Lewis said the letter of findings that Volcker's team sent to him does not spell how much he got in kickbacks.

Volcker's team has been investigating oil-for-food for more than a year. In an interim report released in February, the committee concluded that Sevan solicited oil allocations from Saddam Hussein's regime on behalf of the company, known as AMEP, between 1998 and 2001. It said Nadler was essentially his middleman and accused Sevan of a "grave conflict of interest."

DOJ_NMG_0002061

In its report, Volcker's team mentioned $160,000 in "unexplained funds" belonging to Sevan. Sevan had disclosed the money earlier, saying it was from an aunt in Cyprus.

Lewis said Volcker's committee will also say that Sevan refused to cooperate with its investigators, apparently because he would not meet face-to-face with them in recent months. Lewis acknowledged that Sevan had refused to do so since January because investigators accused him of lying or changing his testimony when he didn't remember meetings or phone calls he'd had years before.

He said instead Sevan had agreed to respond to written questions.

Lewis accused Volcker's team of treating Sevan unfairly by concealing evidence from him, relying on secret interviews with jailed members of Saddam's former regime and questioning his integrity when he couldn't remember phone calls that took place years before.

He said it was trying to look tough and appease critics in the United States who have accused it of bungling the investigation.

"The IIC wants cartoon villains, not the truth," Lewis said in the statement. "Mr. Sevan has now reached a point in his dealings with the IIC where he questions the Committee's commitment to objective and evenhanded fact-finding and doubts he can receive a fair hearing in this forum."

After the February report, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan announced disciplinary proceedings against Sevan but said he would wait until the report came out before making a decision.

It is almost certain that Sevan would be fired if the United Nations accepts the Volcker committee claims.

Cash Crunch Forces Army Base To Send Contract Workers Home (KRT)

By Joseph L. Galloway

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - Robbing Peter to pay Paul is a historic tool in the arcane process of balancing military budgets, but this year Army commanders seem to be taking early and unusual measures to keep the lights on and basic services working.

At one base, Fort Rucker, Ala., the home of Army Aviation for half a century, temporary stop-work orders were issued Monday to 120 contract employees, who were sent home to wait without pay for further developments.

Disappearing with those employees were such services as mowing the grass, maintaining the chemical-parts washers for flight line mechanics, providing government cars and the gasoline they run on, photography and graphic services, photocopying services, storage of household goods for families on the move and counseling for families in crisis.

Officers at Fort Rucker even lost service to their hand-held BlackBerry e-mail devices.

One of the key goals of Army transformation is to privatize upward of 60,000 jobs, replacing uniformed soldiers with civilians under contract and thus freeing soldiers to join the global war on terrorism. But if the Army runs short of money at year's end, the civilians are sent home and the jobs go undone. The budget year for the military ends Sept. 30.

Army spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson described the actions at Fort Rucker as "remedial measures that have no impact on the safety and health of our soldiers and families." He added that Fort Rucker had to take more and stronger measures than other bases have to date.

The Army's new head of installation management, Lt. Gen. David Barno, said he'd "redirected $20 million to Fort Rucker" on Thursday to help it deal with its shortage of cash and that he expected that some of the money would be used to re-establish contract services.

Barno told Knight Ridder he was in the process of "talking face to face with all the facilities managers in the Army, by video conference." He said he talked to 11 managers Thursday and that "none of them were at the point of stopping any services."

Barno blamed part of the problem on large increases in the cost of fuel this year. The Army has spent $720 million more on fuel than had been budgeted. Fuel is a key expense at Fort Rucker, which trains nearly 3,000 helicopter pilots a year for the Army and other services.

"In none of this is there any risk to our ability to fight the wars we are fighting," Barno said. He also said the developments didn't pose any real threat to the Army's job-privatization program.

DOJ_NMG_0002062

"What we don't want is soldiers out there cutting grass when we are in the middle of a war," said Barno, a former U.S. ground commander in Afghanistan.

The end-of-the-year money problem is perennial, and hardly confined to the Army. In past years, the Navy has been forced to ground squadrons of jet fighters when it ran out of money for fuel.

The problem is compounded this year because Congress recessed for its summer break without passing the Defense Appropriations Act. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., stopped consideration of the bill after the White House objected to provisions that would have required drafting new rules for the treatment of suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and other facilities.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Sleeper cell

Among the 520 detainees at Guantanamo Bay is a U.S.-educated Kuwaiti who has not offered much in the way of details about how al Qaeda operates.

The man went to college in South Florida and speaks excellent English. He traveled to Afghanistan sometime before the October 2001 invasion and was captured on the battlefield.

U.S. officials think he was in America to set up al Qaeda "sleeper cells," such as the ones that carried out the September 11 attacks. But so far, he has not admitted to such activity nor provided names of possible cellmates.

French option

We hear from a reliable defense source that senior French military officials do not think ongoing efforts will stop Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

Instead, the French high command talks privately of containing Iran once it becomes a nuclear power.

President Bush, of course, has other ideas. He wants European negotiators to insist that Tehran's Islamic hard-liners end the country's nuclear weapons ambitions.

More than a few retired U.S. military officers say they would not be surprised if Mr. Bush ordered air strikes on Iran's nuclear facilities if no commitment comes by late 2008 as the president's second, and final, term ends.

Pantano's release

The Marine Corps has approved a request from 1st Lt. Ilario Pantano to resign, effective Aug. 26.

The Corps had wanted Lt. Pantano to return to Iraq, after its murder case against him crumbled during a pretrial hearing and after the investigating officer slammed the government's main witness as unreliable.

The Corps accused Lt. Pantano of slaying two Iraqi insurgent suspects in April 2004; Lt. Pantano said he fired in self-defense, a claim that was borne out by evidence uncovered by his defense attorney, Charles Gittins.

After the charges were dropped, Lt. Pantano submitted his resignation. His unit, meanwhile, went back to the volatile Anbar Province, doing what Lt. Pantano's platoon was doing a year before — hunting down insurgents.

Mr. Gittins declined to comment on the officer's plans. Lt. Pantano's story is compelling. Born in New York City, he served as a Marine in the 1991 Persian Gulf War and then worked as a stockbroker and TV producer until the September 11 attacks. He volunteered to rejoin the Marines because he wanted to fight terrorists and found himself in Anbar leading a platoon of young Marines.

Navy's X-Craft

The Navy this week added the first of a new type of high-technology, low-cost coastal patrol boat known as the Littoral Surface Craft-Experimental (LSC-X), or X-Craft.

The ship, known as the Sea Fighter, can move at speeds of up to 50 knots and has a range of some 4,000 nautical miles.

The ship joined the Navy's 3rd Fleet in San Diego and is the first of a series of low-cost weapons being promoted by Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. The new catamaran-design hull is meant for high speed in coastal waters.

DOJ_NMG_0002063

Defense officials say the X-Craft could be a valuable weapon if any conflict breaks out with China over Taiwan. The Navy says the X-Craft is needed to deal with 21st-century threats.

"Today's absence of a global naval threat to the United States has replaced the need to fight conflicts in the open ocean with the requirement to project sea-based power ashore," the Navy said of the new boat.

The boat will be used for battle force protection, mine countermeasures, anti-submarine warfare, amphibious assault support and humanitarian support missions.

"This is the wave of the future," Mr. Hunter said. "We make a lot of speeches about military transformation, but this ship is real transformation."

Gitmo react

Spokesmen for Democratic Sens. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii have gotten back to us about the senators' recent trip to Guantanamo Bay.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Kennedy said the staff member traveling with the senator did not remember receiving any complaints from the soldiers who met with the senator.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Akaka said the senator had a good meeting with Hawaii-origin soldiers and could not remember any complaints coming his way from service members. "For the most part, it was very positive," the spokeswoman said.

We reported that some prison staff complained about the anti-Gitmo statements uttered by some Democratic senators. Mr. Kennedy is a leading critic of how terror suspects are treated at Guantanamo.

Warner ire

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, was one of the earliest to come out for Sen. Bill Frist of Tennessee as Senate majority leader.

But he is not all that pleased these days with Mr. Frist. That's because the majority leader yanked Mr. Warner's cherished defense authorization bill off the floor last month, when he could not get 60 votes to end debate.

To Mr. Frist, the gambit worked. He fought off unwanted Democratic amendments to the defense bill and then won passage of a pro-gun legislation.

Asked about the Warner-Frist relationship, the chairman's spokesman, John Ullyot, said, "He intends to work with the Senate leadership to get a bill authorized this fall. Senator Warner has a very good working relationship with Majority Leader Frist."

Warner's staff

Judy Ansley, director of the Senate Armed Services Committee majority staff, is leaving this month to take a post at the National Security Council, European division.

Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, is bringing a former senior staffer, Charles Abell, out of the Pentagon to take her place. Mr. Abell is now principal deputy undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness. Next year will be Mr. Warner's last as chairman because of term limits. Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, is next in line.

Once-liberal Basra Trades Cultural Freedom For Security (KRT)

By Leila Fadel

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

BASRA, Iraq - Statues of generals from Saddam Hussein's Baath party once lined up on the corniche, a walkway along the Shatt al Arab waterway in this southern port city. They pointed menacingly across the water to Iran, and ships at anchor obscured the view of the blue horizon and the illuminating light of the moon.

Saddam and his military brass are now gone, and families instead fill the walkway that looks out over open waters in this city once brutally oppressed by the deposed dictator.

Basra is enjoying an economic and religious renaissance, even as the rise of conservative Shiite Islam has put a chill on its traditionally flourishing cultural scene.

DOJ_NMG_0002064

Men dressed in the traditional white gowns called dishdashas dangle their legs over the railing as they eat sandwiches from nearby vendors, who rent water pipes and sell fresh nuts to sightseers. Women and children lay blankets in the grass, eat homemade sandwiches and drink sodas from a cooler.

As dusk approaches life begins in Basra, about 350 miles from the violent capital city of Baghdad. People don't need to hide from insurgent gunmen and suicide bombers, who roam the capital's dark streets.

