that we understand, and in our moral and ethical framework ensure, that this tissue otherwise would not be used," he said. "It is similar to the fact that when I do a heart transplant, that heart otherwise would not be used for anything useful."

On the question of whether the days-old blastocyst is a life, Frist said: "There is a continuum from a sperm and an egg, to a blastocyst, to a fetus, to a child, to an adolescent, to an adult."

He acknowledged that other types of stem cells appear to offer some therapeutic benefits but said they were insufficient.

"It appears clear that research using adult stem cells does not hold the same potential for medical advances as does the use of the more versatile embryonic stem cells," he said.

Hendrix, who at the time was immediate past president of the Federation of American Societies for Experimental Biology, said she will never forget the excitement Frist's stance sparked in the research community. "The credibility he brought was something that was just profound," she said.

Conservative and religious activists were displeased, recalled Wendy Wright, senior policy director of Concerned Women for America.

"That was something we didn't care for," she said. "It wouldn't have comported with what the president came up with."

Frist added several caveats, including an outright ban on therapeutic cloning, a process for growing embryonic cells; a thorough consent process for embryo donors; and strict ethical oversight. He advocated limiting the number of cell lines to be used as a way to guard against abuses. But he also explicitly rejected what would become the central plank in the Bush policy.

"This does not mean limiting it to research using stem cells that have already been derived to date," he said, foreshadowing the difficulties scientists are now encountering with the older, federally approved stem cell lines. In a Senate hearing that day, Frist noted that some experts suggested 100 or 200 embryonic stem cell colonies might be enough for federal researchers to "jump-start" the burgeoning field.

When Frist generally accepted Bush's position, Wright praised the senator's change of heart, saying he had an "opportunity to be reeducated."

Last summer, with Bush campaigning for a second term, Frist said in an appearance at the National Press Club that it would be appropriate to reassess the president's stem cell policy after Election Day.

Peggy Willocks, Tennessee state coordinator of the Parkinson's Action Network, has tried unsuccessfully to discuss the issue with Frist. Now, she is resigned to sending him a message through staff, she said. "I want to tell him this is the time he is going to have to take himself up by his own bootstraps and make a decision that's not following Bush," she said.

Two weeks ago, however, Frist said he did not see a need to expand the Bush restrictions, as the House-passed bill does. As he put it: "I agree with the president's policy."

NAACP Considers A New Approach (MJS)

By Leonard Sykes Jr. And Felicia Thomas-Lynn

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, July 3, 2005

With Bruce S. Gordon's stellar background in corporate America, his installation as executive director of the NAACP at its 96th annual convention in Milwaukee could herald a new beginning for the venerable civil rights organization's relationship with the Bush administration.Or could it prove to be a risky, high-stakes gamble?

Delegates will have the final vote on Gordon's appointment as executive director of the nation's oldest civil rights organization when it holds its convention July 9-14 at the Midwest Airlines Convention Center. The vote on his nomination is expected July 14.

Gordon already has indicated he wants to improve the NAACP's relationship with the Bush administration, a radical departure for a group known for its criticism of the president. But in doing so, the 59-year-old retired Verizon Communications executive may run the risk of pitting himself against some members who supported the NAACP's confrontational style with President Bush.

Delegates will get a chance to witness Gordon's style for the first time, as well as hear an array of speakers from across the political and religious spectrum, including some who have been critical of Bush on issues ranging from Social Security reform to the war in Iraq.

U.S. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), the Rev. Jesse Jackson and former NAACP chief Benjamin Hooks are among the scheduled speakers.

Bush was invited to the group's national convention in Milwaukee, but the White House sent a letter to the NAACP indicating that he would not attend. But even with the rejection, it already is clear from Gordon's initial remarks that he wants to forge a new relationship between the NAACP and the Bush administration.

Repositioning image

That gesture alone is a strong indication that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is seeking to position its image in line with the National Urban League, which opened lines of communications with the White House a year ago.

Last year, Bush was one of the headline speakers at the Urban League's national convention in Detroit. He has received invitations to five consecutive NAACP national conventions, and rejected them all, mainly due to the organization's caustic language with his administration and its policies.

Former NAACP President Kweisi Mfume, a former U.S. representative who is now a candidate for the senate in Maryland, labeled Bush's black supporters "ventriloquist's dummies." NAACP board chairman Julian Bond has stridently attacked Bush's on his education, economic and Iraq policies. Last year, the Internal Revenue Service launched an investigation into the group's financial records.

In an interview Thursday, Gordon said although it is not necessary to agree on everything, a constructive relationship with the White House is in the interest of both sides.

Gordon said he has already taken steps to open the dialogue. "The process is in its very early stages, and I'm proceeding with a high level of optimism," he said.

But while Gordon is seeking common ground that "serves the mutual interests" of the administration and the NAACP, there are many within and outside of the organization who aren't so sure it is appropriate to extend an olive branch.

Searching for new role

NAACP observers think Gordon's gesture toward improved relations with Bush is a sign the organization is searching for its soul, and a new role in America.

"The NAACP has been adrift," said Walter C. Farrell Jr., a professor of social welfare and associate director of urban investment strategies in the Kenan-Flagler Institute at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill and a former professor at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

"It's all over the place . . . It doesn't have any coherent focus. They're trying to get back in the game, and they're hurting for money. But what's going to happen with the NAACP and its new leadership is a class war.

"Branches all over the country are basically run by the masses. The black middle class no longer provides its leadership. I think (Gordon) is going to try to track them to the mainstream, and there is a possibility there could be a fight, branch by branch."

Local branches

Jerry Ann Hamilton, president of the Milwaukee branch of the NAACP, said she believes the local branches will respect the choice of the organization's leadership.

"I would hope that Gordon would continue to reach out to the Bush administration as we always have," Hamilton said. "I hope the new president will be effective in getting (Bush) to do this."

DeWayne Wickham, a columnist with USA Today, said it's the NAACP establishment, particularly its chairman, that wants to see a better working relationship with the White House.

Wickham, author of "Bill Clinton and Black America," who is also working on a NAACP book, currently titled: "A House Divided: Politics, Sex and the Struggle for Power Inside the NAACP," said, "Mfume's departure signaled a swinging of the power pendulum in the direction of the chairman. Bond is the important power in this organization at this time."

Whether it is subtle or an outright difference in strategy between the NAACP branches and its new leader, one thing is already clear about Gordon, say those who know him: He is one of only a few not to come from a religious, political or civil rights background. And his record in the corporate world is impeccable.

Consensus builder

Gordon has been described as a consensus builder. And over a 35-year relationship with the telecommunication industry that steered Bell of Pennsylvania through a dizzying string of mergers that led to Verizon Communications, Gordon earned a reputation of becoming comfortable working within the system. Upon his retirement in 2003, Gordon was chief of Verizon's biggest division - retail markets.

One of the major themes of the NAACP will be a new economic thrust, Hamilton said.

The NAACP will take a position against Social Security reforms and a new aggressive push for economic justice. The theme of the convention will be "The Conscience of a Nation."

DOJ_NMG_0001070

"That's the role that the NAACP has always played," she said. "And now we're making it known more than ever as we're going into more direct action all over the country. We're making it known that we have a presence and that our history speaks for itself.

"The major things that have been done for black people in this country have been done by the NAACP."

But how will the closer ties with Bush wash with the overall membership of the NAACP?"

Attorney Vel Phillips, a member of the NAACP for 62 years, isn't so sure it will be a clean sell. There may be a "smidgen" of truth to the fact that the organization should have dialogue with the White House, she said. At the same time, she isn't sold on the fact that the organization should abandon its role as the president's chief critic among African-Americans.

"I don't think it's that necessary to have a dialogue with a president who comes from a state that has the highest number (of death row inmates)," said Phillips, who in 1956 was the first African-American and woman elected to the Milwaukee Common Council.

"I don't know if it's important to have a relationship with him if the president has indicated that he really doesn't care, doesn't come to (our) conventions and doesn't want a relationship. We should keep doing what we're doing and have done for almost 100 years."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Court's Eminent Domain Decision Hailed As Victory For Cities (SLPD)

By Jim Merkel

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 3, 2005

South Side Journal

A Supreme Court decision handed down last week could influence a number of local cases involving eminent domain.

In a 5-4 vote, the high court upheld the right of a private company in New London, Conn. to take private land for private uses.

In Kelo vs. New London, Conn., the Supreme Court ruled that the city could not take land simply to confer a private benefit on a particular private property. However, the decision said the taking would be executed based on a carefully considered development plan, which would have a public benefit.

The decision pleased Mayor Francis Slay.

"It's very difficult rebuilding an older city with the environmental issues and with the issues of assembling sites for redevelopment to help improve the quality of life for people in our neighborhoods," Slay said.

"The eminent domain has been a good tool for us to acquire property so that we can take older areas and redevelop them into something more positive for the entire city and for the entire region."

But Slay said it's important that officials use good judgment and compassion and only use the tool sparingly when other means of redevelopment aren't working.

One local development that would have been affected by a different decision is the planned Loughborough Commons shopping center at Interstate 55 and Loughbough Avenue. There, 19 homeowners agreed to sell to the developer but a 20th, June Thompson and her son Howard, refused,

Circuit Court Judge Timothy Wilson is now considering whether the Thompsons' home can be taken by eminent domain.

"The decision in the Kelo case takes away an argument that we had as to whether or not this was limited by the U.S. Constitution, said Michael Wolff, the Thompsons' attorney.

But Wolff also argued under a provision in the Missouri Constitution, which he said is more restrictive in allowing the taking of property for private use.

The Missouri Constitution allows the taking of property for blight, "the kind of blight that everybody thinks of," Wolff said. "Our argument is that the Thompsons' neighborhood is not blighted as originally understood back in 1945 (when the rule was originally established)," Wolff said.

"I think the decision from the U.S. Supreme Court is a terrible decision," Wolff said. "What the court is doing is writing out of the Fifth Amendment the term 'public use.'"

The Fifth Amendment says private property can't be taken for public use without just compensation.

Especially at the local level, the local governments will be more influenced by wealthy members of the electorate, Wolff said.

A different view is held by Alderman Matt Villa, D-11th Ward, who pushed through legislation in the Board of Aldermen calling for Loughborough Commons and allowing eminent domain.

"If eminent domain did not exist, this development would not be going forward," Villa said. "If you did not have the eminent domain tool, one property owner could effectively kill development that is good for the entire region."

Eminent domain should be a tool that's only used in rare circumstances, Villa said. If more than 10 percent of property owners in a redevelopment area are made to sell through eminent domain, that tool shouldn't be used, he said.

If urban areas can't assemble land for development through eminent domain, developers will go to the edge of metropolitan areas, where a single farmer will sell them land, Villa said. This would increase urban sprawl, he said.

"Very little development would get done in the urban areas that are already built out," Villa said.

"Nothing would get developed," Villa said. "That doesn't serve the overall benefit of the city of St. Louis when you have one property owner that can basically say you're not going to do this development."

One landlord who has seen eminent domain used heavily against him is Jim Roos, who runs the landlord management company, Neighborhood Enterprises. Twenty-three apartment buildings managed by the company with 57 units of housing were taken for the Botanical Heights housing development in the McRee Town neighborhood.

Roos said he thinks he knows how the justices came to their decision.

"They've never substantially experienced how eminent domain can be abused. When you start approving eminent domain for private projects, that becomes a mindset for people in government," Roos said.

"People who are a little less popular, a little less affluent then become the ones who are abused by this," Roos said.

Homes of the affluent won't be taken, Roos said. "It's abusing the rights and the benefits of the poor people."

Some Political Give-and-Take On Matters Ecological (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

Debate in the run-up to Maryland's race for governor was dominated last week by talk about the environment.

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley , a Democratic hopeful, sought to spotlight his record in a sprawling address that included heavy criticism of Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. 's environmental stewardship.

With Baltimore's Inner Harbor as a backdrop, O'Malley accused Ehrlich of lacking commitment to preserving parkland, improving water quality and protecting children from lead paint, among other shortcomings. "While the people of Baltimore are moving forward, our state seems to be taking another course," O'Malley said.

Aides said that the speech was intended to signal O'Malley's commitment to the issue and that specific proposals would come later in a campaign that hasn't officially started. O'Malley announced plans for a summit on environmental matters and pointed Marylanders to his campaign Web site to share their thoughts on the subject in the meantime.

Ehrlich's office declined to respond, directing reporters to the state Republican Party, which sought to shift attention to Baltimore's big-city problems.

"Aren't the streets of Baltimore considered part of O'Malley's environment?" Maryland GOP Chairman John M. Kane said in a statement. "The people of the city would be better served if O'Malley would concentrate on the issues plaguing the city and get his head out of the clouds. . . . You are still six times more likely to be shot in Baltimore than New York City."

Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan , another Democrat interested in being governor, moved aggressively to insert himself into the debate by questioning O'Malley's record.

In his speech, for example, O'Malley touted his city's investment of more than $900 million to upgrade its sewage system. Duncan's camp pointed out that the federal government pushed Baltimore in that direction and highlighted the increased fees residents have had to pay as a result.

"Lofty rhetoric and carefully staged photo opportunities can't hide the fact that when it comes to the environment, Martin O'Malley has been a follower, not a leader," Duncan campaign manager Scott Arceneaux said. "On the environment, the mayor's record is as clear as a polluted city stream."

The Men Who Came to Dinner

A dinner hosted by the Maryland Municipal League in Ocean City last week offered a stark contrast between Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan: O'Malley attended in a business suit; Duncan wore a bright yellow golf shirt.

The two Democratic gubernatorial prospects and the Republican incumbent, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., put in schmoozing time with local officials at the annual four-day conference.

Tuesday night's dinner, at which attire ranged from Sunday best to shorts and untucked shirts, seemed at times like a three-ring circus.

O'Malley hosted a pre-dinner reception that included appearances by several of Ehrlich's Cabinet secretaries. Other guests waited in line for a chance to greet the mayor, who wore a conference attendee badge proclaiming "Martin" in bold, black letters.

Duncan, who hosted a separate reception earlier in the week at Ocean City's fabled night spot, Seacrets, appeared most aggressive in working the dining room crowd once the doors opened.

Ehrlich hosted a dessert reception immediately after the dinner at which guests lined up for pictures with him and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R). O'Malley headed back to Baltimore before it started, but Duncan hung out, shook hands and appeared to enjoy several chocolate-covered strawberries.Busch Aide Departs

Tom Lewis , chief of staff to House Speaker Michael E. Busch , will leave late this month to become director of state affairs for the Johns Hopkins Institutions.

Lewis, who started working for the legislature in 1983, has been with Busch (D-Anne Arundel) for the past three years. He served former speaker Casper R. Taylor (D-Allegany) for eight years.

Busch said Lewis's duties would be assumed by two staff members, Kristin F. Jones and John Favazza .

A Livable Shade Of Green (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

PORTLAND, Ore.

When President Bush travels to the Group of 8 summit meeting this week, he'll stiff Tony Blair and other leaders who are appealing for firm action on global warming.

"Kyoto would have wrecked our economy," Mr. Bush told a Danish interviewer recently, referring to the accord to curb carbon emissions. Maybe that was a plausible argument a few years ago, but now the city of Portland is proving it flat wrong.

Newly released data show that Portland, America's environmental laboratory, has achieved stunning reductions in carbon emissions. It has reduced emissions below the levels of 1990, the benchmark for the Kyoto accord, while booming economically.

What's more, officials in Portland insist that the campaign to cut carbon emissions has entailed no significant economic price, and on the contrary has brought the city huge benefits: less tax money spent on energy, more convenient transportation, a greener city, and expertise in energy efficiency that is helping local businesses win contracts worldwide.

"People have looked at it the wrong way, as a drain," said Mayor Tom Potter, who himself drives a Prius hybrid. "Actually it's something that attracts people. ... It's economical; it makes sense in dollars."

I've been torn about what to do about global warming. But the evidence is growing that climate change is a real threat: I was bowled over when I visited the Arctic and talked to Eskimos who described sea ice disappearing, permafrost melting and visits by robins, for which they have no word in the local language.

In the past, economic models tended to discourage aggressive action on greenhouse gases, because they indicated that the cost of curbing carbon emissions could be extraordinarily high, amounting to perhaps 3 percent of G.N.P.

That's where Portland's experience is so crucial. It confirms the suggestions of some economists that we can take initial steps against global warming without economic disruptions. Then in a decade or two, we can decide whether to proceed with other, costlier steps.

In 1993, Portland became the first local government in the United States to adopt a strategy to deal with climate change. The latest data, released a few weeks ago, show the results: Greenhouse gas emissions last year in Multnomah County, which includes Portland, dropped below the level of 1990, and per capita emissions were down 13 percent.

This was achieved partly by a major increase in public transit, including two light rail lines and a streetcar system. The city has also built 750 miles of bicycle paths, and the number of people commuting by foot or on bicycle has increased 10 percent.

Portland offers all city employees either a $25-per-month bus pass or car pool parking. Private businesses are told that if they provide employees with subsidized parking, they should also subsidize bus commutes.

The city has also offered financial incentives and technical assistance to anyone constructing a "green building" with built-in energy efficiency.

Then there are innumerable little steps, such as encouraging people to weatherize their homes. Portland also replaced the bulbs in the city's traffic lights with light-emitting diodes, which reduce electricity use by 80 percent and save the city almost $500,000 a year.

"Portland's efforts refute the thesis that you can't make progress without huge economic harm," says Erik Sten, a city commissioner. "It actually goes all the other way - to the extent Portland has been successful, the things that we were doing that happened to reduce emissions were the things that made our city livable and hence desirable."

Mr. Sten added that Portland's officials were able to curb carbon emissions only because the steps they took were intrinsically popular and cheap, serving other purposes like reducing traffic congestion or saving on electrical costs. "I haven't seen that much willingness even among our environmentalists," he said, "to do huge masochistic things to save the planet."

So as he heads to the summit meeting, Mr. Bush should get a briefing on Portland's experience (a full report is at www.sustainableportland.org) and accept that we don't need to surrender to global warming.

Perhaps eventually we will face hard trade-offs. But for now Portland shows that we can help our planet without "wrecking" our economy - indeed, at no significant cost at all. At the Group of 8, that should be a no-brainer.

Gang Plunges Tribe Into Turmoil (MJS)

By GRAEME ZIELINSKI

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, July 3, 2005

Hayward - It is an unlikely venue for a gangland killing.

There are no damp alleys topped with garbage, there is no scream of siren or chugging hum of city life.

Here, the wind sighs through the red pines and wisps of spiderwebs hang pendent from the branches, amid patches of sandy soil. Not far away, herons glide across a necklace of pristine glacial lakes.

This pine plantation is where 23-year-old Cody Badbear Wade was shot five times, once in the head. Police searched a nearby cranberry marsh for the murder weapon.

A police report said Wade had proclaimed himself a "King killer," but it turned out differently the night of May 30, 2002.

After trading harsh words with Wade at the Snowshoe Bar, Robert G. "Bobby" Smith, an avowed member of the Almighty Latin King Nation, the violent Hispanic street gang with a significant presence in Milwaukee, would ambush and kill Wade after he approached a clearing in his truck.

Smith, the son of a former Sawyer County sheriff's deputy, told investigators that one of the admitted leaders of the Latin Kings on the Lac Courte Oreilles Indian reservation, Charles Gokey, ordered members to "light up" on Wade. Smith later was sentenced to 13 years in prison for Wade's murder.

Earlier this year, Gokey, in turn, was sentenced in a federal court in Madison to almost 20 years for crack cocaine distribution. U.S. District Judge John C. Shabaz said the harsh punishment was meant "to assist the government's mission to substantially reduce the impact of drug and drug-related crime on the Lac Courte Oreilles reservation."

The two were part of more than 50 prosecutions and a continuing multi-headed investigation that were set in motion by the events in the pine plantation in an attempt to rid the reservation of the Latin Kings.

The Lac Courte Oreilles (pronounced "la COO de ray") Band of Lake Superior Chippewa Indians of Wisconsin lives on a 78,000-acre reservation crisscrossed with more than 260 miles of roads. About 3,000 residents live there out of a total tribal enrollment of 6,000, arrayed in 20 distinct communities, some of which amount to four or five prefabricated homes.

These developments have names like Dry Town, New Post and Bacon Strip and bear the mark of economic depression, made especially vivid against the breathtaking natural beauty of the surrounding landscape, featuring the Chippewa River Flowage. Tribal figures estimate unemployment at more than 70%, despite a casino that has provided one stream of economic relief.

At the tribal headquarters, there are signs of progress. Construction crews are finishing a new administrative office. Just up Old School Road is a brand-new Head Start office, and in front of the tree farm where Wade was killed is another new building, housing a branch of the Boys & Girls Club where on a recent day, dozens of young tribal kids played basketball.

Whereas gang slayings in Milwaukee often barely makes the news, on the Lac Courte Oreilles (LCO) Indian reservation, it has been treated as epochal. And the presence of the Latin Kings, hundreds of miles from their traditional base, has been treated as more than a cross-cultural anomaly, but as a full-on peril to peace.

The prosecutions over the past three years on and near the reservation, including a sweeping round of federal charges that brought long prison terms for dozens of people and the evictions of several tribal members from reservation property, have left children without parents and a tribe with a wounded sense of pride - and a sense of relief.

Court documents and interviews reveal how a relationship developed over the years between Milwaukee and Sawyer County as tribal members spending time in the city imported criminality back to the reservation. Interviews there indicate that the Latin Kings may have been in Sawyer County as early as the 1980s.

"The influences come from cities like Milwaukee. We have a lot of tribal members all over. When they come back from the city, they bring a lot of the negative things with them," said Brian Bisonette, a member of the council that governs the tribe.

Gang members would drive to Milwaukee or the Twin Cities to acquire drugs, and sometimes guns, to be resold at big profits on the reservation, court records show.

The LCO version of the gang was called the "Lion Tribe Set" and was proved, in close to 30 federal guilty pleas, to have kicked profits from crack and powder cocaine sales back to Milwaukee, with the gang going so far as to rent a home on the reservation to process the narcotics, according to court records.

People around the reservation prominently wore the "black and gold," gang colors. Graffiti featuring the crown associated with the Latin Kings began appearing on tribal-owned properties, on traffic signs and literally in the streets.

In some cases, the relationships grew as thick as blood, as Milwaukee gang members started families with LCO members and Latin Kings used the reservation as sort of a hideout, much as Al Capone did at a nearby retreat in the 1920s.

Names such as Acosta and Barragon and Zamora from Milwaukee began being linked with old names locally, such as Martinson, Lasieur and Rademacher.

"We live in a fish bowl," said Bisonette, the tribal council member. "Everyone knows everybody. So when something like this happens . . . "

Consider that Smith's girlfriend was Wade's first cousin. Or that William Morrow, the chief of the tribal police force, which was created in part as a response to the killing, was related to both Smith and Wade. Or that with the Wade killing and the vicious murder later in 2002 of an elderly Hayward couple, allegedly by another Latin King, Sawyer County (current population about 17,000) had the highest per capita murder rate in the state.

When Smith finally admitted in court in February 2005 to pulling the trigger, he said he spoke up partly at the insistence of an uncle familiar with tribal traditions. Smith said that it was the "Indian way" to accept responsibility so healing could begin.

A few weeks ago Smith again echoed that theme in a jail letter to a federal magistrate in Madison, seeking, as his lawyer put it in an accompanying letter, the "various accoutrements" needed to practice his native religion. Medicine bundles. Drums. An eagle feather.

One ritual "involves the ceremonial placing of a plate of food in the outdoors for the spirit of the victim," the lawyer wrote.

But the Wade killing was in many ways only the beginning of the troubles that came to the reservation with the Latin Kings.

In the tense days afterward, and following other gang-related violence on the reservation that included drive-by shootings, brutal beatings and a home arson, the tribal council in September 2002 declared a "state of emergency" and asked for outside help.

It came in the form of a task force made up of Sawyer County, federal and state agencies. It peaked last July, when a small army descended in the early morning hours to serve warrants in one of the largest law-enforcement actions in North Woods history.

"There's never been anything like that here," said Dan Ross, a Sawyer County Sheriff's Department investigator involved in the case. The closest may have been in the early 1900s, when posses were sent to subdue John F. Deitz, who became a national folk hero for defying logger barons at the Cameron Dam.

Beyond a small group, the Latin Kings are not seen in such a heroic light in LCO country.

One mother to a victim of Latin Kings violence, who feared reprisal if her name was used, put it this way: "We just want them gone."

The federal probe continues, with more arrests on the way, according to investigators. In the meantime, several residents on LCO land say that while the investigation may have shown a heavy hand, it caused a serious downtick in the presence of drugs, illegal guns and gang graffiti.

Tension lingers, but eases

"You can just feel it. The tension has gone down quite a bit," said Paul DeMain, managing editor and CEO publisher of News from Indian Country, a national publication he runs from a building on the reservation that includes an Internet café and a gift shop.

His son was a member of the Latin Kings and later dropped out, DeMain said.

Certain members of the tribe are reluctant to talk about the problems with drugs and gangs out of a sense of embarrassment, while others are reluctant to talk, or identify themselves, because they still fear the gang.

"He's getting out soon, so we're still afraid of what he may do," said a victim of Latin Kings violence, a middle-aged woman standing in her front lawn in the Dry Town community.

In any case, the LCO tribe has seen relative peace in the days since the first indictments came down, but in some quarters the silence is seen as ominous.

"You still have the ingredients here," said Bill Cadotte, a tribal program specialist. "There is a lack of jobs, there is a lack of programming here for young people. It's a total problem here."

Morrow, the police chief, pointed to a disturbing sign when driving on a recent day near the site of the Wade killing.

"See those colors?" he said, pointing to teens wearing powder blue basketball jerseys. "Those are supposed to be 'The Players,' " another gang rumored to growing to fill the void created with the recent convictions. "There still are gangs here, but what they will do, we don't know."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Agents Probing Hormone Shipment (DENP)

By Alicia Caldwell and Bill Briggs, Denver Post Staff Writers

Denver Post, July 3, 2005

Agents with the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the Postal Inspection Service are investigating a shipment of human growth hormone worth up to $400,000 to the home of a Denver substance-abuse counselor, records show.

Authorities in March seized 400 vials of Chinese hGH and are investigating clinic owner Tamea Rae Sisco and two people involved in a Hawaiian osteopathic center on suspicion that they illegally imported the drugs for use in anti-aging treatments, according to a federal search- warrant affidavit and federal sources.

Sisco denies any wrongdoing and said she was an intermediary for a legitimate shipment. No charges have been brought as a result of the raid.

While the national debate on performance-enhancing drugs swirls around sports superstars, federal agents are waging a local battle away from the limelight. They're intercepting hGH doses meant for everyday people who are hoping to look younger and leaner. It's all part of a surging anti-aging phenomenon in which hGH is king.

Law enforcement officials step in when hGH is illegally pitched as a youth elixir. HGH can be legally prescribed only under narrow circumstances, including the treatment of AIDS wasting disease. HGH also is obtained illegally by some athletes seeking to build muscle and cut fat.

"I can't comment on ongoing investigations, but I can state that there is a problem in general," said Jeff Dorschner, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Colorado. "The illegal trafficking of human growth hormones remains a concern of the Justice Department."

The investigation is in its infancy, said federal law enforcement sources who still are threading together the intended use and eventual buyers for the 400 vials.

But federal agents suspect Sisco's house was "being used as a location to receive, store and distribute unapproved new drugs, misbranded drugs, and/or human growth hormone illegally introduced into the United States," according to a search-warrant affidavit filed by U.S. Food and Drug Administration special agent Russell Hermann.

Ties to steroid dealer

Agents also are exploring possible ties between the March shipment and Albert Celio, a now-disbarred doctor who supplied steroids and hGH to a local fitness club, according to federal court records.

The operation, which spanned 1999 and 2000, was described in federal records at the time as being the largest steroid-dealing ring in Denver. Investigative documents in that case list sales to a variety of customers, including Denver police officers.

Celio was sentenced Friday to 27 months in federal prison for prescription fraud - one of four cohorts convicted on various charges.

Celio declined to be interviewed for this story.

Now, federal investigators are probing the association between Celio and Sisco. A search-warrant affidavit said Celio co-owned a home with Sisco in 2001. And during the March 18 raid on Sisco's house, agents found a piece of mail addressed to him.

Sisco acknowledges once employing Celio at her clinic, Excel Treatment Program. In 2002, a federal prosecutor called his work at Excel "highly inappropriate" given the drug charges he faced. Sisco said she fired him after learning about the charges.

"We don't even want to be associated with him," Sisco said in an interview. "We treat people to not be affiliated with substance rather than be affiliated with it."

The hGH investigation began March 11 when customs and border protection officers working at the San Francisco international mail facility intercepted two packages from Hefei, China.

The parcels, labeled as mineral samples, were bound for Sisco's home in Aurora and addressed to Teresa Denney, an osteopath who works in Hawaii.

Twenty-three minutes after Sisco accepted the shipment, agents raided her home and seized the vials. On the street, one vial of hGH can sell for as much as $1,000, police say.

At least seven packages originating from overseas had been delivered to Sisco's home in the six months prior to the raid, a postal employee told federal authorities. Only 1 percent to 3 percent of inbound foreign packages are physically examined by customs and border agents, federal authorities say.

The Internet is littered with websites pushing hGH as the new wonder drug for an over-40 crowd seeking a lean, cut physique with little dieting or exercise. Some claim human growth hormone will restore lost hair or banish gray hair, enhance the immune system and even boost sexual performance.

Denney's Honolulu-based clinic offers growth hormone through its website, HGHPharm.com, which compares the drug to a "fountain of youth" and promises results in "as early as one week."

Denney did not return three phone messages left at her clinic in Honolulu.

Looking for links

When federal agents searched Sisco's house in March, they sought any information linking Denney, Sisco, Celio and Keith Skinner, a Hawaii man who once was married to Sisco and had business ties with Celio, court records show.

Skinner's truck, which contained two other boxes from Hefei, China, plus an array of pills and capsules, was parked in Sisco's driveway on the morning of the search.

In an interview, Sisco said the hGH was ordered from China by Denney, a friend, for use in anti- aging treatments on Denney's patients on "the East Coast." Sisco said her role was to keep the hGH chilled before repackaging it and sending the drug east.

"That was legitimate, with that package. They (the federal agents) just didn't know what it was for," said Sisco, also a licensed chiropractor.

Skinner, a former Colorado chiropractor, could not be reached for comment.

Last month, a Denver District Court judge entered a $2.3 million judgment in a medical malpractice case against a business with which Skinner was affiliated, records show. Front Range Management Group, which was doing business as Cellular Medicine Institute, "deceptively represented" Skinner as a licensed physician, according to a judge's order awarding damages.

Drug Case Chilled U.S., Colombia Tie (TAMPTRIB)

Tampa Tribune, July 3, 2005

TAMPA - - U.S. relations with Colombia were briefly strained in March because of a federal prosecutor's court filing in Tampa in the case of an alleged leader of the Cali drug cartel.

Colombian officials even threatened to halt all extraditions to the United States, but U.S. officials retracted the court filing, averting a crisis.

The flare-up exposed a nerve in Colombia and highlighted the troubled, violent and corrupt recent history of efforts to stem the country's illegal drug exports.

``The Colombians went nuts with this thing," said Bruce Bagley, a professor in international relations at the University of Miami. ``It certainly has created hiccups in the U.S.- Colombian relationship."

Former U.S. Ambassador to Colombia Myles Frechette said that based on his reading of reports in the Colombian media, ``I would suspect that Ambassador [William] Wood was told, `Get that fixed and get it fixed tonight.' ... I'm sure it energized Washington from the White House to the lowest levels of the Justice Department."

The controversy involved a Colombian Constitution provision that allows extraditions, but only for crimes committed after Dec. 17, 1997, when the constitutional amendment, Article 35, was enacted.

A defense attorney for Joaquin Mario Valencia-Trujillo filed a motion to enforce that restriction and strike from Valencia's indictment charges that preceded the 1997 constitutional amendment.

Federal investigators say Valencia was a politically connected, if little noticed, leader in the notorious drug cartel as far back as 1988. He is the biggest catch in ``Operation Panama Express," a wide-ranging, long-term investigation, based in Tampa, of Colombian maritime drug traffickers.

Part of a 2002 indictment against Valencia alleges a conspiracy to use drug money to ``make payments to influence political and judicial decisions in Colombia, the United States and elsewhere."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joseph K. Ruddy filed a response to the defense motion alleging that Article 35 is part of the conspiracy mentioned in Valencia's indictment. ``It represents the product of the successful bribery of then-Colombian President Ernesto Samper and the Colombian Congress by the Cali cartel to immunize them from extradition to the United States," Ruddy wrote.

Ruddy's filing said he plans to present testimony at Valencia's trial next year that the cartel ``jointly collected $5 million to pay President Samper to support Article 35 and make it law. Testimony will also establish that almost one-half of the entire Colombian Congress was similarly bribed by the Cali cartel to support the identical legislation."

Ruddy's allegations marked the first time Samper had been publicly accused of receiving traffickers' bribes during his 1994-98 term, The Associated Press reported. He had been accused of taking Cali money in his election campaign.

``I reject in the most categorical and absolute manner the accusation presented ... by a prosecutor in Florida,'' Samper told the AP.

Ruddy also argued in the filing that appeals courts have ``repeatedly and emphatically'' held that a foreign government ``cannot dictate what evidence can or cannot be used to support a conviction on a criminal offense for which it has authorized extradition.''

On March 17, the day The Tampa Tribune published a story about Ruddy's court filing, the prosecution withdrew the pleading and filed an ``amended response'' to the defendant's motion. The new pleading eliminated references to allegations of bribery of Colombian officials.

The next day, the AP reported that Ambassador Wood held a late-night news conference in Colombia to try to repair the damage, insisting that the United States would comply with the extradition requirements from its key ally in Latin America.

``It made front-page headlines [in Colombia] for about two days,'' said Adam Isacson, senior associate at the Center for International Policy's Colombia program. ``Ambassador Wood smoothed it out. ... That made it disappear from the Colombian media immediately.''

Ruddy would not discuss the international kerfuffle. ``I'm not permitted to comment on issues like that,'' he said.

`The Correct Position'

Ruddy said the new filing represents ``the correct position given all the circumstances.'' He said he intends to offer at Valencia's trial evidence cited in the first pleading.

On June 23, U.S. Magistrate Elizabeth A. Jenkins issued a report, recommending that District Judge Elizabeth Kovachevich strike the parts of the indictment that deal with crimes committed before Dec. 17, 1997. Such a ruling would eliminate 26 alleged actions in the conspiracy, leaving 10. The report reflects a suggestion made by Ruddy.

Jenkins did not go as far as the defense wanted. She refused to bar prosecutors from presenting evidence pertaining to allegations that drug trafficking was a pattern that began as early as 1988.

Jenkins' order did not address the allegations filed in the withdrawn prosecution filing, leaving open the issue of bribery and Article 35.

Experts agree on one thing: In the years before the constitutional amendment was adopted, Colombia was rife with corruption.

In 1984, Medellin cartel kingpin Pablo Escobar killed the country's justice minister.

Bagley said intimidation from drug traffickers may be why the Colombian Supreme Court in the 1980s overturned laws allowing extradition of drug lords. In 1991, the constitution was amended to prohibit extradition.

The U.S. government pushed hard for extradition to be reinstated.

``The effort to get an extradition agreement with the United States cost hundreds of lives'' and took many years, Isacson said. During that time, drug traffickers blew up planes in the air and the Colombian headquarters of the FBI, imposing ``a frightening rein of terror to try to keep an extradition agreement from happening,'' he added.

Politicians in Colombia lived in an environment in which they either accepted money from drug traffickers or risked being killed or seeing their families endangered.

``They call it in Spanish plata o plomo,'' Isacson said. ``You get silver or you get lead.''

Article 35 ``was the best they could do after a lot of loss of life and an effort to overcome corruption,'' Isacson said. ``I think the United States was happy to get it.''

Extradition A Top Priority

Frechette, ambassador from July 1994 to November 1997, said getting extradition was a top priority. Since Article 35 was enacted, ``we've been like a house afire on extraditions,'' he said. ``There have been over 200 just under'' President Alvaro Uribe, who has been in office less than three years.

He said the Cali and Medellin cartels ``hired battalions of lawyers and legal people to oppose extradition'' in the belief that ``better a grave in Colombia than prison in the United States.''

He said he received threats, including a funeral wreath delivered to the U.S. Embassy with a card reading, ``Condolences on your death.''

Frechette said many Colombian Congress members were bought off by drug lords. And there was a scandal after evidence turned up that Samper's 1994 presidential campaign had received $6 million from the Cali cartel. Samper was tried in impeachment proceedings but was cleared.

Frechette said Samper escaped conviction because he bought off members of Congress with legislation sending money to their districts. The U.S. government pressured Samper and took away his visa, Frechette said. ``We knew that Samper was always trying to diddle us and trying to introduce amendments [in Congress] that would gut legislation that we wanted, like strengthening sentencing and more cooperation with the U.S. government," he said.

But Frechette was skeptical of Ruddy's allegation that a bribe to Samper was responsible for the extradition restriction. He thinks it's more likely members of Congress were bribed to get the limitation.

Even with the restriction, Frechette said U.S. officials ``thought we produced a great victory, because despite all the money and the threats, extradition was re-established."

Attempts to get around the limitation could undermine the hard-won extradition agreement, he said. ``The prosecutor was out of line and should have been rebuked."

Added Bagley, ``I think your prosecutor is way out on a limb. ... Tell the guy to put up or shut up. ... If he can go forward and have admitted into court evidence [of such a bribe], I would be surprised."

U.S. Attorney Paul Perez, Ruddy's boss, defended the initial filing, saying it was based on public record, including 1997 testimony of Guillermo Pallomari, a former Cali accountant. The AP reported he testified the cartel bribed Colombian officials to get a constitutional ban on extradition and spent $5 million to pick a president they liked.

Perez said U.S. officials sent a transcript of Pallomari's testimony to Colombia after the stir about Ruddy's filing. But Bagley said U.S. officials ``tried to put the lid on this because neither side wants to upset the apple cart and damage this ... relationship." President Uribe ``is one of President Bush's closest allies in all of Latin America. Upsetting that relationship on this issue is simply not worth it."

Gang Busters In Hampton Roads (V-P)

By JOANNE KIMBERLIN AND STEPHANIE HEINATZ, The Virginian-Pilot

The Norfolk (VA) Virginian-Pilot, July 3, 2005

A warning has come from the feds.

An FBI informant says MS-13, a notorious street gang with ties to El Salvador, recently issued an order for its members to kill someone — anyone — wearing a badge in Hampton Roads.

The hit was discussed during a meeting of gang leaders held in Norfolk.

The purpose: To send a message to local law enforcement trying to stop the machete-wielding gang from moving to town.

The message: Stay out of our business. Stay out of our way.

The alert arrived in a May 23 bulletin from the Department of Homeland Security. Both the department and the FBI have refused to comment, but state and federal gang experts confirmed the warning – which has since been put on hold.

“The gangs call it a 'green light,’ ” said Mindy Grizzard, spokeswoman for the Virginia Gang Investigators Association.

In the urban underbellies of Los Angeles, Chicago, Detroit or New York, such a threat might not raise even an eyebrow.

In Hampton Roads, it’s met with an odd mix of shock and shhh.

Shock that such things could happen here.

Shhh because gangs are dirty laundry – the scent of which can derail a city’s redevelopment plan, shred a school’s reputation and cause decent folks to pull out of a neighborhood.

Such stigma results in a battle that’s often waged as quietly as possible. It’s fought from the region’s green countryside to the shadows of its grittiest asphalt. It’s marked by code words, muffled blows, silent losses and whispered wins.

No one is suggesting citizens hit the panic button. In fact, some officials insist gangs aren’t a problem in Hampton Roads.

But others say locals need to wake up. In many quarters, gangs are getting serious attention:

- Every Hampton Roads police department now has a gang unit or gang officers.
- State authorities are doling out millions to communities that admit they have a gang problem.
- Former Attorney General Jerry Kilgore, the Republican candidate for governor, has made the gang issue a bedrock of his campaign.
- Gov. Mark R. Warner recently ordered state police to gauge the scope of gangs in Virginia.
- Local school officials get regular gang updates from police.
- Businesses are even getting involved – police plan to educate employees at the meat-packing plants in Smithfield on how to spot members of MS-13, among their ranks.

And as of Friday, when the latest legislation out of Richmond became law, the Old Dominion took on a title that, at first glance, seems out of keeping with the state’s genteel image:

Virginia now has what it says are the toughest gang laws in the nation.

Destiney Butler, 15, drew a portrait of her brother, Kyron, an 8-year-old who was killed in his bed when a stray bullet from an apparent gang shootout entered the family's Smithfield apartment in 2003. "There is no more innocent victim than a child," said Kyron's mother, Rhonda Butler, shown in the background.

MS-13 violence in Northern Virginia spurred most of the new laws. In recent years, the gang's ranks have mushroomed to an estimated 3,000 members in the Washington suburbs. They've been implicated in a number of machete attacks and grisly murders.

With police pressure increasing in Northern Virginia, Mara Salvatrucha 13 may be looking for new turf. In Hampton Roads, it would not find wide-open territory.

A 2004 survey by the state gang association counted 13 other national gangs already in the region, along with an assortment of homegrown cliques. An estimated 50 gangs operate in Newport News alone. Many regularly cross the river to South Hampton Roads.

Gangs are hardly new, but police are seeing disturbing changes. Pushed by the desire to expand, big-city gangs, such as Bloods and Crips, have sent scouts into the area – recruiting homegrown groups into their fold, ratcheting up the rivalry and organizing their crimes into money-making enterprises.

Gangs are also cropping up in surprising places. In historic Smithfield, a country oasis known best for its ham biscuits and antique shops, one homegrown gang claims the neighborhood behind the meat-packing plants. Another rules two streets of houses rising from the surrounding farm fields. Another stakes its turf in the Jersey Park apartment complex.

An apparent beef between the Jersey Park boys and a gang from nearby Windsor sent a stray bullet into one of the apartments in 2003, killing 8-year-old Kyron Butler as he slept.

No one knows how many gang members are in Hampton Roads. Or how many crimes they commit. Or how many lives are lost to their violence. No one records or collects those numbers.

The U.S. Justice Department believes 25,000 gangs are operating across the country, in more than 3,000 jurisdictions, with more than 750,000 members – more manpower than the U.S. Army.

But that's only a best-guess. Outside the nation's major gang hubs, most police departments use a standardized form that doesn't include a box that can be checked when an incident is gang-related. Without the box, that detail doesn't find its way into the computers, which makes it tough to track gang activity.

Police do know what they see: More gangsters, more graffiti and more weeping mothers, such as Norfolk's Antoinette Boyd. In May 2004, her 25-year-old son wound up dead after men who called themselves Bloods opened fire in the street.

"Something's got to change," Boyd said. "Something's got to be done."

Randy Crank, a Norfolk gang investigator, says "gangbangers" seem to be getting younger and younger.

"We're seeing more 8-, 9- and 10-year-olds," Crank said. "I went to four elementary schools last month that were having trouble."

Roughly 80 suspected gangsters sit in cells in the Norfolk city jail, where deputies try to keep known rivals apart, while at the same time limiting the number of allies placed in each block, said Cpl. Jerry Warner of the Norfolk Sheriff's Department. The bars have held members of MS-13, the Bloods, the Crips, Gangster Disciples, a Puerto Rican gang called NETA, a California set known as South 13, and the Aryan Nation.

Still, the lack of hard statistics supports what's known as "the denial."

"No one wants to be the place pointed to as the one with the gang problem," said George Knox of the National Gang Crime Research Center. "It can be kind of convenient not to know how bad it really is. And if you do know, you don't really want to tell anybody else."

Denial can leave police fighting a two-front battle: on the street and in city hall, where the reluctance of officials to go public with the problem can be a roadblock to getting more officers and money.

According to a 2005 national survey, denial is one the "greatest contributing factors in the alarming increase in the number, size and strength of gangs."

Until recently, Knox said, Virginia has been among the most closed-mouth.

"Cooperation there has been pathetic in the past," he said.

Knox said the national center conducts annual surveys of state prisons to keep its finger on the pulse of gangs behind bars. In Virginia, Knox said, "one bureaucrat waylaid the questionnaires every year. He kept saying, 'We don't have to provide this.' "

Now, Knox said, the state is cooperating: "We had no problem getting the information this year."

In Portsmouth, Sharon Harris, spokeswoman for the city's schools, said: "We don't have any activity that we know to be gang activity."

But some students say gangs have carved out turf on campus.

"It's real tough," said Jamarty Bradshaw, who just graduated from Norcom High School. "There are certain places you can't walk in school because you'll get in trouble."

Still, most school officials insist they're holding their own. They say they maintain close ties with police, keep a sharp eye out for gang signs, and use a strong hand when trouble erupts. In Virginia Beach, faculty is regularly clued in on the latest gang signs, colors, graffiti and clothing.

"I know our coordinator speaks three or four times a week with police," said Richard Ponti, Virginia Beach's director of safe schools and risk management. "We need them to keep us apprised of what they see on the streets."

Schools are required to report gang-related incidents every year to the state's Department of Education. For the 2003-04 school year, Suffolk reported six incidents, Norfolk four, Virginia Beach three, Portsmouth two and Chesapeake one.

But Randy Forbes, a Republican congressman from Chesapeake, said schools fret about their images and have more gang trouble than they admit.

"You ask them and they say no," he said. "But then the superintendent calls me in, shuts the door and says, 'Randy, you've got to do something. If we don't get these people out of here, kids will be killed.' "

Scary labels make some folks queasy. Many agencies use the term "strategic threat group" instead of "gang."

Until lately, Richmond police officers "weren't even allowed to use the word 'gang' in their reports," said Grizzard of the state gang association.

By last year, it was obvious that the city was in the path of a southern migration by gangs out of Northern Virginia. Richmond accepted a $2.5 million grant to fight gang violence – part of more than $8 million being spread across the commonwealth. In May, the city held a news conference to acknowledge its growing troubles with nearly two dozen gangs, including Bloods, Crips and MS-13.

"I hate to put it this way," Grizzard said, "but it's sort of like the money bought the word."

The debate continues in Smithfield. After the shootout that killed Kyron Butler, town detectives reached a quick conclusion.

"There's no question in my mind that it was gang-related," Lt. Kurt Beach said.

But the sheriff of Isle of Wight, the county Smithfield folds into, sees it differently.

"There are bad people everywhere, and, in this case, some bad people got together and did a bad thing," Sheriff Charles Phelps told reporters afterward. "But that doesn't necessarily make them a gang."

Gang violence means business for Shaukat Hagimalik, owner of a custom T-shirt shop in Norfolk. He creates memorial shirts for slain gangsters.

Their memorials hang on a wall in the T-shirts Unlimited & Airbrush shop in The Gallery at Military Circle: 60-plus shirts with computer-scanned photos, all framed by the letters "R.I.P."

The photos are a reflection of the gang scene in Hampton Roads. Gangs span races and cultures. National breakdowns say 49 percent of gang members are Hispanic, 34 percent are black, 10 percent Caucasian, 6 percent Asian, and 1 percent other.

But on this particular wall, nearly all of the photos are of young black men. Nearly every one, says shop owner Shaukat Hagimalik, died from gang violence over the past six or seven years. He says the customers who order the shirts to wear to the funerals tell him so.

"I ask them, 'What happened to him?'" Hagimalik said. "They say, 'Oh, he got shot.'"

From each order, Hagimalik keeps one shirt to hang on the wall.

"I've had fathers bring their sons in here and say, 'Look! Look at them. Do you want to end up on that wall?'"

Police, Hagimalik said, are more interested in his customers – and what he might know about them. He waved a fresh summons to Norfolk court.

"I get these all the time," he said. "They're driving me crazy. They expect me to close up my shop and come there all the time."

Reyna Says 'no Pressure' To Resign (BROWNHER)

By EMMA PEREZ-TREVIÑO, The Brownsville Herald

Brownsville (TX) Herald, July 3, 2005

U.S. Marshals Service Director Ben Reyna never bought a house in Washington, D.C.

"My intention was not to stay," Reyna said last week after submitting his resignation from the Marshals Service effective July 31.

He was not pressured to resign from the post he's held since 2001, he says, and will return to his hometown of Brownsville for personal reasons and without regrets.

"I would not have done anything differently. It's been a great experience and a great honor," Reyna told The Brownsville Herald in an exclusive interview.

"I am very, very pleased, very happy and very grateful for the opportunity to serve the U.S. Marshals Service, but there are also greater things and very important things for me in Brownsville — my family," he said.

Reyna's parents Benigno and Carmen Torres Reyna reside here, where Reyna was born, raised and began his law enforcement career.

But the sequence of events that led to Reyna stepping down may have begun in February with the shooting death of a federal judge's family in Illinois.

The Marshals Service is charged primarily with protecting judges and courts. Its performance is under scrutiny and criticism, seemingly prompted by the slaying of U.S. District Judge Joan Humphrey Lefkow's mother and husband in their Chicago home.

"A litigant who was angry with me shot him in the head, and shot my aged mother, on February 28, 2005, for no reason other than that they were in his way on his road to murder me," Lefkow testified in a Judiciary Commission hearing. "He could have easily added my 16-year-old daughter and me."

Less than a month after the Lefkow murders, Superior Court Judge Rowland Barnes was killed when a prisoner wrestled a gun from a sheriff's deputy in the Fulton County Courthouse in Atlanta, Ga., on March 11.

The back-to-back tragedies shined an unflattering light on the Marshals Service and started a buzz among judges and lawmakers in Washington, D.C.

In a letter dated March 14, U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, wrote to Reyna inquiring about security measures and what would be instituted in response to the attack on the Lefkows.

Reyna said protecting the judiciary has always been and should always be the priority: "That is what allows us to maintain the rule of law."

He also noted that in the agency's 215-year history, no federal judge has been murdered in a courtroom or courthouse.

The Judicial Conference of the United States — with policy-making functions in the administration of U.S. courts — adopted a resolution March 15, calling on the U.S. Department of Justice Department and Marshals Service to review judicial security in a time of "crisis" of the "gravest concern."

Specter has said the U.S. Department of Justice responded on April 11 to indicate that off-site security was under review, "but nothing more than that." He also said that legislators appropriated nearly $12 million for judicial security in an emergency allocation for home alarm systems.

On May 6, Specter met with U.S. Judge Jane R. Roth of Delaware, who chairs the judicial conference's committee on security and facilities. A Senate Judiciary Committee hearing happened on May 18.

The committee heard from several witnesses, including Roth and Lefkow, who made her first public address about the killings and subsequent security concerns.

They aired grievances against Reyna's agency that they said is inadequately funded, unresponsive, lacks manpower, leadership, and questioned the agency's capability to properly assess threats.

Lefkow could not be reached for comment. Specter and Roth did not respond to requests for comments on Reyna's resignation; neither did judiciary committee member U.S. Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas.

Their testimony came a little more than a year after a critical assessment questioning the agency's ability to protect judges. The U.S. Department of Justice's Office of the Inspector General conducted the study in March 2004.

"The decision for me to resign was totally independent of that (criticism and scrutiny)," Reyna told The Herald last week.

"There is never, I guess, such a thing as a perfect time for anything."

Reyna was nominated director of the Marshals Service by President Bush and confirmed by the Senate in 2001.

He said he agrees with much of what those concerned about the agency have said of its resources. The U.S. Marshals Service needs more funding and personnel, he said.

In testimony to the judiciary committee, Reyna said that the president's budget to Congress asked for 993 positions for fiscal years 2001 through 2005, but only 531 were appropriated.

He also referred to a statement from Roth's committee that the Marshals Service "never gets the resources it needs to get the job done."

"I wish that things would move forward a lot faster," he said of bureaucracy and the complex budgetary process.

"It is important to recognize that in government, nobody has unlimited budgets. When I was with the (Brownsville) Police Department, we had to work with what we had. It is the same in the federal government and state government.

"But we want everybody to understand that judges are protected."

Reyna said he doesn't consider the criticism heaped on the agency a personal attack on his work.

"I think that it is totally appropriate for members of Congress and the judiciary to ask questions about how we serve the Marshals Service. I think that we should be able to point out what we have done and what we need (in order) to do a better job."

He said the Marshals Service is but one component of the U.S. Department of Justice that also includes the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Drug Enforcement Administration among other departments.

Praise from U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was aimed at Reyna's work.

In a prepared statement issued June 24, Gonzales, head of the USDoJ, said Reyna served with "integrity and skill" and demonstrated "steadfast leadership" throughout his tenure.

He also recognized Reyna's work with state and local law enforcement in this year's "Operation Falcon," which resulted in arrests of more than 10,000 criminal fugitives.

"I am grateful for his service and wish him every success in his future endeavors," Gonzales said.

Gonzales noted that Reyna improved the agency's ability to carry out its protective missions and its information technology infrastructure; streamlined the allocation of resources; achieved a record level of employment; expanded national and international law enforcement cooperative efforts; and assisted in achieving a significant increase in the apprehension of violent fugitives.

"There are a lot of positive things that have happened here," Reyna said from his office in Washington, D.C.

"We have a great team of marshals and deputy marshals throughout the United States and its territories. We have highly dedicated employees. I will miss working alongside some very dedicated individuals."

Since announcing his resignation, Reyna said he does not know if Gonzales was contacted or urged to secure his removal as has been suggested in national media reports.

"Whether they spoke to him or not, I don't know and he never indicated to me that anyone did," Reyna said.

"Leaving is a normal part of the process. This is the way the job is."

TAX:

In 2002, More Wealthy People Paid No Tax (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

The number of affluent individuals and married couples who paid no federal income taxes jumped more than 15 percent in 2002, to 5,650, government data released last week showed.

The chances of having a large income but not paying taxes on any of it are growing, according to the data, issued in the Internal Revenue Service's annual report to Congress on well-to-do Americans who live tax free.

About one in every 436 high-income Americans paid no taxes in 2002, up from one in 531 in 2001 and one in 1,010 in 2000.

Over all, the top 2 percent of earners - the 2.5 million filers with income of $200,000 or more - paid almost 27 cents in taxes for each dollar of income they reported in 2002, other I.R.S. data showed. This group accounted for 53.5 percent of the income tax paid by all Americans.

Among that high-income group, however, almost 83,000, or one in 33, paid less than a dime in taxes for every dollar of income. An additional 79,000 paid less than 15 cents. The average for all Americans was 13 cents.

Congress taxes Americans on their worldwide income. Of the 5,650 individuals and couples who paid no income taxes to the United States, only 728 paid any to a foreign government, while 4,922 lived completely free of income tax.

The I.R.S. measured income in two ways.

One was by adjusted gross income, the last line on the front page of the Form 1040 tax return. By this measure, 2,959 affluent individuals and married couples paid no federal income tax, down from 3,385 in 2001, but up from 2,328 in 2000. There were 60 such examples in 1977, when a dollar was worth three times as much as in 2002.

On a worldwide basis, 2,551 such individuals and couples paid no tax in 2002, down from 2,875 in 2001, but up from 2,022 in 2000. There were 37 such examples in 1977, the first year the agency disclosed such data.

The second measure, giving a fuller picture, was expanded income, which also includes money from sources like tax-exempt interest and untaxed Social Security benefits. By this measure, 5,650 well-to-do individuals and married couples paid no federal income tax in 2002, up from 4,910 in 2001 and 2,766 in 2000. There were 85 such examples in 1977.

Worldwide on this basis, there were 4,922 individuals and couples who lived tax free in 2002, up from 4,119 in 2001 and 2,320 in 2000. There were 64 such examples in 1977.

The I.R.S. report said that "the most important item in eliminating tax" was taking income in the form of tax-exempt interest on state and municipal bonds.

Nearly two-thirds of those who lived tax-free reported income from such bonds.

The four largest items that reduced income subject to taxation, the I.R.S. said, were miscellaneous deductions; interest paid on borrowing to finance investments; various tax credits; and large medical bills, which can be deducted once they exceed either 7.5 percent or 10 percent of adjusted gross income, depending on the taxpayer's circumstances.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Faces Pivotal Choice For High Court (AP-Y2)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

President Bush could rein the court to the right by nominating a bedrock conservative to replace the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. He could make history — and perhaps pick up votes for the GOP — by naming the first Hispanic to the court. Or he could choose a woman and keep intact the court's current balance of seven men and two women.

Bush has had nearly five years to consider how to burn the "G.W.B" brand on the bench of the highest court in the land.

Regardless of whom he picks, the closely divided court, which often splits 5-4 on key decisions, will very well end up with a more conservative bent.

The question is, how far to the right will the post-O'Connor court be? And how much farther to the right will it lean once the 80-year-old Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who is sick with thyroid cancer, retires and possibly gives Bush a second chance to shape the court?

Legal experts on both sides speculate that the retirement of O'Connor raises the prospect that Bush will name Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He is not a favorite of conservatives, who continued to target the White House this weekend in their anti-Gonzales campaign, saying his views on issues such as abortion and affirmative action are not aligned far enough to the right.

"When the right looks at Judge Gonzales, they have tended to worry they are getting another David Souter," Brad Berenson, a White House lawyer during Bush's first term, said about how conservatives were disappointed when Justice Souter sides with the court's more liberal members. "I don't personally think that's fair, but that is their view."

Gonzales' confirmation hearing for the Justice Department job focused on his role in developing the administration's policy on the interrogation and treatment of suspected terrorists. It is an issue sure to dominate hearings should he turn out to be Bush's first nominee to the Supreme Court.

Yet, Gonzales is a loyal friend of the president's — and Hispanic, a member of one of the fast-growing voting blocs. Bush might be willing to accept a chilly reception from his far-right constituency to make history, reward a friend and lessen the chance of having a more conservative nominee blocked in the Senate.

Bush's options were rearranged when it was O'Connor, not Rehnquist, who announced she was stepping down last week.

"Will politics be considered?" said Berenson, a former Supreme Court clerk. "Will factors like the diversity of the court and a justice's life story be considered? Sure. But I don't think those things are going to drive the decision."

Intellect. Character. Judicial philosophy. The prospect of being able to win Senate confirmation. Those are the overriding issues that several legal experts and advocates on both the right and left think will guide the president, who is facing intense pressure from both sides of the political aisle.

Because Rehnquist sits on the conservative side of the court, replacing him with another conservative would not have shifted the balance of power on the nine-member court.

The same cannot be said of O'Connor. She has been the critical fifth vote on abortion and other contentious issues involving privacy, equal opportunity, the environment and religious rights.

"It is dramatically different with O'Connor retiring," Ralph Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way, said Saturday. "Replacing the conservative O'Connor with a right-wing ideological would be a constitutional catastrophe.

"A right-wing appointment could turn back the clock seven decades on so many fundamental rights and liberties and legal protections that most Americans think are theirs forever," Neas said. "These are rights and liberties and protections that could disappear overnight if a right-wing majority takes control of the court."

Both the liberals and conservatives, who say Neas is exaggerating the potential change to the court, think they have the upper hand in persuading Bush to see it their way. Yet the president's independent streak might make him impossible to sway.

Advocates on the right argue that he must make good on a pledge to name a justice who would vote in the same way as conservative Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. They believe in a strict interpretation of the Constitution that is not affected by cultural or social trends.

Liberals say that given O'Connor's swing position on the court, Bush must choose a moderate conservative — a move that would risk alienating his far-right base but would avoid a nasty confirmation battle with Democrats.

Indeed, Democratic senators might be uneasy about voting against a woman or a minority such as Gonzales or Samuel Garza, a Hispanic on the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

There's no doubt a confirmation fight would be contentious if Bush nominates individuals thought to be on his short list: conservative federal appellate court judges Samuel Alito, J. Michael Luttig, Michael McConnell, John Roberts Jr. and J. Harvie Wilkinson III.

But American University historian Allan J. Lichtman says naming an extremely conservative nominee could backfire on the president because it might prompt Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, a moderate conservative who also has been a swing vote on the court, to inch away from the right.

"That could push Kennedy into the O'Connor slot," Lichtman said.

White House Promises Bi-Partisan Input From Senate (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein And Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

The White House plans to solicit opinions this week from senators in both parties, a senior White House aide said Saturday, as the two sides began early maneuvers in the summer battle over President Bush's first Supreme Court nomination.

While Bush will spend most of the week at meetings in Europe, senior White House officials plan to canvass Democratic and Republican Senators for recommendations to fill the vacancy opened when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement Friday, said the aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"It will be senior White House staff consulting with senators in both parties," the official said. "White House staff will be asking senators for their ideas about good candidates to be nominated."

Democrats and their allies who have emphasized that they want to be consulted reacted cautiously to the signal from White House.

"Their track record of even consulting with Republicans on Capitol Hill is very poor," said Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "It remains to be seen if this is an encouraging first step or is just going to be a one-way dialogue."

The maneuvering by the White House, senators of both parties and the interest groups underscores the priority each side places on shaping the debate. Both sides are trying to position themselves as reasonable and conciliatory to strengthen their hands for the full-scale combat most suspect will erupt.

In his remarks after O'Connor announced her resignation Friday, Bush pledged that he and his advisers would consult with the Senate. Democrats and even some Republican senators such as Susan Collins of Maine have accused the White House this year of failing to consult sufficiently on Bush's nominees for the federal district and appellate courts.

Speaking with reporters Friday, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the administration would undertake "more thorough consulting" on the Supreme Court vacancy.

The president spoke Friday with Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, and placed a call to Reid, although they did not connect, according to White House and congressional officials. The White House aide said Bush has also scheduled a meeting for July 11 with Reid, Leahy, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa.

O'Connor's announcement surprised many in the capital who had been girding for a resignation from ailing Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. Because O'Connor has so often functioned as the decisive fifth vote in a divided court, her retirement instantly ignited intense lobbying campaigns from groups on the left and the right who believe her successor could determine the court's balance of power.

While promising to consult, the aide signaled that the White House did not believe that Bush faced an obligation to replace O'Connor with a justice who shared her relatively moderate views, as some Democrats and liberal groups have suggested.

"The notion that there is . . . a narrow band of people who are appropriate to replace Justice O'Connor is wrong," the official said. "The president will consult, but the president will make a decision."

Given Bush's repeated declarations that he intended to appoint justices with similarities to Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, two of the Court's most conservative members, many liberals remain skeptical that he would genuinely consider Democrats' views before naming his choice.

"There will be activities that constitute an appearance of bipartisan consultation, but it will not be what is actually happening," predicted Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, a leading liberal group.

Bush leaves Tuesday for Denmark and then Scotland, where he will attend the annual meeting of the Group of 8 industrialized nations. White House officials have indicated that he would not announce his nominee to replace O'Connor until after he returned.

Bush himself seemed to be one of the few people still in Washington for the holiday weekend who Saturday was not focused on the O'Connor vacancy. The White House aide said the president was at Camp David preparing for the G-8 meeting and was not reviewing materials on potential nominees.

Another senior White House official, who asked not to be identified while discussing the internal deliberations, said Bush would likely begin to seriously examine the contenders when he flew to Europe on Tuesday.

For Bush, A Defining Moment (CHT)

By Michael Tackett

CHT – Bush Focus, July 3, 2005

The news was about Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But the story is about President Bush.

How Bush manages that story, by the person he nominates to replace O'Connor, by the words he chooses to frame that debate, by the way he deals with Congress, could define his presidency almost as much as terrorism and the war in Iraq.

And the impact on American life could last a generation. The most contentious, difficult and profound issues facing the country--life and death, science and faith, global commerce and crime--are likely now to be shaped by a court that has Bush's signature.

The president, even with sagging approval ratings and diminishing support for the war and his handling of the economy, finds himself in an extraordinarily powerful position with Republicans controlling the executive branch and Congress. Now he will be extending that leverage to the Supreme Court.

O'Connor's resignation was a surprise, to be sure, but not entirely unexpected, and yet it forces a different kind of decision-making for the president. In many respects, naming a replacement for Chief Justice William Rehnquist--considered far more predictably conservative than O'Connor--would have been easier, a judicial form of a zero sum game.

The argument simply would have been over whether the nominee was too conservative. And given Rehnquist's failing health, Bush might get the chance anyway.

Replacing O'Connor forces the president to confront not merely judicial philosophy but also the court's diversity. Bush's support among suburban women has been ebbing since the election. And it is likely that, because O'Connor was largely seen as the swing vote that preserved abortion rights, her proposed successor's views on abortion could become a central issue during Senate confirmation hearings.

If so, Bush would face unrelenting pressure from both sides of the divide.

Social conservatives have often felt betrayed by none other than President Ronald Reagan (who appointed O'Connor) when it came to abortion. And though Bush has sided with them on nearly every issue of concern--from prohibiting embryonic stem cell research to interceding in the Terri Schiavo case to winning passage of a ban on certain late-term abortions--the president's rhetoric about support for a "culture of life" will be put to an ultimate test.

He will face pressure from the left as well, with at least equal zeal, as liberals try to frame the debate as the ultimate fight over a woman's right to make a choice on abortion. And he will face pressure from the moderate center, particularly in the GOP, that favors abortion rights but doesn't really like a discussion of it in the public square.

It has been clear for some time that by a ratio of greater than 2-to-1 Americans don't want to see the landmark Roe vs. Wade ruling completely overturned. And Bush has never specifically said that it should be, either.

"I think there will be a fight, because the partisans on both sides will be looking--on the conservative side, for somebody who's really going to be pretty predictably in favor of dramatic cutbacks in Roe v. Wade, and those on the left who are going to want somebody who at least will think about what Roe v. Wade means," said Drew Days, a professor at Yale Law School and former solicitor general in the Clinton administration.

To some degree, Bush's decision is a gut check, and his thought process can't be predicted.

"Tell me what he wants to be remembered as," said Abner Mikva, a former judge and White House counsel for President Bill Clinton. "If he is thinking about his legacy, I am a lot more comfortable than if he is trying to show how tough he is."

Generally, Americans have paid little attention to Senate confirmation hearings on Supreme Court nominees, with the notable exception of the battle over Clarence Thomas in 1991, and to a lesser extent the fight over Robert Bork. But the tension in the Thomas hearings was over an allegation of sexual harassment, not so much over his legal views.

Climate change

This time promises to be different because the political context has so changed in the last decade. The dividing lines have been more sharply drawn. The cleavage that was driven home in the 2000 presidential race, in which the Supreme Court ultimately ratified Bush's election, has shown no sign of healing.

Interest groups are now far better funded and empowered by technology to try to shape the public debate. Both sides are stoked for a passionate fight.

The president might have a fight that he would rather avoid, despite all the strong signals he has sent to conservatives that their cause is his as well.

But if the sense of certitude that he has brought to his other decisions is on display with his choice of a nominee for the court, it might be a battle he embraces. From the day Bush took office, it was no secret that several of the justices were ailing and a retirement was almost certain. The president's team has been war-gaming its options on the court for years.

The only surprise was that it took this long.

Court Pick To Test Bush Promise (BOS)

By Susan Milligan

The Boston Globe, July 3, 2005

President Bush is likely to deliver to the Senate exactly what he promised in both presidential campaigns and displayed in his lower-court nominations: a Supreme Court pick who is conservative, antiabortion, and a believer in a strict interpretation of the Constitution, according to political operatives and activists in close contact with the White House.

Democratic senators, civil libertarians, and liberal groups are holding out hope Bush will offer a nominee who is uncontroversial and somewhat centrist, someone they say would fill the void created by retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who became a moderating voice on the court. But they agree with conservatives that the prospect is unlikely, and that the president will use his first appointment to the high court to establish a conservative legacy with a nominee similar to those Bush has publicly touted as his favorite justices, conservatives Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

In a nation already deeply polarized by two divisive presidential elections, interest groups are readying for a battle not so much to sway Bush's decision but to fight over just how conservative an acceptable nominee will be.

The Republican Main Street Partnership, comprising centrist Republican lawmakers, is nudging Bush to select a more moderate conservative so he can avoid a nasty confirmation battle in the Senate. Several Senate moderates signaled privately that they would accept Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who, as a member of the Texas Supreme Court, once sided with the majority in ruling that a 17-year-old girl should get an exemption to the parental notification law prior to having an abortion.

But hard-line conservatives are demanding a very conservative, antiabortion judge, and they say they won't be happy with a choice, such as Gonzales, that could appease Democrats and moderates on Capitol Hill. Conservative groups started a concerted effort Friday to pressure the White House to choose someone other than Gonzales, whom they consider questionable on abortion.

"This is the payoff, in an ideological sense. This is why they worked so hard in 2000 and '04," said Daron Shaw, an associate professor at the University of Texas, who advised both Bush presidential campaigns. "To say to them, 'we're nominating a moderate because we don't want to make the Democrats mad' " isn't going to work, Shaw said.

Even before Bush has named a new justice, interest groups are already gearing up for a heated and expensive lobbying campaign over the nominee. The group MoveOn.org on Friday announced a $280,000 TV ad buy urging the naming of a justice who will "protect our rights" by upholding the right to privacy, which is an argument for abortion rights. Paul Schenck, executive director of the National Pro-Life Action Center, said the group has sent out 5,000 letters to members to mobilize support for a conservative nominee and will send out 10,000 more by tomorrow.

With the atmosphere so charged, the White House is expecting a fight on Capitol Hill over any nominee; because of that Bush may select a staunch conservative and reject any notion of appeasing critics, said Mike Carver, a former Reagan administration deputy assistant attorney general who is close to Bush administration officials.

"I don't think this is a power issue, or a testosterone issue. It's a question of living up to your campaign pledges. This president does that," Carver said. "I think he's made it clear he prefers judges in the longstanding tradition of Republican presidents who [strictly] interpret the law. I don't see any reason why he would depart from that."

For religious conservatives, the Supreme Court selection represents a defining moment in Bush's presidency, his most potent opportunity yet to create a legacy that reflects their values. The religious and antiabortion activists, who labored mightily to twice elect Bush, say they aren't ready to accept a moderate nominee in the name of placating an intensely partisan Senate -- and Bush insiders say there's no reason they should.

Conservative lobbyists who meet regularly with White House officials said they don't know who the nominee will be, but they are working to make sure the selection will live up to the promises Bush has made on the matter. Bush has frequently discussed his commitment to a "culture of life," and he said during the 2004 campaign that he "wouldn't pick a judge who said that the Pledge of Allegiance couldn't be said in a school because it had the words `under God' in it."

"That's an example of a judge allowing personal opinion to enter into the decision-making process as opposed to strict interpretation of the Constitution," Bush said during an October debate against Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry.

The lobbyists say they are deeply disappointed with Justice David Souter, the first Supreme Court justice confirmed during the presidency of Bush's father, George H.W. Bush. Souter revealed very little in his confirmation hearings about how he would rule, and he has turned out to be a moderate voice on the Supreme Court. They will fight to see that the current president doesn't make a similar pick, and instead selects someone with the same views as the elder Bush's second Supreme Court appointee -- Clarence Thomas.

O'Connor's departure creates an opening to build a solid conservative voice on the court, said Tom Minnery, vice president of public policy for the Colorado-based group Focus on the Family.

"This is a wonderful opportunity to reshape the court, and the court badly needs reshaping," he said, referring to what he called the "nutty" split decisions recently on the display of religious symbols on public property. In separate 5-4 decisions last week, the court said that Texas may keep a Ten Commandments monument on Capitol grounds, but that Kentucky courthouses must remove Ten Commandments displays in the buildings. In both cases, O'Connor thought the displays should be removed.

"We're confident the president will keep his campaign pledge to send up a nominee who will interpret the constitution as it was written, rather than as the latest fads legal theorists dictate," Minnery said.

Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, which has led the fight against many of Bush's conservative lower-court nominees, said she was not hopeful that Bush would pick a more moderate, less controversial justice.

"While the alliance urges president Bush to nominate a consensus candidate, we don't expect that he'll do so. We expect that he'll spark a fight, and we're hoping that he defies expectations," she said.

Ellen Malcolm, president of EMILY's List, which promotes female, Democratic candidates who favor abortion rights, is so certain Bush will name a very conservative nominee that she is already assessing the galvanizing impact the selection could have for the Democrats in general and female candidates in particular.

"If they make this a partisan ramrodding of a nominee, I think there will be tremendous political consequences" for conservative candidates, Malcolm said.

The activists and political analysts note that Bush -- unlike his predecessor, President Clinton --has consistently stuck to his guns on both policy decision and nominees, no matter how much heat he has gotten from the public, the international community, or Capitol Hill.

Clinton, for example, asked Lani Guinier to withdraw as his nominee as assistant attorney general for civil rights following an outcry over some of her writings, even though Guinier offered to defend herself in front of a highly skeptical Senate Judiciary Committee. Bush, meanwhile, has refused to withdraw his nominee for ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, in the face of heavy opposition from Democrats and at least one Republican in the Senate.

Bush has so far been unable to get Bolton confirmed, and some Republicans are suggesting that he do a "recess appointment" of Bolton, putting him in the job while Congress is out of session, to get his way. Bush used that tactic to get former Alabama attorney general William Pryor a recess appointment in February 2004 to a US appeals court slot, getting around a Democrat-led filibuster that had kept Pryor off the bench since 2003. Democrats considered Pryor an "extremist" and questioned whether he improperly solicited campaign funds from corporations subject to lawsuits by his office.

Under a shaky truce senators brokered last month, Bush got Pryor and two other controversial, conservative judges confirmed by the Senate.

Bush is likely to display the same resolve on a Supreme Court pick, said Bruce Buchanan, a government professor at the University of Texas.

"That's been part of the general strategy: The way you bolster your position across the board is you solidify your base," Buchanan said. "And that part of the base will be very insistent" on a conservative, he said.

Bush Faces Choice Of Advancing Agenda Or Bridging Political Divide (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

KRT – Bush Political Divide, July 3, 2005

President Bush started his search for a new Supreme Court justice Saturday, gearing up for a decision that could have a lasting impact on his presidency, his political party and the nation.y picking a staunch conservative to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Bush could do more to advance the conservative agenda than he has been able to accomplish in five years in the White House. But he also would risk a divisive battle in the Senate and a potential backlash from Americans who favor a middle-ground approach to abortion, gay rights, affirmative action and other hot-button social issues. In today's politically polarized world, with 24-hour cable news, 30-second attack ads, Internet interest groups and ideologically driven bloggers, a contentious nomination battle could drive a deeper wedge between Americans on opposite sides of the political divide.

Democrats have already served notice that they would use a nomination fight to cast Republicans as extremists who are out of touch with average Americans. Republicans say they would paint Democrats as obstructionists.

Any fallout from a bitter confirmation battle could easily spill into next year's congressional elections, when Republican control of Congress will be tested at the polls.

Replacing O'Connor with a like-minded jurist also carries some political risk for Bush, who owes his re-election to strong support from his conservative base. The president's conservative supporters view her retirement as an ideal opportunity to rein in a judiciary that they consider hostile to their values. To them, the vacancy is a test of their faith in Bush, and, by extension, the Republican Party.

"This is going to be a defining moment for President Bush," said the Rev. Patrick Mahoney, director of the Christian Defense Coalition, a conservative group. "If 9/11 was the defining moment of his first term, the composition of the Supreme Court is the defining moment of the second."

Bush has spent most of his political career trying to balance his conservative views against his desire to win support from Americans who might not agree with him. For example, he opposes abortion, but he concedes that most Americans are not ready to outlaw the practice.

"I've always believed that abortion ought to be illegal with the exception of rape, incest or life of the mother. But, look, I'm a realist, as well," the president told a Danish journalist last week.

The stakes at the Supreme Court, the final word on abortion rights and all other legal issues, make it harder to find the middle ground. Conservative groups have made it clear that they expect Bush to select a new ally for Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia, the court's most conservative members.

Bush expressed admiration for both men during the presidential campaign.

"Now it is time to make good on those campaign promises, Mr. President," Troy Newman, the president of the anti-abortion group Operation Rescue, said in a statement issued after O'Connor's resignation announcement Friday. "Now it is time to fulfill your obligation to God and to those who elected you, and appoint a staunchly pro-life judge to the Supreme Court."

It seems unlikely that replacing O'Connor with a stalwart anti-abortion justice would spell the end of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court ruling legalizing abortion. O'Connor voted with a 6-3 majority in the last clear test of that ruling, so shifting one vote is not likely to make a difference at the court.

But the addition of anti-abortion justice would probably make it easier for states to restrict the procedure. And it isn't just abortion that's at stake. O'Connor cast the deciding vote against the court's conservative wing in cases involving the death penalty for minors, affirmative action for law school admission and the display of the Ten Commandments inside Kentucky courts.

"Supreme Court nominees are a president's most important legacy," said Neil Siegel, a law professor at Duke University in North Carolina. "He's got two roads before him, and they are rather stark choices. One is to try to put through the most conservative person that he can. The other is to go for a more moderate-type conservative.

"No matter who he chooses, the court is going to move to the right," Siegel added. "The question is how far."

White House spokesman Trent Duffy said Bush began considering his options on Saturday during a holiday weekend visit to the presidential retreat in Camp David, Md. He will take a stack of information on possible nominees with him Tuesday when he flies to Europe for a three-day trip to Denmark and Scotland.

Although White House aides began looking at possible court nominees in Bush's first term, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Bush has not looked his options in any detail.

McClellan said Bush would not announce a decision until after he returns from Europe on Friday. The president has pledged to visit with congressional leaders from both parties when he gets back.

"He has not, at this point, given any serious consideration to any nominee," McClellan told reporters Friday. Bush has offered no clues to his leanings, saying only that he will find a nominee that Americans can be proud of.

Bush Has Numerous Constituencies To Consider (MINNST)

By Michael Doyle And Lawrence M. O'rourke

Minneapolis Star Tribune, July 3, 2005

As President Bush prepares for what may become a history-changing appointment to the Supreme Court, one thing appears near-certain: Bush's pick will be a conservative whose vote could shift the balance of power on the evenly divided court.

Beyond that, Bush will be confronting a multiplicity of choices as he arrives at a successor to Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her surprise resignation from the court on Friday.

Will he appoint the first Hispanic to the court? Will he select another woman? Will he seek a far-to-the-right conservative who will touch off a titanic confirmation battle in the Senate? Or will he opt for more of a consensus candidate who could win easier confirmation, thereby enhancing prospects for other elements of his second-term agenda?

However Bush decides, his choice could offer the greatest insight on how he wants to leave his mark on the Supreme Court and the country for possibly many years after his term expires in 2009.

Competing agendas

The jockeying for Bush's attention was underway minutes after O'Connor disclosed she was ending her 24-year career on the court.

"We should replace Sandra Day O'Connor with a consensus candidate, not an ideologue," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who called for a summit of the White House and Democratic leaders.

But Republican Sen. Tom Coburn of Oklahoma said now is the time for Bush to make a pick that will decisively change the court's direction. "I would hope that President Bush's nominee will swing the court back toward the Constitution and away from an era of self-indulgent judicial activism," he said.

Already, White House advisers have sifted endless court opinions, law review articles and other background documents. It's painstaking work, as officials seek out the kind of killer detail that might unravel a candidate.

Bush's team has already been able to do much of this preliminary work because at least one Supreme Court vacancy has been anticipated almost from the day he took office.

Only one woman?

The resignation of O'Connor, the first woman to serve on the Supreme Court, interjected a new factor for Bush to consider: Should he make certain that the court is not left with Ruth Bader Ginsburg as the only female member?

Sen. Arlen Specter, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said that two women are "a minimum" on the court. "The gender of the nominee is a "dimension that is very, very important to consider," said Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who will preside over the confirmation hearings.

Specter, a moderate who favors abortion rights and embryonic stem cell research, noted, however, that the eventual retirement of 80-year-old Chief Justice William Rehnquist will almost certainly give Bush another opening to fill.

Appointing the first Hispanic Supreme Court justice is also believed to have Bush's attention. A natural could be Alberto Gonzales, who is a longtime Bush ally from Texas, the former White House counsel and was recently installed as U.S. attorney general.

Another possibility is appellate Judge Emilio Garza, known to have stronger appeal to conservatives than does Gonzales.

Moving to the middle

The closer Bush moves toward the perceived middle, the lower the resistance is likely to be from Senate Democrats. Moving to the middle, however, would anger Bush's conservative base, many of whom see the O'Connor vacancy as a chance to move the court more emphatically rightward.

But fully satisfying conservatives could allow Democrats to characterize the candidate as the kind of "extraordinary" circumstance that, under a recent Senate deal, justifies reinvoking a Senate filibuster. That, in turn, would raise the bar for Senate approval to 60 votes -- unless Republicans made good on a threat to waive the 60-vote requirement.

Should that happen, the Senate could dissolve into a partisan quagmire, raising questions about Bush's ability to achieve many of his domestic priorities.

Bush has already pledged to consult with two key Democrats: Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Avoiding a battle

Some say Bush could also skirt a nasty fight by nominating a member of the Senate. Texas Republican John Cornyn, a former elected member of the Texas Supreme Court, stands as one option. Also mentioned are Utah Republican Orrin Hatch, a former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and Arizona Republican Jon Kyl.

Considered more likely is that Bush will scour the appeals court benches. Among appellate judges with high reputations among conservative activists are Michael Luttig and Harvie Wilkinson of the 4th Circuit in Richmond, Va., and Samuel Alioto of the 2nd Circuit in Philadelphia.

If Bush opts to keep two women on the court, he could choose from two reliable conservatives now serving on the New Orleans-based 5th Circuit Court of Appeals: Edith Clement and Edith Hollan Jones.

Some suggest Bush could get a conservative justice and simultaneously make history with a Hispanic appointment, choosing either Gonzales or Garza. The two candidates, however, offer competing appeals.

The 49-year-old son of Mexican immigrants, Gonzales enjoys a close relationship with Bush, who has appointed him to a variety of sensitive positions. But Gonzales worries activists, who consider him insufficiently conservative. Gonzales told senators during his attorney general confirmation hearing that he considers the Roe vs. Wade decision upholding a woman's right to an abortion to be "the law of the land." As a Texas Supreme Court judge in 2000, he voted to uphold a 17-year-old girl's right to obtain an abortion without notifying her parents.

Garza enjoys a more down-the-line conservative record. Garza, 57, a University of Texas Law School graduate and former Marine officer, has used his position on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals to criticize the Roe vs. Wade decision.

But there's also the issue of personal chemistry when a president is nominating someone who may define his legacy.

On that score, the edge could go to Gonzales and also to Theodore Olson, a former U.S. solicitor general. Olson successfully represented the president in the epic battle after the 2000 election that culminated in the 5-4 Supreme Court decision that chose Bush for the White House over Democrat Al Gore.

Both Sides Fear "stealth" Nominee, Observers Say (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, July 3, 2005

With the Supreme Court battle now under way, what both sides fear most is the unknown: a so-called "stealth" nominee who has a thin paper trail and offers ambiguous answers in the Senate grilling that is sure to come.

Already, activists on the right and left are calculating how to divine the true ideology of any candidate the White House might put forward, especially on politically explosive subjects like abortion. While in the past, nominees have been able to duck and dodge dicey questions, this time the president's pick for the high court won't be let off so easily, court observers say.

The apprehension about a blank-slate candidate is all the more intense on both sides of the aisle because it is Sandra Day O'Connor - herself an unpredictable swing vote - leaving the court, rather than Chief Justice William Rehnquist, a reliable conservative whose retirement had been the subject of speculation.

With a Rehnquist vacancy, President George W. Bush might have felt freer to appoint a strong conservative - and Senate Democrats might have felt more willing to accept such a choice - because it wouldn't have tipped the balance of the court. Now, however, the pressure on Bush to appoint a moderate will be more intense, say those on both sides of the fight.

Indeed, within hours of O'Connor's announcement, Democrats were calling on Bush to nominate someone in her mold - a "voice of reason and moderation," as Sen. Daniel Akaka, D- Hawaii, put it at a news conference here Friday.

Some conservatives, meanwhile, immediately began plotting strategy to head off the most obvious such choice on Bush's short list - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales - in part because they are worried about what they don't know about his views.

"Conservatives are looking for someone with a paper trail that shows their views, as is the left," said Manuel Miranda, head of the Third Branch Conference, a conservative activist group, and former Republican aide to the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Miranda said he fears Gonzales' name may shoot to the top of Bush's list because Gonzales would be the first Latino Supreme Court justice, a move all the more symbolic because he would replace O'Connor, the court's first woman.

Some on the right oppose Gonzales because of a decision the former Texas Supreme Court judge wrote in a case upholding a 17-year-old girl's quest for an exception to a Texas law requiring minors to notify their parents or guardians before undergoing an abortion.

But Miranda voiced much broader concerns, pointing to public comments by the attorney general in which he appeared to espouse a view of the Constitution as a living document whose meaning changes with time as evidence that he would be an unreliable vote on the court.

"This is an unformed mind," said Miranda, who helped organize the sending of a letter to Bush on Friday from a coalition of Latino clergy who said they'd love to see a Hispanic nominee - unless it's Gonzales.

Word watch

Just how liberal and conservative activists - and the U.S. senators they're trying to influence - will smoke out a prospective candidate's views on controversial issues like abortion, gay marriage, or affirmative action is unclear.

In this politically charged environment, court observers say, any nominee is going to do his or her best to be evasive. So the public may be in for a confusing game of Washington semantics.

Take, for instance, the answer from Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., when asked Friday whether he would filibuster a nominee who opposed Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court opinion that established a woman's right to have an abortion.

Kennedy said he wouldn't impose a "litmus test" on any nominee. But he added, he would vote against anyone who doesn't express a "core commitment to constitutional values," including a right to privacy, the foundation of the majority's opinion in Roe v. Wade.

DOJ_NMG_0001091

On the other side of that issue, Jan LaRue, chief counsel of the conservative Concerned Women for America, said: "We have one litmus test. Is the nominee pro-Constitution? Is he an originalist?"

Those who adhere to such a view believe there is no right to an abortion spelled out in the Constitution.

In the past, candidates who have directly answered such couched questions - or even more direct ones - have not fared well. Exhibit A is Robert Bork, the highly controversial 1987 Supreme Court nominee who went down in defeat after being more candid than his supporters wished.

"What was so exciting about the Bork debate was that ... he was really willing to sit down and talk about his notion of the Constitution," said Howard Gillman, a political science professor at the University of Southern California and an expert on Supreme Court nominations. "You really had this very thoughtful debate about different constitutional visions."

Since Bork's defeat, however, "people have learned there are disadvantages to being completely honest and elaborative about your vision," Gillman said. "Nominees feel it's safer territory to cloak themselves in generalities and to talk about respect for precedent. We're really talking about nominees who are not going to want to engage in that kind of substantive conversation."

By contrast, Justice David Souter, nominated by the first President George Bush in 1990, "ducked and parried and answered almost nothing directly and was easily confirmed," noted David Yalof, a political science professor at the University of Connecticut and expert on the judicial selection process.

Similarly, Justice Anthony Kennedy, nominated by Reagan after Bork's defeat, provided careful and circumspect answers and sailed through the Senate.

But once on the court, those two justices turned out to be much more liberal than their supporters had hoped. And conservatives say they have learned a hard lesson from those easy confirmations.

"No one will be happy ... with a kabuki dance of no substance," said Miranda. "On the right, people will always have this sense that they're being had - because they've been had before."

Showdown

Those on the left say they will be just as skeptical of anything short of full and direct answers.

"We think it's critical that there not be any stealth nominees to the court, and by that I mean nominees like Scalia and Thomas who would not discuss their positions on Roe v. Wade (during their confirmations) and have turned out to be staunch opponents who call for the reversal of Roe," said Nancy Northup, president of the Center for Reproductive Rights, an abortion-rights group. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas are seen as the two most conservative members of the court.

Said Elliot Mincberg, of the liberal group People for the American Way: "The Senate is not required to accept a pig in a poke."

A refusal to answer questions about legal precedents such as Roe v. Wade "should not be accepted," Mincberg said. "This is a lifetime seat on the Supreme Court, and that person ought to be required to completely fill out their job application, which includes explaining their judicial philosophy."

Those kinds of demands create a showdown with its own mysterious political puzzle.

"Both sides are going to demand answers, and the nominee is going to be as evasive as possible," Gillman said. "We're as close to a stalemate system as you can imagine. We don't really see the road from here to a successful confirmation."

O'Connor Resignation Ignites Political Firestorm (DeN)

By Joan Biskupic

DetroitNews, July 3, 2005

Sandra Day O'Connor's sudden resignation from the Supreme Court on Friday signals the departure of a pioneering justice who was the most influential member of a divided court. It also ignites a political firestorm over her successor and gives President Bush a chance to make a lasting imprint on the bench.

The departure of O'Connor, who became the first woman on the court when she was named to the bench by President Reagan in 1981, raises the possibility that Bush -- who has never made a high court appointment -- could get the chance to make two of them in short order.

Chief Justice William Rehnquist, 80, is battling thyroid cancer, and much of the talk about potential court retirements has focused on him. But Rehnquist concluded the court's term for 2004-05 this week without giving any indication that he planned to step down.

In a statement released by the court, O'Connor, 75, said she was leaving in part to spend more time with her husband. John O'Connor, 75, has been suffering from Alzheimer's disease. Her resignation creates the first opening on the Supreme Court in 11 years, the bench's longest period without a departure since 1812-1823. The former Arizona state senator was at the ideological center of the court and was its equilibrium, resisting moves by her colleagues to move the court too much to the left or to the right.

To the disappointment of many conservative Republicans, she cast key votes protecting abortion rights, an issue that is certain to be a key point in the Senate confirmation hearings for whoever Bush chooses as her replacement. In disputes over the separation of church and state, O'Connor generally supported limited government mingling with religion. She also took a lead role as the Rehnquist court boosted states' rights and curtailed congressional intervention in the affairs of local governments.

She often was criticized -- by conservative Justice Antonin Scalia, among others -- for seeming to have no hard-and-fast rules on the law, for compromising too much. But O'Connor, the only member of the current court who ever held elective office, favored real governmental action to come from elected legislators.

Because of her centrist approach, her departure could be far more significant than if Rehnquist had resigned. Bush -- who has expressed admiration for Scalia and another conservative justice, Clarence Thomas -- now could appoint someone whose vote could move the court to the right on abortion, affirmative action and other issues.

Senate Democrats such as Minority Leader Harry Reid and interest groups such as the National Women's Law Center have vowed to protect abortion rights and fight any Bush nominee that seems "out of the mainstream." On Friday, they indicated that because it is O'Connor -- and not Rehnquist -- who is leaving, the stakes in the Senate nomination hearings would be particularly high.

In the White House's Rose Garden shortly after O'Connor's announcement, Bush praised her service to the country and said his nominee would be someone who meets "a high standard of legal ability, judgment and integrity."

Anticipating a political battle in a Senate that is sharply divided and that already has resisted his nominees to federal courts, he said, "The nation deserves a dignified process of confirmation in the United States Senate, characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

Bush said he would choose a nominee "in a timely manner" in the hope that the nominee would be confirmed by the Senate before the Supreme Court's new term begins Oct. 3. Press secretary Scott McClellan said later that Bush wouldn't announce his choice until he returns from a four-day trip to Europe on July 8.

White House and Justice Department officials have been working quietly for weeks on a list of prospects. Some have been interviewed informally. But those candidates were being considered as possible replacements for Rehnquist. The departure of the more moderate O'Connor could mean a change in the administration's political calculus toward a more moderate candidate, as Reid and other Democrats have suggested.

A candidate whose stock could be up is Alberto Gonzales, a longtime friend of Bush who had a reputation as a moderate when he was on the Texas Supreme Court. Bush has expressed a desire to appoint the nation's first Hispanic justice, which also could work in Gonzales' favor.

Lower court judges who have been on the White House's radar as potential nominees include Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson, both based in Virginia, on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit; Emilio Garza and Edith Jones, both in Texas and on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit; John Roberts, of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; and Samuel Alito, based in New Jersey on the U.S. Court of Appeals 3rd Circuit.

Some past presidents, most recently Bill Clinton, have asked key members of the opposite party about Supreme Court prospects before nominating them, and Democrats are urging Bush to do the same. "Justice O'Connor has been a voice of reason and moderation on the court," said Reid, D-Nev. "It is vital that she be replaced by someone like her."

'I am 75 years old'

With so much of Washington's focus on a potential retirement by Rehnquist, O'Connor's name had surfaced only in the last few days in news reports about possible departures on the court.

Some of her fellow justices quietly had rejected the notion that O'Connor was leaving. Her work always has been her passion, and O'Connor has drawn strength from her job -- most poignantly in the late 1980s, when she was diagnosed with breast cancer. When she spoke about the experience, she said that work became even more important in her life to keep her going.

But O'Connor's husband, John, has been suffering from Alzheimer's for several years and apparently his condition forced her to change course. She told the other justices of her decision Friday morning.

"I am 75 years old," she said in a statement released through the court public information office. "I need to spend more time with my husband." O'Connor and her husband, who also is 75, met in law school at Stanford University where they were classmates with Rehnquist. The O'Connors have been married for 52 years.

The first hint of O'Connor's resignation came Thursday, when the Supreme Court's head marshal, Pamela Talkin, called White House counsel Harriet Miers to say that a sealed envelope would be delivered from the court on Friday morning. Miers told Bush and Vice President Cheney, who were having lunch. The letter arrived Friday morning, with a surprising message: It was O'Connor, not Rehnquist.

In O'Connor's letter to Bush, she wrote, "It has been a great privilege, indeed, to have served as a member of the court for 24 years. I will leave it with enormous respect for the integrity of the court and its role under our constitutional structure."

Groups ready for 'heck of a fight'

Interest groups stand ready to turn the political battle over O'Connor's replacement into as tough a tussle as the fights over the nominations of Clarence Thomas in 1991 and Robert Bork in 1987. Thomas won confirmation. Bork did not.

"It's hard to imagine anything more heated than those two," says C. Michael Comiskey, political science professor at Penn State Fayette and author of "Seeking Justices: The Judging of Supreme Court Nominees." But, "this could be one heck of a fight" because groups on both sides of the political aisle know that O'Connor was often a key swing vote on cases involving social issues and that Bush could make the court more conservative.

There are signs that the lobbying campaign over this court nomination will be far more sophisticated than any before it and that it likely will resemble a fall political campaign.

On the conservative side, interest groups have pledged to spend at least $20 million on ads, grass-roots lobbying here and elsewhere and other efforts. At least $18 million of that will be spent by one group alone, Progress for America. That group released its first TV/radio ad last week. It was a warning that Democrats would try to smear anyone Bush nominates.

On the liberal side, organizations such as People for the American Way and MoveOnPac.org also plan to spend millions. Within minutes of Bush's appearance Friday, MoveOn Pac announced it was releasing a TV ad warning that a too-conservative nominee could "undermine the rights of individuals and families."

"The moderating leadership of O'Connor must not be replaced with a far-right extremist," says Wade Henderson, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, one of the groups that has been preparing to mount a campaign if Bush nominates a candidate they see as too conservative.

In a statement, the American Civil Liberties Union praised O'Connor as a centrist who "stood up for individual rights and against a radically conservative vision of the Constitution" on key cases involving abortion rights, affirmative action and the rights of foreign detainees to have access to the court system.

"We are gravely concerned that President Bush will use this opportunity to nominate someone whose judicial philosophy is hostile to civil liberties," said Steven Shapiro, the ACLU's legal director.

For Progress for America and other conservative groups, O'Connor's departure signals a once-a-generation opportunity to push for significant change on the high court, with restrictions for abortion chief among the goals. (The current court generally splits 6-3 in favor of abortion rights, with O'Connor in the majority.)

Boydon Gray, former counsel to the first President Bush and a strategist for various groups who are pushing the administration to make the Supreme Court more conservative, cited recent battles in the Senate over judicial nominees in warning Democrats to give Bush's nominee a fair chance.

"We call on Democrats to resist the temptation to use their attack machine against a qualified nominee," Gray said. "All parties should withhold judgment until a fair and sober analysis has occurred.

"We expect the president to choose the best person for this difficult job. We have no doubt that the nominee will be of the highest legal excellence and integrity, who follows the Constitution, defends property rights, and as the president suggested in his press conference, refrains from making law from the bench. Any such nominee deserves a respectful hearing and an up or down vote. They do not deserve to have their record distorted."

Specter under a spotlight

The nomination hearings will put a particular focus on Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who will be at the center of the wrangling over the nominee.

On Friday, Specter called O'Connor a "historic figure" who had "a pivotal role on the court as a centrist."

Specter said he has talked with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist about the timing of hearings and said his panel is prepared to "proceed at any time."

Specter acknowledged that O'Connor's retirement would "pose a somewhat different picture" than Rehnquist's would have. He said he anticipated that with O'Connor being a swing vote, hearings "could produce more controversy. But I don't want to prejudge anything."

He said he had not submitted any recommendations to Bush but had spoken several times to the president about consulting the Senate on a nomination. "I wasn't asked (who I liked). Don't ask, don't tell," he joked.

Of the nominee, Specter said, "People will be expecting everything. This is a very polarized country. ...Everybody can't have their own way."

Specter said he expects abortion rights to "be a focal point" of the confirmation hearings. Specter, who supports abortion rights, said he would have no "litmus test" on that or other issues regarding a nominee. He said that for all the action by interest groups surrounding the nominations process, "the activities of the groups are vastly overstated, vastly overstated, and in many cases they are counterproductive."

As for Rehnquist, Specter -- who has two more chemotherapy treatments left to go for the Hodgkin's lymphoma that has left him bald -- said he saw the chief justice at a lunch a couple weeks ago. Specter said Rehnquist "looked infinitely better" than he had when he sworn in Bush in January.

"Speaking as someone who likes to get up in the morning with something important to do, I wouldn't say it's keeping the chief alive, but I think he likes his job," Specter said. "And if we haven't heard from him by now (concerning his retirement), the chances are you won't hear from him for some time."

A politician on the court

O'Connor's resignation brought an end to the public life of a woman whose rise to the nation's highest court was an inspirational story to women.

O'Connor was born March 26, 1930, in El Paso and grew up on her family's ranch, the Lazy B.

She grew up splitting her years between El Paso, where she lived with her grandmother and attended the Radford School, and the 162,000-acre ranch that her grandfather had established in southeastern Arizona. She graduated from high school at 16 and earned a degree in economics from Stanford in 1950.

She married John O'Connor, also a lawyer, and moved with him to Germany while he was in the Army. After his service, they settled in Phoenix in 1957 and had three sons.

Sandra Day O'Connor became active in Arizona politics and was appointed state senator in 1969 to fill out a vacancy. She later won election and then was elected by fellow Republicans to be the majority leader of Arizona's Senate. She was the first woman nationwide to hold the post.

She left the Legislature and soon after was elected to the Maricopa County Superior Court. In 1979, then-Gov. Bruce Babbitt appointed her to the Arizona Court of Appeals.

Through coincidence and mutual friends, O'Connor met U.S. Chief Justice Warren Burger on a vacation in late 1979. She stayed in touch with him and he eventually helped bring her name to the attention of the Reagan White House in the spring of 1981, before it began looking for a successor to retiring Justice Potter Stewart.

At the time, O'Connor's credentials did not make her an obvious candidate. She was not on a federal court or top state court, as many nominees in the recent past had been. Instead, she was a judge on an Arizona intermediate court handling criminal and civil appeals. But as a former state senator, she had deep and well maintained political connections to the Republican Party. She was a close friend of Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz.

For O'Connor, it was a matter of right place, right time. During his recent campaign for president, Ronald Reagan had promised to give the Supreme Court its first female justice.

O'Connor's nomination was embraced widely, although some opponents of abortion rights warned that she would vote against their cause. O'Connor ended up being confirmed by the Senate, 99-0, on Sept. 21, 1981. She took the judicial oath five days later.

O'Connor's political background ended up shaping her style on the high court. She turned out to be a consensus builder and learned over the years to be adept at counting votes among her colleagues.

Her imprint at the center was evident in 1992 as she, joining with Anthony Kennedy and David Souter, crafted a compromise ruling that affirmed abortion rights nationwide. In 2003, she was the pivotal fifth vote to uphold affirmative action in higher education, arising from a dispute at the University of Michigan. Earlier this term, she was the key fifth vote for a broad reading of the law known as Title IX, which protects girls and women from discrimination in school sports.

O'Connor's place at the center of the court's social milieu also was important. She was the one who ensured that all the justices ate lunch together after oral arguments, she arranged social outings and events for visiting dignitaries. The role she played at the court's social center reinforced her position of influence on the law. She often spoke about how important it was to have "agreeable" relations to minimize disagreements on substance.

She was also the public face of the court internationally. In 2003, for example, as part of the Bush administration's effort to develop democratic structures of government in the Persian Gulf, the president asked O'Connor to represent the United States at an Arab Judicial Forum in Manama, Bahrain.

So What's The 'Right' Pick? (NYT)

By Jeffrey Rosen

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

WHEN Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her intention to resign from the Supreme Court, President Bush promised to nominate a successor who would "faithfully interpret the Constitution."

He is widely expected to appoint a judicial conservative, but the crucial question for the country is what kind of judicial conservative.

Judicial conservatism, after all, is not a monolithic movement: It is a catchphrase for very different approaches to constitutional interpretation that often lead to dramatically different results in cases ranging from affirmative action to abortion and states' rights.

Several of the leading candidates said to be on Mr. Bush's short list - like Judge J. Michael Luttig of Virginia and Judge John Roberts of Washington - defy easy categorization. But it's clear that justices from each philosophical camp would reach very different decisions in the cases Americans care most about. Consider abortion. "A traditionalist conservative might make his peace with Roe v. Wade, saying the country has accepted it," said Akhil Amar, a constitutional law professor at Yale University. "But an original intent person would say: Where does it say that in the Constitution? A deference person would say that legislatures can decide the optimal rate of change, and libertarians will divide based on their answer to a philosophical question about the beginning of life."

Affirmative action cases might be decided in similarly different ways by the various conservative camps. "O'Connor, the pragmatist, relied on the fact that the country had come to accept some affirmative action," Professor Amar said. "A libertarian like Justice Thomas might say affirmative action offends an idea of merit."

According to legal scholars and Supreme Court historians, at least five different types of judicial conservatism are represented on the current Supreme Court and on President Bush's short list. As he ponders his first Supreme Court nomination, President Bush can choose from the following menu:

Originalist Conservatives

Since the 1980's, the most influential movement in conservative legal circles has insisted that the text of the Constitution should be strictly interpreted as it was originally understood by its framers and ratifiers. The leading originalist (who also sometimes calls himself a textualist) is Justice Antonin Scalia, who insists that respect for original understanding is the only way of separating law from politics.

"When this president and this party talk about strict constructionism or faithfully interpreting the law, they mean textualism and originalism," says Jack Goldsmith of Harvard Law School, a former Bush administration official.

Many of the names of President Bush's shortlist, like Judge Michael McConnell of the United States Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit, are widely considered to be originalists, although not all of them embrace the label.

Libertarian/Constitution in Exile Conservatives

This strain of judicial conservatism is consistently anti-government and pro-individual liberties, especially including economic liberties. On the current court, the leading representative of these libertarian conservatives is Clarence Thomas.

"Sometimes, the libertarian conservatives are associated with originalism, because in many cases the original understanding comports with their conception of limited government," says Professor Goldsmith of Harvard. "But sometimes there is a conflict, and the real commitment of the libertarians is to individual liberty, not original understanding or judicial restraint."

For this reason, libertarian conservatives like Justice Thomas are even more willing than traditional originalists like Justice Scalia to overturn decades of judicial precedents with which they disagree and to encourage judicial activism in cases protecting economic liberties.

The favorite Supreme Court candidate of the judicial libertarians is Janice Rogers Brown, recently confirmed by the Senate to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Liberals consider her one of the most radical potential nominees.

Traditionalist Conservatives

Traditionalist conservatives believe that judicial wisdom is built up slowly, and judges shouldn't depart radically in any direction from the Constitution as it has been interpreted in case law over the ages. "The traditionalist conservatives were in the judicial mainstream for at least half a century after the New Deal," says Professor David Strauss of the University of Chicago. Their leading representative during the Warren era was Justice John Marshall Harlan. On the current court, they are best represented by Justice David Souter.

Traditionalists are reluctant to overturn judicial precedents except in the exceptional cases, like Brown v. Board of Education, which outlawed school segregation. On Mr. Bush's shortlist, the leading traditionalist conservative is J. Harvie Wilkinson of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, whom some administration officials reportedly consider too moderate.

Pragmatic Conservatives

Judicial pragmatists believe in reaching practical decisions that will help the institutions of government function smoothly. They are less concerned with the text or history of the Constitution and more interested in empirical evidence about the effects of their decisions in everyday life.

"Lewis Powell, Sandra Day O'Connor's judicial mentor, followed the same trajectory as Justice O'Connor: they both began as tradition-minded conservatives and ended up as conservative-minded pragmatists," Professor Goldsmith says.

In addition to Justice O'Connor, other pragmatists on the current court are Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Justice Stephen Breyer. All voted last year to regulate the detention of enemy combatants over dissents by Justices Scalia and Thomas.

"From my perspective, Justice O'Connor didn't give enough weight to the role of text, history and principle in constitutional law," says Steven Calabresi of Northwestern University Law School, a leading conservative scholar. "I think one concern with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who is on President Bush's shortlist, is that he would be too much of a pragmatist as well."

Social conservatives in particular fear that Mr. Gonzales is too liberal (and too pragmatic) on questions involving affirmative action and abortion.

Deferential Conservatives

One of the oldest strains of judicial conservatism says that courts should play a very limited role in American politics and should rarely, if ever, strike down laws passed by the state legislatures and Congress. On the Supreme Court, the leading advocates of judicial deference to legislatures were Felix Frankfurter and, during the Warren era, Byron White.

During the postwar period, conservative presidents starting with Richard Nixon claimed to want to appoint justices who would allow political battles to be fought in legislatures, not courts. But today, few liberal or conservatives justices or judges consistently believe in judicial deference.

"There is no consistent devotion on the right or the left for judges who defer to the political process across the board," says John Yoo, a law professor at the University of California at Berkeley and a former Bush administration official. "I don't think any of the judge pickers believe in it either."

How will President Bush choose among a dizzying variety of judicial conservatives? "I think O'Connor's leaving makes Bush's job easier," Professor Yoo says. "He's now free to replace O'Connor with a like-minded pragmatist like Gonzales who will win political points with Hispanics but upset his base. Since Bush is likely to have a chance to replace Chief Justice Rehnquist, too, he could reassure social conservatives that they'll get a reliable originalist for the chief's slot."

Other conservative scholars think the game of musical chairs might lead to a different result. "I think Bush will focus on replacing Justice O'Connor with someone who shares his stated philosophical goals of originalism and textualism," said Professor Goldsmith of Harvard. "Once he does that, he can focus on what criteria he will use in selecting a chief."

With one Supreme Court nomination imminent, and another very likely on the horizon, it's clear that Mr. Bush will have an opportunity to satisfy and infuriate conservatives of many stripes. Whatever choice he makes will define not only the Supreme Court but his own conservative legacy.

O'Connor Successor Debated (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

When she heard the name Sandra Day O'Connor for the first time in the fall of 1981, it meant almost nothing to Eleanor Smeal, then president of the National Organization for Women. All she knew was that O'Connor was the new Supreme Court nominee of a president she hotly opposed -- and that O'Connor was a woman.

That was enough. After a few quick calls to O'Connor acquaintances in Arizona, Smeal was on board. "We said, 'We believe she'll be there for women,' " Smeal recalled.

O'Connor's appointment galvanized women across the country in a way almost impossible to imagine nearly a quarter-century later. At a time when women were vastly underrepresented in professional schools and struggling for workplace equality, her ascension to the top ranks of federal power blasted down barriers and opened new horizons for younger generations.

More than just a symbol, she was cheered by women across an unusually wide political spectrum who believed the nation needed not just a female presence but a female perspective on its highest court. Years later, those supporters point to O'Connor's legal reasoning in several key rulings -- abortion rights, discrimination, affirmative action -- which, they are convinced, was informed by her personal experiences.

Yet for all the significance they place on her sex, women are split on the question of whether O'Connor should be succeeded by another woman. Although some of their leaders and members have expressed hope that the next appointee will be a woman, most women's organizations, liberal and conservative, are no longer making a person's sex an official priority, instead holding up O'Connor's reputation for open-mindedness as the characteristic they most want to see replicated.

"I think the mind is more important than the sex," said Jennifer Taylor, 48, a homemaker in Chevy Chase who described herself as liberal. "I just hope -- and I doubt -- that the person who replaces her is going to be as much of a centrist."

But lawyer Victoria Toensing, a Republican and a deputy assistant attorney general from 1984 to 1988, disagreed.

"One out of nine just doesn't do it," she said. "It is important for people to look at the Supreme Court and say there's someone on that court who represents who I am."

For many women who were beginning to make their way in law or politics in the 1970s and early '80s, the idea of a female Supreme Court justice was virtually inconceivable, almost until the moment it happened.

"It was still rare for a woman to be made a partner in a law firm," said Patricia A. McGuire, the president of Trinity College in Northeast. "We would hear horror stories -- if you want to be made partner, don't get married, don't have babies."

Jamie S. Gorelick, who would become deputy attorney general in the Clinton administration, recalled a constitutional law professor in the early 1970s posing hypothetical arguments to his students as if they were members of the Supreme Court and addressing her as "Mr. Justice Gorelick."

"There wasn't even a way to address a hypothetical female Supreme Court justice," recalled Gorelick, now a partner with Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr in the District.

Both women recalled the appointment of O'Connor as unexpected and electrifying. While some liberal women harbored doubts about a Republican appointee, NOW -- which had been pushing for a female justice for years -- quickly decided to support her.

Smeal's Arizona contacts told her "they felt she understood discrimination. She had been discriminated against as a woman," Smeal remembers.

O'Connor's personal history, in fact, became something of a touchstone, both for the activists seeking to predict how she would weigh in on key issues and for women seeking ways to balance career and family.

Although O'Connor graduated third in her Stanford law class, no law firm would hire her, except as a secretary. Ultimately, she started her own firm with her husband, and built a powerful career in law and in Arizona state government.

Judith Areen, then a professor with a 1-year-old child, was another liberal with doubts about O'Connor's credentials. When they met upon O'Connor's arrival in Washington, she found herself impressed.

"I was very admiring of the fact that she had raised three sons and yet had done well enough to elevate herself to the court," said Areen, later the long-serving dean of Georgetown University's law school. Michelle Bernard, a high school senior that fall with notions of becoming a doctor, found herself riveted by the gender debates surrounding the appointment. Would a female jurist overturn Roe v. Wade ? What would she wear on the bench? She started reading everything she could about O'Connor -- and four years later headed for law school.

Once on the court, O'Connor almost immediately found herself the swing vote -- and often the deciding voice -- on issues of keen concern to women, such as abortion. A number cited one of her first opinions for the court, in favor of a male applicant seeking admission to the Mississippi University for Women nursing school, as evidence that she would not tolerate gender bias of any kind.

"She made it very clear in her very first decision [involving sex bias] that she believed you can't apply gender markers," said Judith L. Lichtman, former president of the National Partnership for Women and Families, which works for workplace equality for women. "Although she was very much a moderate conservative . . . she did not bring her own political views to her decisions."

To some, the opinions she wrote and the votes she cast were proof that having a woman on the bench made a difference. Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's Democratic delegate to Congress, cited O'Connor's majority decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey , in which she wrote that states may not put an "undue burden" on women seeking abortions before the fetus can survive on its own.

"Although this is a profoundly conservative justice who was not predictable on human rights and civil rights issues, she nevertheless made us understand why it was important to have a woman on the court," Norton said.

Bernard, now a vice president at the conservative Independent Women's Forum, cited O'Connor's decision in the case that allowed the University of Michigan to continue using race as one of many factors in admissions decisions.

"It takes a woman or a minority or someone who has been marginalized at some point in their lifetime to recognize the importance of our institutions of higher education not just being for the elite few," Bernard said. "You need to experience that in order to reason through that."

Yet Bernard and Norton, like many women on both sides of the spectrum, said they do not think it essential that O'Connor be succeeded by a woman.

"Forget gender," declared Gina Glantz, a longtime Democratic activist who managed former senator Bill Bradley's presidential campaign. "With the country as polarized as it is, to add someone to the court who would add another layer of acrimony to that playing field would be unhealthy for the country. . . . We need a balanced, thoughtful person, regardless of race or gender."

Marsha Greenberger, president of the National Women's Law Center, said that "diversity of experiences is critical, but not at the expense of having a justice who truly cares about equal protections and justice for women and upholding core rights."

Others disagreed. "If you can find a man who thinks like a woman and cares about women as much as women do, then fine, appoint a man," said Susan Ford Bales, a Republican who favors abortion rights and who succeeded her mother as chairman of the Betty Ford Center drug rehabilitation clinic.

But Bales, whose father, President Gerald R. Ford, appointed John Paul Stevens to the high court, added: "I just don't think a man can adequately represent women's fundamental right to equality in areas such as equal pay and health."

Smeal, now president of the Arlington-based advocacy group Feminist Majority, found herself at a NOW convention in Tennessee the day O'Connor announced her retirement. NOW's leadership put out a passionate demand that the next nominee "protect the civil liberties of all people" and pledged to fight anyone who "would turn back the clock on our civil, economic and reproductive rights" but stayed silent on the question of gender.

Not Smeal. She conducted a news conference with some other old-guard feminists, demanding O'Connor's successor be a woman. "We can't go back to the time of tokenism, one woman out of nine," she said. "Symbolism is very important. We're telling the world we have to eliminate the bias against women. There's no better way to do that than to practice what you preach."

5th Circuit Has Likely Candidates (NOTP)

By Mark Schleifstein

New Orleans Times-Picayune, July 3, 2005

The list of potential replacements for retiring U.S. Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first female member of the high court, includes three judges on the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans -- two of them women.

Judges Edith Brown Clement, Edith Jones and Emilio Garza all have been cited as the type of conservative jurists President Bush would like to add to the bench. They also are likely to face opposition from many Democrats in the Senate, which confirms candidates.

Indeed, the fight over any Bush candidate is expected to be greater than usual because of O'Connor's status as a moderately conservative swing vote, said John Baker, a constitutional law professor at the Louisiana State University Law Center.

Among the likely 5th Circuit candidates, Jones would draw the greatest opposition, Baker said, because of signals she has given over the years that she would be an "originalist," closely following the Constitution's original meaning instead of expanding its interpretation in light of modern events.

Both Jones and Garza also have indicated they believe abortion is not justified under the Constitution, he said.

But New Orleans defense lawyer Bruce Waltzer said Clement may actually be more conservative than either of the other two.

"On civil rights and civil liberties issues, she would be to the right of the majority of the Supreme Court today," he said.

Baker said, however, that predicting what an appellate court judge will do when elevated to the Supreme Court is difficult. The job of district and appeals court judges is to interpret the law in the context of Supreme Court decisions, he said, a point that Garza has even cited in opinions in which he has criticized the high court's philosophy.

Edith Brown Clement

With the anticipated retirement of Chief Justice William Rehnquist, White House staffers already have interviewed Clement, 57, as part of their search for Supreme Court candidates, according to columnist Robert Novak.

Her confirmation process in 2001, when Bush elevated her from her U.S. District Court judgeship in New Orleans to the 5th Circuit, was uneventful. The vote for her was unanimous.

She was appointed a district judge in 1991 by the first President Bush.

Observers have said it's difficult to determine much about Clement's constitutional leanings based on the few decisions she's written while on the appeals court.

She did join a stinging dissent saying her fellow judges over-reached in applying the Endangered Species Act to protect insects found in a cave, in a case that blocked development of a Texas shopping mall. The Supreme Court recently declined an appeal of that decision.

A native of Birmingham, Clement received a bachelor of arts degree from the University of Alabama in 1969 and a law degree from the Tulane Law School in 1972. She clerked for U.S. District Judge Herbert Christenberry from 1973 to 1975 and was in private practice in New Orleans from 1975 until she was appointed to the bench.

Emilio Garza

Garza, a former captain in the Marine Corps, has been mentioned as a prominent Bush choice to be the Supreme Court's first Hispanic justice since Benjamin Cardozo was appointed in the 1930s, which could bolster the Republican Party's appeal to Hispanic voters in the 2006 midterm elections.

Garza followed existing Supreme Court precedents when he voted in 1992 to strike down a Louisiana law criminalizing abortion. But in a concurring opinion, Garza said that because the decision to regulate abortion is a political one, "I would allow the people of the state of Louisiana to decide this issue for themselves." He also wrote an opinion this year that found Congress' constitutional authority to regulate interstate commerce allowed it to limit access of protesters to abortion clinic entrances.

Garza, 58, was elevated from a federal district court bench in San Antonio, Texas, to the 5th Circuit by the elder Bush in 1991. He had been appointed to the district bench in 1988 by President Reagan, and had earlier served as a state district court judge in San Antonio. He had a private practice in San Antonio from 1976 to 1983.

Garza graduated from the University of Texas School of Law in 1976, and received bachelor's and master's degrees from Notre Dame in 1969 and 1970.

Edith Jones

Jones, 56, first surfaced as a candidate for the high court in 1990, when she was on a short list considered by the elder Bush when he named David Souter to a seat opened by the death of Justice William Brennan.

She once served as the general counsel of the Texas Republican Party and was an attorney for 11 years in Houston, where she specialized in oil and real estate bankruptcy cases, before being elevated directly to the 5th Circuit by Reagan in 1985.

Jones has written several circuit opinions that have been reversed by the Supreme Court, including one earlier this year involving a death penalty case. She also was the author of the dissent Clement joined in the Endangered Species Act case.

A native of Philadelphia, she received a bachelor of arts degree from Cornell University in 1971 and graduated from the University of Texas School of Law in 1974.

THE CONTENDERS

Some other possible candidates for the upcoming vacancy on the Supreme Court:

SAMUEL A. ALITO: 55, has been a strong conservative voice in his 15 years on the Philadelphia-based 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which is considered to be among the most liberal.

ALBERTO GONZALES: 48, U.S. attorney general and former White House counsel. Critics argue that a memo he wrote on the treatment of terrorism detainees helped lead to abuses of the type seen at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

J. MICHAEL LUTTIG: 51, worked in the Justice Department during the first Bush administration and has served on the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. He was a law clerk to Chief Justice Warren Burger from 1983 to 1984.

MICHAEL McCONNELL: 50, a judge on the Denver-based 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, enjoys bipartisan support in the academic community. Based on his reading of the law, he opposed President Clinton's impeachment and the Supreme Court's 2000 ruling in Bush v. Gore that made George Bush president.

JOHN G. ROBERTS: 50, has been on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit since June 2003. A former clerk to Chief Justice William Rehnquist, Roberts was associate counsel to President Reagan from 1982 to 1986 and then served in the first Bush administration, arguing cases before the Supreme Court from 1989 to 1993.

J. HARVIE WILKINSON III: 60, also on the 4th Circuit appeals bench, has been consistently conservative in his rulings since being put on the court by Reagan in 1984. Wilkinson wrote the majority 4th Circuit opinion in 1996 upholding the "don't ask, don't tell" policy that barred gay men and lesbians serving in the military from revealing their sexual orientation.

Court's Internal Dynamics - A Factor In Decisions - May Change (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

KRT – Internal SCOTUS, July 3, 2005

With Sandra Day O'Connor poised to leave the Supreme Court soon, the talk among interest groups and politicians is about what change will be wrought What will happen with abortion? Affirmative action? Church and state separation?

Finding the answer is more complicated than simply subtracting O'Connor's vote in such cases, and adding another, presumably more conservative one. The court's internal dynamics - the way the justices work together, react to one another and shift over time - also play a pivotal role in how cases are decided. And the injection of a new personality into that dynamic could have unpredictable - and, for the White House, undesirable - effects.

Some court watchers say the arrival of another hard-line conservative to the bench, someone in the mold of Justices Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas, could embolden moderate conservative Anthony Kennedy.

"If you replace O'Connor with a justice like Scalia, there's no doubt it would change the dynamic inside the court," said Ed Lazarus, a court expert who clerked for former Justice Harry Blackmun. "O'Connor and Kennedy have held down the center of the court together. Now he'll be there by himself. A polarizing justice could add pressure to Kennedy to assert the middle."

Court historian David Garrow put it this way: "Replacing a moderate with a conservative automatically magnifies the center," he said.

The current crop of nine justices, including O'Connor, held together for 11 years without a retirement or death - a record in the modern court era. And by all accounts, both inside the court and out, the justices are among the most collegial group in the court's history.

Under the even hand of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, they have largely avoided the acrimony that dominated courts that confronted issues such as Roosevelt's New Deal and the beginnings of the civil rights movement.

There is disagreement - sometimes bitter - over a number of issues, but the proceedings are cordial, and bad feelings don't bleed over from one case to the next.

Even Scalia's biting opinions, which sometimes take aim at other justices' take on the law or their intellect, are not a cause for extended bad feelings.

"You used to have courts where justices displayed open disrespect for the chief justice," Garrow said. When Louis Brandeis was appointed as the first Jewish justice, Justice James McReynolds, a notorious anti-Semite, refused to speak to him, or sit next to him for a court portrait. McReynolds retired in 1941.

"The court this last 11 years has probably been the happiest and most collegial in over a century," Garrow said.

At least partially on the strength of that collegiality, the court has settled into somewhat familiar patterns, revolving around the twin center of O'Connor and Kennedy.

A new face at the court - and the possibility of two, if the ailing Rehnquist leaves soon - means certain change to that stability.

If O'Connor's replacement is more consistently conservative than she is, but also takes to the court's air of cooperation, his or her vote could begin to prove decisive in close cases. But a more aggressive justice, given to extreme positions and derision for the court's other members, could have the opposite effect.

That would empower Kennedy, whose shift to the court's middle has seemed dramatic over the past few terms, and has been decisive in a number of cases that have left conservatives reeling.

Unlike Scalia and Thomas, Kennedy does not adhere to strict constitutional philosophy, and balances interests to come up with his rulings in the court's cases. That approach puts him more in league with O'Connor, Souter, John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. He has a strong penchant for individual liberty, and can be a stickler for procedure in criminal cases. He has been the target of far-right ire at least partially because he got the seat that was initially reserved by President Reagan for Robert Bork, whose approach to the court would have more closely mirrored Scalia's.

In the 2003 decision overturning gay sodomy laws, it was Kennedy who penned the most expansive ruling - one that even O'Connor declined to support. He did the same in the spring ruling that struck down the juvenile death penalty, again without O'Connor's support.

Kennedy also supports limited use of racial preferences, though he voted to strike down two University of Michigan admissions policies in 2003. He has supported most state restrictions on abortion, but has resisted efforts to overturn Roe v. Wade - a key goal of some conservative groups.

On many issues, the court's conservatives would need to convince Kennedy to side with them to overturn liberal precedents, and the new justice could either ease that process, or aggravate it.

Kennedy joined the court in 1986, appointed by Reagan, and began his tenure as a reliable vote, nearly in the mold of Scalia. But as the court's truly liberal wing - composed of justices like Thurgood Marshall, William Brennan and Harry Blackmun - retired, Kennedy has shifted more to the center. Lazarus said he has adopted a role as the court's "moral conscience, from a conservative perspective," but it's a fair distance from where he started.

"O'Connor's absence could be an opportunity for change on some issues for conservatives, but if he's made more powerful by the new appointee, the impact could be much less," Lazarus said.

Garrow said if the White House is thinking strategically, it will appoint a new justice who, both philosophically and by his or her approach, might frequently entice Kennedy or one of the court's more liberal justices to the more conservative side.

"You want someone who might persuasively keep tugging on his shirt sleeve," Garrow said.

O'Connor's Replacement Is Likely To Be A Swinger (LAT)

By Orin S. Kerr

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Some court observers are predicting that the Supreme Court will be radically different without Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. I'm not so sure.

Every year, the court decides a handful of closely divided cases with important ramifications for American life. In many of these cases, the court has divided into three camps.

The first includes the four liberal justices: John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer. The second consists of the three conservatives: Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and William H. Rehnquist. The last camp covers the two moderate swing votes: O'Connor and Anthony M. Kennedy.

O'Connor's retirement removes a swing vote. But that may not have a dramatic effect on the outcomes of the court's biggest cases.

To see why, assume that O'Connor is replaced by a strong conservative, such as Judge J. Michael Luttig of the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals. The balance on the court would change, but only somewhat. Kennedy (for whom I clerked) would remain as a key swing vote.

Kennedy often votes with the more liberal justices to form a liberal majority in major cases. He has voted to uphold Roe vs. Wade, and he wrote the opinions that struck down sodomy laws and invalidated the death penalty for juveniles. All these decisions would remain intact.

This scenario assumes President Bush will nominate — and the Senate will confirm — a justice who consistently votes with the conservatives. That might not happen. Bush might nominate a moderate, or the Senate might not be able to confirm a conservative. In that case, O'Connor's replacement may end up voting in a way similar to O'Connor. Again, little would change.

The possible retirement of Rehnquist raises another important variable. The chief justice has been treated for thyroid cancer, and many expect him to announce his retirement soon.

Rehnquist's departure would drop the number of conservatives on the court from three to two. Bush would nominate two instead of one, but the new justices, taken together, may end up mirroring the would-be combined votes of Rehnquist and O'Connor.

Finally, the legal principle of stare decisis will limit the changes. By institutional tradition, the Supreme Court overturns prior decisions only rarely. The justices routinely decline to overrule old cases even if they would have reached a different result the first time.

In other words, once a case is decided, it tends to stick around. This practice helps explain why most of the major decisions of the liberal Warren Court from the 1960s remain on the books today. It also suggests that most of the decisions shaped by O'Connor will remain the law in the future.

Court's Liberal Bloc Stands Firm (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

WASHINGTON — The Rehnquist court did not come to an end last week as predicted, despite the illness of the chief justice.

But the conservative Supreme Court led by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist did fade away, a development as surprising as the retirement announced Friday by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

In its place at the end of the term stood a moderate-to-liberal court led by John Paul Stevens, the 85-year-old justice who sports bow ties and whose energy and influence seem to have grown with age.

By forming alliances with O'Connor or Justice Anthony M. Kennedy — and sometimes even with Justice Antonin Scalia — Stevens has been able to forge a majority in some of the biggest Supreme Court cases.

The loss of O'Connor's vote might mean Stevens' sway over the court has reached its high-water mark. But with Kennedy and four liberals still in place, the Stevens bloc isn't likely to dissolve overnight.

He led a court this term that was determined to preserve the separation of church and state, increasingly willing to limit the death penalty, committed to removing racial bias from courtrooms and inclined to give cities broad power to regulate property.

In March, the justices struck down state executions of juvenile murderers as "cruel and unusual punishment," with Kennedy casting the key vote for a 5-4 majority; O'Connor was in dissent.

This followed a ruling in January that struck down the federal sentencing rules on the grounds that they gave judges too much power to add years to a defendant's prison term. In that 5-4 decision, Stevens formed an odd coalition that included Scalia and Justice Clarence Thomas. Again, O'Connor dissented.

On the final day of the term, a 5-4 ruling limited government-sponsored displays of the Ten Commandments. O'Connor joined Stevens in an opinion that said government officials could not promote or endorse religion.

Rehnquist was in dissent in all of these decisions.

This is not an entirely new trend. Indeed, this marks the third year in a row in which the liberal bloc has prevailed in the court's biggest cases.

In 2003, a liberal majority, led by Stevens and O'Connor, upheld affirmative action in colleges and universities, and held that gay couples deserved respect in their private lives, not criminal prosecution. That 6-3 ruling, in a Texas case, struck down the last of the laws that made sex between gays a crime. In the mid-1980s, Stevens had argued in a similar case for striking down such laws, but he had done so in dissent.

Last year, Stevens spoke for a narrow majority that rejected the Bush administration's contention that the president alone had the power to capture and hold "enemy combatants" — both foreign and domestic — for as long as he chose. The Constitution gives all individuals held by the government a right to go to court and to challenge the basis for holding them, Stevens said.

This term saw nearly a clean sweep for the liberal faction of the court.

The decision ending executions for young murderers followed in line with a Stevens opinion three years ago that ended state executions of mentally retarded criminals.

This year, the court also overturned two convictions of black men — one in Texas and one in California — because of racial bias in the makeup of the jury.

In what turned out to be one of the most controversial rulings, the court upheld the power of city officials to condemn private property, including homes, to make way for business development.

Stevens stressed that state legislatures may limit this power of "eminent domain," but federal judges should not take on the task, he said.

"This is the term where Justice Stevens became ascendant," Washington lawyer Mark I. Levy said. "It's been a dreadful term for the conservatives. I can't think of a single big case where the conservative side won."

Pepperdine law professor Douglas W. Kmiec, a former Reagan administration lawyer, said it was a "deeply troubling" term.

He pointed to "conservative losses on federalism and on property rights" as well as the "muddle" on religion and the Ten Commandments.

In all these areas, the high court this year rejected earlier opinions by Rehnquist that once held sway with the majority, Kmiec said.

For much of Rehnquist's tenure as chief justice, which began in 1986, the high court followed his lead. It gave more leeway to police and prosecutors. It rejected challenges to the death penalty. It restored support for state's rights and for property rights.

It also moved away from a strict church-state separation. Rehnquist once derided Thomas Jefferson's "wall of separation between church and state" as a "misguided metaphor … based on a bad history." Rehnquist said that from the days of George Washington, American officials had "acknowledged God" through solemn oaths, invocations and religious displays. He said he saw no problem with a "passive monument" of the Ten Commandments on public property.

The Bill of Rights, the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, commands that there can be "no laws respecting an establishment of religion." The Ten Commandments begin with the words, "I am the Lord thy God. Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Stevens said that if officials erected a monument of the Commandments at a government building, its message "is quite plain: This state endorses the divine code of the 'Judeo-Christian' God."

In the court's private conferences, Rehnquist and Stevens have special roles. The chief justice sits at one of end of the table and speaks first. He describes the issues in a pending case and says how he would resolve them.

Stevens, a 1975 appointee of President Ford, is the senior associate justice. He sits at the other end of the table and speaks next. Since the two often take opposite sides in major cases, the outcome turns on whether the other justices vote with Rehnquist or Stevens.

Once the votes are tallied, the chief justice, if he is in the majority, decides who writes the opinion. If not, Stevens decides who writes the opinion.

In the juvenile death penalty case, Roper vs. Simmons, Stevens had a 5-4 majority and assigned the opinion to Justice Kennedy. In his opinion, Kennedy noted that around the world, other nations had abolished capital punishment for crimes committed by people younger than 18.

"The stark reality is the United States is the only country in the world that continues to give official sanction to the juvenile death penalty," Kennedy wrote.

That comment drew a sharp rebuke from Scalia. "I do not believe that the meaning of our [Constitution] should be determined by the subjective views of five members of this Court and like-minded foreigners." Rehnquist agreed with Scalia.

Facing a clash between federal and state power, Stevens spoke for a 6-3 majority in ruling that the federal drug laws trumped California's law allowing the use of medical marijuana.

Kennedy and Scalia joined him, but Rehnquist and O'Connor dissented in Gonzales vs. Raich.

In a test of the Title IX law that bolstered sports for women, Stevens assigned O'Connor to write a 5-4 ruling that held that coaches and teachers could not be punished for complaining about unequal treatment for girls' and women's teams. Rehnquist joined the dissenters in Jackson vs. Birmingham.

In the pair of cases on the Ten Commandments, the majority was split. In a Kentucky case, McCreary County vs. ACLU, Stevens had a 5-4 majority to rule that it was unconstitutional for officials to endorse religion by posting the Commandments in the county courthouse. Justice David H. Souter wrote the opinion, and Justices O'Connor, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer signed on.

In the Commandments case from Texas, the chief justice had a 5-4 majority, and he wrote an opinion that upheld the granite monument that had sat for 44 years on the grounds of the state capitol in Austin. Breyer agreed with the outcome, but he did not agree with Rehnquist's view, leaving the chief justice without a true majority opinion in Van Orden vs. Perry.

Pepperdine's Kmiec says Rehnquist's illness had an effect this year. In October, the chief justice announced he had thyroid cancer, and he underwent surgery to have a hole opened in his windpipe. In January, he returned to the court on a part-time basis. And though he continued to preside over the court's conferences, he spoke haltingly and with evident difficulty.

"His absence from the center chair [during many of the public arguments] could have shaped the dynamic in those close cases," Kmiec said.

Rehnquist and Stevens were not always divided. The justices were unanimous in a series of important business rulings. They held that Internet companies could be held liable for stealing copyrighted materials if they actively aided computer users in downloading free music or movies.

And they ruled that scientists could use patented drugs in research on new drugs. And they limited the reach of an obstruction of justice law in overturning the criminal conviction against the defunct accounting firm of Arthur Andersen.

As the court's only octogenarians, the two also share some old memories. It brought them together in a dissent from the ruling that was welcomed in California and in much of the nation. It was the 5-4 decision that struck down the state laws that banned the direct shipment of wine to consumers.

Stevens grew up during the 1920s in Chicago, where his father owned the city's largest hotel. It was dry during the era of Al Capone and the gangster wars over booze. Rehnquist, born in 1924, grew up in Milwaukee.

The national experiment in the prohibition of alcohol ended in 1933 with the adoption of the 21st Amendment. But the amendment said the "importation into any state … of intoxicating liquors, in violation of [their] laws, is hereby prohibited."

"Today many Americans, particularly those members of younger generations who make policy decisions, regard alcohol as an ordinary article of commerce," Stevens said in a lecture to his younger colleagues, such as 68-year-old Kennedy and 69-year-old Scalia.

He recalled in his written opinion the "moral condemnation … of 'demon rum' in the 1920s and 1930s…. My understanding [and recollection] of the historical context reinforces my conviction" that the ban on cross-state sales of alcohol should be upheld as written.

Rehnquist agreed. So did O'Connor. The words of the 21st Amendment could not be clearer, agreed 57-year-old Thomas, showing again that neither ideology nor age was a sure predictor for a justice of the Supreme Court.

More Politicians For The Court (WP)

By Norman Ornstein

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

The resignation of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor means more than the loss of the most visible centrist on the Supreme Court. It also means the loss of the only justice who has been an elected politician. Before coming to the court in 1981, O'Connor had served in the Arizona Senate for five years, including time as majority leader.

Is that sort of experience important? Last year, at a remarkable seminar at Yale Law School, a group of former Supreme Court law clerks who served a half-century ago discussed the behind-the-scenes story of the 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education. That decision actually took two years to reach. It was unanimous in the end, spanning the full range of ideology on the court from William O. Douglas on the left to Felix Frankfurter on the right. It could easily have been 5 to 4, given the issues at stake, the intensity of views and the breathtaking change the decision represented.

Frankly, if the current court had been serving back then, the decision probably would have been 5 to 4, like so many other highly charged and controversial decisions of recent years. What is the difference? The Warren Court in 1954 had five members who had been politicians -- three former U.S. senators (one of whom had also been a mayor of Cleveland), one state legislator and a former governor, Chief Justice Earl Warren.

The former clerks talked about the way in which Warren, Justices Hugo Black, Sherman Minton, Frankfurter and others worked patiently to build consensus, not just a narrow majority. When it wasn't forthcoming the first time the case was up, they put it off to the next year. Liberals and conservatives alike understood how important it was for society, and for the credibility of the court, to find that consensus and put forward a united front. The fact that several of them had been schooled in an environment of coalition-building -- the legislative process -- was a key to that sensitivity and to the final result.

The Warren court of the 1950s was quite typical of American history up to that point, in that justices often came from political backgrounds. Only one of the nine justices in 1954, Minton, had served on a U.S. court of appeals, and he had been a senator before that. Contrast that with the current Supreme Court -- on which seven of the nine justices have served on a federal court of appeals and one other had service on a state court of appeals. The only current member without a background as a judge, interestingly, is Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

Why the change? Over the past 50 years, the federal courts have increasingly made public policy, from settling details on airborne emissions to intervening in disputes between telephone and cable companies to setting guidelines on abortion and sodomy. The increased policy role has come about in part because Congress has passed the buck on controversial decisions to the courts, and in part because judges, left and right, have been willing and eager to step in to fill vacuums. As our politics have become more ideological and more partisan, lifetime court appointments have thus become more important and valuable.

Choosing judges, especially at the Supreme Court level, has taken on a heightened importance -- and presidents and their partisans want to make sure they know what they are getting. A track record at the federal appeals court level is a much safer predictor of behavior at the next level up than service in the U.S. Senate, or as a governor or in other political office.

But having a court that consists largely or only of nonpoliticians has serious costs for the public. Not only are judges less inclined to think broadly of the country and its social and political divide, they are more likely to look at decisions with tunnel vision, not thinking through the problems of maintaining the court's standing with the public and of implementing difficult and divisive decisions.

Moreover, since much of what the court does is to sort out legislative intent, those without political experience have no real sense of how a legislature works and no direct idea of what legislative intent really means in the crucible of the legislative process. Politicians who have run for office and been in campaigns also know how politics works; the ignorance of basic politics shows up in the court's decisions on political issues such as redistricting.

With O'Connor gone, the Supreme Court will have no politicians and only one member, Stephen Breyer, who has worked in a legislature, as a staffer. Most of the names the White House has floated as possible Supreme Court nominees are, predictably, judges on federal appeals courts. It is time to expand the field to seriously consider people with political backgrounds. Former senators John Danforth and Warren Rudman would be superb choices. At least two current senators, John Cornyn of Texas and Jon Kyl of Arizona, fit the ideological criteria of the White House. Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, has mentioned other capable Republican senators, including Mike DeWine of Ohio and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. There are many others, including present and former governors, senators and House members, who could also fit the bill. The court, and the country, would be well served to have a politician or two on the bench.

By Frank James and Mike Dorning

CHT – Senate Battle, July 3, 2005

At People for the American Way headquarters Friday, Ralph Neas, the liberal advocacy group's president, briefly stopped in the "war room" to rally staffers and volunteers who were contacting activists shortly after Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her retirement.

"What's at stake is everything we care about," he told two dozen mostly young adults working phones and computers and filling envelopes. "We have to get the message out. If a right-winger replaces Sandra Day O'Connor, that right-winger can turn back the clock seven decades." Neas was between interviews and heading to a Capitol Hill news conference.

On the conservative side, the war room was more virtual than real. "Who needs a war room?" said Sean Rushton, executive director of The Committee for Justice. "We can all sit at our desks and e-mail."

Rushton spent the hours after the announcement in the office that his organization rents from a high-powered Republican lobbying firm, juggling conference calls among conservative activists and tapping away at his keyboard on press statements, talking points and a slew of e-mail.

"The message is, be magnanimous about Sandra Day O'Connor and speak about her as a conservative judge," he said.

A heated fight between interest groups on the political left and right over whom President Bush should name to fill a Supreme Court vacancy intensified sharply Friday, as both sides viewed O'Connor's retirement as a chance for Bush to significantly shift the nation's highest court to the right.

The announcement by O'Connor took virtually all the groups by surprise.

Raised stakes for all

For groups on both sides, O'Connor's retirement caused what already were high stakes to multiply because of her role as the court's main swing vote in 5-4 decisions. What had promised to be a major battle as Washington insiders speculated that ailing Chief Justice William Rehnquist might retire loomed as an even bigger fight with news that O'Connor is leaving the court.

Liberal and conservative efforts Friday were driven by fear on one side, hope on the other. Liberals feared decisions favorable to them on affirmative action, abortion rights, the environment and a host of other hot-button issues could be reversed in new rulings. Conservatives hoped a new justice would deliver just such reversals.

Neas and other leaders of the liberal coalition said they hoped the president would consult with Republican and Democratic senators about O'Connor's replacement and pick a consensus candidate. They said that is even more important now because the retirement was of a swing justice, as opposed to Rehnquist. A strong conservative replacement for the reliably conservative Rehnquist might be seen as retaining the philosophical mix among the nine justices.

Liberal advocates put the White House and Senate on notice that if the president wanted a contentious confirmation battle, he would get one.

"If he chooses the more divisive route and names a candidate who is extreme, he will ignite a firestorm," promised Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice.

O'Connor's announcement set in motion activities both sides had planned for months, with thousands of phone calls and hundreds of thousands of e-mails going out to activists who in turn were being asked to reach out to others to lobby their senators. Web sites were updated with the O'Connor news and suggested actions.

For conservatives, the goal was to get supporters to tell senators they wanted O'Connor, whom they called a true conservative, to be replaced by another. Liberals asked supporters to flood senators' offices with the message that they want a nominee who would draw broad bipartisan support.

O'Connor's announcement seemed to especially stun liberals because they viewed her as the key vote for their issues.

A `state of emergency'

"We are declaring a state of emergency at this point, not only for Roe vs. Wade," said Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women. That 1973 decision determined that women had a constitutional right to abortion, a position that O'Connor upheld in various cases during her 24-year tenure on the court.

As much as many liberals were shocked, conservatives, especially Christian conservatives, had a sense of the possibilities created by the vacancy.

"Today marks a watershed moment in American history: the resignation of a swing-vote justice on the Supreme Court and the opportunity to change the court's direction," said James Dobson, founder and head of the Focus on the Family organization and host of a radio show by the same name.

Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a conservative Christian activist group, said the organization had sent an e-mail alert to members but would wait until Bush nominates a successor before asking them to take action.

"We're all ready to go once there's a nominee," Perkins said.

Fears Of Battle Over High Court (BSUN)

By John Woestendiek And Robert Little

The Baltimore Sun, July 3, 2005

It's going to be a bruiser.

If you thought election 2004 and Terri Schiavo's last days were nasty confrontations in the so-called culture wars, just wait for the fight over who will fill Sandra Day O'Connor's U.S. Supreme Court seat.

Ruptures over gay marriage, flag burning or displaying the Ten Commandments will feel like mere tremors compared with the cultural quake sure to erupt when the nation's differences become the weapons with which the Supreme Court's future is determined, political analysts say. Expect the "red" and the "blue" to go at it fiercely enough to leave the nation purple, or at least with some long-lingering bitter feelings.

"It's likely to be the political equivalent of the war of the worlds," said Marshall Wittman - once legislative director for the Christian Coalition, now a senior fellow at the Progressive Policy Institute. "Unless the president completely surprises everyone and picks a moderate, he will likely trigger an end-of-all-times cultural battle over this nomination."

The White House said Bush won't announce a nominee until at least July 8, after he returns from a trip to Europe, but the fight over that nominee is looking to be bloody.

Soon after word of O'Connor's retirement surfaced, Planned Parenthood announced a series of rallies and sent a message to supporters saying, "We cannot remain idle in the face of such a threat."

David Corn, Washington editor of the left-leaning periodical The Nation, quickly posted a column saying, "It should be ugly."

"There will be much at stake. But ugly is ugly," he wrote, adding, "A titanic fight over a Supreme Court nomination can really ruin a summer in Washington."

"The supply lines are being formed," Wittman said Friday, hours after O'Connor, the first woman on the Supreme Court and a swing vote on abortion, announced her retirement.

"Everyone is canceling their weekend vacations to hunker down. People are being deluged with political spam. Everyone's sharpening their sound bites. It's lock-and-load time in Washington."

Those who believe in the concept of culture wars - the idea that the nation is increasingly divided into increasingly entrenched camps that are increasingly at odds over whether the government should legislate moral values - agree that this could be the mother of all of them.

Even before the 2004 election, which seemed to turn on the relatively new political theme of "moral values," the country's fractured conscience had grown apparent.

Disagreements over the balance of church and state have played out in debates over creationism in public schools or display of the Ten Commandments on public property, for instance. A rift over the definition of life and death, kept open by issues related to abortion, has been widened by debates in Congress and elsewhere about things like embryonic stem cell research and Schiavo's right to live or die.

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have provided more fuel, not only by spawning political opposition, but also by sparking disagreements over such matters as the treatment and rights of political prisoners, or whether individual rights should be sacrificed in the name of security.

Some see these culture wars as a concoction of the news media, think tank talking heads and TV producers who like everything to be, if not black and white, at least red and blue.

But even the cynics agree that O'Connor's resignation creates a prism through which the disagreements are likely to be concentrated, amplified and perhaps distorted, leading to the political skirmish of the fledgling century. No matter whom Bush nominates, Democrats are likely to put up a fight and, based on the high stakes and their losing record of late, it's likely to be an all-out one.

Some say another big, prolonged, values-laden battle in Washington will do little more than increase alienation and apathy among the masses, and even widen the rift between the right and left - that, when it comes to the national fabric, we might want to consider switching to Kevlar.

'A firestorm'

"The Democrats will see no downside to attacking this nominee mercilessly," said Richard Shenkman, editor of George Mason University's History News Network. "I don't see any way around it, really. It will be a firestorm."

The president could, of course, defuse the fireworks by appointing a moderate nominee, though few consider that likely. With his poll numbers down and his conservative core in need of a good soothing, he is more apt to rally supporters with a candidate of their ilk. And besides, the conservatives have been burned by the so-called moderates in the past.

While seven of the court's nine justices were appointed by Republicans, three of them - O'Connor, Anthony M. Kennedy and David H. Souter - have hardly been the conservative stalwarts that the party faithful might have expected. In perhaps the most telling example of the conservatives' laments, those three justices teamed up in 1992 to write the court's Planned Parenthood v. Casey decision, which reaffirmed abortion rights and dashed the hopes of the right wing.

"The conservatives have this history now of what they consider to be 20 years of betrayal," said Shenkman, an associate professor of history at George Mason. "They're demanding a true conservative, which will just fan the flames of the cultural war in this country.

"We're living through one of those periods in American history where there is great conflict, where society is not very settled. And I can't imagine things being any more settled after this."

Many expect Bush to choose a nominee who opposes legalized abortion to appease the conservative base of the party and to make up for his father's appointment in 1990 of Souter, whose votes have been more moderate than many expected.

"Consequently, it's payback time for the religious right," Wittman said.

"Ultimately, this fight will be about abortion," he said. "The No. 1 item on the agenda of social conservatives is to overturn Roe v. Wade."

Widening rift seen

Wittman believes the fallout from the battle will serve to widen the rift between those who vote based on their conservative moral values and those who think those values don't belong in the political arena.

"I think we will see the accelerated polarization of American politics, and quite possibly the further alienation of the American people from Washington," said Wittman, who was a Republican for 20 years.

"Most Americans' concerns are about health care, gas prices, and all those will be going to the wayside while Washington engages in the cultural war. Many other important issues will be ignored because of the primary focus on abortion."

That, he says, was the case with the debate over whether Terri Schiavo's feeding tube should be disconnected - the latest flare-up of the culture wars. For more than a year, conservative Christian and anti-abortion groups lined up against civil liberties attorneys, with elected officials entering the fray as reinforcements.

James Davison Hunter, a professor of sociology and religious studies at the University of Virginia and author of Culture Wars: The Struggle to Define America, said the Schiavo case, like the election, served as a trigger.

"My position is that cultural conflict is deeply rooted in American society and has been for quite a while, though it typically remains below the surface of political life until certain events, different events, act like a trigger to bring them to the surface.

"Once they're on the surface, they become politicized. Special interest groups, political parties and activists of all sorts become involved and stake out a position. Where the majority of Americans would want a compromise - some kind of middling position - the special interest groups tend to polarize the issue into stark options, and those extremes tend to frame the public debate."

Bush 'inclusive'

Some think Bush, who is expected to have at least one more Supreme Court seat to fill before his term expires, might choose a less contentious candidate this time - someone who doesn't drive the nation's political extremes to blows.

"My guess is that Bush will nominate someone who is acceptable to his base but who will not be the hard-core ideologue that a lot of them would have liked," said Corwin Smidt, executive director of the Henry Institute for the Study of Christianity and Politics at Calvin College in Grand Rapids, Mich.

"In this climate you won't be able to escape the debates about things like abortion rights or the Ten Commandments," Smidt said. "But despite all the talk about Bush being this polarizing figure, I think there's a lot of evidence in his record to suggest that he's very inclusive, particularly with regards to religion."

Nevertheless, most suspect a battle is in the offing.

"Ordinary people, the average American, spends most of life far away from the battle lines and considers most of these issues irrelevant to their daily lives, but when these triggering events happen, people end up making decisions within the categories that have been given," said the University of Virginia's Hunter.

"We saw that in the last election. Americans divided very evenly but very contentiously. We saw it on a smaller scale with Schiavo. Even though her circumstances were fairly remote from the average American's everyday experience, when senators and presidents become involved, when it becomes politicized and stays in the newscast and on the front pages of newspapers for as long as that did, eventually people take sides."

"As contentious as this is likely to be, it won't divide the nation in ways that will be enduring and really threatening to political institutions," Hunter said. "What it will more likely do is create a disaffection of the average voter. ... People get tired and weary of it."

Word From O'Connor Sets Off Pre-Fourth Fireworks (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

As reporters filed into the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) yesterday afternoon for a briefing on the process to replace Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Frist aide Bob Stevenson called out cheerfully: "This is a great introduction to the Fourth of July weekend. Anybody have to cancel plans?"

Well, yes and no.

O'Connor's announcement caught just about everybody by surprise -- even the White House, which rushed to schedule a Rose Garden appearance for President Bush before his meeting with Kuwait's prime minister. Most people had expected the ailing chief justice, William H. Rehnquist, to be the one making the announcement, and even that seemed doubtful as the days passed. Reporters and staff on the Hill arrived for work in blue jeans, hoping to slip away early for the holiday.

But in a sense, Washington could not have been better prepared for O'Connor's announcement. Liberals and conservatives alike have been drilling for months in preparation for the vacancy, and they responded with an impressive blend of logistical precision and ideological excess. Eighteen minutes after O'Connor's retirement became public, Frist was on the Senate floor reading a 1,600-word statement. Forty-nine minutes later, the first television ads were announced. Eighteen minutes after that, Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) became the first senator to disparage the Reagan-appointed O'Connor, for "self-indulgent judicial activism."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) caught a flight back to Washington to give a news conference. Within hours, hundreds of organizations and lawmakers had issued statements and news releases -- the liberal People for the American Way issued four

-- with the choicest political hyperbole: "Devastating," "historic," "ominous," "critical," "freedoms hang in the balance," "reinventing monarchy," "state of emergency," "save the court."

And Bush hasn't even nominated a successor.

With exceptions such as Coburn, the politicians left most of the hysteria to interest groups and resorted to euphemistic talk. Bush said he would "consult" with the Senate on a nominee. Democrats pretended that they did not have a "litmus test" for prospective justices. Republicans pretended that their only desire for a successor was that the justice would "interpret the law" and wouldn't "make public policy."

But beneath the official posturing was a simple truth: O'Connor is the tiebreaking vote on a range of hot-button social issues, and the battle to replace her will be in many ways a referendum on legal abortion. So it's no surprise that, starting at mid-morning, the O'Connor succession fight became the only game in town.

10:21. The first Associated Press bulletin crosses the wire: "O'Connor, high court's first woman, retires."

10:30. The conservative Becket Fund for Religious Liberty announces that its lawyers are standing by "to discuss the legacy of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and the impact her leaving the court will have on religious liberties." Three hours later, a PR firm issues astatement from the group saying "thank God she's retiring."

10:31. People for the American Way, in its first release, calls for "a consensus nominee," not an "aggressively activist ideologue."

10:33. The White House -- which evidently knew nothing of O'Connor's intentions when Bush's press secretary briefed reporters at 8:30 a.m. -- announces that Bush will speak at 11:15.

10:34. Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) rushes out a preemptive attack on the opposition. "While some Democrats will attack anyone the president nominates, I hope others will give the nominee serious and fair consideration," he says.

10:39. Frist, on the Senate floor, makes no mention of abortion but uses the conservative refrain that a justice's role is "to interpret the law and not to make public policy."

10:40. Planned Parenthood issues a press release: "Departure of Justice O'Connor Creates Ominous Vacancy. . . . Reproductive Rights Hanging in the Balance."

11:01. Senate Democratic leader Harry M. Reid, stuck at home in Nevada, issues his statement: "Justice O'Connor has been a voice of reason and moderation. It is vital that she be replaced by someone like her."

11:07. The liberal Alliance for Justice steals Planned Parenthood's 27-minute-old line. "Individual rights and freedoms hang in the balance," the group says. Not to be outdone, the ACLU warns at 11:11 that "we are gravely concerned that President Bush will use this opportunity to nominate someone whose judicial philosophy is hostile to civil liberties."

11:16. Sweat-soaked journalists wait in the sweltering Rose Garden as television correspondents struggle for words to describe the drama to their viewers. Bush emerges, grinning, saying he will "be deliberate and thorough" but also "timely." He praises O'Connor without praising her judicial opinions. And he warns filibuster-minded Senate Democrats that he wants a "fair vote."

11:21. GOP Chairman Ken Mehlman bemoans "the inevitable protest from far-left special interest groups." Democratic Chairman Howard Dean answers 57 minutes later by saying a cordial process "will be up to President Bush."

12:41. Frist's office serves notice that Supreme Court vacancies over the past 30 years have been filled in 72 days on average. Experts assembled by Frist's staff tell journalists that Bush is under no obligation to consult with Democrats and that it is "inappropriate" for Democrats to ask a nominee about specific issues, such as abortion.

12:49. The conservative Committee for Justice vows guilt by association. "We will be watching Senate Democrats and intend to link moderate and red states senators to their liberal Senate colleagues and outside groups," it announces.

1:42. The liberal Coalition for a Fair and Independent Judiciary weighs in, saying Bush should pursue a "consensus nominee" such as O'Connor, who was confirmed 99 to 0. Twenty minutes later, the conservative Family Research Council holds a news conference to call O'Connor's view on abortion "shocking" and to demand a successor in the mold of Rehnquist or Antonin Scalia. "We have been waiting over a decade," the group's chief, Tony Perkins, says. "We will seize this opportunity."

But he had better pace himself.

Interest Groups Gear Up On Court (PPG)

By Maeve Reston

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 3, 2005

Within minutes of Friday's announcement of the impending retirement of Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, interest groups on the right and left were fully engaged in long-drawn-up battle plans that promise to make this fight fiercer than any previous nomination.

As President Bush is expected to make an announcement regarding his choice to succeed O'Connor perhaps as soon as the end of this week, though possibly longer, groups were already firing off scores of e-mails that encouraged supporters to flood the White House with phone calls recommending the kind of nominee he should pick.

Organizations and coalitions on each side -- already immersed in plans and regular conference calls for several years, in some cases -- have scheduled news conferences and rallies across the nation throughout this week. The liberal group People For the American Way announced yesterday that it would begin running ads this week urging Bush to choose a nominee that could be approved with a broad bipartisan consensus.

One anti-abortion rights group, Generation Life, plans to hold vigils in front of the Supreme Court building before the confirmation hearings begin.

A pro-abortion rights group, Emily's List, was using the excitement of Friday's announcement to solicit those on its e-mail list to contribute to female Senate candidates who would protect abortion rights -- and potentially use minority-party power to block an anti-abortion rights nominee.

The fact that the court vacancy is the first in the era of Internet instant communication and mobilization had led many groups to speculate that thousands more Americans will become involved in the confirmation process as it winds through the summer.

But leaders on both sides say O'Connor's role as a critical swing vote on the high court has already brought a new level of intensity to the fight.

For many on the left, the loss of O'Connor's vote on the high court was the most feared prospect -- because it could lead to a reversal on some crucial abortion-rights cases and dozens of prior 5-4 decisions, ranging from affirmative action in college admissions processes to the recent ruling barring display of the Ten Commandments at courthouses.

"It intensifies everything that we were planning to do," said Elliot Mincberg, legal director at People for the American Way.

"She's been the swing vote in so many important areas -- civil rights, affirmative action, reproductive rights, environmental cases," he said. "So, literally, rights and liberties are at stake across the board depending on who her replacement will be."

For groups on the right, the vacancy is a chance to win appointment of a justice whose views are in line with the conservative justices whom Bush has said he admires most.

"The president has the historic opportunity to keep faith with the promise he has repeated numerous times, which is to name justices who are like Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel of the conservative Concerned Women for America.

She said it was ridiculous that Democrats including Sens. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut were already calling upon Bush to replace O'Connor with a justice of similarly moderate views. "They claim that you have to maintain the balance of the court," LaRue said. "That's irrelevant. ... It's not a constitutional requirement."

Though Senate Judiciary Committee officials say it will be at least several weeks, if not more than a month, before their panel begins holding hearings on whether to recommend confirmation of the president's choice, strategies for interest groups on both sides are already well-established -- as was evident in the first wave of e-mails they sent out.

For more than a week, the conservative Progress for America, a pro-Bush group that has pledged to spend $18 million on the fight, has been running ads intended to discredit liberals' criticism of Bush's court nominees -- stating that their adversaries are committed to 'tar and feather' any choice the president makes.

C. Boyden Gray, White House counsel for former President George H.W. Bush but now head of the Committee for Justice, a group formed to support the president's nominees, said groups on the left need to "take a breath and resist their natural impulse towards exaggeration."

"We call on Democrats to resist the temptation to use their attack machine against a qualified nominee," Gray said. "All parties should withhold judgment until a fair and sober analysis has occurred."

As did Democratic senators, these liberal activists underscored that O'Connor, after being nominated by then-President Ronald Reagan, was confirmed unanimously by the Senate in 1981 during a polarized time. They are urging that Bush, too, should choose "a consensus nominee." Kennedy on Friday already was referring to the precedent of the O'Connor selection as the "Reagan standard."

Nan Aron, head of the progressive Alliance for Justice, a longtime player in confirmation battles, said that with O'Connor's retirement, "individual rights and freedoms hang in the balance."

Bush, said Aron, "can unite the country and consult with both parties in selecting a moderate, consensus nominee -- someone like Justice O'Connor -- or he can continue down the path he has taken with lower-court nominees and name a controversial candidate who will further divide the nation."

Nominee Battle Lines Drawn (DMN)

By Allen Pusey

The Dallas Morning News, July 3, 2005

A look at the key players in the looming fight over the next Supreme Court justice:

REPUBLICANS

Committee For Justice: Committee executive director Sean Rushton's job is to provide instant background and talking points. "It is important to respond very quickly to anything the liberal groups or the Democrats put out there," he said.

He works for C. Boyden Gray, a White House counsel during the first Bush administration who spent the last three years creating a vaguely vertical structure for the hundreds of business, religious and single-issue interest groups that have a stake in getting a conservative court nominee. They have amassed an estimated $18 million to pay for advertising on behalf of a Bush nominee.

American Center for Law and Justice: Televangelist Pat Robertson founded the center, which has offices near the Supreme Court. Jay Sekulow, the organization's chief counsel, is preparing to guide his audience of 1.5 million, most of them evangelical Christians, through the confirmation process. "It's my job to speak to those people, to explain the process to them and get them involved," he said.

Federalist Society: Once little more than a law school debating club, the Federalist Society has become a significant conservative talent pool for law firms, government posts and judicial nominations. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas were Federalists, and most of the names being suggested for the next Supreme Court vacancy are, or have been, members of the society.

Leonard Leo, the group's executive vice president, will seek to convince disparate conservatives that another Federalist voice on the high court will benefit their cause, even if the nominee's record is ambiguous or incomplete.

DEMOCRATS

People For The American Way: Hollywood producer Norman Lear founded People For The American Way for the specific purpose of blocking the nomination of appeals court judge Robert Bork in 1987.

The group's executive director, Ralph Neas, former head of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, said the confirmation will represent a "titanic struggle over radically differing interpretations of the Constitution." His group has been conducting polling and focus groups to distill the most effective arguments against a conservative candidate and setting up a war room of more than 40 work stations to mobilize his troops.

Alliance For Justice: The alliance is a coalition of women's groups who see in any court nominee the potential loss of abortion rights. Nan Aron, its president, has been working to block some of the administration's federal appellate nominees.

"We're prepared to fight and to win if he sends up an individual who's a lightning rod," Ms. Aron said.

Leadership Conference on Civil Rights: Founded in 1950, the conference is a coalition of 180 rights organizations pooling their resources to affect legislation, civil rights litigation and, in this case, federal court nominations.

Executive director Wade Henderson's job is to mobilize and educate the vast array of rights groups under the conference umbrella, including organized labor, gay and lesbian groups, human rights activists and traditional civil rights organizations.

The Right's Moment, Years In The Making (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall And Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

With the Supreme Court vacancy left by the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the conservative movement has within its grasp the prize it has sought for more than 40 years: the control of all levers of the federal government.

From the ashes of Barry Goldwater's presidential campaign, conservatives have built an enduring governing majority, with Republicans winning seven of 10 presidential contests and holding unified control of Congress for 11 years.

The judiciary has until now been alone in clinging to liberalism and the remnants of the Democratic New Deal coalition. A series of Republican appointments to the Supreme Court -- John Paul Stevens, O'Connor, Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter -- have disappointed conservatives by frequently siding with the court's liberal bloc.

That could well happen again with O'Connor's replacement, but conservatives are cautiously hopeful it will not. President Bush has indicated that he will appoint a justice in the tradition of Antonin Scalia, a conservative stalwart. And the conservative movement has something it lacked during its losing battle for the confirmation of Robert H. Bork to the court 18 years ago: a highly coordinated movement that has fused the big dollars of economic conservatives with the grass-roots clout of millions of religious conservatives.

This, conservatives say, will prevent the defeat of another nominee such as Bork and will inoculate Bush from pressure to appoint a moderate such as Kennedy or Souter. And if it works with O'Connor's replacement, conservatives say, they will have found a formula that will allow them gradually to control the judiciary and revisit the full range of precedents regarding abortion, affirmative action, church-state matters and regulations of business and the environment.

"It is a moment of conclusion after years [in which] the conservative movement has moved very far," said Manuel Miranda, a former counsel to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) who leads a coalition of groups pushing for conservative jurists. "The resources on the right are so overwhelmingly different from what they were 11 years ago," when there was last a court vacancy.

Connie Mackey, of the conservative Family Research Council, said at a news conference Friday she sees "a tremendous amount of organization, unlike I'd ever seen" in past confirmation fights. "The social-issue groups as well as the fiscal conservative groups are determined that they're not going to see a Borking of any nominee that would be a good constitutionalist." That was a reference to the effective campaign by Democrats to demonize Bork and defeat his nomination by President Ronald Reagan to the high court.

The conservative bid to reshape the federal judiciary has been years in the making. Since the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision -- widely condemned by conservative legal thinkers -- groups such as the Federalist Society have sought to expand the ranks of young conservative lawyers. Dozens of conservative judicial appointments by Reagan and President George H.W. Bush have given the current president a broad pool of judges from which to choose for the high court.

The prospect of a new Supreme Court vacancy has accelerated this campaign. With the blessings of the Bush White House, a team of conservative leaders self-dubbed "the four horsemen" formed in 2002 and has taken over much of the planning for the nomination fight.

These men are C. Boyden Gray, an establishment lawyer who chairs the Committee for Justice; Jay Alan Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice; Leonard A. Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society; and Edwin A. Meese III, attorney general during part of the Reagan administration.

Gray, in an interview, described a battle plan over two years in the making. The Federalist Society will provide research in support of the nominee. A group called Progress for America, which backed the reelection of Bush in 2004, will spend as much as $18 million on radio and television backing Bush's nominee; and the recently created Judicial Confirmation Network, run by a former Bush campaign coalitions director, is setting up a grass-roots network in the states of six key senators.

"We have been preparing for this for 2 1/2 years," Gray said.

What Gray and others have done is fuse the GOP's economic and social conservatives, much as Bush did in his two presidential races. Gray's Committee for Justice represents business conservatives and has on its board top corporate lawyers; members of the Republican lobbying firm Barbour, Griffith & Rogers; John Engler, head of the National Association of Manufacturers; and Frank A. Keating, president of the American Council of Life Insurers.

O'Connor was pro-business in her rulings, and economic conservatives are determined to keep the seat that way in cases involving class-action lawsuits, tough enforcement of corporate-fraud laws and bankruptcy legislation -- all of which have bottom-line consequences of billions of dollars.

The financial clout of such conservatives is being paired with the grass-roots power of the social conservatives, who have been dismayed by recent rulings of the court on abortion, the Ten Commandments and other polarizing issues. The social conservatives are represented by people such as Sekulow; Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council; and James Dobson of Focus on the Family.

Perkins said Friday that his group "will be mobilizing over 20,000 churches" and is reaching "over a million people" daily through e-mail and the Internet.

The replacement of O'Connor with a more reliable conservative would, by itself, give conservatives a majority for the first time on church-state issues, affirmative action and such abortion issues as parental notification and what critics call "partial birth" procedures. Perhaps more significantly, it will bring the right within one vote of a solid conservative majority that could theoretically overturn the Roe v. Wade abortion ruling -- although some legal analysts say that could be years away.

Veterans of the culture wars of the past few decades see the shift of a couple of seats on the Supreme Court as the culmination of a long struggle.

"This fight has been going on for my entire adult lifetime," said Richard Land, president of the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics & Religious Liberty Commission, who was first ordained in 1969, six years after the Supreme Court had barred school prayer.

Gary Bauer, of the Campaign for Working Families and a 2000 GOP presidential candidate, said: "The court is both the last holdout and the major instigator of the disturbing changes in the values arena over the last 30 years."

Miranda calls the vacancy left by O'Connor a "test case" for conservative clout and says the right will demand that any Bush nominee have a "paper trail" showing strong conservative views.

DOJ_NMG_0001112

"The conservative movement is mobilized to prevent a Souter or even a Kennedy," Miranda said. And once a true conservative is nominated, he added, "The conservative movement is ready to fall on its sword for a presidential nominee, and that is in reaction to Bork."

Ralph G. Neas, who heads the liberal People for the American Way and has been involved in every confirmation battle since 1975, has grudging respect for conservatives' progress.

"They have taken efforts to enhance their organizational structure and be able to finance that structure in a way they haven't before," he said. "They're in many ways replicating what we have been doing for some time, and bringing in wads of new money through their corporate special-interest contacts. Their pockets are much deeper than ours."

The first goal of the conservatives' newfound organizational power is to pressure Bush to nominate an ideologically acceptable judicial candidate. Perkins said Bush "has committed to nominate justices like Scalia and Thomas." Rush Limbaugh, in his radio broadcast, warned that there "is no longer any room" for a "stealth" nominee without a proven conservative record.

Bush said during the 2004 presidential campaign that he admires justices such as Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- a statement that prompts Shannen W. Coffin, a former official in Bush's Justice Department, to say "there's no doubt the president made a promise" to nominate like-minded judges.

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and an adviser to Karl Rove, Bush's chief political strategist, said that starting with the election of 1968, "the left discovered it could no longer hold the presidency, so it turned to Congress for protection." After Democrats lost control of Congress in 1994, "the left turned to the courts. This is all they have left."

In Battle To Confirm A New Justice, Both Sides Get Troops Ready Again (NYT)

By David E. Rosenbaum And Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

The last time Ralph G. Neas and C. Boyden Gray went head to head as commanding generals in a war over a Supreme Court confirmation was in 1991, when Clarence Thomas was the nominee. Now, with the resignation of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, they are adversaries again.

Mr. Gray, who was White House counsel for President George Bush, won the Thomas battle.

But by all accounts, Mr. Neas had the superior operation: a unified battalion of labor unions, civil rights groups, women's organizations, civil libertarians and environmentalists that had more money, more energy and more firepower than had ever been used in a Supreme Court fight. It was an expansion of the same force Mr. Neas mobilized successfully in 1987 to defeat the nomination of Robert H. Bork.

After the bruising Thomas conflict, Mr. Gray, surprised by the fervor of the opposition, vowed he would never be outgunned again.

"When I was counsel, there was nothing out there," he said in a recent interview at his law office. "We didn't have the infrastructure with Bork or Thomas. The other side existed, but this side did not."

This year, said Mr. Gray, chairman of the Committee for Justice, an organization he formed three years ago to work for the president's judicial nominees, he was mustering outside forces that would be up to the fight.

"We haven't leveled the playing field," Mr. Gray said. "But at least we're on the field and we're able to engage." There is no doubt that his side has been much fortified. Progress for America, a group with close ties to the Bush administration, has begun to spend a pledged $18 million on advertising and organizing for the confirmation battle. Christian conservatives, who are far better organized and sophisticated than they were when the first President Bush named Justice Thomas to the court, are springing into action. And Mr. Gray, like his opponent, expects to have far greater reserves of cash and armies of activists this time around.

Some familiar faces are assisting Mr. Gray, who talks regularly with the White House about judicial nominees, in the confirmation campaign. The growing clout of Christian conservatives has given him new allies. He works closely with Jay Sekulow, general counsel of the American Center for Law and Justice, a Christian conservative legal group founded by the televangelist Pat Robertson, and Leonard Leo, a top official of the conservative Federalist Society who doubles as director of Republican outreach to Catholics.

By contrast, Mr. Neas, now president of People for the American Way, is presiding over a liberal coalition that has stayed largely intact over the last 10 years, still led by the same handful of veterans.

After learning of the O'Connor resignation Friday, Mr. Neas joined Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, and representatives from three dozen groups - including the A.F.L.-C.I.O., the American Association of University Women and the Leadership Conference for Civil Rights - at a Capitol news conference to call for a "consensus nominee."

Of the two generals, he is less likely to face dissension in his ranks. His coalition has worked with the Democratic leadership in the Senate all year on appellate court nominees, and Mr. Neas himself is so closely tied to the Democrats in Congress that Senator Edward M. Kennedy once called him "the 101st senator."

The conservatives, by contrast, are looser-knit and have a more contentious relationship with Republicans in the Senate. Mr. Gray's task is to hold them together despite their divergent interests.

Progress for America, for instance, can be counted on to support President Bush's choice. "Our focus as an organization all along has been to defend the president's nominee, no matter who that person is, from attacks from liberal interest groups," said Jessica Boulanger, a spokeswoman for the organization.

But the Christian conservatives say they will back only a nominee with a clear record of subscribing to their views on abortion, gay marriage and the role of religion in public life.

Meanwhile, business groups, which have largely sat out the fights over the president's appeals court nominees, have pledged support for Mr. Gray but will make no commitment until Mr. Bush's choice for the Supreme Court is known.

As in their previous confirmation battles, both sides will rely on advertising blitzes, barrages of mail and phone calls and media campaigns to deliver their messages. But this time they will have to compete to shape public opinion in the faster, more intense world of gossipy Web sites, political blogs and 24-hour news shows. Mr. Gray will be a regular television presence, agreeing to appear exclusively on the Fox network during the confirmation process.

He founded the Committee for Justice in 2002 at the request of Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's chief political adviser, and Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, then the Senate Republican leader, to work for the president's judicial nominees - and to expressly counter the voice and influence of Mr. Neas.

By Friday morning, Mr. Gray had convinced himself that any resignation would hold for the holiday weekend. When he got word of Justice O'Connor's plans, he left home in a flash and headed to his downtown office. Within minutes he was on the phone with allies - among them Edwin Meese III, former White House counsel and attorney general under President Ronald Reagan and now at the Heritage Foundation; former Gov. John Engler of Michigan, now president of the National Association of Manufacturers; and Mr. Sekulow.

A few blocks away on M Street downtown, Mr. Neas had been in his office since 6 a.m. He had joined People for the American Way, a group founded by the Hollywood producer Norman Lear as a political antidote to the conservative Christian movement, in 2000. During the Bork and Thomas battles, he headed the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. At 8:30 a.m., Mr. Neas called his wife, Katy, and promised that this weekend, unlike the past several when he had spent all day devising strategies to respond to various potential court nominations, they would take their 5-year-old daughter, Maria, to the zoo and to see the animated movie "Madagascar."

Then the news broke. By 10 a.m., Mr. Neas had his armies in motion. E-mail messages were sent to the bulk of the group's 750,000 members and supporters, as well as 10,000 reporters. Volunteers streamed into what the organization calls its war room, a 2,500-square-foot space in downtown Washington with 40 computers and 75 phone lines .

At seven regional offices across the country - in California, Florida, Illinois, New York and Texas - staff members were rounding up supporters to bombard the Senate and White House with e-mail messages and petitions once a nominee is announced.

For Mr. Neas, the Supreme Court is the ultimate guardian of fundamental rights, from civil rights to reproductive rights. For Mr. Gray, the Supreme Court is the final arbiter of the Constitution's enduring meaning, with no business usurping decisions better left to voters. Beyond their judicial philosophies, the leaders of the two campaigns could hardly be more different in appearance, background and temperament.

Mr. Gray, 62, is 6-foot-6 and lanky with an angular face. An heir to the Reynolds tobacco fortune, he went to Harvard, clerked for Chief Justice Earl Warren and has more than a trace of his native North Carolina in his voice.

Divorced, he has a daughter, Eliza, who is now at Harvard, and he lives most of the year alone in his elegant, orchid-filled Georgetown house, a hub of the Washington social circuit, where he is host to near-weekly fund-raisers for everything from his judicial interests to a Washington voucher program. He has faced ethics queries in the past for skirting campaign finance laws in the 1990's by using his secretary to make campaign donations to Mr. Lott and, during the first Bush administration, for meeting with oil company representatives while serving on a regulatory task force.

A partner at the traditionally Democratic law firm Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale & Dorr, Mr. Gray is said to be Mr. Bush's top pick for ambassador to the European Union. Business associates say he has been scaling back work with clients in his law practice, easing himself off the many boards on which he sits and making frequent trips to the State Department.

Mr. Neas, 59, is 5-foot-9 and compact, constantly in motion. He grew up outside Boston, graduated from Notre Dame and the University of Chicago Law School and cut his political teeth in the civil rights movement.

He was 42 when he married and did not become a father until he was 54. His family now lives in a three-bedroom home in Bethesda, Md., that he says is "almost large enough to take care of the three of us with room for a grandparent or two."

Paradoxically, both men switched parties well into adulthood.

Mr. Gray was a Democrat until 1978, when he became a Republican because, he says, he opposed the Carter administration's economic policies. Mr. Neas was a Republican and worked for Republican senators throughout the 1970's. He switched parties and ran unsuccessfully for Congress as a Democrat in 1998.

The two have not always been antagonists. In 1989, when Mr. Gray was White House counsel, they worked together on the Americans With Disabilities Act. But on the heels of that, they squared off as rivals once more on civil rights legislation.

"He's a very astute politician," Mr. Gray said of Mr. Neas. "He knows where all the pressure points are and he's a very serious adversary - or ally if you're on his side, which I have been."

Mr. Neas was more critical of his longtime opponent.

"President Bush and Trent Lott chose Boyden Gray to be the quarterback of the radical right," he said. "Boyden Gray has always been the consigliere for the Bush family and has always represented well corporate special interests, often at the expense of ordinary citizens across the country."

Activists Gear Up For Nominee Fight (WP)

By Peter Baker And Susan B. Glasser

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

Many of President Bush's conservative supporters lined up in staunch opposition yesterday to the candidate he might personally most want to name to the Supreme Court, his longtime friend and adviser, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, as battle lines were drawn for selection of the first new justice in more than a decade.

Bush has long been intrigued by the idea of making Gonzales the first Hispanic on the Supreme Court, according to advisers, a prospect that might seem especially tempting in replacing Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the court's first woman. But a range of activists and congressional Republicans warned the White House against the move, saying they do not consider Gonzales a steadfast conservative.

"We would oppose him because we don't believe he has a philosophy that we can determine. We are not enthused," said Tom Minnery, vice president of public policy for Focus on the Family, a conservative advocacy group. "He is someone who is apparently still developing his philosophy, and that's not good enough," Minnery added, citing Gonzales's "lack of open commitment to interpret the Constitution as it was written."