New stores are opening in the city center to serve the droves of people shopping and eating out. One restaurant, G Core, had its grand opening in the main shopping district less than two weeks ago, and dozens of people crowded into the fast-food restaurant built with faux marble and modern steel stools. They enjoyed the complimentary burgers and fries in a classy version of a fast-food joint in the United States.

Taxis are easy to spot but often already full. At 9 p.m. supermarkets are filled with men and women running errands.

The city flaunts its Shiite identity in the streets, after decades of oppression under Saddam. Portraits of Imam Ali and Imam Hussein, two of the most prominent historical Shiite figures as well as Iraq's major Shiite clerics, are hot items at outdoor markets. A portrait of Jesus appears occasionally among the religious paraphernalia.

Many Shiite Iraqis who lived in exile in Iran have flooded back into the country. Miraad Jaber, 35, was exiled when she was a child. Now she sits in a Basra park with her daughters, whom she raised in Iran.

"Loving this country was a problem. I was exiled for more than 25 years," she said. "I felt homesick for the heat of Basra."

Jaber is happy to take her daughters out at night.

"The Islamist parties control the security situation, and it makes it safe," she said.

But the parties are also a source of fear in the birthplace of much of Iraq's poetry and music. Basra is called "the Mother of the Oud," a Middle Eastern lute, in a famous Iraqi song. Residents of other Iraqi cities know that the best dancers come from this land of dates and palm trees.

But in the music district of Saymar the oud is silent now and the drums are lonely, hanging in the breeze with no musicians to play them. There's more fear than joy here.

Moustafa Dawood and Ahmed Aboud own a small music shop. They surround themselves with rows of colorful drums. Golden trumpets hang in a wood and glass cabinet lined with red velvet. The handmade instruments put their lives at risk.

The store next door has been firebombed four times, the store behind them was bombed twice and many of their colleagues have been beaten in the streets by men in police patrol cars and men who attach themselves to Shiite religious parties, they said. The provincial council is dominated by these parties, including the Badr Organization, a political group derived from the armed military wing of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Shiite political group that plays a leading role in Iraq's governing coalition.

Sometimes, men rent an instrument from the shop, sign it out in the old, beat-up blue journal and then bring it back in pieces, calling their business haram, or forbidden.

"Ever since we opened our eyes for the first time, we played music," Aboud said behind an old wooden desk in his store.

"But we don't want to be beaten with the butt of a gun," Dawood added.

Now they stash their instruments in the trunk of their car as they head to a wedding or to beat the drums at religious Shiite ceremonies such as Ashura, which commemorates the slaughter of Hussein, the son of Ali, at the Battle of Karbala.

Two years ago they would strum and drum on music row as they left their shop for a wedding, and would keep blowing into trumpets and beating drums until the celebration ended.

A collage of photos in the shop shows Dawood and 19 colleagues smiling and playing music in happier times, next to a picture of Imam Ali. Maybe he'll become a taxi driver or a chickpea street vendor, he said.

"We were fatter then. Now we are scared and thin," Dawood said.

In the once more liberal city many restaurants are divided now for single men and for families, liquor stores are closed and ice cream shops are the place to hang out. They light up the city center at night, but no bachelors walk inside. They stand at service windows and wait for a cone rather than mingle with young women inside eating multicolored scoops in plastic cups with their families.

DOJ_NMG_0002065

Haifa Ali drank strawberry juice on a recent Saturday night with her two daughters and son on Al Jazaer street, a busy shopping and restaurant area.

"Life is beautiful," she said as she sipped her juice, unafraid in the bustling night. "But these Islamist parties are pressuring our daughters to veil."

One of her daughters, Walaa Tahsin, 20, is the sole unveiled woman in the shop.

"She's a rebel," said her sister, Wissam Tahsin, 24. "To avoid gossip I put it on."

Ali chose to cover her hair, but today's social and political pressures in the southern city have pushed her daughter to wear the veil.

"It's peaceful but there is no fun for them," she said. "I pray and fast and cover, but it's not good to pressure young people. It should be their choice."

Across the city a newly opened park is filled with children late into the evening on a recent weekend. A woman sits with her 40-day-old child, children play on the swings and large families drink from juice boxes and talk, an unfamiliar sight for travelers from the capital.

The people remain unchanged in Basra, as war after war passes through this city of blue skies and towering palm trees weighed down by dates.

They welcome strangers into their homes for Basra's famous fish, Zubaidi (pomfret). They offer tea and cold soda and describe the sweetness of the golden dates.

Garbage still fills the streets but homes have electricity for 10 to 12 hours a day, compared with as few as four to five before the war.

They never know when another war will come. But they will always open the door and insist on cooking a meal for a stranger as they talk about their city of dates, poetry and culture.

"I am the daughter of Basra," Ali said. "We will never lose our kindness."

Clubs Provide A Getaway From Turmoil Of Baghdad (USAT)

USA Today, August 5, 2005

BAGHDAD — Under Saddam Hussein's rule, the Hunting Club was an exclusive refuge for privileged members of his government and supporters of the regime. Food and recreation were plentiful, even when much of the country was struggling during sanctions imposed by the United Nations in 1990-2003.

Today, the Hunting Club is still exclusive, but membership is based on educational achievement and ability to pay dues, club director Hassanain Fadhil says.

The club offers respite from the city's daily violence and summer heat. The pools — there are separate facilities for men and women — provide an escape from the daily power outages that leave much of the city sweltering. The club also has a sauna, restaurants, sports fields and large banquet halls.

Retiree Salim Sa'doun, 50, says he uses the pool frequently. “I am happy to be a member of the Hunting Club and to achieve my dream,” he said. Midday, the restaurants are filled with families and friends huddled over tables of kebab and other local fare.

Clubs became popular in the capital during the 1960s, says Muhammed Sa'eed, a manager at the Yarmouk Club. Today, there are 32 clubs in Baghdad. Most have swimming pools, restaurants and halls for weddings or other occasions. Annual dues at the more popular clubs can be hundreds of dollars per year for a family membership, so membership is generally limited to middle class and wealthy Iraqis.

The Yarmouk Club was established in 1960 for army officers and their families. After the war, the Iraqi Islamic Party protected it from looters. Later, people who lived in the neighborhood took over the facility and turned it into a community center with paid memberships.

The club has gymnasiums, restaurants, a soccer team and tennis courts. Once supported by the government, Yarmouk and other clubs have to be self-sustaining today. Sa'eed, the Yarmouk manager, says the club derives much of its income from renting out its banquet facilities for weddings and other occasions.

DOJ_NMG_0002066

The Jadriya Club was practically the private domain of Saddam's sons, Uday and Qusay. Anyone who wanted a membership had to get approval from Uday, says Ihab Adwar, deputy director of the club.

The luxurious club was looted of furnishings and some of Uday's finest horses in the chaos after the U.S.-led invasion. Today, the facility is struggling to get back on its feet with a new clientele.

"We think that the club will start to be profitable after no less than 10 years," Adwar says.

A Future Beyond A Funeral (WP)

By Ed O'Connell

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

BAGHDAD -- Touring a print shop downtown last summer, I tried to draw out one of the workers, a shy boy of 17 or so, about his daily life. Head down and hands behind his back, he spoke of the searing emptiness facing Iraqi youth; there are no discos, few cafes and little opportunity to interact with the opposite sex. His parents had banned visits to the local mosque after work, for fear he might be recruited by insurgents. So he returned every evening to an overcrowded home shared by many relatives and retreated upstairs to sit on the edge of his bed. "I . . . stare at the wall for a few hours," he said. And it struck me that Iraq's youth are experiencing a living death, one in which ending the pain of everyday life might be an attractive option.

The West must do a better job of bringing opportunity and dignity to these Muslim youths. If we can't, the terrorists will continue to prey upon such vulnerable young people, convincing them that the path to glory and dignity lies along the road of suicide bombings and explosive devices. It seems obvious that the success of the terrorist movement rests on the vulnerability of youth worldwide. In military parlance, halting this trend would be considered the deep fight.

Take a walk along the dusty roads at the Baghdad Correctional Facility (Abu Ghraib), which is now mostly outdoors, and you'll see many ghostlike faces -- local teenagers who took $50 or $100 to plant an IED, shoot a mortar or fire a machine gun at coalition troops. No one told them that if they didn't die, they would end up penned in with 20 other lost souls in a tent surrounded by barbed wire. For the foreigners in their midst, inglorious imprisonment in a faraway land was surely not what the young jihadists had signed up for. Angered as I might have been by their attacks on my countrymen, I still wondered, How do we rehabilitate some of these wayward souls? Or are they simply lost causes? And, more important, how do we persuade them not to join the insurgency in the first place?

One enemy video I obtained last summer shows a teenage boy awakened in the middle of the night and brought to a field to say his last goodbyes to his comrades before carrying out his suicide bombing mission. Toting their weapons, they circle around him. The bomber looks tired and somewhat reluctant, but forces a smile. The terrorist leaders have staged the ultimate act for him. He could not back down, even if he wanted to. It is tantamount to forced suicide.

Another enemy video shows an attack from the triggerman's vantage point as he patiently waits for the right moment to detonate a bomb inside an old car a hundred yards down a busy Baghdad street. After U.S. soldiers pass by, a young boy and a girl walk between them and the car. Yet the bomber does not hesitate to detonate, and in the last frame, a fireball roars up the street toward the boy and girl. In Iraq, the young insurgents-for-hire are increasingly killing other Iraqi youths.

If the terrorists place no value on life, then we must give Iraq's youth something to live for. We know that terrorists recruit Muslim youths when they make pilgrimages to holy sites. We know they often convince these young people that joining the insurgency is a way to redeem past sins or a family's lost dignity. Yet we are failing to give Iraq's young people much to feel dignified about. Western companies are making massive profits providing services to the coalition; why aren't we building an entrepreneurial class from within the ranks of Iraq's young? As it is, these kids walk their own land with sticks, picking up garbage in Baghdad's once attractive parks.

The West must help bring opportunity and hope to the young people of the Muslim world. President Bush's longtime aide Karen Hughes is coming on board to improve America's image in the Muslim world. I propose that Hughes make promoting life and opportunity for Muslim youth one of her top initiatives. She should start by focusing on entrepreneurial opportunities, recreational activities and the opening of doors for young women. Recall the long lines of Iraqi women in black chadors waiting to vote in January's elections? This scene surprised many Americans, but not me. Mothers are revered in Iraq -- they bring life. While we dawdled, failing to take advantage of the momentum created by the success of the first Iraqi national elections, Iraqi mothers were acting. They began to openly challenge the terrorists and local insurgents for taking their children and tearing their families and communities apart. In this high-stakes battle we need all Iraqi mothers on our side -- Sunni, Shiite and Kurd.

DOJ_NMG_0002067

We should recruit Islamic social, political and religious leaders to join us in this initiative. We must not be condescending in our approach. We must be open and show our Muslim partners that even a powerful nation such as ours has social problems with its youth.

Muslim youths must be allowed to imagine the power of building a life rather than just existing. With Muslim leaders as partners we can shatter the culture of despair and nothingness that breeds thinking about death among the young. Promoting a culture of life and opportunity is the real battle we cannot afford to lose.

The writer, a retired lieutenant colonel in the Air Force, is a senior research analyst at Rand Corp. working in Iraq and the Middle East.

Pentagon Agrees To Issue Photos Of Coffins Of Iraq War Dead (NYT)

By John Files

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 - Under the terms of a legal settlement announced on Thursday, the Pentagon will make available "as expeditiously as possible" some photographs of the coffins of service members killed in Iraq. The agreement runs counter to a longstanding Pentagon policy that bars the public release of such photographs. But in response to requests under the Freedom of Information Act, the Pentagon has already released hundreds of such photographs this year, and it agreed under the settlement to continue to do so.

The agreement responded to a Freedom of Information Act suit filed in October in Federal District Court here that sought all photographs and video images that showed coffins or similar items that held the remains of American military personnel at Dover Air Force Base, Del., beginning in February 2003.

The Pentagon has strictly enforced a policy barring news photographs showing the coffins. That policy has been in place since the Persian Gulf war in 1991, and President Bush has said it protects the privacy of the families of the dead.

Ralph Begleiter, a journalism professor at the University of Delaware who was a lead plaintiff in the current suit, said the Pentagon's agreement to release the photographs represented a "significant victory for the honor of those who have made the ultimate sacrifice in war for their country, as well as for their families, for all service personnel and for the American people."

The settlement was announced by Mr. Begleiter, along with the National Security Archive, a research institute on foreign affairs that is affiliated with George Washington University, which provided counsel for the case. The archive has used the Freedom of Information Act in other cases to obtain information about government operations.

The Pentagon issued a statement, saying, "As with all information, including images, the Department of Defense has an obligation and a responsibility to strike a balance between our strong desire to be as transparent as possible and the legitimate concerns to protect the privacy of military families and as necessary, operational security."

But there was no indication that the government would permit news organizations to begin taking such photographs.

Under President Bill Clinton, the policy against taking such photographs was not rigorously enforced, and Mr. Clinton took part in numerous ceremonies that honored dead service members. Under Mr. Bush, the Pentagon issued a directive in March 2003 stating that there would be no news coverage of "deceased military personnel returning to or departing from" air bases.

In June 2004, that policy won the backing of the Senate, when lawmakers defeated a Democratic measure to instruct the Pentagon to allow such pictures.

Lawsuit Forces Release Of More Casualty Images (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

In response to a lawsuit, the Pentagon has released a few dozen new and uncensored images of flag-draped coffins of U.S. troops and agreed to process "as expeditiously as possible" future Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) requests for photo and video images of returning war casualties.

DOJ_NMG_0002068

The decision was called a victory for open government by the National Security Archive, a nongovernmental research group here that helped the litigation. "We forced the Pentagon to admit that release of these images was not a mistake but was in fact required by law," said Thomas Blanton, director of the archive, which posted the images on its Web site yesterday. As a result, he said the parties to the suit agreed July 28 to dismiss the case.

University of Delaware professor Ralph Begleiter sued in October 2004, and in April the Pentagon released 721 images of coffins taken by military photographers in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere. The latest release includes five new images as well as 27 others that had been censored with black rectangles, obscuring the faces of chaplains and service members in honor ceremonies.

Since the Persian Gulf War, the government has gradually tightened restrictions on the public release of images of returning war casualties, most recently at the onset of the Iraq war. The policy has sparked intense debate among the public and military. Some contend the images honor U.S. military sacrifice; others consider them tantamount to an antiwar statement.

The latest controversy arose after Dover Air Force Base, the main port for returning U.S. military remains, released 350 images -- including airplane cargo bays filled with flag-draped coffins -- during a spike in fighting in Iraq in April 2004. The Pentagon said that decision, in response to a FOIA request, was a mistake and ordered that no more photographs be released.

Begleiter's suit was filed to demonstrate that under the act, such photographs must be released as long as they do not harm national security or violate privacy laws.

The Pentagon yesterday said "further consideration" of a Begleiter appeal led it to release the latest photographs in an "unredacted form," meaning without the blacked-out faces. "The Department of Defense has an obligation and a responsibility to strike a balance between our strong desire to be as transparent as possible and the legitimate concerns to protect the privacy of military families and as necessary, operational security," a spokesman said.

Pentagon Web Site Bans Politics (WP)

By Robert Macmillan And Mary Specht

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

The Defense Department has removed messages containing political commentary from a Web site designed for people to show their support for U.S. forces serving in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Most of the postings at America Supports You (http://americasupportsyou.mil) express love and encouragement -- "The greatest nation in the world is kept that way by men and women like you," reads one message -- without partisan asides.

But among the 60,000-plus messages were at least a few dozen -- found with the site's search function -- that equated troop support with backing the Bush administration's political goals. Still others lambasted Democratic politicians such as John F. Kerry and Edward M. Kennedy, the senators from Massachusetts.

One message said: "I thank you Mr. President for all you have done and standing up to the one's who don't believe in you. My theory is that if they don't like it here; we will pay their way out. Can you put that in the budget?"

Another said: "I show my support verbally in public and by donations to the RNC and reelect George W. Bush campaigns."

Both those messages, visible on the site two weeks ago, are gone.

The decision to remove such messages reflects a policy posted on the site last week warning that political speech will be barred. Last month the Wall Street Journal reported that two antiwar messages had disappeared from the site, but at the time the site had no posted policy on political statements.

Now, "we are not including messages with political commentary -- pro or con," said Allison Barber, deputy assistant defense secretary and creator of the Web site, which opened in November. "Frankly, this a site to support the troops and thankfully, our men and women in the military volunteer to defend our country no matter who is in political office."

Yesterday, though, several messages remained that both support and oppose the Bush administration and the U.S. military presence in Iraq and Afghanistan. For example, one said: "We very much support the troops serving but do not support the administration's handling of the conflicts where they are currently asked to serve. Please, bring them home as soon as possible."

Posting political content on Web site operated and financed by the government may not violate any rules, several experts said, but they warned that it creates an image problem.

DOJ_NMG_0002069

The military "should not be seen as promoting a political agenda," said Lawrence M. Noble, head of the Center for Responsive Politics and former general counsel for the Federal Election Commission.

MacMillan is a staff writer for washingtonpost.com. Specht is a news intern for washingtonpost.com.

NATO Will Be Ready In 2006 To Take Over From U.S. Forces In Afghanistan, General Says (NSDY/AP)

The Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, August 5, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan -- A NATO-led international force is set to expand and will be ready to assume responsibility for security across all of Afghanistan by the end of next year, freeing up many of the 17,600 American troops battling militants here, a NATO general said Thursday.

The announcement follows a surge in fighting between U.S.-led forces and Taliban rebels ahead of elections next month. The bloodshed has led the military to rush in an airborne infantry battalion of about 700 troops on standby in Fort Bragg, N.C.

On Thursday, a roadside bomb exploded near a U.S. military vehicle in eastern Afghanistan, killing an American service member and wounding another as well as an Afghan soldier, a U.S. military statement said.

Washington has long urged NATO to move forward with a plan to expand its 10,000-strong force into Afghanistan's volatile south and east.

"We are in a position that we can take over the responsibility for all of Afghanistan in the course of the next year," said Gen. Gerhard Back, who oversees the International Security Assistance Force mission from his base in Brunssum, the Netherlands.

He said he expects the deployment of extra NATO forces to relieve a "substantial" number of troops from the U.S.-led coalition, which also includes some 3,100 soldiers from 19 other nations.

Back said NATO troops would need "more robust" rules of engagement, which govern when and how forces can engage the insurgents.

He spoke to reporters after a ceremony marking the change of the command of ISAF, the NATO-led force, from a Turkish general to Italian Lt. Gen. Mauro Del Vecchio. The force is made up of troops from 36 nations.

ISAF already maintains security in the capital, Kabul, and the country's north and west. It plans to increase its size by an unspecified amount and take over from the U.S.-led coalition in the violence-wracked south early next year, before gradually moving into the east.

ISAF spokesman Riccardo Cristoni said most American troops who stay in Afghanistan after NATO takes responsibility for security nationwide would come under NATO command.

But he said it was not clear whether the United States would also keep a separate force dedicated to hunting Osama bin Laden and other al-Qaida leaders believed to be hiding along the mountainous Afghan-Pakistani border.

U.S. military spokeswoman Lt. Cindy Moore said commanders were still planning how many troops would remain here next year.

Washington has long sought to reduce the number of its troops in Afghanistan. In May, Maj. Gen. Jason Kamiya, the operational commander of U.S. forces in Afghanistan, said he was optimistic there would be a "modest reduction" this summer -- but that has not happened.

NATO has also boosted the size of its force in the past few weeks in response to the violence and in preparation for legislative elections on Sept. 18. It plans to bring in another 2,000 troops before the vote.