The surge of pressure after O'Connor's retirement announcement Friday reflected the brief but intense struggle that will play out in Republican circles in coming days. Bush leaves Tuesday for an international summit in Europe and does not plan to name a nominee until the week of July 11 at the earliest, leaving Republicans a short time to influence his decision. If the broader nomination battle will resemble a presidential campaign, as both sides predict, then the next week or two could amount to a primary.

While some focused on whom Bush's choice will be, others mapped out strategy for the period after he decides. Senate Republicans made plans to begin hearings as quickly as possible after the nomination, focused not on the candidate's positions on hot-button issues but on legal credentials.

A Republican planning document provided to The Washington Post described the need to avoid disclosing the nominee's "personal political views or legal thinking on any issue."

Democrats, by contrast, prepared a campaign to extend the process and portray anyone Bush selects as outside the mainstream. The liberal People for the American Way moved to claim O'Connor's mantle with a new television commercial that flashes her image and demands that Bush pick someone in her pragmatic tradition who "protects our fundamental rights and freedoms" or risk dividing the country.

Intent on preventing the other side from gaining the upper hand, liberals and conservatives spent the weekend in meetings, on conference calls and drafting talking points for Sunday talk shows -- and preparing for the wild-card possibility that a second seat would open if Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist steps down as well.

From Camp David, Bush consulted by telephone with Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. while lawyers at the White House assembled dossiers of candidates for him to take on the flight to Scotland, a senior administration official said.

Various activists and groups have lobbied for their favorites on the list of federal appellate judges under consideration. Appeals Judge J. Michael Luttig of the 4th Circuit is the choice of many conservatives who cite his sharp mind and sturdy track record after 14 years on the bench. The Christian Legal Society and other religious conservatives are promoting Judge Michael W. McConnell of the 10th Circuit, although his criticism of the Supreme Court's decision in the Bush v. Gore decision that ended the 2000 election recount left hard feelings at the White House.

Some activists also point to Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. of the 3rd Circuit, nicknamed by some "Scalito" for demonstrating the same sharp intellect and conservative views of Justice Antonin Scalia. If Bush wants a woman to replace O'Connor, conservatives have embraced Appeals Judges Edith Brown Clement and Edith Hollan Jones, both of the 5th Circuit. If he wants a Hispanic, they have recommended another 5th Circuit judge, Emilio M. Garza, instead of Gonzales.

Judge John G. Roberts of the D.C. Circuit, described as a front-runner by outside White House advisers, does not elicit as much enthusiasm from conservatives but has passed the test of key figures. "Everything I know about him would say he would fit that profile of Scalia and [Clarence] Thomas," said Jan LaRue, counsel to the Concerned Women for America, a conservative group.

Some conservatives yesterday advanced the strategy of naming Janice Rogers Brown, who was confirmed last month to the D.C. Circuit after a Senate battle. Having just confirmed Brown, activists reason, Senate Democrats would not be able to turn around and argue that she meets the criteria of "extraordinary circumstances" deserving a filibuster as defined by a recent bipartisan deal on judicial nominations. And as a black woman, she would be harder to vote against, these strategists reasoned.

"She's just been through the process," said Gary L. Bauer, president of the Christian organization American Values. "It's kind of hard to vote for her once and then turn around and say she's unacceptable."

The one candidate who unifies most conservatives -- in opposition -- is Gonzales. Gonzales occupies a spot on the innermost orbit of the Bush universe, having been a longtime adviser. He was appointed by Bush to the Texas Supreme Court, then he served as White House counsel before becoming attorney general.

Advisers both inside and outside the administration said Bush has not ruled him out for O'Connor's seat, although in his current capacity he is helping to direct the search, and friends say he is reluctant to join the high court, preferring the pace of the executive branch.

While Bush places enormous trust in him, Gonzales elicits groans and eye-rolling from conservatives who worry how he might rule on some issues and see him as another potential David H. Souter, the little-known New Hampshire judge put on the bench by Bush's father and who has turned out to be far too liberal for their taste.

Conservatives most often cite Gonzales's rulings on parental consent cases in Texas involving minors seeking abortions. Gonzales has publicly called Roe v. Wade , the case that established a woman's constitutional right to abortion, "the law of the land," once adding that "how I feel about it personally may differ with how I feel about it legally." Asked during a recent interview with PBS's Charlie Rose whether support for Roe would disqualify a prospective nominee, Gonzales said, "There are no litmus tests for this president."

"The only nomination that would cause the people that I really associate with consternation would be Gonzales," said Michael P. Farris, a prominent conservative constitutional lawyer. "The president's going to need all the help he can get no matter who he picks. I don't think many people in the socially conservative movement would openly oppose him, but the enthusiasm would be sufficiently dampened to the point that many would not participate."

Out of deference to a Republican White House, other conservatives are not as open about their opposition to Gonzales, using code instead, such as urging the president to pick another Scalia or Thomas, whom he has described as his model jurists.

"Conservative groups strongly believe that the president should just do what he promised to do. He was crystal clear on his vision of the appropriate qualities of a judge," Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.) said in an interview yesterday. "He can't allow personal or short-term political factors to override his commitment."

Other conservatives have come up with a new line of argument to dissuade the White House from selecting Gonzales without offending the president. Because he helped fashion so many administration policies, they said, Gonzales would have to recuse himself if they ever came before the bench, including the highly emotional case of late-term abortions that opponents call "partial birth."

"I don't think the president wants to have a 4 to 4 vote when that comes up before the Supreme Court," said Wendy E. Long, counsel to the Judicial Confirmation Network, a group supporting conservative judicial nominees. "That's just not a good position for a justice to be in."

Yet some conservatives have resigned themselves to Gonzales. Robert H. Bork, whose Supreme Court nomination was defeated in 1987, said his friends believe Gonzales will be the nominee and that lobbying will not change that. "Already, people have been pushing various candidates, but I don't think that's going to have much effect on Bush," he said. "I think he already knows what he wants to do."

Bush advisers refused to discuss individual candidates yesterday but brushed off criticism of Gonzales.

"This is not the first time he has come under scrutiny," said a senior administration official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the selection process. "He's a well-centered person. His relationship with the president is strong enough that I don't think he worries too much about the chatter."

Indeed, Gonzales draws criticism from the left side of the political spectrum as well. During his confirmation as attorney general earlier this year, most Democrats voted against him, citing his authorship of detention policies that some blamed for leading to abuse of military detainees.

"We would have serious concern about Gonzales based on what we know of his record on issues pertaining to torture, executive privilege and his handling of death penalty clemency positions" in Texas, said Nan Aron, president of the liberal advocacy group Alliance for Justice. "On other issues about which the right is particularly concerned -- reproductive rights, civil rights -- it would be important for the Judiciary Committee to ask him to answer questions. It's very difficult to know where he stands."

Conservative Groups Rally Against Gonzales As Justice (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, Todd S. Purdum And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Within hours after Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's announced retirement from the Supreme Court, members of conservative groups around the country convened in five national conference calls in which, participants said, they shared one big concern: heading off any effort by President Bush to nominate his attorney general, Alberto R. Gonzales, to replace her.

Late last week, a delegation of conservative lawyers led by C. Boyden Gray and former Attorney General Edwin Meese III met with the White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., to warn that appointing Mr. Gonzales would splinter conservative support.

And Paul M. Weyrich, a veteran conservative organizer and chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, said he had told administration officials that nominating Mr. Gonzales, whose views on abortion are considered suspect by religious conservatives, would fracture the president's conservative backers.

The groundswell of opposition to Mr. Gonzales was just one sign of the conflicting forces suddenly swirling around Mr. Bush this weekend as he headed to Camp David to begin considering a replacement for Justice O'Connor, a decision his aides said would not be announced before he returned from a trip to Europe at the end of next week.

Senate Democrats demanded that he consult them before making a choice and appoint a pragmatist in Justice O'Connor's mold.

Conservatives, flexing their muscles in a battle they have spent a decade preparing for, described the nomination as a test of Mr. Bush's convictions and past promises, and his biggest opportunity yet to assure that the Bush presidency will leave a conservative stamp for a generation to come.

And on Friday, the Rev. Miguel Rivera, president of the National Coalition of Latino Clergy and Christian Leaders, a group that represents more than 6,000 Latino evangelical churches, sent the president a letter urging consideration of "a true conservative Latino nominee," Emilio M. Garza, a federal appeals judge from Texas.

In a telephone interview late Friday, Mr. Rivera said he had received no response. "All the meetings we have had in all the different groups today we have not heard anything to reassure us that he is out of the loop," Mr. Rivera said of Mr. Gonzales.

Administration officials discounted the conservative uprising against Mr. Gonzales, saying that Mr. Bush was already aware of the objections and was not convinced by them.

"It is what it is," said one senior administration official, who insisted on anonymity in exchange for discussing the White House views of the criticism of the attorney general. "The president is going to pick someone who is a true constructionist and who is correct in interpreting the law." The official said that Mr. Gonzales fit that description, but also that Mr. Bush might be wary of moving him to a new position so shortly after he was confirmed as attorney general.

Mr. Bush planned to spend the weekend getting a head start on "homework" on a list of potential nominees and expected to "be on the phones with his advisers," said another senior administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity to describe internal deliberations. He said that the president had been briefed on his staff's preparations for a court vacancy, and that "he knows the orbit of names."

Other White House aides said they had canceled holiday plans to meet with supporters and prepare for a fight whose dimensions and intensity would be, to a considerable extent, dictated by the nominee Mr. Bush settles on.

Members of Congress and conservatives close to the White House said that they were confident that Mr. Bush would use the first Supreme Court vacancy of his tenure to nominate a judge in the mold of Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, as he has repeatedly promised to do.

"They don't need me lobbying on this stuff - they know what to do," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, a conservative group with close ties to the White House. "My only recommendation is that they nominate someone who is 12 or 13 years old," to ensure as long a conservative legacy as possible.

Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, a veteran and former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which will hold hearings on any nominee, said flatly of Mr. Bush: "He's going to appoint a conservative. I have no doubt about that."

But Mr. Hatch, breaking with fellow conservatives, suggested in an interview that he would support Mr. Gonzales.

"Let me not get into any nominee, but Gonzales is an excellent human being," Mr. Hatch said. "He's done an exceptional job as White House counsel. He's brought additional stability and peace to the Justice Department. I know the president is interested in trying to find people of diversity - he's really bent over to do that as president."

Mr. Gonzales is a longtime Bush aide and friend from Texas, and naming him could enhance the Republican Party's standing among Hispanics, one of the president's longtime political goals. Some conservatives acknowledged that they had stated their opposition to him with some delicacy to avoid provoking the White House, given Mr. Gonzales's friendship with the president.

But the swift and vociferous opposition to Mr. Gonzales reflected the intensity of concern on the right over just what kind of conservative Mr. Bush will choose, as he moves toward a decision that will go a long way toward settling any question about what kind of conservative he is, and how his presidency will be remembered.

Mr. Weyrich, while declining to disclose the specifics of a recent conversation with Ken Mehlman, the Republican Party chairman, said: "We have let the administration know through whatever channels we have that Gonzales would be an unwise appointment because of the opposition of some of the groups," some of which he said would actively oppose Mr. Gonzales, while "others like the Southern Baptists and myself would simply not help."

For many conservatives, who have seen Republican presidents nominate justices like Ms. O'Connor who then vote against them on pivotal issues, Mr. Gonzales epitomizes the fear of the unknown. But in other ways, and to some Democrats, he is very well known, confirmed by a vote of 60-to-36, along largely partisan lines, after unexpectedly contentious hearings and debate in which Democrats challenged his policies on the detention and treatment of prisoners in the administration's campaign against terror. In a 2002 legal memorandum, Mr. Gonzales characterized as "obsolete" the Geneva Conventions' limitations on questioning of enemy prisoners, and he said provisions in the conventions like commissary privileges and athletic uniforms were "quaint."

"He would face stiff opposition from liberal groups," said Nan Aron, president of the liberal legal group Alliance for Justice. "He would have to answer tough questions about his role in the administration's war on terror."

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York and a member of the Judiciary Committee, declined to say on Saturday how Senate Democrats might respond to a Gonzales nomination. "It's too early to tell - we're not talking about any specific judge," Mr. Schumer said.

He described the situation with Mr. Gonzales as "a real Rubicon for this president. The hard, hard right wants a true believer."

Even at a time when they have unprecedented influence in the nation's capital, many conservative leaders have become increasingly restive at their comparative lack of sway on the court and have described the selection of the next justice as the most important decision Mr. Bush will make - even if he has to force it through at the expense of his ambitious second-term agenda.

Some Republicans warned that a very conservative nomination by Mr. Bush would guarantee a protracted legislative battle that could doom any hope Mr. Bush had of pushing through a Social Security or tax reform bill.

At the same time, Kenneth M. Duberstein, who managed the Supreme Court nominations of Clarence Thomas and David H. Souter for Mr. Bush's father, said that the president could go only so far in replacing Justice O'Connor, a Reagan appointee who turned out to be a major disappointment to the right.

"Any nominee can be a notch or two to the right of Sandra Day O'Connor, but not 10 notches to the right," Mr. Duberstein said, noting that the political dynamics are different than if Mr. Bush were replacing Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who is ill with thyroid cancer and still widely expected to retire.

The National Review said in an editorial on its Web site: "Conservatives would be appalled and demoralized by a Gonzales appointment."

Phyllis Schlafly, a longtime conservative activist, said: "Bush was very clear, and certainly his constituents believed him, when he said he would appoint justices like Scalia and Thomas. We are not in favor of Gonzales." Reflecting a widely held view among conservatives, and one of the reasons for the intensity of the sentiment on the right, Mrs. Schlafly described Justice O'Connor as "a terrible disappointment."

But other conservatives said there was no reason to fear, given Mr. Bush's record of appointing conservatives as president, and noted Mr. Bush's unambiguous embrace of conservative ideals.

"Whatever else you say about President Bush, he is certainly the type of man who says what he means and means what he says," said Paul Rosenzweig, a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative group. "I also think it's clear that the majority who elected him - and who elected 55 members of the Senate - is looking to him to fulfill that pledge. Just as President Clinton took the opportunity to name two very liberal judges, the president's constituency will be looking to him to appoint a conservative jurist."

White House officials declined to comment, saying that Mr. Bush would not make a final decision until he finished reviewing potential candidates and consulting with Senate leaders, and that they were making an orchestrated effort to avoid saying or doing anything that would feed what they feared could be a week of speculation. One Republican with close ties to the White House said administration officials assumed that Mr. Bush would have at least one other vacancy to fill, and that that could influence his thinking.

Among the names most frequently mentioned as likely candidates, besides Mr. Gonzales and Mr. Garza, are Judges J. Harvie Wilkinson III and J. Michael Luttig of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Richmond, Va.; Judge John G. Roberts Jr., who sits on the federal appeals court in Washington; and Judge Michael W. McConnell of the 10th Circuit, which is based in Denver. Should Mr. Bush consider a woman, the most likely candidates are Judges Edith Brown Clement and Edith H. Jones, both of the Fifth Circuit, based in New Orleans.

Republicans and Democrats agreed on the importance of the appointment for Mr. Bush's legacy, though they differed sharply - and predictably - over what kind of nominee he should choose.

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, said that he believed that Mr. Bush would pick "a qualified, mainstream nominee." But he acknowledged that "the problem is because of the contentious nature of the process, sometimes even mainstream nominees are caricatured in a way that makes them appear to be extreme."

Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona and a member of the Judiciary Committee, said in a telephone interview: "You know President Bush. You know the kind of person he is. You know the way he's approached personnel questions. He's going to be very straightforward about the kind of person he wants."

High Noon For High Court (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus

Like vast armies taking up positions on the eve of battle, interest groups of right and left are readying for a fight over President Bush's nomination of a successor to Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Both sides agree that the battle is likely to be fierce. The stakes are high: O'Connor has been one of the court's "swing votes" whose views determine how cases are decided. The debate over her replacement will focus on some of the most painful and divisive issues before the nation: abortion, gay marriage, religious symbols in public places. It will likely dominate Washington's agenda -- and the media's -- for two months or more.

But in the middle of the storm, like civilians caught on a battlefield, much of the nation may wish that the whole thing would just go away.

"This will be the Super Bowl of polarization for ideological interest groups," said pollster Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center. "But for most of the country, it may just look like another partisan battle in Washington."

Abortion, gay marriage and religion may be "hot button" issues, prized by interest groups and political consultants for their ability to mobilize people to vote and donate money. But most Americans consider those issues less pressing than the war in Iraq or the state of the economy, and recoil from the acrimony of the debate.

"The rhetoric is going to be terrible," predicted Patricia McDonald, a semi-retired lawyer in Leawood, Kan. "Cable television is filled with talking heads who get paid to talk like that, to take the most extreme viewpoints. . . . But in the end, we don't get to vote about this. Life will go on.

"I don't think this is going to be nearly as divisive as the presidential campaign," she added. "Even then, we had a lot of disagreement, but I don't think I met more than two people who really got upset about it."

An increasing number of political scientists agree with her. Americans, they argue, aren't as polarized as they look.

On Election Day, the United States may divide into a 50-50 nation -- or, in last November's choice between George W. Bush and Sen. John F. Kerry, 51-48. But even on the most hotly debated issues, most Americans prefer a position somewhere in the middle.

Most don't want to outlaw all abortions, polls show, but they'd like to see a few more restrictions. Most don't approve of gay marriage, but they're willing to consider other legal rights for homosexuals.

"There's a difference between division and polarization," said Morris Fiorina, a political scientist at Stanford University's Hoover Institution. "We are a closely divided nation -- but we aren't all that deeply divided. In a battle like this one, you're listening to 10 percent on each side scream at each other."

The problem, Fiorina and others say, is that the American political process has become polarized -- and it's increasingly forcing voters to choose between one extreme and the other, leaving out the middle.

The battle over Bush's impending Supreme Court nomination will combine several of the factors that have made politics so divisive. It will likely focus on controversial social, cultural and religious issues. It will culminate in a yes-or-no question -- should the nominee be confirmed, or not? -- without much room for middle ground. And the debate will be spearheaded by interest groups on both extremes -- groups that sometimes appear to have a vested interest in polarization because it increases their influence.

"You've got large amounts of what we used to call issue advocacy money -- money that exists and waits to be deployed in the service of polarization," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania. "That's a new factor."

"It's an open question whether they are raising the money to fight the battles or fight the battles to raise the money," said William A. Galston, who was an aide to former President Clinton and now teaches at the University of Maryland. "This is an infernal machine that has taken on a life of its own."

The coming battle includes several other features that could make the conflict even sharper.

"You have at least two presidential prospects in the Senate . . . whose self-interest lies in gaining as much visibility as they can in a way that will activate their core constituencies," Jamieson said, citing Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., and Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del.

That's not all. This will be the first Supreme Court confirmation battle in 11 years -- which means it will be the first such battle of the Internet age, with its legions of bloggers, and the first of the current era of media polarization, with phalanxes of partisan commentators on competing all-news cable channels.

It will also be the first confirmation battle over a Supreme Court nominee during the current era of conservative Republican domination in both houses of Congress as well as the White House.

Many conservatives have targeted the judiciary as the last branch of the federal government they hope to dominate. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas, has derided the federal courts as "the left's last legislative body."

"Conservatives want a conservative justice, and they feel betrayed by past nominees that weren't contentious," said Jamieson. "That sets up the likelihood that this is going to be hard-fought and divisive."

But Galston, a Democrat, said his party is partly to blame.

"Beginning in the 1950s, the Democratic Party convinced itself that, especially on social issues, the principal vehicle of advance would be the Court," he said. "As a result . . . the principal focus of many interest groups was centered on the Court. Well, there's a Newton's Law of politics: Every action generates a reaction -- frequently an equal and opposite one. The interest groups on the conservative side have become highly court-centered as well."

The history of the abortion issue -- especially the 1973 decision that states could not prohibit abortion -- is a case in point, he said. "Whatever its judicial merits, Roe v. Wade has led to an intensification of polarization and bitterness in American discourse over social issues," Galston said.

"In 1972," before Roe, "neither party platform even mentioned abortion," he noted. "In 1976, each mentioned it in a nuanced way. . . . By 1984, not only was all nuance gone, but people who disagreed with the established line of each party were anathematized."

Divisive partisan battles produce another unwelcome result, Galston said: alienated, disaffected citizens.

"There's a very large share of the American electorate that feels unrepresented by this polarized politics," he said. "The popularity of figures like (Sen. John) McCain, R-Ariz., and (former Secretary of State Colin L.) Powell represents a yearning for leadership by the underrepresented middle who always lose out to the extremes."

If Bush's nominee is a controversial hot-button conservative, he warned: "We could see an orgy of self-destruction. It will bring the rest of the nation's business to a halt for an extended period."

It doesn't have to be that way.

"It's not inevitable," said C. Michael Comiskey, a Supreme Court scholar at Pennsylvania State University at Fayette. "If you look at the confirmation process since (1987), three of the four have been consensual, not 'conflictual'. . . .It's up to presidents to decide whether Supreme Court nominees are conflictual."

In other words, he said, Bush could consult with senators in both parties and nominate a judge who would not polarize the debate.

And even a hard-fought confirmation fight doesn't need to be a bad experience, Jamieson suggested.

"Contentious isn't bad," she said. "What's bad is demagogic-contentious. What's bad is mindless polarization.

NOW Marches In Support Of Abortion Rights (AP-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0001120

By John Gerome, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

Chanting "Not the church, not the state; women must choose their fate," hundreds of members of the National Organization for Women rallied for abortion rights Saturday as President Bush prepares to select a new U.S. Supreme Court justice.

NOW shifted the agenda for its three-day annual convention following the announcement Friday that Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was retiring.

The first woman on the Supreme Court, O'Connor refused in 1989 to join four other justices who were ready to reverse the landmark 1973 decision that said women have a constitutional right to abortion.

In 1992, she helped forge a five-justice majority that reaffirmed the core holding of the 1973 ruling. Then, in 2000, she provided the fifth and decisive vote that struck down a Nebraska law that was aimed at banning a procedure critics call "partial-birth" abortions.

Her retirement gives the court its first vacancy since 1994 and leaves Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg as the only woman on the court.

Activist Eleanor Smeal told the crowd that if Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has any future presidential ambition, he can't be known as the lawmaker instrumental in rolling back abortion rights. Frist, R-Tenn., will be expected to guide Bush's choice to succeed O'Connor through Senate confirmation.

"What we have to do now is raise such a loud voice that Sen. Bill Frist (news, bio, voting record) hears it," said Smeal, former president of the National Organization of Women and current president of the Feminist Majority Foundation. "He has to understand we need a moderate, centrist Supreme Court."

Frist spokesman Nick Smith said it was "premature to be talking about who the president may or may not nominate."

He said the senator would do his best to see a thorough and fair confirmation process. Frist has said he will give up his Senate seat when his term ends next year, but he hasn't answered — or discouraged — speculation that he will run for president in 2008.

Demonstrator Kathy Miller, 58, of Philadelphia, said she wanted to see a moderate justice in the same vein as O'Connor replace her.

"It's not like we're asking to go in the extreme other direction," she said.

Members of NOW planned to elect their president Saturday night.

NOW president Kim Gandy, elected in 2001, is being challenged by Connecticut lawyer Rosemary J. Dempsey, who has held several national and state leadership roles since joining NOW in 1970.

Liberals Gird For Supreme Struggle (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

A group of the most influential liberal court lobbyists gathered in a high-ceilinged room across the hall from the Senate chamber, within hours of Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement announcement Friday.

With grave expressions on their faces, the activists stood somberly behind a lectern and one-by-one delivered impassioned pleas that Justice O'Connor be replaced with a jurist who will protect their particular interests.

"This is a watershed moment," said Ralph G. Neas, president of People for the American Way, noting that this fight will be even more momentous than the one for which they have been preparing for years, the successor to the chief justice.

Most active court watchers were expecting to see the resignation of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, an unwavering conservative on the court. With the surprise announcement from Justice O'Connor, often a swing vote on the court, liberal activists such as Mr. Neas rushed from playing offense on replacing a conservative to having to defend a vital vote.

"Over the last 10 years, we have not had a Rehnquist Court; we've had an O'Connor Court," he said, arguing that replacing her with a reliable conservative would be a "constitutional catastrophe."

Less vocal last week -- but every bit as powerful and involved in the judicial-selection process -- were conservative activists, some of whom chuckled with delight over their turn of good fortune.

"The game hasn't changed, but the post-game celebration will be much bigger," said Manuel Miranda, chairman of the conservative Third Branch Conference. "Drinks will be on me."

DOJ_NMG_0001121

On Friday, many conservatives chose to applaud the service of Justice O'Connor, but to otherwise keep quiet. White House aides and Senate Republicans sent out the word that there should be no public relief that it was Justice O'Connor, rather than Chief Justice Rehnquist, who was retiring.

"Nobody wants to get into gloating here," said one conservative activist. "We're all too aware of what's at stake."

Activists on both sides of the issue have marshaled thousands of people across the country and raised millions of dollars to wage this battle. About the only thing both sides seem to agree on is that much is at stake.

Karen Pearl, interim president of Planned Parenthood Federation of America, told reporters that "this may be one of the most critical and dangerous moments for the future of women's reproductive freedom that any of us have seen in our lifetime."

Few issues carry more voltage on both sides than abortion rights. Ms. Pearl noted the Independence Day weekend and said "there is no freedom more fundamental to our rights than the ability for women to decide whether and when to parent."

Already, she said, Planned Parenthood has alerted 1 million of its supporters, trained 50,000 local leaders and mobilized more than 170 campus groups to rally against any Supreme Court nominee deemed weak on supporting reproductive rights.

The issue is no less important to conservative activists, who are expecting President Bush to nominate someone who is unapologetically opposed to abortion rights.

"The president has the historic opportunity to keep faith with the promise he has repeated numerous times, which is to name justices who are like Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel for Concerned Women of America.

Many conservatives opposed to abortion have made clear that they would not, for instance, be satisfied with the nomination of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Mr. Gonzales is often discussed as a possibility for the high court, but has written opinions conservatives say give adolescents too much leeway to get abortions without notifying their parents.

But abortion won't be the only issue in the upcoming Supreme Court fight.

Justice O'Connor "served as a moderate voice of reason on the court," said Nancy Zirkin, deputy director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. "She played a pivotal role in protecting the right and liberty of all Americans in cases involving affirmative action, human rights, religious freedom, criminal justice and the rights of women -- including reproductive health -- people with disabilities, gays, lesbians and many other communities whose rights are often jeopardized."

She begged Mr. Bush to follow the "shining example of President Reagan" in naming Justice O'Connor's successor. Mr. Reagan also nominated U. S. Court of Appeals Judge Robert H. Bork for the District of Columbia Circuit, a staunch conservative, to the Supreme Court in 1987, but his nomination was ultimately rejected by the Senate.

Disorder In The Court (NYT)

By Stephen L. Carter

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

I KEENLY remember the excitement at the Supreme Court when President Ronald Reagan announced the nomination of the little-known Sandra Day O'Connor to replace the retiring justice, Potter Stewart, in 1981. At the time I was a law clerk for Justice Thurgood Marshall, and, although none of us knew who she was, all of us sensed that a new epoch had begun. We were right.

During her two and a half decades on the court, Justice O'Connor excited as rich a mixture of undeserved opprobrium and richly deserved encomiums as any sitting member. It is far too early to assess Justice O'Connor's legacy, for that is the task of the historians, when they are able to look back and see what part of the current court's work stands the test of time. We cannot predict the far future, but we can predict the near future: it is going to be a messy summer.

What will make the summer messy is the certain controversy over Justice O'Connor's replacement. Mean-spirited idealists on the right and the left have been waiting years for this moment, and now it is upon them. Conservatives are demanding a true believer; worried liberals are gearing up to stop that from happening. The clash is likely to be ugly.

Had Chief Justice William Rehnquist stepped down, as widely expected (and as he still might), the battle would probably have been less severe. One conservative replaces another, liberal activists might have reasoned, so keep the powder dry. But Justice O'Connor's resignation is likely to excite even more attention than her appointment as the first woman on the Supreme Court: she is seen as a swing vote.

On issues from abortion to affirmative action to criminal procedure, it has often been Justice O'Connor's unpredictable vote that determines which bloc prevails. So the right will naturally see its chance to move the court further toward its agenda; and the left will battle to retain what pieces of its own agenda it can, a sort of holding action against the day when the Democrats again rule the White House and the Senate.

This path, so predictable, so frequently trod in recent decades, is carrying the Supreme Court, and the ideal of judicial review, toward disaster. There has been much talk lately of how the cruel posturing of politicians and commentators critical of various decisions hurts the reputation of the courts. And there is something to this notion. But the overwrought attacks by some critics do less harm to the notion of an independent judiciary than does the way activists gird themselves for battle each time a vacancy occurs, as if it is the obligation of the political branches to guarantee outcomes their supporters prefer.

We all claim to believe in judicial independence, but our definition of independence too often turns out to mean deciding cases according to our druthers. A court that rules in our favor displays integrity and independence. A court that rules against us shows its ideology and partisanship. Need evidence? Listen to anyone on the right discuss classroom prayer or abortion. Listen to anyone on the left discuss Bush v. Gore.

When we talk about decisions in this way - as if the only plausible results are the ones we like, a propensity that grows worse at election time and worst of all when a vacancy occurs - we obscure the proper relationship of the judiciary to the other branches of government, and of the Supreme Court justices to the larger society. When the news media survey the public for its view on decisions few people have ever read, interpreting constitutional provisions few people would recognize, the mischief intensifies, for the very act of surveying popular opinion on, say, the correctness of Roe v. Wade implies that the Supreme Court's highest duty is to do as it is told.

Confirmation hearings for nominees to the high court only make matters worse, for the would-be justices are forced to sit before the cameras, under oath, as senators ask them questions they cannot ethically answer, on how they would vote on cases that might come before them. This process began not in the early Republic but in the battle over Jim Crow. In the 1950's, the Southern Democrats who controlled the Senate Judiciary Committee decided to require every nominee to appear in person in order to grill them about Brown v. Board of Education. Before Brown, it was almost unheard-of for a nominee to testify. When the Dixiecrats changed the rules, the liberal position was that inquiries about such matters as judicial philosophy posed a threat to the independence of the judiciary.

The left of that era was correct. The spectacle we have made of confirmation hearings reinforces the public notion that the justices exist to decide cases the way political movements want them to. Liberals think the right started it, and conservatives think the left started it, but the important question is not who started it but who is going to stop it.

Perhaps President Bush could say to his most strident supporters on the right that it is not appropriate for them to behave with the triumphalism of conquerors who believe that the retirement of Justice O'Connor signals the moment to take control of the court. Perhaps the activists on the left, gearing up for a fight, could go back and read the speech made on the Senate floor by Edward Kennedy, during the vicious 1967 campaign over the nomination of Thurgood Marshall. Senator Kennedy warned his colleagues to reject the view that the Senate should reject potential justices who possess a judicial philosophy with which they disagree.

Or perhaps both sides should listen to the wisdom of Justice O'Connor herself. In 1992, she joined Justices David H. Souter and Anthony M. Kennedy in writing that the court, in deciding whether to overrule past decisions, must not "surrender to political pressure" and, indeed, that a reversal "under fire," except for the most compelling reasons, "would subvert the court's legitimacy beyond any serious question." These wise but often misunderstood words do not mean that the court should be above criticism; only that it is not up to politicians to decide when the court is wrong. This language occurred in the controversial decision in Planned Parenthood v. Casey where the court declined an invitation from the United States government to overturn Roe v. Wade. But one need not think Roe (or any other precedent) correct to appreciate the larger point: when the court becomes a political plaything, there is less reason for any of us to respect it.

Not A Campaign (WP)

SECONDS AFTER President Bush announces his choice to replace Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor -- whenever that happens and whoever the nominee is -- liberal interest groups will release a blast of e-mails promising a "rollback" of American liberties if the person is confirmed. Conservative groups, at the same moment, will blitz with e-mails proclaiming the nominee a modern John Marshall. Ads will appear on television. Journalists will be hit with distorted "reports" attacking or defending the nominee's "record," as groups release their opposition research or their defensive spin. Both camps, in short, will unleash the huge sums they have raised in what will be, for all intents and purposes, a political campaign -- a political campaign, unfortunately, for an office that is meant to be not merely apolitical but actively insulated from politics.

The campaign, in reality, began long ago. It began when both sides made the judgment that they had to invest in judicial appointments -- particularly Supreme Court appointments -- to make sure they got the results they wanted from the courts. At this point, the war has become a Washington industry, fed by both sides' wounds from the past, real and imagined, and fears for the future, realistic and fantastical. Barely had Justice O'Connor announced her retirement Friday when the liberal People for the American Way was promising to "help lead the fight against any terrible changes to the Supreme Court." The conservative

Family Research Council vowed that the "public is primed for the fight it will take to confirm a nominee" and promised "significant grassroots support for the President's nominees." A lot of people on both sides actively want a fight.

The war is about money and fundraising as much as it is about jurisprudence and the judicial function. It elevates partisanship and political rhetoric over any serious discussion of law. In the long run, the war over the courts -- which teaches both judges and the public at large to view the courts simply as political institutions -- threatens judicial independence and the integrity of American justice.

So we take this moment, when nobody knows how excellent or terrible the next nominee will be, to emphasize that a judicial nomination is not a political campaign and should not be treated as one. A nominee's record is almost never a simple affair, because good legal reasoning doesn't always render the most politically congenial answer. Demagogic attacks on almost any nominee are easy, and knee-jerk defenses equally so. But a reasonable assessment of the president's choice, whoever it is, will not emerge from such a shouting match.

We say this not in hopes that the war rooms will shut down and the campaign atmosphere give way to a serious discussion of -- and with -- the eventual nominee. That won't happen. But somehow, the serious discussion needs to take place even in an atmosphere that so disfavors it. The only legitimate source of the power of the Supreme Court -- which is, after all, a group of unelected officials who serve for life -- is the premise that interpreting law is not the same as creating it, that the task of judging, in other words, is not a political function. The war rooms, the money and the rhetoric all speak to a loss of faith in that premise on the part of groups who are now fighting over political spoils. Those Americans who still believe in the Third Branch need to endeavor to tune those special interests out.

Confirmation Battle In Senate Could Define Specter's Career (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

In nearly 25 years on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, has sat through nine Supreme Court confirmation hearings, some short and polite, some ugly and drawn out. Now that he is the chairman, he is prepared for the next one to go either way.

"I'm not going to anticipate a bruising battle," Mr. Specter said in an interview on Friday after Justice Sandra Day O'Connor announced her resignation, "but I'm not going to run from one either."

Although Mr. Specter may not anticipate a bruising battle, just about everyone else in Washington does, and the inevitable confirmation fight could be the defining moment in his long career. It comes as he faces a battle of a more personal sort, against Hodgkin's disease.

Perhaps more than any other senator, Mr. Specter will be the pivotal figure as he tries to manage his bitterly divided committee, his own uneasy relationship with the White House and the intense pressure that is already bearing down on him from both the left and right at a time when both sides are deeply suspicious of him.

Within hours of Justice O'Connor's announcement on Friday, Mr. Specter said he would probably hold confirmation hearings in September, a move that could upset conservatives, who would like to move a nominee along as quickly as possible in the hope of outflanking liberal groups that plan to use the summer months to prepare for a confirmation battle. Mr. Specter, though, says only that the Senate has "an obligation to confirm the justice by the 1st of October" and that he intends to meet that deadline.

Sharp-tongued and cagey, with an uncanny knack for parsing his words to wiggle his way out of tight spots, Mr. Specter is widely regarded as the Senate's brightest legal mind. A rare centrist in a Senate that has shifted increasingly to the right, he is reviled by conservatives for dooming the nomination of Robert H. Bork, and by liberals for assuring the confirmation of Justice Clarence Thomas with his aggressive questioning of Anita Hill, the law professor who had accused Justice Thomas of sexual harassment.

Now the vacancy created by the retirement of Justice O'Connor gives Mr. Specter a chance to rewrite his Judiciary Committee history, but it comes at a delicate time for him. He nearly lost his chairmanship last year amid an uproar from conservatives, who were furious when Mr. Specter, an unabashed supporter of abortion rights, suggested that the Senate would have difficulty confirming judges who would overturn Roe v. Wade.

He won the job after an all-out campaign that culminated with a carefully worded four-paragraph statement in which he pledged to "use my best efforts to stop any future filibusters," the tactic Democrats had been using to block President Bush's judicial nominees. The filibuster fight could re-emerge during a Supreme Court confirmation, and a big question is how Mr. Specter would handle it.

"I'll jump off that bridge when I come to it," he said.

So far, Mr. Specter has not been forced to jump. Last month, when Senator Bill Frist, the majority leader, brought the Senate to the brink of a vote to bar judicial filibusters, Mr. Specter kept the chamber on tenterhooks, refusing to say how he would vote even as he urged party leaders to "liberate their caucuses to vote without party straitjackets." When 14 senators - 7 Democrats and 7 Republicans - struck a deal to avert the so-called nuclear option, Mr. Specter was not part of it. His critics were exasperated.

"Arlen Specter is as predictable as the sun rising in the east," Richard Viguerie, the conservative direct mail consultant, complained in an interview at the time. "He's not going to keep a deal he makes with anybody."

But Mr. Specter, whose brusque manner has earned him the nickname Snarlin' Arlen on Capitol Hill, said he was keeping his own counsel, a move he considers wise and one that will probably continue to confound Specter-watchers as the nomination process moves forward. "I've made people mad saying very little, so I'm not going to say very much," he said.

He added: "I think a senator, whether or not he is the chairman, ought to be circumspect in what he says."

That may be especially so for the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, whose members include some of the most powerful lawmakers in the Senate, including fellow Republicans Charles E. Grassley of Iowa and Orrin G. Hatch of Utah and Democrats Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Charles E. Schumer of New York.

But Mr. Specter was not circumspect on Friday about criticizing Democrats who were already vowing to use the filibuster against a nominee they find objectionable.

"I'm a little bit concerned about what I heard Senator Kennedy say on television tonight, that if the president does not nominate someone who meets Senator Kennedy's specifications, as he articulates it, the American people will expect a battle and they're prepared to do it," he said.

"I would hope that we would tone down the rhetoric," he added.

Democrats have been pressing Mr. Bush to seek their advice on possible nominees, and Mr. Specter said he had urged the president to consult with him and three other senior senators - Dr. Frist, Harry Reid, who is the Democratic leader, and Mr. Leahy, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. The president apparently took Mr. Specter's advice and has invited the four men to the White House on July 11, after the Senate returns from recess.

Mr. Specter said that he and Mr. Bush had not named names in any of their conversations. He said he had thought "long and hard" about suggesting possible candidates but decided not to, believing that "the wiser course" would be to remain uncommitted to anyone in particular. As to whether he would advise Mr. Bush against nominating judges who might be perceived as likely to overturn Roe v. Wade, Mr. Specter was noncommittal.

"I'm going to listen to the president," he said, "and see how it goes."

Mr. Specter is not one to shun the limelight - he is scheduled to appear on three morning talk shows on Sunday - and he has never masked his moderate views. Last year, he survived a bitter primary challenge from the right, winning re-election with considerable help from Mr. Bush. In 1995, he made a brief ill-fated bid for the White House, running on the unusual platform of attacking Christian conservatives as an extremist "fringe."

The Supreme Court hearings come at a time of great personal challenge for Mr. Specter. His chemotherapy treatments have left him tired, he said, although he pushes himself to get up in the morning and play his regular squash game.

"Frankly," he said, "it's hard to get out of bed, hard to do the exercises and hard to get going, but once I'm on the squash court, I'm fine."

He has been very public about his illness - "I decided a long time ago: no toupee, no baseball hat, no shaved head," he said, referring to the baldness resulting from his treatment - and has become a symbol for cancer patients, who have been sending him cards and letters. He advises them to keep a busy schedule.

Perhaps for that reason, Mr. Specter may have been the only politician in Washington to publicly speculate that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who has thyroid cancer, would not retire.

"I think I have special insights into how he feels," Mr. Specter said, although he said they have not talked about it. "I think the chief likes to get up every day knowing he has important work to do, and I like to get up every day thinking I have important work to do."

A former prosecutor, Mr. Specter entered public life four decades ago as an ambitious young lawyer on the Warren Commission, which conducted the inquiry into the killing of President John F. Kennedy. He takes credit for producing the so-called single-bullet theory to explain how Kennedy was killed.

Mr. Specter was elected to the Senate in 1980 and immediately sought a seat on the Judiciary Committee, much to the chagrin of the chairman, Senator Strom Thurmond, the conservative Republican from South Carolina. Mr. Thurmond, concerned that Mr. Specter was too liberal, tried to keep him off the committee, but when no one else wanted the last remaining seat, Mr. Specter got it.

Although he will rely heavily on his aides - his chief counsel Michael E. O'Neill, a former clerk of Justice Thomas, is on leave from his job as an associate law professor at George Mason University - Mr. Specter has more experience than any of them. He has participated in the confirmation of every one of the current Supreme Court justices except John Paul Stevens, and he says he views himself as "a fact-finder" rather than a prosecutor.

He pledged to run the hearings "straight down the center, professionally," and added that he was eager to delve into a detailed examination of the nominee. But at 75, he says he is not looking at the coming hearings as any measure of his legacy.

"It's too early," he said, "to think about my legacy."

Parties Line Up Strategies For Hearings On Nomination (WP)

By Mike Allen

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

The two parties have begun outlining their strategies for confirmation hearings once President Bush nominates a successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, with Senate Republicans planning a rapid and rigid schedule designed to prevent Democrats from pinning the nominee down on divisive issues such as abortion.

A planning document for Senate Judiciary Committee Republicans says the nominee will be counseled to avoid disclosing "personal political views or legal thinking on any issue" in an effort to put a focus on qualifications rather than specific issues, including same-sex marriage and the government's treatment of suspected terrorists.

Democrats signaled that whoever the nominee is, their three likely lines of attack will be to assert the White House did not consult them sufficiently, then paint the nominee as ideologically extreme and finally assert that the Senate had not received sufficient documents about the candidate. But Senate Democratic aides said they will focus for now on bipartisan consultation and not publicly prejudge the nominee.

Republican leaders said they are prepared to start Judiciary Committee hearings as soon as three weeks after Bush announces his choice, although they are more likely to begin in late August or early September. Party leaders said it is their goal to have the new justice on the bench when the court reconvenes Oct. 3. O'Connor said in her retirement letter to Bush that she will stay until her successor is confirmed.

Lawmakers and aides said leaders are conscious of the poor image of Congress in recent polls and are determined to avoid having the two to three days of nationally televised hearings come off like a trial. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) appealed for hearings marked by "dignity and respect."

That does not appear likely. Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on courts, said an effort to choke off inquiries about specific issues would fail because Democrats believe they have "an obligation to our country and the Constitution to thoroughly vet the nominee."

"The number one thing we look for are the person's views," Schumer said. "The hard right wants to get it done with as few questions and as quickly as possible."

Republicans cited as precedent the hearings of justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg in 1993 and Stephen G. Breyer in 1994, when the nominees said it was inappropriate to give their views on legal issues that could come before the court.

With the nominee still unknown, the parties' plans are sketchy at points and could change. But to a remarkable degree, the contours of the strategies -- and the avenues down which lawmakers plan to steer debate in coming weeks -- have already emerged in interviews, floor statements and internal planning documents.

An instruction sheet prepared by Senate Republican leaders and given to conservative allies of the White House on Friday afternoon said in its first sentence, in a reference to the tough line taken by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), that the instructions place an "emphasis on taking the high road and avoiding the attacks that Kennedy et al. are implicitly threatening."

The sheet was distributed at a meeting where speakers urged the groups not to stress the abortion issue in their public statements. Eric Ueland, Frist's chief of staff, "urged them not to fall into the mainstream media trap of rhetorical or behavioral excess on behalf of a highly qualified nominee," according to an attendee.

Senate Democrats said they will insist on a more deliberative and candid process than Republicans appear to be contemplating, and called for an unprecedented amount of consultation with the White House before the announcement of a nominee. The Constitution says the president shall nominate judges to the Supreme Court and appoint them "with the Advice and Consent of the Senate," but it does not define the advising function.

Talking points distributed by e-mail by Senate Republican leaders state that consultation "does not mean co-nomination," hinting at the disputes that are likely to erupt even before the public hearings begin. "Consultation is a courtesy," said the talking points, which are guidelines for other senators. "The Constitution does not require it."

Senate Democrats said in their own e-mails that they plan exclusive interviews and briefings for bloggers and Hispanic news outlets throughout the confirmation fight. The party distributed talking points, used to guide lawmakers' news releases and sound bites, stating: "We hope this process will be one of consensus rather than confrontation, but that will be up to President Bush." The Democratic National Committee circulated a memo saying that Bush's sinking poll ratings mean that he "needs a win -- desperately" and that the nomination is "a chance to bring the country together."

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) said in an interview yesterday that his party will resist Democratic arguments for "ideological balance" on the court, a concept not in the writings of the Founding Fathers. And he said it is important to set "reasonable deadlines" for confirmation.

"The longer a nominee is dangled out there, the more people are going to try to take a whack at him like a piñata," Cornyn said.

Senate Democrats said a more reasonable pace than that being contemplated by Republicans would be 75 days between the announcement of a vacancy and the start of hearings. (The hearings for the last two, Breyer and Ginsburg, were less than that.) Schumer said that confirming the nominee by Oct. 3 is "not going to be so easy to do, because it's hard to imagine how hearings would begin before Labor Day." He said to finish hearings, a committee vote and a floor vote by the first Monday in October would be "pretty rough."

Confirmation hearings did not become national spectacles until the television age: Before 1955, only two Supreme Court nominees appeared before the committee, according to court histories. The hearings, the first Supreme Court confirmation since Breyer's 11 years ago, are likely to be held in the Beaux-Arts splendor of the Russell Senate Office Building Caucus Room, site of hearings on the Teapot Dome oil reserves, the Watergate break-in, the Iran-contra affair and the confirmation of Justice Clarence Thomas.

The televised portion of the hearing would probably last two to three days, with an additional day or two for testimony from outside groups. The first day would be taken up mostly by introductions of the nominee and opening statements, so the second would likely be the most intense. Before the committee vote, senators also would be likely to hold a one-day, closed session to discuss confidential matters such as the contents of the FBI report on the nominee.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) is intent on moving expeditiously, Republican aides said. As soon as the nomination is announced, he and Frist will agree on a schedule. One topic of discussion might be limiting opening statements at the committee hearing to Specter and the top Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), to allow more time for questioning the nominee, the aides said.

Specter is to finish chemotherapy treatment for Hodgkin's disease on July 22, and Republican aides said he will show his resilience at the hearings by living up to his reputation for wielding a firm gavel. "You're not going to see him jam the Democrats at all," one of the aides said. "But he can see when they're being dilatory and will draw the line."

But other Judiciary Committee members said that for Specter, 75, the hearings are part of his legacy, as surely as the result will be part of Bush's. His aim is to be driven by objectivity and precedent, fellow Republicans said.

But former GOP senator Alan K. Simpson, who voted to confirm seven of the nine sitting justices, said from his home in Cody, Wyo., yesterday that he already sees the committee members "ripping into each other" and fears there is no way to head off contentious hearings because the groups on both sides are so galvanized.

"If this just turns into an issue of abortion and 'partial birth' abortion, gay marriage, homosexual issues," Simpson said, "it will be the disaster of the ages."

Justice For The Next Justice (WP)

By John Cornyn

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

This week marks a historic occasion, not only for the U.S. Supreme Court, but for America -- the retirement announcement of our nation's first female Supreme Court justice. The process in the U.S. Senate for considering her successor should reflect the best of the American judiciary -- not the worst of American politics.

Justice O'Connor has provided a voice of judicial restraint on a number of important issues on which the court was closely divided. Throughout her 24 years on the nation's highest court, Sandra Day O'Connor worked to restore common sense to our criminal justice system and foster due regard for the powers reserved to the states under the Constitution. Thanks to her, victims of crime are more likely to receive justice and inner-city children are no longer constitutionally barred from access to school choice programs. And although I have not always agreed with her rulings, I have always felt a deep and abiding respect for her commitment to public service and reverence for the law.

The announcement of Justice O'Connor's retirement has now set a familiar process in motion. Soon the president will nominate, and the Senate will have the responsibility to consider, an individual to serve a lifetime appointment to the Supreme Court. As a senator, I must decide whether to vote to confirm or reject this nomination. This is a responsibility not to be taken lightly.

The president has the sole responsibility to pick his nominee. It is crucial that he do so with an eye toward character and temperament. The nominee must be intelligent and wise, thoughtful and careful, and always fair-minded and impartial. The nominee must have good moral character and demonstrated commitment to public service and the common good. And he or she must be open-minded and willing to consider all arguments before the court.

That is why, when evaluating the nominee, I will not be asking for commitments as to how he or she will rule on cases involving such contentious issues as abortion, affirmative action, same-sex marriage, the war on terrorism or any other specific issue on which the nominee might eventually rule.

To ask a judicial nominee how he or she will rule on future cases is to force the nominee to prejudge these cases. Imagine going before a judge whose mind was already made up concerning your case. Imagine a judge who had promised the president or some senator that he would rule against you -- no matter the merits of the case. That would not be a judicial process; it would be a political process.

It's crucial that judges approach every case free from political commitments. They must be free to disappoint their supporters and surprise their opponents and critics. Judges must be free to do their jobs -- to listen to the facts, to carefully divine the law and to be faithful to the Constitution.

As soon as the president announces his nominee, media reports and interest groups will probably attempt to demonize or paint the nominee as a right-wing extremist. Some Senate Democrats -- who often insist on asking nominees to prejudge cases and issues -- will subject the nominee to controversial questioning during the hearing process. The American people should recognize such questions for what they are: an attempt to politicize the process and badger the nominee to reveal personal feelings about any given issue. This is unfair to the nominee and the American people, and grossly distorts the Senate's role of providing advice and consent.

Before her service on the federal bench, Ruth Bader Ginsburg -- a distinguished jurist and liberal favorite -- served as general counsel of the American Civil Liberties Union, a liberal organization that has championed the abolition of traditional marriage laws. Before becoming a judge, Ginsburg expressed her belief that traditional marriage laws are unconstitutional but that prostitution is a constitutional right. She also wrote that the Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts are discriminatory institutions, and that courts must require the use of taxpayer funds to pay for abortions -- hardly views Americans would consider mainstream. Yet Senate Republicans and Democrats alike set aside such concerns and approved her nomination.

By contrast, we have seen during the past four years a partisan minority obstruct this president's judicial nominees -- who hold views shared by millions of Americans and enjoy bipartisan majority support in the Senate -- suffer vicious attacks and unprecedented obstruction at the behest of liberal interest groups.

Our role as senators is to ensure that the nominee is qualified and has the intelligence, character, and judicial temperament to perform the job, to guarantee that all senators have an opportunity to evaluate the nominee, to allow as much debate as is necessary to fully discuss the nomination, and then to come to a vote. Yet there are some who argue that the Senate can refuse to vote altogether, and that the Supreme Court should be forced to operate without a ninth justice.

While I am confident that the nominee to replace Justice O'Connor will be an able jurist, I am less confident in the treatment he or she will receive from the president's opponents.

High Court's Next Term Full Of Big Cases (AP-Y2)

By Gina Holland, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

Abortion, assisted suicide, gay rights, the death penalty. Some of the toughest issues in the land confront the Supreme Court in its new term in the fall.

A new lineup of justices — assuming the successor to influential Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is on the bench — makes the outcome of these cases more unpredictable than usual.

The high court has not had a new member since 1994, a modern-era record. That stability has made it easier to gauge what issues the court will take on and how they will be decided.

On major ones, the court frequently splits 5-4. O'Connor, a moderate put on the court by President Reagan, has been a key vote in death penalty, religion and abortion cases. Her view often became the final word.

Her retirement, announced Friday, shook up the world of Supreme Court lawyers who prepared cases with O'Connor in mind.

"She was widely viewed as the key by experienced and successful litigators. They'll have to figure some other way to win their cases," said Nelson Lund, a George Mason University law professor and former clerk to O'Connor.

O'Connor said that she will remain on the court until her successor is confirmed. Depending on President Bush's choice, there could be a lengthy fight that stretches into the fall.

If O'Connor is not able to continue serving, many major cases could leave the court split 4-4.

Also in doubt is the future of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who has cancer and could step down this summer, too. The last time there were two vacancies was 1971.

Justices already have a full lineup of cases for the nine-month term that begins the first Monday in October. The court has agreed to hear about 40 appeals, including four death penalty cases and two abortion-related cases. About 40 more appeals will be added later.

Whoever the president names to the court will immediately face cases involving the Bush administration.

In one, the court will decide if law schools may restrict military recruiters as a way of protesting the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy excluding openly gay people from military service.

Schools argue that their nondiscrimination policies apply to all recruiters that base hiring on race, gender or sexual orientation.

Justices will take up the administration's challenge to Oregon's law allowing physician-assisted suicide. In addition, there is a fight that tests freedom of religion, over a church's use of hallucinogenic tea in its religious services.

The abortion cases involve a parental notification law from New Hampshire and a long-running fight over the liability of people who protest outside clinics.

O'Connor's successor probably will be quizzed during Senate confirmation hearings about those subjects.

"I'd expect any of the nominees to duck answering," said Paul Schiff Berman, a law professor at the University of Connecticut.

Berman said that a major question is whether the new justice will be a pragmatist like O'Connor.

The 75-year-old former Arizona state senator and mother of three sons approached cases with a practical view.

"She always chose the least extreme solution, the compromise solution," Berman said. "She's kept the court very close to the American popular consensus on most issues."

Unlike the court's other conservatives, she believes that affirmative action has a place in government institutions, although limited. She believes that abortion should be legal. While she supports the death penalty, she has talked openly about concerns that it is being fairly imposed.

Among the death penalty cases in the next term is a potentially significant issue of allowing inmates to get a new chance to prove their innocence with DNA evidence.

"In many cases, Justice O'Connor's votes were to protect the rights of defendants," said Richard Dieter, executive director of the anti-capital punishment Death Penalty Information Center.

Justice's Exit Could Produce Seismic Shift On High Court (BSUN)

By Gail Gibson

The Baltimore Sun, July 3, 2005

She was the deciding vote, again and again, on some of the most critical and contentious issues to reach the Supreme Court in the past two decades, including affirmative action, capital punishment and the disputed 2000 presidential election.

And if the court's next term gets under way in October with her replacement confirmed and on the bench, following the timetable that President Bush set out Friday, the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor could have almost immediate implications.

Already on the calendar for this fall is a string of politically charged cases which, under the court's current lineup, could well have come down to O'Connor's vote. The cases include the Bush administration's challenge to the nation's only right-to-die law, Oregon's Death with Dignity Act, and an appeal of a federal court order striking down as unconstitutional a New Hampshire law requiring parental notification when teenagers seek abortions.

The court has also agreed to decide in its coming term whether colleges and universities that receive federal funding may bar military recruiters, setting up a clash between government funding and free speech, and raising issues of gay rights.

A coalition of law schools has argued that they have a right to refuse to associate with military recruiters, pointing to the First Amendment and what they view as the Pentagon's discriminatory policies on gays and lesbians. The Pentagon contends that because the schools accept federal funding, they have an obligation to allow the military to recruit on campus.

The case is being closely watched by civil liberties groups, which praised O'Connor's willingness to distance herself from administration policies in such cases as Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, in which she ruled that a U.S. citizen seized as an "enemy combatant" in the fight against terror can challenge his detention in U.S. courts.

Capital punishment

Death penalty issues also could hang in the balance. O'Connor, who in 2001 publicly questioned how fairly capital punishment was administered, sided in recent years with a majority that struck down the death penalty for the mentally retarded, but dissented this year from a 5-4 decision banning juvenile executions.

The court agreed last week to hear the appeal of a death row inmate from Tennessee who claims that new DNA evidence could exonerate him in the 1985 rape and murder of a female neighbor whose husband also was a suspect in the crime.

O'Connor wrote a 2003 decision that threw out the death sentence of Maryland inmate Kevin Wiggins, saying trial lawyers in his 1989 case failed to present mitigating evidence about horrific childhood abuses.

Two of the court's other conservatives, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy and Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, joined the 7-2 decision.

The court's two most conservative members - and the judges that President Bush has said he would most want to replicate in appointing a new justice - wrote a scathing dissent. Saying that the majority's reasoning ranged from "the incredible up to the feeble," the dissent from Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas concluded: "Today's decision is extraordinary - even for our 'death is different' jurisprudence."

On such divisive questions, it was O'Connor during her 24 years on the nation's high court who was closely watched as the bellwether. Her retirement, court scholars say, could produce a seismic shift on some of the most high-profile constitutional questions to come before the court - regardless of who is nominated to her seat.

"Her departure is a huge loss to anyone who has wanted the court to continue restraining congressional power over the states," David Garrow, a law professor and Supreme Court historian with Emory University, said in offering an example of O'Connor's influence. "If I was the attorney general of Oregon, I would be very disappointed ... because I just lost a vote."

How great the court's shift will be in the coming years depends largely on who is named to replace O'Connor. But her departure is expected to leave a mark regardless, because of her unique case-by-case approach to the job and her efforts to decide cases on the narrowest, most fact-specific grounds.

That approach meant O'Connor never fit squarely with the court's most conservative or its most liberal members, and she moved between the two blocs often as she earned her reputation as the court's most critical swing vote.

"Justice O'Connor fully earned her reputation as a centrist; she was a conscientious jurist and, in a number of key cases, stood up for individual rights and against a radically conservative vision of the constitution," said Steven Shapiro, legal director for the American Civil Liberties Union.

Sometimes, she switched camps in rapid succession. In 2003, she wrote the court opinion in its landmark, 5-4 decision that upheld the University of Michigan law school's policy of using race as a weighing factor in evaluating applicants. On the same day, she voted with a 6-3 majority that invalidated the school's affirmative action program for undergraduate applicants.

The difference for O'Connor was in the details. But she wrote a powerful endorsement of the importance of racial diversity on campuses: "In order to cultivate a set of leaders with legitimacy in the eyes of the citizenry, it is necessary that the path to leadership be visibly open to talented and qualified individuals of every race and ethnicity."

Sometimes, her decisions did not land in the win column. In the court's most recent term, which concluded last week, O'Connor was in the majority on 47 percent of the court's most high-profile cases - a lower percentage than any other justice on the court this term, according to an analysis by the Georgetown University Law Center's Supreme Court Institute.

She dissented, for instance, when the court this term voted to ban as unconstitutional executions for murderers who were under 18 when they committed their crimes, when it ruled that federal sentencing guidelines should be considered advisory rather than mandatory, and when it upheld as constitutional a 6-foot-tall granite monument displaying the Ten Commandments near the Texas Capitol.

One of the last dissents of her court career was among her most biting. Disagreeing with the court's decision to allow local governments to use eminent domain powers to seize private homes and small businesses to promote private economic development, O'Connor warned: "The specter of condemnation hangs over all property."

"Nothing is to prevent the state from replacing any Motel 6 with a Ritz-Carlton, any home with a shopping mall, or any farm with a factory," she wrote.

"'Independent' is really a good word for her," said Michael P. Van Alstine, a University of Maryland law professor. "She didn't toe the line. She was an independent thinker, and I think that really is what defined her."

It also is what makes the future position of the court so hard to predict on so many issues, some of which have reached the next term's docket.

For the first time in five years, the court will revisit next term the emotional debate over abortion with a review of New Hampshire's parental notification laws. The case could end up being as much about legal technicalities - specifically, what standard should be used to assess the constitutionality of state abortion laws - but it ensures that any questions about abortion rulings during confirmation hearings will be more than hypothetical.

In two key rulings, O'Connor had sided with the court's more liberal members in upholding the basic right to choose an abortion. Advocacy groups on both sides of the emotional debate launched aggressive campaigns over the weekend to influence the confirmation debate, with abortion rights advocates staging a rally in Tennessee - the home state of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

"Women who have the most to lose will be the strongest voice in the debate over this Supreme Court fight," said Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority advocacy organization.

Internal dynamics

O'Connor's retirement leaves one remaining swing vote on abortion, in Kennedy - as well as the unknown views of the yet-unnamed replacement. It is hard to predict, too, how any new arrival might tip the balance on any high-profile issue, said Herman Schwartz, a constitutional law scholar at American University who has written about the Rehnquist court.

"One of the things that's hard to figure is, each of these justices has some issue where they're not quite in line with their natural allies," Schwartz said.

That is especially true in a court that has gone more than a decade without a vacancy.

"It would change the internal dynamics greatly - it would have to," said Arthur Hellman, a University of Pittsburgh law professor who studies the court. "Everybody would be reassessing not only their relationship with the new person, but also their relationship with each other, because there is so much interdependence."

One Justice, Many Cases, Lots Of Power (DMN)

By David Jackson And Allen Pusey

The Dallas Morning News, July 3, 2005

In these politically divided days, a single Supreme Court justice can settle a lot of issues.

One justice can decide whether your daughter has to tell you if she is having an abortion; whether law schools can bar military recruiters from their campuses; whether doctors can help terminally ill patients end their lives.The answers to these questions are uncertain – especially now that Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is leaving the high court.

During her 24 years on the court, Justice O'Connor wound up making decisions that evenly split her colleagues – on issues ranging from access to abortion to how congressional districts are drawn.

"With many 5-to-4 decisions which the court has handed down, she has been the critical vote," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who, as chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, will conduct hearings on a replacement to be nominated by President Bush.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a key Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, said Justice O'Connor's role as a "fulcrum, right at the center of the court" makes the choice of a new justice "all the more significant."

The divisive social issues at stake are fueling the many advocacy groups that plan to spend millions on the emerging judicial war.

Indeed, hostilities have already commenced.

On Saturday, the National Organization for Women, declaring "a state of emergency," conducted an impromptu abortion rights rally at its convention in Nashville, Tenn.

"Not the church, not the state; women must choose their fate," NOW members chanted.

Conservative religious groups, meanwhile, blasted e-mails to their members, asking them to contact the White House and urge Mr. Bush to appoint a jurist willing to overturn Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 decision that made abortion a constitutional right.

Some of these same groups have also registered objections to at least one high court candidate, Attorney General Al Gonzales, calling him wobbly on the abortion issue.

Reaffirming Roe

In assessing Justice O'Connor's influence – and a successor's potential power – consider that Roe vs. Wade might not have survived without her. She and Republican colleague Anthony Kennedy both signed on to a 1992 opinion reaffirming the basic holding of Roe.

Her vote was critical in many other cases:

In 2000, she made the difference in a 5-4 case to overturn a state ban on late-term abortions. Because of her vote, HMO patients in certain states have the right to a second medical opinion even if their health care plan disapproves of it. And another swing vote preserved the use of affirmative action.

Some conservatives have been critical of Justice O'Connor, claiming inconsistencies on such issues as the death penalty and religion in public life; liberals hailed as her as pragmatic and non-ideological – both arguments sure to echo as the process of replacing her moves forward.

More hard cases await the court when it resumes work in October with or without Justice O'Connor, who has agreed to stay on until a successor is confirmed.

The justices have already agreed to review a federal law banning doctors from using drugs to assist suicides. Oregon officials claim the rule infringes on their Death with Dignity Act.

The court is also scheduled to decide whether the government can withhold federal funds from law schools that refused to allow military recruiters on their campuses.

The Pentagon says it has the same rights as other job recruiters; schools say the military violates campus non-discrimination policies with its rules excluding openly gay troops.

A New Hampshire law requiring parental notification for minors before an abortion is also slated for the court's consideration. The justices must decide whether the law has adequate exemptions to protect the health of the minor. Similar laws apply in 33 states.

Many conservatives have eagerly anticipated replacing Justice O'Connor as part of their decades-long effort to shift the ideological direction of court.

The conservative movement grew in large measure in response to the expansive Supreme Court rulings of the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s. The court integrated public schools, struck down school prayer, cut back on capital punishment, exercised control over some political redistricting, restricted police powers and expanded protections for defendants.

Reacting to what he called the court's liberal excesses, President Nixon appointed then-little-known assistant attorney general William Rehnquist in 1971. President Reagan elevated Mr. Rehnquist to chief justice in 1986.

Rehnquist's future

In recent weeks, court watchers thought Chief Justice Rehnquist would be the one retiring because of his thyroid cancer. His departure remains a possibility, which would give Mr. Bush and his conservative supporters another chance to shift the court to the right.

In the meantime, the battle to replace the court's most prominent swing vote is being fought by groups animated by the social issues Justice O'Connor decided.

Conservative organizations include religious activists, business interests, libertarians, and legal groups such as the Federalist Society. They include single-issue organizations ranging from gun owners to tax cutters.

One conservative coalition, Progress for America, has pledged to spend $18 million on the campaign. The group has already produced television ads, including one claiming that Democratic environmentalists would object if Mr. Bush nominated George Washington because he once chopped down a cherry tree.

Liberals groups ready to oppose Mr. Bush's nominee include feminists, unions, environmentalists, gay rights advocates and civil rights organizations. They are led in large part by People for the American Way, Alliance for Justice and the Leadership Council on Civil Rights.

The rhetoric on both sides is just getting started.

Justice O'Connor's retirement "places women's health at risk, endangering the future of reproductive rights in this nation," said Karen Pearl, interim president for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

"The public is primed for the fight it will take to confirm a nominee," said Tony Perkins, president of the socially conservative Family Research Council.

O'Connor Bow Puts New Focus On Rehnquist (CHT)

By William Neikirk

CHT – Rehnquist Focus, July 3, 2005

Chief Justice William Rehnquist might be next. Or will he?

Seemingly frail from his struggle with thyroid cancer, the chief justice defied expectations in the past week by not announcing his retirement. Instead, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor turned out to be the retiree who caused an explosion of Washington political buzz.

But Rehnquist is still considered a good candidate for retirement because of his poor health, possibly giving President Bush the rare opportunity of nominating two Supreme Court justices at about the same time.

But some analysts say that if Rehnquist waits much longer, it is less likely that he will resign.

DOJ_NMG_0001132

"I would doubt it at this point," said Scott Moss, a law professor and Supreme Court expert at Marquette University. "If a justice is going to retire, he probably isn't going to wait until midway through the summer" because that would mean a successor might not be confirmed in time for the court's new term in October.

The 80-year-old chief justice has shown grit in his post, and despite being under treatment for cancer, he showed up on a cold January Inauguration Day to swear in Bush to a second term.

Susan Low Bloch, a law professor at Georgetown University, said she had thought that Rehnquist might have announced his resignation this week.

"But now I don't know what I think," she added. "Now, I sort of think he may wait."

She said she had heard that Rehnquist "doesn't want to get off" the court while O'Connor "did want to get off," adding that "I just know he loves the court and has all his life. Once his wife died, that became everything to him."

Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which considers Supreme Court nominees, weighed in on whether Rehnquist would retire.

"Speaking as someone who likes to get up in the morning with something important to do, I wouldn't say it's keeping the chief justice alive, but I think he likes his job," Specter said. "And if we haven't heard from him by now, the chances are you won't hear from him for some time."

Still, observers noted Rehnquist looked especially weak at the end of the current term.

"I still expect Rehnquist to resign soon, after a decent interval allowing discussion of O'Connor's legacy," said Thomas Mann, a Brookings Institution scholar. Some believe this could happen as early as next week.

If Bush has the chance to name two justices, said Mann, he could "couple a strong conservative with a more ambiguous, uncertain appointee. This might avoid a rancorous battle, which he doesn't need now given his weakened political position."

But if the Senate does have to consider two Supreme Court vacancies at the same time, it is almost certain to make for a bitter, stormy autumn.

Named to the high court by President Richard Nixon and elevated to chief justice by President Ronald Reagan, Rehnquist long has been a conservative mainstay there.

But, said Bloch, he is by no means as conservative as Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, and if he should retire, Bush could conceivably choose two justices that would align themselves more regularly with Scalia and Thomas.

In today's political climate, said Bloch, it is much harder to nominate a justice who has not firmly settled into one philosophical camp or another. When Reagan named O'Connor to the court, she said, the justice's legal background on issues was not as clear.

"It won't happen again," Bloch said. "The president will pick someone whose views are more known."

But analysts said that if Bush has the chance to name two justices and picks two arch-conservatives, it could set off a titanic battle in the Senate over their confirmation. Already, a major fight is expected when O'Connor's replacement is named.

The speculation about court retirements began when Rehnquist developed an aggressive form of throat cancer in late 2004. He underwent treatment and missed a number of oral arguments in late 2004 and early 2005. He returned to the bench on March 21. During his absence, he participated in deliberations and court decisions.

No one knows what the chief justice will do, but Moss said that "there is a long tradition of justices trying to stick it out" even when they are extremely ill.

O'Connor Made Her Mark As Pragmatic Centrist (MINNST)

By Michael Doyle

Minneapolis Star Tribune, July 3, 2005

Sandra Day O'Connor was a chief justice without the title.

The only experienced politician on the current Supreme Court, O'Connor has dominated decision-making for well over a decade. More pragmatic than philosophical, more centrist than hard-line conservative, the former Arizona state senator left a distinctive stamp on American justice that surpassed her initial ground-breaking appointment.

"If we didn't have a tradition of naming courts for the chief justice, this would be known as the O'Connor Court," said Washington attorney Ronald Klain, a former Supreme Court clerk and one-time chief of staff to Al Gore.

When the court has split, it has usually been O'Connor holding the center.

Early on, O'Connor wrote the 5-4 opinion requiring an all-female Mississippi nursing school to admit men. Two decades later, she penned the 5-4 opinion upholding affirmative action in university admissions. In between, the 1952 Stanford Law School graduate literally defined what middle-of-the-road meant for the late 20th century and early 21st century Supreme Court.

"She is somebody who brought a voice of moderation to the Supreme Court," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid told reporters.

Washington, D.C., attorney Masha Dabiza, author of a detailed assessment of O'Connor's jurisprudence, said Friday that "if you compare her to the rest of the Supreme Court, she would be considered a moderate, but I also think the court is further to the right than most people think."

Numbers tell part of the story, starting with the unanimous 99-0 Senate vote by which O'Connor won confirmation in 1981.

The Supreme Court split 5-4 on 175 cases between 1994 and 2003. O'Connor was in the majority in 135 of those cases. This was more than any of the other justices, a 2004 Harvard Law Review statistical analysis found. Chief Justice William Rehnquist, for instance, was in the majority in 111 of the 5-4 cases.

In other words, labels like "The Great Dissenter" or the "Lone Ranger" -- terms once applied to justices Oliver Wendell Holmes and Rehnquist, respectively -- would never fit O'Connor. She was in the majority 89 percent of the time over the past decade, a Georgetown University Law Center analysis found.

Just a few days ago, for instance, O'Connor joined the slim majority in the McCreary vs. ACLU case, ordering removal of the Ten Commandments from a Kentucky courthouse. She was in a similarly slim majority upholding campaign finance reforms in the 2003 case called McConnell vs. Federal Election Commission, and she authored the 2003 opinion in Grutter vs. Bollinger upholding the University of Michigan Law School's use of race in admissions.

"Access to legal education, and thus the legal profession, must be inclusive of talented and qualified individuals of every race and ethnicity," O'Connor wrote for the 5-4 majority.

As her Grutter opinion suggested, simple ideological labels don't do O'Connor justice.

Just one week before striking down Kentucky's posting of the Ten Commandments, O'Connor vigorously argued on behalf of private property owners in her dissent from the ruling in Kelo v. City of New London. The Kelo majority ruling empowered cities to seize more property through eminent domain, and O'Connor's dissent amounted to a conservative's cautionary note.

"She is willing to exercise the court's power on behalf of both liberal and conservative ends," Thomas Keck, assistant professor of political science at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, said in an interview Friday.

Author of a recent book assessing the current court, Keck noted Friday that O'Connor has "regularly joined with conservative colleagues to enforce conservative constitutional principles like states' rights, and regularly joined with liberal colleagues to enforce liberal constitutional principles like gay rights."

Indeed, the gay rights issue illustrates just how O'Connor has evolved as a judge.

In her first term, O'Connor sided with then-associate justice William Rehnquist -- an old Stanford Law School classmate -- in 27 of the 31 decisions resolved by a 5-4 vote. Not long afterward, in the 1986 case called Bowers vs. Hardwick, O'Connor joined Rehnquist in the 5-4 majority opinion upholding Georgia's anti-sodomy law.

But by 2003, O'Connor played a different role. She joined the majority ruling in the Lawrence vs. Texas case that struck down statutes in Texas and other states that ban homosexual sodomy. Although O'Connor declared in a concurring opinion that she was not willing to explicitly overturn Bowers, as the five other majority justices would, she did give voice to a more liberal sentiment than she was expressing in the mid-1980s.

"Texas' sodomy law brands all homosexuals as criminals, thereby making it more difficult for homosexuals to be treated in the same manner as everyone else," O'Connor wrote.

Abortion cases

Such opinions could anger true-blue conservatives, and never more so than in cases involving abortion.

While telling senators during her 1981 confirmation hearing that she would neither "endorse or criticize" the 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision upholding abortion rights, O'Connor characterized abortion as "simply offensive" and repugnant." And in the 1989 case called Webster vs. Reproductive Health Services, O'Connor helped uphold various abortion restrictions.

Nonetheless, in the even more crucial 1992 case called Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania vs. Casey, O'Connor joined the narrow majority that sustained Roe vs. Wade's basic holding. It was, in some ways, a classic O'Connor cut straight down the middle.

The mother of three helped uphold Pennsylvania's 24-hour waiting period for women wanting abortions, while retaining the constitutional right to an abortion. It was an utterly pragmatic ruling; an effort, by some lights, to settle the core abortion question once and for all.

"Liberty," O'Connor and her fellow justices wrote, "finds no refuge in a jurisprudence of doubt."

O'Connor's prose rarely soared, and she usually kept her opinions tightly focused on the technical facts of a particular case. In that respect, she was a conventional conservative compared to a more activist judge such as Scalia or Associate Justice Clarence Thomas.

All of which means it may not be her words that are remembered, but her votes and the concrete consequences that followed.

DOJ_NMG_0001134

"Ah, the tombstone question," O'Connor said, according to an account by the Supreme Court Historical Society. "I hope it says, 'Here Lies a Good Judge.'"

Supreme Difference (WP)

By Linda Ross Meyer

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

Will the Supreme Court be different without Sandra Day O'Connor? You bet. But it will be different not only because she provided crucial votes for a right to privacy, against race-based redistricting, against state endorsement of religion and for affirmative action, etc. The court will be different without her because, if President Bush nominates a replacement on the basis of that person's position on constitutional theory, there will be no one to take the court on an outing from its ivory tower.

Justice O'Connor is known in court circles for organizing field trips for her clerks. She was determined to pry us clerks from behind our computers and from under our piles of briefs, and scoot us into the whirl of working Washington. Getting out into the real world, talking with real people, was a trial for some of her library-carrel-reared clerks, but these outings were not just matters of tourism. They gave us the foundational experience for understanding O'Connor's approach to jurisprudence and her place on the court. And they taught us what the court will lack when O'Connor leaves.

She would troop us around the District, taking in exhibits, touring postal facilities or wandering about historic ships, all the while peppering every docent or captain or postal worker with her questions and characteristic energy and enthusiasm. "Isn't this interesting!" she would exclaim over the concept of self-adhering postal stamps or machinery for dredging clams from the muck of Chesapeake Bay. We bleary-eyed bookworms would dutifully agree.

At the court itself, it seemed to us as if O'Connor kept her feet on the ground in a place often dominated by Grand Constitutional Theory -- a combination of theoretical absolutes and scholarly minutiae of the kind that law professors love. Justice Stephen Breyer's opinions, for example, often sound as though they came directly from the policy wonks at the nonprofit Rand Corp., complete with appendices and concordances. Justice Clarence Thomas, meanwhile, believes his job is to return the court to the constitutional law of the 18th century, according to the Framers' intent, and his opinions usually contain long historical discourses about the state of law in 1790, as capital defendants dance on the head of an historical pin.

Justice Antonin Scalia, likewise, believes in theoretical absolutes. The court should expunge all rights not explicitly articulated in the text. It should never look at legislative history. And it should establish neat, clear, interlocking rules that can be applied consistently for all areas of law (and without further judgment by presumably less-competent trial courts). "What distinguishes the rule of law from the dictatorship of a shifting Supreme Court majority is the absolutely indispensable requirement that judicial opinions be grounded in consistently applied principle," Scalia wrote in his dissent to last week's court decision limiting the display of the Ten Commandments on government property.

But O'Connor believed that judging is not policy analysis or scholarship or ideology. Justice doesn't come from a book. The difficult decisions come in shades of gray, not black and white, and the view from the Supreme Court bench can be a narrow one. She looked to the pragmatic consequences of the court's decisions for everyday citizens, and she tried to do justice in the case while leaving play in the constitutional joints so as not to tie the hands of those closer to the facts and the people.

As a former trial judge and state legislator, she knew firsthand that abstract rules can't always assure a just result, and so her legal "rules" took the form of balancing tests that allowed wiggle room for the vast and infinite variety of real life (much to chagrin of her more theoretical colleagues). State governments could regulate abortion as long as they didn't place an "undue burden" on women; governments could display religious symbols as long as they didn't "endorse" religion or make religious minorities feel excluded from citizenship. She was also one of the few justices willing to grant certiorari in (and review) death penalty cases not just when the constitutional theories needed to be clarified, but to fix mistakes in particular cases.

Her jurisprudence was characterized by a deference for local knowledge and a practical humility about the Court's ability to construct or reconstruct a seamless theory of constitutional law. If people were treated unjustly -- arrested and handcuffed for a seatbelt violation, unfairly denied an equal vote by crazy-quilt redistricting, stripped of their property in order to increase the local tax base, discriminated against because of who they were and not what they had accomplished, or detained without a hearing -- then Grand Theory had to bend to Justice, not Justice to Grand Theory. Like her predecessor, Justice Potter Stewart, she didn't need a theory to know an injustice when she saw it.

Most of what we have been hearing about potential nominees is about their "judicial philosophy" or their "theory of the Constitution." During last year's presidential campaign debates, Bush said, "I would pick people that would be strict constructionists."

And now, in anticipation not of O'Connor's retirement but of Chief Justice William Rehnquist's departure, activist groups on the left and the right have raised millions of dollars to promote or fight against nominees depending on their judicial philosophies. We're asked to support Janice Rogers Brown because she is dedicated to "preserving the Constitution as ratified," Michael

McConnell because of his theory of the establishment clause, Emilio Garza or Edith Jones because they are constitutional originalists, Alberto Gonzales because of his position on substantive due process and abortion rights.

But these positions and writings reveal just one part of what the president should know to make his next decision. Character and range of human experience should also matter. Does the nominee have truly practical wisdom -- an on-the-muddy-ground understanding of the sheer diversity of human aspiration, emotion, frailty, and passion? Does the nominee have a sense of justice to prevail where simple theory proves inadequate? O'Connor did, and a court without members of these qualities does not bode well for our future.

Justice O'Connor's Indelible Stamp (WP)

By Viet Dinh

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

In the coming days, many will no doubt tout Sandra Day O'Connor as the pioneering first female Supreme Court justice. Most will point to her importance as the pivotal middle justice on a divided court. And some will accuse her of squandering her influence by not articulating and hewing to a unified theory of the law of their liking. In all this, the pundits may well be right in the description, but many will be wrong in ascribing merit or blame. Justice O'Connor is, quite simply, a great judge.

In 1995 I and my three co-clerks to O'Connor engaged in a heated discussion over some small point of law whose importance seemed transcendental at the time. This was the mother of all debates, several days of intense silences punctuated by heated discussions. The justice knew, of course, having carried awkward luncheon conversations and having interrupted several of our closed-door shouting matches. But she let us continue without intervention. The next morning, she handed us a two-page draft opinion -- concisely crafted, beautifully written and articulating a clear answer based on her writings and intimations in previous cases. Each of us combatants saw our conflicting points considered, answered or accommodated in her elegant draft. All that was left to do was to check the spelling, fill in the citations and go on with our coffee.

That example encapsulates O'Connor's approach to her work.

Without fanfare she hones her craft, deciding individual cases, answering concrete questions and in the process providing clear and enduring answers to the most important questions of the day.

Take, for example, the recent cases articulating the division of governmental power between state and federal governments. For more than 50 years, the constitutional enumeration of (and therefore implicit limitation of) the powers of the federal government went unheeded. On the Supreme Court, O'Connor spent over a decade dissenting from what she considered the court's abdication of its constitutional responsibility to rein in Congress. The justices agreed in 1995 and placed limits on Congress's power to regulate interstate commerce. O'Connor takes these limits so seriously that last month, contrary to her law-and-order instincts, she voted against federal authority, in the name of commerce, to prohibit in-state marijuana possession.

Given her leadership, many were surprised when O'Connor in recent years voted to affirm Congress's power to regulate family leave policies and access to courthouses. But her votes were perfectly consistent, because these latter cases dealt not with Congress's power to regulate commerce but rather with its separate authority to redress disability and gender discrimination. They are surprising only to those who would view O'Connor through the lens of a states' rights ideologue or a lazy pundit.

Likewise, O'Connor has decried the tendency to adopt a grand unified theory of church-state relations. Instead, she reads the Constitution as prohibiting governmental actions that a reasonable observer would construe as endorsing religious beliefs. This is no "I know it when I see it" test. Rather, it relies on a common legal standard, the reasonable objective person, to guide decisions in concrete cases according to their facts.

Last year O'Connor brought her practical brilliance to bear on the most interesting and vexing current question of constitutional law, military detention of enemy combatants in the war against terrorism. Structural purists would perhaps prefer Justice Clarence Thomas's categorical reliance on the president's exclusive power to wage war. And human rights advocates no doubt cheered Justice John Paul Stevens's characterization of executive detention as akin to mild torture.

O'Connor, however, wrote the controlling opinion for the court, which recognized the president's wartime power to detain enemy combatants who would kill American soldiers and civilians. But even in war there is law, and due process requires that the president afford combatants with some opportunity to challenge their detention before an impartial tribunal. She is mindful that generals fight war, not judges and lawyers, and she prescribed procedures that deferred to military judgment and necessities.

I could go on and identify Justice O'Connor's indelible stamp in every area of the law spanning property rights, race relations, privacy, employment contracts, retirement benefits and so on. But that would be missing the point of her life, work and worth. She is not a crusader, a reformer or a philosopher. She has always tried to be a good judge, and by succeeding she has been a pioneer, sage and icon.

Justice Forged A Path For Women (DMN)

By Colleen Mccain Nelson

The Dallas Morning News, July 3, 2005

When Sandra Day O'Connor was nominated to the Supreme Court, her confirmation hearings were must-see TV for Helen Perry Grimwood and her friends.

Ms. Grimwood, a clerk for the Arizona Court of Appeals in 1981, rushed home each evening to watch replays of the hearings late into the night. "I was absolutely glued [to the TV], and so was everybody I knew," said Ms. Grimwood, who has known Justice O'Connor for more than 30 years. "We were just so intrigued. If that's any indication of what a monumental event it was ... we watched every minute that we could."

During her clerkship, Ms. Grimwood had watched and learned from Justice O'Connor, who was a judge on the Arizona Court of Appeals when President Reagan announced her nomination.

Her mentor's ascension to become the first woman on the country's highest court was a milestone that some women had never dared consider, Ms. Grimwood said.

"Now, women can dream about being on the U.S. Supreme Court," said Ms. Grimwood of Phoenix, now president of the State Bar of Arizona.

Justice O'Connor, who announced her retirement Friday, opened doors for women at the highest levels of the legal profession. But when the justice who once aspired to be a cattle rancher graduated from Stanford Law School, she found that even low-level jobs weren't options for female lawyers. Many law firms simply didn't hire women. One offered the graduate, who finished third in her class, a secretarial position.

Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, who also struggled to find work after law school, said that despite the rejections that Justice O'Connor faced, "she kept that positive spirit, and she has been a leader in everything she's done."

Ms. Hutchison, a Republican, said Justice O'Connor was a role model for women in law.

"She had the spotlight shone on her at an early time in her career, and she handled it with such grace and integrity that I think it set the exact right tone," Ms. Hutchison said.

Regina Montoya of Dallas, a former congressional candidate who served in the Clinton White House, said Justice O'Connor's accomplishments signaled that women could be seen as equal to men.

"She made it really clear that the legal profession was open to women and you could succeed at the highest level," she said.

Beyond limits

Justice O'Connor did not allow gender to define her.

"Yes, I will bring the understanding of a woman to the court, but I doubt that alone will affect my decisions," she once said. "The important thing about my appointment is not that I will decide cases as a woman, but that I am a woman who will get to decide cases."

Mary Spector, an associate professor of law at Southern Methodist University, said Justice O'Connor had to prove to a skeptical public that she was not a "fluke" and that she could thrive in a male-dominated world.

She accomplished that by establishing herself as an independent voice on the court.

"She wielded that middle-ground position with a lot of deliberateness and didn't just influence the court's decisions by her vote but by her opinions and the reasoning she relied upon to split the middle," said Lynne Rambo, a professor of constitutional law at Texas Wesleyan University.

Ms. Grimwood, who describes her mentor as no-nonsense and gracious, said Justice O'Connor has never been an ideologue. She set political agendas aside, simply considering the facts of every case.

Alternative view

And as a working woman with a family, Justice O'Connor brought a unique perspective to the Supreme Court. "She had lots of experience that other members of the court didn't have," Ms. Grimwood said. "Until she was on the court, half the population was just not represented."

Now, nearly 24 years after Justice O'Connor joined the high court, the path for women following in her footsteps will be smoother, Ms. Grimwood said. But she noted that if Justice O'Connor is succeeded by a man, only one woman, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, would remain on the Supreme Court.

"The difference between what it was like when Sandra Day O'Connor graduated from law school and what it's like now is profound," she said. "But we still have a lot of ground to cover."

Feminists On O'Connor: A Mixed Verdict (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0001137

By Hanna Rosin

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

With her retirement, Sandra Day O'Connor did to many American feminists what she's done during her tenure as a Supreme Court justice: Eluded them. She left, in part, to spend more time with her husband, John O'Connor, who suffers from Alzheimer's disease and who has been known to spend his days in her chambers while she works.

Surely your average successful lawyer has faced this dilemma: give up a career or take care of the family. But not the Chief Woman Lawyer of America -- she shouldn't quit to take care of her family, should she? What kind of message does that send?

"I was on a radio show and someone called in to say, 'Would we ever see a man retire to take care of his spouse?' " says Suzanna Sherry, a law professor at Vanderbilt University who has written about O'Connor. "This is why she's never been considered a feminist's feminist. A feminist would say: 'Well, why would she do that?' " O'Connor was the first woman appointed to the Supreme Court, and that alone seals her place in American feminist history. It makes her arguably the most powerful American woman, one rung short of the first female American president. She was third in her Stanford law school class at a time when a woman was lucky to get a job as a secretary at a law firm. That's the job she was offered upon graduation, so she invented her own career path.

Still, she never quite fit the image of a modern feminist. She was appointed by Ronald Reagan. Although she ended up in a critical tie-breaking role on the court, it seemed as if by accident; legal analysts often criticized her for lacking a coherent judicial philosophy, an aggressive Grand Unified Theory that characterizes, say, Antonin Scalia.

In her autobiography, "Lazy B," she wrote about growing up on a remote cattle ranch in Arizona, rounding up wild colts and witnessing drunken bar fights. But the Annie Oakley image never stuck. She is better known for delaying her career until her three sons were in school. Her public persona in Washington was maternal, nurturing, genteel, soft. She let her granddaughter write a book about her featuring a picture on the cover of the two of them holding a teddy bear. On her clerks' door she left a Xerox of her hand with a note that read "For a pat on the back, lean here."

Yesterday, during its convention, the National Organization for Women planned an impromptu march on the Tennessee state capitol in response to news of her retirement. "We are determined not to have an extremist who will roll back women's rights," Eleanor Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority, said in an interview from the rally, with the crowd in the background shouting, "Hell no, we won't go." The feminist movement kicked into action immediately when it lost O'Connor. She may not have been a reliable ally on their pet causes (she voted to invalidate the Violence Against Women Act, for example), but she came through as the critical vote on cases involving abortion and affirmative action. But there were no heartfelt personal reminiscences. No honoring of a fellow suffragette's guts and glory. Just the legal issues and the facts, with all the emotional warmth of a legal brief. It was understood that O'Connor herself wouldn't be caught dead at such a rally.

Smeal testified for O'Connor when she was first nominated and, Smeal says, "I never regretted my testimony." Smeal's highest compliment: "She's obviously a conservative woman, but she did not turn her back on women's rights. It was the best we could do under the circumstances."

In the mid-'80s, feminist legal theorists made an attempt at embracing O'Connor. Sherry wrote an article describing the jurist as the archetype of "difference feminism," a theory popularized by feminist Carol Gilligan and which holds that men and women reason differently and write in different styles.

O'Connor, she wrote, had a uniquely "feminine perspective"; she consistently valued communities over individuals, moderation over confrontation, wrote in a way that's more contextual, less "abstract" and more "caring."

But many feminists "balked at the idea that difference feminism could explain a conservative woman," says Sherry.

O'Connor herself rejected the thesis as well.

"This 'new feminism' is interesting but troubling, precisely because it so nearly echoes the Victorian myth of the 'True Woman' that kept women out of law for so long," O'Connor said at a speech at New York University in 1991. "Asking whether women attorneys speak with 'a different voice' than men do is a question that is both dangerous and unanswerable."

In her generation, women competed on equal terms with men, and the updated feminism must have struck her as a cop-out of a kind.

Once Ruth Bader Ginsburg came on the court in 1993, feminists had an ally they could truly rely on. Ginsburg had dedicated her career to fighting for feminist causes; she had founded the American Civil Liberties Union Women's Rights Project to argue that the law discriminated between men and women; she sees the world through that lens. Now she is the one who wins honors with such names as the Athena Award. NOW named its annual lecture after her.

O'Connor then settled into a place with the feminist establishment that suited both sides better: as the spotty understudy. O'Connor became a favorite speaker at commencement events. She was invited to the types of places that give out crystal figurines, as Margaret Talbot pointed out recently in the New Yorker. (Last year she accepted $5,825 worth of gifts, the second highest amount after Clarence Thomas, "mostly in small crystal figurines," O'Connor said.)

These days O'Connor has a new status in women's circles. She is now the mother of "Sequencing," a new fancy word that means delaying your career until your children are in school. "Juggling Career and Home: Albright, O'Connor, and You," reads a recent article in Mothering magazine, explaining how you can take care of your family and have a stellar career. So maybe feminism has caught up with the Supreme Court justice after all.

Increase In The Number Of Documents Classified By The Government (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Driven in part by fears of terrorism, government secrecy has reached a historic high by several measures, with federal departments classifying documents at the rate of 125 a minute as they create new categories of semi-secrets bearing vague labels like "sensitive security information."

A record 15.6 million documents were classified last year, nearly double the number in 2001, according to the federal Information Security Oversight Office. Meanwhile, the declassification process, which made millions of historical documents available annually in the 1990's, has slowed to a relative crawl, from a high of 204 million pages in 1997 to just 28 million pages last year.

The increasing secrecy - and its rising cost to taxpayers, estimated by the office at $7.2 billion last year - is drawing protests from a growing array of politicians and activists, including Republican members of Congress, leaders of the independent commission that studied the Sept. 11 attacks and even the top federal official who oversees classification.

The acceleration of secrecy began after the 2001 attacks, as officials sought to curtail access to information that might tip off Al Qaeda about America's vulnerabilities. Such worries have not faded; just this week the Department of Health and Human Services sought unsuccessfully to prevent publication of a scientific paper about the threat of a poisoned milk supply on the ground that it was "a road map for terrorists."

But across the political spectrum there is concern that the hoarding of information could backfire. Thomas H. Kean, chairman of the Sept. 11 commission and a former Republican governor of New Jersey, said the failure to prevent the 2001 attacks was rooted not in leaks of sensitive information but in the barriers to sharing information between agencies and with the public.

"You'd just be amazed at the kind of information that's classified - everyday information, things we all know from the newspaper," Mr. Kean said. "We're better off with openness. The best ally we have in protecting ourselves against terrorism is an informed public."

Mr. Kean said he could not legally disclose examples he discovered of unnecessary classification. But others cite cases of what they call secrecy running amok: the Central Intelligence Agency's court fight this year to withhold its budgets from the 1950's and 60's; the Defense Intelligence Agency's deletion of the fact that the Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet was interested in "fencing, boxing and horseback riding"; and the Justice Department's insistence on blacking out a four-line quotation of a published Supreme Court decision.

Secrecy has long been denounced by liberal watchdog groups like the American Civil Liberties Union. But more conservatives are emerging as skeptics, including Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, whose bill to strengthen the Freedom of Information Act passed the Senate last week. The bill, cosponsored by Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, requires that any legislation creating new exemptions to the Freedom of Information Act explicitly disclose them. It is only part of overhaul efforts proposed by the two.

Mr. Cornyn, a former state attorney general, said he had been trying to persuade his colleagues that freedom of information was not just a concern of the news media. "The people should get the information they need to see if government is doing what they want," he said.

He gets no argument from J. William Leonard, who in his three years as director of the Information Security Oversight Office has waged a lonely battle against overclassification. "I've seen information that was classified that I've also seen published in third-grade textbooks," Mr. Leonard said.

Such missteps may come in part from inexperience. Since 2001, President Bush has extended the power to classify documents to the heads of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Agriculture. At the Agriculture Department, where officials are concerned about agroterrorism, employees can visit the agency's Web site and easily print out a bright-yellow "sensitive security information" cover sheet.

Such labels for unclassified information deemed sensitive have multiplied in recent years, going beyond the traditional "for official use only" to "law enforcement sensitive," "homeland security sensitive" and other vague tags.

"We find there's such a proliferation of these bogus categories," which lack clear rules or definitions, said Lawrence J. Halloran, an aide to Representative Christopher Shays, a Connecticut Republican who held a hearing on excessive secrecy in March.

The secrecy wave has reached obscure outposts of federal power. Wes Addington, a lawyer in Prestonsburg, Ky., who represents mine workers filing safety complaints, said the Mine Safety and Health Administration now denied him documents under the Freedom of Information Act that a few years ago were routinely provided.

"Honestly, I don't understand the reason," Mr. Addington said. "I don't see how releasing this stuff would hurt the government."

A spokeswoman for the safety agency, Suzanne Bohnert, said it began withholding inspectors' notes because their release could "harm ongoing enforcement matters."

Some opponents of secrecy say the Bush administration has created an atmosphere that discourages disclosure. Vice President Dick Cheney won a court battle to keep secret the records of his energy task force. Former Attorney General John Ashcroft issued a memorandum in October 2001 urging officials to be careful to protect sensitive information.

Thomas S. Blanton, director of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, said the administration viewed public access to information as encroaching on executive power.

But a spokesman for the National Security Council, Frederick L. Jones II, said the effect of the Ashcroft memorandum had been "greatly exaggerated" by critics. Mr. Jones blamed the increasing use of e-mail for the rapid rise in classified documents. He added that the president had nominated members for a planned Public Interest Declassification Board that would guard against excessive secrecy.

"The administration is proud of its record of openness," Mr. Jones said.

Mr. Blanton's group, which files hundreds of Freedom of Information requests each year, occasionally gets a glimpse of the arbitrariness of bureaucrats' decisions. In 1999, the Defense Intelligence Agency released its two-page Pinochet biography without deletions. Three years later, it released the same document with half the text deleted, including such comments as "Gen. Pinochet is conservative in his political thinking."

In a recent battle, Steven Aftergood, who directs the Project on Government Secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists, sought C.I.A. budgets for 1947 to 1970. A judge gave him only the 1963 budget, because it had already been released.

"I don't know any intelligence professional who says, 'I'll stake my integrity on the need to protect the 1962 intelligence budget,' " Mr. Aftergood said.

But a C.I.A. spokesman, Paul Gimigliano, said that releasing even old budgets could prove a slippery slope. "The budget remains classified to prevent America's adversaries from piecing together the national security priorities set for the C.I.A.," he said. "This is not secrecy for secrecy's sake."

Feds Increasingly Classify Documents (AP-Y2)

By KEVIN FREKING, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 3, 2005

WASHINGTON - Driven largely by ongoing military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, the federal government reports that the number of documents being classified jumped 10 percent last year to 15.6 million.

Free Music Downloads Register now, and choose from a wide variety of your favorite artists and songs www.ez-tracks.com

The numbers come from the Information Security Oversight Office in its latest annual report to the president.

Meanwhile, the number of pages that the government declassified continued to drop. Last year, 28.4 million pages were declassified, a 34 percent drop from the previous year.

An increase in the number of documents being classified has raised concerns that the government is being too secretive, and the report notes that overclassification of documents has been a consistent issue for decades. However, the report stops short of saying that the trend runs counter to the nation's interest.

"It cannot be said conclusively from this report's data that recent increases in the number of classification decisions were due substantially to the phenomenon of overclassification," the report states.

The report, dated March 31, notes that classifying information is an essential and proven tool for defending the nation, but says that it can be a double-edged sword. For example, it said limits on information can contribute to friendly fire deaths on the battle field, and failure to share information contributed to the government's failure to intercept the plot that led to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"Simply put, secrecy comes at a price. For classification to work, agency officials must become more successful in factoring this reality into the overall risk equation when making classification decisions," the report said.

Vast Crowd Attends Rally For The Poor In Scotland (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Wearing white as a symbol of hope and justice, more than 225,000 demonstrators encircled the heart of this graceful medieval city on Saturday and demanded an end to abject poverty around the world.

The radical and the peaceful, the curious and the committed, all poured into the streets here to deliver their message to the powerful leaders who will arrive at Gleneagles Hotel in Perthshire, nearby, for the Group of 8 summit meeting that starts Wednesday.

"Thirty thousand children die every day as a result of extreme poverty," said Richard Bennett, the chairman of the Make Poverty History campaign, the work of a coalition of 500 groups in Britain. "That is one every three seconds. It's totally avoidable, and the fact that it is avoidable makes it unacceptable."

Their list of particulars is not long, Mr. Bennett said at the protest, the first of several scheduled over the week. The activists and demonstrators want the wealthy of the world to do more for the wretched of the world, most notably in Africa. Specifically, they say, the world's richest countries should forgive the debts of the poorest countries, with no strings attached, equalize trade and put an end to harmful export subsidies and increase aid to poor countries while ensuring it gets funneled to the right people. The aid, activists say, should not come attached to cumbersome, unworkable requirements.

Buoyed by the sunny weather, the demonstrators spoke of their newfound hope that the British prime minister, Tony Blair, President Bush and the other leaders of the eight major industrialized countries were beginning to take note of the widening gap between rich and poor. The jubilant crowd blew whistles, banged drums, waved placards that read "Water Not War" and "Drop the Debt," donned kilts and flashed their white wrist bands, a symbol of the anti-poverty campaign.

At 3 p.m., the marchers - and many others in the city - halted for a two-minute silence. Shortly afterward, the marchers formed a white-clad human chain around the city center. In London, St. Paul's Cathedral was wrapped in white, and similar installations were planned in other cities around the world.

"Half the world is dying to eat and the other half is eating itself to death," said Elizabeth Hodgson, 49, a modern studies teacher at a high school in Livingston, not far from Edinburgh, who went to the march with her teenage daughter. "It won't be solved overnight, but there is no point in saying it will never be solved."

Cardinal Keith O'Brien, the head of Scotland's Catholics, read a message from the Vatican. He said that Pope Benedict XVI had called upon the summit meeting's leaders to do more for the poor of the world. The pope, he said, holds "ardent hope that the scourge of global poverty may one day be consigned to history."

Sitting on the grass at the rally on the Meadows, the city's largest park, Mike Dewar, a retired firefighter, said he had gone to the rally to help draw attention to the poverty that is ravaging the world but gets short shrift among the world's most pampered countries.

"They have to realize we're unhappy," he said, of the Group of 8 leaders. "They seem to be immune in their ivory towers. We don't all need money. Just a decent way to earn a living."

On the stage at the Meadows, Kathy Galloway, a human rights advocate from Glasgow, put it bluntly.

"This isn't about charity," she said, to the cheering crowd. "This is about justice."

'Make Poverty History' Protest Draws Tens Of Thousands (LAT)

By Ron Depasquale

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Waves of anti-poverty protesters ringed Scotland's capital Saturday to demand more aid, debt relief and fair trade for poor nations, hoping to pressure world leaders ahead of this week's Group of 8 summit.

Colorfully costumed activists, parents carrying children on their backs and African immigrants massed together for the raucous "Make Poverty History" march, which lasted more than five hours. More than 200,000 people marched and gathered at the Meadows, a downtown park, police said.

Musicians from around the world, including British folk singer Billy Bragg, sang politically charged songs, while activists and religious leaders urged crowds to demonstrate throughout the week of the G-8 summit, when leaders of eight of the wealthiest countries will meet north of the city.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the summit host, has placed African aid at the top of the agenda, along with global warming.

The Make Poverty History coalition, consisting of aid groups such as Oxfam and Christian Aid, coincided with Live 8 concerts around the world on a day that focused global attention on the developing world's plight. People in Edinburgh watched the concerts on a giant video screen.

Along the march, the sound of trumpets, drums and whistles mixed with chants like "Drop, drop, drop the debt!" A band of Kenyan immigrants — with "Fair Trade for Kenya" scrawled on their white T-shirts — danced and sang in Swahili, at one point linking together in a circle.

"We want fair trade — no more subsidies for American and European farmers," said Chege Wanjihia, a 31-year-old healthcare worker. "We don't want handouts. We're tired of handouts."

Brian Chiwara, a Zimbabwean immigrant in a synthetic leopard-skin cloak and feather headdress, said more aid should also bring added scrutiny of African leaders. He stood by a flag that read "Make Mugabe History," a reference to Zimbabwe's leader, Robert Mugabe, who has drawn global scorn for stifling political opposition.

"Just giving money to African governments without holding them accountable only enriches the ruling party," he said. "The U.K. and U.S. should empower Zimbabweans and help us become a democracy."

Aid organizations are working harder in African nations to make sure donated money is properly spent, said Make Poverty History coordinator Adrian Lovett of Oxfam. "We'll go there and count the number of schoolbooks in the schools if that's what it takes," he said.

At the rally, Bragg borrowed Bob Marley's song "One Love" and changed the chorus to "Let's drop the debt and it will be all right." Scottish Cardinal Keith Patrick O'Brien read a message from Pope Benedict XVI calling for the people of rich nations to "urge their leaders to fulfill the pledges made to reduce world poverty, especially in Africa."

British Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown endorsed the march at a Christian Aid rally and called the fight against poverty "the greatest moral crusade of our times."

"You are right to demand trade justice and you are right to say instead of being impoverished, Africa's poorest communities should be empowered," he said.

Edinburgh residents were supportive of the protesters' cause, if a bit nervous.

Some stores along the parade route were boarded closed, but many remained open.

"Hopefully they'll be only peaceful and joyful," said Robert Coulter, a 27-year-old barber. "But just in case they're not, we're putting up a 'Power to the People' sign."

Marchers Rally For G-8 Action On African Poverty (WT)

By Robert MacPherson

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

More than 200,000 people marched and linked arms yesterday in the streets of Edinburgh, calling for action on African poverty at this week's Group of Eight (G-8) summit in nearby Gleneagles.

The Make Poverty History rally formed a walking band of white, the color of solidarity with Africa's poor, around the heart of the Scottish capital. It coincided with the Live 8 series of rock concerts around the world.

Both high-profile events were aimed at pressuring the G-8 leaders' summit, taking place from Wednesday to Friday, to agree to a package of aid, debt relief and trade reform to help lift African nations out of poverty.

Blowing whistles and beating drums, with a few Scottish bagpipes thrown in for good measure, the good-natured crowd formed a ring in the streets that ran around Edinburgh's famous hilltop castle.

At 3:00 p.m., the marchers stopped and held hands, forming a giant human chain beneath the castle. Then they observed a minute's silence in memory of the many millions who have died in poverty.

At the head of the march was Zimbabwean campaigner Amadou Kanoute, one of the few Africans in the overwhelmingly white crowd.

"We are at the front here today and that is the right place, because Africa has to be put at the front," he said. "It makes me feel so good to see the solidarity in the people here today."

Organizers estimated the day's turnout at more than 200,000 people making the demonstration the biggest in Scotland yet for a political cause. Local officials put their own figure at around 200,000 as well.

"This is way over our expectations," said Matt Phillips of Save the Children, a major British charity that is part of the Make Poverty History coalition. "It's been an amazing day with a sharp political edge."

Make Poverty History has three core demands: debt relief for Africa's poorest countries, significantly more and better aid from the West, and "trade justice" to enable Africa to sell more exports to rich countries.

The Associated Press reported that about 150 anarchists and anti-globalization protesters dressed in black joined the march, many wearing hoods or covering their faces with bandanas.

Some had T-shirts bearing the anarchist symbol of the letter "A" inside a circle; one had a placard that said "No nation, no order."

Some pushed over a barricade and charged a line of police before running away down side streets. One activist threw a bottle while another tipped over a garbage can. Police described the incident as minor and said no one had been arrested, the AP reported.

Police fear a repeat of violent anti-globalization protests that have marred past G-8 summits, such as the 2001 event in Genoa, Italy, where an officer fatally shot a protester.

G-8 A Study In Power, Seclusion (AJC)

By Don Melvin

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 3, 2005

This week, the leaders of the world's richest countries will gather at a posh golf resort in the cool of Scotland to tackle the issues of African poverty and global warming.

"Along with the threat from international terrorism and the spread of weapons of mass destruction, I believe they are the most serious problems facing the world today," British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the host and agenda-setter for the summit, wrote in The Economist magazine earlier this year.

The Group of Eight summit will bring him together with the heads of government of the United States, Canada, France, Japan, Russia, Germany and Italy. The meeting will begin Wednesday evening with a ceremonial dinner attended also by the leaders' wives and Queen Elizabeth II. It will end Friday afternoon with a news conference and what participants hope will be a joint statement of agreement.

The leaders will meet at the lush, 850-acre Gleneagles estate resort, where the amenities include a golf course, jogging and bicycling trails and guests can also ride horses, shoot, fish, play tennis and even engage in falconry. But the location has been chosen as much for its seclusion as its splendor, as with all the group's venues since police and protesters clashed violently at a World Trade Organization conference in Seattle in 1999.

Isolated site

Last year's G-8 summit was held on Georgia's Sea Island, where the surrounding water provided a natural barrier to protesters. Gleneagles lacks open water, but its rural isolation makes it easy to limit access to the site.

Though there are only eight official members of the G-8, many other officials from around the world will attend, including U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Jose Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission. Also, 11 other heads of government will be on hand.

And there will be sideshows aplenty. Tens of thousands of demonstrators are expected to descend on Edinburgh, an hour's drive away. Many, gathering under the slogan "Make Poverty History," support Blair's initiative. Other, unrulier groups may protest globalization or promote anarchy.

Aides to the G-8 leaders have been meeting in London this weekend to try to hammer out, insofar as possible, the text of the communiqué their bosses will issue at the close of the conference.

Some areas of agreement are already known. G-8 finance ministers agreed last month to cancel as much as $55 billion in debt owed by 38 poor countries. Proponents of debt cancellation say the loans were often agreed to by corrupt leaders who are no longer in power and that the payment of debt service prevents those countries from spending on needs such as education, health care and infrastructure.

In addition, members of the European Union, largely at Britain's urging, agreed in May to double their annual development aid to $80 billion by 2010. Blair has been pressing the United States, Japan and Canada to do the same, and on Thursday, President Bush indicated that he wants to double U.S. aid to Africa.

But Blair seems unlikely to be able to get an agreement from all his guests to take specific steps to curb global warming. Bush does not agree that science has demonstrated that climate change poses a near-term problem or that it is caused by humans.

The United States has not ratified the Kyoto Protocol, an international agreement to reduce "greenhouse gas" emissions that was negotiated in Japan in 1997. More than 140 countries, including the other members of the G-8, have ratified the agreement.

It does seem possible, however, that the leaders will agree in Scotland to support the development of new technologies that do not produce greenhouse gases. That may be enough for Blair to claim success, said Nicholas Bayne, a former British diplomat who has written books about the G-8 summit process.

"I think Blair's objective was to bring the United States back into the international discussion of what to do about climate change," Bayne said. Scientists say the United States is the largest single emitter of greenhouse gases.

Blair host again

Blair is one of the few heads of state ever to lead a second G-8 summit, having hosted the event in Birmingham, England, in 1998. His skill this time lies not so much in his decision to focus the agenda very narrowly as in announcing the subjects on which he would concentrate nearly two years ahead of time. That allowed all the participants to "orient their thinking," said John Kirton, a G-8 expert at the University of Toronto.

The annual summits began 30 years ago, in 1975, when French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing invited the leaders of the United States, Japan, Germany, Britain and Italy to Rambouillet, near Paris, to discuss economic problems. The group expanded to include Canada in 1976 and Russia in 1998.

Unlike most international bodies, the G-8 does not have a fixed structure. It is up to the country that has the presidency to set the agenda and organize the annual summit.

This year's schedule includes a fair amount of free time, which will allow leaders to hold one-on-one talks with one another. Bush told a London newspaper that his agenda also includes walking hand in hand with his wife through the Scottish mist.

At the end of the summits, the leaders sometimes pose for pictures wearing local clothing. Bush, however, said he will not wear a kilt.

Bush also ruled out eating haggis, a traditional Scottish dish of sheep or calf organs mixed with suet and oatmeal and boiled in the animal's stomach.

"I was briefed on haggis," Bush told The Times of London. "No."

The exclusive club of world leaders, known as the Group of Eight, has an identity crisis. It often is described as a collection of the richest countries or largest industrial democracies. It is neither.

The partnership is under pressure to open the door to new members; China, India and South Korea come to mind. Doing so would reflect the rapidly changing global economy and maintain the strategic role for which the group was organized in the first place.

Yet not one of the current members seems to want to make the first move toward expansion.

These strains will be on display in Gleneagles, Scotland, this week when President Bush meets with leaders from Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia for the group's 30th annual economic summit.

China's economy has surpassed Canada's and is racing to the front of the global pack. India, the world's largest democracy, is surging ahead, too.

Five other countries not in the G-8 club boast economies that are stronger than Russia's. They are Australia, Brazil, Mexico, South Korea and Spain.

"It's hard to talk meaningfully about the world economy any more without China being included," said Grant Aldonas, an international trade lawyer who was commerce undersecretary in Bush's first term. Aldonas said a strong case could be made for bringing in other nations with fast-growing economies.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, this year's summit host, has invited leaders from Brazil, China, India, Mexico and South Africa to attend the summit. They will participate in a discussion on relieving poverty, particularly in Africa, and on climate change.

A former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Richard Holbrooke, suggested in a speech to the Asia Society in New York last month that the annual G-8 summit had become "a complete anachronism" because it includes Russia, Italy and Canada but neither China nor India.

By 2050, the countries with the top economies are expected to be the U.S., China, India, Japan, Britain, France, Germany and South Korea. Current club members Italy and Russia would not rank in the top 10.

So is it time to adjust the membership?

"My preference would be to expand it. It's very hard to knock countries off," said Gary Hufbauer, a trade economist at the Washington-based Institute for International Economics. Perhaps expanded to as many as 18 countries, he said.

"I see it happening in stages. I don't think they can admit another country without admitting China first. And the problem then becomes, if they admit China, they will really have to concede that democracy is not a central criteria," Hufbauer said.

The problem with inviting China, critics say, is that all current members have open-market democracies.

Yet democratic India is excluded despite having a dynamic economy and the expectation it will be a major player on the world stage for years to come.

DOJ_NMG_0001144

At the first economic summit in 1975, the participants were the U.S., Britain, France, Germany and Japan. It turned into the Group of Seven with invitations soon going out to Canada and Italy.

The European Union also sends a representative.

Russia became a full-fledged member in recent years. Earlier, Russian and Soviet presidents could attend the meetings as observers.

With Russian President Vladimir Putin hosting the 2006 summit, his G-8 partners have raised concerns about his recent steps to roll back democratic reforms. In addition, it has focused more attention on why Russia, No. 15 on the World Bank's most recent listing of world economies, is even a G-8 member.

The cloud of the Russian presidency and the rapid growth of many developing-world economies could bring enormous momentum to overhaul the G-8, said James Steinberg, deputy national security adviser in the Clinton administration.

"I see a kind of perfect storm coming together" that could set changes in motion beginning with the next summit, said Steinberg, who now works at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank. At a White House briefing on Thursday, the president's national security adviser sidestepped a question that dealt with the nature of Russia's participation and next year's meeting.

"Obviously, the question will be, what does President Putin want to try and accomplish under his chairmanship," said Stephen Hadley.

"There will be some conversations, obviously, in that part with others, but basically, that's pretty much the prerogative of the chair," Hadley said.

Failure Of Past Efforts Cloud The West's Attempt To Help (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

It must have seemed a wonderful idea in the late 1970s: Build a modern carpet factory in Ihiala, in southeast Nigeria, putting in place one small cog in the country's hoped-for transition from a poor, backward nation to an African economic tiger.

The state of Anambra got a loan of $17 million from a Western bank, and a stretch of virgin land was selected. But not a single spadeful of dirt was ever turned. More than 25 years later, the loan is still being repaid.

Like the untouched land, Nigeria, and much of Africa, has not been transformed by the donor aid that has washed in during recent decades, most of which was stolen or wasted. Despite billions of dollars in grants and loans, Africa is the only continent sliding backward, worse off than it was 25 years ago.

Now, a combination of politics, goodwill and timing is giving Africa its biggest break on debt and aid in years. Finance ministers of the world's richest countries agreed last month to forgive $40 billion in debt in an attempt to lift 18 of the poorest countries out of poverty. Fourteen of those are in Africa.

A Group of 8 meeting in Gleneagles, Scotland, this week will finalize the debt deal and perhaps go further. If a British lobbying blitz succeeds, the G-8 could double total foreign aid to Africa.

So sweeping is the effort that no one can say whether it will work wonders or repeat mistakes of the past, when aid fostered dependency, not progress.

"We don't know. We don't really have a precedent for it," said Todd Moss, an analyst with the Washington-based Center for Global Development. The countries that have been most successful in reducing poverty, China and India, did so with little aid, he noted.

"The record of lots of aid leading to economic growth and transformation is an old idea from the '50s that's never been shown to work," Moss said. "I am very skeptical it will lead to sustained economic growth in Africa, absent of major changes inside some of these countries."

In some African countries, such as corruption-plagued Nigeria, people agree that debt relief rarely trickles down to those who need it most. "The common man will not benefit from any debt forgiveness by foreign creditors. It will be shared by the leadership," said Ernest Emefieh, 60, who runs an Internet cafe in Festac Town outside Lagos. "I do not support debt relief because we are not going to enjoy it."

But many economists and anti-poverty activists counter that lifting the yoke of debt is the only way to reduce hardship in the poorest nations. The World Bank is beginning to favor grants, not loans, for the neediest countries to prevent them from getting buried in debt.

"That's clearly the way we've got to go if we want to avoid building up another debt problem," said Max Lawson of Oxfam, one of the British aid agencies that strongly back 100% debt forgiveness for poor countries with good governance.

The aid recipients' record of responsibility is key. The 18 countries that qualify for the G-8 relief plan have instituted reforms to combat poverty and corruption, and the debt forgiveness should provide free education, schools and clinics for about 120 million people. Twenty-two other countries may qualify later, with debt forgiveness potentially reaching $55 billion.

Since 1980, Africa's per-capita income has declined 25% and life expectancy has sunk to 46 years, the British Commission for Africa wrote this year.

African nations received $540 billion in loans from 1970 to 2002, according to the United Nations. Many countries spend more on servicing their debt than on health and education. But much of the money also vanishes in a fog of graft and neglect.

Some analysts question how much the West can do to end African poverty when countries make their own economic decisions and set their own budget priorities. Most concur that massive infusions of aid will be effective only if they are accompanied by trade and investment.

On the other hand, analysts such as Francis Kornegay of the Center for Policy Studies in Johannesburg argue that many more countries should have their debt wiped clean, even those with records of poor governance and entrenched corruption, including Nigeria, Angola, Congo and Sudan. These four do not now qualify for G-8 debt relief.

"These countries are very strategic. If they are stabilized, then the continent has a chance. If Nigeria becomes a failed state, which no one wants, you can imagine how that would set back West Africa and equatorial Africa," Kornegay said.

With $33 billion in foreign debt, Nigeria illustrates why there is widespread cynicism about forgiving African debt and pumping in aid. Why, critics ask, should creditors erase the debts of a country that brings in more than $25 billion annually from oil exports, while most of its people live on less than $1 a day? Won't the money be misused as it has been before?

Many Nigerians think it will. Father Gabriel Osu, spokesman for Lagos' Roman Catholic archdiocese, is angry that those who squandered loans have not been punished.

"As a patriot and on the basis of sentiment, we as a people need debt forgiveness. But on a reality basis, we don't deserve it," he said. "We took the loans, and we must pay them back. See … the vanity all around us. Does this support calls for debt relief?"

Nigeria is supposed to pay $2 billion a year to service its debt. It pays about half that, and officials lobbying for relief recently threatened to stop payments altogether in an Argentina-style default.

Such posturing might not seem likely to garner international sympathy, given Nigeria's oil wealth. But much of the revenue has been guzzled by mismanagement and corruption, leaving 95 million Nigerians in extreme poverty — out of a populace of 129 million. By comparison, about 120 million live in such conditions in the 18 countries chosen for debt relief by the G-8.

Moss and Kornegay argue that Nigeria merits a special deal because a small group of economic reformers, including President Olusegun Obasanjo and Finance Minister Ngozi Okonjo-Iweala, a former vice president of the World Bank, are struggling against powerful interests to put the country on the right track.

"You have an economic system that has deeply entrenched interests, where corruption, graft and patronage are part of the system, and their history of economic management has been awful. But … the country, which was a military dictatorship for 15 years, now has a fragile democracy," Moss said.

"And it has a very capable economic team in place that's trying desperately to reform the economy and to break the stranglehold of the thugs," he said. "If you want the reformers in Nigeria to succeed, we have to do something on debt."

The Western commitment to Africa will be tested when the World Trade Organization meets in Hong Kong in December. There is pressure on Europe and the U.S. to cut subsidies on cotton and sugar that make it nearly impossible for struggling African farmers to compete.

But substantial changes in agricultural subsidies are unlikely, and this could undermine efforts to fight poverty through debt relief. "This year for us is about aid, debt and trade," said Oxfam's Lawson. "If any one of those three falls through, it means their impact is lessened.

"If you've got debt relief and that releases money for you to process cotton, but because of subsidies in America you can't sell that cotton, then clearly the debt relief isn't as effective as it could have been," he said. "If aid is used to get kids into school for an education and when they get out there are no jobs, then clearly that's not going to work."

Moss says the key to raising Africa out of poverty is encouraging small farms and businesses.

"That's where the employment comes from, that's where the tax revenue comes from, that's where the wealth creation comes from," he said. "Now aid can play a role there and trade can play a role there and not having a debt burden can help, but none of those are magic bullets."

Among Ordinary Africans, G-8 Seems Out Of Touch (WP)

By Emily Wax

Peter Kanans, a coffee farmer whose house has no running water and a leaking roof, said he had a message for the leaders of the world's richest countries who will meet at the G-8 summit next week: Unfair trade practices are enriching African officials and international coffee chains while village farmers grow steadily poorer.

"Like many hardworking Africans, I have a serious bone to pick with the G-8," said Kanans, a slender man of 60 who has a college education but wears shredded flip-flops. This year, Kanans said, his crop netted about $300 -- less than his brother in Delaware spends in two months on takeout cappuccinos.

"Even if they cancel the debt, even if they give our governments aid money, ordinary Africans will not benefit," he said. "That money will only make the corrupt people richer and Africans international beggars for decades to come."

The G-8 conference of the eight major industrialized nations, which starts Wednesday in Scotland under the leadership of British Prime Minister Tony Blair, hopes to address trade imbalances in Africa and endorse two major plans championed by Blair that would double aid to the continent and cancel the debt of 14 African countries so they can use the money for such needs as health and education.

This weekend, 10 massive rock concerts, called Live 8, are being held in major cities from Philadelphia to Berlin to Johannesburg to rally support for debt relief and aid to Africa. The celebrity-studded events (Bono, Paul McCartney, Stevie Wonder and Senegalese superstar Youssou N'Dourare are among the artists appearing) are similar to the Live Aid concerts that were held in 1985 to raise money for world famine relief.

On the world's poorest continent, however, feelings about debt relief and aid money are far more nuanced than many Westerners may realize. Africans interviewed this week, from farmers to artists to health workers, say they are grateful for the outpouring of sentiment, and glad to hear that glamorous musicians and actors are championing their cause and that college students are wearing bracelets with the slogan, "Make Poverty History."

But they also said there was a dangerous disconnect between what the industrialized nations see as solutions and what Africans believe they need. Instead of debt relief and more aid, many Africans said they wanted the G-8 to focus on ending corruption and on improving roads, courts, banking and secondary education.

Another useful step, many Africans said, would be to end Western countries' trade subsidies for their own farmers, which make it impossible for African industries to do much more than survive. Debt relief, some asserted, is actually hush money to get free trade advocates off the backs of European countries, the United States and Japan, which offer huge subsidies to their corn, cattle and cotton farmers and thus undercut African farmers' ability to enter the market.

Ousmane Sembene, the prominent Senegalese-born filmmaker, shocked a crowd of earnest young people in London during a talk in early June when he condemned the G-8 and the Live 8 concerts as "fake," and added: "African heads of state who buy into that idea of aid are all liars. The only way for us to come out of poverty is to work hard."

Sembene used the example of cotton, which African countries grow but none of the G-8 countries buy. Instead, he said, they subsidize their own cotton farmers and then dump used clothing on the African markets, crippling Africa's domestic clothing industries.

"We make great cotton in Africa, but the West won't buy it. Instead they are selling us rags," he said. "Everywhere you go in Africa, in the big cities, you would think that you were in a Salvation Army store."

Corruption is an issue that Africans raised repeatedly in discussions about aid and debt relief. In Kenya, many people said they felt betrayed by the new government, which was elected on an anti-corruption platform in 2002. After taking office in early 2003, some said, cabinet officials voted themselves a 172 percent salary increase, putting them among the world's highest-paid ministers.

"Anyone who has spent any real amount of time in Africa knows that corruption is the reality. It's a disservice to ordinary Africans to not be honest about that," said Rose Mucheke, 35, a Kenyan health care worker in Nairobi. While her salary is barely enough to meet her monthly bills, she said bitterly, "the aid money will go into the pockets of corrupt officials to buy their fully loaded Mercedes-Benzes."

Kenya, ironically, does not qualify for immediate G-8 debt relief, because it technically has enough cash to pay its debts -- even though the average citizen lives on $1 per day. The 14 countries due to receive the relief are considerably poorer.

While international pop stars sing to promote relief of poverty and debt, African intellectuals and civil society leaders said they were lobbying hard to shift world attention to other issues, such as the need to link aid to a reduction in corruption and to decrease Western subsidies on agriculture.

"You can address poverty needs by filling someone's belly, giving them a doctor and clean water and a house. But that doesn't make them competitive in the world market," Ross Herbert, a researcher with the South African Institute of International Affairs, said from Johannesburg. "A strong element of aid is about national posturing. Then again, Africa needs so much help that we are taking what we can get. Debt relief is a start, but it's not a panacea."

Herbert said he would like to see G-8 leaders focus on ensuring that aid money goes to developing institutions such as courts and banks, to promote confidence in the rule of law and stability for investors, and on building roads to help cut Africa's onerous transport costs for crops and other products.

The story of Peter Kanans is a case study in how corruption can sabotage even the most ambitious African families. His father was once a successful coffee farmer who sent his sons to college and donated land and money to build a three-story church in their town, 40 miles northeast of the capital, Nairobi.

Kanans got a degree in criminal justice, and rose to become a senior police official and an expert on terrorist bombings. But in the late 1980s, he said, he was fired when he tried to stop a Kenyan official named Nicholas Biwott from smuggling in cheap sugar from abroad without paying taxes. Newspaper reports from that time confirmed Kanans's story. Since then, Biwott has been the subject of numerous corruption investigations.

Kanans went back to farming and took over his father's coffee business. But he said he soon found that government-controlled cooperatives, which acted as liaisons between farmers and the large Western coffee companies, were skimming profits while giving farmers a drastically lower price. He also observed that Kenya was relying more and more on aid, even as its leaders grew richer.

His wife, though a midwife herself, died in childbirth, he said, because the hospital had received little of the aid that supposedly had been donated by foreign countries. His brother, a professor at Kenyatta University, became frustrated with the low pay and left to teach in Delaware.

Back in Kanans's village, many people started to get sick with HIV/AIDS. Kanans and his new wife suddenly found themselves feeding 20 orphans. Aid groups said money was being sent, but he said little reached them.

"Now, I find myself poorer than my father ever was," Kanans said, pointing to a hole in his pants. "All I want to say to G-8 is: Spend some time with the real people of Africa. You're welcome at my home anytime, if you don't mind life without running water."

The Congo Case (NYT)

By James Traub

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

In the last days of 1962, United Nations peacekeepers under the command of Maj. Gen. Dewan Prem Chand of India launched an offensive, rakishly titled Operation Grand Slam, against the secessionist army of Moise Tshombe in the Congolese province of Katanga. Within days, Chand's jet bombers and fighters had smashed the Katangese Air Force, and his men had overrun the rebel strongholds. Tshombe surrendered, and his rebellion, which was among the things that had kept Congo in a state of continual chaos after independence in 1960, largely collapsed. The U.N. remained in Congo for another 18 months. When the troops withdrew, Secretary General U Thant explained that "the United Nations cannot permanently protect the Congo or any other country from the internal tensions and disturbances created by its own organic growth toward unity and nationhood."

Forty-one years later, it is safe to say that while Thant may have been brutally honest about the U.N.'s limitations, he was unduly optimistic about Congo's prospects. The Democratic Republic of the Congo, to use its current and sadly self-mocking name, is on life support, attended around the clock by aid organizations, international bankers, diplomats and, above all, by a vast U.N. civilian and military operation costing $1 billion a year. Congo has in many ways retrogressed since 1960: few Congolese have access to roads, electricity, clean water, medical care or almost any other public services; Congo is a state in name only. Of course, the U.N. doesn't fight wars these days, but even if it did, Congo's problems can no longer be solved by jet fighters. The real problem, of course, is that tangle of "internal tensions and disturbances," which in a happier day seemed like a transitory stage of nationhood.

There is a welcome sense of possibility, even of optimism, about much of Africa just now. At the Gleneagles summit of the world's leading economic powers, the G-8, to be held later this week in Scotland, we may well be hearing a great deal about promising African countries like Ghana or Malawi, which need only timely and well-directed help from the West to prosper. It is a persuasive argument, and an urgent one. But it is also true that great swaths of the continent are occupied by countries -- Sudan, Sierra Leone, Burundi and, not least, Congo -- that, left to their own devices, are very likely to eat themselves up, and their neighbors as well. The international community has no choice but to intervene in these places. While we may know how to stand up to warlords and militias, even if the U.N. has trouble mustering the force needed to do the job, we don't really know what it means to "intervene" against a political culture that is corrupt, mendacious and self-perpetuating. This is a pathology for which the U.N., and the international community, will be avidly seeking a cure for many years to come.

n early May, I flew to South Kivu, an eastern province of Congo that borders Rwanda, in order to spend time with the Pakistani peacekeepers who patrol the area. South Kivu is one of the most heartbreaking regions of what is surely one of the world's most ill-starred nations. It is a startlingly lovely spot, more Hemingway than Conrad: green hills fading into distant, dark ridges; exceptionally well-fed cows grazing on the upper slopes; fields planted with corn, beans, cassava and bananas. South Kivu has abundant water and timber, gold and diamonds, copper and coltan (the mineral from which cellphone chips are made). And yet for all that -- in part because of all that -- the fundamental conditions of life are pitiful. As I was bouncing up a steep, rutted road, a soldier nudged me in the ribs and said, "Look, an ambulance." And there, momentarily stopped on the side of the road, were four weary men bearing on their shoulders a wooden cradle that held a woman wrapped in a thin blanket. It would be hours before they reached the nearest clinic, which was unlikely to have any medicine.

South Kivu was a victim of the same neglect that almost every part of Congo suffered during the 32-year kleptocracy of Mobutu Sese Seko. But the region has endured an extra measure of suffering owing to its proximity to Rwanda. In 1994, thousands of Rwandan Hutu génocidaires fled across the border before the advancing Tutsi forces, settling in the rural areas of South and North Kivu and living off smuggling, "taxes" on local markets, kidnapping and plunder. Starting in late 1966, the Rwandan Army poured over the border and massacred its Hutu adversaries as well as thousands of civilians. After the Hutu threat had been suppressed, the Rwandan Army remained in the Kivus, turning much of eastern Congo into an economic protectorate. And when the Rwandan troops finally left under international pressure, the 10,000 to 15,000 remaining members of the Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda, or F.D.L.R., as the Hutu militia called themselves, returned to their brutal exactions.

U.N. peacekeepers returned to Congo in 2000. Two years earlier, a savage civil war, which involved Congo's neighbors as well as myriad militia groups, had convulsed the entire Great Lakes region. The Security Council agreed to send 5,500 peacekeepers to enforce a very shaky cease-fire. It was a preposterously small number to clamp a lid on so immense a caldron -- the Kivus alone are three times as big as Sierra Leone, where the U.N. had more than twice the number of troops -- and I recall senior officials at the time grimly predicting that the U.N. Mission in Congo, known as Monuc after its French name, would disappear into the Congolese vastness and maybe take the whole peacekeeping enterprise with it. And their fears were soon validated. Peacekeepers were overwhelmed and humiliated on several occasions, most notoriously in Bunia, the chief city of the northeastern region of Ituri, in 2003. There, a small detachment of Uruguayan guards, who had been sent to protect the U.N. mission in the midst of a savage battle between rival militias, remained inside the U.N. compound while hundreds of civilians were murdered.

In May and June 2004, mutinous government troops affiliated with, and quite possibly aided by, the Rwandan government launched attacks on Bukavu, the capital of South Kivu. The city, like Bunia, was protected by poorly trained and equipped Uruguayan peacekeepers. Ordered to take up blocking positions, the Uruguayans instead surrendered the airport and allowed the rebels to take the city, where they indulged in rape, pillage and murder. The Uruguayans protected the hundreds of citizens who took shelter in their compound but refused to venture outside to halt the mayhem. A scathing report by a unit of the U.N. Department of Peacekeeping Operations blamed the civilian leadership of the mission no less than the peacekeepers themselves. William Lacy Swing, the veteran American diplomat who heads the U.N. mission in Congo, personally threatened to take military action if the rebels attacked the airport. But ultimately nothing was done.

The people of South Kivu loathed the Uruguayans, and thus the U.N. itself. When U.N. vehicles drove around Bukavu, local people glared at them and drew fingers across their throats. "The Uruguayans didn't come for peacekeeping," as one Bukavan told me. "They came for tourism." And that very much included sexual tourism. The Uruguayans were notorious for paying villagers -- including children -- for sex. But in this they were scarcely distinctive; U.N. investigations, which began only in the wake of news reports, found numerous instances of sexual abuse, including child prostitution, rape, the exchange of food for sex and other forms of exploitation, among both peacekeepers and civilian employees in Congo. The mission seemed to be a fiasco at every level.

The fall of Bukavu recalled in miniature the most sickening chapters of U.N. peacekeeping, including the slaughter in Srebrenica; indeed, the whole mission, with its failure to come to grips with a chaotic and brutal environment, felt very much like Bosnia redux. But here there was no NATO to save the U.N. with a bombing campaign. Following a request from Secretary General Kofi Annan, the Security Council agreed last fall to add 5,900 troops, principally in the form of new "Kivu brigades," and to give them a stronger mandate. In the Kivus, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations was able to replace a patchwork of national contingents of varying degrees of competence and enthusiasm with brigades of Indians and Pakistanis, among the most professional armies available to the U.N. Early this year, the Uruguayans gave way to a 3,000-man Pakistani brigade.

The area I was driving up to, Walungu, had been terrorized by the F.D.L.R. with almost complete impunity despite the presence of a Uruguayan contingent. At the local peacekeeping headquarters, an island of immaculate landscaping amid dusty squalor, I was greeted by Gen. Shujaat Ali Khan, the new brigade commander. Shujaat, a bluff, garrulous character with a thick black mustache set in a round, pudgy face, gave the impression that, nationality aside, he would have been quite happy serving 40-odd years ago under Dewan Prem Chand. He bridled at the restrictive rules of engagement that have governed peacekeeping ever since the first Congo venture, which, despite its eventual success, provoked a widespread backlash against war-fighting by the U.N. "We are not permitted to fly the attack helicopters at night," he complained. "We cannot fly with the doors open and so on." He could not just go and shoot bad guys.

Shujaat was prepared to forcibly disarm the F.D.L.R., but the Security Council resolution that governed Monuc would not permit that. He had to leave disarmament to the Congolese government troops in the area, and that would be a very unequal fight. The F.D.L.R. was a highly disciplined army, while the Congolese Army was barely a fighting force. The troops who had initially been assigned to work with the Pakistanis had instead devoted themselves to plunder, frequently in collaboration with the F.D.L.R. Shujaat had reached a deal with the regional commander in which his men would transport all 2,200 soldiers out of the area in exchange for other government troops actually willing to fight. "Now," he said, "it is as per our desire."

For all his bluster, Shujaat understood that his job was not to attack the F.D.L.R. troops but to suppress their brigandage so that life could return to something like normal. He appeared to be succeeding. Since the Pakistanis had arrived, the population of a camp in Walungu for "internally displaced people" had dwindled from 2,500 to 800. The ultimate goal was to make life so uncomfortable for the Hutu rebels that they would go back home (though it was plain that the hard core of génocidaires would never leave without a fight). Here, too, the situation was improving: At the end of March, in a major breakthrough, the F.D.L.R.'s political arm had pledged to end its armed struggle against the Rwandan government and to return home as long as its members were guaranteed "political space." Paul Kagame, the Rwandan president, had promised them a safe homecoming though not the political space, a commodity almost unknown in Rwanda. Shujaat, a worrier as well as a blunt realist, found the whole enterprise somewhat doubtful. "These fellows are having an excellent life raping the women and so forth," he told me. "Why should they go back and go to prison?"

Later that afternoon, I drove out with a squad of soldiers in open transports with machine-gun mounts. We stopped at a plateau ringed by steep green hills. Here the men would stay for the next 12 hours: if word of an attack came from any of the government soldiers they had posted in the local villages, they would bounce down the rutted lanes and confront the rebels with gunfire if necessary. Maj. Mohammed Younis, the commanding officer, pointed out the local villages along the ridge lines and said, "When we first began, in late March, we had three to four incidents every week." An F..D.L.R. raiding party would wait until nightfall and then attack a village, stealing food and raping women; they frequently kidnapped villagers, took them back to the forest and threatened to kill them if relatives didn't pay ransoms. But Operation Night Flash, as the Pakistanis called their nocturnal vigil, had at least temporarily closed down the crime wave. Younis said that there hadn't been an incident for close to a week.

As an almost impenetrable fog rolled in, we drove down to the village of Kanyola and stopped in a plaza before the parish church. A group of villagers materialized; one of them stepped forward to say that they had just found the bodies of two victims of a notorious F.D.L.R. kidnapping. Would we like to see them? Several minutes later, an old woman came trudging up the dirt lane from the village, bearing what appeared to be a large child on her back. When she drew closer, we could see that the child was in fact a gray-haired man. The woman, who said she was 65, had the stony mien of the endlessly suffering; only when invited to do so did she rest the corpse on the tailgate of one of our vehicles. The man, she said, was her husband. He and seven others had been kidnapped three weeks earlier. She had paid, he had been released and then he had died from natural causes on the way home; she had stumbled across his corpse. The man standing silently next to her, with a bullet wound in his arm, was her husband's brother, who had avoided capture in the same incident. Having told her tale, she bent over double in order to yank her husband's corpse onto her back, staggered for a moment, righted herself and then stoically bore her burden to the steps of the church.

Nothing else happened that night. Like a modern police force, the Pakistanis seemed to have reduced the crime rate by flooding the bad neighborhoods. And it wasn't only in South Kivu that peacekeepers had taken the fight to the enemy. In the Ituri region, scene of the most humiliating of Monuc's failures to protect civilians, peacekeepers in armored personnel carriers had conducted "cordon and search" operations that had led to the disarming of 12,000 of the estimated 15,000 militia members in the area. Violence continued both in Ituri and in South Kivu, but it was no longer apt to lead to another war or to derail the peace process. In the end, that was all peacekeeping could do. The rest was politics. And politics, it turned out, was much the harder part.

ongo's great problem is the same one that plagues so many African countries -- poor governance. But this technocratic term scarcely does justice to the self-perpetuating machine of immiseration that one Congolese leader after another has operated for over a century. King Leopold II of Belgium put the mechanism in motion in the 1880's when he reduced the tribes of the region to so many employees of companies devoted to sucking up Congo's treasures, principally ivory and rubber. The Belgians ultimately bequeathed the country a decent infrastructure, though they left it ludicrously unprepared for self-government. (At independence, none of Congo's 14 million citizens -- zero -- had university degrees in law, medicine or engineering.) Five years after independence, Mobutu toppled Congo's only elected president in a coup and instituted a home-grown version of Leopold's rapacity. Mobutu stole billions over the years, while the roads and hospitals and schools the Belgians had left behind disintegrated into the bush. Unlike the Belgian king, Mobutu lavished Congo's bounty on his collaborators, who frequently left a presidential audience with $5,000 or $10,000 in their pockets. Kabuya Lumuna, a former World Bank consultant who served as Mobutu's spokesman and deputy chief of cabinet in the last years, said: "Mobutu created an image for the Congolese people that enrichment through the state was normal practice. It is normal for a person to say: 'I have finished my studies. If I can't get a government post, I will live my entire life in poverty.'"

If the purpose of the state is to organize plunder, then a functioning civil service -- or for that matter, a private sector -- only makes the job harder. What Congo lacks is thus not only an effective apparatus -- customs officials, tax collectors, policemen -- but also a legitimate notion of politics. Something so deep-seated is almost by definition impossible for outsiders to import, yet a legitimate politics is unlikely to arise on its own, because the rewards of corruption are simply too lavish.

In 1997, Mobutu was overthrown by a guerrilla army originating in Katanga. The commander, Laurent Kabila, proved to be every bit as corrupt and brutal as Mobutu but lacked Mobutu's spirit of regal largess. And he was reckless: having gained the indispensable support of Rwanda as well as Uganda, he then shut them out of power. Kabila's former allies turned against him and were all too happy to support, and control, a Congolese militia force. What began as a war in the east in 1998 swelled into a Hobbesian war of all against all. Militias, pro- and antigovernment, rose up across the country. Angola and Zimbabwe entered on Kabila's side; whatever their strategic calculations, Congo's neighbors knew they could exploit the chaos to bite off their own chunk of the country's precious resources. It was civil war as mass plunder. Millions of peasants were forced to flee their villages, leading to as many as four million deaths, chiefly from malnourishment and disease. Kabila was murdered by one of his own bodyguards in 2001, and the Katangese entourage who had come to power replaced him with one of his sons, Joseph, then 29, a feckless character who had worked as a cabdriver in Tanzania and was considered acceptable to the outside world.

That outside world has not allowed the machinery of misery to simply grind on, as it would have until quite recently. In early 2003, after various truces had been signed and violated and hostilities had finally tapered off, President Thabo Mbeki of South Africa coaxed the combatants into forming a new government. Kabila's party, the People's Party for Reconstruction and Democracy, or P.P.R.D., would hold the presidency while vice presidencies and a portion of national and provincial offices would be parceled out among the major opposition forces, including the Congolese Rally for Democracy, or R.C.D., a party from the east essentially controlled by Rwanda; the Mayi-Mayi, an amorphous militia that had fought the R.C.D; and a party from the north organized by a wealthy businessman. The men who had provoked Congo's unspeakable civil war were thus given an opportunity to jockey for a share of its spoils. Through what is widely described as an adroit combination of horse trading and bribery, the P.P.R.D. succeeded in excluding Congo's one legitimate political party, which had formed in opposition to Mobutu, and in including two essentially compliant groups among the "opposition" parties.

he most unusual feature of Congo's power-sharing arrangement is that the warlords agreed to make diplomats from the major-donor countries as well as important African neighbors "co-responsible" for the transition, which is to say that outsiders would have the power to impede the inevitable attempts to corrupt the process. And just as the tribal militias and the F.D.L.R. in the east keep challenging the peacekeepers and forcing them to take a tougher line, so have the members of the transitional government confronted their diplomatic minders. Political failure has been, in fact, directly responsible for much of the continued violence and disorder. The parties to the power-sharing agreement had pledged to integrate their militias into a new national army. But since none of these parties had any real political base, the militias were their sole guarantee of power. And so army units, whatever their new name, tended to remain loyal to their old masters and prone to fighting one another -- as they had in Bukavu in 2004 -- rather than any supposedly common enemy. And since most of the $8 million a month that international donors gave the government to pay its soldiers disappeared in transit, the troops had few means of survival save predation, which in any case they were quite accustomed to from the civil-war period. William Swing, the American head of the U.N. mission, assured me that the chief figures in the government "recognize this, and they want to help." Others I spoke to took the view that it was precisely such heightened opportunities for graft that had lured the warlords into the government in the first place.

The U.N., which holds a nonvoting position on the international committee supporting the process, exercises substantial influence over Congolese affairs owing to its size, the reach of its mission and its impartial status. And Swing has played a crucial role in reassuring foreign capitals that Congo is on the right track. He is a great believer in "the process," for which the U.N. provides technical expertise and political guidance. "Of all the peacekeeping transitions in Africa," he told me in his big office in the U.N. compound in Kinshasa, "I don't know of any that's going better than this one." Swing is a classically optimistic American abroad, a calm veteran of innumerable African upheavals who has stayed in improbably wonderful trim despite his 70 years. His optimism, however, can feel dangerously like nonchalance. U.N. officials tried to force him out of office after his failure in Bukavu and his sluggish response to the sexual-abuse scandal, but after he mounted a campaign in Washington, the Bush administration pressured told Kofi Annan to keep him. And with a mild public chastisement, he was retained. Peacekeeping officials in New York fear that Swing's upbeat salesmanship sends the worst possible message to the principal actors. "My feeling," says an official who works with Monuc and thus declined to speak for attribution, "is that we're spending a billion dollars, these people are a bunch of crooks and they're stealing the country blind. We have a responsibility to be pushy."

The question of pushiness has dogged the U.N. and its partners, who seem to shuffle back and forth over some imaginary line of acceptable intervention. When I arrived in Kinshasa in early May, a major crisis was brewing over the constitution. A committee of foreign and Congolese experts had drafted a constitution and submitted it to Parliament, but legislators -- all of them appointed to their posts by the various warlords -- kept changing the document to transfer more and more power to the office of the president, until the constitution had become a virtual blueprint for dictatorship. I had been told repeatedly that Kabila's party, the P.P.R.D., had bribed legislators to, in effect, surrender their own powers. When I met with Azarias Ruberwa, one of the opposition leaders and easily the most highly regarded of the four vice presidents, he said, "The corruption in our country has become so pervasive that these legislators were paid $500 to change their votes -- not $5,000, $500." Ruberwa was outraged not so much at the sale of votes as at the willingness to subvert the nation for peanuts.

The U.N. was then gearing up for a staggeringly expensive and complex national election process, and the prospect of collaborating in what looked like constitutionally sanctioned Mobutuism appalled a number of officials. "We could spend several hundred million to elect a dictator," said Ross Mountain, Monuc's deputy special representative. "Normally you can get a dictator cheaper than that." But diplomats in Kinshasa made no attempt to block the process. Jean-Marie Guehenno, the head of U.N. peacekeeping, went to the Security Council in late April to alert it to this looming catastrophe, but he was firmly rebuffed. The nearly unanimous view was that the Congolese should be free to write their own constitution; it was a matter of sovereignty. And there it would have rested had not Guehenno, deeply alarmed, immediately spoken to senior diplomatic officials in Europe. A few days later, Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, came to Congo to personally deliver the message that the constitution was unacceptable. Diplomats in Kinshasa bestirred themselves at the 11th hour to drive home the same point. Kabila, who knows that he cannot survive without international support, finally relented, and on May 13 Parliament adopted a new, more democratic Constitution.

The transition process has been agonizingly protracted. As originally envisioned, the election was to be held no later than June 30, but thanks to endless dithering, it probably won't be held before some time next year. Another opposition leader, Mbusa Nyamwisi, insisted that Kabila and his Katangese entourage, who effectively control Congo's public-sector companies and a range of mining operations, want to postpone the election as long as possible in order to keep the cash register ringing -- though the same can be said for the other leading parties, each with its own fiefs. No one can say for sure whether the Congolese people, who have been hearing for years that change is soon to come, will accept yet another promissory note.

Swing told me that he understands "the general frustration and impatience with the slowness of the transition," but said that he felt that the Congolese people will accept the delay in the electoral process as long as they see forward momentum. Swing's optimism may well prove justified, but when I relayed his views over lunch in a Kinshasa restaurant with a group of leading Congolese journalists and representatives of rights groups, I was greeted with hoots of derision. Belhard Mbuyi, a columnist for Soft, a local daily, said that when he had admonished villagers just outside of Kinshasa to be patient and to trust in the electoral process, they turned on him, saying, "That's what Kabila says; you must be for Kabila." It was, he said, all he could do to keep from being beaten to a pulp. "They've produced so many schedules in the past," Mbuyi said, "and none of them have been kept." Mbuyi fears an explosion of anger that no party will have the organization and legitimacy to control.

Even if the summer passes without incident and the Congolese go to the polls in due course, the election may do very little to legitimize the state in the eyes of the people. And the problem is not only Kabila and his party; few of the chief candidates will have any connection to the aspirations of the Congolese people. "That's why it's not enough to say to the people, 'Elections are coming,'" says a U.N. official based in Kinshasa who declined to be identified. "We have to say: 'We've heard your message that you can't stand these people who were in the bush for five years of war. They started the war, and now they're looting the money.'" The official says that the only way to prevent the election from deepening popular alienation is to sideline the current government, including Kabila, in favor of figures with greater legitimacy. Such conversations, he said, had not yet begun.

The optimistic view is that elections will bring to the fore a new generation of well-educated and forward-looking politicians. And in fact, I met several opposition leaders who seemed to be essentially free of the Mobutuist taint. But that, alas, cannot be said of Joseph Kabila, the likeliest winner of the election. (I was unable to meet with either Kabila or his senior advisers, who had decamped to Katanga in order to suppress an uprising that included members of Kabila's own elite security force.) Kabila has perpetrated no atrocities; he is plainly not the monster his father was. Congolese, including his own partners in government, tend to view him as an amiable nullity -- "The presidential space is absent," the leader of the Senate said -- but one who is answerable to the same men who surrounded his father after seizing power by brute force and who appear to have disposed of Kabila pere when he became a liability. Vice President Ruberwa, who says that he plans to run for president on a platform of good governance whether anyone pays attention or not, assumes that Kabila will use the vast wealth he has amassed to try to buy the election. "The danger," he said, "will come if the election is nevertheless seen by the world as legitimate. A thief can always be forced out of office, but if he is legitimized by an election, what can you say?"

Well, you could say, "That's sovereignty for you." The international community cannot force the Congolese people to choose the good guy, any more than they can bomb the bad guys into submission; those days are over. But the only Congolese official I met who talked about sovereignty was an unrepentant servitor to the Mobutu government. The Congolese I talked to want to be saved from themselves, or at least from their desperate predicament. Even those who accuse Monuc of spinelessness or complicity add immediately that of course the U.N. troops mustn't leave. They want more troops, not fewer, and more insistent political engagement. They want to see Kabila brought to heel, even if they aren't sure how.

What, then, is to be done? After all, the doctors of the international community, for all their wealth and know-how, cannot rid Congo of its poisons; this is the work of generations. And one argument we will be hearing from the Bush administration at the Gleneagles G-8 summit meeting is that corrupt countries have to change their own political culture before the world starts pouring in aid. That is true, but rather facile. For just as Monuc has begun demonstrating, at last, that there's plenty of space for action between passivity and warfare, so there is space between anticolonial deference and neocolonial dominion (though Congo presents a pretty strong case for the latter). And it is not just something that we owe to the Congolese. If we believe that in the post-9/11 world we can no longer afford to let failed states fester, then we plainly owe it to ourselves to stop the Congolese political class from preying on its people and to shape the nascent institutions of state in such a way as to give legitimate economic and political activity a decent shot at survival. Is that, in fact, a prescription for some kind of benevolent imperialism? If so, then bring it on.

Africa At The Summit (NYT)

"There can be no excuse, no defense, no justification for the plight of millions of our fellow human beings in Africa today. And there should be nothing that stands in our way in changing it." That ringing summons was issued by Britain's prime minister, Tony Blair, earlier this year, when he presented the compelling findings and lucid recommendations of his Commission for Africa. Later this week, we will see whether President Bush has the vision and compassion to meet those challenges, and grasp a historic opportunity to radically improve the life prospects of millions of those fellow human beings.

An unusual and mutually reinforcing set of possibilities is converging around this week's summit meeting of the world's richest countries in Scotland. If Mr. Bush is truly the compassionate conservative he says he is, he will not let the moment pass with the United States continuing to contribute far less than its share to the international effort to include Africa in the prosperity of the 21st century.

Africa is not looking for handouts. It is looking for help in nurturing the human capital, physical infrastructure and governmental capacities that are indispensable to modern development. Africa's poor are asking the world's rich countries for an admission ticket to the modern world. America, the world's richest country, would betray its values and its humanity by holding back.

To his great credit, Mr. Bush has been more attentive to the problems of Africa than his recent predecessors. He has increased overall assistance, stepped up spending on H.I.V./AIDS programs and created the Millennium Challenge Account to reward Africa's best-governed countries. Last week he promised further increases, including a program to fight malaria, and new teacher training and scholarship money to help girls attend school.

But so far there has been a discouraging gap between Mr. Bush's generous declarations and the money Washington has actually made available to Africa. The White House has failed to push the Republican-controlled Congress to fully finance Mr. Bush's aid programs and failed to spur its own aid appointees to get the money flowing to where it is most urgently needed.

At this point, America's total worldwide spending on all forms of foreign aid still amounts to only a relatively stingy 0.16 percent of this country's gross national income, one of the lowest proportions in the developed world. Most European countries represented at this week's summit meeting are already giving substantially higher percentages of their smaller national incomes. Many have promised to double those percentages between now and 2010. Mr. Bush needs to commit Washington to a substantially faster rate of increase to make America once again a leader in global development.

A brighter future for Africa will require more than just increased aid. The other recommendations made by Mr. Blair's commission are just as important. Rich-world agricultural subsidies make it possible for high-cost American, European and Japanese farmers to undersell efficient African producers even in their home markets; they must be phased out. Attention and money must be devoted to strengthening peace agreements and preventing conflicts before they erupt - a far cheaper and more humane approach than waiting to send help only after genocide and other atrocities start appearing on international television screens.

Donors must also make certain that African governments are held accountable for how the money is spent. Western countries can fight corruption by urging their own companies to be more transparent about the money they pay to African governments for oil, diamonds and other valuable commodities and by pressing Western banks to better monitor and police suspicious deposits and fund transfers.

There is a desperate need for greater policy coherence in a period when many national governments, including Washington, are sensibly exhorting African governments to spend more on primary health care and education while international financial institutions largely controlled by those same Western governments have been pressing African countries to shrink their government payrolls, including teachers and health care workers.

Africa comes to this week's summit meeting proclaiming its commitment to be a responsible and constructive partner in its own development. It has made significant accomplishments over the past decade or so. These include a rising trend of multiparty elections across the continent (tyrannies like Zimbabwe's are now the exception, not the rule), an important reduction in the number and scope of destructive civil wars (Darfur being a tragic counterexample), the spread of enlightened economic management (notably in South Africa, Uganda and Ghana) and brave governmental forays against corruption in places like Nigeria.

Nurturing these positive trends and providing hope for Africa's millions, is, as Mr. Blair unflinchingly put it, "the fundamental moral challenge of our generation." We beseech Mr. Bush to embrace that challenge on behalf of the American people.

A Promise, And Pitfalls (LAT)

President Bush's announcement last week of a $1.2-billion package to fight malaria in Africa over the next five years showed an awareness of the disease's economic and human toll. That's progress; the United States has essentially ignored its devastating effects on Africa for decades, throwing in token sums that have enriched U.S. aid contractors but done next to nothing to reduce mortality from a plague that kills from 1 million to 3 million people a year.

Speaking at the Smithsonian Institution on Thursday, Bush announced a package of aid for Africa that also included a doubling of U.S. spending to $400 million for promoting education for girls and an additional $55 million over three years to improve legal protections for women. Welcome moves all, but also a defensive strategy. At the Group of 8 summit starting Wednesday in Gleneagles, Scotland, Bush will be asked to join an initiative by British Prime Minister Tony Blair to double overall aid to Africa. Bush now has a face-saving way to turn Blair down.

All that aside, Bush's malaria initiative is an inspirational commitment that — if implemented properly and fully funded by Congress — could save thousands of lives. Unfortunately, those are big "ifs."

Bush has made grand promises before on foreign aid but failed to wield his influence over the Republican-controlled Congress to get them funded, or to follow through to get the money used.

His biggest aid initiative, the Millennium Challenge Account, was initially touted as a sweeping commitment to Africa that would rise to $5 billion a year by 2006. For the 2006 budget, Bush requested $3 billion for the account, and last week a Senate subcommittee trimmed that to $1.8 billion. The previous year's commitment was less. Yet even that is misleading. To date only $400,000 from the account has actually been spent, though commitments have been signed to spend $610 million on four nations.

Assuming Bush can drum up the money to keep his $1.2-billion promise on malaria, there are serious questions about how it would be spent. At all costs, the administration should resist the traditional method of distributing foreign aid: giving it to the U.S. Agency for International Development.

In May, Senate hearings on USAID's anti-malaria spending turned up some shocking revelations, including the fact that just 5% of the agency's $90-million malaria budget is spent on concrete tools to fight the disease, such as insecticide-treated bed nets and drugs. The bulk of the money goes to nonprofit U.S. corporations that mostly provide high-priced consulting work to African governments or create public education campaigns to induce people to buy bed nets, which very few rural Africans can afford.

The administration promises to work with other governments and the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Malaria and Tuberculosis, and that's a good sign. Bush should see this initiative as an experiment in distributing aid without USAID's involvement.

Now's Not The Time For Europe To Go Wobbly (WP)

By Ivo Daalder And James M. Goldgeier

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

From the beginning, Europeans have greeted President Bush's "transformational diplomacy" with disdain. To them, the mess in Iraq demonstrates the failure of a policy that relies on speaking loudly and carrying a big stick. Instead of pursuing a policy of invasion, Western Europe has used the prospect of membership in the European Union to help transform the countries of Central and Eastern Europe into stable market democracies, thus continuing a process that saw Greece, Spain and Portugal join after they too pursued a democratic path.

The crisis in Europe that has emerged in recent weeks, first with the rejection of the European constitution by voters in France and the Netherlands and then with the breakdown of budget negotiations at last month's E.U. summit, has put the brakes on talk of continuing the enlargement process. The consequences of turning inward will not be temporary -- nor confined to Europe alone. Nations that had hoped to join instead face a future marked by economic decline, creeping authoritarianism, growing instability and possibly even violence. As for the European model of transformation -- recently heralded as the reason "Why Europe Will Run the 21st Century" -- it will lose its luster in other parts of the world, which looked to Europe's success as a way to direct their own future.

In the last 15 years, many east European countries reformed their economies, tackled corruption and opened their political systems in the expectation that E.U. membership would bring them the peace and prosperity their western neighbors had long enjoyed. That hope may now be lost for all remaining aspirants but Bulgaria and Romania, whose negotiations with the E.U. are far enough along that they may join in 2007. Turkey will have to rethink its assumption that the opening of formal accession talks on Oct. 3 would be the first sure step to membership down the road. The Balkan countries of Croatia, Macedonia and Bosnia will have to revise their hopes that the years of war could finally be put behind them as they joined Europe, paving the way perhaps for Serbia and Montenegro and a final resolution of the festering sore of Kosovo. And Ukrainians will have to think again about whether the 2004 Orange Revolution really heralded a new Euro-Atlantic orientation after years of increasingly corrupt and authoritarian rule.

For all of these countries, Europe's current crisis could not have come at a worse moment. Conflict over the future course of reform will be likely in them all, halting if not reversing the progress made to date. Europe's entire periphery will be that much more unstable -- with consequences for stability within the E.U. itself.

The growing resistance to enlargement is shortsighted. Let's remember what earlier enlargement did for Europe in just 15 years. A continent that produced World War I, World War II and the Cold War has been transformed into a Europe nearly whole and free and at peace. Never before have so many countries with so many people made such political and economic progress in such a short period of time as the countries imprisoned for decades behind the Iron Curtain. These gains are now being put at risk.

Take the Balkans. While the violence of the 1990s is behind us, the situation there remains fragile. For now, the ugly face of nationalism is being held in check as Bosnia, Croatia, Macedonia and Serbia have embarked on the reforms necessary to be considered for E.U. membership. Once that door closes, the political consensus in favor of reform will likely shatter as leaders fall back into their old ways. The situation in Kosovo remains particularly volatile -- with the only viable long-term solution being for both Kosovo and Serbia to join the larger Europe.

Turkey offers the more immediate challenge. While voters in France and the Netherlands made clear that they did not want Turkey to join their Union, can Europe really afford not to continue on a path that would lead to membership for the first primarily Muslim country? Consider what might be lost. Because of the need to satisfy the E.U.'s criteria, Ankara's leaders have already undertaken extraordinary reforms. On the political side, Turkey has abolished the death penalty, allowed much greater freedom of speech and introduced civilian control over military budgets. On the economic front, Ankara has slashed government subsidies. The government has reached out to the country's Kurdish minority and to neighboring Greece, with which relations are better than ever. All this might be lost if Europe fails to leave open the possibility of Turkey's membership.

Similarly, without the incentive of E.U. membership, Ukraine's new leaders may prove either not committed or not strong enough to root out corruption and reform the security services. These are tough challenges -- but ones that Ukraine's neighbors were determined to overcome once they realized this was the price they had to pay for entering Europe. If Ukraine fails to get a clear signal that its future lies with Europe, the hopes of the Orange Revolution will fade fast.

The consequences for Europe of a failure to keep the enlargement process moving are grave. Failure in Turkey might well inflame Muslim populations throughout Europe. And while many Europeans fear that Turkish membership brings Europe to the borders of Iran, Iraq and Syria, Europe cannot hope to play a stabilizing role in the broader Middle East if it does not help Turkey succeed.

After the bright hopes of last year, failure in Ukraine would be disastrous for the former Soviet Union as a whole, producing a sense of crisis not only for Ukraine's neighbors in the east but also for some of its E.U. neighbors in the west, potentially increasing Moscow's leverage over these nations.

There is too much at stake for Europe to accept risks like these. Washington must help its European friends in developing policies that minimize the damage. NATO's expansion policy, which has languished as E.U. enlargement took center stage, should be put back on the front burner to address the fears and aspirations of countries like Ukraine, Serbia and Bosnia. The

E.U. must also create new kinds of association arrangements that fall short of membership, and thus do not evoke the kind of public opposition that full membership now does.

Unless the door to Europe is kept ajar, the instability that continues to bedevil Europe's periphery in the broader Middle East and the former Soviet Union will come to plague Europe itself and all that has been accomplished there. The consequences would be bad not just for Europe, but also for the United States, which needs a strong partner to address challenges emanating from Northern Africa, the Middle East and Eurasia.

Music, Politics Merge In Live 8 Concerts Across The Globe (KRT)

By Matthew Schofield

Knight Ridder, July 3, 2005

The new era of celebrity diplomacy kicked up its volume Saturday, with rock concerts on four continents aimed at forcing world leaders to increase African aid, cancel existing debt and open up trade.

The concerts, the beginning first in Tokyo with the last of the day ending in Barrie, Canada, attracted more than a million in person, and a potential television audience of billions. The effort was called Live 8, a counterweight to the G-8 summit scheduled to begin Wednesday in Gleneagles, Scotland. The G-8 is a group of the world's eight most powerful leaders. At their meeting this week, they are scheduled to address African economic and global climate issues.

In addition to the concerts, almost a quarter million protesters marched in Edinburgh, the nearest large city to the summit site, calling for an end to poverty.

Summit participants, including President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, have already preliminarily agreed to cancel $40 billion of debt in the world's poorest nations, and to increase direct aid moving toward the $25 billion to $50 billion called for by Live 8 organizers.

Critics of the effort claim that it focuses too much on aid and too little on job creation in Africa, that it is too patriarchal and that too few Africans are involved in an effort aimed at helping Africa.

The focus Saturday, however, was on stage. The driving force behind the effort, Bob Geldof, formerly of the Boomtown Rats and the organizer 20 years ago of Live Aid - the concert that raised about $150 million for African aid, had billed this not as a fund-raiser, but a consciousness raiser.

In a tribute to the first effort, the London concert began with rock group U2 and former Beatle Paul McCartney singing "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Heart's Club Band," opening with the words, "It was 20 years ago today ... "

Before the London concert began in Hyde Park, as about 200,000 waited outside a quickly built stage framed by guitars with the body shaped like Africa and the necks twisted into figure eights, Geldof told reporters: "Everything that rock and roll is meant to be is happening now."

Later, during the performance, he would describe Saturday's concerts as part of the "long, long walk to justice."

Performers around the world mixed music with the political pleas, pop-star Madonna, in London, asked concertgoers, "Are you ready to start a revolution? Are you ready to change history?"

In Philadelphia, in a scene that was broadcast to concerts around the world, actor/singer Will Smith urged people around the world to snap their fingers at three-second intervals, noting that the pace represented the death rate for African children from poverty.

Not all of those on stage were artists, however.

In Johannesburg, former South African leader Nelson Mandela - in a message broadcast to other venues - called the worldwide event an "historic opportunity," for "a better future for all ... It is within your power to prevent a genocide against humanity."

And Microsoft billionaire Bill Gates noted in London, "If you show people the problems and you show them the solutions, they will be moved to act."

The G-8 includes the United States, United Kingdom, Canada, France, Italy, Germany, Japan and Russia, and there was a concert in each nation.

United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan, in London to show support for Live 8, said that there was great value in turning the world's eyes toward the problems of global poverty.

"On behalf of the poor, the voiceless and the weak, I say thank you," he said.

Off stage, Bono, of the rock group U2, said that they weren't there to change the world, but to energize the audience to take up the cause.

"The rock stars and hip hop stars can't change anything," he said. "But the audience can. They can put the politicians who do something in and out of office."

City Of Brotherly Love Brings It On Home (WP)

By J. Freedom Du Lac And Teresa Wiltz

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

It's not every day that you see this: A prepubescent girl in the middle of a Million Fan Mosh, squealing in apparent ecstasy and holding up a hand-drawn sign that declares "I (Heart) Linkin Park!!!!!!" A few feet to her left, a woman old enough to be her mother wearing a Toby Keith T-shirt. And nearby, a solemn-looking man holding his own stenciled statement that says: "Make Poverty History."

That unlikely brew of cause and cacophony was the hallmark of Live 8, the politically motivated pop festival that was staged Saturday in 10 cities around the world. The only U.S. edition was here, on the Benjamin Franklin Parkway in front of the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

Mayor John Street announced that 1 million people packed the 60 acres on and around the mile-long boulevard. If that number is remotely accurate, Live 8 would rank as the largest concert ever staged in North America.

No question, hundreds of thousands of people turned out for a musical smorgasbord that had the multiethnic rap-rockers Linkin Park and the country boy Keith sharing a stage with neosoul singer Alicia Keys, hair-metal relics Def Leppard and rap star Kanye West. (Not all at once, though.) United in cause, if nothing else, the disparate group of stars provided the draw -- and, every few minutes, the message, too:

Dear world leaders,

Rid Africa of debt. Now.

Signed,

The Billboard Top 40

"This is one of the most important things we will collectively or individually be a part of," singer Rob Thomas told the crowd. A sheepish look washing over his face, Thomas then introduced a relationship song by noting that "it doesn't have anything to do with" the issues at hand.

At least he acknowledged what was becoming increasingly obvious and awkward: That few of the performers chose material even remotely related to the core Live 8 message. Organizers did have the good sense to fill the show-closing slot with Stevie Wonder, who has long addressed human suffering and injustice in song; yet even Wonder's set included off-message love songs, such as "Signed, Sealed, Delivered I'm Yours."

The crowd was blessed with plenty of sunshine and relatively mild temperatures for July, although it didn't seem that way after a few hours in shoulder-to-shoulder formation. The show ran from a little before noon until nearly 7 p.m., about an hour longer than planned yet still relatively close to schedule for an event that came together in just 32 days.

By show's end, police reported four arrests for what were called minor incidents and five disorderly conduct citations. Thirty-eight people were transported to hospitals, primarily for heat-related problems, and about 300 concertgoers were treated and released at medical facilities at the concert site, according to Tom McNally, a spokesman for the city.

The technological difficulties of coordinating so many shows -- 10 on four continents -- became obvious early in the day, when the nine Jumbotrons in Philadelphia showed Paul McCartney and U2 performing "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band" in Hyde Park as audio bled in from Paris, where R&B singer Craig David was doing a severe disservice to the Beatles classic "Come Together." Throw in the distraction of a bass being sound-checked and you had a mash-up gone awry.

As if on cue, a mounted police officer's horse, trotting through the crowd, relieved itself at that very moment.

There were other glitches in Philadelphia, too. During the Black Eyed Peas' set, almost an entire verse of "Where Is the Love?" went unheard. Speakers popped and crackled during Destiny's Child's performance, appearing to strain under the weight of all that thunderous bass. (Or maybe that was the sound of all those jaws dropping when Beyonce Knowles sashayed onstage in a perilously short white skirt.)

The Jumbotrons were meant to connect concertgoers in the nether reaches of the parkway to the performers, but the screen operators often betrayed a wandering eye. The majority of West's electrifying set, for instance, was heard but not seen, as the screens flashed canned video images rather than the Chicago rapper-producer's actual performances of the smash hit "Jesus Walks" and the new anti-bling treatise, "Diamonds of Sierra Leone." It was a shame, as the set was one of the day's artistic high points.

Not that this was supposed to be about art.

Live 8 organizer Bob Geldof's goal was to make a social statement so grand, so loud, that the leaders of the industrialized world simply could not ignore it. So, with a few exceptions, Geldof booked the biggest artists, not necessarily the best.

How else to explain the ridiculous sight of Bon Jovi's Richie Sambora fretting over his anachronistic double-neck guitar? Or, worse: a choice slot for those piffle-rock masters, Maroon 5?

DOJ_NMG_0001157

At least fans weren't ripped off. As with the other Live 8s, the Philadelphia concert was free.

"We're not asking for your money," actor Don Cheadle said from the stage. "We're asking for your voice."

Cheadle then urged everybody to sign an online petition to pressure the G-8 participants, meeting this week in Scotland, to help Africa out of abject poverty.

Said actor-rapper (and Philly native) Will Smith: "We're calling on the eight most powerful leaders to do what they can to end. This. Tragedy."

These being megalomaniacal pop stars, of course, there were also calls made in the name of far less noble causes.

Having been carried onto the stage on a throne, Smith instructed the crowd to scream "Will's house!" every time he asked just where we were. He also detonated various pyrotechnics in an apparent effort to mark his territory. (It didn't work, as he was overshadowed by several artists, including West, the rock-rap group Linkin Park performing an explosive set with rap icon Jay-Z; Australian heartthrob Keith Urban, whose country-pop performance was a revelation -- even Bon Jovi.)

The Black Eyed Peas weren't nearly as braggadocious as Smith. That's never been the boho-pop-rap group's style. The group did, however, show off at least a hint of crassness when lead vocalist will.i.am introduced the last part of the group's set by saying: "We're going to do a song off our new record, 'Monkey Business.' " In mentioning their product by name, the Peas stood virtually alone.

To their credit, the Peas -- like the other Live 8 performers here and around the world -- did not receive a penny for having performed. But it wasn't exactly a net loss. The artists got to perform their hit songs -- typically three to a set -- before a global TV audience that organizers predicted would number more than 2 billion.

Backstage, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer, every performer received a token of the organizers' appreciation: a $3,000 Hugo Boss duffel bag, along with access to an impressive spread of swag, from $2,000 Gibson guitars to Bertolucci watches worth as much as $6,000.

Backstage, in the press tent, celebrities were shuttled in and out for a little picture-taking and a little espousing about the troubled state of affairs on the African continent.

Some didn't even bother with the espousing part. There was Anna Nicole Smith, she of the hyper-inflated chest and the newly Trimspa'd bod. It was announced that Ms. Smith would not be fielding questions. She was, however, more than happy to provide a photo op. Dressed in skinny jeans and a nearly absent pink top, she preened and posed, smiling and mute, her Mystic Tan gleaming. She shimmied and shook her implants, just as Jumbotrons began transmitting Will Smith's speech.

"Every three seconds, a child in Africa dies," he intoned onstage as the other Smith shook her investments.

The Rev. Al -- Sharpton, not Green -- was in the house, seemingly impervious to the heat with his shellacked hair and beige leisure suit. He came with a posse and an agenda: He and Mayor Street would be meeting the next day to form a "follow-up plan" to Live 8.

Someone from the press corps wanted to know how Sharpton remained so "fearless."

"You have to be committed," Sharpton said. "You have to be here for a reason, not just a season. I'm not always fearless."

Rita Marley, looking glam and way younger than her sixtysomething years in high heels and capris, was channeling her late husband, reggae giant Bob Marley. When asked a question, she spoke in lyric:

"Get up, stand up, stand up for your rights," she said, "Get up, stand up, don't give up the fight."

Kami, the HIV-positive puppet who appears on the South African version of "Sesame Street," was backstage, too. Reporters diligently asked the puppet questions and jotted down answers.

Out front, the show began 15 minutes before noon, when the British band Kaiser Chiefs bounded onstage after what seemed like endless hours of sound checks. Looking like they'd time-traveled from the first Live Aid (neck scarves! oh-so-'80s blazers! rolled-up jeans!), the group offered a rather ominous opener: "I Predict a Riot."

If nothing else, the show suggested a possible new Olympic sport: The 60-acre steeplechase. Police cleared the parkway overnight and kept eager fans at bay until daybreak, when the tree-lined boulevard was reopened to pedestrian traffic and a human autobahn materialized. "It was crazy -- totally insane," said Michael Lunt.

The 23-year-old had flown in from Salt Lake City overnight, arriving just in time to make a mad dash in the general direction of the stage. To get there, he had to avoid wires, fencing, vending trucks, 400 Port-a-Potties and tens of thousands of people along the way.

"There were already a ton of people here," said Lunt's friend, Jeff Johnson, 24, who had taken the train up from Washington's Union Station. "The floodgates opened, and everybody just started running. Whoever was fastest got up to the front."

The two Brigham Young University students must be fleet afoot, then: As the show began, Lunt and Johnson were positioned just behind the metal barricades 30 yards from the stage. They were the best spots in the house, at least for the hoi polloi. VIPs occupied the area immediately in front of the 60-by-120-foot stage and even got their own folding chairs.

Lunt and Johnson hadn't slept since Thursday, and they clearly hadn't prepared for the marathon event. Neither was wearing sunscreen (which became evident by noon, as their faces turned a bright pink). Nor had they eaten since Friday, when Lunt had a small bag of pretzels on the plane and Johnson had a hot dog -- and now there was no food within grabbing distance. "We'll feed off the music, I guess," Lunt said.

And then, there was the bathroom issue. As in: how to go without losing those spots near the stage?

"We're pretty much stuck here," Johnson said. "I guess we'll have to go easy on the water. But it's worth it. It's a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

As fans wedged onto the parkway sang along to Destiny's Child's "Say My Name," a couple performed an erotic pas de deux, grinding to the music as the man yelled, "Owwwwww! Owwwwwww!" and others looked on in bemusement. There were those who attempted to picnic, bravely spreading out blankets on the grass -- only to have them trampled by the crowd.

As Wonder closed the show, the air was ripe with the fragrant aroma of day-long sweat and sunburned skin. Everyone got to their feet.Young girls swathed in the latest in boho-chic peasant skirts clutched tiny American flags. A contingent of rollerbladers danced with their helmets on. They'd been on hand to help, running water to police and firefighters. Now they were taking advantage of their access to get closer to the stage.

Backstage, singer Sarah McLachlan said that performing here was almost a "meditative" experience. "I've never gone by myself live in front of all these people," she said. "I almost started crying."

She said that as soon as she heard "a hint of a whisper" that Live 8 might be happening, she asked her manager to sign her up.

Wonder was the last to speak backstage, switching to a business suit emblazoned with gold brocade, evocative of Michael Jackson's court attire.

"How can you take the first continent of civilization, with all its natural resources, and not give back?" he said. "It's a joke."

Live 8 Concerts Rock The Globe For Africa (WT)

By Scott Galupo

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

Hundreds of thousands turned out here yesterday for the U.S. installment of Live 8, a worldwide cluster of concerts performed in advance of the July 6 summit of Group of Eight leaders and designed to raise awareness of poverty in the developing world.

The six-hour concert, staged in front of the Philadelphia Museum of Art and stretching across 60 acres of the Benjamin Franklin Parkway, featured top American artists, such as the rock band Bon Jovi, country musician Toby Keith, rapper Jay-Z and R&B group Destiny's Child.

"With the stroke of a pen, eight men can make a world of difference for billions of people," said rapper-actor and concert host Will Smith, referring to the world leaders who will meet Wednesday in Gleneagles, Scotland.

Live 8 organizer Bob Geldof requested that performers ratchet down the kind of partisan rhetoric that characterized celebrities' involvement in the presidential election last year. Artists here complied for the most part, but, occasionally, lips loosened.

Before his performance, rapper Kayne West said the Iraq war, the AIDS epidemic in Africa and the South Asian tsunami made him wonder, "Are all of Hitler's dreams coming true -- to only have one race left?"

In addition to pop musicians, the event drew black actors, such as Chris Tucker and "Hotel Rwanda" star Don Cheadle. And the scantily clad reality-TV star Anna Nicole Smith posed for reporters, but chose not to answer questions, such as "Why are you here?"

Elsewhere across the globe, more than a million fans attended concerts in Tokyo, Moscow, Johannesburg, Berlin, Rome, Paris, Toronto, London and the southwest England town of Cornwall, where a concert featured African-based musicians.

None of the Live 8 concerts yesterday raised funds for the blighted African nations. Instead, Mr. Geldof, the driving force behind the Live Aid famine-relief concerts 20 years ago, said Live 8 represented a post-charity phase of a global anti-poverty campaign.

Mr. Geldof and fellow Live 8 organizers U2 frontman Bono and screenwriter Richard Curtis aim to convince the world's eight leading industrialized nations to cancel the debt of Africa's poorest countries, increase foreign-aid spending and open their markets to African exports.

"Don't make Africa more pathetic," said Rick Warren, author of "The Purpose Driven Life." "Africa doesn't need a handout. It needs a hand up."

The Live 8 concerts, London's in particular, were criticized for excluding nonwhite musicians. Philadelphia's lineup, meanwhile, was heavy on black hip-hop and R&B artists, such as Mr. West, the Black Eyed Peas and Alicia Keys.

DOJ_NMG_0001159

Record producer and Philadelphia event organizer Russell Simmons said "no big idea carries in America without hip-hop."

Benjamin Chavis of the Hip-Hop Summit Action Network said, "Hip-hop is a growing cultural phenomenon throughout Africa. We want to connect."

Attendance figures here were disputed primarily owing to the no-ticket, all-invitation nature of the event. (Concertgoers at London's Hyde Park, in contrast, were awarded tickets on a lottery basis.)

Thousands of people streamed through Philadelphia's center-city core -- which was closed to vehicle traffic -- just to be within reverberatory earshot of the music.

Veteran local promoter Larry Magid reported "no surprises" about midway through the afternoon.

"Are we good or what?" said local disc jockey Cindy Drew, boasting of the city's capacity to handle large crowds.

Crane-hoisted hoses sprayed the crush of people on the parkway, whose carnival-like perimeter was dominated by freelance T-shirt hawkers and a bevy of food vendors.

In fact, a minor pre-concert controversy here revolved around the seemingly disproportionate share -- 17 percent -- of minority set-aside vending spaces that were given to Philadelphia Mayor John F. Street's brother, T. Milton Street.

"There was no special arrangement for him," a spokesman for a food company partnering with Mr. Street told the Philadelphia Inquirer.

In Johannesburg, former South African President Nelson Mandela received a five-minute ovation, according to wire reports. "History and the generations to come will judge our leaders by the decisions they make in the coming weeks," Mr. Mandela said. "I say to all those leaders: Do not look the other way. Do not hesitate ... . It is within your power to prevent a genocide."

In Hyde Park, Paul McCartney and U2 opened the show jointly with a rendition of the Beatles classic "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band." Aptly enough, the song's first line evoked the anniversary of the original Live Aid: "It was 20 years ago today ... ."

Organizers estimated that up to 85 percent of the world's population had access to the Live 8 concerts through television, radio or online broadcasts. In parts of Europe, the concerts could be viewed on mobile phones, according to Ralph Simon, head of the London-based Mobilium Group.

Asked in Philadelphia if artists felt they were competing with the $200-million-raising-legacy of Live Aid, Def Leppard frontman Joe Elliott said, "We're not competing with anybody. Everybody wins today."

Musical Cry To Help Africa's Poor Is Heard Around Globe (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

Hundreds of thousands of people gathered here and in nine other spots around the world on Saturday for a series of free concerts meant to persuade world leaders to give more money to fight poverty in Africa.

The concerts, held in South Africa as well as in each of the eight countries whose leaders will gather at the Group of 8 summit meeting in Scotland starting on Wednesday, were a triumph of logistical flexibility, extravagant idealism and strange juxtapositions.

In London, the preternaturally scruffy Sir Bob Geldof, the former Boomtown Rat and the events organizer, performed an old favorite, "I Don't Like Mondays," while the clean-cut billionaire Bill Gates told the cheering crowd that "some day in the future, all the people in the world will be able to lead a healthy life."

Conceived only in May and organized in haste, with additions popping up at the last minute - concerts in Moscow and Japan were announced just a few days ago - the Live 8 shows were intended to send a loud message to the leaders of the eight countries before their meeting.

In Philadelphia, an estimated 1.5 million people heard the rapper and actor Will Smith relay the sobering statistic that in Africa, one child dies every three seconds. In Johannesburg some 40,000 people gathered to listen to the music and to denounce the selfishness of the world's richest countries.

"They owe us," said the South African pop star Zola, speaking of Europe. "They are the ones who brought slavery, killed our ancestors. If anybody must pay, they must pay us back so that we can have jobs and education."

Elsewhere, some of the stars seemed unsure of the statistics they were citing - in London, performers could not agree whether 50,000 Africans die of poverty every day, or just 20,000 - but the sentiment was there. "This is our moment; this is our time; this is our chance to stand up for what's right," Bono of U2 told the crowd in Hyde Park, saying 3,000 Africans die every day of bites from disease-carrying mosquitoes.

U2 led off the concert here, playing "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band" along with one of its composers, Sir Paul McCartney. The familiar opening line - "It was 20 years ago today" - was an affectionate reference to Live Aid, the multiact extravaganza staged in 1985, also by Sir Bob, to raise money directly for African famine relief.

Expectations for Live 8 were high, as was on-the-scene euphoria. Chris Martin, the charismatic frontman of Coldplay, which performed in London, called the concerts "the greatest thing that's ever been organized, probably, in the history of the world."

According to Sir Bob, who sweet-talked, strong-armed and shamed politicians and musicians into endorsing and taking part in the 10 concerts, the collective gatherings constituted "the largest mandate for action in history."

Among his "demands" were that the Group of 8 leaders increase aid to Africa by $25 billion, as well as send an additional $25 billion to impoverished non-African countries.

The concerts included more than 200 musical acts scheduled to play more than 69 hours of music. Organizers said 5.5 billion people would be able to watch or listen on the Internet and over 182 television stations and 2,000 radio networks and stations.

Enormous crowds turned out for the concerts in London and in Philadelphia, where a diverse and mellow crowd withstood 85-degree heat to listen to bands including Destiny's Child and the Black-Eyed Peas. But some of the other concerts - held in Barrie, Canada; Berlin; Johannesburg; the Eden Project, an ecological theme park in Cornwall, southwestern England; Moscow; Versailles, France; Philadelphia; Rome; and Chiba, Japan - proved not as well-attended as expected.

The concert in Japan drew just 10,000 spectators, in a stadium that holds twice that many. At the Circus Maximus in Rome, the crowd was estimated at about 200,000, and enthusiasm was high. "I wanted to raise their awareness about issues like canceling the debt," Isabella Dandina, a 40-year-old housewife, said of her three teenage children. She said she thought the initiative would jolt the Group of 8 leaders into action. "We're all voters, if you want to put it in blackmail terms," she said.

The mood was festive at the Brandenburg Gate in Berlin, too. "I can feel a sense of community among all the people," said 31-year-old Peter Gabriel, a computer engineer, "and many of the band leaders actually seem very convincing in what they say."

Many Africans were not aware that concerts were being held on their behalf. "I hope it's going to help us Africans," said Jane Waisaka, a hairdresser in Nairobi, "but I really don't know how."

Sir Bob has certainly been doing his best to prod politicians into paying attention, publicly berating Italy and Canada, saying they do not spend enough money on foreign aid.

The call was taken up at the concert in Barrie, a town about an hour north of Toronto, where the Canadian musician Tom Cochrane said onstage that foreign aid should represent 0.7 percent of the country's gross domestic product.

But a poll published Saturday said most Canadians agreed with their prime minister, Paul Martin, that spending should be kept in check so as to preserve the country's budget surplus.

"I'm sure Bob Geldof means well," the commentator Connie Woodcock wrote recently in the Toronto Sun, "but where does this second-string musician get off telling Paul Martin he doesn't like our foreign aid spending?"

Start To Make It Better, Live 8 Urges (LAT)

By Randy Lewis and Vanora Bennett

LAT -- Live 8, July 3, 2005

The day began here with Paul McCartney and U2 joining forces, climaxed with the emotionally charged reunion of iconic '70s rock band Pink Floyd and wrapped with an all-star cast singing the Beatles' "Hey Jude."

And that was just on one of the 10 stages around the world that were part of Saturday's Live 8 concert extravaganza to raise awareness about poverty in Africa.

American rock band Green Day powered through Queen's "We Are the Champions" in Berlin, husband-wife country music stars Tim McGraw and Faith Hill topped the bill in Rome, and in Canada, Neil Young delivered a tenacious rendition of his sardonic anthem "Rockin' in the Free World" in his first public performance since a brain aneurysm in March.

About 900,000 people turned out in nine countries for the free concerts, which were broadcast live on TV, radio and over the Internet in 140 countries to a potential audience estimated at more than 1 billion.

"This is our moment, this is our time," U2 singer Bono, one of the driving forces behind Live 8 and 1985's Live Aid, said in front of an estimated 200,000 people at London's Hyde Park. "This is our chance to stand up for what's right. We're not asking for charity. We're asking for justice."

Unlike the Live Aid concerts in London and Philadelphia two decades ago, at which fans were asked to open their hearts and their wallets to help famine victims in Africa, the thrust of Live 8 wasn't raising funds, but consciousness about the toll poverty is taking in Africa.

Musicians and celebrity speakers urged audiences to pressure President Bush, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and leaders of other wealthy nations to take swift action when they meet for the annual Group of 8 summit Wednesday near Edinburgh, Scotland. About 220,000 people gathered there Saturday for a rally timed to coincide with the summit and the concerts.

Live 8 supporters want the G-8 to adopt a three-pronged program mirroring recommendations by Britain's Commission on Africa, of which Bob Geldof, organizer of Live 8 and Live Aid, is a member. It calls for canceling debts, increasing foreign aid and ending trade tariffs for impoverished African nations.

McCartney and U2, who sang the Beatles' "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band" on Saturday, were joined in London by other Live Aid veterans, including the Who, Madonna, Elton John and Sting.

At other venues, Stevie Wonder, Jay-Z, Celine Dion and more than 100 pop, rock and rap performers took the stage in Philadelphia, Moscow, Tokyo, Berlin, Rome, Paris, Toronto, Johannesburg, South Africa, and Cornwall, England. Many of the musicians were children when Live Aid was staged, and many watching the Live 8 shows hadn't been born.

"This is really the United Nations," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan told the London audience on a warm afternoon. "The whole world has come together in solidarity with the poor. On the behalf of the poor, the voices of the weak have said thank you."

In Johannesburg, former South African President Nelson Mandela received a five-minute standing ovation from an audience of more than 8,000 after saying, "History and the generations to come will judge our leaders by the decisions they make in the coming weeks."

Anti-establishment rock stars even turned over stage time to one of the world's most famous capitalists and philanthropists, Microsoft Corp. co-founder Bill Gates, who received a hero's welcome. "We can do it," he said, "and when we do it, it will be the best thing humanity has ever done."

As chairman of this year's G-8 summit, Blair has promised to put the issue of poverty in Africa at the top of the group's agenda. Saturday's concerts were hastily mounted after being announced in May by Bono and Geldof.

In one of the day's most dramatic and emotional moments, Geldof addressed the skepticism directed at him about pop musicians and their fans attempting to influence world politics.

"Mahatma Gandhi freed a continent, Martin Luther King freed a people, Nelson Mandela freed a country," Geldof told the London crowd. "It does work — they will listen."

Then he brought out Birhan Woldu, a 24-year-old Ethiopian woman who he said was prominently featured in a documentary shown at Live Aid about the famine then gripping her country.

In that film, Woldu, then a toddler, had been wrapped in a burial shroud because nuns caring for the starving told her father she was within 15 minutes of death. She survived, and with the help of money and services generated by Live Aid, she grew up and recently took exams for a college degree in agricultural studies.

After she told the crowd, through an interpreter, "We Africans love you very much," Geldof defiantly said: "There — don't let them tell you this stuff doesn't work." He then introduced Madonna, who kissed Weldu.

In addition to Green Day, the Berlin lineup included Beach Boys founder Brian Wilson and rock band Audioslave. The concert in Johannesburg and a smaller event in Cornwall, heavy with African acts, were arranged after Geldof and other Live 8 organizers were criticized for including few black performers in London. Geldof noted the heavy rap and R&B contingent in Philadelphia, and said the priority was to get big-name acts that could draw a wide audience.

The Live 8 concert in France at the Palace of Versailles outside Paris featured the Cure, Italian tenor Andrea Bocelli, Latin pop star Shakira and numerous French pop acts that drew about 65,000 people. The show near Tokyo, added relatively late and headlined by Icelandic singer Björk and U.S. punk band Good Charlotte, pulled in about 10,000 people — half the capacity of the Makuhari Messe hall.

"What we did in the Beatles really overtook us and our intentions," McCartney said ahead of Saturday's performances. "When it is remembered and loved that way, you can only appreciate that something mighty has happened, way beyond anything we set out to do. I think the same thing is happening with Live 8 now."

Geldof had asked performers to refrain from criticizing world leaders, which resulted in a minimum of pointedly politicized pronouncements. In Philadelphia, rapper Jay-Z alluded to "billions of dollars being spent to kill people," and German punk rocker Campino told the Berlin audience, "We have to get Africa out of USA's headlock."

Times staff writer Lewis reported from Los Angeles and special correspondent Bennett from London. Times staff writers Achrene Sicakyuz in Paris, Christian Retzlaff in Berlin and Natasha Yefimova in Moscow contributed to this report.

Tone Deaf On Africa (NYT)

By William Easterly

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

BONO, Jeffrey Sachs, Tony Blair, rock bands, finance ministers and aid agencies have been vowing to "make poverty history" in Africa as the Group of 8 summit meeting in Scotland begins this week. The proponents of a comprehensive plan to end Africa's poverty say the solutions are easy. For example, Gordon Brown, Britain's chancellor of the Exchequer, says preventing the deaths of five million children over the next 10 years would cost just $3 more for each new mother in the world's poorest countries. All told, Tony Blair's Commission for Africa calls for $25 billion more in aid to Africa per year.

It's great that so many are finally noticing the tragedy of Africa. But sadly, historical evidence says that the solutions offered by big plans are not so easy. From 1960 to 2003, we spent $568 billion (in today's dollars) to end poverty in Africa. Yet these efforts still did not lift Africa from misery and stagnation.

Why don't big plans work? Because they miss the critical elements of feedback and accountability. If consumers like a product, its maker prospers; if they don't, the company goes out of business. If voters complain about public services to their local politician, the politician either fixes the problem or gets voted out of office. It doesn't always work, but it works well enough for rich people to get potato chips and paved roads.

For the poor, Professor Sachs and the United Nations Millennium Project propose everything from nitrogen-fixing leguminous trees to replenish the soil, to rainwater harvesting, to battery-charging stations, for, by my count, 449 interventions. Poor Africans have no market or democratic mechanisms to let planners in New York know which of the 449 interventions they need, whether they are satisfied with the results, or whether the goods ever arrived at all.

Take the nitrogen-fixing leguminous trees that cure exhausted soils. As one study pointed out, the trees don't grow well in shade, they can proliferate as weeds and they can wind up competing for soil nutrients, especially in arid areas. It's easy to decree a solution at the top, but it will never work without the detailed local knowledge at the bottom - which planners in New York cannot possibly process.

To make it worse, the United Nations agencies, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, and national aid agencies like the United States Agency for International Development are jointly responsible for these interventions to reach the Millennium Development Goals (which are various indicators of reduced poverty). Collective responsibility for big goals doesn't hold any one agency accountable if the effort fails; they can always point to others as the ones who are to blame.

Who took responsibility, for example, for missing the goal of universal primary school enrollment by 2000 set by a 1990 United Nations conference? Instead, it is now one of the Millennium Development Goals for 2015.

The sensible alternative is to concentrate on piecemeal solutions to poor people's problems. You can evaluate the results of a specific intervention by comparing them with conditions in another group without the intervention, and you can get feedback from those affected and hold an individual aid agency accountable.

The Dutch aid organization I.C.S. Africa distributed deworming drugs to schoolchildren in the Busia district of Kenya. Ninety-two percent of the children had intestinal worms that cause listlessness, malnutrition and pain. I.C.S. invited economists to evaluate its program, comparing those children who got the drugs with those who did not. The deworming drugs decreased school absenteeism by a quarter. "Pupils who had been miserable now became active and lifeful," said a schoolteacher.

Piecemeal projects have led to progress in other areas as well. Twenty-five percent of the population in African countries had access to clean water in 1970; 60 percent do so today. The enrollment rate in secondary school has gone from less than 5 percent to more than 30 percent over the last 40 years; over the same period, increased vaccination helped infant mortality fall by more than a third. Aid agencies are more accountable on visible piecemeal steps like water pipes and wells, school buildings and vaccinations - where individual contributions can be measured - than they are on nebulous goals like African poverty reduction, which depends on many players and many factors.

Piecemeal fixers do not promise the miracles that planners do; they just quietly deliver results. Accountability for aid would transfer power from planners to fixers, both African and foreign. Maybe then we can hold some aid agency accountable to get the full value of those three additional dollars to each new mother.

O.K., Japan Isn't Taking Over The World. But China... (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

NOT even 20 years have passed since the apparently unstoppable Japanese economic juggernaut struck fear in the hearts of Americans, and now China has emerged to be seen as the new economic menace threatening the nation's vital strategic interests.

America's boom in the 1990's, coupled with Japan's decline into an economic quagmire through much of the decade, quelled most fears that the Japanese were going to eat our economic lunch.

But now China has set out to snap up everything from Unocal to Maytag, not to mention a steady diet of United States Treasury bonds. And many of the leading voices who worried about Japan in the 1980's are warning that China presents a much bigger and more complex conundrum.

"In retrospect I probably did overstate the nature of the Japanese challenge," said Chalmers Johnson, a prominent expert on Asia who in the early 1990's argued that Japan was "the only nation with real leverage over the United States." But, he added, "China is several orders of magnitude different from Japan."

China is not only much bigger and more populous. Its economy is likely to become the largest in the world at some point in the next 50 years. As China keeps growing at a rubber-burning pace, competition with the United States over energy resources alone could cause substantial tension.

Americans' fear of Japan's ascendancy in the 1980's was inspired by economics and pride. The growing bilateral trade deficit, as Japanese companies acquired leadership in industries that were once dominated by American businesses, cast a pall on America's self-confidence. The Japanese purchase of high-profile American assets, whether Columbia Pictures or the Pebble Beach golf course, just rubbed it in.

Relations with China have a more complex geopolitical dimension. Unlike Japan, China is likely to become a military power. And it is not an unconditional ally. From Taiwan to the Middle East, the strategic interests of China diverge from America's. As it throws its weight around, to secure supplies of energy, say, or to avail itself of strategic technology, China can cause American policy makers no end of discomfort.

For instance, if the United States government were to block the China National Offshore Oil Corporation from acquiring Unocal, it might just push China into cutting energy deals that the United States government would rather it did not make with countries like Russia or Iran.

"Clearly the relationship between the United States and China is much more ambivalent than that between the United States and Japan," said Clyde V. Prestowitz, a trade negotiator during the Reagan administration who in the 1980's warned that Japan's ascent could eclipse the United States' power and compromise its prosperity.

Those differences might warrant a more careful review of deals like the attempted purchase of Unocal by China's state run oil company.

Robert B. Reich, the former secretary of labor in the Clinton administration who as a Harvard professor in the early 1990's argued that big Japanese investments in the United States were not threatening, says today that a Chinese acquisition of a potentially strategic asset like Unocal could be problematic.

"In economic terms there is no reason to block Chinese ownership of U.S. assets just as there was no reason to block Japan from buying U.S. assets in the 1980's," Mr. Reich said. "But in political terms in 2005 there may be a reason to take seriously the downside of China owning Unocal."

But even those most concerned about China's rise up the economic, political and military ladder recognize another, perhaps more important difference between China and 1980's Japan. The United States has a vested interest in China's success.

For starters, whereas Japan's success at the time was inevitably seen as America's failure, today American businesses are all rooting for China to succeed. Because they own a lot of it.

"It was virtually impossible for a foreigner to make an acquisition in Japan," Mr. Prestowitz said. "In China its 'y'all come.' American business is part of the China lobby, not the anti-China lobby."

Some of Japan's old foes view America's growing interdependence with China with suspicion. "Interdependence means dependence," said Susan J. Tolchin, a professor of public policy at George Mason University who in 1993 was the co-author of "Selling Our Security," which argued against allowing foreign investment in American technology companies. "If we lose our economic independence we are going to lose our independence of movement on foreign policy."

Yet most acknowledge that China's transformation from a struggling Communist state to a prosperous nation with a growing stake in the global system of market economies is in America's best interest. For example, if the Chinese central bank owns oodles of United States Treasury bonds, it has a reason not to want to destabilize the bond market.

"I cannot see how a rich bourgeois China could be not in our interest," Mr. Johnson said. "If we're interested in our security we should establish collaborative ties with China right now."

The difference in emphasis appears in a shift in Mr. Prestowitz's writing about Asia. In 1988, he published "Trading Places: How We Are Giving Our Future to Japan and How to Reclaim It." This year, he published "Three Billion New Capitalists: The Great Shift of Wealth and Power to the East."

Today, Mr. Prestowitz said, the biggest risk is not that China will succeed in rising to become an economic superpower. The biggest risk is that it will fail.

The Chinese Invasion (LAT)

Even some people who were not alarmed when Japanese companies started snapping up famous American businesses 15 years ago are succumbing to alarm about Chinese companies doing the same thing today. The alarmists were wrong the last time, and the please-remain-calm types were right. Are there good reasons to think that things are different this time around?

The Japan scare came with a lot of xenophobia, verging on racism, and foolish analogies between Japan's military imperialism of World War II and the so-called economic imperialism of half a century later. That earlier Japanese imperialism had involved killing millions of foreigners in an attempt to rule half the world by military force. The later Japanese so-called imperialism involved selling high-quality goods to millions of willing foreigners and then investing part of the proceeds in job-producing assets in those foreign countries.

Anti-Japanese hysteria also featured quite a bit of anthropological poppycock about how the basic laws of economics don't apply to cultures that emphasize production over consumption. Or to novel forms of organization (remember the keiretsu?) that combine all the evils of socialism and corporate capitalism into a production machine that is too efficient to be tolerated. Virtues morphed into cheating: They work hard and save while we spend and borrow — it's not fair!

The current and growing anti-Chinese sentiment has the same basic causes: resentment at another country's economic success and fear that it threatens our own well-being. But there are distinctions in flavor. Yesterday's Japanophobia and today's Sinophobia draw from different themes of classic Western prejudice against the East. Japan was the wily Oriental with his devilish plots. China is the Asian hordes. It's not that they're so smart, it's just that there are so darn many of them, and they are all being orchestrated by a fiendish Communist Party. Peasants pour out of the countryside into huge factories where they work 20 hours a day for $3.25 and produce enough of everything to fill an entire Wal-Mart every 7.3 minutes…. And we, like fools, buy this stuff. It's not fair!

But it turned out that Japan was not one big, unstoppable economic machine. Its economy has been in the tank, while ours has thrived, for most of the period since the Japanophobia pandemic. The Japanese are not robots. A touching human weakness — vanity — caused them to overpay for prestigious American assets such as Rockefeller Center and Columbia Pictures, which they then managed badly. And who today feels humiliated because a major studio is named "Sony" — or even thinks of Sony as especially Japanese, or even foreign?

Old-fashioned economics has more to say about these episodes than cultural theorizing does. Economic point No. 1 is that if there is a problem, it's our fault, not theirs. When you spend more than you earn (or consume more than you produce), you go into debt. We've been doing that with a vengeance lately, both as individuals and as a society, through the government. Others then have your IOUs.

In international trade, these IOUs are known as "dollars," and they're ultimately only good for one thing: buying stuff from the United States. For misguided reasons of its own, China keeps its currency and consumer demand artificially low, resulting in a larger trade imbalance: We buy a lot more from them than they buy from us. But another way to look at it is that they send us all those lovely things on the shelves at Wal-Mart and we send them in exchange small pieces of paper. (Or actually not even that: just some electronic pulses representing pieces of paper called dollars.)

We complain about this. But when they start spending their dollars instead of hoarding them, we are horrified at what they are able to buy: IBM's ThinkPad computer line, the Maytag appliance brand name, an oil company (Unocal). But it is our own spendthrift ways that supply the dollars. If foreigners ever lost interest in accumulating or spending dollars, we would really be in trouble.

Economic point No. 2 is the golden oldie: Free trade is good, even if it is unilateral. The United States benefits from being open to anything China wishes to sell to us, whether or not China reciprocates. Trade is disruptive. But people tend to focus on the lost jobs and lose sight of the cheap shirts.

During the Japan fuss, this trade-off was often described as destroying a blue-collar worker's life so that a yuppie could drive a Lexus. But imports from China tend to be more down-market. They effectively raise the standard of living of the lowest-income Americans. The much smaller number of Americans who are hurt by trade deserve generous help from the vast majority who benefit from it. But restricting trade with China to help those few would harm the many.

Then there's globalization, the third economic reality. In the emerging world economy, American investors will own shares in Chinese companies that invest in Albania or Zambia, and so on. Already, much of what we are buying "from China" is being produced by U.S. companies there, and today's anti-Beijing chorus overlooks the extent to which our culture is changing China in our image.

Americans needn't fear the prospect of the world's largest country joining the global middle class. This — or the more prosaic possibility that some country might definitively unseat the United States as the world's richest country — is not some tragic possibility that Americans must acknowledge with good grace or world-weary resignation (like the British waving farewell to their empire). The wealth of other nations is good for Americans in the narrowest selfish terms.

Hamas Weighs Abbas' Offer To Join Cabinet (WT)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas has asked his most formidable rival, the militant Islamic group Hamas, to join his Cabinet in advance of Israel's Gaza pullout, and the group is considering the offer, officials on both sides said yesterday.

Israel denounced the idea of Hamas' joining the Palestinian government, calling the group "a murderous terrorist organization."

Hamas has strong grass-roots support in Gaza and has demanded to help rule the area after Israel's pullout, slated to begin in August. The group was expected to make a strong showing in Palestinian parliamentary elections later this year and recently won municipal elections in several West Bank and Gaza districts. By incorporating Hamas into his government, Mr. Abbas hopes to improve prospects of a smooth takeover at a time when violence in Gaza has heated up.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said this was not the first time Mr. Abbas has offered to bring the militant group into his Cabinet.

"Our policy is a policy of one authority, one gun, and we welcome all political parties to participate as such," Mr. Erekat said.

Mr. Abbas first invited Hamas to join his Cabinet two months ago, but Hamas rejected the offer because it was conditioned on the group's agreeing to a delay in parliamentary elections. The vote originally scheduled for July has been delayed until the end of the year.

Hamas' West Bank leader, Sheik Hassan Yousef, said the group was considering the latest offer from Mr. Abbas.

The United States considers Hamas a terrorist organization and refuses to deal with it.

Israel and the United States have demanded that Mr. Abbas disarm Hamas and other militants, a step he has refused to take for fear it would provoke bloodshed among Palestinians. He has chosen instead to co-opt militants.

"Hamas is a murderous terrorist organization responsible for countless acts of senseless violence against innocent civilians," Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said. "Hamas is no partner for us in any sort of political process."

The Palestinian leader has promised a smooth turnover in Gaza and a clampdown on militants who would fire on Israeli soldiers and about 8,500 Jewish settlers who will withdraw. He has also said he would not allow a land grab after the summer evacuation.

But a fragile truce Mr. Abbas reached with Israel in February has been unraveling as the pullout date approaches.

Mr. Abbas is to meet Palestinian militant leaders living in self-imposed exile in Damascus during a visit to Syria this week, his national security adviser, Jibril Rajoub, said yesterday.

Some West Bank Settlers Dig In Their Heels As Pullout Looms (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, July 3, 2005

Tile by tile, a new synagogue is rapidly taking form just steps from an outdoor basketball court where five families have moved into a makeshift neighborhood of military tents.

On a recent afternoon, there was plenty of room nearby for more arrivals beneath huge canopies that shade a rectangular dirt lot, lending it the appearance of an American fairground. If this Jewish settlement is soon to be evacuated, and the Israeli government insists it is, there is little sign its residents plan to go easily. Rather than packing up, Sanur's 31 families are busily fortifying their hold on the West Bank hilltop in anticipation of a last stand.

Volunteers from Jewish religious academies have rushed to join in building the synagogue, which awaits a roof and the rest of the tile floor. Backers have come from other strongholds of Jewish nationalist ideology in the West Bank.

Sanur is one of four settlements in the northern West Bank scheduled to be abandoned by Israel this summer, along with all 21 Jewish communities in the Gaza Strip. So far, most of the attention has focused on the withdrawal from Gaza, home to the vast majority of the estimated 8,000 settlers who are to be uprooted from both areas. The pullout is set to begin in mid-August.

Sanur and the three other isolated West Bank settlements, Homesh, Ganim and Kadim, have been largely overlooked in the turbulent national drama over the planned withdrawal, but military officials say settler resistance may prove especially tough in Sanur and Homesh.

Ganim and Kadim, secular communities about 10 miles to the north with 60 families between them, aren't expected to present much of a problem because many residents have said they are willing to leave and have started hunting for new homes.

"Ninety-five percent of the people here will leave before August 15th," said Ganim resident Aharon Yarden, 40, who planned to move with his family to the Golan Heights.

Around Sanur and Homesh, a web of back roads, trails and canyons could make it difficult for the army to block the arrival of religious militants from other settlements in the northern West Bank, historically referred to by its biblical name, Samaria.

Settlers in Sanur say they expect 10,000 or more supporters to sweep in to help thwart the evacuation. Employing images of a dire military-style standoff, one right-wing Israeli lawmaker has compared Sanur to Stalingrad.

The evacuation "will be impossible," said Miriam Adler, a Sanur resident and spokeswoman for the community. "They just won't succeed."

Adler, 28, moved to Sanur with her husband 2 1/2 years ago from Kiryat Arba, a Jewish enclave near the West Bank city of Hebron known for its hard-line ideology.

At the time, Sanur had been all but deserted. Once a military post under Ottoman and British rule, Sanur was settled by Jews in 1978 and served as an artists' colony. But most of the secular residents fled after violence erupted between Israel and the Palestinians in September 2000.

Taking their place in rows of low, bunker-like stucco houses were young families ardent about religion and unflinching in their belief that Jews are the rightful heirs of all the biblical land of Israel. Some attend colleges and universities in the West Bank or in Israel. All wear the skullcaps and head scarves of the religiously observant.

To these residents, the battle against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and his pullout plan hinges on passion and faith. Although Gaza has many settlers who are devout, it is the West Bank that has greater biblical significance and the lion's share of the 230,000 Jewish settlers, who draw extra fervor from being able to gesture across a valley to one site or another mentioned in the Old Testament.

"Sharon is temporary, and the land of Israel is eternal," Adler said, standing at the edge of the little tent village. "Whoever fights for ideology — and not interest — will win."

It is possible from here to gaze past a plain of Palestinian hay fields to Homesh, perched on a peak immediately above the Palestinian village of Burqa. From the backyard of a Jewish home in Homesh, one can hear a Palestinian vendor below touting his wares: tomatoes, oranges, apricots.

Homesh, with 55 families, is a collection of modest stucco houses hemmed by a wire security fence. Its residents are less uniformly religious than those in Sanur and more ambivalent about what to do next. Although all prefer to stay, a split has emerged between religious residents, who are determined to fight, and their secular neighbors, who say they will obey the government's edict.

A core of activists has organized protest events, including bringing in thousands of supporters during the springtime Passover holiday, and sought to make sure that backers will show up to thwart the withdrawal. Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz was heckled there during a recent meeting at which some residents had hoped to learn more about where they might move.

Menora Hazani, a devout, 28-year-old teacher and filmmaker in Homesh, said Sharon had deliberately focused attention on Gaza because pulling out of a slice of the West Bank, with scores of remaining settlements and relative proximity to large Israeli cities, was more problematic.

"Leaving the region here is much more catastrophic in security terms than leaving Gush Katif," Hazani said, referring to the main settlement block in Gaza.

Hazani, whose father, Benny Katsover, was a well-known settler leader, said she and her husband still hoped that the withdrawal would not take place. Hazani said, though, that if the police came to the door, officers would have to carry the family out. She said any resistance must be nonviolent.

Other Homesh residents say they are waiting for the government to tell them where to go and have no plans to put up a fight.

"I'm a law-abiding person," said Nina Korover, 58, who emigrated from Ukraine in 1992 and moved with her husband into a $30,000 house a year later.

She recalls how thirsty and drab the stony landscape appeared then. Now, Korover said, "there is nothing more beautiful than Homesh."

In one direction, the West Bank city of Nablus covers a hillside; in the other, Tel Aviv's skyscrapers punctuate the hazy glare of the Mediterranean.

Homesh has only three businesses, including a car parts factory. Most residents commute to work in Tel Aviv or coastal Netanya, about 30 miles away, or settlements in the West Bank.

Korover said about 30 Homesh families, about half of them from the former Soviet Union, had concluded that it was time to prepare to leave. The government said last week that the families had signed an agreement to move as a group to a community in Israel, but residents said the matter was still being negotiated.

Korover's husband, Boris, died four years ago when a Palestinian driver steered a car into his. Leaving the home where the couple crafted a life after emigrating somehow feels like a betrayal, she said.

But Korover worries that religious hard-liners might be more interested in a confrontation with the government than in negotiation. "I don't want to leave my house, but if I have no choice — if they say I have to leave — I won't make a war," she said.

Iranian Leader Denies He Took Embassy Hostages (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

A shiny black Peugeot rolled to a stop, and there he was, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the president-elect of Iran, smiling through an open window, ready to greet a few of the people who have been coming to his street as a sort of pilgrimage since he won.

The security men tried to keep a cordon around the car, but the president-elect gave his casual smile, and told them to let the people through. He also let this reporter and an interpreter approach.

When asked the question preoccupying many Americans about him just now - Had he been among the students who sacked the United States Embassy in 1979 and held American hostages for 444 days? - his driver started to pull out, but Mr. Ahmadinejad stopped him and said he would answer.

"It is not true," he said. "It is only rumors."

The security men began to push again, and three women draped in flowing black chadors made their way up to the car.

One woman handed Mr. Ahmadinejad a blank piece of paper on which he wrote: "Stick to your Islamic values. God will help you."

And with that, he closed the window and was driven off.

Since the election a week ago, it has been nearly impossible to get a feel for Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, to take the measure of the man. He has refused all interviews, though he did hold one hourlong news conference. His spokesman has insisted that he was not among the students at the embassy.

He is generally described as an ultra-conservative. He has been a member of the Basij militia, which is made up of young bearded men who ride through the streets on motorcycles enforcing strict codes of behavior and dress, often brutally. He was also a member of the Revolutionary Guard during the war with Iraq. And of course he has recently been accused of being one of the student leaders who stormed the American Embassy in Tehran on Nov. 4, 1979, keeping 52 hostages.

Yet friends, supporters and neighbors here describe the diminutive, bearded man as humble and caring. Mr. Ahmadinejad has a small circle of aides, one that appears a bit overwhelmed by all the demands and preparations ahead. Nasser Hadian-Jazy, a political science professor at Tehran University, said that he had known the president-elect since childhood and that Mr. Ahmadinejad was not involved with the student hostage takers. He said they grew up together in East Tehran, and Mr. Hadian-Jazy described his old classmate as among the brightest in the neighborhood.

He called Mr. Ahmadinejad "self-confident, committed and absolutely incorruptible." He said he is very religious, but modern in his thinking. If there is a negative quality, Mr. Hadian-Jazy said, it is that he is very set in his views, and can be hard to persuade otherwise.

"If you can force him to sit down and listen, he has the capability to understand," the professor said.

While Mr. Ahmadinejad maintained a humble life style as the appointed mayor of Tehran, that is likely to change, if for no other reason than security. He lives at the end of a dead-end street, more of an alley that runs alongside a school. The alley opens onto a circle, with a small park in the middle with benches and a field of grass that now attracts those who come to ask favors of the president-elect, and serves as a spot for neighbors to socialize. These days, cars packed with sightseers drive around the circle, stopping to look down the alley, a far cry from the palatial and off-limit homes of other Iranian leaders.

On Friday, the day of prayer and rest in most Muslim countries, some of Mr. Ahmadinejad's neighbors sat on a bench, talking about their favorite son. It is almost a rule that when someone is asked about Mr. Ahmadinejad, the first thing said is that he is a modest person who has never lost touch with his roots. Security is very tight in the neighborhood, and with soldiers and plainclothes agents around, the neighbors were afraid to give their names.

One older man, who said he had lived in the neighborhood for 15 years, said that every year for the Iranian New Year, Mr. Ahmadinejad invited the neighbors over for a celebration. He is described as a devout man who lives in a three-bedroom house with two sons and a daughter. His family has little furniture, they said, and has machine-made carpets, not the more expensive hand-woven ones commonly owned by the better-off.

One son is finishing high school, and the two other children are studying in the university, the neighbors said.

Since he became mayor of Tehran, the city has had a driver pick Mr. Ahmadinejad up for work every day. But on his days off, neighbors said, he still drives the same 1977 Peugeot, without air-conditioning, that is parked in the alleyway beside the house.

People are quick to offer stories about Mr. Ahmadinejad, almost as if he was a religious figure. They say, for example, that he always brought his own lunch to work because he did not want the city to have to pay for his meals.

At the municipal building, Ahmad Esmali's job is to deliver tea to the offices. "This mayor was better than the others," he said recently. "He saw managers and workers with one eye."

In the park on Friday, one neighbor said the mayor had given money to the local butcher, at a shop called Zand, so the butcher could give poor and needy people meat at a discount. Two young men working in the butcher shop said they believed it was true.

It is a common practice in many Middle Eastern cultures for leaders to have audiences with citizens seeking help, or to accept their petitions for assistance. Mr. Ahmadinejad appears to take that custom to heart.

A small security booth sits at the mouth of the alley leading to his house. As Mr. Ahmadinejad's car pulled out, a security agent handed the president-elect a pile of letters that had been delivered that morning, from people seeking some kind of help.

Ali Ghorbani, 29, had just driven up to deliver a letter to the guard booth when Mr. Ahmadinejad pulled up. Mr. Ghorbani wanted to ask for a loan so he and a friend could open a cultural center in Tehran. He was allowed to hand the letter directly to the president-elect. "I didn't have the faintest idea I would see him," Mr. Ghorbani said as he walked away. "He took the letter and told me I would have a reply in two weeks."

Iranian Accused In Killing Of Kurds (WT)

By William J. Kole

The Washington Times, July 3, 2005

Iran's newly elected president, already accused of taking American diplomats hostage 26 years ago, played a key role in the 1989 execution-style slayings of a Kurdish opposition leader and two associates in Vienna, an exiled Iranian dissident said yesterday.

Austria's daily Der Standard quoted a prominent Austrian politician as saying authorities have "very convincing" evidence linking Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to the attacks in Vienna, in which the Kurds were killed.

The reports follow recent accusations from some of the 52 Americans who were held hostage for 444 days in Iran beginning in 1979 that Mr. Ahmadinejad, a hard-line Islamist, was among the hostage-takers.

Neither Mr. Ahmadinejad nor his aides could be reached yesterday for comment on the claims about the Vienna killings, but the president-elect on Friday denied a role in the hostage-taking.

"It is not true," Mr. Ahmadinejad said. "It is only rumors."

Alireza Jafarzadeh, who runs Strategic Policy Consulting, a Washington-based think tank focusing on Iran and Iraq, said Mr. Ahmadinejad was a Revolutionary Guard commander who supplied the weapons used to gun down Iranian Kurdish politician Abdul-Rahman Ghassemlou and two colleagues on July 13, 1989, in Vienna.

Mr. Jafarzadeh is a former U.S. representative for the National Council of Resistance of Iran. The council is the political arm of the Mojahedin Khalq, a group that Washington and the European Union list as a terrorist organization.

Mr. Ghassemlou, the principal target, was secretary-general of the Democratic Party of Iranian Kurdistan. His delegation had been in Vienna for secret talks with envoys from the Tehran regime.

Mr. Jafarzadeh said his assessment was based on Iranian government sources "who have provided accurate information in the past." He said Mr. Ahmadinejad helped organize the Vienna attack while serving in the Revolutionary Guard's Ramazan garrison near the western Iranian city of Kermanshah.

"While he was there, he became involved in terrorist operations abroad, and he led many, many operations," Mr. Jafarzadeh said.

In 2002, Mr. Jafarzadeh disclosed information about two hidden nuclear sites in Iran that helped uncover nearly two decades of secret atomic activity and stoked fears that Tehran was trying to build a nuclear bomb.

Der Standard reported yesterday that Peter Pilz, a top official with Austria's Green Party, accused Mr. Ahmadinejad of traveling to Vienna a few days before the slayings to deliver the weapons to the Iranian commandos who carried out the killings. He said he wants a warrant issued for Mr. Ahmadinejad's arrest

Mr. Pilz could not be reached for comment yesterday, and calls to Austria's Interior Ministry and the nation's federal counterterrorism agency went unanswered.

Mr. Pilz said an unidentified Iranian journalist living in France was contacted in 2001 by one of the reputed gunmen, described as a former revolutionary guard who has since died. The gunman's account -- which Mr. Pilz said strongly implicated Mr. Ahmadinejad -- was turned over to Austria's federal Office for Counterterrorism and Constitutional Protection.

In another development, a top Iranian former secret agent told the Associated Press in Tehran yesterday that the hostage-taker in a 1979 photograph that has come under intense scrutiny is not of Mr. Ahmadinejad, but a former militant who committed suicide in jail.

Saeed Hajjarian, a top adviser to departing President Mohammad Khatami, identified the man in the photo dating to the 1979 U.S. Embassy siege as Taqi Mohammadi.

Iran's newly elected president has been accused of being a major participant in the taking of American hostages at the embassy.

Six former U.S. hostages who saw the president-elect in photos or on television said they believe Mr. Ahmadinejad was among the hostage-takers. One said he was interrogated by Mr. Ahmadinejad.

The White House said it was taking their statements seriously. President Bush said "many questions" were raised by the accusations.

International media have compared photos of Mr. Ahmadinejad, who won a presidential runoff election the week before last, with a black-and-white picture of one of the hostage-takers, a young man with a thin, bearded face and dark hair that sweeps down across his forehead.

But Mr. Hajjarian said they were not the same person.

"This man is Taqi Mohammadi, a militant who later turned into a dissident and committed suicide in jail," he said, pointing to the 1979 photo.

Mr. Hajjarian's comment follows statements by a number of the former Iranian students who carried out the U.S. Embassy seizure and held Americans hostage that Mr. Ahmadinejad had no role in the operation.

For The Poor In Iran, Voting Was About Making Ends Meet (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, July 3, 2005

They had come from very different neighborhoods and backgrounds, but they were all there for the same reason: to buy government-subsidized food.

The line ran from the basement up the stairs and out the door.

Inside, sugar and rice were selling for about one-fifth of the retail price, a huge savings in a country where according to an opposition economist more than a quarter of the people live below the poverty line - which is defined as a family of five with an income of less than $278 a month.

"I cannot make ends meet," said Hossein Ganji, 49, who works behind a counter in the food distribution center. Mr. Ganji supports his wife and three children on about $150 a month.

"I am the only person that works in my family," he said. "All the others are unemployed."

This distribution center in a crowded basement in southern Tehran and many others like it around the country represent the kind of government assistance that many people here want more of - and that Mahmoud Ahmadinejad promised to provide in his successful campaign to become the next president of Iran.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, who catapulted to president-elect from near obscurity as the appointed mayor of Tehran, campaigned on a populist message, promising to redistribute the nation's wealth, hold down prices, raise salaries and lift state-supported benefits for the poor. He infused those pledges with the theme of social justice, which resonated in a society where aiding the poor is considered an obligation for the faithful.

His message came at the right time. In 1997 and again in 2001, voters focused their political will on social and democratic freedoms in electing Mohammad Khatami to the presidency. But his promised reforms were hardly carried out, and in the election last week voters appeared to have shifted focus to their pocketbooks. One candidate, Mehdi Karroubi, a former speaker of Parliament, just missed making it to the runoff election for president after promising to pay each family the equivalent of $60 a month if elected.

Average salaries run about $200 a month in Iran, with a salary of $300 to $500 considered generous. But costs are fast outstripping the ability to pay - government figures put annual inflation at about 15 percent, though on some products, merchants say prices rise far faster than that.

In a food store in central Tehran, the owner, Reza Karimi, said pomegranate paste had doubled in price to nearly $2; a bottle of olive oil rose to about $4 from $3, and in the last three months a little more than a pound of rice climbed to $1.80 from $1.30.

The price of dairy products sold by a state-owned company jumped 17 percent on Wednesday alone, he said. "The prices will jump again next month," he said. "And when one company raises their prices, they all do."

Khodabaksh Jalili, 30, is typical of many people in southern Tehran who supported Mr. Ahmadinejad. He moved to the city from Asadabad, a village 200 miles west of Tehran, when the farm that had supported his family for generations failed because of drought and a shortage of supplies, he said.

He has a wife and two children and earns about $200 a month working in a food store. His rent is $50 a month, and he makes extra money on his day off ferrying passengers on his scooter. If he is lucky, he said, he takes in another $20 a month.

"I have very little," he said. "I am married eight years. I have never been to the cinema with my children."

Iran is awash in oil money, as the price of crude topped $60 a barrel this week, pumping billions into the government treasury. But this country's economy is still tied down by a system in which the state and a shadowy collection of foundations controlled by clerics monopolize the vast bulk of its industries, including oil.

With all that money effectively locked up and a state budget weighed down by subsidies, there is little to spur the kind of private sector growth and development that would help provide someone like Mr. Jalili with a job that could support a family.

Past presidents have tried to move the economy away from its dependence on oil revenue and to open Iran to investment, but they have been thwarted by more conservative powers intent on preserving the vestiges of a welfare state.

The clerics - who control vast wealth and power through the foundations, known as bonyads - are also unwilling to give that up, and they answer to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, not to elected officials, limiting what any president can do.

The bonyads, which were set up after the 1979 revolution to control assets held by the former shah's family and associates, were to operate as nonprofit organizations dedicated to aiding the poor. Since then, they have amassed great wealth and now control a large swath of the nation's economy.

Though there has been some progress in the past eight years in opening the country to foreign investment, economists say the inability to change the fundamental structure of the economy has allowed unemployment and poverty to climb.

Rahim Oskui, who described himself as an opposition economist working for the Industrial Management Institute, a quasi-governmental agency, said the official figures of 10 percent unemployment and 27 percent living in poverty were most likely understated.

"It is very natural, that when a candidate comes chanting slogans of justice and welfare, which belong to 400 years ago, this population will follow along," Mr. Oskui said.

Iran is a country still making the transition from a village-based agricultural economy to a more industrial economy, he said, with both controlled by the government and the foundations. That change has created a political force of millions who have left their homes and social support networks in villages and towns in search of work in big cities, only to find themselves poor and disenfranchised, Mr. Oskui said.

"They are looking for a source that can help them out," he said.

Hamid Shahrabi, 31, is the kind of person Mr. Oskui was talking about. Because of Mr. Ahmadinejad's economic message, he said, he got involved in politics for the first time. "I never voted in a presidential election before," Mr. Shahrabi said. "This guy put his hand on the Koran and said he would work for poor people - so I worked for him and voted for him."

Mr. Shahrabi lives with his wife, Azam, 30, and two small children in a one-room apartment in southeastern Tehran. There is no furniture in the living room, just a carpet on the concrete floor, a few pillows along the walls and a small television on a stand. They turned a walk-in closet into a separate bedroom, where their 12-year-old daughter sleeps and where they keep their bed cushions during the day. On any given day, the family's refrigerator is almost empty, but for a pot of traditional Iranian stew - a mix of rice, meat and vegetables - three-day-old bread and some tomatoes. They survive on their government rations.

Mr. Shahrabi moved to the city from Arak, a province in central Iran, when he was 15 years old, following his brothers in search of work when the family farm was no longer making enough money. He found a job with a state-owned oil company, which he kept until he was laid off four years ago. He has not found work since, and rides around the city on his battered motor scooter making deliveries and carrying passengers for about $5 a day. Of that he has to set aside $3 a day for rent.

"I feel really ashamed in front of my family," Mr. Shahrabi said, without a trace of self-pity. "My doctor said I need to feed my daughter better. I cannot afford to buy my wife new dresses. My son always feels dizzy. The landlord has asked me to find another place to live."

The Ahmadinejad campaign message of economic hope - as well as social justice - captured the hearts not only of people like Mr. Shahrabi but also of middle-class families. Parts of the middle class have trouble meeting their own financial needs, although their support for Mr. Ahmadinejad also stems from having grown used to buying subsidized food, even if they can afford to pay market prices.

DOJ_NMG_0001171

At the distribution center in southern Tehran, Mohammed Javad Moradli, 50, said he backed Mr. Ahmadinejad because he was a religious man. His wife, Fatimeh Ghadani, 47, wrapped in a chador, nudged his arm. "It's also about the economy," she said. "We don't want slogans. We want deeds."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Saudis Say Top Al Qaeda Militant Killed. Saudi Arabia yesterday reported a top al Qaeda militant, Younis Muhammed Ibrahim al-Hayari, was killed in a clash with police. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 3, 0:25, Seigenthaler) reported al-Hayari "died after exchanging gunfire and hurling hand grenades at police. He was known to be a top bomb maker linked to a number of terrorist attacks."

Reuters (7/4, Evans) reports al-Hayyari, a Moroccan national, was "at the top of its list of most wanted al Qaeda leaders" in Saudi Arabai. A senior Saudi official "described Hayyari, 36, who reportedly fought in Bosnia in the 1990s and came to Saudi Arabia in 2001, as a shadowy figure who was 'more of a strategic leader than field commander.'" He was "a link to al Qaeda outside Saudi Arabia, brought funds into the kingdom, and was friend to a Muslim scholar close to al Qaeda's leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al Zaraqawi, the official said."

The AP (7/4) reports the "clashes took place in the Rawdah district, an upscale neighborhood in eastern Riyadh, said Interior Ministry spokesman Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki." The Interior Ministry official "said security forces conducted two simultaneous operations in eastern Riyadh to capture suspects and killed Mr. Hayari after a shoot-out, while arresting three other suspected militants, who were not identified." The Washington Post (7/4, A13) also runs the AP story.

Prosecutors Test Limits In Putting Islam On The Stand. The Legal Times (7/4, Blum) reports, "In a recent criminal trial in Virginia, the prosecutor told the jury that the defendant couldn't be trusted to tell the truth, that he would lie to their faces — all because of his religious beliefs. … The defendant, an American citizen accused of supporting terrorism, was convicted. The religion in question, of course, was Islam." The Times continues, "Now, the Virginia attorney representing Ali Al-Timimi is pushing for a new trial, saying that prosecutors secured the guilty verdict by appealing to religious bigotry against Muslims. … The case illustrates the difficulty in prosecuting suspected terrorists who subscribe to a form of militant Islam, without airing tenets of the religion itself before a jury. And it raises the question of how far is too far when it comes to using a defendant's religious beliefs as evidence of criminal intent. The issue will likely continue to confront judges as more cases against accused terrorists come to trial. … Timimi's lawyer, Edward MacMahon Jr., is seeking to overturn Timimi's conviction, citing prosecutorial misconduct and the prejudicial impact of statements he says portrayed Islam as a violent religion. One specific objection: that Assistant U.S. Attorney Gordon Kromberg instructed the jury in his closing argument that Timimi, a devout Muslim, would lie to jurors because the jurors were kafir — or nonbelievers. … Judge Leonie Brinkema of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia is likely to consider MacMahon's motion when Timimi appears for sentencing July 13. … Kromberg declined to comment, citing Justice Department policy. Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said that department officials would not comment on a pending case. In a court filing responding to MacMahon's charges, Kromberg maintains that Timimi's personal religious views were 'directly relevant' to the case."

Attorneys In Dispute Over Fees In Terror Suit. The Legal Times (7/4, Broida) reports, "Steven Perles and Thomas Fortune Fay made their reputation representing victims of terror attacks in lawsuits against countries that sponsor terrorism. But the two D.C. lawyers are now embroiled in a legal battle over the multimillion-dollar fees their successful litigation brought about, with Perles fending off charges he misused money in a trust account that belonged to both of them." The Times continues, "In a suit filed June 20, Fay accuses Perles of improperly using $1 million of his terror-case proceeds as a bond in another suit filed against Perles by a former employee, Anne-Marie Kagy, who is seeking her own share of the proceeds. In the Kagy case, U.S. Magistrate Judge Alan Kay concluded that Perles owes the former employee almost $1.5 million." The Times adds, "Fay and Perles worked as co-counsel in high-profile terrorism cases, including two against the government of Iran that yielded judgments of almost $600 million, of which $54 million has been collected. And, in fact, their lobbying efforts had made such suits possible: They persuaded Congress in 1996 to pass a law permitting terrorism victims to collect a portion of their judgments from the frozen assets of states that sponsor terrorism. … Both Fay and Perles declined to comment about the substantive issues in the lawsuit, since the litigation is still pending and Perles has yet to file a response to Fay's complaint. But both say they hope that Fay's suit will not affect three other terrorism cases against Libya, Sudan, and Iran in which they are currently collaborating."

Judge Sets August Trial Date For Hayats But Admits Delay Likely. The Lodi News-Sentinel (7/2, Bohm) reports, "At a Friday hearing in federal court, U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. set an Aug. 23 trial for Umer and Hamid Hayat, though he added, 'I don't know how realistic that's going to be.' It hinges on whether the federal Classified Information Procedures Act slows the case down, because even Burrell's own staff members would have to undergo extensive background checks before being allowed to handle sensitive documents. … Burrell set an Aug. 19 hearing on issues related to CIPA, and also set dates for attorneys to file motions related to CIPA procedures within the next two weeks. Additionally, he scheduled a July 15 hearing regarding whether the trial will have to be delayed." The AP (7/2, Thompson) also reports on the trial dates.

PATRIOT ACT:

ACLU Official Urges Patriot Act Reform. In an op-ed for the San Francisco Chronicle (7/4) Dorothy M. Ehrlich, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California, writes, "Patriotic Americans have a lot at stake this Fourth of July. After the glare of fireworks has faded, the true test of American patriotism moves to Congress, where both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees will prepare to debate the fate of the USA Patriot Act." Ehrlich continues, "It's a debate that has long been anticipated. … More than 400 boards of supervisors and town councils from Elko, Nev., to New York City spoke up. Seven state governments, including four 'red' states with Republican majorities, called for reform. … The outcry is all the more remarkable when you consider that three years ago, a bipartisan movement for Patriot Act reform was virtually unthinkable. In the aftermath of Sept. 11, the Bush administration, with former Attorney General John Ashcroft leading the charge, chose to demand unilateral power to limit civil liberties and diminish our privacy in a variety of ways." Ehrlich concludes, "The Patriot Act in its current form includes provisions that threaten the American legacy of liberty and privacy. But it can be fixed easily to restore meaningful checks and balances while properly focusing our limited anti- terrorism resources on foreign terrorists rather than ordinary Americans. … The question is, will Congress keep America safe and free by correcting the fundamental flaws in the Patriot Act? We'll find out when it resumes after the Fourth of July recess. Patriotism is so much more than flag-waving and pyrotechnics. It's about vigilantly guarding the fundamental American principles of justice and liberty that have come under siege with the Bush administration's determination to hold itself above the law. It's time to restore the basic checks and balances that are fundamental to our constitutional liberties. That's the kind of patriotism we yearn for today."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pentagon, CIA Reach Understanding To Prevent Intelligence Overlaps. The expansion of the Defense Department's operations in intelligence matters has led the Pentagon and the CIA to reach a compromise on the division of labor between the two. The Washington Post (7/4, A2, Pincus) reports the "growing Pentagon intelligence activities at home and abroad have caused CIA Director Porter J. Goss and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to reach a new written agreement to prevent conflicts and overlap in spying, technical collection and analysis between their two organizations." Gen. Michael V. Hayden, deputy director of national intelligence, "told reporters last week that a classified memo of understanding between the agencies has been drafted and is awaiting the signatures of Goss and Rumsfeld." The document "sets out what the Defense Department and the CIA will do as part of the intelligence restructuring that is taking place under the aegis of the director of national intelligence (DNI), John D. Negroponte."

Pentagon Technology Experts To Use Decoys To Frustrate Hackers. The Washington Post (7/4, D5, Onley) reports two leading Pentagon "technologists propose defending the military's Global Information Grid by using decoy networks and 'honey pots' to fool hackers. The goal is to lure intruders into these areas and away from operational networks." Army Col. Carl W. Hunt, technology director for the Joint Task Force for Global Network Operations, and Doug Gardner, director of the applied technology unit of the joint task force, say "the diversion strategy, called Net Force Maneuver, would lead hackers 'to systems where we are prepared to receive them.'"

WPost Says Bush Plans For FBI Reform Are Significant. The Washington Post (7/4, A16) says in an editorial that President Bush's "reforms of the FBI, which follow recommendations from a commission he appointed to study intelligence failures concerning Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, are potentially profound and warrant public attention. In critical respects, they take the bureau in the right direction. The first question is whether they go far enough or whether they will end up being merely shifted boxes on the government's organizational chart. The second question is whether, in one particular area, they go too far." The bureau has "made more headway in developing intelligence capability than its fiercer critics acknowledge, but it remains, in its heart and soul, a police force. This culture may simply be too deeply rooted to be changed." But it also "is essential that FBI agents collecting intelligence domestically are not directed by the White House or top administration officials but, rather, by the FBI director overseen by the attorney general."

FBI Seen As Loser In Bush's Intelligence Reforms. The Los Angeles Times (7/5) editorializes, "The reforms that President Bush signed on to last week could at least theoretically end the warfare" between the CIA and the FBI, "resulting in agencies better able to focus on core missions. The job of persuading, or forcing, them to do so falls to the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte. With the president at his back, he might even succeed. Despite FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III's best efforts to resist change, his agency is the decided loser -- and the CIA the winner -- in the reorganization of the 15 agencies that have something to do with intelligence, as recommended by a presidential commission." The "FBI is smarting over the humiliation, but it could prove a boon for the bureau," because establishing "a separate office in the FBI that answers to Negroponte as well as Mueller will at least allow the rest of the FBI to get on with what it does best, tracking down domestic criminals."

Woman Arrested For Poison-Laced Death Threats To Mueller, Pistole, Justices. The AP (7/2) reports the FBI has arrested Barbara March of Bridgeport, Conn., for allegedly "mailing death threats, some laced with rat poison, to each of the U.S. Supreme Court justices and FBI Director Robert Mueller." March "was charged with one count of mailing a threatening letter," but "the charge could change with a federal grand jury investigation. Laboratory results determined that seven of the letters mailed to Supreme Court justices were laced with rat poison, the FBI said in an affidavit. The contents of two other letters sent to justices and two letters sent to Mueller and Deputy Director John S. Pistole are being analyzed by the FBI." WTNH-TV Hartford (7/1, 12:00 p.m.), WFSB-TV Hartford (7/1, 7:00 a.m.) and the New York Times (7/2, Stowe) also reported on March's arrest.

Los Alamos Labs Using Computer Modeling To Predict Impact Of Terror Attacks. The Washington Post (7/4, A1, Cha) reports in a front page story that scientists at the Los Alamos National Laboratory have "been constructing the most elaborate computer models of the United States ever attempted. There are virtual cities inhabited by millions of virtual individuals who go to work, shopping centers, soccer games and anywhere else their real life counterparts go. And there are virtual power grids, oil and gas lines, water pipelines, airplane and train systems, even a virtual Internet." The Post notes, "The information is so sensitive that most of the lab's work is classified, and the physical facility is secured with its own experimental technologies. If the simulations got into the wrong hands, the researchers say, they could be used as the ultimate weapon against Americans." Still, some "urban planners have criticized the project for its cost -- each simulation can cost tens of millions of dollars -- and have argued that such modeling can never be precise."

Small Plane Violated Airspace Restrictions Near Camp David Saturday. The Washington Post (7/4, B1, Raghavan, Ruane) reports a small plane "entered restricted airspace Saturday night around Camp David, where President Bush was spending the weekend, prompting federal officials to dispatch a fighter jet to intercept it and track it until it landed at an airport in Frederick." Authorities "questioned the pilot of the Cessna 172 and released him. The aircraft was among three small planes that violated the restricted airspace Saturday. The breaches illustrate how increasingly complicated it is for civilian pilots to traverse the most controlled airspace in the nation -- and for federal officials to protect it." Such incidents "are becoming so routine that the vast majority go unreported."

The Washington Times/AP (7/4) reports, "The pilot was forced to land and was questioned but was released late Saturday without being charged, Secret Service spokesman Jonathan Cherry said yesterday."

Nichols Reportedly Talking To FBI About His Role In Oklahoma City Bombing. The AP (7/5, Murphy) reports that "Terry Nichols has been meeting with the FBI and has revealed additional details about his involvement in the 1995 attack that destroyed the Oklahoma City federal building, his mother said Sunday." Nichols "acknowledged that he helped Timothy McVeigh acquire ammonium nitrate fertilizer and racing fuel that were combined to make the explosive, and helped assemble the bomb components, said Nichols' mother, Joyce Wilt of Lapeer, Mich. 'That's the extent of it,' Wilt said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. 'From there on, he had no knowledge.' … Wilt said she believes others were involved in the bombing and that the FBI is hiding it." The AP adds, "Gary Johnson, a spokesman for the FBI office in Oklahoma City, would not confirm any talks between Nichols and the agency."

OECD To Warn Insurers Unable To Bear Losses From "Mega-Terrorism." The Financial Times (7/5, Felsted) reports the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development "will warn" today that "insurers might be unable to bear losses from 'mega-terrorism.'" In some countries, claims "from attacks that could include a nuclear, chemical or biological incident could even outstrip the joint compensation capacity of insurers and governments." The estimates of "maximum losses resulting from a single terrorist attack range from $50bn to $250bn," compared to over $30 billion for the 9/11 attacks in New York.

DC Railroad Bridge Said To Demonstrate Vulnerability To Chemical Attack. The New York Times (7/5) says in an editorial that the "weakest point in America's defense against terrorism may be an inconspicuous little bridge a few blocks from the Capitol. Rail tanker cars filled with deadly chemicals pass over the bridge, at Second Street and E Street SW, on their journeys up and down the East Coast. The bridge is highly vulnerable to an explosion from below, and if deadly chemicals were released on it, they would endanger every member of Congress and as many as 250,000 other federal employees." The "vulnerability could be easily eliminated by a federal law barring the transportation of hazardous materials through Washington and other locations at high risk of a terrorist attack. But the railroads have fought such legislation, which would increase their costs. If the Bush administration and Congress are serious about homeland security, they will get a chemical transportation law passed at once."

WAR NEWS:

Gonzales Makes Quick Surprise Trip To Iraq. Amid speculation that he may be line for a promotion to the Supreme Court, Attorney General Gonzales yesterday made a surprise visit to Baghdad. ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 6, 0:20, Moran) reported Gonzales met "with American troops and Justice Department officials there, several hundred of whom are training Iraqi judges, police and prison guards." The CBS Evening News (7/3, lead story, 2:25, Guida) reported that "though Gonzales was 6,000 miles from Washington, his name dominated Capitol conversations about the vacancy on the Supreme Court."

The Washington Post (7/5, 2:48 PM, Eggen) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales returned to Washington Monday after seven-hour visit to Baghdad that was aimed at highlighting the efforts to build a functional criminal justice system in Iraq. The trip also served to illustrate the severe dangers and obstacles that remain." The Post continues, "Gonzales had to travel to Iraq under intense secrecy and heavy guard out of fear insurgents would target him. After arriving at Baghdad airport early Sunday, he was temporarily stranded there while waiting out a sandstorm that had grounded helicopters. Insurgents have made the nine-mile road into the city's center too dangerous to drive." The Post adds, "His presence in Baghdad was not revealed publicly until he was safely inside the Green Zone, the walled compound of former palaces and parks that serve as a shaky refuge for coalition forces and the Iraqi government. … There Gonzales met with Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari and other senior Iraqi officials to discuss plans for a joint task force to investigate the kidnappings and other serious offenses that contributed to the chaos outside the U.S. compound. … Hours earlier, Egypt's highest-ranking diplomat in Iraq, Ihab Sherif, disappeared after being accosted by two carloads of gunmen as he drove in Baghdad. … 'What we need to do is develop the expertise within the Iraqi community to prosecute assassinations, kidnappings and other serious crimes,' Gonzales said in an interview during the trip. 'This should improve the situation.'"

The Washington Post (7/4, A1, Eggen) reports, "Even as his name echoes in Washington as one of the most likely

Supreme Court candidates, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales landed in war-torn Iraq on Sunday for an unannounced visit with some of the hundreds of Justice Department employees stationed here." The Post continues, "In an interview with The Washington Post on his way to the Iraqi capital, Gonzales said he would continue to be directly involved in making recommendations to President Bush for a possible successor to retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But Gonzales, a close friend and longtime confidant to Bush, declined to comment on his own chances or interest in the post. … 'There will be a group of people who will share their thoughts with the president about a nominee, and obviously I am part of those discussions,' Gonzales said. 'But I'm not going to talk about the details of those discussions or the recommendations or anything like that . . . I think the president is going to be deliberative in his decision.'" The Post adds, "Although Bush may 'take some time' to make a final call, Gonzales added, the president is adamant that a new justice be confirmed by October. The interviews with The Post and the Associated Press en route to Baghdad were Gonzales's first comments about the high court since O'Connor resigned Friday. … The trip is the first to Iraq by the top U.S. law enforcement officer since the Iraq invasion more than two years ago. Gonzales, who took the post in February, nearly had to cancel the final leg of his trip because helicopters were grounded by sandstorms and the road from the Baghdad airport to the U.S.-controlled Green Zone remains very dangerous."

The New York Times/Reuters (7/4) reports, A U.S. embassy spokesman said Gonzales met Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Iraq's justice and interior ministers during his previously unannounced flying visit. … The Department of Justice said Gonzales was also meeting some of the department's 400 staff in Iraq. … They include a large team of investigators that has been helping Iraq build a war crimes case against ousted leader Saddam Hussein and other members of his regime." Reuters adds, "Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said Gonzales's meetings with members of the Iraqi government were 'to offer his support for what they are doing in terms of reconstituting or rebuilding the judicial system in Iraq.' … 'He's also meeting with the DOJ employees that are on the ground in Iraq just to express his support for what they're doing,' Scolinos said."

The Chicago Tribune (7/4, Madhani) reports, "Gunmen kidnapped Egypt's top diplomat in Iraq, authorities said Sunday, snatching the envoy in a busy commercial district in the capital. … The abduction came hours before a surprise visit to the capital by U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales, who met with Iraqi and American officials and U.S. troops." The Tribune adds, "Gonzales made his a surprise one-day visit to Baghdad to thank U.S. Justice Department officials and troops working in Iraq for their service. He also visited with several Iraqi officials, including Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, according to the U.S. Embassy. … The unannounced visit, the latest of several by high-ranking Bush administration officials around past holidays, came as Gonzales' name has surfaced as a possible successor to Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who on Friday announced her retirement."

The AP (7/4, Sherman) reports, "The United States will help Iraq investigate the killing and kidnapping of government officials, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says. The informal agreement was disclosed as Gonzales made an unannounced and tightly guarded, six-hour visit Sunday to Baghdad. He met with Iraq's prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, as well as police and judicial officials." The AP continues, "Word of the arrangement followed the abduction on Saturday night of Egypt's top envoy to Iraq. … 'There are still some high-level crimes, murders and kidnappings that are not being prosecuted. One reason is that the evidence is not available,' Gonzales said in an interview en route back to Washington." The AP adds, "While details are still to be worked out, investigators from the FBI and other U.S. law enforcement agencies would join their Iraqi counterparts at crime scenes and in other aspects of the probes, aides to Gonzales said. … Gonzales praised Iraq's commitment to democracy in the face of sustained deadly attacks by insurgents and also used the trip to show support for U.S. troops in Iraq. … 'As we approach the Fourth of July weekend, I suspect there's some of you that are here that sometimes feel lonely and you sometimes wonder whether you are alone,' Gonzales told American soldiers at the U.S. Embassy. 'And I'm here to tell you that you are not alone, that the American people are very much with you.'"

The New York Times (7/4, Wong) reports, "American and Iraqi officials declined to specify when Mr. Gonzales had planned the trip or why, for a visit that lasted only six hours. But under his leadership, the Justice Department is playing an important role in the coming trials of Saddam Hussein and other officials of the former government. Mr. Sharif, who arrived here just a month ago, was seized as he was driving alone in his white Jeep Cherokee through the Jamia neighborhood of Baghdad, where he lived, an Interior Ministry official said. No group claimed responsibility for abducting him. … The Baghdad visit by Mr. Gonzales coincided with speculation that he may be nominated as a replacement for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her resignation on Friday. His trip here to the heavily fortified American Embassy was a closely guarded secret, and reporters based here were not invited to meet with him. … He released a written statement that said, 'I am proud of the people of the Department of Justice who are contributing to this effort by helping Iraqis advance the rule of law.'"

The New York Daily News (7/4, McAuliff) reports, "After landing in Baghdad under tight security, Gonzales boosted Iraq's push for democracy and gave a pep talk to U.S. troops who were fighting while their families back home were preparing to celebrate Independence Day. … 'As we approach the Fourth of July weekend, I suspect there's some of you that are here that sometimes feel lonely and you sometimes wonder whether you are alone,' he told G.I.s. 'I'm here to tell you that you are not alone, that the American people are very much with you.' … Gonzales said his trip aimed to show Iraqis the U.S. commitment to their new government. 'We are doing a lot to promote democracy and the rule of law,' he said."

The Knight Ridder Newspapers (7/4, Fadel) reports, "Accompanying Gonzales was FBI Assistant Director Willie Hulon, who directs the FBI's counterterrorism division."

Agence France-Presse (7/5) reports that Gonazles "was accompanied by Max Wood, the embassy's newly-appointed justice attache, and Willie Hulon, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's counter-terrorism division, said the statement. … Former attorney general John Ashcroft never visited Iraq."

Gonzales Visits Iraq. Alberto Gonzales' trip to Iraq was widely covered by local TV. Usually, the coverage either mentioned that Gonzales made the trip in order to support US troops or to help the Iraqi government get off the ground. Often, stations mentioned that Gonzales was in Iraq for both those reasons. Some examples: NC8-CABLE-TV Washington, DC (7/3, 2:25 p.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made a surprise trip to Iraq today. It's his first visit to the new democracy. He says he chose the Independence Day weekend for his trip to show support both for US troops there and Iraq's fledgling government."

WTVT-TV Tampa (7/3, 7:10 a.m.) reported, "Gonzales made a surprise visit under heavy guard. He picked the July Fourth weekend to show support for US troops."

KABC-TV Los Angeles (7/4, 6:30 a.m.) reported that Gonzales praised democracy and "thanked the troops for brave service."

WNBC-TV New York (7/4, 5:41 a.m.) reported, "Iraq has accepted Gonzales' offer to help the investigation into the kidnappings and killings of top officials. Over the weekend, Egypt's diplomat was taken hostage."

WLS-TV Chicago (7/4, 5:02 a.m.) reported, "Gonzales says Iraq is now ready to accept American help investigating some crimes. He made the statement after completing a surprise six-hour visit to Baghdad. On his return flight, he talked about the agreement that the US would help investigate the kidnap and murder of Iraqi officials. Gonzales says some of these crimes aren't being prosecuted because Iraqi authorities haven't been able to gather enough evidence."

WPVI-TV Philadelphia (7/4, 6:07 a.m.) reported that Gonzales "met with the country's prime minister, as well as police and judicial officials." He "said Iraq is ready to accept US help to prosecute kidnappers and killers."

WSB-TV Atlanta (7/4, 5:49 a.m.) reported, "Gonzales says he made the trip to show support for US troops in Baghdad and offer FBI help to the Iraqis."

KDFW-TV Dallas (7/4, 8:04 a.m.) reported, "The nation's top lawyer told Iraqis the US will stand" by their fledgling government. Gonzales "promised to help support the young Iraqi justice system and police and he praised US troops." KPNX-TV Phoenix (7/4, 5:06 a.m.), KCPQ-TV Seattle (7/3, 10:08 p.m.), KMOV-TV St. Louis (7/3, 10:10 p.m.), and WRGB-TV Albany, New York (7/4, 6:11 a.m.) were among the many other stations that also covered the story, using much the same language as that used by the stations cited above.

On Independence Day, President Bush Calls For Resolve In Iraq. President Bush called on Americans to remember US troops fighting the war on terror in their celebrations for the holiday. In his remarks at Morgantown, West Virginia, the President also called for resolve and for seeing the Iraq mission through to the end. ABC and CBS covered Bush's remarks, while NBC mentioned the President's West Virginia trip in a story on the Supreme Court vacancy.

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 4, 2:05, Gibson) reported, "The soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan were on President Bush's mind this holiday. In West Virginia, he urged Americans to show their support for US forces overseas." Bush was shown saying, "There's so many ways to do so. You can fly the flag. Or send a letter to the troops in the field. Or help a military family down the street." The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 2, :40, Roberts) said the President "appealed to Americans to show resolve in Iraq." Bush was shown saying, "We pray for the families who have lost a loved one in freedom's cause, and we know that the best way to honor their sacrifice is to complete the mission so we will stay until the fight is won."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 5, 2:10, O'Donnell) reported, "This was a day for President Bush to simply wave the flag, marking the holiday in Morgantown, West Virginia." Bush: "And on Independence Day we remember that we also have essential responsibilities here at home."

The Charleston State Journal (7/5, Kaull) reports the President "spoke for about 20 minutes, mostly about the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism. He drew parallels between America's War for Independence, which lasted eight years, and the struggle to establish democracy in Iraq." Bush also "thanked West Virginians for their patriotism. 'Coming to West Virginia is becoming a Fourth of July tradition for me,' he said.'" The Wheeling Intelligencer (7/5, King) adds, "It appears President George W. Bush now equates the Fourth of July with democracy, freedom and West Virginia."

CNN's Inside Politics (7/4, Franken) said Bush's speech "was really a repeat of last week's speech in which he was beginning to try and shore up support for the war in Iraq, which has been suffering from a lack of -- a dwindling lack of support in the United States. … But to reinforce the point that the war in Iraq has become a very contentious issue in the United States, a group of about 50 demonstrators appeared outside the hall where the president spoke." The New York Times (7/5, Kornblut) also says this morning that Bush reprised "his prime-time speech on Iraq the week before."

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Chen) reports Bush asserted "that he has 'a comprehensive strategy' to win the struggle in Iraq and prevail in the global war on terrorism." Bush "has been under growing pressure, including from some Republican lawmakers, to articulate an exit strategy -- what the White House prefers to call 'a strategy for success' -- for Iraq." In his remarks, "however, Bush did not go beyond the points he made last Tuesday in a nationally televised prime-time address. … As he spoke, the shouts of a cluster of demonstrators could be heard, although their words were difficult to discern.":

The Washington Times (7/5, Curl) reports "several thousand students, veterans, civic leaders and members of the military packed West Virginia University's downtown campus for the ticketed event." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/5, O'Toole) notes the "cheering…audience," adding Bush "melded a salute to the troops with a defense of his war policies; a celebration of American independence with promises of democracy to come in the Middle East." Bush "was introduced yesterday by US Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va., who proclaimed that Bush's frequent visits had transformed him from a Texan to a Mountaineer. … The spotlight on Capito came as speculation continues that she will challenge [Sen. Robert] Byrd, the state's long-serving Democrat, in next year's election."

Meanwhile, Reuters (7/5, Bohan) notes Bush "also invoked the Revolutionary War as he cast the Iraq war as a struggle to help Iraqis achieve freedom." The AP (7/5, Hunt) adds, "With his approval ratings sagging and anxiety over the war rising, Bush has decided to devote more attention to explaining what he believes is at stake in Iraq and his strategy for dealing with it. … The president's communications effort has been complicated by the Supreme Court vacancy caused by the surprise retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor."

Bush's Independence Day speech at West Virginia University received widespread local TV coverage across the nation, with several reports noting that it was Bush's third Independence Day speech in four years in the Mountain State. Some examples: WDIV-TV Detroit (7/4) reported, "In the President's third speech in four years at the school, he called on all Americans to show support for those troops serving in what he called the fight against terrorism." Bush was shown saying, "The men and women of our armed forces have always answered our nation's call."

WITI-TV Milwaukee (7/4) reported, "President Bush kicks off the Fourth with an appearance in West Virginia. There, he thanked America's war heroes for their service to the country. The President stopped in West Virginia on the Fourth. He says Americans need to do something to show their appreciation for the troops." KDKA-TV Pittsburgh (7/4) also said, "West Virginians are getting used to seeing President Bush on this holiday."

WBBM-TV Chicago (7/4) reported, "President Bush is message to the nation is familiar. The US needs to support troops who are defending freedom in Iraq. As we report, the President again said those troops are not going anywhere any time soon. A colorful setting, a warm welcome for the President speaking on the campus of West Virginia University. He rallied to show extra support for the troops."

Knight Ridder (7/5, Silva) says Bush made "a repeat Independence Day visit to this mountainous realm that helped elect him and re-elect him." The Washington Post (7/5, Helderman) notes, "In all, 13 West Virginians have been killed in Iraq since the war began. A sailor from the state was also one of 16 troops killed last week when a MH-47 Chinook helicopter crashed in eastern Afghanistan."

US, Iraqi Troops Arrest Over 100 Suspected Insurgents. The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 2, :40, Roberts) reported, "In Iraq today, hundreds of US and Iraqi troops arrested at least 100 suspected militants in raids near the Baghdad airport. A suicide car-bomber struck an Iraqi army convoy in Fallujah, killing at least three civilians. And in Baghdad, a remote-control car bomb missed a US military convoy, but killed two Iraqi civilians."

Syrian Forces Clash With Militants Linked To Iraqi Insurgency. The New York Times (7/5, Fattah) reports that Syrian security forces "clashed early Monday in the hills overlooking Damascus with men believed to be militants connected to Iraq's insurgency." The predawn firefight on Qassioun Mountain "left one police officer dead and several others wounded. … It was the second clash in as many days between the Syrian authorities and people believed to be militants." The Times notes that Syria "has come under significant pressure" from the US "to seal its long border with Iraq, and has been accused of giving Iraqi insurgents safe harbor and of encouraging the insurgency. But in recent weeks, it has sought to highlight its own problem with militants as well as to show it has gotten serious about stamping out militancy."

Army Reservists Build Artificial Limbs For Iraqis. The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 8, 2:35, Roberts) reported, "Some Army Reservists in Iraq are using their civilian expertise to give injured Iraqis a new start." CBS (Dozier) added Captain Steve Lindsley and MP Sgt. Chris Cummings, who organized Operation Restoration, a program to build artificial limbs for wounded Iraqis. The group has "helped some 60 people. To keep the clinic open, Sergeant Cummings extended his tour by nine months."

Marine Reservists Profiled. NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 3, 2:05, Engel) profiled the regimen of the Marines of Kilo Company, "part of Regimental Combat Team 2 on patrol in the dangerous Sunni Triangle northwest of Baghdad." Engel: "At home, they're plumbers, cops, salesmen and students. Now, they are hunting down insurgents in the city of Hit."

Iraqi Prime Minister Rules Out Talks With Terrorists. The Washington Times (7/5, Martin) reports, "Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari has ruled out talks with any terrorist or insurgent group that has the blood of Iraqi citizens on its hands. But, in a recent interview, Mr. al-Jaafari also held out an olive branch to other hard-line anti-government and anti-American militants whose opposition had not led to the deaths of Iraqis." Mr. "al-Jaafari said he would welcome bringing hard-line Sunni groups into a political dialogue and even into his government." Times adds, "The prime minister said it was also politically important to put former Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein on trial quickly and to reach a rapid conviction and an imposition of the sentence passed by the court. He dismissed suggestions that the trial, and especially a death sentence, could inflame passions and increase terrorism."

Sunni Umbrella Group Urges Iraqi Members To Vote. The New York Times (7/5, Glanz) says "a major Sunni umbrella group called on its members on Monday to register for the next round of elections and take part 'despite our reservations.'" Adnan al-Dulaimi, the head of a group called the Sunni Endowment, "said in a briefing in Baghdad that clerics would be asked to issue fatwas, or religious rulings, essentially ordering Sunnis to vote in elections." The Times notes that Dulaimi also "explicitly renounced violence as a way for the Sunnis to regain power."

The Washington Post (7/5, Mosher, Fekeiki) adds "another pivotal Sunni group, the Iraqi Islamic Party, immediately voiced support for the proposal." Subhi Nawzen Tawfik, a political science professor at the University of Baghdad's International Studies Center, "called the initiative 'a very important development.'"

Iraq Seen As Replacing Afghanistan As Prime Training Ground For Terrorists. Knight Ridder (7/5, Strobel) says that Iraq has replaced Afghanistan "as the prime training ground for foreign terrorists who could travel elsewhere across the globe and wreak havoc, according to U.S. counterterrorism officials and classified studies by the CIA and the State Department." Of particular concern, "are the urban combat techniques being learned and used by foreign fighters assaulting U.S. and Iraqi troops. There's already evidence that those tactics are being replicated elsewhere." Knight Ridder says that Iraq's emergence as a terrorist training ground "appears to challenge President Bush's rationale for invading and overthrowing leader Saddam Hussein in March 2003."

Iraqi Barbershops Targeted By Insurgents. The Washington Times (7/5, Karim) reports, "Baghdadis headed to the barbershop are going more often to the Shi'ite neighborhood of Sadr City than to mixed neighborhoods, where they could be shot by Sunni radicals who charge that clean shaven men want to look like US soldiers." According "to an Interior Ministry official, at least 20 barbers have been assassinated in areas like Shaab, Bayaa, Saidiyah and Baghdad al-Jadeeda over the past two months."

Diplomats Fear For Their Safety In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Daragahi) reports that he kidnapping of Ihab al-Sherif, "Egypt's top envoy in Baghdad," has "sent shivers through the capital's small diplomatic community and may further hamper Iraq's drive to restore full diplomatic relations with the world." U.S. and Iraqi officials "have accused the mostly Sunni Muslim nations of the Arab world of refusing to restore full diplomatic ties with Iraq because it has been led by Shiites since the handover of sovereignty last year." However, Demiye Haddad, "the Jordanian embassy's charge d'affaires, said security -- not politics -- is the issue." Diplomats "say they fear for their safety in Iraq, and are concerned that their nations could become targets of terrorists if they appear to warm up to Baghdad." Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, "commended the Bush administration's efforts to change Iraq and the Middle East. The mass graves that Saddam Hussein left behind justified the war, he said."

Stateside Groups Lend Support To War Dogs In Iraq. The Washington Times (7/5, Haberkorn) reports that military war dogs in Iraq that help save lives by detecting bombs and traps and finding injured civilians are "getting chapped [noses] from the desert heat. When Amy Nichols, owner of Happy Tails Dog Spa in Tysons Corner, heard of the dogs' tale, she bought some lip balm for their noses and set up a donation box in front of her store. The doggy day care also is collecting flying discs, knotted ropes and treats to send to the hundreds of dogs serving in Iraq." The Times notes that by next week, Nichols "expects to send about 50 pounds of donations to the dog handlers in Iraq. Schools and animal advocacy groups across the nation have held collection drives to help the dogs in Iraq, and the US War Dogs Association has proposed a memorial for military working dogs and their handlers."

Two Navy SEALs Reportedly Killed In Eastern Afghanistan. One of the four Navy SEALs missing in the mountainous region of eastern Afghanistan was rescued over the weekend and is in stable condition. However, there is no official word on the remaining members of the team, and officials have told reporters on background that two of the Special Forces troops have been found dead. The networks all ran the story early in their newscasts. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 3, 2:10, Raddatz) reported, "Officials will say little about this, since one of the SEALs remains missing and the rescue efforts continue." The "loss of two more Navy SEALs would mean that, in less than a week, the SEALs have lost ten members, since 8 SEALs were killed on the rescue helicopter that crashed on Tuesday."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, lead story, 2:55, Orr) reported, "A US official tonight confirms that two of the four Navy commandos missing since Tuesday are dead," but the "search for the fourth missing SEAL goes on." NBC Nightly News (7/4, lead story, 1:45, Miklaszewski) reported, "The governor of Kunar Province announced that a second Navy SEAL had been found wounded and was being cared for in a remote Afghan village. But tonight, US military and Pentagon officials say there is no confirmation a second SEAL has been located."

US Officials Express Regret For Civilian Casualties In Afghanistan. The CBS Evening News (7/4, lead story, 2:55, Orr) reported the rescue operation "comes during a spike in Afghan violence. 45 US soldiers have been killed in the last three months along with 500 enemy fighters and more than 130 civilians." US officials "expressed regret that an air strike Friday on a terrorist compound killed an unknown number of civilians. But in a statement, said: 'When enemy forces move their families into the locations where they conduct terrorist operations, they put these innocent civilians at risk.'"

Taliban Said To Be Reemerging In Afghanistan. The Taliban and al Qaeda are thought to be making a bid to reemerge in Afghanistan, which is one reason for the recent upsurge in violence there. NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 2, 2:05, Allen) reported, "The Taliban has reemerged, supported by al Qaeda, a force estimated at some 20,000. US military officials say some of those fighters come over the mountains from Pakistan, with tactics imported from Iraq -- suicide bombs, roadside bombs, targeted assassinations, violence often directed at Afghan police, aide workers, anyone supporting the US and the new government." At least "45 US troops have died since early April, including 16 in the last week's chopper crash, the single deadliest day for American forces in Afghanistan."

Defense Department Considering Move Away From Two-War Strategy. Prompted by the ongoing conflict in Iraq, the Defense Department is reconsidering its current two-war strategy as part of its quadrennial review. The New York Times (7/5, Shanker, Schmitt) reports senior military planners are "weighing whether to shape the military to mount one conventional campaign while devoting more resources to defending American territory and antiterrorism efforts." The strategy shift will "determine the future size of the military as well as the fate of hundreds of billions of dollars in new weapons." The debate over the changes "reflects a growing recognition that the current burden of maintaining forces in Iraq and Afghanistan, along with the other demands of the global campaign against terrorism, may force a change in the assumptions that have been the foundation of all military planning." An "official designation of a counterterrorism role and a shift to a strategy that focuses on domestic defense would have a huge impact on the size and composition of the military." Strategies "that order the military to be prepared for two wars would argue for more high-technology weapons, in particular warplanes. An emphasis on one war and counterterrorism duties would require lighter, more agile forces - perhaps fewer troops, but more Special Operations units - and a range of other needs, such as intelligence, language and communications specialists." The "unusual mission in Iraq, which could last for years, has not just taken the slot for one of the two wars; it has upended the central concept of the two-war model."

DOJ:

Filling Top Post In New DOJ National Security Division Could Be Difficult. The Legal Times (7/4, Blum) reports, "The president's proposal to create a new National Security Division in the Justice Department, if adopted, would formalize the removal of the wall between intelligence gathering and criminal prosecution. But finding the right person to run the new section, which would bring together the DOJ's counterterrorism section, counterespionage section, and the Office of Intelligence Policy and Review, may not be easy." The Times continues, "Before the passage of the USA Patriot Act in 2001, intelligence agents and prosecutors rarely worked together. As a result, few lawyers have experience in both disciplines. 'There really aren't a lot of people who bridge both worlds,' says Suzanne Spaulding, a former CIA lawyer." The Times adds, "The post is unlikely to go to James Baker, who currently heads the Justice Department's intelligence office, or to counterterrorism chief Barry Sabin because both men are career officials without strong Republican ties. One senior DOJ official says the shuffle will not disrupt ongoing terrorism investigations: 'The advantage of putting those troops in the same division is that it will enable them to better take advantage of synergy the destruction of the wall has made possible.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ To Continue HealthSouth Probe. The AP (7/4, Reeves) reports, "Federal prosecutors aren't done with HealthSouth Corp., despite the acquittal of ousted CEO Richard Scrushy in a $2.7 billion earnings overstatement. Two former executives who pleaded guilty in the accounting scheme are set for sentencing this summer, and two more indicted in the fraud are awaiting trial in Birmingham, where jurors last week found Scrushy not guilty." The AP continues, "HealthSouth, meanwhile, is still feeding information to prosecutors as it sorts out the aftermath of the financial debacle, and U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said her office is still investigating the long-running fraud at the rehabilitation and medical services chain." The AP adds, "A recent earnings restatement filed by HealthSouth with the Securities and Exchange Commission includes information about payments and perks offered to some health care providers that could have violated Medicare rules, Martin said in an interview with The Associated Press. … 'Now I'll turn my attention to some other things that have been on the back burner during the trial,' said Martin, declining to elaborate. … The acquittal of Scrushy on all 36 counts was a stinging defeat for FBI agents and prosecutors who spent more than two years on the case, and Martin said attorneys are eager to talk more with jurors to find out exactly where their case failed. … But Martin rejected the idea that Scrushy's acquittal meant the whole investigation was a failure. … 'Overall it's been an incredible success with 15 guilty pleas,' she said. 'Sometimes that last domino doesn't fall.'"

SEC To Pursue Civil Action Against Scrushy. The Washington Post (7/5, Johnson) reports that on Thursday, the SEC "will file court papers seeking a chance to pursue its case" against Richard Scrushy "for the earnings inflation at HealthSouth Corp." The SEC wants to forbid Scrushy "from serving as an officer or director of another public company. It is also seeking $786 million in penalties and disgorgement." One of Scrushy's attorneys, Arthur W. Leach, "said he hopes the jury verdict [in the criminal case] 'has caused [U.S. District Judge Inge] Johnson to have increased questions about the strength and the merit of the SEC case.'" Experts added, however, that the SEC "is charging Scrushy with failing to follow accounting procedures and other new allegations not contained in his criminal indictment." In addition, the SEC "may be able to sharpen its case based on lessons it gleans from the failed criminal prosecution."

German Brokerage Firm Is Investigated For Missing Funds. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Taylor, Reilly) reports that "about €270 million, or roughly $320 million, in client funds hasn't been accounted for at a little-known German brokerage firm" called Phoenix Kapitaldienst GmbH. The Journal says the Phoenix "scam" operated for nearly a decade, and appears to be "one of Europe's biggest investment frauds -- potentially affecting as many as 30,000 investors." To cover up the fraud, Phoenix "simply wrote fake account statements and shredded documents." Prosecutors "have started proceedings against two directors of the company on charges of fraud in 6,940 cases related to the firm and arrested the two, one of whom they allege destroyed documents. A Frankfurt court appointed law firm Schultze & Braun to oversee insolvency proceedings at the firm."

Evan Greenberg Still Standing Despite Investigations. The Washington Post (7/5, Starkman) runs a lengthy piece on the many legal challenges facing Ace, Ltd. leader Evan Greenberg, noting that he is "staying on his feet despite investigations into the U.S. insurance industry that have toppled his brother and father." Greenberg "has acknowledged his own company's shortcomings and called for industry-wide reforms," but "he also said Ace has weathered an internal review of bid-rigging allegations without major findings of wrongdoing beyond those disclosed earlier this year." According to documents Ace filed in March with the SEC, "the company has received 43 subpoenas, civil demands and other queries from attorneys general in 10 jurisdictions, including the District, and 10 state insurance departments or other regulators, including Maryland's." There are also "ongoing state and federal investigations into accounting and business practices at AIG, where Evan Greenberg worked for 25 years, including the last three as chief operating officer under his father."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Email Shows Rove Was One Of Cooper's Sources. Newsweek (7/11, Isikoff) reports that Time magazine "agreed last week to turn over reporter Matthew Cooper's e-mails and computer notes to a special prosecutor investigating the leak of an undercover CIA agent's identity. … Now the story may be about to take another turn. The e-mails surrendered by Time Inc., which are largely between Cooper and his editors, show that one of Cooper's sources was White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, according to two lawyers who asked not to be identified because they are representing witnesses sympathetic to the White House. Cooper and a Time spokeswoman declined to comment. But in an interview with NEWSWEEK, Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, confirmed that Rove had been interviewed by Cooper for the article. It is unclear, however, what passed between Cooper and Rove." Luskin "told NEWSWEEK that Rove 'never knowingly disclosed classified information" and that "he did not tell any reporter that Valerie Plame worked for the CIA.' Luskin declined, however, to discuss any other details. He did say that Rove himself had testified before the grand jury 'two or three times' and signed a waiver authorizing reporters to testify about their conversations with him." Newsweek adds that "one of the two lawyers representing a witness sympathetic to the White House told NEWSWEEK that there was growing 'concern' in the White House that the prosecutor is interested in Rove."

Time (7/11, Saporito) reports that Luskin said Cooper "called Rove during the week before Novak's story appeared but declined to say what they discussed. … The lawyer said he has received repeated assurances from Fitzgerald's office that Rove is not a target in the case."

Rove Attorney Denies He Leaked Name Of CIA Agent. The CBS Evening News (7/3, story 4, :20, Roberts) reported, "Responding to a published report, the lawyer for White House aide Karl Rove denied today that his client leaked a CIA agent's name to Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper. Newsweek says e-mails surrendered by Time to a special prosecutor show that Rove was one of Cooper's sources."

In a story about the legal climate surrounding the issue of press confidentiality, the New York Times (7/4, Seelye) reports that "lawyers for the news media say that the legal climate for those seeking to protect confidential sources is turning chillier, with more subpoenas being issued to reporters. There is no database that tracks such subpoenas, and some prosecutors dispute that they are on the rise." But "a series of high-profile cases involving confidential sources has the news media on edge. … In the last year, more than two dozen reporters across the country have been subpoenaed or questioned about their confidential sources in cases before federal courts, according to the Newspaper Association of America."

Cunningham Made $400,000 In Boat Sale.

The San Diego Unioin-Tribune/Copley News Service (7/5, Kammer, Stern) reports, "Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham made roughly a $400,000 profit by selling the boat he lived aboard in the nation's capital from 1997 to 2002 to a businessman convicted in a bid-rigging scheme. The man said he subsequently got advice from Cunningham about how to pursue a presidential pardon from the Bush administration. … The businessman further acknowledged that a mortgage company owned by his daughter and nephew provided Cunningham with two loans totaling $1.1 million so the congressman could buy his home in Rancho Santa Fe. The businessman said he eventually paid off one of those loans in partial payment for the yacht." Copley adds, "Cunningham bought the 65-foot flat-bottom riverboat Kelly C from then-Rep. Sonny Callahan, R-Ala., for $200,000 in 1997. Five years later, he sold the boat for $600,000 to Thomas Kontogiannis, the Long Island businessman said yesterday. … Kontogiannis defended the $600,000 price tag as 'a steal,' saying that he had received an appraisal for twice that amount." Copley adds, "The Kontogiannis family is a frequent contributor to Republican causes, including a $300 contribution to Cunningham in July 2002, the year of the sale. …Cunningham's financial dealings in recent weeks have embroiled him in a multitiered federal investigation and cast a shadow over his Washington career. … In a series of interviews with Copley News Service yesterday, Kontogiannis confirmed that he bought Cunningham's boat and that the congressman offered to help him explore the possibility of seeking a pardon from President Bush and the Justice Department. Cunningham then put him in touch with a Washington law firm and recommended 'two or three' lawyers to talk to, said the businessman."

Developer's Purchase Of Cunningham's Boat, Loan Not Documented. The Washington Post (7/5, A2, Babcock) reports Long Island developer Thomas T. Kontogiannis recently bought Rep. Randy Cunningham's "65-foot yacht, the Kelly C, and helped the California Republican finance a house." However, Kontogiannis says the "transactions are nothing like Cunningham's dealings on another house and yacht that are the subject of a federal investigation." However, the transactions between the Cunningham "and Kontogiannis are not fully documented in the public record or the congressman's financial disclosure. Cunningham, for example, is still listed as the owner of the Kelly C, with his address listed as the home he bought more than a year after Kontogiannis said he bought the yacht from the congressman." Kontogiannis "said in interviews this weekend that he bought the Kelly C, a boat on which Cunningham used to live while Congress was in session, for $600,000 in summer 2002." Then in late 2003, Kontogiannis said, "when Cunningham bought a $2.55 million home in Rancho Santa Fe, the congressman asked if a mortgage company owned by Kontogiannis's nephew and daughter could finance $1.1 million in mortgages."

Cunningham Cancels Independence Day Public Appearance. CNN's Inside Politics (7/11, Johns) reported, "Republican Congressman Duke Cunningham canceled a scheduled appearance today at a pancake breakfast in his home district. Cunningham is under investigation for selling this San Diego-area home to a defense contractor who later sold the house for a loss. A spokesman said Cunningham did not want to be a distraction at this morning's event." The AP (7/5, Hettena) says that on Friday, "the FBI raided Cunningham's San Diego-area home as authorities intensified their investigation of the congressman's financial dealings."

Indicted Tennessee Lawmaker Adds Scrushy Lawyer To Defense Team. The AP (7/4) reports state Sen. John Ford has retained "Attorney Donald Watkins, who helped former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy win an acquittal on fraud charges last week," to defend him on federal bribery charges stemming from Operation Tennessee Waltz. The AP adds, "According to Watkins there are two reasons why the case looks good for Ford. 'The secret video tapes that the FBI made do not portray what really happened with the course of conduct of Senator Fords' dealings with the FBI and the entity created by the FBI.,' Watkins said. Watkins also said that the undercover operatives cooperating with the FBI have credibility issues."

Former Kansas County Official Pleads Guilty To Lying To FBI. The Kansas City Star (7/3, Thomas, Smith) reports, "Former Jackson County Executive Bill Waris pleaded guilty Saturday to lying to FBI agents in a criminal investigation that, according to documents, targets Katheryn Shields, the county's current top elected official." The Star adds, "In an agreement reached late Friday with federal prosecutors, Waris pledged to cooperate fully with the investigation. In return, said U.S. Attorney Todd Graves, the government dismissed parts of a Nov. 17, 2004, federal indictment against Waris and won't oppose any request for probation at his sentencing."

Cleveland Corruption Trial Jurors Remain Deadlocked. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (7/2, Tobin) reports, "The jury deciding the fate of Nate Gray remained deadlocked Friday night over charges that Gray traded public contracts for bribes. The jury sent notice to U.S. District Judge James Gwin that it had not agreed on any of the 59 counts of conspiracy, fraud and bribery against Gray, Cleveland City Councilman Joe Jones and New Orleans businessman Gilbert Jackson." The Plain Dealer notes, "One of the FBI agents working on the case slumped when Gwin read the note. Defense lawyers grinned and asked Gwin to declare a mistrial," but Gwin ordered the jurors "to return for more deliberations next week."

NYPD Detectives Accused In Mob Killings Seek Release On Bond. Newsday (7/2, DeStefano) reports, "Two ex-cops accused of being hitmen for the mob are not dangerous and should be let out of solitary confinement on bail, defense attorneys said Friday. In a 19-page bail application…lawyers for Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa said the case…was 'slim' and that narcotics charges in the indictment had no connection to the racketeering charges." Newsday adds, "A bail hearing is scheduled in the case for Tuesday before Judge Jack B. Weinstein. Prosecutors had not filed a response to the defense papers as of late Friday." The New York Daily News (7/2, Marzulli) notes, "The defendants asked a federal judge yesterday to free them on $1 million bail and offered to put up their homes in Las Vegas and properties owned by their children and close relatives to secure the bond."

Alleged US Child Predator Arrested In Joint FBI-RCMP Investigation. The (Toronto) Globe and Mail (7/2, A4, Sher) reports, "A man whose picture appeared in a gallery of suspected child predators on the America's Most Wanted website was tracked down in Montreal this week after an international cyberhunt. … 'It was a great co-ordinated effort,' said Detective Sergeant Paul Gillespie of Toronto Police's sex-crime unit, which worked with the FBI, the RCMP and police in Quebec to locate the man." The Globe and Mail notes that at the outset "the FBI had few clues, except his approximate weight, hair colour and a couple of scars and tattoos on his arms. 'He's been out the longest,' said Arnold Bell, unit chief of the FBI's Innocent Images project. … About two weeks ago, members of Toronto's sex-crimes unit came across new pictures and a video from the same series in a newsgroup."

Former Illinois Death Row Inmate Faces New Charges. The AP (7/5, Robinson) reports, "Aaron Patterson walked out of prison 2 1/2 years ago, a free man with a pardon and a chance to start fresh. But the happy ending never came for Patterson, who faces fresh drug and weapon charges that could hand him a return trip to prison. These days, the 40-year-old Patterson sits in a federal jail awaiting the start of jury selection Tuesday." The AP continues, "His story of torture by police and 17 years on death row had helped launch an emotional campaign against the death penalty in Illinois." The AP adds, "Patterson was among four former death row inmates who were pardoned by former Gov. George Ryan in one of his last acts in office in January 2003. A day later the governor commuted the sentences of all 160 other death row inmates to life without parole. … Patterson insisted that he was tortured by police into confessing to a double murder he did not commit. The head of the unit that investigated his case, Lt. Jon Burge, was later fired for allegedly mistreating a suspect. … Ryan's actions were warmly applauded by opponents of the death penalty, who nominated the former governor for the Nobel Peace Prize. Patterson's claims have been echoed by dozens of others. … But the cheering for both Patterson and Ryan has long since faded. … The former governor is facing a racketeering indictment, and federal prosecutors are asking the judge — who by coincidence is U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer, who also is handling Patterson's case — to bar his lawyers from using his moratorium on capital punishment to try to impress the jury. … Meanwhile, federal prosecutors say Patterson emerged from prison to become a leader of the South Side's P. Stones street gang."

Task Force Faces Big Challenge In Ohio Corruption Probe. The Toledo Blade (OH) (7/5, Wilkinson) reports, "In the month since its creation, the task force to investigate Tom Noe has been relatively quiet, slowly putting together a process while gathering information." The Blade continues, "What the four prosecutors face is daunting: Unraveling the complex world of Mr. Noe's coin business and political activity. The investigation will stretch across Ohio and the country." The Blade adds, "Together, the four prosecutors - two U.S. attorneys, two elected county prosecutors; one female, three male; one Democrat, three Republicans - will have to decide what charges will be sought and, if any are brought, who will prosecute them. … But despite the complexity of the case, its high profile, and the overlapping boundaries of their jurisdictions, they are confident that they'll get the job done. … 'You do the right thing,' said Gregory A. White, U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Ohio, based in Cleveland. 'You are comfortable with your process. We are progressing and confident about all the things that are going on. We are maintaining the integrity of this expanded investigation.'"

USA Today Examines Eric Rudolph's Letters To His Mother. In a front-page piece, USA Today (7/5, Morrison) reports on letters convicted bomber Eric Rudolph has written his mother. When Rudolph pleaded guilty on April 13, he released "a rambling, 11-page statement that condemns abortion and homosexuality and says he had 'nothing personal' against his victims," but his letters home, by contrast, "are cogent and well-written." The letters "reveal a thinker, clever and cunning, who details how he fooled locals and the feds during five years on the lam; an egoist who sees himself and his plight in the books that now take up his days; a zealot, unapologetic in his disgust for abortion and the government; a son who seems to deeply regret what his family has endured." In a letter his mother received April 21, he writes, "I don't believe that a government that sanctions, protects and promotes the murder of 50 million unborn children in the heinous practice of abortion has the moral authority to judge a man for murder."

Mexican Nationals' Murder Convictions Come Under Scrutiny. The Washington Times (7/4, Aynesworth) reports a criminal motion will be argued in Littlefield, TX, next month, following an investigation into whether "two Mexican nationals should serve life sentences or -- because of prosecutorial malfeasance and inadequate representation -- their 1998 murder convictions should be overturned." There also could be testimony that would "cast suspicion on two other men, one of whom reportedly had bragged to friends about the murder of a convenience-store clerk." The murder convictions of Jesus Ramirez and Alberto Sifuentes came seven years ago, after "prosecutions that offered no forensic evidence and no motives, but did have witnesses who since have been accused of perjury. The case has drawn considerable attention from the Mexican government."

Police Say A Blow To The Head Killed A Missing Oregon Boy. The NewYorkTimes/AP (7/4) reported "a four-year-old Oregon boy who police say was killed by his step-grandmother and left along a rural road in the foothills of the Cascade Range died from a blow to the head. An autopsy conducted a day after Christine Coffman led police to her step-grandson's body determined the cause of death to be blunt force head trauma, said Officer Kevin Krebs, a spokesman for the Milwaukie Police Department." Coffman was charged Saturday with aggravated murder in the death of Matal Sanchez, who had disappeared Wednesday from his home in the Portland suburb of Milwaukie.

Police Find Remains In Montana Thought To Be Missing Boy. Police yesterday found remains in western Montana that were thought to be those of nine-year-old Dylan Groene, who was kidnapped along with his eight-year-old sister Shasta Groene. The girl's rescue from convicted pedophile Joseph Duncan has angered many advocates of tougher penalties for sexual offenders.

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 5, 2:35, Gibson) reported advocates "of stronger laws against sexual predators were outraged, as more details emerged about" Duncan. ABC (Karlinsky) added, "Questions are now being raised about why such a person, who has a record of sex crimes, dating back 25 years, was free in the first place. He was released in April on only $15,000 bail, after being charged with molesting a 6-year-old boy, at this Minnesota playground. Prosecutors urged that Duncan be kept in custody. The judge now says he doesn't remember if he knew Duncan was a level-three offender with a rape conviction and numerous parole violations, considered to be in high risk of re-offending." The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 6, 2:40, Bowers) reported, "Investigators are waiting on DNA analysis to confirm what we believe," that Shasta Groene told investigators "that her brother is dead."

Kidnapped Eight-Year-Old Girl Rescued In Idaho. Idaho authorities over the weekend rescued eight-year-old Shasta Groene, who was kidnapped after her mother, her mother's boyfriend, and her older brother were murdered. However, her nine-year-old brother Dylan remains unaccounted for. A convicted sex offender, Edward Duncan, was arrested in Shasta Groene's kidnapping, but has not yet been charged with any other crimes. The story received extensive coverage in all three network newscasts.

ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 2, 2:05, Karlinsky) reported, "Duncan is no stranger to authorities who are now scouring his Fargo, ND, home. He is a registered sex offender who has done prison time for rape but more recently studied computer science at North Dakota State University. On his own website, he writes, 'My intent is to harm society as much as I can -- then die.'" Tim Fuhrman, FBI: "I don't think there is any question we will be involved in attempting to work on exploiting what may or may not be in any computer we may or may not find." The CBS Evening News (7/3, story 5, 2:15, Roberts) and NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 6, 2:30, Okwu) also reported the story. The story also was picked up by The New York Times/AP (7/4), among other media sources.

Police Unable To Trace Nearly Quarter Of Sex Offenders. ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 3, 2:05, Moran) reported "the shock of the crime" in the Groene case "is compounded by the fact that the suspect is a convicted child molester: Almost one-quarter of all sex offenders fail to obey their state's registration requirements." That "means many of them are simply on the loose." ABC (Jamieson) added, "There are nearly 550,000 registered sex offenders in the United States, but police may not know where 100,000 of them are." Law enforcement groups "say police just don't have the time or the resources to track every sex offender. And studies show just 5% of convicted sex offenders are arrested again, a lower rate than other criminals. But that hasn't diminished public outrage. And states are moving aggressively to track sex offenders and prevent them from molesting again."

DC Cracks Down on Jaywalking, Holding Cell Phones While Driving. The Washington Post (7/4, Weiss) reported Washington, DC, has been cracking down on such things as jaywalking and holding a cell phone while driving. They are moves the Post said are making "some people wonder whether the District is turning into a Big Brother 'nanny state.'" However, "DC Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large) defended the actions, saying city leaders have to strike a balance between making urban life safe and livable and preserving the fun of city living. 'It's not always that the government is looking for ways to be more of a nanny,' he said."

Boy Killed In iPod Robbery. The NewYorkTimes (7/4, Medina, Sweeney) reports, "Two Brooklyn, NY, teenagers were arrested Sunday on charges that they robbed and killed a 15-year-old boy…when they stole his friend's iPod. "The victim, Christopher Rose, was walking with three other boys late Saturday afternoon when a large group of teenagers approached them and demanded that they turn over the iPod that one of the boys was carrying. A witness said "when the boys refused, one of the suspects began hitting them. Then someone stabbed Christopher twice in the chest." Law enforcement officials have warned in recent months that "iPods have prompted an increase in thefts on the subways, and that teenagers are particularly vulnerable targets of iPod thefts by other teenagers."

that "was among 337 such crimes reported in Prince George's County as of June 30, a 47 percent jump from the 229 carjackings reported at the same time last year. In 2004, Prince George's reported the highest number of carjackings in Maryland: 563, compared with 492 for all of the state's other jurisdictions combined." County public safety director Vernon Herron says carjacking is considered "one of the highest priorities, along with homicides and other violent crimes." In several cases, "the carjackers have abducted car owners and resorted to violence. In one recent carjacking, a man who came to the aid of his girlfriend was shot."

Ohio US Attorney Asks Court to Unseal Filings In Herbal Supplement Case. The Cincinnati Enquirer (7/5, McNair) reports, "Ever since the government seized $24 million in bank accounts from herbal supplements kingpin Steven Warshak in March, the two sides have waged war in the secrecy of sealed court filings. … That could change, thanks to a request to open the case to public view - not by any news organization but by the government itself." The Enquirer continues, "The government's motives aren't available for anyone to see because its motion to unseal the case is, well, sealed. Fred Alverson, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Cincinnati, said the government is asking U.S. District Judge Susan Dlott to unseal everything except the affidavits backing the original request to freeze Warshak's assets. … 'Our motion is in response to a motion by them asking that certain documents be sealed or filed with redactions,' Alverson said. 'Our response is that these do not fit any of the Justice Department exceptions for documents to remain sealed in a civil case. ... They (the case files) should be open for the public to see.'" The Enquirer adds, "The government froze the $24 million at the same time federal agents with search warrants raided the Greater Cincinnati offices of Warshak's company, Berkeley Premium Nutraceuticals. The U.S. Postal Inspection Service led the raids. The asset freeze was supported by government claims that the $24 million was obtained by fraudulent means. … Several thousand consumers have filed complaints to the Ohio Attorney General's Office and Cincinnati Better Business Bureau since 2001 alleging that Berkeley billed their credit cards for penis enlargement pills and other products they had ordered for a 30-day free trial. Berkeley, based in Forest Park, said it amended its billing practices in August, prompting the number of complaints to shrink."

DOJ Sues Bulletproof-Vest Maker, Supplier For Fraud. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Scannell) reports that DOJ filed suit in federal court in Washington against "a bulletproof-vest maker and a ballistic-fiber supplier, alleging they sold body armor knowing it was defective." The civil suit "named Second Chance Body Armor Inc. of Central Lake, Mich., and its fiber supplier, Japan's Toyobo Co., and related entities," alleging that "from 1998 until 2001 Toyobo and Second Chance 'kept silent as to the ever-mounting information in their possession that the [bullet-resistant] Zylon fabric degraded substantially faster than expected' when exposed to certain light, temperature and humidity conditions." The Journal notes that both companies "have been sued by law-enforcement groups, state attorneys general, a wounded police officer, and the widow of an officer who was killed while wearing a vest."

Suits Against Detroit Police Officers Have Cost City $45 Million In Last Three Years. The Detroit Free Press (7.5, Swickard) reports, "Detroit has paid out almost $45 million over the past three years in police misconduct lawsuits, with more than half that amount going to pay cases involving officers with histories of past lawsuits, according to a City Council analysis." The Free Press continues, "The payouts are a costly jump since the last time police lawsuits were examined. A 2000 study found that the bill for the previous three years was $32 million and officials warned then that the trend of big payouts endangered the city's fiscal health." The Free Press adds, "The latest report on the multimillion dollar hemorrhage comes as the city struggles with a $300-million budget crisis that's forced hundreds of municipal layoffs. Firefighters and emergency medical technicians are among those laid off, but so far no police officers have lost their jobs. … Detroit police are currently under a federal consent degree mandating sweeping and costly changes in the way the department operates. The agreement came in 2003 after a U.S. Justice Department investigation that was spurred, in part, by Free Press reports detailing the high rate of civilians fatally shot by officers and constitutionally questionable practices of dragnet arrests and holding relatives to force suspects to surrender. …

The study, by the council's research and analysis division, looked at police misconduct cases that came before the council from 1987 to 2004 and found the city paid out more than $188 million in that 18-year period. The payouts cover settlements including pretrial agreements, mediations, arbitrations and judgments."

Bloomberg's Response To Racially Charged Beating Noted. In his New York Times column (7/4), Bob Herbert wrote, "Early last Wednesday a neighborhood nitwit named Nicholas (Fat Nick) Minucci pummeled a fellow named Glenn Moore with a metal baseball bat, police said. Mr. Moore was walking around Howard Beach with a couple of friends. What they were up to is not real clear and not particularly relevant. … In any event, Mr. Moore and his friends, who are black, ended up being chased by Fat Nick and a couple of his friends, who are white. … The beating allegedly was accompanied by racial slurs. As bad as this incident was, it would never have risen to the status of a major news story in a city of eight million people except for the fact that it happened in Howard Beach, a nearly all-white residential area." Yet Herbert concludes that "the city is a different and a better place these days. Mayor Michael Bloomberg could not have responded faster to last week's attack if he had been wearing Rollerblades."

United Church Of Christ Backs Gay Marriage. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 7, :25, Gibson) reported, "The United Church of Christ today became the largest Christian denomination to endorse same-sex marriage. 80% of the members of the church's rulemaking body voted in favor of the endorsement, which is not binding on any of the church's 5,700 congregations. Leaders of the church acknowledge it may cause some of the congregations or some of the 1.3 million members to go elsewhere."

ANTITRUST:

Chinese Government Blasts US Congress Over Unocal Takeover Bid. The Washington Post (7/5, A1, Goodman) reports, "The Chinese government on Monday sharply criticized the United States for threatening to erect barriers aimed at preventing the attempted takeover of the American oil company Unocal Corp. by one of China's three largest energy firms, CNOOC Ltd. Four days after the House of Representatives overwhelmingly approved a resolution urging the Bush administration to block the proposed transaction as a threat to national security, China's Foreign Ministry excoriated Congress for injecting politics into what it characterized as a standard business matter. 'We demand that the U.S. Congress correct its mistaken ways of politicizing economic and trade issues and stop interfering in the normal commercial exchanges between enterprises of the two countries,' the Foreign Ministry said in a written statement.

Chevron Benefiting From Anti-China Rhetoric. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Berman, Gold) reports, "With members of Congress suggesting resolutions, special hearings and potential laws to stymie Cnooc Ltd.'s ambitions, the pressure is now on the Chinese oil company to seize some momentum in its $18.5 billion takeover bid for Unocal Corp. The harsh response has even surprised people in the camp of Chevron Corp., whose $16 billion-plus deal is due to be voted on by Unocal shareholders in only five weeks. Amid an anti-Cnooc campaign in Washington, one person close to Chevron conceded, 'A lot of it is not organized; it came on its own. It's a freebie for every congressman to pile on China.'"

The New York Times (7/5, Mouawad, Barboza) reports, "The last thing Chevron wanted when it made its $16.8 billion offer for Unocal back in April was to be pitted in a takeover battle against the Chinese government. After all, one of the main reasons it went after Unocal, a California-based independent oil company with vast resources in Asia, was to sell oil and gas to the fastest-growing energy market in the world, China. But on June 22, when…Cnooc, countered with a higher bid for Unocal, Chevron found itself in a delicate position. Since then, Chevron's managers have gone into overdrive to portray the Chinese government-backed offer as unfair competition and to close their deal as quickly as possible. They have received support from many lawmakers in Washington, who have painted the Chinese offer as a threat to America's national security."

Chinese Likely To Boost Oil Production Thereby Helping US Consumers. The Washington Post (7/5) editorializes that China has "no interest in suppressing oil production to drive up prices; to the contrary, if China gains control of Unocal it will want to boost production as much as possible, which would push world prices downward and so help the United States. Those who refuse to draw comfort from this prospect argue that China might route all of Unocal's output to its own consumers, thereby depriving Americans of a source of energy. That is not actually practical, but even if it were, it would just mean that China would buy less on the open market than it would have otherwise. So there'd be less supply on the world market, but less demand also. The effect on U.S. gasoline prices would be zero."

CNOOC, Chevron Pursue Differing Strategies In UNOCAL Bid. The Wall Street Journal (7/4, Pottinger, Biers) reports, "In the competition to buy Unocal Corp., the prevailing bidder -- Chinese oil producer Cnooc Ltd or its US rival Chevron Corp. -- might be determined by timing as much as money. With Unocal shareholders scheduled to vote on Chevron's $16.6 billion cash-and-stock offer in just five weeks, Chevron's strategy seems to be this: Make Cnooc's bid appear destined for a lengthy and complicated regulatory review in the hope that Unocal shareholders support Chevron's deal -- even though Cnooc is offering nearly $2 billion more." The strategy of "Cnooc, China's biggest offshore oil and natural-gas producer, has been to do all it can to speed up a US regulatory review of its offer in hope of boosting Unocal shareholders' confidence that Cnooc's bid -- politically contentious in the US -- can win approval in reasonable time." The Journal adds, "Working in favor of Chevron are attitudes in the U.S. Congress, where recent attention on America's trade deficit has fueled hostility toward China." But "working in Cnooc's favor is Unocal shareholders' knowledge that U.S. regulators almost never block acquisitions on national-security grounds. If Cnooc can get the ball rolling on a formal regulatory review before Unocal's Aug. 10 shareholder vote, its bid stands a better chance of winning support from Unocal shareholders."

August Deals Face Tough Antitrust Scrutiny. The Deal (7/4, Lindell) reports, "The bidding war for August Technology Corp. may come down not to price but to antitrust concerns." The Deal continues, "Although the Bloomington, Minn., chip equipment maker on June 28 agreed to a $193 million deal with Rudolph Technologies Inc., industry rival KLA-Tencor Corp., which previously had bid $205 million for August Technology, has vowed to renew its pursuit. Seeking to thwart such a bid, Flanders, N.J.-based Rudolph said last week that a combination of KLA-Tencor and August Technology would pose antitrust risks. … But while Rudolph's offer for the company is likely to have an easier time with regulators, neither deal is a slam dunk, antitrust lawyers said. The review by the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division could hinge on how broadly enforcers define the market for semiconductor testing, inspection and metrology equipment, which is used to search for microscopic flaws in chips. The structure of this market and potential customer concerns also are likely to figure in whether the deals receive clearance." The Deal adds, "In sizing up the market affected by the sale of August Technology, antitrust enforcers will focus on the market for so-called macro defect inspection tools, which are used to spot problems with components used in semiconductor manufacturing, said Robert Doyle, an antitrust partner at Sheppard Mullin Richter & Hampton LLP. KLA-Tencor, the leader in that sector, has about 50% of that market, with August Technology and Rudolph each having roughly 25%. … One factor that may come into play is the small market for macro defect gear, which is worth roughly $70 million per year. That has led some risk arbitrageurs to speculate that the government would not closely review the deal. But such sentiments are more hopeful than realistic, said another antitrust lawyer. … Neither the Justice Department nor the Federal Trade Commission 'throws fish back because they are too small,' he said, requesting anonymity because he hasn't closely reviewed the specifics of the deal."

T-Mobile USA May Be Put Up For Sale. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Singer, Pringle, Karnitschnig, Drucker) says that German telecom titan Deutsche Telekom AG "is exploring whether to sell its U.S. wireless operation, T-Mobile USA Inc., a move that could fetch as much as $30 billion and alter mobile-phone markets on both sides of the Atlantic." The company "has told investors in private meetings recently that it expects to make a decision by December." The Journal adds that the possibility of the sale "has intensified on the heels of drastic reshaping of the U.S. telecommunications and cable television market. In the past 18 months, a succession of acquisitions…have formed several huge communications companies that dwarf T-Mobile USA." Choosing to sell T-Mobile USA, however, "could prove to be a difficult option," as the most likely cellular buyer, Vodafone, "says it isn't interested even though the world's largest wireless carrier has long wanted to control a service provider in the U.S."

Singapore Investment Co. Plans To Buy Stake In Chinese Bank. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Areddy) reports, "Singapore's state-owned investment company will join Bank of America Corp. as a strategic foreign investor in China Construction Bank, a government-owned property lender." A subsidiary of Temasek Holdings (Pte.) Ltd. "will pay $1 billion for shares in China's No. 3 lender when the bank conducts an initial public offering, the official Xinhua news agency reported late yesterday." Bank of America, of Charlotte, N.C., "agreed to invest $2.5 billion for the stake and an additional $500 million to maintain that level when China Construction goes public. The purchase by Bank of America worked out to about $305 million for 1% of the Chinese bank, while…Temasek [apparently] would be paying about $275 million per 1%."

Microsoft Settles Antitrust Matter With IBM. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Guth, Forelle) says that Microsoft's agreement to settle an antitrust dispute with IBM "sweeps away some past differences but also highlights the growing rivalry between the two technology giants." IBM's "growing services arm gives the company a powerful platform from which to pitch products at the expense of Microsoft's." Furthermore, IBM "is also a major backer of open-source software, particularly the Linux operating system, which continues to be a thorn in Microsoft's side." On Friday, the two companies "said Microsoft will pay IBM $775 million in one lump sum and extend $75 million in credit toward Microsoft software that IBM will use internally." The settlement "is the latest in a quest by [Microsoft General Counsel Brad] Smith to resolve private claims resulting from Microsoft's antitrust battles in the 1990s with the U.S. government, including a broad suit filed by the Justice Department in 1998 and settled in 2002."

Mohawk To Buy Unilin. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Singer) reports that Mohawk Industries Inc., "a maker of carpet and floor coverings, said it agreed to acquire Belgian flooring maker Unilin Holding NV for $2.65 billion." Mohawk, "based in Calhoun, Ga., beat out private-equity firms that also had been looking at Unilin." The Journal notes that private-equity firms' "merger-and-acquisition activity in Europe has increased substantially in the past few years, but recently trade buyers have been outbidding private equity in some big acquisitions."

T-Mobile Sale Said To Be Possible. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, A3, Singer, Pringle, Karnitschnig, Drucker) reports, "Deutsche Telekom AG is exploring whether to sell its US wireless operation, T-Mobile USA Inc., a move that could fetch as much as $30 billion and alter mobile-phone markets on both sides of the Atlantic."

Jury Rules For Boston Scientific In Patent Case Against J&J. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Brickley) reports, "A Delaware jury ruled for Boston Scientific Corp. and against Johnson & Johnson in a key test of patents protecting drug-eluting-stent technology." The jury found that "J&J's Cypher stent trespasses on a Boston Scientific patent, which protects technology that allows drug coatings to be applied to stents, medical devices used in the treatment of cardiovascular disease." J&J's cardiovascular unit, Cordis Corp., "said in a statement that it would seek to have the verdict overturned, either by the judge who presided over the federal-court contest or by appeal to a different court." The finding of infringement against J&J, "the only other company with a major piece of the U.S. market for drug-eluting stents" is described as "a critical one for Boston Scientific."

ENVIRONMENT:

At G8, Bush To Oppose Effort To Reduce Greenhouse Gas Emissions. The Washington Times/Agence France-Presse (7/4) reports although the Group of Eight "has to tackle climate change, President Bush vowed to spurn any Kyoto-style deal on the 'significant' problem of global warming, he said in an interview to air" on Britain's ITV. Bush said that "global warming was 'a significant, long-term issue that we've got to deal with.'" But he said "any climate change agreement along the lines of the United Nations' Kyoto Protocol -- which the United States refused to sign -- would get short shrift." Bush said, "If this [draft plan under negotiation] looks like Kyoto, the answer is no. The Kyoto treaty would have wrecked our economy, if I can be blunt." Bush said he "wanted G-8 leaders to put Kyoto behind them and move on to supporting new technologies to limit global warming without harming businesses." He also "underlined the U.S. government's $20 billion investment in technologies such as zero-emission power stations and hydrogen-powered vehicles."

The Financial Times (7/4, Blitz, Beattie) reports the G8 leaders "look set to agree an accord to combat climate change at their summit this week, averting a rift between the US and France over global warming and intensifying pressure on China and India to curb greenhouse gas emissions." Prime Minister Tony Blair "is on the brink of brokering a global agreement on climate change, one which explicitly recognises that science compels the world to act to contain greenhouse gases." A "final draft of the accord to be agreed by the G8 heads including George W. Bush, US president, and Jacques Chirac, French president was hammered out by diplomatic 'sherpas' from each of the member states in London at the weekend." Though the US won't sign the Kyoto protocol, it "gave its backing at the weekend meeting to a final draft accord that meets the minimum demands made by Mr Chirac on climate change."

Bush Denies Softening His Views On Climate Change To Reward Blair. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Daniszewski, Depasquale) reports that in advance of the G-8 summit, President Bush said "he would not substantially change his stance on global warming to reward British Prime Minister Tony Blair for his support of the war in Iraq." Bush said, "I really don't view our relationship as one of quid pro quo. Tony Blair made decisions on what he thought was best for keeping the peace and winning the war on terror, as I did." Bush reiterated his "opposition to the Kyoto Protocol that mandates targets for cutting greenhouse gas emissions," telling Britain's ITV1 television "that he would reject any measures that 'look like Kyoto.'" Bush "nevertheless acknowledged that human activity is at least partly behind the apparent warming of the planet in recent years. And he said that there may be other compromises the United States and other nations can make to reduce the amount of greenhouse gases being produced."

The Washington Post/Reuters (7/5, A10) report President Bush "told British Prime Minister Tony Blair to expect no favors" at the G-8 summit "in return for backing the war in Iraq." Reports that "a last-ditch round of negotiations by G-8 officials over the weekend would result in an accord in some way recognizing the science behind global warming were bolstered by French President Jacques Chirac, who said on Sunday that the G-8 leaders were 'heading toward an agreement.'" But Bush "was cautious. Environmental experts said that, rather than risk an open rift, the eight nations had decided on an accord offering the barest minimum on global warming."

The New York Times (7/5, Cowell) reports Bush is "generally seen to be at odds with Britain and most other members of the group on accepting the scientific evidence relating to the causes of global warming, and therefore on the need for immediate steps to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases." Bush's remarks "seemed to conflict with a forecast on Sunday by President Jacques Chirac of France that the member countries - the others are Canada, Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia - were 'heading toward an agreement' on global warming." At a news conference "in London on Monday, Sir Michael Jay, Mr. Blair's representative at talks by senior officials in advance of the meeting, said climate change 'was never going to be an easy discussion,' and added, 'There are differences of opinion, particularly about the science.'"

The Washington Times (7/5, Lakely) notes the trip to Europe is President Bush's "fourth journey to the Continent this year -- one of his presidency's few foreign trips during which Iraq and the war on terror will give way to the pleasantries of international diplomacy." The President is "expected to ignore politely Mr. Blair's pleas to join Europe in taking concrete steps to fight global warming, a diplomatic slight against the prime minister."

Mississippi Drought Divides Senate Appropriations Committee Members. The Washington Post (7/5, Murray) reports a severe drought, "now in its seventh year, is wreaking havoc up and down the Missouri, from the river's headwaters at Three Forks, Mont., to its confluence with the Mississippi River near St. Louis. One big casualty: a commercial shipping tradition that dates to Lewis and Clark." What the Missouri "needs most is a deluge of melted snow and rain, but Mother Nature is not cooperating. Absent that, the Senate Appropriations Committee is trying to alleviate the problem -- but members are badly split over what to do." Nearly "a third of the 28 committee members represent states that border the Missouri or have an economic stake in it, and they fall into two camps with very different interests: upstream and downstream." Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) "and two fellow upstreamers, Sens. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), want to retain more water in the upper Midwest reservoirs that were built after the Depression to control flooding and improve navigation." Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) "leads a downstream faction that also includes Sens. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and Tom Harkin (D-Iowa). They argue that holding more water in the reservoirs would end commercial navigation on the Missouri, jeopardize operations at 18 power plants and hinder shipping on the Mississippi -- one of the country's most important transportation corridors." The Mississippi angle "broadens the downstream coalition to include Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.); Mitch McConnell (Ky.), the No. 2 Republican in the Senate; and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.)."

House Legislation Would Lessen Government's Duty To Protect Species. The New York Times (7/4, Barringer) says that "Republican critics of the Endangered Species Act in Congress have drafted legislation hedging the government's obligation to take all necessary steps to bring back to robust health any species on the brink of extinction." The legislation "envisions more limited government obligations: ensuring that the status of an endangered plant or animal gets no worse and helping to make it better." Jamie Clark, the executive vice president of Defenders of Wildlife, said the draft measure "'takes a wrecking ball to the whole Endangered Species Act' by changing its mission, disabling enforcement tools and loosening controls on agencies like the Forest Service and the Army Corps of Engineers." Jim Sims, the executive vice president of Partnership for the West, counters that "the draft has a 'common-sense' emphasis on incremental improvements that are achievable, rather than on long-term recovery that may take decades."

Administration Accused Of Trying To Subvert Endangered Species Act. The New York Times (7/5) editorializes, "The Endangered Species Act of 1973 is far and away the most controversial of all the landmark environmental statutes…especially…among those libertarians and property owners who think that commercial development is unduly restricted by the mandate to protect not only plants and animals, but also the habitats essential to their survival. The law is up for reauthorization again this year, and the pressures to weaken it are great. There are ways to streamline the law and make it less litigious that would not come at the expense of its core values and purpose. Regrettably, the Bush administration is not waiting for this debate to take place. Since the day they took office, Bush officials have tried to subvert the law administratively and in the courts."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

National Association Of Counties Survey Finds Meth Number One Illegal Drug Problem. USA Today (7/5, Leinwand) reports, "Methamphetamine is a bigger problem than cocaine, marijuana or heroin for most communities, according to a survey of law enforcement agencies in 500 counties in 45 states by the National Association of Counties. The survey, to be released today by the national group that represents county commissioners, supervisors and other top county officials, finds that methamphetamine is: The No. 1 illegal drug problem in the view of law enforcement agencies in 58% of the counties surveyed. Fewer than 20% see pot as the top problem. Behind an increase in other crimes. Agencies in 70% of the counties said the drug is driving up the number of robberies and burglaries. Seen as the top drug problem in every area of the country except the Northeast. There, law enforcement agencies consider heroin the No. 1 problem, ahead of pot, methamphetamine and cocaine. … The survey highlights a difference between what many local officials say is the biggest drug problem and where the federal government has targeted its prevention and eradication efforts." The association says in its survey, "On the national level, the federal government still considers marijuana as the No. 1 drug problem in America, but county law enforcement officials have a different perspective on this ranking." USA Today adds, "Congress is considering restricting the nationwide sale of products that contain the drug pseudoephedrine." ONDCP policy analyst David Murray said that "the Bush administration is developing a national response to the meth problem." However, he said, "the administration cannot neglect other drugs in the process." Murray said that "federal agencies, including the [DEA], are working to disrupt the supply of chemicals needed to make methamphetamine and stop the smugglers who carry it from Mexico and Canada." He said that "marijuana remains a top priority because it is the most commonly used illegal drug, with 15 million users, compared with about 1 million meth users." Murray said, "We do have to keep all drug threats in context, which means you cannot ignore marijuana."

"Colombianization Of Mexico" Now Becoming Reality With Increase In Drug-Related Violence. Newsweek (7/11, Contreras) reports, "The rising tide of lawlessness has stoked fears that a narcostate, where organized crime holds sway over Mexico's political elites, might one day emerge on the southern border of the United States." Ted Galen Carpenter, a defense and foreign-policy expert at the right-wing Cato Institute in Washington, said, "There are growing signs that the Colombianization of Mexico is now becoming a reality. If a similar process takes place in Mexico, it's going to be 10 times worse than in Colombia because Mexico is locked into the US economically to a much greater degree." Newsweek adds, "Officials on both sides of the US-Mexican border dismiss such warnings as overblown. Mexico's Attorney General Daniel Cabeza de Vaca told the newspaper El Universal last month that the country's drug cartels represented no immediate threat to national security, and in its latest annual report on the international narcotics trade the US State Department gave the Fox government high marks for 'its intensive counternarcotics and law enforcement effort.' If anything, say some US officials, the current turf wars between dueling cartels in a number of Mexican border states erupted in response to the vacuum created by the Fox government's arrest of two major kingpins in 2002 and 2003. Parallels with Colombia, where both leftist guerrillas and right-wing militias are also engaged in drug trafficking, do not bear close scrutiny in their judgment." Mike Braun, chief of operations for the DEA, said, "In Mexico you don't have insurgent groups or terrorist organizations that are involved in virtually every aspect of drug trafficking. We're getting greater cooperation from the Fox administration than from any previous Mexican government I know of." Newsweek notes, "The menace haunting the country's present and future stability starts with the letter C, but it's spelled 'corruption,' not 'Colombia.' Law enforcement is a notoriously low-paying career in Mexico, and an entry-level cop in a midsize city's police department makes as little as $135 a month. Confronted with a druglord's stark choice of plomo o plata (lead or money), many if not most Mexican policemen on the lower rungs of their agencies will opt for the bribe." Bruan added, "We're fine with respect to law enforcement at the central-government level, but the farther you get from the seat of power, the more problematic things can become in a place like Mexico."

The New York Times (7/5, Thompson) reports, "Killings and kidnappings happen almost every day in the city of Nuevo Laredo, about 150 miles north of this small town. Matamoros is quiet in comparison. The most common crime here these days, the police say, is robbery. But as recently as three years ago, this, too, was a capital of the drug war. People on the street said they are afraid that it could become one again. And here, like Colombia, society's first line of defense against the chaos -- the municipal police -- has proved to be its weakest." Anthony P. Placido, the acting assistant administrator for intelligence at the DEA, in a recent appearance before Congress, said, "Law enforcement in Mexico is all too often part of the problem rather than part of the solution. This is particularly true at the municipal and state levels of government." The Times adds, "Interviews with four municipal police officers in this city of 500,000 people across the Rio Grande from Brownsville, Tex., offer a glimpse inside a reality as harsh and persistent as Mexico's blazing summer sun. The officers -- a shift commander, two squad leaders and a recent graduate of the police academy -- were chosen by the minister of public security, Rubén González Chapa, to be interviewed for this article. … Not one of the officers denied that there were abuses and corruption in their ranks. They described officers taking bribes from drunks and prostitutes and accepting gifts from businessmen and residents for providing extra surveillance around their properties." The Times notes, "When asked, however, about the more egregious accusations by Mexican and United States officials that municipal police often serve as lookouts and hit men for the drug traffickers, the officers typically retreated into vague generalities. What they offered instead of the ugly details about police misdeeds was a look at where the abuses are born, describing a place sorely lacking incentives, not to mention basic equipment to uphold the law, and filled with humiliations that left many officers feeling loyal to no one but themselves. Money was the officers' biggest complaint."

Case Of Mistaken Identity Made In Arrest Of Suspected Juarez Drug Cartel Leader. The Los Angles Times (7/5, Dickerson) reports, "Mexican authorities said Monday that they thought they had arrested the leader of the Juarez drug cartel, but later said tests showed it was a case of mistaken identity. The determination that the detained man was not Vicente Carrillo Fuentes dashed hopes of a rare instance of good news for Mexico's anti-narcotics forces amid an upsurge of violence. It was also the second high-profile error in the last two weeks. In June, Mexican federal authorities detained a British citizen of Lebanese descent on suspicion that he was connected to terrorist organizations behind the Sept. 11 attacks. But that suspect, Amer Haykel, turned out to be simply a tourist."

The Dallas Morning News (7/5, Eaton, Corchado) reports, "Mexican authorities on Monday said they thought they had captured Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, one of the country's most wanted drug lords. But by the day's end, they had reversed course, calling it a case of mistaken identity. Agents had quietly arrested their subject on Saturday at Perisur, a Mexico City shopping center. He identified himself as Joaquín Romero Aparicio, but Mexican officials were almost sure that DNA tests would reveal his criminal identity." Presidential spokesman Rubén Aguilar said, "Right now, it is likely Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, but it isn't completely confirmed." The Morning News adds, "Vicente Carrillo Fuentes Earlier Monday, the prospect that Mr. Carrillo Fuentes, 42, had been arrested excited law enforcement officials and journalists on both sides of the US-Mexico border. Mr. Carrillo Fuentes and his lieutenants allegedly ordered the murders of dozens of US citizens and hundreds of Mexicans during a decade years-long reign of terror, American authorities say. The State Department had offered a reward of up to $5 million for information leading to the arrest or conviction of Mr. Carrillo Fuentes, suspected of leading the Juárez cartel."

The San Antonio Express-News (7/5, Schiller) reports, "A spokesman for President Vicente Fox said Monday officers believe they have captured Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, who is accused of running the powerful Juárez cartel. … But the arrested man's family and media reports late Monday night indicated it was a case of mistaken identity. DNA and fingerprint analyses were being conducted on the man, who was arrested Saturday at an upscale shopping center in the capital, spokesman Rúben Aguilar said. 'We have to prove that this is the guy,' he said. The Express-News adds, "Televisa network raised doubt by interviewing family members who said Romero is an architect and loving father who has nothing to do with drug trafficking. Televisa also showed a picture of Romero in which he appeared to look like a photo taken of Carrillo Fuentes. The network suggested the similarity of the two pictures -- and little other evidence -- prompted the arrest. Federal investigators could not be reached to comment on Televisa's assertions." Reuters (7/5, Bremer) and the AP (7/5, Lee) also reported this story.

Results Of Mexico's Stepped-Up Drug War Questioned. The Dallas Morning News (7/5, Samuels, Iliff) reports, "Mexico finally is fighting the war on drugs that the US government has demanded for decades: a frontal assault on drug barons, their organizations and their merchandise, using the police and military in concert with US intelligence. The results, Mexican and US authorities say, have been impressive. Forty-six thousand people jailed on drug charges, President Vicente Fox said in a recent speech, 97 tons of cocaine seized, more than a million marijuana plants destroyed. It's been four years, Mr. Fox and US officials said, of steady progress." The Morning News adds, "But a rising chorus of voices in Mexico and the US says the real results are record levels of violence, instability and corruption in Mexico, resurgent drug cartels, nearly 200 dead police officers and soldiers, along with millions of wasted dollars in a country where half the population of 105 million is poor. Mexico receives almost no aid from the US government. And the result in the US? No noticeable drop in the supply of cheap drugs – and an actual decline in the price of cocaine, according to a new UN report. Some analysts say Mexico's approach has not only failed to stanch the flow of drugs but is also destabilizing the young democracy. Mexico needs to turn back now, they say." Dave Murray, a policy analyst with the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said that "Washington understands the sacrifice being made by Mexico, but that it also is in Mexico's interest to fight the traffickers vigorously." Murray said, "It's been a horrendous fight for them. We have to salute their willingness to take on this fight." Murray added, "If drugs transit through your country and you think, 'Well it's just for those norteamericanos. The money comes to us, the drugs to them. What's the problem?' They soon discover drugs are left behind as payment in kind for services provided. And local traffickers soon become drug dealers. And to whom do they sell? To local kids. … The problems will become worse and worse as narcotraffickers corrode the system... and you will find them growing into a power within the nation that can actually threaten the legitimacy and viability of democratic governments." But that, critics say, is "just what is happening now with the stepped-up war."

"El Chapo" Proves To Be A Tough Adversary For Law Enforcement. The San Diego Union-Tribune/Copley News (7/2, Walker) reports, "The arrests in recent years of several drug traffickers – including Gulf cartel leader Cardenas, Tijuana cartel leader Benjamín Arellano Félix and the Amezcua brothers – strengthened other cartel leaders." DEA spokesman Misha Piastro said, "He is very ambitious and very active. He's extremely clever and he's willing to invest the time and money to do big projects." Copley News adds, "A 26-page federal indictment handed down against Guzmán 11 years ago in San Diego accused Guzmán, 51, of trying to ship seven tons of cocaine packed in cans of jalapeño chili peppers across the border at Tecate. The indictment also described a tunnel he ordered built in Otay Mesa, complete with railroad tracks and lighting, and accused him of building another tunnel that ended under a pool table in a Douglas, Ariz., bar. The table was raised and lowered with a hydraulic lift, Piastro said. The US government is offering a $5 million reward for Guzmán's capture, and DEA agents in San Diego staff a 24-hour hotline to collect tips on his whereabouts. Some of the tips that come through the hotline, which can be dialed from almost anywhere in Latin America, are valid. Others prove to be false. One caller reported – erroneously – that Guzmán had been spotted dancing the tango in Los Angeles. But another caller may have been Guzmán himself 'trying to verify that the hotline wasn't set up by his rivals,' Piastro said. 'It wouldn't be out of character for him to do something like that,' Piastro said. 'He's pretty brazen.' Guzmán has proved a tough adversary for Mexican law enforcement. 'We are looking for him everywhere, but it's difficult to determine where he is,' José Luis Santiago Vasconcelos, Mexico's deputy attorney general for organized crime, said during an interview with foreign correspondents earlier this year. 'He's not a subject that we see established in one place, living, defended by a big group of gunmen.'"

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Boudreaux) reports, "Although US officials have repeatedly praised Mexico's anti-drug efforts under President Vicente Fox, including the arrest of 18 cartel leaders over the last four years, Guzman's elusiveness is an embarrassing symbol of the country's failure to stop the bloodshed or slow the flow of cocaine, heroin, marijuana and amphetamines into the United States. 'He is the last of the Mohicans,' said Jorge Chabat, a Mexico City expert on law enforcement issues. 'All the other big cartels have been decapitated. That is why they want him so badly.'" The Times adds, 'US authorities also want to get Shorty, who was indicted in 1995 in San Diego on charges of money laundering and conspiracy to import tons of cocaine. In December, federal authorities offered a $5-million reward for tips leading to his capture and are sharing intelligence with Mexican authorities. Since then, the dragnet has tightened with the arrests in Mexico of Guzman's 21-year-old son, a brother, two nephews and a niece, all accused of aiding his drug business. Nine houses and six vehicles belonging to him and his associates were seized in June. Rival drug traffickers are after him too. They killed another of his brothers and two of his associates in a Mexican prison last year. But so far the heat on Guzman has merely enhanced his mystique as an untouchable outlaw constantly on the move, escorted by 10 armed bodyguards and apparently shielded across Mexico by a web of corrupt officials to whom he once boasted paying a total of $5 million per month."

Nuevo Laredo Residents Trapped In Deadly War Between Rival Drug Cartels. The San Diego Union-Tribune/Copley News (7/2, Walker) reports, "For almost three years, people in this dusty border city of 500,000 have been trapped in a deadly war being waged by two drug cartels for control of the lucrative corridor between Nuevo Laredo and its US sister city, Laredo, Texas. One of the cartels is led by Joaquin 'El Chapo' Guzmán. … The other is headed by Osiel Cárdenas. … The two drug kingpins are vying for control of the most important commercial crossing between the United States and Mexico, according to law enforcement officials on both sides of the border. Roughly 9,000 tractor-trailers rumble over Nuevo Laredo's World Trade Bridge into the United States each day, accounting for almost 50 percent of the U.S.-Mexico commercial border traffic. The volume of truck traffic is so overwhelming that, US officials acknowledge, truckloads of narcotics slip through undetected. The violence has escalated in recent months as the cartels struggle to control this gateway into the United States."

Nuevo Laredo Families Desperate For Information About "Los Des-Aparecidos." The Houston Chronicle (7/4, Pinkerton) reports, "Nancy Segovia, an anxious 20-year-old wife and mother, searches for a husband who did not return from his job as a Nuevo Laredo policeman three weeks ago. Two Laredo men, William Slemaker, 52, and Pablo Cisneros, 49, search for their daughters, who vanished 10 months ago while visiting this violence-torn border city. Last week, the three stood in 100-degree-plus temperatures outside a Mexican military base, trying to learn whether their loved ones were among the 44 people rescued by federal agents from two safe houses operated by a drug cartel. The wife and fathers gathered with hundreds of others from both sides of the border, desperate for information about people known as los des- aparecidos, or the missing ones. The rescue operation June 29 raised the hopes of Segovia, Slemaker, Cisneros and many others looking for relatives who vanished, with no ransom demands, during a three-year turf war between rival drug cartels. Each was disappointed." The Chronicle adds, "In Nuevo Laredo, the faces of the missing stare out from homemade posters attached to street lights, taped to doorways of police stations or printed in newspaper ads. In a city that has seen more than 70 killings linked to the drug war so far this year, the missing are largely unknown to the public, and the local police seem to have done little to find them."

Mexican Authorities Abruptly End Search For Human Remains At Remote Ranch House Near Nuevo Laredo. The San Antonio Express-News (7/3, Zarazua) reports, "Federal police abruptly ended their search for human remains Saturday morning at a remote ranch house on the edge of town here, leaving the property without saying what, if anything, they'd found. All that was left inside the compound's cinderblock walls were piles of disturbed earth and a broken black metal gate. A small contingent of Mexican military troops remained outside the beige-colored compound this morning, but the troops leader said they were on 'routine patrol.' On Friday, an FBI spokesman said US agents who had been on the scene earlier this week believed the bones that had been found were those of animals. The FBI has since not returned here. The headline in one of today's afternoon dailies in Nuevo Laredo screamed 'NADA AUN,' or 'Nothing Yet.' Federal police spent all day Friday digging the patio of the ranch house in the sweltering heat in search of human remains believed to have been buried there by drug cartel hit men. The ranch house is about nine miles south of the Texas-Mexico border near the Nuevo Laredo highway leading to Monterrey."

Drug-Fueled Corruption Alleged In Highest Levels Of Venezuela's Security Forces. The Miami Herald (7/4, Dudley, Gunson) reports, "In [Bejuma, Venezuela], people still talk about the 'Bejuma massacre' in a whisper, partly because one man who spoke out is in a grave, partly because the killers were allegedly policemen. But the source of the fear can be summed up in a single word: drug trafficking, on the kind of massive level and involving corrupt government officials that has long been a profound problem in neighboring Colombia. Drug seizures in Venezuela doubled in the past four years. There are mounting allegations of drug-fueled corruption at the highest levels of the security forces, accompanied by what appears to be official indifference. Just last month, a suspected Colombian trafficker wanted in the United States escaped from a Venezuelan police lockup after allegedly bribing his guards." The Herald adds, "The rising drug trafficking has become yet another sore point in relations between the Bush administration and Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, a fiery populist who has repeatedly accused the US government of trying to topple him. 'There are a few people who see [drugs] as a global problem, but those people are few and far between,' said one Western counter-drug official who asked for anonymity because he did not have official permission to speak publicly on the topic. Venezuela has long been a transit country for illegal Colombian drugs. But record seizures in 2004 that reached 32 tons of cocaine and 12 tons of heroin and marijuana put authorities on the alert."

US Envoy Sees Decline In Venezuelan Cooperation In Effort To Fight Terrorism, Drug Trafficking. The AP (7/4) reports, "A decline in cooperation between Venezuelan and U.S. authorities has weakened efforts to fight terrorism and drug trafficking, the US. ambassador to the South American country said." US Ambassador William Brownfield said in an interview broadcast Sunday on the Venezuelan television station Televen, "On the issue of illegal drugs, we have a situation where we have a reduction in cooperation between some police forces. I wish we could have more cooperation in passing along more information on matters of terrorism, the movement of specific people."

Reuters (7/4) reports, "Cooperation between Venezuela and the United States to fight terrorism and drug-trafficking has run into problems and could be improved, the U.S. ambassador to Caracas said on Sunday. William Brownfield said 'complicated problems' had emerged in the relationship between Venezuela, the world's No. 5 oil exporter, and its biggest energy client, the United States."

FBI, ATF Investigating Suspicious Fire At Florida Abortion Clinic This Morning. WPTV-TV West Palm Beach (7/5) reports on its Web site, "Agents from the FBI have joined investigators from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms this morning at the scene of a late night fire at the Presidential Women's clinic in West Palm Beach. The origin of the fire at the clinic which performs abortions appears to be suspicious. There were no injuries . West Palm Beach mayor Lois Frankel will issue a statement this morning as investigators and firefighters remain on the scene."

WPost Criticizes House's DC Gun Vote. The Washington Post (7/4) editorializes that a majority of the U.S. House of Representatives trampled "upon the right of self-determination" by overturning a city law and voting "to allow D.C. residents to keep in their homes loaded shotguns and rifles, as well as handguns bought before 1976, unbounded by trigger locks or disassembled. The deed itself makes a mockery of Congress as a federal body. If the action is allowed to stand, however, the consequences could be even worse: The nation's capital will become a deadlier place in which to live." The Post says "the notion of Congress encouraging citizens in the nation's capital to keep loaded and unprotected guns in their homes borders on insanity."

TAX:

Tax Court Procedure Called Into Question During Attorney's Fraud Trial. The National Law Journal (7/5, Coyle) reports, "A seven-year-old secret report by a special trial judge of the U.S. Tax Court in the lengthy and complex fraud trial of a renowned tax lawyer and his business partners found no fraud -- not even a suspicion of fraud -- by the three men, despite a subsequent Tax Court decision to the contrary." The Journal continues, "The conflict between the original report and the Tax Court decision has prompted some to raise ethical questions about Tax Court procedures and to call on Congress to examine them. … The Tax Court recently released the report after the U.S. Supreme Court held earlier this year that 'no statute authorizes, and the current text of [Tax Court] Rule 183 does not warrant,' the concealment of special trial judge reports by the Tax Court." The Journal adds, "The Supreme Court ruling -- Ballard v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, No. 03-184, and Estate of Kanter v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, No. 03-1034 -- followed years of litigation over the report in three federal circuits by lawyers for estate and tax attorney Burton W. Kanter and his business partners Claude Ballard and Robert Lisle, all of whom believed the report would exonerate them. … Special Trial Judge D. Irwin Couvillion oversaw the five-week trial in 1994 in which the government charged Kanter, Ballard and Lisle with $30 million in tax deficiencies and civil fraud penalties in three alleged kickback schemes. In his 300-page report, produced four years later, Couvillion, who did not have authority to issue the Tax Court's final decision, said the court 'cannot find or conclude' that the claimed kickback schemes existed or, if they did exist, that there was tax fraud in connection with them."

NYTimes Calls For Repeal Of Internet Sales Tax Exemption. The New York Times (7/5) editorializes, "Thirteen years is a long time to get a pass. A 1992 Supreme Court decision has exempted Internet retailers from the obligation to collect most sales taxes on the grounds that it would be unduly burdensome. Back then, the country's thousands of state and local taxing jurisdictions all had differing rules. But times have changed, and the law of the land should, too. … Online sales-tax collection can be done nationwide. Many retailers already collect the taxes. Now Congress should step up and pass a law overturning the court's exemption in states that have streamlined their tax systems. That would allow hard-pressed states to take in roughly $20 billion a year in annual sales tax revenue that is rightfully theirs, and perhaps much more, depending on the growth in online shopping. It would also help level the playing field between local and online retailers."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Speculation Grows About Possible Gonzales Nomination To Supreme Court. As Attorney General Alberto Gonzales visited Iraq over the weekend, speculation ran rampant that President Bush was considering him as a replacement for Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her retirement on Friday. So far, opposition to Gonzales has come from the GOP's evangelical conservative base, which is wary of the Attorney General because of rulings on abortion he made as a state Supreme Court justice in Texas. Both CBS and NBC ran full segments on the possibility of a Gonzales nomination, while ABC noted his trip to Iraq.

The AP (7/4, Sherman) reports Gonzales "deflected questions about his interest in serving on the Supreme Court and said Sunday that criticism about his conservative credentials did not bother him. 'Many of the people speaking probably don't have all the information about prospective nominees. What's important is what the president of the United States thinks about me,' Gonzales told reporters while flying to the Middle East."

The Washington Post (7/4, A1, Eggen) reports that in an interview with The Washington Post on his way to Iraq, "Gonzales said he would continue to be directly involved in making recommendations to President Bush for a possible successor to retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But Gonzales, a close friend and longtime confidant to Bush, declined to comment on his own chances or interest in the post. 'There will be a group of people who will share their thoughts with the president about a nominee, and obviously I am part of those discussions,' Gonzales said. 'But I'm not going to talk about the details of those discussions or the recommendations or anything like that...I think the president is going to be deliberative in his decision.'" Although Bush "may 'take some time' to make a final call, Gonzales added," the President "is adamant that a new justice be confirmed by October."

The CBS Evening News (7/3, lead story, 2:25, Guida) reported the "conservative base is already feeding President Bush plenty about one possible pick, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and it's not a spoonful of sugar. The right wing questions his stance on abortion, trying to derail any Gonzales bandwagon before it gets rolling." Some conservative groups "are already lining up against Gonzales." Jay Sekulow, American Center for Law & Justice: "There is concern on the right. There is no doubt about it. There's not a lot of enthusiasm." Guida: "But Senator Arlen Specter, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee that will review the nominee, suggested conservatives should hold their fire."

Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (7/3, Mitchell) to comment on conservative opposition to Gonzales, Specter said, "My reaction is that people ought to hold their fire and stand back and realize that it's President George W. Bush who was elected with the constitutional authority to make the designations. … I think the conservatives are entitled to express themselves, but I think they ought to have some respect for the president. And Attorney General Gonzales is a very well-qualified man, and I don't think he really deserved to be criticized." Reuters (7/4, Elsner) reports Hatch said on CBS' "Face The Nation" he "had spoken to Bush on Saturday and expected a nominee within a couple of days after Bush's return."

Sekulow said on CBS' Face the Nation (7/3, Roberts), "You know, it's interesting. We have the vacancy of Justice O'Connor, and at the same time, the court is taking one major life case involving parental notification. Alberto Gonzales, when he was a judge in the Texas Supreme Court, dealt with that issue, came out on the other side of it, where the conservative groups are. So there's some concern. There's also the issue of, he's the attorney general of the United States. He's doing a fantastic job, by the way. He was a great White House counsel, too. You're in the middle of a war on terror. … And the idea that we're going to switch the attorney general out in the middle of that, I find to be timing not particularly great."

NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 4, 2:10, Seigenthaler) said "some of the President's most conservative supporters don't want Gonzales at all." Conservatives "are putting pressure on Bush, saying Gonzales can't be trusted. But an advisor with close ties to the White House says that's only speculation." C. Boyden Gray, Committee for Justice: "If the President wants to nominate Judge Gonzales, he will. I don't think he's going to be constrained by these interest groups."

Gray was asked on Fox News Sunday (7/3, Wallace) to respond to Sunday's New York Times story that claimed he led a delegation to the White House warning President Bush not to nominate Attorney General Gonzales; Gray replied, "That was news to me. I don't think we discussed any individuals in that meeting, which was about process, not about people. And I would, of course, support Judge Gonzales if he were nominated. So I don't know where the story came from. … If the president wants to nominate him, he will, and he will be confirmed."

Sen. Orrin Hatch, asked on CBS' Face the Nation (7/3, Roberts) for his views on the potential nomination of Gonzales, said, "Let me just say this, I think that's pure bunk. Gonzales is a terrific human being, a good lawyer, a person who has more than shown that he's a good human being and a person who could handle the job. If the president chooses Alberto Gonzales, I think Alberto Gonzales will do the job, do it well. And I think we would all feel pretty good about it." But "some of the right-wing groups, of course, are trying to push the president into getting the most conservative person that they can get. And they don't consider Judge Gonzales to be as conservative as some of the others. But I can tell you, he's a person of integrity and a person of ability, a person with good temperance, you know, temperancy. He's a very fine man. And if he gets picked, I'm certainly going to support him."

In as preview of the upcoming Senate battle, the Los Angeles Times (7/4, Brownstein, Schmitt) reports that senators from both parties "jostled Sunday to define the rules of engagement in the political struggle…Bush's first Supreme Court nomination." In appearances across all the Sunday talk shows, "members of the Senate Judiciary Committee sparred about whether nominees should be asked their views on specific issues such as abortion, whether it was appropriate to apply more scrutiny to nominees who would change the court's balance of power, and what the circumstances, if any, might be that would justify a filibuster against Bush's eventual choice."

The New York Times (7/4, Hulse, Nagourney) reports "White House officials were privately encouraging lawmakers not to get drawn into speculation over candidates' names but to concentrate on calling for quick and fair consideration of whomever President Bush nominates. … Democrats called for a deliberate review of any nominee and pledged to press the eventual candidate on issues including abortion and same-sex marriage, while Republicans declared that such specific inquiries were out of line."

The AP (7/4, Yost) reports that "asked whether he would support a filibuster if a hard-liner is chosen, the judiciary committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick Leahy, said, 'I would hope that we don't reach that point.' 'That's why we're going to meet with the president in about a week, going to urge that he put somebody who would unite the country, not divide the country,' said Leahy."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (7/4, O'Rourke) says "the top Republican and Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee appealed for restraint, at least until President Bush announces his choice in a week or so. 'We ought to tone down the rhetoric,'" said Specter. Leahy added, "Let's take it easy."

Sen. Joseph Biden, appearing on CBS' Face the Nation (7/3, Roberts), said, "I was chairman at the time of Bork and Thomas. And it is true, I did allow both to go out without recommendation. … I could have stopped each of them from getting a vote in the full Senate. But I didn't let them out because I believed that a filibuster was wrong. I let them out because I believe the Constitution says the Senate…must decide whether or not to let a vote occur, not a committee. … I have no intention of filibustering anybody. It depends on who the president sends. But I could see a circumstance. For example, if he sent up" Judge Janice Rogers Brown "I can assure you, that would be a very, very, very difficult fight, and she probably would be filibustered."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/4, Mcgough) reports, "In the sort of 'gotcha' moment that has become common on Sunday television talk shows, George Stephanopoulos, the host of ABC's 'This Week,' yesterday confronted Sen. Edward Kennedy with Kennedy's own words from the 1967 debate over the confirmation of Thurgood Marshall for a seat on the US Supreme Court." Stephanopoulos "noted that Kennedy had told his colleagues that they shouldn't take Marshall's judicial philosophy into account but instead should limit their inquiry to the nominee's 'background, experience qualifications and temperament.'"

The New York Times (7/4, Kirkpatrick) reports "Bork, the former Supreme Court nominee whose rejection 18 years ago has hovered over every confirmation since, is back in the spotlight. … Defending the Senate's role in approving nominees, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, reprised in an appearance on ABC the speech he made attacking Mr. Bork shortly after his nomination. 'Can we imagine what this country would be like today if Judge Bork had gone onto the Supreme Court with his views about civil rights and other issues?' he said. 'It would be an entirely different America.'" Since then, however, "Bork has become an inspiration to many conservatives, who say they have organized and raised money to support the nomination of like-minded jurists."

Sen. Ted Kennedy writes in today's Washington Post (7/4, A17) that "the president should reject the pressure of the extreme factions of his party that want litmus tests for his nominee. This process shouldn't just be about whether the next justice would help roll back women's rights by overturning Roe v. Wade , the law of the land. It should be about something much more basic: protecting our core constitutional values for generations to come, the freedoms that we've fought for, bled for and died for. … I haven't always agreed with O'Connor. I didn't agree earlier this year that we should continue to execute juveniles. And I certainly didn't agree with her in Bush v. Gore." But "she was fair and tried to interpret the law. Unfortunately, many of those whom President Bush has nominated to the lower courts in the past four years have wanted to remake the law to suit their own ideologies . I hope the president will consult with the Senate and select a consensus nominee as dedicated to the Constitution as Sandra Day O'Connor."

The Washington Times (7/4, A1, Hurt) quotes Sen. Chuck Schumer saying, "I think the number one thing that I am interested in are the nominee's views." The notion of "picking apart a nominee to the federal bench based on his personal opinions about political matters is out of bounds, conservatives say. 'It's asking them to basically run on a political platform,' Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, responded to Mr. Schumer yesterday."

The New York Times (7/4, Deutsch) asks whether "now that Justice O'Connor is leaving the court…the pendulum swing back to give employers the right to hire and fire as they please, or even encourage them to dismantle voluntary affirmative action programs." Neither "business leaders nor minority advocates," says the Times, "expect that to happen. Minorities and women, they note, make up an increasingly large part of the potential work force -- and of the consumer base."

The Washington Post (7/4, A15, Lane) says in its "Full Court Press" column that while "O'Connor and her centrist legacy may have been at the center of attention because of her surprise retirement announcement Friday, the center of power during the term was one chair to her left, where Justice Anthony M. Kennedy -- the court's other center-right swing voter -- sits." In three "crucial cases" this term, Kennedy, "a 1988 appointee of President Ronald Reagan, defected from the five-member right-of-center bloc that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist nominally leads." Kennedy "joined with the court's liberals to abolish the death penalty for juvenile offenders, to give local governments a green light to take private property for economic development and to endorse a broad theory of federal regulatory power that denied states the right to override a federal law against homegrown medical marijuana."

The New York Times (7/4, Greenhouse) adds that in this last term, "the court displayed a growing concern about the death penalty, with the majority suggesting that lower courts had taken the Supreme Court's impatience with prolonged appeals too far toward short-circuiting defendants' rights. The justices also gave broad interpretations to three federal antidiscrimination laws." Justice Stephen G. Breyer, adds the Times, "displaced…O'Connor at the court's center of gravity, casting the fewest dissenting votes." The AP (7/4, Holland) runs a similar story, saying "the power broker at the Supreme Court this term was the 'junior justice,' Stephen Breyer."

The Legal Times (7/4, Goldman) reports, "Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's surprise retirement leaves President George W. Bush in a bind: Can he possibly replace the first woman on the Supreme Court with a white male? … After all, prior to O'Connor's July 1 announcement, most of the smart money for a potential high court nominee was on middle-aged white judges such as John Roberts of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit and J. Michael Luttig of the 4th Circuit. But that was to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who, at least for the moment, is staying. … 'Do you replace O'Connor with a woman, or with a Hispanic, so you have a new first?' says American University law professor Stephen Wermiel. 'The question is, who are you trying to appease? And are you looking for a fight — or looking to avoid a fight?'" The Times adds, "Competing interest groups lost no time in laying down markers, and rallying their troops. Hispanic activists, for one, and their interest groups say the opportunity is ripe for Bush to name the nation's first Hispanic justice. Nominating a Hispanic would also help the Republican Party woo a key and growing constituency that it has actively courted. … But the person some see as the leading Hispanic candidate, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, is viewed as flatly unacceptable by the hard-line conservative and evangelical groups that take credit for Bush's presidential re-election victory. … 'He's not an ideological conservative; it's not a world he comes from,' notes one senior Republican Senate staffer. "And we don't believe he has convictions he will stand by. As one former Supreme Court clerk said to me, 'When the most charming man in Washington, [Justice] Stephen Breyer, comes calling, will Gonzales stand up for his beliefs?' … That may make someone like Judge Emilio Garza of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit a more likely candidate. Garza is viewed as a passionate opponent of Roe v. Wade. And if the White House seeks a minority candidate, but not a Hispanic one, it could turn to former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, now general counsel of PepsiCo."

In a column for the Weekly Standard (7/4), Fred Barnes writes, "Through a campaign aide, Bush answered a question about the kind of Supreme Court justice he admired. The answer was Antonin Scalia, a conservative. That was in 1999, as Bush was beginning his race for the presidency. He was asked a similar question later that year by Tim Russert on Meet the Press. The answer was the same--Scalia. Now jump to the summer of 2003 as Bush is preparing for his reelection campaign. Meeting with advisers at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, Bush said one of his top priorities is to create a diverse Republican party with many more Hispanics." Barnes continues, "Bush's comments point to the two directions he must choose between in selecting a nominee to replace Sandra Day O'Connor on the Supreme Court. The first--the Scalia direction--would be to pick a respected conservative jurist and thus move the ideological tilt of the court to the right. The second would be to choose Attorney General Alberto Gonzales or another Hispanic, a step unlikely to change the court's current ideological posture." Barnes adds, "The first would be in sync with the thrust of Bush's presidency. As Bush and his aides never tire of telling everyone, he came to the White House to do big things and achieve important changes. And transforming the Supreme Court into a more conservative body and shrinking the role of unelected judges in American life is one of his major goals. … Nominating a full-blown judicial conservative--there are plenty to choose from--would surely provoke a bitter confirmation struggle in the Senate. He might even lose the fight. But all of Bush's accomplishments have come over the strong opposition of Democrats or have drawn sharp criticism from them. This includes tax cuts, education reform, creation of a Homeland Security Department, and Iraq. Bush's motto, if he had one, should be no pain, no gain. … Naming Gonzales or another Hispanic to the high court would be in line with Bush's political goal of enlarging the Republican party. And picking Gonzales might indeed help in that regard. He would be the first Hispanic justice. A Gonzales nomination would also be personally satisfying to Bush. 'The president loves Alberto Gonzales and trusts him,' Texas Senator John Cornyn, a friend of both, said. Gonzales was Bush's White House counsel before becoming attorney general. … But there's a difference between trying to improve the position of a political party and seizing an historic opportunity to change both the role and the rulings of the federal judiciary. The first is a decision any president or politician would make. Given the furor the second could provoke, it's a decision only a few presidents would make. My guess is Bush is one of them."

Bush Defends Gonzales, Discusses O'Connor Vacancy. In a telephone interview with USA Today (7/5, Keen), President Bush "said Monday that special-interest groups running TV ads and mobilizing supporters for a fight over his choice of a successor to Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor should 'tone down the heated rhetoric.'" In addition, he "forcefully defended Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a prospect criticized by conservatives." Conservative groups, says USA Today, "have criticized Gonzales, who, as a member of the Texas Supreme Court, backed exceptions to a state law requiring teenagers to notify a parent before getting an abortion." Bush also "said he won't rush a decision but wants her successor to be on the bench when the Supreme Court resumes work in October."

USA Today (7/5) prints the transcript of the interview in today's edition. Bush said, "My call to the senators who will be leading the debate on either side is to help elevate this rhetoric so that the country will take a prideful look at the process, recognize there will be differences of opinion but that we can step back after it's over and say, 'That's the way we ought to conduct a debate on something as serious as a Supreme Court nominee.'" Asked if "the attacks on Gonzales are out of line," the President answered, "Al Gonzales is a great friend of mine. I'm the kind of person, when a friend gets attacked, I don't like it. We're lucky to have him as the attorney general, and I'm lucky to have him as a friend." He later said, "I'm considering a pretty good-sized group of people right now, and of course, there's a diverse group of citizens."

USA Today also quotes Bush saying, "I have reached out to members of the Senate and will continue to do so. And then there will be a period of time in which I myself will sit down with the prospective nominees. But I was very serious when I said we need to have this person on the bench prior to the beginning of the next session." However, says the Wall Street Journal (7/5, McKinnon, Cooper), "Bush's track record -- and a nearly unbroken record of presidential precedent -- suggest that in the end, lawmakers will have little say in whom the president nominates." The White House "made much of Mr. Bush's conversation last week with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, when the two men discussed potential nominees to the Supreme Court shortly before Justice O'Connor's retirement was announced," but "neither the Bush White House's operating style nor historical precedent suggests that those conversations will have much effect."

The O'Connor vacancy received extensive media coverage last night and this morning. Media stories indicate Christian Evangelicals are determined to see President Bush choose a Supreme Court nominee who supports their positions on issues as abortion, church-state cases, gay rights, and affirmative action. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 6, 2:30, Gibson) reported O'Connor's decision "to retire set off a weekend of intense preparation, by those who want to influence who will replace her. And among the places where the campaign to enlist support was strong, were at conservative Christian churches." ABC (Tapper) added, "Bush's dilemma is to find a nominee with appeal to the mainstream while also satisfying the Republican base of Christian conservatives, who clearly have expectations." Many of their leaders "worry the most prominent candidate for the court, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, is not as conservative on some of these social issues as are others on the court."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 5, 2:10, O'Donnell) reported White House advisors say aides "have been preparing special files on potential Supreme Court nominees for the President to review aboard Air Force One." Bush's "conservative base flatly does not want a repeat" of the moderate O'Connor. Lanier Swann, Concerned Women for America: "What we would like to see is a jurist who is not a swing vote. We don't want to be surprised by his opinion."

O'Donnell: "Democrats just as firm on the need for a moderate." But there may be "early agreement against one potential choice", Attorney General Gonzales. The "right fears Gonzales's position on abortion. The left worries about his role in writing policy on the treatment of war prisoners."

On CNN's Inside Politics (7/11), analyst William Schneider said "the new vacancy gives conservatives a shot at turning the majority on the court against abortion. They don't want to risk it with another stealth nominee, like [David] Souter, so they've begun to rally against Gonzales, even though there's no clear indication Bush will nominate him." Likewise, the Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Feldmann) says that "for social conservatives, long active in Republican politics, the moment of truth has finally arrived: a chance to move the US Supreme Court to the right, particularly on abortion, gay rights, and other divisive cultural issues." Turning to the Attorney General's potential nomination, the Monitor says that "while conservative, the genial Gonzales is not seen as a hard-liner. And there's the rub: To social conservatives, he does not represent a reliable vote to overturn Roe v. Wade." The New York Times (7/5, Bumiller, Kirpatrick) also reports "many prominent conservatives are using contacts with the White House to press against a nomination" of the Attorney General.

The New York Times (7/5, Purdum) adds Bush "faces a daunting historical reality: presidents don't always get what they bargain for when they grant even seemingly close allies lifetime tenure on a fiercely independent institution, where the hot-button issues of the future are hard to predict. … It is precisely to guard against such surprises -- and the likes of more recent Republican appointees who have disappointed their party's conservative wing, from the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to David H. Souter and Anthony M. Kennedy -- that many conservatives are now urging Mr. Bush to pick an established jurist or legal scholar with a defined philosophy, clear paper trail and unimpeachable credentials on questions from abortion to property rights."

Reuters (7/5, Whitesides) reports the nomination "creates a maze of political risks for…Bush, with a wrong move either angering his conservative base or igniting a partisan brawl that could sink the rest of his second-term agenda." Analysts, adds Reuters, "say the fight could pollute Washington's already strained atmosphere and turn off middle-of-the-road voters seen as crucial to Republican hopes to expand their majority in the 2006 congressional elections and win the 2008 White House race."

USA Today (7/5, Kiely) runs a similar story under the headline "For Bush, A Lot Riding On Court Appointment," calling Bush's upcoming pick "one of the most momentous decisions of his career." USA Today adds that "the intensity of Bush's commitment to social conservatives' agenda is unclear," and "conservatives and religious activists, whom Bush political adviser Karl Rove identified as being key to the president's re-election, are reminding the president that he owes them." The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Bravin, Cummings) also says "the first stage of the fight…is shaping up as a struggle within the conservative coalition over steering the White House choice. … Evangelical Christians are the most vocal."

The New York Times (7/5, Sanger) considers Bush's decision-process. "If the past is any guide," says the Times, "Mr. Bush will prove vague as he nears a decision. When considering other top appointments or big decisions, he has shown that he is not above sending conflicting signals to mask his intentions, or catering, at least rhetorically, to differing constituencies. And he has not shied from confrontation, as even he alluded to on Friday when, while praising Justice O'Connor, he also announced that his nominee deserved 'fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote.'"

The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Mullins) analyzes the effect of the vacancy on the agenda currently before Congress. The Journal reports that Bob Stevenson, a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "said the confirmation process will have only a 'minimal' effect on the Republican agenda. Indeed, there will be little difference in the pace of action before the Judiciary Committee starts confirmation hearings, likely in September." That "leaves senators with just a month to reach a final deal with the House on highway legislation and to approve the Central American Free Trade Agreement, Mr. Bush's major trade initiative. When confirmation hearings begin, senators will find it more difficult to make progress on their priorities as senators shift attention to the judicial process, and time on the Senate calendar dwindles."

The Washington Post (7/5, Lane) focuses on the vacancy's effect on future decisions. O'Connor's past opinions "show that she would have played a pivotal role" in key issues. Now, "their outcome may hinge on the views of her successor. Learning those views may prove challenging to senators, if a nominee adheres to the practice of not answering questions about matters that are, or soon will be, before the court." Even if O'Connor "were replaced by a conservative opponent of Roe v. Wade , the 1973 ruling recognizing a right to abortion, Roe would still have the support of a five-justice majority. … Still, next term will present O'Connor's successor with a chance to answer important questions about the scope of Roe as well as other precedents." Analyzing the current court, meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (7/5, Bravin) says "the successor to…O'Connor on the Supreme Court will enter an arena increasingly shaped by the competing legal theories of two justices: Antonin Scalia and Stephen Breyer."

The New York Times (7/5, Liptak) and the Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Richey) analyze O'Connor's legacy as the first woman in the Supreme Court,

Many Gonzales Aides Have Conservative Credentials. The Washington Post (7/5, A11, Eggen) reports "at least half a dozen" of Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez's "senior aides also worked under him when he ran the White House counsel's office." Former colleagues "now at Justice include his chief of staff, his deputy chief of staff, two senior counselors and the head of the legal policy office. In addition, the Bush administration's nominee to be Gonzales's second-in-command, Timothy E. Flanigan, also served as his White House deputy." Still, Justice officials are "quick to stress that this group of alumni is part of a broader circle of advisers that Gonzales relies upon, including holdovers from John D. Ashcroft's tenure and new hires who have not worked closely with him in the past." Gonzalez deputy chief of staff D. Kyle Sampson "said that 'talking about a White House mafia or something like that would not accurately characterize his openness and inclusiveness.'" The Post adds many Gonzalez aides "have extensive and deeply conservative credentials." Among them are chief of staff Theodore W. Ullyot, Associate Attorney General Robert D. McCallum, Tasia Scolinos, the director of public affairs, counselors Raul F. Yanes, Jeffrey Taylor, and Courtney Simmons Elwood, Rachel Brand, acting head of the department's influential Office of Legal Policy, Michael A. Battl , head of the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, and Deputy Attorney General-designate Timothy E. Flanigan.

Female Candidates Given Good Chance. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Bravin, Cummings, Greenberger) says the retirement of O'Connor, "the first woman on the Supreme Court and one of two currently, is expected to raise the profile of female candidates." The two women "most often mentioned on Bush short lists are Edith Jones, 54 years old, a former general counsel of the Texas Republican party who was appointed by President Reagan in 1985 to serve on the US Appeals court in New Orleans, and Janice Rogers Brown, 55, the African-American daughter of sharecroppers who grew up Greenville, Ala. and attended segregated schools. After fierce resistance by Senate Democrats, she was recently confirmed to become an appeals court judge as a result of a deal between moderate Democrats and Republicans." The Journal adds, "Social conservatives are comfortable with Judge Jones, who passes their abortion litmus test with high grades."

Special Interest Groups Gear Up For Nomination Fight. CNN's Inside Politics (7/11, Franken) reported, "Just about every special-interest group in the world on either side of the political spectrum has geared up for" the coming fight over Bush's Supreme Court nominee. The groups have "spent months raising millions to get ready for a battle royale, which is going to be taking place without a doubt once the president names his nominee. He says he wants somebody to be on the court, a replacement for Justice O'Connor, by October. There's an awful lot of battle ahead before that occurs."

The Washington Post (7/5, Edsall) reports "participants predict the competition for cash will turn the Senate confirmation into the most expensive nomination fight in the nation's history, certain to break $50 million and, if the nominee is especially controversial, likely to approach $100 million. Most of the money raised would not be publicly reported." The Post adds, "With the exception of such groups as MoveOn PAC, many organizations active in the fight are tax-exempt and have few, if any, disclosure requirements." On the right, "Progress for America, which spent $45 million in behalf of the Bush 2004 campaign, is committed to spending $18 million for targeted radio and television ads; the allied Judicial Confirmation Network plans to spend $2 million to $3 million for grass-roots lobbying of key senators; and Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, has vowed to put unspecified 'millions' behind a conservative nominee." On the left, "such groups as People for the American Way and MoveOn PAC already flexed their muscles in the debate over the 'nuclear option' proposal of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to end filibusters of judicial nominees. With far lower levels of public interest, People for the American Way was able to collect $5 million for the filibuster issue, MoveOn raised $1.5 million and the Alliance for Justice raised $1 million."