More than 900 people have been killed in fighting since March, when winter snows melted on mountain passes the insurgents use and the rebels launched major offensives across the country.

Afghan, NATO and American officials have warned that the spike in fighting may threaten the elections, which is the next key step toward democracy after a quarter-century of war.

"Some sources of instability like Taliban, al-Qaida and other elements might still pose a danger to the democratic process in Afghanistan," said Hikmet Cetin, the top civilian representative for NATO in Afghanistan. "We are aware that at the critical juncture for Afghans' future, the security situation could not be taken for granted."

DOJ_NMG_0002070

The attack that killed the U.S. service member Thursday occurred near a base at Urgun in Paktika province, which borders Pakistan. It came just over a week after two other U.S. service members were killed in separate attacks.

The death brings to 174 the number of U.S. troops killed in and around Afghanistan since Operation Enduring Freedom began in 2001.

DOJ:

Deputy Attorney General Comey To Take Post At Lockheed Martin (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

The nation's No. 2 law-enforcement official, Deputy Attorney General James Comey, is expected to join Lockheed Martin Corp. as senior vice president and general counsel when he leaves the government this month, according to people familiar with the matter.

Mr. Comey, perhaps best known in recent years for spearheading a crackdown on corporate fraud, previously had prosecuted numerous organized-crime and terrorism cases, including those involving crime boss John Gambino and the 1996 Khobar Towers terrorist attack on a U.S. military facility in Saudi Arabia. President Bush appointed him to the senior Justice Department post in December 2003.

Separately, David N. Kelley, who succeeded Mr. Comey as U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York in early 2004, is leaving that post to join law firm Cahill Gordon & Reindel LLP. He will start at the firm in the fall as a litigation group partner.

Mr. Comey's hiring by Lockheed, which will take effect Oct. 1, will add legal firepower to the executive team at the nation's largest defense contractor, which often faces a variety of legal claims, ranging from environmental cleanups to false claims and securities suits.

Directors at Lockheed, Bethesda, Md., are expected to vote on Mr. Comey's compensation this morning. Mr. Comey declined to comment.

Mr. Comey, 44 years old, is expected to be succeeded at the Justice Department by Timothy Flanigan, general counsel at Tyco International Ltd. and former White House deputy counsel.

At the Justice Department, Mr. Comey has overseen day-to-day operations, serving as the point person at department headquarters for U.S. attorneys nationwide and leading the Corporate Fraud Task Force, an interagency group created by the president amid numerous corporate-accounting scandals. To that end, federal prosecutors have charged more than 1,300 individuals with various related crimes since the group's formation in July 2002.

As U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, Mr.Comey directed corporate-fraud cases involving WorldCom Inc., Adelphia Communications Corp. and ImClone Systems Inc., as well as aiding the government's response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. From 1996 to 2001, he was the managing Assistant U.S. Attorney in Richmond, Va.

The departure of Mr. Kelley, 45, a career prosecutor, was expected. He is a Democrat and presidents usually nominate U.S. attorneys from their own party. Mr. Kelley will be succeeded by Michael J. Garcia, whom President Bush nominated earlier this year. Mr. Garcia, a top Department of Homeland Security official, was confirmed by the Senate.

--Kara Scannell contributed to this article.

Lockheed Names Justice Department's Comey To GC Post (AP)

AP, August 5, 2005

Lockheed Martin Corp., the nation's largest defense contractor, said Thursday that the second-ranking official at the Justice Department will become the company's general counsel.

Deputy Attorney General James Comey, 44, will join Lockheed in October, replacing Frank Menaker Jr., 65, as its top lawyer. Comey, who was appointed in 2003 by President Bush, said in April that he planned to leave the Justice Department in the fall.

At Justice, he led the agency's corporate fraud task force, overseeing the prosecution of firms such as WorldCom and Enron Corp. He had served earlier as U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, and handled the investigation of the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia while working at the U.S. attorney's office in Virginia.

Menaker, who has served as general counsel at Lockheed since March 1995, will retire at the end of January 2006.

Lockheed also said the former deputy secretary of Homeland Security, James Loy, was elected to the company's board of directors. Loy was also the first director of the Transportation Security Administration.

Lockheed shares fell 13 cents to close at $62.82 Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange.

U.S. Deputy AG Comey To Join Lockheed Martin (REU)

Reuters, August 5, 2005

U.S. Deputy Attorney General James Comey, who made his name prosecuting corporate executives, is to join the nation's No. 1 defense contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. as general counsel, a source familiar with the matter said on Thursday.

Comey, the No. 2 U.S. legal official behind Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, led the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, overseeing prosecutions of executives at Adelphia Communications Corp. , ImClone Systems Inc. and WorldCom. He also handled a number of high-profile terror and drug cases.

The Lockheed appointment is set to start on Oct. 1. The move was first reported in The Wall Street Journal.

Comey, who was named Deputy Attorney General in October 2003, said in April he planned to resign and move into the private sector.

Before serving in Washington, Comey was U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, where he made his name prosecuting an organized crime case against the Gambino family.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

U.S. Probes Allegations Of Bribery At DaimlerChrysler (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke And Stephen Power

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

The Justice Department is pursuing a criminal investigation of allegations that DaimlerChrysler AG's Mercedes unit paid bribes in at least a dozen countries and that senior executives may have been aware of the practice.

The investigation is an escalation of a civil inquiry by the Securities and Exchange Commission that was disclosed late last year. That inquiry was triggered by a former Chrysler accountant in Detroit who alleged in a lawsuit last year that the company kept dozens of secret bank accounts to bribe foreign officials.

The investigation comes at a difficult time for DaimlerChrysler. Last week, Chief Executive Jürgen Schrempp unexpectedly said he would retire at the end of this year, well ahead of the April 2008 expiration of his contract, amid weak financial results and other setbacks at the company, the world's fifth-largest auto maker as measured by sales.

German federal authorities joined the investigation as well, people close to the case said, after the July 22 suicide of Rudi Kornmayer, managing director of the company's plant in Nigeria. The 53-year-old executive shot himself in a park in Esslingen, Germany, police said. Investigators are reviewing a suicide note that refers to the bribery inquiry, those close to the case said.

DaimlerChrysler operations in Latin America and Africa are among those under scrutiny, a person close to the case said, but the nature and purpose of the alleged payments hasn't been disclosed.

In financial disclosures on July 28, DaimlerChrysler reported it has identified "accounts, transactions and related payments that are subject to special scrutiny." The company said it is cooperating fully with investigators and "voluntarily sharing...information from its own internal investigation" in response to subpoenas from U.S. authorities.

A spokesman at DaimlerChrysler's Stuttgart, Germany, headquarters declined to amplify that statement or discuss the death of Mr. Kornmayer, who headed the company's Nigerian operations. A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0002072

Historically, there has been recurring tension between the U.S. and foreign companies over enforcement of U.S. anti-corruption laws. Foreign bribes by companies or individuals were outlawed by the 1977 Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, and in recent years the U.S. has pushed other countries to adopt similar laws. But bribery remains common in parts of Africa and Latin America, and in many oil-producing nations.

Bribery is illegal across the European Union. But before passage of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development Anti-Bribery Convention in 1997, several European governments, including Germany's, openly allowed tax deductions for bribery overseas, according to Transparency International, a Berlin-based nonprofit group dedicated to fighting corruption. Germany's parliament ratified the convention in 1999.

The U.S. has stepped up enforcement of its anti-bribery law in recent years, and a growing number of companies have been disclosing possible foreign bribery in the wake of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-accountability law. The largest such case to date was settled earlier this year, when defense contractor Titan Corp. paid $28.5 million in fines and other penalties for $3.5 million in alleged bribes in the African nation of Benin, part of which was used in a presidential election campaign to secure the award of a telecommunications contract, according to a government filing in federal court in San Diego. The bribery investigation had derailed a planned acquisition of Titan by Lockheed Martin Corp.

The DaimlerChrysler inquiry stems from a wrongful-dismissal lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit last year and settled last month. The plaintiff in that case, former Chrysler accountant David Bazzetta, alleged he was fired in part because he complained to superiors about secret bank accounts kept by the company's Mercedes unit.

Mr. Bazzetta said he first learned of the accounts at a corporate audit executive committee meeting in Stuttgart in July 2001. At the time Mr. Bazzetta's allegations were disclosed, Dieter Zetsche, then-CEO of Chrysler Group, told The Wall Street Journal "there is no evidence supporting" the allegations.

Mr. Bazzetta also claimed, according to court filings, that a senior audit manager told the group that foreign bribery had once been a "common practice" and that Mercedes managers in a few countries were resisting efforts to "wind down" the practice to come into compliance with U.S. law. DaimlerBenz AG and Chrysler Corp. merged in 1998; the company is subject to U.S. bribery law because its shares are listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. Bazzetta said in his lawsuit that he was told by his supervisor to "forget what was said" and that "issues that arise in corporate audit must remain in corporate audit." He also said he was told that Mr. Schrempp and other executives had been briefed by a senior auditor on 40 secret accounts that still existed and that the money was "buried deep within [the] balance sheet." The accounts still existed, Mr. Bazzetta asserted in his lawsuit, "because the chief executives of the business units not only favored this practice but believed it a necessary cost of doing business."

Terms of the settlement between Mr. Bazzetta and DaimlerChrysler are confidential, said his attorney, Sue Ellen Eisenberg of law firm Eisenberg & Bogas, Bloomfield Hills, Mich. Mr. Bazzetta later met with investigators and provided further details of the 2001 meeting. She said Mr. Bazzetta would not comment. Mr. Bazzetta's suit doesn't say how the accounts were used by country managers or whether they still are in existence.

In its SEC filing last week, DaimlerChrysler said it "has not yet reached any definitive conclusions as to whether, or to what extent, these transactions and payments may constitute violations of applicable law." If the Justice Department or SEC find that violations have occurred, the company said, "They could seek criminal or civil sanctions, including monetary penalties against DaimlerChrysler and certain of its employees, as well as changes to its business practices and compliance programs."