Deal On "Nuclear Option" Seen As Key Factor In Upcoming Battle. The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Chaddock) reports this morning, "The decision of 14 senators -- whether to hold or abandon an agreement to keep the wheels of the judicial appointments moving -- is emerging as the wildcard in the looming confirmation fight over the US Supreme Court." Six weeks ago, recounts the Monitor, "the Gang of 14 stunned the Senate by a bipartisan pact to allow long-delayed votes on President Bush's most controversial nominees, while preserving the minority's right to filibuster under 'extraordinary circumstances.' … Now that pact meets its ultimate test: filling a seat on a Supreme Court closely divided on issues ranging from abortion to property rights." Democrats "say the nuclear option is off the table for a Supreme Court nomination fight. Republicans say it emphatically is not. In the end, it's the Gang of 14 who decide which side is right. The key question: How resilient is that pact and the trust that binds it?"

More Commentary. Robert Bork, a former judge of the US Court of Appeals whose Supreme Court nomination was rejected by a Democratic Senate in 1987 writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/5), "Democratic senators' filibusters of the president's previous judicial nominees demonstrate liberals' determination to retain the court as their political weapon. … The leaders of the Democratic Party in the Senate are making it the party of moral anarchy, and they will fight to keep the Court activist and liberal. The struggle over the Supreme Court is not just about law: it is about the future of our culture." Adds Bork, "To restore the Court's integrity will require a minimum of three appointments of men and women who have so firm an understanding of the judicial function that they will not drift left once on the bench. Choosing, and fighting for, the right man or woman to replace Justice O'Connor is the place to start."

Along similar lines, the Wall Street Journal (7/5) editorializes, "For liberals, the courts have become the preferred way to win policy victories now that Americans are consistently rejecting their agenda at the ballot box. Unlike Barbara Jordan and her colleagues 25 years ago, modern liberals are unlikely to be satisfied with a nominee who is a 'good lawyer and believes in the Constitution.'" But "the only way to stop 'borking' as a political strategy is to defy and defeat it. Mr. Bush told voters in 2000 and 2004 that he would nominate Justices in the mold of Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. He owes it to the country, and his most loyal supporters, to keep that promise."

GOP Senators Crafting Compromise Stem Cell Legislation. Roll Call (7/5, Preston) reports, "A group of Republican Senators is working quietly on new embryonic stem-cell legislation intended to appease scientists while also avoiding a potentially politically damaging presidential veto. … The basis of the still-to-be drafted Senate bill would allow for federal funds to be used for embryonic stem-cell research, but would require that the embryo not be harmed during the process. Several Republicans said Congress should be promoting a technique currently used during genetic testing and in vitro fertilization that allows for a stem cell to be taken from the embryo without destroying it." Sen. Rick Santorum said, "Even though I question the potential of that research, nevertheless it is an area that the scientific community wants to do research and we want to make sure it is done in an ethical way." Santorum "said the discussions include Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Chairman Mike Enzi. Sen. Johnny Isakson "who is involved in the talks about the safe extraction of stem cells from embryos, said he thinks that this compromise bill would appease people on both sides of the debate."

California Stem Cell Research Institute Yet To Make Headway. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Hamilton) reports that as Congress fights "over a bill that could expand federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, California's newly minted $3 billion commitment to the field is still trying to get itself off the ground." Eight months "after a state ballot initiative, Proposition 71, established the California Institute for Regenerative Medicine, the stem-cell agency's main accomplishment has been to bootstrap itself into existence." The Institute's "real mission -- to funnel roughly $300 million a year into California-based stem-cell research and facilities over the next decade -- is stalled." The Institute's funding "is in limbo" because of a lawsuit, while it has "been beset with controversies over its accountability and openness, including an effort by state legislators -- now on hold -- to impose tougher standards on the effort."

FEMA Asks Floridians To Return Aid Overpayments. The Washington Post and the New York Times run an AP story this morning (7/4) reporting that the Federal Emergency Management Agency "has asked thousands of Floridians whose homes were damaged by last summer's four hurricanes to give back more than $27 million in aid overpayments." FEMA "earlier this year began mailing letters to residents in efforts to recoup the overpayments from people who received federal aid after Hurricanes Charley, Frances, Ivan and Jeanne hit Florida last August and September." According to data supplied to the Fort Myers News-Press through a Freedom of Information Act request, "the agency detailed 6,579 cases in which they say people owe a total of $27.2 million."

Pelosi Files Travel Reports On Three Previously Undisclosed Trips. In an indication that Democrats may not get the mileage out of the controversy over House Majority Leader Tom DeLay's travel at the expense of outside groups, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi on Friday filed reports on three previously undocumented trips. The Washington Post (7/5, A3, Allen) reports Rep. Pelosi "filed delinquent reports Friday" for the three trips "that were worth $8,580 and occurred as long as seven years ago." Pelosi's filing is "among hundreds of revisions from members of both parties who have amended missing or incomplete reports as scrutiny of lawmaker travel has intensified." The "most expensive trip was not reported on Pelosi's annual financial disclosure statement or on the travel disclosure form that is required within 30 days of a trip." House ethics committee members "have shown no appetite for taking up all those cases and are considering an amnesty for reporting violations, although not for serious matters such as accepting a trip from a lobbyist, which House rules forbid." The unreported trip "was a week-long 1999 visit to Taiwan, paid for by the Chinese National Association of Industry and Commerce, for 'meetings with government, military and business officials,' according to a filing Pelosi signed June 30. The flights cost $3,400 each for Pelosi and her husband. The hotel cost was $940. The sponsor, which has picked up trips for leaders of both parties, paid $300 for meals."

Federal Employees Concerned Salary Raises Will Be Less Frequent Due To Reforms. The Washington Post (7/5, A11, Lee) reports, "Here is why working for the federal government is so good: Federal civil servants, on average, have received a pay raise in every year but two since 1969, meaning they can pretty much bank on seeing their paychecks grow annually. But there is a cloud inside that silver lining: Average annual wages and salaries in the private sector have grown faster than civil service pay in the past 36 years, and so have consumer prices. … Many federal workers are growing increasingly anxious about their pay as the Bush administration prepares to toss out the 15-grade General Schedule, which links pay to longevity in a job, and replace it with a system that more directly ties salary increases to performance evaluations." Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, "said she fears that annual raises will suffer."

Settlement Expected In Wrongful Death Suit Involving Capitol Police. Roll Call (7/5, McArdle) reports, "A wrongful death suit brought by the wife of a Maryland man who died while in custody of the Capitol Police is likely headed toward settlement, a lawyer for the deceased's family said after a status hearing Thursday. After scheduling another status hearing for early October, U.S. District Judge James Robertson agreed, at the request of both sides, to refer the case to a magistrate judge, who could arbitrate a settlement agreement." Roll Call notes, "The original lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia in November 2004 by the family of Brandywine, Md., resident Gary Thompson. Thompson died Feb. 9, 2004, after he was arrested by Capitol Police following a traffic accident outside Union Station. His widow, Lois Thompson, is seeking $50 million in compensatory damages, as well as legal fees." Roll Call adds, "According to the lawsuit, Capitol Police officers responding to an accident in which a van driven by Gary Thompson collided with a taxicab…found Thompson still in his vehicle hunched over the steering wheel. The family contends that Thompson, a diabetic, suffered from a diabetic seizure shortly before the accident occurred. … After removing Thompson from the vehicle, officers placed him on the ground on his stomach and handcuffed him. … Thompson then fell unconscious; when paramedics arrived, they were unable to locate a pulse. He was pronounced dead about an hour later at Washington Hospital Center." Roll Call relates, "The following month, the D.C. Office of the Chief Medical Examiner labeled the cause of death 'positional asphyxia,' meaning his chest and rib cage were not able to expand so that he could draw breath. The death was ruled a homicide."

Health Net Vows To Fight Louisiana Judgment. The Los Angeles Daily News (7/2, Hopkins) reported that Health Net "vowed Friday to keep up its legal fight" following a Louisiana court decision applying "$117 million in fines stemming from the failure of three former subsidiaries." Health Net "sold its Foundation Health Plans in Louisiana, Oklahoma and Texas in April 1999 to AmCareco Inc. for an undisclosed price. Within three years, state regulators took over all three and placed them into receivership. Alleging fraud, conspiracy, negligence and other crimes, the receivers then sued both companies. Health Net has maintained its innocence throughout, but faced a setback on Thursday when a Louisiana jury awarded the Texas receivers $52.4 million in compensatory damages and another $65 million in punitive charges Roughly $8 million of the compensatory damages would be paid by other parties in the suit, however." Health Net Vice President for Investor Relations David Olson said, "We continue to believe that the claims have no merit. We're going to continue to fight because we believe in our case. The fact of the matter is we sold them in 1999 and it was three years later that they became insolvent."

MarketWatch (7/1, Pritchard) reported that Health Net said it "continues to believe that the plaintiffs' claims have no merit and said it will 'continue to vigorously pursue all avenues of redress, including post-trial motions, appeals and its pending cross claims against other parties.'" The Portland Business Journal (7/2) reported that Health Net "said it will continue to vigorously pursue all avenues of redress, including post-trial motions, appeals and its pending cross claims against other parties." The Los Angeles Business Journal (7/1, Filus) also reported that Health Net "said it disagreed with the jury's decision and planned to appeal the judgment."

The Los Angeles Times (7/2) and the Hartford Courant (7/2) both ran a Bloomberg News brief on the Louisiana decision.

Merck Seeks Postponement Of First Vioxx Trial. The AP (7/4) reported that Merck is "asking a judge to delay the first wrongful death trial over its pain reliever Vioxx, saying it cannot receive a fair trial if the Texas case begins next week as scheduled. The company wants the trial postponed for at least 60 days, citing recent publicity about the drug. Merck withdrew the drug in September when research showed that patients who took it for 18 months or longer more than doubled their risk for heart attack and stroke. Since then, more than 2,400 Vioxx lawsuits have been filed nationwide." A hearing on Merck's motion is slated for today in Texas.

USA Today Backs "Health Courts" For Medical Legal Matters. USA Today (7/5) editorializes, "Physicians often abandon their best judgment if they think a test might protect them in a malpractice lawsuit." Defensive medicine "can reassure patients, but it isn't benign. It results in unnecessary cesarean sections, painful breast biopsies in women with lumps unlikely to be cancerous, and hospitalization of patients who don't need that level of care. The practice is pervasive and costs at least $60 billion a year, according to the Department of Health and Human Services -- paid by people's insurance premiums. … So far, the leading idea for a remedy has been President Bush's proposal to cap jury awards for pain and suffering, but it is stalled in the Senate and is a partial cure at best. Caps might lower malpractice insurance costs, but they don't tackle deeper problems. One intriguing idea, backed by the bipartisan legal reform group Common Good, is special 'health courts,' where judges experienced in medicine would try cases without juries. … The national malpractice roulette is inefficient and unjust. Health courts could show the way for quicker and fairer compensation to the deserving, and they might reduce the incentive for doctors to engage in defensive medicine that puts patients at risk. Starting the experiment is the right medicine for an ailing system."

Trial Lawyers Group's President Opposes Idea. In an opposing op-ed in USA Today (7/5), Association of Trial Lawyers of America President Todd A. Smith writes, "Replacing the basic fairness of individualized justice determined by the wisdom of 12 American men and women sitting on juries with one-size-fits-all 'health courts' is a bad idea and would impose huge additional burdens on state taxpayers. Our current legal system recognizes that each case has unique circumstances and gives juries -- your friends, neighbors and co-workers -- the responsibility to make fair decisions based on all the facts. The fundamental unfairness of health courts is the assumption that all similar injuries are the same. Would a typical American jury say the loss of a finger is worth more to a concert pianist than an office worker? Would 12 citizens decide reproductive systems are more important to people of child-bearing age than to elderly people? That's why we have juries."

Victims, Descendants Pursue Lost Art Using SCOTUS Ruling. The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Dotinga) reports on individuals who are taking on foreign governments "to force the return of artwork," such as that looted in the 1930s and 1940s by the Nazis. Although "some museums have returned plundered artwork to their owners or their descendants," other museums "seek support in European laws that emphasize statutes of limitations and the ownership rights of those who made purchases in 'good faith.'" The US Supreme Court "helped matters last year when it paved the way for Americans to sue foreign countries over stolen art." Even if American plaintiffs win their cases, however, "they'll face the challenge of convincing foreign governments to cough up the artwork." American lawyers who work on stolen art cases "say many disputes are handled privately, outside the court system. Bad publicity and the expense of hiring attorneys to fight lawsuits could convince foreign museums to try that route."

Iran Accuses US, Israel Of Lying About President-Elect. The AP (7/4, Dareini) reports Iran "accused the U.S. and Israel on Sunday of a smear campaign against its president-elect and warned Europe, which is in tricky nuclear negotiations with Tehran, not to join in the mudslinging." President-elect Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "has been accused of taking American hostages in 1979 when radical students seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. Iranian exiles and an Austrian politician are alleging he was involved in the 1989 slaying of a Kurdish leader and two associates in Vienna." But Iranian officials "have denied both allegations." Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi said, "The charges are so evidently false that they don't deserve an answer. It's clear that it's mere lies. Europeans should show their political maturity and not intertwine their interests with those of the Americans. They are advised to seriously avoid interference in this issue. We advise the Europeans not to fall into the trap of the Zionist media." The Washington Times (7/4) also runs the AP story.

Pakistani Supreme Court Overturns Acquittals Of Gang Rapists. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 10, 2:25, Maceda) reported, "When Pakistan's Supreme Court overturned the acquittals this past week of 13 men accused of ordering and carrying out a so-called 'honoree', women's right's activists called it much more than a victory for the rape victim, 36-year-old Mukhtar Mai." Shahnaz Bokhari, women's right's activist:

As Many As Nine Defendants May Be Tried Jointly For Srebenica War Crimes. The New York Times (7/4, Simons) reports, "Prosecutors at the United Nations war crimes tribunal in The Hague are preparing a joint trial of nine of the highest-ranking officers accused of playing integral roles in the Srebrenica killings. Such a large joint trial would dwarf any other proceedings the court has held. All nine men face charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity, and five of them are accused of complicity to commit genocide. A joint trial is possible because eight of the generals and senior officers from the Bosnian Serb Army have arrived in The Hague in recent months, their 'voluntary surrender' largely a result of international pressure on the Serbian authorities. … Judges at the tribunal that deals with the former Yugoslavia must still approve prosecuting the men as a group, and no trial date has been set. Some lawyers who follow the court have said they fear that a joint trial could become a management nightmare, involving at least 18 defense lawyers and many prosecutors. Several defense lawyers have already objected to a joint trial."

Abbas Weighs Allowing Jordanian Troops Into West Bank. The Washington Times (7/5, Mitnick) reports, "Palestinian security chiefs and Jordanian officials are discussing sending a unit of the Jordanian military to the West Bank to boost stability after Israel's withdrawal. The deployment, backed by Palestinian Interior Minister Nasser Youssef, would strengthen Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' hand to enforce law and order on rogue bands of Palestinian militants that could undermine his administration." The Times adds, "Inviting the Jordanian troops across is a political decision that the Palestinian president has put off because it would signal a more confrontational approach toward militants."

Anti-Chavez Activist Faces 28 Years In Prison. The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Ceaser) reports that Venezuelan political activist Maria Corina Machado could face up to 28 years in prison for "treason to the nation" and conspiracy. Machado, who works for Sumate, the organization that led last year's unsuccessful bid to recall President Hugo Chávez from office, has become "a cause célèbre for Chávez's opponents and a demon for his supporters. So when Machado met with President Bush in the White House May 31, it raised a firestorm of government criticism back in Caracas. Venezuela's foreign minister called the meeting 'a provocation,' and the interior minister charged that Machado was a puppet of the CIA, continuing the heated rhetoric that has characterized the relationship between the Bush administration and Venezuela's leftist leader."

Political Scandal In Brazil Intensifies. The Financial Times (7/5, Colitt) reports, "The political crisis in Brazil intensified on Monday as fresh allegations of improper fundraising threatened to force the resignation of figures close to President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva." Lula da Silva's government is "at its weakest since it came to power in January 2003." The Times adds, "Over the weekend Mr Lula da Silva's Workers' party, or PT, admitted having received financial aid from Marcos Valerio de Souza, head of a publicity firm with government contracts and the chief suspect in pay-offs to legislators. Delubio Soares, the PT's treasurer, admitted giving misleading information about the party's relations with Mr de Souza. The PT had previously denied a financial relationship with Mr de Souza, a friend of Mr Soares. … The scandal has angered traditional supporters of the PT, which for most of its 25-year existence has campaigned under the banner of ethical politics."

Gay Couples Register To Marry In Spain. The New York Times (7/5, Mclean) reports, "The lines inside the Madrid Civil Registry, where capital residents apply for marriage licenses, swelled with gay and lesbian couples for the first time on Monday, four days after Parliament passed a law giving same-sex couples across Spain the right to marry and to adopt children. The vote makes Spain the first nation to remove all legal distinctions between same-sex and heterosexual unions, say advocates for marriage rights for gay couples. Belgium, Canada and the Netherlands have also legalized gay marriage, but only Canada's laws, which do not yet apply to all of the country, contain language as liberal as Spain's."

Five Countries To Face EU Suits Over Energy Markets. The Wall Street Journal (7/5) reports, "The European Commission is set to launch court cases against five European Union countries that have failed to pass laws deregulating national energy markets, as part of a crackdown on laggard governments, people familiar with the matter said. At a meeting today, the commission is expected to endorse a decision to sue Estonia, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg and Spain at the European Court of Justice, a source said. The court has the power to impose heavy fines, but it usually takes about 20 months for it to deliver a verdict. … The court cases are the final step in the commission's legal process. The commission uses the courts only when governments have failed to heed two warnings to bring national legislation into line with EU law. Today, the commission will issue roughly 3,800 reprimands -- ranging from first warnings to suits -- to member governments."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Saudis Say Top Al Qaeda Militant Killed. Saudi Arabia yesterday reported a top al Qaeda militant, Younis Muhammed Ibrahim al-Hayari, was killed in a clash with police. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 3, 0:25, Seigenthaler) reported al-Hayari "died after exchanging gunfire and hurling hand grenades at police. He was known to be a top bomb maker linked to a number of terrorist attacks."

Reuters (7/4, Evans) reports al-Hayyari, a Moroccan national, was "at the top of its list of most wanted al Qaeda leaders" in Saudi Arabai. A senior Saudi official "described Hayyari, 36, who reportedly fought in Bosnia in the 1990s and came to Saudi Arabia in 2001, as a shadowy figure who was 'more of a strategic leader than field commander.'" He was "a link to al Qaeda outside Saudi Arabia, brought funds into the kingdom, and was friend to a Muslim scholar close to al Qaeda's leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al Zaraqawi, the official said."

The AP (7/4) reports the "clashes took place in the Rawdah district, an upscale neighborhood in eastern Riyadh, said Interior Ministry spokesman Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki." The Interior Ministry official "said security forces conducted two simultaneous operations in eastern Riyadh to capture suspects and killed Mr. Hayari after a shoot-out, while arresting three other suspected militants, who were not identified." The Washington Post (7/4, A13) also runs the AP story.

Prosecutors Test Limits In Putting Islam On The Stand. The Legal Times (7/4, Blum) reports, "In a recent criminal trial in Virginia, the prosecutor told the jury that the defendant couldn't be trusted to tell the truth, that he would lie to their faces — all because of his religious beliefs. … The defendant, an American citizen accused of supporting terrorism, was convicted. The religion in question, of course, was Islam." The Times continues, "Now, the Virginia attorney representing Ali Al-Timimi is pushing for a new trial, saying that prosecutors secured the guilty verdict by appealing to religious bigotry against Muslims. … The case illustrates the difficulty in prosecuting suspected terrorists who subscribe to a form of militant Islam, without airing tenets of the religion itself before a jury. And it raises the question of how far is too far when it comes to using a defendant's religious beliefs as evidence of criminal intent. The issue will likely continue to confront judges as more cases against accused terrorists come to trial. … Timimi's lawyer, Edward MacMahon Jr., is seeking to overturn Timimi's conviction, citing prosecutorial misconduct and the prejudicial impact of statements he says portrayed Islam as a violent religion. One specific objection: that Assistant U.S. Attorney Gordon Kromberg instructed the jury in his closing argument that Timimi, a devout Muslim, would lie to jurors because the jurors were kafir — or nonbelievers. … Judge Leonie Brinkema of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia is likely to consider MacMahon's motion when Timimi appears for sentencing July 13. … Kromberg declined to comment, citing Justice Department policy. Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said that department officials would not comment on a pending case. In a court filing responding to MacMahon's charges, Kromberg maintains that Timimi's personal religious views were 'directly relevant' to the case."

Attorneys In Dispute Over Fees In Terror Suit. The Legal Times (7/4, Broida) reports, "Steven Perles and Thomas Fortune Fay made their reputation representing victims of terror attacks in lawsuits against countries that sponsor terrorism. But the two D.C. lawyers are now embroiled in a legal battle over the multimillion-dollar fees their successful litigation brought about, with Perles fending off charges he misused money in a trust account that belonged to both of them." The Times continues, "In a suit filed June 20, Fay accuses Perles of improperly using $1 million of his terror-case proceeds as a bond in another suit filed against Perles by a former employee, Anne-Marie Kagy, who is seeking her own share of the proceeds. In the Kagy case, U.S. Magistrate Judge Alan Kay concluded that Perles owes the former employee almost $1.5 million." The Times adds, "Fay and Perles worked as co-counsel in high-profile terrorism cases, including two against the government of Iran that yielded judgments of almost $600 million, of which $54 million has been collected. And, in fact, their lobbying efforts had made such suits possible: They persuaded Congress in 1996 to pass a law permitting terrorism victims to collect a portion of their judgments from the frozen assets of states that sponsor terrorism. … Both Fay and Perles declined to comment about the substantive issues in the lawsuit, since the litigation is still pending and Perles has yet to file a response to Fay's complaint. But both say they hope that Fay's suit will not affect three other terrorism cases against Libya, Sudan, and Iran in which they are currently collaborating."

Judge Sets August Trial Date For Hayats But Admits Delay Likely. The Lodi News-Sentinel (7/2, Bohm) reports, "At a Friday hearing in federal court, U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. set an Aug. 23 trial for Umer and Hamid Hayat, though he added, 'I don't know how realistic that's going to be.' It hinges on whether the federal Classified Information Procedures Act slows the case down, because even Burrell's own staff members would have to undergo extensive background checks before being allowed to handle sensitive documents. … Burrell set an Aug. 19 hearing on issues related to CIPA, and also set dates for attorneys to file motions related to CIPA procedures within the next two weeks. Additionally, he scheduled a July 15 hearing regarding whether the trial will have to be delayed." The AP (7/2, Thompson) also reports on the trial dates.

PATRIOT ACT:

ACLU Official Urges Patriot Act Reform. In an op-ed for the San Francisco Chronicle (7/4) Dorothy M. Ehrlich, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California, writes, "Patriotic Americans have a lot at stake this Fourth of July. After the glare of fireworks has faded, the true test of American patriotism moves to Congress, where both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees will prepare to debate the fate of the USA Patriot Act." Ehrlich continues, "It's a debate that has long been anticipated. … More than 400 boards of supervisors and town councils from Elko, Nev., to New York City spoke up. Seven state governments, including four 'red' states with Republican majorities, called for reform. … The outcry is all the more remarkable when you consider that three years ago, a bipartisan movement for Patriot Act reform was virtually unthinkable. In the aftermath of Sept. 11, the Bush administration, with former Attorney General John Ashcroft leading the charge, chose to demand unilateral power to limit civil liberties and diminish our privacy in a variety of ways." Ehrlich concludes, "The Patriot Act in its current form includes provisions that threaten the American legacy of liberty and privacy. But it can be fixed easily to restore meaningful checks and balances while properly focusing our limited anti- terrorism resources on foreign terrorists rather than ordinary Americans. … The question is, will Congress keep America safe and free by correcting the fundamental flaws in the Patriot Act? We'll find out when it resumes after the Fourth of July recess. Patriotism is so much more than flag-waving and pyrotechnics. It's about vigilantly guarding the fundamental American principles of justice and liberty that have come under siege with the Bush administration's determination to hold itself above the law. It's time to restore the basic checks and balances that are fundamental to our constitutional liberties. That's the kind of patriotism we yearn for today."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pentagon, CIA Reach Understanding To Prevent Intelligence Overlaps. The expansion of the Defense Department's operations in intelligence matters has led the Pentagon and the CIA to reach a compromise on the division of labor between the two. The Washington Post (7/4, A2, Pincus) reports the "growing Pentagon intelligence activities at home and abroad have caused CIA Director Porter J. Goss and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to reach a new written agreement to prevent conflicts and overlap in spying, technical collection and analysis between their two organizations." Gen. Michael V. Hayden, deputy director of national intelligence, "told reporters last week that a classified memo of understanding between the agencies has been drafted and is awaiting the signatures of Goss and Rumsfeld." The document "sets out what the Defense Department and the CIA will do as part of the intelligence restructuring that is taking place under the aegis of the director of national intelligence (DNI), John D. Negroponte."

Pentagon Technology Experts To Use Decoys To Frustrate Hackers. The Washington Post (7/4, D5, Onley) reports two leading Pentagon "technologists propose defending the military's Global Information Grid by using decoy networks and 'honey pots' to fool hackers. The goal is to lure intruders into these areas and away from operational networks." Army Col. Carl W. Hunt, technology director for the Joint Task Force for Global Network Operations, and Doug Gardner, director of the applied technology unit of the joint task force, say "the diversion strategy, called Net Force Maneuver, would lead hackers 'to systems where we are prepared to receive them.'"

WPost Says Bush Plans For FBI Reform Are Significant. The Washington Post (7/4, A16) says in an editorial that President Bush's "reforms of the FBI, which follow recommendations from a commission he appointed to study intelligence failures concerning Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, are potentially profound and warrant public attention. In critical respects, they take the bureau in the right direction. The first question is whether they go far enough or whether they will end up being merely shifted boxes on the government's organizational chart. The second question is whether, in one particular area, they go too far." The bureau has "made more headway in developing intelligence capability than its fiercer critics acknowledge, but it remains, in its heart and soul, a police force. This culture may simply be too deeply rooted to be changed." But it also "is essential that FBI agents collecting intelligence domestically are not directed by the White House or top administration officials but, rather, by the FBI director overseen by the attorney general."

FBI Seen As Loser In Bush's Intelligence Reforms. The Los Angeles Times (7/5) editorializes, "The reforms that President Bush signed on to last week could at least theoretically end the warfare" between the CIA and the FBI, "resulting in agencies better able to focus on core missions. The job of persuading, or forcing, them to do so falls to the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte. With the president at his back, he might even succeed. Despite FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III's best efforts to resist change, his agency is the decided loser -- and the CIA the winner -- in the reorganization of the 15 agencies that have something to do with intelligence, as recommended by a presidential commission." The "FBI is smarting over the humiliation, but it could prove a boon for the bureau," because establishing "a separate office in the FBI that answers to Negroponte as well as Mueller will at least allow the rest of the FBI to get on with what it does best, tracking down domestic criminals."

Woman Arrested For Poison-Laced Death Threats To Mueller, Pistole, Justices. The AP (7/2) reports the FBI has arrested Barbara March of Bridgeport, Conn., for allegedly "mailing death threats, some laced with rat poison, to each of the U.S. Supreme Court justices and FBI Director Robert Mueller." March "was charged with one count of mailing a threatening letter," but "the charge could change with a federal grand jury investigation. Laboratory results determined that seven of the letters mailed to Supreme Court justices were laced with rat poison, the FBI said in an affidavit. The contents of two other letters sent to justices and two letters sent to Mueller and Deputy Director John S. Pistole are being analyzed by the FBI." WTNH-TV Hartford (7/1, 12:00 p.m.), WFSB-TV Hartford (7/1, 7:00 a.m.) and the New York Times (7/2, Stowe) also reported on March's arrest.

Los Alamos Labs Using Computer Modeling To Predict Impact Of Terror Attacks. The Washington Post (7/4, A1, Cha) reports in a front page story that scientists at the Los Alamos National Laboratory have "been constructing the most elaborate computer models of the United States ever attempted. There are virtual cities inhabited by millions of virtual individuals who go to work, shopping centers, soccer games and anywhere else their real life counterparts go. And there are virtual power grids, oil and gas lines, water pipelines, airplane and train systems, even a virtual Internet." The Post notes, "The information is so sensitive that most of the lab's work is classified, and the physical facility is secured with its own experimental technologies. If the simulations got into the wrong hands, the researchers say, they could be used as the ultimate weapon against Americans." Still, some "urban planners have criticized the project for its cost -- each simulation can cost tens of millions of dollars -- and have argued that such modeling can never be precise."

Small Plane Violated Airspace Restrictions Near Camp David Saturday. The Washington Post (7/4, B1, Raghavan, Ruane) reports a small plane "entered restricted airspace Saturday night around Camp David, where President Bush was spending the weekend, prompting federal officials to dispatch a fighter jet to intercept it and track it until it landed at an airport in Frederick." Authorities "questioned the pilot of the Cessna 172 and released him. The aircraft was among three small planes that violated the restricted airspace Saturday. The breaches illustrate how increasingly complicated it is for civilian pilots to traverse the most controlled airspace in the nation -- and for federal officials to protect it." Such incidents "are becoming so routine that the vast majority go unreported."

The Washington Times/AP (7/4) reports, "The pilot was forced to land and was questioned but was released late Saturday without being charged, Secret Service spokesman Jonathan Cherry said yesterday."

Nichols Reportedly Talking To FBI About His Role In Oklahoma City Bombing. The AP (7/5, Murphy) reports that "Terry Nichols has been meeting with the FBI and has revealed additional details about his involvement in the 1995 attack that destroyed the Oklahoma City federal building, his mother said Sunday." Nichols "acknowledged that he helped Timothy McVeigh acquire ammonium nitrate fertilizer and racing fuel that were combined to make the explosive, and helped assemble the bomb components, said Nichols' mother, Joyce Wilt of Lapeer, Mich. 'That's the extent of it,' Wilt said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. 'From there on, he had no knowledge.' … Wilt said she believes others were involved in the bombing and that the FBI is hiding it." The AP adds, "Gary Johnson, a spokesman for the FBI office in Oklahoma City, would not confirm any talks between Nichols and the agency."

OECD To Warn Insurers Unable To Bear Losses From "Mega-Terrorism." The Financial Times (7/5, Felsted) reports the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development "will warn" today that "insurers might be unable to bear losses from 'mega-terrorism.'" In some countries, claims "from attacks that could include a nuclear, chemical or biological incident could even outstrip the joint compensation capacity of insurers and governments." The estimates of "maximum losses resulting from a single terrorist attack range from $50bn to $250bn," compared to over $30 billion for the 9/11 attacks in New York.

DC Railroad Bridge Said To Demonstrate Vulnerability To Chemical Attack. The New York Times (7/5) says in an editorial that the "weakest point in America's defense against terrorism may be an inconspicuous little bridge a few blocks from the Capitol. Rail tanker cars filled with deadly chemicals pass over the bridge, at Second Street and E Street SW, on their journeys up and down the East Coast. The bridge is highly vulnerable to an explosion from below, and if deadly chemicals were released on it, they would endanger every member of Congress and as many as 250,000 other federal employees." The "vulnerability could be easily eliminated by a federal law barring the transportation of hazardous materials through Washington and other locations at high risk of a terrorist attack. But the railroads have fought such legislation, which would increase their costs. If the Bush administration and Congress are serious about homeland security, they will get a chemical transportation law passed at once."

WAR NEWS:

Gonzales Makes Quick Surprise Trip To Iraq. Amid speculation that he may be line for a promotion to the Supreme Court, Attorney General Gonzales yesterday made a surprise visit to Baghdad. ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 6, 0:20, Moran) reported Gonzales met "with American troops and Justice Department officials there, several hundred of whom are training Iraqi judges, police and prison guards." The CBS Evening News (7/3, lead story, 2:25, Guida) reported that "though Gonzales was 6,000 miles from Washington, his name dominated Capitol conversations about the vacancy on the Supreme Court."

The Washington Post (7/5, 2:48 PM, Eggen) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales returned to Washington Monday after seven-hour visit to Baghdad that was aimed at highlighting the efforts to build a functional criminal justice system in Iraq. The trip also served to illustrate the severe dangers and obstacles that remain." The Post continues, "Gonzales had to travel to Iraq under intense secrecy and heavy guard out of fear insurgents would target him. After arriving at Baghdad airport early Sunday, he was temporarily stranded there while waiting out a sandstorm that had grounded helicopters. Insurgents have made the nine-mile road into the city's center too dangerous to drive." The Post adds, "His presence in Baghdad was not revealed publicly until he was safely inside the Green Zone, the walled compound of former palaces and parks that serve as a shaky refuge for coalition forces and the Iraqi government. … There Gonzales met with Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari and other senior Iraqi officials to discuss plans for a joint task force to investigate the kidnappings and other serious offenses that contributed to the chaos outside the U.S. compound. … Hours earlier, Egypt's highest-ranking diplomat in Iraq, Ihab Sherif, disappeared after being accosted by two carloads of gunmen as he drove in Baghdad. … 'What we need to do is develop the expertise within the Iraqi community to prosecute assassinations, kidnappings and other serious crimes,' Gonzales said in an interview during the trip. 'This should improve the situation.'"

The Washington Post (7/4, A1, Eggen) reports, "Even as his name echoes in Washington as one of the most likely Supreme Court candidates, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales landed in war-torn Iraq on Sunday for an unannounced visit with some of the hundreds of Justice Department employees stationed here." The Post continues, "In an interview with The Washington Post on his way to the Iraqi capital, Gonzales said he would continue to be directly involved in making recommendations to President Bush for a possible successor to retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But Gonzales, a close friend and longtime confidant to Bush, declined to comment on his own chances or interest in the post. … 'There will be a group of people who will share their thoughts with the president about a nominee, and obviously I am part of those discussions,' Gonzales said. 'But I'm not going to talk about the details of those discussions or the recommendations or anything like that . . . I think the president is going to be deliberative in his decision.'" The Post adds, "Although Bush may 'take some time' to make a final call, Gonzales added, the president is adamant that a new justice be confirmed by October. The interviews with The Post and the Associated Press en route to Baghdad were Gonzales's first comments about the high court since O'Connor resigned Friday. … The trip is the first to Iraq by the top U.S. law enforcement officer since the Iraq invasion more than two years ago. Gonzales, who took the post in February, nearly had to cancel the final leg of his trip because helicopters were grounded by sandstorms and the road from the Baghdad airport to the U.S.-controlled Green Zone remains very dangerous."

The New York Times/Reuters (7/4) reports, A U.S. embassy spokesman said Gonzales met Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Iraq's justice and interior ministers during his previously unannounced flying visit. … The Department of Justice said Gonzales was also meeting some of the department's 400 staff in Iraq. … They include a large team of investigators that has been helping Iraq build a war crimes case against ousted leader Saddam Hussein and other members of his regime." Reuters adds, "Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said Gonzales's meetings with members of the Iraqi government were 'to offer his support for what they are doing in terms of reconstituting or rebuilding the judicial system in Iraq.' … 'He's also meeting with the DOJ employees that are on the ground in Iraq just to express his support for what they're doing,' Scolinos said."

The Chicago Tribune (7/4, Madhani) reports, "Gunmen kidnapped Egypt's top diplomat in Iraq, authorities said Sunday, snatching the envoy in a busy commercial district in the capital. … The abduction came hours before a surprise visit to the capital by U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales, who met with Iraqi and American officials and U.S. troops." The Tribune adds, "Gonzales made his a surprise one-day visit to Baghdad to thank U.S. Justice Department officials and troops working in Iraq for their service. He also visited with several Iraqi officials, including Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, according to the U.S. Embassy. … The unannounced visit, the latest of several by high-ranking Bush administration officials around past holidays, came as Gonzales' name has surfaced as a possible successor to Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who on Friday announced her retirement."

The AP (7/4, Sherman) reports, "The United States will help Iraq investigate the killing and kidnapping of government officials, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says. The informal agreement was disclosed as Gonzales made an unannounced and tightly guarded, six-hour visit Sunday to Baghdad. He met with Iraq's prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, as well as police and judicial officials." The AP continues, "Word of the arrangement followed the abduction on Saturday night of Egypt's top envoy to Iraq. … 'There are still some high-level crimes, murders and kidnappings that are not being prosecuted. One reason is that the evidence is not available,' Gonzales said in an interview en route back to Washington." The AP adds, "While details are still to be worked out, investigators from the FBI and other U.S. law enforcement agencies would join their Iraqi counterparts at crime scenes and in other aspects of the probes, aides to Gonzales said. … Gonzales praised Iraq's commitment to democracy in the face of sustained deadly attacks by insurgents and also used the trip to show support for U.S. troops in Iraq. … 'As we approach the Fourth of July weekend, I suspect there's some of you that are here that sometimes feel lonely and you sometimes wonder whether you are alone,' Gonzales told American soldiers at the U.S. Embassy. 'And I'm here to tell you that you are not alone, that the American people are very much with you.'"

The New York Times (7/4, Wong) reports, "American and Iraqi officials declined to specify when Mr. Gonzales had planned the trip or why, for a visit that lasted only six hours. But under his leadership, the Justice Department is playing an important role in the coming trials of Saddam Hussein and other officials of the former government. Mr. Sharif, who arrived here just a month ago, was seized as he was driving alone in his white Jeep Cherokee through the Jamia neighborhood of Baghdad, where he lived, an Interior Ministry official said. No group claimed responsibility for abducting him. … The Baghdad visit by Mr. Gonzales coincided with speculation that he may be nominated as a replacement for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her resignation on Friday. His trip here to the heavily fortified American Embassy was a closely guarded secret, and reporters based here were not invited to meet with him. … He released a written statement that said, 'I am proud of the people of the Department of Justice who are contributing to this effort by helping Iraqis advance the rule of law.'"

The New York Daily News (7/4, McAuliff) reports, "After landing in Baghdad under tight security, Gonzales boosted Iraq's push for democracy and gave a pep talk to U.S. troops who were fighting while their families back home were preparing to celebrate Independence Day. … 'As we approach the Fourth of July weekend, I suspect there's some of you that are here that sometimes feel lonely and you sometimes wonder whether you are alone,' he told G.I.s. 'I'm here to tell you that you are not alone, that the American people are very much with you.' … Gonzales said his trip aimed to show Iraqis the U.S. commitment to their new government. 'We are doing a lot to promote democracy and the rule of law,' he said."

Agence France-Presse (7/5) reports that Gonazles "was accompanied by Max Wood, the embassy's newly-appointed justice attache, and Willie Hulon, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's counter-terrorism division, said the statement. … Former attorney general John Ashcroft never visited Iraq."

Gonzales Visits Iraq. Alberto Gonzales' trip to Iraq was widely covered by local TV. Usually, the coverage either mentioned that Gonzales made the trip in order to support US troops or to help the Iraqi government get off the ground. Often, stations mentioned that Gonzales was in Iraq for both those reasons. Some examples: NC8-CABLE-TV Washington, DC (7/3, 2:25 p.m.) reported, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made a surprise trip to Iraq today. It's his first visit to the new democracy. He says he chose the Independence Day weekend for his trip to show support both for US troops there and Iraq's fledgling government."

WTVT-TV Tampa (7/3, 7:10 a.m.) reported, "Gonzales made a surprise visit under heavy guard. He picked the July Fourth weekend to show support for US troops."

KABC-TV Los Angeles (7/4, 6:30 a.m.) reported that Gonzales praised democracy and "thanked the troops for brave service."

WNBC-TV New York (7/4, 5:41 a.m.) reported, "Iraq has accepted Gonzales' offer to help the investigation into the kidnappings and killings of top officials. Over the weekend, Egypt's diplomat was taken hostage."

WLS-TV Chicago (7/4, 5:02 a.m.) reported, "Gonzales says Iraq is now ready to accept American help investigating some crimes. He made the statement after completing a surprise six-hour visit to Baghdad. On his return flight, he talked about the agreement that the US would help investigate the kidnap and murder of Iraqi officials. Gonzales says some of these crimes aren't being prosecuted because Iraqi authorities haven't been able to gather enough evidence."

WPVI-TV Philadelphia (7/4, 6:07 a.m.) reported that Gonzales "met with the country's prime minister, as well as police and judicial officials." He "said Iraq is ready to accept US help to prosecute kidnappers and killers."

WSB-TV Atlanta (7/4, 5:49 a.m.) reported, "Gonzales says he made the trip to show support for US troops in Baghdad and offer FBI help to the Iraqis."

KDFW-TV Dallas (7/4, 8:04 a.m.) reported, "The nation's top lawyer told Iraqis the US will stand" by their fledgling government. Gonzales "promised to help support the young Iraqi justice system and police and he praised US troops." KPNX-TV Phoenix (7/4, 5:06 a.m.), KCPQ-TV Seattle (7/3, 10:08 p.m.), KMOV-TV St. Louis (7/3, 10:10 p.m.), and WRGB-TV Albany, New York (7/4, 6:11 a.m.) were among the many other stations that also covered the story, using much the same language as that used by the stations cited above.

On Independence Day, President Bush Calls For Resolve In Iraq. President Bush called on Americans to remember US troops fighting the war on terror in their celebrations for the holiday. In his remarks at Morgantown, West Virginia, the President also called for resolve and for seeing the Iraq mission through to the end. ABC and CBS covered Bush's remarks, while NBC mentioned the President's West Virginia trip in a story on the Supreme Court vacancy.

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 4, 2:05, Gibson) reported, "The soldiers in Iraq and Afghanistan were on President Bush's mind this holiday. In West Virginia, he urged Americans to show their support for US forces overseas." Bush was shown saying, "There's so many ways to do so. You can fly the flag. Or send a letter to the troops in the field. Or help a military family down the street." The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 2, :40, Roberts) said the President "appealed to Americans to show resolve in Iraq." Bush was shown saying, "We pray for the families who have lost a loved one in freedom's cause, and we know that the best way to honor their sacrifice is to complete the mission so we will stay until the fight is won."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 5, 2:10, O'Donnell) reported, "This was a day for President Bush to simply wave the flag, marking the holiday in Morgantown, West Virginia." Bush: "And on Independence Day we remember that we also have essential responsibilities here at home."

The Charleston State Journal (7/5, Kaull) reports the President "spoke for about 20 minutes, mostly about the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism. He drew parallels between America's War for Independence, which lasted eight years, and the struggle to establish democracy in Iraq." Bush also "thanked West Virginians for their patriotism. 'Coming to West Virginia is becoming a Fourth of July tradition for me,' he said.'" The Wheeling Intelligencer (7/5, King) adds, "It appears President George W. Bush now equates the Fourth of July with democracy, freedom and West Virginia."

CNN's Inside Politics (7/4, Franken) said Bush's speech "was really a repeat of last week's speech in which he was beginning to try and shore up support for the war in Iraq, which has been suffering from a lack of -- a dwindling lack of support in the United States. … But to reinforce the point that the war in Iraq has become a very contentious issue in the United States, a group of about 50 demonstrators appeared outside the hall where the president spoke." The New York Times (7/5, Kornblut) also says this morning that Bush reprised "his prime-time speech on Iraq the week before."

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Chen) reports Bush asserted "that he has 'a comprehensive strategy' to win the struggle in Iraq and prevail in the global war on terrorism." Bush "has been under growing pressure, including from some Republican lawmakers, to articulate an exit strategy -- what the White House prefers to call 'a strategy for success' -- for Iraq." In his remarks, "however, Bush did not go beyond the points he made last Tuesday in a nationally televised prime-time address. … As he spoke, the shouts of a cluster of demonstrators could be heard, although their words were difficult to discern.":

The Washington Times (7/5, Curl) reports "several thousand students, veterans, civic leaders and members of the military packed West Virginia University's downtown campus for the ticketed event." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/5, O'Toole) notes the "cheering…audience," adding Bush "melded a salute to the troops with a defense of his war policies; a celebration of American independence with promises of democracy to come in the Middle East." Bush "was introduced yesterday by US Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va., who proclaimed that Bush's frequent visits had transformed him from a Texan to a Mountaineer. … The spotlight on Capito came as speculation continues that she will challenge [Sen. Robert] Byrd, the state's long-serving Democrat, in next year's election."

Meanwhile, Reuters (7/5, Bohan) notes Bush "also invoked the Revolutionary War as he cast the Iraq war as a struggle to help Iraqis achieve freedom." The AP (7/5, Hunt) adds, "With his approval ratings sagging and anxiety over the war rising, Bush has decided to devote more attention to explaining what he believes is at stake in Iraq and his strategy for dealing with it. … The president's communications effort has been complicated by the Supreme Court vacancy caused by the surprise retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor."

Bush's Independence Day speech at West Virginia University received widespread local TV coverage across the nation, with several reports noting that it was Bush's third

Independence Day speech in four years in the Mountain State. Some examples: WDIV-TV Detroit (7/4) reported, "In the President's third speech in four years at the school, he called on all Americans to show support for those troops serving in what he called the fight against terrorism." Bush was shown saying, "The men and women of our armed forces have always answered our nation's call."

WITI-TV Milwaukee (7/4) reported, "President Bush kicks off the Fourth with an appearance in West Virginia. There, he thanked America's war heroes for their service to the country. The President stopped in West Virginia on the Fourth. He says Americans need to do something to show their appreciation for the troops." KDKA-TV Pittsburgh (7/4) also said, "West Virginians are getting used to seeing President Bush on this holiday."

WBBM-TV Chicago (7/4) reported, "President Bush is message to the nation is familiar. The US needs to support troops who are defending freedom in Iraq. As we report, the President again said those troops are not going anywhere any time soon. A colorful setting, a warm welcome for the President speaking on the campus of West Virginia University. He rallied to show extra support for the troops."

Knight Ridder (7/5, Silva) says Bush made "a repeat Independence Day visit to this mountainous realm that helped elect him and re-elect him." The Washington Post (7/5, Helderman) notes, "In all, 13 West Virginians have been killed in Iraq since the war began. A sailor from the state was also one of 16 troops killed last week when a MH-47 Chinook helicopter crashed in eastern Afghanistan."

US, Iraqi Troops Arrest Over 100 Suspected Insurgents. The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 2, :40, Roberts) reported, "In Iraq today, hundreds of US and Iraqi troops arrested at least 100 suspected militants in raids near the Baghdad airport. A suicide car-bomber struck an Iraqi army convoy in Fallujah, killing at least three civilians. And in Baghdad, a remote-control car bomb missed a US military convoy, but killed two Iraqi civilians."

Syrian Forces Clash With Militants Linked To Iraqi Insurgency. The New York Times (7/5, Fattah) reports that Syrian security forces "clashed early Monday in the hills overlooking Damascus with men believed to be militants connected to Iraq's insurgency." The predawn firefight on Qassioun Mountain "left one police officer dead and several others wounded. … It was the second clash in as many days between the Syrian authorities and people believed to be militants." The Times notes that Syria "has come under significant pressure" from the US "to seal its long border with Iraq, and has been accused of giving Iraqi insurgents safe harbor and of encouraging the insurgency. But in recent weeks, it has sought to highlight its own problem with militants as well as to show it has gotten serious about stamping out militancy."

Army Reservists Build Artificial Limbs For Iraqis. The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 8, 2:35, Roberts) reported, "Some Army Reservists in Iraq are using their civilian expertise to give injured Iraqis a new start." CBS (Dozier) added Captain Steve Lindsley and MP Sgt. Chris Cummings, who organized Operation Restoration, a program to build artificial limbs for wounded Iraqis. The group has "helped some 60 people. To keep the clinic open, Sergeant Cummings extended his tour by nine months."

Marine Reservists Profiled. NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 3, 2:05, Engel) profiled the regimen of the Marines of Kilo Company, "part of Regimental Combat Team 2 on patrol in the dangerous Sunni Triangle northwest of Baghdad." Engel: "At home, they're plumbers, cops, salesmen and students. Now, they are hunting down insurgents in the city of Hit."

Iraqi Prime Minister Rules Out Talks With Terrorists. The Washington Times (7/5, Martin) reports, "Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari has ruled out talks with any terrorist or insurgent group that has the blood of Iraqi citizens on its hands. But, in a recent interview, Mr. al-Jaafari also held out an olive branch to other hard-line anti-government and anti-American militants whose opposition had not led to the deaths of Iraqis." Mr. "al-Jaafari said he would welcome bringing hard-line Sunni groups into a political dialogue and even into his government." Times adds, "The prime minister said it was also politically important to put former Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein on trial quickly and to reach a rapid conviction and an imposition of the sentence passed by the court. He dismissed suggestions that the trial, and especially a death sentence, could inflame passions and increase terrorism."

Sunni Umbrella Group Urges Iraqi Members To Vote. The New York Times (7/5, Glanz) says "a major Sunni umbrella group called on its members on Monday to register for the next round of elections and take part 'despite our reservations.'" Adnan al-Dulaimi, the head of a group called the Sunni Endowment, "said in a briefing in Baghdad that clerics would be asked to issue fatwas, or religious rulings, essentially ordering Sunnis to vote in elections." The Times notes that Dulaimi also "explicitly renounced violence as a way for the Sunnis to regain power."

The Washington Post (7/5, Mosher, Fekeiki) adds "another pivotal Sunni group, the Iraqi Islamic Party, immediately voiced support for the proposal." Subhi Nawzen Tawfik, a political science professor at the University of

Baghdad's International Studies Center, "called the initiative 'a very important development.'"

Iraq Seen As Replacing Afghanistan As Prime Training Ground For Terrorists. Knight Ridder (7/5, Strobel) says that Iraq has replaced Afghanistan "as the prime training ground for foreign terrorists who could travel elsewhere across the globe and wreak havoc, according to U.S. counterterrorism officials and classified studies by the CIA and the State Department." Of particular concern, "are the urban combat techniques being learned and used by foreign fighters assaulting U.S. and Iraqi troops. There's already evidence that those tactics are being replicated elsewhere." Knight Ridder says that Iraq's emergence as a terrorist training ground "appears to challenge President Bush's rationale for invading and overthrowing leader Saddam Hussein in March 2003."

Iraqi Barbershops Targeted By Insurgents. The Washington Times (7/5, Karim) reports, "Baghdadis headed to the barbershop are going more often to the Shi'ite neighborhood of Sadr City than to mixed neighborhoods, where they could be shot by Sunni radicals who charge that clean shaven men want to look like US soldiers." According "to an Interior Ministry official, at least 20 barbers have been assassinated in areas like Shaab, Bayaa, Saidiyah and Baghdad al-Jadeeda over the past two months."

Diplomats Fear For Their Safety In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Daragahi) reports that he kidnapping of Ihab al-Sherif, "Egypt's top envoy in Baghdad," has "sent shivers through the capital's small diplomatic community and may further hamper Iraq's drive to restore full diplomatic relations with the world." U.S. and Iraqi officials "have accused the mostly Sunni Muslim nations of the Arab world of refusing to restore full diplomatic ties with Iraq because it has been led by Shiites since the handover of sovereignty last year." However, Demiye Haddad, "the Jordanian embassy's charge d'affaires, said security -- not politics -- is the issue." Diplomats "say they fear for their safety in Iraq, and are concerned that their nations could become targets of terrorists if they appear to warm up to Baghdad." Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, "commended the Bush administration's efforts to change Iraq and the Middle East. The mass graves that Saddam Hussein left behind justified the war, he said."

Stateside Groups Lend Support To War Dogs In Iraq. The Washington Times (7/5, Haberkorn) reports that military war dogs in Iraq that help save lives by detecting bombs and traps and finding injured civilians are "getting chapped [noses] from the desert heat. When Amy Nichols, owner of Happy Tails Dog Spa in Tysons Corner, heard of the dogs' tale, she bought some lip balm for their noses and set up a donation box in front of her store. The doggy day care also is collecting flying discs, knotted ropes and treats to send to the hundreds of dogs serving in Iraq." The Times notes that by next week, Nichols "expects to send about 50 pounds of donations to the dog handlers in Iraq. Schools and animal advocacy groups across the nation have held collection drives to help the dogs in Iraq, and the US War Dogs Association has proposed a memorial for military working dogs and their handlers."

Two Navy SEALs Reportedly Killed In Eastern Afghanistan. One of the four Navy SEALs missing in the mountainous region of eastern Afghanistan was rescued over the weekend and is in stable condition. However, there is no official word on the remaining members of the team, and officials have told reporters on background that two of the Special Forces troops have been found dead. The networks all ran the story early in their newscasts. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 3, 2:10, Raddatz) reported, "Officials will say little about this, since one of the SEALs remains missing and the rescue efforts continue." The "loss of two more Navy SEALs would mean that, in less than a week, the SEALs have lost ten members, since 8 SEALs were killed on the rescue helicopter that crashed on Tuesday."

The CBS Evening News (7/4, lead story, 2:55, Orr) reported, "A US official tonight confirms that two of the four Navy commandos missing since Tuesday are dead," but the "search for the fourth missing SEAL goes on." NBC Nightly News (7/4, lead story, 1:45, Miklaszewski) reported, "The governor of Kunar Province announced that a second Navy SEAL had been found wounded and was being cared for in a remote Afghan village. But tonight, US military and Pentagon officials say there is no confirmation a second SEAL has been located."

US Officials Express Regret For Civilian Casualties In Afghanistan. The CBS Evening News (7/4, lead story, 2:55, Orr) reported the rescue operation "comes during a spike in Afghan violence. 45 US soldiers have been killed in the last three months along with 500 enemy fighters and more than 130 civilians." US officials "expressed regret that an air strike Friday on a terrorist compound killed an unknown number of civilians. But in a statement, said: 'When enemy forces move their families into the locations where they conduct terrorist operations, they put these innocent civilians at risk.'"

Taliban Said To Be Reemerging In Afghanistan. The Taliban and al Qaeda are thought to be making a bid to reemerge in Afghanistan, which is one reason for the recent upsurge in violence there. NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 2, 2:05, Allen) reported, "The Taliban has reemerged, supported by al Qaeda, a force estimated at some 20,000. US military officials say some of those fighters come over the mountains from Pakistan, with tactics imported from Iraq -- suicide bombs, roadside bombs, targeted assassinations, violence often directed at Afghan police, aide workers, anyone supporting the US and the new government." At least "45 US troops have died since early April, including 16 in the last week's chopper crash, the single deadliest day for American forces in Afghanistan."

Defense Department Considering Move Away From Two-War Strategy. Prompted by the ongoing conflict in Iraq, the Defense Department is reconsidering its current two-war strategy as part of its quadrennial review. The New York Times (7/5, Shanker, Schmitt) reports senior military planners are "weighing whether to shape the military to mount one conventional campaign while devoting more resources to defending American territory and antiterrorism efforts." The strategy shift will "determine the future size of the military as well as the fate of hundreds of billions of dollars in new weapons." The debate over the changes "reflects a growing recognition that the current burden of maintaining forces in Iraq and Afghanistan, along with the other demands of the global campaign against terrorism, may force a change in the assumptions that have been the foundation of all military planning." An "official designation of a counterterrorism role and a shift to a strategy that focuses on domestic defense would have a huge impact on the size and composition of the military." Strategies "that order the military to be prepared for two wars would argue for more high-technology weapons, in particular warplanes. An emphasis on one war and counterterrorism duties would require lighter, more agile forces - perhaps fewer troops, but more Special Operations units - and a range of other needs, such as intelligence, language and communications specialists." The "unusual mission in Iraq, which could last for years, has not just taken the slot for one of the two wars; it has upended the central concept of the two-war model."

DOJ:

Filling Top Post In New DOJ National Security Division Could Be Difficult. The Legal Times (7/4, Blum) reports, "The president's proposal to create a new National Security Division in the Justice Department, if adopted, would formalize the removal of the wall between intelligence gathering and criminal prosecution. But finding the right person to run the new section, which would bring together the DOJ's counterterrorism section, counterespionage section, and the Office of Intelligence Policy and Review, may not be easy." The Times continues, "Before the passage of the USA Patriot Act in 2001, intelligence agents and prosecutors rarely worked together. As a result, few lawyers have experience in both disciplines. 'There really aren't a lot of people who bridge both worlds,' says Suzanne Spaulding, a former CIA lawyer." The Times adds, "The post is unlikely to go to James Baker, who currently heads the Justice Department's intelligence office, or to counterterrorism chief Barry Sabin because both men are career officials without strong Republican ties. One senior DOJ official says the shuffle will not disrupt ongoing terrorism investigations: 'The advantage of putting those troops in the same division is that it will enable them to better take advantage of synergy the destruction of the wall has made possible.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ To Continue HealthSouth Probe. The AP (7/4, Reeves) reports, "Federal prosecutors aren't done with HealthSouth Corp., despite the acquittal of ousted CEO Richard Scrushy in a $2.7 billion earnings overstatement. Two former executives who pleaded guilty in the accounting scheme are set for sentencing this summer, and two more indicted in the fraud are awaiting trial in Birmingham, where jurors last week found Scrushy not guilty." The AP continues, "HealthSouth, meanwhile, is still feeding information to prosecutors as it sorts out the aftermath of the financial debacle, and U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said her office is still investigating the long-running fraud at the rehabilitation and medical services chain." The AP adds, "A recent earnings restatement filed by HealthSouth with the Securities and Exchange Commission includes information about payments and perks offered to some health care providers that could have violated Medicare rules, Martin said in an interview with The Associated Press. … 'Now I'll turn my attention to some other things that have been on the back burner during the trial,' said Martin, declining to elaborate. … The acquittal of Scrushy on all 36 counts was a stinging defeat for FBI agents and prosecutors who spent more than two years on the case, and Martin said attorneys are eager to talk more with jurors to find out exactly where their case failed. … But Martin rejected the idea that Scrushy's acquittal meant the whole investigation was a failure. … 'Overall it's been an incredible success with 15 guilty pleas,' she said. 'Sometimes that last domino doesn't fall.'"

SEC To Pursue Civil Action Against Scrushy. The Washington Post (7/5, Johnson) reports that on Thursday, the SEC "will file court papers seeking a chance to pursue its case" against Richard Scrushy "for the earnings inflation at HealthSouth Corp." The SEC wants to forbid Scrushy "from serving as an officer or director of another public company. It is also seeking $786 million in penalties and disgorgement." One of Scrushy's attorneys, Arthur W. Leach, "said he hopes the jury verdict [in the criminal case] 'has caused [U.S. District Judge Inge] Johnson to have increased questions about the strength and the merit of the SEC case.'" Experts added, however, that the SEC "is charging Scrushy with failing to follow accounting procedures and other new allegations not contained in his criminal indictment." In addition, the SEC "may be able to sharpen its case based on lessons it gleans from the failed criminal prosecution."

German Brokerage Firm Is Investigated For Missing Funds. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Taylor, Reilly) reports that "about €270 million, or roughly $320 million, in client funds hasn't been accounted for at a little-known German brokerage firm" called Phoenix Kapitaldienst GmbH. The Journal says the Phoenix "scam" operated for nearly a decade, and appears to be "one of Europe's biggest investment frauds -- potentially affecting as many as 30,000 investors." To cover up the fraud, Phoenix "simply wrote fake account statements and shredded documents." Prosecutors "have started proceedings against two directors of the company on charges of fraud in 6,940 cases related to the firm and arrested the two, one of whom they allege destroyed documents. A Frankfurt court appointed law firm Schultze & Braun to oversee insolvency proceedings at the firm."

Evan Greenberg Still Standing Despite Investigations. The Washington Post (7/5, Starkman) runs a lengthy piece on the many legal challenges facing Ace, Ltd. leader Evan Greenberg, noting that he is "staying on his feet despite investigations into the U.S. insurance industry that have toppled his brother and father." Greenberg "has acknowledged his own company's shortcomings and called for industry-wide reforms," but "he also said Ace has weathered an internal review of bid-rigging allegations without major findings of wrongdoing beyond those disclosed earlier this year." According to documents Ace filed in March with the SEC, "the company has received 43 subpoenas, civil demands and other queries from attorneys general in 10 jurisdictions, including the District, and 10 state insurance departments or other regulators, including Maryland's." There are also "ongoing state and federal investigations into accounting and business practices at AIG, where Evan Greenberg worked for 25 years, including the last three as chief operating officer under his father."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Email Shows Rove Was One Of Cooper's Sources. Newsweek (7/11, Isikoff) reports that Time magazine "agreed last week to turn over reporter Matthew Cooper's e-mails and computer notes to a special prosecutor investigating the leak of an undercover CIA agent's identity. … Now the story may be about to take another turn. The e-mails surrendered by Time Inc., which are largely between Cooper and his editors, show that one of Cooper's sources was White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, according to two lawyers who asked not to be identified because they are representing witnesses sympathetic to the White House. Cooper and a Time spokeswoman declined to comment. But in an interview with NEWSWEEK, Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, confirmed that Rove had been interviewed by Cooper for the article. It is unclear, however, what passed between Cooper and Rove." Luskin "told NEWSWEEK that Rove 'never knowingly disclosed classified information" and that "he did not tell any reporter that Valerie Plame worked for the CIA.' Luskin declined, however, to discuss any other details. He did say that Rove himself had testified before the grand jury 'two or three times' and signed a waiver authorizing reporters to testify about their conversations with him." Newsweek adds that "one of the two lawyers representing a witness sympathetic to the White House told NEWSWEEK that there was growing 'concern' in the White House that the prosecutor is interested in Rove."

Time (7/11, Saporito) reports that Luskin said Cooper "called Rove during the week before Novak's story appeared but declined to say what they discussed. … The lawyer said he has received repeated assurances from Fitzgerald's office that Rove is not a target in the case."

Rove Attorney Denies He Leaked Name Of CIA Agent. The CBS Evening News (7/3, story 4, :20, Roberts) reported, "Responding to a published report, the lawyer for White House aide Karl Rove denied today that his client leaked a CIA agent's name to Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper. Newsweek says e-mails surrendered by Time to a special prosecutor show that Rove was one of Cooper's sources."

In a story about the legal climate surrounding the issue of press confidentiality, the New York Times (7/4, Seelye) reports that "lawyers for the news media say that the legal climate for those seeking to protect confidential sources is turning chillier, with more subpoenas being issued to reporters. There is no database that tracks such subpoenas, and some prosecutors dispute that they are on the rise." But "a series of high-profile cases involving confidential sources has the news media on edge. … In the last year, more than two dozen reporters across the country have been subpoenaed or questioned about their confidential sources in cases before federal courts, according to the Newspaper Association of America."

Cunningham Made $400,000 In Boat Sale. The San Diego Unioin-Tribune/Copley News Service (7/5, Kammer, Stern) reports, "Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham made roughly a $400,000 profit by selling the boat he lived aboard in the nation's capital from 1997 to 2002 to a businessman convicted in a bid-rigging scheme. The man said he subsequently got advice from Cunningham about how to pursue a presidential pardon from the Bush administration. … The businessman further acknowledged that a mortgage company owned by his daughter and nephew provided Cunningham with two loans totaling $1.1 million so the congressman could buy his home in Rancho Santa Fe. The businessman said he eventually paid off one of those loans in partial payment for the yacht." Copley adds, "Cunningham bought the 65-foot flat-bottom riverboat Kelly C from then-Rep. Sonny Callahan, R-Ala., for $200,000 in 1997. Five years later, he sold the boat for $600,000 to Thomas Kontogiannis, the Long Island businessman said yesterday. … Kontogiannis defended the $600,000 price tag as 'a steal,' saying that he had received an appraisal for twice that amount." Copley adds, "The Kontogiannis family is a frequent contributor to Republican causes, including a $300 contribution to Cunningham in July 2002, the year of the sale. …Cunningham's financial dealings in recent weeks have embroiled him in a multitiered federal investigation and cast a shadow over his Washington career. … In a series of interviews with Copley News Service yesterday, Kontogiannis confirmed that he bought Cunningham's boat and that the congressman offered to help him explore the possibility of seeking a pardon from President Bush and the Justice Department. Cunningham then put him in touch with a Washington law firm and recommended 'two or three' lawyers to talk to, said the businessman."

Developer's Purchase Of Cunningham's Boat, Loan Not Documented. The Washington Post (7/5, A2, Babcock) reports Long Island developer Thomas T. Kontogiannis recently bought Rep. Randy Cunningham's "65-foot yacht, the Kelly C, and helped the California Republican finance a house." However, Kontogiannis says the "transactions are nothing like Cunningham's dealings on another house and yacht that are the subject of a federal investigation." However, the transactions between the Cunningham "and Kontogiannis are not fully documented in the public record or the congressman's financial disclosure. Cunningham, for example, is still listed as the owner of the Kelly C, with his address listed as the home he bought more than a year after Kontogiannis said he bought the yacht from the congressman." Kontogiannis "said in interviews this weekend that he bought the Kelly C, a boat on which Cunningham used to live while Congress was in session, for $600,000 in summer 2002." Then in late 2003, Kontogiannis said, "when Cunningham bought a $2.55 million home in Rancho Santa Fe, the congressman asked if a mortgage company owned by Kontogiannis's nephew and daughter could finance $1.1 million in mortgages."

Cunningham Cancels Independence Day Public Appearance. CNN's Inside Politics (7/11, Johns) reported, "Republican Congressman Duke Cunningham canceled a scheduled appearance today at a pancake breakfast in his home district. Cunningham is under investigation for selling this San Diego-area home to a defense contractor who later sold the house for a loss. A spokesman said Cunningham did not want to be a distraction at this morning's event." The AP (7/5, Hettena) says that on Friday, "the FBI raided Cunningham's San Diego-area home as authorities intensified their investigation of the congressman's financial dealings."

Indicted Tennessee Lawmaker Adds Scrushy Lawyer To Defense Team. The AP (7/4) reports state Sen. John Ford has retained "Attorney Donald Watkins, who helped former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy win an acquittal on fraud charges last week," to defend him on federal bribery charges stemming from Operation Tennessee Waltz. The AP adds, "According to Watkins there are two reasons why the case looks good for Ford. 'The secret video tapes that the FBI made do not portray what really happened with the course of conduct of Senator Fords' dealings with the FBI and the entity created by the FBI.,' Watkins said. Watkins also said that the undercover operatives cooperating with the FBI have credibility issues."

Former Kansas County Official Pleads Guilty To Lying To FBI. The Kansas City Star (7/3, Thomas, Smith) reports, "Former Jackson County Executive Bill Waris pleaded guilty Saturday to lying to FBI agents in a criminal investigation that, according to documents, targets Katheryn Shields, the county's current top elected official." The Star adds, "In an agreement reached late Friday with federal prosecutors, Waris pledged to cooperate fully with the investigation. In return, said U.S. Attorney Todd Graves, the government dismissed parts of a Nov. 17, 2004, federal indictment against Waris and won't oppose any request for probation at his sentencing."

Cleveland Corruption Trial Jurors Remain Deadlocked. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (7/2, Tobin) reports, "The jury deciding the fate of Nate Gray remained deadlocked Friday night over charges that Gray traded public contracts for bribes. The jury sent notice to U.S. District Judge James Gwin that it had not agreed on any of the 59 counts of conspiracy, fraud and bribery against Gray, Cleveland City Councilman Joe Jones and New Orleans businessman Gilbert Jackson." The Plain Dealer notes, "One of the FBI agents working on the case slumped when Gwin read the note. Defense lawyers grinned and asked Gwin to declare a mistrial," but Gwin ordered the jurors "to return for more deliberations next week."

NYPD Detectives Accused In Mob Killings Seek Release On Bond. Newsday (7/2, DeStefano) reports, "Two ex-cops accused of being hitmen for the mob are not dangerous and should be let out of solitary confinement on bail, defense attorneys said Friday. In a 19-page bail application…lawyers for Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa said the case…was 'slim' and that narcotics charges in the indictment had no connection to the racketeering charges." Newsday adds, "A bail hearing is scheduled in the case for Tuesday before Judge Jack B. Weinstein. Prosecutors had not filed a response to the defense papers as of late Friday." The New York Daily News (7/2, Marzulli) notes, "The defendants asked a federal judge yesterday to free them on $1 million bail and offered to put up their homes in Las Vegas and properties owned by their children and close relatives to secure the bond."

Alleged US Child Predator Arrested In Joint FBI-RCMP Investigation. The (Toronto) Globe and Mail (7/2, A4, Sher) reports, "A man whose picture appeared in a gallery of suspected child predators on the America's Most Wanted website was tracked down in Montreal this week after an international cyberhunt. … 'It was a great co-ordinated effort,' said Detective Sergeant Paul Gillespie of Toronto Police's sex-crime unit, which worked with the FBI, the RCMP and police in Quebec to locate the man." The Globe and Mail notes that at the outset "the FBI had few clues, except his approximate weight, hair colour and a couple of scars and tattoos on his arms. 'He's been out the longest,' said Arnold Bell, unit chief of the FBI's Innocent Images project. … About two weeks ago, members of Toronto's sex-crimes unit came across new pictures and a video from the same series in a newsgroup."

Former Illinois Death Row Inmate Faces New Charges. The AP (7/5, Robinson) reports, "Aaron Patterson walked out of prison 2 1/2 years ago, a free man with a pardon and a chance to start fresh. But the happy ending never came for Patterson, who faces fresh drug and weapon charges that could hand him a return trip to prison. These days, the 40-year-old Patterson sits in a federal jail awaiting the start of jury selection Tuesday." The AP continues, "His story of torture by police and 17 years on death row had helped launch an emotional campaign against the death penalty in Illinois." The AP adds, "Patterson was among four former death row inmates who were pardoned by former Gov. George Ryan in one of his last acts in office in January 2003. A day later the governor commuted the sentences of all 160 other death row inmates to life without parole. … Patterson insisted that he was tortured by police into confessing to a double murder he did not commit. The head of the unit that investigated his case, Lt. Jon Burge, was later fired for allegedly mistreating a suspect. … Ryan's actions were warmly applauded by opponents of the death penalty, who nominated the former governor for the Nobel Peace Prize. Patterson's claims have been echoed by dozens of others. … But the cheering for both Patterson and Ryan has long since faded. … The former governor is facing a racketeering indictment, and federal prosecutors are asking the judge — who by coincidence is U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer, who also is handling Patterson's case — to bar his lawyers from using his moratorium on capital punishment to try to impress the jury. … Meanwhile, federal prosecutors say Patterson emerged from prison to become a leader of the South Side's P. Stones street gang."

Task Force Faces Big Challenge In Ohio Corruption Probe. The Toledo Blade (OH) (7/5, Wilkinson) reports, "In the month since its creation, the task force to investigate Tom Noe has been relatively quiet, slowly putting together a process while gathering information." The Blade continues, "What the four prosecutors face is daunting: Unraveling the complex world of Mr. Noe's coin business and political activity. The investigation will stretch across Ohio and the country." The Blade adds, "Together, the four prosecutors - two U.S. attorneys, two elected county prosecutors; one female, three male; one Democrat, three Republicans - will have to decide what charges will be sought and, if any are brought, who will prosecute them. … But despite the complexity of the case, its high profile, and the overlapping boundaries of their jurisdictions, they are confident that they'll get the job done. … 'You do the right thing,' said Gregory A. White, U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Ohio, based in Cleveland. 'You are comfortable with your process. We are progressing and confident about all the things that are going on. We are maintaining the integrity of this expanded investigation.'"

USA Today Examines Eric Rudolph's Letters To His Mother. In a front-page piece, USA Today (7/5, Morrison) reports on letters convicted bomber Eric Rudolph has written his mother. When Rudolph pleaded guilty on April 13, he released "a rambling, 11-page statement that condemns abortion and homosexuality and says he had 'nothing personal' against his victims," but his letters home, by contrast, "are cogent and well-written." The letters "reveal a thinker, clever and cunning, who details how he fooled locals and the feds during five years on the lam; an egoist who sees himself and his plight in the books that now take up his days; a zealot, unapologetic in his disgust for abortion and the government; a son who seems to deeply regret what his family has endured." In a letter his mother received April 21, he writes, "I don't believe that a government that sanctions, protects and promotes the murder of 50 million unborn children in the heinous practice of abortion has the moral authority to judge a man for murder."

Mexican Nationals' Murder Convictions Come Under Scrutiny. The Washington Times (7/4, Aynesworth) reports a criminal motion will be argued in Littlefield, TX, next month, following an investigation into whether "two Mexican nationals should serve life sentences or -- because of prosecutorial malfeasance and inadequate representation -- their 1998 murder convictions should be overturned." There also could be testimony that would "cast suspicion on two other men, one of whom reportedly had bragged to friends about the murder of a convenience-store clerk." The murder convictions of Jesus Ramirez and Alberto Sifuentes came seven years ago, after "prosecutions that offered no forensic evidence and no motives, but did have witnesses who since have been accused of perjury. The case has drawn considerable attention from the Mexican government."

Police Say A Blow To The Head Killed A Missing Oregon Boy. The NewYorkTimes/AP (7/4) reported "a four-year-old Oregon boy who police say was killed by his step-grandmother and left along a rural road in the foothills of the Cascade Range died from a blow to the head. An autopsy conducted a day after Christine Coffman led police to her step-grandson's body determined the cause of death to be blunt force head trauma, said Officer Kevin Krebs, a spokesman for the Milwaukie Police Department." Coffman was charged Saturday with aggravated murder in the death of Matal Sanchez, who had disappeared Wednesday from his home in the Portland suburb of Milwaukie.

Police Find Remains In Montana Thought To Be Missing Boy. Police yesterday found remains in western Montana that were thought to be those of nine-year-old Dylan Groene, who was kidnapped along with his eight-year-old sister Shasta Groene. The girl's rescue from convicted pedophile Joseph Duncan has angered many advocates of tougher penalties for sexual offenders.

ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 5, 2:35, Gibson) reported advocates "of stronger laws against sexual predators were outraged, as more details emerged about" Duncan. ABC (Karlinsky) added, "Questions are now being raised about why such a person, who has a record of sex crimes, dating back 25 years, was free in the first place. He was released in April on only $15,000 bail, after being charged with molesting a 6-year-old boy, at this Minnesota playground. Prosecutors urged that Duncan be kept in custody. The judge now says he doesn't remember if he knew Duncan was a level-three offender with a rape conviction and numerous parole violations, considered to be in high risk of re-offending." The CBS Evening News (7/4, story 6, 2:40, Bowers) reported, "Investigators are waiting on DNA analysis to confirm what we believe," that Shasta Groene told investigators "that her brother is dead."

Kidnapped Eight-Year-Old Girl Rescued In Idaho. Idaho authorities over the weekend rescued eight-year-old Shasta Groene, who was kidnapped after her mother, her mother's boyfriend, and her older brother were murdered. However, her nine-year-old brother Dylan remains unaccounted for. A convicted sex offender, Edward Duncan, was arrested in Shasta Groene's kidnapping, but has not yet been charged with any other crimes. The story received extensive coverage in all three network newscasts.

ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 2, 2:05, Karlinsky) reported, "Duncan is no stranger to authorities who are now scouring his Fargo, ND, home. He is a registered sex offender who has done prison time for rape but more recently studied computer science at North Dakota State University. On his own website, he writes, 'My intent is to harm society as much as I can -- then die.'" Tim Fuhrman, FBI: "I don't think there is any question we will be involved in attempting to work on exploiting what may or may not be in any computer we may or may not find." The CBS Evening News (7/3, story 5, 2:15, Roberts) and NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 6, 2:30, Okwu) also reported the story. The story also was picked up by The New York Times/AP (7/4), among other media sources.

Police Unable To Trace Nearly Quarter Of Sex Offenders. ABC World News Tonight (7/3, story 3, 2:05, Moran) reported "the shock of the crime" in the Groene case "is compounded by the fact that the suspect is a convicted child molester: Almost one-quarter of all sex offenders fail to obey their state's registration requirements." That "means many of them are simply on the loose." ABC (Jamieson) added, "There are nearly 550,000 registered sex offenders in the United States, but police may not know where 100,000 of them are." Law enforcement groups "say police just don't have the time or the resources to track every sex offender. And studies show just 5% of convicted sex offenders are arrested again, a lower rate than other criminals. But that hasn't diminished public outrage. And states are moving aggressively to track sex offenders and prevent them from molesting again."

DC Cracks Down on Jaywalking, Holding Cell Phones While Driving. The Washington Post (7/4, Weiss) reported Washington, DC, has been cracking down on such things as jaywalking and holding a cell phone while driving. They are moves the Post said are making "some people wonder whether the District is turning into a Big Brother 'nanny state.'" However, "DC Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large) defended the actions, saying city leaders have to strike a balance between making urban life safe and livable and preserving the fun of city living. 'It's not always that the government is looking for ways to be more of a nanny,' he said."

Boy Killed In iPod Robbery. The NewYorkTimes (7/4, Medina, Sweeney) reports, "Two Brooklyn, NY, teenagers were arrested Sunday on charges that they robbed and killed a 15-year-old boy…when they stole his friend's iPod. "The victim, Christopher Rose, was walking with three other boys late Saturday afternoon when a large group of teenagers approached them and demanded that they turn over the iPod that one of the boys was carrying. A witness said "when the boys refused, one of the suspects began hitting them. Then someone stabbed Christopher twice in the chest." Law enforcement officials have warned in recent months that "iPods have prompted an increase in thefts on the subways, and that teenagers are particularly vulnerable targets of iPod thefts by other teenagers."

Carjackings Rise In PG County. The Washington Post (7/5, Thomas-Lester) reports on an April 24 carjacking that "was among 337 such crimes reported in Prince George's County as of June 30, a 47 percent jump from the 229 carjackings reported at the same time last year. In 2004, Prince George's reported the highest number of carjackings in Maryland: 563, compared with 492 for all of the state's other jurisdictions combined." County public safety director Vernon Herron says carjacking is considered "one of the highest priorities, along with homicides and other violent crimes." In several cases, "the carjackers have abducted car owners and resorted to violence. In one recent carjacking, a man who came to the aid of his girlfriend was shot."

Ohio US Attorney Asks Court to Unseal Filings In Herbal Supplement Case. The Cincinnati Enquirer (7/5, McNair) reports, "Ever since the government seized $24 million in bank accounts from herbal supplements kingpin Steven Warshak in March, the two sides have waged war in the secrecy of sealed court filings. … That could change, thanks to a request to open the case to public view - not by any news organization but by the government itself." The Enquirer continues, "The government's motives aren't available for anyone to see because its motion to unseal the case is, well, sealed. Fred Alverson, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Cincinnati, said the government is asking U.S. District Judge Susan Dlott to unseal everything except the affidavits backing the original request to freeze Warshak's assets. … 'Our motion is in response to a motion by them asking that certain documents be sealed or filed with redactions,' Alverson said. 'Our response is that these do not fit any of the Justice Department exceptions for documents to remain sealed in a civil case. ... They (the case files) should be open for the public to see.'" The Enquirer adds, "The government froze the $24 million at the same time federal agents with search warrants raided the Greater Cincinnati offices of Warshak's company, Berkeley Premium Nutraceuticals. The U.S. Postal Inspection Service led the raids. The asset freeze was supported by government claims that the $24 million was obtained by fraudulent means. … Several thousand consumers have filed complaints to the Ohio Attorney General's Office and Cincinnati Better Business Bureau since 2001 alleging that Berkeley billed their credit cards for penis enlargement pills and other products they had ordered for a 30-day free trial. Berkeley, based in Forest Park, said it amended its billing practices in August, prompting the number of complaints to shrink."

DOJ Sues Bulletproof-Vest Maker, Supplier For Fraud. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Scannell) reports that DOJ filed suit in federal court in Washington against "a bulletproof-vest maker and a ballistic-fiber supplier, alleging they sold body armor knowing it was defective." The civil suit "named Second Chance Body Armor Inc. of Central Lake, Mich., and its fiber supplier, Japan's Toyobo Co., and related entities," alleging that "from 1998 until 2001 Toyobo and Second Chance 'kept silent as to the ever-mounting information in their possession that the [bullet-resistant] Zylon fabric degraded substantially faster than expected' when exposed to certain light, temperature and humidity conditions." The Journal notes that both companies "have been sued by law-enforcement groups, state attorneys general, a wounded police officer, and the widow of an officer who was killed while wearing a vest."

Suits Against Detroit Police Officers Have Cost City $45 Million In Last Three Years. The Detroit Free Press (7.5, Swickard) reports, "Detroit has paid out almost $45 million over the past three years in police misconduct lawsuits, with more than half that amount going to pay cases involving officers with histories of past lawsuits, according to a City Council analysis." The Free Press continues, "The payouts are a costly jump since the last time police lawsuits were examined. A 2000 study found that the bill for the previous three years was $32 million and officials warned then that the trend of big payouts endangered the city's fiscal health." The Free Press adds, "The latest report on the multimillion dollar hemorrhage comes as the city struggles with a $300-million budget crisis that's forced hundreds of municipal layoffs. Firefighters and emergency medical technicians are among those laid off, but so far no police officers have lost their jobs. … Detroit police are currently under a federal consent degree mandating sweeping and costly changes in the way the department operates. The agreement came in 2003 after a U.S. Justice Department investigation that was spurred, in part, by Free Press reports detailing the high rate of civilians fatally shot by officers and constitutionally questionable practices of dragnet arrests and holding relatives to force suspects to surrender. … The study, by the council's research and analysis division, looked at police misconduct cases that came before the council from 1987 to 2004 and found the city paid out more than $188 million in that 18-year period. The payouts cover settlements including pretrial agreements, mediations, arbitrations and judgments."

Bloomberg's Response To Racially Charged Beating Noted. In his New York Times column (7/4), Bob Herbert wrote, "Early last Wednesday a neighborhood nitwit named Nicholas (Fat Nick) Minucci pummeled a fellow named Glenn Moore with a metal baseball bat, police said. Mr. Moore was walking around Howard Beach with a couple of friends. What they were up to is not real clear and not particularly relevant. … In any event, Mr. Moore and his friends, who are black, ended up being chased by Fat Nick and a couple of his friends, who are white. … The beating allegedly was accompanied by racial slurs. As bad as this incident was, it would never have risen to the status of a major news story in a city of eight million people except for the fact that it happened in Howard Beach, a nearly all-white residential area." Yet Herbert concludes that "the city is a different and a better place these days. Mayor Michael Bloomberg could not have responded faster to last week's attack if he had been wearing Rollerblades."

United Church Of Christ Backs Gay Marriage. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 7, :25, Gibson) reported, "The United Church of Christ today became the largest Christian denomination to endorse same-sex marriage. 80% of the members of the church's rulemaking body voted in favor of the endorsement, which is not binding on any of the church's 5,700 congregations. Leaders of the church acknowledge it may cause some of the congregations or some of the 1.3 million members to go elsewhere."

Chinese Government Blasts US Congress Over Unocal Takeover Bid. The Washington Post (7/5, A1, Goodman) reports, "The Chinese government on Monday sharply criticized the United States for threatening to erect barriers aimed at preventing the attempted takeover of the American oil company Unocal Corp. by one of China's three largest energy firms, CNOOC Ltd. Four days after the House of Representatives overwhelmingly approved a resolution urging the Bush administration to block the proposed transaction as a threat to national security, China's Foreign Ministry excoriated Congress for injecting politics into what it characterized as a standard business matter. 'We demand that the U.S. Congress correct its mistaken ways of politicizing economic and trade issues and stop interfering in the normal commercial exchanges between enterprises of the two countries,' the Foreign Ministry said in a written statement.

Chevron Benefiting From Anti-China Rhetoric. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Berman, Gold) reports, "With members of Congress suggesting resolutions, special hearings and potential laws to stymie Cnooc Ltd.'s ambitions, the pressure is now on the Chinese oil company to seize some momentum in its $18.5 billion takeover bid for Unocal Corp. The harsh response has even surprised people in the camp of Chevron Corp., whose $16 billion-plus deal is due to be voted on by Unocal shareholders in only five weeks. Amid an anti-Cnooc campaign in Washington, one person close to Chevron conceded, 'A lot of it is not organized; it came on its own. It's a freebie for every congressman to pile on China.'"

The New York Times (7/5, Mouawad, Barboza) reports, "The last thing Chevron wanted when it made its $16.8 billion offer for Unocal back in April was to be pitted in a takeover battle against the Chinese government. After all, one of the main reasons it went after Unocal, a California-based independent oil company with vast resources in Asia, was to sell oil and gas to the fastest-growing energy market in the world, China. But on June 22, when…Cnooc, countered with a higher bid for Unocal, Chevron found itself in a delicate position. Since then, Chevron's managers have gone into overdrive to portray the Chinese government-backed offer as unfair competition and to close their deal as quickly as possible. They have received support from many lawmakers in Washington, who have painted the Chinese offer as a threat to America's national security."

Chinese Likely To Boost Oil Production Thereby Helping US Consumers. The Washington Post (7/5) editorializes that China has "no interest in suppressing oil production to drive up prices; to the contrary, if China gains control of Unocal it will want to boost production as much as possible, which would push world prices downward and so help the United States. Those who refuse to draw comfort from this prospect argue that China might route all of Unocal's output to its own consumers, thereby depriving Americans of a source of energy. That is not actually practical, but even if it were, it would just mean that China would buy less on the open market than it would have otherwise. So there'd be less supply on the world market, but less demand also. The effect on U.S. gasoline prices would be zero."

reports, "In the competition to buy Unocal Corp., the prevailing bidder -- Chinese oil producer Cnooc Ltd or its US rival Chevron Corp. -- might be determined by timing as much as money. With Unocal shareholders scheduled to vote on Chevron's $16.6 billion cash-and-stock offer in just five weeks, Chevron's strategy seems to be this: Make Cnooc's bid appear destined for a lengthy and complicated regulatory review in the hope that Unocal shareholders support Chevron's deal -- even though Cnooc is offering nearly $2 billion more." The strategy of "Cnooc, China's biggest offshore oil and natural-gas producer, has been to do all it can to speed up a US regulatory review of its offer in hope of boosting Unocal shareholders' confidence that Cnooc's bid -- politically contentious in the US -- can win approval in reasonable time." The Journal adds, "Working in favor of Chevron are attitudes in the U.S. Congress, where recent attention on America's trade deficit has fueled hostility toward China." But "working in Cnooc's favor is Unocal shareholders' knowledge that U.S. regulators almost never block acquisitions on national-security grounds. If Cnooc can get the ball rolling on a formal regulatory review before Unocal's Aug. 10 shareholder vote, its bid stands a better chance of winning support from Unocal shareholders."

August Deals Face Tough Antitrust Scrutiny. The Deal (7/4, Lindell) reports, "The bidding war for August Technology Corp. may come down not to price but to antitrust concerns." The Deal continues, "Although the Bloomington, Minn., chip equipment maker on June 28 agreed to a $193 million deal with Rudolph Technologies Inc., industry rival KLA-Tencor Corp., which previously had bid $205 million for August Technology, has vowed to renew its pursuit. Seeking to thwart such a bid, Flanders, N.J.-based Rudolph said last week that a combination of KLA-Tencor and August Technology would pose antitrust risks. … But while Rudolph's offer for the company is likely to have an easier time with regulators, neither deal is a slam dunk, antitrust lawyers said. The review by the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division could hinge on how broadly enforcers define the market for semiconductor testing, inspection and metrology equipment, which is used to search for microscopic flaws in chips. The structure of this market and potential customer concerns also are likely to figure in whether the deals receive clearance." The Deal adds, "In sizing up the market affected by the sale of August Technology, antitrust enforcers will focus on the market for so-called macro defect inspection tools, which are used to spot problems with components used in semiconductor manufacturing, said Robert Doyle, an antitrust partner at Sheppard Mullin Richter & Hampton LLP. KLA-Tencor, the leader in that sector, has about 50% of that market, with August Technology and Rudolph each having roughly 25%. … One factor that may come into play is the small market for macro defect gear, which is worth roughly $70 million per year. That has led some risk arbitrageurs to speculate that the government would not closely review the deal. But such sentiments are more hopeful than realistic, said another antitrust lawyer. … Neither the Justice Department nor the Federal Trade Commission 'throws fish back because they are too small,' he said, requesting anonymity because he hasn't closely reviewed the specifics of the deal."

T-Mobile USA May Be Put Up For Sale. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Singer, Pringle, Karnitschnig, Drucker) says that German telecom titan Deutsche Telekom AG "is exploring whether to sell its U.S. wireless operation, T-Mobile USA Inc., a move that could fetch as much as $30 billion and alter mobile-phone markets on both sides of the Atlantic." The company "has told investors in private meetings recently that it expects to make a decision by December." The Journal adds that the possibility of the sale "has intensified on the heels of drastic reshaping of the U.S. telecommunications and cable television market. In the past 18 months, a succession of acquisitions…have formed several huge communications companies that dwarf T-Mobile USA." Choosing to sell T-Mobile USA, however, "could prove to be a difficult option," as the most likely cellular buyer, Vodafone, "says it isn't interested even though the world's largest wireless carrier has long wanted to control a service provider in the U.S."

Singapore Investment Co. Plans To Buy Stake In Chinese Bank. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Areddy) reports, "Singapore's state-owned investment company will join Bank of America Corp. as a strategic foreign investor in China Construction Bank, a government-owned property lender." A subsidiary of Temasek Holdings (Pte.) Ltd. "will pay $1 billion for shares in China's No. 3 lender when the bank conducts an initial public offering, the official Xinhua news agency reported late yesterday." Bank of America, of Charlotte, N.C., "agreed to invest $2.5 billion for the stake and an additional $500 million to maintain that level when China Construction goes public. The purchase by Bank of America worked out to about $305 million for 1% of the Chinese bank, while…Temasek [apparently] would be paying about $275 million per 1%."

Microsoft Settles Antitrust Matter With IBM. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Guth, Forelle) says that Microsoft's agreement to settle an antitrust dispute with IBM "sweeps away some past differences but also highlights the growing rivalry between the two technology giants." IBM's "growing services arm gives the company a powerful platform from which to pitch products at the expense of Microsoft's." Furthermore, IBM "is also a major backer of open-source software, particularly the Linux operating system, which continues to be a thorn in Microsoft's side." On Friday, the two companies "said Microsoft will pay IBM $775 million in one lump sum and extend $75 million in credit toward Microsoft software that IBM will use internally." The settlement "is the latest in a quest by [Microsoft General Counsel Brad] Smith to resolve private claims resulting from Microsoft's antitrust battles in the 1990s with the U.S. government, including a broad suit filed by the Justice Department in 1998 and settled in 2002."

Mohawk To Buy Unilin. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Singer) reports that Mohawk Industries Inc., "a maker of carpet and floor coverings, said it agreed to acquire Belgian flooring maker Unilin Holding NV for $2.65 billion." Mohawk, "based in Calhoun, Ga., beat out private-equity firms that also had been looking at Unilin." The Journal notes that private-equity firms' "merger-and-acquisition activity in Europe has increased substantially in the past few years, but recently trade buyers have been outbidding private equity in some big acquisitions."

T-Mobile Sale Said To Be Possible. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, A3, Singer, Pringle, Karnitschnig, Drucker) reports, "Deutsche Telekom AG is exploring whether to sell its US wireless operation, T-Mobile USA Inc., a move that could fetch as much as $30 billion and alter mobile-phone markets on both sides of the Atlantic."

Jury Rules For Boston Scientific In Patent Case Against J&J. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Brickley) reports, "A Delaware jury ruled for Boston Scientific Corp. and against Johnson & Johnson in a key test of patents protecting drug-eluting-stent technology." The jury found that "J&J's Cypher stent trespasses on a Boston Scientific patent, which protects technology that allows drug coatings to be applied to stents, medical devices used in the treatment of cardiovascular disease." J&J's cardiovascular unit, Cordis Corp., "said in a statement that it would seek to have the verdict overturned, either by the judge who presided over the federal-court contest or by appeal to a different court." The finding of infringement against J&J, "the only other company with a major piece of the U.S. market for drug-eluting stents" is described as "a critical one for Boston Scientific."

At G8, Bush To Oppose Effort To Reduce Greenhouse Gas Emissions. The Washington Times/Agence France-Presse (7/4) reports although the Group of Eight "has to tackle climate change, President Bush vowed to spurn any Kyoto-style deal on the 'significant' problem of global warming, he said in an interview to air" on Britain's ITV. Bush said that "global warming was 'a significant, long-term issue that we've got to deal with.'" But he said "any climate change agreement along the lines of the United Nations' Kyoto Protocol -- which the United States refused to sign -- would get short shrift." Bush said, "If this [draft plan under negotiation] looks like Kyoto, the answer is no. The Kyoto treaty would have wrecked our economy, if I can be blunt." Bush said he "wanted G-8 leaders to put Kyoto behind them and move on to supporting new technologies to limit global warming without harming businesses." He also "underlined the U.S. government's $20 billion investment in technologies such as zero-emission power stations and hydrogen-powered vehicles."

The Financial Times (7/4, Blitz, Beattie) reports the G8 leaders "look set to agree an accord to combat climate change at their summit this week, averting a rift between the US and France over global warming and intensifying pressure on China and India to curb greenhouse gas emissions." Prime Minister Tony Blair "is on the brink of brokering a global agreement on climate change, one which explicitly recognises that science compels the world to act to contain greenhouse gases." A "final draft of the accord to be agreed by the G8 heads including George W. Bush, US president, and Jacques Chirac, French president was hammered out by diplomatic 'sherpas' from each of the member states in London at the weekend." Though the US won't sign the Kyoto protocol, it "gave its backing at the weekend meeting to a final draft accord that meets the minimum demands made by Mr Chirac on climate change."

Bush Denies Softening His Views On Climate Change To Reward Blair. The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Daniszewski, Depasquale) reports that in advance of the G-8 summit, President Bush said "he would not substantially change his stance on global warming to reward British Prime Minister Tony Blair for his support of the war in Iraq." Bush said, "I really don't view our relationship as one of quid pro quo. Tony Blair made decisions on what he thought was best for keeping the peace and winning the war on terror, as I did." Bush reiterated his "opposition to the Kyoto Protocol that mandates targets for cutting greenhouse gas emissions," telling Britain's ITV1 television "that he would reject any measures that 'look like Kyoto.'" Bush "nevertheless acknowledged that human activity is at least partly behind the apparent warming of the planet in recent years. And he said that there may be other compromises the United States and other nations can make to reduce the amount of greenhouse gases being produced."

The Washington Post/Reuters (7/5, A10) report President Bush "told British Prime Minister Tony Blair to expect no favors" at the G-8 summit "in return for backing the war in Iraq." Reports that "a last-ditch round of negotiations by G-8 officials over the weekend would result in an accord in some way recognizing the science behind global warming were bolstered by French President Jacques Chirac, who said on Sunday that the G-8 leaders were 'heading toward an agreement.'" But Bush "was cautious. Environmental experts said that, rather than risk an open rift, the eight nations had decided on an accord offering the barest minimum on global warming."

The New York Times (7/5, Cowell) reports Bush is "generally seen to be at odds with Britain and most other members of the group on accepting the scientific evidence relating to the causes of global warming, and therefore on the need for immediate steps to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases." Bush's remarks "seemed to conflict with a forecast on Sunday by President Jacques Chirac of France that the member countries - the others are Canada, Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia - were 'heading toward an agreement' on global warming." At a news conference "in London on Monday, Sir Michael Jay, Mr. Blair's representative at talks by senior officials in advance of the meeting, said climate change 'was never going to be an easy discussion,' and added, 'There are differences of opinion, particularly about the science.'"

The Washington Times (7/5, Lakely) notes the trip to Europe is President Bush's "fourth journey to the Continent this year -- one of his presidency's few foreign trips during which Iraq and the war on terror will give way to the pleasantries of international diplomacy." The President is "expected to ignore politely Mr. Blair's pleas to join Europe in taking concrete steps to fight global warming, a diplomatic slight against the prime minister."

Mississippi Drought Divides Senate Appropriations Committee Members. The Washington Post (7/5, Murray) reports a severe drought, "now in its seventh year, is wreaking havoc up and down the Missouri, from the river's headwaters at Three Forks, Mont., to its confluence with the Mississippi River near St. Louis. One big casualty: a commercial shipping tradition that dates to Lewis and Clark." What the Missouri "needs most is a deluge of melted snow and rain, but Mother Nature is not cooperating. Absent that, the Senate Appropriations Committee is trying to alleviate the problem -- but members are badly split over what to do." Nearly "a third of the 28 committee members represent states that border the Missouri or have an economic stake in it, and they fall into two camps with very different interests: upstream and downstream." Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) "and two fellow upstreamers, Sens. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), want to retain more water in the upper Midwest reservoirs that were built after the Depression to control flooding and improve navigation." Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) "leads a downstream faction that also includes Sens. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and Tom Harkin (D-Iowa). They argue that holding more water in the reservoirs would end commercial navigation on the Missouri, jeopardize operations at 18 power plants and hinder shipping on the Mississippi -- one of the country's most important transportation corridors." The Mississippi angle "broadens the downstream coalition to include Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.); Mitch McConnell (Ky.), the No. 2 Republican in the Senate; and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.)."

House Legislation Would Lessen Government's Duty To Protect Species. The New York Times (7/4, Barringer) says that "Republican critics of the Endangered Species Act in Congress have drafted legislation hedging the government's obligation to take all necessary steps to bring back to robust health any species on the brink of extinction." The legislation "envisions more limited government obligations: ensuring that the status of an endangered plant or animal gets no worse and helping to make it better." Jamie Clark, the executive vice president of Defenders of Wildlife, said the draft measure "'takes a wrecking ball to the whole Endangered Species Act' by changing its mission, disabling enforcement tools and loosening controls on agencies like the Forest Service and the Army Corps of Engineers." Jim Sims, the executive vice president of Partnership for the West, counters that "the draft has a 'common-sense' emphasis on incremental improvements that are achievable, rather than on long-term recovery that may take decades."

Administration Accused Of Trying To Subvert Endangered Species Act. The New York Times (7/5) editorializes, "The Endangered Species Act of 1973 is far and away the most controversial of all the landmark environmental statutes…especially…among those libertarians and property owners who think that commercial development is unduly restricted by the mandate to protect not only plants and animals, but also the habitats essential to their survival. The law is up for reauthorization again this year, and the pressures to weaken it are great. There are ways to streamline the law and make it less litigious that would not come at the expense of its core values and purpose. Regrettably, the Bush administration is not waiting for this debate to take place. Since the day they took office, Bush officials have tried to subvert the law administratively and in the courts."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

bigger problem than cocaine, marijuana or heroin for most communities, according to a survey of law enforcement agencies in 500 counties in 45 states by the National Association of Counties. The survey, to be released today by the national group that represents county commissioners, supervisors and other top county officials, finds that methamphetamine is: The No. 1 illegal drug problem in the view of law enforcement agencies in 58% of the counties surveyed. Fewer than 20% see pot as the top problem. Behind an increase in other crimes. Agencies in 70% of the counties said the drug is driving up the number of robberies and burglaries. Seen as the top drug problem in every area of the country except the Northeast. There, law enforcement agencies consider heroin the No. 1 problem, ahead of pot, methamphetamine and cocaine. … The survey highlights a difference between what many local officials say is the biggest drug problem and where the federal government has targeted its prevention and eradication efforts." The association says in its survey, "On the national level, the federal government still considers marijuana as the No. 1 drug problem in America, but county law enforcement officials have a different perspective on this ranking." USA Today adds, "Congress is considering restricting the nationwide sale of products that contain the drug pseudoephedrine." ONDCP policy analyst David Murray said that "the Bush administration is developing a national response to the meth problem." However, he said, "the administration cannot neglect other drugs in the process." Murray said that "federal agencies, including the [DEA], are working to disrupt the supply of chemicals needed to make methamphetamine and stop the smugglers who carry it from Mexico and Canada." He said that "marijuana remains a top priority because it is the most commonly used illegal drug, with 15 million users, compared with about 1 million meth users." Murray said, "We do have to keep all drug threats in context, which means you cannot ignore marijuana."

"Colombianization Of Mexico" Now Becoming Reality With Increase In Drug-Related Violence.

Newsweek (7/11, Contreras) reports, "The rising tide of lawlessness has stoked fears that a narcostate, where organized crime holds sway over Mexico's political elites, might one day emerge on the southern border of the United States." Ted Galen Carpenter, a defense and foreign-policy expert at the right-wing Cato Institute in Washington, said, "There are growing signs that the Colombianization of Mexico is now becoming a reality. If a similar process takes place in Mexico, it's going to be 10 times worse than in Colombia because Mexico is locked into the US economically to a much greater degree." Newsweek adds, "Officials on both sides of the US-Mexican border dismiss such warnings as overblown. Mexico's Attorney General Daniel Cabeza de Vaca told the newspaper El Universal last month that the country's drug cartels represented no immediate threat to national security, and in its latest annual report on the international narcotics trade the US State Department gave the Fox government high marks for 'its intensive counternarcotics and law enforcement effort.' If anything, say some US officials, the current turf wars between dueling cartels in a number of Mexican border states erupted in response to the vacuum created by the Fox government's arrest of two major kingpins in 2002 and 2003. Parallels with Colombia, where both leftist guerrillas and right-wing militias are also engaged in drug trafficking, do not bear close scrutiny in their judgment." Mike Braun, chief of operations for the DEA, said, "In Mexico you don't have insurgent groups or terrorist organizations that are involved in virtually every aspect of drug trafficking. We're getting greater cooperation from the Fox administration than from any previous Mexican government I know of." Newsweek notes, "The menace haunting the country's present and future stability starts with the letter C, but it's spelled 'corruption,' not 'Colombia.' Law enforcement is a notoriously low-paying career in Mexico, and an entry-level cop in a midsize city's police department makes as little as $135 a month. Confronted with a druglord's stark choice of plomo o plata (lead or money), many if not most Mexican policemen on the lower rungs of their agencies will opt for the bribe." Bruan added, "We're fine with respect to law enforcement at the central-government level, but the farther you get from the seat of power, the more problematic things can become in a place like Mexico."

The New York Times (7/5, Thompson) reports, "Killings and kidnappings happen almost every day in the city of Nuevo Laredo, about 150 miles north of this small town. Matamoros is quiet in comparison. The most common crime here these days, the police say, is robbery. But as recently as three years ago, this, too, was a capital of the drug war. People on the street said they are afraid that it could become one again. And here, like Colombia, society's first line of defense against the chaos -- the municipal police -- has proved to be its weakest." Anthony P. Placido, the acting assistant administrator for intelligence at the DEA, in a recent appearance before Congress, said, "Law enforcement in Mexico is all too often part of the problem rather than part of the solution. This is particularly true at the municipal and state levels of government." The Times adds, "Interviews with four municipal police officers in this city of 500,000 people across the Rio Grande from Brownsville, Tex., offer a glimpse inside a reality as harsh and persistent as Mexico's blazing summer sun. The officers -- a shift commander, two squad leaders and a recent graduate of the police academy -- were chosen by the minister of public security, Rubén González Chapa, to be interviewed for this article. … Not one of the officers denied that there were abuses and corruption in their ranks.

They described officers taking bribes from drunks and prostitutes and accepting gifts from businessmen and residents for providing extra surveillance around their properties." The Times notes, "When asked, however, about the more egregious accusations by Mexican and United States officials that municipal police often serve as lookouts and hit men for the drug traffickers, the officers typically retreated into vague generalities. What they offered instead of the ugly details about police misdeeds was a look at where the abuses are born, describing a place sorely lacking incentives, not to mention basic equipment to uphold the law, and filled with humiliations that left many officers feeling loyal to no one but themselves. Money was the officers' biggest complaint."

Case Of Mistaken Identity Made In Arrest Of Suspected Juarez Drug Cartel Leader. The Los Angles Times (7/5, Dickerson) reports, "Mexican authorities said Monday that they thought they had arrested the leader of the Juarez drug cartel, but later said tests showed it was a case of mistaken identity. The determination that the detained man was not Vicente Carrillo Fuentes dashed hopes of a rare instance of good news for Mexico's anti-narcotics forces amid an upsurge of violence. It was also the second high-profile error in the last two weeks. In June, Mexican federal authorities detained a British citizen of Lebanese descent on suspicion that he was connected to terrorist organizations behind the Sept. 11 attacks. But that suspect, Amer Haykel, turned out to be simply a tourist."

The Dallas Morning News (7/5, Eaton, Corchado) reports, "Mexican authorities on Monday said they thought they had captured Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, one of the country's most wanted drug lords. But by the day's end, they had reversed course, calling it a case of mistaken identity. Agents had quietly arrested their subject on Saturday at Perisur, a Mexico City shopping center. He identified himself as Joaquín Romero Aparicio, but Mexican officials were almost sure that DNA tests would reveal his criminal identity." Presidential spokesman Rubén Aguilar said, "Right now, it is likely Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, but it isn't completely confirmed." The Morning News adds, "Vicente Carrillo Fuentes Earlier Monday, the prospect that Mr. Carrillo Fuentes, 42, had been arrested excited law enforcement officials and journalists on both sides of the US-Mexico border. Mr. Carrillo Fuentes and his lieutenants allegedly ordered the murders of dozens of US citizens and hundreds of Mexicans during a decade years-long reign of terror, American authorities say. The State Department had offered a reward of up to $5 million for information leading to the arrest or conviction of Mr. Carrillo Fuentes, suspected of leading the Juárez cartel."

The San Antonio Express-News (7/5, Schiller) reports, "A spokesman for President Vicente Fox said Monday officers believe they have captured Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, who is accused of running the powerful Juárez cartel. … But the arrested man's family and media reports late Monday night indicated it was a case of mistaken identity. DNA and fingerprint analyses were being conducted on the man, who was arrested Saturday at an upscale shopping center in the capital, spokesman Rúben Aguilar said. 'We have to prove that this is the guy,' he said. The Express-News adds, "Televisa network raised doubt by interviewing family members who said Romero is an architect and loving father who has nothing to do with drug trafficking. Televisa also showed a picture of Romero in which he appeared to look like a photo taken of Carrillo Fuentes. The network suggested the similarity of the two pictures -- and little other evidence -- prompted the arrest. Federal investigators could not be reached to comment on Televisa's assertions." Reuters (7/5, Bremer) and the AP (7/5, Lee) also reported this story.

Results Of Mexico's Stepped-Up Drug War Questioned. The Dallas Morning News (7/5, Samuels, Iliff) reports, "Mexico finally is fighting the war on drugs that the US government has demanded for decades: a frontal assault on drug barons, their organizations and their merchandise, using the police and military in concert with US intelligence. The results, Mexican and US authorities say, have been impressive. Forty-six thousand people jailed on drug charges, President Vicente Fox said in a recent speech, 97 tons of cocaine seized, more than a million marijuana plants destroyed. It's been four years, Mr. Fox and US officials said, of steady progress." The Morning News adds, "But a rising chorus of voices in Mexico and the US says the real results are record levels of violence, instability and corruption in Mexico, resurgent drug cartels, nearly 200 dead police officers and soldiers, along with millions of wasted dollars in a country where half the population of 105 million is poor. Mexico receives almost no aid from the US government. And the result in the US? No noticeable drop in the supply of cheap drugs – and an actual decline in the price of cocaine, according to a new UN report. Some analysts say Mexico's approach has not only failed to stanch the flow of drugs but is also destabilizing the young democracy. Mexico needs to turn back now, they say." Dave Murray, a policy analyst with the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said that "Washington understands the sacrifice being made by Mexico, but that it also is in Mexico's interest to fight the traffickers vigorously." Murray said, "It's been a horrendous fight for them. We have to salute their willingness to take on this fight." Murray added, "If drugs transit through your country and you think, 'Well it's just for those norteamericanos. The money comes to us, the drugs to them. What's the problem?' They soon discover drugs are left behind as payment in kind for services provided. And local traffickers soon become drug dealers. And to whom do they sell? To local kids. … The problems will become worse and worse as narcotraffickers corrode the system... and you will find them growing into a power within the nation that can actually threaten the legitimacy and viability of democratic governments." But that, critics say, is "just what is happening now with the stepped-up war."

"El Chapo" Proves To Be A Tough Adversary For Law Enforcement. The San Diego Union-Tribune/Copley News (7/2, Walker) reports, "The arrests in recent years of several drug traffickers – including Gulf cartel leader Cardenas, Tijuana cartel leader Benjamín Arellano Félix and the Amezcua brothers – strengthened other cartel leaders." DEA spokesman Misha Piastro said, "He is very ambitious and very active. He's extremely clever and he's willing to invest the time and money to do big projects." Copley News adds, "A 26-page federal indictment handed down against Guzmán 11 years ago in San Diego accused Guzmán, 51, of trying to ship seven tons of cocaine packed in cans of jalapeño chili peppers across the border at Tecate. The indictment also described a tunnel he ordered built in Otay Mesa, complete with railroad tracks and lighting, and accused him of building another tunnel that ended under a pool table in a Douglas, Ariz., bar. The table was raised and lowered with a hydraulic lift, Piastro said. The US government is offering a $5 million reward for Guzmán's capture, and DEA agents in San Diego staff a 24-hour hotline to collect tips on his whereabouts. Some of the tips that come through the hotline, which can be dialed from almost anywhere in Latin America, are valid. Others prove to be false. One caller reported – erroneously – that Guzmán had been spotted dancing the tango in Los Angeles. But another caller may have been Guzmán himself 'trying to verify that the hotline wasn't set up by his rivals,' Piastro said. 'It wouldn't be out of character for him to do something like that,' Piastro said. 'He's pretty brazen.' Guzmán has proved a tough adversary for Mexican law enforcement. 'We are looking for him everywhere, but it's difficult to determine where he is,' José Luis Santiago Vasconcelos, Mexico's deputy attorney general for organized crime, said during an interview with foreign correspondents earlier this year. 'He's not a subject that we see established in one place, living, defended by a big group of gunmen.'"

The Los Angeles Times (7/5, Boudreaux) reports, "Although US officials have repeatedly praised Mexico's anti-drug efforts under President Vicente Fox, including the arrest of 18 cartel leaders over the last four years, Guzman's elusiveness is an embarrassing symbol of the country's failure to stop the bloodshed or slow the flow of cocaine, heroin, marijuana and amphetamines into the United States. 'He is the last of the Mohicans,' said Jorge Chabat, a Mexico City expert on law enforcement issues. 'All the other big cartels have been decapitated. That is why they want him so badly.'" The Times adds, 'US authorities also want to get Shorty, who was indicted in 1995 in San Diego on charges of money laundering and conspiracy to import tons of cocaine. In December, federal authorities offered a $5-million reward for tips leading to his capture and are sharing intelligence with Mexican authorities. Since then, the dragnet has tightened with the arrests in Mexico of Guzman's 21-year-old son, a brother, two nephews and a niece, all accused of aiding his drug business. Nine houses and six vehicles belonging to him and his associates were seized in June. Rival drug traffickers are after him too. They killed another of his brothers and two of his associates in a Mexican prison last year. But so far the heat on Guzman has merely enhanced his mystique as an untouchable outlaw constantly on the move, escorted by 10 armed bodyguards and apparently shielded across Mexico by a web of corrupt officials to whom he once boasted paying a total of $5 million per month."

Nuevo Laredo Residents Trapped In Deadly War Between Rival Drug Cartels. The San Diego Union-Tribune/Copley News (7/2, Walker) reports, "For almost three years, people in this dusty border city of 500,000 have been trapped in a deadly war being waged by two drug cartels for control of the lucrative corridor between Nuevo Laredo and its US sister city, Laredo, Texas. One of the cartels is led by Joaquin 'El Chapo' Guzmán. … The other is headed by Osiel Cárdenas. … The two drug kingpins are vying for control of the most important commercial crossing between the United States and Mexico, according to law enforcement officials on both sides of the border. Roughly 9,000 tractor-trailers rumble over Nuevo Laredo's World Trade Bridge into the United States each day, accounting for almost 50 percent of the U.S.-Mexico commercial border traffic. The volume of truck traffic is so overwhelming that, US officials acknowledge, truckloads of narcotics slip through undetected. The violence has escalated in recent months as the cartels struggle to control this gateway into the United States."

Nuevo Laredo Families Desperate For Information About "Los Des-Aparecidos." The Houston Chronicle (7/4, Pinkerton) reports, "Nancy Segovia, an anxious 20-year-old wife and mother, searches for a husband who did not return from his job as a Nuevo Laredo policeman three weeks ago. Two Laredo men, William Slemaker, 52, and Pablo Cisneros, 49, search for their daughters, who vanished 10 months ago while visiting this violence-torn border city. Last week, the three stood in 100-degree-plus temperatures outside a Mexican military base, trying to learn whether their loved ones were among the 44 people rescued by federal agents from two safe houses operated by a drug cartel. The wife and fathers gathered with hundreds of others from both sides of the border, desperate for information about people known as los des- aparecidos, or the missing ones. The rescue operation June 29 raised the hopes of Segovia, Slemaker, Cisneros and many others looking for relatives who vanished, with no ransom demands, during a three-year turf war between rival drug cartels. Each was disappointed." The Chronicle adds, "In Nuevo Laredo, the faces of the missing stare out from homemade posters attached to street lights, taped to doorways of police stations or printed in newspaper ads. In a city that has seen more than 70 killings linked to the drug war so far this year, the missing are largely unknown to the public, and the local police seem to have done little to find them."

Mexican Authorities Abruptly End Search For Human Remains At Remote Ranch House Near Nuevo Laredo. The San Antonio Express-News (7/3, Zarazua) reports, "Federal police abruptly ended their search for human remains Saturday morning at a remote ranch house on the edge of town here, leaving the property without saying what, if anything, they'd found. All that was left inside the compound's cinderblock walls were piles of disturbed earth and a broken black metal gate. A small contingent of Mexican military troops remained outside the beige-colored compound this morning, but the troops leader said they were on 'routine patrol.' On Friday, an FBI spokesman said US agents who had been on the scene earlier this week believed the bones that had been found were those of animals. The FBI has since not returned here. The headline in one of today's afternoon dailies in Nuevo Laredo screamed 'NADA AUN,' or 'Nothing Yet.' Federal police spent all day Friday digging the patio of the ranch house in the sweltering heat in search of human remains believed to have been buried there by drug cartel hit men. The ranch house is about nine miles south of the Texas-Mexico border near the Nuevo Laredo highway leading to Monterrey."

Drug-Fueled Corruption Alleged In Highest Levels Of Venezuela's Security Forces. The Miami Herald (7/4, Dudley, Gunson) reports, "In [Bejuma, Venezuela], people still talk about the 'Bejuma massacre' in a whisper, partly because one man who spoke out is in a grave, partly because the killers were allegedly policemen. But the source of the fear can be summed up in a single word: drug trafficking, on the kind of massive level and involving corrupt government officials that has long been a profound problem in neighboring Colombia. Drug seizures in Venezuela doubled in the past four years. There are mounting allegations of drug-fueled corruption at the highest levels of the security forces, accompanied by what appears to be official indifference. Just last month, a suspected Colombian trafficker wanted in the United States escaped from a Venezuelan police lockup after allegedly bribing his guards." The Herald adds, "The rising drug trafficking has become yet another sore point in relations between the Bush administration and Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, a fiery populist who has repeatedly accused the US government of trying to topple him. 'There are a few people who see [drugs] as a global problem, but those people are few and far between,' said one Western counter-drug official who asked for anonymity because he did not have official permission to speak publicly on the topic. Venezuela has long been a transit country for illegal Colombian drugs. But record seizures in 2004 that reached 32 tons of cocaine and 12 tons of heroin and marijuana put authorities on the alert."

US Envoy Sees Decline In Venezuelan Cooperation In Effort To Fight Terrorism, Drug Trafficking. The AP (7/4) reports, "A decline in cooperation between Venezuelan and U.S. authorities has weakened efforts to fight terrorism and drug trafficking, the US. ambassador to the South American country said." US Ambassador William Brownfield said in an interview broadcast Sunday on the Venezuelan television station Televen, "On the issue of illegal drugs, we have a situation where we have a reduction in cooperation between some police forces. I wish we could have more cooperation in passing along more information on matters of terrorism, the movement of specific people."

Reuters (7/4) reports, "Cooperation between Venezuela and the United States to fight terrorism and drug-trafficking has run into problems and could be improved, the U.S. ambassador to Caracas said on Sunday. William Brownfield said 'complicated problems' had emerged in the relationship between Venezuela, the world's No. 5 oil exporter, and its biggest energy client, the United States."

FBI, ATF Investigating Suspicious Fire At Florida Abortion Clinic This Morning. WPTV-TV West Palm Beach (7/5) reports on its Web site, "Agents from the FBI have joined investigators from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms this morning at the scene of a late night fire at the Presidential Women's clinic in West Palm Beach. The origin of the fire at the clinic which performs abortions appears to be suspicious. There were no injuries . West Palm Beach mayor Lois Frankel will issue a statement this morning as investigators and firefighters remain on the scene."

WPost Criticizes House's DC Gun Vote. The Washington Post (7/4) editorializes that a majority of the U.S. House of Representatives trampled "upon the right of self-determination" by overturning a city law and voting "to allow D.C. residents to keep in their homes loaded shotguns and rifles, as well as handguns bought before 1976, unbounded by trigger locks or disassembled. The deed itself makes a mockery of Congress as a federal body. If the action is allowed to stand, however, the consequences could be even worse: The nation's capital will become a deadlier place in which to live." The Post says "the notion of Congress encouraging citizens in the nation's capital to keep loaded and unprotected guns in their homes borders on insanity."

Tax Court Procedure Called Into Question During Attorney's Fraud Trial. The National Law Journal (7/5, Coyle) reports, "A seven-year-old secret report by a special trial judge of the U.S. Tax Court in the lengthy and complex fraud trial of a renowned tax lawyer and his business partners found no fraud -- not even a suspicion of fraud -- by the three men, despite a subsequent Tax Court decision to the contrary." The Journal continues, "The conflict between the original report and the Tax Court decision has prompted some to raise ethical questions about Tax Court procedures and to call on Congress to examine them. … The Tax Court recently released the report after the U.S. Supreme Court held earlier this year that 'no statute authorizes, and the current text of [Tax Court] Rule 183 does not warrant,' the concealment of special trial judge reports by the Tax Court." The Journal adds, "The Supreme Court ruling -- Ballard v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, No. 03-184, and Estate of Kanter v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, No. 03-1034 -- followed years of litigation over the report in three federal circuits by lawyers for estate and tax attorney Burton W. Kanter and his business partners Claude Ballard and Robert Lisle, all of whom believed the report would exonerate them. … Special Trial Judge D. Irwin Couvillion oversaw the five-week trial in 1994 in which the government charged Kanter, Ballard and Lisle with $30 million in tax deficiencies and civil fraud penalties in three alleged kickback schemes. In his 300-page report, produced four years later, Couvillion, who did not have authority to issue the Tax Court's final decision, said the court 'cannot find or conclude' that the claimed kickback schemes existed or, if they did exist, that there was tax fraud in connection with them."

NYTimes Calls For Repeal Of Internet Sales Tax Exemption. The New York Times (7/5) editorializes, "Thirteen years is a long time to get a pass. A 1992 Supreme Court decision has exempted Internet retailers from the obligation to collect most sales taxes on the grounds that it would be unduly burdensome. Back then, the country's thousands of state and local taxing jurisdictions all had differing rules. But times have changed, and the law of the land should, too. … Online sales-tax collection can be done nationwide. Many retailers already collect the taxes. Now Congress should step up and pass a law overturning the court's exemption in states that have streamlined their tax systems. That would allow hard-pressed states to take in roughly $20 billion a year in annual sales tax revenue that is rightfully theirs, and perhaps much more, depending on the growth in online shopping. It would also help level the playing field between local and online retailers."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Speculation Grows About Possible Gonzales Nomination To Supreme Court. As Attorney General Alberto Gonzales visited Iraq over the weekend, speculation ran rampant that President Bush was considering him as a replacement for Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her retirement on Friday. So far, opposition to Gonzales has come from the GOP's evangelical conservative base, which is wary of the Attorney General because of rulings on abortion he made as a state Supreme Court justice in Texas. Both CBS and NBC ran full segments on the possibility of a Gonzales nomination, while ABC noted his trip to Iraq.

The AP (7/4, Sherman) reports Gonzales "deflected questions about his interest in serving on the Supreme Court and said Sunday that criticism about his conservative credentials did not bother him. 'Many of the people speaking probably don't have all the information about prospective nominees. What's important is what the president of the United States thinks about me,' Gonzales told reporters while flying to the Middle East."

The Washington Post (7/4, A1, Eggen) reports that in an interview with The Washington Post on his way to Iraq, "Gonzales said he would continue to be directly involved in making recommendations to President Bush for a possible successor to retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But Gonzales, a close friend and longtime confidant to Bush, declined to comment on his own chances or interest in the post. 'There will be a group of people who will share their thoughts with the president about a nominee, and obviously I am part of those discussions,' Gonzales said. 'But I'm not going to talk about the details of those discussions or the recommendations or anything like that...I think the president is going to be deliberative in his decision.'" Although Bush "may 'take some time' to make a final call, Gonzales added," the President "is adamant that a new justice be confirmed by October."

The CBS Evening News (7/3, lead story, 2:25, Guida) reported the "conservative base is already feeding President Bush plenty about one possible pick, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, and it's not a spoonful of sugar. The right wing questions his stance on abortion, trying to derail any Gonzales bandwagon before it gets rolling." Some conservative groups "are already lining up against Gonzales." Jay Sekulow, American Center for Law & Justice: "There is concern on the right. There is no doubt about it. There's not a lot of enthusiasm." Guida: "But Senator Arlen Specter, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee that will review the nominee, suggested conservatives should hold their fire."

Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (7/3, Mitchell) to comment on conservative opposition to Gonzales, Specter said, "My reaction is that people ought to hold their fire and stand back and realize that it's President George W. Bush who was elected with the constitutional authority to make the designations. … I think the conservatives are entitled to express themselves, but I think they ought to have some respect for the president. And Attorney General Gonzales is a very well-qualified man, and I don't think he really deserved to be criticized." Reuters (7/4, Elsner) reports Hatch said on CBS' "Face The Nation" he "had spoken to Bush on Saturday and expected a nominee within a couple of days after Bush's return."

Sekulow said on CBS' Face the Nation (7/3, Roberts), "You know, it's interesting. We have the vacancy of Justice O'Connor, and at the same time, the court is taking one major life case involving parental notification. Alberto Gonzales, when he was a judge in the Texas Supreme Court, dealt with that issue, came out on the other side of it, where the conservative groups are. So there's some concern. There's also the issue of, he's the attorney general of the United States. He's doing a fantastic job, by the way. He was a great White House counsel, too. You're in the middle of a war on terror. … And the idea that we're going to switch the attorney general out in the middle of that, I find to be timing not particularly great."

NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 4, 2:10, Seigenthaler) said "some of the President's most conservative supporters don't want Gonzales at all." Conservatives "are putting pressure on Bush, saying Gonzales can't be trusted. But an advisor with close ties to the White House says that's only speculation." C. Boyden Gray, Committee for Justice: "If the President wants to nominate Judge Gonzales, he will. I don't think he's going to be constrained by these interest groups."

Gray was asked on Fox News Sunday (7/3, Wallace) to respond to Sunday's New York Times story that claimed he led a delegation to the White House warning President Bush not to nominate Attorney General Gonzales; Gray replied, "That was news to me. I don't think we discussed any individuals in that meeting, which was about process, not about people. And I would, of course, support Judge Gonzales if he were nominated. So I don't know where the story came from. … If the president wants to nominate him, he will, and he will be confirmed."

Sen. Orrin Hatch, asked on CBS' Face the Nation (7/3, Roberts) for his views on the potential nomination of Gonzales, said, "Let me just say this, I think that's pure bunk. Gonzales is a terrific human being, a good lawyer, a person who has more than shown that he's a good human being and a person who could handle the job. If the president chooses Alberto Gonzales, I think Alberto Gonzales will do the job, do it well. And I think we would all feel pretty good about it." But "some of the right-wing groups, of course, are trying to push the president into getting the most conservative person that they can get. And they don't consider Judge Gonzales to be as conservative as some of the others. But I can tell you, he's a person of integrity and a person of ability, a person with good temperance, you know, temperancy. He's a very fine man. And if he gets picked, I'm certainly going to support him."

In as preview of the upcoming Senate battle, the Los Angeles Times (7/4, Brownstein, Schmitt) reports that senators from both parties "jostled Sunday to define the rules of engagement in the political struggle…Bush's first Supreme Court nomination." In appearances across all the Sunday talk shows, "members of the Senate Judiciary Committee sparred about whether nominees should be asked their views on specific issues such as abortion, whether it was appropriate to apply more scrutiny to nominees who would change the court's balance of power, and what the circumstances, if any, might be that would justify a filibuster against Bush's eventual choice."

The New York Times (7/4, Hulse, Nagourney) reports "White House officials were privately encouraging lawmakers not to get drawn into speculation over candidates' names but to concentrate on calling for quick and fair consideration of whomever President Bush nominates. … Democrats called for a deliberate review of any nominee and pledged to press the eventual candidate on issues including abortion and same-sex marriage, while Republicans declared that such specific inquiries were out of line."

The AP (7/4, Yost) reports that "asked whether he would support a filibuster if a hard-liner is chosen, the judiciary committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick Leahy, said, 'I would hope that we don't reach that point.' 'That's why we're going to meet with the president in about a week, going to urge that he put somebody who would unite the country, not divide the country,' said Leahy."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (7/4, O'Rourke) says "the top Republican and Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee appealed for restraint, at least until President Bush announces his choice in a week or so. 'We ought to tone down the rhetoric,'" said Specter. Leahy added, "Let's take it easy."

Sen. Joseph Biden, appearing on CBS' Face the Nation (7/3, Roberts), said, "I was chairman at the time of Bork and Thomas. And it is true, I did allow both to go out without recommendation. … I could have stopped each of them from getting a vote in the full Senate. But I didn't let them out because I believed that a filibuster was wrong. I let them out because I believe the Constitution says the Senate…must decide whether or not to let a vote occur, not a committee. … I have no intention of filibustering anybody. It depends on who the president sends. But I could see a circumstance. For example, if he sent up" Judge Janice Rogers Brown "I can assure you, that would be a very, very, very difficult fight, and she probably would be filibustered."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (7/4, Mcgough) reports, "In the sort of 'gotcha' moment that has become common on Sunday television talk shows, George Stephanopoulos, the host of ABC's 'This Week,' yesterday confronted Sen. Edward Kennedy with Kennedy's own words from the 1967 debate over the confirmation of Thurgood Marshall for a seat on the US Supreme Court." Stephanopoulos "noted that Kennedy had told his colleagues that they shouldn't take Marshall's judicial philosophy into account but instead should limit their inquiry to the nominee's 'background, experience qualifications and temperament.'"

The New York Times (7/4, Kirkpatrick) reports "Bork, the former Supreme Court nominee whose rejection 18 years ago has hovered over every confirmation since, is back in the spotlight. … Defending the Senate's role in approving nominees, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, reprised in an appearance on ABC the speech he made attacking Mr. Bork shortly after his nomination. 'Can we imagine what this country would be like today if Judge Bork had gone onto the Supreme Court with his views about civil rights and other issues?' he said. 'It would be an entirely different America.'" Since then, however, "Bork has become an inspiration to many conservatives, who say they have organized and raised money to support the nomination of like-minded jurists."

Sen. Ted Kennedy writes in today's Washington Post (7/4, A17) that "the president should reject the pressure of the extreme factions of his party that want litmus tests for his nominee. This process shouldn't just be about whether the next justice would help roll back women's rights by overturning Roe v. Wade , the law of the land. It should be about something much more basic: protecting our core constitutional values for generations to come, the freedoms that we've fought for, bled for and died for. … I haven't always agreed with O'Connor. I didn't agree earlier this year that we should continue to execute juveniles. And I certainly didn't agree with her in Bush v. Gore." But "she was fair and tried to interpret the law. Unfortunately, many of those whom President Bush has nominated to the lower courts in the past four years have wanted to remake the law to suit their own ideologies . I hope the president will consult with the Senate and select a consensus nominee as dedicated to the Constitution as Sandra Day O'Connor."

The Washington Times (7/4, A1, Hurt) quotes Sen. Chuck Schumer saying, "I think the number one thing that I am interested in are the nominee's views." The notion of "picking apart a nominee to the federal bench based on his personal opinions about political matters is out of bounds, conservatives say. 'It's asking them to basically run on a political platform,' Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, responded to Mr. Schumer yesterday."

The New York Times (7/4, Deutsch) asks whether "now that Justice O'Connor is leaving the court…the pendulum swing back to give employers the right to hire and fire as they please, or even encourage them to dismantle voluntary affirmative action programs." Neither "business leaders nor minority advocates," says the Times, "expect that to happen. Minorities and women, they note, make up an increasingly large part of the potential work force -- and of the consumer base."

The Washington Post (7/4, A15, Lane) says in its "Full Court Press" column that while "O'Connor and her centrist legacy may have been at the center of attention because of her surprise retirement announcement Friday, the center of power during the term was one chair to her left, where Justice Anthony M. Kennedy -- the court's other center-right swing voter -- sits." In three "crucial cases" this term, Kennedy, "a 1988 appointee of President Ronald Reagan, defected from the five-member right-of-center bloc that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist nominally leads." Kennedy "joined with the court's liberals to abolish the death penalty for juvenile offenders, to give local governments a green light to take private property for economic development and to endorse a broad theory of federal regulatory power that denied states the right to override a federal law against homegrown medical marijuana."

The New York Times (7/4, Greenhouse) adds that in this last term, "the court displayed a growing concern about the death penalty, with the majority suggesting that lower courts had taken the Supreme Court's impatience with prolonged appeals too far toward short-circuiting defendants' rights. The justices also gave broad interpretations to three federal antidiscrimination laws." Justice Stephen G. Breyer, adds the Times, "displaced…O'Connor at the court's center of gravity, casting the fewest dissenting votes." The AP (7/4, Holland) runs a similar story, saying "the power broker at the Supreme Court this term was the 'junior justice,' Stephen Breyer."

The Legal Times (7/4, Goldman) reports, "Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's surprise retirement leaves President George W. Bush in a bind: Can he possibly replace the first woman on the Supreme Court with a white male? … After all, prior to O'Connor's July 1 announcement, most of the smart money for a potential high court nominee was on middle-aged white judges such as John Roberts of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit and J. Michael Luttig of the 4th Circuit. But that was to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who, at least for the moment, is staying. … 'Do you replace O'Connor with a woman, or with a Hispanic, so you have a new first?' says American University law professor Stephen Wermiel. 'The question is, who are you trying to appease? And are you looking for a fight — or looking to avoid a fight?'" The Times adds, "Competing interest groups lost no time in laying down markers, and rallying their troops. Hispanic activists, for one, and their interest groups say the opportunity is ripe for Bush to name the nation's first Hispanic justice. Nominating a Hispanic would also help the Republican Party woo a key and growing constituency that it has actively courted. … But the person some see as the leading Hispanic candidate, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, is viewed as flatly unacceptable by the hard-line conservative and evangelical groups that take credit for Bush's presidential re-election victory. … 'He's not an ideological conservative; it's not a world he comes from,' notes one senior Republican Senate staffer. "And we don't believe he has convictions he will stand by. As one former Supreme Court clerk said to me, 'When the most charming man in Washington, [Justice] Stephen Breyer, comes calling, will Gonzales stand up for his beliefs?' … That may make someone like Judge Emilio Garza of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit a more likely candidate. Garza is viewed as a passionate opponent of Roe v. Wade. And if the White House seeks a minority candidate, but not a Hispanic one, it could turn to former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, now general counsel of PepsiCo."

In a column for the Weekly Standard (7/4), Fred Barnes writes, "Through a campaign aide, Bush answered a question about the kind of Supreme Court justice he admired. The answer was Antonin Scalia, a conservative. That was in 1999, as Bush was beginning his race for the presidency. He was asked a similar question later that year by Tim Russert on Meet the Press. The answer was the same--Scalia. Now jump to the summer of 2003 as Bush is preparing for his reelection campaign. Meeting with advisers at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, Bush said one of his top priorities is to create a diverse Republican party with many more Hispanics." Barnes continues, "Bush's comments point to the two directions he must choose between in selecting a nominee to replace Sandra Day O'Connor on the Supreme Court. The first--the Scalia direction--would be to pick a respected conservative jurist and thus move the ideological tilt of the court to the right. The second would be to choose Attorney General Alberto Gonzales or another Hispanic, a step unlikely to change the court's current ideological posture." Barnes adds, "The first would be in sync with the thrust of Bush's presidency. As Bush and his aides never tire of telling everyone, he came to the White House to do big things and achieve important changes. And transforming the Supreme Court into a more conservative body and shrinking the role of unelected judges in American life is one of his major goals. … Nominating a full-blown judicial conservative--there are plenty to choose from--would surely provoke a bitter confirmation struggle in the Senate. He might even lose the fight. But all of Bush's accomplishments have come over the strong opposition of Democrats or have drawn sharp criticism from them. This includes tax cuts, education reform, creation of a Homeland Security Department, and Iraq. Bush's motto, if he had one, should be no pain, no gain. … Naming Gonzales or another Hispanic to the high court would be in line with Bush's political goal of enlarging the Republican party. And picking Gonzales might indeed help in that regard. He would be the first Hispanic justice. A Gonzales nomination would also be personally satisfying to Bush. 'The president loves Alberto Gonzales and trusts him,' Texas Senator John Cornyn, a friend of both, said. Gonzales was Bush's White House counsel before becoming attorney general. … But there's a difference between trying to improve the position of a political party and seizing an historic opportunity to change both the role and the rulings of the federal judiciary. The first is a decision any president or politician would make. Given the furor the second could provoke, it's a decision only a few presidents would make. My guess is Bush is one of them."

Bush Defends Gonzales, Discusses O'Connor Vacancy. In a telephone interview with USA Today (7/5, Keen), President Bush "said Monday that special-interest groups running TV ads and mobilizing supporters for a fight over his choice of a successor to Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor should 'tone down the heated rhetoric.'" In addition, he "forcefully defended Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a prospect criticized by conservatives." Conservative groups, says USA Today, "have criticized Gonzales, who, as a member of the Texas Supreme Court, backed exceptions to a state law requiring teenagers to notify a parent before getting an abortion." Bush also "said he won't rush a decision but wants her successor to be on the bench when the Supreme Court resumes work in October."

USA Today (7/5) prints the transcript of the interview in today's edition. Bush said, "My call to the senators who will be leading the debate on either side is to help elevate this rhetoric so that the country will take a prideful look at the process, recognize there will be differences of opinion but that we can step back after it's over and say, 'That's the way we ought to conduct a debate on something as serious as a Supreme Court nominee.'" Asked if "the attacks on Gonzales are out of line," the President answered, "Al Gonzales is a great friend of mine. I'm the kind of person, when a friend gets attacked, I don't like it. We're lucky to have him as the attorney general, and I'm lucky to have him as a friend." He later said, "I'm considering a pretty good-sized group of people right now, and of course, there's a diverse group of citizens."

USA Today also quotes Bush saying, "I have reached out to members of the Senate and will continue to do so. And then there will be a period of time in which I myself will sit down with the prospective nominees. But I was very serious when I said we need to have this person on the bench prior to the beginning of the next session." However, says the Wall Street Journal (7/5, McKinnon, Cooper), "Bush's track record

-- and a nearly unbroken record of presidential precedent -- suggest that in the end, lawmakers will have little say in whom the president nominates." The White House "made much of Mr. Bush's conversation last week with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, when the two men discussed potential nominees to the Supreme Court shortly before Justice O'Connor's retirement was announced," but "neither the Bush White House's operating style nor historical precedent suggests that those conversations will have much effect."

The O'Connor vacancy received extensive media coverage last night and this morning. Media stories indicate Christian Evangelicals are determined to see President Bush choose a Supreme Court nominee who supports their positions on issues as abortion, church-state cases, gay rights, and affirmative action. ABC World News Tonight (7/4, story 6, 2:30, Gibson) reported O'Connor's decision "to retire set off a weekend of intense preparation, by those who want to influence who will replace her. And among the places where the campaign to enlist support was strong, were at conservative Christian churches." ABC (Tapper) added, "Bush's dilemma is to find a nominee with appeal to the mainstream while also satisfying the Republican base of Christian conservatives, who clearly have expectations." Many of their leaders "worry the most prominent candidate for the court, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, is not as conservative on some of these social issues as are others on the court."

NBC Nightly News (7/4, story 5, 2:10, O'Donnell) reported White House advisors say aides "have been preparing special files on potential Supreme Court nominees for the President to review aboard Air Force One." Bush's "conservative base flatly does not want a repeat" of the moderate O'Connor. Lanier Swann, Concerned Women for America: "What we would like to see is a jurist who is not a swing vote. We don't want to be surprised by his opinion." O'Donnell: "Democrats just as firm on the need for a moderate." But there may be "early agreement against one potential choice", Attorney General Gonzales. The "right fears Gonzales's position on abortion. The left worries about his role in writing policy on the treatment of war prisoners."

On CNN's Inside Politics (7/11), analyst William Schneider said "the new vacancy gives conservatives a shot at turning the majority on the court against abortion. They don't want to risk it with another stealth nominee, like [David] Souter, so they've begun to rally against Gonzales, even though there's no clear indication Bush will nominate him." Likewise, the Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Feldmann) says that "for social conservatives, long active in Republican politics, the moment of truth has finally arrived: a chance to move the US Supreme Court to the right, particularly on abortion, gay rights, and other divisive cultural issues." Turning to the Attorney General's potential nomination, the Monitor says that "while conservative, the genial Gonzales is not seen as a hard-liner. And there's the rub: To social conservatives, he does not represent a reliable vote to overturn Roe v. Wade." The New York Times (7/5, Bumiller, Kirpatrick) also reports "many prominent conservatives are using contacts with the White House to press against a nomination" of the Attorney General.

The New York Times (7/5, Purdum) adds Bush "faces a daunting historical reality: presidents don't always get what they bargain for when they grant even seemingly close allies lifetime tenure on a fiercely independent institution, where the hot-button issues of the future are hard to predict. … It is precisely to guard against such surprises -- and the likes of more recent Republican appointees who have disappointed their party's conservative wing, from the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to David H. Souter and Anthony M. Kennedy -- that many conservatives are now urging Mr. Bush to pick an established jurist or legal scholar with a defined philosophy, clear paper trail and unimpeachable credentials on questions from abortion to property rights."

Reuters (7/5, Whitesides) reports the nomination "creates a maze of political risks for…Bush, with a wrong move either angering his conservative base or igniting a partisan brawl that could sink the rest of his second-term agenda." Analysts, adds Reuters, "say the fight could pollute Washington's already strained atmosphere and turn off middle-of-the-road voters seen as crucial to Republican hopes to expand their majority in the 2006 congressional elections and win the 2008 White House race."

USA Today (7/5, Kiely) runs a similar story under the headline "For Bush, A Lot Riding On Court Appointment," calling Bush's upcoming pick "one of the most momentous decisions of his career." USA Today adds that "the intensity of Bush's commitment to social conservatives' agenda is unclear," and "conservatives and religious activists, whom Bush political adviser Karl Rove identified as being key to the president's re-election, are reminding the president that he owes them." The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Bravin, Cummings) also says "the first stage of the fight…is shaping up as a struggle within the conservative coalition over steering the White House choice. … Evangelical Christians are the most vocal."

The New York Times (7/5, Sanger) considers Bush's decision-process. "If the past is any guide," says the Times, "Mr. Bush will prove vague as he nears a decision. When considering other top appointments or big decisions, he has shown that he is not above sending conflicting signals to mask his intentions, or catering, at least rhetorically, to differing constituencies. And he has not shied from confrontation, as even he alluded to on Friday when, while praising Justice O'Connor, he also announced that his nominee deserved 'fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote.'"

The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Mullins) analyzes the effect of the vacancy on the agenda currently before Congress. The Journal reports that Bob Stevenson, a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "said the confirmation process will have only a 'minimal' effect on the Republican agenda. Indeed, there will be little difference in the pace of action before the Judiciary Committee starts confirmation hearings, likely in September." That "leaves senators with just a month to reach a final deal with the House on highway legislation and to approve the Central American Free Trade Agreement, Mr. Bush's major trade initiative. When confirmation hearings begin, senators will find it more difficult to make progress on their priorities as senators shift attention to the judicial process, and time on the Senate calendar dwindles."

The Washington Post (7/5, Lane) focuses on the vacancy's effect on future decisions. O'Connor's past opinions "show that she would have played a pivotal role" in key issues. Now, "their outcome may hinge on the views of her successor. Learning those views may prove challenging to senators, if a nominee adheres to the practice of not answering questions about matters that are, or soon will be, before the court." Even if O'Connor "were replaced by a conservative opponent of Roe v. Wade , the 1973 ruling recognizing a right to abortion, Roe would still have the support of a five-justice majority. … Still, next term will present O'Connor's successor with a chance to answer important questions about the scope of Roe as well as other precedents." Analyzing the current court, meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (7/5, Bravin) says "the successor to…O'Connor on the Supreme Court will enter an arena increasingly shaped by the competing legal theories of two justices: Antonin Scalia and Stephen Breyer."

The New York Times (7/5, Liptak) and the Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Richey) analyze O'Connor's legacy as the first woman in the Supreme Court,

Many Gonzales Aides Have Conservative Credentials. The Washington Post (7/5, A11, Eggen) reports "at least half a dozen" of Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez's "senior aides also worked under him when he ran the White House counsel's office." Former colleagues "now at Justice include his chief of staff, his deputy chief of staff, two senior counselors and the head of the legal policy office. In addition, the Bush administration's nominee to be Gonzales's second-in-command, Timothy E. Flanigan, also served as his White House deputy." Still, Justice officials are "quick to stress that this group of alumni is part of a broader circle of advisers that Gonzales relies upon, including holdovers from John D. Ashcroft's tenure and new hires who have not worked closely with him in the past." Gonzalez deputy chief of staff D. Kyle Sampson "said that 'talking about a White House mafia or something like that would not accurately characterize his openness and inclusiveness.'" The Post adds many Gonzalez aides "have extensive and deeply conservative credentials." Among them are chief of staff Theodore W. Ullyot, Associate Attorney General Robert D. McCallum, Tasia Scolinos, the director of public affairs, counselors Raul F. Yanes, Jeffrey Taylor, and Courtney Simmons Elwood, Rachel Brand, acting head of the department's influential Office of Legal Policy, Michael A. Battl , head of the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, and Deputy Attorney General-designate Timothy E. Flanigan.

Female Candidates Given Good Chance. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Bravin, Cummings, Greenberger) says the retirement of O'Connor, "the first woman on the Supreme Court and one of two currently, is expected to raise the profile of female candidates." The two women "most often mentioned on Bush short lists are Edith Jones, 54 years old, a former general counsel of the Texas Republican party who was appointed by President Reagan in 1985 to serve on the US Appeals court in New Orleans, and Janice Rogers Brown, 55, the African-American daughter of sharecroppers who grew up Greenville, Ala. and attended segregated schools. After fierce resistance by Senate Democrats, she was recently confirmed to become an appeals court judge as a result of a deal between moderate Democrats and Republicans." The Journal adds, "Social conservatives are comfortable with Judge Jones, who passes their abortion litmus test with high grades."

Special Interest Groups Gear Up For Nomination Fight. CNN's Inside Politics (7/11, Franken) reported, "Just about every special-interest group in the world on either side of the political spectrum has geared up for" the coming fight over Bush's Supreme Court nominee. The groups have "spent months raising millions to get ready for a battle royale, which is going to be taking place without a doubt once the president names his nominee. He says he wants somebody to be on the court, a replacement for Justice O'Connor, by October. There's an awful lot of battle ahead before that occurs."

The Washington Post (7/5, Edsall) reports "participants predict the competition for cash will turn the Senate confirmation into the most expensive nomination fight in the nation's history, certain to break $50 million and, if the nominee is especially controversial, likely to approach $100 million. Most of the money raised would not be publicly reported." The Post adds, "With the exception of such groups as MoveOn PAC, many organizations active in the fight are tax-exempt and have few, if any, disclosure requirements." On the right, "Progress for America, which spent $45 million in behalf of the Bush 2004 campaign, is committed to spending $18 million for targeted radio and television ads; the allied Judicial Confirmation Network plans to spend $2 million to $3 million for grass-roots lobbying of key senators; and Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, has vowed to put unspecified 'millions' behind a conservative nominee." On the left, "such groups as People for the American Way and MoveOn PAC already flexed their muscles in the debate over the 'nuclear option' proposal of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to end filibusters of judicial nominees. With far lower levels of public interest, People for the American Way was able to collect $5 million for the filibuster issue, MoveOn raised $1.5 million and the Alliance for Justice raised $1 million."

Deal On "Nuclear Option" Seen As Key Factor In Upcoming Battle. The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Chaddock) reports this morning, "The decision of 14 senators -- whether to hold or abandon an agreement to keep the wheels of the judicial appointments moving -- is emerging as the wildcard in the looming confirmation fight over the US Supreme Court." Six weeks ago, recounts the Monitor, "the Gang of 14 stunned the Senate by a bipartisan pact to allow long-delayed votes on President Bush's most controversial nominees, while preserving the minority's right to filibuster under 'extraordinary circumstances.' … Now that pact meets its ultimate test: filling a seat on a Supreme Court closely divided on issues ranging from abortion to property rights." Democrats "say the nuclear option is off the table for a Supreme Court nomination fight. Republicans say it emphatically is not. In the end, it's the Gang of 14 who decide which side is right. The key question: How resilient is that pact and the trust that binds it?"

More Commentary. Robert Bork, a former judge of the US Court of Appeals whose Supreme Court nomination was rejected by a Democratic Senate in 1987 writes in the Wall Street Journal (7/5), "Democratic senators' filibusters of the president's previous judicial nominees demonstrate liberals' determination to retain the court as their political weapon. … The leaders of the Democratic Party in the Senate are making it the party of moral anarchy, and they will fight to keep the Court activist and liberal. The struggle over the Supreme Court is not just about law: it is about the future of our culture." Adds Bork, "To restore the Court's integrity will require a minimum of three appointments of men and women who have so firm an understanding of the judicial function that they will not drift left once on the bench. Choosing, and fighting for, the right man or woman to replace Justice O'Connor is the place to start."

Along similar lines, the Wall Street Journal (7/5) editorializes, "For liberals, the courts have become the preferred way to win policy victories now that Americans are consistently rejecting their agenda at the ballot box. Unlike Barbara Jordan and her colleagues 25 years ago, modern liberals are unlikely to be satisfied with a nominee who is a 'good lawyer and believes in the Constitution.'" But "the only way to stop 'borking' as a political strategy is to defy and defeat it. Mr. Bush told voters in 2000 and 2004 that he would nominate Justices in the mold of Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. He owes it to the country, and his most loyal supporters, to keep that promise."

GOP Senators Crafting Compromise Stem Cell Legislation. Roll Call (7/5, Preston) reports, "A group of Republican Senators is working quietly on new embryonic stem-cell legislation intended to appease scientists while also avoiding a potentially politically damaging presidential veto. … The basis of the still-to-be drafted Senate bill would allow for federal funds to be used for embryonic stem-cell research, but would require that the embryo not be harmed during the process. Several Republicans said Congress should be promoting a technique currently used during genetic testing and in vitro fertilization that allows for a stem cell to be taken from the embryo without destroying it." Sen. Rick Santorum said, "Even though I question the potential of that research, nevertheless it is an area that the scientific community wants to do research and we want to make sure it is done in an ethical way." Santorum "said the discussions include Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Chairman Mike Enzi. Sen. Johnny Isakson "who is involved in the talks about the safe extraction of stem cells from embryos, said he thinks that this compromise bill would appease people on both sides of the debate."

California Stem Cell Research Institute Yet To Make Headway. The Wall Street Journal (7/5, Hamilton) reports that as Congress fights "over a bill that could expand federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, California's newly minted $3 billion commitment to the field is still trying to get itself off the ground." Eight months "after a state ballot initiative, Proposition 71, established the California Institute for Regenerative Medicine, the stem-cell agency's main accomplishment has been to bootstrap itself into existence." The Institute's "real mission -- to funnel roughly $300 million a year into California-based stem-cell research and facilities over the next decade -- is stalled." The Institute's funding "is in limbo" because of a lawsuit, while it has "been beset with controversies over its accountability and openness, including an effort by state legislators -- now on hold -- to impose tougher standards on the effort."

FEMA Asks Floridians To Return Aid Overpayments. The Washington Post and the New York Times run an AP story this morning (7/4) reporting that the Federal Emergency Management Agency "has asked thousands of Floridians whose homes were damaged by last summer's four hurricanes to give back more than $27 million in aid overpayments." FEMA "earlier this year began mailing letters to residents in efforts to recoup the overpayments from people who received federal aid after Hurricanes Charley, Frances, Ivan and Jeanne hit Florida last August and September." According to data supplied to the Fort Myers

News-Press through a Freedom of Information Act request, "the agency detailed 6,579 cases in which they say people owe a total of $27.2 million."

Pelosi Files Travel Reports On Three Previously Undisclosed Trips. In an indication that Democrats may not get the mileage out of the controversy over House Majority Leader Tom DeLay's travel at the expense of outside groups, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi on Friday filed reports on three previously undocumented trips. The Washington Post (7/5, A3, Allen) reports Rep. Pelosi "filed delinquent reports Friday" for the three trips "that were worth $8,580 and occurred as long as seven years ago." Pelosi's filing is "among hundreds of revisions from members of both parties who have amended missing or incomplete reports as scrutiny of lawmaker travel has intensified." The "most expensive trip was not reported on Pelosi's annual financial disclosure statement or on the travel disclosure form that is required within 30 days of a trip." House ethics committee members "have shown no appetite for taking up all those cases and are considering an amnesty for reporting violations, although not for serious matters such as accepting a trip from a lobbyist, which House rules forbid." The unreported trip "was a week-long 1999 visit to Taiwan, paid for by the Chinese National Association of Industry and Commerce, for 'meetings with government, military and business officials,' according to a filing Pelosi signed June 30. The flights cost $3,400 each for Pelosi and her husband. The hotel cost was $940. The sponsor, which has picked up trips for leaders of both parties, paid $300 for meals."

Federal Employees Concerned Salary Raises Will Be Less Frequent Due To Reforms. The Washington Post (7/5, A11, Lee) reports, "Here is why working for the federal government is so good: Federal civil servants, on average, have received a pay raise in every year but two since 1969, meaning they can pretty much bank on seeing their paychecks grow annually. But there is a cloud inside that silver lining: Average annual wages and salaries in the private sector have grown faster than civil service pay in the past 36 years, and so have consumer prices. … Many federal workers are growing increasingly anxious about their pay as the Bush administration prepares to toss out the 15-grade General Schedule, which links pay to longevity in a job, and replace it with a system that more directly ties salary increases to performance evaluations." Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, "said she fears that annual raises will suffer."

Settlement Expected In Wrongful Death Suit Involving Capitol Police. Roll Call (7/5, McArdle) reports, "A wrongful death suit brought by the wife of a Maryland man who died while in custody of the Capitol Police is likely headed toward settlement, a lawyer for the deceased's family said after a status hearing Thursday. After scheduling another status hearing for early October, U.S. District Judge James Robertson agreed, at the request of both sides, to refer the case to a magistrate judge, who could arbitrate a settlement agreement." Roll Call notes, "The original lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia in November 2004 by the family of Brandywine, Md., resident Gary Thompson. Thompson died Feb. 9, 2004, after he was arrested by Capitol Police following a traffic accident outside Union Station. His widow, Lois Thompson, is seeking $50 million in compensatory damages, as well as legal fees." Roll Call adds, "According to the lawsuit, Capitol Police officers responding to an accident in which a van driven by Gary Thompson collided with a taxicab…found Thompson still in his vehicle hunched over the steering wheel. The family contends that Thompson, a diabetic, suffered from a diabetic seizure shortly before the accident occurred. … After removing Thompson from the vehicle, officers placed him on the ground on his stomach and handcuffed him. … Thompson then fell unconscious; when paramedics arrived, they were unable to locate a pulse. He was pronounced dead about an hour later at Washington Hospital Center." Roll Call relates, "The following month, the D.C. Office of the Chief Medical Examiner labeled the cause of death 'positional asphyxia,' meaning his chest and rib cage were not able to expand so that he could draw breath. The death was ruled a homicide."

Health Net Vows To Fight Louisiana Judgment. The Los Angeles Daily News (7/2, Hopkins) reported that Health Net "vowed Friday to keep up its legal fight" following a Louisiana court decision applying "$117 million in fines stemming from the failure of three former subsidiaries." Health Net "sold its Foundation Health Plans in Louisiana, Oklahoma and Texas in April 1999 to AmCareco Inc. for an undisclosed price. Within three years, state regulators took over all three and placed them into receivership. Alleging fraud, conspiracy, negligence and other crimes, the receivers then sued both companies. Health Net has maintained its innocence throughout, but faced a setback on Thursday when a Louisiana jury awarded the Texas receivers $52.4 million in compensatory damages and another $65 million in punitive charges Roughly $8 million of the compensatory damages would be paid by other parties in the suit, however."

Health Net Vice President for Investor Relations David Olson said, "We continue to believe that the claims have no merit. We're going to continue to fight because we believe in our case. The fact of the matter is we sold them in 1999 and it was three years later that they became insolvent."

MarketWatch (7/1, Pritchard) reported that Health Net said it "continues to believe that the plaintiffs' claims have no merit and said it will 'continue to vigorously pursue all avenues of redress, including post-trial motions, appeals and its pending cross claims against other parties.'" The Portland Business Journal (7/2) reported that Health Net "said it will continue to vigorously pursue all avenues of redress, including post-trial motions, appeals and its pending cross claims against other parties." The Los Angeles Business Journal (7/1, Filus) also reported that Health Net "said it disagreed with the jury's decision and planned to appeal the judgment."

The Los Angeles Times (7/2) and the Hartford Courant (7/2) both ran a Bloomberg News brief on the Louisiana decision.

Merck Seeks Postponement Of First Vioxx Trial. The AP (7/4) reported that Merck is "asking a judge to delay the first wrongful death trial over its pain reliever Vioxx, saying it cannot receive a fair trial if the Texas case begins next week as scheduled. The company wants the trial postponed for at least 60 days, citing recent publicity about the drug. Merck withdrew the drug in September when research showed that patients who took it for 18 months or longer more than doubled their risk for heart attack and stroke. Since then, more than 2,400 Vioxx lawsuits have been filed nationwide." A hearing on Merck's motion is slated for today in Texas.

USA Today Backs "Health Courts" For Medical Legal Matters. USA Today (7/5) editorializes, "Physicians often abandon their best judgment if they think a test might protect them in a malpractice lawsuit." Defensive medicine "can reassure patients, but it isn't benign. It results in unnecessary cesarean sections, painful breast biopsies in women with lumps unlikely to be cancerous, and hospitalization of patients who don't need that level of care. The practice is pervasive and costs at least $60 billion a year, according to the Department of Health and Human Services -- paid by people's insurance premiums. … So far, the leading idea for a remedy has been President Bush's proposal to cap jury awards for pain and suffering, but it is stalled in the Senate and is a partial cure at best. Caps might lower malpractice insurance costs, but they don't tackle deeper problems. One intriguing idea, backed by the bipartisan legal reform group Common Good, is special 'health courts,' where judges experienced in medicine would try cases without juries. … The national malpractice roulette is inefficient and unjust. Health courts could show the way for quicker and fairer compensation to the deserving, and they might reduce the incentive for doctors to engage in defensive medicine that puts patients at risk. Starting the experiment is the right medicine for an ailing system."

Trial Lawyers Group's President Opposes Idea. In an opposing op-ed in USA Today (7/5), Association of Trial Lawyers of America President Todd A. Smith writes, "Replacing the basic fairness of individualized justice determined by the wisdom of 12 American men and women sitting on juries with one-size-fits-all 'health courts' is a bad idea and would impose huge additional burdens on state taxpayers. Our current legal system recognizes that each case has unique circumstances and gives juries -- your friends, neighbors and co-workers -- the responsibility to make fair decisions based on all the facts. The fundamental unfairness of health courts is the assumption that all similar injuries are the same. Would a typical American jury say the loss of a finger is worth more to a concert pianist than an office worker? Would 12 citizens decide reproductive systems are more important to people of child-bearing age than to elderly people? That's why we have juries."

Victims, Descendants Pursue Lost Art Using SCOTUS Ruling. The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Dotinga) reports on individuals who are taking on foreign governments "to force the return of artwork," such as that looted in the 1930s and 1940s by the Nazis. Although "some museums have returned plundered artwork to their owners or their descendants," other museums "seek support in European laws that emphasize statutes of limitations and the ownership rights of those who made purchases in 'good faith.'" The US Supreme Court "helped matters last year when it paved the way for Americans to sue foreign countries over stolen art." Even if American plaintiffs win their cases, however, "they'll face the challenge of convincing foreign governments to cough up the artwork." American lawyers who work on stolen art cases "say many disputes are handled privately, outside the court system. Bad publicity and the expense of hiring attorneys to fight lawsuits could convince foreign museums to try that route."

Iran Accuses US, Israel Of Lying About President-Elect. The AP (7/4, Dareini) reports Iran "accused the U.S. and Israel on Sunday of a smear campaign against its president-elect and warned Europe, which is in tricky nuclear negotiations with Tehran, not to join in the mudslinging." President-elect Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "has been accused of taking American hostages in 1979 when radical students seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. Iranian exiles and an Austrian politician are alleging he was involved in the 1989 slaying of a Kurdish leader and two associates in Vienna." But Iranian officials "have denied both allegations." Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi said, "The charges are so evidently false that they don't deserve an answer. It's clear that it's mere lies. Europeans should show their political maturity and not intertwine their interests with those of the Americans. They are advised to seriously avoid interference in this issue. We advise the Europeans not to fall into the trap of the Zionist media." The Washington Times (7/4) also runs the AP story.

Pakistani Supreme Court Overturns Acquittals Of Gang Rapists. NBC Nightly News (7/3, story 10, 2:25, Maceda) reported, "When Pakistan's Supreme Court overturned the acquittals this past week of 13 men accused of ordering and carrying out a so-called 'honoree', women's right's activists called it much more than a victory for the rape victim, 36-year-old Mukhtar Mai." Shahnaz Bokhari, women's right's activist:

As Many As Nine Defendants May Be Tried Jointly For Srebenica War Crimes. The New York Times (7/4, Simons) reports, "Prosecutors at the United Nations war crimes tribunal in The Hague are preparing a joint trial of nine of the highest-ranking officers accused of playing integral roles in the Srebrenica killings. Such a large joint trial would dwarf any other proceedings the court has held. All nine men face charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity, and five of them are accused of complicity to commit genocide. A joint trial is possible because eight of the generals and senior officers from the Bosnian Serb Army have arrived in The Hague in recent months, their 'voluntary surrender' largely a result of international pressure on the Serbian authorities. … Judges at the tribunal that deals with the former Yugoslavia must still approve prosecuting the men as a group, and no trial date has been set. Some lawyers who follow the court have said they fear that a joint trial could become a management nightmare, involving at least 18 defense lawyers and many prosecutors. Several defense lawyers have already objected to a joint trial."

Abbas Weighs Allowing Jordanian Troops Into West Bank. The Washington Times (7/5, Mitnick) reports, "Palestinian security chiefs and Jordanian officials are discussing sending a unit of the Jordanian military to the West Bank to boost stability after Israel's withdrawal. The deployment, backed by Palestinian Interior Minister Nasser Youssef, would strengthen Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' hand to enforce law and order on rogue bands of Palestinian militants that could undermine his administration." The Times adds, "Inviting the Jordanian troops across is a political decision that the Palestinian president has put off because it would signal a more confrontational approach toward militants."

Anti-Chavez Activist Faces 28 Years In Prison. The Christian Science Monitor (7/5, Ceaser) reports that Venezuelan political activist Maria Corina Machado could face up to 28 years in prison for "treason to the nation" and conspiracy. Machado, who works for Sumate, the organization that led last year's unsuccessful bid to recall President Hugo Chávez from office, has become "a cause célèbre for Chávez's opponents and a demon for his supporters. So when Machado met with President Bush in the White House May 31, it raised a firestorm of government criticism back in Caracas. Venezuela's foreign minister called the meeting 'a provocation,' and the interior minister charged that Machado was a puppet of the CIA, continuing the heated rhetoric that has characterized the relationship between the Bush administration and Venezuela's leftist leader."

Political Scandal In Brazil Intensifies. The Financial Times (7/5, Colitt) reports, "The political crisis in Brazil intensified on Monday as fresh allegations of improper fundraising threatened to force the resignation of figures close to President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva." Lula da Silva's government is "at its weakest since it came to power in January 2003." The Times adds, "Over the weekend Mr Lula da Silva's Workers' party, or PT, admitted having received financial aid from Marcos Valerio de Souza, head of a publicity firm with government contracts and the chief suspect in pay-offs to legislators. Delubio Soares, the PT's treasurer, admitted giving misleading information about the party's relations with Mr de Souza. The PT had previously denied a financial relationship with Mr de Souza, a friend of Mr Soares. … The scandal has angered traditional supporters of the PT, which for most of its 25-year existence has campaigned under the banner of ethical politics."

Gay Couples Register To Marry In Spain. The New York Times (7/5, Mclean) reports, "The lines inside the Madrid Civil Registry, where capital residents apply for marriage licenses, swelled with gay and lesbian couples for the first time on Monday, four days after Parliament passed a law giving same-sex couples across Spain the right to marry and to adopt children. The vote makes Spain the first nation to remove all legal distinctions between same-sex and heterosexual unions, say advocates for marriage rights for gay couples. Belgium, Canada and the Netherlands have also legalized gay marriage, but only Canada's laws, which do not yet apply to all of the country, contain language as liberal as Spain's."

Five Countries To Face EU Suits Over Energy Markets. The Wall Street Journal (7/5) reports, "The European Commission is set to launch court cases against five European Union countries that have failed to pass laws deregulating national energy markets, as part of a crackdown on laggard governments, people familiar with the matter said. At a meeting today, the commission is expected to endorse a decision to sue Estonia, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg and Spain at the European Court of Justice, a source said. The court has the power to impose heavy fines, but it usually takes about 20 months for it to deliver a verdict. … The court cases are the final step in the commission's legal process. The commission uses the courts only when governments have failed to heed two warnings to bring national legislation into line with EU law. Today, the commission will issue roughly 3,800 reprimands -- ranging from first warnings to suits -- to member governments."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Saudi Arabia Says Kills Top Al Qaeda Militant (REU-Y2)

By Dominic Evans

Reuters, July 5, 2005

Saudi Arabia's security forces killed the man at the top of its list of most wanted al Qaeda leaders in a clash in Riyadh on Sunday, the Interior Ministry said.

Moroccan national Younis Mohammad Ibrahim al-Hayyari, accused of involvement in a series of attacks in the world's biggest oil exporter, died after exchanging fire and hurling hand grenades at police, the ministry said.

Hayyari topped a list of 36 al Qaeda suspects released by Riyadh last week. The ministry said he had helped prepare explosives and played a part in several attacks in Saudi Arabia.

"He was recently nominated by his colleagues to be the leader of strife and corruption in the land after the death of his predecessors," the statement said.

A senior Saudi official described Hayyari, 36, who reportedly fought in Bosnia in the 1990s and came to Saudi Arabia in 2001, as a shadowy figure who was "more of a strategic leader than field commander."

He was a link to al Qaeda outside Saudi Arabia, brought funds into the kingdom, and was friend to a Muslim scholar close to al Qaeda's leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al Zaraqawi, the official said.

Saudi Arabia has been battling suspected al Qaeda militants since May 2003 when they launched a wave of violence with triple suicide bombings at Western housing compounds in Riyadh.

Interior Minister Prince Nayef said Sunday's operation was the result of extensive surveillance by Saudi security forces, and he pledged to pursue other suspected militants.

"God willing, we will reach the rest using the same method," he said after seeing wounded security officers.

De facto ruler Crown Prince Abdullah told President Bush in an Independence Day message that Saudi Arabia was determined to "work with its friends to uproot all factors of destruction and terrorism."

Al Qaeda is fighting to expel non-Muslims from the Gulf state, which is home to Islam's two holiest sites in Mecca and Medina, and wants to topple its pro-Western absolute monarchy.

The attacks have killed 91 foreign nationals and Saudi civilians and wounded 510 others, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to London Prince Turki al-Faisal said last week.

Forty-one security force members have been killed and 218 wounded, while 112 militants have been killed and 25 wounded, he said. He put material losses at 1 billion riyals ($270 million).

There have been fewer recent attacks, but last month gunmen killed a security officer in Mecca and diplomats say three helicopters were set on fire at a military base north of Riyadh.

LEADERS KILLED

Successive leaders of the Saudi wing of al Qaeda have been killed since 2003 and Saudi officials say their replacements are increasingly inexperienced. But Western counterterrorism experts say al Qaeda has shown a resilience and ability to regenerate.

One other man was arrested at the scene of Sunday's clash and two others surrendered in a simultaneous police raid in the same district of eastern Riyadh.

Prince Nayef described Hayyari as a "dangerous man" but said others on the wanted list were just as dangerous. The three captured men were not on the list, he added without elaborating.

Last week Saudi Arabia issued its new wanted list of al Qaeda suspects -- most of whom are Saudis but some are from Chad, Yemen, Morocco and Mauritania.

It offered a reward of up to 7 million riyals ($1.87 million) for anyone who helped authorities capture a militant or foil a planned attack.

One of the 36 suspects, Fayez Ayoub, flew back to Riyadh on Friday and surrendered to authorities. Newspapers have reported at least two others on the list have already been killed in neighboring Iraq, where insurgents are battling U.S. forces.

All but two men on a previous list of 26 wanted militants, published in December 2003, are believed dead or in custody.

Head Of Saudi Al Qaeda Killed In Clash In Riyadh (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

Security forces killed the al Qaeda terrorist group's leader in Saudi Arabia during a fierce gun battle Sunday in the capital , Riyadh, an Interior Ministry official told this country's official news agency.

Younis Mohammed Ibrahim al-Hayari, a Moroccan, was killed during a dawn raid by security forces on an area where suspected militants were hiding, an Interior Ministry official was quoted by Saudi Press Agency as saying.

The clashes took place in the Rawdah district, an upscale neighborhood in eastern Riyadh, said Interior Ministry spokesman Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki.

The unidentified official quoted by SPA said Mr. Hayari headed Osama bin Laden's al Qaeda terror network in the kingdom, which has been ravaged by terrorist attacks during more than two years of violence.

"He [Mr. Hayari] was nominated by his peers, and following the death of those preceding him, to be the head of sedition and corruption in the land," the official said in the SPA report.

Mr. Hayari topped a list issued Tuesday of 36 most-wanted militants sought for participation in previous terror attacks in the kingdom dating back to 2003. On Wednesday, Saudi Interior Minister Prince Nayef warned that the possibility of more attacks. Mr. Hayari was believed to have had close ties to Abdul Karim al-Majati, an al Qaeda leader killed in April 2005.

The Interior Ministry official said security forces conducted two simultaneous operations in eastern Riyadh to capture suspects and killed Mr. Hayari after a shoot-out, while arresting three other suspected militants, who were not identified.

It said the first operation ended without incident and with two suspects surrendering. But in the second raid, militants engaged in a gun battle with troops and threw grenades before Mr. Hayari was killed and another extremist was arrested.

"The two operations have concluded, but we will continue to pursue all the terrorists," Lt. Gen. Turki said. The report said six security force personnel were slightly wounded in the gun battles while weapons, munitions, communications equipment, computers and documents were seized at both scenes.

According to information released by Saudi authorities earlier this week, Mr. Hayari entered Saudi Arabia five years ago for the annual hajj pilgrimage season but remained in the country with his wife and young daughter.

Saudi officials said Mr. Hayari, 36 years old, had regularly disguised himself to avoid capture and had been previously spotted in Riyadh.

This oil-rich kingdom has suffered a series of heavy terrorist attacks since May 2003 when suicide bombers attacked three housing estates for foreigners in the capital Riyadh.

The kingdom then launched a wave of retaliatory raids against the militants, and issued a list of 26 most-wanted in December 2003. Security forces have killed or captured 23 of the 26 figures on that list.

Saudi Security Force Kills Al Qaeda Figure (WP/AP)

By Abdullah Al-shihri, Associated Press

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, July 3 -- Saudi anti-terrorism forces killed al Qaeda's top leader in the Persian Gulf kingdom in a gun battle Sunday, but experts warned that Saudi Arabia still faces a surge in attacks despite its two-year crackdown on extremists.

Officials said a 90-minute battle in the eastern Rawdah district, an upscale neighborhood in Riyadh, was the latest blow dealt to Osama bin Laden's group in Saudi Arabia, a U.S. ally. Many of al Qaeda's leaders have either been killed or captured since authorities launched an offensive against the group in 2003.

Younis Mohammed Ibrahim Hayari, a Moroccan, was killed in a dawn raid by security forces in an area where suspected extremists were hiding, according to an Interior Ministry official quoted by the state-run Saudi Press Agency.

Three other suspects were arrested, a security official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. He said Hayari and the three other men were on a list of Saudi Arabia's 36 most wanted terrorists that was issued Tuesday.

The government news agency, quoting an unidentified official, reported that Hayari headed al Qaeda in Saudi Arabia.

Hayari "was nominated by his peers . . . to be the head of sedition and corruption in the land." the official said.

On Wednesday, the Saudi interior minister, Prince Nayef, warned of the possibility of more attacks.

Security forces "killed the leader less than four days after they issued the list. That is a major victory, both on the intelligence and the logistical levels. It's a major intelligence breakthrough," said Mustafa Alani, a terrorism expert at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai.

He claimed that the terror group had a leadership crisis and that Hayari's killing would hinder the group's operations.

"There is clearly a leadership vacuum in the kingdom for Saudi Arabia and this will demoralize the members who are in hiding," he said.

Hayari was believed to have had close ties to Abdul Karim Majati, an al Qaeda leader killed in April.

The Interior Ministry official said security forces conducted two simultaneous operations in eastern Riyadh to capture suspects and killed Hayari after a shootout.

This oil-rich kingdom has suffered a series of attacks since May 2003, when suicide bombers attacked three compounds housing foreigners in Riyadh. Saudi security forces then launched a wave of retaliatory raids against the extremists, and in December 2003 issued a list of 26 most wanted suspects; 23 of them have reportedly been killed or captured.

Putting Islam On The Stand (LEGALT)

By Vanessa Blum, Legal Times

Legal Times, July 4, 2005

In a recent criminal trial in Virginia, the prosecutor told the jury that the defendant couldn't be trusted to tell the truth, that he would lie to their faces — all because of his religious beliefs.

The defendant, an American citizen accused of supporting terrorism, was convicted. The religion in question, of course, was Islam.

Now, the Virginia attorney representing Ali Al-Timimi is pushing for a new trial, saying that prosecutors secured the guilty verdict by appealing to religious bigotry against Muslims.

The case illustrates the difficulty in prosecuting suspected terrorists who subscribe to a form of militant Islam, without airing tenets of the religion itself before a jury. And it raises the question of how far is too far when it comes to using a defendant's religious beliefs as evidence of criminal intent. The issue will likely continue to confront judges as more cases against accused terrorists come to trial.

Timimi's lawyer, Edward MacMahon Jr., is seeking to overturn Timimi's conviction, citing prosecutorial misconduct and the prejudicial impact of statements he says portrayed Islam as a violent religion. One specific objection: that Assistant U.S. Attorney Gordon Kromberg instructed the jury in his closing argument that Timimi, a devout Muslim, would lie to jurors because the jurors were kafir — or nonbelievers.

Judge Leonie Brinkema of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia is likely to consider MacMahon's motion when Timimi appears for sentencing July 13.

Kromberg declined to comment, citing Justice Department policy. Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said that department officials would not comment on a pending case. In a court filing responding to MacMahon's charges, Kromberg maintains that Timimi's personal religious views were "directly relevant" to the case.

"While such an argument may be unfairly prejudicial in a case involving a typical bank robbery, drug trafficking, or mail fraud, Timimi was charged with much different offenses," the brief states. "In light of the charges against Timimi, the government's arguments were directly relevant to his prosecution and fairly made."

But Georgetown law professor and civil rights advocate David Cole says mere relevance may not be enough to justify repeated references to a Muslim defendant's religion during trial. Federal judges should exclude such evidence if its value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant, Cole says.

"There has been a tremendous demonization of Islam since Sept. 11, and the sins of al Qaeda have been spread to Islam generally in popular culture," Cole says. "The risk is that there is so much prejudice in the population at large that references to the Muslim faith end up clouding a jury's ability to determine guilt or innocence."

US VERSUS THEM

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, MacMahon, who also represents convicted terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui, has received a crash course in Islam. But during a recent interview, it was a story from the Old Testament — the violent tale of the Battle of Jericho — that was on the 44-year-old Catholic's mind.

According to the Bible, Joshua leads a force of 40,000 to take over the land of Canaan. After sending spies into a brothel to gather intelligence, the force conquers the city and slaughters its inhabitants, claiming the land as its own.

"If I told the story to a crowd of Christians, would I be telling them to go lie or to kill or to seek out prostitutes? Would I be responsible for inciting a riot?" MacMahon asks.

Such an argument would sound absurd in a federal courtroom, MacMahon asserts. No jury would believe it. But when it comes to the religion of Islam and how it is being portrayed in court, he says, it is a different matter. According to the government's case, Timimi, a religious scholar and popular lecturer on Islamic issues, urged a group of Virginia followers in the days after the Sept. 11 attacks to join the Taliban and fight U.S. forces in Afghanistan.

MacMahon says that jurors sitting in such trials who are unfamiliar with the religion may not recognize an argument that plays on their own biases. There were no Muslims on the panel that convicted Timimi. And, in fact, since Sept. 11, there has not been a single Muslim juror on a major terrorism case. Some experts say the culture gap between Muslim defendants and jurors may open the door to verdicts based on stereotypes.

"A Muslim juror wouldn't necessarily be more sympathetic, but there would be an opportunity for that juror to educate others about cultural differences and to dispel prejudices that might be expressed in the jury room," says New York jury consultant Julie Howe.

"Just like there can be racial prejudice, I think there is religious prejudice out there against Muslims, in particular since 9/11," says Howe, who advised defense attorneys for Mohammed al-Moayad, a Yemeni cleric convicted in March 2005 of supporting al Qaeda and Hamas. "Some jurors are inclined to believe that Muslims are predisposed to violence."

The federal courts have repeatedly grappled with how racial bias affects juries. But when it comes to the sensitive issue of religion, experts say the line between acceptable trial rhetoric and prejudicial remarks can be a fuzzy one. Unlike race, an immutable physical characteristic, religious beliefs can factor into a defendant's intent, motives, and world view — concepts central to criminal prosecution.

Timimi's defense lawyers are basing their request for a new trial on statements Kromberg made in his closing argument, including the prosecutor's final words to the jury: "If you're a kafir, Timimi believes in time of war he's supposed to lie to you. Don't fall for it. Find him — find Sheik Ali Timimi — guilty as charged."

Another remark cited by the defense team targeted one of Timimi's key witnesses. The witness testified that Timimi never told followers that Muslims had an obligation to wage war against the United States. In his closing, Kromberg told jurors not to believe the witness because he had also testified that he considered Shiite Muslims nonbelievers who should have their heads lopped off.

MacMahon says Kromberg's remarks were gratuitous — no one in the case was charged with committing such acts of violence. MacMahon further argues that the comments created an us-against-them atmosphere in the Alexandria, Va., courtroom.

"It is clear to counsel that the point that the government was trying to make to the jury was that Muslims are religiously obligated to wage war against the United States, to lie, and to kill," MacMahon states in his motion for a new trial.

Kromberg maintains that his remarks never referred to Islam in general but only to Timimi's beliefs. In a June 20 brief responding to MacMahon's claims, Kromberg states, "It is an insult to Muslims in America and around the world for Timimi to claim that the beliefs he . . . [holds] are shared by Muslims generally."

Even before the start of Timimi's trial, Kromberg and MacMahon wrangled over whether prosecutors would be allowed to tell jurors that Timimi had stated a view that Muslims could lie to the enemy if they were at war.

MacMahon sought to bar the testimony, citing a federal rule of evidence that explicitly prohibits lawyers from using witnesses' religious beliefs to undermine their credibility. But in a pretrial motion, Kromberg argued that Timimi's willingness to lie was not technically a religious belief but a political one, and that his statements should be admissible because they proved bias. In addition, Kromberg said that the evidentiary rule was inapplicable because Timimi did not testify at his trial.

Brinkema ruled from the bench, siding with the government.

Henry Klingeman, a former federal prosecutor in New Jersey, says it would be unfair to prevent government lawyers from using a defendant's own statements as evidence simply because those statements deal with religious subjects.

"I think this is going to be an issue that we see a lot of in the future," Klingeman says. "In a case where a defendant is saying, 'I'm peaceful because I'm a religious person' and placing their own religious views at issue, it would seem to me that lawyers should be permitted to inquire about those views."

MATTERS OF FAITH

Indeed, legal experts say, there is often no way to effectively prosecute those who support terrorist organizations without examining their religious beliefs.

"It's a very serious issue in these trials because terrorists are cloaking themselves in pseudo-religion," says Jeffrey Addicott, director of the Center for Terrorism Law at St. Mary's University School of Law in San Antonio.

"By and large, prosecutors have acted very judiciously," Addicott adds. "They understand this is a war on an extreme sect that cloaks its acts in religiosity and does not represent the vast majority of Muslims."

But MacMahon is not the only defense lawyer who questions the government's emphasis on Islam during terrorism trials.

INFLAMMATORY TERMS USED

One common gripe from the defense bar is prosecutors' frequent use of Islamic terms like jihad and fatwa, which have negative connotations in America. Another is the use of expert witnesses to school jurors in the history of Islam, much like a prosecutor might use an expert witness to provide background on the Mafia in an organized-crime case.

"Essentially, many jurors' first experience learning about Islam would be from the prosecutor," says Detroit civil rights lawyer Shereef Akeel. "They don't have any reference points to assess the prosecutor's credibility."

Akeel, who sat in the courtroom during the 2003 terrorism trial of four Detroit-area residents, says he was disturbed by prosecutors' frequent use of the phrase "economic jihad."

"Rather than focusing on the elements of a crime, they cloud it by sprinkling the facts with these foreign terms that seem frightening to a person not familiar with the religion," Akeel says.

To prevent religious bias from affecting jury deliberations, jury selection in terrorism trials is particularly rigorous. Not only must prospective jurors answer scores of questions about their feelings toward Islam and the Middle East, they also are asked to state their own religion — a question that is ordinarily considered irrelevant.

In the Timimi case, prospective jurors were asked nearly a dozen questions related to religion, including their personal religious preference, the religion they were raised in, and how often they attend religious services. They also were asked if they knew any Muslims or had any familiarity with Islamic practices.

Marjorie Fargo, president of Jury Services Inc. in Alexandria, was appointed by the court to serve as a jury consultant for Timimi's defense team. Fargo says that the vast majority of those who filled out jury questionnaires in the case associated the word jihad — a term she says was "bandied about" during the trial — with violence or terrorism.

"In the Muslim religion, you can wage a jihad against anything, and because there was lack of understanding on that, it could possibly affect a juror's interpretation of the evidence," Fargo says.

MacMahon says he would have preferred to keep Timimi's religious beliefs out of the trial altogether.

DOJ_NMG_0001259

"If prosecutors had wanted to try the case based solely on what happened, they could have," MacMahon says. "Instead, we learned about the Koran and all these religious concepts. It never stopped."

MacMahon adds, "The effect of it, and the exact reason the government does it, is that the defendant has to defend himself against an aura of criminality that is unrelated to the actual events of the case."

Lawyers War Over Fees In Terror Suit (LEGALT)

By Bethany Broida, Legal Times

Legal Times, July 4, 2005

Steven Perles and Thomas Fortune Fay made their reputation representing victims of terror attacks in lawsuits against countries that sponsor terrorism. But the two D.C. lawyers are now embroiled in a legal battle over the multimillion-dollar fees their successful litigation brought about, with Perles fending off charges he misused money in a trust account that belonged to both of them.

In a suit filed June 20, Fay accuses Perles of improperly using $1 million of his terror-case proceeds as a bond in another suit filed against Perles by a former employee, Anne-Marie Kagy, who is seeking her own share of the proceeds. In the Kagy case, U.S. Magistrate Judge Alan Kay concluded that Perles owes the former employee almost $1.5 million.

Fay and Perles worked as co-counsel in high-profile terrorism cases, including two against the government of Iran that yielded judgments of almost $600 million, of which $54 million has been collected. And, in fact, their lobbying efforts had made such suits possible: They persuaded Congress in 1996 to pass a law permitting terrorism victims to collect a portion of their judgments from the frozen assets of states that sponsor terrorism.

Both Fay and Perles declined to comment about the substantive issues in the lawsuit, since the litigation is still pending and Perles has yet to file a response to Fay's complaint. But both say they hope that Fay's suit will not affect three other terrorism cases against Libya, Sudan, and Iran in which they are currently collaborating.

"It is just a lawsuit right now, and I hope it stays that way," Fay says. "It is unfortunate."

LITIGATING FLATOW

Anne-Marie Kagy was a law student when she went to work at the Perles Law Firm. Through her attorney, she also declined to comment for this article, but according to court documents, she continued to work for Perles after graduation, and in 1996 approached him about a full-time position. Perles told Kagy that he could not pay her a base salary, but offered to let her work on some of his cases on a contingency basis, meaning she would get paid only if and when he did.

One of those cases involved a wrongful death claim on behalf of the family of Alisa Flatow. In April 1995, the young American student was killed by a suicide bomber who blew up a bus on the Gaza Strip. Flatow's father, Stephen, filed a lawsuit against the Islamic Republic of Iran charging that the terrorist who killed Flatow was acting as an agent of Iran and its Ministry of Information.

At the time, the lawsuit was unprecedented and the chances of recovering any money from the case were considered remote, at best.

In addition to her work on the Flatow case, Kagy also worked on a group of cases involving claims by Jewish American citizens who were forced into slave labor in Nazi concentration camps during World War II. About half of those cases ended with a judgment, and Perles paid Kagy a third of his net proceeds.

Perles' fee in those cases was capped, so the money recovered was nowhere near the multimillion-dollar judgment the attorneys sought in the Flatow case.

All told, court documents say, Kagy received about $20,000 over the course of three years for her work on the Holocaust cases. In addition, she was paid $50 an hour for her work on some of Perles' other non-contingency cases. Specific arrangements for Kagy's compensation in the Flatow matter were never agreed upon.

Kagy worked on the Flatow case for three years. At first, she assisted Perles and his co-counsel, Thomas Fay, a D.C. solo practitioner, in drafting the complaint and overseeing the effecting of service on Iran.

After the Iranian government refused to defend itself against the suit, the documents say, Kagy took on the responsibility of researching and writing a comprehensive memorandum analyzing and refuting every conceivable defense Iran might have raised if it had chosen to defend the claim.

In the court documents, both Perles and Kagy acknowledge she contributed valuable services to the Flatow litigation. Both also agree that Kagy was entitled to some compensation for her work, in the event money was ever collected.

In March 1998, U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth entered a judgment in favor of Flatow for $22.5 million in compensatory damages and $225 million in punitive damages, based in part on Kagy's memo.

As her work on the Flatow case wound down, Kagy began working on a similar case involving two other American students, Matthew Eisenfeld and Sara Duker, who were also killed by suicide bombers on an Israeli bus. Again, the families sued Iran, claiming the country provided financial support for the terrorists.

The number of hours Kagy spent on the Eisenfeld and Duker cases was a matter of dispute, but Kagy left the firm in 1999.

In July 2000, Lamberth awarded the Duker and Eisenfeld families $327 million, including $27 million in compensatory damages.

The following October, Congress authorized payment of compensatory damages to victims of terrorism in suits against Iran. The money came from Iranian credits with the Department of Defense representing overpayments for military equipment and the proceeds on rental property that the Iranians owned in the United States.

Both judgments were ultimately paid out in January 2001.

KAGY MAKES A CLAIM

In December 2000, Kagy notified Perles that since judgments on the cases had finally come through, she was entitled to $3 million — a third of Perles' share and what she considered her part of the contingency payments in the Flatow and Eisenfeld and Duker cases.

The following month, Perles filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia seeking a declaratory judgment and saying that he and Kagy had an oral agreement that she would receive an "unspecified multiple of her normal hourly rate."

At the time, Perles' attorney, Steven Schneebaum, now a partner at Greenberg Traurig, told Legal Times that Perles would be happy to pay Kagy $75,000 for her work on Flatow, an amount he says reflected her agreed-upon hourly rate. Schneebaum said that Kagy had no basis to seek more.

In response, Kagy filed a counterclaim, and a $2 million attorney's lien was placed against the net proceeds of the judgments in an account managed by Perles' attorney.

Since Perles and Fay were equal partners in both the Flatow and the Eisenfeld and Duker litigation, half of the money taken for the lien belonged to Fay.

The litigation wound its way through the courts, with Perles arguing that while Kagy should be compensated for her work in the Flatow case, she was not entitled to any of the proceeds in the Eisenfeld and Duker cases because of her "very limited participation."

"Her name is on the pleadings. She did the work," says Mark Cummings of Sher, Cummings and Ellis, who represents Kagy. "But to this day she has not been paid a dime on either Flatow or Eisenfeld and Duker."

On April 20, more than four years after the initial suits were filed, the court entered a final judgment finding Kagy was entitled to about $1.4 million — or a third of Perles' fee — in the Flatow case and about $47,000, based upon an hourly rate, for her work on the Eisenfeld and Duker case.

Neither side was happy with the outcome, and both immediately filed appeals, which are still pending.

FAY JOINS THE FIGHT

Despite his partnership with Perles, Fay was never named as a party in the dispute between Perles and Kagy. But with a final judgment of more than $1 million in Kagy's favor, Fay became worried about his half of the money that was subject to the lien.

Over the next few weeks, in a series of letters and face-to-face meetings with Perles and his attorney, Schneebaum, Fay requested that his portion of the money be returned from the trust account, where it was held since 2001.

In a May 19 letter to Perles and Schneebaum, Fay wrote, "Let me note that the lien asserted by Ms. Kagy was upon the proceeds from the Flatow and Eisenfeld cases, not upon the Perles share. On that basis I agreed to deduct $2 million from the Fay and Perles joint net proceeds to cover the amount of the asserted lien. Obviously a number of issues remain open including the question of whether the entire amount being held is subject to enforcement upon any judgment entered against Steve Perles, but not against me."

As the weeks passed, Fay grew increasingly concerned when he learned that the balance in the lien account had dropped to $1.6 million and that about $425,000 was transferred from the account to pay for Perles' legal fees, something that Fay says in court documents occurred without his permission. In addition, he learned Perles planned to use the remainder of the money to secure the judgment while he appealed his case.

In another letter, on May 27, Fay wrote, "I repeat my request for return of one half of the original escrow deposit amount. I did not agree to pay half of Anne-Marie Kagy's compensation or half of any judgment entered on her behalf. "

In the interim, according to court documents, Perles filed his motion asking that the money from the original lien placed be used as a bond to secure the judgment during the appeal process.

In his motion, Perles asserted that the amount in the account was $1,339,675, slightly less than the amount of the judgment. He said he would commit to keeping $1.5 million in the account to satisfy both the judgment and any interest.

"There was $2 million that was supposed to be put aside in a trust and not touched," says Kagy's lawyer, Cummings. "We have a pretty serious problem with that."

Without a satisfactory response from Perles about the return of his money, and with the balance in the account declining, Fay filed a lawsuit June 20, accusing Perles and Greenberg Traurig, which handled the trust, of unauthorized use of funds, unjust enrichment, and conversion. In his suit, Fay asked not only for his money back plus interest, but damages as well.

"The total money wasn't there, and I guess that is what upset me," Fay says.

Based on some of the documents submitted in Fay's suit, Kagy filed her own motion June 29, opposing Perles' request to use the lien as bond for the appeal and accusing Perles of committing fraud on the court.

If it is determined that Perles misappropriated money from the joint trust account, he could face an investigation by the D.C. Bar. Bar Counsel Wallace "Gene" Shipp Jr. declined to comment specifically on the lawsuit between Fay and Perles, but said the conduct that is alleged is the type that could trigger a bar ethics probe.

Trial Set For Lodi Father, Son (LODINEWS)

By Layla Bohm

Lodi News-Sentinel, July 2, 2005

A Lodi father and son accused of terrorism ties but charged only with lying to agents could stand trial in August, though that's only if matters of national security don't slow things down.

At a Friday hearing in federal court, U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. set an Aug. 23 trial for Umer and Hamid Hayat, though he added, "I don't know how realistic that's going to be."

It hinges on whether the federal Classified Information Procedures Act slows the case down, because even Burrell's own staff members would have to undergo extensive background checks before being allowed to handle sensitive documents. The act, signed into law by Congress in 1980, limits the disclosure of anything that could affect national security.

Burrell set an Aug. 19 hearing on issues related to CIPA, and also set dates for attorneys to file motions related to CIPA procedures within the next two weeks. Additionally, he scheduled a July 15 hearing regarding whether the trial will have to be delayed.

Under federal law, the Hayats are entitled to a trial within 70 days from the date they were indicted. A grand jury on June 16 indicted Hamid Hayat, 22, with two counts of lying to federal agents about attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan. His father is charged with one count of lying about his son's involvement.

Defense attorney Johnny Griffin III argued that the government has had since May 29, when Hamid Hayat boarded a plane from Pakistan headed to the United States and triggered an alert because he was on a no-fly list. He was interviewed, allowed to continue to the U.S., and both men were arrested a few days later.

"It's not fair to these men who are sitting in jail," Griffin said in court. "The government should have dotted its i's and crossed its t's before putting these men in jail and labeling them as terrorists."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Steve Lapham argued that his office has already turned over 400 videos, CDs and DVDs, along with more than 2,000 pages of documents that need to be translated from Urdu, Pashto and Arabic. The documents could contain important things, Lapham said, citing a small piece of paper with Arabic writing that was found in Hamid Hayat's wallet.

"It is a highly significant document. A document like that could be buried in 2,000 pages," he said.

Hamid Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, bristled and denied the importance of the slip of paper. "Being a Muslim, I know it's a prayer. That's all it is," she told the judge.

Classified Procedures Act

The Classified Information Procedures Act applies to documents and information that could harm national security. In federal court Friday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Steve Lapham said it could involve a number of extra security measures in a criminal court case, including:

• Establishing a court security officer to oversee the handling of sensitive documents.

• Federal security clearances for any court personnel, including the judge's staff, who might handle the documents. Such clearances take 45 to 60 days.

• Similar clearances for defense attorneys.

• Sending prosecutors to personally look at the documents, as some probably cannot be sent through the mail, due to security risks.

Mojaddidi, who speaks several languages herself, said the rest of the documents were mere "fluff." Griffin likened them to "books and magazines, average stuff you'd expect to find in your catch-all drawer at home."

Attorneys argued back and forth over whether an August trial would be possible. Burrell, who will preside over the trial but had not handled the case previously, ultimately made no ruling Friday. He did tell U.S. attorneys that they need to put in writing their understanding of the CIPA process.

The Hayats, who stood beside their attorneys at Friday's court appearance, remain in the Sacramento County jail without bail.

August Trial Argued For Two Lodi Men (CCT)

By Don Thompson

The Contra Costa Times, July 2, 2005

SACRAMENTO - A federal judge set a trial date next month for a father and son charged with lying about terrorist activities, but prosecutors said they would seek a delay.

Prosecutors said they need more time to respond to a defense request for information and that national security concerns surrounding evidence in the case make an August trial unrealistic.

U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. on Friday set the trial for Aug. 23 and placed the burden on the government to prove why the two men should not be tried quickly.

Hamid Hayat, 22, and his father, Umer Hayat, 47, both of Lodi, are being held without bond on charges of lying to the FBI about whether the son attended an al Qaida training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004.

Hamid Hayat was charged a month ago with two counts alleging he lied when he said he did not attend the camp. His father faces a single count of lying. The FBI said the elder Hayat later admitted paying for his son's flight to Pakistan and for the camp, which was run by the friend of a relative.

In responding to the defense request for information, prosecutors have requested information from 40 federal agencies, including two intelligence agencies. That almost certainly will lead the government to invoke the Classified Information Protection Act, requiring considerable court security precautions and delay, Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Lapham said.

Burrell scheduled an Aug. 19 hearing on prosecutors' objection to the trial date.

Meanwhile, both sides spent more than an hour during Friday's hearing sparring over the significance of evidence against the two men.

Lapham said a slip of paper in Hamid Hayat's wallet with a single line in Arabic is "a very significant document" in proving his intent. Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, said the paper merely contained a prayer.

Similarly, 2,000 pages written in three foreign languages and 400 videotapes, cassettes and compact discs seized from the Hayats' home may be significant once they are translated, Lapham said.

Mojaddidi, who speaks Urdu and Pashto, the primary languages in the material, described it as "fluff."

"We don't think that stuff is going to be relevant," she said.

PATRIOT ACT:

OPEN FORUM Patriotism Vs. The USA Patriot Act (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, July 4, 2005

Patriotic Americans have a lot at stake this Fourth of July. After the glare of fireworks has faded, the true test of American patriotism moves to Congress, where both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees will prepare to debate the fate of the USA Patriot Act.

It's a debate that has long been anticipated. When Congress passed the Patriot Act -- all 150 sections of it -- just weeks after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, many lawmakers understood that some of these broad new powers should only be temporary. They wisely agreed that many of the most controversial sections of the act (about 10 percent) would automatically expire in four years. Thus, as the Dec. 31 expiration (or "sunset") deadline approaches, congressional debate about the Patriot Act is finally beginning.

But the opportunity for a robust debate has been marred by a pre-emptive effort in the Senate, where the Select Intelligence Committee decided to hold its vote and debate on expanding the Patriot Act in secret. A copy of the unwise and unwarranted bill it approved was not made public until more than two weeks later.

Far worse than cloaking the legislative process in secrecy was the outcome. The Senate Select Intelligence Committee approved a bill that would make permanent virtually all of the controversial provisions Congress originally made temporary. What's more, the measure would give the FBI the power to write its own subpoenas to demand any kind of record, with no judicial approval and without making a showing to the court that there are facts that connect the records sought to a terrorist.

Clearly, the senators meeting behind closed doors didn't hear Americans calling for Patriot Act reform. More than 400 boards of supervisors and town councils from Elko, Nev., to New York City spoke up. Seven state governments, including four "red" states with Republican majorities, called for reform. Meanwhile, a new coalition, "Patriots to Restore Checks and Balances," brings together some unlikely allies, including the ACLU and the American Conservative Union.

The outcry is all the more remarkable when you consider that three years ago, a bipartisan movement for Patriot Act reform was virtually unthinkable. In the aftermath of Sept. 11, the Bush administration, with former Attorney General John Ashcroft leading the charge, chose to demand unilateral power to limit civil liberties and diminish our privacy in a variety of ways. Indeed, Ashcroft lashed out at those who questioned the administration's policies with such McCarthyist comebacks as, "Your tactics only aid terrorists, for they erode our national unity and diminish our resolve." His tough talk was backed by action: The administration issued an executive order lifting a ban against spying on and infiltrating domestic political and religious groups.

The Patriot Act in its current form includes provisions that threaten the American legacy of liberty and privacy. But it can be fixed easily to restore meaningful checks and balances while properly focusing our limited anti-terrorism resources on foreign terrorists rather than ordinary Americans. Bipartisan legislation, the Security and Freedom Enhanced Act, is a good place to start. The SAFE Act includes commonsense fixes such as requiring individual suspicion for searches of libraries, bookstores and other sensitive records; placing reasonable limits on "sneak and peek" searches, and helping to ensure that the expansive new wiretap powers do not allow eavesdropping on the conversations of innocent people.

The question is, will Congress keep America safe and free by correcting the fundamental flaws in the Patriot Act? We'll find out when it resumes after the Fourth of July recess. Patriotism is so much more than flag-waving and pyrotechnics. It's about vigilantly guarding the fundamental American principles of justice and liberty that have come under siege with the Bush administration's determination to hold itself above the law. It's time to restore the basic checks and balances that are fundamental to our constitutional liberties. That's the kind of patriotism we yearn for today.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

CIA, Pentagon Seek To Avoid Overlap (WP)

By Walter Pincus, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, July 4, 2005

Growing Pentagon intelligence activities at home and abroad have caused CIA Director Porter J. Goss and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to reach a new written agreement to prevent conflicts and overlap in spying, technical collection and analysis between their two organizations, according to senior officials at both agencies.

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, deputy director of national intelligence, told reporters last week that a classified memo of understanding between the agencies has been drafted and is awaiting the signatures of Goss and Rumsfeld.

The document sets out what the Defense Department and the CIA will do as part of the intelligence restructuring that is taking place under the aegis of the director of national intelligence (DNI), John D. Negroponte. "We are trying to 'deconflict' the operations," Hayden said, and "coordinate them as closely as possible." Negroponte's office is also studying how new Pentagon operations fit into the DNI's overall role.

One issue is what constitutes traditional military activities such as battlefield preparations, under which military operatives clandestinely visit countries to gather information in preparation for any future conflict. Pentagon operatives allegedly have visited countries without prior CIA knowledge, although the local CIA station chief was supposed to have been told.

Under the reorganization just approved by President Bush, a senior CIA official will become what Hayden described as "the national humint [human intelligence] manager," coordinating all overseas spying activities whether carried on by the CIA, the Pentagon or the FBI.

As part of the response to potential terrorism, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the military services are expanding their human and technical collection of intelligence and their analytical capabilities. The DIA has 7,500 employees -- about half as many as the CIA -- but is planning to add nearly 1,000 over the next few years. As a result, it wants to send nearly that number to new facilities in Virginia, despite having just completed a new building at Bolling Air Force Base in the District.

The size of the new DIA building was planned almost 10 years ago, before the agency acquired new missions and personnel that "won't fit into the building," a senior Defense Department official said.

Some of the new DIA missions involve worldwide counterintelligence and data-collection programs that may overlap into the purview of CIA, the National Counterterrorism Center (NCTC), the Department of Homeland Security or other intelligence agencies based on the DNI reorganization.

White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend, who was in charge of studying how to integrate intelligence restructuring recommended by the Silberman-Robb presidential commission, told reporters last week that Rumsfeld was reviewing the future role of a little-publicized Pentagon group known as the Counter Intelligence Field Activity (CIFA).

Formed in 2002, CIFA was established to oversee Defense Department counterintelligence investigations and training and to assess potential terrorist threats at home and abroad. It has gathered domestic and international data, including criminal, financial, credit and other records, as well as background information about foreign workers and scientists employed by the Defense Department and other U.S. agencies.

One of the Silberman-Robb panel recommendations was that CIFA be given "new counterespionage and law enforcement authorities to investigate national security matters and crimes including treason, espionage . . . or terrorist-directed sabotage."

The panel said this authority could be granted to CIFA by a DNI directive. Townsend said the question was whether an enhanced CIFA should remain within the Pentagon.

Another new, little-known Pentagon initiative is the Partnership to Defeat Terrorism, which brings together a worldwide collection of think tanks, academics and private business leaders to try to develop an information-sharing base that could be used to protect the world's critical infrastructures -- including buildings, roads, industrial plants and computer systems related to financial institutions -- from terrorist attacks.

It has been placed under the Defense Department's Strategic Command, as part of the new missions given to that Pentagon unit by Rumsfeld. Senior officials in other intelligence agencies have questioned whether this function belongs in the Pentagon or elsewhere.

The Pentagon has been generous in providing one- and two-star officers to help staff the new DNI offices, senior administration officials said. Hayden confirmed that Defense has been "offering good talent" and that "the trick for us is to balance" the DNI staff among personnel from the 15 agencies that make up the intelligence community.

"I wish CIA and others would seize that opportunity because people are concerned about bureaucratic balance," said a senior DNI official who spoke on the condition of anonymity. A CIA official said Goss "was concentrating on protecting the diminished role of the agency."

Retired Vice Adm. John Redd has been nominated by President Bush to be director of the NCTC. If approved by the Senate, the Pentagon-experienced Redd will replace a CIA official, John Brennan, who directed establishment of the new agency, half of whose employees have come from the CIA.

The Counterterrorism Center, now a DNI agency, has also been assigned to plan strategic operations at home and abroad. After some internal discussions in which Pentagon officials attempted to get the strategic planning function removed from the NCTC, Negroponte has decided to put an Army officer, Brig. Gen. Jeffrey J. Schloesser, at the head of that office.

Now director of the Aviation Task Force for the Army's deputy chief of staff for operations, Schloesser also has a planning and special operations background, Hayden said.

"The test will be whether Schloesser, a uniformed officer, reports to only the NCTC director and the DNI, and not to the joint chiefs and not the Defense Department," said a senior DNI official. "He now represents the interagency effort."

Decoys Suggested For Pentagon Network (WP)

By Dawn S. Onley, Special To The Washington Post

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

Two of the Pentagon's leading technologists propose defending the military's Global Information Grid by using decoy networks and "honey pots" to fool hackers.

The goal is to lure intruders into these areas and away from operational networks.

"No other enterprise in the world has responsibility for a communications network quite like the GIG," Army Col. Carl W. Hunt, technology director for the Joint Task Force for Global Network Operations, said at the Army Small Computer Program conference in Las Vegas last month. The Defense Department is developing the Global Information Grid as the next-generation information technology architecture to be used by the military and intelligence agencies.

Hunt and Doug Gardner, director of the applied technology unit of the joint task force, wrote a recent paper outlining ways to keep malicious intruders from penetrating the GIG. The paper was presented at the Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers Workshop on Information Assurance last month at the U.S. Military Academy in West Point, N.Y.

The diversion strategy, called Net Force Maneuver, would lead hackers "to systems where we are prepared to receive them," Hunt and Gardner wrote. It's a technique that technology experts outside the Pentagon have called a honey pot.

"These systems will collect information on methodologies, techniques and tools while providing a realistic 'playground' for the intruder," Hunt and Gardner wrote. "This playground will be devoid of real system information but will keep the intruder occupied. The goal here then is to ensure the intruder does not know which systems are real and which ones aren't."

Ross Stapleton-Gray, senior research analyst at Skaion Corp., a computer security company in North Chelmsford, Mass., said the idea has merit, but it wouldn't necessarily be easy for the Defense Department to achieve.

Phantom Defense Department networks "would be an interesting challenge: They'd need to behave sufficiently realistically as to convince prospective attackers that they were authentic, yet not reveal too much about the real networks," he said.

Stapleton-Gray said he could imagine the Defense Department running a continuous simulation of parts of networks "in parallel with the real ones. When outsiders show up and start probing around the fake networks, you can track all their activities, even feed them information on fictional vulnerabilities, and see what they do."

Hunt and Gardner warned Defense officials that Net Force Maneuver is no silver bullet. They said it would need to be combined with other protective measures that are now being developed.

Intelligence Shuffle (WP)

Post

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

IN MORE NORMAL times, a presidential decision to rearrange the structure of domestic intelligence gathering would be a big deal. Since Sept. 11, 2001, however, this country has seen the organizational charts of governmental counterterrorism efforts rearranged so extensively that President Bush's shuffling of the FBI's intelligence and counterterrorism authorities last week was almost a ho-hum event: Another day, another reorganization of American government.

But Mr. Bush's reforms of the FBI, which follow recommendations from a commission he appointed to study intelligence failures concerning Iraqi weapons of mass destruction, are potentially profound and warrant public attention. In critical respects, they take the bureau in the right direction. The first question is whether they go far enough or whether they will end up being merely shifted boxes on the government's organizational chart. The second question is whether, in one particular area, they go too far.

The president has directed that the FBI's key national security functions -- counterterrorism, counterintelligence and intelligence gathering -- be consolidated into a single National Security Service headed by a high-level bureau official. The integration of these functions, all of which are now partly under the jurisdiction of the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, makes a lot of sense. For one thing, it will give the director a single hierarchy over whose chief he will have veto power. Moreover, in a world in which counterterrorism so dominates intelligence operations and collection, creating a unified national security infrastructure in the bureau seems like common sense.

A great part of the challenge of reforming the FBI since Sept. 11 has been transforming its law enforcement culture -- rooted in the collection of evidence for criminal prosecution -- into a credible intelligence organization capable of compiling, analyzing and sharing a far broader swath of information than might be useful for criminal purposes. If the FBI is to develop critical mass as an intelligence agency in the long run, creating a unified national security effort within it is a necessary part of the picture.

Whether this transformation is ultimately possible, however, remains an open question. The bureau has made more headway in developing intelligence capability than its fiercer critics acknowledge, but it remains, in its heart and soul, a police force. This culture may simply be too deeply rooted to be changed. At present, however, creating a domestic intelligence service is politically dicey; the step would have significant civil liberties implications and could create gaps in effectiveness that terrorists could exploit. Consequently, there is little choice but to proceed as the administration is proceeding -- that is, reform the bureau with an ongoing eye to whether the project is, at the end of the day, a fool's errand.

The other concern about Mr. Bush's order is that it potentially gives the director of national intelligence, a politically appointed intelligence official who works directly for the president, too much power over day-to-day operations of FBI agents. The president's memorandum requires the government to "develop procedures" by which the director of national intelligence can "communicate with the FBI's field offices" through the new head of the National Security Service. Whether this presents a problem depends entirely on what these procedures turn out to be. It is essential that FBI agents collecting intelligence domestically are not directed by the White House or top administration officials but, rather, by the FBI director overseen by the attorney general. In implementing the president's order, the administration must remember that whatever agency is responsible for domestic intelligence must be kept independent of politics.

An End To Spy Versus Spy? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 5, 2005

Like the title characters in the movie "Mr. and Mrs. Smith," the FBI and CIA have been an outwardly happy couple that are actually in perpetual combat. The reforms that President Bush signed on to last week could at least theoretically end the warfare, resulting in agencies better able to focus on core missions. The job of persuading, or forcing, them to do so falls to the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte.

With the president at his back, he might even succeed.

Despite FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III's best efforts to resist change, his agency is the decided loser — and the CIA the winner — in the reorganization of the 15 agencies that have something to do with intelligence, as recommended by a presidential commission.

The panel left the CIA mostly intact, and its leadership is already cobbling out an agreement over territory with the Pentagon's even larger intelligence apparatus.

The CIA is a winner here, as well — as coordinator of all use of human spies, including by the Pentagon. The commission's report focused its fire on the abysmal performance of the FBI, which has repeatedly been drubbed for its 9/11 failures and, most recently, for an expensive computer upgrade program that has proved a total bust.

The result is that Negroponte gets direct authority over new national security divisions at the FBI and the Justice Department, including budgetary power and appointments.

The FBI is smarting over the humiliation, but it could prove a boon for the bureau. Historically, the FBI's record on countering espionage plots, whether during World War II or the Cold War, is one of futility. It's a basic misfit — of cops who catch bank robbers trying to chase spies. Establishing a separate office in the FBI that answers to Negroponte as well as Mueller will at least allow the rest of the FBI to get on with what it does best, tracking down domestic criminals.

What's more, Negroponte won't be able to complain that he has powers only in name, not substance.

Congress tried and failed to persuade President George H.W. Bush in 1991 to appoint a director of national intelligence and reorganize the spy agencies. Even President Truman's Cold War invention of the CIA from the remains of World War II's elite spies was supposed to bring intelligence under a powerful single chief.

Negroponte, known as a ruthless policy operative, understands that history of failure. Unless he flexes the new muscles of his agency, he will end up as part of just another sequel.

Bridgeport Woman Charged With Threatening Supreme Court, FBI (AP)

AP, July 5, 2005

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. -- The FBI arrested a city woman accused of mailing death threats, some laced with rat poison, to each of the U.S. Supreme Court justices and FBI Director Robert Mueller.

Barbara March, 59, was charged with one count of mailing a threatening letter. A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Washington said Thursday the charge could change with a federal grand jury investigation.

Laboratory results determined that seven of the letters mailed to Supreme Court justices were laced with rat poison, the FBI said in an affidavit. The contents of two other letters sent to justices and two letters sent to Mueller and Deputy Director John S. Pistole are being analyzed by the FBI.

March, also known as Barbara McMahon and Bonnie McMahon, is being detained without bond at the York Correctional Institution in Niantic. A probable cause hearing has been set for July 11, but it will be canceled if an indictment is returned in Washington.

In 1985, March entered a no-contest plea and was found guilty of two counts of attempted murder and one count of carrying a pistol without a permit. She was charged with shooting at her brother, Richard March, and his wife.

Diane March was shot in the chest, and survived.

DOJ_NMG_0001268

Richard March contacted U.S. postal inspectors several days later and turned over a bottle of wine mailed to his 65-year-old mother. Tests by the State Toxicology Laboratory determined it was laced with Benadryl, which, mixed with alcohol, could be lethal.

Investigators at the time found rat poison among March's belongings.

March has been in state custody, the longest from Dec. 9, 1985, to June 29, 1989, except for two months during that time, said a spokesman for the state Department of Correction.

She was incarcerated in 1992 for about a month and again in 1994 for a month.

Bridgeport Woman Mailed Poison To Justices, F.B.I. Says (NYT)

By Stacey Stowe

The New York Times, July 2, 2005

HARTFORD, July 1 - Federal agents have charged a woman who rented a room in a homeless shelter in Bridgeport, Conn., and worked in a fast-food restaurant there with sending letters containing rat poison to justices of the United States Supreme Court and to top officials in the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The woman, Barbara J. March, 59, was arrested June 24 on a criminal complaint issued by federal prosecutors in Washington. The investigators said she had mailed typewritten death threats in nine envelopes last spring to several justices and to the director and the deputy director of the F.B.I. Taped to each letter was a smashed baked good or a piece of candy that laboratory tests showed contained pellets of rat poison, they said. In May, two more letters were sent to the "remaining justices," according to the F.B.I complaint.

According to the complaint, the letters said: "We are (or I am) going to kill you. This is poisoned."

The F.B.I. said that it had linked Ms. March to the letters by the envelopes, which had return addresses of people who were her classmates and sorority sisters at Stetson University in DeLand, Fla., or who attended elementary or high school with Ms. March or her brother, according to the complaint, which was filed by Monica Patton, a special agent of the F.B.I.

Ms. March's arrest was first reported in The Connecticut Post on Friday.

Ms. March has been incarcerated about nine times in the last 20 years, said Brian Garnett, a spokesman for the State Department of Corrections. In 1985, she mailed wine reportedly containing poison to several relatives, including her mother, Ms. Patton said in her complaint. Two years later, Ms. March was convicted of attempted murder after shooting at her brother and sister-in-law.

But at Prospect House, a shelter and a subsidized apartment building in Bridgeport, where she has lived since 1999, Ms. March "had never caused a moment of trouble," said its director, Patricia Ginyard. A petite woman with long dark hair, Ms. March worked at a local fast-food restaurant, Ms. Ginyard said. Her arrest shocked residents and administrators at the home.

"I was floored," Ms. Ginyard said. "We were all like 'not little Barb.' "

David J. Wenc, the private lawyer appointed by the federal court for Ms. March, said he expected her to plead not guilty. She is being held at York Correctional Institution in Niantic.

Computers Simulate Terrorism's Extremes (WP)

By Ariana Eunjung Cha, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

LOS ALAMOS, N.M.-- Deep inside the cave-like laboratories of the legendary research center that created the atomic bomb, scientists have begun work on a Manhattan Project of a different sort.

In the wake of Sept. 11, 2001, they have been constructing the most elaborate computer models of the United States ever attempted. There are virtual cities inhabited by millions of virtual individuals who go to work, shopping centers, soccer games and anywhere else their real life counterparts go. And there are virtual power grids, oil and gas lines, water pipelines, airplane and train systems, even a virtual Internet.

The scientists build them. And then they destroy them.

DOJ_NMG_0001269

On a recent weekday at the Los Alamos National Laboratory, researcher Steve Fernandez took several power-relay plants in the Pacific Northwest offline with a few clicks of his keyboard while Kristin Omberg and Brent Daniel were working up mathematical models that calculated the worst places to release biological agents in San Diego.

"We're trying to be the best terrorists we can be," said James P. Smith, who is working on simulations of a smallpox virus released in Portland, Ore. "Sometimes we finish and we're like, 'We're glad we're not terrorists.' "

The Los Alamos experiments are part of the Homeland Security Department's efforts to harness technology to aid the war on terrorism. Like government "data-mining" projects that use flight itineraries, credit card reports and other data and try to find patterns to predict who might be a likely terrorist, the simulations are attempts to guess the bigger picture.

The federal government is using the simulations to provide options in the event of a real terrorist attack. The information is so sensitive that most of the lab's work is classified, and the physical facility is secured with its own experimental technologies. If the simulations got into the wrong hands, the researchers say, they could be used as the ultimate weapon against Americans. "It would be a terrorist recipe for doing something terrible," Smith said.

Some urban planners have criticized the project for its cost -- each simulation can cost tens of millions of dollars -- and have argued that such modeling can never be precise. A book on public health threats by the Institute of Medicine of the National Academies, for example, notes that some critics say simulations "cannot provide clear evidence for or against any option." Advocates say the exercise is providing crucial information for protecting the country.

When planes crashed into the World Trade Center and Pentagon nearly four years ago, the government had little understanding of the weaknesses and interdependencies of power, water, transportation and telecommunications networks. Richard Clarke, the former counterterrorism czar under the Clinton and Bush administrations, warned that this opened the possibility of "cascade" failures--domino effects--that authorities had little power to stop.

In 2003, for example, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission revealed that a computer "worm" on the Internet penetrated the control systems of a nuclear power plant, disabling its safety mechanisms for about five hours. That same year, much of the East Coast and Midwest were hit with an electrical blackout that experts thought should have been limited to one area.

Clarke created a "critical infrastructure protection" group made up of the top officials from the government and from industry. The Los Alamos simulations are the cornerstone of their work.

The models have helped officials pinpoint and prioritize where changes need to be made. Fernandez's work has led to upgraded security at certain power plants. Omberg and Daniel have created biosensors--which can detect a wide variety of biological threats -- that have been placed in areas of major cities that the computer program calculated were vulnerable, such as near sports arenas or transportation hubs.

Smith's findings have been a major component of the debate over whether it's necessary to synthesize enough smallpox vaccine for the entire country. He found that in the event of an outbreak, targeted vaccination would work almost as well as mass vaccination if officials moved quickly to establish quarantine zones for those infected.

Traditionally, estimates of infection and deaths are made using a simple multiple that denotes how fast the disease spread. Smith's program is far more detailed and uses a mixture of mathematical data and basic psychology to simulate an area and the behavior of its population.

It begins by modeling every city block using census data, then populates the city using information on household income and age of residents. Next the scientists simulate people's movements on a daily basis by using data from diaries kept by commuters; foot traffic patterns on streets, malls and other public places; and public transportation schedules. The hope is to be able to see how different social interactions are in America in 2005 from other areas where the spread of disease has been studied -- such as in rural Africa, where communities are much more isolated, or in the United States in 1918 when some cities like Portland saw much traffic from soldiers on boats.

It turns out that the average person in Portland, population 1.6 million, has about five "activities" per day. That is, they might get up and drop the children off at school, go to work, buy gas, buy groceries and then pick up the children. The average travel time for each person is 30 minutes.

"The thing that makes it unique is the estimate of who comes into contact with whom in a large urban area and how long the contacts last," said Stephen Eubank, a researcher at the Bioinformatics Institute at Virginia Tech who worked with Smith on the smallpox simulation.

The scientists continuously run the simulations, which operate about 100 times faster than real time, testing actions like closing the airport, quarantining a neighborhood or shutting down workplaces.

"It's like the movie 'Groundhog Day.' You could reach in and say what I did yesterday didn't work so well and let's see how something else works," Eubank said.

In one simulation, Smith unleashed the smallpox virus in a university building in downtown Portland, with several students becoming victims. Soon after the 10-day incubation period passed, hospitals throughout Portland began to report cases. Smith's computer chronicled the devastation. Day 1: 1,281 infected, zero dead. Day 35: 23,919 infected, 551 dead. Day 70: 380,582 infected, 12,499 dead.

Smith wondered: How would the results change if local officials closed the schools? If they started mass vaccination? If they locked down the whole city?

Smith programmed a cluster of computers to run through these scenarios and hundreds of others, trying to determine which response would save the most lives.

Each time the model is run, it produces more data than the contents of the Library of Congress. Some findings are obvious: that the invention of air transportation may be the biggest factor in the spread of disease. Others aren't as easy to guess: that shutting down schools may not help as much as expected because parents are likely to take their children to malls and playgrounds where they can come in contact with others who have been infected. It also turned out that the speed of intervention is much more important than the type of intervention.

If officials waited 10 days or more, Smith found, "We didn't get to enough people so a lot of people died. It was almost as bad as a "do nothing" strategy, which was depressing."

Eubank said that when he runs simulations for governors or mayors, they inevitably ask him to quarantine the whole city, to make sure residents stay in their houses.

"But if I had to do that I would basically be shooting anybody who walks out on their doorstep. That's not acceptable," Eubank said. "We are trying to understand the 'cost-benefit' tradeoff--if you implement a quarantine it may give you the benefit you're looking for but it may be too costly socially."

The biggest challenge simulation researchers face is that it's unlikely they'll ever know how accurate they were until a real attack occurs. The only system that's been tested against a real life event is Fernandez's program for how hurricanes will affect the electricity grid.

In September 2004, his team used the system to predict the route of Hurricane Frances based on historical information about similar hurricanes as well as its wind profile, intensity and other data 40 hours before landfall. He advised Florida officials to position emergency repair teams in parts of the state that he thought would receive the most damage--and he turned out to be correct. His computer was also right about the 11 days it would require to get power back up for 90 percent of the state, and about the estimate of damage: $28 billion; the final damage total was $27 billion.

Fernandez said the pinpoint accuracy of the Hurricane Frances simulation was just plain luck. The world is too complex, he said, to ever be captured that specifically in a computer program.

No matter how much money is spent, he said, or how long scientists work on the task, "we'll never understand all the interdependencies of life."

Fighter Jet Intercepts Plane Near Camp David (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Michael Ruane, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, July 3, 2005

A small plane entered restricted airspace Saturday night around Camp David, where President Bush was spending the weekend, prompting federal officials to dispatch a fighter jet to intercept it and track it until it landed at an airport in Frederick.

DOJ_NMG_0001271

Authorities questioned the pilot of the Cessna 172 and released him. The aircraft was among three small planes that violated the restricted airspace Saturday. The breaches illustrate how increasingly complicated it is for civilian pilots to traverse the most controlled airspace in the nation -- and for federal officials to protect it.

In fact, such incidents are becoming so routine that the vast majority go unreported. Air defense officials said that since Sept. 11, 2001, they have sent fighter jets to respond to more than 2,000 violations of airspace across the United States.

Inside the so-called Air Defense Identification Zone, a 2,000-square-mile area of protected airspace around Washington, there are an average of two to three airspace violations a day when it's clear enough to fly small aircraft, said Laura Brown, a spokeswoman for the Federal Aviation Administration.

There were previous times when fighter jets intercepted small planes flying into the protected airspace around the Camp David retreat, said Lt. Jody Vazquez of the North American Aerospace Defense Command.

"This is not an uncommon thing to happen," Vazquez said. "We've had more than 2,000 threats, but a 9/11 has not occurred again. We consider this a success."

The complexity of the system continues to trigger the capital's alarm systems. On Wednesday, the Capitol was evacuated after a small, fast-flying plane breached Washington's restricted airspace. The intrusion disrupted a Senate vote and prompted Bush to be rushed to a safer location.

And on May 11, another small plane violated restricted airspace, prompting lawmakers and government workers to flee the Capitol, the White House and other buildings.

It was unknown yesterday whether Bush was moved from Camp David after Saturday night's incident. The White House referred calls to the Secret Service, which would not comment.

On most days, the small planes would not have been in violation. They were all flying well outside the three-nautical-mile no-fly zone that rings Camp David, which sits near Thurmont, north of Frederick.

But this past weekend, with Bush there, the radius of the restricted airspace was temporarily widened to 10 miles, part of a roster of post-Sept. 11 security measures.

"They weren't totally aware of the no-fly zone -- exactly where the borders were," said Cpl. K. Sherwood of the Maryland State Police, referring to the husband and wife who rented the plane, which was white with blue, maroon and yellow trim.

The plane bore at an altitude of 2,400 feet into the restricted airspace about 10:40 p.m. The couple apparently did not have the plane's radio on, said federal aviation officials, and had not filed a flight plan. Private planes require a distinct transponder code so authorities will know their identity, and pilots are required to maintain radio contact with the FAA as they approach restricted areas.

Air controllers watched the tiny blip on their radar screen as it moved deeper into the restricted airspace, but there was no way to contact the pilot, Vazquez said. So air defense personnel from NORAD dispatched an F-15 fighter jet to intercept and follow the Cessna. By then, it was 7 1/2 miles north of Camp David.

"We were just following the aircraft," Vazquez said. "The pilot was not responding to the radio."

Minutes later, the Cessna landed at Frederick Municipal Airport, where Secret Service agents were waiting to question the husband, the pilot. No charges were filed, and he was released, said Jonathan Cherry, an agency spokesman. Police yesterday would not identify the couple who had rented the plane, registered to Frederick-based Airworthy Aviation.

The first of the other two small planes that briefly breached the restricted airspace Saturday strayed inside the zone at 11:45 a.m. about eight miles south of Camp David and remained inside for about seven minutes, Brown said. It then flew out and landed in Lincoln Park, N.J.

The second plane skimmed the edge at 12:42 p.m. about 10 miles north of Camp David and left the restricted airspace after three minutes.

Both planes were tracked by radar, Brown said, and FAA investigators plan to question the violators. No fighter jets were dispatched in those incidents.

Jeff Myers, a spokesman with the Frederick-based Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, which has more than 400,000 members nationwide, said such breaches by small planes "clearly" pose "no real threat" to the nation's security.

DOJ_NMG_0001272

"The issue here is not the damage that can be done. It's the fear of what might happen," he said. "If somebody wanted to do huge harm to the D.C. area, there are so many other ways of doing it than small planes.

"It's great to be worried about a threat, but let's be worried about the right threats," he added. "No small airplane has ever been used in an act of terror anywhere in the world."

Still, Myers said, there was no excuse for pilots in the region to be violating the airspace zones around Washington. His organization, he said, is trying to educate its members to better plan their flights and get permission to even go near restricted zones.

"We're frustrated by pilots who aren't heeding the warnings," Myers said. "And those warnings are plentiful."

Plane Gets Too Close To Bush Retreat (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, July 4, 2005

FREDERICK, Md. (AP) -- Federal authorities questioned and released a pilot Saturday night after a plane violated restricted airspace around Camp David, forcing a landing at Frederick's airport.

The small Cessna passenger plane was intercepted by fighter jets while traveling about eight miles northwest of Frederick at about 10:45 p.m., Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) spokeswoman Holly Baker told the Associated Press yesterday.

The pilot was forced to land and was questioned but was released late Saturday without being charged, Secret Service spokesman Jonathan Cherry said yesterday.

President Bush was spending the weekend at the presidential retreat near Thurmont, which is one of the off-limits zones in the Washington area.

The White House did not respond to questions about whether President Bush had to be evacuated from the area during the incident or was even aware of the plane.

Two F-16 jets forced the Cessna to land at the airport, the Frederick News-Post first reported. The newspaper said a man and woman were interviewed, but Mr. Cherry wouldn't comment on the report.

No one was taken into custody, said Maryland State Police Sgt. M.W. Jones, adding that the plane may have been rented at the airport.

Since September 11, 2001, hundreds of pilots have violated Washington's restricted airspace.

Private planes are not allowed to fly in the Air Defense Identification Zone, about 2,000 square miles radiating from the three airports around Washington, without a special transponder code and radio contact with the FAA. They are not allowed within 16 miles of the Washington Monument.

On Wednesday, the White House briefly went to red alert when a plane entered restricted airspace around Washington. Mr. Bush was hurried from his residence to a safer location and lawmakers were ordered to evacuate the U.S. Capitol.

Two fighter jets intercepted the twin-engine, propeller-driven plane eight miles northeast of the Capitol and escorted it to Winchester, Va.

On May 11, a private Cessna violated restricted airspace and sent lawmakers and other government workers scrambling from the Capitol, the White House and other federal buildings. That plane also was escorted to Frederick Municipal Airport.

Mother Says Nichols Revealed Bombing Role (WP/AP)

By Sean Murphy, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, July 4, 2005

OKLAHOMA CITY -- Bombing conspirator Terry Nichols has been meeting with the FBI and has revealed additional details about his involvement in the 1995 attack that destroyed the Oklahoma City federal building, his mother said Sunday.

Nichols, serving life in prison on federal and state convictions for the bombing that killed 168 people, acknowledged that he helped Timothy McVeigh acquire ammonium nitrate fertilizer and racing fuel that were combined to make the explosive, and helped assemble the bomb components, said Nichols' mother, Joyce Wilt of Lapeer, Mich.

"That's the extent of it," Wilt said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. "From there on, he had no knowledge."

McVeigh was convicted of federal conspiracy and murder charges in the bombing and was executed on June 11, 2001.

Prosecutors have contended that Nichols willingly helped McVeigh plan and carry out the bombing. Wilt said she believes others were involved in the bombing and that the FBI is hiding it.

Wilt contends her son suffers from Asperger's Syndrome, a form of autism that allowed him to be easily manipulated by others. She said McVeigh took advantage of Nichols to get him to help with the bombing preparations and that he threatened to harm Nichols and his family if he didn't comply.

"Terry was just being protective of all of us," Wilt said. "It just breaks my heart, because he was a good kid. He got out in the world and people started taking advantage of him."

She said her son didn't know what McVeigh planned to do with the bomb.

"He didn't ask. People with that type of syndrome don't do that," Wilt said. "When you ask him to do something, he just does it."

Citing unidentified sources, The Oklahoman reported Sunday that Nichols acknowledged to the FBI that he robbed Arkansas gun dealer Roger Moore to help finance the bombing and that he thought McVeigh planned to bomb a monument to get back at the federal government.

Based on Nichols' statement this spring, the FBI recovered a .50-caliber sniper rifle taken in the robbery, the newspaper reported citing unnamed sources.

Prosecutors say Nichols stole an estimated $63,000 in weapons and other items from Moore's home that were then sold to help finance the terror plot. Moore, who underwent months of questioning after the bombing, was never charged and denies any involvement.

Gary Johnson, a spokesman for the FBI office in Oklahoma City, would not confirm any talks between Nichols and the agency. "We may make a statement in a few days regarding the recent media reports, but not at this point," Johnson said Sunday.

The lead defense attorney at Nichols' state trial, Brian Hermanson, said he had not been present for any such conversations and would not confirm if any took place, but said it wouldn't surprise him.

"He's not facing the death penalty. It's pretty logical," Hermanson said.

OECD Warns Of Unbearable Losses From Terrorism (FT)

By Andrea Felsted

Financial Times, July 5, 2005

Insurers might be unable to bear losses from “mega-terrorism”, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development will warn on Tuesday.

In some countries, claims from attacks that could include a nuclear, chemical or biological incident could even outstrip the joint compensation capacity of insurers and governments, the OECD will warn. Estimates of maximum losses resulting from a single terrorist attack range from $50bn to $250bn. The attacks on New York on September 11 2001 resulted in insurance losses estimated at more than $30bn, according to the report.

Mega-terrorism would be an attack resulting in losses of more than $100bn the explosion of a dirty bomb, the spreading of poisonous gas or large-scale water contamination.

The OECD will say: “The losses associated with very large-scale terrorist attacks can remain beyond the capability of the private insurance and reinsurance industry to price and absorb alone.” In some countries mega-terrorism could result in losses beyond the level that insurers and governments could absorb without threatening national economic stability.

Risks from chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear attacks are generally excluded from insurance coverage and are often not fully covered by government-backed schemes. The OECD will urge governments to work with the insurance industry to develop ways to cover these.

It will warn that in some countries the economic and social impact of a large-scale attack could be greater than in 2001 because of the low take-up of terrorism insurance despite a stabilisation in the market for terrorism insurance since 2001. “In countries with low terrorism insurance take-up rates, a large-scale terrorist attack could be more damaging today than before 2001 since a far smaller portion of the risk would be spread across the national and international insurance and reinsurance community.”

Member countries should rely on the private sector as far as possible to cover terrorism risks. But, government intervention might be needed if there is not enough capacity to cover risks in the private markets.

It will note that partnership arrangements between insurers and governments as in the UK, the US, Australia, France, Germany, the Netherlands and Spain have worked well in stabilising insurance markets after attacks.

The comments come just days after the Bush administration said it opposed an extension of the terrorism risk insurance programme enacted following the September 2001 attacks.

Washington's Deadly Bridge (NYT)

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

The weakest point in America's defense against terrorism may be an inconspicuous little bridge a few blocks from the Capitol. Rail tanker cars filled with deadly chemicals pass over the bridge, at Second Street and E Street SW, on their journeys up and down the East Coast. The bridge is highly vulnerable to an explosion from below, and if deadly chemicals were released on it, they would endanger every member of Congress and as many as 250,000 other federal employees.

This vulnerability could be easily eliminated by a federal law barring the transportation of hazardous materials through Washington and other locations at high risk of a terrorist attack. But the railroads have fought such legislation, which would increase their costs. If the Bush administration and Congress are serious about homeland security, they will get a chemical transportation law passed at once.

When antiterrorism experts try to predict what could happen in the next 9/11 attack, the dispersal of deadly chemicals is at or near the top of their list. An assault on a chemical plant or a rail car filled with chemicals would turn another unremarkable part of the infrastructure into a powerful instrument of death. An attack on a single rail tanker filled with chlorine could kill or seriously harm 100,000 people in less than an hour. Because of its location in the middle of official Washington, a chlorine leak from a rail tanker on the bridge at Second Street could endanger much of the federal government, including Congress and the Supreme Court.

Such an attack would be frighteningly simple to carry out. The 90-ton rail tanker cars that carry chlorine and other deadly chemicals are clearly labeled. Terrorists could wait for such a shipment to reach the bridge and then explode a truck bomb from below, causing the tanker to derail and crack open, releasing its deadly contents. On a recent visit, a member of the editorial board found virtually no barriers to such an attack. The bridge runs over a public street that has little traffic and plenty of space for a truck to lie in wait. We saw no sign that police or other security officers were protecting it.

Earlier this year, the City Council in Washington passed a law prohibiting the transport of ultrahazardous materials within 2.2 miles of the Capitol. But CSX, the railroad that operates the two main lines running through the district, has gone to court to challenge the law, which would add to its costs. It claims that city governments do not have the power to interfere with interstate rail shipping. A federal court has blocked the law from taking effect, though CSX has temporarily stopped shipping ultrahazardous materials on the rail line closest to the Capitol.

The Bush administration filed a brief supporting CSX in its challenge to Washington's law, and, incredibly, it has made no effort to do the job with federal regulation. When it comes to defending the nation from terrorism, the president and the Republican leadership in Congress have been unwilling to make large corporations, many of them big campaign donors, shoulder their share of the burden. Washington's residents and employees should not have to risk their lives to save CSX the cost of rerouting shipments of ultrahazardous materials.

There is a simple solution. Senator Joseph Biden, Democrat of Delaware, has introduced a bill aimed at keeping hazardous rail shipments out of areas like downtown Washington, where the terrorist threat is greatest. Any member of Congress who is not already supporting Mr. Biden's bill should take a short walk to Second Street and E Street SW for a reminder of why it is urgently needed.

WAR NEWS:

Gonzales Returns From Iraq Trip (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0001275

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

ABOARD AIR FORCE TWO, July 4 -- Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales returned to Washington Monday after seven-hour visit to Baghdad that was aimed at highlighting the efforts to build a functional criminal justice system in Iraq. The trip also served to illustrate the severe dangers and obstacles that remain.

Gonzales had to travel to Iraq under intense secrecy and heavy guard out of fear insurgents would target him. After arriving at Baghdad airport early Sunday, he was temporarily stranded there while waiting out a sandstorm that had grounded helicopters. Insurgents have made the nine-mile road into the city's center too dangerous to drive.

His presence in Baghdad was not revealed publicly until he was safely inside the Green Zone, the walled compound of former palaces and parks that serve as a shaky refuge for coalition forces and the Iraqi government.

There Gonzales met with Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari and other senior Iraqi officials to discuss plans for a joint task force to investigate the kidnappings and other serious offenses that contributed to the chaos outside the U.S. compound.

Hours earlier, Egypt's highest-ranking diplomat in Iraq, Ihab Sherif, disappeared after being accosted by two carloads of gunmen as he drove in Baghdad.

"What we need to do is develop the expertise within the Iraqi community to prosecute assassinations, kidnappings and other serious crimes," Gonzales said in an interview during the trip. "This should improve the situation."

Hundreds of people, including an estimated 200 foreigners, have been kidnapped since the Iraqi insurgency began two years ago.

"Challenges to the rule of law are certainly substantial," Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who leads efforts to train and equip Iraqi security forces, remarked at the start of a meeting Sunday between Gonzales and military leaders at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad.

Gonzales and other U.S. officials stressed during their brief visit that they believe a new anti-crime task force -- modeled loosely on the anti-terrorism and anti-gang task forces common in the United States -- will bring significant improvements. FBI agents and other U.S. investigators will help build evidence and identify suspects, but prosecutions would be left up to the new Iraqi courts, U.S. officials said.

The focus on a task force marks a shift in strategy by the Justice Department, which until now has attempted to keep U.S. prosecutors and FBI agents out of direct involvement in criminal cases involving Iraqis and other foreign citizens.

Gonzales and other officials sought to downplay any criticism of current Iraqi investigative efforts. "It's not that they can't do the job," said one senior Justice official, who declined to be identified discussing details of the negotiations between the two governments. "It's that the job is so difficult they need some assistance, and we can provide that."

The task force would likely include about 10 U.S. investigators, including representatives from the FBI, the U.S. Marshals Service and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Gonzales said after his closed meetings with Iraqis that there was "universal support" for the idea.

He also said that, despite continuing troubles, he found the trip to Baghdad "inspiring."

"These people are working under difficult and extreme circumstances, trying accomplish a very difficult task," he said, referring to Iraqi and U.S. investigators.

The Justice Department has about 100 prosecutors and staff and 400 contractors in Iraq, primarily helping to train judges, corrections officers and police officers. The FBI also has about 60 agents and analysts in Baghdad focused primarily on investigating insurgent attacks against U.S. forces.

Among those who traveled to Baghdad with Gonzales was Max Wood, the U.S. attorney for the Middle District of Georgia, who will lead Justice Department efforts in Iraq over the next year.

A special unit of Justice Department prosecutors and investigators in Baghdad is also helping Iraqi prosecutors compile evidence and build criminal cases against Saddam Hussein and other former members of the deposed government. Gonzales said he did not have any detailed discussions with Iraqi officials about plans for trials of Hussein and other suspects, saying such decisions are entirely up to the Iraqi government.

Attorney General Makes Quick Trip To Iraqi Capital (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, July 4, 2005

BAGHDAD, July 3 -- Even as his name echoes in Washington as one of the most likely Supreme Court candidates, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales landed in war-torn Iraq on Sunday for an unannounced visit with some of the hundreds of Justice Department employees stationed here.

In an interview with The Washington Post on his way to the Iraqi capital, Gonzales said he would continue to be directly involved in making recommendations to President Bush for a possible successor to retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. But Gonzales, a close friend and longtime confidant to Bush, declined to comment on his own chances or interest in the post.

"There will be a group of people who will share their thoughts with the president about a nominee, and obviously I am part of those discussions," Gonzales said. "But I'm not going to talk about the details of those discussions or the recommendations or anything like that . . . I think the president is going to be deliberative in his decision."

Although Bush may "take some time" to make a final call, Gonzales added, the president is adamant that a new justice be confirmed by October. The interviews with The Post and the Associated Press en route to Baghdad were Gonzales's first comments about the high court since O'Connor resigned Friday.

The trip is the first to Iraq by the top U.S. law enforcement officer since the Iraq invasion more than two years ago. Gonzales, who took the post in February, nearly had to cancel the final leg of his trip because helicopters were grounded by sandstorms and the road from the Baghdad airport to the U.S.-controlled Green Zone remains very dangerous.

About 500 Justice Department employees are stationed in Iraq, including some 400 contractors. About 60 FBI agents and analysts also are stationed here.

In meetings with U.S. and Iraqi officials, Gonzales announced plans to form a joint U.S.-Iraq task force to focus on an increasing number of violent crimes, including beheadings and kidnappings, that continue to go unsolved.

"One of the most important ways to fight terrorism is to promote democracy, and one of the most important ways to promote democracy is the rule of law," Gonzales said in the interview.

Gonzales, who spent about seven hours in Baghdad, also met with the prime minister, Ibrahim Jafari, and the interior minister, Bayan Jabr.

Gonzales, 49, has worked with Bush since his days as Texas governor and came to Washington as Bush's White House counsel in 2001. After a bruising confirmation battle for the attorney general post in which Gonzales came under fire from Democrats over detainee abuses, a Gonzales nomination to the Supreme Court would likely face opposition from conservative Republicans who dislike his previous positions on such issues as abortion and affirmative action.

Some of Bush's allies in the Senate and elsewhere rebuked conservative critics of Gonzales as a potential nominee. Several activist groups have said Gonzales is not tough enough in his stands against abortion and other matters, but Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) called the allegations "pure bunk." Hatch, a senior Judiciary Committee member, told CBS's "Face the Nation" that Gonzales "is a terrific human being, a good lawyer" who would do well on the court.

"But some of the right-wing groups, of course, are trying to push the president into getting the most conservative person that they can get, and they don't consider Judge Gonzales to be as conservative as some of the others," Hatch said. "But, I can tell you, he's a person of integrity . . . and if he gets picked, I'm certainly going to support him."

Speaking on ABC's "This Week," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.) said: "I know Al Gonzales, and he's a good man. And he's doing an outstanding job as attorney general. But at this point, we're all engaged in a lot of speculation as to who the nominee might be, and we may all be wrong." Cornyn has also been mentioned as a potential nominee.

Justice aides said Gonzales's unannounced trip to Iraq -- which was held under wraps for security reasons until he was safely in the Green Zone -- had been planned for some time and was not connected to the Supreme Court vacancy.

The department's Office of Legal Policy is the main branch within the Justice Department that is vetting and researching potential candidates for the high court. But preparations for a Supreme Court vacancy began at the start of Bush's first term, and Gonzales -- first as White House counsel and now as attorney general -- has been at the center of most of those discussions.

When asked whether he would accept the high court nomination if it was offered to him, Gonzales just smiled. "I love being attorney general," he said.

In a brief address to Justice and Defense department personnel, Gonzales said: "I'm here to tell you that you're not alone, that the American people are very much with you. I want you to know that we're thinking about you, we miss you and we look forward to the day that you can come home."

Staff writers Charles Babington and Susan Schmidt in Washington contributed to this report.

Attorney General Makes Surprise Baghdad Visit (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, July 4, 2005

BAGHDAD (Reuters) - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made a surprise single-day visit to Baghdad on Sunday, meeting top officials and justice department employees.

A U.S. embassy spokesman said Gonzales met Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and Iraq's justice and interior ministers during his previously unannounced flying visit.

The Department of Justice said Gonzales was also meeting some of the department's 400 staff in Iraq.

They include a large team of investigators that has been helping Iraq build a war crimes case against ousted leader Saddam Hussein and other members of his regime.

Department of Justice employees are also helping to train members of Iraq's judiciary.

Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said Gonzales's meetings with members of the Iraqi government were ``to offer his support for what they are doing in terms of reconstituting or rebuilding the judicial system in Iraq."

``He's also meeting with the DOJ employees that are on the ground in Iraq just to express his support for what they're doing," Scolinos said.

The attorney general has been mentioned as a possible candidate to take the U.S. Supreme Court seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her plans to retire last week.

Top Egypt Diplomat Seized In Iraq (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani, Tribune Staff Reporter. Tribune News Services Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, July 4, 2005

BAGHDAD -- Gunmen kidnapped Egypt's top diplomat in Iraq, authorities said Sunday, snatching the envoy in a busy commercial district in the capital.

The abduction came hours before a surprise visit to the capital by U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales, who met with Iraqi and American officials and U.S. troops.

About eight gunmen pistol-whipped the diplomat, Ihab al-Sherif, outside a bookstore in Baghdad's al-Jamaa neighborhood Saturday evening and then stuffed him into the trunk of a car, witnesses said.

Egyptian officials in Cairo confirmed Sunday that al-Sherif, 51, Egypt's chief of diplomatic mission in Iraq, was abducted.

Al-Sherif was widely expected to become Egypt's ambassador to Iraq when an embassy is established here.

Speaking to reporters, Egyptian Deputy Foreign Minister Hani Khallaf seemed to take a conciliatory tone with al-Sherif's captors.

"If the kidnappers want to send a certain message, then al-Sherif is the most trusted one to bring it to Egypt," Khallaf said. The Foreign Ministry said efforts were under way to discover who the captors were and to win the diplomat's release.

Witnesses said one of the gunmen shouted at passersby that al-Sherif was an "American" and was "pimping the Iraqi people."

"He was bleeding from the top of his head where one of the gunmen had hit him with the pistol," said Mustafa Adnan, 17, who peeked out of his nearby photography studio when he heard a scuffle starting. "He resisted the gunmen, but they were able to shove him into the trunk."

Minutes after the gunmen sped away with al-Sherif, witnesses stopped a U.S. convoy passing through the area to tell them about the incident.

DOJ_NMG_0001278

The U.S. soldiers quickly cordoned off the area in an attempt to find al-Sherif, said Mohammed Amin, 45, who watched the scene unfold through the window of the mobile phone shop he manages. But the gunmen were long gone.

Egyptian officials in Cairo would not reveal details of the kidnapping.

In Baghdad, the diplomatic mission's officials sealed off their compound and instructed Iraqi police to turn away reporters after news of the kidnapping broke Sunday.

Al-Sherif arrived in Iraq a little more than a month ago to serve as Egypt's top diplomat in Iraq. In June, Egyptian officials also stated their intention to turn their mission into a full-fledged embassy, and that al-Sherif would likely be elevated to the title of ambassador.

In July 2004, another Egyptian diplomat, Mohammed Mamdouh Helmi Qutb, was kidnapped in Baghdad. His captors freed him after the Egyptian government reiterated that they had no plans to deploy troops to Iraq.

Also Sunday, the U.S. military announced the capture of a Tunisian national suspected of importing suicide bombers into Iraq on behalf of the terrorist organization Al Qaeda in Iraq.

Imad Nassar Ahmed Amarah, also known as Abu Hamza, purportedly specialized in shuttling foreign fighters into Iraq for suicide missions in the Mosul area, the U.S. military said.

It said it has collected evidence suggesting that more than 100 suicide bombers have gone through safe houses under Amarah's control.

Gonzales made his a surprise one-day visit to Baghdad to thank U.S. Justice Department officials and troops working in Iraq for their service. He also visited with several Iraqi officials, including Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, according to the U.S. Embassy.

The unannounced visit, the latest of several by high-ranking Bush administration officials around past holidays, came as Gonzales' name has surfaced as a possible successor to Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who on Friday announced her retirement.

In violence Sunday, three police officers and a civilian were killed when a car bomb exploded near a police patrol near the northern city of Kirkuk, officials said.

Two American troops were wounded as a suicide attacker struck near a checkpoint in Ramadi in western Iraq.

Gonzales: FBI To Aid Iraqi Investigations (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, Associated Press

AP, July 4, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The United States will help Iraq investigate the killing and kidnapping of government officials, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says. The informal agreement was disclosed as Gonzales made an unannounced and tightly guarded, six-hour visit Sunday to Baghdad. He met with Iraq's prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, as well as police and judicial officials.

Advertisement

Word of the arrangement followed the abduction on Saturday night of Egypt's top envoy to Iraq.

"There are still some high-level crimes, murders and kidnappings that are not being prosecuted. One reason is that the evidence is not available," Gonzales said in an interview en route back to Washington.

While details are still to be worked out, investigators from the FBI and other U.S. law enforcement agencies would join their Iraqi counterparts at crime scenes and in other aspects of the probes, aides to Gonzales said.

The attorney general's visit took place under extraordinary security precautions, including a news blackout until Gonzales was safely inside the heavily fortified Green Zone where Iraqi and U.S. officials work.

The visit was almost scrapped because bad weather temporarily grounded helicopters that were to take Gonzales and his entourage from the Baghdad airport to the city. Driving the eight miles from the airport -- a stretch that risks bombings and other attacks -- was considered too dangerous.

Gonzales praised Iraq's commitment to democracy in the face of sustained deadly attacks by insurgents and also used the trip to show support for U.S. troops in Iraq.

"As we approach the Fourth of July weekend, I suspect there's some of you that are here that sometimes feel lonely and you sometimes wonder whether you are alone," Gonzales told American soldiers at the U.S. Embassy. "And I'm here to tell you that you are not alone, that the American people are very much with you."

The attorney general condemned abuses by American soldiers at the Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad, blaming them on a few individuals, not official U.S. policy.

As White House counsel in President Bush's first term, Gonzales helped develop the administration's legal strategy in the fight against terror.

He wrote a memo in 2002 contending that Bush had the right to waive anti-torture laws and international treaties that provide protections to prisoners of war. Critics have said the memo helped lead to abuses of the type seen at Abu Ghraib, an allegation he has denied.

A few senior Justice Department officials accompanied Gonzales, including Max Wood, the U.S. attorney in Macon, Ga., who is beginning a posting as the senior U.S. law enforcement official in Iraq.

More than 400 Justice Department employees and contractors are working to train Iraqi judges, prosecutors, police and prison guards. A separate unit is working with the Iraqi tribunal preparing to try former President Saddam Hussein and others.

Some five dozen FBI agents and analysts also are on assignment in Iraq investigating roadside bombings and other attacks against U.S.-led coalition forces.

Top Egyptian Diplomat In Baghdad Is Kidnapped (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, July 4, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, July 3 - The top Egyptian diplomat in Iraq was kidnapped late Saturday by gunmen in western Baghdad, Iraqi officials said Sunday. It is the first abduction of the head of a diplomatic mission here, at a time when the American and Iraqi governments are vigorously pressing Arab nations to send ambassadors to Iraq.

Word of the kidnapping of the diplomat, Ihab al-Sharif, came on a day of at least one deadly car bombing and other insurgent mayhem, as well as an unannounced visit to Baghdad by Alberto R. Gonzales, the United States attorney general, who has been mentioned as a possible nominee for Supreme Court justice.

American and Iraqi officials declined to specify when Mr. Gonzales had planned the trip or why, for a visit that lasted only six hours. But under his leadership, the Justice Department is playing an important role in the coming trials of Saddam Hussein and other officials of the former government. Mr. Sharif, who arrived here just a month ago, was seized as he was driving alone in his white Jeep Cherokee through the Jamia neighborhood of Baghdad, where he lived, an Interior Ministry official said. No group claimed responsibility for abducting him.

Several Egyptians have been kidnapped and released in Baghdad in the last year, including one lower-ranking diplomat, as part of a rash of kidnappings of foreigners and Iraqis that in many instances are done for cash ransoms.

Mr. Sharif has been designated to become Egypt's ambassador, an appointment that would create a diplomatic bond between Iraq and one of the Arab world's most influential countries, and help bestow legitimacy on the Iraqi government. The kidnappers may have been trying to send a warning to Egypt and other Arab nations that are considering strengthening diplomatic ties.

The Egyptian Foreign Ministry said it "is hoping to discover the circumstances surrounding the incident and secure the safety of the Egyptian diplomat assigned to strengthen bilateral relations between the two sisterly nations."

The Iraqi Islamic Party, a prominent Sunni Arab political group, condemned the abduction and demanded the Egyptian's release. The insurgency here is largely led by Sunni Arabs, and the Iraqi Islamic Party is believed to have some influence among the fighters.

Less than two weeks ago, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice publicly urged Iraq's Arab neighbors to send ambassadors to Iraq. Besides Egypt, only Jordan has committed to doing so. The White House is hoping stronger support by those countries, where a majority of Arabs are Sunnis, will help undercut the insurgency against the Iraqi government, which is dominated by Shiites.

But Sunni leaders and diplomats in the Middle East have expressed concerns about both security and Iranian Shiite influence here. Arab leaders are also keenly aware that the American-led occupation of Iraq is unpopular in their own countries.

Three witnesses to the kidnapping were quoted by The Associated Press as saying about eight gunmen had surrounded Mr. Sharif on Rabie Street as he stopped to buy a newspaper. One gunman struck him on the head with a pistol butt and called him an "American spy," the witnesses were quoted as saying, and the assailants shoved him into a car trunk.

In violence on Sunday, a car bomb exploded beside a police patrol in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing two officers and wounding one, said Maj. Imad Abdullah of the Kirkuk police.

Gunmen opened fire on a police commander's car in Baghdad, killing his driver. Gunmen also killed a Public Works Ministry employee on Sunday, and killed a Shiite cleric named Adil al-Janabi and one of his bodyguards late on Saturday.

The Baghdad visit by Mr. Gonzales coincided with speculation that he may be nominated as a replacement for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her resignation on Friday. His trip here to the heavily fortified American Embassy was a closely guarded secret, and reporters based here were not invited to meet with him.

He released a written statement that said, "I am proud of the people of the Department of Justice who are contributing to this effort by helping Iraqis advance the rule of law."

More than 400 Justice Department employees and contractors work in Iraq. They have been assigned to help set up the court system, conduct criminal investigations and advise the Iraqi tribunal overseeing the trials of Mr. Hussein and his aides.

Accompanying Mr. Gonzales were several American officials, including Max Wood, a United States attorney in Georgia who has been designated as the Justice Department's attaché to the American Embassy here. Willie Hulon, the head of the F.B.I.'s counterterrorism division, also arrived with Mr. Gonzales.

Mr. Gonzales's critics have accused him, in his previous job as White House counsel, of playing an important role in narrowing the legal definition of what constitutes torture, which ultimately contributed to prisoner abuse in Abu Ghraib and elsewhere. He also wrote a memorandum in January 2002 to the White House that said the Geneva Conventions did not apply to the war in Afghanistan and that described as "quaint" and "obsolete" several measures in the conventions.

At a regularly scheduled news conference in Baghdad, a spokesman for the Iraqi government, Laith Kubba, acknowledged Sunday that some Iraqi security forces had been responsible for torturing and abusing prisoners. Responding to a question about a report of those abuses in The Observer of London, he added that the government did not approve of such actions and was investigating reported incidents.

Mr. Kubba also criticized American troops for shooting and killing unarmed Iraqi civilians, citing the recent deaths of Yasser Salihee, a reporter for Knight Ridder, and Muhammad al-Sumaidaie, a cousin of Iraq's ambassador to the United Nations, Samir Sumaidaie. The American military has said it is investigating both incidents.

On Sunday, the mother of Muhammad al-Sumaidaie gave an account in a telephone interview with The New York Times of how, she said, American marines had entered her home on June 25 and killed her son.

Shortly after 10 a.m., marines entered the family home near the western town of Haditha to search for weapons, the mother, Sanaa Hashim Abdul Aziz, said. Muhammad, 21, an engineering student, took the marines into a bedroom to show them a Kalashnikov. "A few minutes later, we heard a gunshot, the sound of a single bullet being fired," Ms. Abdul Aziz said, her voice breaking.

The marines then took Muhammad's brother, Ali, 17, into the room. Ali "saw his brother lying in a pool of his blood," she said. "Ali was shocked to see his brother like that, and the marines asked him to then pick up the weapon that was lying on the ground next to his brother. He refused, and they started beating and interrogating him."

The marines left with the Kalashnikov and told neighbors they had killed a terrorist, Ms. Abdul Aziz said. The bullet that killed Muhammad had passed through his jaw, she added. Iraqi soldiers were standing outside the house but the marines did not let them enter, she said.

Samir Sumaidaie, the ambassador to the United Nations, said in an e-mail interview that he had "no idea whether the investigation is going to be serious or a whitewash," but that he would insist on a "credible, speedy and high-level inquiry that can be trusted to get at the truth."

Gonzales Goes To Iraq To Pump Up The Troops (NYDN)

By Michael McAuliff

New York Daily News, July 4, 2005

While Conservatives were set to go to war against a possible nomination of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to the Supreme Court, the nation's top lawman jetted off to the real war in Iraq yesterday.

After landing in Baghdad under tight security, Gonzales boosted Iraq's push for democracy and gave a pep talk to U.S. troops who were fighting while their families back home were preparing to celebrate Independence Day.

"As we approach the Fourth of July weekend, I suspect there's some of you that are here that sometimes feel lonely and you sometimes wonder whether you are alone," he told G.I.s. "I'm here to tell you that you are not alone, that the American people are very much with you."

Gonzales said his trip aimed to show Iraqis the U.S. commitment to their new government. "We are doing a lot to promote democracy and the rule of law," he said.

More than 400 Justice Department workers are in Iraq to train judges and law enforcement forces.

Iraqi Insurgents Seize Top Egyptian Diplomat (KRT)

By Leila Fadel, Knight Ridder Newspapers

Knight Ridder Newspapers, July 4, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The Egyptian ambassador-designate Ihab al-Sherif, the first diplomat from an Arab nation to Iraq, was kidnapped from his upscale Mansour neighborhood late Saturday.

Sherif had been in the country only a few weeks after Egypt agreed to upgrade its mission to a full embassy complete with an ambassador. Sherif is the highest-ranking foreign diplomat to be kidnapped in Iraq. Another Egyptian diplomat was kidnapped briefly last year and released.

The seizure reflects an attempt by insurgents to thwart the fledging democracy's efforts to normalize relations with its neighbors.

The Egyptian embassy would not comment on Sherif's kidnapping and did not release any details to Iraq's ministry of the interior in Baghdad.

Egypt severed its diplomatic ties with Iraq after Saddam Hussein's army invaded Kuwait in 1990.

Meanwhile, as U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales arrived in Baghdad on a surprise trip to visit with Justice Department personnel assigned to Iraq, new concerns were expressed over the killing of civilians by U.S. troops.

Laith Kuba, the spokesman for Prime Minister Ibrahim al Jaafari, criticized the American military following the deaths of Iraqi civilians in recent weeks.

The killings also were raised at a meeting of the Iraqi Parliament on Sunday during a divided debate on Iraqi sovereignty.

Many members were upset that Jaafari would not set a timetable for American troops to withdraw. Mahmoud Otthman, a Kurdish legislator, said at least 10 Iraqis have been killed in the last week by American soldiers.

"When sovereignty was transferred there was an agreement about foreign troops in Iraq," said Kuba, the president's spokesman. "There have been many recommendations, but these regulations have not been abided by. We are not going to take these incidents lightly."

Three journalists, including Knight Ridder's special correspondent Yasser Salihee, were shot by American soldiers. A cousin of Iraqi U.N. ambassador Samir al Sumaidai also was killed in Haditha during an offensive in the area.

Their deaths are under investigation, according to U.S. military officials in Baghdad.

Gonzales, who wrote the 2002 memo that eased restrictions on the use of torture of prisoners captured in Iraq and Afghanistan, spent the day meeting with Iraqi officials, including Jaafari, and U.S. military personnel. The Department of Justice has nearly 400 employees and contractors working in Iraq, assisting on legal and security issues.

Accompanying Gonzales was FBI Assistant Director Willie Hulon, who directs the FBI's counterterrorism division.

Over the past two years the U.S. military has continually refused to release the number of Iraqi civilians that have been killed since the war began.

DOJ_NMG_0001282

Iraq Body Count, a London based Web site that tracks deaths reported by the media or by officials, estimates the death toll of civilians since March 2003 between 22,787 and 25,814.

Many of those deaths came in the initial invasion and as the military has sought to control the insurgency. In addition, some deaths occur while soldiers are on patrol or at the numerous checkpoints designed to stop suicide bombers and the deployment of insurgents as well as the movement of weapons.

Human Rights Watch and the Committee to Protect Journalists have recommended that temporary and permanent checkpoints be marked more clearly to warn drivers of their presence. Examples include using spike strips, temporary speed bumps, flashing sirens and signs in English and Arabic.

"Until these investigations are complete it's premature to know what, if anything needs to happen," said Lt. Col. Steve Boylan, a top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq. "Recommendations will be made based on the investigation. But until that's completed it's just speculation and guesswork. We just don't know at this point."

The International Federation of Journalists called for independent investigations of the deaths of at least 17 journalists who have been killed by U.S. troops since the war began, the group said in a release issued Saturday.

US Attorney General Visits Iraq (AFP-Y2)

AFP, July 5, 2005

US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales arrived in Baghdad on his first trip to Iraq to meet with US and Iraqi officials, an embassy statement said.

"We recognise and thank the brave American men and women who are sacrificing to promote democracy in Iraq and to defend our freedom," he said upon arrival, according to the statement.

He was accompanied by Max Wood, the embassy's newly-appointed justice attache, and Willie Hulon, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's counter-terrorism division, said the statement.

Former attorney general John Ashcroft never visited Iraq.

"I am proud of the people of the Department of Justice who are contributing to this effort by helping Iraqis advance the rule of law," Gonzales said.

The US Justice Department has more than 400 employees and contractor personnel in Iraq helping the transitional government strengthen its law enforcement and justice system infrastructure.

The department also set up in May 2004 the Regime Crimes Liaison Office to support the Iraqi Special Tribunal, the court set up by the former US-led occupation authority to try ousted dictator Saddam Hussein and members of his regime.

Bush Visits Morgantown (CSJ)

By April Kaull

Charleston (WV) State Journal, July 5, 2005

President Bush visited West Virginia Monday for his third July Fourth visit in four years, and used the trip to ask Americans to stay the course in Iraq.

"The terrorists can kill the innocent, but they cannot stop the advance of freedom," the president told a cheering crowd at West Virginia University in Morgantown.

"Our strategy can be summed up this way: As Iraqis stand up, we will stand down, and then our troops can come home to a proud and grateful nation," he said to thousands at Woodburn Circle.

The president spoke for about 20 minutes, mostly about the war in Iraq and the fight against terrorism. He drew parallels between America's War for Independence, which lasted eight years, and the struggle to establish democracy in Iraq.

Our Founding Fathers faced terrible hardships, Bush said, but they kept their resolve and created a nation of liberty.

Two centuries later, "the Declaration of Independence has remained a revolutionary document."

Bush thanked West Virginians for their patriotism. "Coming to West Virginia is becoming a Fourth of July tradition for me," he said. "And every time I come here, I appreciate the beauty of West Virginia, and I appreciate being with decent, hardworking, patriotic Americans who call the Mountain State home.

DOJ_NMG_0001283

The president asked Americans to continue to support the troops, by flying a flag at home, helping a neighbor who has a family member in the military or visiting a Defense Department Web site.

Bush had special praise for two West Virginia soldiers:

Capt. Jeff Setzer, a Charleston police officer and a battery commander for the 201st Field Artillery Unit of the West Virginia National Guard. Setzer was in Baghdad during the elections in January, Bush said.

1st Lt. James McCormick of Scott Depot, who served 13 months in Iraq as part of the 518th Combat Gun Truck Company. McCormick earned the Bronze Star and two Purple Hearts during his tour. But Bush said McCormick wrote him a letter last week that said he would return to Iraq and continue the mission if needed.

"The men and women of America's Armed Forces are bringing great honor to the uniform they wear and to the nation they serve," Bush said. "And in this time of testing, our troops, whether they be stationed here or abroad, can know that the American people stand behind them all the way."

Air Force One landed at Morgantown's airport about 9:30 a.m. Monday, where he greeted U.S. Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, Mountaineers football coach Rich Rodriguez and other officials. He then was taken by motorcade to Woodburn Circle.

Bush's previous July Fourth visits were to Ripley in 2002 and Charleston in 2004.

Bush Brings His Message To W.Va. (WI)

By Joselyn King

Wheeling Intelligencer, July 5, 2005

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. - It appears President George W. Bush now equates the Fourth of July with democracy, freedom and West Virginia. Bush made his third Independence Day trip to the Mountain State Monday, addressing a large gathering outside outside West Virginia University's Woodburn Hall in Morgantown. On July 4, 2002, Bush spoke in Ripley, W.Va., and last year he made his Independence Day speech in Charleston.

"Coming to West Virginia is becoming a Fourth of July tradition for me," Bush told the crowd in Morgantown. "Every time I come here, I appreciate the beauty of West Virginia - and I appreciate being with decent, hardworking, patriotic Americans who call the Mountain State home."

Bush spoke about freedom and democracy Monday, and he urged Americans to support those troops currently fighting to bring these values to the Middle East. He reiterated his oft-used quote, "We will bring our enemies to justice, or bring justice to our enemies."

"Our enemies in this new war are men who celebrate murder, incite suicide and thirst for absolute power," Bush said. "They seek to spread their ideology of tyranny and oppression across the world. They seek to turn the Middle East into a haven for terror. They seek to drive America out of the region. These terrorists will not be stopped by negotiations, or concessions, or appeals to reason.

"In this war, there is only one option, and that is victory."

The U.S. strategy in the Middle East can be summed up this way, Bush added. "As Iraqis stand up, we will stand down, and then our troops can come home to a proud and grateful nation," he said.

Bush told the crowd that many West Virginian soldiers were "serving with skill and honor in the war on terrorism."

"Some of America's finest men and women have given their lives in the war on terror, and we remember them on Independence Day," he said. "We pray for the families who have lost a loved one in freedom's cause. And we know that the best way to honor their sacrifice is to complete the mission, so we will stay until the fight is won."

U.S. Rep. Shelly Moore-Capito, R-W.Va., introduced Bush in Morgantown.

"When the president wants to celebrate America and see what makes America great, he comes to West Virginia," she said. "He came into the presidency a Texan, and he has become a Mountaineer. Like you and me, he will always be free.

"We are proud to have him home where he belongs."

After the speech, Capito said Bush identifies with West Virginians.

"He loves West Virginia," she said. "He always gets a great reception here, and he feels confident with the people in West Virginia.

DOJ_NMG_0001284

"He also doesn't want to travel too far from Washington on Independence Day. He likes to be in a spot where his message will be received well, and this is a great thing that this is in West Virginia."

West Virginia Republican Party Chairman Robin Capehart of Wheeling added that the state's residents share Bush's values of spreading democracy.

"They love freedom - just like he does," Capehart said. He predicts Bush will return to West Virginia for Independence Day next year, and that he will make a number of visits to the state before his term ends.

Capehart, though, denied that Capito's appearance alongside the president was an indication that next year she will seek the Senate seat presently held by Democrat Robert C. Byrd.

"They have a very good relationship," Capehart said of Bush and Capito. "She is a big supporter of the president, and anytime you see him in the state you will see her with him."

Capito said Monday she will make no decision on her future political plans until this fall.

Bush Compares Challenges In Iraq To First Independence Day (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

MORGANTOWN, W.Va., July 4 - The challenges that America faces in Iraq, President Bush said at an outdoor rally here on Monday, are like those that confronted the country on its first Independence Day.

"On July 4, 1776, more than five years of the Revolutionary War still lay ahead," Mr. Bush said.

"From the battle of New York, to the winter at Valley Forge, to the victory at Yorktown, our forefathers faced terrible losses and hardships. Yet they kept their resolve," he said. "They kept their faith in a future of liberty, and with their hard-won victory, we guaranteed a home for the Declaration's proposition that all are created equal."

Reprising his prime-time speech on Iraq the week before, President Bush declared an exit strategy in place.

"Our strategy can be summed up this way: As Iraqis stand up, we will stand down, and then our troops can come home to a proud and grateful nation," Mr. Bush said.

But for now, he said, they are fighting for a revolution as meaningful - and inevitable - as the one being waged 229 years ago. "Our men and women in uniform are defending America against the threats of the 21st century," he said. "The war we are fighting came to our shores on September the 11th, 2001. After that day, I made a pledge to the American people - we will not wait to be attacked again."

It was the third time in recent years that Mr. Bush had visited West Virginia on the July 4 holiday, drawn to its nearness and increasingly Republican electorate at a time when many in the state are also active in the military. Republicans, having won the state's five electoral votes in the last two presidential elections, are now eyeing the possibility that Representative Shelley Moore Capito, a Republican often targeted by Democrats, will challenge the revered Democratic senator from the state, Robert C. Byrd, who is up for re-election in 2006. Ms. Capito and her father, Archie A. Moore, Jr., the former governor, joined Mr. Bush onstage.

But after a weekend of intense focus on the Supreme Court vacancy left by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and amid preparations for his attendance at the Group of 8 summit in Europe early Tuesday, President Bush avoided politics and kept to his patriotic message.

Karl Rove, his senior adviser, rode the flight from Washington to West Virginia but did not respond to requests for an interview over his reported role in a controversy that threatens to put two reporters in jail. Newsweek had reported over the weekend that Mr. Rove had talked to Matthew Cooper of Time magazine for an article about Valerie Plame, a C.I.A. operative whose name was illegally disclosed by an unidentified White House official in a case now under investigation.

The Newsweek article did not identify Mr. Rove as that source, but Bush critics have been eager to tie him to the leak. Outside the presidential rally in Morgantown, one protester made reference to the case, holding a sign that read: "Jail Karl Rove."

Several dozen other protesters demonstrated against the war in Iraq, chanting, "Please support our troops, not the president!"

But they were overwhelmed by Bush supporters. About 4,300 tickets to the event were given out by the Greater Morgantown Convention and Visitors' Bureau, according to its executive director, Stacey Brodak, who said the occasion brought great pride to the small college town just across the Pennsylvania border. The crowd, a sea of patriotic gear and military uniforms, gathered inside the campus green at West Virginia University for hours before the president arrived.

One local Bush supporter, Steve Smith, 57, a property manager, said he had left the house at 6 a.m. to get a good view. Like many in the crowd, Mr. Smith was wearing a vivid T-shirt that declared him "100 percent red-blooded American"; he described President Bush as "our greatest president ever."

Becky Dziekan, 52, said she had driven five hours from her home in Dayton, Ohio, to hear the president speak in the town where two of her daughters also live. "I wanted him to know he's not alone," said Ms. Dziekan, a Republican who voted for Mr. Bush.

But she stopped short of raving about his remarks. "For a celebration, it was sufficient. I mean, we're going to go have a picnic," she said. "I wouldn't want it for a State of the Union speech."

Bush Claims 'Comprehensive Strategy' For Iraq (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, July 5, 2005

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — President Bush pledged Monday to keep U.S. forces in Iraq "until the fight is won," telling a Fourth of July crowd that he has "a comprehensive strategy" to win the struggle in Iraq and prevail in the global war on terrorism.

Making his third Independence Day visit to West Virginia in four years, the president also asked Americans to remain patient, saying: "We know that the freedom we defend is meant for all men and women, and for all times. And we know that when the work is hard, the proper response is not retreat; it is courage."

In recent weeks Bush has been under growing pressure, including from some Republican lawmakers, to articulate an exit strategy -- what the White House prefers to call "a strategy for success" -- for Iraq. In his remarks here, however, Bush did not go beyond the points he made last Tuesday in a nationally televised prime-time address from Fort Bragg, N.C.

"In this time of testing, our troops, whether they be stationed here or abroad, can know that the American people stand behind them all the way," Bush told several thousand ticket-holders on a sun-drenched, grassy quad at the downtown campus of West Virginia University.

"Some of America's finest men and women have given their lives in the war on terror, and we remember them on Independence Day. We pray for the families who have lost a loved one in freedom's cause. And we know that the best way to honor their sacrifice is to complete the mission, so we will stay until the fight is won," he declared, slamming his right fist on the lectern for emphasis.

As he spoke, the shouts of a cluster of demonstrators could be heard, although their words were difficult to discern.

White House aides were hard-pressed to explain Bush's penchant for visiting the Mountaineer State on Independence Day. "It's a great place to go for the Fourth of July," said deputy press secretary Dana Perino.

In his remarks, Bush noted that it had become "a tradition" for him to visit the state on July 4. West Virginia is historically a Democratic state, but in last November's presidential election, its voters backed Bush over Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., by 56 percent to 43 percent.

In his remarks, the president again linked Iraq to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and explained anew the Bush doctrine of taking pre-emptive strikes against terrorists and their allies "so we don't have to face them here at home."

Apparently referring to the growing levels of insurgent violence in Iraq, Bush called Iraq "the latest battlefield in the war of terror" and said: "Our work there is difficult and dangerous because terrorists from across the region are converging on Iraq to fight the rise of democracy."

He acknowledged that the "images of cruelty and suffering we see on television" are "difficult for our compassionate nation to watch.

"Yet the terrorist violence has not brought them any closer to achieving their strategic objectives," he said. "The terrorists tried to intimidate the Iraqi Governing Council, and they failed. They tried to delay the transfer of sovereignty to Iraq, and they failed. They tried to stop the free Iraqi elections, and they failed. They continue to kill in the hope that they will break the resolve of the American people, but they will fail."

The president was back at the White House by lunchtime. He leaves Tuesday for Denmark and then Scotland, where he will attend the G8 meeting of the leaders of the world's eight leading industrialized nations.

Bush Speech Touches On History Of Freedom (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, July 5, 2005

President Bush yesterday used Independence Day to thank U.S. armed forces fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan, as he urged Americans to keep the resolve their forefathers have exhibited throughout history.

"During that hot summer in Philadelphia more than 200 years ago, from our desperate fight for independence to the darkest days of a civil war, to the hard-fought battles of the 20th century, there were many chances to lose our heart, our nerve, or our way," the president said in a speech at West Virginia University.

"But Americans have always held firm, because we have always believed in certain truths: We know that the freedom we defend is meant for all men and women, and for all times. And we know that when the work is hard, the proper response is not retreat; it is courage," he said.

Mr. Bush, with no tie and with his sleeves rolled up, pointed out that establishing a democracy from scratch -- which early Americans did and which Iraqis are attempting now -- is not easy.

"On July 4, 1776, more than five years of the Revolutionary War still lay ahead. From the battle of New York to the winter at Valley Forge, to the victory at Yorktown, our forefathers faced terrible losses and hardships. Yet, they kept their resolve," the president said.

Mr. Bush said he is troubled by the "images of cruelty and suffering we see on television," but added that terrorists and insurgents in Iraq have utterly failed to make progress on their goal of stopping freedom and democracy in the Middle East nation.

"The terrorists tried to intimidate the Iraqi Governing Council, and they failed," he said. "They tried to delay the transfer of sovereignty to Iraq, and they failed. They tried to stop the free Iraqi elections, and they failed. They continue to kill in the hope that they will break the resolve of the American people, but they will fail."

Mr. Bush said Iraqis are fighting alongside Americans, telling the cheering crowd, "As Iraqis stand up, we will stand down, and then our troops can come home to a proud and grateful nation."

"We will stay until the fight is won," he said, adding, "In this war, there's only one option, and that is victory."

Mr. Bush urged Americans to use this Fourth of July to "find a way to thank the men and women defending our freedom."

"At this time, when we celebrate our freedom, our troops have got to understand that the American people support them all the way. And on Independence Day, we remember that we also have essential responsibilities here at home, the unfinished work of American freedom."

Mr. Bush has made an Independence Day visit to West Virginia a tradition of sorts. This was his third time since he took office in 2001.

Several thousand students, veterans, civic leaders and members of the military packed West Virginia University's downtown campus for the ticketed event. A small group of protesters near the speech chanted "Bush lied, people died," with some waving banners calling for the president's impeachment.

Bush Defends Iraq Policy (PPG)

By James O'Toole

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 5, 2005

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. -- Before a cheering West Virginia University audience, President Bush melded a salute to the troops with a defense of his war policies; a celebration of American independence with promises of democracy to come in the Middle East.

"On July 4, 1776, more than five years of the Revolutionary War still lay ahead," Bush said during yesterday's appearance. "From the battle of New York to the winter at Valley Forge, to the victory at Yorktown, our forefathers faced terrible losses and hardships. Yet they kept their resolve."

Invoking the memory of Sept. 11, Bush said, "We're taking the fight to the terrorists abroad so we do not have to face them here at home.

"Iraq is the latest battlefield in the war on terror," Bush said later in his 20-minute address. "Our work there is difficult and dangerous because terrorists from across the region are converging on Iraq to fight the rise of democracy. ... Yet, the terrorist violence has not brought them any closer to achieving their strategic objectives. They continue to kill in the hope that they will break the resolve of the American people, but they will fail.

"The lesson of this experience is clear: The terrorists can kill the innocent, but they cannot stop the advance of freedom."

The tough tone of the holiday speech echoed the rhetoric of Bush's address last Tuesday in Fort Bragg, N.C., in which he again sought to explain and rally support for his strategy in Iraq.

Alluding to efforts to train the armed forces of the Iraqi government at a time when U.S. deaths there have climbed to more than 1,700, Bush said, "Our strategy can be summed up this way: as Iraqis stand up, we will stand down, and our troops can come home to a proud and grateful nation."

Under a hazy blue sky, the president spoke before a crowd of several thousand, many of whom had lined up hours before to cram themselves into Woodburn Circle, a grassy plaza surrounded by some of the oldest buildings on the university campus. He was flanked on the stage by servicemen and veterans from all branches of the service, while a National Guard band played the same patriotic medleys heard in parks and town squares across the country yesterday.

While public opinion surveys show continued erosion in support for his administration's conduct of the war, Bush urged the crowd to resolve to make some gesture to support the troops fighting abroad, such as sending a letter or seeking out a serviceman or woman's family.

"We pray for the families who have lost a loved one in freedom's cause. And we know that the best way to honor their sacrifice is to complete the mission, so we will stay until the fight is won," he said.

Reciting a litany of trials from American history, Bush said, "There were many chances to lose our heart, our nerve, or our way. But Americans have always held firm, because we have always believed in certain truths: We know that the freedom we defend is meant for all men and women, and for all times. And we know that when the work is hard, the proper response is not retreat; it is courage."

On a steamy morning, the crowd repeatedly treated Bush to rounds of applause -- a contrast to the more somber mood of the president's Fort Bragg audience last week. The high-spirited throng came ready to voice its approval.

Even before the president touched down, they offered cheers for technicians' sound checks, and a wave of anticipatory applause when an aide affixed the presidential seal to the lectern.

The presidential message got a tougher reception from scores of protesters corralled more than 100 yards away from Woodburn Circle. As Bush spoke, their chants of opposition were barely audible.

Ruth Kershner, a member of the WVU faculty, carried a sign that read, "[U.S.] Sen. [Robert] Byrd was right about you," an allusion to the veteran Democratic lawmaker's anti-war stance and his criticisms of Bush's rationale for the Iraq War.

As fellow protesters chanted, "Bush lies, thousands die," Rachel Spero, a junior psychology major, held aloft a sign that read, "War Begins with Dubya."

"I just thought on the Fourth of July, of all days, it was important to come out and make your political views known," Spero said.

As the audience streamed away after Bush's speech, supporters of the president shouted rebuttals at the demonstrators. Across University Avenue, the two groups competed in a generally peaceful shouting match.

Bush has spent three of the last four Independence Days in West Virginia.

As he spoke yesterday, he looked across the campus toward Oglebay Plaza, where a mast is enshrined from the U.S.S. West Virginia, the battleship that rests on the bottom of Pearl Harbor.

Bush was in Charleston for last year's Independence Day; in Ripley, W.Va., on July 4, 2002.

The state rewarded Bush with its electoral votes in each of his elections. To that end, he was here nine times during last year's election season on his way to a comfortable victory in a traditionally Democratic state.

DOJ_NMG_0001288

Bush was introduced yesterday by U.S. Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va., who proclaimed that Bush's frequent visits had transformed him from a Texan to a Mountaineer.

His last visit to the state was in the spring, when he came to promote his stalled proposal for changes in the Social Security system.

Among the other dignitaries on stage with Capito was her father, the colorful former Gov. Arch Moore, resplendent in a vivid green sport coat.

The spotlight on Capito came as speculation continues that she will challenge Byrd, the state's long-serving Democrat, in next year's election. Byrd, 87, who is in his eighth term, has not yet said whether he will seek another term, but his bid for re-election is widely anticipated.

Capito, the only Republican in the state's congressional delegation, also has held off on a formal announcement of her 2006 plans but is considered the most formidable potential challenger to the Appropriations Committee powerhouse.

Bush Urges U.S. Resolve On Iraq Despite Bloodshed (REU-Y2)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, July 5, 2005

President Bush urged Americans on Monday to show resolve in the Iraq war despite the bloodshed, as he appealed for patriotic spirit on Independence Day.

Facing waning support for the Iraq war, Bush in a speech in West Virginia revived memories of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on America and said a retreat in Iraq would embolden militants who want to "break the resolve of the American people."

"Our work there is difficult and dangerous because terrorists from across the region are converging on Iraq to fight the rise of democracy," he said. But he added, "we will stay until the fight is won."

Bush also invoked the Revolutionary War as he cast the Iraq war as a struggle to help Iraqis achieve freedom.

"We know this great ideal of human freedom is entrusted to us in a special way, and the ideal of liberty is worth defending," he said.

Bush used a prime-time address at the Fort Bragg, North Carolina, Army base last week to try to ease growing concerns about the war that have pushed his approval ratings to the lowest levels of his presidency.

In the Fort Bragg address he rejected calls by some Democrats and even a few Republicans in Congress to set a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

His was criticized by many Democrats for mentioning Sept. 11 five times in his speech, even though no connection between the government of former Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and the Sept. 11 attacks was ever established.

The White House now calls Iraq the central front in the war on terrorism in part because the insurgency is led by Jordanian militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who has sworn allegiance to al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

On Monday Bush underscored themes from the Fort Bragg speech, saying his strategy was to train Iraqis to take over more of their own security.

"As Iraqis stand up, we will stand down," he said.

More than 1,700 Americans have been killed in the Iraq war and thousands have been wounded.

Bush said the celebration of the 229th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence was a reminder of the need to persevere despite difficulties.

He said that during Revolutionary War and conflicts that America faced in the following two centuries, "there were many chances to lose our heart, our nerve or our way."

"But Americans have always held firm ... We know that when the work is hard, the proper response is not retreat, it is courage."

Bush Urges Resolve In The War In Iraq (AP-Y2)

President Bush, with an Independence Day appeal for patriotism, urged resolve in the war in Iraq on Monday and said that "the proper response is not retreat. It is courage."

Bush made a quick holiday visit to the West Virginia University campus and spoke outdoors at a grassy circle on a hot, humid day. The audience of a couple thousand people was restricted to ticket-holders who gave him an enthusiastic welcome. The shouts of several hundred protesters who were kept out of sight could be heard faintly during the address.

With his approval ratings sagging and anxiety over the war rising, Bush has decided to devote more attention to explaining what he believes is at stake in Iraq and his strategy for dealing with it.

His address reflected the same themes — and some of the same phrasing — of his prime-time address to the nation on Tuesday and his weekly radio address on Saturday.

The president's communications effort has been complicated by the Supreme Court vacancy caused by the surprise retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Bush is expected to have to spend an increasing amount of time in selecting and selling his nominee in a tough Senate confirmation battle. He will take information about potential nominees when he sets out for Europe on Tuesday to visit Denmark and attend the annual summit of leading industrialized nations.

In his speech, Bush said that "times of war are times of great sacrifice" and that America remembers its fallen on Independence Day.

The war in Iraq has claimed the lives of more than 1,740 Americans, wounded 13,190 and cost more than $200 billion.

"We know that the best way to honor their sacrifice is to complete the mission," Bush said, "and so we will stay until the fight is won."

"As we celebrate the Fourth of July," he said, "we rededicate ourselves to the ideals that inspired our founders. During that hot summer in Philadelphia more than 200 years ago, from our desperate fight for independence to the darkest days of a civil war, to the hard-fought battles of the 20th century, there were many chances to lose our heart, our nerve, or our way.

"But Americans have always held firm, because we have always believed in certain truths," the president said. "We know that the freedom we defend is meant for all men and women, and for all times. And we know that when the work is hard, the proper response is not retreat. It is courage."

He called Iraq only the latest battlefield in the war on terror, and declared that "America will not tolerate regimes that harbor or support terrorists."

Bush said that insurgents won't win.

"They continue to kill in hope they will break the resolve of the American people but they will fail," Bush said.

Bush characterized the insurgents there as "men who celebrate murder" as they seek to spread their ideology and "turn the Middle East into a haven of terror."

Even though the television images of death "are "difficult for our compassionate nation to watch," he said, the insurgents are no closer to stopping the move toward democracy."

"Terrorists can kill the innocent but they cannot stop the advance of freedom," he said.

Bush has made Independence Day visits to West Virginia something of a tradition. It was his third July Fourth visit to the state in four years. He carried the state in 2000 and 2004.

Bush Again Urges Americans To Stand Firm On Iraq War (MACT/KRT)

By Mark Silva

The Macon Telegraph, July 5, 2005

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. - (KRT) - With a flag-draped clock tower for a backdrop in a politically friendly state on a sunny Fourth of July, President Bush defended the war in Iraq as part of a grand American quest for freedom spanning "from Bunker Hill to Baghdad."

DOJ_NMG_0001290

The president, making a repeat Independence Day visit to this mountainous realm that helped elect him and re-elect him, delivered a direct challenge to "finish the fight" in Iraq that terrorists carried to America on Sept. 11, 2001.

"From our desperate fight for independence to the darkest days of the Civil War, to the hard-fought battles of the 20th century, there were many chances to lose our heart, our nerve or our way," Bush said. "But Americans have always held firm.

"We know that when the work is hard, the proper response is not retreat. It is courage," he said, reiterating an argument for continuing the costly conflict in Iraq that he spelled out in a nationally televised address last week.

Yet even as he confronts waning public support for combat in Iraq and presses the war on terrorism that consumed his first term, the president's attention is shifting to a domestic matter that could prove just as central to his legacy: appointing a justice to the Supreme Court.

As he prepares to embark Tuesday for a European tour starting in Denmark, where he will thank the Danish prime minister for contributing military forces in Iraq, Bush will carry with him a file of candidates for a vacancy on the high court created by the surprise retirement Friday of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Bush does not plan to name candidate to succeed O'Connor until after returning Friday night from a three-day summit of the Group of Eight industrial nations in Scotland. But well-financed conservative and liberal organizations already are gearing up for a battle over Bush's nominee.

"There is a lot of staff communication," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said Monday of the screening of court candidates. "The legal team has been preparing materials for him to take on his trip."

Still, the president found time - as he did last year and on a previous Fourth of July - for a quick morning flight to Bush-backing West Virginia, where a few thousand people assembled on the hilly campus of a state university to see him.

Only a cluster of protesters chanting "Bush lied, people died" and signs stating "We support the troops, not the president" assembled on the perimeter of West Virginia University's flag-adorned green. One displayed a placard: "9/11 does not equal Iraq."

Most came to cheer the president on a hot, hazy holiday morning.

"George Washington used to drop by this part of the state, and I appreciate a warm welcome for another George W.," said Bush, without a tie and with his shirt sleeves rolled up. Poised on a grandstand in front of a brick clock tower framed by shingled mansard roofs, he said, "Stopping in West Virginia is becoming a Fourth of July tradition for me."

This supportive setting on a day set aside for patriotism and pride provided another stage for Bush's defense of the conflict in Iraq that has claimed more than 1,700 American lives.

As he has before, Bush strove to connect the war with the terrorist assaults on the United States and insisted that American troops will remain in Iraq until the nation can defend itself against a deadly insurgency there. But he also sought to connect the struggle of U.S. troops around Baghdad to the one fought in American colonies more than two centuries ago.

"We remember the band of patriots who risked their lives to bring freedom to a new colony. They kept their resolve, they kept their faith in a future of liberty," he said.

"At this hour, our men and women in uniform are defending America against the threats of the 21st century," the president said. "We know that the best way to honor their sacrifice is to complete their mission, so we will stay until the fight is won."

Maintaining that "the war we are fighting came to our shores on September the 11th, 2001," Bush said, "In this war there is only one option, and that is victory."

Vowing to fight terrorists abroad instead of at home, he said: "They continue to kill in the hope that they will break the resolve of the American people, but they will fail. ... The terrorists can kill the innocent, but they cannot stop the advance of freedom."

Bush Urges Persistence On Iraq (WP)

By Rosalind S. Helderman

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

MORGANTOWN, W.Va., July 4 -- President Bush used his annual Independence Day speech to pay homage to America's fighting men and women and to urge the nation to remain firmly behind the effort in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0001291

In an appearance at West Virginia University, he acknowledged that continued violence in Iraq has been "hard for a compassionate nation to watch." But he compared today's hardships to those faced by Americans of past generations, including those who declared the country independent and fought the Revolutionary War 229 years ago.

"During that hot summer in Philadelphia more than 200 years ago, from our desperate fight for independence to the darkest days of a civil war, to the hard-fought battles of the 20th century, there were many chances to lose our heart, our nerve or our way," he said. "But Americans have always held firm, because we have always believed in certain truths: We know that the freedom we defend is meant for all men and women, and for all times."

Bush spoke to an outdoor audience of about 2,000 people -- restricted to ticket-holders. Outside the flag-and-bunting-draped event area, a knot of protesters gathered, carrying signs reading "Bush Lied" and chanting "We support our troops, not the president" and "Peace is patriotic."

This marked the third Fourth of July holiday in four years he has celebrated in West Virginia, and the second in a row. Last year, in the midst of his reelection campaign, Bush commemorated the day with an address at the state Capitol in Charleston.

In the year since, the president won reelection and Iraqis went to the polls in their first national election of the post-Saddam Hussein era. At the same time, violence in the country has continued. More than 870 U.S. troops -- including seven West Virginians -- have been killed in Iraq since the president's last Fourth of July address, and recent polls have shown weakening public support for the war. As a result, White House aides have said, Bush has concluded he must do more to refocus the nation's attention on the mission and its stakes.

Repeating themes he struck last week in a nationally televised speech before soldiers at Fort Bragg, N.C., Bush argued that Iraq has become a main arena in the larger battle against terrorism. "We're taking the fight to the terrorists abroad so we do not have to face them here at home," he said.

Speaking in front of a military band and the university's red-brick Woodburn Hall, he vowed that Iraqi insurgents who "continue to kill in the hope that they will break the resolve of the American people" will fail.

"We know that when the work is hard, the proper response is not retreat; it is courage," he said.

Bush said Americans will stay in Iraq until the country's security forces are capable of defending Iraq on their own. "Our strategy can be summed up this way -- as Iraqis stand up, we will stand down and then our troops can come home to a proud and grateful nation," he said.

In all, 13 West Virginians have been killed in Iraq since the war began. A sailor from the state was also one of 16 troops killed last week when a MH-47 Chinook helicopter crashed in eastern Afghanistan.

Syrians Clash With Fighters Linked To The Iraqi Insurgency (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

CAIRO, July 4 - Syrian security forces clashed early Monday in the hills overlooking Damascus with men believed to be militants connected to Iraq's insurgency, the official Syrian news agency SANA reported.

Some of the militants were believed to have been former bodyguards for Saddam Hussein, the report said, but it gave no further details and did not say how it was known who they were or where they might have escaped to afterward.

The predawn firefight on scenic Qassioun Mountain left one police officer dead and several others wounded, the report said. It was the second clash in as many days between the Syrian authorities and people believed to be militants, perhaps from the same group.

On Sunday, border guards and security agents fought with a group along the Lebanese-Syrian border, leaving one of the suspected militants and two guards dead. More than 34 militants were later arrested in what appeared to be a sweep of the area, the news agency reported.

Syria has come under significant pressure from the United States to seal its long border with Iraq, and has been accused of giving Iraqi insurgents safe harbor and of encouraging the insurgency. But in recent weeks, it has sought to highlight its own problem with militants as well as to show it has gotten serious about stamping out militancy.

DOJ_NMG_0001292

Two people were arrested in the clash on Monday. They were identified as Sharif Ayed Saif al-Smadi, one of two fugitive brothers from Jordan wanted there on criminal charges, and Manal al-Smadi, the wife of the other brother, Muhammad. The brothers had ties to a group suspected of helping militants enter Iraq, The Associated Press reported.

Ms. Smadi later appeared on Al Arabiya television, apparently with permission of Syrian officials. She said the brothers had been in Iraq before the American-led invasion in 2003 and had joined the fedayeen, the militia Saddam Hussein sent to fight American troops.

SANA, the Syrian news agency, said the security officers had been on the militants' trail for several days. It was not immediately clear how many militants were involved in the clashes on Sunday and Monday.

Early last month, Syrian security officials announced the arrest of a number of members of the Levant Army, said to be plotting numerous attacks in Damascus. The group is believed to be tied to a suicide bombing of a community center in Qatar in March that left a Briton dead, and there have been reports that they have ties to the insurgency in Iraq.

Late last month, the government organized a tour for diplomats and reporters along Syria's southern border with Iraq, seeking to emphasize its concern about infiltrators coming in from Iraq. In all, some 7,000 Syrian soldiers patrol the length of the border with Iraq.

"The effort to prevent infiltrators is our main emphasis," said a Syrian border commander, who refused to identify himself.

Iraqi: No Talks With Killers (WT)

By Paul Martin

The Washington Times, July 5, 2005

LONDON -- Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari has ruled out talks with any terrorist or insurgent group that has the blood of Iraqi citizens on its hands.

But, in a recent interview, Mr. al-Jaafari also held out an olive branch to other hard-line anti-government and anti-American militants whose opposition had not led to the deaths of Iraqis.

"We cannot make dialogue with anyone who has committed crimes against the Iraqi people," he said in London, after visits to Britain and the United States.

At the same time, Mr. al-Jaafari said he would welcome bringing hard-line Sunni groups into a political dialogue and even into his government.

"If they have not committed crimes against the Iraqi people, we open our hearts to them, and we are [already] in honest and genuine dialogue with them," he said.

He added: "We invite them to be part of the political process -- to exchange the gun for the pen."

The London Sunday Times reported on June 26 that insurgent commanders "apparently came face to face" with four U.S. officials during meetings last month at a villa some 25 miles north of Baghdad.

When asked on NBC's "Meet the Press" about the report of the two meetings, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said: "Oh, I would doubt it. I think there have probably been many more than that."

Three militant groups distanced themselves from the reports, denying they had ever negotiated, and in a Web site-posted communique, one group, Ansar al-Sunna, said it did not speak to Americans, it killed them.

It added that, even when the American forces leave, their associates in the Iraqi government would remain in Iraq and would be targeted.

Mr. Rumsfeld appeared to suggest that American meetings with hard-liners were designed to help the Iraqi interim administration headed by Mr. al-Jaafari.

"We see the government of Iraq is sovereign. They are the ones that are reaching out to the people who are not supporting the government," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

Yet Mr. al-Jaafari's line of willingness to negotiate appeared to be drawn far more stringently than that suggested by Mr. Rumsfeld.

Mr. al-Jaafari said that support for terrorist bombings and other atrocities was already waning and would decline further as more Sunni factions joined the government or forswore violence.

DOJ_NMG_0001293

He said the advancement of the political process, and especially the announcement of a new constitution and a subsequent election in December, would dampen violence further.

Aides said the new government was determined to implement the agreed timetable for that election, irrespective of the degree of violence prevalent in Iraq at the time.

The prime minister said it was also politically important to put former Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein on trial quickly and to reach a rapid conviction and an imposition of the sentence passed by the court.

He dismissed suggestions that the trial, and especially a death sentence, could inflame passions and increase terrorism.

"It will definitely reduce the amount of violence, " Mr. al-Jaafari said.

He also rejected any suggestion that the country's president, currently Jalal Talabani, the veteran Kurdish leader, would exercise a prerogative to commute a death sentence.

Mr. Talabani had told an interviewer several weeks ago that he was opposed to capital punishment, even for Saddam, though he added: "I know I am in a minority of one in the current government."

Mr. al-Jaafari said Iraq wanted to act as a democracy and to ensure that any verdict reached by the court or tribunal was carried out without executive intervention.

"Saddam has to pay for his crimes," Mr. al-Jaafari said.

The prime minister is planning trips to Iran, Saudi Arabia and Syria in efforts to tighten border controls and reduce meddling by neighboring states.

He told The Washington Times last week that he expects violence to abate well within the next two years.

Sunni Group In Iraq Urges Members To Vote (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, July 4 - In what might be a sign of a new political landscape, a major Sunni umbrella group called on its members on Monday to register for the next round of elections and take part "despite our reservations."

Adnan al-Dulaimi, the head of the group, called the Sunni Endowment, said in a briefing in Baghdad that clerics would be asked to issue fatwas, or religious rulings, essentially ordering Sunnis to vote in elections. Among its other functions, the Sunni Endowment is charged with oversight of Sunni Arab mosques and holy sites throughout Iraq, giving it wide influence among clerics.

"I ask all Sunni people to register their names for the next election, because we are in a political battle that depends on the vote," he said.

Sunni Arabs largely boycotted the January elections, producing a National Assembly with only a handful of Sunnis, leaving the ethnic group that ruled the country until 2003 with little influence in the government.

The next round of voting will include a referendum on a constitution, a document being hammered out in the National Assembly.

Perhaps as significant as his call for voting, Mr. Dulaimi explicitly renounced violence as a way for the Sunnis to regain power. Mr. Dulaimi's group, like many other Sunni groups, insists that Sunnis are not a minority in Iraq, despite various estimates suggesting that they make up about 20 percent of the population.

Iraq's ethnically based political strife was also on display on Monday in Kirkuk, in the north, where more than 2,000 Arabs and Turkmens demonstrated against the Kurdish rule that has settled on the city since the elections in January. A Kurdish slate won 26 of 41 seats in the city council and has made significant changes in how the city is run.

Important posts went overwhelmingly to Kurdish officials, said Ali Mehdi, a leader of the Turkmen front. The Turkmens were an Asian people put into place by the Turks to govern the area under Ottoman rule.

"The current administration, which is formed by Kurdish parties, does not represent the people of Kirkuk," Mr. Mehdi said at the demonstration, in Convention Square.

Muhammad Khalil, a city council member who serves as a spokesman for Arab members of the council, asserted that the refusal of the Kurdish bloc to compromise had forced other groups to form what he called a "shadow government" for the city.

DOJ_NMG_0001294

Marching in heavy security, people in the crowd raised banners denouncing federalism, the political decentralization favored by Kurds, who want the area to maintain a large degree of local control.

Baghdad was unusually quiet on American Independence Day, although an Interior Ministry official said at least two roadside bombs had gone off, killing at least three civilians and wounding three more. Both bombs exploded in the dangerous southern fringes of the city.

Further details emerged Monday from witnesses to the kidnapping of Ihab al-Sharif, Egypt's top diplomat in Iraq, from a Baghdad street on Sunday.

The owner of an appliance shop across the street from where gunmen surrounded Mr. Sharif as he got out of his Jeep Cherokee to buy a newspaper said the diplomat shrieked as four men dragged him toward the trunk of a black sedan.

One of the men struck Mr. Sharif in the head with a pistol so hard that he began to bleed, said an employee at Al Arjas photography lab, just a few feet from the kidnapping.

Taher al-Ani, owner of an air-conditioner shop near the same spot, said some of the men ran toward a gray car that was parked closeby with a driver. Some of the men stopped traffic to speed the escape before jumping in the car.

"The whole operation didn't take more than two minutes," said the employee at the photography lab. "The ambassador was not accompanied by guards."

Iraqi Clerics Plan Edict On Sunnis' Political Role (WP)

By Andy Mosher And Omar Fekeiki

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

BAGHDAD, July 4 -- Several senior clerics of Iraq's disaffected Sunni Muslim minority will soon issue a decree calling on followers of the faith to vote in upcoming elections and help write a new constitution, a prominent Sunni leader said Monday. The step could draw Sunni Arabs away from the insurgency and into a political process they have steadfastly rejected.

Adnan Dulaimi, who heads the Sunni Endowment, the government agency responsible for Sunni religious affairs, said the framers of the religious edict, or fatwa , would seek the support of other groups in the fractious Sunni community before issuing it.

The push for the fatwa, together with National Assembly's formal approval Monday of adding 15 Sunnis to the committee writing a draft constitution, suggested that the slow and often contentious efforts to bring Sunni Arabs into the political sphere were beginning to bear fruit.

The Shiite Muslim-led government of Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari has encouraged Sunni Arabs to embrace politics and to abandon the two-year-old insurgency dominated by Sunnis and foreign fighters.

Jafari's Shiite coalition won the most votes in the Jan. 30 elections, giving it a majority in the 275-seat National Assembly and putting Iraq's Shiite majority in power for the first time in the country's modern history. Sunni Arabs, who dominated political and military institutions until President Saddam Hussein was toppled by the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, largely boycotted the vote and emerged with only 17 assembly seats.

The Sunni Arab leadership, traditionally more divided than that of the Shiites, began moving away from rejection of the new government in March, when the influential Association of Muslim Scholars supported a fatwa calling on Sunnis to serve in Iraq's nascent security forces.

The proposed edict announced Monday would call for Sunni participation in writing the draft constitution, which is meant to be completed by Aug. 15, and for all Iraqis to vote in the next election, which would be held Dec. 15 if the constitution is prepared on time and ratified in an October referendum. The decree would also call for Sunnis to serve on the country's electoral commission.

The Association of Muslim Scholars did not comment Monday on the proposed fatwa. Its support, while crucial, could prove elusive. The association has maintained that no Iraqi government can be considered legitimate unless U.S. and other foreign military forces leave the country, or at least set a deadline for doing so. The Iraqi and U.S. governments have refused to take that step.

Dulaimi said in an interview Monday that "we will contact the Association of Muslim Scholars and urge them to join the initiative, and we hope to reach a compromise that satisfies all."

DOJ_NMG_0001295

Another pivotal Sunni group, the Iraqi Islamic Party, immediately voiced support for the proposal. Noting that the party was among the first Sunni organizations to encourage voting in the next election, Tariq Hashimi, the party's secretary general, said that Sunnis' respect for religious leadership ensured that "if a fatwa is issued to urge people to participate, this will help to improve the legal and political situation of the elections and the constitution. It will also help to end the confusion in the Iraqi community: People are confused whether the constitution and elections are legitimate or not."

Subhi Nawzen Tawfik, a political science professor at the University of Baghdad's International Studies Center, called the initiative "a very important development."

In addition to redressing the power imbalance brought on by the Sunnis' "strategic mistake" of staying away from the January election, Tawfik said the edict would appeal to Sunni insurgents who took up arms because they believed the current political system was imposed on Iraq by foreign powers.

"There is no doubt that the Sunnis make up the core of the real, original resistance against occupation, a distinction which no one can dispute," Tawfik said. "Thus, when the head of the Sunni Endowment calls for serious Sunni participation, and makes an appeal for calming down the situation, his appeal will be heeded."

In Iraq, mosques are owned and financed by the government. Dulaimi, as head of the endowment, functions not as a political figure in the government, but as a facilitator of religious life.

Abdul Rahman Nuaimi, a Sunni member of the National Assembly's constitution committee, said: "When an important figure in the community, like the head of the Sunni Endowment, urges people and clergymen to participate in the elections, this will help the process. This will help to move forward and defeat all the obstacles we face in the process of writing the constitution."

The move by the National Assembly Monday to add 15 Sunnis to the committee, expanding its membership to 71, was another key development in a constitution-writing process that is six weeks from a deadline for producing a draft document. Though the National Assembly was elected in January with the principal mandate of writing the document, the committee was not formed until May, and it initially included only two Sunni Arabs.

The expanded committee will hold its first meeting on Wednesday, and its chairman, Humam Hammoudi, said the new members would be shown "the drafts we have reached so far," the Reuters news agency reported.

Meanwhile, authorities said there was no sign of the whereabouts of Ihab Sherif, Egypt's top diplomat in Iraq, who disappeared Saturday night and is presumed to have been kidnapped. Egyptian officials told news services that Egypt had received no ransom demands or statements from anyone claiming to have abducted the envoy.

In Baghdad's western Bayaa neighborhood, a remote-controlled car bomb killed two civilians and narrowly missed a passing U.S. military patrol, witnesses said.

"I thought that it was a broken-down car that someone left there," said Ahmad Shihab, an employee with a government construction company that has a project near the site of the attack. "Then, after an American patrol passed by, it exploded. I saw black smoke first, then felt the impact. A huge blaze with metal parts splashed everywhere."

U.S. and Iraqi troops swept through a western Baghdad neighborhood on Monday, arresting about 100 suspected insurgents in a fresh crackdown near the city's airport, the Associated Press reported.

In the northern city of Mosul, gunmen killed police Capt. Ahmen Muayad, a bodyguard for the provincial governor, as he left his house Monday morning, according to police Gen. Saeed Mohammed. Another police officer, Lt. Ahmen Mutaz, was gunned down in the city center.

Iraq Seen Emerging As Prime Training Ground For Terrorists (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - Iraq has replaced Afghanistan as the prime training ground for foreign terrorists who could travel elsewhere across the globe and wreak havoc, according to U.S. counterterrorism officials and classified studies by the CIA and the State Department.

DOJ_NMG_0001296

Of particular concern, the officials and studies say, are the urban combat techniques being learned and used by foreign fighters assaulting U.S. and Iraqi troops. There's already evidence that those tactics are being replicated elsewhere.

Marine Corps Lt. Gen. James T. Conway told a Pentagon briefing last week that remotely detonated bombs known as improvised explosive devices, or IEDs - the insurgents' weapon of choice in Iraq - are an increasing threat to U.S. forces trying to stabilize Afghanistan.

The trend is "a little bit troubling," Conway said.

Iraq's emergence as a terrorist training ground appears to challenge President Bush's rationale for invading and overthrowing leader Saddam Hussein in March 2003.

"To complete the mission, we will prevent al-Qaida and other foreign terrorists from turning Iraq into what Afghanistan was under the Taliban, a safe haven from which they could launch attacks on America and our friends," the president said in a nationally televised address last Tuesday.

But Iraq wasn't a source of Islamic fundamentalist terrorism under Saddam and played no role in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Critics argue that the U.S. invasion harmed, rather than helped, the war on terror by acting as a magnet and recruiting tool.

"Arguably, it's created new problems that we're going to be dealing with for a long time," said Steven Simon, a senior analyst at the RAND Corp. who served at the National Security Council under President Clinton.

Foreign fighters' growing experience with IEDs, in particular, "is a real problem if you think these guys are going to wind up in the streets of Europe and the Middle East, or even the United States at some point," Simon said.

The classified CIA and State Department assessments were completed in May and deal with what intelligence analysts are calling "bleed out" or "terrorist dispersal" from Iraq to surrounding countries.

The officials who described them did so on condition of anonymity because intelligence matters are involved.

The studies compare Iraq to Afghanistan in the 1980s, when the Soviet invasion drew Muslim fighters known as mujahedeen from around the world. After the Soviet defeat, many of them, including Osama bin Laden, built terrorist networks or fought for Islamic causes outside Afghanistan.

Foreign fighters make up only a fraction of the Iraqi insurgency, perhaps as little as 5 percent. Many are killed or captured, but their numbers are replenished by fresh recruits, who often transit via Syria.

U.S. ally Saudi Arabia is a prime potential destination for experienced fighters returning from Iraq, the study by the State Department's Intelligence and Research bureau concludes, according to officials familiar with its contents.

Yemen is another likely destination.

Saudi citizens are thought to make up the largest contingent of foreign fighters in Iraq, and the Saudi royal family has expressed alarm to the U.S. government over the prospect of battle-scarred militants returning to the oil-rich kingdom.

Other insurgents are believed to come from Syria, Jordan, Yemen, Egypt and elsewhere in North Africa.

Some current and former government experts said the comparison between Afghanistan's one-time role as a global terrorist training headquarters and Iraq today is "overstated," in the words of one U.S. official.

Arab veterans of the Afghan war were often welcomed home by their governments and state-run media, and they were portrayed as heroes for their role in forcing the Soviet Union to withdraw from Afghanistan in 1989, the State Department report notes.

By contrast, foreign insurgents leaving Iraq are likely to face imprisonment or worse in their home countries.

Nor is the outcome of the insurgency known. For now, fighters remain focused on attacking U.S. and Iraqi forces, not conducting terrorism elsewhere.

Still, the CIA report, roughly two dozen pages long, warns that veterans of Iraq could in some ways pose a more potent threat.

The report's existence was first reported by Newsweek and The New York Times.

"You're talking about people who have had exposure to a broader range of strategies and tactics than we saw in Afghanistan," said a U.S. counterterrorism official who has read the report.

DOJ_NMG_0001297

And, he said, "the people in Iraq come to the table more anti-American and more radicalized" than the fighters who went to Afghanistan two decades ago to fight Russian troops.

The reports are aimed at helping the Bush administration conduct contingency planning to deal with the "terrorist dispersal" threat.

Simon, the former counterterrorism official, said international coordination among law enforcement and intelligence agencies will be key.

Conway, the director of operations for the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged concern about Iraq's role as a terrorist training ground.

"I think it's a logical conclusion, if you look at the history of Afghanistan and what we saw come out of there," Conway said. "It is a concern, but there is not much we can do about it at this point in time," he said, noting that the military's principal focus is on combat operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iraqi Barbers Face Unkindest Cut Of All, Targeting By Terrorists (WT)

By Ammar Karim, Agence France Presse

The Washington Times, July 5, 2005

BAGHDAD -- Baghdadis headed to the barbershop are going more often to the Shi'ite neighborhood of Sadr City than to mixed neighborhoods, where they could be shot by Sunni radicals who charge that clean shaven men want to look like U.S. soldiers.

"I have customers coming from far away," said Ali Habin, who was happy to see his barbershop packed with customers.

"Young men are coming from remote neighborhoods like Shaab and Ur, where there have been attacks targeting barbershops."

Northwestern Sadr City is solidly Shi'ite, and even Sunni insurgents don't dare venture there.

All Muslim clerics, including Shi'ite spiritual leader Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Husseini al-Sistani, say that shaving goes against Islamic law, but there have been no attacks in Shi'ite areas.

According to Dubai-based Al Arabiya television, Arabs spend $110 million a year at the barbershop and own 697 million razors of all kinds.

"Recently, there has been an increase in the number of attacks against barbershops, to the extent that it has become a daily occurrence, and we have to look for safer places," said Ammar Qassem, 20, who was halfway through a shave.

"In one day, four barbers were killed and others decided to close shop to avoid the same fate," said Mr. Qassem, who lives in the nearby Ashaab neighborhood.

In a shop that measures a minuscule 86 square feet, six other waiting clients nod in approval, and the barber did not hesitate to lay the blame at the feet of Salafists, or Sunni religious hard-liners.

"Those who carry out the attacks belong to Ansar al-Sunna or Wahhabi groups that are very active in the neighborhoods of Al-Jazair, Ashaab and Hay al-Ur," he charged.

The al Qaeda-linked Army of Ansar al-Sunna is one of a number of insurgent groups reported to have taken part in talks with U.S. representatives last month, although Internet statements posted in its name have denied it.

The strict Wahhabi version of Sunni Islam is the official religion of neighboring Saudi Arabia and provides inspiration for some of the militants fighting the Iraqi government and its U.S. backers.

Such is the terror in Baghdad that it is now common to see signs that say: "We apologize for not shaving beards or removing facial hair."

"I put this sign up after one of my friends in the same street was threatened. I've decided to quit shaving beards or removing facial hair to save my life, as well as those of my customers. I only cut hair, said Muhannad Ali Sahib, who owns a barbershop in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Zaiyunah.

According to an Interior Ministry official, at least 20 barbers have been assassinated in areas like Shaab, Bayaa, Saidiyah and Baghdad al-Jadeeda over the past two months.

Egyptian Envoy's Abduction Adds To Diplomatic Chill (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, July 5, 2005

BAGHDAD — The kidnapping of Egypt's top envoy in Baghdad has sent shivers through the capital's small diplomatic community and may further hamper Iraq's drive to restore full diplomatic relations with the world.

Ihab al-Sherif was abducted as he drove between his home and a store Saturday night, and there was no new information Monday about his whereabouts or any claim of responsibility. Al-Sherif, head of Egypt's diplomatic mission in Baghdad, was set to become a full-fledged ambassador, the first from an Arab country since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

U.S. and Iraqi officials have accused the mostly Sunni Muslim nations of the Arab world of refusing to restore full diplomatic ties with Iraq because it has been led by Shiites since the handover of sovereignty last year.

But Demiye Haddad, the Jordanian embassy's charge d'affaires, said security -- not politics -- is the issue.

"All diplomats are targets here," Haddad said in an interview during a Fourth of July celebration on the grounds of the U.S. Embassy. "Jordan has demonstrated that we have stood by the new Iraq. When the safety of our ambassador is assured, we will bring an ambassador."

Even non-Arab countries such as Canada, which does not keep an embassy in Baghdad and has a skeleton staff of only two diplomats, have shunned Iraq.

Diplomats say they fear for their safety in Iraq, and are concerned that their nations could become targets of terrorists if they appear to warm up to Baghdad.

Police on Monday reported another abduction, this time of a female member of Baghdad's city council in the Kadhemiya district. Ahlam Ahmed Mahmoud Jabouri was grabbed in front of her home Sunday by two men in sky-blue Oldsmobile, an Interior Ministry official said.

Violence continued throughout the capital. A car bomb exploded on a street leading to Baghdad's treacherous airport road, killing a couple and injuring their son. A roadside bomb in the Zafarania district killed one civilian.

Nearly 250 U.S. and 600 Iraqi soldiers seized 100 suspected insurgents, including at least one Egyptian, during an early-morning raid in neighborhoods near the airport, the military said in a statement.

In the capital's well-fortified Green Zone, Iraq's political leaders joined U.S. military commanders and diplomats from the United States and other countries to commemorate Independence Day.

Jalal Talabani, Iraq's president, commended the Bush administration's efforts to change Iraq and the Middle East. The mass graves that Saddam Hussein left behind justified the war, he said. "It is the worst kind of WMD," or weapon of mass destruction, said the Kurdish leader. President Bush had cited the threat of weapons of mass destruction -- nuclear, chemical or biological weapons -- as a key rationale for the invasion, although none were found.

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari praised America's democratic principles, and urged Iraqis not to allow violence to derail Iraq's freely elected government. "They should not allow the car bomb to change the nature of an elected government," he told about 250 guests gathered for an outdoor barbecue.

U.S. charge d'affaires David Satterfield, filling in for an ailing Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, said: "Perhaps nowhere in the world is the price of freedom so clear as here in Iraq."

War Dogs Lap Up Support (WT)

By Jen Haberkorn

The Washington Times, July 5, 2005

Military war dogs in Iraq help save lives by detecting bombs and traps and finding injured civilians, but their noses are getting chapped from the desert heat.

When Amy Nichols, owner of Happy Tails Dog Spa in Tysons Corner, heard of the dogs' tale, she bought some lip balm for their noses and set up a donation box in front of her store. The doggy day care also is collecting flying discs, knotted ropes and treats to send to the hundreds of dogs serving in Iraq.

Ms. Nichols had been looking for a cause to combine old-fashioned patriotism and dog care -- a cause close to the hearts of many of the store's customers.

DOJ_NMG_0001299

"People who take their dogs to day care are really generous and supportive," Ms. Nichols said. "We hear about the dogs and get choked up about it. They're all dog lovers here."

By next week, she expects to send about 50 pounds of donations to the dog handlers in Iraq.

Schools and animal advocacy groups across the nation have held collection drives to help the dogs in Iraq, and the U.S. War Dogs Association has proposed a memorial for military working dogs and their handlers.

"It's not important what's in the package; it's the idea of sending something to these men and women and their canines ... that people in the states care about them, worry about them and wish them a safe journey," said Ronald L. Aiello, president of the association and a former Marine scout handler in Vietnam.

The association also uses donations to send about 250 care packages per year to dog handlers. The packages might include beef jerky for the handler and vegetable jerky for the dog.

Ms. Nichols' drive is not associated with the group. She contacted Master Sgt. Chris Burgess, operations chief for the 2nd Military Police Battalion at Camp Fallujah in Iraq, who compiled a list of the dogs' needs.

"Thank you for all the support," he said in an e-mail to Ms. Nichols. "I know the handlers and the dogs will appreciate it very much."

Military working dogs -- many of them German shepherds, Dutch shepherds or Belgian Malinois -- have been used since World War II. The dogs keep U.S. troops safe, but also may remind troops of their pets at home and provide a morale boost, Mr. Aiello said.

Mr. Aiello's dog in Vietnam, Stormy, was responsible for checking buildings for explosives before the Marines entered. The handlers are responsible for caring for the four-legged soldiers and relaying their messages to the troops.

"They're fantastic animals," he said. "They do a great job of alerting to danger."

Military war dogs are performing the same service for U.S. troops in Iraq.

"The [breeds] are so smart, they need stuff to do," Ms. Nichols said. "They love having a job."

But they still need time to play and time to sharpen their skills, which is why they receive the flying discs, rubber toys and ropes. Their handlers asked for sunflower seeds, sugarless gum, energy drinks, crackers, meat sticks and beef jerky.

The three-year-old doggy day care is covering the shipping costs, which Ms. Nichols expects to reach $100 to $150.

"Look at what they're asking for ... Blistex and Goldfish crackers," she said. "We could walk across the street right now and get it. It's very basic stuff."

Pentagon Weighs Strategy Change To Deter Terror (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, July 4 - The Pentagon's most senior planners are challenging the longstanding strategy that requires the armed forces to be prepared to fight two major wars at a time. Instead, they are weighing whether to shape the military to mount one conventional campaign while devoting more resources to defending American territory and antiterrorism efforts.

The consideration of these profound changes are at the center of the current top-to-bottom review of Pentagon strategy, as ordered by Congress every four years, and will determine the future size of the military as well as the fate of hundreds of billions of dollars in new weapons.

The intense debate reflects a growing recognition that the current burden of maintaining forces in Iraq and Afghanistan, along with the other demands of the global campaign against terrorism, may force a change in the assumptions that have been the foundation of all military planning.

The concern that the concentration of troops and weapons in Iraq and Afghanistan was limiting the Pentagon's ability to deal with other potential armed conflicts was underscored by Gen. Richard B. Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in a classified risk assessment to Congress this spring. But the current review is the first by the Pentagon in decades to seriously question the wisdom of the two-war strategy.

The two-war model provides enough people and weapons to mount a major campaign, like the Persian Gulf war of 1991 or the invasion of Iraq in 2003, while maintaining enough reserves to respond in a similar manner elsewhere.

An official designation of a counterterrorism role and a shift to a strategy that focuses on domestic defense would have a huge impact on the size and composition of the military.

In a nutshell, strategies that order the military to be prepared for two wars would argue for more high-technology weapons, in particular warplanes. An emphasis on one war and counterterrorism duties would require lighter, more agile forces - perhaps fewer troops, but more Special Operations units - and a range of other needs, such as intelligence, language and communications specialists.

Civilian and military officials are trying to decide to what degree to acknowledge that operations like the continuing presence in Iraq - not a full-blown conventional war, but a prolonged commitment - may be such a burden that it would not be possible to also fight two full-scale campaigns elsewhere.

In effect, the unusual mission in Iraq, which could last for years, has not just taken the slot for one of the two wars; it has upended the central concept of the two-war model. It is neither a major conventional combat nor a mere peacekeeping operation. It does not require the full array of forces, especially from the Navy and the Air Force, of a conventional war, and it takes far more troops than peacekeeping ordinarily would.

The force of 138,000 troops in Iraq is only 13,000 smaller than it was at the height of the offensive on Baghdad two years ago, yet the administration describes the campaign not as a major conventional war, but as the leading effort in the nation's fight against terrorism.

"The war in Iraq requires a very large ground-force presence," said Loren Thompson, an analyst at the Lexington Institute, a policy research center in Arlington, Va. "War with China or North Korea or Iran, the other countries mentioned in the major review scenarios, would require a much more capable Navy and Air Force."

Mr. Thompson added that "what we need for conventional victory is different from what we need for fighting insurgents, and fighting insurgents has relatively little connection to stopping the spread of nuclear weapons. We can't afford it all."

The Pentagon's sweeping study, called the Quadrennial Defense Review, is not due to be completed until early next year, when it will be submitted to Congress with the administration's annual budget request. Yet debate over the review cannot ignore the mounting costs of the war in Iraq, approximately $5 billion a month.

A description of the major issues discussed in the classified review was gathered from interviews with more than a half-dozen civilian officials and military officers from across the armed services who are directly involved in the process.

The current military strategy is known by a numerical label, 1-4-2-1, with the first number representing the defense of American territory. That is followed by numbers representing the ability to deter hostilities in four critical areas of the world, and to swiftly defeat two adversaries in near-simultaneous major combat operations The final number stands for a requirement that the military retain the capability, at the same time, to decisively defeat one of those two adversaries, which would include capturing a capital and toppling a government.

"We have 1-4-2-1 now, and we are going to look at that," said Ryan Henry, who serves as principal deputy under secretary of defense for policy.

Asked where the military's heavy commitment to the fight against terrorism fits into the current strategy formula, Mr. Henry said, "It wasn't there when they came up with 1-4-2-1." If a new strategy emerges from the review, he said, it might be "something that doesn't have any numbers at all."

Several officials involved in the review characterized the debate as "an effort to create a construct that will bring a better balance" among domestic defense, the antiterrorism campaign and conventional military requirements.

After years of saying American forces were sufficient for a two-war strategy, "we've come to the realization that we're not," said another Defense Department official involved in the deliberations, who was granted anonymity because he could not otherwise discuss the talks, which are classified. "It's coming to grips with reality."

Senior leaders are trying to develop strategies that will do a better job of addressing the requirements of antiterrorism and domestic defense, while acknowledging that future American wars will most likely be irregular - against urban guerrillas and insurgents - rather than conventional.

Tentative proposals by midlevel staff members on holding a summer summit on the review have been shelved, and the debate is now driven by weekly meetings that officials say have brought new discipline to a sprawling process.

DOJ_NMG_0001301

Under Gordon R. England, nominated to succeed Paul D. Wolfowitz as deputy defense secretary, more than 150 questions that the review should address have been sorted into 36 major themes. They include such things as balancing reserve and active-duty forces; the role of other agencies in domestic security; combat medicine; the ability of foreign coastal powers to keep American forces at a distance; and the ability to attract people with important skills, such as a knowledge of the Arabic language.

The review is analyzing in detail what would happen if the United States had to fight China, North Korea or Iran.

In preparing for the review's presentation to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the highest-level decisions are made at round-table discussions held about three times a month and managed by Mr. England and Gen. Peter Pace, vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the nominee to succeed General Myers as the chairman. Although no draft of the review has been presented to Mr. Rumsfeld, he already has, in broad terms, endorsed efforts that would transform the military into a lighter, more mobile force.

General Pace declined through a spokeswoman on Friday to discuss the review.

"Whether anybody believed we could actually fight two wars at once is open to debate," one senior military officer said. "But having it in the strategy raised enough uncertainty in the minds of our opponents that it served as a deterrent. Do we want to lose that? We don't want to give any adversary the confidence that they could take advantage of us while we're engaged in one major combat operation."

Inadmissible: Survey Yields Mixed Results For D.C. Firms; Reaction To The Creation Of A New National Security Division; And More (LEGALT)

Legal Times

Legal Times, July 4, 2005

SURVEY YIELDS MIXED RESULTS FOR D.C. FIRMS

The numbers are in and, no surprise, 2004 was again a very good year for the nation's largest and wealthiest law firms. That's according to the AmLaw 100, the annual survey of law firm financial data published in this month's edition of The American Lawyer, a sister publication of Legal Times. The survey found that revenue at the nation's 100 biggest law firms jumped 10 percent over 2003.

For firms with headquarters in the D.C. area, however, the survey is a mixed bag. Wilmer, Cutler & Pickering's merger with Boston-based Hale and Dorr last year vaulted the combined behemoth up the charts, making it the nation's 12th-largest law firm, as measured by gross revenue (the firms were No. 58 and 60 in 2003, respectively). But if Wilmer was the chart's biggest gainer, D.C. also has the distinction of being home to firms that took two of the largest falls. Dickstein Shapiro Morin & Oshinsky, which was No. 66 in 2003, tumbled off the chart. Howrey (formerly Howrey Simon Arnold & White) saw not only its name but its revenues reduced, causing the firm to drop from No. 44 to No. 61. Both firms' numbers were helped in 2003 by contingent fee windfalls. Akin Gump Strauss Hauer &Feld remained the most profitable regionally based firm, as measured by profits per partner. Its $920,000-per-partner figure was trailed closely by that of Finnegan, Henderson, Farabow, Garrett & Dunner at $895,000.

This year the magazine introduced a new metric to measure a law firm's financial performance: value per lawyer. That figure computes the average number of lawyers needed to generate $10 million in compensation to all partners (both equity and nonequity), giving high marks to firms with low overhead and efficient management. By that measure, Arnold &Porter and Hogan &Hartson were tops among locally based firms, each needing just 32 lawyers to generate $10 million to line the partners' pockets. McGuireWoods, by comparison, needed 44 lawyers. That figure looks good compared with that of troubled Coudert Brothers, which needed an army of 91. But the New York giants still tower over the D.C. region's home-grown firms. Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz, for example, couldn't even field a softball team with the seven lawyers it needed to generate $10 million in partner paychecks. — Jason McLure

SPY GAME

The president's proposal to create a new National Security Division in the Justice Department, if adopted, would formalize the removal of the wall between intelligence gathering and criminal prosecution. But finding the right person to run the new section, which would bring together the DOJ's counterterrorism section, counterespionage section, and the Office of Intelligence Policy and Review, may not be easy. Before the passage of the USA Patriot Act in 2001, intelligence agents and prosecutors rarely worked together. As a result, few lawyers have experience in both disciplines. "There really aren't a lot of people who bridge both worlds," says Suzanne Spaulding, a former CIA lawyer. The post is unlikely to go to James Baker, who currently heads the Justice Department's intelligence office, or to counterterrorism chief Barry Sabin because both men are career officials without strong Republican ties. One senior DOJ official says the shuffle will not disrupt ongoing terrorism investigations: "The advantage of putting those troops in the same division is that it will enable them to better take advantage of synergy the destruction of the wall has made possible." — Vanessa Blum

DÉJÀ VU

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce will be heading back to court to fight Securities and Exchange Commission rules governing the independence of mutual fund boards, says the business lobby's general counsel Steve Bokat. Just days after the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit ordered the SEC to reconsider its requirement that the chairman and 75 percent of a mutual fund board be independent from the company, the agency voted to reaffirm the same rules. This time, the business lobby says, the agency didn't deliberate long enough before its 3-2 vote on June 29. It was a coup of sorts for Republican SEC Chairman William Donaldson, who pushed the vote before stepping down on June 30. — Lily Henning

COMING HOME

The tune is a familiar one: top government lawyer leaves regulatory agency to cash in at former firm. But in the case of Stephen Cutler, the former director of the Security and Exchange Commission's Enforcement Division, the announcement last week that he'd return to Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr was by no means inevitable. After all, Cutler's two predecessors at the SEC had opted to go in-house on Wall Street at Credit Suisse First Boston Inc. and Deutsche Bank AG. Cutler says he spoke with investment banks as well as other law firms before deciding to return. To help woo Cutler back, the firm trotted out heavy-hitting partners Jamie Gorelick, Seth Waxman, and Charlene Barshefsky, and arranged a lunch at the Park Hyatt for Cutler with Wilmer's junior securities partners. Cutler, who will start in the fall, says the move was a "chance to join what I think of as the pre-eminent SEC practice in the country." It's likely that Cutler, who oversaw the investigations of WorldCom Inc., Tyco International Ltd., and Qwest Communications International Inc., also negotiated a pay package substantially more than the roughly $200,000 he was paid annually by the SEC. (Both Cutler and firm co-managing partner William Perlstein declined to discuss compensation arrangements.) Also last week, Wilmer announced the opening of its first West Coast office in Palo Alto, Calif. — Jason McLure

NEW PASTURES

Venable has picked up former longtime DLA Piper Rudnick Gray Cary partner Emilio Cividanes, a data privacy and intellectual property lawyer and lobbyist. Cividanes, 49, had been at Piper for nearly 17 years; at Venable he joins what Ian Volner, who chairs the firm's regulatory group, calls one of the largest advertising, marketing, and distribution practices in the country. "Milo adds a dimension to a practice that already includes about 40 lawyers," Volner says. Cividanes' departure follows the death last year of DLA Piper's Ronald Plesser, who had chaired the firm's electronic commerce and privacy practice group. "He was my mentor and my senior colleague for almost 16 years. When that happens, you have to revisit everything," says Cividanes, calling the Venable job an "excellent opportunity." Cividanes, who splits his time between lobbying, counseling, and litigation, represents, among other clients, Reed Elsevier's LexisNexis, Time Warner Cable, and the Direct Marketing Association. Along with Plesser, he was part of a team that represented the DMA in its ultimately unsuccessful bid to prevent the establishment of a national Do Not Call Registry. — T.R. Goldman

LAWYERING UP

A federal probe of a real estate transaction involving Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R.-Calif.) has been good for the local white collar bar. Last week, a grand jury in California served Cunningham with a subpoena for documents, following a host of news reports examining Cunningham's 2003 sale of his Del Mar, Calif., house to defense contractor MZM Inc. for $1.6 million. MZM sold the house within a year at a $700,000 loss. Cunningham, who sits on a defense appropriations subcommittee, also lived on a yacht moored in Washington, the Duke-Stir, that belongs to MZM founder Mitchell Wade. Cunningham, who has said he has "acted honorably and honestly" but admitted showing "poor judgment" in the home sale, has hired congressional investigations specialist K. Lee Blalack of O'Melveny &Myers to handle the matter. Wade, who resigned from MZM last month, has turned to a bipartisan team of partners at Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr: Reginald Brown, former Bush White House associate counsel; Howard Shapiro, who served as general counsel at the FBI for much of the Clinton administration; and former federal prosecutor Ronald Machen. MZM has retained Steptoe & Johnson's Mark Hulkower. — Jason McLure

DOJ_NMG_0001303

CHUTZPAH

No one can deny John Marboah has guts. Marboah, aka Charles Boateng, is an illegal alien who used a fake name and Social Security number to get a construction job. He then filed a workers' compensation claim after being injured. Marboah, a citizen of the Netherlands, later sued his lawyers for $5 million, alleging they botched the paperwork in his compensation case. Marboah's true identity was exposed when he tried to re-enter the United States from Canada in 2002. In what one D.C. judge called "an unusual measure of audacity," Marboah continued to push the legal malpractice suit, arguing he still had a case because his compensation claim had been granted under his fake name. "It was a clear case of legal malpractice," says Benjamin Trichilo of Trichilo, Bancroft, McGavin, Horvath & Judkins, who represented Marboah in the malpractice suit. The D.C. Court of Appeals disagreed and last week ruled in favor of Marboah's former attorney, Alan Ackerman, and his firm. Marboah's deception led Judge Frank Schwelb to include a footnote, quoting Sir Walter Scott: "Oh, what a tangled web we weave when first we practice to deceive." — Bethany Broida

FLIPPING

Laura Flippin, formerly a special assistant to the president and executive secretary of the Homeland Security Council, has joined Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker's litigation department as of counsel. Prior to serving in the Bush White House, Flippin was a deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's Civil Division, overseeing immigration and consumer litigation. Flippin says her experience litigating against Fortune 500 companies has given her an insider's point of view: "My understanding of how the government looks at these cases and prosecutes them is a good foundation for expanding on a practice that I now have an insider's perspective on." Litigation department chair James Wareham says Flippin's government experience will be an asset to the global litigation practice. — Hilary Lewis

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Feds To Continue HealthSouth Probe (AP)

By JAY REEVES, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, July 4, 2005

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (AP) - Federal prosecutors aren't done with HealthSouth Corp., despite the acquittal of ousted CEO Richard Scrushy in a $2.7 billion earnings overstatement. Two former executives who pleaded guilty in the accounting scheme are set for sentencing this summer, and two more indicted in the fraud are awaiting trial in Birmingham, where jurors last week found Scrushy not guilty.

HealthSouth, meanwhile, is still feeding information to prosecutors as it sorts out the aftermath of the financial debacle, and U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said her office is still investigating the long-running fraud at the rehabilitation and medical services chain.

A recent earnings restatement filed by HealthSouth with the Securities and Exchange Commission includes information about payments and perks offered to some health care providers that could have violated Medicare rules, Martin said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"Now I'll turn my attention to some other things that have been on the back burner during the trial," said Martin, declining to elaborate.

The acquittal of Scrushy on all 36 counts was a stinging defeat for FBI agents and prosecutors who spent more than two years on the case, and Martin said attorneys are eager to talk more with jurors to find out exactly where their case failed.

But Martin rejected the idea that Scrushy's acquittal meant the whole investigation was a failure.

"Overall it's been an incredible success with 15 guilty pleas," she said. "Sometimes that last domino doesn't fall."

DOJ_NMG_0001304

Years of bogus accounting at the company Scrushy founded and ran for nearly two decades were revealed in March 2003, when the SEC filed a civil lawsuit accusing him and HealthSouth of a massive fraud.

HealthSouth fired Scrushy and cleaned out most of the company's top officers, with 15 one-time executives pleading guilty in the scam. HealthSouth never denied the fraud occurred, and neither did Scrushy.

But jurors didn't feel that the government had proved Scrushy was aware of and took part in the conspiracy with some of his closest, longest-serving aides.

By the time HealthSouth employees stopped confessing crimes, 15 people had struck plea deals and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors trying to unravel the crime. The executives-turned-felons included longtime Scrushy associate Aaron Beam, who helped Scrushy start HealthSouth in a one-room office in 1984.

Beam, the company's first finance chief, pleaded guilty to bank fraud in the scheme and was the first of five CFOs to take the stand and tie Scrushy to the fraud. Jurors rejected all that testimony, telling reporters afterward that all five men had credibility problems.

Now, Beam is scheduled to be sentenced on July 25 for his role in the fraud. Defense lawyer Donald Briskman said Beam fulfilled his part of the plea deal by taking the stand against his old colleague, and he expects prosecutors to honor their end of the bargain by recommending a lighter sentence.

"Despite what the result may have been, Mr. Beam testified accurately, completely and fully," Briskman said.

Beam and Will Hicks, a one-time HealthSouth vice president who also testified against Scrushy and also is set for sentencing on July 25, could receive probation based on the punishment handed down to 10 other HealthSouth executives sentenced so far. Only one was sent to prison, and that term was for only five months.

"I really don't want to speculate on any possible sentence," Briskman said.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last month ordered a judge to explain his light sentences for two more former HealthSouth workers who pleaded guilty, former CFO Mike Martin and Richard Botts, a vice president, but the court didn't order tougher punishment for the two, who got probation. Still, prosecutors are renewing their request for prison for Martin and Botts.

Meanwhile, former HealthSouth president and director Jim Bennett and Hannibal "Sonny" Crumpler, a division controller, are awaiting trial. Bennett's attorneys have asked for a date as early as November, and Crumpler's case is set to begin Sept. 12.

HealthSouth repeatedly has said it is cooperating with authorities, but Martin said no decision has been made on whether to charge the corporation itself with a crime.

"The company has continued to self-report things that it found, and we are still looking into those," she said.

HealthSouth last month agreed to pay $100 million to settle the civil fraud charges filed by the SEC, and in January it reached a $325 million settlement with the Justice Department to resolve issues linked to Medicare billing practices.

SEC To Try To Pursue Scrushy In Civil Court (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

Federal prosecutors last week failed in their attempt to hold former health care executive Richard M. Scrushy accountable for a $2.7 billion accounting fraud. Now the Securities and Exchange Commission is taking a crack.

Thursday, the SEC will file court papers seeking a chance to pursue its case against Scrushy for the earnings inflation at HealthSouth Corp. The agency wants to forbid Scrushy, 52, from serving as an officer or director of another public company. It is also seeking $786 million in penalties and disgorgement.

But whether the SEC will succeed where criminal authorities stumbled is far from clear, experts said.

U.S. District Judge Inge P. Johnson last week ordered the agency to "show cause . . . why this case should not be dismissed."

Two years ago, the same judge rejected the agency's attempt to freeze hundreds of millions of dollars in Scrushy's cash and property after an unusual 11-day hearing in Birmingham. The SEC sought to protect the assets so eventually they could be distributed to investors who lost money after the fraud came to light.

"Evidence of defendant Scrushy's involvement in the alleged scheme to inflate profits . . . is lacking," the judge wrote in a May 2003 opinion.

She added that testimony from former HealthSouth finance chiefs who pleaded guilty to taking part in the scheme lacked credibility and called a secret recording of Scrushy talking about the company's financial problems "ambivalent at best."

Similar doubts also were cited by jurors who last week acquitted Scrushy on three dozen fraud, conspiracy and money-laundering charges in a trial that featured testimony from all five of the company's former finance officials. Scrushy could have faced decades behind bars if he had been convicted.

Arthur W. Leach, a lawyer for Scrushy, said he hopes the jury verdict "has caused Judge Johnson to have increased questions about the strength and the merit of the SEC case." Leach noted that the judge in the criminal trial had ruled that Justice Department prosecutors and securities investigators had colluded in a way that violated Scrushy's rights -- a decision that resulted in Scrushy's SEC deposition being tossed out of the criminal case.

John Nester, an agency spokesman, declined to comment on the substance of the agency's argument but said the SEC would pursue its case.

"It's extremely rare that this situation happens, and it's something nobody at the SEC will be happy about," said Gregory S. Bruch, a former agency lawyer and a partner at Foley & Lardner LLP in the District. "Judges generally don't like the government taking multiple shots at people on the same set of facts."

Civil claims such as those filed by the SEC must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence -- a far lower burden than the reasonable-doubt standard necessary for a criminal conviction. Experts added that the agency is charging Scrushy with failing to follow accounting procedures and other new allegations not contained in his criminal indictment.

In addition, the SEC may be able to sharpen its case based on lessons it gleans from the failed criminal prosecution.

"I don't know how much mileage Scrushy can get out of this acquittal," said Steven R. Smith, a securities lawyer at Bryan Cave LLP.

Derek M. Meisner, a former SEC lawyer now at Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham LLP, said agency officials might consider settling with Scrushy rather than trying their luck in court. Lawyers for Scrushy said last week that he wants to return to HealthSouth, where he remains a member of the board.

But the rehabilitation hospital company's new managers decreed that Scrushy, HealthSouth's largest individual shareholder, would not be welcome under any circumstances. Institutional shareholders and money managers have echoed that sentiment.

The company's board has been holding special committee meetings, without Scrushy, for the past two years. HealthSouth expects to hold a formal shareholder meeting as soon as its financial statements are up to date -- perhaps as early as the first quarter of 2006, spokesman Andy Brimmer said. The company does not plan to include Scrushy on the slate of board candidates.

German Broker Is Investigated For Millions In Missing Funds (WSJ)

By Edward Taylor And David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

In what appears to be one of Europe's biggest investment frauds -- potentially affecting as many as 30,000 investors -- about €270 million, or roughly $320 million, in client funds hasn't been accounted for at a little-known German brokerage firm, lawyers probing the firm's activities said Friday.

Despite promising double-digit returns to investors, Phoenix Kapitaldienst GmbH was a scam that operated for nearly a decade, said Otto Lakies, a member of the law firm appointed to oversee Phoenix's insolvency proceedings and is trying to trace the funds. To cover up the fraud, the firm simply wrote fake account statements and shredded documents, he added. The ruse went undetected even during a special audit of the firm in 2002 ordered by German markets watchdog BaFin.

"It was a systematic deception, a fraud which should have been detected earlier because it was so...obvious," Mr. Lakies said.

Some managers at Phoenix itself discovered the fraud in March when they uncovered a phantom account that purportedly contained €600 million. Their discovery came almost a year after the death of top Phoenix manager Dieter Breitkreuz, who was killed in a plane crash on April 7, 2004. These managers contacted BaFin, which on March 10 blocked the company's accounts and called in prosecutors.

Prosecutors have started proceedings against two directors of the company on charges of fraud in 6,940 cases related to the firm and arrested the two, one of whom they allege destroyed documents. A Frankfurt court appointed law firm Schultze & Braun to oversee insolvency proceedings at the firm; Mr. Lakies, its head of forensic services, has been trying to piece together what happened and find what money is left.

Phoenix couldn't be reached for comment.

Insolvency administrator Frank Schmitt of Schultze & Braun said he has accounted for €232 million of €500 million that individuals from Germany, Denmark and the United Kingdom invested with Phoenix. He said it was unlikely the remaining money would be recovered, but investigations are continuing. Much of the money had been paid out by Phoenix in salaries and profit-participation plans among employees, as well as in taxes, he said.

Lawyers at Schultze & Braun said that the fraud began in the early 1990s and that signs emerged as early as 1997.

Hoping To Avoid The Third Out (WP)

By Dean Starkman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

Evan G. Greenberg, the last member of his family to head a major insurance company, is walking a fine line, staying on his feet despite investigations into the U.S. insurance industry that have toppled his brother and father.

A son of industry icon Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg, 50-year-old Evan heads Ace Ltd., a major Bermuda-based insurer that is one of the most profitable in the industry. The company is a big underwriter in Asia and a leading U.S. insurer against big corporate losses, such as those from asbestos claims.

Evan Greenberg has so far managed to keep a low profile and mollify authorities -- unlike his father, who was ousted in March after heading giant American International Group Inc. for 37 years, and older brother Jeffrey, who resigned last fall as chief executive of Marsh & McLennan Cos. after New York state Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer filed civil bid-rigging charges against the company and publicly signaled his desire for Jeffrey W. Greenberg's ouster.

In comments to investors, Evan Greenberg has acknowledged his own company's shortcomings and called for industry-wide reforms. But he also said Ace has weathered an internal review of bid-rigging allegations without major findings of wrongdoing beyond those disclosed earlier this year. At the time of the disclosure, Ace fired three executives, suspended two others and forced the resignation of the head of its U.S. operations, who reported to Greenberg.

"We are an ethical company," he said on a conference call in May. "We have conducted ourselves in a fit and proper manner."

Greenberg has decided to fight a civil suit filed by Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal alleging that Ace paid an improper secret commission to Marsh to win a state contract to administer $80 million in workers' compensation claims.

Greenberg has said the company believes the case has no merit, and Ace has a filed a motion to dismiss the claim.

Some observers say the company is confident that Greenberg will weather the industry-wide investigations.

"ACE believes its CEO is not a focus of any investigation, despite having the last name Greenberg," J. Paul Newsome, an analyst for A.G. Edwards & Sons Inc., wrote in April. Newsome added recently that he has not learned anything since then to contradict that notion.

Greenberg and Ace, through a company spokesman, declined to comment.

The company faces plenty of questions. According to documents Ace filed in March with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the company has received 43 subpoenas, civil demands and other queries from attorneys general in 10 jurisdictions, including the District, and 10 state insurance departments or other regulators, including Maryland's.

DOJ_NMG_0001307

State authorities are investigating whether insurance firms took kickbacks or colluded with one another to increase prices. State and federal officials are also looking into whether companies misled investors by accounting for a type of insurance as a loan when there was no transfer of risk.

Greenberg himself has cautioned that the company is still conducting the second half of a two-part internal review into the company's use of "finite risk" insurance, an income-smoothing device misused by some companies to cover up problems on their books. Allegations of such misuse sparked investigations into AIG and Berkshire Hathaway Inc.'s General Re Corp. insurance unit. The internal review of Ace, by Mary Jo White, a former U.S. attorney for Manhattan and a partner at Debevoise & Plimpton LLP, is due in a month or so.

There are also ongoing state and federal investigations into accounting and business practices at AIG, where Evan Greenberg worked for 25 years, including the last three as chief operating officer under his father.

For a long time, Evan Greenberg was considered the least likely family member to run an insurance company. His father had run AIG since 1967 and turned it into the world's largest insurer. His brother Jeffrey, a graduate of Choate School in Connecticut, Brown University and Georgetown law school, joined a Marsh insurance-brokerage unit and rose quickly. He joined AIG in 1978 and was considered a potential successor to his father, until the two fell out and Jeffrey abruptly left in 1995. He later became head of Marsh, a big source of business for AIG.

Evan, by contrast, did not graduate from college and drifted after finishing at an alternative high school, working as a cook in a nursing home and as a bartender before joining an AIG subsidiary in Colorado in 1975.

Evan served in posts in Korea and Japan and was named to head AIG's foreign general insurance business. He returned to New York in the early 1990s and was named president and chief operating officer in 1997.

As part of his duties, Evan oversaw AIG's auto warranty business, which turned into a "disastrous" investment resulting in a $210 million loss by 1999, according to a civil fraud suit filed by Spitzer against AIG last month. In lengthy litigation brought in 1999 against AIG by a claims adjuster, Warrantech Automotive of Bedford, Tex., Evan Greenberg testified in a 2001 deposition that his father held him responsible for the debacle.

"I received the CEO's displeasure with the business, and how bad it was, routinely; his impatience, his unhappiness and his expectations," he said. The case was first highlighted in a USA Today article published in November.

"We wish Evan the very best in his future endeavors," his father said in AIG news release.

The auto warranty losses became a centerpiece of Spitzer's civil suit against AIG, which alleges that Maurice Greenberg and others arranged a "fraudulent and illegal scheme" beginning in April 2000 to disguise the auto warranty losses as investment losses. AIG says it is cooperating with all investigations. Maurice Greenberg has denied the allegations.

A year after leaving AIG, Evan Greenberg joined Ace, a company packed with AIG alumni and one of AIG's fiercest rivals.

Founded in 1985 to fill an underserved market insuring against large corporate losses, known as excess casualty, the company went on to mimic AIG's core business, commercial underwriting, and became one of the few to compete with AIG both in the United States and globally. The rivalry heated up in 1994, when a top AIG executive and protege of Maurice Greenberg, Brian Duperreault, left AIG to head Ace, taking several AIG executives with him. Maurice Greenberg often disparaged Ace to investors and analysts, sarcastically asking if it was "some kind of bandage," according to people who heard him.

Evan Greenberg was hired in November 2001 to head Ace's overseas unit, became president and chief operating officer in June 2003 and succeeded Duperreault as chief executive in May 2004. He was paid $7.2 million in salary, bonus and restricted stock last year, plus more than $214,000 as a housing allowance and more than $68,000 for personal travel on corporate aircraft, according to documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

A lawsuit filed by Spitzer in October against Marsh alleged that the New York-based brokerage conspired with Ace and other insurers to rig insurance bids for corporate customers. An Ace assistant vice president, Patricia Abrams, pleaded guilty in New York state court to a misdemeanor criminal complaint alleging that she attempted to restrain trade. She was charged with providing noncompetitive "b" quotes intended to fool insurance customers under a "rigged bidding process." Abrams is expected to cooperate with Spitzer in his criminal investigation of the industry, according to a person familiar with the matter who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigations.

A lawyer for Abrams did not return a telephone call.

Ace was not named as a defendant in the suit, although the suit said Ace and other companies "conspired unreasonably to restrain trade." Marsh settled its portion of the suit in January, apologizing and setting up an $850 million compensation fund.

In January, the head of Ace's U.S. unit, Susan Rivera, resigned after an e-mail to her was included in court papers as part of Spitzer's investigation. In the e-mail, Geoffrey G. Gregory, the president of Ace's casualty risk unit, warns that "b" quotes could "potentially be construed as simply providing the appearance of competition."

Rivera was also mentioned in a settlement agreement signed in April by Spitzer and Willis Group Holdings Ltd., another New York brokerage. Spitzer alleged that a former Willis official "personally convinced" Rivera to send him "fraudulent e-mails" to justify a $500,000 payment from Ace to Willis. The payment was a "contingent commission" intended to prod Willis to steer corporate clients to "favored" insurance companies, Spitzer alleged. A Willis spokesman declined to comment; the company paid $50 million to settle the investigation without a lawsuit being filed. Barry Ostrager, a lawyer for Rivera, said his client did nothing wrong and that the Spitzer allegations are a "mischaracterization of the historical facts."

Rivera had been recruited to Ace by Evan Greenberg, according to a person familiar with the matter who requested anonymity because of the ongoing investigation. Ace announced in November that it had fired Abrams and Gregory, and, last month, a third executive. A lawyer for Gregory declined to comment.

In the conference call with investors, Evan Greenberg said the company's problems in bid-rigging had been mostly confined to the excess casualty unit, plus "a few" examples of behavior that were "inconsistent" with the company's code of conduct.

Greenberg also acknowledged the fraught regulatory environment. Asked whether he expected regulators to show increased "vigilance" from now on, he said: "I don't know that there'll be any more vigilance than we have today. It's a pretty frickin' vigilant environment."

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Rove Factor? (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff, Newsweek

Newsweek, July 3, 2005

Its legal appeals exhausted, Time magazine agreed last week to turn over reporter Matthew Cooper's e-mails and computer notes to a special prosecutor investigating the leak of an undercover CIA agent's identity. The case has been the subject of press controversy for two years. Saying "we are not above the law," Time Inc. Editor in Chief Norman Pearlstine decided to comply with a grand-jury subpoena to turn over documents related to the leak. But Cooper (and a New York Times reporter, Judith Miller) is still refusing to testify and faces jail this week.

At issue is the story of a CIA-sponsored trip taken by former ambassador (and White House critic) Joseph Wilson to investigate reports that Iraq was seeking to buy uranium from the African country of Niger. "Some government officials have noted to Time in interviews... that Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame, is a CIA official who monitors the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction," said Cooper's July 2003 Time online article.

Now the story may be about to take another turn. The e-mails surrendered by Time Inc., which are largely between Cooper and his editors, show that one of Cooper's sources was White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove, according to two lawyers who asked not to be identified because they are representing witnesses sympathetic to the White House. Cooper and a Time spokeswoman declined to comment. But in an interview with NEWSWEEK, Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, confirmed that Rove had been interviewed by Cooper for the article. It is unclear, however, what passed between Cooper and Rove.

The controversy began three days before the Time piece appeared, when columnist Robert Novak, writing about Wilson's trip, reported that Wilson had been sent at the suggestion of his wife, who was identified by name as a CIA operative. The leak to Novak, apparently intended to discredit Wilson's mission, caused a furor when it turned out that Plame was an undercover agent. It is a crime to knowingly reveal the identity of an undercover CIA official. A special prosecutor was appointed and began subpoenaing reporters to find the source of the leak.

Novak appears to have made some kind of arrangement with the special prosecutor, and other journalists who reported on the Plame story have talked to prosecutors with the permission of their sources. Cooper agreed to discuss his contact with Lewis (Scooter) Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's top aide, after Libby gave him permission to do so. But Cooper drew the line when special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald asked about other sources.

Initially, Fitzgerald's focus was on Novak's sourcing, since Novak was the first to out Plame. But according to Luskin, Rove's lawyer, Rove spoke to Cooper three or four days before Novak's column appeared. Luskin told NEWSWEEK that Rove "never knowingly disclosed classified information" and that "he did not tell any reporter that Valerie Plame worked for the CIA." Luskin declined, however, to discuss any other details. He did say that Rove himself had testified before the grand jury "two or three times" and signed a waiver authorizing reporters to testify about their conversations with him. "He has answered every question that has been put to him about his conversations with Cooper and anybody else," Luskin said. But one of the two lawyers representing a witness sympathetic to the White House told NEWSWEEK that there was growing "concern" in the White House that the prosecutor is interested in Rove. Fitzgerald declined to comment.

In early October 2003, NEWSWEEK reported that immediately after Novak's column appeared in July, Rove called MSNBC "Hardball" host Chris Matthews and told him that Wilson's wife was "fair game." But White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters at the time that any suggestion that Rove had played a role in outing Plame was "totally ridiculous." On Oct. 10, McClellan was asked directly if Rove and two other White House aides had ever discussed Valerie Plame with any reporters. McClellan said he had spoken with all three, and "those individuals assured me they were not involved in this."

When To Give Up A Source (TIME)

By BILL SAPORITO

Time, July 3, 2005

For journalists, confidential sources can be as essential as ink. That's why so many were surprised last week when Norman Pearlstine, editor-in-chief of Time Inc., said he would reveal some confidential information about a big story. In a case involving TIME magazine White House correspondent Matthew Cooper, Pearlstine agreed to comply with a federal subpoena and surrender Cooper's notes and files relating to a story he had written that is part of an investigation into the disclosure of a CIA operative's identity. Time Inc. had appealed the case all the way to the Supreme Court, but when the court declined last week to hear the case, Pearlstine made the decision he calls "the most difficult I have made in more than 36 years in the news business."

Many in the media world quickly criticized the move as a capitulation to government pressure that could scare off future sources. "I can't think of a time," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, "when a news organization has done something like this." Tom Rosenstiel, director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, said Time Inc.'s decision signals that sources--and reporters--will now have to worry about media companies in addition to government prosecutors. "How will sources believe that journalists can keep their word?" he asked. But others pointed out that Time Inc. had run out of venues to fight the case. "Time Inc. fought this as hard as anyone could, with great lawyers, at great expense," said Newton Minow, former FCC chairman and professor emeritus at Northwestern University School of Law. "Once that happens, you have to obey the law."

The Cooper case evolved from an investigation by special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, who set out to identify the unnamed Bush Administration sources cited by journalist Robert Novak in a July 2003 column that outed CIA officer Valerie Plame. Cooper subsequently wrote a piece for TIME's website saying that "some government officials" had provided him with information similar to what Novak had reported. Cooper suggested in his article that the sources were seeking to discredit Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, who found evidence contradicting the Administration's prewar claim that Iraq had sought uranium in Africa for nuclear weapons. Judith Miller of the New York Times may have spoken to the same sources, though she didn't publish anything. (Nonetheless, she, like Cooper, could face jail time for declining to reveal her contacts.) The New York Times criticized Time Inc.'s decision to hand over material--publisher Arthur Sulzberger Jr. said he was "deeply disappointed"--and said it backed Miller's refusal to testify. Cooper was stoically diplomatic: "There's honor in obeying an order backed by the Supreme Court. There's honor in civil disobedience. I wish Time Inc. had tried to hold out longer against handing over papers that identified my sources. But there's surely principle in both decisions."

After Time Inc. agreed to turn over the requested materials to Fitzgerald's office, speculation quickly surfaced over whose names would be identified. Much of that focused on Karl Rove, senior adviser to President George W. Bush. Rove's lawyer, Robert Luskin, said Cooper called Rove during the week before Novak's story appeared but declined to say what they discussed. Luskin said Rove "has never knowingly disclosed classified information." The lawyer said he has received repeated assurances from Fitzgerald's office that Rove is not a target in the case.