DaimlerChrysler also announced $17.8 million in adjustments to "certain payable accounts related to consolidated subsidiaries." The changes are insignificant given DaimlerChrysler's vast size, but may be a clue to the size of the alleged improper payments. Company officials declined to explain the accounting changes or detail how they relate to the bribery investigation. The statement also said, "It is possible that further adjustments may be required as the company completes its investigation."

The DaimlerChrysler investigation comes amid probes at other high-profile German companies that have put some of the country's traditional corporate practices under a microscope. German prosecutors are looking into allegations that a former Volkswagen AG executive set up phony businesses abroad to enrich himself at the expense of Volkswagen business partners, and that the company's personnel department gave union leaders unrestricted access to a corporate travel account that paid for plush hotels and other perks.

DOJ_NMG_0002073

While allegations of corruption at Volkswagen and other companies have garnered widespread publicity in Germany recently, most corporations are more sensitive to perceptions of wrongdoing, and have tightened ethics codes to prohibit behavior that would previously have been tolerated, said Dagmar Schröder, managing director of Transparency International's Germany chapter.

SEC Urges Judge To Let Scrushy Case Proceed (LAT/BLOOM)

By From Bloomberg News

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

HealthSouth Corp. founder Richard Scrushy should face civil-fraud charges for his role in "one of the largest financial frauds in U.S. history," the Securities and Exchange Commission said Thursday in urging a judge to let the case proceed.

The SEC's filing in federal court in Birmingham, Ala., called Scrushy "desperate" for asking last month that the lawsuit be dismissed because of the agency's collaboration with the Justice Department. Any guidance given to the SEC was within acceptable rules, the agency said.

"Scrushy wants this court to create new law, from scratch, that would obligate the SEC to keep suspects apprised of developments in parallel DOJ investigations," the SEC said. "Scrushy wants the SEC to become the con man's ear in the Justice Department."

Scrushy is accused by the SEC of lying to investors and signing false financial reports. The lawsuit is one of several stemming from fraud that happened under Scrushy's watch from 1996 to 2002 at HealthSouth, the largest U.S. operator of rehabilitation medicine services. Scrushy, who is fighting to regain control of the company he started in 1984, was acquitted June 28 of criminal charges.

Arthur Leach, Scrushy's lawyer, said he hadn't yet read the SEC filing and couldn't comment.

Greenberg Fires Back At Directors (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Maurice R. Greenberg, the former chairman and chief executive of the giant insurer American International Group, has challenged the rationale for its $4 billion income restatement, calling many of the items "exaggerated and unnecessary."

In a document presented to regulators yesterday, Mr. Greenberg's lawyers point to many people, including the company's audit committee and PricewaterhouseCoopers, as being equally responsible for overseeing the company's complex accounting. It suggests that the company's huge restatement was carried out to justify Mr. Greenberg's ouster earlier this year.

The document, known as a white paper, is a gamble for Mr. Greenberg. He is named in a suit brought by the New York attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, which claims that he and others manipulated A.I.G.'s financial statements and misled regulators, and he continues to be under criminal and civil investigation by federal authorities. In late May, A.I.G. restated five years of results, lowering its net income over that time by $4 billion, or 10 percent.

The paper is "a shot across the bow of the regulators who clearly are contemplating bringing criminal charges," said Robert A. Mintz, head of the white-collar defense practice of the law firm McCarter & English and a former federal prosecutor. "It's a signal that this is clearly a winnable fight and it's far from a black and white case."

Mr. Greenberg's lawyers challenge many of the restatement items and question what they call the board's rash judgment to force Mr. Greenberg's resignation before any charges were brought. The intense regulatory environment, they write, does not explain the whole picture.

"The rush to judgment may also be explained in part by the outside directors' interest in legitimizing their removal of Mr. Greenberg," the paper says, "whose 38-year record in creating stockholder value is beyond dispute in American business history and by understanding the long-held ambitions of at least one or two such directors to take a leading role at A.I.G."

Chris Winans, an A.I.G. spokesman, said: "We have not been given access to the so-called white paper and we have no comment on it. We stand by our decision as fully disclosed in our recent 10(k) filing with the S.E.C."

Darren Dopp, a spokesman for Mr. Spitzer, said, "We'll let the case and the facts speak for themselves."

Among the items that the paper challenges are an $850 million charge for asbestos and environmental reserves and a decision to expense already awarded long-term compensation. It also examines the role played by both A.I.G.'s audit committee and PricewaterhouseCoopers for approving many of the transactions now deemed improper.

A spokesman for PricewaterhouseCoopers could not be reached for comment.

Mr. Greenberg's lawyers question A.I.G.'s reversal on how to account for stock awarded to A.I.G. employees by Starr International, a private company that ultimately became a vehicle to offer incentive compensation to A.I.G. employees. In its 10(k) filing, A.I.G. states that it did not previously expense the compensation because "the amounts had been determined not to be material."

As a result of that program, A.I.G. stockholders enjoyed a lower rate of dilution than other companies because Starr International, rather than A.I.G., could offer the compensation. According to the paper, Starr International has offered information to A.I.G. that would enable it to save hundreds of millions of dollars through a tax deduction. A.I.G. has not responded to that offer, Mr. Greenberg's lawyers wrote.

"These changes to the form 10(k) may be an attempt by new management to set the bar as low as possible on the investment community's expectations of A.I.G.'s earnings going forward," the paper says.

The report does not detail Mr. Greenberg's role in a so-called finite insurance transaction with General Re, a subsidiary of Berkshire Hathaway, which Mr. Spitzer accuses Mr. Greenberg of orchestrating solely to dress up A.I.G.'s financials.

The report says the accounting community continues to debate the issue of when finite reinsurance contracts qualify as reinsurance accounting, calling the issue "complex and highly subjective."

But the document does not address Mr. Greenberg's motives in seeking the transaction. His lawyers say they have not received the documents necessary to review the matter properly.

The report takes shots at various individuals inside A.I.G. Mr. Spitzer's complaint alleges that management made accounting adjustments, known as top-level adjustments, to improve its results. Mr. Greenberg's lawyers say no top-level entries were made without consultation with PricewaterhouseCoopers, adding that Martin J. Sullivan, the current chief executive of A.I.G., was "involved in certain top-level adjustments to general insurance loss reserves."

Mr. Sullivan has not been accused of any wrongdoing. Through Mr. Winans, he declined to comment.

Greenberg Defends AIG's Accounting, Rebuts Allegations (WSJ)

By Theo Francis And Ian McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Attorneys for former American International Group Inc. Chairman and Chief Executive Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg defended many of the accounting decisions made on his watch, telling regulators that the company's auditor and current AIG executives knew of moves the company recently reversed.

In a 51-page document, the lawyers say that AIG's longtime auditor, PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, Chief Executive Martin J. Sullivan and Chief Financial Officer Steven J. Bensinger, among others, were aware of accounting moves that the company has reversed under pressure from regulators.

In late May AIG restated five years of financial results, shaving its reported profit through 2004 by 10%, or $3.9 billion, and cutting its net worth by 3%. The company's shares have fallen 16% since it disclosed state and federal subpoenas in February.

The document suggests current managers are eager to take sizable charges now partly to make the firm's future results looks stronger by comparison. The changes behind the restatement "may be an effort by new management to set the bar as low as possible on the investment community's expectations of AIG's earnings going forward," according to the document. The outside directors also have "an interest in legitimizing their removal of Mr. Greenberg," the document says.

The document, which was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, marks Mr. Greenberg's first detailed attempt since he was forced out in March to rebut allegations that he and others improperly manipulated AIG's books to burnish the company's otherwise strong results. Those allegations are made in AIG's latest annual report and in a lawsuit filed in May by the New York attorney general and the state insurance department against the company, Mr. Greenberg and another former executive. The latest document first was described in an editorial published yesterday in the Journal.

An AIG spokesman said the company stands by its restatement. "We have not been given access to the so-called white paper...and we have no comment on it," he said. Messrs. Sullivan and Bensinger also had no comment, he said. AIG has said that an internal review this year turned up new information that led the company to re-evaluate past accounting decisions. A PricewaterhouseCoopers spokesman said the firm hasn't seen the document and declined to comment.

AIG and New York regulators are in the early stages of settlement talks, people familiar with the talks say. Mr. Greenberg's attorneys previously have said he would contest the New York lawsuit's allegations, as has an attorney for the other defendant.

A spokesman for the New York attorney general's office confirmed receiving the document but declined to comment. A New York insurance department spokesman declined to comment and said the agency hadn't received the document from Mr. Greenberg's legal team.

The attorneys argue in the document that Mr. Greenberg was "not responsible for developing and implementing the accounting policies of AIG." Other top officials knew of many decisions, the document states. Both PricewaterhouseCoopers and AIG's interim chairman, Frank Zarb, for example, knew of the accounting treatment AIG used for "covered calls," derivative transactions that AIG in May said had been improperly booked, the document says. Mr. Zarb couldn't be reached to comment.

In criticizing AIG's decision to increase its reserves for liabilities related to asbestos and pollution losses -- a move that reduced net income by $850 million -- the document notes that Mr. Bensinger, now financial chief, had been responsible for presenting AIG's earlier figures to ratings companies.

New SEC Chief Vows Agency Will Be 'Investors' Advocate' (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

In his first day on the job, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox sought to allay concerns that he'll kowtow to business, telling SEC staff that "the Department of Commerce serves our country's businesses. We are the investors' advocate."

The arrival of Mr. Cox, a former Republican congressman from Southern California, has been viewed with skepticism by some who fear he may take a more business-friendly approach to regulation and enforcement than his predecessor, William Donaldson.

At a staff meeting yesterday morning, Mr. Cox told staffers those predictions "often have as much factual basis as a WorldCom prospectus" and said anyone who tries to take advantage of the investing public "will find themselves a powerful adversary in the SEC."