The investigation has been bizarre from the start. For one thing, it's still unclear whether any laws were broken in the Plame revelation. (Deliberately disclosing an operative's name is illegal but only if the government is actively trying to conceal its relationship with that person.) Yet Fitzgerald's wide-ranging investigation has involved subpoenas of at least five journalists, and several, including Cooper, NBC's Tim Russert and the Washington Post's Walter Pincus, have testified on at least a limited basis. The courts have repeatedly denied Cooper and Miller privilege to protect their sources. After the Supreme Court refused to hear the case, Pearlstine says he concluded that Time Inc. had an obligation to follow the law and obey the ruling. "An organization that prides itself on pointing its finger at people shouldn't be breaking the law itself," he said.

Some pundits have countered that an act of civil disobedience by Time Inc.--declining to follow an "unjust" ruling while being prepared to suffer the legal consequence--wouldn't be the same as placing oneself above the law. In Pearlstine's view, "when the courts rule that a citizen's obligation to testify before a grand jury takes precedence over the press's First Amendment right, to me, going against that finding would put us above the law." Others have questioned whether Time Inc. was putting corporate priorities over journalistic ones. Continued refusal to cooperate with the judge would have meant increased fines (well above the current $1,000-a-day penalty). Pearlstine vehemently dismissed the idea of any such calculation. "I am solely responsible for this decision, and the threat of fines never figured into my thinking," he said. He added that he did not consult with Time Inc. CEO Ann Moore or Richard Parsons, CEO of Time Warner, Time Inc.'s parent.

In handing over the requested materials, Pearlstine and Time Inc. made the argument that there was now no need for Cooper to testify because Cooper's files contain at least some of the information Fitzgerald has been seeking. In the interim, Cooper and Miller have asked Judge Thomas F. Hogan to sentence them, if it comes to that, to home confinement or, barring that, to federal prison camps, as opposed to maximum-security prisons or the notorious Washington jails.

Will Time Inc.'s actions alter the rules of journalism? Some think so. "This is going to be open season on journalists," says Dalglish. "Litigators are out there thinking, Why not subpoena them? I'm probably going to win." In Pearlstine's view, Time Inc.'s decision is a narrowly framed one that applies only to a case that involves a federal grand jury with access to secret testimony about a national-security issue. He says he still believes in the value of confidential sources--and fighting to keep them that way as far as the law allows.

Another way in which this case differs from a typical one is that unlike in a traditional whistle-blower scenario in which a source is being protected from potential retaliation, the source or sources being protected in the Cooper case may well have been retaliating against Wilson. "This was leading into a blind alley," says Jim Wheaton, who teaches media law at Stanford University and the University of California, Berkeley. "If the Supreme Court had taken the case, it was likely to say there's no privilege, period." Jay Rosen, chairman of New York University's journalism department, understood the logic of Time Inc.'s ultimate decision. "I find it hard to get worked up into the same outrage as others about the Time decision, which seems to me to be a practical decision," he told the Wall Street Journal.

In the future, the best hope for journalists may be a federal shield law, now in Congress, which would let reporters keep sources confidential under any circumstances. Thirty-one states and the District of Columbia have shield laws, while 18 additional states have similar protections. A federal law has been proposed by Senator Richard Lugar and Representative Mike Pence of Indiana, who have signed up dozens of co-sponsors. It's not that legislators love the media. But when it comes to advancing their politics, legislators can be world-class leakers and could have as much to lose as journalists. --With reporting by Mark Thompson and Viveca Novak/Washington and Nathan Thornburgh/New York

Journalists Say Threat Of Subpoena Intensifies (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

In 1991, when Timothy Phelps, a reporter for Newsday, and Nina Totenberg, a reporter for National Public Radio, broke the news that Anita Hill had accused Clarence Thomas, then a Supreme Court nominee, of sexual harassment, a special Senate counsel tried to subpoena the reporters' telephone records to unmask their confidential source.

The accusations prompted a second round of highly contentious confirmation hearings, but Senate leaders ultimately refused to give the special counsel permission to pursue the records, and eventually the matter was dropped.

Mr. Phelps, who is now Newsday's bureau chief in Washington, recalled his case last week after two courts, including the Supreme Court, ruled in two similar cases against journalists.

"We seemed to have pretty solid support for the stand we took, from the journalistic community, the legal community, the human rights community, the public," he said. "And I don't sense as much of that today, even in the journalistic community. The legal atmosphere, the corporate atmosphere, and the public atmosphere has changed."

Lawyers for the news media say that the legal climate for those seeking to protect confidential sources is turning chillier, with more subpoenas being issued to reporters. There is no database that tracks such subpoenas, and some prosecutors dispute that they are on the rise. But a series of high-profile cases involving confidential sources has the news media on edge.

"It does feel like open season," said Laura Handman, a First Amendment lawyer based in Washington. "There are more instances of courts ordering confidential sources to be disclosed," she said, adding that she believed the Bush administration's emphasis on secrecy was partly to blame. "This leads to more leak inquiries, which, in turn, leads to more subpoenas."

In the last year, more than two dozen reporters across the country have been subpoenaed or questioned about their confidential sources in cases before federal courts, according to the Newspaper Association of America. Paul J. Boyle, senior vice president of the association, said he believed that "the filing of subpoenas, as well as the letters and phone calls that media companies receive from prosecutors and civil litigants, is on the rise."

Kurt Wimmer, a media lawyer whose firm, Covington & Burling, represents 45 television stations in 40 states, said he had as many subpoenas against reporters in the first three months of this year as he had in all of last year.

He said those subpoenas were largely inspired by the looming prospect over the last several months that Judith Miller of The New York Times and Matthew Cooper of Time magazine would go to jail for refusing to testify in a grand jury investigation into the disclosure of the identity of a covert C.I.A. operative, Valerie Plame. The Supreme Court last week declined to hear the reporters' appeal, intensifying one of the biggest clashes between the news media and the courts in a generation.

"When the Supreme Court says there's nothing wrong with forcing reporters to testify and go to jail, other lawyers are looking at that and saying, 'Why shouldn't I subpoena a reporter?' " Mr. Wimmer said.

Others doubt that there have been more subpoenas recently, saying it may just seem that way because a handful of cases have become so prominent. They say that regardless of the numbers, there is nothing wrong with pursuing justice if a reporter has been manipulated by a source and published misleading information.

In another case last week, a federal appeals court in Washington upheld contempt orders against four reporters who had refused to disclose their confidential sources to Wen Ho Lee, an atomic scientist who had been suspected of passing secrets to the Chinese but pleaded guilty to a lesser charge. He is suing the government for giving information about him to those reporters, violating his privacy.

Brian A. Sun, a Los Angeles lawyer who represents Dr. Lee, said that while he did not see more subpoenas, just more publicity about them, he agreed that the Miller-Cooper case "could encourage other prosecutors to utilize the tools that they have had available to them." In Mr. Sun's view, what is behind these cases are leakers who have "less than altruistic motives" and are using reporters, while those reporters in turn are looking to break a big story.

The heightened interest in national security issues since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks has drawn attention to some cases, said Martin London, a New York lawyer who has litigated several media cases and subpoenaed nearly a dozen reporters in 1972 on behalf of Spiro T. Agnew, the former vice president. At the same time, he said, high-profile scandals at various news organizations, including The New York Times and CBS News, have undermined confidence in the news media.

"I don't buy that there is any increase in subpoenas," Mr. London said. "The Miller-Cooper case is very unusual, it has a lot of wrinkles that are just sort of extraordinary. But it's perfectly reasonable in a post-9/11 world for the government to be concerned about the security of C.I.A. information."

John Nowacki, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the department would not comment on the use of subpoenas against reporters.

Mr. Boyle and others said there was a change after a 2003 ruling written by Richard Posner, an influential federal appeals court judge in Chicago, who said that lower courts had been misreading a 1972 Supreme Court decision, Branzburg v. Hayes. That case in fact rejected the idea of First Amendment protections for reporters, but media lawyers over three decades managed to convince judges otherwise.

"He seems to have freed some of his colleagues to pull back on the privilege," said Sandra Baron, executive director of the Media Law Resource Center.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special prosecutor in the Miller-Cooper case, has served as something of a role model for those who are seeking information from reporters. Mr. Fitzgerald has employed a technique based on the idea that if a source no longer requires confidentiality, the reporter's pledge to keep it is moot. He has sought and obtained waivers from suspected sources releasing reporters of their confidentiality agreements, making it harder for reporters to claim they are bound by a pledge not to talk.

Through this approach, Mr. Fitzgerald obtained at least limited testimony from journalists including Tim Russert of NBC, Walter Pincus of The Washington Post and Mr. Cooper. Mr. Cooper was subpoenaed again and refused to testify, although Time Inc. has turned over his notes to the prosecutor, a decision with which Mr. Cooper said he disagreed. Mr. Cooper and Ms. Miller face another court hearing Wednesday to learn their fates.

Mr. Phelps, for one, lamented this turn of events and said it was only likely to chill potential sources in the future. "T he fact that some news organizations have cooperated in this case is going to put a little seed of doubt in people's minds about whether they can really depend on reporters or not," he said.

And there is a rising concern among reporters that those people might be right.

"The biggest fear that most reporters have now is not having their mail taken or their phone records taken without their being told," said John Solomon, who oversees investigative reporting for the Associated Press and who had both of those things happen to him, in 2002 and 2001, respectively. "The biggest concern is that they'll write about something and will be forced to talk about it."

Representative Mike Pence, the Indiana Republican who is pushing, so far unsuccessfully, for Congress to pass a federal law to protect journalists, said that fear was justified. "No reporter, as the law has evolved in the last 30 years, can give absolute assurance to any source that at no time will their identity be disclosed," he said.

In addition to the Lee and Miller-Cooper cases, there have been several other high-profile cases involving confidential sources. Jim Taricani, a reporter with WJAR, a television station in Providence, R.I., refused to reveal the identity of the person who leaked him an F.B.I. videotape of a politician taking a bribe. He was sentenced to six months of home detention in December and was released after four months.

Nine news organizations have been subpoenaed in the case involving Steven J. Hatfill, a scientist, who sued federal officials under the privacy act for naming him as a "person of interest" in the 2001 anthrax investigations. As many as 100 federal agents have waived any confidentiality agreements they had with the media in that case.

Ms. Miller of The New York Times and a colleague, Philip Shenon, are under subpoena for their phone records by a grand jury investigating the leak of information about a planned F.B.I. raid on an Islamic charity suspected of funding terrorism. In February, a federal district judge in New York held that the reporters had a right to keep their phone records confidential.

The cases come as polls show the public has a deepening distrust of the news media, although a study by the Pew Research Center last month found that 76 percent of Americans think the use of confidential sources is at least sometimes justified.

Michael Getler, the ombudsman for The Washington Post, cautioned between linking what he agrees is a rise in the number of legal proceedings over sources and the low regard in which the news media is held. "There clearly is a more widespread ideological assault from both sides on the press these days, and that may well be feeding some of the prosecutorial zeal," he said. "But I don't know that that is really the case. I don't think we know enough to say exactly what is driving individual prosecutors."

Boat Sale By 'Duke' Made Him $400,000 (SDUT)

By Jerry Kammer And Marcus Stern, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune, July 5, 2005

CITY ISLAND, N.Y. – Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham made roughly a $400,000 profit by selling the boat he lived aboard in the nation's capital from 1997 to 2002 to a businessman convicted in a bid-rigging scheme. The man said he subsequently got advice from Cunningham about how to pursue a presidential pardon from the Bush administration.

The businessman further acknowledged that a mortgage company owned by his daughter and nephew provided Cunningham with two loans totaling $1.1 million so the congressman could buy his home in Rancho Santa Fe. The businessman said he eventually paid off one of those loans in partial payment for the yacht.

Cunningham bought the 65-foot flat-bottom riverboat Kelly C from then-Rep. Sonny Callahan, R-Ala., for $200,000 in 1997. Five years later, he sold the boat for $600,000 to Thomas Kontogiannis, the Long Island businessman said yesterday.

Kontogiannis defended the $600,000 price tag as "a steal," saying that he had received an appraisal for twice that amount.

The Kontogiannis family is a frequent contributor to Republican causes, including a $300 contribution to Cunningham in July 2002, the year of the sale.

Cunningham's financial dealings in recent weeks have embroiled him in a multitiered federal investigation and cast a shadow over his Washington career.

In a series of interviews with Copley News Service yesterday, Kontogiannis confirmed that he bought Cunningham's boat and that the congressman offered to help him explore the possibility of seeking a pardon from President Bush and the Justice Department. Cunningham then put him in touch with a Washington law firm and recommended "two or three" lawyers to talk to, said the businessman.

"I said I have this problem and I was wondering if I can get a pardon out of it," said the 56-year-old real estate developer, who has more than a dozen companies. "He (Cunningham) said to me, 'I know nothing about these things, but I'll find the proper law firm and I'll let you know if they can help you.' "

Kontogiannis was among four people and five corporations pleading guilty in October 2002 to kickback and bribery charges in connection with a$6.3 million bid-rigging scheme involving contracts to provide computer services to New York public schools. Kontogiannis owned three of the companies. The defendants were ordered to repay the school board $4.8 million.

Kontogiannis said he went to Washington and talked to the law firm recommended by the congressman. But he said he then dropped the idea. "It's not worth the aggravation," he said, describing the process as too complicated.

U.S. Coast Guard records do not reflect the sale of the Kelly C from Cunningham to Kontogiannis, showing Cunningham as the boat's owner since 1997.

Kontogiannis said he never registered the yacht in his name because it is not seaworthy and he knew he would not be able to take it out on the ocean in its current condition.

He confirmed that he and Cunningham had talked about the congressman buying it back from him, at a price he did not disclose. But Kontogiannis said he dropped that idea when he saw how expensive it would be to acquire an ocean-worthy yacht.

That change of mind came after Cunningham visited the shipyard here with a long list of repairs to be made, but just before Cunningham became engulfed in controversies over his sale of his Del Mar-area house to Mitchell Wade, a defense contractor, who later resold the house at a $700,000 loss.

Cunningham's dealings with Wade are the subject of FBI and federal grand jury investigations.

Wade is the founder of MZM Inc., a Washington, D.C.-based company which has received $163 million in defense contracts since 2002. Cunningham, a member of the influential House defense appropriations subcommittee and Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, has said that he supported funding requests benefiting MZM. Cunningham also has lived aboard Wade's 42-foot yacht, the Duke-Stir, since April 2004 in the same slip once occupied by the Kelly C.

Federal agents executed search warrants Friday at Cunningham's Rancho Santa Fe home, MZM's headquarters and Wade's yacht.

The boat at the center of this latest storm to rock Cunningham today sits forlornly on blocks in the shipyard of Consolidated Yachts at the end of Pilot Street not far from the Neptune Inn and Sammy's Fish Box restaurant.

Though gussied up recently with fresh coats of white paint and what Kontogiannis said was a $100,000 refurbishing overseen by his wife, the boat is far from ready for much ocean travel, according to workers at the shipyard.

Its last sea voyage came with Cunningham at the helm. That was late in 2002 when Cunningham delivered it to the Glen Cove Marina near here, according to Joe Weiser, Glen Cove's owner.

"He brought it here himself," Weiser said of Cunningham. "He gave me a picture of himself in his flight outfit."

Cunningham was a decorated pilot in Vietnam.

Attempts to reach Cunningham attorneys K. Lee Blalack and Mark Holscher for comment last night were unsuccessful. Nor did Cunningham spokesman Mark Olson respond to calls to his cell phone.

Kontogiannis said there is no comparison between the sale of Cunningham's Del Mar-area house to Wade and the sale of the Kelly C.

"There is no reason for me to avoid something. Everything is plain and simple for me," he said, adding about Cunningham's problems with MZM, "I don't know what the problem is that they have out there, but that is their problem."

The developer confirmed that a mortgage company owned by his daughter and nephew, Coastal Capital, provided the mortgage loans to the congressman when he bought his $2.55 million home in Rancho Santa Fe.

He insisted the loans were at "normal rates." Kontogiannis said he earlier this year paid off a $500,000 second mortgage on that home, primarily using money he said he owed Cunningham for the yacht.

"We accumulated all the money and paid the second mortgage off . . . on the fifteenth of March," he said.

Cunningham never listed the mortgage debt on his congressional financial disclosure forms, though he was not required to do so. (Members of Congress are are not required to list or provide details on their personal residences or personal property.)

Kontogiannis said the rate on the $500,000 loan was about 10 percent and the rate on a $595,000 loan was "maybe around 6 or 6¼."

Weiser said the Kelly C, whose twin engines are considered too small for a 65-foot yacht, never left its slip. Kontogiannis agreed that the flat-bottomed boat could not handle the ocean, and said he used it primarily for dockside parties.

"It's basically a party barge," said marina mechanic Wes Iencierz. "It's something you'd take out into a river, drop an anchor and have a party."

Iencierz confirmed yesterday that six weeks ago Cunningham showed up at the marina with his own mechanic in tow, clearly indicating that he intended to buy it back. Cunningham's mechanic handed him a long list of needed repairs.

Shipyard employees had derided the Kelly C when it arrived at the Glen Cove Marina around August 2002 because of its poor mechanical condition. The boat was rarely used while berthed at Glen Cove, according to marina employees.

Aboard the yacht yesterday, the repair list – or a similar list – could still be seen on the boat, which rests on wood blocks stacked three-high and is held aloft by adjustable metal braces.

The door to the interior has a stylized "C" etched in the glass and the signs of the $100,000 refurbishing could be seen in the blue carpeting, leather coach and well-crafted wood bar.

The list of repairs included work on engine impellers, running lights, the anchor light and the filters.

The co-owner of Consolidated Yachts clearly was uncertain about the future of the boat now that Cunningham has removed himself from the picture. "I could get stuck with the damn thing," said Wesly L. Rodstrom Jr. He said he called Cunningham called only a few days ago – either Thursday or Friday – to find out what was going on. "He said, 'Oh, I've got nothing to do with the boat.' "

Developer Helped Congressman By Buying Boat, Arranging Loan (WP)

By Charles R. Babcock

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

Thomas T. Kontogiannis, a Long Island developer, says he doesn't particularly like politics, so he never does business with the federal government. Still, he hit it off with Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham years ago, and recently Kontogiannis bought Cunningham's 65-foot yacht, the Kelly C, and helped the California Republican finance a house.

DOJ_NMG_0001315

The developer says the transactions are nothing like Cunningham's dealings on another house and yacht that are the subject of a federal investigation. A federal grand jury is examining Cunningham's relationship with Mitchell J. Wade, a Washington defense contractor who bought a home from Cunningham, possibly at an inflated price, and then let the congressman stay rent-free on Wade's 42-foot boat, the Duke-Stir, while in Washington.

The transactions between the congressman and Kontogiannis are not fully documented in the public record or the congressman's financial disclosure. Cunningham, for example, is still listed as the owner of the Kelly C, with his address listed as the home he bought more than a year after Kontogiannis said he bought the yacht from the congressman.

Kontogiannis, of Glen Head, N.Y., said in interviews this weekend that he bought the Kelly C, a boat on which Cunningham used to live while Congress was in session, for $600,000 in summer 2002. Kontogiannis spent $100,000 more redecorating it the next year at the Glen Cove marina but didn't use it except for dockside parties, he said, because it wasn't stable in rough seas. Kontogiannis said he never got around to changing the title on the boat from Cunningham's name to his.

Then in late 2003, Kontogiannis said, when Cunningham bought a $2.55 million home in Rancho Santa Fe, the congressman asked if a mortgage company owned by Kontogiannis's nephew and daughter could finance $1.1 million in mortgages. The congressman bought that house shortly after Wade paid $1.675 million for Cunningham's previous home in Del Mar. Wade then sold that house for a $700,000 loss.

Kontogiannis said he recently paid off a $500,000 second mortgage on the Rancho Santa Fe home at the congressman's request, mostly with money he owed Cunningham for the yacht.

There is no mention of Kontogiannis's debt to Cunningham on the congressman's financial disclosure statements.

Cunningham's lawyers, K. Lee Blalack II and Mark Holscher, said in a written statement that the congressman's "business dealings with Mr. Kontogiannis have been entirely proper."

Cunningham called and visited the Long Island marina a month ago -- before news stories about Wade appeared -- to arrange for repairs so he could take the Kelly C back to Washington.

Kontogiannis, 56, said he had discussed reselling the Kelly C to Cunningham but decided against it. The source close to Cunningham said the congressman registered the boat this year using his new California address in anticipation of the resale. But that idea resale was jettisoned when San Diego area newspapers broke stories about the congressman's dealings with Wade.

The developer said his failure to record the change in title on the boat should not be taken as a sign that he was doing Cunningham a favor by paying for refurbishing his boat. "Why would I do that?" he said. "I don't need the man." Kontogiannis said he has never asked Cunningham for a favor.

The developer pleaded guilty to what he said was a misdemeanor state fraud charge in 2002 in connection with alleged bribes to a local school superintendent in return for $6 million in computer contracts. He said he agreed to pay $5 million in reimbursement.

Kontogiannis, who came to the United States from Greece in 1970, said he met Cunningham at a Washington function about 15 years ago. They talk a couple of times a year, he said. Cunningham was a Navy fighter pilot in Vietnam and an instructor at its Top Gun flight school.

Kontogiannis said he went to a party on the Kelly C around 1995, when it was owned by another congressman, and liked the steel-hull craft. After Cunningham bought it 1997, for a reported $200,000, Kontogiannis said he told the congressman: "If you ever decide to sell it, I'd love to buy it."

Cunningham "called and asked if I was still interested" in buying the boat, Kontogiannis said. He did so, he said, after getting the boat appraised at $1.2 million. The developer said he financed the transaction by giving the congressman about $30,000, assuming the payments on an existing $140,000 bank loan and financing the remaining $425,000 as a personal note that accumulated interest at the prime rate. He said a family company, Axxion LLC, made the payments on the bank loan.

The congressman approached him again in 2003 when Cunningham planned to buy the Rancho Santa Fe home, Kontogiannis said. The congressman asked if Coastal Capital, the company the developer said is owned by his nephew and daughter, could finance the mortgage at its wholesale price, which had a slightly lower interest rate than retail mortgage lenders. The decision was "a slam dunk," Kontogiannis said, because the house had been appraised at $2.55 million.

Kontogiannis said Cunningham asked him last year to pay back the Kelly C loan, which was accruing interest at about 3 1/2 percent, by paying off the second mortgage on the house. Interest on the congressman's loan was accruing at 10 percent, though Cunningham wasn't making payments, he said.

The developer paid off the mortgage, he said, after Cunningham wrote him a check for $70,000 to make up the difference between what he owed on the boat and what Cunningham owed on the second mortgage.

As of late June, land records in California did not show the congressman had paid off the second mortgage. "I sent him a letter of satisfaction" in March, Kontogiannis said. "It's up to him to get it recorded."

Embattled Congressman Skips July 4th Event (AP-Y2)

By Seth Hettena, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 5, 2005

Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham canceled his annual appearance at a July Fourth pancake breakfast in his district to avoid a media frenzy over the growing scandal shadowing the eight-term Republican.

Three days earlier, the FBI raided Cunningham's San Diego-area home as authorities intensified their investigation of the congressman's financial dealings.

The pancake breakfast was to have been Cunningham's first public event since last month's disclosure that the congressman sold his previous home to a defense contractor for what may have been an inflated price. Organizers received word Sunday the congressman would not attend.

"We thought it would be a media frenzy as well as possibly a lot of people with different agendas and we didn't want to distract from the spirit of the event," said Cunningham spokesman Mark Olson.

The event seemed tailor-made for the former Navy "Top Gun" fighter pilot and Vietnam war ace: A flag-waving crowd dressed in red, white and blue cheered speeches by a Navy chaplain and a Boy Scout color guard and a rendition of Lee Greenwood's "God Bless the USA."

On Friday, the FBI searched Cunningham's $2.55 million mansion in the exclusive community of Rancho Santa Fe as well as the 42-foot yacht, the "Duke Stir," owned by Mitchell Wade, the founder of the defense firm MZM Inc., and the company's offices.

Wade bought Cunningham's previous home, and Cunningham has resided on his yacht in Washington. If he was living on Wade's boat for free, that could be a violation of congressional ethics rules.

Wade bought Cunningham's house for $1.675 million in 2003 and sold it nearly a year later for a $975,000 — a $700,000 loss in one of the nation's hottest housing markets.

Cunningham has admitted he showed "poor judgment" in selling his home to Wade but said he acted honestly and predicted the investigation would clear him. MZM has said it is cooperating with the investigation. Wade has not commented publicly.

Scrushy's Attorney To Represent Ford (KNOXNS/AP)

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), July 4, 2005

MEMPHIS - State Sen. John Ford is adding a big name to the legal team defending him in a federal bribery case.

Attorney Donald Watkins, who helped former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy win an acquittal on fraud charges last week, will help out Ford, WPTY of Memphis reported.

Ford was indicted last month in the Tennessee Waltz sting. He is accused of taking $55,000 in bribes from a fake company set up by the FBI. The investigation includes 2,000 hours of undercover tapes.

"We hope to have Senator Ford's freedom secured by next year," Watkins said.

Watkins' law firm is part of the trio of that defended Scrushy, who was accused of directing a $2.7 billion accounting fraud at his medical company. During trial, prosecutors played a secret tape recording that seemed to incriminate him, yet he was just found not guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0001317

The three firms from Alabama are joining his Memphis attorney, Mike Scholl. According to Watkins there are two reasons why the case looks good for Ford.

"The secret video tapes that the FBI made do not portray what really happened with the course of conduct of Senator Fords' dealings with the FBI and the entity created by the FBI.," Watkins said.

Watkins also said that the undercover operatives cooperating with the FBI have credibility issues.

Ford said it's been a painful experience but he's getting a lot of encouragement.

"I have overwhelming support in this community and throughout the state. Overwhelming," Ford said.

Waris Pleads Guilty To Lying To FBI (KCS)

By JUDY THOMAS and DEANN SMITH, The Kansas City Star

The Kansas City Star, July 5, 2005

Former Jackson County Executive Bill Waris pleaded guilty Saturday to lying to FBI agents in a criminal investigation that, according to documents, targets Katheryn Shields, the county's current top elected official.

Dressed in a gray suit and a white shirt, Waris admitted to U.S. Magistrate Judge Sarah W. Hays that he lied to FBI agents on March 12, 2004. That came in connection with an investigation into whether a county official offered a woman a county contract in exchange for the woman's husband withdrawing his application for a seat on the Jackson County Sports Complex Authority.

Waris declined to comment after the hearing, which came 72 hours before he was set to stand trial in federal court. During the 15-minute hearing, his attorney, John P. O'Connor, told the judge the guilty plea was "in his (Waris') best interest."

"This is a lesser charge in which the likelihood of going to jail is minimized," O'Connor said.

In an agreement reached late Friday with federal prosecutors, Waris pledged to cooperate fully with the investigation. In return, said U.S. Attorney Todd Graves, the government dismissed parts of a Nov. 17, 2004, federal indictment against Waris and won't oppose any request for probation at his sentencing.

"They haven't said that they are going to ask for probation, but I assume that they will," Graves said.

O'Connor declined to comment further on the case when contacted Saturday afternoon.

Shields has not been charged and has denied any wrongdoing. In grand jury transcripts, government officials have identified Shields as a target of the probe.

Reached by telephone Saturday morning, Shields' husband, Phil Cardarella, said she would have no comment and that they were unaware of Waris' guilty plea. He declined to identify her attorney.

"At this point, it would be premature for anyone to comment," Cardarella said.

The indictment that was dropped against Waris was on two felony charges of lying and obstructing justice, which are Class C and Class D felonies. The charge Waris pleaded guilty to Saturday was a Class D felony.

"The point of this prosecution wasn't to punish Mr. Waris to the maximum amount we could," Graves said. "The point of this prosecution was to send a message that you cannot lie to a federal agent, and that we want your cooperation and if we believe you've lied and are not cooperating, we will file an action in court."

Waris, 61, could receive a sentence of up to five years in prison without parole, plus a fine of up to $250,000. But sentencing guidelines allow the judge to sentence him to no jail time. Graves said a sentencing hearing would be scheduled after a pre-sentence investigation was completed by the U.S. Probation Office, possibly within 30 to 60 days.

Graves said the advantage of the plea agreement was that it forced Waris to provide substantial assistance to the federal investigation "by fully and truthfully disclosing everything he knows … including testifying before the grand jury or at trial. Mr. Waris clearly has information we are interested in. He is cooperating, and we find that to be significant."

The case against Waris — a former lobbyist for Jackson County and the Kansas City School District — was the unforeseen outgrowth of a controversy last year between Shields and Jackson County Prosecutor Mike Sanders over the county's anti-drug tax. The squabble eventually triggered a grand jury investigation into the tax and county contracts.

The grand jury looked into whether Shields offered a $12,000, no-bid contract to Republican activist Catherine Nugent to raise funds for the Fort Osage Historical Society in exchange for her husband, Daniel Nugent, withdrawing from consideration for a seat on the sports authority.

Nugent has said she declined the offer. Her husband did not withdraw his application, and the Jackson County Legislature did not select him as one of the three finalists. Instead, former Kansas City Mayor Richard Berkley received the nomination and the appointment. He recently resigned, citing family reasons.

At Saturday's hearing, Assistant U.S. Attorney William Meiners outlined the government's case against Waris.

Prosecutors contend that on Oct. 6, 2003, a telephone conference call was made involving Shields and Catherine Nugent in which Waris and Jackson County Legislator Daniel Tarwater were present. Meiners alleged that during that call, Shields told Nugent that the fund-raising position was available and that the job was contingent on Daniel Nugent withdrawing his application for a seat on the sports authority.

Waris, when questioned on March 12, 2004, by the FBI, denied he was present during the conference call. At Saturday's hearing, he told the judge he had lied about that.

Even though Meiners in open court named Shields as present during the conference call, Graves repeatedly refused to comment on Shields during his news conference after the hearing. Graves did confirm, however, that Tarwater was not a target of the investigation, and said he has been cooperating "any way he could" since appearing before the grand jury.

Sanders declined comment Saturday afternoon.

Former U.S. Attorney Jean Paul Bradshaw said Saturday that typically Waris would have had to give prosecutors a statement before the plea agreement was finalized. Bradshaw said Meiners would not have outlined to a federal judge the prosecution's contention about the conference call without believing Waris would support it.

Political observers said it remained to be seen what impact Waris' guilty plea would have on Jackson County government.

"It puts everything on hold in terms of political fallout for the county government or any county officials," said political consultant and former county official Steve Glorioso. "I think it makes a lot of people anxious, not just Katheryn Shields. Bill Waris has tentacles into all levels of government …"

Several Jackson County legislators were shocked when told Saturday about Waris' plea.

Legislator Bob Stringfield said the county's credibility would take a hit, which he said would hinder the county's efforts to get support for improvements to Kauffman and Arrowhead stadiums.

Legislator Henry Rizzo said Waris' plea gave credence to the initial charges, and that his prayers were with Waris and his family.

"All of this is coming so fast, I don't know what to say," Rizzo said.

Legislator Fred Arbanas said he had not been following the case closely and could not comment.

Legislators Scott Burnett and Bob Spence said the Waris plea had no impact on county government.

"It is unfortunate that it occurred. I think we will have to see the rest of it play out. It is unfortunate he lied about it," Burnett said. "Nothing Waris pleaded to today has to do with her (Shields) directly."

State Sen. Victor Callahan, a former county legislator, called Waris' guilty plea "a sad day for the taxpayers."

Gray Jury Split; Judge Orders Further Work (CLPD)

By Mike Tobin, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, July 2, 2005

The jury deciding the fate of Nate Gray remained deadlocked Friday night over charges that Gray traded public contracts for bribes.

The jury sent notice to U.S. District Judge James Gwin that it had not agreed on any of the 59 counts of conspiracy, fraud and bribery against Gray, Cleveland City Councilman Joe Jones and New Orleans businessman Gilbert Jackson.

"We are not being unanimous on any count," jurors wrote to Gwin Friday morning. "The range of opinions on any counts do not lead us to believe further deliberations would bring us any closer."

DOJ_NMG_0001319

One of the FBI agents working on the case slumped when Gwin read the note. Defense lawyers grinned and asked Gwin to declare a mistrial.

Instead, Gwin told the 12 jurors to continue discussing the case.

They did, but they remained far apart hours later.

"We are unable to find common ground on most of the counts," jurors wrote in a separate note Friday afternoon. "Given the limited movement since Tuesday, we believe there is no way to ever reach a unanimous decision on all of the counts."

Gwin took the unusual step of keeping the jurors in court until 8 p.m., hours after they normally would have been sent home.

Instead of declaring a mistrial, he ordered them to return for more deliberations next week. Gwin ordered jurors not to discuss the case with friends or relatives during the long holiday weekend.

Gray, a close friend of former Mayor Michael R. White, appeared relieved by the jury's difficulties reaching a verdict. He has been cheerful throughout the three-week trial, often chatting with friends and relatives who stop by the courthouse.

Gray, Jones and Jackson are accused of being part of a conspiracy in which bribes were paid in exchange for public contracts in Cleveland, East Cleveland, Houston and New Orleans.

Jurors have debated the case for more than three days after sitting through two weeks of testimony. Much of the testimony focused on secretly recorded conversations between the three defendants and Ricardo Teamor, who has already pleaded guilty to paying bribes to Jones.

During Gray's trial, jurors also watched several secretly recorded meetings between Gray and former East Cleveland Mayor Emmanuel Onunwor, who has been found guilty of accepting bribes.

Gray was shown giving Onunwor envelopes of cash during several meetings. Onunwor told jurors the money was bribes for East Cleveland contracts, but Gray's lawyers said he was simply giving money to an old friend and expected nothing in return.

Much of the proceedings in court Friday took place with jurors out of the room and involved Cleveland City Councilman Zack Reed.

Reed has not been charged in the case, but he is close friends with Gray and Teamor.

Reed told reporters last week that he went to high school with one of the jurors in the Gray trial, even though jurors initially said they did not know any people on a long list of potential witnesses, including Reed. As a result, Gray's lawyers made a motion for a mistrial, but Gwin denied the request Friday.

Reed's attorney, Timothy Ivey, asked Gwin on Friday to seal transcripts of conversations between lawyers that focused on the juror Reed knows.

Because those conversations remain secret, lawyers in the case could not answer questions about what those conversations involved.

Mafia Cops Not Dangerous And Should Get Bail, Attorneys Say (NYNSDY)

By ANTHONY M. DESTEFANO, STAFF WRITER

New York Newsday, July 5, 2005

Two ex-cops accused of being hitmen for the mob are not dangerous and should be let out of solitary confinement on bail, defense attorneys said Friday. In a 19-page bail application filed in federal court in Brooklyn, lawyers for Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa said the case against the two former detectives was "slim" and that narcotics charges in the indictment had no connection to the racketeering charges.

"The government has not, and cannot, prove by clear and convincing evidence that Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa pose any present danger to a person or the community," said attorneys Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, who represent both men respectively.

The attorneys argued that even if there was evidence that Eppolito and Caracappa committed violent acts and might do o again that there are adequate conditions for bail.

Eppolito, 56, and Caracappa, 63, have been held in solitary confinement at the Brooklyn federal detention facility since they were brought back to New York to face a racketeering indictment returned in March.

They were charged with complicity in eight murders and other crimes at the behest of former acting Lucchese crime boss Anthony Casso. The indictment alleged that some of the homicides took place when both defendants were police officers.

A bail hearing is scheduled in the case for Tuesday before Judge Jack B. Weinstein. Prosecutors had not filed a response to the defense papers as of late Friday.

The defense attorneys argued at length in their latest submission that allegations that the officers sold methamphetamine and laundered money appeared to center around the actions of a government informant and accountant Steven Corso.

The attorneys said Corso misled and entrapped Eppolito and Caracappa in the narcotics charges after claiming he could get wealthy Hollywood "bigshots" to invest in Eppolito's screenplays.

Mob Cops Try For 1M Bail (NYDN)

By JOHN MARZULLI, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, July 2, 2005

Reputed Mafia cops Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa want to be sprung from jail - and they are willing to pay up.

The defendants asked a federal judge yesterday to free them on $1 million bail and offered to put up their homes in Las Vegas and properties owned by their children and close relatives to secure the bond.

Eppolito and Caracappa are charged with selling out their badges to the Mafia and having a hand in eight gangland slayings between 1986 and 1991.

Their lawyers argue in court papers filed yesterday in Brooklyn Federal Court that allegations of mob ties were first made against the defendants in 1994 by Luchese crime boss Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso, and they never fled.

"They retired with many honors reflecting their dedication to law enforcement and extensive contributions to the safety and betterment of New York City," lawyers Edward Hayes and Bruce Cutler wrote.

Both are caged 23 hours a day and neither is in great shape. Eppolito underwent open heart surgery in December and Caracappa has battled lung cancer.

Besides the defendants' homes, Eppolito's two daughters, sister and sister-in-law are offering to post their homes, and Caracappa's brother, a retired NYPD lieutenant, and his 90-year-old mother are putting up their homes, too.

Federal Judge Jack Weinstein has been sympathetic to the defendants, ordering they be provided with thermal underpants and increasing their phone privileges.

Web Hunt Nabs Man In Montreal Wanted By FBI On Sex Charges (TG&M)

By JULIAN SHER

The (Toronto) Globe and Mail, July 2, 2005

MONTREAL -- A man whose picture appeared in a gallery of suspected child predators on the America's Most Wanted website was tracked down in Montreal this week after an international cyberhunt. He faces charges of sexual assault, incest and distribution of child pornography.

"It was a great co-ordinated effort," said Detective Sergeant Paul Gillespie of Toronto Police's sex-crime unit, which worked with the FBI, the RCMP and police in Quebec to locate the man.

"This shows the system for identifying victims and abusers is working. Canada is finally in the game," Det. Sgt. Gillespie added.

On Monday, police arrested a 32-year-old man in Montreal North, who cannot be named because one of the alleged victims is his seven-year-old daughter. He remains behind bars until a bail hearing on July 13.

In early 2004, the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation took the unusual step back of issuing "John Doe" warrants for several people whose names were not known, but whose images had been captured abusing children in pictures and video distributed on the Web. The FBI asked the TV-crime show America's Most Wanted to broadcast their faces. Viewers quickly identified them all, except for "Internet John Doe #4."

DOJ_NMG_0001321

Described as a man "who uses the Internet to distribute disgusting photos showing himself molesting young children," he was accused of engaging in "sadistic and violent conduct."

The FBI had few clues, except his approximate weight, hair colour and a couple of scars and tattoos on his arms.

"He's been out the longest," said Arnold Bell, unit chief of the FBI's Innocent Images project.

Although they assumed he was American, the FBI and Interpol also circulated the series of graphic pictures featuring the man that first appeared on the Web in 2002 to police agencies around the world.

About two weeks ago, members of Toronto's sex-crimes unit came across new pictures and a video from the same series in a newsgroup.

Detective Ian Lamond said they blew up a snippet of a poster in one of the pictures and saw a word in French. Det. Lamond, who lived in Montreal briefly and has family there, also spotted through a window in another picture a railing resembling one of the city's distinctive outside staircases.

"Based on all the pieces coming together, I had a really strong feeling that this was Montreal," he said.

The Toronto Police forwarded the information to the Sûreté du Québec, the provincial police, and to the RCMP's recently created National Child Exploitation Co-ordination Centre.

An alert investigator from the centre recognized one young girl in the photos from an old tip that had been passed on to Canada's National Tipline at http://www.cybertip.ca. The RCMP had a possible identification of the suspect, but the search was stalled without more clues.

"That lead looked like a dead end until the new photos," said Sergeant Robert Lajoie, who heads the centre. "It's a perfect example of why we need a central-contact point like we now have here to disseminate this kind of intelligence."

The RCMP quickly forwarded its new information to Montreal. Constable Chantal Mackels of the SQ said the Quebec police got the details last Wednesday and within 48 hours their cybercrime unit confirmed the suspect's identity and location.

Last Friday, June 24 -- a national holiday in Quebec -- police armed with a search warrant seized about 1,000 DVDs, CDs and computer disks at the man's home.

They made the formal arrest on Monday and the man's daughter was taken into the custody of youth-protection workers.Julian Sher is a Montreal journalist working on a book about child pornography Search globeandmail.com Search Site More Search Options/Archives Search Tips

Ex-Death Row Inmate Fights Fresh Charges (AP-Y2)

By Mike Robinson, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 5, 2005

Aaron Patterson walked out of prison 2 1/2 years ago, a free man with a pardon and a chance to start fresh. But the happy ending never came for Patterson, who faces fresh drug and weapon charges that could hand him a return trip to prison. These days, the 40-year-old Patterson sits in a federal jail awaiting the start of jury selection Tuesday.

His story of torture by police and 17 years on death row had helped launch an emotional campaign against the death penalty in Illinois.

Patterson was among four former death row inmates who were pardoned by former Gov. George Ryan in one of his last acts in office in January 2003. A day later the governor commuted the sentences of all 160 other death row inmates to life without parole.

Patterson insisted that he was tortured by police into confessing to a double murder he did not commit. The head of the unit that investigated his case, Lt. Jon Burge, was later fired for allegedly mistreating a suspect.

Ryan's actions were warmly applauded by opponents of the death penalty, who nominated the former governor for the Nobel Peace Prize. Patterson's claims have been echoed by dozens of others.

But the cheering for both Patterson and Ryan has long since faded.

The former governor is facing a racketeering indictment, and federal prosecutors are asking the judge — who by coincidence is U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer, who also is handling Patterson's case — to bar his lawyers from using his moratorium on capital punishment to try to impress the jury.

DOJ_NMG_0001322

Meanwhile, federal prosecutors say Patterson emerged from prison to become a leader of the South Side's P. Stones street gang.

A 13-count indictment charges him with brokering heroin sales to a federal informant and selling bags of marijuana out of his home. It also charges him with buying four guns, including a MAC-10 machine pistol.

Another alleged gang member, Mark Mannie, is also charged in some of the counts.

Patterson and his defense attorneys contend he was the victim of a setup after he dedicated his life to rooting out corruption in government and the police force. As for the gun charges, Patterson says that he never meant to buy real guns but wanted the kind of replicas that some people collect.

Chances are, Patterson won't even be allowed to sit in the courtroom for his own trial but instead will have to watch on closed-circuit TV from jail because of his frequent outbursts.

"I'm concerned that he could very well poison the proceedings," Pallmeyer said of Patterson, who was hustled out of the courtroom by federal marshals Friday following a series of leather-lunged, profanity-laced comments.

The tirades got worse after Pallmeyer turned down a last-minute bid by Patterson to fire his lawyers and serve as his own attorney.

"If you force me to go to trial like that, Your Honor, this is going to be another Chicago 7 trial — they're going to have to tie me to the chair and gag me," he said, referring to the riot conspiracy trial following the 1968 Democratic National Convention, when one defendant was gagged and tied to his chair.

Pallmeyer opted instead for a closed-circuit TV hookup at the correctional center where Patterson will be able to see the judge and witnesses but not be disruptive.

Two defense psychologists testified that Patterson's outbursts show he shouldn't go to trial at all — that he's mentally incompetent and suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder because of torture by Burge. A prosecution psychiatrist disagreed.

Competent or not, no one denies that Patterson has serious personality problems following his years on death row.

"He's deeply scarred," says defense attorney Standish E. Willis, who worked for years to secure Patterson's release from prison. "And he does need some help."

Task Force Faces Big Job In Noe Inquiry (TOLB)

By MIKE WILKINSON, BLADE STAFF WRITER

Toledo Blade (OH), July 5, 2005

In the month since its creation, the task force to investigate Tom Noe has been relatively quiet, slowly putting together a process while gathering information.

What the four prosecutors face is daunting: Unraveling the complex world of Mr. Noe's coin business and political activity. The investigation will stretch across Ohio and the country.

Together, the four prosecutors - two U.S. attorneys, two elected county prosecutors; one female, three male; one Democrat, three Republicans - will have to decide what charges will be sought and, if any are brought, who will prosecute them.

But despite the complexity of the case, its high profile, and the overlapping boundaries of their jurisdictions, they are confident that they'll get the job done.

"You do the right thing," said Gregory A. White, U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Ohio, based in Cleveland. "You are comfortable with your process. We are progressing and confident about all the things that are going on. We are maintaining the integrity of this expanded investigation."

As the task force gets off the ground, Mr. White knows he is working with peers: Greg Lockhart, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Ohio and a former Greene County assistant prosecutor; Julia Bates, Lucas County prosecutor, and Ron O'Brien, Franklin County prosecutor. Ms. Bates is the only Democrat.

"The beauty of this is we've created a cooperative effort to get this thing evaluated and explained in the most sensible, positive way," Ms. Bates said.

DOJ_NMG_0001323

Three of the four know each other quite well - Mr. O'Brien, Mr. White, and Ms. Bates all were county prosecutors at the same time. Mr. White was well-known in the state's county prosecutors' association for his work on the revamping of Ohio's criminal sentencing provisions.

When Ms. Bates was president of the association, she leaned on Mr. O'Brien to lead a training committee.

"We've been sort of a team for the good of the order since we've been in office," she said.

Although other state departments are investigating, as is the Jefferson County, Colorado, sheriff's department, the task force will be the primary criminal investigative unit. It is working with the Ohio inspector general and the Ohio Ethics Commission.

Tom Charles, the inspector general, was the first to announce an investigation of Mr. Noe in April. He has been studying Mr. Noe's business deal to manage two rare-coin funds for the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation. David Freel, executive director of the Ethics Commission, has also been working closely on the matter.

The group will have its hands full.

Hundreds of boxes containing Mr. Noe's business records sit in Columbus, waiting to be deciphered. And the officials know they have something to look for: Mr. Noe's attorneys have said up to $13 million is missing from the $50 million coin investment.

In addition, the Ethics Commission is looking into a number of officials, including Gov. Bob Taft, who has said he had not properly disclosed some golf outings. The governor's former chief of staff, Brian Hicks, also is under investigation for having spent vacation time at Mr. Noe's Florida home.

'An important case'

Mr. White has conducted a number of public corruption cases throughout his career, winning convictions against Democrats and Republicans and is familiar with the difficult nature of high-profile cases.

"Some are larger than others. This one, the magnitude of it is yet to be determined. But it is a large case and an important case for the state of Ohio," Mr. White said.

Mr. Charles is the only one of the six who isn't a lawyer. He's a longtime police officer who served on the state highway patrol for 31 years and has worn out his share of patrol car tires and shoe leather.

After retiring from the patrol, he moved to the job of legislative inspector general before winning the job of inspector general about seven years ago. He was appointed first by Gov. George Voinovich and reappointed by Governor Taft.

Of the cast of investigative characters looking into the rare-coin scandal, Mr. Charles is the only apolitical figure, having been a political independent for longer than he has held his post, he said. He "would hope" a Democratic administration would hire him just as readily as a Republican one.

"I try to stay as much out of politics as you can. I probably, in a few years, will retire. I don't know that I will go to another post. I am what I am; I have no other aspiration, other than maybe to work for [California Gov.] Arnold Schwarzenegger someday," he said with a laugh.

In addition to providing ethics advice to state officials and employees, Mr. Freel is responsible for directing the Ethics Commission's investigations. He has prosecuted ethics violations, most notably in 1994 for the embezzlement of millions of dollars by the son of the former Columbiana County treasurer.

Varied experience

Mr. Lockhart has been a lifelong prosecutor. Handling those duties for the U.S. Justice Department in a large area of southern Ohio that includes Columbus, Cincinnati, and Dayton for the last 18 years, he helped send a Lancaster municipal judge to prison last year for arson, fraud, and money-laundering, and was involved in the 2003 investigation and conviction of a Columbus truck driver who admitted scrutinizing New York landmarks for al-Qaeda.

President Bush appointed Mr. Lockhart as U.S. attorney for the region in 2001. Before that, Mr. Lockhart served as a deputy U.S. attorney.

Earlier in his career, he spent 10 years as an assistant prosecutor in Greene County, working for several years under Mike DeWine, then the county prosecutor who now is the senior U.S. senator from Ohio.

In the investigation of potential wrongdoing at the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation, he sees his role as secondary. Mr. White's division is investigating Mr. Noe's role in raising money for an October, 2003, fund-raiser in Columbus.

"At this time the lead is with the U.S. attorney's office in the northern district [Cleveland and Toledo] and the Lucas County prosecutor," Mr. Lockhart said.

But he is prepared to lend assistance where needed.

"We came together because of the interest of the state and law enforcement community in taking a look at what we had and who may or may not be involved," he added.

Few people in the Toledo area may have heard of Mr. O'Brien, but if they'd been watching Court TV earlier this year, they would have seen him while prosecuting Charles McCoy. Mr. McCoy was charged with a series of shootings between 2003 and 2004 along Columbus area roads that killed one person. A mistrial was declared in May because of a deadlocked jury. The case will be retried, although Mr. O'Brien will no longer seek the death penalty.

Cold-case work

Ms. Bates has spent her entire professional career in the Lucas County prosecutor's office, where she started as a law intern while she was attending the University of Toledo law school.

After passing the bar in 1976, she was hired full-time by Tony Pizza, who had just been appointed to the post. He was elected in 1976 and held the post until he retired in 1996. He was succeeded by Ms. Bates.

She is perhaps most proud of her office's work on the county's cold-case unit, which has unearthed new evidence on old cases and gotten several high-profile convictions.

In 1978, she lost one case that always bothered her, a rape charge against James Frazier. "For 28 years I thought about James Frazier out there…," she said.

Mr. Frazier was convicted last month of murder for a crime committed on March 2, 2004, and is to die by lethal injection.

Focused investigation

Now the focus is on Mr. Noe and wherever the case may lead.

As the six investigators pore over documents and interview people, they'll do so with the help of some of their peers from different counties and different agencies. They say that's fine - an investigation is an investigation, regardless of who the target is.

"We all trust each other. It transcends politics. It has to do with professionals who are doing their jobs and what they are sworn to do," Mr. White said.

Eric Rudolph Eluded The Feds For Years. Now, For The First Time, His Mother Shares Letters The Serial Bomber Wrote From Jail. (USAT)

By Blake Morrison, Usa Today

USA Today, July 5, 2005

"Despite my many flaws, I still hope that you can find it in your loving selfless heart to forgive me. … And even though I cannot apologize for being who I am and expressing myself in the way that I did, it troubles me greatly that you had to experience any hardships because of my deeds."

SARASOTA, Fla. — Pat Rudolph reads the Mother's Day card from her son, the second youngest of six children. It feels so different from the others she opened this year. It came from prison, for one, and from a man she now struggles to understand.

He even signed it as a stranger might, with a middle initial and last name affixed to his first: "Your wayward son, Eric R. Rudolph."

She is 77 now, but these days, she feels years older — far more tired than when Eric Rudolph vanished into the mountains of North Carolina in 1998 and she feared she never would see him again. At least then she had his innocence to sustain her. That's what she believed, anyway.

The boy she raised would never do what the government said he had done: kill two people and wound more than a hundred by bombing two abortion clinics, a gay nightclub and the 1996 Summer Olympics in Atlanta. The man who did that, who hid a bomb in a backpack and sent masonry nails tearing through the Olympic crowd, couldn't be her son. She had reared him as a pacifist. No matter his views, he would never hurt others.

Then she heard the news in April. Her son would plead guilty to everything. To killing the off-duty police officer outside the clinic in Birmingham, Ala. To killing the woman at the Olympics. To maiming so many others.

Eric Rudolph, now 38, had confessed in exchange for four life sentences without parole. He would not be tried. He would not face death. He is scheduled to be sentenced July 18 for the bombing in Birmingham.

She hasn't seen him in the dozen weeks since he confessed; she often feels too ill to travel. And she talks with him sparingly; she cannot afford his collect calls. So she relies on his letters from jail — letters she shared with USA TODAY in hopes of showing a fuller picture of her son — to sate her need to know who he has become.

To date, he has granted no interviews and, through his mother, declined to talk to USA TODAY. When he pleaded guilty April 13, he released only a rambling, 11-page statement that condemns abortion and homosexuality and says he had "nothing personal" against his victims.

By contrast, his letters home — more than 200 pages in sloppy cursive — are cogent and well-written. More than his statement, they offer an unadorned glimpse into the mind of Eric Rudolph: why he did what he did, how he survived in the wild, and why he was caught.

They reveal a thinker, clever and cunning, who details how he fooled locals and the feds during five years on the lam; an egoist who sees himself and his plight in the books that now take up his days; a zealot, unapologetic in his disgust for abortion and the government; a son who seems to deeply regret what his family has endured.

"I get more of a feeling for him from the letters than when I'm with him," his mother says. "And that's what counts. The feeling."

Since a rookie cop caught Rudolph behind the Save-A-Lot grocery store in Murphy, N.C., two years ago, Pat Rudolph guesses that her son has gained about 30 pounds.

Worry and heartache have cost her just as many, and in the past few weeks, she has begun to see a therapist. She needs to talk, to figure things out. She has even been writing a book to try to explain her son, and herself, to the world.

Eric Rudolph is a monster, an American terrorist. That's what she has heard people say. And she can quarrel with them for only two reasons: because he is hers, and because she knows him. Or does she?

"I would so much like for us to see one another before I leave this place," he writes of his impending transfer from Alabama to a prison in Colorado. "And perhaps it will be for the last time, for distance may place an insurmountable obstacle between us."

As she reads his words again and again, she asks the same question as his victims and their families: Why? Perhaps, she worries, she is to blame.

Today, Pat Rudolph does what federal authorities did for more than five years: She searches for her son. They hunted for him in the mountains of North Carolina. She hopes to find him here, in these letters.

"The latest tour group just came through: The authorities here often bring a group of people, I know not who, up to the windows of my cellblock and peek in like tourists at a zoo viewing the latest exotic animal," he writes in an undated letter from his cell in Birmingham. "I try to ignore them and act nonchalant, but I must confess I have the urge to bounce around and scratch my armpits for their entertainment."

Pat Rudolph can't help but smile. In her mind's eye, she sees him there, playing the gorilla, and his lightheartedness lessens her load. That's the Eric she remembers. The witty teen who could mimic scenes from the movies; the intense boy who pitched Little League; the son she taught at home during his last two years of school.

Even then, his humor was dry, subtle, controlled. Still, he always could make her laugh. "One of his coaches in baseball used to call him 'Smiley,' because he didn't smile that much," she recalls. "But when he did, it was a beautiful smile."

She goes there for only a moment. Then … reality. He will always be an oddity now. Always caged. Always on display.

Ask some of the victims of his crimes and they'll say Rudolph's price is small — too small compared to theirs. He is alive, after all. Alice Hawthorne, 44, an entrepreneur from Albany, Ga., was killed in the Olympics bombing; Robert Sanderson, 35, an off-duty police officer working as a security guard, was killed in the Birmingham blast.

Emily Lyons survived. A nurse at the New Woman All Women Health Care Clinic in Birmingham, she was blinded and crippled when the nails from a Rudolph bomb tore through her in 1998. The day of the bombing, she says, Eric Rudolph "decided to be God." She is angry that prosecutors cut Rudolph a deal. "He deserves to die," she says.

Since the blast seven years ago, Lyons, now 48, has had 21 operations. On her face. On her neck. On her legs. Almost everywhere. Her left eye is plastic; damage to her right keeps her from driving at night.

"That poor girl's been through it," Pat Rudolph says. "But what can I say that's going to heal her broken heart and broken body? Only that I'm sorry that my son did this thing. … The apology really needs to come from my son."

In his letters, Rudolph shows no such inclination. In one, sent about a week after the guilty plea, he becomes introspective about his choice to turn violent. It is the only clue in the letters about why he took this course, but his soul-searching seems no more than an intellectual exercise.

"Perhaps I should have found a peaceful outlet for my opposition to the government in Washington: maybe I should have been a lawyer and fought (for) decency in the face of this rotten system; perhaps I could have taken up teaching and sought to inculcate a healthy outlook in a decidedly unhealthy society," he writes. "But I didn't do any of these things, and I resorted to force to have my voice heard. However wrongheaded my tactical decision to resort to violence may have been, morally speaking my actions were justified."

The words pain Pat Rudolph, and she reacts like any mother might. She loves her son but hates his manner. And she believes — because it gives her strength — that some day her son will grow wiser.

"Many good people continue to send me money and books," Rudolph writes in an undated letter. "Most of them have, of course, an agenda; mostly born-again Christians looking to save my soul. I suppose the assumption is made that because I'm in here I must be a 'sinner' in need of salvation, and they would be glad to sell me a ticket to heaven, hawking this salvation like peanuts at a ballgame. I do appreciate their charity, but I could really do without the condescension. They have been so nice I would hate to break it to them that I really prefer Nietzsche to the Bible."

He took two years to tell his mother he was guilty. She heard it first from an assistant to one of his lawyers. Then she wept. "My heart sank," she remembers. "I didn't know what to do. What could I do? What could I say?" She managed only a few words to the assistant: "It's hard for me to believe this."

But a part of her knew, she says now. A part of her sensed it the first time she hugged him after he was caught on May 31, 2003. "I felt he was uneasy," she recalls. "It wasn't his usual grab-and-hug-you sort of thing." She never did ask him whether he'd done the bombings. She still hasn't. The phone calls and visits are monitored, the letters read by others.

With his guilty plea, however, his letters home changed, and he began to tell of his reasoning and of his crimes. "I don't believe that a government that sanctions, protects and promotes the murder of 50 million unborn children in the heinous practice of abortion has the moral authority to judge a man for murder," he writes in a letter she received April 21.

As Pat Rudolph reads those letters, she bridles at his righteous indignation. It is not her way.

His mother, who once studied to be a nun and joined with activist and pacifist Dorothy Day and the Catholic Workers Party in the 1950s, now sees herself as a libertarian. She once chose the words "anarchist" to describe her views but now believes in a limited government. Her Christian faith is more spiritual than religious, more about meditation than about prayer.

And as for abortion, Eric Rudolph's mother believes the decision belongs to the woman, not to the government.

She sees how her son views religion — not spiritually, but as a scholar might — and she thinks that's how he reconciles his actions.

Like the Koran to Muslim terrorists, parts of the Bible have been commandeered by her son to justify the unjustifiable, she says. As she explains, "You can find a scripture in there to suit anything."

Even so, for Eric Rudolph — a man who quoted a Biblical passage on hypocrisy when he pleaded guilty — the choice of Nietzsche over the Gospel is a curious one. Friedrich Nietzsche, the German philosopher, once declared "God is dead."

His mother says she recognizes the intellectual Eric, the son who spent only a few terms in college but loved history. The religious zealot, she says, is a mystery. "A lot of this fundamentalist kind of thinking is a recent thing with him," she says. "I don't know where all this occurred, because it's certainly not from me or from anyone else in the family. I just don't know where all of this came from."

She isn't alone. The man who once led the hunt for Rudolph, former FBI agent Woody Enderson, says that "no one really knew him. … I really don't know what led him to become the person he is."

DOJ_NMG_0001327

Much has been written about her husband's death from cancer when Eric was a teenager — how Pat and Bob Rudolph, Eric's father, went to Mexico in 1981 so Bob could be treated with laetrile, a drug banned in the USA. But Eric Rudolph, in a statement the day he pleaded guilty, dismissed the notion that his father's death left him angry at the government.

Another myth, Pat Rudolph says, is that the far-right Christian church in Missouri the family attended when Eric was 17 made her son hateful. The family stayed less than a year. "We were exploring a lot of things then, and it's something we looked into. But it wasn't right for us," she explains. "Just because you look at porn doesn't make you a child molester."

Her son's views on homosexuality also surprise her. One of Eric's brothers is gay.

"I'm starting Dostoevsky's The Brothers Karamazov, which is supposed to be the greatest novel of all time," Rudolph writes in an undated letter. "I've read his Crime and Punishment years ago, which I can honestly say was the best novel I have read to date. … He was tried and convicted of revolutionary activity by a Tsarist court and sentenced to death by firing squad. As he was being tied to the stake, he was given a last minute pardon and was sent to Siberia."

Perhaps this is how he views his life — a revolutionary spared from death but exiled to prison. His mother thinks so.

"I just finished reading Billy Budd by Melville," he writes in another undated letter. "It's a story about a good man sacrificed on the altar of military-legal expediency. It makes a powerful statement at the end of the novel about the relativity of history, and just who ends up being the good guy or bad guy depends on who gets to write the story."

Perhaps this is what gives him hope: that someday, his actions will be seen, not as terrorism, but as heroism. For now and to most, his mother understands, Eric Rudolph belongs among a small group of homegrown terrorists: the Unabomber, Ted Kaczynski; and the man who toppled the Oklahoma City federal building, Timothy McVeigh.

And Pat Rudolph, by the actions of her son, becomes the terrorist's mother. "I often think of Mrs. McVeigh," she says quietly. "What did that woman feel?"

"Here's a child that you fed at the breast for two years, almost …" Her voice wavers. "I'd always tried to do the right things by him, for him, and it was like a slap in the face.

"God have mercy on him," she whispers. "That's all I can say."

It is at these moments that she looks back to the letters. She sets aside the pages of dogma and picks out a few letters he has sent her. They are her favorites. They make her smile.

In them, Eric Rudolph doesn't talk politics. He tells stories of his time on the run. They are daring tales, and they leave her proud, almost tickled.

As she reads them, Pat Rudolph stops looking for answers. His words pull her back to the place where she raised him, back to the mountains of North Carolina and the chilly nights of October 1999, almost two years after he vanished.

Mexicans' Conviction Getting New Look (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 5, 2005

LITTLEFIELD, Texas -- A multifaceted criminal motion will be argued here next month, the culmination of a lengthy investigation into whether two Mexican nationals should serve life sentences in Texas prisons or -- because of prosecutorial malfeasance and inadequate representation -- their 1998 murder convictions should be overturned.

If the judge sees fit, there also could be testimony forthcoming in the habeas-corpus writ that would cast suspicion on two other men, one of whom reportedly had bragged to friends about the murder of a convenience-store clerk.

The capital-murder convictions of Jesus Ramirez and Alberto Sifuentes came in separate trials here seven years ago -- prosecutions that offered no forensic evidence and no motives, but did have witnesses who since have been accused of perjury.

The case has drawn considerable attention from the Mexican government -- enough that, one source said, Texas officials are feeling some pressure.

"With the case still in litigation, it would not be appropriate for us to comment," Jerry Strickland, spokesman for Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott, whose office is opposing the Mexican nationals' appeals, told The Washington Times.

DOJ_NMG_0001328

One Austin lawyer said yesterday he had been told the attorney general's team intended to interview some of the most important witnesses before the Aug. 2 hearing, possibly to determine strategy.

Some veteran lawyers said the prosecution cases were so weak that sanctions should be brought against the district attorney and his aides.

Lamb County District Attorney Mark Yarbrough and his assistant, Scott Say, likely will testify about their roles in the two prosecutions.

Barry F. McNeil, a partner in charge of Dallas' Haynes and Boone LLP law firm's pro-bono reinvestigation, charged that not only was the prosecution tainted by "testimony the D.A. knew was false," but also that the two men's attorneys were extremely derelict.

Among the charges to be explored here next month include:

• The state's No. 1 witness lied about seeing Sifuentes and Ramirez at the murder scene just minutes before the convenience-store clerk was killed.

• The prosecution refused to reveal -- as is required by law -- the fact that one of their witnesses, a career criminal facing charges of raping a child, had cut a deal for leniency to testify against Ramirez.

Autopsy: Head Trauma Killed Missing Boy (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

Filed at 1:11 a.m. ET

MILWAUKIE, Ore. (AP) -- A 4-year-old boy who police say was killed by his step-grandmother and left along a rural road in the foothills of the Cascade Range died from a blow to the head, authorities said Sunday.

An autopsy conducted a day after Christine Coffman led police to her step-grandson's body determined the cause of death to be blunt force head trauma, said Officer Kevin Krebs, a spokesman for the Milwaukie Police Department.

Krebs did not reveal how authorities believe the child was killed or how many times he had been struck. He also wouldn't say whether the boy was already dead when he was left in the woods, though he said the autopsy showed the child died from his injuries.

Coffman, 43, was charged Saturday with aggravated murder in the death of Matal Sanchez, who had disappeared Wednesday from his home in the Portland suburb of Milwaukie about 25 miles from where his body was found.

In the neighborhood of well-tended lawns and blooming trees, neighbors said they never suspected that Coffman, who appeared to be a doting grandmother, could be involved in the boy's disappearance. But her behavior on the day the child was reported missing raised questions.

Matal disappeared about the same time Coffman left the home, Krebs said. But when Coffman returned three hours later, the child wasn't with her and her clothes were stained with a red-colored substance.

"From the moment I saw that, I thought something was wrong," said Debbie Leader, a neighbor who shares a fenceline with the boy's family.

Holly Miller, 15, another neighbor, said Coffman appeared agitated. "I asked her if she was OK. She was just sitting there crying," Miller said.

Krebs confirmed that Coffman had a red residue on her clothes but declined to say whether it was blood.

Coffman was questioned while neighbors and authorities spent days searching for the boy. It wasn't until Saturday that she led detectives to the body near the town of Estacada in an area blanketed in heavy brush.

"The sad part is your family is the one you're supposed to be safest with," said Chuck Brittle, 46, a commercial flower grower, whose house lies a few miles away from where the body was found.

Coffman is being held without bail and is scheduled to be arraigned on Tuesday in Clackamas County Court. It wasn't immediately known if she had an attorney who could comment. The family wasn't at the home, which was cordoned off by police tape Sunday.

Human Remains Found In Missing Boy Search (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

COEUR D'ALENE, Idaho (AP) -- Seven weeks to the day after Shasta and Dylan Groene were reported missing, Shasta was seen cuddling in the arms of her father, while authorities said they had found human remains that might be her missing 9-year-old brother.

Kootenai County Sheriff Rocky Watson said Monday that "possible" human remains had been found at a site in western Montana, and would be sent to the FBI crime lab in Virginia for DNA analysis. That is expected to take three days.

Watson declined to answer questions, but the fact that he called a press conference at the place where reporters were following the Groene story indicated officials believe the remains were related.

"Unfortunately we believe Dylan to be deceased," Sheriff's Capt. Ben Wolfinger said after Watson's announcement. But until the remains are identified, they could not be certain, he said.

Dylan and Shasta, 8, had been missing since May 16, when the bound and bludgeoned bodies of their mother, older brother and mother's boyfriend were found at their rural home near here. Shasta was spotted by employees and customers early Saturday morning eating breakfast with a man at a Denny's restaurant in Coeur d'Alene.

Officers arrested the man, Joseph Edward Duncan III, 42, on suspicion of kidnapping and other charges. Duncan, from Fargo, N.D., is a violent sexual predator who has spent much of his adult life in prison.

Authorities planned to formally charge Duncan with kidnapping and being a fugitive from justice, and have said more charges were possible. A judge ruled Monday that there was probable cause to keep Duncan in jail until an initial court appearance Tuesday.

The sheriff's office released a photograph showing a smiling Shasta hugging her father Steve at Kootenai Medical Center. Another photo showed her holding a doll. The photos do not show any apparent injuries from her nearly six weeks of captivity.

"She's a much happier little girl right now," Wolfinger said, adding she was listed in good condition.

Officers have interviewed the girl a couple of times, but details of what happened to the children are agonizingly slow in coming. Duncan has refused to cooperate, officials said.

Major questions include: Was Duncan involved in the three initial slayings? Have the children been with him the whole time? And, if so, where have they been hiding?

"We've got a lot of questions left unanswered," Wolfinger said, and some 60 investigators from the local area, the Idaho State Patrol and the FBI are working the case.

Authorities have relied on information from Shasta, evidence from Duncan's stolen red Jeep Cherokee and some 100 new tips from the public in the search for the boy. The tips have poured in since photos of Duncan and the Jeep were released, and many are "vehicle-specific and Duncan-specific," Wolfinger said.

Watson said the remains were found at "one of the possible locations in western Montana," but did not elaborate about the site.

"Investigators continue to follow all of the other leads in this complex case," Watson said. "This case continues to be the No. 1 priority for all agencies involved."

Shasta has provided helpful information, but Wolfinger declined to say exactly what the girl was telling officers. "It's a slow process with Shasta," he said. "We're taking that very slowly."

The children were declared missing when authorities arrived at their home May 16 and found the bodies of their mother, Brenda Groene, 40, brother Slade Groene, 13, and their mother's boyfriend, Mark McKenzie, 37.

Authorities believe Duncan and the children remained in the Northwest during the past seven weeks, but Wolfinger declined to say where. He also would not say if there was any evidence others were accompanying Duncan.

Steven Groene on Sunday night spoke publicly for the first time about being reunited with his daughter, and thanked the community for its support. He said his daughter was watching movies and had a vanilla shake and pancakes for breakfast.

"Shasta is doing very well and we all are very hopeful that Dylan will come home safely," he said.

Officials have not said why they believe the Groene family was targeted. Steve Groene said he had never heard of Duncan before Saturday. Authorities searched Duncan's Fargo apartment.

Duncan, who was raised in Tacoma, Wash., had spent more than a decade in prison for sexually assaulting a 14-year-old boy at gunpoint and was a fugitive at the time of his arrest for allegedly molesting a 6-year-old boy in Minnesota.

A registered high-risk sex offender, Duncan was released on $15,000 bail earlier this year after being charged with molesting the boy. Police in Fargo had been looking for Duncan since May, when he failed to check in with a probation agent.

D.C.'s List Of Don'ts Grating On Some Nerves (WP)

By Eric M. Weiss, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

A parking ticket on your windshield used to be as far as the stubby arm of District law would reach. But now, drivers are ticketed by robot cameras, holding a cell phone when driving is verboten and no one is allowed to have more than one drink at a time at city bars. Last week, D.C. police were handing out $10 tickets for jaywalking.

Jaywalking.

It makes some people wonder whether the District is turning into a Big Brother "nanny state." With these official efforts to make urban life safer, is there danger of Washington losing some of its buzz and the organic street life that makes a city a city?

"If there was no crime, everyone had a job and affordable housing, then the city can start being paternalistic," said Kevin Cuddy, 33, of Logan Circle, who was handed a warning Friday for jaywalking on 16th Street NW, even though 10 seconds were remaining on the crosswalk indicator when he stepped off the sidewalk. D.C. police say it is against the law to begin crossing the street when the red hand appears, regardless of the time left.

In addition to the jaywalking crackdown, District officials also are enforcing restrictions on tinted car windows and cyclists running red lights. Intersection monitors are posted at key gridlock points during rush hour. Jersey barriers surround many formerly accessible buildings in the city while surveillance cameras watch overhead. Children in vehicles must be strapped into car seats until age 8. District leaders are considering a ban on smoking in bars and restaurants.

D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large) defended the quality-of-life campaign, saying city leaders have to strike a balance between making urban life safe and livable and preserving the fun of city living.

"It's not always that the government is looking for ways to be more of a nanny," he said.

Yet for some Washingtonians, what's happening crosses the line between vigilance and intrusiveness. For them, it is as over-the-top as Metro police arresting a woman for eating a candy bar in a station, as happened last July.

"For a city of liberty, I don't know what's happening," said C. Peter "Buzz" Beler, longtime owner of the Prime Rib on K Street NW and an opponent of the proposed smoking ban. He recently had to pay an electronic speeding ticket but got away scot-free when he jaywalked Thursday.

In a buttoned-down region, the District has always been the place to party. For years, the minimum drinking age was 18, and the attitude in the streets seemed to be "anything goes." In the 1990s, the city was broke and practically lawless. Its mayor was arrested for smoking crack cocaine in a hotel room.

Today, the District has $1 billion in the bank, crime is down and the mayor is a bow-tied accountant. Downtown is revitalized, and empty nesters and young couples drawn to urban living are rehabilitating neighborhoods. And as in such cities as New York, political leaders are focusing on other, arguably lesser problems.

Dean Chandler, 34, of Hyattsville, who has been ticketed for jaywalking, said the crackdown is a natural result of all the changes the District has undergone in the past 15 years. He said he thinks city leaders are trying to "weed out" those they don't want to be part of the new, gentrifying District.

"It's changing," he said. "Everything was kind of loose. But now it is less the District of Columbia and more of an American city. People with power and influence come here, and now they are changing things."

But Mendelson said jaywalking is dangerous as well as illegal. He said the city is joining in a regional educational effort about pedestrian safety in reaction to a number of deaths. Each year in the District, pedestrians account for an average of 14 fatalities and nearly 800 injuries, according to the city's Department of Transportation. Eight pedestrians have been killed this year.

Mendelson, chairman of the council's judiciary committee and a sponsor of the proposed smoking ban, said the city also has repealed rules that don't make sense, such as requiring permits for restaurants that put lighted candles on tables.

Those who study such things say the District's recently imposed restrictions and crackdowns are part of a trend of looking to government not just to protect life and liberty but to enforce society's rules of behavior.

"People are promiscuous about giving up other people's rights," said Eugene O'Donnell, a former police officer and prosecutor who is a professor at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York. "Individually, it's hard to argue against these laws. The problem is when you aggregate it. It's a creeping sort of thing."

This uneasiness could be felt during a 12-hour D.C. Council hearing nearly three weeks ago on the proposed smoking ban. Proponents cited dozens of studies showing how dangerous smoking is and how a ban would protect workers. Opponents waved other studies showing how a ban would ruin the city's bar and restaurant industry.

But between the lines, the debate was about freedom: the freedom to light up a cigarette in their favorite bar vs. the freedom to enjoy a drink or a meal without inhaling a stranger's smoke.

"In reaction to the lawlessness of the past, there is a sense that any expression of spontaneity has been wiped out," said Joel Kotkin, author of "The City: A Global History." "You don't want people smoking crack on K Street, but you have to wonder at what point do you feel like you're in Disneyland."

2 Are Charged With Murder In IPod Theft (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina And Matthew Sweeney

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

Two Brooklyn teenagers were arrested early yesterday on charges that they robbed and killed a 15-year-old boy in the Farragut neighborhood when they stole his friend's iPod, the police said.

The victim, Christopher Rose, was walking with three other boys late Saturday afternoon when a large group of teenagers approached them and demanded that they turn over the iPod that one of the boys was carrying, according to the police and witnesses. When the boys refused, one of the suspects began hitting them, said Kenneth, 15, who was with Christopher at the time of the attack. Then someone stabbed Christopher twice in the chest.

Law enforcement officials have warned in recent months that iPods have prompted an increase in thefts on the subways, and that teenagers are particularly vulnerable targets of iPod thefts by other teenagers.

The police said yesterday that they had charged Darran Samuel, 16, and Daryl Stephen, 17, with murder, robbery and criminal possession of a weapon in connection with Christopher's death. Relatives of both boys, reached at their homes in Brooklyn, said the youths had no history of violence.

"Maybe they were the two who didn't run fast enough," said Daryl's aunt, who declined to give her name.

A man who described himself as an uncle of Darran's, but who also declined to give his name, described the youth as "weak and frail."

"There is no possible way he could have committed the crime of murder," he said, but added, "maybe in bad company and not good judgment."

Police officials said that they were still searching for other suspects, and that they had not yet recovered the iPod.

Christopher attended school in Bushkill, Pa., where his parents said they had sent him with the hope that he might be safer and receive a better education.

"We sent him out there to get away from this horrible life," Christopher's father, Errol Rose, said yesterday. "All these years - seven and a half years - I've been back and forth from Pennsylvania with this boy. He didn't last too long before they rubbed him out."

Christopher and his friends were on their way to the Port Authority Bus Terminal to catch a bus back to Pennsylvania on Saturday when they were attacked. Usually, someone would drive him to the subway or take him to the bus terminal, Mr. Rose said. But since he and his wife were attending a wedding, Mr. Rose said he gave Christopher permission to head back on his own. It was one of the few times the Roses had allowed Christopher to walk around the neighborhood alone.

Mr. Rose said that Christopher and three friends - had planned to take the subway to the bus terminal, where they would catch a bus to Pennsylvania, arriving in time to watch a fireworks display. Traveling with Christopher were Kenneth and two brothers, Richard, 15, and Jonathan, 11, whose mother asked that their last name be withheld.

"Don't talk to strangers; if you need to talk to anybody, talk to someone in uniform," Mr. Rose recalled saying. He called Christopher back to emphasize his point. "Did you hear what I said?" he asked.

Christopher was stabbed to death just a few minutes later on 40th Street near Avenue D, a block and a half from his home.

Several teenagers approached Christopher and his three friends just after they began walking on Avenue D. Richard was showing Kenneth his iPod when one of the older boys approached them and demanded it, Kenneth said. Richard handed the iPod to Jonathan before turning back toward the Rose home. Several teenagers in another group, some riding bikes, began approaching them.

"There were like 15 or 20 of them, and there were more coming," Kenneth said yesterday. He spoke in front of the Rose family home with his back facing the news cameras, hiding his swollen and bruised right eye. "We were trying to get away."

Kenneth said that when he turned around to check on his friends, Christopher and Richard were fighting more than a dozen boys. The suspects then took the iPod, Kenneth's cellphone and Christopher's sneakers before running off.

At some point during the fight, Christopher was stabbed twice in the chest, and fell to the ground. "I can't think," Kenneth said. "Me and him were like brothers."

"I'm mad I can't do anything about it," he added.

The two were so close that their mothers were hesitant to separate them for the summer, so Kenneth, whose family lives in Pennsylvania, had planned to live with the Rose family in Brooklyn. The two were to help Christopher's mother at a social service agency for disabled children in East New York where she works, family members said.

Christopher had three older sisters. During the school year, he often returned to New York for weekends and holidays, his parents said. He spent a lot of time at the Brooklyn Tabernacle church, where he played basketball and participated in a youth group.

Family and friends poured into the Rose home yesterday, many coming from the church. They gathered inside the family's two-story home, some praying and some crying.

Many said Christopher was shy. A recent report card suggested that he speak up more in class.

"My husband was afraid the city was too rough for him," Sharon Rose, Christopher's mother, said. "Should I have stayed home yesterday? Should he have stayed down there for the summer? All kind of choices pop into your head."

Carjackers Have Pr. George's Residents Driving Scared (WP)

By Avis Thomas-lester

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

Prince George's County resident Synetra Mendheim and her father, Terry, had noticed the car as they headed toward her white Mazda Millenia that Sunday morning, but they thought the men inside were waiting for a parking place.

It was 3:30 a.m., and Synetra Mendheim, 25, was going to Reagan National Airport for a flight to South Africa, where she would join other missionaries from her church to work with young AIDS patients. Terry had driven up from Virginia Beach to drive her to the airport. The plan was for Terry, in his late-model Mercedes, to follow Synetra to her mother's house nearby in Fort Washington, where she would drop off the Mazda and give one last kiss to her baby daughter, Kaylan, who had spent the night at her grandmother's house.

As Synetra Mendheim reached for her keys, three car doors opened and a shotgun cocked.

"Get on the ground! Get on the ground!" a man shouted, pointing the gun at her father. Synetra froze. Terry got on the ground and called her name.

"I thought, 'This cannot be happening,' " Synetra Mendheim said in an interview. "When my dad called my name, it snapped me back. I lay on the ground in an almost fetal position. I was so scared. I just wanted to curl into a ball so that I could protect myself."

DOJ_NMG_0001333

The April 24 carjacking, in the 7200 block of Jaywick Avenue in Fort Washington, was among 337 such crimes reported in Prince George's County as of June 30, a 47 percent jump from the 229 carjackings reported at the same time last year. In 2004, Prince George's reported the highest number of carjackings in Maryland: 563, compared with 492 for all of the state's other jurisdictions combined.

As police officials try to combat the problem, some county residents look over their shoulders in parking lots and curtail activities for fear that they will become the next victim. They avoid gas stations and limit nighttime trips to the grocery store and mall. They dig for their keys before they leave their offices and watch who lurks near their homes before they pull into their driveways or parking spaces.

"When I come home, I keep my car doors locked while the garage door goes down," said Mitchellville resident Ann Powell, a professor at Gallaudet University. "I don't get out of my car until the garage door is all the way down."

Mark Ricks, 38, of Laurel, a Web site designer, said he is careful about driving in areas where a number of people loiter, parks where other people can see him and is more apprehensive in parking garages.

"And I make it a habit to lock my doors when I first get into my car -- even before I put on my seat belt," he said. "I'm not going to say that I take an extra minute when going into the parking lot t0 look around, but it is kind of scary."

Law enforcement officials say they are working on solutions and acknowledge that concerns about carjacking, like other violent crimes, have affected some residents' quality of life.

"Carjacking is one of the highest priorities, along with homicides and other violent crimes," said Vernon R. Herron, the county public safety director. "It's terrifying. When someone is carjacked at gunpoint or by force, they are traumatized. It is something they will always remember."

Synetra Mendheim, who works as a receptionist at a Northwest Washington law firm, worries when she returns home from Bible study classes. After a recent evening out with girlfriends in Georgetown, she made all of them spend the night when they got back to her apartment for fear that they would meet up with carjackers in the parking lot. She was especially worried because police said that another man was carjacked a few minutes after she was on April 24 and that several other armed car thefts have occurred in the area.

"We got back to my apartment, but then we talked and hung out, so by the time they were ready to leave, it was almost 3 a.m., about the time I got carjacked," she said. "I said, 'Nobody is going anywhere. You're all staying right here.' "

She and her sister, Charlise Mendheim, 28, who shares the apartment, also refuse to get out of their cars if anyone is nearby on foot or in a car when they get home.

"We have a pact that if we see anybody, we ride around and then come back," said Synetra Mendheim. "We don't get out of the car while anybody is waiting and while anybody is standing around."

Averyl Bailey, 33, whose 2002 gold Land Rover Discovery was carjacked in the 8600 block of Devon Drive in Fort Washington as she returned home from choir practice June 20, said she no longer checks her mailbox at night. She was at the box, down the hill from her home, about 10:45 p.m. when a red car pulled up and three men approached her -- two of them armed with handguns.

Police are investigating the case as possibly connected to a gang of violent car thieves suspected in at least three carjackings in Clinton and Hyattsville since June 18. At some scenes, the men left in a silver Nissan Altima, which has subsequently been recovered in the District.

Detectives are also investigating carjacking as the motive in at least one unsolved homicide. They declined to identify the case.

Herron said the county's carjacking victims "cross every socioeconomic line." Victims who have been carjacked in recent months include an off-duty police officer whose silver 1995 Chevrolet Caprice was stolen at gunpoint about 6 p.m. June 18 in the 8000 block of Mike Shapiro Drive in Clinton.

In several cases, the carjackers have abducted car owners and resorted to violence. In one recent carjacking, a man who came to the aid of his girlfriend was shot. In March, a man standing next to his 2000 Toyota Avalon in the 2700 block of Crestwick Place in Suitland was abducted by the carjackers, driven to several locations and placed in the trunk. Police believe the carjackers committed several robberies while the victim was in the trunk. On May 5, Prince George's police chased a carjacking suspect into Southeast Washington and fatally shot him.

Cars have been recovered in many of the cases. The cars belonging to Bailey, the off-duty police officer and Synetra Mendheim have been recovered. Police also recovered a 2000 Chrysler 300M that was carjacked in the same parking lot on Jaywick Avenue a short time after Mendheim was robbed of her car. Two men have been arrested in the heist of Mendheim's car, and police told her that they were looking for three or four other suspects.

Synetra Mendheim is relieved that her story had a happy ending. When Terry Mendheim could not produce his wallet, his daughter pleaded with the robbers. Frantically searching for a reason, she said: "Please don't shoot him. He doesn't live here."

When the carjackers saw her curled in a ball, one of them kept snatching at her legs until she lay flat. She prayed, and they eventually drove away, taking her backpack and her luggage, which included a suitcase of jackets donated by church members for the children in South Africa.

Terry Mendheim checked his daughter for injuries, then made her a pledge. "You're still going," he said of the missionary trip. "I don't know how, but you're still going."

As police investigated the case, Synetra Mendheim's church, the Soul Factory in Forestville, mobilized to get her another passport and plane ticket. She went to Africa as planned, two days after the carjacking.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Attorney Asks Court To Unseal Berkeley Case (CINE)

By James McNair, Enquirer staff writer

The Cincinnati Enquirer, July 5, 2005

Ever since the government seized $24 million in bank accounts from herbal supplements kingpin Steven Warshak in March, the two sides have waged war in the secrecy of sealed court filings.

That could change, thanks to a request to open the case to public view - not by any news organization but by the government itself.

The government's motives aren't available for anyone to see because its motion to unseal the case is, well, sealed. Fred Alverson, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Cincinnati, said the government is asking U.S. District Judge Susan Dlott to unseal everything except the affidavits backing the original request to freeze Warshak's assets.

"Our motion is in response to a motion by them asking that certain documents be sealed or filed with redactions," Alverson said. "Our response is that these do not fit any of the Justice Department exceptions for documents to remain sealed in a civil case. ... They (the case files) should be open for the public to see."

The government froze the $24 million at the same time federal agents with search warrants raided the Greater Cincinnati offices of Warshak's company, Berkeley Premium Nutraceuticals. The U.S. Postal Inspection Service led the raids. The asset freeze was supported by government claims that the $24 million was obtained by fraudulent means.

Several thousand consumers have filed complaints to the Ohio Attorney General's Office and Cincinnati Better Business Bureau since 2001 alleging that Berkeley billed their credit cards for penis enlargement pills and other products they had ordered for a 30-day free trial. Berkeley, based in Forest Park, said it amended its billing practices in August, prompting the number of complaints to shrink.

During the dispute over Warshak's assets, the government filed an amended, more detailed - and sealed - complaint with the court.

Warshak's lawyers want Dlott to give him until July 14 to counter with an edited copy of the amended complaint. The lead lawyer listed on the response, Martin Pinales of Cincinnati, wouldn't say what Warshak wants edited from public view.

"I can't comment, nor do I comment on pending litigation," he said.

U.S. Sues Maker Of Body Armor, Its Fiber Supplier (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

DOJ_NMG_0001335

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

The U.S. Justice Department sued a bulletproof-vest maker and a ballistic-fiber supplier, alleging they sold body armor knowing it was defective.

The complaint filed last week in federal court in Washington was brought on behalf of several federal agencies that bought thousands of vests made with Zylon, a bullet-resistant fiber. The civil suit named Second Chance Body Armor Inc. of Central Lake, Mich., and its fiber supplier, Japan's Toyobo Co., and related entities.

The suit alleges that from 1998 until 2001 Toyobo and Second Chance "kept silent as to the ever-mounting information in their possession that the Zylon fabric degraded substantially faster than expected" when exposed to certain light, temperature and humidity conditions.

The vests were the subject of a Wall Street Journal article on Nov. 15, 2004.

Both companies already have been sued by law-enforcement groups, state attorneys general, a wounded police officer, and the widow of an officer who was killed while wearing a vest.

"We think it will go a long way toward resolving the issue as to who's responsible for the issue," said Kevin Dougherty, a lawyer for Second Chance. He added the company believes Toyobo "is responsible for the problem of Zylon being defective."

Kent Jarrell, a spokesman for Toyobo, said: "We don't understand why we are a defendant in this lawsuit. This lawsuit is really all about Second Chance and the allegations made by a former employee about what Second Chance knew, when it knew it, and when it decided not to share critical information about the failure of its vests with Toyobo, the public and with investigating authorities. Second Chance was the bad actor, not Toyobo."

The complaint is based largely on information from Second Chance's former research director, Aaron Westrick, who filed a whistle-blower suit last year and testified as a witness in other suits about the company's knowledge of the test results. The company said he was laid off in a cost-cutting move. Mr. Westrick's lawyer has said his termination was retaliatory.

Second Chance marketed its Zylon vests under the brand names Ultima and Ultimax as the "world's thinnest, lightest, and strongest armor," and they were popular with law-enforcement officials. In 1998, federal employees bought more than 40,000 vests with some Zylon fiber.

The Justice Department alleges in the complaint that test results as early as 1998 showed that the Zylon fiber deteriorated "rapidly" when exposed to visible and fluorescent light. Quoting a document, the complaint says Second Chance told Toyobo that they both "must avoid even the perception of a possible problem" with Zylon. Additional testing in 2001 showed the vest's resistance broke down when exposed to high temperatures and humidity, making it less effective before the warranty expired.

"Despite this mounting evidence," Second Chance and Toyobo continued to sell them "knowing that these vests were defective," the complaint alleges. In September 2003, Second Chance said it would upgrade and replace potentially defective vests. The company filed for protection last October under Chapter 11 of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code, citing the costs of replacing vests and legal fees.

Last week, Second Chance recommended an additional 98,000 vests made with Zylon be replaced citing new research that showed they "may fail to perform and result in serious injury or death."

Cop Suits Cost $44.7 Million (FREEP)

By Joe Swickard, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, July 5, 2005

Detroit has paid out almost $45 million over the past three years in police misconduct lawsuits, with more than half that amount going to pay cases involving officers with histories of past lawsuits, according to a City Council analysis.

The payouts are a costly jump since the last time police lawsuits were examined. A 2000 study found that the bill for the previous three years was $32 million and officials warned then that the trend of big payouts endangered the city's fiscal health.

The latest report on the multimillion dollar hemorrhage comes as the city struggles with a $300-million budget crisis that's forced hundreds of municipal layoffs. Firefighters and emergency medical technicians are among those laid off, but so far no police officers have lost their jobs.

Detroit police are currently under a federal consent degree mandating sweeping and costly changes in the way the department operates. The agreement came in 2003 after a U.S. Justice Department investigation that was spurred, in part, by Free Press reports detailing the high rate of civilians fatally shot by officers and constitutionally questionable practices of dragnet arrests and holding relatives to force suspects to surrender.

The study, by the council's research and analysis division, looked at police misconduct cases that came before the council from 1987 to 2004 and found the city paid out more than $188 million in that 18-year period. The payouts cover settlements including pretrial agreements, mediations, arbitrations and judgments.

Tracking repeaters

Suits involving repeaters -- officers who have been named in more than one case -- account for more than $111 million, or about 60% of the settlement payouts since 1987.

In the period of 2002-04, settlements came to $44.7 million. Repeaters' cases cost just more than $24 million, or about 54% of the settlements.

"This is a lot of money being spent that shouldn't be spent," Council President Maryann Mahaffey said Monday. "There's a small number of repeaters and why are they not being taken care of?"

"These numbers are staggering," said Councilwoman Sheila Cockrel, who requested the study.

Detroit is self-insured, meaning the settlements come directly from municipal accounts and not from insurance companies. Money going to lawsuits, Mahaffey and Cockrel said, could have been spent on necessary services.

Cockrel and Mahaffey said repeaters' costs underscore the long-standing need for a computerized tracking system to monitor officers' performance and flag potentially dangerous behavior.

"Why in God's name don't we have an early warning system -- we have been asking for one for years," Cockrel said.

Mahaffey was equally put out: "Why on Earth -- I just don't understand it -- do you allow bad ones to remain? Good supervision means keeping track. I'm tired of hearing you can't fire under civil service. You can if you've kept track."

Not every repeater is a bad cop, Cockrel said. An officer's assignment might routinely place him or her at potentially troublesome incidents that result in lawsuits, she said.

"So I don't want to sweep up the good cops, too, but you can't get to these huge numbers without some bad actors on the force," Cockrel said.

In 2004, there were 332 repeaters in cases that came before the council. That was up from 256 in 2003 and 217 in 2002.

The report said a correlation between repeaters and settlement costs "is patently obvious from only a cursory review," and that the city on its own, or with the Justice Department, has to tackle the problem. A computerized risk-management system is required in the federal agreement. The city's progress is to be evaluated in the next monitor's report, expected this summer.

Mayoral spokeswoman Ceeon Quiett referred questions to police spokesman James Tate on Monday, but Tate could not be reached for comment.

In the past, police officials said aggressive lawyers seeking big paydays contributed to the big payouts and said the planned computer tracking would help cap costs.

The analysis, released Friday, was dogged by data problems and the report warns the full cost of bad cops is not known.

Records for dozens of cases -- many of them for 2004 -- are missing from the database.

The raw data for all of 1994 is missing, the report said. That year was left as zero in some calculations and in others, figures from earlier studies were used. Attempts are being made to reconstruct the missing information, according to a footnote in the analysis.

Holes in the data

Additionally, the report said the figures do not include payouts that were made without a lawsuit being started.

"Therefore the actual amount of money paid out by the City to resolve police misconduct cases could be higher," the report cautioned.

Mahaffey said missing data stymies reform.

"If you don't have the records, you don't have the information that shows where your needs are," she said.

The report does not name individual officers or specific lawsuits, nor does it examine the city's legal strategy and practices. It also does not evaluate the cases' merits.

However, it does point out there were three multimillion dollar settlements in 2004, the costliest year. The settlements -- $5.5 million, $4.5 million and $2.9 million -- all involved fatal crashes with police scout cars. In all, cases cost more than $22.1 million that year.

The second costliest year was 1990, with settlements exceeding $16.4 million. That figure included payouts for wrongful deaths and shootings, false arrest and use of excessive force.

Because of the holiday weekend, comparisons could not be made with other large cities' current costs. In 2000, though, the City of Chicago reported paying more than $17 million in cases from 1997 to1999 while Detroit paid about $33 million.

A Different New York (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

Yes, it was a hateful crime. And, yes, it happened in the Howard Beach section of Queens. But, no, this is not déjà vu.

Early last Wednesday a neighborhood nitwit named Nicholas (Fat Nick) Minucci pummeled a fellow named Glenn Moore with a metal baseball bat, police said. Mr. Moore was walking around Howard Beach with a couple of friends. What they were up to is not real clear and not particularly relevant. Maybe they were doing some 3 a.m. sightseeing. At least one is reported to have said he was looking for a car to steal.

In any event, Mr. Moore and his friends, who are black, ended up being chased by Fat Nick and a couple of his friends, who are white. When Mr. Moore tripped and fell, Fat Nick, according to the police, whaled on him with the bat, leaving him with a fractured skull.

The beating allegedly was accompanied by racial slurs. And some of Mr. Moore's belongings were stolen.

As bad as this incident was, it would never have risen to the status of a major news story in a city of eight million people except for the fact that it happened in Howard Beach, a nearly all-white residential area near Kennedy Airport. Howard Beach has never lived down the notoriety that resulted from the hideous death in 1986 of Michael Griffith, one of three black men who were stranded in the neighborhood after their car broke down. They were attacked by a gang of white youths who were enraged by their mere presence.

Mr. Griffith was struck by a car and killed as he ran onto a highway in an effort to flee the gang.

That incident ignited a prolonged period of turmoil that severely aggravated the already raw nerves of race relations in the city. Public officials, including the Queens district attorney, John Santucci, clashed openly with lawyers for the surviving victims. Eventually a special state prosecutor, Charles Hynes, who is now the Brooklyn district attorney, was named to handle the case.

That was New York then, when subway fares were a dollar, crime was out of control, and Gimbels was bidding the world adieu.

The city is a different and a better place these days. Mayor Michael Bloomberg could not have responded faster to last week's attack if he had been wearing Rollerblades. "I cannot stress it enough," he said. "We are going to live together, and nobody, nobody, should ever feel that they will be attacked because of their ethnicity, their orientation, their religion, where they live, their documented status, or anything else. Period. End of story."

The police moved just as fast. They quickly arrested Mr. Minucci, who is 19 and addicted to a gangster wannabe lifestyle. (He drives a $60,000 Cadillac S.U.V. and likes to cruise around flashing gold necklaces, Rolexes and other expensive bling.) The attack was deemed a hate crime, and Mr. Minucci was charged with first-degree assault. An alleged accomplice, Anthony Ench, 21, was also arrested, and a third man is being questioned.

The current Queens district attorney, Richard Brown, made it clear that anyone charged in the case would be vigorously prosecuted. And the Rev. Al Sharpton, who was the point person for the protests in the first Howard Beach case, praised the way the mayor, Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly and other officials have taken control of this one.

A singular development in New York over the past several years, accelerated by the terrible experience of Sept. 11, 2001, has been a willingness to move beyond the chronic ethnic conflict and divisiveness of previous eras. People in and out of government have worked hard to address problems in constructive ways.

We may not be approaching nirvana, and Howard Beach can hardly be characterized as a haven of racial tolerance. But there are very few New Yorkers interested in revisiting the searing ethnic face-offs of the past.

Mr. Sharpton, who had lunch with several public officials in Howard Beach on Friday, said that "the tone of the city has changed - as I have changed" in 19 years and that this incident should not be allowed to spiral out of control or overshadow the substantial progress the city has made.

He said he was concerned about the attack, which is why he went to Howard Beach. But he pointedly noted, "We're not fighting for the right to steal cars."

A crime was committed in Howard Beach. The wisest response would be to investigate, prosecute and move on.

ANTITRUST:

China Tells Congress To Back Off Businesses (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

SHANGHAI, July 4 -- The Chinese government on Monday sharply criticized the United States for threatening to erect barriers aimed at preventing the attempted takeover of the American oil company Unocal Corp. by one of China's three largest energy firms, CNOOC Ltd.

Four days after the House of Representatives overwhelmingly approved a resolution urging the Bush administration to block the proposed transaction as a threat to national security, China's Foreign Ministry excoriated Congress for injecting politics into what it characterized as a standard business matter.

"We demand that the U.S. Congress correct its mistaken ways of politicizing economic and trade issues and stop interfering in the normal commercial exchanges between enterprises of the two countries," the Foreign Ministry said in a written statement. "CNOOC's bid to take over the U.S. Unocal company is a normal commercial activity between enterprises and should not fall victim to political interference. The development of economic and trade cooperation between China and the United States conforms to the interests of both sides."

Those words, the latest rhetorical volley in an escalating trade battle, officially elevated the takeover battle for Unocal into a bilateral issue involving Washington and Beijing, raising the stakes of the outcome.

CNOOC's bid comes as China's emerging force in the global economy continues to sow international tensions over competition for natural resources, impacts on the environment, trade balances and security relationships. The deal would be the latest in a string of Chinese purchases of foreign companies as Beijing encourages domestic firms to seek new markets abroad and secure raw materials for China's aggressive industrialization. The Chinese government has urged energy companies in particular to buy foreign oil fields as China's consumption soars, deepening worries about the country's access to supplies.

Already, CNOOC's bid has taken China across a new threshold: It has unleashed the first takeover battle between a Chinese company and a U.S. firm, the oil giant Chevron Corp., which has its own deal to buy Unocal, for $16.5 billion. If completed, CNOOC's purchase -- its bid is for $18.5 billion -- would be the largest foreign takeover ever made by a Chinese firm.

But as the price of oil continues to soar, underscoring the finite supply of global stocks, some members of Congress portray China's appetite for energy as a threat to U.S. interests. They are painting CNOOC's effort to buy Unocal as an attempt to siphon off oil that would otherwise land in the United States, a proposition that analysts call dubious because most of Unocal's outstanding contracts supply customers in Asia.

As the House adopted its resolution Thursday by a 398 to 15 vote, some noted that CNOOC remains under the majority control of the Communist Party-led state, suggesting that this alone made the deal a threat.

"We cannot, in my opinion, afford to have a major U.S. energy supplier controlled by the Communist Chinese," said Rep. William J. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat. Monday's reply from Beijing reinforced what CNOOC has said from the beginning -- that the deal is nothing more than an attempt to expand its business opportunities and invest capital sensibly.

Long before CNOOC emerged with its unsolicited offer for Unocal, the United States-China relationship was already highly complex. There has been friction in recent months over China's roughly $160 billion trade surplus with the United States and surges this year in Chinese-made textiles reaching U.S. shores. Some U.S. trade groups accuse China of manipulating its currency, the yuan, to keep it artificially low, making Chinese goods unfairly cheap on world markets. The Bush administration has pressured China to allow its currency to float freely. China argues that it is being made a scapegoat for the decline of U.S. manufacturing.

Tensions also have grown over North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons. In Washington, some suggest that China is not doing enough to pressure North Korea, its longtime ally, to return to stalled talks, while propping up the regime in Pyongyang with food and fuel. Chinese officials have criticized the United States for demonizing North Korea and undermining the possibility of progress.

Taiwan is always a hot button. China claims the self-governing island as part of its territory and threatens to reclaim it by force if Taiwan's government moves toward declaring its independence. The United States is nominally pledged to come to Taiwan's aid in event of war.

The battle over Unocal has injected yet another factor into this already volatile relationship ahead of a planned visit to Washington by Chinese President Hu Jintao this fall.

But analysts say the issue has thus far produced little that could alter the relationship between the two governments, because Beijing has grown sophisticated at distinguishing between rhetoric from Capitol Hill -- where Thursday's resolution was nonbinding -- and policy from the White House, which has said little on the subject.

But whatever comes of the Unocal battle, tensions over Chinese investment are probably only beginning. Just as a rising Japan in the 1980s snapped up high-profile assets in the United States and provoked widespread American unease, China's expanding horizons are having a similar effect.

Moreover, key differences between Japan of that era and current-day China could make this go-round more combustible: Japan was a U.S. military ally and part of the same ideological bloc, whereas China is viewed by many in Washington as an adversary.

But the simplest reason for tension may be the amount of cash at China's disposal: As investment pours in and China's central bank buys dollars to maintain the value of its currency, the country has amassed $650 billion in foreign exchange reserves. China has plowed much of that money into U.S. Treasury bonds.

But the quest for Unocal and other foreign companies is being construed by some as a sign of diversification.

"We invest too much in U.S. federal bonds, and they don't make us much money," said Pan Rui, a professor at the Center for American Studies at Fudan University in Shanghai. "Now we're learning to invest more wisely, to try to invest in American companies and industries."

As Rancor Mounts, Cnooc Needs To Push Its Offer For Unocal (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

With members of Congress suggesting resolutions, special hearings and potential laws to stymie Cnooc Ltd.'s ambitions, the pressure is now on the Chinese oil company to seize some momentum in its $18.5 billion takeover bid for Unocal Corp.

The harsh response has even surprised people in the camp of Chevron Corp., whose $16 billion-plus deal is due to be voted on by Unocal shareholders in only five weeks. Amid an anti-Cnooc campaign in Washington, one person close to Chevron conceded, "A lot of it is not organized; it came on its own. It's a freebie for every congressman to pile on China."

Chevron believes that sentiment will work in its favor. The possibility that a Cnooc deal would fail to win quick regulatory approval in Washington makes Chevron's offer more attractive despite its lower price, Chevron Vice Chairman Peter Robertson said yesterday in an interview. "I think we have the better offer, and I think we'll prevail at the level we're at," Mr. Robertson said.

DOJ_NMG_0001340

Cnooc, China's biggest offshore oil and natural-gas producer, has used a light touch in public, keeping Chief Executive Fu Chengyu from the U.S. In a news release late last week, its chief financial officer promised that once the facts are known, "many misimpressions will be corrected."

Still, in Washington, an army of lobbyists led by Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, a well-connected Dallas law firm, has yet to stanch opposition to Cnooc.

Friday, the company filed a preliminary notice of its deal with the U.S. foreign-acquisition panel, called the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. Seeking a review before Unocal and Cnooc have agreed to final terms is an unusual maneuver, but not without precedent. By law, the committee, known as CFIUS, is required to ask Unocal to submit its views on the matter, though Unocal had no role in Cnooc's initial notice, which consisted mainly of basic information such as annual reports and securities filings. A person close to Cnooc said the filing "sends a message to the government and to Unocal, that we will do everything we can to get this process started."

Todd M. Malan, executive director of the Organization for International Investment, a trade group of foreign companies with U.S. subsidiaries, says Cnooc's filing for a CFIUS review is smart strategically. "They are advancing their cause in a pretty zealous way," he says. "One of the main points that Chevron has been making is that the [CFIUS] process is long and opaque. If Cnooc gets the clock started, that provides some level of certainty."

But Cnooc's eagerness won't necessarily translate into government action, because the panel alone decides when the review begins. Tony Fratto, a spokesman for the Treasury Department, which runs the committee, has said that "CFIUS does not provide 'advisory opinions.' " It begins the process when it views "a transaction is likely to be successful," he said.

Congress, meanwhile, can taint shareholder sentiment by creating the impression of a drawn-out approval process. Thursday, the House of Representatives voted 333-92 to bar the Treasury from using any of its funds to "recommend approval" of the sale to Cnooc, which might have little bearing on any CFIUS review, given the bill wouldn't take effect until October, and the matter will be decided by then. A nonbinding resolution, adopted 398-15, expressed concern that such a sale "would threaten to impair" national security. Texas Republican Joe Barton said last week he would hold public hearings sometime after the Fourth of July congressional recess.

Against these political head winds, Cnooc will need to win support from the Unocal board and its management. Their blessing will be central to mollifying politicians.

Unocal is now studying Cnooc's all-cash offer, and could decide within the next two weeks, a person familiar with the matter said.

Cnooc does have some current leverage. As a person close to Cnooc points out, it would be difficult for Chevron to win Unocal given that its current bid -- which Friday stood at about $60 a share -- is nearly $6 below Unocal's current trading price of $65.84, and $7 below Cnooc's offer. "If Chevron doesn't raise its bid, we've got a strong hand," this person says.

Of course, some Unocal shareholders will want the best money they can get.

"If we had to vote today, I'm not accepting the Chevron deal," because Cnooc is offering considerably more money, says Jason Putnam, an energy analyst with Victory Capital Management Inc., one of the 10 largest Unocal shareholders. "I'm not as concerned about the Washington risk" as some are, he says.

Mr. Robertson contends that Chevron has other merits over Cnooc. Chevron has more experience and technology drilling for oil and natural gas in deep-water fields like those Unocal has in the Gulf of Mexico and in Indonesia. "We will produce more oil and gas from those assets in the deep-water Gulf of Mexico than Unocal would have and than Unocal and Cnooc together can. "

In Seeking Unocal, Chevron Ruffles An Asian Partner (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad And David Barboza

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

The last thing Chevron wanted when it made its $16.8 billion offer for Unocal back in April was to be pitted in a takeover battle against the Chinese government.

DOJ_NMG_0001341

After all, one of the main reasons it went after Unocal, a California-based independent oil company with vast resources in Asia, was to sell oil and gas to the fastest-growing energy market in the world, China. But on June 22, when the state-controlled China National Offshore Oil Corporation, or Cnooc, countered with a higher bid for Unocal, Chevron found itself in a delicate position.

Since then, Chevron's managers have gone into overdrive to portray the Chinese government-backed offer as unfair competition and to close their deal as quickly as possible. They have received support from many lawmakers in Washington, who have painted the Chinese offer as a threat to America's national security.

Now, Chevron must walk a fine line between fending off Cnooc's $18.5 billion bid for Unocal and the risk of alienating Cnooc, its largest partner in China. There, for example, the two companies have teamed up in a $35 billion agreement to ship liquefied natural gas over the next 25 years from several huge Australian fields where Chevron has part ownership to some of Cnooc's terminals in China. But now, the partners appear to be on a collision course.

Much is at stake for Chevron and its cautious chief executive, David J. O'Reilly. Since 2000, Chevron's oil production has declined every year, and the company has had trouble replacing the reserves it pumps out of the ground. On Wall Street, its share price trails its peers.

With a Unocal deal, Chevron, the second-largest American oil company after Exxon Mobil, hopes to reverse both trends. Mr. O'Reilly estimates the takeover would increase Chevron's proven reserves by 15 percent, to 13 billion barrels of oil equivalent, and expand its oil and gas production to 3 million barrels a day, up from about 2.5 million barrels a day in 2004. Chevron has said that it expected the merged company to grow by 6 percent a year from 2005 to 2009.

"Chevron wants it badly because they don't have near-term production growth," said Jay Saunders, an oil analyst at Deutsche Bank. "The fact they had to do this offer is a reflection of Chevron's challenges that its rivals don't have."

Chevron and Cnooc are now locked in a race against time - and a potentially costly bidding war - before Unocal shareholders vote on the Chevron offer on Aug. 10.

Since April 4, when its offer was formally endorsed by Unocal's board, Chevron has managed to secure the approval of both the Federal Trade Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission in a record time. Cnooc faces an additional level of scrutiny on national security grounds by the Treasury Department's Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States, and last week it asked the government for a fast review of its offer.

While Chevron believes it still has the upper hand, its deal is far from assured. Cnooc is negotiating with Unocal on the terms of its offer in a bid to persuade the Unocal board to change its position and reverse its stance that favors Chevron.

In the days after Cnooc topped their bid, Chevron officials have used harsh language to describe their longtime partner.

Peter J. Robertson, Chevron's vice chairman, said Cnooc's bid was inferior and would not produce as much oil and gas because Cnooc lacked experience in deepwater drilling.

Mr. Robertson has also taken a stab at the Chinese government by saying that the bidding war with Cnooc was unfair because it was largely backed by loans from the largest state-controlled bank and Cnooc's government-controlled parent company. The loans are worth about $13 billion.

"Clearly, this is not a commercial competition," he said two days after the Chinese offer was made. "We are competing with the Chinese government, and I think that is wrong."

But he also dismissed suggestions that the battle would have any long-term effects on Chevron's relations with Cnooc. "We are partners with Cnooc, and we expect that to continue," he said in an interview last week.

For years, Chevron officials have become increasingly cozy with the Chinese government, praising its efforts and trumpeting its alliances with Cnooc. Mr. Robertson, in a speech in Beijing last October, said that China needed to ensure a stable and secure supply of affordable energy and that China would have to invest large amounts of its own capital in energy projects, both within China and around the world.

Now, analysts said Chevron's new hardball strategy could backfire.

Chevron "developed a very good relationship with both the government and the state-owned companies," said Han Xiaoping, the chief information officer at Falcon Power, an energy consulting firm in Beijing. "I think this is a strategic mistake that Chevron has made. It should have kept the whole deal as a normal commercial activity and shouldn't have used politics as an argument."

The battle is turning into a test for Mr. O'Reilly, Chevron's Dublin-born chairman and chief executive since 2000, and his biggest challenge since he successfully marshaled the $45.8 billion takeover of Texaco in 2001. That acquisition came amid a wave of megamergers in the oil industry, after BP's takeovers of both Amoco and the Atlantic Richfield Company and Exxon's purchase of Mobil.

"Dave was a very active rugby player when he was a kid. He's very competitive, but he's also very disciplined," said J. Robinson West, a friend of Mr. O'Reilly and the chairman of PFC Energy, an oil consultancy that counts both Chevron and Unocal as clients. "He doesn't want to lose the deal but he doesn't want to do anything silly, like overbidding."

Before securing the assent of Unocal's board, Mr. O'Reilly has had to increase his bid twice already. Some analysts expect he will be forced to raise his offer once more, even if marginally, to clinch the deal.

Talks between the two companies started on Jan. 6 when Mr. O'Reilly called Charles R. Williamson, his counterpart at Unocal, to ask if he would consider a friendly takeover offer.

The call came hours after the first news reports that China's third-largest government-controlled oil company was set to bid $13 billion for Unocal's Asian assets. The bid was a bombshell in the oil industry that highlighted the emergence of China as a powerful competitor in the global race for oil and gas reserves.

For Chevron, though, it was a chance to act. With Unocal on the market, Chevron could strengthen its reach in Asia, reverse its production decline and increase its reserves - all in one quick shot.

"It's a tremendous opportunity for us," Mr. Robertson said. "The company has slimmed itself down recently and focused on four or five world-class assets from which a super-major like Chevron can get the most."

The company has had to fight for Unocal. According to regulatory filings Chevron made to the S.E.C. in June, three companies have been quietly competing over Unocal for more than six months.

After Cnooc's initial opening to Unocal in December, and Chevron's talks with Unocal the next month, a third company, Eni of Italy, also approached Unocal. During the next four months, Unocal's board rejected four offers, two from Chevron, one from Cnooc and one from Eni, all deemed too low, before finally endorsing Chevron.

On Feb. 28, after Unocal's board turned down his first offer, Mr. O'Reilly dropped out of the race. He had offered 0.94 of a Chevron share in exchange for each Unocal share.

But on March 28, two days before another board meeting at Unocal, Mr. Williamson contacted Mr. O'Reilly to tell him his board would welcome a new proposal from Chevron if it was still interested. Mr. O'Reilly put his team to work again, and Chevron made a new offer of 1.03 of its shares for each Unocal share.

Meanwhile, Eni tentatively offered $58 a share in cash for each Unocal share but never came up with a written proposal. It finally dropped out of the race because some of its executives considered an acquisition too hazardous and the price too high.

As for Cnooc, whose first offer of $59 to $62 a share had been turned down informally earlier in March, its chief executive, Fu Chengyu, decided he needed more time to consider a higher offer and withdrew from the bidding - only temporarily, as it turned out.

At Chevron, according to the S.E.C. filings, Mr. O'Reilly was told by his negotiating team that Unocal would "look at his offer more favorably" if it included some cash. So on April 2, just hours before the deadline, Chevron's board met to approve an offer that included both cash and shares.

The next morning, executives from the two companies convened to consider Chevron's new proposal: 0.7725 of a Chevron share and $16.25 in cash for each Unocal share. Talks then lasted all day and extended into the night before Unocal's board finally approved the new offer. A merger agreement was signed at 4:30 a.m. Pacific time on April 4. Hours later, the two executives announced the deal. Since then, the value of Chevron's offer has dropped by $400 million because of a 4 percent decline in Chevron's share price.

Oil And Security (WP)

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0001343

The bid by a Chinese state-owned firm for Unocal, a California-based oil and gas company, has triggered understandable concern. Oil is a strategic commodity; China has a dictatorial government. Last week an overwhelming majority of the House of Representatives voted for a measure that would impede the bid for Unocal. But however widespread and understandable, these concerns are mistaken. The reason is that China is an oil importer.

U.S. reliance on oil exporters with unsavory and potentially unstable governments is a genuine security problem. To meet global demand, all producers except Saudi Arabia are pumping oil at full capacity, which means that fairly modest disruptions -- an exceptionally cold winter in the Northern Hemisphere, for example, or an uptick of civil unrest in Nigeria's oil region -- can trigger a shortage. To stave off a price spike that could skewer the U.S. economy, the United States relies on Saudi Arabia to act as a swing producer; this gives the undemocratic Saudi regime troubling leverage. Add in the possibility that some other oil exporter -- Venezuela? -- might choose to withhold supply to blackmail the United States, and the argument for cutting domestic fuel consumption through auto mileage standards and other tools is clear.

Oil importers such as China are different, however. They have no interest in suppressing oil production to drive up prices; to the contrary, if China gains control of Unocal it will want to boost production as much as possible, which would push world prices downward and so help the United States. Those who refuse to draw comfort from this prospect argue that China might route all of Unocal's output to its own consumers, thereby depriving Americans of a source of energy. That is not actually practical, but even if it were, it would just mean that China would buy less on the open market than it would have otherwise. So there'd be less supply on the world market, but less demand also. The effect on U.S. gasoline prices would be zero.

China might pose a threat to U.S. oil security if it bought so many foreign oil fields and oil companies that it had more energy than it needed. This would put it in a position to satisfy its own consumption while hurting the United States by holding production down. But this is a far-fetched scenario. As of the end of 2004, China imported a hefty 3.2 million barrels of oil daily; by 2020, according to Booz Allen Hamilton, a management consultancy, this gap is likely to quintuple. China's stated goal is to lock in half of its imports by owning the sources or by signing long-term supply contracts. But it's not sure to achieve that ambition, let alone the far more extreme one of achieving an oil surplus. In any case, Unocal certainly isn't big enough to vault China into self-sufficiency. Its combined oil and gas output comes to around 450,000 "barrels of oil equivalent" each day, according to Booz Allen Hamilton. That's 15 percent of China's current import needs and 3 percent of the needs projected in 2020.

China's bid faces regulatory obstacles. The Chinese government proposes to finance the acquisition partly with interest-free government loans, and although this is a boon for Unocal's shareholders, some claim (almost certainly wrongly) that it violates World Trade Organization rules. Equally, some assert that Unocal's drilling technology may have military applications, so the bid may have to be reviewed on national security grounds. But however these debates play out, it's important that the temperature not be raised by spurious anxieties about oil security. Far from wanting to buy Unocal in order to gain leverage over this country, the Chinese are simply trying to protect their own economy against a future jump in oil prices. There's nothing wrong with that.

To Secure Unocal, Timing May Be Key (WSJ)

By Matt Pottinger In Beijing And John M. Biers In New York, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

In the competition to buy Unocal Corp., the prevailing bidder -- Chinese oil producer Cnooc Ltd or its U.S. rival Chevron Corp. -- might be determined by timing as much as money.

With Unocal shareholders scheduled to vote on Chevron's $16.6 billion cash-and-stock offer in just five weeks, Chevron's strategy seems to be this: Make Cnooc's bid appear destined for a lengthy and complicated regulatory review in the hope that Unocal shareholders support Chevron's deal -- even though Cnooc is offering nearly $2 billion more.

The strategy of Cnooc, China's biggest offshore oil and natural-gas producer, has been to do all it can to speed up a U.S. regulatory review of its offer in hope of boosting Unocal shareholders' confidence that Cnooc's bid -- politically contentious in the U.S. -- can win approval in reasonable time.

Working in favor of Chevron are attitudes in the U.S. Congress, where recent attention on America's trade deficit has fueled hostility toward China. On Thursday, the House of Representatives voted 333-92 to bar the Treasury from using any of its funds to "recommend approval" of the sale to Cnooc. A nonbinding resolution, adopted 398-15, expressed concern such a sale "would threaten to impair" U.S. national security. And one representative who has portrayed Cnooc's bid as a threat to U.S. interests has promised to schedule public hearings on the matter soon.

But working in Cnooc's favor is Unocal shareholders' knowledge that U.S. regulators almost never block acquisitions on national-security grounds. If Cnooc can get the ball rolling on a formal regulatory review before Unocal's Aug. 10 shareholder vote, its bid stands a better chance of winning support from Unocal shareholders.

To that end, Cnooc on Friday asked the U.S. panel in charge of investigating foreign acquisitions -- the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. -- to begin a national-security review of its $18.5 billion all-cash bid for Unocal. The Chinese company, which is controlled by state-owned China National Offshore Oil Corp. and is listed on the New York and Hong Kong stock exchanges, said in a news release it is confident that the key committee, known as CFIUS, would see no reason to prevent Cnooc from buying Unocal.

"We believe that once all the facts are known and the commercial purpose and terms of the transaction are fully understood, many initial misimpressions will be corrected, and many doubts and questions will be favorably resolved," Cnooc Chief Financial Officer Yang Hua said in the press release.

It remains unclear how Cnooc's request will affect the timing of a review by CFIUS, which could take as long as 90 days once it begins. Tony Fratto, the acting assistant Treasury secretary for public affairs, said the committee needs to see filings from both Cnooc and Unocal as well as make a determination the transaction is likely to close before beginning a review.

"A CFIUS review may begin when the necessary information from a potential acquiring company and target company is filed with the Committee, and the Committee determines that a transaction is likely to be successful," Mr. Fratto said. "CFIUS does not provide 'advisory opinions'."

That could prove a high hurdle. Unocal is prohibited by the terms of its acquisition agreement with Chevron from accepting another bid until its shareholders vote on Chevron's bid. However, if CFIUS requests a filing from Unocal, the California-based company must comply within seven days, Cnooc said, citing the committee's rules.

Keith Shugarman, a lawyer at Goodwin Procter LLP in the U.S. who has advised clients on transactions considered by CFIUS, the committee rarely takes up contested deals. If CFIUS does take up the Unocal matter, it would begin with a 30-day review period followed by, if necessary, a 45-day investigation. Given congressional hostility toward a potential deal with the Chinese company, Mr. Shugarman said he expects the committee would undertake such an investigation.

But even an in-depth review by the panel would advance Cnooc's cause from its current status, he said. Under that time frame, the Cnooc review would be at an advanced stage by the scheduled Aug. 10 Unocal shareholder vote on Chevron's terms. "It definitely increases the credibility and viability of the [Cnooc] offer," Mr. Shugarman said.

August Deals Face Antitrust Risk (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell

The Deal, July 4, 2005

The bidding war for August Technology Corp. may come down not to price but to antitrust concerns.

Although the Bloomington, Minn., chip equipment maker on June 28 agreed to a $193 million deal with Rudolph Technologies Inc., industry rival KLA-Tencor Corp., which previously had bid $205 million for August Technology, has vowed to renew its pursuit. Seeking to thwart such a bid, Flanders, N.J.-based Rudolph said last week that a combination of KLA-Tencor and August Technology would pose antitrust risks.

But while Rudolph's offer for the company is likely to have an easier time with regulators, neither deal is a slam dunk, antitrust lawyers said. The review by the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division could hinge on how broadly enforcers define the market for semiconductor testing, inspection and metrology equipment, which is used to search for microscopic flaws in chips. The structure of this market and potential customer concerns also are likely to figure in whether the deals receive clearance.

In sizing up the market affected by the sale of August Technology, antitrust enforcers will focus on the market for so-called macro defect inspection tools, which are used to spot problems with components used in semiconductor manufacturing, said

Robert Doyle, an antitrust partner at Sheppard Mullin Richter & Hampton LLP. KLA-Tencor, the leader in that sector, has about 50% of that market, with August Technology and Rudolph each having roughly 25%.

"If the market is defined narrowly, I'd suspect KLA could give up certain assets to make this deal work," Doyle said.

One factor that may come into play is the small market for macro defect gear, which is worth roughly $70 million per year. That has led some risk arbitrageurs to speculate that the government would not closely review the deal. But such sentiments are more hopeful than realistic, said another antitrust lawyer.

Neither the Justice Department nor the Federal Trade Commission "throws fish back because they are too small," he said, requesting anonymity because he hasn't closely reviewed the specifics of the deal. "Despite recent cases, both agencies look at what customers have to say. They wouldn't necessarily give it a pass if customers didn't complain. They would test the logic of what customers were saying."

Some customers have expressed reservations about the impact of KLA-Tencor buying August Technology, which could harm its bid, Doyle said.

The Antitrust Division also will examine if smaller technology makers with similar products could enter the market. But several antitrust lawyers said the August Technology merger would reduce the number of competitors in the sector from three to two, which typically arouses antitrust concerns. They said the deal resembles the FTC's 2000 challenge to H.J. Heinz Co.'s acquisition of Beech-Nut Nutrition Corp. Heinz wanted to acquire Beech-Nut so it could more effectively compete against Gerber AG in baby food sales.

A federal appeals court concluded the merger was illegal because competition between Heinz and Beech-Nut to gain shelf space, and thus to compete against Gerber, resulted in lower prices.

"Currently, smaller parties don't exert restraining power on a larger company's prices," one attorney said.

T-Mobile USA Could Go Up For Sale (WSJ)

By Jason Singer And David Pringle, Matthew Karnitschnig And Jesse Drucker

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

Deutsche Telekom AG is exploring whether to sell its U.S. wireless operation, T-Mobile USA Inc., a move that could fetch as much as $30 billion and alter mobile-phone markets on both sides of the Atlantic.

As the German telecom titan faces a huge bill to upgrade the technology used by its U.S. unit to keep pace with rivals, Deutsche Telekom's management board has been debating T-Mobile USA's fate, according to people close to the matter. The company has told investors in private meetings recently that it expects to make a decision by December.

The sale of T-Mobile USA has often been considered unlikely because Deutsche Telekom traditionally has said it saw its U.S. wireless operation as a growth engine. But the possibility has intensified on the heels of drastic reshaping of the U.S. telecommunications and cable television market. In the past 18 months, a succession of acquisitions -- including Cingular Wireless's acquisition of AT&T Wireless Services Inc., Sprint Corp.'s acquisition of Nextel Communications Inc., Verizon Communications Inc.'s planned acquisition of MCI Inc. and AT&T Corp.'s agreement to be acquired by SBC Communications Inc. -- have formed several huge communications companies that dwarf T-Mobile USA.

In addition, cable companies are expanding into the phone business, while phone companies are planning to offer television services, each offering consumers packages of numerous telecom and entertainment services, something T-Mobile USA is unable to do as it has no landline, broadband or television units in the U.S.

While that added competition could hurt T-Mobile in years to come, it could also provide an opportunity for a sale now to a cable company seeking its own wireless operations. And the U.S. phone market hasn't yet finished reshaping altogether, with some investors saying that Vodafone Group PLC's long-term role in its current wireless joint venture with Verizon remains a question mark.

Some top Deutsche Telekom executives have argued the company should sell T-Mobile USA and use the proceeds to make acquisitions in Europe instead of spending billions of dollars in the next few years to build a faster network in the U.S. to keep pace with rivals offering high-speed wireless Internet access, people close the situation say.

Rivals like Verizon Wireless and Sprint have either started, or plan shortly, to start offering high-speed wireless data services at speeds comparable to wired digital subscriber lines, whereas T-Mobile USA has largely relied on the less costly Wi-Fi technology, which has more limited range.

T-Mobile USA's small position in the highly competitive U.S. market has some investors rooting for Deutsche Telekom to sell. "From a strategic position, I would rather have them exit the U.S. market, especially when you are faced with this huge upgrade," said Theo Maas, an Amsterdam-based fund manager with ABN Amro Asset Management who holds Deutsche Telekom shares.

While T-Mobile USA has been experiencing some of the fastest growth in the industry -- adding 4.2 million new subscribers during 2004 -- it is only the country's fourth-biggest national carrier, with about 18.3 million customers. It could be left behind by the two big U.S. wireless mergers of last year: Cingular Wireless's purchase of AT&T Wireless -- now with more than 50 million subscribers -- and the pending Sprint-Nextel merger, which, if approved by shareholders and regulators later this year, would serve more than 40 million wireless subscribers. That will make Sprint the country's third-biggest carrier, behind Cingular, a joint venture of SBC and BellSouth Corp, and Verizon Wireless, in which Verizon owns 55% and Vodafone the remainder.

As U.S. cable operators and telephone companies step up their competition, cable companies still need to offer a wireless service to fully compete. Comcast Corp., the country's biggest cable operator, has had talks with T-Mobile about a wireless reselling deal -- Comcast selling wireless service but using T-Mobile's network. A consortium of cable operators -- including Comcast -- is exploring its wireless options, which could include purchasing an entire operator.

Choosing to sell the T-Mobile USA, however, could prove to be a difficult option. The most likely cellular buyer, Vodafone says it isn't interested even though the world's largest wireless carrier has long wanted to control a service provider in the U.S.

But a purchase of T-Mobile USA isn't in the cards for Vodafone, says Bobby Leach, a spokesman for Vodafone, Newbury, England. "We are not interested in T-Mobile's U.S. assets," Mr. Leach says. "We have made clear our commitment to the Verizon Wireless partnership." Mr. Leach declined to comment further.

Verizon Wireless has refused to use Vodafone's brand and uses a different network technology than Vodafone, which makes it tricky to roll out services that work in both the U.S. and Europe.

T-Mobile USA, by contrast, uses the same technology as Vodafone. Vodafone has tried and failed to gain control of a U.S. carrier before. Last year, it lost a bidding war for AT&T Wireless Services Inc.

In addition, some Deutsche Telekom executives worry that following a sale of T-Mobile USA, shareholders would pressure management to return that money to them. Germany's cash-strapped government is the company's biggest shareholder and it might push management to distribute the proceeds of a sale.

Singapore State Firm Plans To Buy Stake In A Chinese Bank (WSJ)

By James T. Areddy

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

SHANGHAI -- Singapore's state-owned investment company will join Bank of America Corp. as a strategic foreign investor in China Construction Bank, a government-owned property lender, Chinese state media reported.

A subsidiary of Temasek Holdings (Pte.) Ltd. will pay $1 billion for shares in China's No. 3 lender when the bank conducts an initial public offering, the official Xinhua news agency reported late yesterday, quoting a spokesman for Beijing-based China Construction.

Also yesterday, China's Financial News said the total investment will be $1.4 billion for a 5.1% stake in China Construction. The reports said a deal with Temasek was signed July 1 in Beijing. China Construction declined to confirm or deny the reports.

Xinhua said Temasek, using its subsidiary Asia Financial Holdings Pte., will buy $1 billion in shares at the IPO, scheduled for as soon as late this year, and acquire other shares directly from the state agency that owns the bank, Central Huijin Investment Co. The pricing reported in the Financial News suggests the Singapore investor is getting shares at a discount to the price announced last month for Bank of America's 9% stake.

DOJ_NMG_0001347

Bank of America, of Charlotte, N.C., agreed to invest $2.5 billion for the stake and an additional $500 million to maintain that level when China Construction goes public. The purchase by Bank of America worked out to about $305 million for 1% of the Chinese bank, while, based on the Financial News report, Temasek would be paying about $275 million per 1%.

The state-owned Chinese bank had net assets at the end of last year totaling $23.5 billion, Xinhua reported.

Bank of America will have an option to eventually lift its stake in China Construction Bank to 19.9%, the maximum allowed for a single foreign investor in a Chinese bank.

Microsoft Accord To End IBM Case Highlights Rivalry (WSJ)

By Robert A. Guth And Charles Forelle, Staff Reporters Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

Microsoft Corp.'s agreement to settle an antitrust dispute with International Business Machines Corp. sweeps away some past differences but also highlights the growing rivalry between the two technology giants.

On Friday, the two companies said Microsoft will pay IBM $775 million in one lump sum and extend $75 million in credit toward Microsoft software that IBM will use internally.

The settlement resolves IBM claims that Microsoft overcharged and used discriminatory pricing on sales of software to IBM in the 1990s. Included in the pact is a resolution of claims that Microsoft's practices harmed IBM's OS/2 operating system and SmartSuite group of software applications.

But while the detente was applauded by executives on both sides, it won't likely usher in an era of new cooperation between the two companies. Perhaps more than many of Microsoft's historical rivals, IBM is increasingly perceived by the software maker as both an obstacle and a threat. IBM has a strong grip on the data centers of large corporations, an area that Microsoft has targeted for sales of its server software.

The settlement excludes any claims against Microsoft related to IBM's server hardware or software business, though IBM agreed not to assert claims for monetary damages for two years against Microsoft in the server area.

But a more fundamental difference between the two companies is also at issue. IBM's growing services arm gives the company a powerful platform from which to pitch products at the expense of Microsoft's. In IBM's model, Microsoft risks being relegated to just one supplier to large computer installations managed by IBM.

IBM is also a major backer of open-source software, particularly the Linux operating system, which continues to be a thorn in Microsoft's side. Other struggles between IBM and Microsoft loom in such areas as low-end data storage, Web-based application software and network security. And though the two companies in recent years have cooperated in areas that include Web services, both are vying to encourage third-party software developers to write applications for their respective platforms.

The differences were highlighted by the absence of any announcement of collaborative work between the two companies, unlike previous agreements that Microsoft reached to settle antitrust suits with Time Warner Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc.

"This is an example of addressing one issue and we have further opportunities to both compete and collaborate," said Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith of the IBM pact.

In a statement, Ed Lineen, IBM's general counsel, said the company is "pleased that we have amicably resolved these longstanding issues."

The IBM settlement is the latest in a quest by Mr. Smith to resolve private claims resulting from Microsoft's antitrust battles in the 1990s with the U.S. government, including a broad suit filed by the Justice Department in 1998 and settled in 2002.

Among other rulings in that case, a federal judge found that Microsoft had forced IBM and Gateway Inc. to pay higher prices than other computer makers for its Windows operating system, a ruling that paved the way for the companies to pursue claims against Microsoft without filing suit.

Other companies used evidence gathered in the government case as a basis for their own actions. Sun, for example, filed a suit that was settled in 2004 with a payment by Microsoft of nearly $2 billion.

With the IBM issues resolved, "we are getting increasingly close to saying that the 1990s are finally over," Mr. Smith, Microsoft's general counsel, said in an interview.

Mohawk To Buy Belgium's Unilin For $2.65 Billion (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0001348

By Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

Mohawk Industries Inc., a maker of carpet and floor coverings, said it agreed to acquire Belgian flooring maker Unilin Holding NV for $2.65 billion.

Mohawk, based in Calhoun, Ga., beat out private-equity firms that also had been looking at Unilin.

It is the latest instance of a victory over private-equity firms, which also had been looking at Unilin, by so-called trade buyers, or buyers in the same industry. Private-equity firms buy companies with a view to restructuring them and then either selling them or taking them public a few years later.

Private-equity firms' merger-and-acquisition activity in Europe has increased substantially in the past few years, but recently trade buyers have been outbidding private equity in some big acquisitions. For instance, earlier this year, Telefónica SA, Spain's biggest telecommunications concern, beat out private-equity firms to purchase Cesky Telecom of the Czech Republic.

Closely held Unilin, of Wielsbeke, Belgium, has 2,200 employees at 12 production facilities in Belgium, France, the Netherlands and the U.S. It makes wood-based panels, laminated panels, laminated flooring and roofing systems. The 45-year-old company put itself up for sale in March, citing the need for new investors as shareholders.

Mohawk, which was founded in 1878 and has about 34,000 employees, has made 18 acquisitions in the past 13 years, expanding its range of products to include rugs and mats, high-end bath rugs and woven throws, bedspreads and coverlets. Mohawk reported first-quarter sales of $1.49 billion, up 7.4% from a year earlier. Net profit in the quarter rose 5.6% to $70 million.

Unilin had annual sales of about $1.0 billion, Mohawk said. Unilin's current management will continue to operate the company, Mohawk said.

Unilin isn't the first European flooring maker to attract interested buyers. Forbo Holding AG of Switzerland drew the interest of private-equity firm CVC Capital Partners Ltd. in November, but the deal fell through after CVC was unsuccessful in buying enough of the company's shares in a tender process.

Mohawk was advised by Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., while Unilin was advised by Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

Jury Finds For Boston Scientific In Stent-Patent Case Against J&J (WSJ)

By Peg Brickley, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

WILMINGTON, Del. -- A Delaware jury ruled for Boston Scientific Corp. and against Johnson & Johnson in a key test of patents protecting drug-eluting-stent technology.

The jury said J&J's Cypher stent trespasses on a Boston Scientific patent, which protects technology that allows drug coatings to be applied to stents, medical devices used in the treatment of cardiovascular disease.

The jury also found J&J's Cypher, Bx Velocity, Bx Sonic and Genesis stents infringe a design patent held by Boston Scientific.

Boston Scientific, of Natick, Mass., lost two earlier patent fights with its rival in the multibillion-dollar stent market this year in the same court.

J&J's cardiovascular unit, Cordis Corp., said in a statement that it would seek to have the verdict overturned, either by the judge who presided over the federal-court contest or by appeal to a different court.

Boston Scientific Chief Operating Officer Paul LaViolette said in a statement that the company was "very pleased with the jury's verdict."

Friday's decision means J&J, of New Brunswick, N.J., will face a damages trial in August, around the same time Boston Scientific tries to fend off damages in the first of the two stent patent disputes that went to trial in June.

Both of the June stent patent-infringement trials involved the newest versions of the medical devices, Boston Scientific's Taxus Express and Liberté and J&J's Cypher.

An earlier case, decided in March, ended in an infringement finding for J&J and against Boston Scientific for its Nir stent, which is no longer marketed. Damages in that case remain to be resolved.

In their bare-metal version, stents are miniature scaffolds that prop unclogged arteries open after angioplasty treatment.

DOJ_NMG_0001349

Drug-eluting stents so significantly reduce rates at which treated vessels close up again that they have almost pushed the bare-metal versions off the market.

That made Friday's finding of infringement against J&J -- the only other company with a major piece of the U.S. market for drug-eluting stents -- a critical one for Boston Scientific.

Bush To Reject Kyoto-style Deal At G-8 (WT/AFP)

The Washington Times, July 5, 2005

LONDON (Agence France-Presse) -- Although the Group of Eight has to tackle climate change, President Bush vowed to spurn any Kyoto-style deal on the "significant" problem of global warming, he said in an interview to air today.

Mr. Bush told Britain's ITV television ahead of the gathering Wednesday through Friday in Scotland that global warming was "a significant, long-term issue that we've got to deal with."

However, any climate change agreement along the lines of the United Nations' Kyoto Protocol -- which the United States refused to sign -- would get short shrift, he said.

Instead he offered up new technology as the way forward.

"If this [draft plan under negotiation] looks like Kyoto, the answer is no," Mr. Bush said. "The Kyoto treaty would have wrecked our economy, if I can be blunt."

The Kyoto Protocol requires industrialized countries that have ratified it to limit their emissions by a 2012 time frame as compared with a 1990 benchmark.

The president has opposed action against climate change since he took office in 2001 in favor of further studies of the phenomena -- despite significant global pressure that the world's largest consumer of fossil fuels change its policies.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who hosts the three-day gathering by Britain, Canada, Germany, France, Italy, Russia, Japan and the United States, wants to secure deals on climate change as well as African aid and debt.

French President Jacques Chirac said yesterday he was optimistic that a deal on climate change could be struck at the summit after informal talks with the German and Russian leaders in Russia.

"We are waiting to know the American position, which was ... far more moderate, or less demanding than ours. I hope we can find a sufficiently clear, firm agreement in this field," Mr. Chirac said.

Negotiators for the G-8 countries reportedly are drawing up draft plans on climate change.

The U.S. president said he wanted G-8 leaders to put Kyoto behind them and move on to supporting new technologies to limit global warming without harming businesses.

Mr. Bush underlined the U.S. government's $20 billion investment in technologies such as zero-emission power stations and hydrogen-powered vehicles.

"I think you can grow your economy and at the same time do a better job of harnessing greenhouse gases," he said. "That's exactly what I intend to talk to our partners about.

"My hope is -- and I think the hope of Tony Blair is -- to move beyond the Kyoto debate and to collaborate on new technologies," he said.

These would "enable the United States and other countries to diversify away from fossil fuels so that the air will be cleaner and that we have the economic and national security that comes from less dependence on foreign sources of oil," he said.

G8 Heads On Brink Of Climate Agreement (FT)

By James Blitz And Alan Beattie

Financial Times, July 5, 2005

The leaders of the Group of Eight industrial nations look set to agree an accord to combat climate change at their summit this week, averting a rift between the US and France over global warming and intensifying pressure on China and India to curb greenhouse gas emissions.

DOJ_NMG_0001350

As Tony Blair prepares to host the G8 leaders at the gathering in Gleneagles, the prime minister is on the brink of brokering a global agreement on climate change, one which explicitly recognises that science compels the world to act to contain greenhouse gases.

A final draft of the accord to be agreed by the G8 heads including George W. Bush, US president, and Jacques Chirac, French president was hammered out by diplomatic "sherpas" from each of the member states in London at the weekend.

The US continues to refuse to sign the Kyoto protocol, which sets international targets for the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions. However, the US gave its backing at the weekend meeting to a final draft accord that meets the minimum demands made by Mr Chirac on climate change.

"There is an acknowledgment in the text that the science compels us to act and that human activity contributes to climate change," said a senior diplomat from the G8, who also noted that the final text makes two explicit references to the Kyoto treaty as many G8 states requested.

Another G8 diplomat said the text acknowledged there was a consensus among scientists that climate change was taking place and that fossil fuels were an important part of the problem. "The idea is there in the text that we know enough now to slow climate change, to stop it and reverse it," he said.

Other G8 diplomats said the draft assists the US by framing the need to cut carbon emissions not only in terms of the battle to combat climate change but the need to preserve energy security.

Diplomats from several G8 countries on Sunday night warned that the communiqué could yet be altered by the G8 heads.

President Bush underlined US reservations in an interview recorded for British television last Wednesday.

"If this looks like Kyoto, the answer is 'no'. The Kyoto treaty would have wrecked our economy," he said in the interview, which was conducted last Wednesday for ITV and was scheduled for broadcast on Monday.

Mr Bush's comments underline what a success it will be for Mr Blair, who holds the G8 presidency, if the weekend text is approved. He is keen to get an overarching political statement on climate change agreed this week as part of an action plan that encourages China and India to import technologies that help reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

However, there was a setback for Mr Blair on the other main issue to be discussed at this week's summit development aid for Africa.

Most of the G8 governments are content to make a declaration that they are planning to "double" development aid for Africa by 2010. However, the UK was unable to persuade them to state that this would mean giving Africa $50bn by the end of the decade.

Max Lawson, policy adviser at Oxfam, said: "It is a step forward but people were expecting something extraordinary, and this isn't it."

Bush Maintains Stance On Global Warming (LAT)

By John Daniszewski And Ron Depasquale

The Los Angeles Times, July 5, 2005

LONDON — As world leaders prepared for a major summit, President Bush said Monday that he would not substantially change his stance on global warming to reward British Prime Minister Tony Blair for his support of the war in Iraq.

"I really don't view our relationship as one of quid pro quo," Bush said. "Tony Blair made decisions on what he thought was best for keeping the peace and winning the war on terror, as I did."

Reiterating his opposition to the Kyoto Protocol that mandates targets for cutting greenhouse gas emissions, Bush told Britain's ITV1 television that he would reject any measures that "look like Kyoto." Although the U.S. is the world's largest emitter of carbon dioxide, Bush has rejected the treaty because its provisions, he said, would "wreck the U.S. economy."

Blair is hosting the Group of Eight summit that begins Wednesday in Gleneagles, Scotland, and he has made fighting climate change and increasing assistance to Africa the top two priorities of the meeting.

The annual gathering has in recent years attracted protesters denouncing the Iraq war, globalization and capitalism. Demonstrators clashed with police Monday on the streets of Edinburgh, the nearest big city to the exclusive golf resort where

Bush, Blair and the leaders of Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia will meet. Thousands of police were being rushed to the area to cope with an expected onslaught of demonstrators.

In the days leading up to the summit, aides to Bush have sought to dispel his image as an international cowboy. His administration has announced plans to double development aid to Africa by 2010, although not in the way Blair and other G-8 leaders had proposed.

While rejecting any "quid pro quo" on climate change, Bush nevertheless acknowledged that human activity is at least partly behind the apparent warming of the planet in recent years. And he said that there may be other compromises the United States and other nations can make to reduce the amount of greenhouse gases being produced.

In the past, European leaders have been frustrated that U.S. officials have disputed scientific evidence of accelerated warming, and questioned whether the phenomenon poses a real threat to the planet.

Asked in the interview whether climate change is "manmade," Bush replied, "To a certain extent it is, obviously."

"You know, look, there was a debate of Kyoto, and I made the decision -- as did a lot of other people in this country, by the way -- that the Kyoto treaty didn't suit our needs. In other words, the Kyoto treaty would have wrecked our economy, if I can be blunt."

Bush denied, though, that he was putting U.S. economic interests above the interests of the planet.

"My hope is ... to move beyond the Kyoto debate and to collaborate on new technologies that will enable the United States and other countries to diversity away from fossil fuels so that the air will be cleaner and that we have the economic and national security that comes from less dependence of foreign sources of oil," he said.

"To that end, we're investing in a lot of ... research on hydrogen-powered automobiles. I believe we'll be able to burn coal without emitting any greenhouse gases," he said, also citing his backing for "more nuclear power."

The Kyoto Protocol took effect in February with ratification by 141 countries -- including every industrialized nation except Australia and the United States. It aims to reduce greenhouse gas emissions to roughly 5 percent below 1990 levels by 2012.

In addition to economic concerns, Bush has rejected the pact because of objections to the way it divides emissions cutbacks between developed and undeveloped countries. However, American officials say the United States is making progress to meet its own goals for reducing carbon emissions.

British Foreign Minister Jack Straw said U.S. opposition to the Kyoto treaty was long-standing and well-known, but he remained optimistic that the meeting of the summit would still yield results.

"Each country comes to these negotiations ... with its own national perspective," Straw said at a news conference. But he said it was "remarkable how far sentiment has moved in the period since the prime minister identified aid to Africa and climate change as the key" issues to be addressed.

Lower-ranking government officials involved in the summit planning worked throughout the weekend, hammering out wording on communiques covering both climate change and aid to Africa. Michael Jay, a Foreign Office official, told reporters that the weekend talks had been "pretty intense" and that Britain remained hopeful that a "consensus agreement on climate change" will be signed at Gleneagles.

The Financial Times reported Monday that the eight countries would adopt a joint "action plan" on climate change, although it would stop short of making specific emission-reduction targets. The statement would also contain language referring to a growing consensus among scientists about the problem, the paper said.

On the subject of helping Africa, the leaders appear already to have reached an agreement to raise assistance and eliminate debt of the poorest African countries.

None of the official actions were likely to satisfy the street protesters who have been gathering in Scotland from around the world in anticipation of the summit.

In Edinburgh on Monday, protesters chanted, "We all live in a terrorist regime" to the tune of the Beatles' song "Yellow Submarine." Drummers and dancers clad in pink and purple led black-hooded anarchists on an unauthorized anti-capitalist march in downtown. . By 9 p.m., 60 people had been arrested, mostly on disorderly conduct charges, police said.

Thousands of police recruited from around Britain have converged on Scotland, hoping to cope with demonstrators expected to number in the tens of thousands by the first day of the summit.

Police practiced their crowd-control techniques Monday, surrounding a group of protesters less than an hour into the march and herding them into a narrow side street before cordoning them off.

The marchers kept drumming, dancing and tossing confetti as bemused bystanders watched from apartments and offices. Some of the estimated 200 protesters tried periodically to ram through the rows of police, but got nowhere.

"We should have a right to protest in a democracy," said Erik, a Danish protester who did not give his last name. "But these (police) don't realize that."

The protesters chanted obscenities, with one man wearing a black dress and pink wig and waving a purple fan accusing the G-8 countries of promoting "wage slavery." "We are against the capitalist, consumer society, and there are alternatives to that," said the man, who gave his name as Susan.

John Knowles, a recent graduate of the University of Edinburgh who was caught up in the protests, called it all "a joke."

"They paid maybe 150 pounds to fly here, and they organized this through their broadband Internet. So maybe they like capitalism after all," he said of the marchers.

Some downtown businesses were boarded and shut, while police advised those still open to close. Certain roads were closed and patrolled by police on horseback.

Hoping to ward of protest vandalism, several bars and restaurants hung signs reading: "We are a family restaurant," and "We are not part of a major chain."

On Scotland's west coast, meanwhile, more than 600 protesters attempted to blockade a nuclear submarine base at Faslane, police said.

The protesters staged a sit-in, demanding that money spent on defense be redirected to fight poverty in the developing world. Four people were arrested, but the protest was concluded peacefully, a police spokeswoman said.

Bush Advises Blair Not To Expect Special Treatment At G-8 Summit (WP/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

LONDON, July 4 -- President Bush told British Prime Minister Tony Blair to expect no favors at this week's Group of Eight summit of major industrialized countries in return for backing the war in Iraq. Blair, who has made tackling global warming and relieving African poverty the goals of his year-long presidency of the G-8, will host fellow leaders at the Gleneagles Hotel in Scotland from Wednesday to Friday.

"I really don't view our relationship as one of quid pro quo," Bush told Britain's ITV1 television in an interview. "Tony Blair made decisions on what he thought was best for keeping the peace and winning the war on terror, as I did."

Reports that a last-ditch round of negotiations by G-8 officials over the weekend would result in an accord in some way recognizing the science behind global warming were bolstered by French President Jacques Chirac, who said on Sunday that the G-8 leaders were "heading toward an agreement."

A Canadian official said late Monday that there had been "significant progress" on a climate change text, while Britain's top G-8 negotiator, Michael Jay, said he sensed a desire to reach an agreement.

But Bush was cautious. Environmental experts said that, rather than risk an open rift, the eight nations had decided on an accord offering the barest minimum on global warming.

"If this looks like Kyoto, the answer is no. The Kyoto treaty would have wrecked our economy," Bush said in the interview, recorded last Wednesday and broadcast on Monday.

The other G-8 members are Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia.

Meanwhile, during a protest Monday in Edinburgh, Scotland's capital, a small group of anarchists sparked scuffles between riot police and demonstrators.

At least two police officers were injured in clashes, and several people fainted in the crush. Police said there had been 30 arrests related to the protests.

The demonstrations began peacefully as protesters, banging drums and shaking bells, marched and danced into waiting police containment cordons.

DOJ_NMG_0001353

The demonstrations were part of a variety of protests that began Saturday with a 200,000-strong march through the city calling for an end to poverty in the developing world, especially Africa.

On Monday, black-clad and masked members of the Black Bloc, an anarchist group based in Germany and Scandinavia that has been prominent in protests at past G-8 summits, mingled with other demonstrators dressed as fairies and clowns.

On Eve Of Summit Talks, Leaders And Protesters Prepare (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

LONDON, July 4 - With some signs of discord after a weekend of free rock concerts and celebrity urgings to end Africa's poverty, politicians and protesters prepared Monday for the Group of 8 summit meeting later in the week.

The leaders of eight major industrial nations are to meet Wednesday through Friday at the luxurious Gleneagles golf estate north of Edinburgh, preoccupied by two main subjects - dealing with climate change and relieving African poverty through changes in policies on trade, aid and debt.

In Edinburgh on Monday police officers drawn from the estimated 10,000 on duty to guard the meeting fought running scuffles with several hundred antiglobalization protesters. No injuries were immediately reported.

In an interview broadcast Monday on British television, President Bush seemed to damp any expectation that he might reward Prime Minister Tony Blair, the conference host, for his support in the American effort to prevent terrorism.

"I really don't view our relationship as one of quid pro quo," Mr. Bush said. "Tony Blair made decisions on what he thought was best for keeping the peace and winning the war on terror, as I did. So I go to the G-8 not really trying to make him look bad or good but with an agenda that I think is best for our country."

Mr. Bush is generally seen to be at odds with Britain and most other members of the group on accepting the scientific evidence relating to the causes of global warming, and therefore on the need for immediate steps to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases. Indeed, the United States is held by other group members to be the world's biggest polluter.

Mr. Bush's remarks seemed to conflict with a forecast on Sunday by President Jacques Chirac of France that the member countries - the others are Canada, Germany, Italy, Japan and Russia - were "heading toward an agreement" on global warming.

At a news conference in London on Monday, Sir Michael Jay, Mr. Blair's representative at talks by senior officials in advance of the meeting, said climate change "was never going to be an easy discussion," and added, "There are differences of opinion, particularly about the science."

Asked about speculation that the meeting might split over climate change and produce two final statements - one of them representing the United States' view and one agreed by the others - he said, "I'm not going to rule in or rule out anything."

Mr. Bush maintained his opposition to deals like the Kyoto Protocol, which set targets for lowering greenhouse gas emissions and which the United States has refused to accept.

"If this looks like Kyoto, the answer is no," he said. "The Kyoto agreement would have wrecked our economy. I think you can grow your economy and at the same time do a better job of harnessing greenhouse gases. That's exactly what I want to talk to our partners about."

His only softening lay in remarks during the interview that climate change represented a "significant long-term issue that we've got to deal with" and that the problem was "to some extent" a result of human actions.

Environmental groups said those remarks fell short of acknowledging the scale of the problem.

At other talks in advance of the summit meeting, Group of 8 countries have apparently made some progress on increasing aid to Africa and canceling debt. But trade, said Sir Michael, the British representative, "is going to be one of the most difficult issues."

In part, that is because a change in trade rules would affect huge farm subsidies in both the United States and the European Union - an area in which Mr. Bush seemed to suggest the Europeans had more changes to make than the United States.

"We've got agricultural subsidies, not nearly to the extent that our friends in the E.U. have," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0001354

In support of more aid for Africa, campaigners like Sir Bob Geldof, a former rock singer, urged the leaders to heed the voices of millions of people who flocked to rock concerts across the globe over the weekend or took to the streets. More than 200,000 people demonstrated Saturday in Edinburgh to reinforce the slogan: Make Poverty History.

"We are asking them to be great," Sir Bob said Monday, referring to the eight leaders. He said it would be a "grotesque failure" if there was no breakthrough at the meeting.

In Edinburgh, the police said that by Monday night about 60 people had been arrested after skirmishes between protesters and officers wielding transparent riot shields. The day of protests paralyzed Princes Street, a main thoroughfare near Edinburgh Castle. Witnesses said the police, some on horseback, confronted protesters throwing paving stones and park benches. Television images showed young children and shoppers caught up in the fray.

The fighting raised worries among officers about the next few days, when tens of thousands more protesters plan to arrive in Edinburgh and attend a rock concert as the summit meeting formally opens Wednesday. The police said the violence had been set off by a number of protesters, including some from around Europe.

Protesters had billed a march through the city as a carnival, but Tom Halpin, a senior Scottish police officer, said the event had not been authorized. "Those involved were determined to cause as much disruption as possible," he told reporters. "We are facing a hard core of determined activists, supported by hangers-on."

The leaders of several African countries, including South Africa, Nigeria, Ethiopia, Tanzania, Ghana, Senegal and Algeria, are to meet Friday with Group of 8 leaders.

African leaders gathered Monday in Libya for a summit meeting of the African Union, whose president, Alpha Oumar Konare of Mali, said Africa would take part in major development meetings "proud, united and showing solidarity," Agence France-Presse reported.

But, voicing some skepticism, he said, "Too many promises have been made to us in the course of too many meetings, but none has ever been honored."

Mad Cows and Englishmen

By The New York Times

PARIS, July 4 -President Chirac joked about mad cow diseases and bad English food during a conversation on Sunday in Kaliningrad with President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia and Chancellor Gerhard Schröder of Germany, the French daily Libération reported Monday.

"The only thing they have ever done for European agriculture is mad cow," Mr. Chirac joked, eliciting laughter from Mr. Schröder and Mr. Putin, the newspaper said. As for British food, Mr. Chirac apparently said, "You can't trust people who cook as badly as that."

Asked to comment on the remarks, Mr. Chirac's chief spokesman, Jérôme Bonnafont, said, "No reaction whatsoever."

Relations between France and Britain have been even more strained than usual after the collapse of a European Union summit meeting last month in which Mr. Chirac and Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain blamed each other for its failure. Mr. Blair is determined to cut European Union farm subsidies, which mainly benefit France, while Mr. Chirac and other leaders want Britain to give up a generous rebate it receives each year.

Bush Heads To G-8 Summit In Scotland (WT)

By James G. Lakely

The Washington Times, July 5, 2005

The once travel-shy President Bush lands in Europe today for his fourth journey to the Continent this year -- one of his presidency's few foreign trips during which Iraq and the war on terror will give way to the pleasantries of international diplomacy.

Mr. Bush already has trumped host British Prime Minister Tony Blair's first agenda item for the Group of Eight (G-8) summit in Gleneagles, Scotland -- financial aid to Africa. On the eve of his trip, Mr. Bush pledged billions to fight malaria and encourage economic development and political reform on the troubled continent.

But the president is expected to ignore politely Mr. Blair's pleas to join Europe in taking concrete steps to fight global warming, a diplomatic slight against the prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0001355

The Guardian newspaper in London reported last week that Mr. Blair was considering issuing a final communique that states "there is now strong evidence that significant global warming is occurring and that human activity is contributing to this warming."

The Bush administration has stated for years that there is not enough scientific evidence to prove global warming is occurring, let alone that humans are responsible for it.

"Climate change is felt dearly in Europe and is one issue where we've ruptured the relationship," said Susan Rice, senior fellow of foreign-policy studies for the Brookings Institution. "If the president is seen as not having been as forward-leaning as the other leaders on this issue, it won't do much to improve relations greatly."

Mr. Bush also is expected to push the other leaders of the eight economic powers -- which include Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Canada, Japan and Italy, in addition to the United States -- to expand their African agenda to include stopping genocide in Sudan.

"Britain has a history in Africa," said Nile Gardiner, a fellow in Anglo-American relations for the Heritage Foundation. "A tougher line from the British government will have an impact on the African countries."

The Bush administration long has pushed the United Nations and members of the G-8 to link foreign aid to the rooting out of corruption in Africa.

Mr. Bush told the Times of London last week that he "can't in good faith" continue to send aid to Africa if he "can't guarantee the money is being spent properly."

"That's just not good stewardship of our own money, nor is it effective in helping people," he said.

Andrew Natsios, the director of the U.S. Agency for International Development, told Fox News last week the $1.2 billion to fight malaria and the $400 million for education programs would go only to governments that could be trusted to spend it wisely. If that aid is needed in nations the White House considers corrupt, it will be funneled through nongovernmental organizations.

One of Mr. Bush's biggest challenges, Mr. Gardiner said, will be to get the other economic powers -- which often chastise the United States for not spending enough on foreign aid -- to share his mind-set.

"The views of the American public on the dangers of foreign aid are now shared by the British public," Mr. Gardiner said. "There is a shared concern that foreign aid simply gets squandered by dictatorial regimes.

"I expect a pretty tough message by the Americans and the British to African governments that they have to clean up their act," he said.

Mr. Bush leaves for Denmark this morning to thank that country for its cooperation in the war on terror before heading to Scotland for the three-day summit that begins tomorrow.

Protests, which were lightly attended at last year's G-8 summit in Sea Island, Ga., are expected to attract tens of thousands of people to Scotland. Organizers are hoping to build on the momentum of this past weekend's Live 8 concerts that were designed to pressure the G-8 nations to dramatically increase their aid to Africa and forgive African nations' debts.

There was little indication that the concerts, held on four continents, had any effect on the thinking of the leaders, who did not mention the spectacle at their presummit weekend press conferences.

Mr. Blair also has set aside time at the summit to launch an initiative on the Middle East peace process, saying Friday he saw an "atmosphere of hope" in the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians.

Drought Along The Missouri Divides The Senate (WP)

By Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

ALTON, Ill. -- Roger Blaske's great-grandfather worked the Missouri River. So did his grandfather, as well as his dad. But last year, Blaske sold the family barges. The river was just too low.

A severe drought, now in its seventh year, is wreaking havoc up and down the Missouri, from the river's headwaters at Three Forks, Mont., to its confluence with the Mississippi River near St. Louis. One big casualty: a commercial shipping tradition that dates to Lewis and Clark.

DOJ_NMG_0001356

"We've all seen droughts before -- but this one, it's serious," Blaske, 62 and retired, said while sitting on a park bench recently at a visitor center near the confluence.

What the Missouri needs most is a deluge of melted snow and rain, but Mother Nature is not cooperating. Absent that, the Senate Appropriations Committee is trying to alleviate the problem -- but members are badly split over what to do.

Nearly a third of the 28 committee members represent states that border the Missouri or have an economic stake in it, and they fall into two camps with very different interests: upstream and downstream.

"It's almost become a Hatfield-McCoy kind of fight, unfortunately," said Sen. Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.).

Dorgan and two fellow upstreamers, Sens. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) and Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), want to retain more water in the upper Midwest reservoirs that were built after the Depression to control flooding and improve navigation. Over the decades, the six reservoirs, in the Dakotas, Montana and Nebraska, have become a vital regional resource, providing drinking water to many communities and spawning a lucrative fishing and boating industry.

Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) leads a downstream faction that also includes Sens. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and Tom Harkin (D-Iowa). They argue that holding more water in the reservoirs would end commercial navigation on the Missouri, jeopardize operations at 18 power plants and hinder shipping on the Mississippi -- one of the country's most important transportation corridors.

The Mississippi angle broadens the downstream coalition to include Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R-Miss.); Mitch McConnell (Ky.), the No. 2 Republican in the Senate; and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.).

The two sides are using hearings and legislation to duke it out. As the drought worsens, the remedies are getting more creative. Dorgan's latest idea: a federal buyout of the barge industry, which he says is worth about $8 million a year -- about a tenth of the revenue that Dorgan says the tourism industry generates on Lake Sakakawea, the Missouri River reservoir in the middle of his state.

Last year, Dorgan and Burns tried to hold back more reservoir water by adding a provision to the spending bill produced by the interior subcommittee, which the two senators control. The full committee passed the legislation, infuriating Bond. The former Missouri governor inserted language to block the provision in the veterans affairs and housing spending bill produced by the panel that he chairs. Both bills wound up on the Senate floor, with Bond eventually prevailing.

"There was a lot of fur flying," Dorgan recalled.

This year, the upstream senators have gone after the barge industry, arguing that too much water is being wasted to essentially prop up a dying industry. Dorgan complained that a third of the water annually shifted from reservoirs into the Missouri is needed solely to improve navigation for barges. During a recent hearing on the Army Corps of Engineers, he pressed John Paul Woodley Jr., assistant secretary of the Army for civil works, who is responsible for the Corps, to reassess its Missouri River priorities.

"I feel very strongly, as do many in the upstream states, that we are systematically cheated," Dorgan told Woodley. Dorgan said that although the drought is an act of nature, "the management of the river is another part of it, and we're tired of it, and it needs to be solved."

"I am deeply sympathetic with your views, Senator," Woodley said, noting that support for navigation is mandated by statute.

What no one disputes is that the drought is having a devastating effect on the river. Normally the Missouri River system contains about 58 million acre-feet of water, but the level has dropped to below 38 million acre-feet.

Upstream, the drought is costing small towns and Indian reservations drinking water. In Parshall, N.D., on the Fort Berthold Reservation, the Corps had to extend the town's waterline to reach Lake Sakakawea. When the water receded further, residents gave up and dug wells.

A reservation at Fort Yates, N.D., lost all water for a time.

Fishing is big business on the reservoirs, but access is increasingly limited, as the water's edge retreats further from the cabins and tackle shops that once sat on the shoreline. Boat docks on Montana's Fort Peck Reservoir -- noted for its walleye fishing -- are surrounded by grasslands, stranded a mile from the receding shoreline.

DOJ_NMG_0001357

The Missouri has never lived up to long-ago expectations that it would become a principal transportation corridor, similar to the Mississippi. In 1945, Congress authorized clearing a nine-foot-deep, 735-mile navigational channel from Sioux City, Iowa, to the confluence just north of St. Louis. Construction was completed in 1981.

The Army Corps of Engineers had projected that Missouri barge traffic, mostly agriculture-related, would increase steadily, to 5 million tons by 1980, from 1.1 million tons in 1960. Shipments exceeded projections in the early years, peaking at 3.3 million tons in 1977. But they have since declined. By 2000, annual barge traffic had fallen to 1.3 million tons -- or 74 percent below the original projections, according to research by C. Phillip Baumel of Iowa State University and Jerry Van Der Kamp, executive vice president of Agri Industries of West Des Moines.

Today, the barge industry has shriveled to a few companies. In 2004, the drought shortened the Missouri's eight-month shipping season by 47 days. For the past few years, barge operators have had to contend with an eight-foot-deep channel, a foot shallower than normal, which reduces the load they can carry by roughly the equivalent of their profit margin.

Barge operators tend to still see a bit of romance in river travel. Blaske started in the business as a deckhand during summer breaks from school. After college and a stint in shipyard management, he joined the family business in 1978. Soon, he was operating 85 barges, hauling fertilizer upstream and grain downstream, to and from Sioux City.

It was during an earlier drought in the 1980s that Blaske first recalls hearing complaints from the upstream folks. On the lower portion of the river, water levels had fallen, but barge traffic was not drastically affected, because the river channel was sufficiently deep. But the 1993 flood damaged the channel, and it wasn't fixed when the current drought struck in the late 1990s.

"You ran into a lot of stuff," Blaske said. His barges were damaged, shipments were delayed and customers started wondering, "Why should we even look at the river?"

A few niche businesses cannot get by without barges, and for now, they are the only customers. One company, Magnolia Marine, uses custom-built barges to haul a special type of asphalt. The nuclear power plant in Callaway, Mo., is using barges to ship replacement equipment that is too large for rail or trucks. But the barge industry's mainstay has always been agricultural products, and officials say those customers will not return until the river stabilizes.

"We're in a downward spiral," said Mike Wells, deputy director and chief of water resources at the Missouri Department of Natural Resources. He is urging barge operators to return to the river as soon as conditions improve. "We think there's a viable navigation industry if we can get the river back."

Bond is trying to protect the barge operators but says he also represents farmers and other shipping customers who must contend with higher freight costs for rail and trucks because of the loss of river commerce. "We have to have the competition," he said. His office is prepared to pounce if Dorgan acts on his buyout idea.

Bill Would Reduce Government's Role In Protecting Species (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, July 4, 2005

WASHINGTON, July 3 - Republican critics of the Endangered Species Act in Congress have drafted legislation hedging the government's obligation to take all necessary steps to bring back to robust health any species on the brink of extinction.

The draft envisions more limited government obligations: ensuring that the status of an endangered plant or animal gets no worse and helping to make it better.

Representatives of environmental groups who have seen the draft legislation said that the change, achieved by redefining the act's interpretation of "conservation," would severely undercut the law.

The draft measure, said Jamie Rappaport Clark, the executive vice president of Defenders of Wildlife, "takes a wrecking ball to the whole Endangered Species Act" by changing its mission, disabling enforcement tools and loosening controls on agencies like the Forest Service and the Army Corps of Engineers.

But Jim Sims, the executive vice president of Partnership for the West, a group representing Western ranchers, farmers and industries, said that the draft has a "common-sense" emphasis on incremental improvements that are achievable, rather than on long-term recovery that may take decades. "The aspirational change is necessary," he said. "It's more important to incrementally improve the species' health as much as we can rather than set the bar at total and complete recovery, and nothing else."

DOJ_NMG_0001358

The draft legislation, prepared by the Republican staff of the House Resources Committee, also narrows the law's reach, potentially exempting many federal actions that are now subject to review. In addition, it requires that the authority to list subgroups of a species of fish or wildlife as endangered be used "only sparingly." The draft would automatically take the Endangered Species Act off the books in 2015.

Richard W. Pombo, Republican of California and chairman of the House Resources Committee, has long been a critic of the Endangered Species Act, although in recent months he has spoken more favorably of its goals, and indicated that his revisions would make them more achievable.

The draft legislation was given to The New York Times by a lawmaker opposed to its provisions, who requested anonymity because the legislation had not yet been introduced. It has been circulating among interest groups focused on the issue , which tends to pit environmental groups against a loose coalition of Western ranchers, farmers and business interests. Most lobbyists believe that the committee's legislation will provide the framework for rewriting and reauthorizing the act.

The law has been a magnet for controversy since its passage in 1973. It is credited with playing a major role in preventing the extinction of hundreds of species of plants, insects, animals and birds in the United States. Nonetheless, only a handful of the more than 1,200 species listed over the years have recovered sufficiently to permit their removal from the list.

The law, as interpreted by a series of federal judges in the past quarter-century, has been instrumental in blocking dam construction, ending most logging in the old-growth forests of the Pacific Northwest, overturning state or regional decisions on the allocation of scarce western water, and preventing some development on public and private land.

Over the past decade, efforts to rewrite the law failed to pass the House or were blocked by Senate Republicans, but Mr. Pombo said in a recent interview that he believed he could forge a consensus and win passage of the bill, given Republican gains in the House and the Senate in the last election.

Some of his supporters are not as sure. But Mr. Sims, of Partnership for the West, is not among them. "The prospects for some updating of the Endangered Species Act are very high in this Congress," he said.

"I think the chairman has a very reasonable marker out there with this draft," Mr. Sims added. "It's not too far to the left, not too far to the right. A number of my members don't think this goes far enough."

Environmental groups are gearing up their own campaign in opposition to the legislation as currently drafted.

They may find unusual allies in property-rights advocates who have focused their criticism on the bill's requirement that the government designate, and potentially restrict the use of, territory that is essential to a species' recovery. In a June 16 letter to Mr. Pombo, representatives of groups including the Competitive Enterprise Institute, Americans for Tax Reform and Gun Owners of America urged that the bill ensure that all property owners be compensated if their land values drop.

The draft legislation permits compensation only when a property owner shows that a government action diminishes a property's value by at least 50 percent.

On the issue of what constitutes the "best available science" for making and supporting decisions under the law, the draft measure takes the unusual step of giving one scientific method preference over another. It calls for "empirical data" - which can be hard to obtain when a species's numbers are small and scattered - to be used when possible. More common currently are studies based on statistical models of a species's number, range and viability.

The draft legislation also sets new restrictions for mapping the territory considered essential for the recovery of an endangered species. It would limit such territory, called "critical habitat," to areas currently occupied by the species; the law now allows for the inclusion of a larger portion of the species's historic range. In the new proposal, expansion of the current range is possible only if that range is inadequate to prevent the species's extinction.

"It shortchanges habitat protection," said Ms. Clark of Defenders of Wildlife. "And habitat destruction is the primary reason for most species becoming endangered." She added that the law "places almost overwhelming restrictions on sound science."

Mr. Sims, in turn, argued that some of the law's proponents care more about keeping land unused than ending threats of extinction. "This is the Endangered Species Act," he said. "I would argue that a great majority of the American people believe that a focus on efforts to recover a species are more important than efforts to lock up land."

An Endangered Act (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0001359

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

The Endangered Species Act of 1973 is far and away the most controversial of all the landmark environmental statutes enacted during the Nixon years. It is especially so among those libertarians and property owners who think that commercial development is unduly restricted by the mandate to protect not only plants and animals, but also the habitats essential to their survival. The law is up for reauthorization again this year, and the pressures to weaken it are great. There are ways to streamline the law and make it less litigious that would not come at the expense of its core values and purpose.

Regrettably, the Bush administration is not waiting for this debate to take place. Since the day they took office, Bush officials have tried to subvert the law administratively and in the courts. They have slowed the process by which species are listed as threatened or endangered, cut scientists out of important wildlife decisions, encouraged and then sided with industry lawsuits against habitat designation, and tortured the very meaning of the act to evade its obligations.

The most recent example involves endangered salmon species in the Columbia and Snake River basins in the Pacific Northwest. These fish have long had trouble catching a break. A comprehensive recovery plan devised by the Clinton administration was tossed out by a federal judge, James Redden, who found the prescriptions too vague and the projected outcomes too speculative. But the Clinton administration never tried to shirk its lawful obligation to provide for the recovery of the species by settling, as this administration has, for the lesser goal of keeping the current rate of decline from getting any worse.

Nor did it descend to the same depths of casuistry. Among other things, the National Marine Fisheries Service proposes to include millions of hatchery-raised fish in its assessments of wild fish - a bit of mathematical gymnastics that would instantly make endangered wild salmon populations seem healthier than they are and thus ease the need for protection. No less preposterous is its argument that it cannot remove the dams on the lower Snake River - an option the Clinton administration held in reserve in case all other recovery measures failed - because they are immutable parts of the landscape, like a mountain.

An angry - indeed, flabbergasted - Judge Redden has now tossed out this plan as well. For good measure, he has ordered the government to increase the volume of water spilled over the dams this summer to ease the passage of young fish to the ocean and thus increase their chances of survival. Given the dwindling number of wild salmon, he was quite right to do so. The only downside is that the ruling has inflamed various members of Congress, and some of them are muttering darkly about legislative retaliation.

This would not be helpful, either for the salmon or for a broader discussion of the Endangered Species Act. In his recent ruling, Judge Redden invited all the stakeholders - the dam operators, the developers, the commercial fishermen and the Indian tribes that depend on salmon for their living - to get together to devise a common plan.

Any discussion of the law itself should be conducted with comparable transparency. It is a fundamentally sound statute with wide public support and a demonstrable record of success. By forcing a better balance between commerce and nature, it has often constrained human behavior in ways that lead to a healthier environment for everyone. The law, and our environment, deserve far better than the guerrilla warfare with which the opponents of the Endangered Species Act have tried to undermine it.

Counties Say Meth Is Top Drug Threat (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — Methamphetamine is a bigger problem than cocaine, marijuana or heroin for most communities, according to a survey of law enforcement agencies in 500 counties in 45 states by the National Association of Counties.

The survey, to be released today by the national group that represents county commissioners, supervisors and other top county officials, finds that methamphetamine is:

•The No. 1 illegal drug problem in the view of law enforcement agencies in 58% of the counties surveyed. Fewer than 20% see pot as the top problem.

•Behind an increase in other crimes. Agencies in 70% of the counties said the drug is driving up the number of robberies and burglaries.

•Seen as the top drug problem in every area of the country except the Northeast. There, law enforcement agencies consider heroin the No. 1 problem, ahead of pot, methamphetamine and cocaine.

Meth, as it is called, is a form of speed that is usually smoked or injected. It can be quickly and highly addictive.

Methamphetamine can be made from basic ingredients, particularly cold medicines that contain pseudoephedrine and fertilizer made with anhydrous ammonia.

The survey highlights a difference between what many local officials say is the biggest drug problem and where the federal government has targeted its prevention and eradication efforts.

"On the national level, the federal government still considers marijuana as the No. 1 drug problem in America, but county law enforcement officials have a different perspective on this ranking," the association says in its survey.

Congress is considering restricting the nationwide sale of products that contain the drug pseudoephedrine.

David Murray, a policy analyst for the Office of National Drug Control Policy, says the Bush administration is developing a national response to the meth problem.

However, he says, the administration cannot neglect other drugs in the process.

Federal agencies, including the Drug Enforcement Administration, are working to disrupt the supply of chemicals needed to make methamphetamine and stop the smugglers who carry it from Mexico and Canada, Murray says.

He says marijuana remains a top priority because it is the most commonly used illegal drug, with 15 million users, compared with about 1 million meth users.

"We do have to keep all drug threats in context, which means you cannot ignore marijuana," he says.

Losing The Battle (NSWK)

By Joseph Contreras

Newsweek, July 11, 2005

The hostages were found just before dusk in three houses on the southeastern outskirts of the Mexican border town of Nuevo Laredo. Most had their hands bound, some had been blindfolded with tape over their eyes, and at least one had been tortured and had to be rushed to a local hospital. But not all and probably not even most of the 44 captives discovered by federal agents and Army troops early last week were innocent victims of a kidnapping ring. As the police investigation unfolded, Mexican authorities suspected the kidnappers and many of their hostages belonged to the drug-trafficking underworld that has terrorized Nuevo Laredo for the past two years. Some of the captives may have failed to settle debts with neighborhood drug dealers. Others were likely foot soldiers in the employ of rival trafficking syndicates, rounded up to provide valuable information. Perhaps most disturbing of all, some of the detainees said they had been initially snatched by municipal police officers who were paid $300 for each hostage.

The discovery of the kidnap victims was only the latest twist in the escalating drug wars plaguing Mexico today. Nearly 700 people have been killed in drug-related violence thus far this year. Last month, after the newly named police chief of Nuevo Laredo was murdered within hours of accepting the job, the government of President Vicente Fox launched a crackdown in three northern states regarded as strongholds of the country's leading drug-trafficking cartels. The rising tide of lawlessness has stoked fears that a narcostate, where organized crime holds sway over Mexico's political elites, might one day emerge on the southern border of the United States. "There are growing signs that the Colombianization of Mexico is now becoming a reality," says Ted Galen Carpenter, a defense and foreign-policy expert at the right-wing Cato Institute in Washington. "If a similar process takes place in Mexico, it's going to be 10 times worse than in Colombia because Mexico is locked into the U.S. economically to a much greater degree."

Officials on both sides of the U.S.-Mexican border dismiss such warnings as overblown. Mexico's Attorney General Daniel Cabeza de Vaca told the newspaper El Universal last month that the country's drug cartels represented no immediate threat to national security, and in its latest annual report on the international narcotics trade the U.S. State Department gave the Fox government high marks for "its intensive counternarcotics and law enforcement effort." If anything, say some U.S. officials, the current turf wars between dueling cartels in a number of Mexican border states erupted in response to the vacuum created by the Fox government's arrest of two major kingpins in 2002 and 2003. Parallels with Colombia, where both leftist guerrillas and right-wing militias are also engaged in drug trafficking, do not bear close scrutiny in their judgment. "In Mexico you don't have insurgent groups or terrorist organizations that are involved in virtually every aspect of drug trafficking," says Mike Braun, chief of operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. "We're getting greater cooperation from the Fox administration than from any previous Mexican government I know of."

At the same time, Braun and other U.S. officials don't try to downplay the magnitude of the challenge facing them in Mexico. Up to 90 percent of all the cocaine consumed in the United States is smuggled through Mexico. The country ranks as the largest foreign supplier of marijuana and the second largest source of heroin for the American market. More than half the methamphetamines sold in the United States are made in Mexico, and Mexican-run labs that operate north of the border account for much of the remainder. Inside the United States, Mexican traffickers control 11 of the 13 largest urban markets and have acquired a fearsome reputation. "The Mexican cartels are the most dangerous trafficking organizations in the world," says one U.S. official in Mexico City who asked not to be identified for security reasons. "They'll kill you for a dime, and they have everyone paid off and scared to death."

And that goes to the heart of Mexico's drug problem. The menace haunting the country's present and future stability starts with the letter C, but it's spelled "corruption," not "Colombia." Law enforcement is a notoriously low-paying career in Mexico, and an entry-level cop in a midsize city's police department makes as little as $135 a month. Confronted with a druglord's stark choice of plomo o plata (lead or money), many if not most Mexican policemen on the lower rungs of their agencies will opt for the bribe. "We're fine with respect to law enforcement at the central-government level," says the DEA's Braun, "but the farther you get from the seat of power, the more problematic things can become in a place like Mexico."

Nowhere is that more evident than on the mean streets of Nuevo Laredo. The city of 300,000 is the busiest port of entry along the 3,100km-long U.S.-Mexico border, with an average of 6,000 trucks crossing into Texas each day. That makes the town a highly coveted entrepot for drug traffickers, and in the late 1990s the Gulf cartel led by Osiel Cardenas began recruiting troops from a military-intelligence battalion who had been posted to the area to combat the drug gangs. The city became a full-blown war zone in 2003 when Cardenas was arrested and a cartel based in the Pacific-coast state of Sinaloa sent a large contingent of hit men to do battle with his private army of ex-soldiers. In more recent times the city's entire 724-member police force was confined to its stations last month after some local cops opened fire on a convoy of federal agents dispatched from Mexico City to restore order in Nuevo Laredo.

The city's economic fortunes took a nose dive when the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City issued a travel advisory in January voicing alarm over the recent deaths and disappearances of more than two dozen American citizens in Nuevo Laredo. The ensuing collapse of the city's cross-border tourist trade has driven retail sales down by 50 percent, and real-estate prices have also tumbled. Convoys of soldiers in black berets and armed with assault rifles began patrolling the streets of the city three weeks ago, but the casualty toll in Nuevo —Laredo continues to rise. At the weekend, more than 50 people had died in drug-related violence since the start of the year. "There isn't a single place in the city where one feels safe," says Raymundo Ramos Vasquez, a Nuevo Laredo newspaper reporter who heads up an independent human-rights committee. "The government is losing the battle against drugs, and worst of all they aren't prepared to admit it."

To date, the spillover of drug-fueled carnage across the border has been kept to a minimum. The most serious long-term fallout from Mexico's narcowars may come from rising recreational drug use inside the country. According to the national Health Ministry, at least 570,000 Mexicans use narcotics on a regular basis, and consumption of crack and powder cocaine has risen sharply in recent years. "The greatest threat comes from the person who sells drugs outside our schools and corrupts our children," says Attorney General Cabeza de Vaca. "He is public enemy number one." But the street dealer is a mere minion in a multibillion-dollar industry dominated by Mexico's ruthless drug kingpins. And as long as Americans want to buy their merchandise and Mexican cops accept their payoffs, the country's cartels will retain the upper hand.

Corruption Hampers Mexican Police In Border Drug War (NYT)

By Ginger Thompson

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0001362

MATAMOROS, Mexico - A crooked cop is the oldest story in the book in Mexico. But this country has been forced to re-examine its police as it struggles against a devastating crime wave that in the last six months has taken more than 600 lives.

At least half those killings have happened in the six Mexican states along the border with the United States, where drug traffickers fighting for control of lucrative drug routes empty their automatic weapons on busy streets in the light of day. Lawlessness has become so brazen, and impunity so complete, that experts on the illegal drug trade have begun comparing northern Mexico to Colombia, where powerful cartels took over large parts of the country by corrupting or killing police officers, politicians, journalists and judges.

Killings and kidnappings happen almost every day in the city of Nuevo Laredo, about 150 miles north of this small town. Matamoros is quiet in comparison. The most common crime here these days, the police say, is robbery. But as recently as three years ago, this, too, was a capital of the drug war. People on the street said they are afraid that it could become one again.

And here, like Colombia, society's first line of defense against the chaos - the municipal police - has proved to be its weakest.

"Law enforcement in Mexico is all too often part of the problem rather than part of the solution," said Anthony P. Placido, the acting assistant administrator for intelligence at the United States Drug Enforcement Administration, in a recent appearance before Congress. "This is particularly true at the municipal and state levels of government."

Interviews with four municipal police officers in this city of 500,000 people across the Rio Grande from Brownsville, Tex., offer a glimpse inside a reality as harsh and persistent as Mexico's blazing summer sun. The officers - a shift commander, two squad leaders and a recent graduate of the police academy - were chosen by the minister of public security, Rubén González Chapa, to be interviewed for this article. Then Mr. González allowed each officer to be interviewed alone, on the condition that they not be identified because he did not want to jeopardize their standing among their superiors and colleagues.

Not one of the officers denied that there were abuses and corruption in their ranks. They described officers taking bribes from drunks and prostitutes and accepting gifts from businessmen and residents for providing extra surveillance around their properties. One of the squad leaders acknowledged carrying an unauthorized automatic pistol, rather than the revolver that was assigned to him. And the other acknowledged that sometimes he loses his temper and beats up suspects before bringing them to the station.

"I would feel ashamed to beat up a drunk," one of the squad leaders said. "But a thief, a murderer or a rapist, I have to admit, I am very tough with them."

When asked, however, about the more egregious accusations by Mexican and United States officials that municipal police often serve as lookouts and hit men for the drug traffickers, the officers typically retreated into vague generalities. What they offered instead of the ugly details about police misdeeds was a look at where the abuses are born, describing a place sorely lacking incentives, not to mention basic equipment to uphold the law, and filled with humiliations that left many officers feeling loyal to no one but themselves.

Money was the officers' biggest complaint. The starting salary for the typical municipal police officer is less than $350 a month, better than a factory worker but less than the average cab driver. They get only basic medical treatment if they get hurt on the job. And their families get just enough to bury them, less than $6,000, if they are killed on duty.

If the officers want equipment that works - a vest that stops automatic machine-gun fire or handcuffs that cannot be ripped apart - they have to buy their own. One of the squad leaders interviewed described how he and the three colleagues pooled their money to install air-conditioning in their patrol car so they could withstand the city's 110-degree temperatures. And he said he switched his cellphone service from month to month, depending on which company offered him the best rate per minute.

Officers here said they have to buy their own bullets. One officer, a seven-year veteran of the force, said he usually goes across the border to the Wal-Mart in Brownsville and sneaks the bullets back to Mexico. The Brownsville police stopped him twice and seized his ammunition, he said. He was too ashamed, he said, to tell them that he was also an officer. But he was even more ashamed, he said, because he did not feel like one of them.

"Everyone criticizes the police," he said. "They say we are worse than the criminals. They say they want professional police, but they do not treat us like professionals. They want us to respect our jobs. But no one respects us.

"Those who love this shirt do the best we can," he added, tugging on the collar of his midnight blue uniform. "It is very hard to be straight."

When asked about the severe ammunition shortages and the bullet smuggling by his officers, Mr. González shrugged and said he had hired an ironsmith to refill spent bullet casings. And Mayor Baltazar Hinojosa Ochoa acknowledged the problem in an interview, saying: "Forget about bullets. Our police do not get good training, good equipment or good salaries." The police academy is one instructor and a classroom. And the officers said they get two visits to a firing range because there are not enough bullets for more.

"I would say about 30 percent of the officers know how to shoot," the recent academy graduate said. "The other 70 percent do not."

The Constitution classifies organized crime, including drug trafficking, as a federal offense. But there are fewer than 20 federal agents in Matamoros, a city about the size of Washington. So the first responders are usually the city's 600 municipal police officers - authorized mainly to enforce administrative offensives punishable by fines up to $40.

The two groups often do not work well together.

In Nuevo Laredo, four police officers have been killed in drug-related shootings since March, including the city's last two police chiefs. The second, Alejandro Domínguez, a former president of the local chamber of commerce, was shot to death hours after being sworn in.

A few days later, municipal police officers fired on federal agents who had arrived to investigate the chief's killing. The mayor suspended Nuevo Laredo's entire police force, about 730 officers, pending drug and polygraph tests. News reports from there indicate that almost half of the officers were receiving payments from leaders of the feared Gulf cartel. And President Vicente Fox, worried by the escalating violence and the concerns about local corruption, sent 1,000 soldiers and federal agents to patrol border cities as part of a special operation called Safe Mexico.

Still the killings continue. So do the confrontations between local and federal authorities.

In mid-June, federal agents stopped two municipal police officers here and accused them of illegally carrying military weapons, rather than their service revolvers. The municipal officers radioed for help. Almost the entire night shift, 104 officers, rushed to the scene.

One of the squad leaders interviewed said he told the federal agents to back off. "You are not going to leave here with those officers," he recalled telling them. "You are going to have to jump over me. And if you want to use your guns, then this is where I will die."

The bravado worked that time, the squad leader said, and the municipal officers were released. But more often than not, things go the other way.

He described attending community meetings where business leaders demand that the police crack down on crime - but who threaten to have them fired for detaining spouses or children caught drinking in public or behind the wheel of a car. When asked whether he had ever taken a bribe from a drug trafficker, the shift commander first answered the question with a question. "What would you say if a drug trafficker came to you and said: 'Help me and live. Do not help me, and die?' "

He demanded an answer, over and over again, refusing to say whether he had ever been approached with such a proposition. Then he pulled key chain from his pocket with a photo of his family, and he answered.

"I would tell them: 'I do not want to work with you. But I am not here to fight you, either. They do not pay me enough for that,' " the shift commander said. " 'Just do not bother me, or my family. I will not bother you, and we can all live in blessed peace.' "

Mexico Says Suspect Isn't Drug Kingpin (LAT)

By Marla Dickerson

The Los Angeles Times, July 5, 2005

MEXICO CITY — Mexican authorities said Monday that they thought they had arrested the leader of the Juarez drug cartel, but later said tests showed it was a case of mistaken identity.

The determination that the detained man was not Vicente Carrillo Fuentes dashed hopes of a rare instance of good news for Mexico's anti-narcotics forces amid an upsurge of violence.

DOJ_NMG_0001364

It was also the second high-profile error in the last two weeks.

In June, Mexican federal authorities detained a British citizen of Lebanese descent on suspicion that he was connected to terrorist organizations behind the Sept. 11 attacks. But that suspect, Amer Haykel, turned out to be simply a tourist.

Mexico's Federal Agency of Investigation reported that the suspect had been arrested at an upscale Mexico City shopping mall Saturday, said Ruben Aguilar, spokesman for President Vicente Fox.

Aguilar said prosecutors conducted fingerprint analysis and DNA tests to determine the identity of the man, who gave his name as Joaquín Romero Aparicio and who local media said had undergone extensive plastic surgery. As it turned out, he had given his true name.

Maria Romero, his sister, said, "My brother is a respectable person, married and with a family. He is an architect. They have done him an injustice. How is it possible that they have detained him without proof? I can assure you that my brother has nothing to do with drug trafficking. It's an injustice."

Carrillo's brother Amado, once considered the most powerful drug lord in Mexico, is believed to have died in 1997 during botched plastic surgery to change his appearance. Experts said capturing Vicente Carrillo Fuentes would have dealt another blow to a drug gang that had lost influence and cohesion since Amado's death. Another Carrillo brother, Rodolfo, 29, was killed by hit men in Sinaloa state in September.

The arrest of Carrillo would have been a boost for Fox, who has been under pressure from the United States to stem a tide of drug-related violence that has claimed more than 600 lives this year, many along the border. Bodies are turning up almost daily from Tijuana to Cancun, many of them bearing marks of torture and mutilation that are the calling cards of organized crime.

Fox has vowed the "mother of all battles" against narcotics traffickers, with 18 top leaders toppled during his administration. Veteran observers call that record impressive, but they say it has done nothing to restrict the flow of drugs into the United States and has ratcheted up tension among gangsters.

For example, authorities trace recent violence in the border town of Nuevo Laredo to the 2003 arrest of Osiel Cardenas, alleged leader of the Gulf cartel. Sensing the opportunity to take control of a key smuggling route to the United States, his rivals, led by Sinaloa-based Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman, moved in, setting off a bloody turf war.

Jorge Chabat, a Mexico City political scientist and an expert on organized crime, said that though the United States would welcome the capture of Carrillo, his arrest could provoke even more killing as aspiring kingpins scramble to take his place.

The Juarez cartel, which takes its name from the border city of Ciudad Juarez, flourished in the 1990s under the leadership of Amado Carrillo.

Nicknamed the "Lord of the Skies," he became a legend by ditching the small boats and prop planes used by his predecessors, instead ferrying cocaine by the ton from South America in large jets.

But his death is believed to have loosened the confederation of traffickers that once formed the core of the cartel. The killing and jailing of major drug trade figures throughout Mexico have destabilized rival gangs as well, so that no cartel predominates.

Mexico: Arrested Man Isn't Drug Lord (DMN)

By Tracey Eaton And Alfredo Corchado, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, July 5, 2005

Mexican authorities on Monday said they thought they had captured Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, one of the country's most wanted drug lords. But by the day's end, they had reversed course, calling it a case of mistaken identity.

Agents had quietly arrested their subject on Saturday at Perisur, a Mexico City shopping center. He identified himself as Joaquín Romero Aparicio, but Mexican officials were almost sure that DNA tests would reveal his criminal identity.

“Right now, it is likely Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, but it isn't completely confirmed,” presidential spokesman Rubén Aguilar said.

But late in the day, the Los Angeles Times was reporting that Mr. Aguilar had gotten the wrong man.

Vicente Carrillo Fuentes

DOJ_NMG_0001365

Earlier Monday, the prospect that Mr. Carrillo Fuentes, 42, had been arrested excited law enforcement officials and journalists on both sides of the U.S.-Mexico border. Mr. Carrillo Fuentes and his lieutenants allegedly ordered the murders of dozens of U.S. citizens and hundreds of Mexicans during a decade years-long reign of terror, American authorities say.

The State Department had offered a reward of up to $5 million for information leading to the arrest or conviction of Mr. Carrillo Fuentes, suspected of leading the Juárez cartel.

Mr. Carrillo Fuentes would have been the latest in a series of high-profile drug suspects arrested or killed since Mr. President Vicente Fox took office in 2000. Almost 200 police officers and soldiers have been killed in the anti-drug crackdown.

For the past several weeks, American agents had been predicting that Mr. Carrillo Fuentes would be an appropriate "sacrificial lamb" for the Juárez cartel. The drug organization, once considered the most powerful in North America, has been under reorganization and, some say, in decline.

News of his arrest spread fast in the border city of Ciudad Juárez, which the cartel has terrorized for years.

"This is all part of the game," said Marisela Olvera Tapia, a housecleaner from Ciudad Juárez. "Maybe he didn't pay his dues, or maybe someone had to go and it was his time."

U.S. agents say Mr. Carrillo Fuentes' influence had been waning since last year, when his brother, Rodolfo, was assassinated by killers believed to be close to the drug lord's archenemy, Joaquín "El Chapo" Guzmán.

"At the time, the leaders formed an uneasy truce that basically said, 'Vicente, you can still be part of the gang, but you're not the player you used to be. Move aside if you want to stay alive. Otherwise you will face the same fate as that of your brother,' " the U.S. agent said.

The retired DEA agent said on condition of anonymity that even if Mr. Carrillo Fuentes' clout was declining, his arrest was "still a good catch. Look at all the damage he's done."

In September 2000, U.S. prosecutors in Texas charged Mr. Carrillo Fuentes with ordering the killings of 10 people, including seven who were found dead at ranches near Ciudad Juárez.

He was accused of ordering the killing of anyone thought to be supplying information on the cartel to U.S. authorities.

But Mexican officials weren't always so eager to help catch him. And in 1998, when U.S. officials in Texas described him as "an international star of the drug trafficking world," Mexican officials said they wouldn't be able to arrest him because they had no warrants for his arrest.

During the cartel's heyday, the organization funneled $500 million per year in bribes to local, state and federal police and elected public officials, experts say.

In the 1990s, the cartel generated at least $10 billion per year in drug sales in major markets such as Dallas, Houston, Chicago and New York, according to Charles Bowden, author of Down by the River, a book about the Mexican drug trade.

Until 1997, the group's leader was Mr. Carrillo Fuentes' older brother, Amado, nicknamed "Lord of the Skies" for his pioneering use of decommissioned passenger airliners in smuggling tons of cocaine to Mexico.

The elder brother died after botched plastic surgery in July 1997, and his brother – who is also suspected of having resorted to plastic surgery to change his appearance – took over leadership of the cartel, authorities say.

"He's a true binational drug trafficker who never understood borderlines," the former DEA agent said. "He was ruthless, vicious. His philosophy was shoot first and then ask questions later. He was nothing like his brother."

Mr. Carrillo Fuentes owned several homes, including one in El Paso where he once lived with his girlfriend and infant daughter, U.S. law enforcement officials said. He used a forged ID to travel between Juárez and El Paso, where his girlfriend lived with their child, law enforcement reports show.

This year, U.S. agents say, his gang began undergoing an overhaul. Another cartel leader, Juan José Esparragoza, also known as "El Azul," or Blue, consolidated his power by joining other top drug lords, including Ismael Zambada, the Beltran Leyva brothers and Mr. Guzmán, agents say.

The new organization is known as El Triangulo de Oro, or Triangle of Gold, named for Sinaloa, Chihuahua and Durango states. Or it's simply called the Alliance.

Phil Jordan, former director of the El Paso Intelligence Center, a federal counternarcotics agency, said Mr. Carrillo Fuentes' arrest would have "minimal impact" if he remained in Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0001366

"To leave the guy in a Mexican jail where he can still run things would do little more than change his residence of operation," Mr. Jordan said. "What the Mexican government really needs to do is extradite Carrillo Fuentes to the United States as soon as possible. Without that, I don't foresee a decrease in violence."

Results of DNA tests to determine the identity of the man arrested Saturday are expected as early as today.

Juárez Kingpin May Be In A Cell (Express-News)

By Dane Schiller

The San Antonio Express-News, July 5, 2005

MEXICO CITY — The gang violence already rife along the Rio Grande might intensify after federal agents arrested a man believed to be a drug smuggling capo for whom the U.S. is offering a $5 million reward.

A spokesman for President Vicente Fox said Monday that officers believe they have captured Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, who is accused of running the powerful Juárez cartel. The cartel was made famous by Carrillo Fuentes' brother, who used large planes to smuggle Colombian cocaine and who died of complications from plastic surgery to conceal his identity.

DNA and fingerprint analyses were being conducted on the man, who was arrested Saturday at an upscale shopping center in the capital, spokesman Rúben Aguilar said.

"We have to prove that this is the guy," he said.

The arrested man identified himself as Joaquin Romero Aparicio, according to the national news agency. But authorities believe he is the 42-year-old brother of Amado Carrillo Fuentes, the legendary drug boss who was known as "Lord of the Skies" and died in July 1997.

Aguilar didn't share details of how agents learned the supposed boss was in Mexico City, how he was grabbed or why they believe he is Carrillo Fuentes.

Mexico's attorney general's office, the lead agency in the narcotics operation, declined to comment.

The arrest would mark a major victory for Fox, who vowed to fight the "mother of all wars" against the cartels.

Should the man prove to be Carrillo Fuentes, "this is a very important blow to the cartels," said Fernando Guzmán Pérez Peláez, a federal congressman who heads the chamber's National Security Commission.

As part of a nationwide operation launched June 11, soldiers and federal police are pressuring organized-crime gangsters — from street corners and barrooms to highways and ranches.

Part of the government's strategy is to keep fugitives on the run, deny cartels access to traditional smuggling routes and arrest their leaders.

But short-circuiting operations also creates opportunities for the ambitious and bold to climb the ranks.

"There is violence and violence and violence, but somebody is always able to step up and take the reins," a former U.S. federal agent said. "When you start taking down the big heads, there are always five or six splinter groups that pop up.".

The Juárez cartel, based out of Ciudad Juárez across the border from El Paso, is aligned with Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzmán Loera.

U.S. and Mexican authorities contend Guzman is Mexico's leading drug trafficker and is battling the Gulf (of Mexico) cartel for smuggling routes across the South Texas-Mexico border.

Vicente Carrillo Fuentes is wanted in Mexico, but also in the United States, where he is named in a 46-count federal indictment out of El Paso.

He is accused of cocaine trafficking, money laundering, witness tampering and ordering multiple murders to prevent informants from sharing information with U.S. law-enforcement authorities.

Identifying him is complicated, as the U.S. government believes he might have undergone surgery to alter his appearance — as his brother did, only to die of a medication overdose after surgery.

After Amado Carrillo Fuentes died, his Juárez cartel remained largely intact, as his brother Vicente and other key lieutenants were able to maintain control of specific geographic regions, according to a Drug Enforcement Administration report.

Guzmán Pérez, the congressman, noted that although authorities have captured "El Chapo" Guzmán, taking down his ally Carrillo Fuentes would be a direct hit on his operations.

DOJ_NMG_0001367

Carrillo Fuentes' arrest would mark the biggest victory for the Fox administration since the March 2003 arrest of Osiel Cardenas, head of the Gulf cartel. Cardenas, however, is said to continue to run his cartel from prison.

He was snatched from the city of Matamoros, across the border from Brownsville, after a series of fierce gunbattles.

"It is triumph, but just for the moment, as they are losing the war against the drug cartel," said José Antonio Crespo, a researcher in Mexico City who specializes in cartels and politics. "Once they put a cartel boss in prison, violence is unleashed as his lieutenants or rivals fight to be his successor. Of course there will be violence and it will splash on civilians and government employees."

The recently released United Nations World Drug Report 2005 says 77 percent of the cocaine destined for the United States passes through Central America and Mexico and that Mexican cartels control the majority of wholesale distribution within the United States.

The ongoing cartel battle has claimed at least 650 lives nationwide and about 70 in Nuevo Laredo, across the Rio Grande from Laredo.

As the busiest border crossing point for commercial traffic, Nuevo Laredo is the prime battleground for the cartel wars. Authorities contend the cartels often hide drugs in legitimate cargo.

Mexico Believes It Captured Drug Cartel Leader (REU)

By Catherine Bremer

Reuters, July 5, 2005

MEXICO CITY, July 4 (Reuters) - Mexico believes it may have captured Vicente Carrillo, boss of the powerful Juarez drug cartel, in what would be a major victory in a war on drug gangs responsible for an explosion of violence on the U.S. border.

But Mexico's main television network said Monday that DNA tests had showed the captured man was not Carrillo, one of Mexico's biggest drug barons and listed as one of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's top 10 major international fugitives.

The suspect was arrested in a Mexico City shopping center on Saturday.

Prosecutors were carrying out DNA tests and fingerprint checks to confirm his identity because of the extensive plastic surgery Carrillo has reportedly used to change his face.

"We presume this is Vicente Carrillo, but it is not completely confirmed," government spokesman Ruben Aguilar said. "I can only confirm the (arrest), and during the day the attorney general's office will give details on the subject."

But a statement promised by the attorney general's office did not appear and the Televisa network said the man arrested was in fact an architect, Joaquin Romero Aparicio.

"They have finished the DNA tests and they are not compatible at all with this drug trafficker," Televisa said on its main night news show, without giving a source for its information.

The attorney general's office said a suspect who was possibly Carrillo had been arrested after a tip from a witness who was being protected, but said it could be several days before DNA tests confirm his identity.

"A person has been arrested and is being investigated, possibly Vicente Carrillo, but we still don't have information that allows us to determine if he is or not," a spokesman at the attorney general's office said.

"They are carrying out checks but they don't have the data yet. Waiting for the DNA results would mean a minimum of three days and then any extra time," he said.

BROTHER OF "LORD OF THE SKIES"

Carrillo, who runs the Juarez cartel along with sidekick Juan Jose Esparragoza, is the brother of cartel founder Amado Carrillo, whose own attempts to change his appearance with plastic surgery led to his death on the operating table in 1997.

The U.S. DEA's Web site describes Carrillo, a former police officer, as "armed and dangerous".

Based in the grim border city of Ciudad Juarez, notorious for a spate of brutal murders of women, the Juarez cartel is a confederation of clan-like crime families who smuggle Colombian cocaine and locally grown marijuana to the United States.

In its heyday in the 1990s, the cartel used a stripped Boeing 727 passenger jet to haul tons of cocaine north, earning Amado Carrillo the gangland tag of "El Senor de los Cielos" or "Lord of the Skies".

DOJ_NMG_0001368

More than 500 people have been killed so far this year in drug-related violence which has escalated since President Vicente Fox launched a "mother of all battles" on drug gangs at the start of the year.

Last month, troops arrested a brother of Joaquin Guzman, Mexico's most wanted man and leader of the Sinaloa cartel.

The government says it has made hundreds of other arrests this year in the northern states of Tamaulipas, Sinaloa and Baja California.

Aguilar also said on Monday that U.S. police had arrested Martin Rojas, suspected mastermind of the April murder of Raul Gibb, owner and editor of a newspaper in the state of Veracruz that published articles about an illicit fuel smuggling racket allegedly run by Rojas.

Alleged Mexico Drug Cartel Leader Arrested (AP)

By MORGAN LEE

The Associated Press, July 5, 2005

MEXICO CITY (AP) - Authorities believe they've arrested the leader of Mexico's most-powerful drug gang, but the suspect's family said Monday night that it was a case of mistaken identity.

Ruben Aguilar, President Vicente Fox's spokesman, said Mexico's Federal Agency of Investigation captured a man going by the name of Joaquin Romero in a Mexico City shopping mall on Saturday. He said the suspect was being fingerprinted and his DNA checked to confirm his real identity - but that he might be Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, believed to be the leader of the Juarez cartel.

``Right now, it is likely Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, but it isn't completely confirmed," Aguilar said.

Mexico's Attorney General's office didn't comment on Aguilar's announcement, however, and the Televisa network raised more doubt by interviewing family members who said Romero was an architect and loving father who had nothing to do with drug trafficking.

Televisa also showed a picture of Romero in which he appeared to look like a photo taken of Carrillo Fuentes. The network suggested that the similarity of the two pictures - and little other evidence - prompted the arrest.

Federal investigators could not be reached to comment on Televisa's assertions.

Drug leaders often use false names and change their appearance to avoid capture. Carrillo Fuentes' brother, Amado, led the cartel until 1997, when he was believed to have died during botched plastic surgery.

If the arrest is confirmed, it would be a blow to the Juarez cartel, the only drug gang that hasn't had a top leader arrested amid a nationwide crackdown.

As rival organizations - including the Gulf cartel and the feared Arellano Felix gang - lost their leaders to government operatives, the Juarez cartel flourished and has been waging a bloody battle for control of drug routes all along the U.S. border.

But U.S. and Mexican law enforcement authorities say Carrillo Fuentes' influence within the Juarez organization has been on the decline.

Juan Jose Esparragoza - also known as ``El Azul," or Blue - has worked his way to the top of the organization along with several other men with close ties to cocaine producers in Colombia, according to the Mexican Attorney General's office and the FBI.

The Juarez-based gang's power became legendary in the 1980s and 90s under Amado Carrillo - better known as ``The Lord of the Skies" - for flying planeloads of cocaine into the United States.

In recent months, the Juarez cartel's battle to control the few spots out of its reach along the U.S.-Mexico border - mainly the city of Tijuana to the west and the stretch of border between Nuevo Laredo and Matamoros to the east - has left scores dead and prompted U.S. officials to warn tourists about traveling to Mexico's northern border area.

Mexico Debates Stepped-up Drug War (DMN)

By Lennox Samuels And Laurence Iliff

The Dallas Morning News, July 5, 2005

MEXICO CITY – Mexico finally is fighting the war on drugs that the U.S. government has demanded for decades: a frontal assault on drug barons, their organizations and their merchandise, using the police and military in concert with U.S. intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0001369

LOUIS DeLUCA/DMN Mexican government troops had to patrol the streets of Nuevo Laredo in June to control the violence attributed to rival drug trafficking factions.

The results, Mexican and U.S. authorities say, have been impressive. Forty-six thousand people jailed on drug charges, President Vicente Fox said in a recent speech, 97 tons of cocaine seized, more than a million marijuana plants destroyed. It's been four years, Mr. Fox and U.S. officials said, of steady progress.

But a rising chorus of voices in Mexico and the U.S. says the real results are record levels of violence, instability and corruption in Mexico, resurgent drug cartels, nearly 200 dead police officers and soldiers, along with millions of wasted dollars in a country where half the population of 105 million is poor. Mexico receives almost no aid from the U.S. government.

And the result in the U.S.? No noticeable drop in the supply of cheap drugs – and an actual decline in the price of cocaine, according to a new U.N. report.

Some analysts say Mexico's approach has not only failed to stanch the flow of drugs but is also destabilizing the young democracy. Mexico needs to turn back now, they say.

"The Americans pressure us to carry out a head-on drug war, and when the situation starts to get out of control, the Americans complain that there is violence on the border," said political commentator José Antonio Crespo. "There is no way of making them happy because they always have some reason not to be."

Before the violence spirals out of control, as it has in Colombia as a result of similar policies, Mr. Crespo said, Mexico should go back to pretending to fight an unwinnable war rather than fighting it in earnest.

"If the United States is not going to legalize drugs, then Mexico has to come to terms with the narcos," he said. "There were agreements in the past to let 80 percent of the drugs through, to allow some seizures for the Americans and for the media, and there was a lot less violence."

Mr. Fox said recently that is not an option.

"We have the strength, the capacity, the moral integrity to win this battle," Mr. Fox said June 24 to mark the international day on fighting drug abuse and trafficking. "What is at stake here is the future of our girls, boys and young people."

Mexico's interests

Dave Murray, a policy analyst with the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said Washington understands the sacrifice being made by Mexico, but that it also is in Mexico's interest to fight the traffickers vigorously.

"It's been a horrendous fight for them. We have to salute their willingness to take on this fight," said Mr. Murray. But turning a blind eye is not an option.

"If drugs transit through your country and you think, 'Well it's just for those norteamericanos. The money comes to us, the drugs to them. What's the problem?' They soon discover drugs are left behind as payment in kind for services provided. And local traffickers soon become drug dealers. And to whom do they sell? To local kids," said Mr. Murray.

"The problems will become worse and worse as narcotraffickers corrode the system ... and you will find them growing into a power within the nation that can actually threaten the legitimacy and viability of democratic governments."

But that, critics say, is just what is happening now with the stepped-up war.

Northern border cities such as Nuevo Laredo essentially have slipped out of the government's control despite increasing deployment of soldiers and federal police, some analysts say.

More drugs are getting left behind because of the drug fight, they say, and addiction is up at home.

The nightly accounting of deaths associated with the drug fight has made public security the No. 1 issue among Mexicans in recent months, overtaking unemployment and the lackluster economy, according to a public opinion survey by the Televisa TV network.

Tourism to the Texas-Mexico border is down. For Mexican critics of the policy, an upside is hard to find.

Even the U.S. State Department acknowledges that not much has changed.

"Despite its intense law enforcement efforts, Mexico is the leading transit country for cocaine and a major producer of heroin, methamphetamine, and marijuana destined for U.S. markets," said the 2005 International Narcotics Control Strategy Report.

DOJ_NMG_0001370

Further, it acknowledged: "As a result of the huge traffic in drugs, Mexican criminal organizations dominate operations, controlling most of the thirteen primary drug distribution centers in the U.S. The violence of warring Mexican cartels has spilled over the border from Mexico to U.S. sites on the other side."

Comprehensive plan

Some critics say the two countries need a more comprehensive anti-drug policy that focuses on demand as well as supply.

"The policy is working in part, in the sense that we are catching and arresting the drug lords," said Sigrid Arzt of the nongovernmental organization Democracy, Human Rights and Security. "The problem is that the policy has focused on beheading the cartels without additional strategies to deal with consumption and things the U.S. should do in its own territory, such as decreasing the market.

"There will always be someone in line to succeed these drug kingpins. I mean, this is a huge economic business."

Mexico's anti-drug policy should incorporate "prevention, education and information," said Ms. Arzt, founder and partner in the organization. She said the government must do a better job of explaining to Mexicans why the drug problem is such a serious issue.

"People hear that drugs is a national security problem," she said, "but no one truly grasps the dimensions of tolerating this. We need to have a culture of understanding. And the government must work on building confidence in the actions it is doing."

A State Department official expressed a similar reservation.

"One of the things that the Mexican government could do a better job of is coming to the public [and saying], 'We have to stay in this for the long haul, for our survival. Do you want your kids to grow up in a violent and dysfunctional place?' Maybe that's what's lacking," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

U.S.-inspired drug policies have been "a negative in terms of cost" to such countries as Mexico and Colombia, said Gary S. Becker, economics professor at the University of Chicago. He said the drug war has hindered Colombia's economic growth rate and "the preoccupation with cartels has hurt the country."

"Mexico may be moving in that direction," said Dr. Becker, who won the Nobel Prize for economics in 1992. "This is a very expensive process for the U.S. and other countries, and there's little bang for the buck, as it were.

"My conclusion is that we have to look at more radical solutions such as legalization of drugs."

Dr. Becker acknowledged, however, that such a development is unlikely any time soon, noting that "the vast majority of politicians are unwilling to take on legalization in any serious way."

The State Department official said neither Mexico nor the U.S. can afford to let up despite the prospect of "a long, vicious, difficult struggle."

"What's the alternative? Just let them do whatever they want and we won't have the violence? No, because then you'll end up with complete control by criminal elements. I certainly don't want to belittle the sacrifices ... but do you really want organized crime running your country?"

Staff writer Michelle Mittelstadt in Washington contributed to this report.

Drugs, Guns And Money (SDUT/Copley News)

By S. Lynne Walker, Copley News Service

The San Diego Union-Tribune/Copley News, July 2, 2005

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico – Every day at noon, church bells ring out across this city reminding people to pray for peace.

They peal for a respite from the violence that has claimed more than 70 lives this year, including Nuevo Laredo's newly appointed police chief.

They peal for the safe return of scores of residents who have disappeared and for the salvation of children who are being lured into the drug trade.

"At least 10 of every 100 families have been touched by violence. There is a culture of death here," said Father Jésus Salazar, a Catholic priest. "The only thing that is important to drug traffickers is the profit, the weapons, the power."

For almost three years, people in this dusty border city of 500,000 have been trapped in a deadly war being waged by two drug cartels for control of the lucrative corridor between Nuevo Laredo and its U.S. sister city, Laredo, Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0001371

One of the cartels is led by Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzmán, who escaped from a maximum-security prison in 2001 by hiding in a laundry cart. The other is headed by Osiel Cárdenas, who is locked in a maximum-security prison near Mexico City, but whose reach still extends to the border.

The two drug kingpins are vying for control of the most important commercial crossing between the United States and Mexico, according to law enforcement officials on both sides of the border.

Roughly 9,000 tractor-trailers rumble over Nuevo Laredo's World Trade Bridge into the United States each day, accounting for almost 50 percent of the U.S.-Mexico commercial border traffic. The volume of truck traffic is so overwhelming that, U.S. officials acknowledge, truckloads of narcotics slip through undetected.

The violence has escalated in recent months as the cartels struggle to control this gateway into the United States.

"Neither cartel has been able to gain the upper hand and neither one is going to give up because the prize is so valuable," said a U.S. official who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

Both traffickers have deployed squads of hit men to carry out brazen killings – often on busy city streets and sometimes in broad daylight, according to Mexican federal law enforcement officials.

Their lieutenants rented safe houses in neighborhoods throughout the city. And they flaunted their presence by driving through town in flashy pickup trucks and expensive cars, their faces hidden behind tinted glass.

The victims of the drug violence range from prominent public officials to teenagers.

Since January, six police commanders have been slain. On a sunny afternoon in June, a man linked by police to Cárdenas' cartel was shot dead in plain view of Nuevo Laredo Mayor Daniel Peña's City Hall office. That same weekend, shots were fired into a motel, an explosive device was thrown into one of the rooms and the occupants were kidnapped and never heard from again.

Often the victims are targeted because they are presumed to be loyal to the rival cartel. But sometimes they are ordinary citizens – a Popsicle seller, a bricklayer, a hair stylist – trapped in the midst of a gun battle.

"People say they live or die at the whim of the drug traffickers," said the U.S. official. "Everybody has become much more closed in, much more afraid. You can sense the psychological tension."

Restaurants and stores are closing. Retail sales are down. Unemployment is rising.

Some residents have sold their homes and moved to Mexico's interior. The head of the city's Public Security Commission now lives on the U.S. side of the border.

Those who stay sometimes find themselves wishing that one of the cartels would win, so the killing would stop and life in Nuevo Laredo would return to normal.

They can't go to weddings or parties for fear that drug traffickers will be among the guests. Teenagers are reluctant to strike up friendships because they might be meeting aspiring drug dealers. And little children talk about being narcos when they grow up, because narcos have the best trucks, the nicest jewelry, the most money.

"We are facing a difficult situation," Mayor Peña said.

To try to show that the city is safe, Peña drove his SUV along Nuevo Laredo's streets last week without the protection of bodyguards.

"We have to set aside our psychosis, our fear," he said. "We have to convince ourselves that Nuevo Laredo is a place where we can live in peace."

U.S. toll The violence in Nuevo Laredo has also affected the U.S. side of the border.

Convention groups once visited Laredo, Texas, so they could go on cross-border trips featuring shopping and margaritas, but numbers have fallen because promoters are uneasy about sending Americans into Mexico.

Since August, 42 Americans have disappeared while visiting Nuevo Laredo, said Jim Dickmeyer, press attache for the U.S. Embassy in Mexico. Nineteen have reappeared, four were apparently killed and 19 are still missing.

"People think that they can't come to Laredo without a bulletproof vest," said Laredo Mayor Betty Flores. "We don't have a beach, we have a border. And now that is hurting us."

The violence has strained relations between two cities whose ties are so deep that for 106 years they've celebrated George Washington's birthday by meeting on the international bridge for a neighborly embrace.

DOJ_NMG_0001372

Flores said she has been asking for U.S. federal assistance for four years, a request that has gone unanswered. When the Texas received $40 million from Homeland Security last year, Laredo's share was just $100,000.

"We haven't gotten the help we needed," Flores said. "There's still not enough attention on the southern border of the United States, from Brownsville to California."

Overlooked Today, Nuevo Laredo has no police chief or police force.

The last chief, Alejandro Domínguez, was gunned down June 8 outside his office just seven hours after taking the job.

Since his killing, the entire police force – 700 officers – has been detained for background checks and drug testing. Fox sent soldiers and federal agents to replace them, warning Mexicans that the fight to defeat the cartels would be "long and bitter."

Domínguez, who was head of Nuevo Laredo's Chamber of Commerce, was known as an honest, civic-minded man. He had once worked for the federal attorney general's office and believed he could resolve the city's growing crime problem.

He took the job when nobody else would, turning a deaf ear to his wife's plea that he give up the idea of being chief. The previous chief had quit in early May to become the City Council's secretary.

Jacobo Suneson, vice president of tourism at the Chamber of Commerce, said Domínguez "genuinely wanted to help."

Suneson sat beside Domínguez at Chamber meetings. "He thought he could clean it up," Suneson said of his colleague. "When this man gets assassinated seven hours into the job, what is the message? What they're trying to say is, 'Don't get in our way.' "

The swift and brutal killing of Domínguez reminded a stunned world that Mexico is still in the grip of drug cartels.

The arrests in recent years of several drug traffickers – including Gulf cartel leader Cardenas, Tijuana cartel leader Benjamín Arellano Félix and the Amezcua brothers – strengthened other cartel leaders. Guzmán, a short, chunky man with a moustache, is now considered one of Mexico's most powerful cartel bosses.

"He is very ambitious and very active," said Misha Piastro, a Drug Enforcement Administration spokesman in San Diego. "He's extremely clever and he's willing to invest the time and money to do big projects."

A 26-page federal indictment handed down against Guzmán 11 years ago in San Diego accused Guzmán, 51, of trying to ship seven tons of cocaine packed in cans of jalapeño chili peppers across the border at Tecate.

The indictment also described a tunnel he ordered built in Otay Mesa, complete with railroad tracks and lighting, and accused him of building another tunnel that ended under a pool table in a Douglas, Ariz., bar. The table was raised and lowered with a hydraulic lift, Piastro said.

The U.S. government is offering a $5 million reward for Guzmán's capture, and DEA agents in San Diego staff a 24-hour hotline to collect tips on his whereabouts.

Some of the tips that come through the hotline, which can be dialed from almost anywhere in Latin America, are valid. Others prove to be false.

One caller reported – erroneously – that Guzmán had been spotted dancing the tango in Los Angeles. But another caller may have been Guzmán himself "trying to verify that the hotline wasn't set up by his rivals," Piastro said.

"It wouldn't be out of character for him to do something like that," Piastro said. "He's pretty brazen."

Guzmán has proved a tough adversary for Mexican law enforcement.

"We are looking for him everywhere, but it's difficult to determine where he is," José Luis Santiago Vasconcelos, Mexico's deputy attorney general for organized crime, said during an interview with foreign correspondents earlier this year. "He's not a subject that we see established in one place, living, defended by a big group of gunmen."

For Nuevo Laredo's sidelined police force, Guzmán and his hit men have been fearsome targets.

Police officers are ill-equipped, under paid and threatened with losing their lives if they oppose the cartel bosses.

"There were very brave police trying to function in an inferno of battle around them," said the U.S. official who requested anonymity. "How can a normal person function in that kind of environment? You have to ask yourself what you would do if someone shoved a picture of your child in your face and said he could be hurt. What would you do?"

Even the federal agents patrolling Nuevo Laredo acknowledge they are no match for drug traffickers.

DOJ_NMG_0001373

"They have better weapons and better communications than us," said an armed agent of the Federal Agency of Investigation, the Mexican equivalent of the FBI, who declined to give his name for fear of being fired. "We don't have the tools we need. But we do the best we can."

Training officers Omar Pimentel is training a new generation of police officers to fight crime in Nuevo Laredo.

Pimentel, a 37-year-old former highway patrol officer who heads the city's police academy, will watch his first recruits graduate on Monday.

"I have dedicated myself to giving them quality training," he said, "so they will be career police, not police who fill their pockets."

Tall, slender and dressed in a pink Polo Ralph Lauren shirt, Pimentel is now being mentioned as the top candidate for the job of police chief.

Although he wants to continue his work at the academy he said "if they call me, if they invite me, I would take it with great pleasure."

His wife, who is pregnant with their second child, is terrified that her husband might accept the dangerous post.

Pimentel knows the job is risky and even admits the idea sometimes makes him nervous.

"The person that they designate has to be a person who knows what he is going to do, what he is going to say. He has to be very intelligent, very cautious not to have problems in his job."

Pimentel says his parents worry for his safety, too.

"They ask God to watch over me so everything comes out well."

Mexico's Master Of Elusion (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 5, 2005

BADIRAGUATO, Mexico — The voice was unmistakably his. Mexico's most wanted criminal was back in his rural stronghold in the western Sierra Madre.

But when 200 army paratroopers swooped in by helicopter minutes after the voice registered on a wiretap, he was gone. The soldiers found only a few ranch hands and the drug baron's Hummer and Dodge Ram pickup, which they blew up before retreating in frustration.

The November raid was the closest a government search party has come to Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman since he slipped out of a maximum-security prison in a laundry cart 4 1/2 years ago.

On the lam with a satellite phone, laptop computer and AK-47 rifle, the 50-year-old fugitive has rebuilt his empire and started a war with rival smugglers that has claimed more than 600 lives this year. Although Mexican officials call him one of the most prolific, innovative and ruthless traffickers they have ever faced, his disappearing acts have made him a folk hero.

The 5-foot-6 kingpin's nickname means "Shorty," but there is nothing diminutive about the shadow he casts on Mexico and the United States. The story of his mercurial career and bid for underworld supremacy offers a glimpse of a violent industry that bedevils both countries.

Although U.S. officials have repeatedly praised Mexico's anti-drug efforts under President Vicente Fox, including the arrest of 18 cartel leaders over the last four years, Guzman's elusiveness is an embarrassing symbol of the country's failure to stop the bloodshed or slow the flow of cocaine, heroin, marijuana and amphetamines into the United States.

"He is the last of the Mohicans," said Jorge Chabat, a Mexico City expert on law enforcement issues. "All the other big cartels have been decapitated. That is why they want him so badly."

U.S. authorities also want to get Shorty, who was indicted in 1995 in San Diego on charges of money laundering and conspiracy to import tons of cocaine. In December, federal authorities offered a $5-million reward for tips leading to his capture and are sharing intelligence with Mexican authorities.

Since then, the dragnet has tightened with the arrests in Mexico of Guzman's 21-year-old son (nicknamed "Little Shorty"), a brother, two nephews and a niece, all accused of aiding his drug business. Nine houses and six vehicles belonging to him and his associates were seized in June.

Rival drug traffickers are after him too. They killed another of his brothers and two of his associates in a Mexican prison last year.

But so far the heat on Guzman has merely enhanced his mystique as an untouchable outlaw constantly on the move, escorted by 10 armed bodyguards and apparently shielded across Mexico by a web of corrupt officials to whom he once boasted paying a total of $5 million per month.

By sport utility vehicle and private aircraft, he shuttles among safe houses in 16 of Mexico's 31 states, according to an army intelligence report. "He is practically a guerrilla of drugs," said Jose Luis Santiago Vasconcelos, Mexico's deputy attorney general for organized crime.

A ballad recorded by Los Buitres (The Vultures) and sold on CDs across the country is part of a popular narco-culture that glorifies Guzman's life on the run and the exploits of other kingpins.

He sleeps at times in homes, at times in tents

Radio and rifle at the foot of the bed

Sometimes his roof is a cave.

Guzman does seem to be everywhere.

"Once, on a single day, I got tips of sightings in Nuevo Laredo, Mochicahui, Badiraguato, Mexicali, Caborca and Agua Prieta," said J. Jesus Blancornelas, a Tijuana newspaper editor who is knowledgeable about the drug cartels. "Everyone thinks they are seeing him."

The difficulty of arresting Guzman becomes starkly evident in the isolated, mountainous terrain of Badiraguato, the 2,000-square-mile municipality in Sinaloa state where he was born.

His ranch at La Tuna is a five-hour drive on bad roads from Badiraguato's well-kept urban center. Between the ranch and the outside world are several thousand families who have lived for generations on the proceeds of marijuana and poppy cultivation. They complain of government neglect and defiantly replant their illegal crops as fast as the army destroys them.

"Some of them have benefited from his generosity," said Santiago Vasconcelos, the federal prosecutor. "They see him as a hero. They cover for him, and when any stranger comes into the communities, they warn him."

"It's similar to trying to find Osama bin Laden," a U.S. law enforcement official said.

Badiraguato's 29-man police force does nothing to stop his security detail from setting up checkpoints, people in the area say. "When the cops pass El Chapo on the road, they call him Boss," a resident said.

But most people here are reluctant to utter Guzman's name, much less acknowledge his comings and goings. "We do not know in the slightest whether or not this famous Chapo even exists," said Jose Luis Morales, the municipality's No. 2 official.

Residents who are willing to talk about him are unwilling to give their names. They say the drug baron spreads cash like a benevolent father, paying for public works and medical care for the needy. They say he shuns fancy jewelry, has a wife and several mistresses, comes home frequently and throws catered parties at the ranch but never stays long.

When federal police raided one of his parties, in November 2003, Guzman and his guests had been tipped off and left behind four hapless narco-balladeers of La Sombra Nortena (the Northern Shadow), who had been paid $4,000 to entertain. They and their sound man were arrested on charges of possessing marijuana and a firearm.

Guzman's illicit empire is proof that someone with a third-grade education can rise to the top in Mexico as long as his family is well connected.

A former mistress, Zulema Hernandez, told author Julio Scherer for a book about Mexico's prisons that Guzman felt deprived growing up and was haunted into his adulthood by "a terror of returning to poverty." As a boy, she said, he toiled on his grandfather's farm after his abusive father kicked him out of the house.

Poor or not, Guzman was a nephew of the late Pedro Aviles Perez, a founding father of the Sinaloa drug cartel. He eventually joined its payroll as an overseer of illicit crops.

The cartel's rise in the 1980s marked the birth of large-scale Mexican drug trafficking. Already producing and exporting marijuana and heroin, it took over the shipment of South American cocaine through Mexico to the U.S. Southwest after U.S. authorities closed off air and sea smuggling routes into Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0001375

Guzman rose quickly to become the cartel's import manager. It was his job to get planes, boats and trucks full of cocaine into Mexico, while his cousin Hector Palma took charge of moving the drugs by land to clients in the United States.

By 1989, Aviles was dead and cartel co-founder Miguel Angel Felix Gallardo was in prison. The cartel broke up, with Guzman and Palma taking a chunk of the operation that was moving up to 24 tons of cocaine a month, U.S. law enforcement officials say.

Guzman, the dominant of the two cousins, began to gain notoriety for two qualities: brutality and creativity.

Challenged by the Arellano Felix family for control of the cartel, Guzman went to war. The Arellanos, who were related to the imprisoned Felix Gallardo, set up base in Tijuana. In 1992, Guzman sent 40 gunmen to a Puerto Vallarta disco where the Arellanos were partying. Nine people died in the commando-style raid.

Meanwhile, Guzman devised innovative ways to move ever larger quantities of cocaine. He smuggled the powder inside fire extinguishers and set up phony food distribution warehouses so he could move it, truckloads at a time, in cans labeled chili peppers.

"He thinks big," Drug Enforcement Administration spokesman Misha Pilastro said. "When Chapo gets involved in a drug deal, we're talking about extremely large quantities. Tons."

First arrested in 1991, Guzman bribed the Mexico City police chief $50,000 to let him go. Later testimony in Mexico alleged that he enjoyed the protection of the country's top law enforcement officials at the time.

His imprisonment in 1993 resulted from his feud with the Arellanos, who had sent gunmen to ambush him at the Guadalajara airport. Instead, they shot the city's Roman Catholic cardinal, Juan Jesus Posadas Ocampo, whose death brought public pressure on the government to move against the drug barons. Guzman was arrested 16 days later in Guatemala.

Living in luxury at El Puente Grande, the maximum-security prison near Guadalajara, he allegedly kept his hand in business with messages passed through his lawyers. Shortly after Mexico's Supreme Court ruled that he could be extradited to the United States, he escaped.

The prison warden and more than 30 guards were implicated in what one narco-ballad immortalized as the "breakout of the millennium." Mexican officials have been trying to recapture him ever since.

Staying a step ahead of them, Guzman adapted to changes in the drug business during his 7 1/2-year imprisonment. Facing a federal administration less susceptible to bribery than its predecessors, he has made his operation more mobile and relied on corrupt local officials.

Despite being semiliterate (he once used a ghostwriter to pen love letters to a mistress), he has mastered the Internet as a tool to make multimillion-dollar deals without risky face-to-face meetings, U.S. officials say.

Equally important, Mexican authorities say, he has gained the financial and armed support of key Colombian traffickers who had lost faith in the Mexican cartels as the Fox administration infiltrated their ranks and captured their leaders.

"He was at the top of his game before he went to prison, and it was only a matter of time before he'd get back up there if he stayed alive," a U.S. law enforcement official said. "He's definitely back. He's strong. You can tell from the violence, he's more and more out there."

His rivals have fallen one by one since 2002. Ramon Arellano Felix is dead, and his brother Benjamin is in prison, along with Gulf cartel boss Osiel Cardenas, exposing their Baja California and Rio Grande territories to Guzman's forays.

One U.S. official says gangs led by Guzman and two allies now control all drug traffic along the Arizona and New Mexico borders and are fighting for gateways into Texas and California in a battle involving hundreds of gunmen.

U.S. officials say there is no evidence that the violence has diminished Guzman's operation or the overall flow of drugs from Mexico. But the Mexican manhunt is focused enough, they believe, that in the long run Shorty will go down. "He's a very high-profile target, and eventually he'll make a mistake and get caught," a U.S. official said.

To Guzman's neighbors in the Sierra Madre, the search is an exercise in futility.

Even with him gone, they say, little would change as long as Americans crave illegal drugs and Mexico remains a poor country with weak law enforcement. As they have for generations, the highlands of Sinaloa will keep producing narcotics and "other Chapo Guzmans," said Jose A. Rios, who once represented the state in Mexico's Congress.

For now, Chapo remains a fugitive and keeps popping up in the unlikeliest places.

DOJ_NMG_0001376

On a Saturday evening in early May, he strode brazenly into an upscale restaurant in Nuevo Laredo, a violent border city whose drug trade his gunmen are still fighting to control. The general had come to survey the battlefield.

With his bodyguards blocking the doors, Guzman instructed about 40 astonished customers to stay seated and refrain from using their cellphones. "Don't be alarmed," he said, according to witness accounts confirmed by the FBI. "Order whatever you want and I'll pay."

When he had finished dining, he plunked down thousands of dollars in cash, stood up calmly and vanished into the night.

Authorities Offer Little Help, Hope To Families Of Missing (HC)

By James Pinkerton

Houston Chronicle, July 4, 2005

NUEVO LAREDO, MEXICO - Nancy Segovia, an anxious 20-year-old wife and mother, searches for a husband who did not return from his job as a Nuevo Laredo policeman three weeks ago.

Two Laredo men, William Slemaker, 52, and Pablo Cisneros, 49, search for their daughters, who vanished 10 months ago while visiting this violence-torn border city.

Last week, the three stood in 100-degree-plus temperatures outside a Mexican military base, trying to learn whether their loved ones were among the 44 people rescued by federal agents from two safe houses operated by a drug cartel.

The wife and fathers gathered with hundreds of others from both sides of the border, desperate for information about people known as los des- aparecidos, or the missing ones.

The rescue operation June 29 raised the hopes of Segovia, Slemaker, Cisneros and many others looking for relatives who vanished, with no ransom demands, during a three-year turf war between rival drug cartels. Each was disappointed.

In Nuevo Laredo, the faces of the missing stare out from homemade posters attached to street lights, taped to doorways of police stations or printed in newspaper ads. In a city that has seen more than 70 killings linked to the drug war so far this year, the missing are largely unknown to the public, and the local police seem to have done little to find them.

Federal officials said in Mexico City last week that many of the 44 victims were seized by city police who turned them over to cartel gunmen. One of the police commanders in Nuevo Laredo's 450-member force, Moises de Anda, said he did not know whether officers were kidnappers but "If the federal agencies investigating this are saying that (police officers abducted many of the captives), then it's probably true."

"People go on patrol, and you don't know what they do."

At the end of a week that began with good news, the two fathers and the young wife again were left to continue their searches, armed with few clues.

Disappeared in SeptemberThere were no ransom calls to either the men or the policeman's family, adding to the speculation the kidnappings were ordered by two powerful drug gangs fighting for control of Nuevo Laredo and its smuggling routes into Texas.

"We're at a point where we ... want to get past this nightmare," said Slemaker, a railroad worker and truck driver. " We want them dead or alive — but God forbid they are dead."

He said his stepdaughter, Yvette Martinez, 28, was last heard from on Sept. 18 when she drove back from Nuevo Laredo with Brenda Cisneros, who was celebrating her 23rd birthday.

The two women were returning from a concert and could see the American flag next to the international bridge when they called a friend, Slemaker said.

Slemaker and Pablo Cisneros, who runs an automotive business in Laredo, were tired and frustrated after a promising lead seemed to evaporate.

Many theoriesThe evening before, they gave a Mexican federal police commander the location of a ranch outside Nuevo Laredo where more kidnapped victims were rumored to be held.

The commander, in the presence of a reporter, promised that a rescue would be mounted the next day. But it did not happen, and the men could not locate the official for a follow-up meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0001377

Meanwhile, federal police did search at least one ranch outside Nuevo Laredo last week but did not find anything of significance, U.S. officials said.

In the months Slemaker and Cisneros have searched for their daughters, they have heard theories.

"I've been told several times that Yvette and Brenda were given as gifts to the bosses of the cartels," Slemaker said. "And now they are being used to cook and clean for the kidnapped victims. Others say they are being drugged."

Official numbers of the missing are hard to come by in Nuevo Laredo, where state police and prosecutors have jurisdiction over kidnapping complaints.

Human rights attorney Arturo Solis, in nearby Reynosa, said the kidnappings will continue until there is a top-to-bottom reform of police agencies. "They have to fight the impunity and the corruption within the police," Solis said.

The Center for Border Studies and Human Rights Promotion, which Solis directs, reported that 193 people had been kidnapped through June in the border cities of the state of Tamaulipas. It counted 59 abductions in Nuevo Laredo, 38 in Reynosa and 62 in Matamoros, the three major cities in the state. The other 34 occurred in small towns and villages on the border.

Last year, there were 121 kidnappings in the state, including 46 in Nuevo Laredo.

A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City said 42 Americans have been reported missing in Tamaulipas since August. The bodies of four were later found, 19 people were returned, and 19 remain missing.

Early last month, international attention focused on Nuevo Laredo when a new police chief was shot to death within hours of taking the oath of office. When a group of federal agents sent to the city to investigate the assassination was fired on by municipal police, federal authorities surrounded their headquarters and disarmed the officers.

Since then, 79 have been dismissed from the force, and 41 remain confined in Mexico City pending investigation into their roles in the encounter with federal police.

On June 9, the day after the chief's assassination, Nuevo Laredo police officer Gabriel Galarza, 32, did not return to the home he shares with Segovia after working a 4 p.m.-midnight shift.

Life in limboSegovia is a clerk in the traffic division at Nuevo Laredo police headquarters. Her office is in the same building as the state police officers investigating her husband's disappearance.

"They say they don't know anything about what happened to him or his vehicle," Segovia said. "In truth, I don't think they're looking. I don't see that they're doing anything."

Segovia has moved in with her mother, who cares for her 1-year-old daughter.

Segovia said her routine has taken on a drab sameness. After working an eight-hour shift, she swings by the unfinished home she and her husband were building on an unpaved street. The subdivision is called The Will to Work and is a working-class neighborhood next to the city's automotive junkyards on the industrial west side.

Inside the two-bedroom home, Segovia has left a scribbled message on a notepad telling Galarza that she loves him and asking him to call her. It sits on the dining-room table, next to a loaded clip from his assault rifle he left behind, along with his bulletproof vest.

An entertainment center in the modest living room holds pictures of her husband in police fatigues, proudly displaying an assault rifle, standing next to their daughter. The latest bill for her husband's credit card lies on the mantel, and Segovia opened it to show they owe $750.

"If he was corrupt, doing bad, we wouldn't have all these payments, all these debts and bills, because we are struggling," Segovia said.

Sudden changeHer father-in-law, Santos Galarza, 53, has been helping Segovia look for his son and his missing car, a 1994 green Honda Civic. But he said city, state and federal authorities have been of little help.

"I think it (the disappearance) was related to his work because he didn't have any enemies," said the father.

Both father and wife suspect that the police officer may have witnessed a crime, perhaps one committed by fellow officers. They think it is not a coincidence that he was suddenly assigned to stand guard alone at a school, a different assignment from his usual patrol duties.

And the day before he disappeared, a fellow police officer failed to return home after working the same shift at the same school, said the officer's father.

DOJ_NMG_0001378

Mexican federal authorities say the 44 captives freed last Sunday had been abducted in the last two months. Most of them, a top prosecutor said, were working for one of the two contending drug cartels and had been targeted by their rivals. The prosecutor did not name the gangs.

Rafael Garcia, the second-in-command of the Mexican attorney general's office in Nuevo Laredo, said the families of kidnapping victims are afraid to report the abductions.

"Since (the rescue), we've had 20 or 30 people who have made anonymous reports of abductions," Garcia said. "They call, or they come by and leave information. But they won't file an official complaint, because they are afraid of reprisals."

In Laredo, prosecutor Robert Balli said the kidnappers are either from the same police agencies that investigate kidnappings or are wearing identical uniforms and driving cars with identical police insignia.

"When you've been kidnapped by people you believe are from a particular law enforcement agency, you don't feel comfortable going to the same agency to file a complaint," Balli said.

Despite the fear and disillusionment, some people say the federal search for kidnapping victims has given them a reason to hope the missing may yet be found.

"They are getting results, no matter who they find," said liquor-store clerk Ramiro Villalobos, 19.

He said his 14-year-old cousin, Jesus Antonio Barcenas, was abducted from his home in March 2001 by armed hooded men dressed in black.

"They never called for a ransom," he said. "I think it was narcotics traffickers who made a mistake."

Villalobos said the boy's family reported the abduction to the authorities, but in the four years since the police have not reported any progress.

"Hopefully, he's alive," Villalobos said.

Search At Border Ranch Abruptly Ends (Express-News)

By Jeorge Zarazua

The San Antonio Express-News, July 3, 2005

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico — Federal police abruptly ended their search for human remains Saturday morning at a remote ranch house on the edge of town here, leaving the property without saying what, if anything, they'd found.

All that was left inside the compound's cinderblock walls were piles of disturbed earth and a broken black metal gate.

A small contingent of Mexican military troops remained outside the beige-colored compound this morning, but the troops leader said they were on "routine patrol."

On Friday, an FBI spokesman said U.S. agents who had been on the scene earlier this week believed the bones that had been found were those of animals.

The FBI has since not returned here.

The headline in one of today's afternoon dailies in Nuevo Laredo screamed "NADA AUN," or "Nothing Yet"

Federal police spent all day Friday digging the patio of the ranch house in the sweltering heat in search of human remains believed to have been buried there by drug cartel hit men.

The ranch house is about nine miles south of the Texas-Mexico border near the Nuevo Laredo highway leading to Monterrey.

Authorities feared the remote compound hidden deep in brush land was used as a drug-cartel killing factory, where enemies were taken to be shot and cremated in large metal drums. The border violence is believed to be the result of drug cartels battling for control of vital smuggling routes for marijuana, cocaine and other drugs into the United States.

Authorities gleaned a tip about the property while interrogating more than 40 prisoners who were rescued last Sunday from separate houses in Nuevo Laredo.

The hostages were freed only to be jailed by Mexican federal police, who believe they in fact are criminals with underworld ties.

One of the hostages is being investigated as a possible suspect in a 2004 fatal shooting of a Laredo man.

Agents of Mexico's version of the FBI, known by the initials AFI, raided the ranch house Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0001379

Noel Ramirez Mandujano, an investigator with Mexico's attorney general's office, said investigators found pieces of charred bone, 200-liter metal drums, blood-tainted clothing and numerous shell casings inside the compound.

The bones, which FBI agents had viewed, were sent to Mexico City for DNA testing, according to Ramirez.

Authorities have not announced results of that testing.

The search at the ranch house seemed exhaustive Friday, with federal police using a Bobcat earthmover and later a backhoe at night to scrap several feet deep into the ranch house's patio.

A German shepherd trained to sniff out bodies also was brought in Friday afternoon.

Mexican federal police remained late at the ranch house Friday, leaving about midnight.

This morning, the search was suspended and the backhoe retrieved.

Meanwhile, the violence in this border city caught in the middle of a bloody drug cartel turf war continued late Friday night.

A Laredo man attending a birthday party was gunned down shortly before midnight. Business owner Hector Vallejo Quiroz, 34, died at the scene.

More than 70 people have been killed here this year and authorities are bracing themselves for even more deaths as summer temperatures continue to climb into the 100s.

Drugs Linked To Armed Forces (MH)

By STEVEN DUDLEY AND PHIL GUNSON

The Miami Herald, July 4, 2005

BEJUMA, Venezuela - In this deceptively tranquil farming village, people still talk about the "Bejuma massacre" in a whisper, partly because one man who spoke out is in a grave, partly because the killers were allegedly policemen.

But the source of the fear can be summed up in a single word: drug trafficking, on the kind of massive level and involving corrupt government officials that has long been a profound problem in neighboring Colombia.

Drug seizures in Venezuela doubled in the past four years. There are mounting allegations of drug-fueled corruption at the highest levels of the security forces, accompanied by what appears to be official indifference. Just last month, a suspected Colombian trafficker wanted in the United States escaped from a Venezuelan police lockup after allegedly bribing his guards.

The rising drug trafficking has become yet another sore point in relations between the Bush administration and Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, a fiery populist who has repeatedly accused the U.S. government of trying to topple him.

"There are a few people who see [drugs] as a global problem, but those people are few and far between," said one Western counter-drug official who asked for anonymity because he did not have official permission to speak publicly on the topic.

Venezuela has long been a transit country for illegal Colombian drugs. But record seizures in 2004 that reached 32 tons of cocaine and 12 tons of heroin and marijuana put authorities on the alert.

"The organizations have grown more sophisticated," Mildred Camero, former head of CONACUID, the drug-fighting arm of the Venezuelan government, told a news conference earlier this year.

CARTEL ALLEGATIONS

Still, CONACUID and other law enforcement agencies have arrested few major traffickers and say they know of no Venezuelan cartels -- information that numerous police and counter-drug officials in Colombia contradict.

Venezuelan authorities indeed at times blame their neighbors for the scourge. "We have problems because we have countries that produce [drugs] along our border and there are weaknesses along that border because it's nearly 1,300 miles long," Camero told the news conference.

Colombia's drugs flow to other parts of the world on land and air routes through areas such as the Venezuelan state of Carabobo, where Bejuma is located, on the Caribbean Coast. Police describe Carabobo as a key link in the chain that sends tons of cocaine, marijuana and growing amounts of heroin to the United States and Europe.

And with the growing volume has come more drug-related violence and corruption at increasingly higher levels.

"There's been a huge transformation," said a foreign diplomat in Caracas who asked that he not be identified because of the sensitivity of his job. ``The corruption is reaching levels we've just never seen before."

THE GONZALEZ CASE

DOJ_NMG_0001380

The problem was nowhere more visible than in the case of suspected trafficker Eudo González, who according to neighbors often threw parties for police and allowed them to use a firing range on his Bejuma ranch.

But the heavily armed police and intelligence officers who showed up at his gate on Feb. 11, 2004, were not looking to party. By the time they were done, González and at least five of his employees were dead -- killed in a "shootout" that left not a scratch on any of the cops.

González and his brother Hermágoras were well known to counter-drug officials. A court in Virginia indicted Eudo on heroin charges in the mid-1990s. And officials of two foreign lawenforcement agencies told The Herald he was involved in drugs, gun-running and money-laundering, and could be Venezuela's top trafficker.

But the González brothers allegedly enjoyed the friendship of law enforcement officials far beyond the parties at Eudo's ranch.

When the police killed Eudo, he was carrying a National Guard identification card signed by the Guard's former head of intelligence, Gen. Alexis Maneiro, according to reports published by Mauro Marcano, a newspaper columnist and local radio program host in the small town of Maturín. Marcano also served as a municipal councilman in Maturín, a town in the region east of Bejuma where Maneiro once headed the National Guard detachment.

JOURNALIST KILLED

Marcano, 55, who was shot and killed by a gunman in September as he left his apartment, had long alleged the existence of a drug-smuggling group dubbed the Cartel of the Suns after the insignias of rank worn by Venezuelan generals -- as U.S. generals wear stars.

One foreign diplomat in Caracas familiar with anti-drug operations described the cartel as ``a large group of generals in the army and the National Guard, especially . . . They control a certain number of shipments out of Colombia, and they get a cut of those shipments."

The Western counter-drug official who asked for anonymity estimated that the group might be responsible for three-to-five tons of cocaine a month and 20-30 kilograms of heroin.

Venezuelan government officials have said little on the topic.

After The Herald made several attempts to interview Gen. Frank Morgado, head of the National Guard's anti-narcotics command, about the Maneiro case, Morgado responded via fax that his unit "has no information relating to that matter." He suggested consulting ``the relevant authorities."

Maneiro did not return repeated Herald phone calls to his office.

But the National Guard's own commitment to the fight against drugs has come under question.

EXITING THE TASK FORCE

Earlier this year, Guardsmen unexpectedly seized U.S.-donated equipment and vehicles from a mixed police-and-judicial investigative unit and withdrew from the task force, which works closely with U.S. officials. After several weeks of haggling, the Guard returned the equipment but has not rejoined the task force.

And last month, the government abruptly removed Camero -- one of the key U.S. allies in the government, according to officials at the American embassy here -- from her post at CONACUID. Also ousted were two senior officials in the prosecutor's office with oversight of drug cases.

"There have been some recent bumps in the road," U.S. Ambassador to Venezuela William Brownfield acknowledged to The Herald last month.

Gen. Maneiro's career has not prospered since the Marcano killing. Shortly afterward, he was removed from his post as commander of the Guard's 7th Region, which includes Maturín, and assigned to run the National Guard academy in Caracas.

But investigators have not questioned him or any other senior military and police figures previously fingered by Marcano, according to Reporters Without Borders, a Paris-based independent group that tracks abuses against journalists.

"The investigation," said one of its recent reports, ``has come to a complete halt."

U.S. Envoy: Venezuela Cooperation Slipping (AP)

By Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0001381

The Associated Press, July 4, 2005

CARACAS, Venezuela -- A decline in cooperation between Venezuelan and U.S. authorities has weakened efforts to fight terrorism and drug trafficking, the U.S. ambassador to the South American country said.

"On the issue of illegal drugs, we have a situation where we have a reduction in cooperation between some police forces," U.S. Ambassador William Brownfield said in an interview broadcast Sunday on the Venezuelan television station Televen.

"I wish we could have more cooperation in passing along more information on matters of terrorism, the movement of specific people, Brownfield said, without giving details.

U.S.-Venezuelan relations have been marked by tensions during President Hugo Chavez's more than six years in power.

Chavez's close ties to Cuban leader Fidel Castro and his frequent criticisms of the U.S. government have coincided with U.S. officials' repeated statements of concern about his increasing domination of Venezuelan politics.

U.S. officials have denied Chavez's repeated accusations of backing plots against him, including a short-lived coup in 2002.

The United States remains the top buyer of oil from Venezuela, the world's fifth-largest oil exporter.

Venezuela's location next to Colombia also has made it a major transit point for Colombian cocaine headed for the United States and Europe.

U.S. Sees Security Hitches With Venezuela (REU)

Reuters, July 4, 2005

CARACAS, Venezuela (Reuters) - Cooperation between Venezuela and the United States to fight terrorism and drug-trafficking has run into problems and could be improved, the U.S. ambassador to Caracas said on Sunday.

William Brownfield said "complicated problems" had emerged in the relationship between Venezuela, the world's No. 5 oil exporter, and its biggest energy client, the United States.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, first elected in 1998, is a fierce opponent of U.S. policies he calls "imperialist."

President Bush's administration has criticized Chavez as an increasingly authoritarian ruler and a left-wing anti-U.S. troublemaker bent on trying to destabilize Latin America in alliance with Cuban President Fidel Castro.

"At this moment, in the area of drugs, we have a situation in which we've had a reduction in cooperation between some U.S. and Venezuelan police forces ... I wish we could cooperate more," Brownfield told Venezuela's Televen television channel.

He said there had been problems in obtaining extradition from Venezuela of drug-trafficking suspects. Tons of illegal drugs like cocaine and heroin are shipped across Venezuela each year from Colombia to U.S. and European markets.

"I wish we could have more collaboration in passing on more information about terrorism affairs, about the movement of specific persons," Brownfield added, without elaborating.

Chavez, who often accuses Bush of plotting to topple or kill him, has cut back Venezuela's military cooperation with Washington. U.S. officials say he has increased ties with anti-U.S. states such as Cuba, Iran and Libya.

Chavez says the Bush administration backed a short-lived coup against him in 2002. He has threatened to cut off oil supplies to the U.S. if Washington tries to invade or harm him.

In a television broadcast Sunday, the Venezuelan president said his intelligence services had detected a war games exercise being practiced by the U.S. military, code-named Balboa, which he said simulated an invasion of Venezuela.

"They had better not make the mistake, I'm telling them, because if they do they'll be sorry for 500 years," he said.

Brownfield repeated U.S. denials of these charges. "There has been no plan, is no plan and will be no plan for an assassination, an invasion, a coup, a sabotage of oil production or any other intervention," he said.

Guns Over Democracy (WP)

Post

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

PARLIAMENTARIANS gathered in Washington this holiday weekend from Europe and North America arrived just in time to witness the U.S. House of Representatives -- on the eve of the anniversary commemorating the signing of the Declaration of Independence -- trample upon the right of self-determination. Morphing themselves into city council members, a House majority overturned a city law and voted to allow D.C. residents to keep in their homes loaded shotguns and rifles, as well as handguns bought before 1976, unbounded by trigger locks or disassembled. The deed itself makes a mockery of Congress as a federal body. If the action is allowed to stand, however, the consequences could be even worse: The nation's capital will become a deadlier place in which to live.

The gun safety law that the House voted to repeal makes all the sense in the world. It enjoys the full backing of the city's mayor, council, police chief and, most important of all, the city's residents. Perhaps residents and their leaders want the law on the books because they know, even if the House does not, that properly locked or secured guns help prevent gun violence and accidental shootings. Perhaps District residents support their gun safety laws because they now see crime in their city at a 20-year low. Perhaps they also resent this imposition of House judgment because District residents, through their elected leaders, are authorized under the Home Rule Act to make their own laws. But perhaps they are outraged most of all because they have no vote in Congress. At the very time that the House was telling Americans living in the District what their local laws should be, Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), the District's representative on Capitol Hill, had to stand by and watch -- unable to express her views with a vote.

We hope opponents of the House action are successful in stopping the repeal in the Senate. Clearly the last thing D.C. police need is another obstacle to charging negligent gun owners with gun safety violations or more cases of children dying from playing with guns. The notion of Congress encouraging citizens in the nation's capital to keep loaded and unprotected guns in their homes borders on insanity. Ironically, this quashing of self-determination is taking place under the eyes of the 55-nation parliamentary assembly of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which is conducting its annual meeting in the city. On Saturday a committee of the group overwhelmingly supported a resolution calling for equal voting rights for D.C. residents. The plight of the voteless District is plain for the world to see.

Lawyer's Fraud Trial Sparks Questions About Tax Court Procedure (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

Law.com, July 5, 2005

A seven-year-old secret report by a special trial judge of the U.S. Tax Court in the lengthy and complex fraud trial of a renowned tax lawyer and his business partners found no fraud -- not even a suspicion of fraud -- by the three men, despite a subsequent Tax Court decision to the contrary.

The conflict between the original report and the Tax Court decision has prompted some to raise ethical questions about Tax Court procedures and to call on Congress to examine them.

The Tax Court recently released the report after the U.S. Supreme Court held earlier this year that "no statute authorizes, and the current text of [Tax Court] Rule 183 does not warrant," the concealment of special trial judge reports by the Tax Court.

The Supreme Court ruling -- Ballard v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, No. 03-184, and Estate of Kanter v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, No. 03-1034 -- followed years of litigation over the report in three federal circuits by lawyers for estate and tax attorney Burton W. Kanter and his business partners Claude Ballard and Robert Lisle, all of whom believed the report would exonerate them.

"One of the enormous frustrations about the case, now that we've seen what the presiding judge found, is that the taxpayers, who had their reputations severely damaged, have been litigating for years and have spent a fortune just to get to [the] point of having the original findings of the judge who presided at trial," said Richard Pildes of New York University School of Law, counsel to the estate of Burton Kanter. "Two of the three taxpayers have died."

Special Trial Judge D. Irwin Couvillion oversaw the five-week trial in 1994 in which the government charged Kanter, Ballard and Lisle with $30 million in tax deficiencies and civil fraud penalties in three alleged kickback schemes. In his 300-page report, produced four years later, Couvillion, who did not have authority to issue the Tax Court's final decision, said the court "cannot find or conclude" that the claimed kickback schemes existed or, if they did exist, that there was tax fraud in connection with them.

He also said that the transactions on which the government based its fraud allegations "amount to only respondent's suspicious [sic] of fraud. The Court, however, does not consider these transactions as even rising to the level of suspicion of fraud."

A year later, Senior Judge Howard A. Dawson issued the final decision, saying he was "adopting the opinion of Special Trial Judge D. Irvin Couvillion," but ruled for the government on the fraud and most of the tax liability issues.

UNKNOWN DIFFERENCES

Because Couvillion's original report was secret, no one would have known of the differences between the two but for another Tax Court judge and the chief special trial judge at the time who contacted Kanter's trial lawyer and informed him of the reversal of the findings of fact.

The Tax Court denied requests for the report, saying in an order, "Judge Dawson states and Special Trial Judge Couvillion agrees, that, after a meticulous and time-consuming review of the complex record in these cases, Judge Dawson adopted the findings of fact and opinion of Special Trial Judge Couvillion," and Dawson gave "due regard" to Couvillion's credibility findings.

'DISTURBING' DIFFERENCES

But the report is "very different" from the 1999 opinion, said tax scholar Leandra Lederman of the Indiana University School of Law-Bloomington.

"Most important, the original report did not find that the taxpayers committed fraud; the opinion did," she emphasized. "These differences are disturbing. They raise questions about what the Tax Court means in Rule 183 cases when it says it 'agrees with and adopts' the findings of the trier of fact. This type of question may undermine confidence in the Tax Court's practices in Rule 183 cases."

Tax Court Chief Judge Joel Gerber did not respond to a request for comment on Rule 183.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in the Ballard case (Ballard is the only survivor) ordered the Tax Court to produce the report and the parties to brief what should happen next.

The 7th Circuit in the Kanter case sent his case back to the Tax Court over a strong dissent. The 5th Circuit in the Lisle case had much earlier overturned the fraud decision and sent the case back to the Tax Court on deficiency issues, where it remains.

"We want the fraud and deficiencies -- which total about $10 million -- reversed," said Steven S. Brown of Chicago's Martin, Brown & Sullivan, counsel to Ballard and Lisle. "We think the 11th Circuit has all it needs to make its decision. We want the Tax Court to vacate its opinion [in Lisle]."

Internet Sales Taxes (NYT)

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

Thirteen years is a long time to get a pass. A 1992 Supreme Court decision has exempted Internet retailers from the obligation to collect most sales taxes on the grounds that it would be unduly burdensome. Back then, the country's thousands of state and local taxing jurisdictions all had differing rules.

But times have changed, and the law of the land should, too. Last week, 18 state tax collectors met in Chicago to announce an interstate agreement establishing uniform sales tax rules. Starting in October, the group will offer free software that will allow any business to easily collect the required taxes online.

The states' demonstration project will drive home the point that online sales-tax collection can be done nationwide. Many retailers already collect the taxes. Now Congress should step up and pass a law overturning the court's exemption in states that have streamlined their tax systems. That would allow hard-pressed states to take in roughly $20 billion a year in annual sales tax revenue that is rightfully theirs, and perhaps much more, depending on the growth in online shopping. It would also help level the playing field between local and online retailers.

No one in Congress has proposed legislation yet, but Senator Byron Dorgan, a North Dakota Democrat, and Senator Michael Enzi, a Wyoming Republican, are working on the issue. Still, anti-taxers are already grousing. Among their complaints is that collecting sales taxes online would represent a tax increase, which they oppose on principle. That's disingenuous. Online sales have always been taxable. But it's impossible for states to collect any sales tax directly from shoppers unless the shoppers voluntarily send in the tax. For the tax to be enforceable, it must be collected by retailers.

A related objection is that federal legislation should not be used to resolve a state-tax issue. That's totally off the point. The only way to address the Supreme Court ruling is for Congress to pass a federal law.

As if sensing the hollowness of those arguments, Web merchants are already gearing up for the day when they'll be required to collect sales tax. The New York Times reported last week that eBay and Amazon were duking it out over the level of online sales at which tax collection should apply. An eBay spokesman quoted in the article said businesses selling "in the range of $5 million" should be exempt from any collection obligation. Noting that a company doing $5 million in online sales is hardly a mom-and-pop, Amazon says that if there is an exemption, it should be much more limited. We don't see why any business should be exempt.

Lawmakers should not become distracted. Sales tax collection by online retailers is an idea whose time is way overdue.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Gonzales Deflects Queries About High Court (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 5, 2005

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales deflected questions about his interest in serving on the Supreme Court and said Sunday that criticism about his conservative credentials did not bother him.

"Many of the people speaking probably don't have all the information about prospective nominees. What's important is what the president of the United States thinks about me," Gonzales told reporters while flying to the Middle East.

"That's evident by the position he has asked me to fill," said Gonzales, who made a surprise one-day visit to Iraq.

Gonzales will help screen nominees even though he is widely thought to be under consideration by President Bush to replace retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

On a trip to see U.S. troops as well as Justice Department and Iraqi officials, Gonzales was asked by reporters if he was flattered to be considered a possible nominee. "I just look at the job that I do as attorney general. I'm happy in that job," he said.

Attorney general since February, Gonzales has been a Bush confidant since Bush became governor of Texas in 1995.

Gonzales was the governor's chief counsel for two years before Bush appointed him to be Texas secretary of state. In 1999, Bush appointed Gonzales to the Texas Supreme Court. He joined the Bush White House in 2001 as its top lawyer.

Gonzales, 49, would be the high court's first Hispanic justice if he were nominated by Bush and confirmed by the Senate.

During their association, Bush often has cited Gonzales's heritage and modest background. The son of migrant farm workers from Mexico, Gonzales grew up in a two-bedroom house in Houston with seven siblings.

Some conservatives are questioning whether Gonzales is too moderate, particularly on abortion and affirmative action. Liberals have criticized his role in determining the Bush administration's legal positions on the treatment of detainees and other terrorism-related policies.

The Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy, working with Gonzales, will make recommendations to Bush about prospective nominees. Gonzales said the White House has been at work since 2001 on potential nominees if there were a Supreme Court vacancy.

When Bush was the likely Republican nominee for president in 2000, he turned to Dick Cheney to lead the search for a running mate. Ultimately, Cheney himself got the job.

Senators Call For Calm On U.S. High Court Nominee (REU-Y2)

By Alan Elsner

Reuters, July 4, 2005

As conservative and liberal interest groups gear up for a bruising and expensive battle over the next Supreme Court nominee, senior Republican and Democratic senators on Sunday pleaded for calm, calling on both sides to tone down the rhetoric.

Both sides are preparing for a bloody political battle following Friday's resignation of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman ever appointed to the court.

Her decision to retire gave President Bush his first opportunity to nominate a member of the nine-member panel, which plays a central role in shaping the social, cultural and political fabric of the United States.

Bush's choice must be confirmed by the Senate, where Republicans hold 55 of the 100 seats but lack the 60 votes necessary to break a filibuster, or blocking tactic, if the minority decided to try to mount one.

Judiciary committee chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican who will run confirmation hearings for Bush's eventual nominee, was one of several senators who appeared on Sunday talk shows to urge calm.

"It would be very useful for the country if the rhetoric were to be toned down," he said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"We have laid plans for a professional approach where we're going to keep the rhetoric down," Specter added.

Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record), the ranking Democrat on the committee, echoed his sentiments. "Let's take it easy. I had a long talk with the President on Friday. He assured me then that he wants to consult as he has before," he said.

Bush is expected to move quickly on the nomination after he returns from the Group of Eight summit in Scotland at the end of next week.

Utah Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch (news, bio, voting record) said on CBS' "Face The Nation" he had spoken to Bush on Saturday and expected a nominee within a couple of days after Bush's return.

DISCUSS VACANCY

Bush has invited Specter, Leahy, and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and Minority Leader Harry Reid to meet him on Friday to discuss the vacancy.

Meanwhile, pressure groups on either extreme of the political spectrum have already started running TV commercials and say they could spent a combined $40 million to influence the choice, which is seen as pivotal since O'Connor was often the swing vote in crucial court decisions.

Conservatives have already launched a preemptive strike against Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a Bush favorite said to be a front-runner for the post, whom they view as ideologically suspect.

Christian conservative leaders have urged the White House not to pick him. Gonzales would be the first Hispanic ever to serve on the court.

Hatch said of Gonzales: "Some of the right wing groups, of course, are trying to push the President into getting the most conservative person they can get and they don't consider Judge Gonzales to be as conservative as some of the others... If he gets picked I am certainly going to support him."

Democrats are urging Bush not to pick a fight by nominating someone they might regard as a conservative extremist. "I hope that it is a mainstream conservative ... someone who really speaks to the great bulk of Americans," California Democrat Dianne Feinstein said on "Fox News Sunday."

"I think the president would do well to reach into the mainstream, to try to bring people together over this appointment, and I think it's very do-able," she said.

Massachusetts Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), the leading liberal voice in the Senate, said he preferred not to have a brawl but that decision was up to Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0001386

"We're all hopeful -- again, this is up to the President. If he wants to pick a judge, we want to be able to support him, but if he wants to have a fight about it, then that's going to be the case," he said.

Court Battle Lines Drawn (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein And Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, July 4, 2005

WASHINGTON — Senators from both parties jostled Sunday to define the rules of engagement in the political struggle over President Bush's first Supreme Court nomination.

In appearances on all the Sunday talk shows, members of the Senate Judiciary Committee sparred about whether nominees should be asked their views on specific issues such as abortion; whether it was appropriate to apply more scrutiny to nominees who would change the court's balance of power; and what circumstances, if any, might justify a filibuster against Bush's eventual choice.

The partisan disagreements on so many issues, before Bush has selected his nominee to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, underscore the conflict that may be ahead if the president's choice does not attract broad bipartisan support.

Indeed, on Sunday, senators and representatives of conservative and liberal interest groups even disagreed on whether Bush should feel obligated to select a nominee acceptable to both parties.

Adding to the edgy tone were continued signs of divisions among conservatives about Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales, widely considered one of the leading contenders for the nomination. C. Boyden Gray, who heads a broad conservative coalition that is supportive of Bush's judicial appointments, said he would support Gonzales if nominated. But a leading social conservative said there was "not a lot of enthusiasm" on the right for his selection.

"There is concern on the right, there's no doubt about it," Jay Alan Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, a conservative group that specializes in religious rights, said on CBS' "Face the Nation." He added that Gonzales, who made a surprise trip to Iraq over the weekend, was doing a "fantastic job" at the Justice Department — and that Bush should keep him there.

The right is wary of Gonzales, seeing him as a supporter of abortion rights and affirmative action, based on his decisions while a Texas Supreme Court justice and his actions as White House counsel.

Democrats, meanwhile, have said that Gonzales' role in developing Bush administration policies on handling detainees in U.S. prisons in Iraq and at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, could cause difficulties similar to those that complicated his nomination as attorney general this year.

White House aides have said Bush will announce his choice for the court after he returns from this week's Group of 8 summit of industrialized nations in Scotland. Bush is to leave Tuesday and return Friday evening. He has scheduled a July 11 meeting on the court with Senate leaders from both parties, and Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), a former Judiciary Committee chairman, told CBS that he expected Bush to reveal his decision "maybe even the same day or within a day or two."

On ABC's "This Week," the current chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), said he would be flexible on whether to schedule the confirmation hearings for the nominee in August or September.

"Our duty is to get this confirmation done by the first Monday in October," Specter said. "That's when the court starts in session, and we are going to meet that duty."

Some of the sharpest exchanges Sunday involved whether the nominee should be required to disclose his or her views on specific issues that could come before the court, such as abortion or same-sex marriage.

One senior Senate GOP aide told The Times on Saturday that Republicans believed the nominee should not be pressed to disclose views on specific cases. On Sunday, the Washington Post reported that GOP aides to the Senate Judiciary Committee had circulated a memo making that argument.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said Sunday on ABC: "It's completely inappropriate to ask nominees to make promises to politicians about how they're going to vote, should a case come before them. And it's also wrong to ask a judge — not knowing how the case would be postured, what the facts would be — to prejudge these issues before they have a chance to hear all the evidence."

DOJ_NMG_0001387

But Cornyn seemed to crack open the door to asking nominees about Roe vs. Wade, the decision that guaranteed legal access to abortion, and other Supreme Court precedents: "I think it's an appropriate question to ask what their views are on cases that have been decided and judicial opinions that have been written."

Appearing with Cornyn, Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said the panel had a responsibility to broadly probe the nominee's legal views and ideology.

"This is such an important position, the U.S. Supreme Court," Schumer said. "With a flick of a pen they can change people's lives. I think it's a dereliction of our responsibilities if we don't ask these kinds of questions."

Schumer added: "To take one person's writing 30 years ago and say that disqualifies them, that's wrong. But to then just say, 'OK, tell us where you went to law school and what your career was; and have you ever broken the law? You're on the Supreme Court' — no way."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the committee when his party last controlled the Senate, told CBS that he didn't think "we should be talking about the outcome of specific cases" but instead should assess "what methodology a judge will use" in deciding cases.

In a view rejected by Republicans and conservative activists, Biden also argued that this nomination called for additional scrutiny because the nominee could change the balance of power on a court where O'Connor had frequently functioned as the swing vote.

Biden said the likelihood that the nominee would shift the court's balance "probably" made it more likely that Senate Democrats would filibuster a choice that drew broad opposition in the party.

But Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), one of the architects of the recent bipartisan deal by 14 moderates that preserved the filibuster for judicial nominations in "extraordinary circumstances," strongly warned Democrats against trying to use the delaying tactic on Bush's nominee. The filibuster allows a Senate minority to block consideration of legislation or a nomination with 41 votes.

Appearing on "Fox News Sunday," Graham said that disagreement with a nominee's legal views would not meet the deal's standard for filibustering judicial appointees.

"Ideological attacks are not an extraordinary circumstance," he said. "To me, it'd have to be a character problem, an ethics problem, some allegation about the qualifications of the person, not an ideological bent."

If Graham and one other Republican signatory changed their minds about the deal, GOP Senate leaders probably would have enough votes to ban filibusters of judicial appointments. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), another of the deal's authors, has already issued similar warnings.

In one more clash, Democrats repeatedly urged Bush to nominate what they called a "consensus candidate." On ABC, for instance, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts called on Bush to select "someone that can bring the country together, someone that can rally the Republicans and Democrats."

But on CBS, the conservative Sekulow ridiculed the idea that Bush needed to find a nominee who could appeal to both parties. "This idea that we've got to have a consensus candidate … is ridiculous," he said. "The president has the authority. The Senate can say yes or no."

Senators Clash On Questioning A Court Nominee (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, July 4, 2005

WASHINGTON, July 3 - With a White House nomination of a new Supreme Court justice at least a week away, members of the Senate began sharpening their differences on Sunday as lawmakers battled over the proper line of questioning at confirmation hearings and the right of Democrats to filibuster a nominee they deem unacceptable.

As senators sparred in interviews, op-ed columns and television appearances, the Bush administration sought to keep its deliberations over a potential successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor out of public view. White House officials were privately encouraging lawmakers not to get drawn into speculation over candidates' names but to concentrate on calling for quick and fair consideration of whomever President Bush nominates. [Related Article]

DOJ_NMG_0001388

Conservative groups, meanwhile, continued to press their opposition to one frequently mentioned presidential favorite, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

Democrats called for a deliberate review of any nominee and pledged to press the eventual candidate on issues including abortion and same-sex marriage, while Republicans declared that such specific inquiries were out of line.

"All questions are legitimate," Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, a Democratic member of the Judiciary Committee, said in an interview. "What is your view on Roe v. Wade? What is your view on gay marriage? They are going to try to get away with the idea that we're not going to know their views. But that's not going to work this time."

But Senator Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican who sits on the Judiciary Committee as well, said the push for such detailed positions was highly objectionable and suggested that Democrats might be forming a strategy of trying to derail a nomination on the ground of withholding information.

"You cannot ask a judge to prejudge a specific matter," Mr. Sessions said. He pointed to other cases in which Democrats had raised objections to Bush administration nominees in part on the ground that information was being withheld, including the nomination of John R. Bolton to be ambassador to the United Nations. "If the Democrats are pushing that, then they are trying to create an issue," he said.

And Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah and former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said in an interview: "Any member of the committee can ask whatever they want, no matter how stupid. But I don't think nominees have to answer certain questions. They don't have to answer questions about how they are going to vote in the future. They don't have to answer stupid questions. They don't have to answer argumentative cases."

Mr. Hatch said senators in past confirmation hearings had tried, with varying degrees of success, to divine the views of potential justices on critical cases facing the court. "But never has it been to the degree that Senator Schumer is suggesting," he said.

A senior White House official, who insisted on anonymity in discussing the early phases of the nomination, echoed Mr. Sessions and other Republicans on the Judiciary Committee, saying, "There has been a long-term standard that the appropriateness of questioning does not include asking judges to take specific sides or positions regarding cases they may hear one day."

The arguments hinted at the partisan intensity of what will be the first Supreme Court confirmation hearings in nearly 11 years. And they reflected a central element of what is shaping up as a Republican confirmation strategy: shrink the target of attack on any nominee by limiting both the questions that may be posed and the time between the nomination and the hearings.

"I think we ought to have our business taken care of by the time the court reconvenes in October," said Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas and another Judiciary Committee member. "We need to get to work."

Beyond the push for late summer hearings, Republicans say they will try to limit the access senators would have to F.B.I. documents on the potential nominee - the unpredictable wild card in any judicial confirmation because even the White House cannot fully anticipate the outcome of the background investigation when the president makes his choice. They cite as precedent an agreement reached in 1992 between the first Bush White House and a Democratic chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Democrats say that, because of the special significance of the Supreme Court, every senator, or at least the party leaders, needs a chance to review the full F.B.I. report to make a fully informed vote.

With official Washington on break for the Fourth of July holiday, much of the positioning and saber rattling took place - typically enough - on the Sunday talk shows, as members of the Senate and advocates from each side used the forums to lay out early arguments and positions. This was done with holiday accommodations: there were stand-ins for some of the usual Sunday morning hosts, and in one case, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, was interviewed by George Stephanopoulos of ABC News by remote from a home in Southampton, N.Y., where Mr. Kennedy was spending the holiday weekend.

The White House, notably, did not dispatch anyone onto the Sunday morning circuit, reflecting a decision by Mr. Bush's aides to try, as much as possible, to hold down speculation about the top contenders until Mr. Bush has announced his choice. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, held open the possibility of a filibuster against a nominee deemed out of the mainstream by Democrats. "I have no intention of filibustering, but he - it depends on who the president sends," Mr. Biden said on the CBS program "Face the Nation."

Mr. Hatch said in a later interview that he could not see "any circumstances where a filibuster would be appropriate." He warned that if Democrats tried to mount one, the Senate would most likely revert to the so-called nuclear option to bar the use of a filibuster to block judicial nominees. The Senate narrowly averted a showdown over the filibuster in May, and the tenuous nature of the compromise still looms over any Supreme Court confirmation hearings.

A nominee rejected this time would join 12 others rejected over the years by the Senate. At least 16 nominees withdrew, declined their nominations or had their votes postponed.

Democrats held up Justice O'Connor as the model justice that Mr. Bush should seek in looking to replace her, a notable contrast from what many of the same Democrats said about Ms. O'Connor in December 2000, when she voted with the majority in a 5-to-4 decision that ended the vote recounting in Florida and gave the White House to Mr. Bush.

"This is very bad for the Supreme Court, because their credibility is so diminished and their moral posture is so diminished that it could take years to pull them back from that," Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, said at the time.

Of the Democrats' present-day sentiments, Mr. Hatch said that "she's suddenly the goddess of all jurists."

A central issue shaping up in these early maneuverings is what kind of questions are appropriate at the confirmation hearings. In his autobiography, Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is now the Judiciary Committee chairman, wrote that "from my experience participating in Supreme Court nomination hearings, I have found that the better a nominee thinks his chances are, the less he will say at the hearing to minimize the risk."

Mr. Sessions said that a background form filled out by judicial nominees had a question to make certain that no one involved in the selection was asked how he or she would rule on specific cases. "You cannot demand a commitment from nominees," he said.

But some Democrats said it was entirely proper to question the nominee on matters that have long been before the court.

"There are many issues of well-established constitutional law on which millions of Americans rely every day, such as the right to fair treatment by the justice system, the right to equality in education and the workplace, and the right to privacy in our family and medical decisions," Mr. Kennedy said in a statement. "As part of the confirmation process, the American people will reasonably expect those questions to be asked and the nominees to answer them."

The dispute was not breaking entirely along partisan lines. Mr. Biden, for example, said that he would not ask the nominee questions about abortion, saying he considered them inappropriate in such hearings.

Republicans say that Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer both sidestepped specific questions on issues like the death penalty and abortion. The Democrats counter that since then, lower court nominees have answered questions about their personal views.

Democrats also sought to slow the Republican push for hearings, arguing that since Justice O'Connor had agreed to remain on the court until her successor was named there was no need to rush. "The strategy of the hard right is to avoid questions," Mr. Schumer said. "Their view is to do it quickly, focus on whether they have blemishes on their record, focus on their résumé not their views."

Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, said on "Fox News Sunday" that the Senate had as much riding on the confirmation as Mr. Bush and the nominee. "Can we have a confirmation process that will hold the Senate up to the world and the nation as a deliberative body made up of men and women who are serious about their job, or will it break down into some food fight?" Mr. Graham asked. "I really think the Senate's reputation is at stake as much as anything else."

Bork's 1987 Hearings On Senators' Minds (AP-Y2)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 5, 2005

In the eyes of still-bitter conservatives, Robert Bork is the symbol of the Senate's advice-and-consent power gone haywire. To liberals and the Republican chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Bork's confirmation hearings revealed extreme views that warranted rejection of the Supreme Court nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0001390

The memory of Bork's tumultuous Senate hearings 18 years ago are very much on the minds of senators as they call for dignified confirmation proceedings for whomever President Bush chooses as retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's successor on the high court.

Bork himself weighed in Sunday. So did two of his opponents from 1987, Sens. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass, who will both play important roles in determining whether O'Connor's replacement will be confirmed.

Specter is Judiciary Committee chairman. Kennedy, a committee member, says he's ready to fight if the president chooses someone who does not fit Kennedy's vision of a mainstream nominee.

Republicans on the committee are urging Democrats to give ample leeway to Bush's choice.

"Ruth Bader Ginsburg was a general counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, yet she was overwhelmingly confirmed" during the Clinton administration, Sen. John Cornyn (news, bio, voting record), R-Texas, said on ABC's "This Week." Ginsburg "wasn't asked about her earlier writings on whether laws banning prostitution were unconstitutional," he added.

Specter and Kennedy said the country is better off without someone like Bork on the Supreme Court.

"Can we imagine what this country would be like today if Judge Bork had gone onto the Supreme Court with his views about civil rights and other issues?" Kennedy asked on ABC.

Bork suggested he is still being demonized by senators who opposed him in 1987.

"I think they recognized what they did and they have to keep justifying it, and they have to keep misrepresenting me," Bork said of the senators who sent his nomination down to defeat. Bork appeared on CNN's "Late Edition."

Senate Judiciary Committee members crystalized the debate over O'Connor's successor, making clear that a hard-line conservative would trigger a furious battle on Capitol Hill that could touch off a Democratic filibuster.

The division emerged amid a conservative lobbying campaign against one possible pick, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a longtime Texas friend of President Bush who is considered too moderate by right-wing Republicans.

"I don't think the social conservatives ought to prejudge Attorney General Gonzales. Attorney General Gonzales may not even be in the picture," Specter, R-Pa., said on ABC's "This Week."

On a trip to Iraq to visit U.S. troops and Justice Department and Iraqi officials, Gonzales deflected questions about being considered a possible nominee. "I just look at the job that I do as attorney general. I'm happy in that job," he said.

Specter said he thinks Bush will consider "the gender factor" in making a selection, and the fact that O'Connor was a pivotal swing vote.

However, it is unclear what the president will consider.

Bush has said in the past that conservative justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas are the kind of people he admires on the Supreme Court.

Bush was at Camp David, Md., mulling over his options, while Democratic Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record) of New York was urging a summit between senators from both parties and the president.

Asked whether he would support a filibuster if a hard-liner is chosen, the Judiciary Committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record) of Vermont, said, "I would hope that we don't reach that point."

"I have no intention of filibustering, but it depends on who the president sends," said Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record), D-Del.

Leahy appeared on NBC's "Meet the Press" and Biden on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Senators Issue Call For Restraint On Court Vacancy (MINNST)

By Lawrence M. O'rourke, Star Tribune Washington Bureau Correspondent

Minneapolis Star Tribune, July 4, 2005

WASHINGTON, D.C. -- As conservative and liberal activist groups prepared Sunday for an expensive, all-out battle over the next U.S. Supreme Court justice, the top Republican and Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee appealed for restraint, at least until President Bush announces his choice in a week or so.

"We ought to tone down the rhetoric," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman.

"Let's take it easy," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, of Vermont, the committee's ranking Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0001391

The two men, along with Senate leaders Bill Frist, R-Tenn., and Harry Reid, D-Nev., have been invited to the White House to meet with the president on Friday after Bush returns from the Group of Eight summit in Scotland.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a potential candidate for the Supreme Court vacancy being left by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, made a surprise visit to Baghdad on Sunday. He told reporters that he would continue to be directly involved in advising Bush on the choice, despite possibly being considered himself.

Gonzales, who has already been opposed by some on the right as being too moderate, said that Bush might "take some time" in reaching his decision but wanted the next justice seated by the time the court starts a new session in October.

Democrats promoted the idea that Bush should pick a consensus candidate able to win overwhelmingly in the Senate.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., urged him to appoint a "mainstream conservative, someone who really speaks to the great bulk of Americans."

Republicans said that Democratic nominees historically had been given ample leeway and that Republican nominees should be given the same consideration.

"Ruth Bader Ginsburg was a general counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, yet she was overwhelmingly confirmed," Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said.

Analysis: Ideological Battle Looms Over Supreme Court Vacancy (PPG)

By Michael Mcgough, Post-gazette National Bureau

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, July 4, 2005

WASHINGTON -- In the sort of "gotcha" moment that has become common on Sunday television talk shows, George Stephanopoulos, the host of ABC's "This Week," yesterday confronted Sen. Edward Kennedy with Kennedy's own words from the 1967 debate over the confirmation of Thurgood Marshall for a seat on the U.S. Supreme Court.

Stephanopoulos noted that Kennedy had told his colleagues that they shouldn't take Marshall's judicial philosophy into account but instead should limit their inquiry to the nominee's "background, experience qualifications and temperament."

"If it was the right standard in 1967, isn't it the right standard now?" Stephanopoulos asked, referring to Kennedy's concerns about the philosophy of the man or woman President Bush might nominate to replace Sandra Day O'Connor.

The Massachusetts Democrat had a comeback -- that if the president focuses on ideology in picking a nominee, it's also fair game for the Senate. But the implication of Stephanopoulos' question was that Kennedy was following some famous political advice from onetime Louisiana Gov. Huey Long. "The time has come," Long once said, "for all good men to rise above principle."

Kennedy isn't the first participant in the run-up to the Supreme Court confirmation war to have enunciated a principle about the selection of a justice only to "rise above" it, and he won't be the last. And if one principle doesn't do the job, advocates will be happy to shift ground. And much as some observers lament that reality, it is unlikely to change so long as the Supreme Court has the final say on hot-button issues like abortion and affirmative action.

Consider the way the liberal group People for the American Way pirouetted on another issue -- whether a Supreme Court nominee should be similar in judicial philosophy to the justice he or she is replacing.

Last month, when it looked as if it would be the conservative Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist who would be stepping down, the liberal group's president, Ralph Neas, rejected the notion that liberals should not make a fuss if Bush replaced the very conservative Rehnquist with another conservative.

"There is no basis in constitutional law or history for reserving an ideological 'slot on the court,' " Neas said, adding that "each Supreme Court nominee should be evaluated based on standards of excellence, integrity and commitment to upholding the rights and legal protections that Americans enjoy under our Constitution and laws." As for ideology, Bush would be well advised, Neas said, to replace Rehnquist with a moderate conservative.

Now that it is O'Connor, the perennial swing vote, who is leaving the court, Neas' desired end result is the same -- a justice like O'Connor -- but the underlying principle has shifted. Last week, Neas called O'Connor's retirement "a critical moment for the Constitution" and warned that "replacing Justice O'Connor with another Justice [Antonin] Scalia would be a disaster for civil rights, privacy and the rights of individuals to be protected against abuse by government or corporate power."

So the philosophy of the departing justice is a consideration after all.

DOJ_NMG_0001392

It isn't just liberals like Kennedy or Neas who are flexible about the theory that should govern the Supreme Court selection process so long as the bottom line -- a congenial justice -- is guaranteed.

Appearing on "Face the Nation" yesterday, Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah said that while Bush would consult with Democratic senators -- as President Bill Clinton famously did with Hatch before he made two high court nominations -- the choice of a nominee was basically the president's.

"The Constitution does not require consultation. It's a courtesy." said Hatch, the most senior Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

What does the Constitution itself say? Article II directs that the president "shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States."

For Democrats seeking to preserve O'Connor's centrist legacy, "advice and consent" means serious consultation between the White House and the Senate before a nomination is made and a choice that will win bipartisan support. For Republicans, Hatch said, it means an "up or down vote" -- no filibusters -- after the president makes what is essentially his choice.

The conservative interest groups that are determined that O'Connor's successor will not be the "moderate conservative" sought by Democrats -- or even a potential moderate, like Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales -- make an additional, extra constitutional argument. They say Bush is bound by his campaign promises to appoint a justice in the mold of Scalia and Justice Clarence Thomas.

That the president should have wide latitude in choosing Supreme Court justices -- to the point of using the appointments to redeem campaign promises -- is not a strictly Republican view. Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., in his unsuccessful presidential campaign, indicated that he wouldn't appoint justices who would undo the Roe v.Wade decision legalizing abortion. Kerry is unlikely to extend that notion of accountability to one's base to a decision by Bush to replace O'Connor with a critic of Roe.

While this gap between principle and practice might seem obvious -- it's the politics, stupid, as James Carville might say -- there have been times when Republicans and Democrats agreed that presidents should have considerable leeway in choosing Supreme Court justices and that the Senate should be willing to confirm nominee with adequate legal credentials and no ethical problems.

Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, a Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, said yesterday on "This Week" that the Eisenhower administration was such a time. Kennedy, responding to Stephanopoulos' quote of his 1967 comments, said that things changed with President Ronald Reagan's failed 1987 nomination of Robert Bork to the high court. Because Bork's ideology was a key consideration in his selection by the White House, Kennedy said, it was a legitimate issue for the Senate to scrutinize.

Whether or not the Bork nomination was the turning point, ideology is on the table because, as Schumer said yesterday, "The U.S. Supreme Court with a flick of the pen [can] change people's lives." And it isn't just the two parties in the Senate that are preparing for war as if lives depended on the outcome. So are interest groups on the right and left.

In an editorial yesterday titled "Not a Campaign," The Washington Post plaintively noted that a seat on the court is "meant to be not merely apolitical but actively insulated from politics." But the editorial conceded that it was unlikely that "the war rooms will shut down and the campaign atmosphere give way to a serious discussion of -- and with -- the potential nominee."

Some observers are even more fatalistic. Michael Greve, head of the Federalism Project at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, believes that as long as the court has the final say on issues like abortion, a return to the dignified confirmations of the past is impossible.

"It's fashionable now to bemoan how controversial and contentious this nominations process has become, how many attempts there are to curb the courts," Greve told a seminar last month at the Brookings Institution. "But I think the source of those conflagrations and contentions is perfectly obvious ... . As Justice Scalia has explained, if you have a court that doesn't even try to act as a constitutional interpreter, if you have a court that tries to be the moral conscience of the nation, people will in the end, at the end of the day, insist on accountability."

Greve said the only way out of the politicization of the confirmation process is "at the same time very easy and next to impossible. The easy way is one single sentence in one single Supreme Court decision saying, 'There is no constitutional right to abortion.' " But Greve added that a reversal of Roe v. Wade would be unlikely even if Bush were able to name two new justices.

Run-Up To Judicial Fight Puts A Spotlight On Bork (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, July 4, 2005

WASHINGTON, July 3 - Judge Robert H. Bork, the former Supreme Court nominee whose rejection 18 years ago has hovered over every confirmation since, is back in the spotlight.

Interviewed on CNN on Sunday about the vacancy to be left by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's resignation, Mr. Bork squared off once again against his former nemesis, Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican whose critical interrogation during the 1987 hearings helped doom Mr. Bork's nomination. "I know Specter, and the truth is not in him," Mr. Bork said on "Late Edition" on CNN.

Mr. Specter, appearing earlier on that program and several others, brought Mr. Bork up repeatedly. "I've been criticized a lot for questioning Judge Bork in one session for an hour and a half," Mr. Specter said, defending his criticism of Judge Bork's emphasis on the "original intent" of the Constitution's framers. "If his 'original intent' stood, we'd still be segregating the United States Senate with African-Americans on one side and Caucasians on the other side."

Defending the Senate's role in approving nominees, Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, reprised in an appearance on ABC the speech he made attacking Mr. Bork shortly after his nomination. "Can we imagine what this country would be like today if Judge Bork had gone onto the Supreme Court with his views about civil rights and other issues?" he said. "It would be an entirely different America."

Since then, however, Mr. Bork has become an inspiration to many conservatives, who say they have organized and raised money to support the nomination of like-minded jurists, making "strict construction" and "original intent" their watchwords. With their ascendance in the White House and the Senate, many conservatives believe Mr. Bork's vindication is near.

On CNN and in an interview on Fox News on Friday, Mr. Bork defended himself once again against Mr. Specter's accusation that his legal philosophy would have precluded the ruling in Brown v. Board of Education that ultimately led to the end of segregation. "I have written, and he must know it, that Brown against Board of Education, the case that ended segregation, was a correct decision," Mr. Bork said.

"The problem is the court has made itself into a political institution. It's now gone well outside anything that's in the Constitution and begun to decide matters according to their preferences," he said. "When that happens, when it becomes a political institution, it becomes a political prize and both sides will fight for it."

Still, Mr. Bork said he had found some satisfaction in his defeat. He noted that "Borking" is now used as a verb meaning "to attack with unfair means," he said. "To have your name become a verb is to achieve a certain form of immortality."

Let The Senate Advise (WP)

By Edward M. Kennedy, Post

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement gives President Bush, elected by a divided nation that has become even more divided, a unique opportunity to unite us by choosing for the Supreme Court someone who can win support from a broad bipartisan majority in the Senate and whom the vast majority of Americans will be proud of.

Justice O'Connor's appointment to the high court is a useful model. Of the 20 Supreme Court nominations I have seen, hers was one of the most impressive. She was a Republican through and through who served the state of Arizona with distinction as assistant attorney general, state senator, trial judge and appellate judge. She was nominated by a Republican president, Ronald Reagan, and was opposed by activists who were even further to the right than he was, but Reagan stood by her. I'm sure Reagan understood the importance, for the good of the country, of avoiding a divisive battle over the first woman nominated for the Supreme Court.

When her nomination reached the Senate floor, she was confirmed unanimously. For 24 years she has demonstrated that the Senate's confidence in her was eminently justified. She has faithfully applied her own extraordinary life experiences, her broad knowledge of the law and her dedication to the Constitution to complex issues. She had no agenda except being the best possible justice.

If Bush emulates Reagan, the appointment of a replacement for O'Connor can be an expeditious, cooperative and unifying process. The president can choose a nominee whom the Senate will strongly support, as the framers of the Constitution envisioned. Those wise men, meeting in Philadelphia in 1787, well remembered the events of 1776 that we celebrate today. They remembered what it was to live as subjects under a tyrannical monarch. They resolved that absolute power would never reside in any of our leaders, and they constructed the careful system of checks and balances that has prevented it ever since.

They returned time and time again at the Constitutional Convention to the question of who should appoint judges. Five times they voted not to give the president any role in such appointments, but to give that power solely to the Senate. There were many other suggestions. Benjamin Franklin thought the Scottish system of letting the lawyers choose judges might work; he said the best candidate was usually chosen, because other lawyers wanted to eliminate their strongest competitor. Our forefathers finally compromised and authorized the president to make appointments "with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The genius of their plan was obvious. If both the president and the Senate must agree on an appointment, there is a strong incentive to select people who can obtain a consensus in the nation and in the Senate. They spoke of the appointment power as a "joint" power, and that's what it's been for 218 years. "Joint" means cooperation and consultation and consensus. It means picking from a list of mainstream lawyers and judges who have demonstrated that they are dedicated to the Constitution and the rights it guarantees. It means avoiding candidates who would come to the court with personal, partisan or ideological agendas. It means ignoring the advice of those who prefer that the president pick fights with the Senate instead of picking judges with the Senate. It means taking seriously the "advice" part of "advice and consent" by sharing the names of prospective nominees with the leadership of both parties in the Senate, the Judiciary Committee, and other senators who will fairly reflect the balance of views in the Senate and the country.

Confirmation proceedings should not be partisan exercises or occasions for party discipline. The president must not expect that if he chooses the route of confrontation and conflict, senators in his party will march to the battle stations with him and support his nominee. At least three times while I have been in the Senate, a president who did so found that members of his own party would not place party above country and joined in rejecting a divisive nominee. That's because they understood then what the president and all of us must remember today -- that the Supreme Court, as the last line of defense for "liberty and justice for all" should always be above partisan politics.

The president should reject the pressure of the extreme factions of his party that want litmus tests for his nominee. This process shouldn't just be about whether the next justice would help roll back women's rights by overturning Roe v. Wade, the law of the land. It should be about something much more basic: protecting our core constitutional values for generations to come, the freedoms that we've fought for, bled for and died for. Because of Sandra Day O'Connor, the disabled are guaranteed access to our public courts. Teachers can't be fired for opposing discrimination against girls in our public schools. Patients can get a second opinion when an HMO tries to deny them care. Our water is cleaner and citizens can stop polluters who dump toxins into our waterways.

I haven't always agreed with O'Connor. I didn't agree earlier this year that we should continue to execute juveniles. And I certainly didn't agree with her in Bush v. Gore.

But she was fair and tried to interpret the law. Unfortunately, many of those whom President Bush has nominated to the lower courts in the past four years have wanted to remake the law to suit their own ideologies. I hope the president will consult with the Senate and select a consensus nominee as dedicated to the Constitution as Sandra Day O'Connor.

If the president consults with senators and listens to their advice, as the framers wanted presidents to do, we can have a nominee our children and grandchildren can all be proud of.

The writer is a Democratic senator from Massachusetts.

Politics Shadow Supreme Hopefuls (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0001395

By Charles Hurt, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, July 5, 2005

Senate Democrats said yesterday that they will demand to know the political views of any nominee President Bush names to replace retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

"I think the number one thing that I am interested in are the nominee's views," Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat and Senate Judiciary Committee member, said yesterday on ABC's "This Week."

Such questions will ensure acrimonious confirmation hearings and conservatives have long argued that such questions -- political "litmus tests," they call them -- are improper and undermine the independence of the federal judiciary.

Democrats also warned Mr. Bush to pick a "consensus" or a "moderate conservative" nominee -- a far cry from Mr. Bush's re-election campaign pledge to name a conservative to the high court similar to sitting Supreme Court Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, defended his 1987 decision to attack then-federal Judge Robert H. Bork based on his political views, including the famous "Robert Bork's America" speech on the Senate floor. And he said he would do the same thing if Mr. Bush sends an similarly conservative nominee to replace Justice O'Connor.

"When the president sent Robert Bork to the Senate Judiciary Committee for nomination ... it was very clear that he was selected primarily because of his judicial philosophy," Mr. Kennedy said on ABC. "They made it, really, an issue there, and it became the issue before the Judiciary Committee and the country."

"Again, this is up to the president," he said. "If he wants to pick a judge, we want to be able to support him, but if he wants to have a fight about it, then that's going to be the case."

The notion of picking apart a nominee to the federal bench based on his personal opinions about political matters is out of bounds, conservatives say.

"It's asking them to basically run on a political platform," Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, responded to Mr. Schumer yesterday.

Mr. Cornyn said it's fine to ask a nominee to opine on a settled case, but asking about the merits of such issues as abortion or affirmative action is akin to requiring nominees to "make promises to politicians about how they're going to vote should a case come before them."

Mr. Schumer said "the courts have been the protectors of individual rights since the Republic was founded" and it would be wrong "to put someone on the bench when you know nothing about their views on civil rights, on women's rights, on environmental rights and on everything else."

Another Judiciary Committee Democrat said his colleagues will filibuster a nominee they deem unacceptable.

The Fallout From O'Connor's Resignation (NYT)

By Claudia H. Deutsch

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

Few people would dispute the impact that Sandra Day O'Connor, in her 24 years on the Supreme Court, has had on advancing the rights of women and minorities to equal hiring and education opportunities and to a bias-free workplace.

But now that Justice O'Connor is leaving the court, will the pendulum swing back to give employers the right to hire and fire as they please, or even encourage them to dismantle voluntary affirmative action programs?

Neither business leaders nor minority advocates expect that to happen. Minorities and women, they note, make up an increasingly large part of the potential work force - and of the consumer base.

"Sure, we worry that the balance will be tipped when it comes to court rulings affecting people of color, but we don't worry that industry will backtrack," said Harriet R. Michel, president of the Minority Supplier Development Council, which matches minority businesses with corporate customers. "The realities of the American marketplace are such that, if companies don't embrace supplier diversity, they are acting to the detriment of their bottom line."

DOJ_NMG_0001396

The same holds true for hiring policies, said Theodore M. Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund. "From a dollars-and-cents standpoint," he said, "it is no longer economically realistic for companies to be lily-white and male."

In fact, many business leaders feel they have lost a friend in Justice O'Connor.

"I'd love for her to be replaced with a clone," said Roderick M. Hills, a former chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission and now a co-chair of the judicial selection committee of the Committee for Economic Development, a nonpartisan group of business and academic leaders based in Washington. "She had an understanding of acceptable business conduct that was tempered by a real respect for the law."

Justice O'Connor was the swing vote in Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education, a 1999 case that made a school responsible for preventing harassment of students by other students, a ruling with implications for workplace harassment.

She sided with the majority in 1983 when the court ruled that employers must give men and women equal retirement benefits, in a case called Norris v. Arizona Governing Committee. She again sided with the majority in 1986, on Meritor Bank v. Vinson, a case that made it illegal for companies to countenance sexual harassment in their workplaces.

After the announcement of Justice O'Connor's resignation on Friday, civil rights advocacy groups rushed to issue statements of concern and vowed to fight for a replacement equally friendly to their cause.

"She's been the key vote in race cases for more than 20 years," said Mr. Shaw of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund. Jocelyn C. Frye, director of legal and public policy at the National Partnership for Women and Families, also feels the loss. "She made it clear, in all her votes, that affirmative action is an appropriate and lawful remedy if it is done right, and that sexual harassment must be remedied in any context," she said.

Some legal experts say her track record was less clear. "On civil rights issues, sometimes she got it really right, but sometimes she got it really wrong," said Abigail Thernstrom, vice chair of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, an independent federal agency, as well as a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute, a New York-based research group.

Ms. Thernstrom applauded Justice O'Connor's stance in Shaw vs. Reno, a 1993 decision that prohibited North Carolina from implementing a redistricting plan that would effectively have created two districts populated primarily by blacks. But she insists that Justice O'Connor was wrong in Grutter v. Bollinger, the 2003 case that affirmed the University of Michigan Law School's right to take race into consideration in accepting applicants. "She neglected all of the opinions she had enunciated in cases like Shaw," Ms. Thernstrom said.

Justice O'Connor showed sensitivity to affirmative action in certain areas of employment and education, but she also balanced that with her suspicions about the use of race as a criteria for hiring and government contracting. In 1989, she authored a 5-4 opinion that struck down a program, used by Richmond, Va., to set aside a percentage of municipal contracts along racial lines. In the decision, she wrote that the government may use racial preferences in hiring or awarding contracts only if it is rectifying cases of proven past discrimination.

She rarely showed an antipathy to business. Indeed, her majority decision in Grutter v. Bollinger was hailed by minority rights and business groups alike.

The minority groups saw it as guaranteeing better access to higher education; corporations, many of which registered as friends of the court, said it both assured a pipeline of qualified talent and safeguarded the legality of their own internal diversity programs.

Justice O'Connor's impact on the business world was by no means confined to areas of racial and gender equality. Nor were her opinions consistently pro- or anti-business. She was in the majority in 2003 when the court upheld the law restricting the flow of corporate "soft money," or unregulated contributions, to political parties. Many executives at the time said they welcomed the decision because it relieved them of feeling obliged to make large contributions when asked to do so by candidates and party officials.

She won kudos from business groups when she wrote the majority opinion in Gade v. National Solid Wastes Management Association, a 1992 ruling which forbids states from enforcing stricter worker-safety standards than called for by the government, and in Feist Publications v. Rural Telephone Service Company, a 1991 ruling that said consumer addresses and phone numbers in telephone directories are not protected by copyright law, and thus can be used by direct marketers.

DOJ_NMG_0001397

Some of her decisions pleased some business groups while alienating others. For example, 1997, in State Oil v. Kahn, Justice O'Connor wrote that there were circumstances under which price caps on products are not anticompetitive; it was a victory for manufacturers, but a defeat for retailers and wholesalers. She was, at times, a vocal dissenter when the court ruled against business interests. The court placed an upward limit on punitive damage awards only in 2003, in State Farm v. Campbell. Justice O'Connor had fought for such a limit for years.

"Business has lost its absolute best friend and most passionate advocate on the issue of limiting punitive damages," said Carter G. Phillips, a managing partner of the law firm Sidley Austin Brown & Wood.

Nor did Justice O'Connor march in lock step with civil rights advocates in areas of race and gender bias. In 1986, in Wygant v. Jackson Board of Education, she wrote the opinion that a school district must lay off teachers in order of seniority, even if that meant a disproportionate number of black teachers would lose their jobs.

"Hers was often a difficult vote to get, and she wrote many anti-affirmative action opinions," Mr. Shaw said, citing the Richmond, Va., case as a particular irritant. "But, in an increasingly conservative court, at least her vote was in play."

In Other News From The Middle, Some Shifts By Justice Kennedy (WP)

By Charles Lane, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

All eyes were on Justice Sandra Day O'Connor after the Supreme Court wrapped up its term this week.

But while O'Connor and her centrist legacy may have been at the center of attention because of her surprise retirement announcement Friday, the center of power during the term was one chair to her left, where Justice Anthony M. Kennedy -- the court's other center-right swing voter -- sits.

In three crucial cases this term, Kennedy, a 1988 appointee of President Ronald Reagan, defected from the five-member right-of-center bloc that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist nominally leads.

Kennedy joined with the court's liberals to abolish the death penalty for juvenile offenders, to give local governments a green light to take private property for economic development and to endorse a broad theory of federal regulatory power that denied states the right to override a federal law against homegrown medical marijuana.

O'Connor actually found herself in dissent in most of the court's big cases last term, voting to uphold the juvenile death penalty, to strike down Texas's display of the Ten Commandments, to forbid takings of private property for economic development and to uphold California's right to pass a medical marijuana law.

And she expressed that dissent in what was, for her, an unusually uncompromising tone; she seemed uninterested in keeping her options open for future cases, as she often did in the past.

In the marijuana case, for example, she accused the majority of "threaten[ing] to sweep all of productive human activity into federal regulatory reach."

In hindsight, this may have been a clue to her plans to retire. Referring to the property rights case, Richard J. Lazarus, a professor of law at Georgetown University, noted that it was very uncharacteristic of O'Connor. "It didn't read like an O'Connor opinion," he said. "It made me think she was in a different frame of mind."

For Kennedy's part, not only did he desert the conservative camp on crucial issues, he did so in spite of his past votes and writings on the court, which suggested that he might have come out the other way each time.

"What's up with Justice Kennedy?" Boston University law professor Randy Barnett asked at a forum on the recently concluded term sponsored by the American Constitution Society last week. "He's clearly crossed some kind of a Rubicon. That's the big news of this term."

Kennedy's rulings further angered conservative activists who were already upset with him because of his authorship of the court's opinion last year abolishing state laws against same-sex sodomy.

In a generally disappointing term for the right, some conservatives said the only bright spot in the court's Kennedy-supported leftward movement was that it will help them rally their base to urge President Bush to put a committed conservative on the court.

DOJ_NMG_0001398

"As grievous as some of the rulings are," said Jan LaRue, chief counsel of Concerned Women for America, a conservative group that focuses on social issues, "they have the good effect of awakening more Americans to how important each vote on the court is."

There could be two vacancies to fill if Rehnquist, 80 and suffering from thyroid cancer, follows his old friend O'Connor into retirement.

Rehnquist seemed frail last Monday and struggled to speak clearly through a special valve in his throat where doctors performed surgery in October to help him breathe. He seemed in good spirits, however, cracking a joke about the lengthy list of dissenting and concurring opinions in one case.

Rehnquist was being a good sport at the end of a term in which his influence seemed to ebb along with his physical health.

Of the 24 cases decided by a vote of 5 to 4, the conservative coalition of Rehnquist, O'Connor, Kennedy, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas held together in only five, according to statistics compiled by the law firm Goldstein & Howe.

In the previous two terms, the conservative majority had held together in almost half of the 5 to 4 cases, the firm said.

Capital punishment, property rights, state sovereignty and more latitude for official expressions of religious sentiment have all been pet causes of the chief justice in his 33 years on the court. He has helped moved the court to the right on each of these issues during the past decade -- but found himself mostly in dissent on them this term.

Kennedy was the difference-maker in the death penalty case, writing the opinion for a five-member majority that found the country had formed a "national consensus" against executing offenders who were younger than 18 at the time of their crimes.

This implicitly repudiated a position Kennedy had taken in 1989, when he joined the court in upholding the practice. As recently as 2003, he had voted to reinstate a juvenile's death sentence that had been put on hold by an appeals court.

This time, he buttressed his argument with references to other countries' opposition to the juvenile death penalty, drawing fire from conservatives who saw him importing foreign law into the interpretation of the Constitution -- as he had previously done in striking down the sodomy laws.

Notably, Kennedy could have reached the same result in the death penalty case without making such references. "To add that separate section is an example of Kennedy's really declaring his independence from the conservative orthodoxy of originalism," Supreme Court litigator Paul Smith said at the American Constitution Society forum.

On property rights, Kennedy supplied a fifth vote to a four-member liberal bloc to uphold local governments' right to buy out private property when deemed necessary to promote broader economic development.

The property rights activists who brought the case had expected Kennedy's support, based in part on his generally pro-property-rights record on the court.

And in the medical marijuana case, Kennedy joined Scalia in breaking with a recent string of cases in which they and the court's other conservatives had struck down federal laws on the grounds that they exceeded Congress's power to regulate interstate commerce.

But whereas Scalia supplied a separate opinion explaining how his positions then and now could be reconciled, Kennedy simply cast his vote without further comment.

Even when Rehnquist had a majority including Kennedy -- as he did in upholding a six-foot stone monument of the Ten Commandments on the Texas Capitol grounds -- it was a shallow victory.

The fifth vote in his coalition came not from someone who agreed with his long-standing view that the commandments are generally permissible on government property, but from Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who accepted the monument on the much narrower basis that it had not aroused much controversy during its four-decade stay in Austin.

Court's Term A Turn Back To The Center (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, July 4, 2005

WASHINGTON, July 3 - Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's unexpected retirement announcement last week shifted public attention toward her legacy and the Supreme Court's future and away from the term that just concluded. But the term - apparently not the Rehnquist Court's last, after all - contained its share of notable developments that, taken together, cast a shadow of ambiguity over Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's legacy.

The court's federalism revolution stalled, while the revival of property rights, which appeared to be taking off not long ago, crashed and burned on a riverbank in New London, Conn.

The court displayed a growing concern about the death penalty, with the majority suggesting that lower courts had taken the Supreme Court's impatience with prolonged appeals too far toward short-circuiting defendants' rights. The justices also gave broad interpretations to three federal antidiscrimination laws.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer displaced Justice O'Connor at the court's center of gravity, casting the fewest dissenting votes - 10, to Justice O'Connor's 11 - in the 74 cases that were decided with full opinions.

As the Rehnquist Court ended a 19th year and appeared poised, unexpectedly, to begin a 20th, it was almost as if a constitutional centripetal force had been at work in recent years, pulling the court back toward the middle in many areas of its docket, including federalism, affirmative action, religion and abortion. The result frustrated conservatives and raised the stakes for the appointment of Justice O'Connor's successor.

The court's six discrimination cases from this past term provide an example. Three were brought under the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection, and the others required an interpretation of three different federal statutes.

In all six cases, with Justice O'Connor in the majority in four, the court adopted a broader reading of the relevant provision, not necessarily handing victory to the particular individuals but keeping avenues of legal redress open for the future.

Beyond these case-specific trends, the voting patterns this term were unusual.

In recent terms, the five most conservative members of the court, Chief Justice Rehnquist, Justice O'Connor, and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony M. Kennedy and Clarence Thomas, displayed a striking degree of cohesion. They voted together, for example, in half of the 18 5-to-4 decisions in the 2003-2004 term. In the past five terms, their alliance in the most closely divided cases ranged from a low of just over one-third of the cases in one term to a high of 70 percent of them in another.

But in the latest term, which began Oct. 4 and ended June 27, the five voted together in only 18 percent of the cases decided by five-member majorities, 4 out of 22. (Four of the 22 cases were decided by votes of 5 to 3, with the chief justice not participating.)

Although theories were available to explain votes that looked anomalous, some of the alignments turned heads. For example, Justices Scalia and Kennedy joined Justice Breyer and Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg to reject the states' rights position in the California medical marijuana case. Justice Breyer provided the crucial fifth vote for Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion upholding the Ten Commandments monument on the grounds of the Texas State Capitol.

In 48 split decisions this past term, Justices Ginsburg and Breyer, President Bill Clinton's two Supreme Court appointments (and the only two current justices to have been appointed by a Democratic president), were on opposite sides in 11. Justices Scalia and Thomas, who are often mistakenly viewed as ideologically inseparable, were on opposite sides in 12.

After their 11 years together, what has gotten into these nine justices?

Nelson Lund of the George Mason University School of Law, who was a law clerk for Justice O'Connor during the court's 1987 term, said in an interview that there was a tendency to blame her for outcomes that have disappointed Professor Lund's fellow conservatives. "But the easy explanations are not quite adequate," he said.

Pointing out that courts proceed incrementally, informed by precedent and by the facts of each case, Professor Lund continued: "There is a deep current of common-law thinking that pervades our legal system. Our courts rarely make a lot of big lurches. Usually when they make a big step, it's because people didn't realize how big a step it was, and then they pull back."

Kathleen M. Sullivan, a liberal legal scholar and former dean of Stanford Law School, offered a similar observation. The court's recent behavior may be "as much psychological as jurisprudential," she said in an interview.

Professor Sullivan said some of the term's more surprising outcomes may reflect the fact that the Supreme Court, its membership stable while the lower federal courts have had considerable turnover, is now by some measures to the left of some of the federal appeals courts.

She said some justices may have been alarmed to find that the appeals courts were carrying their opinions further than intended or were applying them in unanticipated ways. This, in turn, may explain why in several decisions this year, including rulings for defendants in death penalty cases, the Supreme Court did not articulate new legal principles so much as correct what it saw as erroneous lower court opinions, a role it usually avoids. "The middle justices have seen themselves as guardians of the court's integrity even at the price of inconsistency," Professor Sullivan said.

The term was something of a triumph for Justice Stevens, the longest-serving associate justice and a vigorous 85-year-old who has no plans to retire; in fact, this week he is interviewing applicants for clerkships for the court's term that begins in October 2006.

Of his several major opinions, by far the sweetest for him must have been his majority opinion in Gonzales v. Raich, declaring that federal authority trumped California's medical marijuana initiative. Justice Stevens, a Republican named to the court by President Gerald Ford and now arguably the most liberal justice, has been adamant in resisting the states' rights tilt of the court in a series of federalism cases. He also wrote for the majority in the eminent domain case, Kelo v. City of New London, and in an important age discrimination case, Smith v. City of Jackson.

Justice Stevens filed one particularly notable dissenting opinion during the term, in a case that prohibited states from discriminating against out-of-state wineries. In Justice Stevens' view, the intent of the 21st Amendment, adopted in 1933, was to give states free rein in regulating alcohol use and commerce within their borders. To support his argument, he drew on a resource no other justice had available: a memory of the repeal of Prohibition. "My understanding (and recollection) of the historical context reinforces my conviction" about the meaning of the amendment, he said.

Course corrections were made by justices across the ideological spectrum, even in areas of the docket not usually seen as lightning rods. For example, the court upheld the federal beef marketing program that finances the "Beef, it's what's for dinner" advertising campaign through assessments on cattle producers, even on those who object to paying.

A Supreme Court decision fours years earlier had found that a similar program amounted to compelled speech in violation of the First Amendment. The decision used language that, if taken to a logical conclusion, suggested a new constitutional basis for attacking a range of government programs, even taxation.

So in an opinion by Justice Scalia, who had joined the earlier decision, the court tacked back, shutting the door on that First Amendment theory before it could gain momentum. Chief Justice Rehnquist also changed sides.

In the constant dynamic of stability and change inside the court, justices find different comfort levels. With Justice O'Connor's departure, change will now come, for the first time in 11 years, from outside the court as well.

Criminal Law and Sentencing

The court's continuing re-examination of the respective roles of judges and juries in criminal sentencing produced a transformation in federal guidelines.

The decision in United States v. Booker, No. 04-104, was really two separate 5-to-4 opinions supported by two different coalitions of justices. First, Justices Stevens, Scalia, Souter, Thomas and Ginsburg held that the federal sentencing guidelines were unconstitutional because they gave judges power that, under the Sixth Amendment's right to a trial by jury, belonged to the jurors - namely, the power to make the factual findings that determine the sentence.

A second coalition, composed of Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Breyer, Kennedy, O'Connor and Ginsburg, then ruled that the problem could be fixed by making the guidelines advisory rather than mandatory, restoring to federal judges some of the discretion that Congress had taken away 21 years earlier.

In another case, the court ruled 5 to 4 that the Constitution categorically bars capital punishment for crimes committed before the age of 18. Justice Kennedy's opinion in the case, Roper v. Simmons, No. 03-633, overturned a 1989 precedent that had set the age at 16. The Roper decision also concluded that the American public, as well as the world, had turned against the death penalty for juveniles. Justices Scalia, Thomas and O'Connor dissented, along with Chief Justice Rehnquist.

For only the third time in 20 years, the court overturned a death sentence on the ground that the defendant had received a constitutionally inadequate defense. Justice Souter's 5-to-4 opinion in Rompilla v. Beard, No. 04-5462, was joined by Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, Breyer and O'Connor.

In Deck v. Missouri, No. 04-5293, the court ruled 7 to 2 that it is unconstitutional to use shackles to restrain a prisoner during a death penalty sentencing hearing unless there is a particular reason for doing so. Justice Breyer said for the majority that shackling was inherently prejudicial and required "adequate justification." Justices Thomas and Scalia dissented.

The court also ruled that in making a routine traffic stop, the police can allow a trained dog to sniff the car for drugs without the need for any particular suspicion of a narcotics violation. Justices Souter and Ginsburg dissented in the case, Illinois v. Caballes, No. 03-923, and the chief justice did not vote.

In Castle Rock v. Gonzales, No. 04-278, the court held that the police do not have a constitutional duty to enforce a court-issued domestic order of protection. The 7-to-2 decision overturned an appeals court ruling that allowed a woman to sue a Colorado police department for failing to take action after her estranged husband violated a restraining order by kidnapping their three daughters, whom he then murdered.

The mandatory arrest language on the order could not displace the police department's ordinary exercise of discretion, the court held in an opinion by Justice Scalia, over the dissenting votes of Justices Stevens and Ginsburg.

Property Rights

In what was perhaps the term's most disputed decision, the court ruled that fostering economic development is an appropriate use of the government's power of eminent domain. The 5-to-4 decision in Kelo v. City of New London, No. 04-108, upheld a plan in the economically depressed Connecticut city to replace an old residential neighborhood with office space and a conference hotel. The majority opinion by Justice Stevens was joined by Justices Kennedy, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer.

The court also unanimously upheld Hawaii's rent-control law for gasoline stations, rejecting the oil companies' argument that limiting their rate of return amounted to an unconstitutional "taking" of private property. The case was Lingle v. Chevron U.S.A. Inc., No. 04-163.

Religion

Two decisions on government display of the Ten Commandments looked in opposite directions, with only Justice Breyer joining the majority in each of the 5-to-4 rulings.

In Van Orden v. Perry, No. 03-1500, the court found that the display of a six-foot-high Ten Commandments monument on the grounds of the Texas State Capitol did not amount to an unconstitutional "establishment" of religion. Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote the opinion, joined by Justices Breyer, Kennedy, Scalia and Thomas.

In McCreary County v. American Civil Liberties Union, No. 03-1693, the court held that the framed display of the Ten Commandments on the walls of two Kentucky county courthouses, although surrounded by other texts of historical interest and secular content, was unconstitutional. Justices Souter, O'Connor, Ginsburg and Stevens, along with Justice Breyer, voted in the majority.

Also, the court ruled unanimously that a new federal law, the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, does not violate the separation of church and state in requiring prison officials to meet inmates' religious needs. Justice Ginsburg's opinion in Cutter v. Wilkinson, No. 03-9877, warned, however, that prison security remained a "compelling state interest" and that demonstrated problems in accommodating inmates' requests would be resolved in favor of prison officials.

Discrimination

The federal law that bars sex discrimination in schools and colleges also prohibits school officials from retaliating against those who bring complaints of such discrimination, the court ruled in Jackson v. Birmingham Board of Education, No. 02-1672. The 5-to-4 decision expanded the scope of the law known as Title IX to include protection for whistle-blowers. Justice O'Connor's majority opinion was joined by Justices Stevens, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer.

Also, employees who sue for age discrimination do not have to prove that the discrimination was intentional, the court ruled. The 5-to-3 decision in Smith v. City of Jackson, No. 03-1160, applied to the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, the "disparate impact" theory of liability long familiar under the laws against race and sex discrimination. Employees need not produce a smoking gun, but can win by showing that a policy has the effect of discriminating against older workers, regardless of an employer's motivation. The dissenters were Justices Thomas, Kennedy, and O'Connor. Chief Justice Rehnquist did not participate.

In Spector v. Norwegian Cruise Line Ltd., No. 03-1388, the court ruled 6 to 3 that the Americans With Disabilities Act protects the rights of passengers who sail on cruise ships that call at American ports, even ships that fly under foreign flags, as most do. However, ships will not be required to make major structural alterations. The dissenters were Justices Scalia and O'Connor and Chief Justice Rehnquist.

The court also overturned a 20-year-old murder conviction in Texas on the ground that the jury selection had been infected by racial discrimination. The 6-to-3 decision in Miller-El v. Dretke, No. 03-9659, was the court's second ruling on behalf of the death row inmate, Thomas Miller-El. The dissenters were Justices Thomas and Scalia and Chief Justice Rehnquist.

In another case, the court ruled that a California prison policy that temporarily segregates new or newly transferred inmates by race, for the stated purpose of preventing gang violence, was constitutionally suspect and not entitled to the judicial deference that is usually accorded to prison administration policies. The vote in Johnson v. California, No. 03-636, was 5 to 3, with Chief Justice Rehnquist not participating. Justice Stevens said in his dissent that the policy was flatly unconstitutional. Justices Scalia and Thomas, dissenting on different grounds, said the court should have deferred to prison officials.

Federalism

Reasserting federal authority, the court upheld the power of Congress to prohibit and prosecute the possession and use of marijuana, even in California and the 10 other states that allowed it for medical purposes. A federal appeals court had ruled that the noncommercial cultivation and use of marijuana that did not cross state lines fell outside Congress's constitutional authority to regulate interstate commerce.

The vote in Gonzales v. Raich, No. 03-1454, was 6 to 3. The surprise was not that Justices Stevens, Ginsburg, Souter, and Breyer voted with the majority, but that Justices Kennedy and Scalia defected from their usual states' rights allies to vote to uphold federal power.

Rejecting state protectionism in the national wine market, the court overturned liquor laws in New York and Michigan and ruled that states that allow in-state wineries to ship directly to consumers must give the same privilege to out-of-state wineries. The vote in Granholm v. Heald, No. 03-1116, was 5 to 4, with Justices Kennedy, Scalia, Souter, Ginsburg and Breyer in the majority.

The court rejected a claim of federal pre-emption and allowed suits to go forward in state court claiming negligence in the design and manufacture of pesticides and herbicides. These products are regulated under a federal law, the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act, and the Bush administration had argued that this statute, which does not allow private lawsuits in federal court, also implicitly blocked the states from opening their courts to such suits. The vote in Bates v. Dow AgroSciences L.L.C., No. 03-388, was 7 to 2, with Justices Thomas and Scalia dissenting.

Immigration

The court ruled unanimously that driving under the influence of alcohol, even when serious injury results, is not a "crime of violence" for which an immigrant should face automatic deportation. Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote the opinion in Leocal v. Ashcroft, No. 03-583, which rejected the Bush administration's interpretation of federal immigration law.

Meanwhile, Cubans who entered the United States during the Mariel boatlift in 1980 and subsequently committed crimes cannot be subjected to open-ended detention, the court ruled in a 7-to-2 decision. Although these Cubans, as many as 1,000 of the 125,000 who arrived in the boatlift, are now deportable, Cuba will not take them back. They may not be held for more than six months without a special reason, Justice Scalia said for the court in Clark v. Martinez, No. 03-878. Justice Thomas and Chief Justice Rehnquist dissented.

Immigrants from Somalia may be deported despite the lack of a centrally functioning government in Somalia to receive them, the court ruled 5 to 4 in Jama v. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, No. 03-674. The dissenters were Justices Souter, Stevens, Ginsburg and Breyer.

Business

The court unanimously overturned the criminal conviction of the accounting firm Arthur Andersen for shredding documents related to its work for Enron as that company was collapsing in 2001. Chief Justice Rehnquist said for the majority in Arthur Andersen v. United States, No. 04-368, that the judge's instructions to the jury failed to require the necessary proof that the firm knew its actions were wrong. The victory came too late for Andersen, which lost its clients and its licenses and now has 200 employees, down from 28,000, wrapping up the firm's affairs.

In another unanimous opinion, the court reinstated a copyright-infringement suit by Hollywood studios and the music industry against two file-sharing services whose software enables users to download copyrighted movies and songs.

Overturning an appeals court ruling in favor of the services, Grokster and StreamCast Networks, the court held that a company shown to induce copyright infringement can be liable even if its products also have lawful uses. While sending the case, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios v. Grokster Ltd., No. 04-480, back to the lower courts, the justices made it clear that they believed the plaintiffs had presented ample evidence of inducement.

Upholding an interpretation by the Federal Communications Commission, the court ruled that cable companies do not have to allow rivals to offer high-speed Internet access over their systems. The 6-to-3 decision in National Cable & Telecommunications Association v. Brand X Internet Services, No. 04-277, was a victory for cable in the competition to provide broadband service. Justices Scalia, Souter and Ginsburg dissented.

In another case, the court ruled unanimously that federal bankruptcy law shields individual retirement accounts from creditors. The decision in Rousey v. Jacoway, No. 03-1407, extended the protection already provided to 401(k) accounts and company pension plans.

The court also raised the bar for investors bringing securities fraud cases. The mere accusation that a company's misrepresentations inflated the stock price is an insufficient basis for a suit, the court ruled unanimously in Dura Pharmaceuticals Inc. v. Broudo, No. 03-932. Instead, investors must claim at the outset that it was the artificially high stock price that actually caused their losses.

High Court's Junior Member A Power Broker (AP-Y2)

By Gina Holland, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 5, 2005

The power broker at the Supreme Court this term was the "junior justice," Stephen Breyer. He was on the winning side in the 10 biggest cases of the year, covering capital punishment, medical marijuana, property rights and Ten Commandments displays.

By contrast, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was in the majority only three times as his conservative bloc splintered again and again.

Of course, the top news from the court was the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. She announced on Friday that she would leave as soon as President Bush's nominee is confirmed.

It is the first vacancy on the court since 1994, the longest stretch since the early 1800s.

Bush could have a second seat to fill should the 80-year-old Rehnquist, who has thyroid cancer, decide to step down, too. The widower announced his illness in October and his future on the court is very much in doubt.

O'Connor's pending departure means Breyer finally will shed the "junior justice" title he has held for 11 years. As the newest member of the court, he is saddled with such menial duties as answering the door when justices hold weekly private meetings.

But there was nothing back bench about the performance by the Clinton appointee this session.

The 66-year-old former college professor and congressional lawyer was a pivotal vote in two cases that set a new standard for religious displays in government buildings.

Breyer, known for his amiable style, also is credited with working out a compromise that salvaged federal sentencing guidelines. It was an important decision because about 64,000 people are sentenced in federal courts each year.

"He has such a well-developed sense of diplomacy that it's not surprising to see his long-term moderate vision is now being embraced by the court," said Georgetown University law professor Neal Katyal, a former Breyer law clerk.

Among Breyer's surprises this term was his critical role in two Ten Commandments cases decided on the final day of the term. Together, the rulings made clear that overtly religious displays are unconstitutional, but historic ones are allowed. Breyer was the only justice in the majority on both.

"He has become the most pragmatic person on the court. He has a way of taking the temperature of society," said Marci Hamilton, a former O'Connor clerk whose new book is "God vs. The Gavel," about courts and religion.

Overall this session, the court ruled in about 80 cases; one-third of them were resolved on 5-4 votes.

Usually the five conservatives, sometimes known as the "Rehnquist five," vote together in about half of the 5-4 decisions. This year they were together in just five such rulings.

DOJ_NMG_0001404

O'Connor and Anthony Kennedy, both appointed by President Reagan, were not the swing voters they usually are on sharply divided issues.

"Almost all of the court's members found themselves in unusual alignments as novel questions came before them," said Thomas Goldstein, a lawyer who argues before the court and tracks voting trends.

Rehnquist disagreed with rulings that made it unconstitutional to execute juvenile murderers; said federal drug agents did not have to honor state medical marijuana laws; barred a Ten Commandments display in Kentucky; and empowered local governments to seize people's homes for use for projects that will generate tax revenue.

"This term confirms that Chief Justice Rehnquist's legacy on the court is more in the nature of a correction than a revolution," said Richard Garnett, a Notre Dame law professor and former Rehnquist clerk.

Breyer filed 11 dissents, although none in major cases. He read a dissent from the bench in one case, to demonstrate his dissatisfaction when the court ruled against a Tennessee death row inmate who wanted to pursue more appeals.

Overall, however, the court was sympathetic to claims that inmates had been treated unfairly. The court overturned the death sentences of four inmates. In a fifth case, the justices ruled that states cannot put to death killers who were not at least 18-years-old at the time of the crime.

Playing a pivotal role in the capital punishment cases, and others, was the court's oldest member, 85-year-old John Paul Stevens. Stevens presided on the bench while Rehnquist was receiving radiation and chemotherapy treatments. Rehnquist was off the bench for five months. He voted in most of the cases, however.

Stevens, on the court since 1975, had taken the unusual step of calling for an end to juvenile executions in 2002, but he did not have the votes to accomplish it. He called the executions a "relic of the past" and "inconsistent with evolving standards of decency in a civilized society." This time, Stevens prevailed with the vote of Kennedy.

"People forget that Justice Stevens has also been on the court a long time, building a legacy of his own," Garnett said.

Political Calculus Of Replacing O'Connor (LEGALT)

By T.R. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, July 4, 2005

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's surprise retirement leaves President George W. Bush in a bind: Can he possibly replace the first woman on the Supreme Court with a white male?

After all, prior to O'Connor's July 1 announcement, most of the smart money for a potential high court nominee was on middle-aged white judges such as John Roberts of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit and J. Michael Luttig of the 4th Circuit. But that was to replace Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who, at least for the moment, is staying.

"Do you replace O'Connor with a woman, or with a Hispanic, so you have a new first?" says American University law professor Stephen Wermiel. "The question is, who are you trying to appease? And are you looking for a fight — or looking to avoid a fight?"

Competing interest groups lost no time in laying down markers, and rallying their troops. Hispanic activists, for one, and their interest groups say the opportunity is ripe for Bush to name the nation's first Hispanic justice. Nominating a Hispanic would also help the Republican Party woo a key and growing constituency that it has actively courted.

"It's been 10 years now since we've had a vacancy, and a lot has changed," notes Mickey Ibarra, a former Clinton administration official who now has his own lobby shop. "Hispanics are becoming the largest minority, and whether it's for a replacement of Rehnquist or O'Connor, consideration of a Hispanic seems like it has to be a must."

But the person some see as the leading Hispanic candidate, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, is viewed as flatly unacceptable by the hard-line conservative and evangelical groups that take credit for Bush's presidential re-election victory.

"He's not an ideological conservative; it's not a world he comes from," notes one senior Republican Senate staffer. "And we don't believe he has convictions he will stand by. As one former Supreme Court clerk said to me, 'When the most charming man in Washington, [Justice] Stephen Breyer, comes calling, will Gonzales stand up for his beliefs?"

That may make someone like Judge Emilio Garza of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit a more likely candidate. Garza is viewed as a passionate opponent of Roe v. Wade. And if the White House seeks a minority candidate, but not a Hispanic one, it could turn to former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, now general counsel of PepsiCo.

There is also the possibility of nominating a female justice to replace O'Connor. Here, the most likely candidates are two judges on the 5th Circuit — Edith Jones, who was appointed by President Ronald Reagan, and Edith Brown Clement, a 2001 Bush appointee.

Jones is considered by conservatives to be ideologically sound. But her lengthy paper trail and outspoken manner would give opponents plenty of ammunition.

In O'Connor's case, it isn't as simple as replacing a woman with another woman, or a minority with a minority. As the Court's most consistent swing vote, O'Connor's replacement could have a far greater impact on future Supreme Court decisions — about affirmative action, federalism, and abortion, for example — than Rehnquist's replacement would have.

"The significance could not be greater," says Elliot Mincberg, general counsel of People for the American Way, one of the leading liberal interest groups in the upcoming Supreme Court fight.

"It's not a question of being merely conservative," said Mincberg, about a possible O'Connor replacement. "It's a question of [a nominee] being so far to the right as to literally flip the Court in a whole range of areas."

And some interest groups are counting on that.

"We expect the president to be true to his word, as he has been with his appellate court nominations, and to name someone in the likeness of [Justices Antonin] Scalia and [Clarence] Thomas," says Jan LaRue, the chief counsel of Concerned Women for America, a conservative public policy women's organization, which claims 500,000 members.

Of course, Bush always retains the possibility of replacing O'Connor with one of several appellate court judges who had been considered strong possibilities if Rehnquist resigned, such as Roberts, Luttig, or Michael McConnell of the 10th Circuit.

"I think the smart move is to pick John Roberts," says American University's Wermiel. "I think Roberts will play very well in the nominations process. He's polished, accomplished, easygoing, and not intimidating."

If the White House wants a fight, it will find one. And if Bush does name a far-right ideological conservative, like Luttig or Jones or Garza, Senate Democrats would almost certainly filibuster the nominee.

In that case, the Senate would be right back to the ugly precipice where it found itself this spring, with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) threatening to use a parliamentary maneuver to eliminate the judicial filibuster.

That crisis was averted, at least for the time being, by a May 23 deal cut by seven moderate Democrats and seven moderate Republicans. The Democrats agreed not to filibuster a nominee, and the Republicans agreed not to eliminate the judicial filibuster, except in "extraordinary circumstances."

The White House may also have to appease the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), whose chairmanship was almost derailed earlier this year after his comments that a Supreme Court nominee who opposed abortion rights was not likely to win Senate confirmation.

"The stakes have changed," Wermiel notes. "Rehnquist was just going to be a dress rehearsal for this moment, for the swing vacancy. But we skipped the dress rehearsal and went to opening night."

Sean Rushton, the executive director of the Committee for Justice, a leading conservative judicial nominations interest group, says Bush should focus on substance, not ethnicity or gender.

"Find someone who fits the bill ideologically," he says. "But all things being equal, why not go with a woman or a Hispanic?"

Of course, Bush could always nominate a so-called mainstream conservative, one whom the Democrats could find very few reasons to filibuster. Indeed, at a brief Rose Garden announcement about O'Connor's resignation Friday, he spoke about wanting a "dignified process . . . characterized by fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

Seth Rosenthal, the legal director of the liberal Alliance for Justice, notes that one way the president could avoid a knock-down, drag-out fight is to name one of the Republican-appointed "consensus nominees" recently identified by the Alliance. The four are: Judge Stanley Marcus of the 11th Circuit; Michael Mukasey, a federal trial judge in New York; Judge Edward Prado of the 5th Circuit; and Judge Ann Williams of the 7th Circuit.

O'Connor, Rosenthal says, was just such a selection.

"She's certainly a conservative on a host of issues, on states' rights, criminal justice issues, you name it," he says. "But she did not bring an ideological agenda to the bench. She decided things on a case-by-case basis. She decided things in an incremental way."

Fred Barnes column: The Two Roads (WEEKSTAN)

Weekly Standard, July 4, 2005

THROUGH A CAMPAIGN AIDE, Bush answered a question about the kind of Supreme Court justice he admired. The answer was Antonin Scalia, a conservative. That was in 1999, as Bush was beginning his race for the presidency. He was asked a similar question later that year by Tim Russert on Meet the Press. The answer was the same--Scalia. Now jump to the summer of 2003 as Bush is preparing for his reelection campaign. Meeting with advisers at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, Bush said one of his top priorities is to create a diverse Republican party with many more Hispanics.

Bush's comments point to the two directions he must choose between in selecting a nominee to replace Sandra Day O'Connor on the Supreme Court. The first--the Scalia direction--would be to pick a respected conservative jurist and thus move the ideological tilt of the court to the right. The second would be to choose Attorney General Alberto Gonzales or another Hispanic, a step unlikely to change the court's current ideological posture.

The first would be in sync with the thrust of Bush's presidency. As Bush and his aides never tire of telling everyone, he came to the White House to do big things and achieve important changes. And transforming the Supreme Court into a more conservative body and shrinking the role of unelected judges in American life is one of his major goals.

Bush also prides himself on not doing the easy or politically popular thing. He could have sought minor adjustments in Social Security to improve its solvency, but he chose to promote total reform. After routing al Qaeda terrorists in Afghanistan, he could have stopped and gone no further, preserving his high poll rating. Instead he deposed Saddam Hussein in Iraq.

Nominating a full-blown judicial conservative--there are plenty to choose from--would surely provoke a bitter confirmation struggle in the Senate. He might even lose the fight. But all of Bush's accomplishments have come over the strong opposition of Democrats or have drawn sharp criticism from them. This includes tax cuts, education reform, creation of a Homeland Security Department, and Iraq. Bush's motto, if he had one, should be no pain, no gain.

Placing another conservative on the high court, and perhaps several more if other resignations occur, would give Bush a lasting and extraordinarily significant legacy. And by nudging the court to the right Bush would merely be counteracting what President Clinton did with his two Supreme Court nominations. Clinton filled vacancies on the court with liberals Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer. Each replaced a more conservative justice, Harry Blackmun and Byron White, respectively.

Naming Gonzales or another Hispanic to the high court would be in line with Bush's political goal of enlarging the Republican party. And picking Gonzales might indeed help in that regard. He would be the first Hispanic justice. A Gonzales nomination would also be personally satisfying to Bush. "The president loves Alberto Gonzales and trusts him," Texas Senator John Cornyn, a friend of both, said. Gonzales was Bush's White House counsel before becoming attorney general.

But there's a difference between trying to improve the position of a political party and seizing an historic opportunity to change both the role and the rulings of the federal judiciary. The first is a decision any president or politician would make. Given the furor the second could provoke, it's a decision only a few presidents would make. My guess is Bush is one of them.

Cool Off Rhetoric On Court, Bush Says (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, July 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0001407

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Monday that special-interest groups running TV ads and mobilizing supporters for a fight over his choice of a successor to Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor should "tone down the heated rhetoric." He forcefully defended Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a prospect criticized by conservatives.

"Al Gonzales is a great friend of mine," Bush said in a phone interview. "When a friend gets attacked, I don't like it." (Related item: Q-and-A excerpts)

Conservative groups have criticized Gonzales, who, as a member of the Texas Supreme Court, backed exceptions to a state law requiring teenagers to notify a parent before getting an abortion.

In his first response to questions about the vacancy since O'Connor's surprise announcement Friday, Bush said he won't rush a decision but wants her successor to be on the bench when the Supreme Court resumes work in October.

He said he's considering — "a good-sized" number of prospects. "I will begin to hone in on a handful of candidates over the course of the next few weeks," he said. Then, he said, he will interview them himself.

Asked whether women and minorities are on his list, Bush said, "Of course there's a diverse group of citizens." He hasn't identified any potential nominees. Gonzales is Hispanic; the court has never had a Hispanic member.

Kay Daly of the Coalition for a Fair Judiciary, a coalition of conservative organizations, said her group is split on Gonzales. She said some think Gonzales' record "does not fit" the conservative mold of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, whom Bush has repeatedly cited as models for his choice of a nominee to the high court.

O'Connor's resignation announcement was a surprise to the White House. Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who is battling cancer, was considered the most likely to depart.

O'Connor's decision immediately launched an aggressive effort by interest groups to influence Bush's choice of a replacement.

People for the American Way, a liberal group, is running a TV ad asking whether Bush will "follow history, choosing a judge who protects our fundamental rights and freedoms," or "divide the country." Progress for America, a conservative group, has sent 8.7 million e-mails telling supporters to ignore Democrats' attacks.

Richard Davis, a political science professor at Brigham Young University and author of Electing Justice: Fixing the Supreme Court Nomination Process, said the coming weeks will "look like a presidential campaign."

At stake are divisive issues such as abortion rights and affirmative action. Bush, who has said Americans aren't ready to ban abortion, declined to say whether he will name a justice who would vote to outlaw it. "As I have repeatedly said, I do not believe in a litmus test for my judges," he said.

Bush said lobbying won't affect him: "I feel no pressure except the pressure to put somebody on the bench who will bring dignity to the office, somebody who's got the intellect necessary to do the job, somebody of great integrity and somebody who will faithfully interpret the Constitution."

He cautioned against a partisan war. "I would hope that the groups involved in this process — the special-interest groups — will help tone down the heated rhetoric and focus on the nominee's credentials and philosophy," he said.

The Senate, which has been fighting for months about his nominees to federal courts, can "get rid of the bitterness and rancor that seem to have been prevalent in a lot of the recent debates," he said.

Q-and-A: Bush Wants Justice Of 'Great Integrity And Intellect' (USAT)

USA Today, July 5, 2005

President Bush spoke Monday with USA TODAY's Judy Keen about filling the vacancy on the Supreme Court. These excerpts have been edited for length. (Related item: Bush: 'Tone down' rhetoric)

Q: Do you want to move the Supreme Court in a more conservative direction?

A: This is a responsibility I take very seriously, and I have indicated in the course of two campaigns that I intend to nominate a person with great integrity and intellect and experience who will faithfully interpret the Constitution.

Q: Do you believe the court is not conservative enough?

A: I'm making the pick based upon the criterion I just outlined. I'm looking at a wide range of candidates, people from different walks of life. I will begin to hone in on a handful of candidates over the course of the next few weeks and then will submit my nomination. But I am looking for an individual able to do the job, of course, who will bring great judgment to the bench and one who has the philosophy that I just outlined.

Q: Are you considering waiting until August to announce your choice so opponents don't have a full month to attack while Congress is recessed?

A: I have reached out to members of the Senate and will continue to do so. And then there will be a period of time in which I myself will sit down with the prospective nominees. But I was very serious when I said we need to have this person on the bench prior to the beginning of the next session.

Q: Would you like the Senate to return in August to deal with the nomination?

A: Part of the consultative process with the Senate, of course, will be to determine how best to get a speedy resolution to the nomination. I look forward to consulting with the Senate to make sure that the dialogue and tone of the debate is one that will bring credit to the country. This is a good opportunity for the Senate to get rid of the bitterness and rancor that seem to have been prevalent in a lot of the recent debates.

Q: Should the Senate's agreement not to block votes on judicial nominees except under "extraordinary circumstances" apply?

A: I think all my judges should get an up or down vote on the floor of the Senate. I think there ought to be a good, fair hearing. I know there will be. I hope the language and tone of the debate is one that is uplifting. I would hope that the groups involved in this process — the special-interest groups — will help tone down the heated rhetoric and focus on the nominee's credentials and philosophy.

Q: You said Friday that you want a dignified process, but already interest groups are working hard to pressure you.

A: I feel no pressure except the pressure to put somebody on the bench who will bring dignity to the office, somebody who's got the intellect necessary to do the job, somebody of great integrity and somebody who will faithfully interpret the Constitution and laws of the country.

Q: What do you make of the tone of the dialogue already and in particular the attacks on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, who's considered a possible nominee?

A: My call to the senators who will be leading the debate on either side is to help elevate this rhetoric so that the country will take a prideful look at the process, recognize there will be differences of opinion but that we can step back after it's over and say, "That's the way we ought to conduct a debate on something as serious as a Supreme Court nominee."

Q: Do you think the attacks on Gonzales are out of line?

A: Al Gonzales is a great friend of mine. I'm the kind of person, when a friend gets attacked, I don't like it. We're lucky to have him as the attorney general, and I'm lucky to have him as a friend.

Q: How many people are on your list? Does it include women and minorities?

A: I'm considering a pretty good-sized group of people right now, and of course, there's a diverse group of citizens.

Q: Do you feel any obligation to appoint a woman?

A: I feel an obligation to make sure I reach out to all our society, to people from different parts of our society. It's very important for the people to know that I'm interested in diversity on the court, and I'm also interested in making sure that the person I pick, regardless of who he or she is and regardless of the background of that person, is a person of great integrity, somebody who can do the job.

Q: You have said the American people are not ready for a change in Roe v. Wade. Do you still believe that, or is this your chance to overturn it?

A: As I have repeatedly said, I do not believe in a litmus test for my judges.

Bush Unlikely To Give Lawmakers Much Say In His Pick For Justice (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Senate moderates in both parties are demanding that President Bush seek their advice before nominating a successor to retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

But Mr. Bush's track record -- and a nearly unbroken record of presidential precedent -- suggest that in the end, lawmakers will have little say in whom the president nominates.

Within minutes of the announcement that Justice O'Connor was retiring, the White House said it planned to confer with Republicans and Democrats before choosing her successor. The White House made much of Mr. Bush's conversation last week with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, when the two men discussed potential nominees to the Supreme Court shortly before Justice O'Connor's retirement was announced.

"I would expect that he would be talking to the majority leader, the minority leader, the ranking members of the Judiciary Committee," presidential spokesman Scott McClellan said of Mr. Bush. "I think this will be an even more thorough process" of conferring between the White House and Congress than usual on nominations, Mr. McClellan added.

Through the Motions

But neither the Bush White House's operating style nor historical precedent suggests that those conversations will have much effect. "Bush will pick whomever he wants," said David Yalof, a University of Connecticut professor and author of a book about the Supreme Court nomination process. Mr. Bush might go through the motions with influential Senate moderates, Mr. Yalof added, but "if it could even be described as input, it's not going to be influence."

The issue of consultation sprang to the fore early in June as tensions in the Senate over judicial nominations boiled over. After Democratic threats to filibuster several of Mr. Bush's appellate-court picks, Republican conservatives sought to rewrite Senate rules and do away with the procedural device for blocking nominations. Ultimately, a group of 14 moderates from both parties reached an agreement among themselves to push through some of Mr. Bush's judicial nominees and limit filibusters to "extraordinary circumstances."

One section of the agreement called on the president to consult with Democrats and Republicans "prior to submitting a judicial nomination to the Senate for consideration." The language was negotiated by Robert Byrd (D., W.Va.) and John Warner (R., Va.), two of the Senate's veteran deal makers.

"I hope the president will...allow us to provide real advice," said Sen. Mary Landrieu, a Louisiana Democrat.

In an apparent effort to address the concern, Mr. Bush telephoned important senators of both parties Friday, not long after Justice O'Connor's announcement. His 14-minute call to Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the top Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, interrupted the senator's own news conference.

Advice in Atrophy

If such gestures result in true collaboration it will mark a turnaround for the presidential appointment process.

"Traditionally that's just not been done that much," said John Maltese, a University of Georgia professor who wrote a book about the confirmation process. While the Constitution calls for the president to nominate and appoint justices with the "advice and consent" of the Senate, the "advice" part of the clause "has atrophied," he said.

Even President Lyndon Johnson, who had been Senate Democratic majority leader, had only perfunctory consultations with his former colleagues regarding his Supreme Court picks, according to Mr. Yalof.

If anything, the lack of consultation has grown more pronounced in recent decades, experts said, as the power of the presidency has increased in relation to Congress, and as the political stakes involved in federal court decisions have grown. During the 1970s and 1980s, Presidents Carter and Reagan fueled tension with Capitol Hill by taking steps to reduce senatorial influence over the selection of trial and appeals-court judges.

Clinton an Exception

The trend was interrupted during President Clinton's administration, when he consulted closely with Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah in the president's Supreme Court picks. Sen. Hatch advised Mr. Clinton that one possible candidate, Bruce Babbitt, was unlikely to pass muster with the Senate and Mr. Babbitt was dropped from consideration.

Several experts said they believe Mr. Clinton focused on other issues and didn't want to spend much political capital on the Supreme Court. Though he made two appointments to the high court, replacing moderates Byron White and Harry Blackmun, Mr. Clinton also had little chance of changing the balance of power.

Mr. Bush, by contrast, has a chance to tip the balance on a court that routinely casts 5-4 votes on the most politically charged issues, often with Justice O'Connor serving as the swing.

DOJ_NMG_0001410

The president has faced criticism that he doesn't even consult with his own party when pushing nominations -- or other legislative business -- through Congress. The nomination of John Bolton, Mr. Bush's choice for United Nations ambassador, has been stalled twice this year by Democrats and Republicans who have misgivings about Mr. Bolton's suitability for the job.

Some Republicans say the Gang of 14 agreement may force Mr. Bush to be more conciliatory in his choice of a nominee. But moderate Sen. Arlen Specter (R., Pa.), chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said that he wouldn't presume to impose his opinions on the president. The agreement's vague language on consultation has some Democrats saying it's unlikely to spark a successful filibuster battle.

Some Republican sympathizers even say that, paradoxically, the agreement may push Mr. Bush to be more hard-line in order to defend his constitutional power to nominate justices.

"If I were the president's lawyer I would say [the Gang of 14 agreement] can't possibly change the game," said Douglas Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor and former constitutional legal counsel in the Justice Department during the administrations of Presidents Reagan and George H.W. Bush. "I actually think the effect is to embolden the president, to make the choice he would most strongly favor."

Bush Faces Tough Choice To Fill Supreme Court Vacancy (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - For social conservatives, long active in Republican politics, the moment of truth has finally arrived: a chance to move the US Supreme Court to the right, particularly on abortion, gay rights, and other divisive cultural issues.

But, with the announced retirement of centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, will President Bush do what he has long said he intended - nominate a justice in the mold of Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas, both strongly conservative?

Enter the politics of the day. The atmosphere in Washington is fiercely partisan, and Bush is struggling to carry out his bold second-term agenda. Social Security reform has stalled, and the public is increasingly skeptical of the Iraq war. Polls also show the public has little use for what it sees as arcane sideshows - such as the Terri Schiavo imbroglio - while Americans worry about the price of gas, healthcare, and soldiers dying overseas.

In short, even as religious-conservative activists like Pat Robertson insist that the top three moral issues for the second term are "judges, judges, and judges," Bush may well decide that now is not the time to add an incendiary Supreme Court nomination to the mix, political analysts say.

"For Bush it's not just judges, although judges matter," says Norman Ornstein, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute. "But to go for a confrontational battle now - knowing you'll have another coming in six months or less, knowing that the public attitude probably will be, 'there they go again,' especially if he picks someone who's a real ideologue - there's a price to be paid for that."

So it is not by accident that one top name under consideration, and actively floated in the press by the administration, is Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He has many things going for him: He would be the first Hispanic justice, allowing Bush to replace one historic first with another - and perhaps win over some Hispanic votes to the GOP. Gonzales has just survived the rigors of a Senate confirmation, which included close grilling over his drafting of the so-called "torture memos." And he is the trusted friend of a president who values loyalty highly, having served Bush in various positions since 1995, beginning with general counsel to the then-Texas governor.

While conservative, the genial Gonzales is not seen as a hard-liner. And there's the rub: To social conservatives, he does not represent a reliable vote to overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 abortion-rights ruling. Conservatives also disagree with his defense of affirmative action. But it is abortion - the central issue in the coming confirmation battle - that gives activists on both sides the most heartache. As a justice on the Texas Supreme Court, Gonzales voted in favor of a pregnant teen's right to abortion without notifying her parents.

If Bush nominates Gonzales, it is debatable which side will raise the bigger fuss, social conservatives or liberal activists. Liberals have made clear that they will closely scrutinize whomever Bush puts forward, not just on their record on abortion, but also on other issues such as civil liberties and the environment. Chances that liberals will oppose whomever is nominated are high. The question is, how hard to fight. If it's Gonzales, the opposition would likely be less intense than if it were a more straight-down-the-line conservative, analysts say.

From the social conservatives' perspective, the White House is well aware of the grassroots objections to Gonzales. Publicly, religious conservatives express confidence that Bush will "do the right thing" and name someone else they can support. Privately, one activist said, "I'd be a little surprised if the president was going into a fight knowing that all his troops weren't behind him."

Gary Bauer, another religious-conservative activist, says he's not worried that Gonzales might be nominated, because he trusts Bush to keep his word. "He's said so many times that Scalia and Thomas are his examples of good judges, so to me it didn't seem credible that Gonzales would be in that same category," says Mr. Bauer, head of the group American Values. "I do think that the president knows there are high expectations that he will attempt to bring the Supreme Court closer to the values of the people who have elected him twice."

When talk centered more on Chief Justice William Rehnquist as likely to retire first, many of the names bandied about were of solidly conservative white men. Now, says legal historian David Garrow, "all these encomiums to O'Connor as the first woman really make it, in presidential-legacy terms, a matter of much greater historical heft to name the first Hispanic to replace the first woman."

Other analysts insist that Bush does not have to name a woman or a minority to Justice O'Connor's seat. But when O'Connor announced her resignation on July 1, the White House made clear women were under consideration. One name that shot to the top in conservative circles was Edith Brown Clement, a conservative judge on the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Still, the Gonzales talk has not gone away. On conservative blogs, Mr. Garrow notes, the only question is whether Bush nominates Gonzales now or to replace Justice Rehnquist. Some religious conservatives agree that Gonzales is still in the running - despite the ramifications for Bush's base.

"I think it's a live option, only because the president has such confidence in him, and the president's confidence may in fact trump the lack of support in the grassroots," says Deal Hudson, a conservative Catholic activist.

Jim Guth, an expert on religion and politics at Furman University in Greenville, S.C., surmises that the better path for Bush might be to nominate someone now whom religious conservatives can support and save Gonzales for later. He mentions two possible names, Fourth Circuit Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson and Tenth Circuit Judge Michael McConnell, as filling that bill - while also not likely arousing a filibuster in the Senate.

Still, Professor Guth believes Bush could still finesse a Gonzales pick. "I've always been impressed with Mr. Bush's ability to stay in touch with rank-and-file conservative Protestants, think what they're thinking, make the moves that may not please the movement organizations but generally seem satisfactory or even appealing to more mainstream religious conservatives," Guth says. "As we go on through the new millennium, the movement organizations in some ways matter less and less."

One sure thing is that several more days of speculation lie ahead. The White House says Bush will not name a nominee until after he returns from Europe on July 8. More likely, he will wait at least until the following Monday, July 11.

As Official Washington Takes A Holiday, Combatants On Both Sides Carry On (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, July 4 - As President Bush prepared for a trip to Europe, advocacy groups continued mobilizing on Monday for an intense campaign to try to influence his selection of a successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and sway any ensuing confirmation fight.

During a morning trip to deliver an Independence Day speech in Morgantown, W.Va., Mr. Bush said nothing publicly about his plans to fill the Supreme Court vacancy, and he remained at a quiet White House in the afternoon. He is to leave early Tuesday for a stop in Denmark before heading to Scotland for a summit meeting of leaders of the world's chief industrialized democracies.

DOJ_NMG_0001412

Administration officials said staff members in the White House counsel's office continued to prepare profiles on the top Supreme Court contenders for Mr. Bush to take with him to Europe. But the West Wing was largely deserted on Monday afternoon as a groundskeeper on a large mower rumbled over the North Lawn.

While most of the White House staff had taken off for the holiday, though, conservative and liberal advocacy groups spent the weekend polling, preparing television advertisements and completing research on prospective nominees.

"It's been a very busy 72 hours," said Ralph G. Neas, president of People for the American Way, who is leading a coalition of liberal groups poised to oppose Mr. Bush's nominee.

Mr. Neas said People for the American Way would begin televising an advertisement this week as part of what he described as the "preselection message campaign" aimed at senators, the public, the media and, he said, Mr. Bush.

"Our founding fathers gave justices lifetime appointments to free them from partisan politics," the narrator says in that advertisement. "Now the question is, Will President Bush follow history, choosing a judge who protects our fundamental rights and freedoms? Or will he divide the country, trying to force through a judge who threatens our basic rights as Americans?"

Mr. Neas said the advertisement would be shown on national cable television and in swing states whose senators are expected to come under pressure, a list that is likely to include Pennsylvania, Maine, Nebraska and Florida. He said that the scope of the campaign would be dictated to some extent by the amount of money the group raised over the next few days, but that early indications were that its coffers would be flush.

Mr. Neas said his organization had finished examining the records of possible nominees and could produce new advertisements if necessary. "Assuming it's one of the couple of dozen who have been mentioned," he said, "we are ready to go."

He declared that his group was not "looking for a fight" with Mr. Bush. But, referring to Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia, he also said, "I'm sure that if he one more time chooses confrontation over collaboration and, say, if he replaces a mainstream conservative like Sandra Day O'Connor with someone like Thomas or Scalia, a right-wing ideologue, that would mean a constitutional crisis."

Progress for America, a conservative group that has pledged to spend $18 million to defend whomever the president nominates, said it was gathering family photographs of a list of potential picks so that it could televise positive biographical commercials within two days of Mr. Bush's announcement of his nominee, which could come as early as next week.

"We are ramping up our research efforts to take a look at potential nominees and be ready and up with ads in support of that person," said Jessica Boulanger, a spokeswoman for the group.

Ms. Boulanger said paid staff members of Progress for America were working with conservative talk-radio hosts in 21 states and organizing letters to newspaper editors.

Another conservative group, the Judicial Confirmation Network, also has local organizers in many states. Their goal is to lay the groundwork for counterattacks on liberal groups likely to criticize a conservative nominee. "The message is, The only nominee that would be acceptable to the liberal left is Ted Kennedy," Ms. Boulanger said.

Networks of conservative organizations including the Arlington Group, a conservative Christian alliance formed two years ago to oppose same-sex marriage, are speaking regularly in conference calls to plot strategy.

Many prominent conservatives are using contacts with the White House to press against a nomination of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, a presidential confidant frequently mentioned as a Supreme Court contender. Conservatives, who suspect that Mr. Gonzales is not strongly opposed to abortion, are reluctant to criticize him directly because he is a friend of Mr. Bush. Instead, many are arguing that his current work as attorney general would force him to recuse himself from important cases involving the federal government.