His brief remarks underscored the delicate balancing act that awaits Mr. Cox, who will have to weigh the needs of investors against the growing concerns of business that the SEC has become too aggressive. He acknowledged that the SEC "faces some thorny issues" as it looks to implement controversial new rules, including an overhaul of stock trading, the registration of hedge-fund advisers and new mutual-fund governance requirements. Mr. Donaldson pushed those rules through on a 3-2 vote with the support of the SEC's two Democratic commissioners and over the objections of Republican Commissioners Paul Atkins and Cynthia Glassman.

Mr. Cox didn't offer specifics of his own agenda yesterday other than to say he wants to improve disclosure both on Wall Street and within the SEC. He said he wants the SEC to renew its focus on the "plain English" doctrine, implemented under former Chairman Arthur Levitt, intended to make Wall Street documents more intelligible to investors. He said that same goal should also apply to the SEC's written rules and regulations, which can be massive and hard to understand. "The SEC has to practice what it preaches," he said.

Mr. Cox is expected to spend some time getting up to speed on the SEC's activities and initiatives and is also expected to start interviewing staff for several open positions, including the agency's head of investment management and its market-regulation division.

New SEC Chief Vows To Reduce Jargon (FT)

By Andrew Parker

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

Christopher Cox, the new Republican chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, signalled on Thursday that providing investors with more user-friendly financial information would be a theme of his leadership.

Mr Cox, on his first day as the chief US financial regulator, complained about the lack of "plain English" in company proxy statements and mutual fund prospectuses.

He also warned that the SEC faced some "truly thorny issues" in implementing rules on stock trading, hedge fund oversight and mutual fund governance that were finalised by William Donaldson, his predecessor.

Mr Cox used a speech at the SEC headquarters in Washington to set out his concerns about the lack of comprehensible information for retail investors.

"When a company issues a proxy statement, should the millions of ordinary Americans who own the company's stock be able to read and understand it?" he asked.

"It is all well and good that their broker's lawyer could understand it. But what about the individual investors themselves - is disclosure for them too?"

Mr Cox praised an initiative on plain English in financial information by Arthur Levitt, the former Democratic chairman of the SEC.

"Chairman Levitt's vision was dead-on," he said. "How hard do you think it would be today to find offensive legalese in almost any mutual fund prospectus or proxy statement?"

He also emphasised the need for the SEC to practise what it preached, and to make sure its own rules and publications contained plain English. Mr Cox joked about speculation, running up to the Senate's confirmation of him as SEC chairman last week, on whether the regulator would be business-friendly or investor-friendly under his leadership.

As a Republican congressman for the past 17 years, he developed a business-friendly legislative track record. Mr Cox on Thursday said the SEC was "the investor's advocate". "During my chairmanship, anyone who attempts to drive a wedge between the interests of business and interests of investors in that business will find themselves confronted by a relentless and powerful adversary in the Securities and Exchange Commission," he said.

He added that it should not be necessary for the interests of business and investors to be in conflict, given that shareholders owned companies.

Mr Cox signalled that he would retain Linda Thomsen, who was appointed SEC director of enforcement in May by Mr Donaldson.

The senior SEC staff serve at the pleasure of the chairman, and there has been media speculation that Mr Cox might want changes to personnel.

Stock Options: Do They Make Bosses Cheat? (NYT)

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

QUESTION for shareholders: If the company's directors give lots of options to the chief executive, should you be happy or nervous?

The traditional answer from academia was that big options grants were good. They aligned the interests of executives with shareholders, and they helped to offset the tendency of executives to avoid risky but potentially profitable investments.

But it turns out that the conclusions were based more on optimistic theories than data. Now, with option grants having become the largest portion of chief executive compensation - worth more than either salary or bonus for the average boss - analysis of data on corporate performance provides some disturbing results.

It appears that really big options grants make it more likely that companies will fudge their numbers and that companies with such grants are more likely to go broke.

One study, to be presented this weekend at a meeting of the Academy of Management in Honolulu, compared 435 companies that were forced to restate their financial statements with similar companies that did not run into such problems.

DOJ_NMG_0002077

The report found that the higher the proportion of the boss's pay in stock options, the more likely the company was to be forced to restate profits. For companies where bosses got 92 percent or more of their pay in options, about a fifth ended up faking their books within five years.

That conclusion would be more persuasive if the authors, Jared Harris, a doctoral candidate at the University of Minnesota, and Philip Bromley, a management professor there, had looked at all companies that are so generous with options.

But it makes a lot of sense. Those executives whose well-being most depends on the stock going up are most likely to do what they can to arrange that, by fair means or foul.

IT is not just options that seem to correlate with fraud, the study found. Bosses of companies that are doing much worse than their competitors may feel a need to cheat. And companies that turn in a very good year have a propensity for faking numbers the next year.

"A firm with an exceptional year faces a difficult problem," the authors write. "If the high performance the year before was partly luck, then the firm may be unable to replicate the high performance, but the market will view failing to do so negatively. Trying to equal past performance, such firms may resort to financial misrepresentation."

Another study that shows the dangers of excessive options comes from Moody's, the bond rating service. The study's authors, Kenneth A. Bertsch and Christopher Mann, found that companies with the highest-paid bosses, adjusted for things like company size and performance, were far more likely to default on debt or to suffer major cuts in bond ratings.

There is, they note, a relatively benign explanation: such companies are taking risks to benefit shareholders, and while some of the risks do not work out, others do. But they offer two other possible explanations. One is that high management pay reflects weak board oversight. The other is that incentive pay packages can "create an environment that ultimately leads to fraud."

Stock options may not produce fraud but they do magnify its rewards. As the Harris-Bromley article notes: "It is easy to be honest if $1 is at stake; it is harder to be honest if $10 million is available."

The lesson for corporate boards is that if they think it is a good idea to lavish stock options on top management, they also need to be vigilant in putting in safeguards to prevent and discover fraud. As Mr. Harris put it, "it does look like the more options you pay your C.E.O., the more likely the firm is to cheat."

Delphi Negotiates With GM, UAW About Big Revamp (WSJ)

By Joseph B. White

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Delphi Corp. Chairman and Chief Executive Officer Robert S. "Steve" Miller said the automotive supplier is in discussions with former parent General Motors Corp. and the United Auto Workers about a comprehensive restructuring of Delphi's unprofitable U.S. operations aimed at avoiding bankruptcy reorganization.

Mr. Miller, a veteran leader of large-scale corporate restructurings, said discussions with GM and the union "are very constructive and give me hope that we can restructure out of court." But Mr. Miller said that if Delphi can't reach agreements with GM and the UAW that substantially cut its U.S. labor costs and allow for restructuring or sale of unprofitable businesses, the company can't continue on its current course until September 2007, when its current UAW contract expires.

Delphi had a $403 million loss in the first quarter, and has forecast a loss for the year. "We don't have the wherewithal to go another two years losing money at that rate," Mr. Miller said in an interview at Delphi headquarters. Mr. Miller took the helm at Delphi July 1, succeeding former Chairman and Chief Executive Officer J.T. Battenberg III, who announced his retirement in February.

Delphi had $28.62 billion in revenue and a $4.75 billion loss in 2004. Delphi has been wrestling with management turmoil linked to revelations of accounting irregularities. The company at the end of last month restated earnings for 2001 through 2003. The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating. No Delphi executives have been charged with wrongdoing.

Delphi's operating crisis became acute during the first half of this year as GM, which accounts for 49% of Delphi's total business, slashed production amid slowing sales.

DOJ_NMG_0002078

One result of the GM cuts is that Delphi has about 4,000 UAW workers who are laid off but receiving pay and benefits from Delphi under the master UAW contract. Delphi President Rodney O'Neal, in comments at an industry conference earlier this week, said payments to laid-off workers are costing Delphi $300 million to $400 million a year.

Most of Delphi's roughly 25,000 UAW workers earn the same wages and benefits as GM hourly workers. Most of Delphi's supplier competitors pay even their unionized U.S. workers a fraction of Delphi's $27-an-hour rate. Delphi's pension plan is $4.7 billion underfunded, according to a July 29 report by analysts at Standard & Poor's Corp. The company has a retiree health-care liability of $10 billion.

Mr. Miller said a $2.8 billion refinancing plan completed in June has given the company time to "come to an orderly resolution" of restructuring talks with GM and the union.

A GM spokesman said the company wouldn't comment on talks with Delphi. Union officials couldn't be reached.

GM doesn't have equity ties to Delphi, and Delphi employees aren't GM employees. However, GM could be liable for a portion of pension and retiree health benefits for Delphi's UAW employees, should Delphi seek a bankruptcy-court reorganization and terminate its pension plans. Delphi workers also have a limited right to return to GM, if GM has job openings.

Moreover, GM would have an incentive to avoid the potential disruption to its operations from a Delphi collapse. For example, a bankruptcy court could order GM to pay Delphi higher prices.

What will be critical to Delphi's effort to avoid a bankruptcy reorganization, Mr. Miller said, is the support of Delphi's suppliers and customers. Suppliers could demand immediate payment for goods delivered to Delphi. Potential customers could decide not to award Delphi business for fear that the company would fail to perform.

Mr. Miller didn't disclose specifics for his restructuring plan. He said Delphi will concentrate on high-technology products -- including nonautomotive ventures.

Delayed Reaction At Morgan Stanley, Board Slowly Faced Its Purcell Problem (WSJ)

By Ann Davis And Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

On a sunny day in early June, near the top of a 60-story glass tower with panoramic views of Boston, three independent Morgan Stanley directors heard a stern critique from money managers at the hedge fund Highfields Capital Management LP.

Morgan Stanley Chief Executive Philip Purcell risked being ousted in a proxy fight the next spring, the Highfields managers said. Yet the Morgan Stanley board had allowed two designated successors to leave and the firm was suffering an alarming exodus of talent, they said.