Others are taking a blunter approach. Adam McManus, a San Antonio radio host who says his program reaches 50,000 listeners, has been urging them to call the president about Mr. Gonzales.

"The values votes - conservative Christians in particular - were the ones who brought George W. Bush to the presidential dance, and he needs to remain loyal to his conservative base," Mr. McManus said in an interview. "Now is the time to strike while the iron is hot, to e-mail him, to call him, to write letters. We need to, by the thousands, let him know that he needs to do right by his commitment to protect the lives of unborn babies."

DOJ_NMG_0001413

Interest groups on both the right and the left also wasted no time in asking supporters to open their checkbooks for the battle ahead.

In e-mail to supporters, the National Right to Life Committee wrote, "Please contribute to National Right to Life's grass-roots effort."

On the opposing side, the abortion rights group Naral Pro-Choice America posted a picture of Mr. Bush on its Web page and declared, "Don't let his choice end yours!" Below Mr. Bush's photograph were the words "Help fund the fight!"

Since Justice O'Connor announced on Friday that she was retiring, People for the American Way has similarly sent out 500,000 letters and e-mail messages that include a pitch for contributions.

Silent on the skirmishing over the court, Mr. Bush instead used the Fourth of July holiday to compare the challenges of the war in Iraq to those faced by American revolutionaries in 1776.

"On July 4, 1776, more than five years of the Revolutionary War still lay ahead," he said in an outdoor rally at West Virginia University, in Morgantown.

"From the Battle of New York to the winter at Valley Forge to the victory at Yorktown, our forefathers faced terrible losses and hardships," Mr. Bush added. "Yet they kept their resolve. They kept their faith in a future of liberty, and with their hard-won victory we guaranteed a home for the Declaration's proposition that all are created equal."

He said that "at this hour, our men and women in uniform are defending America against the threats of the 21st century," and declared once again that "Iraq is the latest battlefield in the war on terror."

The president is to return from Europe late Friday and meet with a bipartisan group of senators next Monday to discuss the Supreme Court vacancy. The earliest he could name a nominee will be later next week, and some Republicans say he could wait until the following week or even August.

Presidents, Choosing Justices, Can Wind Up With Surprises (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, July 4 - In July 1902, confident that he had found a judge opposed to "big railroad men and other members of large corporations," Theodore Roosevelt named Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. as his first appointee to the Supreme Court, delighted with a choice that their fellow Republican, Senator Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts, called "our kind right through."

Twenty months (and many convivial dinners at the White House) later, in the middle of an election year, Justice Holmes voted against his progressive president in the biggest railroad trust-busting case of the time, United States v. Northern Securities. "I could carve out of a banana a judge with more backbone than that," an enraged Roosevelt declared.

As President Bush prepares to fill a vacancy that conservatives hope (and liberals fear) could shape the Supreme Court for a generation, he faces a daunting historical reality: presidents don't always get what they bargain for when they grant even seemingly close allies lifetime tenure on a fiercely independent institution, where the hot-button issues of the future are hard to predict.

"The biggest damn fool mistake I ever made," Dwight D. Eisenhower said of his appointment of Chief Justice Earl Warren, who discomfited him with the Brown v. Board of Education ruling ordering desegregation of public schools, and other liberal opinions. Harry S. Truman was even more scathing about Justice Tom C. Clark, a Truman appointee who voted against his 1952 seizure of the steel industry to avert a strike.

"It isn't so much that he's a bad man," Truman later told the oral historian Merle Miller. "It's just that he's such a dumb son of a bitch."

It is precisely to guard against such surprises - and the likes of more recent Republican appointees who have disappointed their party's conservative wing, from the retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to David H. Souter and Anthony M. Kennedy - that many conservatives are now urging Mr. Bush to pick an established jurist or legal scholar with a defined philosophy, clear paper trail and unimpeachable credentials on questions from abortion to property rights.

DOJ_NMG_0001414

"He's not guaranteed of getting what he's hoping for, but he can maximize his chances," said Edward Lazarus, a former clerk to Justice Harry A. Blackmun and the author of "Closed Chambers: The Rise, Fall and Future of the Modern Supreme Court." "The way to maximize your chances is to pick someone who is really deeply ideological and has spent a long time thinking about the issues, either a judge or a scholar or someone with a long track record and well-formed ideology."

Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, whom Mr. Bush has cited as his models, have ruled predictably - and often in lockstep. Many of the federal appellate court judges believed to be among the candidates Mr. Bush is now considering would appear to fit the same mold.

But even one of the conservative movement's favorite candidates, Judge J. Michael Luttig of the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Richmond, Va., agreed to invalidate a Virginia ban on a form of abortion that the law calls partial birth - a restriction he had previously upheld - after the Supreme Court struck down a similar law in Nebraska. As a member of the Supreme Court, would he feel even more bound by its precedents and traditions?

No less an expert than Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist suggested in a speech more than 20 years ago that any president's ability to pack the court with like-minded justices is inherently limited. While a new justice might feel "strongly loyal to the president who appointed him," Justice Rehnquist told a Minnesota law school audience in 1984, "institutional pressures" within the court itself tend to "weaken and diffuse the outside loyalties of any new appointee."

He added that the court "is an institution far more dominated by centrifugal forces, pushing towards individuality and independence, than it is by centripetal forces pulling for hierarchical ordering and institutional unity."

Presidents as far back as Thomas Jefferson and James Madison have been surprised or disappointed by decisions of their appointees to the court. But perhaps the most famous example was Abraham Lincoln, who named his secretary of the treasury, Salmon P. Chase, as chief justice primarily to ensure that the court would uphold the constitutionality of the legislation by which the federal government had financed the Civil War, and which Mr. Chase had helped draft.

"We cannot ask a man what he will do, and if we should, and he should answer us, we would despise him," Lincoln said, by way of explaining his choice. "Therefore we must take a man whose opinions are known."

Perhaps in one of his perennially unsuccessful efforts to win the Democratic presidential nomination, Justice Chase wrote the court's opinion finding the legislation unconstitutional. But the decision was also, Chief Justice Rehnquist noted, "a textbook example of the proposition that one may look at a legal question differently as a judge than one did as a member of the executive branch."

It is just that reality that so concerns some conservatives about the prospect that Mr. Bush might name Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, whose views on issues like abortion are less known. That is why Republican and Democratic senators are already jousting pre-emptively over just how detailed their questioning about any nominee's views on issues should be. To the impassioned advocates on both sides, every detail might be telling.

More than 60 years ago, Zechariah Chafee, a leading legal historian, suggested that the best place to look for signs of a nominee's judicial attitudes was "not in his file of clients or in his safe-deposit box but at the books in his private library at home."

While some legal scholars like Laurence H. Tribe of Harvard have argued that presidents do have enormous power to influence the Supreme Court, others remain skeptical. Richard D. Friedman, of the University of Michigan Law School, said that "the dynamic of the court can be very important, the nine justices speaking to each other and, very importantly, to their clerks."

Harlan Fiske Stone, appointed by Calvin Coolidge, whom he had served as attorney general, eventually came under the influence of Justices Holmes and Louis D. Brandeis "and moved quite steadily left," Professor Friedman said.

The court's slow turnover also all but guarantees that presidents will have limited vacancies to fill. Since 1869, when the number of seats was set at nine, only William Howard Taft and Franklin D. Roosevelt managed to name a majority of justices in a single term, and only Dwight D. Eisenhower did so over the course of two terms. Moreover, Franklin Roosevelt's appointees were nothing like a bloc, and at least one of them, Felix Frankfurter, a prominent liberal law professor, proved surprisingly conservative on the bench.

"I just think what Mr. Justice Frankfurter did when he was a professor and private citizen overlooks the fact that once he got on the court, the job is completely different," said William T. Coleman Jr., who clerked for him in 1948-49 and went on to become Gerald R. Ford's secretary of transportation. He noted that when Mr. Ford appointed Justice John Paul Stevens, who now often votes with the two Democratic appointees on the court, "we read every opinion he'd ever written, but it's really the quality of the person you look for."

"President Ford told me just three weeks ago that one of the decisions he was proudest of was his appointment of Mr. Justice Stevens," Mr. Coleman added. "And that doesn't mean he has decided every case the way President Ford wanted."

Bush Faces Political Risk With Supreme Court Choice (REU-Y2)

By John Whitesides, Political Correspondent

Reuters, July 5, 2005

The potentially explosive choice of a new Supreme Court justice creates a maze of political risks for President Bush, with a wrong move either angering his conservative base or igniting a partisan brawl that could sink the rest of his second-term agenda.

The retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a crucial swing vote on the divided nine-member court, gives Bush and conservatives a long-awaited opportunity to dramatically shift the court to the right on hot-button social issues like abortion, affirmative action and civil liberties.

But Democrats and interest groups on the left promise an all-out battle to block any nominee they view as too conservative. They have called on Bush to appoint a new justice in the mold of O'Connor, an appointee of President Ronald Reagan who at times sided against the court's most conservative members on a series of crucial 5-4 votes.

Both sides are marshaling money and manpower for an epic political war. Analysts say the fight could pollute Washington's already strained atmosphere and turn off middle-of-the-road voters seen as crucial to Republican hopes to expand their majority in the 2006 congressional elections and win the 2008 White House race.

A prolonged Senate confirmation battle also could make it tough for Bush to build support for languishing initiatives like the war in Iraq and the revamping of Social Security, analysts said.

"Bush has to decide if he wants to keep the base happy and maybe sacrifice his dreams for unity on Iraq -- as well as much of his domestic legislative agenda," said Bruce Buchanan, a professor at the University of Texas.

Keeping conservatives happy has been a key component of Bush's political strategy, and he has made a series of conservative judicial appointments to lower courts that have drawn Democratic opposition. But the chance to dramatically shift the Supreme Court to the right has raised the stakes even higher.

"This was going to be an intense battle whoever retired," said Brian McCabe, president of the conservative Progress for America, which plans an $18 million blitz on behalf of Bush's nominee. "But it is certainly more intense now."

'DEFINING MOMENT' FOR BUSH

Conservatives have pressed Bush to appoint a new justice in the image of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the court's most conservative members and the two justices Bush says he admires most.

They also have told the White House that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales would not be acceptable because of questions about his views on abortion.

"President Bush must nominate someone whose judicial philosophy is crystal clear," said James Dobson, founder of the conservative religious group Focus on the Family.

"And no one has been clearer about this than the president himself, who said during his campaign that he would appoint justices in the mold of Clarence Thomas or Antonin Scalia," Dobson said.

On the left, liberal interest groups say their hope is that Bush will appoint a judge who evaluates issues on a case-by-case basis, rather than a strict ideologue.

"It's a defining moment for President Bush," said Elliot Mincberg, legal director for the liberal People for the American Way, which is leading the coalition of interest groups prepared to challenge Bush's choice.

"It may be the president's last real chance to fulfill his pledge to the American people to be a uniter, not a divider," he said. "Does he decide to pick a judge or pick a fight?"

Buchanan said Bush has the ability to be pragmatic on crucial political issues, as he showed on legislative compromises over tax cuts, the Homeland Security Department and school vouchers.

DOJ_NMG_0001416

"He's also got a contrarian streak that suggests he might try to surprise people," Buchanan said. "And he certainly has a strong incentive to move to the center in order to preserve the chance for forward progress on other high priority measures."

For Bush, A Lot Riding On Court Appointment (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — When President Bush returns from the Group of 8 summit in Europe at the end of this week, he'll face one of the most momentous decisions of his career.

The person he picks to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor on the Supreme Court will help determine how he's viewed in history books. The selection could resolve a question in contemporary American politics: How conservative is George Bush?

The intensity of Bush's commitment to social conservatives' agenda is unclear. For example, the president says he backs a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, but he has never made it a top legislative priority. He opposes abortion but has said repeatedly that the country isn't ready to ban it.

Now conservatives and religious activists, whom Bush political adviser Karl Rove identified as being key to the president's re-election, are reminding the president that he owes them. "We really expect that the president will keep his promise, which he made repeatedly in both campaigns, that he would put forth nominees in the profile of Thomas and Scalia," says Jan LaRue, chief counsel of Concerned Women for America, a conservative group. The reference was to Justices Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia, the high court's two most conservative justices.

Making such an appointment would trigger a fight in the Senate, where Democrats control enough votes to block a presidential nominee by filibuster. Even some Republicans have balked at an effort to take that power away.

Bush has a history of compromising. As governor of Texas, he forged alliances with Democrats to move his agenda. His first major legislative accomplishment as president, the No Child Left Behind Act establishing tough new standards for elementary and secondary schools, was a bipartisan effort. To secure Democratic support, Bush forced conservatives in his party to back off demands for school vouchers that would have helped send children to private or religious schools.

Filling a Supreme Court vacancy is a high-stakes decision that involves complicated issues. Some of the factors he'll be weighing:

•History. Few decisions a president makes have more potential to extend his influence than a lifetime appointment to the Supreme Court.

O'Connor, who announced her retirement Friday, was appointed by President Reagan, who died last year. Chief Justice William Rehnquist was appointed by President Nixon, who died in 1994. Ron Klain, an adviser who participated in the deliberations that led to President Clinton's two Supreme Court picks, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer, says the decision is influenced more by a sense of legacy than by outside lobbying.

"The president knew he was making a choice for history," Klain says.

•Diversity. Bush will be filling a seat that was occupied by the court's first woman. Some conservative activists argue that that shouldn't make a difference in choosing a replacement. Kay Daly, president of the Coalition for a Fair Judiciary, mocked the idea that "there has to be a for-ladies-only sign" on the seat.

But the gender issue could prompt Bush to add more female candidates to his list or to make his own historic first, by appointing a Hispanic.

In interviews over the weekend, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter warned conservative groups not to make snap judgments about Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, a longtime Bush friend.

•Politics. Though he won re-election last year and Republicans gained seats in the Senate, the president isn't approaching the Supreme Court appointment with a high approval rating. Forty-five percent of Americans approve of the job he's doing, according to a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll taken June 24-26.

•Democrats. The Senate recently rebuffed an effort to eliminate the filibuster for judicial nominees. That leaves Democrats, who control 44 of the Senate's 100 votes, in a position to block a Bush nominee by engaging in a filibuster, an extended debate designed to prevent a vote. It takes 60 votes to end a filibuster. Bush needs to find a candidate who can pick up some Democratic support, or try to break up the "Gang of 14." The "gang" is a bipartisan group of senators who agreed to preserve the Senate's ability to filibuster judicial nominees so long as it's used only in extraordinary circumstances. Members of the group, who plan to meet again next week, are resisting efforts to divide them.

Sen. Ben Nelson, D-Neb., one of the group, says the Supreme Court vacancy is different from any of the more than 200 lower-court vacancies Bush has filled, sometimes over objections from Democrats. "This is so significant that we ought to have the advice and consent of the Senate," Nelson says.

On Friday, Bush called Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Sen. Patrick Leahy, the top-ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, to invite them to the White House next week.

Bringing key members of the opposition party into the decision-making process could smooth the way for the president's nominee, says Leon Panetta, Clinton's White House chief of staff.

"What you don't want to do is blindside people," Panetta says. "You're almost guaranteed problems if you do."

Divided Ranks In High Court Battle, First Phase Plays Out Among Conservatives (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The first stage of the fight over replacing Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is shaping up as a struggle within the conservative coalition over steering the White House choice.

Administration officials have said Mr. Bush won't announce a nominee until he meets with Senate leaders from both parties next week, after returning from a summit with world leaders in Scotland. So while the public fireworks over the July 4 weekend centered on the battle between left and right over the ultimate candidate, the immediate vacuum has triggered intense jockeying among Republican factions trying to fill the void.

Evangelical Christians are the most vocal. They considered Justice O'Connor -- a Reagan appointee who announced her retirement Friday -- to have been a disaster for their cause. She was the court's pivotal swing vote on issues such as upholding certain abortion rights and, just last week, limiting public displays of the Ten Commandments.

"On almost every issue, she has been against us," says Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, one of the leading religious activist groups in the court fight. One of his primary goals: a new justice very different from Justice O'Connor.

For the business community, however, the departure of Justice O'Connor, 75 years old, is the loss of an ally who took a skeptical view of big jury awards, claims allowed under the Americans With Disabilities Act and employment and government-contract quotas. "We felt she was a very business-friendly person because of her very practical approach," says Stan Anderson, of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "We are clearly going to miss her, and we hope a candidate of the same kind of stature, philosophy and discipline is nominated to replace her."

Meanwhile, the handful of Republican moderates who brokered an uneasy bipartisan truce in the Senate last month over judicial nominees is hoping Mr. Bush's first choice for the high court won't be so extreme as to shatter that calm. Many women argue that Justice O'Connor, the first female justice, should be succeeded by another woman. President Bush's political advisers see a chance for Republicans to make gains among the rapidly growing Hispanic voting bloc by appointing the first Hispanic to the bench. But the most likely Hispanic choice -- Bush confidant and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales -- draws fire from the religious right because of an opinion he issued involving a state abortion regulation.

Mr. Bush would have an easier time of pleasing his far-flung coalition if he had two vacancies to fill. And he may still get that chance soon. The ailing chief justice, William Rehnquist, surprised court watchers by declining to announce his own retirement last week. But the Washington rumor mill remains abuzz over the possibility that the 80-year-old, battling thyroid cancer, will retire sometime this summer.

Beyond Mr. Gonzales, the short list includes two women with conservative records, Edith Jones and Edith Clement, both of the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans. Judge John Roberts, a Republican appointee on the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals with a limited paper trail, gets frequent mention. Michael McConnell, on the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver, wins points from the religious right for his opposition to Roe v. Wade, and from the business community for his experience as a telecommunications lawyer.

So far, Mr. Bush and his aides have said little about their plans. The president spent much of the weekend closeted at Camp David to review candidates.

Activists are stepping into the vacuum. Mr. Perkins of the Family Research Council, who has hired three new lobbyists with legal expertise, plans to help activate members of 20,000 churches to lobby the Senate and emailed his own one million members on the matter last week.

Business groups are mobilizing as well. After Justice O'Connor announced her retirement Friday, John Engler, the former Republican governor of Michigan and currently president of the National Association of Manufacturers, made hasty calls to complete a 10-person committee to assess any White House nominee. The panel would review a candidate's rulings on such corporate issues as intellectual property rights, jury awards and federal versus state regulatory jurisdiction. A conference call is scheduled for later this week to set up a strategy and timetable for meetings once Mr. Bush announces his nominee.

"If the business community wants to be heard it can be," says C. Boyden Gray, a former White House counsel to the first Bush administration who is now organizing business lobbyists for the confirmation process. "This shouldn't be an abortion debate."

The White House would like a new justice in place by October, when the court begins its next session. Once Mr. Bush sends the name to the Senate, the Judiciary Committee will likely need a month to conduct its own research and give the American Bar Association time to assess the candidate. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter has said he'd like to hold hearings by September. The nominee might then get a final Senate vote before October -- unless Democrats derail the process by trying to filibuster the nominee.

While the White House may not have a name to put forth yet, Mr. Bush has been carefully preparing for this moment practically from the day a split Supreme Court authorized his presidency more than four years ago. Previous administrations have considered judicial appointments secondary to other political goals and thus been more willing to negotiate over them. Not so for the Bush team. "If you look at what's been done with lower court nominees, there hasn't been that kind of horse-trading -- 'We'll nominate this person if we get your support on Social Security reform,' " says David Leitch, a former deputy counsel to Mr. Bush.

Indeed, major Bush initiatives such as Social Security are facing uncertain outcomes. So Supreme Court appointments may be Mr. Bush's best chance to cement a domestic legacy in his second term -- particularly replacing a frequent swing vote like Justice O'Connor.

Added Significance

Justice O'Connor has frequently tipped the balance of the court on social issues, and so the question of her successor has taken on added significance for social conservatives. She was the primary mover behind a 1992 compromise ruling upholding abortion rights, and thus angered the churches and religious activists in the 1990s that helped President Bush secure a second term last year.

And there are already hot-button social cases on the docket for the court's next term, beginning in October, where an O'Connor successor could make a difference. One involves a New Hampshire statute requiring parental notification before pregnant minors could obtain an abortion.

A second case the court will hear later this year tests the reach of federal power to block a state policy social conservatives oppose: physician-assisted suicide. To stymie Oregon's voter-approved Death With Dignity Act, the Bush administration warned that doctors who prescribe drugs to terminally ill patients seeking to end their lives might face prosecution under the federal Controlled Substances Act. The Ninth Circuit in San Francisco ruled that would overstep federal authority, prompting the Bush administration's appeal to the Supreme Court. In a dissent this past term, Justice O'Connor backed the rights of states to allow the use of marijuana for medicinal purposes, and her logic there parallels Oregon's position in the assisted-suicide case.

While many O'Connor rules have riled social conservatives, corporate lobbyists were largely pleased with the legacy of Justice O'Connor, who, as a Republican legislator in Arizona before joining the bench, was keenly tuned to the needs of business. In a 2003 case, State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. v. Campbell, Justice O'Connor joined a 6-3 majority in striking as excessive a $145 million punitive award against the insurance firm when the plaintiff was awarded just $1 million in compensatory damages. That ruling went further to suggest that a 1-to-1 ratio in punitive and compensatory damages seemed more appropriate in most cases. Two of the dissenters were the justices most widely embraced by social conservatives, Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia. They said the court had no authority to limit jury awards.

There are also intellectual disagreements within the conservative camp about the appropriate judicial philosophy to seek in a nominee. In vetting candidates, administration aides likely will be "focusing on those who take a very restrained view of the expansion of due-process rights," says John Yoo, a University of California, Berkeley, law professor who served in Mr. Bush's Justice Department. Many of the controversial liberal decisions of the 1950s and 1960s under the court led by Chief Justice Earl Warren, he notes, were drawn from the Fifth Amendment's due-process clause.

But Mr. Yoo says there may be a conflict between the views of conservative intellectuals who have dominated the administration's legal policies, and the social objectives of the president's political base. For example, Mr. Yoo says, social conservatives might support a federal law saying "any hospital that is connected to interstate commerce cannot remove a feeding tube." Conservative intellectuals likely would view such a statute as exceeding Congress's power over interstate commerce.

A second vacancy would change the dynamics of the nomination process. If Mr. Rehnquist were to retire, Mr. Bush could, for example, appease evangelicals more easily by nominating one justice who generates great excitement among the religious right while tapping another they don't trust as much. Mr. Bush also would have another variable to play with. He could choose either to name a new chief justice from outside the court, or he could promote a sitting justice and then bring in a new associate justice. A decision to elevate either Antonin Scalia or Clarence Thomas to chief would get an enthusiastic reception among social conservatives and could persuade them to compromise on an outside pick.

Two vacancies would also give Mr. Bush more room to bargain with Senate Democrats, who would find it hard to try and block both choices at the same time.

"We tend to look at the court as a whole," said Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat and Judiciary Committee member. "I've always said it would be an excellent Supreme Court that had one Scalia and one Brennan and not five of each," he said, referring to the current leader of the court's right wing and the liberal late justice who wrote many of the Warren Court's most significant opinions.

'Two Ediths'

When speculation in recent weeks centered on a possible Rehnquist retirement, the short lists circulating around Washington contained mainly conservative men. But the departure of Justice O'Connor has shifted the calculus to raise the profiles of several women candidates. Most often mentioned are the "two Ediths" who serve on the New Orleans appellate court.

Judge Edith Jones, 54, is a former general counsel of the Texas Republican party who was appointed by President Reagan in 1985. In a 1993 case, she upheld a Mississippi law that in general prohibits minors from obtaining abortions without the consent of both parents. Last year, in another abortion case, Judge Jones went out of her way to write that the Supreme Court's seminal abortion-rights case, Roe v. Wade, was "an exercise in raw judicial power" that should be re-examined.

Judge Jones also was a member of the 1997 federal bankruptcy-law review commission that spawned the pro-creditor overhaul of the code ultimately passed by Congress earlier this year. In a dissent from a commission's report that urged more protections for debtors, Judge Jones said that the majority report "ignores creditors' complaints that their interests are systematically shortchanged by the (report), while those of debtors are enhanced."

Judge Clement, 57, was elevated to the Fifth Circuit by President Bush in 2001, 10 years after the elder President Bush appointed her a district judge. Although her appellate record is shorter than Judge Jones's, she already has proven a reliable conservative vote. In 2002, for instance, she joined Judge Jones and other judges in dissenting from an opinion upholding an armed-robbery conviction under the federal Hobbs Act. Those dissenters concluded that because the crimes affected local stores in Fort Worth, Texas, they lacked enough relation to interstate commerce to trigger federal jurisdiction.

Bush aides say he is eager, at some point in his term, to place on the bench Attorney General Gonzales, who served in then-Texas Gov. Bush's cabinet, and was appointed by Gov. Bush to the Texas Supreme Court. Some Republican strategists argue that a historic appointment of the first Mexican-American justice will handcuff Democratic dissenters. A group of seven moderate Democrats agreed last month to prevent a filibuster of a Bush court nominee except under "extraordinary circumstances." It might be politically difficult to argue that a Gonzales nomination meets that standard for justifying a filibuster.

The greatest challenge to a Gonzales nomination now comes not from liberals, but from social conservatives, who question how he would rule on affirmative-action disputes and fret about his imprecise record on abortion. Some social conservatives are unhappy with a 2000 opinion Mr. Gonzales, as a Texas judge, wrote concerning a state law that requires parental notification before minors can obtain abortions. They believe he construed an exception to the law too broadly.

If Mr. Gonzales, a son of migrant Mexican crop pickers, isn't tapped to succeed Justice O'Connor, but remains on the Bush short list for a future vacancy, he may face pressure to better establish his conservative bona fides -- particularly on abortion -- to win a future nomination. To do so, he could follow in the footsteps of his predecessor, John Ashcroft, the leading hero for religious conservatives in the first Bush term, who tried to subpoena records of abortion clinics for late-term operations and filed friend-of-the-court briefs on behalf of groups suing to uphold legal limits on such procedures.

Even before Mr. Bush has made his choice, advertising wars between the left and right already have begun. Bush allies are running commercials warning that Democrats will say bad things about any nominee. Meanwhile, liberal groups are urging Mr. Bush to fulfill his 2000 pledge to be a "uniter, not a divider" by putting forth a centrist candidate who reflects Justice O'Connor's swing-vote history.

Within hours of the surprise O'Connor announcement, the abortion-rights group NARAL Pro-Choice America sent instant messages to 800,000 online supporters while MoveOn.org, a liberal online organization, launched an emergency donation drive for television advertising. Friday night, they regrouped over Chinese take-out food to assess reports coming in from field teams in Pennsylvania, Florida, Rhode Island and elsewhere, the homes of key swing Republican senators.

Meanwhile, conservatives jumped on a series of conference calls to ratchet up their lobbying campaign. Mr. Reid, the Senate minority leader, already has called the president "a loser," the ad says, so there's not limit to what they will use against a would-be appointment to the high court.

In Reading Bush On Court, Words Don't Always Help (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, July 3 - In the days just before his first inauguration, in 2001, George Bush gave a brief insight into what he looks for in crucial appointments.

"I understand the Western mentality, and I want the Western mentality represented in this administration," Mr. Bush said in an interview at his ranch in Crawford, Tex. He was talking about Clinton-era efforts to restrict development and logging in national forests.

Those listening carefully to the newly elected president understood the code: "Western mentality" meant that land ownership rights were paramount in his mind, and eventually he did away with Mr. Clinton's rules.

Suddenly, the code words Mr. Bush has refined in four and a half years since he took office are about to be examined as never before. As he considers his choices for filling the first Supreme Court vacancy of his presidency, he can expect that his every utterance on judicial philosophy will be freighted with new meaning.

There have been many times in his presidency that his views of the judiciary were very clear. While he rejected the idea of a litmus test for Supreme Court nominees during last year's campaign, he has denounced "activist judges" who "legislate from the bench."

And earlier this year, Mr. Bush rushed back from his ranch during the Congressional Easter break to sign legislation in the middle of the night to intervene to save the life of Terri Schiavo at a time when Republicans and conservatives were criticizing the judiciary for allowing her feeding tube to be removed.

From now on, everything he says, especially in his interactions with reporters at the Group of 8 summit meeting in Scotland this week, will be dissected. Will he put his highest priority on a "Western mentality," which he shared with Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who liked to call herself a "cowgirl from Arizona"?

Or will he talk anew about diversity, which might seem to give an edge to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, whose life story Mr. Bush often recites in glowing terms, but who also gives heartburn to Mr. Bush's conservative base?

If the past is any guide, Mr. Bush will prove vague as he nears a decision. When considering other top appointments or big decisions, he has shown that he is not above sending conflicting signals to mask his intentions, or catering, at least rhetorically, to differing constituencies. And he has not shied from confrontation, as even he alluded to on Friday when, while praising Justice O'Connor, he also announced that his nominee deserved "fair treatment, a fair hearing and a fair vote."

In the interview in January 2001, as he was polishing his first inaugural address, Mr. Bush made it clear that in his mind, confirmation battles were not to be avoided. He said he viewed them as part of the atmospheric noise of Washington, like traffic in front of the Lincoln Memorial.

"He could end up being a lightning rod," Mr. Bush said of John Ashcroft, then his choice for attorney general and a favorite of social conservatives. But he quickly added that in a world of so many cable stations, anyone could become a lightning rod. "If it had not been him, it would have been somebody else," he said. "That's just part of the process."

This weekend a senior aide to Mr. Bush, who would not allow his name to be used in describing the president's thinking and who cautioned that he had no idea whom the president was going to pick, said Mr. Bush believed that "more than ever." He pointed to Mr. Bush's unwillingness to back down on the nomination of a hard-core ideologue, John R. Bolton, as his nominee for ambassador to the United Nations, even though Mr. Bolton appears to have little chance of taking up the post unless Mr. Bush makes a recess appointment, circumventing the Senate.

"In Bush's view," the aide said, "to surrender on a confirmation is to invite the other side to do worse to you next time." (Mr. Bolton, in one of those curiosities of Washington history, was on the team that tried - unsuccessfully - to manage the nomination of Robert H. Bork to the Supreme Court in 1987.)

Mr. Bush's most commonly used statement about judges of all stripes sounds a lot like what he said in April when he was asked about comments by the House Republican leader, Representative Tom DeLay of Texas, that Congress should crack down on unaccountable judges.

"I believe in an independent judiciary," Mr. Bush said, seeming to distance himself considerably from Mr. DeLay. "I believe in proper checks and balances." And then he added: "And we'll continue to put judges on the bench who strictly and faithfully interpret the Constitution."

But when his opponent in the last election, Senator John Kerry, said that he would never appoint anyone to the Supreme Court who would overturn the right to abortion, Mr. Bush bristled. "I will not have a litmus test," he declared, reverting to language from the 2000 election. "I will pick judges who will interpret the Constitution, but I'll have no litmus tests."

The exchange was an example of how careful he has been not to say how he would balance the pressure from evangelical Christians, who played a crucial role in securing his re-election, and his oft-stated desire to reduce partisan bickering in Washington. At his first news conference after his re-election, he played a variation on this favorite dance, saying that when a vacancy occurred on the Supreme Court he would choose "somebody who knows the difference between personal opinion and the strict interpretation of the law."

To students of Mr. Bush's philosophy, that phrase is another set of code words. "It might just sound like he wants conservatives," said Kenneth L. Manning, an associate professor at the University of Massachusetts, Dartmouth, who has conducted a detailed study of the ideological direction of Federal District Court judges appointed by Mr. Bush.

To Professor Manning, that means Mr. Bush does not want judges to create rights the way the Supreme Court established a right to privacy in Griswold v. Connecticut four decades ago. That case found in the Constitution a right to use contraception, establishing a foundation for what later became a right to abortion in Roe v. Wade.

Which leads to Mr. Bush's reference to the Dred Scott case, at a debate in St. Louis last year. That was a case, Mr. Bush said, "where judges years ago said that the Constitution allowed slavery because of personal property rights," and he called that judicial activism. "That's personal opinion," Mr. Bush said. "That's not what the Constitution says. The Constitution of the United States says we're all - you know, it doesn't say that. It doesn't speak to the equality of America."

If the president's words were less than clear, his meaning was plain to dedicated opponents of abortion. To them, opposing Dred Scott is shorthand for opposing Roe v. Wade, which they believe will be overturned one day as an erroneous violation of basic human rights.

The other way to examine Mr. Bush's proclivities is not through what he says, but through what he has done.

DOJ_NMG_0001422

Professor Manning's study, conducted with Robert A. Carp of the University of Houston and Ronald Stidham of Appalachian State University, concluded that as a group, Mr. Bush's appointees so far have been the most conservative of any group of judicial appointees since before Franklin D. Roosevelt's presidency. No surprise there. But Professor Manning said that Mr. Bush "doesn't get much credit" for the fact that he has also appointed the most diverse group of judges of any president except Bill Clinton.

He has found conservative women, Hispanics and blacks, the study found, in numbers never seen before. "Bush puts ideology first," Professor Manning concluded, "but diversity is a close second."

Confirmation Will Sidetrack Judiciary Committee (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A Supreme Court confirmation is expected to sidetrack work on matters before the Senate Judiciary Committee such as a bailout for asbestos makers and immigration overhauls. A possible court fight also could affect Social Security retooling, tax reductions, spending cuts and other White House priorities.

Mr. Bush and Republican leaders in the Senate hope to usher the nominee through weeks of hearings and votes by Sept. 30 so the Supreme Court can open its next session in early October with a full complement of justices. But that is also the deadline for two other Republican priorities -- a budget-reconciliation package and legislation to fund the federal government -- that could falter if a court battle arises.

The budget bill includes tax cuts, Medicare changes and language to permit oil and gas drilling in a strip of Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. The funding bills could spark additional skirmishes over the scope and reach of the federal government, such as funding for community development, public television and programs for the poor.

Bob Stevenson, a spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, said the confirmation process will have only a "minimal" effect on the Republican agenda. Indeed, there will be little difference in the pace of action before the Judiciary Committee starts confirmation hearings, likely in September.

That leaves senators with just a month to reach a final deal with the House on highway legislation and to approve the Central American Free Trade Agreement, Mr. Bush's major trade initiative. When confirmation hearings begin, senators will find it more difficult to make progress on their priorities as senators shift attention to the judicial process, and time on the Senate calendar dwindles.

Senators are scheduled to take a monthlong August holiday. When they return, there will be a crush of issues and only a few months before the end of the year.

That means that Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley of Iowa may have an even harder time bringing a Social Security overhaul bill to the Senate floor this year. Sen. Pete Domenici (R., N.M.), chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources panel, will have a limited window to reach a deal with the House on energy legislation. Banking Committee Chairman Richard Shelby of Alabama may not find the time on the Senate floor for a vote on a measure to tighten oversight of mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, whose accounting problems have drawn the notice of lawmakers and financial regulators.

Fall Cases On Hot-Button Issues May Hinge On The New Justice (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

Abortion. Physician-assisted suicide. Gay rights. How will the Supreme Court handle those issues without Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the centrist swing voter who announced her retirement from the court last week after a 24-year tenure?

Actually, it probably won't take long to find out. The abortion rights of teenagers, administration efforts to override a state right-to-die law, and the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy are all on the docket for the court term that begins Oct. 3.

O'Connor's past opinions show that she would have played a pivotal role in these cases. Now, their outcome may hinge on the views of her successor. Learning those views may prove challenging to senators, if a nominee adheres to the practice of not answering questions about matters that are, or soon will be, before the court.

"One of the fascinating dances in the confirmation process is going to be how much you can get a nominee to answer, even about relatively recent precedents, when the issues are presented in cases that are pending on the docket," said Douglas W. Kmiec, a professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University.

The retirement of O'Connor, who often cast the deciding vote in the court's cases, could portend great change at the court, especially if President Bush replaces her with a steadfastly conservative nominee, as many expect.

If O'Connor's career teaches anything, it is that a justice's initial votes on the court are not necessarily a reliable guide to what that justice will do in the course of a long, life-tenured career. In her first years, she leaned heavily against abortion and affirmative action, only to tack in the other direction later.

Even if O'Connor were replaced by a conservative opponent of Roe v. Wade , the 1973 ruling recognizing a right to abortion, Roe would still have the support of a five-justice majority. Any challenge to its core holding would take years to bubble up from lower courts.

Still, next term will present O'Connor's successor with a chance to answer important questions about the scope of Roe as well as other precedents.

For example, a 1992 Supreme Court decision, co-written by O'Connor, set forth a test for the constitutionality of state abortion regulations, saying they must not impose an "undue burden" on exercising the right to abortion.

The court defined an undue burden as a law that "in a large fraction of cases" puts a "substantial obstacle" in the way of someone seeking an abortion.

At the same time, the court has said that states may pass laws requiring minors to notify their parents of plans to terminate a pregnancy, as long as they permit minors to seek a court's permission when informing their parents is impossible or dangerous.

The court has never clarified whether O'Connor's "undue burden" test means that parental-notification laws, which are on the books in 33 states, must include an explicit exception for cases in which the pregnant girl's health is at risk.

But in Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood , No. 04-1144, which is to be argued in December and decided by mid-2006, the court will rule on a New Hampshire law that has no health exception. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 1st Circuit, based in Boston, ruled last year that the New Hampshire law is unconstitutional and cannot go into effect.

In its appeal, however, New Hampshire said the 1st Circuit applied the wrong legal standard. It cited a 1987 Supreme Court ruling that suggests opponents of the law must show that the law would limit abortion rights not just in some or most cases but in all cases.

If the justices affirm the ruling of the 1st Circuit, striking down the law, the effect will be to fortify and entrench Supreme Court precedents on abortion rights. If the court rules in favor of New Hampshire law, it will open the door to other states to adopt similar legislation.

Any elucidation of the court's view of its doctrine of a health exception could also affect the federal ban on the procedure critics call "partial birth" abortion. Enacted by Congress with Bush's support in 2003, it included no exception to protect the woman's health. But three district courts have found it unconstitutional under a 5 to 4 Supreme Court ruling in 2000, joined by O'Connor, that said such bans must include a health exception.

The government's appeals are pending, and conflicting decisions by appeals courts could lead to a Supreme Court case in the early years of O'Connor's successor.

In October, physician-assisted suicide will be before the court in Gonzales v. Oregon , No. 04-623. The administration has appealed a lower court's order barring the Justice Department from taking away the prescribing rights of Oregon doctors who prescribe lethal doses of drugs to terminally ill patients who have chosen to die under that state's 11-year-old Death With Dignity Act.

Assisted suicide is an intensely emotional issue, both for advocates of a "right to die," who see it as many people's only means of a dignified death, and for conservative Christians, who see it as a form of murder.

Opposition to laws such as Oregon's was a favorite cause of former attorney general John D. Ashcroft, who issued a November 2001 directive determining that assisting suicide is not a "legitimate medical purpose" under federal drug-control law -- and that the Drug Enforcement Administration could act against any physician who authorized drugs to help someone die.

DOJ_NMG_0001424

The directive overturned a 1998 decision by President Bill Clinton's attorney general, Janet Reno, that permitted Oregon doctors to assist in suicides.

Strictly speaking, the case does not involve any assertion of a constitutionally protected right to die. The court unanimously refused to recognize such a right in 1997, ruling that it should be left to the states to determine whether legalized assisted suicide is wise policy.

Rather, the case is framed by the parties as a clash between federal power to regulate drugs and states' power to regulate the practice of medicine.

But the practical effect of the Ashcroft directive is to make Oregon's law a dead letter -- and O'Connor might have been sympathetic to Oregon. She vigorously dissented from the court's 6 to 3 ruling last month in which it upheld a federal override of California's medical marijuana law. In the 1997 case, Washington v. Glucksberg , the court was ruling on state bans on assisted suicide. O'Connor was one of five justices who wrote or signed concurring opinions implying that they might not strike down a state law such as the Oregon one that permits assisted suicide.

"Death will be different for each of us," she wrote. "For many the last days will be spent in physical pain . . . some will seek medication to alleviate that pain and other symptoms."

In Rumsfeld v. FAIR , No. 04-1152, to be argued in November, the question is whether some law schools may curb military recruiters' access to their students in protest of the U.S. armed forces' ban on openly gay members.

The court is being asked to rule on the constitutionality of the Solomon Amendment, a federal law that requires universities to give military recruiters equal access or risk millions of dollars in federal funding.

Legal analysts generally expect a win for the government, but the case will create a high-profile forum in which both opponents and supporters of the "don't ask, don't tell" policy can fight out this particular battle of the culture wars.

Scalia, Breyer: High Court Polar Opposites (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- The successor to Justice Sandra Day O'Connor on the Supreme Court will enter an arena increasingly shaped by the competing legal theories of two justices: Antonin Scalia and Stephen Breyer.

Each member of the high court has principles behind his or her decisions, of course, and writes opinions setting forth that reasoning. Moreover, in the course of hundreds of cases, the nine justices line up in different and sometimes unpredictable ways. But in more than a decade together, Justice Scalia, appointed in 1986 by President Reagan, and Justice Breyer, appointed in 1994 by President Clinton, have come to represent for many lawyers two poles of jurisprudence.

"Breyer and Scalia have much more coherent theories of what the law should be and take those theories and reason down to the cases," says Paul Rosenzweig, a senior legal research fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. Justice O'Connor "tended to reason the opposite way...adjudicating each case in front of her on its particular facts rather than on a grand or overarching theory of law."

Justice Scalia contends the only legitimate way to interpret the Constitution is to determine what the text meant at the time it was adopted, an approach that worries some corporate lawyers since there is nothing in the Constitution, for instance, that protects business from huge punitive-damage awards.

Justice Breyer argues that judges should discern the purposes behind constitutional provisions and apply them to modern circumstances the founders never envisioned.

That difference has emerged at various flash points, most recently in a spirited debate over the relevance of foreign jurisprudence to interpreting the Constitution. Justice Scalia says foreign authority has no relevance whatsoever, while Justice Breyer says how other countries confront similar issues can help inform American legal reasoning.

Frustrated Fans

Conservatives revere Justice Scalia, and liberals take solace in Justice Breyer, but each judge claims his method tracks the Constitution, not politics -- and each, on occasion, has managed to frustrate his usual constituency, if not raise questions about his own doctrinal consistency.

DOJ_NMG_0001425

In a March speech, Justice Scalia sought to distance his jurisprudence from a political agenda. "Conservatives are willing to grow the Constitution to cover their favorite causes just as liberals are," he said at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington. "I say, 'A pox on both their houses.' "

Indeed, Justice Scalia considers it a violation of the First Amendment to prohibit destruction of the American flag and has voted to invalidate sentencing guidelines that allowed judges to punish convicted defendants for factors not proved to a jury. "Though I'm a law-and-order type, I can't do all the mean, conservative things I would like to do to this society," he said. "When I find the original meaning of the Constitution, I am handcuffed."

Justice Scalia has fashioned perhaps the most coherent response to the expansive view of rights the court adopted in the 1950s and '60s under Chief Justice Earl Warren. Sometimes called the "living Constitution," the Warren court's approach enraged conservatives who saw it as a cover for judges reading their own liberal preferences into the 18th-century document.

In speeches, Justice Scalia repeatedly has singled out a line from a 1958 Warren opinion that tied the Eighth Amendment ban on "cruel and unusual punishments" to "the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society."

Articulating a Vision

"I detest that phrase," Justice Scalia said in January at an appearance with Justice Breyer at American University. "I'm afraid that societies don't always mature. Sometimes they rot."

Nonetheless, the court went on to cite the "evolving standards" test in March, when, in a 5-4 decision that saw Justice Breyer in the majority and Justice Scalia in dissent, it ruled unconstitutional the death penalty for juveniles.

"The Constitution is not a living organism, for Pete's sake; it's a legal document, and like all legal documents, it says some things and it doesn't say others," Justice Scalia said in his March speech.

This view isn't embraced by many law professors. Justice Scalia says they consider his method of limiting constitutional analysis to the document's original meaning -- called originalism -- to be "some kind of weird affliction."

Still, Justice Scalia's message has resonated with the public, says Clyde Spillenger, a law professor at the University of California, Los Angeles. "The only jurisprudence that has made it into the public sphere is Scalia's originalism," he says. Now, however, "Breyer has taken up the challenge. He has seen the need to articulate a vision as well as decide cases."

Justice Breyer, who calls his approach "active liberty," will publish a mass-market book under that title in October, when the Supreme Court convenes for its next term. In an October 2001 lecture at New York University, Justice Breyer laid out his theory, all but chastising Justice Scalia by name.

"My approach differs from that of judges who would place nearly exclusive interpretive weight upon language, history, tradition and precedent," he said. Such judges "may believe that these more 'original' sources will more readily yield rules," but since "history and tradition are open to competing claims and rival interpretations," their approach "simply channels subjectivity into a choice about which history?"

Considering Consequences

Justice Breyer argues that in addition to individual provisions, judges should focus on "constitutional objectives" derived from considering "the document as a whole." Moreover, they should place "considerable weight on consequences -- consequences valued in terms of basic constitutional purposes."

The difference emerges starkly in certain cases, such as those concerning regulation of political-campaign finance. Justice Scalia, recalling the Stamp Act that helped provoke the American Revolution, has argued that restrictions on campaign contributions or fund raising amount to an unconstitutional restriction on free speech. But the court has been more equivocal, in 1976 striking down a limit on campaign expenditures, but in 2003 upholding the McCain-Feingold law that restricted certain political contributions.

"The nation's founders did not speak directly about campaign contributions," Justice Breyer said in his NYU speech. And in a 2000 concurrence upholding a state campaign-finance law, he wrote that both sides could claim legitimate constitutional interests -- the right of wealthy forces to promote their political interests within a democratic framework that functions best when less powerful voices aren't drowned out. Even as they restrict funding of some political speech, campaign-finance laws can encourage "public participation and open discussion that the First Amendment itself presupposes," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0001426

That consequentialist approach made the difference in last week's Ten Commandments opinions, where in separate 5-4 majorities the court upheld the placement of a decades-old monolith amid other monuments on the grounds of Texas's state capitol, but found unconstitutional framed copies of the Decalogue recently installed in Kentucky courthouses by religiously motivated local officials.

All Bets Are Off

Only Justice Breyer was in both majorities. He explained his position as based "on the basic purposes" of the First Amendment's religion clauses, which he read as aiming to avoid "religiously based divisiveness." Removing an old stone marker that had attracted no controversy for years might provoke such divisiveness -- as would allowing current-day local officials to get away with posting religious materials in public buildings.

Justice Scalia found that all such displays were permissible, based on his view that the framers themselves often made religious references, whereas placing such symbols on public property fell short of the prohibition of a governmental "establishment of religion."

While conservatives expect the new justice will hew to Justice Scalia's approach and disdain that of Justice Breyer, Mr. Rosenzweig of the Heritage Foundation notes there is no guarantee how a life-tenured justice will turn out.

On a frequently divided court, "he or she may be a third pole," he says.

O'Connor Leap Moved Women Up The Bench (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

When President Ronald Reagan decided to nominate Sandra Day O'Connor as the first woman ever to the Supreme Court in 1981, he did not have a lot of other women to choose from. The bench, one might say, was not deep.

"The pool of well-credentialed women lawyers was minuscule at the time," said Patrick J. Schiltz, a law professor at the University of St. Thomas in Minneapolis who served as a law clerk for Justice Antonin Scalia. "They had to reach for O'Connor. She wasn't even on the high court in Arizona. She was on a middle-level appellate court. Has there been another nominee to the Supreme Court from a midlevel state appeals court?"

The answer, it seems, is no. "You would be very hard pressed to find anyone in the history of the court who was elevated from that role," said Kermit L. Hall, the president of the State University of New York at Albany and the editor of "The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States." "It speaks volumes to the presence of women on the bench at that time. O'Connor really opened up a set of opportunities that really would not have existed without her."

A look at the courts shows the breadth of change across the quarter of a century bookmarked by Justice O'Connor's nomination and her retirement. In 1981, Mr. Reagan's first year in office, there were almost 700 active federal judges, and 48 were women, some of them semiretired. Today, according to the Federal Judicial Center, there are 201 women and 622 men among active federal judges. As late as the beginning of the administration of Jimmy Carter in 1977, there were fewer than 10 women on the federal bench, according to the administrative office of the federal courts.

Roberta C. Ramo, who became the first woman to be president of the American Bar Association in 1995, recalls what a breakthrough the O'Connor nomination was in 1981.

"It makes me tear up right now just to think about it," Ms. Ramo said. "She was a woman who had led a life that included having children, stopped practicing for a while, suffered discrimination, was a legislator, was a judge. That was terribly meaningful."

Justice O'Connor, who had served as a trial judge for five years in Phoenix and then for less than two years on the state court of appeals, one step down from the Arizona Supreme Court, made her way at a time when women who were lawyers were often lucky to get job offers, much less judicial appointments.

Eleanor Smeal, who was the president of the National Organization for Women in 1981, said the O'Connor nomination was a turning point.

"At that time women were a very teeny percentage of judges," Ms. Smeal said. "We were begging male judges to give us our rights, and we wanted someone on the inside."

DOJ_NMG_0001427

The first woman to serve on the federal bench was Florence Ellinwood Allen, appointed to the federal appeals court in Cincinnati by Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1934. Harry S. Truman appointed the first woman to be a federal trial judge, Burnita Shelton Matthew, in 1949.

Because of Justice O'Connor's conservative reputation on certain issues, some women's groups were wary of her at the outset, fearful that she would oppose legal protections for abortion and interpret federal laws addressing sex discrimination narrowly. But her rulings in those areas have generally found approval with women's groups.

That is not to say women who are judges are more likely to side with women who appear before them than men are, said Cass R. Sunstein, a law professor at the University of Chicago who has studied judges' voting patterns.

"In sex discrimination and sexual harassment cases," Mr. Sunstein said, "women judges are no more sympathetic to female plaintiffs than men judges. But Democratic appointees are more sympathetic to female plaintiffs than Republican appointees."

Justice O'Connor was one of 5 women in a class of 102 students who graduated from Stanford Law School in 1952, at a time when tuition was $220, said Catherine Nardone, an associate dean there. The class of 2007 has 71 women and 95 men, and they pay more than $35,000 a year.

In 1981, according to the American Bar Association, 36 percent of law school students were women. Last year, it was 48 percent.

But the change in law schools is not reflected in the upper ranks of the big law firms, said Larry Kramer, the dean of Stanford Law School. "In the profession," Mr. Kramer said, "this is definitely still an issue. Partnerships in law firms haven't kept pace."

About 16 percent of law firm partners are women, according to a 2003 bar association report.

That represents substantial progress. Justice O'Connor was refused a job at every law firm to which she applied and was offered secretarial jobs instead, even though she had graduated near the top of her class.

There is much room for improvement on law school faculties, too, Mr. Kramer said. Of 43 law professors at Stanford, 13 are women.

In all, said Deborah Rhode, a law professor at Stanford, "Women's representation in status, income and security have increased, but they're still overrepresented at the bottom and underrepresented at the top."

Justice O'Connor's successor will face legal issues of grave concern to women, but most of the ones likely to reach the court soon will be incremental. The core right to abortion, supported by six of the current justices, appears secure in the short term, although the constitutionality of various restrictions is likely to arise. The court will also continue to shape the contours of laws prohibiting sex discrimination, including one concerning discriminatory practices in school athletic programs.

Justice O'Connor's unexpected resignation has upended the conventional wisdom about the relevant criteria for the next nominee. There had been much talk of racial and ethnic diversity and almost none concerning the implications of candidates' gender. That has changed.

"Until the middle of last week, when the White House started hearing rumors that Justice O'Connor would resign," said Thomas C. Goldstein, who argues frequently before the court and is an authority on it, "every name on the short list was a boy. Every name on the long list was a boy."

Ms. Smeal, now the president of the Feminist Majority Foundation, a women's rights group, said the question should not be whether Justice O'Connor's seat ought to be filled by a woman but why half of the nine justices are not women. The other woman on the court is Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who was appointed by Bill Clinton. "We're asking for another woman," Ms. Smeal said. "We should have at least four. We should not be allowed to go back to one. The era of tokenism is over."

Although the pool of female judges is much larger today than it was in 1981, the relevant group remains small.

"The number of prominent conservative Republican female federal appellate judges," Professor Schiltz said, "gets to be a very, very small pool."

The women most frequently mentioned as being considered for Justice O'Connor's seat all sit on federal appeals courts. They include Judges Edith Brown Clement, Edith H. Jones and Priscilla R. Owen, all of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, and Judge Janice Rogers Brown of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

There has been no serious talk, this time, of the need to scour the state lower courts to find a woman suitable for the nation's highest court.

The Imprint That O'Connor Leaves On The High Court (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - In 1981, when Sandra Day O'Connor became the first woman appointed to the US Supreme Court, she was by no means the most qualified individual in the country for the job.

She was not a partner in a major law firm. She had never clerked for a Supreme Court justice. She had never argued a case or even attended a session at the high court. Nor had she served as a federal trial judge or federal appeals court judge.

It wasn't that Ms. O'Connor lacked the competence or intelligence to have performed all those jobs: She graduated third in her class at Stanford Law School. But in the 1950s, the law belonged to men, and those who pulled the levers of power could not see beyond O'Connor's gender.

She was discouraged. But she never quit.

As her 24-year Supreme Court career demonstrates, Justice O'Connor, who announced her retirement last Friday, had other qualifications that helped mold and prepare her to become one of the most influential and important figures in American law.

Now, as she plans to leave the court upon confirmation of a successor, scholars, historians, and some of her own former clerks are assessing her place in history.

O'Connor helped break down gender stereotypes and open doors for women in legal and other professions. But perhaps more important, she quickly moved past the "first woman" label and became a centrist leader on the court.

"When you become the first sister in a group of brethren, I think it had to have been a difficult beginning," says RonNell Andersen Jones, who clerked for O'Connor during the 2003-04 term. But she says O'Connor soldiered through by focusing on her role as a justice.

"She genuinely thought of herself as one of nine members of the court - as a person who had a job to do and one vote to cast."

Charles Blanchard, a lawyer in Phoenix who clerked for O'Connor in 1986-87, agrees. "Her real accomplishment in opening doors for women is not that she was the first woman Supreme Court justice, but that she so quickly transcended that," he says.

"She didn't decide issues for women from a woman's perspective," adds Marci Hamilton, a law professor at Yeshiva University's Cardozo School of Law in New York and a 1989-90 O'Connor clerk. "She was always an independent-minded, strong-willed individual who made decisions based on her own internal moral compass."

She also says, "That is a wonderful role model for anybody, but also for women moving up the ranks." 'The most powerful woman'

O'Connor's vote has often been decisive.

She is sometimes referred to as the most powerful woman in America because of her role as a key swing voter on the sharply divided court. When the court divides 4-4 on a hot-button issue, O'Connor frequently breaks the deadlock, and the resulting law mirrors her view of how the matter should be resolved.

The power of her position has been closely watched in part because of a single issue: abortion. O'Connor seemed poised to overturn the Roe v. Wade precedent in the early 1980s just after she joined the court. But she later helped preserve Roe's essential holding in 1992 by joining forces at the center of the court with Justices David Souter and Anthony Kennedy.

In a string of other cases, she has exercised similar power to shift the direction of the law - sometimes by wielding a single vote.

DOJ_NMG_0001429

Her influence was evident in 2000 when her vote tipped the balance in striking down a ban on so-called "partial-birth" abortions, and in 2003 when she provided the crucial fifth vote to uphold the constitutionality of affirmative action in university admissions.

In 2004, she was once again in the driver's seat at the center of the court, writing that American citizens detained as enemy combatants in the war on terror must be provided a level of due process in the civilian courts. "A state of war is not a blank check for the president when it comes to the rights of the nation's citizens," she wrote.

On the conservative side, her vote has been crucial to the conservative wing's federalism revival and in upholding school vouchers in 2002. She also joined her conservative colleagues in Bush v. Gore, voting in December 2000 to halt the Florida recount in the presidential election.

In matters of church and state, O'Connor has also played an important role, particularly with her development of the so-called endorsement test to determine whether certain government actions involving religion violate the First Amendment's establishment clause. Elements of O'Connor's test are evident in both the majority and minority positions in the two recent Ten Commandments decisions, analysts say. Her conservative critics

Over the years, O'Connor has voted consistently in a number of areas, but conservative critics say she is too unpredictable in high-profile, blockbuster cases. They say it appears she is attempting to do what she believes is best, rather than simply ruling in accordance with the dictates of the law and the Constitution.

These critics say her pragmatic, case-by-case approach in many areas has fostered confusion among lawyers and lower-court judges who can never be sure what the law is until O'Connor has ruled in each case.

In contrast, Justice Antonin Scalia is seen as seeking to develop a jurisprudence of binding principles - bright-line tests and rules that can consistently be applied across a range of cases. This difference in approach has frequently placed the two justices on a collision course in major cases.

"Scalia has often described his view of the rule of law as the law of rules," says Eugene Volokh, a 1993-94 O'Connor clerk and now a UCLA School of Law professor. "I think Justice O'Connor's view is the work of the law is making law work," he says.

"Sometimes she likes clear, bright-line rules," Professor Volokh says. "Sometimes she thinks they just don't fit with the complexity of the world."

One example of O'Connor's concern about the potential damage that can be done by bright-line rules arises in a case involving the religious use of peyote by native Americans. In a 1990 decision written by Justice Scalia, the court announced that the First Amendment's free exercise of religion clause does not protect the religious use of peyote against enforcement of general antidrug laws.

O'Connor disagreed. She believes that the First Amendment requires the government to avoid interfering in religious worship unless it is absolutely necessary to achieve a major government objective.

"Although it may provide a bright line, the rule the court declared ... does not faithfully serve the purpose of the Constitution," O'Connor wrote in 1997. She said the court would never adopt a similar rule limiting the First Amendment's free-speech protections, and should not encumber a portion of the same amendment only a few words away.

"Given the centrality of freedom of speech and religion to the American concept of personal liberty," she wrote, "it is altogether reasonable to conclude that both should be treated with the highest degree of respect." O'Connor's beginnings

O'Connor was nominated in 1981 to the seat vacated by Potter Stewart. In naming O'Connor, President Reagan fulfilled a 1980 campaign pledge to name a woman to the high court.

Her nomination was confirmed by the Senate 99 to 0. She was sworn in as a justice on Sept. 25, 1981.

Analysts say that several aspects of O'Connor's early life laid the foundation for her later work at the high court. Among them: her childhood on a remote cattle ranch in Arizona, her public service in Arizona as a lawmaker, and her work as a state trial judge and appeals court judge.

But perhaps most important was her search for work in 1952. After graduating third in her Stanford Law School class, she was unable to find a job as a private-sector lawyer because none of the major firms in California would consider hiring a woman. Only one firm offered her a spot - as a secretary.

DOJ_NMG_0001430

Thirty years later, among those involved in her selection as a Supreme Court nominee was William French Smith, then attorney general. In the 1950s, Mr. Smith was a partner in the California law firm that declined to hire O'Connor as a lawyer but offered her work as a secretary.

Ms. Jones, who is also a recent law-school graduate, says she never once thought her gender might be a roadblock to a legal career. "I am embarrassed at how much I took it for granted," she says.

"It was good for me to be able to sit down with Justice O'Connor and hear her say, 'I graduated way at the top of my Stanford Law School class and couldn't get a job except as a secretary at a law firm. No one would take me seriously, and I had to make my own opportunities for myself.' "

Jones adds, "It gives you a nice appreciation of how very far we've come in what amounts to one lifetime."

For Gonzales, A Familiar Cast At The Table (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

For Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, some meetings at the Justice Department must feel similar to those he held when he was President Bush's chief lawyer. After all, at least half a dozen of his senior aides also worked under him when he ran the White House counsel's office.

Former colleagues now at Justice include his chief of staff, his deputy chief of staff, two senior counselors and the head of the legal policy office. In addition, the Bush administration's nominee to be Gonzales's second-in-command, Timothy E. Flanigan, also served as his White House deputy.

But Justice officials are quick to stress that this group of alumni is part of a broader circle of advisers that Gonzales relies upon, including holdovers from John D. Ashcroft's tenure and new hires who have not worked closely with him in the past.

D. Kyle Sampson, his deputy chief of staff, said that "talking about a White House mafia or something like that would not accurately characterize his openness and inclusiveness."

"I like to think he just did a dang good job of hiring us all in the first place," said Sampson, who worked for Gonzales before coming to Justice in 2003 under Ashcroft. "I just think it's a matter of good lawyers he happens to know and be comfortable with."

Even as Gonzales is still cementing his team in place, of course, he is widely reported to be on the short list as a potential Supreme Court nominee. His chances are enhanced by his close relationship with Bush, who has been his boss since Bush was Texas governor. But Gonzales is viewed with suspicion by many within the Republican Party's conservative base, who disagree with moderate legal positions he has taken on issues such as abortion and affirmative action.

Many of his closest aides, by contrast, have extensive and deeply conservative credentials. Many are young lawyers with impressive résumés and fast-rising careers. Justice officials declined to speculate on what might happen to them if Gonzales moves on to the high court.

The key members of Gonzales's inner circle at Justice include:

· Theodore W. Ullyot , 38, chief of staff, had been a deputy assistant and deputy staff secretary for Bush at the White House. From 2003 to 2004, he worked in the counsel's office under Gonzales. Earlier, he was senior vice president and general counsel at AOL Time Warner Europe and a partner at Kirkland & Ellis.

Ullyot is one of the many "Luttigators" who work in the senior ranks of Justice, having clerked for federal appellate judge J. Michael Luttig, the prominent conservative frequently mentioned as a potential Supreme Court nominee. Ullyot also clerked for another hero in GOP legal circles, Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia.

"His leadership style is to listen and engage," Ullyot said of Gonzales. "Our job on the staff is to make sure that he's hearing from all the people that he needs to be hearing from."

· D. Kyle Sampson , 35, deputy chief of staff, came to Justice in 2003 from Gonzales's shop at the White House, and was a counselor to Ashcroft. He learned the ropes on the Hill by working as counsel to Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) on the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Like Ullyot and several other senior aides at Justice, Sampson is a graduate of the University of Chicago Law School, the alma mater of many prominent conservatives.

· Robert D. McCallum , 59, associate attorney general, arrived at Justice the week after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Although he had not worked closely with Gonzales in the past, the Yale Law School alumnus has enjoyed a higher public profile in recent months than he did during the Ashcroft years.

McCallum also has found himself at the center of controversy in recent weeks over the department's decision to drastically scale back a proposed penalty in the government's tobacco lawsuit.

McCallum echoes the comments of others who have worked with Gonzales, saying he "encourages a very vigorous internal debate and deliberation" on issues.

· Tasia Scolinos , 33, is the director of public affairs and, like all of Gonzales's closest aides, a lawyer. She is directly involved in mapping out public relations strategies and in preparing the attorney general for media events, Hill testimony and other public appearances.

Scolinos came to Justice from the Department of Homeland Security, where she was senior director of communications.

"The Department of Justice has a wide portfolio, and many of those issues are very important," said Scolinos, a graduate of Claremont McKenna College and Georgetown University law school. "We try to use the prestige of the attorney general's office to talk about and focus on issues that need attention."

· Raul F. Yanes , 39, senior counselor, worked with Gonzales as an associate counsel at the White House from 2003 until he moved to Justice to work for the new attorney general.

Yanes spent most of his career in private practice at Davis Polk & Wardwell in New York and is a graduate of Harvard Law School.

· Jeffrey Taylor , 40, a Harvard Law graduate, is also a counselor to Gonzales. Taylor previously worked in private practice and as a federal prosecutor in San Diego.

Like Sampson, Taylor worked for Hatch in the Senate and first came to Justice as a counselor to Ashcroft in 2002.

· Courtney Simmons Elwood , 37, another counselor, worked with Gonzales at the White House counsel's office from 2001 to 2002 and then served as deputy counsel in Vice President Cheney's office from 2003 until arriving at Justice in February.

She also clerked for Luttig and is a graduate of Yale Law School.

· Rachel Brand , 32, currently serves as acting head of the department's influential Office of Legal Policy and is awaiting formal confirmation from the Senate.

A graduate of the University of Minnesota and Harvard Law School, she served as an associate White House counsel and clerked for Justice Anthony M. Kennedy.

· Michael A. Battle , 49, is the new head of the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, a liaison-type position that Gonzales intends to turn to in his bid to push for prosecutions of gang violence, obscenity and other crimes, according to aides.

Battle is a former public defender and family court judge who gained national attention as the U.S. attorney in Buffalo prosecuting the "Lackawanna Six," a group of Yemeni men convicted on terrorism charges after admitting they had trained at an al Qaeda camp before the Sept. 11 attacks.

· Timothy E. Flanigan , 51, is not technically a Gonzales aide yet, but he is certain to be one of the most important players at Justice if he is confirmed to replace James B. Comey as deputy attorney general. Flanigan was Gonzales's deputy at the White House from 2001 to 2002 before going to work for Tyco International Inc. as general counsel.

Officials have said Flanigan was closely involved in some of the most controversial decisions linked to Gonzales's office after the Sept. 11 attacks -- including the finding that the Geneva Conventions' protections do not apply to suspected terrorists captured on the battlefield and a since-retracted Justice memo narrowing the definition of what constitutes torture.

Flanigan was part of the litigation team representing the Bush campaign during the 2000 election dispute and previously worked at Justice during the administration of President George H.W. Bush.

Profiles Of Jones, Brown Rise In Wake Of O'Connor Retirement (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin, Jeanne Cummings And Robert S. Greenberger

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

The retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman on the Supreme Court and one of two currently, is expected to raise the profile of female candidates.

The two women most often mentioned on Bush short lists are Edith Jones, 54 years old, a former general counsel of the Texas Republican party who was appointed by President Reagan in 1985 to serve on the U.S. Appeals court in New Orleans, and Janice Rogers Brown, 55, the African-American daughter of sharecroppers who grew up Greenville, Ala. and attended segregated schools. After fierce resistance by Senate Democrats, she was recently confirmed to become an appeals court judge as a result of a deal between moderate Democrats and Republicans.

Social conservatives are comfortable with Judge Jones, who passes their abortion litmus test with high grades. In a 1993 case, writing for the majority, she upheld a Mississippi law that prohibits certain minors from obtaining abortions without the consent of both parents, saying it doesn't unduly burden the right to seek an abortion. In another abortion case, Judge Jones, who agreed on a narrow technicality with an abortion-rights decision, nevertheless went out of her way in a concurring opinion to say that the Supreme Court's seminal abortion-rights case, Roe v. Wade, was "an exercise in raw judicial power."

On another issue, she also ruled that a female police officer's work environment wasn't hostile simply because there were some derogatory references to her in a police newsletter's satirical column. And in a case involving capital murder, Judge Jones said that the fact that a defendant's attorney fell asleep during parts of the prosecutor's presentation wasn't sufficient grounds for ruling that he was inadequately represented.

Judge Jones also was a member of the 1997 federal bankruptcy law review commission that spawned the pro-creditor overhaul of the code ultimately passed by Congress earlier this year. In a dissent from a commission's report that urged more protections for debtors, Judge Jones said that the majority report "ignores creditors' complaints that their interests are systematically shortchanged by the (report), while those of debtors are enhanced."

The Senate Democrats' fierce opposition to Judge Brown reflected her staunch conservatism. In a speech in 1999, she said, "Where government advances – and it advances relentlessly – freedom is imperiled, community impoverished religion marginalized and civilization itself jeopardized." At her nomination hearing last November for a seat on the U.S. Appeals Court for the District of Columbia, Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary committee, called her an "agenda-driven judge whose respect for precedent and rules …changing depending on the subject matter."

In a case of interest to business, Judge Brown dissented from her colleagues' view that Nike Inc. could be sued under California law for inaccurate comments it made in defense of its overseas labor practices. She said the California statute involved in the lawsuit unconstitutionally limited free speech. Several experts, including Harvard Law School professor Laurence Tribe, a liberal, agreed with her view.

Other Candidates

One frequently mentioned candidate as an associate justice or chief justice is federal Circuit Judge J. Michael Luttig, who was appointed to the court by the first President Bush in 1991. He is considered to be more ideologically conservative than another name often mentioned, federal Circuit Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson III. Judge Luttig is close friends with Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

Writing for the majority in a 1992 appeals court decision, Judge Luttig affirmed a first-degree murder conviction based on strong circumstantial evidence but no direct evidence. "He is very tough in criminal cases, very hard on crime and supports the death penalty," said Rodney Smolla, a law professor at University of Richmond Law School. Judge Luttig's own father was murdered in April, 1994, during a robbery outside his East Texas home. When he was once asked by defense lawyers to recuse himself from a death-penalty case, Judge Luttig refused, saying that all judges are formed by their life experiences.

In a 1993 ruling, he said that a prisoner needed to produce hard evidence of serious or significant physical or emotional injury in order to win a case based on a constitutional violation of the prohibition of "cruel and unusual punishment." In a First Amendment case, Judge Luttig, in a concurring opinion, argued that the First Amendment protected the right of a group to have a confederate flag on their Virginia license plates, even though it was offensive to other citizens.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush has also made known his desire to elevate the first Hispanic to the court, and a top choice would be Emilio Garza of the New Orleans appeals court. Judge Garza, 55, was appointed by President Reagan to a U.S. district court and by President George H.W. Bush to the appeals court. Beyond his anti-abortion views, he is known for voting in a 1999 case to affirm the right of a policeman to arrest and handcuff a woman for violating Texas' seat-belt law. The woman was driving with her young children. The Supreme Court later affirmed the decision.

In a decision involving a lawsuit under the Americans with Disabilities Act against El Paso, Texas and the Texas secretary of state for refusing to make ballots accessible for the blind, Judge Garza ruled that the ADA didn't cover Texas state officials. The ADA has been a frequent target of the Rehnquist court, which has limited its reach significantly.

Federal Circuit Judge John Roberts was sworn two years ago for a seat on the influential U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which handles complex cases involving the federal government. A Harvard college and Harvard Law School honors graduate, the brainy and likeable Mr. Roberts joins Mr. Wilkinson on lists for a possible chief justice pick.

He is widely admired by Democrats, as well as Republicans. "I think he's the conservative equivalent to a Ruth Bader Ginsburg or Stephen Breyer," says Bradford Berenson, a former Bush White House official, referring to two Supreme Court justices who are considered moderates. Also, because the D.C. appeals court rarely handles abortion actions or cases involving religious issues, he is a blank slate on social cases -- a trait that could ease his acceptance to Democrats but make it harder for him to win support from social conservatives and evangelicals.

Vacancy Starts A Fundraising Race (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

The effort to fill the Supreme Court seat being vacated by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor has already become a fundraising magnet for both left and right that promises to rival the 2004 presidential campaign for the rate of cash flow, if not total dollars raised.

The prospect of shifting the Supreme Court to the right has fueled a quest for dollars by conservative and liberal interest groups that will halt only if President Bush does the unexpected and nominates someone acceptable to all sides.

Under the scenario of an ideological battle, participants predict the competition for cash will turn the Senate confirmation into the most expensive nomination fight in the nation's history, certain to break $50 million and, if the nominee is especially controversial, likely to approach $100 million.

Most of the money raised would not be publicly reported. With the exception of such groups as MoveOn PAC, many organizations active in the fight are tax-exempt and have few, if any, disclosure requirements.

The nomination process will pit two lobbying and interest-group coalitions that have repeatedly gone head to head during the Bush administration over tax cuts, energy legislation, and class-action and bankruptcy measures. While the business-social-conservative coalition has repeatedly defeated the liberal-labor alliance, the outcome of a far more visible nomination fight would be highly unpredictable.

On the right, Progress for America, which spent $45 million in behalf of the Bush 2004 campaign, is committed to spending $18 million for targeted radio and television ads; the allied Judicial Confirmation Network plans to spend $2 million to $3 million for grass-roots lobbying of key senators; and Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, has vowed to put unspecified "millions" behind a conservative nominee.

"The focus of Progress for America is crystal clear," said spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger. "That is to defend the president's nominee from attacks from the left."

The spending by these groups only touches the surface of the expected investment in a conservative nominee by James Dobson's Focus on the Family, by Jay Sekulow's American Center for Law and Justice, by the hundreds of programs broadcast on Christian radio, and by the vast network of other organizations, including the Christian Coalition, the Free Congress Foundation, the Southern Baptist Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission, Concerned Women for America, and business groups such as the National Association of Manufacturers.

On the left, such groups as People for the American Way and MoveOn PAC already flexed their muscles in the debate over the "nuclear option" proposal of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to end filibusters of judicial nominees.

With far lower levels of public interest, People for the American Way was able to collect $5 million for the filibuster issue, MoveOn raised $1.5 million and the Alliance for Justice raised $1 million.

"The $1.5 million was just a warm-up for what's to come," said Ben Brandzel, MoveOn's advocacy director. "That was a preparatory round, with far less attention and little focus on the threat to our rights, and $1.5 million was no sweat."

Just as there are hundreds of groups on the right prepared to spend money and time on the nomination, there are a host of counterparts on the left, including the AFL-CIO and its member unions, civil rights organizations, gay and lesbian groups, environmental lobbies, and the well-heeled trial lawyer bar.

Abortion rights groups are expecting the nomination fight to help them regain vitality. With Roe v. Wade on the books for 32 years, many younger women are relatively unaware of the fact that abortion was illegal in most of the United States, liberal women's rights leaders say.

"NARAL Pro-Choice America surpassed its fundraising goals in the hours following Justice O'Connor's announcement," said President Nancy Keenan. Donors "are deeply concerned that President Bush will choose to further divide this nation by nominating a radical right-wing conservative."

Moderation is not the tone of fundraising appeals in the nomination contest. "This is big, people. Huge," NARAL wrote to supporters. "It's true, there is no freedom without choice. Without choice, we are not free."

In private, leaders of organizations on both the left and the right acknowledge that the more controversial the nominee Bush selects, the more money each side will raise.

The money will finance lobbying campaigns conducted in the halls of Congress, on radio and television, in senators' home-state town meetings, in pressure from business and civil rights leaders -- at every leverage point the two sides can find.

The left and right have already designated target senators and put in place the tools of political warfare to mobilize troops at the grass-roots level. Progress for America, for example, has targeted 21 states, including all the states that cast majorities for Bush and have a Democratic Senate incumbent up for reelection in 2006.

In addition, virtually every group is investing in the states of Republican senators who prevented adoption of the nuclear option ending judicial filibusters and in those of Republican moderates who might vote against a very conservative nominee. These key states include Maine, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Arizona and Rhode Island.

Senate Pact Shapes High-court Fight (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, July 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - The decision of 14 senators - whether to hold or abandon an agreement to keep the wheels of the judicial appointments moving - is emerging as the wildcard in the looming confirmation fight over the US Supreme Court.

Six weeks ago, the Gang of 14 stunned the Senate by a bipartisan pact to allow long-delayed votes on President Bush's most controversial nominees, while preserving the minority's right to filibuster under "extraordinary circumstances." The deal opened the door to a quick confirmation of six of the president's nominees. It also sidelined, for a time, GOP plans to force a change in Senate rules to end filibusters on judicial nominations, dubbed the "nuclear option."

Now that pact meets its ultimate test: filling a seat on a Supreme Court closely divided on issues ranging from abortion to property rights. Democrats say the nuclear option is off the table for a Supreme Court nomination fight. Republicans say it emphatically is not. In the end, it's the Gang of 14 who decide which side is right.

The key question: How resilient is that pact and the trust that binds it? That hinges on whether the seven Democrats and seven Republicans end up on opposite sides regarding the definition of "extraordinary circumstances."

Members of the Gang of 14 say they don't want to be a shadow Senate Judiciary Committee or to break with their own party leadership. "The 14 do not expect the president to consult with us as a group. We're not trying to become the Judiciary Committee or the arbiters of all these nominees," says Sen. Mark Pryor (D) of Arkansas, one of seven Democrats signing the May 23 agreement.

If the pact holds, minority Democrats will be unable to filibuster a Bush nominee on party lines. Nor will Republicans be able to take the filibuster option permanently off the table. That agreement has two elements: each painstakingly negotiated. Outside groups and party leaders have tried to interpret that agreement, but, in the end, it comes down to the good will and judgment of the 14 who signed it. So far, members say that good will is holding.

An early test of the viability of the agreement is whether the president consults with senators, both Democratic and Republican, before submitting a judicial nomination for confirmation. "Such a return to the early practices of our government may well serve to reduce the rancor that unfortunately accompanies the advice and consent process in the Senate," said the 14 in their May 23 agreement.

In a bid to interpret that agreement, Sen. Charles Schumer (D) of New York, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said in a press briefing on Friday that such consultation must involve "real, face-to-face, back-and-forth consultation." Republican leaders insist the choice is up to President Bush and that it need not be negotiated in advance with Democrats.

But, in fact, the terms of the agreement within the Gang of 14 sets a relatively low standard of the advice function, according to Sen. John Warner (R) of Virginia, who with Sen. Robert Byrd (D) of West Virginia, drafted this piece of the resolution.

The key document used in negotiating the language on consultation was an excerpt from Federalist No. 66, written by Alexander Hamilton in 1788. It reads, in part: "It will be the office of the President to nominate, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint. There will, of course, be no exertion of choice on the part of the Senate. They may defeat one choice of the Executive, and oblige him to make another; but they cannot themselves choose - they can only ratify or reject the choice of the President."

The other key element in the Gang of 14 agreement is how senators interpret their commitment to filibuster a judicial nominee only under "extraordinary circumstances." Democrats on the Judiciary Committee say that ideology must be a factor in making that assessment. On Sunday, Sen. Lindsey Graham, one of the GOP signatories, said it was not. "Based on what we've done in the past with [Bush nominees since May 23], ideological attacks are not an 'extraordinary circumstance,' " he said on Fox News.

But Democrats who signed the agreement are leaving their options open. "I'm leaving open my judgment as to what 'extraordinary circumstances' involves," says Sen. Ben Nelson (D) of Nebraska. He says there will be "no surprises," and that members of the Gang of 14 have ongoing discussions on this point.

A test case of the agreement is whether a nominee as conservative as Janice Rogers Brown, confirmed to the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, could get past a filibuster threat for the Supreme Court. Senator Pryor says it's not clear. "Every nomination is different.... I would hope that Janice Rogers Brown would not ever be considered for the US Supreme Court. But I'd like to reserve judgment on that. I may be wrong about her. She may get on the D.C. circuit and be a wonderful surprise. I may change my mind on her over time. Let her have some time to develop there and show what sort of judge she may be," he said.

The 14 signatories include Republicans John Warner of Virginia, John McCain of Arizona, Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island; and Democrats Robert Byrd of West Virginia, Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, Ben Nelson of Nebraska, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, Daniel Inouye of Hawaii, Mark Pryor of Arkansas, and Ken Salazar of Colorado.

Four of the Democrats (Nelson, Byrd, Landrieu, and Pryor) are from largely Republican States, and could be targeted in elections by conservative ads if the accord falters.

Their Will Be Done (WSJ)

By Robert H. Bork

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

What do the nomination of a replacement for Sandra Day O'Connor, constitutional law, and moral chaos have to do with one another? A good deal more than you may think.

In Federalist 2, John Jay wrote of America that "Providence has been pleased to give this one connected country to one united people -- a people descended from the same ancestors, speaking the same language, professing the same religion, attached to the same principles of government, very similar in their manners and customs . . . ." Such a people enjoy the same moral assumptions, the cement that forms a society rather than a cluster of groups. Though Jay's conditions have long been obsolete, until recently Americans did possess a large body of common moral assumptions rooted in our original Anglo-Protestant culture, and expressed in law. Now, however, a variety of disintegrating influences are undermining that unanimity, not least among them is the capture of constitutional law by an extreme liberationist philosophy. America is becoming a cacophony of voices proclaiming different, or no, truths.

Alexis de Tocqueville observed that "If each undertook himself to form all his opinions and to pursue the truth in isolation down paths cleared by him alone, it is not probable that a great number of men would ever unite in any common belief. . . . [W]ithout common ideas there is no common action, and without common action men still exist, but a social body does not."

Contrast Tocqueville with Justices Harry Blackmun and Anthony Kennedy. Blackmun wanted to create a constitutional right to homosexual sodomy because of the asserted "'moral fact' that a person belongs to himself and not others nor to society as a whole." Justice Kennedy, writing for six justices, did invent that right, declaring that "At the heart of [constitutional] liberty is the right to define one's own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life." Neither of these vaporings has the remotest basis in the actual Constitution and neither has any definable meaning other than that a common morality may not be sustained by law if a majority of justices prefer that each individual follow his own desires.

Once the justices depart, as most of them have, from the original understanding of the principles of the Constitution, they lack any guidance other than their own attempts at moral philosophy, a task for which they have not even minimal skills. Yet when it rules in the name of the Constitution, whether it rules truly or not, the Court is the most powerful branch of government in domestic policy. The combination of absolute power, disdain for the historic Constitution, and philosophical incompetence is lethal.

The Court's philosophy reflects, or rather embodies and advances, the liberationist spirit of our times. In moral matters, each man is a separate sovereignty. In its insistence on radical personal autonomy, the Court assaults what remains of our stock of common moral beliefs. That is all the more insidious because the public and the media take these spurious constitutional rulings as not merely legal conclusions but moral teachings supposedly incarnate in our most sacred civic document. That teaching is the desirability, as the sociologist Robert Nisbet put it, of the "break-up of social molecules into atoms, of a generalized nihilism toward society and culture as the result of individualistic hedonism and the fragmenting effect of both state and economy." He noted that both Edmund Burke and Tocqueville placed much of the blame for such developments on the intellectual class -- in our time dominant in, for example, the universities, the media, church bureaucracies, and foundation staffs -- a class to which judges belong and to whose opinions they respond. Thus ever-expanding rights continually deplete America's bank of common morality.

Consider just a few of the Court's accomplishments: The justices have weakened the authority of other institutions, public and private, such as schools, businesses, and churches; assisted in sapping the vitality of religion through a transparently false interpretation of the establishment clause; denigrated marriage and family; destroyed taboos about vile language in public; protected as free speech the basest pornography, including computer-simulated child pornography; weakened political parties and permitted prior restraints on political speech, violating the core of the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech; created a right to abortion virtually on demand, invalidating the laws of all 50 states; whittled down capital punishment, on the path, apparently, to abolishing it entirely; mounted a campaign to normalize homosexuality, culminating soon, it seems obvious, in a right to homosexual marriage; permitted racial and gender discrimination at the expense of white males; and made the criminal justice system needlessly slow and complex, tipping the balance in favor of criminals. Justice O'Connor, a warm, down-to-earth, and very likeable person, joined many, though not all, of these bold attempts to remake America. Whatever one may think of these outcomes as matters of policy, not one is authorized by the Constitution and some are directly contrary to it. All of them, however, are consistent with the left-liberal liberationist impulse that advances moral anarchy.

Democratic senators' filibusters of the president's previous judicial nominees demonstrate liberals' determination to retain the court as their political weapon. They claim that conservative critics of the Court threaten the independence of the judiciary, as though independence is a warrant to abandon the Constitution for personal predilection. The Court's critics are not angry without cause; they have been provoked. The Court has converted itself from a legal institution to a political one, and has made so many basic and unsettling changes in American government, life, and culture that a counterattack was inevitable, and long overdue. If the critics' rhetoric is sometimes overheated, it is less so than that of some Democratic senators and their interest-group allies. The leaders of the Democratic Party in the Senate are making it the party of moral anarchy, and they will fight to keep the Court activist and liberal. The struggle over the Supreme Court is not just about law: it is about the future of our culture.

To restore the Court's integrity will require a minimum of three appointments of men and women who have so firm an understanding of the judicial function that they will not drift left once on the bench. Choosing, and fighting for, the right man or woman to replace Justice O'Connor is the place to start. That will be difficult, but the stakes are the legitimate scope of self-government and an end to judicially imposed moral disorder.

Mr. Bork, a former judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals (D.C. Circuit), is a fellow at the Hudson Institute and editor of "A Country I Do Not Recognize: The Legal Assault on American Values," forthcoming from the Hoover Institution Press.

After O'Connor (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

When President Reagan nominated Sandra Day O'Connor for the Supreme Court in 1981, former Texas Congresswoman Barbara Jordan, a Democrat, declared, "I don't know the lady, but if she's a good lawyer and believes in the Constitution, she'll be all right."

And so Justice O'Connor was confirmed unanimously as the 102nd Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court and the first woman to sit on the highest court in the land. Twenty-four years later, her retirement has set the judicial-appointment process in motion again for the first time in 11 years. On Friday President Bush called for a "dignified" confirmation process, meaning no repeat of the attempts to annihilate Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas. By way of contrast, Barbara Jordan's comment seems like a relic of a more gracious past.

Hours after Justice O'Connor's announcement, MoveOn.org was predicting a nominee who is "an extremist who will undermine the rights of individuals and families." Ted Kennedy was already ratcheting up his end-of-days rhetoric. Mr. Bush shouldn't let these threats deter him from choosing someone who will move the Court in the direction that voters have endorsed in two Presidential elections in a row.

Justice O'Connor is being hailed as the Court's "swing" Justice, but her legacy is more complicated. She has been a conservative on property rights and federalism, most recently in her Kelo dissent, where she took vigorous issue with the Court's extension of government's eminent domain power to include the taking of private property for private economic development. Replacing her with a "moderate" could actually mean a more liberal court on those issues.

Where she drifted left over the years -- and where her written opinions often sowed confusion -- was on social issues, notably church-state and racial matters. She focused more on the facts of a particular case than on determining bright-line rules that citizens could understand and legislatures could follow in the future. Before the Ten Commandments decision came down last month, Beltway wags joked that Justice O'Connor would find five of the 10 unconstitutional.

Her muddled 2003 rulings on racial preferences at the University of Michigan is a case in point. On one hand, she found a "compelling governmental interest" in ensuring diversity, but she also expressed the hope that 25 years hence it would no longer be needed. Even here, however, she opposed the most blatant race-based schemes, which would put her to the right of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, judging from what we know about his role in influencing the government brief in the Michigan cases.

She also moved left on abortion over the years, but her departure does not put Roe v. Wade in jeopardy, notwithstanding claims on the left. Justice O'Connor provided the fifth vote in Casey, reaffirming Roe and a woman's right to abortion, but Ruth Bader Ginsburg has since joined the Court as the sixth vote in favor of Roe. On the other hand, the Carhart partial-birth abortion case -- a 5-4 decision overturning Nebraska's ban -- could well be overturned. But then two-thirds of Americans support laws banning that procedure, and it is the Court's extremism that has blocked just about any regulation of abortion even up to the time of birth.

Mr. Bush has had five years to evaluate possible nominees to the Supreme Court and there are many highly qualified candidates -- male and female, on the appeals courts and elsewhere. Liberals who are demanding that he replace Justice O'Connor with a non-conservative are ignoring the recent history of Supreme Court nominations. When President Clinton named liberal Ruth Bader Ginsburg to replace Byron White, who had voted against Roe, Republicans didn't object even though that clearly moved the Court to the left on abortion and most other issues.

Mr. Bush has often said he'd like to appoint a Hispanic to the Court, and there are several fine candidates, including Miguel Estrada, whose nomination to the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals was filibustered during Mr. Bush's first Administration. As a war

President, Mr. Bush will also want someone who has a healthy respect for executive power in fighting terrorism -- such as the Fourth Circuit's J. Harvie Wilkinson. This argues against Mr. Gonzales who, as former White House counsel and now head of the Justice Department, would have to recuse himself from most if not all of the war-on-terror cases. A series of 4-4 rulings would be bad for the country on what promises to be a fundamental legal debate in the coming years and could be a matter of national survival.

Any nominee will provide a test of the recent Senate deal barring a filibuster except in "extraordinary circumstances." If words mean anything, they ought to allow a filibuster only in the case of something truly unusual, such as an ethical scandal. They shouldn't include judicial philosophy, although the left is already trying to redefine them that way. The only time the filibuster has been used against a Supreme Court nominee was LBJ's choice of Abe Fortas, who faced corruption charges, and even then it was used mainly to gauge Senate support.

Justice O'Connor served 24 terms, and the average tenure for recent Justices is 19.5 years, or five Presidential terms, so the stakes are enormous. For liberals, the courts have become the preferred way to win policy victories now that Americans are consistently rejecting their agenda at the ballot box. Unlike Barbara Jordan and her colleagues 25 years ago, modern liberals are unlikely to be satisfied with a nominee who is a "good lawyer and believes in the Constitution."

But the only way to stop "borking" as a political strategy is to defy and defeat it. Mr. Bush told voters in 2000 and 2004 that he would nominate Justices in the mold of Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. He owes it to the country, and his most loyal supporters, to keep that promise.

Common Ground On Stem Cells? (RC)

By Mark Preston

Roll Call, July 5, 2005

Senators Seek Consensus Bill A group of Republican Senators is working quietly on new embryonic stem-cell legislation intended to appease scientists while also avoiding a potentially politically damaging presidential veto.

President Bush is opposed to providing federal funds for embryonic stem-cell research that causes the embryo to be destroyed. Bush has vowed to veto any stem-cell bill that he believes does not honor the sanctity of life.

The stem-cell issue is being framed by advocates on either side as one of morality and hope, and it has prompted a division in the Republican ruling majority in Congress. Against the objections of GOP leaders, the House approved a measure in May that would allow federal funds to be used for embryonic stem-cell research.

The Senate is expected to approve the bill at some point later this year, putting Bush in the position of having to follow through on his veto threat — a power he has not yet used in his presidency — unless another option is presented.

The basis of the still-to-be drafted Senate bill would allow for federal funds to be used for embryonic stem-cell research, but would require that the embryo not be harmed during the process.

Several Republicans said Congress should be promoting a technique currently used during genetic testing and in vitro fertilization that allows for a stem cell to be taken from the embryo without destroying it.

“We are trying to see if we can find some ground that allows for research to continue,” said Senate Republican Conference Chairman Rick Santorum (Pa.). “Even though I question the potential of that research, nevertheless it is an area that the scientific community wants to do research and we want to make sure it is done in an ethical way.”

Santorum said the discussions include Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Chairman Mike Enzi (R-Wyo.) as well as rank-and-file Members.

Enzi’s panel approved a different stem-cell measure last week that promotes the use of stem cells extracted from cord blood and bone marrow. A similar bill has already passed the House, but many people do not believe these cells hold as much healing potential as embryonic stem cells.

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.), who is involved in the talks about the safe extraction of stem cells from embryos, said he thinks that this compromise bill would appease people on both sides of the debate.

“My position is, if there is a way to develop a stem cell without destroying an embryo, then that is where [the National Institutes of Health] should be making their investment, because the ethical and moral questions to me go away,” Isakson said.

DOJ_NMG_0001439

Many Republicans such as Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.), advocate the use of adult and cord blood stem cells but are ardent opponents of harming an embryo for its stem cells.

But researchers argue that embryonic stem cells are more valuable than adult and cord blood stem cells and might be used in the future to treat diseases. While embryonic stem-cell research is not outlawed, advocates of the procedure contend that federal funding is crucial to help speed up research.

Brownback said he would oppose any measure that would result in harming an embryo.

"To me this about life," Brownback said. "However it plays out this is about life. You can't compromise about that. You have got to stand for life."

In addition to prompting a scientific debate, the stem-cell question has a significant political undercurrent that could be a part of the issues discussed in the 2006 elections.

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) predicted that Congressional Republicans would pay a political price in November 2006 if Bush vetoes an embryonic stem-cell research bill.

"By him being so stubborn about it, it is sad for the country but it is going to be very harmful, I think, for the Republicans," Boxer said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) called on Frist last week to schedule a Senate debate on the embryonic stem-cell bill following the July Fourth Congressional recess.

Some Republicans grudgingly acknowledged that a presidential veto might not be received well by many voters. They compared such a scenario to the GOP's decision to involve Congress in the Terri Schiavo matter earlier this year. Schiavo, a brain-damaged Florida woman, was at the center of a bitter family struggle over whether her feeding tube should be removed. Despite Congress' intervention, Schiavo's feeding tube was removed and she eventually died.

"The party took a hit on the whole Schiavo incident, and this has the same potential," said Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.).

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) warned Democrats not to try to politicize the stem-cell debate. The Mississippi Republican said any attempt to do so would make him and perhaps other Republicans who currently support embryonic stem-cell research to withdraw their support.

"Not only would it make me not want to, but I am just going to say, 'No, I ain't going to do it,'" Lott said.

Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), who is involved in the discussions to forge a compromise bill, said this just might be a way to promote scientific research, while sidestepping a potentially divisive battle over the use of embryonic stem cells.

"This is a way to ethically federally fund promising scientific research," Allen said. "This may be a way of getting the parties together."

California Stem-Cell Agency Gets Off To Inauspicious Start (WSJ)

By David P. Hamilton

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

As politicians in Washington tussle over a bill that could expand federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research, California's newly minted $3 billion commitment to the field is still trying to get itself off the ground.

Eight months after a state ballot initiative, Proposition 71, established the California Institute for Regenerative Medicine, the stem-cell agency's main accomplishment has been to bootstrap itself into existence.

The institute has staked out a new permanent headquarters site in San Francisco, selected an interim president and put together several panels of experts to help evaluate funding requests and determine research standards. But its real mission -- to funnel roughly $300 million a year into California-based stem-cell research and facilities over the next decade -- is stalled.

Thanks to a lawsuit that has delayed a planned sale of state bonds, the institute's main source of funding is in limbo. The stem-cell agency has been subsisting on an initial loan from the state and couldn't even hire additional support staff until philanthropists offered it a $5 million gift earlier this month. In the meantime, it has been beset with controversies over its accountability and openness, including an effort by state legislators -- now on hold -- to impose tougher standards on the effort.

It wasn't supposed to be this way. Robert Klein II, a Silicon Valley real-estate developer who drafted much of Proposition 71 and led the fight for its passage, designed the program as a durable oasis in which stem-cell science could flourish, insulated from California's political turbulence. Instead, Proposition 71 created one of the most peculiar and largely unaccountable government research agencies in the country, which in turn has fueled varying degrees of resistance from both opponents and supporters of stem-cell research.

"Scientists and universities have been burned so often by changing political winds that they are unwilling to take risks without a guarantee of stability," says Mr. Klein, who now, in effect, directs the program as chairman of the agency's 29-member oversight board.

Stability is exactly what Proposition 71 appeared to deliver. Unlike most government research programs, the California stem-cell institute doesn't have to ask a legislature for annual funding; instead, its substantial budget is supposed to flow automatically from the sale of state bonds. California legislators can't tamper with the program for at least three years, and any changes after that will require 70% supermajorities in both houses and the governor's signature.

Furthermore, the proposition shielded some activities of the stem-cell institute from public scrutiny under California's strong sunshine laws. Members of the oversight board, who wield final authority over the program, serve fixed terms but can't be fired or replaced for any reason short of actual misconduct.

The lawsuit against the institute and its oversight board takes direct aim at some of these provisions, charging that they violate the California constitution because the stem-cell agency isn't under the exclusive control of the state. Although the suit was filed by a group of Proposition 71 opponents who say they aren't challenging the stem-cell research for moral reasons, the plaintiffs are represented by the Life Legal Defense Foundation, an antiabortion group. State officials say the suit is without merit and call it an ideological attack on stem-cell research itself.

Whether or not they are right, the uncertainty created by the suit poses a threat to the sale of the state bonds that are supposed to fund the stem-cell institute. Investors are unlikely to purchase the bonds if the state might lose the suit, forcing California officials to consider alternatives.

The state treasurer's office, for instance, has drawn up a plan to issue as much as $200 million of "bond anticipation notes," which are short-term instruments that would be paid off with the proceeds from a subsequent bond issue -- if and when such an issue takes place. If the state were to lose the lawsuit, however, buyers of the notes could face the loss of their investment.

It isn't clear that typical investors will be willing to assume the enormous risk associated with these notes. So Mr. Klein anticipates marketing $100 million of the notes directly to philanthropic foundations with an interest in stem-cell research. He calls this pitch a "no-lose" proposition for the foundations, since their investments will further medical research whether or not the anticipation notes are actually repaid, but he admits that persuading individual foundations to sign on to the novel financing scheme has been slow work.

Funds from the anticipation notes will be needed by September, when the stem-cell institute hopes to begin a $15 million fellowship program to train 200 junior stem-cell scientists. The money would also cover an initial round of "seed money" research grants that the institute hopes to award in the late fall.

Despite its financial strains, the institute has found the cash to hire its own lobbyist and other consultants, as well as to pay six-figure salaries to several of its initial staff hires -- some of them former aides to Mr. Klein -- which critics have assailed as excessive. Mr. Klein says the outside help was necessary to fill in staffing gaps at the institute, which still has only 15 employees.

The institute has managed to turn aside for now a legislative effort to impose stricter conflict-of-interest and accountability measures on the program. Earlier this year, Democratic state Sen. Deborah Ortiz, an early proponent of a stem-cell ballot initiative and a vocal supporter of Proposition 71, introduced a state constitutional amendment to fill what she called "gaps" in the law that might undermine public confidence in the program. Because of the way the proposition was structured, such an amendment is the only way to impose new rules on the stem-cell agency.

The institute's oversight board quickly rallied against the measure that Zach Hall, the institute's interim president, said would "cripple" the program. It held a special public meeting in the state capital to discuss the measure, then dispersed its members to lobby individual legislators and their staffs.

The Senate's Democratic leadership subsequently agreed to hold off while the institute crafted its own tighter rules, which it has begun to do. If lawmakers aren't satisfied, the proposed amendment is likely to move forward, although state voters would still need to ratify it in next year's primary election.

In the meantime, Mr. Klein faces some restlessness among members of his oversight committee. Last week, he and his allies narrowly turned aside an effort to elect Jeff Sheehy, a representative for AIDS patients who was appointed to the board by a Senate leader, as chairman of a newly formed legislative-liaison committee. Mr. Klein won the chairmanship by a single vote.

FEMA Seeks Return Of $27 Million In Fla. Hurricane Aid (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, July 4, 2005

FORT MYERS, Fla. -- The Federal Emergency Management Agency has asked thousands of Floridians whose homes were damaged by last summer's four hurricanes to give back more than $27 million in aid overpayments.

FEMA earlier this year began mailing letters to residents in efforts to recoup the overpayments from people who received federal aid after Hurricanes Charley, Frances, Ivan and Jeanne hit Florida last August and September.

According to data supplied to the Fort Myers News-Press through a Freedom of Information Act request, the agency detailed 6,579 cases in which they say people owe a total of $27.2 million.

Many of the problems stem from FEMA providing money for items that were later covered by property insurance policies, from more than one person from the same household applying for benefits or from processing errors.

FEMA has committed more than $5 billion to Florida's hurricane recovery.

Hurricane Victims Asked To Repay Millions (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, July 4, 2005

FORT MYERS, Fla., July 3 (AP) - The Federal Emergency Management Agency has asked thousands of Floridians whose homes suffered hurricane damage last summer to give back $27 million in aid overpayments.

The agency began mailing letters to residents this year to recoup overpayments from people who received federal aid after Hurricanes Charley, Frances, Ivan and Jeanne hit Florida last August and September.

According to data supplied to The News-Press of Fort Myers, the agency found 6,579 cases in which they say people owe a total of $27.2 million.

Many of the problems stem from the agency's providing money for items that were later covered by property insurance policies, more than one person from the same household applying for benefits or processing errors.

Nicol Andrews, a spokeswoman, said the $27 million was less than 1 percent of the more than $5 billion the agency had committed.

"Our mission is to get in there and help out and address immediate needs, food, shelter, clothing," Ms. Andrews said Sunday. "Months after or quite a while after, we go back, and, as is our obligation to the taxpayers, we try to recoup funds that were distributed in error."

The agency is asking one Escambia County household to return $50,723, saying the award was made for a home that was not a primary residence.

Pelosi Turns In Delinquent Reports For 3 Sponsor-Funded Trips (WP)

By Mike Allen

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) filed delinquent reports Friday for three trips she accepted from outside sponsors that were worth $8,580 and occurred as long as seven years ago, according to copies of the documents.

The filing is among hundreds of revisions from members of both parties who have amended missing or incomplete reports as scrutiny of lawmaker travel has intensified.

DOJ_NMG_0001442

The most expensive trip was not reported on Pelosi's annual financial disclosure statement or on the travel disclosure form that is required within 30 days of a trip.

A more common violation among members filing corrections was to list a trip on the annual statement but not file the more detailed form about a specific trip. The House ethics committee plans to examine the tardy disclosures after being stalled since January in partisan disputes.

Committee members have shown no appetite for taking up all those cases and are considering an amnesty for reporting violations, although not for serious matters such as accepting a trip from a lobbyist, which House rules forbid. The data firm PoliticalMoneyLine calculates that members of Congress have received more than $18 million in travel from private organizations in the past five years, with Democrats taking 3,458 trips and Republicans taking 2,666.

Pelosi, who was elected House Democratic leader in November 2002, said in a letter to the ethics committee: "Although the current travel issue has focused on trips that have taken place since 2000, I have further reviewed my record of privately funded travel prior to becoming part of the Democratic Leadership." She said that "as a result," she was filing three forms, two for trips that she had reported on her annual statements.

The unreported trip was a week-long 1999 visit to Taiwan, paid for by the Chinese National Association of Industry and Commerce, for "meetings with government, military and business officials," according to a filing Pelosi signed June 30. The flights cost $3,400 each for Pelosi and her husband. The hotel cost was $940. The sponsor, which has picked up trips for leaders of both parties, paid $300 for meals.

Pelosi said she had provided "a good faith estimate" of the cost of the other two trips, since her "office records for that period do not indicate the costs." In 1998, NBC paid for a $200 trip to New York for a "Meet the Press" appearance, according to the filing. In 1999, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee paid $300 for transportation to Delray Beach, Fla., and $40 for meals for Pelosi to appear at a reception and briefing.

Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), vice chairman of the House Republican Conference, said the filing is new evidence that the focus on House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) has been disproportionate. "Democrats have just as many substantive questions," Kingston said.

Federal Workers Anxious Over Pay (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, July 5, 2005

Here is why working for the federal government is so good: Federal civil servants, on average, have received a pay raise in every year but two since 1969, meaning they can pretty much bank on seeing their paychecks grow annually.

But there is a cloud inside that silver lining: Average annual wages and salaries in the private sector have grown faster than civil service pay in the past 36 years, and so have consumer prices.

So while federal work has a lot to recommend it, pay is not one of the big draws, said Beth Moten, chief lobbyist for the American Federation of Government Employees. "Overall it's probably a negative," Moten said. "I don't think that salaries are comparable with similar occupations in the private sector. People come because they are public-service-minded."

In a recent survey by the Office of Personnel Management, 62 percent of federal workers said they were either "very satisfied" or "satisfied" with their pay. About 21 percent said they were "dissatisfied" or "very dissatisfied," and the rest said they were "neither satisfied nor dissatisfied."

Many federal workers are growing increasingly anxious about their pay as the Bush administration prepares to toss out the 15-grade General Schedule, which links pay to longevity in a job, and replace it with a system that more directly ties salary increases to performance evaluations.

Starting this summer, such systems will be phased in over several years at the departments of Defense and Homeland Security, which together employ more than 900,000 civilian workers. And Bush administration officials want similar changes throughout government.

Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said she fears that annual raises will suffer.

"I think in part it will come from a lack of funding," Kelley said. "I'm worried about what they will do with the money and whether there will be any recognition at all of the necessity for an annual adjustment that allows federal employees to even have a potential for staying even, from a buying-power standpoint."

At a briefing on the new DHS system earlier this year, Ronald P. Sanders, an associate director at the Office of Personnel Management, said pay increases will be determined both by the available money and by annual performance ratings. "Every employee who is 'fully successful' or better will be eligible to get a performance pay increase every year," Sanders said.

Even under the current system, with its long track record of pay increases, Moten said her members "know that you have to fight for the pay raise every year."

This year it is a fight that the federal employee unions and their allies in Congress appear to be winning. Last week, the House approved a 3.1 percent pay raise for the federal government's 1.8 million civilian employees. The pay raise, which would take effect in January and would be identical to what Congress is providing the military next year, was included in a fiscal 2006 spending bill for the departments of Transportation, the Treasury, and Housing and Urban Development.

The House vote swept aside the recommendation of President Bush, who had proposed a 2.3 percent raise for federal civilian employees and a 3.1 percent raise for the military. While the Senate has not taken up the pay-raise question, the House's action provides a strong signal that federal workers can expect to receive the 3.1 percent increase next year.

Since 1969, federal employees, on average, have received an annual pay hike of at least 2 percent in every year except 1983 and 1986, when there was no increase, according to a recent Congressional Research Service report. The overall pay scales for workers in General Schedule positions has increased by 357 percent during that period. That's higher than the 281 percent increase in congressional pay over the same time frame, although lawmakers' salaries -- $162,100 for most members of the House and Senate -- are far higher than the average federal worker's pay.

Average private-sector salaries have risen faster than federal pay, growing by 522 percent since 1969. Prices also have climbed faster, rising by 410 percent over the period, according to the CRS report.

The Federal Employees Pay Comparability Act of 1990 was designed to bring federal salaries in line with those in the private sector. But the act has been only partly implemented, in part because the Clinton and Bush administrations have taken issue with its methodology and cost. So Congress and the White House instead negotiate the federal pay raise each year.

Settlement Likely In Wrongful Death Suit (RC)

By John Mcardle, Roll Call Staff

Roll Call, July 5, 2005

A wrongful death suit brought by the wife of a Maryland man who died while in custody of the Capitol Police is likely headed toward settlement, a lawyer for the deceased's family said after a status hearing Thursday.

After scheduling another status hearing for early October, U.S. District Judge James Robertson agreed, at the request of both sides, to refer the case to a magistrate judge, who could arbitrate a settlement agreement. After agreeing to refer the case, Robertson said, "hopefully that means you'll never come back here."

The original lawsuit was filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia in November 2004 by the family of Brandywine, Md., resident Gary Thompson. Thompson died Feb. 9, 2004, after he was arrested by Capitol Police following a traffic accident outside Union Station. His widow, Lois Thompson, is seeking $50 million in compensatory damages, as well as legal fees.

"We're hopeful to get this resolved in the next three months," Thompson family attorney Jimmy Bell said after the hearing. "It's a sad situation that Mr. Thompson had to die unnecessarily. Settling this case will start the healing process for the family and ensure some accountability so something like this never happens again."

The U.S. Attorney's Office, which is representing the Capitol Police, would not comment. "The Department of Justice's policy is not to comment on settlement negotiations," said office spokesman Channing Phillips.

DOJ_NMG_0001444

According to the lawsuit, Capitol Police officers responding to an accident in which a van driven by Gary Thompson collided with a taxicab near the corner of Columbus Circle and E Street Northeast, found Thompson still in his vehicle hunched over the steering wheel. The family contends that Thompson, a diabetic, suffered from a diabetic seizure shortly before the accident occurred.

The officers attempted to remove Thompson from his vehicle and when he refused, because he was "in medical crisis," they began to hit Thompson to force him to release the steering wheel, the suit states.

After removing Thompson from the vehicle, officers placed him on the ground on his stomach and handcuffed him. Bell asserts that officers continued to force Thompson to the ground as he attempted to raise his head to breathe.

Thompson then fell unconscious; when paramedics arrived, they were unable to locate a pulse. He was pronounced dead about an hour later at Washington Hospital Center.

The following month, the D.C. Office of the Chief Medical Examiner labeled the cause of death "positional asphyxia," meaning his chest and rib cage were not able to expand so that he could draw breath. The death was ruled a homicide.

The initial complaint and one expert opinion for the case contend that the Capitol Police violated "proper arrest procedures," which resulted in Thompson's death.

Earlier this year, the U.S. Attorney's Office was unsuccessful in its motion to dismiss the case on the grounds of "contributory negligence" on the part of Thompson.

Health Net Will Fight Judgments (NYDN)

By Brent Hopkins

New York Daily News, July 5, 2005

WOODLAND HILLS -- Facing $117 million in fines stemming from the failure of three former subsidiaries, Health Net Inc. vowed Friday to keep up its legal fight.

The managed care company sold its Foundation Health Plans in Louisiana, Oklahoma and Texas in April 1999 to AmCareco Inc. for an undisclosed price. Within three years, state regulators took over all three and placed them into receivership. Alleging fraud, conspiracy, negligence and other crimes, the receivers then sued both companies.

Health Net has maintained its innocence throughout, but faced a setback on Thursday when a Louisiana jury awarded the Texas receivers $52.4 million in compensatory damages and another $65 million in punitive charges. Roughly $8 million of the compensatory damages would be paid by other parties in the suit, however.

"We continue to believe that the claims have no merit," said David Olson. "We're going to continue to fight because we believe in our case. The fact of the matter is we sold them in 1999 and it was three years later that they became insolvent."

The plaintiffs allege Health Net knew its plans were in poor financial shape when it sold them, then extracted an additional $8 million in payments that forced them into insolvency. The extremely litigious sale has already resulted in numerous settlements from parties involved in the transfer, with Health Net remaining the lone holdout.

"We're hopeful that the jury sent a message to Health Net and that the judge will send one to get this over with," said Marlon Harrison, the receiver for AmCare Health Plans of Louisiana. "To drag this out even more will just cost the receiverships more time and money."

Thursday's award represents only the Texas portion of the case, with plaintiffs in the other two states seeking an additional $30 million in compensatory awards and punitive damages, as well. Harrison said he expected a ruling from the judge by the end of next week.

"We're really happy with the verdict and for the people who received the damages," said Jessica Fisher, a spokeswoman for the Oklahoma Department of Insurance. "We're looking forward to an award for the people in Oklahoma, as well."

Shares of Health Net closed at $37.53 on Friday, down 63 cents.

Market Pulse: Health Net To Appeal $117M Jury Award In La. (MWATCH)

By Carolyn Pritchard

MarketWatch, July 1, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0001445

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Health Net Inc. said Friday that a jury in Baton Rouge, La. state court a day earlier awarded $117 million in damages -- $52.4 million in compensatory damages and $65 million in punitive damages -- in a case against the company arising from the 1999 sale of three of its health plan subsidiaries in which plaintiffs allege fraud, negligence, conspiracy and breach of fiduciary duty, among other claims. Thursday's verdict involved the sale of the health care company's former Texas unit; a separate judgment is pending regarding the sale of two others. Health Net said it continues to believe that the plaintiffs' claims have no merit and said it will "continue to vigorously pursue all avenues of redress, including post-trial motions, appeals and its pending cross claims against other parties."

Louisiana Jury Rules Against Health Net (BIZJOURN)

Business Journals, July 1, 2005

A jury in Baton Rouge, La., state court Thursday awarded $117 million to plaintiffs who sued Health Net Inc. in a case involving the sale of Health Net's former Texas health plan subsidiary.

The plaintiffs will receive $52.4 million compensatory damages and $65 million in punitive damages.

The jury allocated 15 percent of the compensatory damages to other parties, which leads Health Net (NYSE: HNT) to expect a "downward adjustment to the verdict in an amount to be determined."

The case stems from Health Net's 1999 sale of three subsidiaries to AmCareco. Three years later, the plans came under state review and were accused of fraud and conspiracy, among other claims.

The verdict applies only to a Texas case, and the judge will rule separately on cases in Oklahoma and Louisiana.

Health Net said it will continue to vigorously pursue all avenues of redress, including post-trial motions, appeals and its pending cross claims against other parties.

Health Net Hit With $117 Million Judgment In Fraud Case (LABIZ)

By SARAH FILUS, Los Angeles Business Journal Staff

LA Business Journal, July 5, 2005

Health Net Inc., the Woodland Hills-based health maintenance organization, was hit Friday with a $117 million judgment in a case accusing it of fraud in the 1999 sale of three health plans.

A Louisiana jury awarded $52.4 million in compensatory damages and $65 million in punitive damages in a lawsuit brought by the receivers of three former Health Net subsidiaries that went bankrupt in 2002, three years after their sale to Houston-based AmCareco Inc.

The receivers sued AmCareco, Health Net, and other parties charging them with fraud, negligence, conspiracy, and breach of fiduciary duty among other claims. Friday's judgment only involved the sale of Health Net's former Texas health plan.

The other two cases, involving plans in Oklahoma and Louisiana, are being tried by a Texas judge. The plaintiffs in those cases are seeking about $30 million in compensatory damages along with punitive damages.

Health Net plans said it disagreed with the jury's decision and planned to appeal the judgment, which it would partially share. The jury said other parties must pay 15 percent of the compensatory damages.

"The plaintiffs attempted to reach back to the original sale. It took three years to happen when we weren't involved," said David Olson, senior vice president of corporate communications for Health Net.

Health Net Fined In Texas HMO's Collapse (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, July 5, 2005

A Louisiana jury ordered Health Net Inc. to pay $117.4 million in the collapse of a Texas health maintenance organization the company sold in 1999.

Attorneys for the Texas receiver said Woodland Hills-based Health Net allowed AmCareco Inc. to buy the company with the HMO's own money, leaving the plan insolvent.

Health Net Loses Case In Louisiana (HARTC)

By Bloomberg News

The Hartford Courant, July 2, 2005

Health Net Inc. was ordered by a Louisiana jury to pay $117.4 million over the collapse of a Texas business the company sold in 1999.

The Texas health maintenance organization, and others acquired by AmCareCo. Inc. in Louisiana and Oklahoma, went into receivership in 2002. Attorneys for the Texas receiver said AmCareCo. used the HMOs' own money to buy them from Health Net, leaving the plans insolvent.

"They took the reserves out and left the HMOs broke," said attorney Jim George, of George & Brothers in Austin, Texas. "It left medical bills of $52 million unpaid in Texas."

A Baton Rouge, La., jury found Thursday that Health Net committed fraud, and the panel awarded $52.4 million in damages and $65 million in punitive damages to the Texas receiver.

Claims by the Louisiana and Oklahoma health plans, which are seeking more than $30 million, will be heard by a judge. Health Net, which is based in Woodland Hills, Calif., and has operations in Connecticut, said there is no merit in the lawsuits and it will appeal.

"Health Net has vigorously contested all of the plaintiffs' claims since they were filed," spokesman David Olson said in an interview. "AmCareCo had adequate financial resources."

George said Health Net, then called Foundation Health System Inc., used a leveraged buyout to sell the health plans to AmCare. Reserves earmarked to pay medical claims went to Health Net, he said.

"Doing a leveraged buyout with an insurance company is inappropriate," George said. "It's like a bank having an LBO with the depositors' money."

SAGAPONACK, N.Y. (AP) -- Merck & Co. is asking a judge to delay the first wrongful death trial over its pain reliever Vioxx, saying it cannot receive a fair trial if the Texas case begins next week as scheduled.

The company wants the trial postponed for at least 60 days, citing recent publicity about the drug. Merck withdrew the drug in September when research showed that patients who took it for 18 months or longer more than doubled their risk for heart attack and stroke. Since then, more than 2,400 Vioxx lawsuits have been filed nationwide.

A hearing on Merck's motion is slated for Tuesday in Wharton, Texas. Mark Lanier, a Houston attorney for a woman suing New Jersey-based Merck over her husband's 2001 death, said he will oppose a delay.

In the motion, which was filed Friday, Merck said a lawsuit brought Thursday by Texas Attorney General Greg Abbott seeking $250 million in damages for Vioxx purchases has "effectively eliminated any possibility Merck can receive a fair trial beginning July 11."

It also noted that a law firm which helped the attorney general's office on the lawsuit represents at least six plaintiffs suing the company.

"The timing of the (state) lawsuit is hardly a coincidence," according to Merck's motion.

The filing also said a story in the "national media" which cited a privileged attorney-client communication could prejudice a jury against it. The Associated Press reported June 22 that Merck scientists had contacted company attorneys in 2000 about reformulating Vioxx over concerns it could cause negative cardiovascular side effects.

Lanier said Monday that Merck signed an agreement with him in May not to postpone the trial for any reason other than the health of the lead attorneys.

He also said he would oppose the motion for a delay because the story about the Texas attorney general's lawsuit did not receive prominent coverage in the Houston Chronicle -- the region's major newspaper -- and that the newspaper in Brazoria County did not publish the AP article. The suit is expected to be heard in that county, south of Houston.

'Health Courts' Offer Cure (USAT)

USA Today, July 5, 2005

A child falls and gets a nasty bump on the head. Worried parents rush the child to the emergency room. Observation for a couple of hours might be the right choice, but chances are doctors will order an expensive CT scan.

Physicians often abandon their best judgment if they think a test might protect them in a malpractice lawsuit. In the bump-on-the-head case, a CT scan provides cover if a trial lawyer someday asks, "Why didn't you do more to rule out bleeding in the brain?"

Such defensive medicine can reassure patients, but it isn't benign. It results in unnecessary cesarean sections, painful breast biopsies in women with lumps unlikely to be cancerous, and hospitalization of patients who don't need that level of care.

The practice is pervasive and costs at least $60 billion a year, according to the Department of Health and Human Services — paid by people's insurance premiums.

A survey of 824 Pennsylvania doctors, published June 1, found 93% admit to risk aversion tactics such as over-ordering tests, abandoning high-risk procedures and avoiding the sickest of patients. This is just a symptom of an unhealthy medical liability system that forces some doctors out of practice and encourages others to hide mistakes instead of learn from them.

So far, the leading idea for a remedy has been President Bush's proposal to cap jury awards for pain and suffering, but it is stalled in the Senate and is a partial cure at best. Caps might lower malpractice insurance costs, but they don't tackle deeper problems.

One intriguing idea, backed by the bipartisan legal reform group Common Good, is special "health courts," where judges experienced in medicine would try cases without juries. Rep. Mac Thornberry, R-Texas, and Sens. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo., and Max Baucus, D-Mont., have introduced bills to let states experiment with these courts. Among the potential advantages:

• Eliminating hired guns. Judges could pick impartial experts to guide them, instead of the present system of dueling experts hired by each side. Unlike juries, judges would issue written opinions that establish precedents and standards of care.

• More consistent awards. Juries sometimes base awards more on sympathy than facts. An injury worth $100,000 in one place might bring a $2 million award, or nothing at all, in another. Health courts could make awards based on a schedule of benefits, similar to workers' compensation, that would be fairer and more consistent.

Opponents say the right to trial by jury is too important to give up. But special courts already handle tax, bankruptcy, maritime and family disputes without juries.

The national malpractice roulette is inefficient and unjust. Health courts could show the way for quicker and fairer compensation to the deserving, and they might reduce the incentive for doctors to engage in defensive medicine that puts patients at risk.

Starting the experiment is the right medicine for an ailing system.

Juries Remain Best Medicine (USAT)

By Todd A. Smith

USA Today, July 5, 2005

Replacing the basic fairness of individualized justice determined by the wisdom of 12 American men and women sitting on juries with one-size-fits-all "health courts" is a bad idea and would impose huge additional burdens on state taxpayers.

Our current legal system recognizes that each case has unique circumstances and gives juries — your friends, neighbors and co-workers — the responsibility to make fair decisions based on all the facts.

The fundamental unfairness of health courts is the assumption that all similar injuries are the same. Would a typical American jury say the loss of a finger is worth more to a concert pianist than an office worker? Would 12 citizens decide reproductive systems are more important to people of child-bearing age than to elderly people? That's why we have juries.

Forcing states to create huge new legal bureaucracies and pay for well-qualified experts (now paid for by parties in the case) would be prohibitively expensive — imposing additional taxes on states already struggling with budget shortfalls.

Replacing juries with health courts insults the hard-working Americans who do their civic duty serving on juries. We routinely trust juries to decide complex matters: massive corporate fraud in the Enron case and even life and death in criminal trials. Medical malpractice cases, in which patients have been maimed or killed by the negligence of hospitals or the greed of insurance companies, should be treated no differently.

Special courts are not the answer to problems in the heath or civil justice systems.

Patient-safety reform could reduce the 100,000 Americans killed every year by preventable medical errors. Insurance reform would help doctors with unconscionably inflated insurance premiums. Common-sense reform would ensure that only deserving cases go to trial, and quickly. Frivolous defenses by insurance companies to delay compensating victims should be stopped.

Health courts — radical surgery when more benign treatment is called for — would be less fair to victims of medical negligence and more expensive for taxpayers. Whether as a full-blown radical change of our legal system or a pilot project, an unfair and bad idea is still an unfair and bad idea.

US Lawsuits Pursue Lost Art (CSM)

By Randy Dotinga

The Christian Science Monitor, July 5, 2005

SAN DIEGO - Growing up as a young boy in Germany, Claude Cassirer had a front seat to the sophisticated culture of prewar Berlin. He'd sit in his grandmother's parlor, soaking in the conversation, the fine furniture and a striking Pissarro painting of rainy-day Paris, a reminder of his family's close ties to impressionist painters.

"Before Hitler, we led a very pleasant life," recalls Mr. Cassirer, a retired photographer who lives near San Diego. "Then all of a sudden my father didn't have the options he had, and my grandparents were threatened with concentration camps."

His immediate family fled Germany, leaving the painting to the Nazis, and Cassirer didn't see it again until 2000, when a friend discovered it in an art book. Upon hearing the news, "I nearly fainted," says Cassirer. "It means my whole life; it means my whole past."

Five years later, the painting, claimed by a Madrid museum, is the focus of an international legal dispute that spotlights America's growing reputation as the friendliest place on earth for people looking to reclaim stolen art.

Armed with a new US Supreme Court precedent, Cassirer and others are taking on foreign governments - in this case, Spain - to force the return of artwork. But the plaintiffs face big obstacles, ranging from resistant museums and murky ownership records to less-than-sympathetic European law. And then there's the matter of enforcement: if you win a lawsuit against Austria or the city of Amsterdam - both defendants in current cases - how do you collect?

Thieves have been running off with art for millenniums, at least since early Egyptians started robbing tombs. But looting took on an official flavor in the 1930s and 1940s as the ruling Nazis plundered art collections in both Germany and occupied countries.

Some Jewish families were left with nothing; others, like the Cassirers, got a pittance for their possessions. Hundreds of thousands of artworks landed in Nazi hands.

The 1897 Pissarro painting "Rue Saint-Honore, Afternoon, Rain Effect" now sits in the world-renowned Thyssen-Bornemisza Museum. According to the Cassirer family, it's worth an estimated $15 million to $20 million.

The worth of other paintings at stake in international lawsuits is estimated in the hundreds of millions of dollars. Some critics accuse the claimants of greed and fear the artwork will vanish from public view.

But money is hardly the sole motivation for those seeking to recover stolen art, according to Louis Marchesano, curator of prints and drawings at the Getty Research Institute in Los Angeles. Families, he says, are trying to reunite with their past.

"It has to do with the social or cultural identity that's attached to the very act of collecting," he says. "You had these bourgeois, upper- and middle-class collectors, in Germany and other countries. They were identifying themselves as people of taste, people of culture. By stripping these people of their possessions, the Nazis were dehumanizing them as part of a larger campaign."

In both the US and abroad, some museums have returned plundered artwork to their owners or their descendants, especially during in the 1990s when art stolen during the Holocaust became a cause célèbre. But other museums seek support in European laws that emphasize statutes of limitations and the ownership rights of those who made purchases in "good faith," says Willi Korte, a Washington D.C. investigator who specializes in stolen art.

That's where the US comes in. "If you want to sue, you sue in this country," Mr. Korte says.

The Supreme Court helped matters last year when it paved the way for Americans to sue foreign countries over stolen art. The case revolved around a family's claims to six paintings by Austrian artist Gustav Klimt that were allegedly stolen by Nazis and landed in the Austrian National Gallery.

Another case, involving claims by the family of Russian artist Kasimir Malevich to his paintings at Amsterdam's Stedelijk Museum, is now working its way through a US federal district court. Even if American plaintiffs win their cases, they'll face the challenge of convincing foreign governments to cough up the artwork. The US could seize foreign assets or grab the paintings if they travel here, but that would be an extreme move.

There's another possibility, however. American lawyers who work on stolen art cases say many disputes are handled privately, outside the court system. Bad publicity and the expense of hiring attorneys to fight lawsuits could convince foreign museums to try that route. Ultimately, "the point of these [legal] efforts is to generate pressure that these people come back to the bargaining table," Korte says. "At the least, you can cause the other side considerable financial pain."

Cassirer plans to continue his fight.

Iran: U.S., Israel Waging Smear Campaign (AP-Y2)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP2, July 5, 2005

Iran accused the U.S. and Israel on Sunday of a smear campaign against its president-elect and warned Europe, which is in tricky nuclear negotiations with Tehran, not to join in the mudslinging.

The ultraconservative Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who won a landslide presidential election victory, has been accused of taking American hostages in 1979 when radical students seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. Iranian exiles and an Austrian politician are alleging he was involved in the 1989 slaying of a Kurdish leader and two associates in Vienna.

Iranian officials have denied both allegations.

"The charges are so evidently false that they don't deserve an answer. It's clear that it's mere lies," Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid Reza Asefi said Sunday at a news conference in Tehran.

"Europeans should show their political maturity and not intertwine their interests with those of the Americans. They are advised to seriously avoid interference in this issue," Asefi warned. "We advise the Europeans not to fall into the trap of the Zionist media."

The Iranian warning came as France, Germany and Britain lead European Union efforts to persuade Tehran to permanently halt nuclear enrichment activities, which the United States claims are part of Iran's plan to develop a nuclear arsenal.

Iran rejects the U.S. claims and insists it is pursuing nuclear technology for peaceful purposes, such as generating power. Uranium enriched to low levels can be used for energy while highly enriched uranium can be used in bombs.

President Bush has said the claims swirling around Ahmadinejad are not his primary concern and he instead wants the Europeans to make clear to the new leader that a nuclear-armed Iran will not be tolerated.

Israel's ambassador to Washington, Daniel Ayalon, said Monday that Ahmadinejad was more extreme than his rivals. He insisted Iran must be stopped from developing nuclear weapons, a task that he said should be assigned to the U.N. Security Council.

The Europeans are offering economic incentives in hopes of persuading Iran to permanently freeze its enrichment program on its own to avoid U.N. intervention and possible sanctions.

Ahmadinejad, the former mayor of Tehran, has said Iran will not curtail its nuclear program and will restart uranium enrichment activities, which it voluntarily suspended in November as part of negotiations with the Europeans.

Asefi said the wave of allegations against Ahmadinejad was an expression of disappointment over the June 24 presidential runoff vote. Ahmadinejad defeated former President Ayatollah Hashemi Rafsanjani, who was perceived as more moderate.

"That the result of the election was not predictable for them should not serve as a reason not to accept it," the spokesman said. "We can't dissolve the whole nation and create another nation to follow their wish."

In 1979, Ahmadinejad was a member of the Office of Strengthening Unity, the student organization that planned the Tehran Embassy takeover. Six former hostages who saw the president-elect in a 1979 photo or on television said they believe Ahmadinejad was among the captors who held them for 444 days and one said he was interrogated by the new president.

Ahmadinejad has denied he was one of the hostage takers.

On Saturday, Saeed Hajjarian, a top former secret agent and a senior adviser to outgoing reformist President Mohammad Khatami, also denied the allegation and identified the captor in the pictures as a former militant who committed suicide in prison years ago.

A different set of allegations against Ahmadinejad emerged on Saturday in Austria. The newspaper Der Standard quoted a top official in Austria's Green Party as saying authorities have "very convincing" evidence linking Ahmadinejad to the 1989 slaying of Abdul-Rahman Ghassemlou, an Iranian opposition Kurdish leader, in Vienna. Exiled Iranian dissidents made the same accusations.

But Hajjarian denied those allegations as well.

"I'm opposed to Ahmadinejad's policies and thinking but he was not involved in the hostage drama nor in the assassination of an Iranian opposition Kurdish leader in Vienna," Hajjarian told The Associated Press on Saturday.

Though Hajjarian said the president-elect was not involved in either incident, he has been at loggerheads with the hard-line Ahmadinejad and did accuse him of financial wrongdoing while previously serving as governor of Ardabil province in northwestern Iran before he was mayor of Tehran. No official charges have been brought against Ahmadinejad.

Mohammad Reza Bahonar, a senior hard-liner close to Ahmadinejad, publicly acknowledged this week that Intelligence Minister Ali Yunesi had opposed Ahmadinejad's appointment as Tehran mayor because there was a "dossier" against him. But he did not explain the nature of the case.

Iran Sees Smears From U.S., Israel (WT/AP)

TEHRAN -- Iran accused the U.S. and Israel yesterday of a smear campaign against its president-elect and warned Europe, which is in sensitive nuclear negotiations with Tehran, not to join in the mudslinging.

Details Of Srebrenica Emerge As Hague Prepares For A Trial (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

THE HAGUE - To carry out mass murder in Bosnia, the organizers devised an elaborate ruse. They stole the blue helmets and white vehicles of United Nations peacekeepers so they could trick and capture their victims. They blocked access roads to keep away outsiders like Red Cross workers and journalists.

On July 11, 1995, as gunshots rang in the night, the Bosnian Serb military leader, Gen. Ratko Mladic, met in a local hotel with a man summoned to speak for the frightened people in the mountain town of Srebrenica. "I guarantee that all those who surrender their weapons will live," the general said. "I need a clear answer so I can decide both as a man and as a commander."

But the next morning, a five-day killing frenzy began. By the time it was over, the Bosnian Serb Army and police forces had systematically tracked down and executed close to 8,000 boys and men.

General Mladic and the Bosnian Serb political leader, Radovan Karadzic, who were indicted as the main architects of Europe's worst massacre since World War II, have evaded capture. But many men from their inner circle are now in jail.

Prosecutors at the United Nations war crimes tribunal in The Hague are preparing a joint trial of nine of the highest-ranking officers accused of playing integral roles in the Srebrenica killings. Such a large joint trial would dwarf any other proceedings the court has held.

All nine men face charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity, and five of them are accused of complicity to commit genocide.

A joint trial is possible because eight of the generals and senior officers from the Bosnian Serb Army have arrived in The Hague in recent months, their "voluntary surrender" largely a result of international pressure on the Serbian authorities. One remains at large.

Judges at the tribunal that deals with the former Yugoslavia must still approve prosecuting the men as a group, and no trial date has been set. Some lawyers who follow the court have said they fear that a joint trial could become a management nightmare, involving at least 18 defense lawyers and many prosecutors. Several defense lawyers have already objected to a joint trial.

But prosecutors argue that trying the men together would avoid much duplication, minimize hardship for victims and witnesses and ensure consistency in dealing with crimes committed during the same campaign.

Prosecutors also say their case has been strengthened by a cache of documents that NATO troops obtained recently from the archives of one of the main military entities, the Drina Corps. The archives are said to include statements and papers signed by several of the accused.

Until now, the trials dealing with the wars of the 1990's that tore up Yugoslavia have been short on a paper trail and have had to rely heavily on witnesses' testimony.

DOJ_NMG_0001452

Much of what happened at Srebrenica, which had been a United Nations protectorate, is now known. Crucial details came out during two trials of three high-ranking officers who are now serving long sentences. Another three men - two senior officers and a soldier in a firing squad - pleaded guilty and provided lengthy testimony.

The picture painted during those many hours in court shows that the capture and killing of the men and boys of Srebrenica were coordinated by the military security and intelligence branch of the Bosnian Serb Army and militarized police. The forces were supplied and paid by a special department of the Serbian government in Belgrade, whose president was Slobodan Milosevic. His war crimes trial here is now in its fourth year.

The killing at Srebrenica began soon after General Mladic's troops had overwhelmed the 300 United Nations peacekeepers protecting about 40,000 people who had sought refuge in the town or already lived there.

The Bosnian Serb troops immediately separated more than 1,000 unarmed Bosnian Muslim men and boys from the families that had fled to the town. Several thousand others, former fighters as well as civilians, were ambushed as they tried to escape though the woods. Others unknowingly surrendered to Serbs disguised as United Nations peacekeepers, witnesses have testified.

The captives were executed at various places in the area, at a warehouse, on a farm, near a dam, on the banks of a river. Many bodies were later found in mass graves with their hands tied behind their backs. The Red Cross list of the missing has close to 8,000 names.

"It was a huge logistical undertaking, moving prisoners, then moving bodies and to do all of this out of sight of the U.N. and the press," said a prosecutor who has long worked on the case. Under tribunal rules, only official spokesmen, not prosecutors, can speak for publication.

If the group trial goes forward, the accused will include those thought to be "the real hands-on guys, the guys on the ground that made all this possible," the prosecutor said. Among them are Ljubomir Borovcanin, a police commander charged with capturing and killing fleeing men. In court, prosecutors have shown a photograph of him during the operation, wearing a United Nations helmet.

Two of the other defendants from General Mladic's inner circle are Col. Ljubisa Beara, the security and intelligence chief of the army's main staff, and one of his deputies, Lt. Col. Vujadin Popovic. Their indictment says they supervised the deportation of women and children and saw to it that men and teenage boys were rounded up, put in temporary holding facilities and taken to the killing fields.

A radio intercept from July 15, during the killing, seems to record the rate of progress. On the tape, played in court during an earlier trial, a man identifying himself as Colonel Beara reports to his boss and asks for assistance, because "I have 3,500 parcels to distribute," a reference, prosecutors say, to captives and bodies to be disposed of.

On the afternoon of July 17, on another radio intercept played in court, Colonel Popovic calls his boss, Gen. Radislav Krstic, from a farm where, on that day, in a span of five hours, an estimated 1,200 captives were executed.

"Hello, it's Popovic, boss," he says. "Everything has been brought to an end. That job is done. No problems. I am here at the place. Can I just take a little break, take a shower? Basically that all gets an A. The grade is an A."

That night, according to the intercepts, Colonel Popovic called General Krstic again, but could not reach him. By then, 500 more prisoners had been killed, at a cultural center at Pilice. On the intercept, the man identifying himself as Colonel Popovic says: "Tell the general I finished the job. I was there on the spot." He adds, "It was horrible, horrible."

Among the questions that prosecutors hope to answer in any future trial dealing with Srebrenica is when, how and by whom the decision to commit the mass killings was made. They will also be looking for another crucial piece of the puzzle: what exactly was Mr. Milosevic's role in the killings and deportations of Muslims during three years of war in Bosnia that ended in late 1995.

Another trial already under way is dealing with war crimes by the Muslim forces before the fall of Srebrenica. But the prosecution says that while war crimes were committed by Serbs, Croats and Bosnians during the wars of the early 1990's, evidence is overwhelming that most were committed by Serbs and that the gravest crime of all took place at Srebrenica.

Mark Harmon, the lead prosecutor in the case against General Krstic, who was sentenced to 35 years in prison, told the judges in that trial that Srebrenica was about "the triumph of evil - a story about how officers and soldiers of the Bosnian Serb

Army, men who professed to be professional soldiers, men who professed to represent the ideals of a distinguished Serbian past, organized, planned and willingly participated in genocide."

West Bank Plan Eyes Jordanians On Patrol (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, July 5, 2005

TEL AVIV -- Palestinian security chiefs and Jordanian officials are discussing sending a unit of the Jordanian military to the West Bank to boost stability after Israel's withdrawal.

The deployment, backed by Palestinian Interior Minister Nasser Youssef, would strengthen Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' hand to enforce law and order on rogue bands of Palestinian militants that could undermine his administration. For Jordan, the plan represents its most active role in the West Bank since former King Hussein forswore all claims to the territories in 1987.

Composed of Jordanian citizens of Palestinian origin, the Bader Brigade is formally considered an armed wing of the Palestine Liberation Organization, but the troops are trained and commanded by the Jordanian military.

"From the beginning of the discussions on disengagement, there's been an agreement" with Jordan, said Tawfiq Abu Khousa, a spokesman for the Palestinian Interior Ministry. "Now it only depends on the Israelis to give approval for them to come over. They are ready for every position that they are assigned to by the Palestinians."

The spokesman said that approximately 1,500 Bader soldiers could be dispatched to the West Bank. A Jordanian government spokesman, Asmaa Khodhor, told reporters last month that the government is waiting for a green light from the Palestinians to dispatch the forces.

Israeli consent is not a forgone conclusion. If Israel were to agree to such a plan, it would mark the first time it has permitted any foreign security forces into the Palestinian territories since the West Bank and Gaza were first conquered by the Jewish state in 1967.

Observers say such a landmark decision is almost certain to stir political opposition from right-wing opponents of the disengagement, although some Israeli security specialists are thought to support extending an invitation to the Jordanian forces.

"It puts security into the hands of a more credible force," said Shmuel Bar, an authority on the Middle East at the Herzliya Interdisciplinary Center. "The worst Jordanian force is better than the best trained Palestinian force."

The troops would most likely be deployed near the city of Jenin, a city known as a hotbed of militancy and lawlessness. Israel's planned withdrawal from four settlements in the northern West Bank will place a large region under Palestinian control, posing a challenge to Mr. Abbas' aspiration to encourage law and order.

Inviting the Jordanian troops across is a political decision that the Palestinian president has put off because it would signal a more confrontational approach toward militants.

"Then you can maintain the semblance of authority in these cities that will be evacuated," said Said Zeedani, a political analyst. "Then you can cope with the phenomenon of armed groups."

But Mr. Abbas isn't keen on facing down militants just yet. The Palestinian president is trying to convince armed groups like Hamas to join his government. Over the weekend, the Islamic militants reportedly rejected Mr. Abbas' offer. Hamas is also likely to be uncomfortable with the presence of the Bader unit patrolling the West Bank.

The Bader force was trained by the Jordanians as one part of the Palestinian army in exile. Similar Palestinian units were set up in Arab militaries around the region.

Mr. Bar said the soldiers are loyal to Jordan's Hashemite monarchy. But Palestinian officials and observers said that once they cross the border into the West Bank, they would be placed under the command of Mr. Youssef.

"They are forces of the army of Palestine, which are in Jordan," Mr. Abu Khousa said. "They will help in the disengagement, in creating order, and security, everything."

Anti-Chávez Leader Under Fire (CSM)

By Mike Ceaser

The Christian Science Monitor, July 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0001454

CARACAS, VENEZUELA - Maria Corina Machado doesn't hesitate when asked her feelings about the possibility of going to prison for up to 28 years for "treason to the nation" and conspiracy.

"I'm scared, I'm very scared; I have three kids," the political activist says softly, sitting in her small office in the Caracas headquarters of Sumate, the organization that led last year's unsuccessful bid to recall President Hugo Chávez from office.

Mr. Chávez's landslide victory in that vote only added to the troubles of Ms. Machado, Sumate's vice president and the woman who has come to symbolize the anti-Chávez opposition. Machado is facing criminal charges for allegedly endorsing the April 2002 coup which unseated Chávez for 48 hours, and for Sumate's having accepted US government funds. She is due in court Wednesday for a hearing.

Machado has become a cause célèbre for Chávez's opponents and a demon for his supporters. So when Machado met with President Bush in the White House May 31, it raised a firestorm of government criticism back in Caracas. Venezuela's foreign minister called the meeting "a provocation," and the interior minister charged that Machado was a puppet of the CIA, continuing the heated rhetoric that has characterized the relationship between the Bush administration and Venezuela's leftist leader.

The anti-Machado sentiments have even infused rank-and-file Chávez supporters. "She's sold out her country," says Milagros Medina, who sells pro-Chávez books on a central Caracas plaza. Machado "should be in prison."

It's a lot to handle for someone who says she got into the politics by happenstance and that her goal is not to oppose Chávez but to strengthen Venezuela's democracy. The daughter of an affluent Caracas family, Machado worked after college as an industrial engineer before leaving to raise her family. She also founded an organization to help orphans. In 2002, a friend invited her to create a pro-democracy group. "I decided to drop everything else," she recalls.

Soon, Sumate had a list of 40,000 vol- unteers across the country, Machado says.

But Sumate's pro-democracy pretensions are no more than a front for its anti-Chávez goals, say observers. Sumate is "a thoroughly anti-Chávez group," says Larry Birns, director of the liberal Council on Hemispheric Affairs in Washington. During the anti-Chávez recall effort, Sumate "did everything required of a political campaign. They played a coordinated role."

Machado does not hide her disdain for the populist president, who she says has profoundly damaged Venezuela's democratic institutions. Chávez's critics say his government has packed the Supreme Court, used government institutions to retaliate against political opponents, and passed laws restricting media freedoms and the right to protest.

On this particular day, Machado has just returned to Caracas from a trip visiting regional Sumate organizers, and struggles to stave off discouragement. Many volunteers are afraid of government retaliation, she says, and Sumate's warnings that Venezuela's electoral system is being compromised, including the addition of foreigners to voter rolls, have fallen on deaf ears.

"In many other countries where the rule of law is respected, this would have been a real big issue," notes Machado, who says her responsibilities as Sumate's second in command and as a single mother leave her time for only three hours of sleep a night. "We expected a big reaction" to the warning. "But you know what happened? Nothing!"

Her frustration reflects the mood of the opposition, which is still trying to pick itself up from Chávez's victory in last August's referendum. The charismatic and controversial president enjoys 70 percent support in polls and has a campaign chest filled by record world petroleum prices. The disparate opposition, meanwhile, lacks a single candidate or message to rally around. Some say that Machado, articulate and passionate about her ideas, could be the candidate to unite and motivate the opposition. She denies interest.

But that discussion will become moot if Machado goes to prison. She faces a charge of treason for allegedly signing the manifesto which dissolved the nation's democratic institutions during the ephemeral 2002 coup. Machado says she had simply visited the presidential palace and wrote her name on what she believed to be a sign-in sheet. The conspiracy charge against Machado and other Sumate directors stems from $53,000 the organization received from the US Congress-funded National Endowment for Democracy. Machado makes no apologies.

"It is legal, it is our right," she says of the foreign funds. "We have to do it, because if we concede, then the government has achieved what it wanted; they have intimidated us." But, Machado says, 95 percent of Sumate's funding comes from Venezuelans.

Machado vows she will see the trial through. Meanwhile, she is trying to continue her work. "If you're going to fight for democracy, this is something which you have to do every day, all day long," she says.

Fundraising Scandal In Brazil Puts Pressure On Lula (FT)

By Raymond Colitt

Financial Times, July 5, 2005

The political crisis in Brazil intensified on Monday as fresh allegations of improper fundraising threatened to force the resignation of figures close to President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva.

Full media coverage, including live broadcasts of congressional inquiries into complaints of corruption at several state enterprises and an alleged scheme to buy legislators' support, have left Mr Lula da Silva's government at its weakest since it came to power in January 2003.

On Monday, after weeks of stability, the Bovespa stock index fell just over 1 per cent in late trading, while the Real lost 0.4 per cent against the US dollar.

Over the weekend Mr Lula da Silva's Workers' party, or PT, admitted having received financial aid from Marcos Valerio de Souza, head of a publicity firm with government contracts and the chief suspect in pay-offs to legislators. Delubio Soares, the PT's treasurer, admitted giving misleading information about the party's relations with Mr de Souza. The PT had previously denied a financial relationship with Mr de Souza, a friend of Mr Soares.

Last month José Dirceu, Mr Lula da Silva's chief of staff, became the first high-level casualty of the scandal.

Silvio Pereira, PT secretary- general, resigned on Monday. Mr Soares and José Genoino, the PT president, are also under pressure to stand down and the re-election of Mr Lula da Silva in October next year considered all but certain only a few months ago is in doubt. “Not running for re-election may be the way out for the PT and for Lula,” Cristovam Buarque, an influential PT senator, suggested.

The scandal has angered traditional supporters of the PT, which for most of its 25-year existence has campaigned under the banner of ethical politics.

“The leadership ignored its base they thought they could do what they wanted with the party,” said Ivan Valente, a PT congressman. “Genoino has to go.” Mr Lula da Silva is expected to announce a cabinet reshuffle soon in an effort to rebuild his divided alliance of leftwing and centrist parties that form Brazil's governing coalition.

Opposition leaders claim the relationship with Mr de Souza was part of a broader scheme in which the PT used public funds to finance itself and its allies and to help secure a congressional majority. “It is shocking. Money from government coffers is paying for the liabilities of a political party,” said Alberto Goldman, head of the PSDB, the opposition party in the lower house. The PT denies the allegations.

The government is also suspected of appointing political allies, rather than civil servants, to public enterprises, to be able to reward constituents and parties with public works contracts.

“The PT attempted to secure power at all costs. They wanted to go too far too fast,” said Amaury de Souza, political analyst with MCM consultants.

There has been growing evidence in recent weeks of irregularities in at least two state enterprises: the postal service and the reinsurance institute (IRB).

Congress, meanwhile, has become a battlefield, with five congressional investigations into corruption claims involving government and opposition parties.

As part of the expected reshuffle, the centrist PMDB party says it has been promised two additional ministries in exchange for votes from the majority of its faction in the lower house.

Most analysts believe this will provide little lasting support. Many PMDB candidates face the PT in several gubernatorial elections next year and are eager to distance themselves from the government. “The survival of the alliance will depend on electoral calculations, not cabinet posts,” says Walder de Goes, a political scientist in Bras´lia. “And there the government is looking increasingly weak.”

DOJ_NMG_0001456

For now, many analysts believe the effect of the crisis on the economy remains limited. “There is a tremendous amount of noise, but when all is said and done we still see little chance of major changes in economic policy,” said Mario Mesquita, chief economist for ABN Amro Brazil.

First Gay Couples Apply For Marriage Under New Spanish Law (NYT)

By Renwick Mclean

The New York Times, July 5, 2005

MADRID, July 4 - When Ramón Vizcaíno and Luis Ibarcena tried to apply for a marriage license here two months ago, they caused a minor scandal.

Confusing news reports had led them to believe that Spain had legalized gay marriage, they said, when, in fact, it had only passed a preliminary vote in Parliament.

"The people there were very surprised to see two men asking about marriage," said Mr. Vizcaíno, a 38-year-old security guard. "They looked at us like we were crazy."

But on Monday, the baffled faces and dismissive tones gave way to smiles and handshakes, as the men became one of the first gay couples to seek government authorization to wed under Spain's new marriage law, which took effect on Sunday.

"This means we are no longer second-class citizens," Mr. Vizcaíno said in an interview Monday. "We have always had the same obligations as other citizens. We deserve the same rights, too."

The lines inside the Madrid Civil Registry, where capital residents apply for marriage licenses, swelled with gay and lesbian couples for the first time on Monday, four days after Parliament passed a law giving same-sex couples across Spain the right to marry and to adopt children.

The vote makes Spain the first nation to remove all legal distinctions between same-sex and heterosexual unions, say advocates for marriage rights for gay couples. Belgium, Canada and the Netherlands have also legalized gay marriage, but only Canada's laws, which do not yet apply to all of the country, contain language as liberal as Spain's.

Near the close of business on Monday, Boti G. Rodrigo, an official at the registry, said that only four gay couples had formally applied for marriage licenses but that many more had come seeking information about the process.

"We expect that the number of same-sex couples will be disproportionately high for weeks, if not months to come," she said.

Ms. Rodrigo said that most of the couples requesting information on Monday had been together for years.

Parliament's decision to legalize gay marriage has provoked tremendous animosity among religious conservatives in Spain, a predominantly Roman Catholic country.

In a speech before Pope Benedict XVI in Rome on Monday, the archbishop of Madrid, Cardinal Antonio María Rouco Varela, condemned the law, saying it was evidence of a society in which "not only is faith denied, but also human reason itself."

Ricardo Blázquez, the president of the Conference of Catholic Bishops, also denounced the law on Monday, saying at a news conference near Madrid that it "throws moral and human order into confusion."

Many of the gay couples interviewed on Monday said they had grown up in Catholic households but were no longer practicing Catholics, in part because of the church's opposition to gay marriage. But Mr. Ibarcena, 32, the partner of Mr. Vizcaíno and also a security guard, said he still attended church regularly.

"I stand up and challenge them when they say things that are anti-gay," he said. "I haven't given up on them yet."

EU Members To Face Energy Suits (WSJ/DJN)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

BRUSSELS -- The European Commission is set to launch court cases against five European Union countries that have failed to pass laws deregulating national energy markets, as part of a crackdown on laggard governments, people familiar with the matter said.

DOJ_NMG_0001457

At a meeting today, the commission is expected to endorse a decision to sue Estonia, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg and Spain at the European Court of Justice, a source said. The court has the power to impose heavy fines, but it usually takes about 20 months for it to deliver a verdict.

The EU has made the electricity sector one of its main targets in its industry-by-industry deregulation of Europe's former monopolies. From July 2007, all 25 member nations are obliged to fully open their electricity markets, but governments are struggling to implement the market-opening rules.

The court cases are the final step in the commission's legal process. The commission uses the courts only when governments have failed to to heed two warnings to bring national legislation into line with EU law. Today, the commission will issue roughly 3,800 reprimands -- ranging from first warnings to suits -- to member governments.

The "infringements" cover the failure to either fully implement or properly apply laws and regulations across a range of industry sectors.

The commission will notify EU governments of the decisions it has taken. The information won't be communicated to the media immediately because of the volume of cases involved, a person familiar with the matter said.

The commission in March said it was poised to file suits against as many as 10 countries unless they speedily adopted legislation deregulating their energy markets. Belgium, Germany, Latvia and Lithuania have since come into line. Portugal is still having problems but will probably win a two-month extension, according to a person familiar with the matter.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Saudi Arabia Says Kills Top Al Qaeda Militant (REU-Y2)

By Dominic Evans

Reuters, July 5, 2005

Saudi Arabia's security forces killed the man at the top of its list of most wanted al Qaeda leaders in a clash in Riyadh on Sunday, the Interior Ministry said.

Moroccan national Younis Mohammad Ibrahim al-Hayyari, accused of involvement in a series of attacks in the world's biggest oil exporter, died after exchanging fire and hurling hand grenades at police, the ministry said.

Hayyari topped a list of 36 al Qaeda suspects released by Riyadh last week. The ministry said he had helped prepare explosives and played a part in several attacks in Saudi Arabia.

"He was recently nominated by his colleagues to be the leader of strife and corruption in the land after the death of his predecessors," the statement said.

A senior Saudi official described Hayyari, 36, who reportedly fought in Bosnia in the 1990s and came to Saudi Arabia in 2001, as a shadowy figure who was "more of a strategic leader than field commander."

He was a link to al Qaeda outside Saudi Arabia, brought funds into the kingdom, and was friend to a Muslim scholar close to al Qaeda's leader in Iraq, Abu Musab al Zaraqawi, the official said.

Saudi Arabia has been battling suspected al Qaeda militants since May 2003 when they launched a wave of violence with triple suicide bombings at Western housing compounds in Riyadh.

Interior Minister Prince Nayef said Sunday's operation was the result of extensive surveillance by Saudi security forces, and he pledged to pursue other suspected militants.

"God willing, we will reach the rest using the same method," he said after seeing wounded security officers.

De facto ruler Crown Prince Abdullah told President Bush in an Independence Day message that Saudi Arabia was determined to "work with its friends to uproot all factors of destruction and terrorism."

Al Qaeda is fighting to expel non-Muslims from the Gulf state, which is home to Islam's two holiest sites in Mecca and Medina, and wants to topple its pro-Western absolute monarchy.

DOJ_NMG_0001461

The attacks have killed 91 foreign nationals and Saudi civilians and wounded 510 others, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to London Prince Turki al-Faisal said last week.

Forty-one security force members have been killed and 218 wounded, while 112 militants have been killed and 25 wounded, he said. He put material losses at 1 billion riyals ($270 million).

There have been fewer recent attacks, but last month gunmen killed a security officer in Mecca and diplomats say three helicopters were set on fire at a military base north of Riyadh.

LEADERS KILLED

Successive leaders of the Saudi wing of al Qaeda have been killed since 2003 and Saudi officials say their replacements are increasingly inexperienced. But Western counterterrorism experts say al Qaeda has shown a resilience and ability to regenerate.

One other man was arrested at the scene of Sunday's clash and two others surrendered in a simultaneous police raid in the same district of eastern Riyadh.

Prince Nayef described Hayyari as a "dangerous man" but said others on the wanted list were just as dangerous. The three captured men were not on the list, he added without elaborating.

Last week Saudi Arabia issued its new wanted list of al Qaeda suspects -- most of whom are Saudis but some are from Chad, Yemen, Morocco and Mauritania.

It offered a reward of up to 7 million riyals ($1.87 million) for anyone who helped authorities capture a militant or foil a planned attack.

One of the 36 suspects, Fayez Ayoub, flew back to Riyadh on Friday and surrendered to authorities. Newspapers have reported at least two others on the list have already been killed in neighboring Iraq, where insurgents are battling U.S. forces.

All but two men on a previous list of 26 wanted militants, published in December 2003, are believed dead or in custody.

Head Of Saudi Al Qaeda Killed In Clash In Riyadh (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, July 5, 2005

Security forces killed the al Qaeda terrorist group's leader in Saudi Arabia during a fierce gun battle Sunday in the capital, Riyadh, an Interior Ministry official told this country's official news agency.

Younis Mohammed Ibrahim al-Hayari, a Moroccan, was killed during a dawn raid by security forces on an area where suspected militants were hiding, an Interior Ministry official was quoted by Saudi Press Agency as saying.

The clashes took place in the Rawdah district, an upscale neighborhood in eastern Riyadh, said Interior Ministry spokesman Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki.

The unidentified official quoted by SPA said Mr. Hayari headed Osama bin Laden's al Qaeda terror network in the kingdom, which has been ravaged by terrorist attacks during more than two years of violence.

"He [Mr. Hayari] was nominated by his peers, and following the death of those preceding him, to be the head of sedition and corruption in the land," the official said in the SPA report.

Mr. Hayari topped a list issued Tuesday of 36 most-wanted militants sought for participation in previous terror attacks in the kingdom dating back to 2003. On Wednesday, Saudi Interior Minister Prince Nayef warned that the possibility of more attacks. Mr. Hayari was believed to have had close ties to Abdul Karim al-Majati, an al Qaeda leader killed in April 2005.

The Interior Ministry official said security forces conducted two simultaneous operations in eastern Riyadh to capture suspects and killed Mr. Hayari after a shoot-out, while arresting three other suspected militants, who were not identified.

It said the first operation ended without incident and with two suspects surrendering. But in the second raid, militants engaged in a gun battle with troops and threw grenades before Mr. Hayari was killed and another extremist was arrested.

"The two operations have concluded, but we will continue to pursue all the terrorists," Lt. Gen. Turki said. The report said six security force personnel were slightly wounded in the gun battles while weapons, munitions, communications equipment, computers and documents were seized at both scenes.

According to information released by Saudi authorities earlier this week, Mr. Hayari entered Saudi Arabia five years ago for the annual hajj pilgrimage season but remained in the country with his wife and young daughter.

Saudi officials said Mr. Hayari, 36 years old, had regularly disguised himself to avoid capture and had been previously spotted in Riyadh.

This oil-rich kingdom has suffered a series of heavy terrorist attacks since May 2003 when suicide bombers attacked three housing estates for foreigners in the capital Riyadh.

The kingdom then launched a wave of retaliatory raids against the militants, and issued a list of 26 most-wanted in December 2003. Security forces have killed or captured 23 of the 26 figures on that list.

Saudi Security Force Kills Al Qaeda Figure (WP/AP)

By Abdullah Al-shihri, Associated Press

The Washington Post, July 4, 2005

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, July 3 -- Saudi anti-terrorism forces killed al Qaeda's top leader in the Persian Gulf kingdom in a gun battle Sunday, but experts warned that Saudi Arabia still faces a surge in attacks despite its two-year crackdown on extremists.

Officials said a 90-minute battle in the eastern Rawdah district, an upscale neighborhood in Riyadh, was the latest blow dealt to Osama bin Laden's group in Saudi Arabia, a U.S. ally. Many of al Qaeda's leaders have either been killed or captured since authorities launched an offensive against the group in 2003.

Younis Mohammed Ibrahim Hayari, a Moroccan, was killed in a dawn raid by security forces in an area where suspected extremists were hiding, according to an Interior Ministry official quoted by the state-run Saudi Press Agency.

Three other suspects were arrested, a security official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. He said Hayari and the three other men were on a list of Saudi Arabia's 36 most wanted terrorists that was issued Tuesday.

The government news agency, quoting an unidentified official, reported that Hayari headed al Qaeda in Saudi Arabia.

Hayari "was nominated by his peers . . . to be the head of sedition and corruption in the land." the official said.

On Wednesday, the Saudi interior minister, Prince Nayef, warned of the possibility of more attacks.

Security forces "killed the leader less than four days after they issued the list. That is a major victory, both on the intelligence and the logistical levels. It's a major intelligence breakthrough," said Mustafa Alani, a terrorism expert at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai.

He claimed that the terror group had a leadership crisis and that Hayari's killing would hinder the group's operations.

"There is clearly a leadership vacuum in the kingdom for Saudi Arabia and this will demoralize the members who are in hiding," he said.

Hayari was believed to have had close ties to Abdul Karim Majati, an al Qaeda leader killed in April.

The Interior Ministry official said security forces conducted two simultaneous operations in eastern Riyadh to capture suspects and killed Hayari after a shootout.

This oil-rich kingdom has suffered a series of attacks since May 2003, when suicide bombers attacked three compounds housing foreigners in Riyadh. Saudi security forces then launched a wave of retaliatory raids against the extremists, and in December 2003 issued a list of 26 most wanted suspects; 23 of them have reportedly been killed or captured.

Putting Islam On The Stand (LEGALT)

By Vanessa Blum, Legal Times

Legal Times, July 4, 2005

In a recent criminal trial in Virginia, the prosecutor told the jury that the defendant couldn't be trusted to tell the truth, that he would lie to their faces — all because of his religious beliefs.

The defendant, an American citizen accused of supporting terrorism, was convicted. The religion in question, of course, was Islam.

Now, the Virginia attorney representing Ali Al-Timimi is pushing for a new trial, saying that prosecutors secured the guilty verdict by appealing to religious bigotry against Muslims.

The case illustrates the difficulty in prosecuting suspected terrorists who subscribe to a form of militant Islam, without airing tenets of the religion itself before a jury. And it raises the question of how far is too far when it comes to using a defendant's religious beliefs as evidence of criminal intent. The issue will likely continue to confront judges as more cases against accused terrorists come to trial.

Timimi's lawyer, Edward MacMahon Jr., is seeking to overturn Timimi's conviction, citing prosecutorial misconduct and the prejudicial impact of statements he says portrayed Islam as a violent religion. One specific objection: that Assistant U.S. Attorney Gordon Kromberg instructed the jury in his closing argument that Timimi, a devout Muslim, would lie to jurors because the jurors were kafir — or nonbelievers.

Judge Leonie Brinkema of the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia is likely to consider MacMahon's motion when Timimi appears for sentencing July 13.

DOJ_NMG_0001463

Kromberg declined to comment, citing Justice Department policy. Bryan Sierra, a spokesman for the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said that department officials would not comment on a pending case. In a court filing responding to MacMahon's charges, Kromberg maintains that Timimi's personal religious views were "directly relevant" to the case.

"While such an argument may be unfairly prejudicial in a case involving a typical bank robbery, drug trafficking, or mail fraud, Timimi was charged with much different offenses," the brief states. "In light of the charges against Timimi, the government's arguments were directly relevant to his prosecution and fairly made."

But Georgetown law professor and civil rights advocate David Cole says mere relevance may not be enough to justify repeated references to a Muslim defendant's religion during trial. Federal judges should exclude such evidence if its value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant, Cole says.

"There has been a tremendous demonization of Islam since Sept. 11, and the sins of al Qaeda have been spread to Islam generally in popular culture," Cole says. "The risk is that there is so much prejudice in the population at large that references to the Muslim faith end up clouding a jury's ability to determine guilt or innocence."

US VERSUS THEM

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, MacMahon, who also represents convicted terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui, has received a crash course in Islam. But during a recent interview, it was a story from the Old Testament — the violent tale of the Battle of Jericho — that was on the 44-year-old Catholic's mind.

According to the Bible, Joshua leads a force of 40,000 to take over the land of Canaan. After sending spies into a brothel to gather intelligence, the force conquers the city and slaughters its inhabitants, claiming the land as its own.

"If I told the story to a crowd of Christians, would I be telling them to go lie or to kill or to seek out prostitutes? Would I be responsible for inciting a riot?" MacMahon asks.

Such an argument would sound absurd in a federal courtroom, MacMahon asserts. No jury would believe it. But when it comes to the religion of Islam and how it is being portrayed in court, he says, it is a different matter. According to the government's case, Timimi, a religious scholar and popular lecturer on Islamic issues, urged a group of Virginia followers in the days after the Sept. 11 attacks to join the Taliban and fight U.S. forces in Afghanistan.

MacMahon says that jurors sitting in such trials who are unfamiliar with the religion may not recognize an argument that plays on their own biases. There were no Muslims on the panel that convicted Timimi. And, in fact, since Sept. 11, there has not been a single Muslim juror on a major terrorism case. Some experts say the culture gap between Muslim defendants and jurors may open the door to verdicts based on stereotypes.

"A Muslim juror wouldn't necessarily be more sympathetic, but there would be an opportunity for that juror to educate others about cultural differences and to dispel prejudices that might be expressed in the jury room," says New York jury consultant Julie Howe.

"Just like there can be racial prejudice, I think there is religious prejudice out there against Muslims, in particular since 9/11," says Howe, who advised defense attorneys for Mohammed al-Moayad, a Yemeni cleric convicted in March 2005 of supporting al Qaeda and Hamas. "Some jurors are inclined to believe that Muslims are predisposed to violence."

The federal courts have repeatedly grappled with how racial bias affects juries. But when it comes to the sensitive issue of religion, experts say the line between acceptable trial rhetoric and prejudicial remarks can be a fuzzy one. Unlike race, an immutable physical characteristic, religious beliefs can factor into a defendant's intent, motives, and world view — concepts central to criminal prosecution.

Timimi's defense lawyers are basing their request for a new trial on statements Kromberg made in his closing argument, including the prosecutor's final words to the jury: "If you're a kafir, Timimi believes in time of war he's supposed to lie to you. Don't fall for it. Find him — find Sheik Ali Timimi — guilty as charged."

Another remark cited by the defense team targeted one of Timimi's key witnesses. The witness testified that Timimi never told followers that Muslims had an obligation to wage war against the United States. In his closing, Kromberg told jurors not to believe the witness because he had also testified that he considered Shiite Muslims nonbelievers who should have their heads lopped off.

MacMahon says Kromberg's remarks were gratuitous — no one in the case was charged with committing such acts of violence. MacMahon further argues that the comments created an us-against-them atmosphere in the Alexandria, Va., courtroom.

"It is clear to counsel that the point that the government was trying to make to the jury was that Muslims are religiously obligated to wage war against the United States, to lie, and to kill," MacMahon states in his motion for a new trial.

Kromberg maintains that his remarks never referred to Islam in general but only to Timimi's beliefs. In a June 20 brief responding to MacMahon's claims, Kromberg states, "It is an insult to Muslims in America and around the world for Timimi to claim that the beliefs he . . . [holds] are shared by Muslims generally."

Even before the start of Timimi's trial, Kromberg and MacMahon wrangled over whether prosecutors would be allowed to tell jurors that Timimi had stated a view that Muslims could lie to the enemy if they were at war.

MacMahon sought to bar the testimony, citing a federal rule of evidence that explicitly prohibits lawyers from using witnesses' religious beliefs to undermine their credibility. But in a pretrial motion, Kromberg argued that Timimi's willingness to lie was not technically a religious belief but a political one, and that his statements should be admissible because they proved bias. In addition, Kromberg said that the evidentiary rule was inapplicable because Timimi did not testify at his trial.

Brinkema ruled from the bench, siding with the government.

Henry Klingeman, a former federal prosecutor in New Jersey, says it would be unfair to prevent government lawyers from using a defendant's own statements as evidence simply because those statements deal with religious subjects.

"I think this is going to be an issue that we see a lot of in the future," Klingeman says. "In a case where a defendant is saying, 'I'm peaceful because I'm a religious person' and placing their own religious views at issue, it would seem to me that lawyers should be permitted to inquire about those views."

MATTERS OF FAITH

Indeed, legal experts say, there is often no way to effectively prosecute those who support terrorist organizations without examining their religious beliefs.

"It's a very serious issue in these trials because terrorists are cloaking themselves in pseudo-religion," says Jeffrey Addicott, director of the Center for Terrorism Law at St. Mary's University School of Law in San Antonio.

"By and large, prosecutors have acted very judiciously," Addicott adds. "They understand this is a war on an extreme sect that cloaks its acts in religiosity and does not represent the vast majority of Muslims."

But MacMahon is not the only defense lawyer who questions the government's emphasis on Islam during terrorism trials.

INFLAMMATORY TERMS USED

One common gripe from the defense bar is prosecutors' frequent use of Islamic terms like jihad and fatwa, which have negative connotations in America. Another is the use of expert witnesses to school jurors in the history of Islam, much like a prosecutor might use an expert witness to provide background on the Mafia in an organized-crime case.

"Essentially, many jurors' first experience learning about Islam would be from the prosecutor," says Detroit civil rights lawyer Shereef Akeel. "They don't have any reference points to assess the prosecutor's credibility."

Akeel, who sat in the courtroom during the 2003 terrorism trial of four Detroit-area residents, says he was disturbed by prosecutors' frequent use of the phrase "economic jihad."

"Rather than focusing on the elements of a crime, they cloud it by sprinkling the facts with these foreign terms that seem frightening to a person not familiar with the religion," Akeel says.

To prevent religious bias from affecting jury deliberations, jury selection in terrorism trials is particularly rigorous. Not only must prospective jurors answer scores of questions about their feelings toward Islam and the Middle East, they also are asked to state their own religion — a question that is ordinarily considered irrelevant.

In the Timimi case, prospective jurors were asked nearly a dozen questions related to religion, including their personal religious preference, the religion they were raised in, and how often they attend religious services. They also were asked if they knew any Muslims or had any familiarity with Islamic practices.

Marjorie Fargo, president of Jury Services Inc. in Alexandria, was appointed by the court to serve as a jury consultant for Timimi's defense team. Fargo says that the vast majority of those who filled out jury questionnaires in the case associated the word jihad — a term she says was "bandied about" during the trial — with violence or terrorism.

"In the Muslim religion, you can wage a jihad against anything, and because there was lack of understanding on that, it could possibly affect a juror's interpretation of the evidence," Fargo says.

MacMahon says he would have preferred to keep Timimi's religious beliefs out of the trial altogether.

"If prosecutors had wanted to try the case based solely on what happened, they could have," MacMahon says. "Instead, we learned about the Koran and all these religious concepts. It never stopped."

MacMahon adds, "The effect of it, and the exact reason the government does it, is that the defendant has to defend himself against an aura of criminality that is unrelated to the actual events of the case."

Lawyers War Over Fees In Terror Suit (LEGALT)

By Bethany Broida, Legal Times

Legal Times, July 4, 2005

Steven Perles and Thomas Fortune Fay made their reputation representing victims of terror attacks in lawsuits against countries that sponsor terrorism. But the two D.C. lawyers are now embroiled in a legal battle over the multimillion-dollar fees their successful litigation brought about, with Perles fending off charges he misused money in a trust account that belonged to both of them.

In a suit filed June 20, Fay accuses Perles of improperly using $1 million of his terror-case proceeds as a bond in another suit filed against Perles by a former employee, Anne-Marie Kagy, who is seeking her own share of the proceeds. In the Kagy case, U.S. Magistrate Judge Alan Kay concluded that Perles owes the former employee almost $1.5 million.

Fay and Perles worked as co-counsel in high-profile terrorism cases, including two against the government of Iran that yielded judgments of almost $600 million, of which $54 million has been collected. And, in fact, their lobbying efforts had made such suits possible: They persuaded Congress in 1996 to pass a law permitting terrorism victims to collect a portion of their judgments from the frozen assets of states that sponsor terrorism.

Both Fay and Perles declined to comment about the substantive issues in the lawsuit, since the litigation is still pending and Perles has yet to file a response to Fay's complaint. But both say they hope that Fay's suit will not affect three other terrorism cases against Libya, Sudan, and Iran in which they are currently collaborating.

"It is just a lawsuit right now, and I hope it stays that way," Fay says. "It is unfortunate."

LITIGATING FLATOW

Anne-Marie Kagy was a law student when she went to work at the Perles Law Firm. Through her attorney, she also declined to comment for this article, but according to court documents, she continued to work for Perles after graduation, and in 1996 approached him about a full-time position. Perles told Kagy that he could not pay her a base salary, but offered to let her work on some of his cases on a contingency basis, meaning she would get paid only if and when he did.

One of those cases involved a wrongful death claim on behalf of the family of Alisa Flatow. In April 1995, the young American student was killed by a suicide bomber who blew up a bus on the Gaza Strip. Flatow's father, Stephen, filed a lawsuit against the Islamic Republic of Iran charging that the terrorist who killed Flatow was acting as an agent of Iran and its Ministry of Information.

At the time, the lawsuit was unprecedented and the chances of recovering any money from the case were considered remote, at best.

In addition to her work on the Flatow case, Kagy also worked on a group of cases involving claims by Jewish American citizens who were forced into slave labor in Nazi concentration camps during World War II. About half of those cases ended with a judgment, and Perles paid Kagy a third of his net proceeds.

Perles' fee in those cases was capped, so the money recovered was nowhere near the multimillion-dollar judgment the attorneys sought in the Flatow case.

All told, court documents say, Kagy received about $20,000 over the course of three years for her work on the Holocaust cases. In addition, she was paid $50 an hour for her work on some of Perles' other non-contingency cases. Specific arrangements for Kagy's compensation in the Flatow matter were never agreed upon.

Kagy worked on the Flatow case for three years. At first, she assisted Perles and his co-counsel, Thomas Fay, a D.C. solo practitioner, in drafting the complaint and overseeing the effecting of service on Iran.

After the Iranian government refused to defend itself against the suit, the documents say, Kagy took on the responsibility of researching and writing a comprehensive memorandum analyzing and refuting every conceivable defense Iran might have raised if it had chosen to defend the claim.

In the court documents, both Perles and Kagy acknowledge she contributed valuable services to the Flatow litigation. Both also agree that Kagy was entitled to some compensation for her work, in the event money was ever collected.

In March 1998, U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth entered a judgment in favor of Flatow for $22.5 million in compensatory damages and $225 million in punitive damages, based in part on Kagy's memo.

As her work on the Flatow case wound down, Kagy began working on a similar case involving two other American students, Matthew Eisenfeld and Sara Duker, who were also killed by suicide bombers on an Israeli bus. Again, the families sued Iran, claiming the country provided financial support for the terrorists.

The number of hours Kagy spent on the Eisenfeld and Duker cases was a matter of dispute, but Kagy left the firm in 1999.

In July 2000, Lamberth awarded the Duker and Eisenfeld families $327 million, including $27 million in compensatory damages.

The following October, Congress authorized payment of compensatory damages to victims of terrorism in suits against Iran. The money came from Iranian credits with the Department of Defense representing overpayments for military equipment and the proceeds on rental property that the Iranians owned in the United States.

Both judgments were ultimately paid out in January 2001.

KAGY MAKES A CLAIM

DOJ_NMG_0001466

In December 2000, Kagy notified Perles that since judgments on the cases had finally come through, she was entitled to $3 million — a third of Perles' share and what she considered her part of the contingency payments in the Flatow and Eisenfeld and Duker cases.

The following month, Perles filed suit in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia seeking a declaratory judgment and saying that he and Kagy had an oral agreement that she would receive an "unspecified multiple of her normal hourly rate."

At the time, Perles' attorney, Steven Schneebaum, now a partner at Greenberg Traurig, told Legal Times that Perles would be happy to pay Kagy $75,000 for her work on Flatow, an amount he says reflected her agreed-upon hourly rate. Schneebaum said that Kagy had no basis to seek more.

In response, Kagy filed a counterclaim, and a $2 million attorney's lien was placed against the net proceeds of the judgments in an account managed by Perles' attorney.

Since Perles and Fay were equal partners in both the Flatow and the Eisenfeld and Duker litigation, half of the money taken for the lien belonged to Fay.

The litigation wound its way through the courts, with Perles arguing that while Kagy should be compensated for her work in the Flatow case, she was not entitled to any of the proceeds in the Eisenfeld and Duker cases because of her "very limited participation."

"Her name is on the pleadings. She did the work," says Mark Cummings of Sher, Cummings and Ellis, who represents Kagy. "But to this day she has not been paid a dime on either Flatow or Eisenfeld and Duker."

On April 20, more than four years after the initial suits were filed, the court entered a final judgment finding Kagy was entitled to about $1.4 million — or a third of Perles' fee — in the Flatow case and about $47,000, based upon an hourly rate, for her work on the Eisenfeld and Duker case.

Neither side was happy with the outcome, and both immediately filed appeals, which are still pending.

FAY JOINS THE FIGHT

Despite his partnership with Perles, Fay was never named as a party in the dispute between Perles and Kagy. But with a final judgment of more than $1 million in Kagy's favor, Fay became worried about his half of the money that was subject to the lien.

Over the next few weeks, in a series of letters and face-to-face meetings with Perles and his attorney, Schneebaum, Fay requested that his portion of the money be returned from the trust account, where it was held since 2001.

In a May 19 letter to Perles and Schneebaum, Fay wrote, "Let me note that the lien asserted by Ms. Kagy was upon the proceeds from the Flatow and Eisenfeld cases, not upon the Perles share. On that basis I agreed to deduct $2 million from the Fay and Perles joint net proceeds to cover the amount of the asserted lien. Obviously a number of issues remain open including the question of whether the entire amount being held is subject to enforcement upon any judgment entered against Steve Perles, but not against me."

As the weeks passed, Fay grew increasingly concerned when he learned that the balance in the lien account had dropped to $1.6 million and that about $425,000 was transferred from the account to pay for Perles' legal fees, something that Fay says in court documents occurred without his permission. In addition, he learned Perles planned to use the remainder of the money to secure the judgment while he appealed his case.

In another letter, on May 27, Fay wrote, "I repeat my request for return of one half of the original escrow deposit amount. I did not agree to pay half of Anne-Marie Kagy's compensation or half of any judgment entered on her behalf. "

In the interim, according to court documents, Perles filed his motion asking that the money from the original lien placed be used as a bond to secure the judgment during the appeal process.

In his motion, Perles asserted that the amount in the account was $1,339,675, slightly less than the amount of the judgment. He said he would commit to keeping $1.5 million in the account to satisfy both the judgment and any interest.

"There was $2 million that was supposed to be put aside in a trust and not touched," says Kagy's lawyer, Cummings. "We have a pretty serious problem with that."

Without a satisfactory response from Perles about the return of his money, and with the balance in the account declining, Fay filed a lawsuit June 20, accusing Perles and Greenberg Traurig, which handled the trust, of unauthorized use of funds, unjust enrichment, and conversion. In his suit, Fay asked not only for his money back plus interest, but damages as well.

"The total money wasn't there, and I guess that is what upset me," Fay says.

Based on some of the documents submitted in Fay's suit, Kagy filed her own motion June 29, opposing Perles' request to use the lien as bond for the appeal and accusing Perles of committing fraud on the court.

If it is determined that Perles misappropriated money from the joint trust account, he could face an investigation by the D.C. Bar. Bar Counsel Wallace "Gene" Shipp Jr. declined to comment specifically on the lawsuit between Fay and Perles, but said the conduct that is alleged is the type that could trigger a bar ethics probe.

Trial Set For Lodi Father, Son (LODINEWS)

By Layla Bohm

Lodi News-Sentinel, July 2, 2005