The meeting with Highfields was the last significant event before directors and Mr. Purcell decided he should step down, according to interviews with two people knowledgeable about board deliberations. On June 13 he announced he would resign and he left the firm on June 30.

Based on interviews with directors, investors and others, a picture emerges of a board that came to grips painfully slowly with the extent of Mr. Purcell's unpopularity. By some directors' own accounts, the board initially misjudged attacks on Mr. Purcell by retired Morgan Stanley executives, seeing the complaints as carping about his personal style rather than as an issue that threatened the company's performance.

The tale serves as a caution for boards in an era when their role in corporate governance is drawing more scrutiny. The damage from delay when directors fail to spread their antennae widely is especially great at a Wall Street securities firm like Morgan Stanley, where the most valuable assets can walk out the door and never return.

That's precisely what happened during the three months between the first stirrings of revolt in March and Mr. Purcell's resignation in June: Dozens of key Morgan Stanley staffers quit and joined rival companies or are considering starting their own firms. Replacing those people is an issue that Mr. Purcell's successor, John Mack, is trying to address.

As this year dawned, directors had reason to believe all was calm at Morgan Stanley. The firm was a big player in the dot-com boom of the late 1990s and had suffered in the collapse. But in 2003 and 2004, Morgan Stanley's profits rebounded and the stock price climbed back somewhat.

DOJ_NMG_0002079

"Performance had turned up," says recently named lead director Miles Marsh, a mild-mannered native of South Africa who used to lead a paper-products company. Earnings per share rose 18% in 2004 and Morgan Stanley was No. 1 in stock underwriting, he notes.

When eight prominent Morgan Stanley alumni called for Mr. Purcell's removal in a March 3 letter, many of the directors saw little more than sour grapes. It was well-known that many Morgan Stanley old-timers had an animus toward Mr. Purcell, who led Dean Witter, Discover & Co. into its merger with Morgan Stanley in 1997. Mr. Purcell nudged out Mr. Mack, a Morgan Stanley veteran, in 2001 by not ceding the CEO job as Mr. Mack thought they had agreed.

"It struck us that the complaints against Phil were more personal than based on performance," says Michael Miles, a former CEO of Philip Morris Cos. Mr. Miles was one of Dean Witter's directors when it went public in 1993 and since the Morgan Stanley merger has chaired the committee that recommends new directors and oversees board procedure.

On March 14, the directors solicited views from about a dozen top executives, asking them what they thought of Morgan Stanley's strategy and leadership. Star investment banker Joseph Perella was at a conference in Mexico with 60 clients. In a 20-minute call, Mr. Perella told three directors he believed Mr. Purcell's leadership style wasn't working, according to a person told of the call at the time. A spokesman for Mr. Perella, Tim Metz, declined to comment.

Mr. Perella said Mr. Purcell, who lived in New York during the week but typically returned to his family's home near Chicago on weekends, had little involvement in Manhattan's civic or charitable affairs and was little-known among clients and employees.

"But Joe, these are all soft issues," Mr. Marsh responded, people familiar with the call said. Mr. Marsh asked Mr. Perella to focus on "hard" issues such as business strategy and execution, according to a person familiar with the conversation.

One director even sought to squelch a doubter on the board. At a mid-March board meeting, Laura D'Andrea Tyson, a former Clinton administration economic official who is dean of the London Business School, said directors should take the criticism of Mr. Purcell's record more seriously. Director Charles Knight, former CEO of Emerson Electric Co., rebuked Ms. Tyson, calling her comment inappropriate, people familiar with the exchange say.

Depth of Feeling

Several encounters suggest directors misunderstood the depth of feeling among people in Morgan Stanley's institutional securities business, which underwrites and trades stocks and bonds as well as advising corporations on mergers. That business, the traditional core of Morgan Stanley, generates 60% of the firm's profits.

At one point Mr. Miles compared Mr. Purcell to management icon Jack Welch, the former head of General Electric Co., and the dissidents to lower-level employees. "Can you imagine 10 engineers from the GE engine plant in Cincinnati who don't like how the engine division is being operated writing a letter to the GE board saying Jack Welch should be fired?" Mr. Miles asked some bankers, say people familiar with his remarks. Mr. Miles meant to refer to Mr. Welch's more controversial early years as chief executive, when his cost cuts earned him the nickname "Neutron Jack."

In fact, the dissidents included a former chairman and a former president of Morgan Stanley. On April 2, Mr. Perella spoke for an hour with Mr. Miles and said the troops were in disarray, according to people familiar with the conversation. Mr. Perella asked about arranging a meeting between bankers and directors, these people say. The meeting had been suggested by Paul Taubman, co-head of mergers and acquisitions.

Mr. Miles responded tartly that if the purpose of the meeting was to tell directors that Mr. Purcell should resign, it wouldn't be much of a meeting because the board is "100% behind Phil." He advised Mr. Perella to tell his people to "go back to work." And he urged Mr. Perella to "put the genie back in the bottle" by helping quell the dissent, people familiar with the discussion say.

On April 13, Mr. Perella and the head of investment banking, Terry Meguid, resigned. Mr. Perella went on to land an assignment advising MBNA Corp. on its purchase by Bank of America Corp. -- a $35 billion deal announced in June that Morgan Stanley wasn't involved in.

The week after Mr. Perella resigned, Messrs. Miles and Purcell visited the Baltimore headquarters of T. Rowe Price Group Inc., a shareholder and client. The two men said Morgan Stanley's business was fine and the problem was the alumni attack itself, according to people familiar with the meeting. Mr. Purcell gave himself a grade of 8 out of 10 and said the firm needed to get out of the newspapers, these people say.

DOJ_NMG_0002080

Some T. Rowe officials were taken aback at the way Mr. Purcell didn't take responsibility for the firm's flagging morale. People at the meeting recall T. Rowe analyst Jeff Arricale blurting: "No, Phil, you're the problem!" Mr. Miles, while praising management's performance, bristled when someone implied that the board was too stubborn about considering new leadership. "The board is not in Phil's pocket. There are no wallflowers here," he said, according to people at the meeting.

The board took steps to interview more employees. On the weekend of April 23 and 24, Messrs. Miles and Marsh secretly contacted Raymond McGuire, Morgan Stanley's other co-head of mergers. Mr. McGuire, who himself would leave the firm in May to join Citigroup Inc., urged them to talk to others to get "a true picture of the state of affairs," according to people familiar with the discussion.

The following week, directors interviewed around 50 employees in one-on-one sessions in New York and London and in telephone calls to Asia and elsewhere. They got an earful. One of those interviewed was Mr. Taubman, the co-head of mergers. Around that time, people who talked to him say, Mr. Taubman was bringing up a recent announcement by the directors that there was no compelling reason to remove Mr. Purcell. These people say Mr. Taubman asked: What was the compelling reason for Mr. Purcell to be the CEO? Mr. Taubman declined to comment.

The tide was turning. Mr. Marsh, the former paper executive, says that after the interviews, "it became apparent to us that a management change seemed inevitable. The situation had progressed to a point where we could not go back."

New Divisions

A board meeting on Saturday, April 30, at a suburban Chicago office park housing Morgan Stanley's credit-card operations exposed new divisions among the directors. The board and Mr. Purcell agreed on modest governance changes. Mr. Purcell said those moves plus the hiring of a new vice chairman, merger lawyer David Heleniak from Shearman & Sterling, would be enough to calm the storm, say people familiar with the meeting.

At one stage, the outside directors asked Mr. Purcell and his co-presidents with board seats to leave the room. Mr. Knight, the director who had clashed with Ms. Tyson in March, and Klaus Zumwinkel, chairman of the management board of Germany's Deutsche Post AG, said they supported Mr. Purcell and didn't see any reason to discuss the matter since the board had already decided on it, according to several accounts of the meeting. Messrs. Knight and Zumwinkel had to leave early. They declined through spokesmen to comment for this article.

The attempt to cut off debate bothered some other directors, people familiar with the meeting say. Once Messrs. Knight and Zumwinkel left, the discussion turned more freewheeling. Mr. Miles, who had recently declared the board's 100% support for Mr. Purcell, now encouraged open debate. The directors who had interviewed Morgan Stanley employees briefed the others on what they had heard.

Howard Davies, director of the London School of Economics and Political Science, said employees in London whom he had interviewed felt company morale was unlikely to improve under Mr. Purcell. "I'm not sure we're going to get though this problem without change," he told the others, a person familiar with the meeting says. Ms. Tyson said she might quit the board if it refused to go beyond modest governance changes and Mr. Davies was considering a similar move. But both were persuaded to stay as they heard other directors including Mr. Marsh show an openness to bigger changes, say people familiar with the meeting.

Mr. Marsh argued that management had to be accountable for the firm's lack of cohesion. He questioned the wisdom of backing Mr. Purcell, asking: "Do you think we're really doing the right thing here?"

Publicly, the board gave no hint of the developing split to avoid worsening the uproar. It announced on the night of Sunday, May 1, that directors had "unanimously" concluded a management change wasn't in shareholders' interest.

As May wore on, says Mr. Marsh, it became apparent that "the level of noise was not abating." In mid-May, a Florida state jury found Morgan Stanley had defrauded financier Ronald Perelman, and the firm was ordered to pay $1.45 billion. The judge angrily accused Morgan Stanley of withholding evidence. Mr. Davies, an audit committee member, soon began questioning members of the legal department about how the Florida lawsuit had been handled.

As the board continued to mull Mr. Purcell's fate, the exodus continued. Among others, a nine-person team of derivatives specialists and traders who had been working to build new products for individual investors left for Wachovia Corp. Mr. McGuire jumped to Citigroup on May 23.

DOJ_NMG_0002081

The next day, Highfields sent a letter urging directors to choose a new leader. Highfields, which owned 2.5 million Morgan shares as of March 31, had a history of publicly challenging managers including a confrontation in 2001 with Enron Corp.'s then-CEO, Jeffrey Skilling.

On June 3, three directors -- Mr. Marsh, Mr. Knight and Robert Kidder, former CEO of Borden Chemical Inc. -- sat down with Highfields founders Jonathon Jacobson and Richard Grubman in the Highfields office on the 51st floor of the John Hancock tower in Boston.

In a businesslike presentation, without attacking Mr. Purcell personally, one of the Highfields founders warned the directors they had "a bigger problem than you know you have," people familiar with the meeting say. Messrs. Jacobson and Grubman asked if the directors were ready to fight a proxy battle in 2006 when alumni might urge shareholders to withhold support for Mr. Purcell's re-election. The Highfields team noted that Mr. Purcell had failed to identify his own successors, pushing them out instead. It was urgent to solve the succession issue quickly, they said.

This time, the directors didn't push back. While a few were still perceived as holdouts for Mr. Purcell, the chief executive had heard about the Highfields meeting and was signaling that he was prepared to step down, say people familiar with the matter. The board convened an emergency meeting in Chicago on Wednesday, June 8, to discuss his departure, and continued negotiating his exit through the weekend.

Mr. Marsh says the board tried to act as quickly as possible. "The decision to change leadership was resolved in a three-month period from April to June." he says. "It's very important for a board to achieve consensus and that often takes some time."

As the end neared, directors awarded Mr. Purcell about $44 million in exit pay plus a $62.3 million retirement package. It gave a co-president, Stephen Crawford, closely aligned with Mr. Purcell $32 million when he resigned in July.

Now a pension fund has sued directors for continuing to support Mr. Purcell as the franchise deteriorated and for approving the lavish pay deals. Some institutional shareholders are discussing an effort to vote out the directors at next spring's annual meeting.

US Regulators Plan 1-Year Job Restriction On Bank Examiners (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones Newswires, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- U.S. regulators on Thursday proposed rules to enforce a new law restricting senior bank examiners from working for the banks they supervise for one year after leaving their jobs.

Starting Dec. 17 the job restriction, included in an intelligence and anti-terrorism law enacted late last year, would apply to examiners at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and the Office of Thrift Supervision.

The legal requirement followed a year-long probe by the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations into money laundering allegations involving Riggs Bank N.A., which has since been acquired by PNC Financial Services Group (PNC) (PNC).

The Senate subcommittee found the OCC was slow to respond while Riggs helped corrupt leaders from Chile and Equatorial Guinea. Questions surrounded R. Ashley Lee, the regulatory agency's examiner in-charge at Riggs from 1998 to 2002, who left to become Riggs' chief risk officer. Lee was put on leave while the U.S. Justice Department investigated ethics violations.

The proposed restriction would apply to employees of bank regulators who serve as senior examiners for two or more months during their final year of employment with the agencies.

These individuals would be barred for one year from knowingly accepting compensation "as an employee, officer, director or consultant from that institution or holding company, or from certain related entities," the regulators said in a joint statement. Potential penalties for violation would include a ban on employment in the banking industry for up to five years and fines of up to $250,000.

The regulators are accepting public comment on their proposal for 60 days from its publication in the Federal Register Friday.

-By Campion Walsh; Dow Jones Newswires; 202 862 9249; campion.walsh@ dowjones.com

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Indicts 2 In Case Of Divulged Secrets (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

Two former employees of an influential pro-Israel lobbying group were indicted yesterday on charges that they illegally received and passed on classified information to foreign officials and reporters over a period of five years, part of a case that has complicated relations between the United States and one of its closest allies.

Although no foreign government is named in the indictment, U.S. government sources have identified Israel as the country at the center of the probe. The Israeli Embassy in Washington also confirmed yesterday that it has been "approached" by investigators in the case.

The 26-page indictment, handed up in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, represents the first formal allegations of criminal wrongdoing against the former employees of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. AIPAC is widely recognized as one of the most powerful lobbying organizations in Washington and has carefully cultivated close ties to Congress and the Bush administration.

The indictment also recasts the government's allegations against Lawrence A. Franklin, a Defense Department analyst who had already been charged with disclosing secret information about possible attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq and other topics. One of six original counts was dropped against Franklin, 58, of Kearneysville, W.Va.

Former AIPAC director of foreign policy issues Steven J. Rosen, 63, of Silver Spring was indicted on two counts related to unlawful disclosure of "national defense information" obtained from Franklin and other unidentified government officials since 1999 on topics including Iran, Saudi Arabia and al Qaeda. A former AIPAC analyst, Keith Weissman, 53, of Bethesda, was indicted on one count of conspiracy to illegally communicate classified information.

Rosen was instrumental in making AIPAC a formidable political force and helped pioneer the strategy of lobbying the executive branch as energetically as Capitol Hill, beginning in the Reagan administration. The FBI's long-running investigation -- which has involved clandestine wiretaps and other surveillance dating back several years -- has angered many political supporters of Israel and has caused friction between the two governments.

AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman but continues to pay their legal fees. "AIPAC dismissed Rosen and Weissman because they engaged in conduct that was not part of their jobs, and because this conduct did not comport in any way with the standards that AIPAC expects of its employees," said Patrick Dorton, a spokesman for AIPAC.

A spokesman for the Israeli Embassy in Washington, David Siegel, said that Israel was formally approached by U.S. investigators in the case several weeks ago and that "we've expressed our willingness to cooperate in this process." He denied any wrongdoing by embassy diplomats.

Attorneys for Rosen and Weissman also vigorously disputed the charges.

"The charges in the indictment announced today are entirely unjustified," Abbe Lowell, Rosen's attorney, said in a statement. Lowell said he expects the trial to "show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process."

Weissman's attorney, John Nissikas, said in a statement: "We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies."

Franklin's attorney, Plato Cacheris, said the charges were "not welcome but expected." Cacheris said he may request that Franklin be prosecuted separately from the others.

The indictment alleges that, beginning in April 1999, Rosen and, later, Weissman sought to influence people in the United States government, including Franklin, with whom they first met in February 2003, and used those contacts to gather sensitive and classified information.

DOJ_NMG_0002083

In announcing the charges in Alexandria, U.S. Attorney Paul J. McNulty said that while "Washington is a town in which the flow of information is virtually nonstop," there is a clear distinction in the law that "separates classified information from everything else."

"Today's charges are about crossing that line," McNulty said. "Those entrusted with safeguarding our nation's secrets must remain faithful to that trust. Those not authorized to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation might be."

The motivation of Rosen and Weissman McNulty said, was simply to "advance their foreign policy agendas and personal careers."

McNulty said prosecutors had no immediate plans to charge anyone else in the case but said the investigation was continuing. In addition to unidentified U.S. and foreign government officials, the indictment refers to an unknown number of journalists who were in contact with Rosen and, in some cases, allegedly received classified information. Sources familiar with the case have said that one of the reporters in contact with Rosen and Weissman was Glenn Kessler of The Washington Post.

Rosen faces up to 20 years in prison and Weissman faces up to 10 years; both are scheduled to appear in court Aug. 16. Franklin, who pleaded not guilty to the earlier charges, faces up to 45 years in prison if convicted on all counts, officials said.

Israel Lobbyists Facing Charges In Secrets Case (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 - Two former officials of a pro-Israel lobbying group were charged in an indictment filed Thursday with illegally conspiring to gather and disclose classified national security information to journalists and an unnamed foreign power that government officials identified as Israel.

The indictment accused Steven J. Rosen and Keith Weissman, formerly senior staff members at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, with improperly disclosing national security information beginning in April 1999. The group dismissed the two men last April.

As the committee's director of foreign policy issues, Mr. Rosen was a highly visible figure in Washington who helped the organization define its lobbying agenda on the Middle East and forged important relationships with powerful conservatives in the Bush administration. Mr. Weissman was a senior Middle East analyst.

The charges in the long-running inquiry were expected, but nevertheless unusual. Neither Mr. Rosen nor Mr. Weissman, who have denied any wrongdoing, held security clearances.

They were not government employees and they operated in a foreign policy world in which private lobbyists, public officials and journalists often trade delicate information about executive branch decision-making that is related to other countries.

The indictment did not accuse any journalist of wrongdoing, but cited several conversations that Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman had with unidentified journalists as "overt acts" that furthered the conspiracy. Government officials have said investigators want to interview reporters who talked with either of the two men. It is not clear who the journalists are or whether any them have been interviewed.

The indictment said the two men had disclosed classified information about a number of subjects, including American policy in Iran, terrorism in central Asia, Al Qaeda and the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers apartment in Saudi Arabia, which killed 23 Americans, mainly military personnel.

Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman were each charged with a single count of conspiracy; Mr. Rosen was also charged with an additional count of passing classified information. The government has never offered a motive for the actions the men are accused of taking. The indictment said Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman had seemed keenly aware of the delicateness of information they had obtained from at least three American officials, including Lawrence A. Franklin, a former Defense Department analyst who met the two men in February 2003. The indictment did not name the other two American officials.

Mr. Franklin has already been charged in the case, and he was the subject of additional charges in Thursday's indictment. Mr. Franklin, Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman are scheduled to be arraigned on Aug. 16 before Judge T. S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va.

DOJ_NMG_0002084

The indictment charged that Mr. Franklin, Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman had talked about the classified nature of the material they shared, referring to it in conversations with each other, as well as with foreign officials and journalists, as "extremely sensitive" or "secret." At one point, the indictment said, Mr. Franklin seemed to know that he was disclosing secrets, warning Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman against discussing classified information about possible attacks on American forces in Iraq.

The offenses charged in the indictment fall under the Espionage Act, but no one has been charged with spying. Although the statutes do not explicitly apply only to government officials with security clearances, prosecutors have not often pursued cases like the one against Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman. They are accused of transferring classified information to journalists and foreign government officials that could be "used to the injury" of the United States or "to the advantage" another country.

Among the meetings with journalists, the indictment charged, was one that occurred in December 2000 after Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman met with an unidentified American official. It said that Mr. Rosen met with an unidentified "member of the media" to whom he gave classified information dealing with United States strategy options involving an unnamed Middle Eastern country and internal American deliberations about those options.

The indictment contained additional charges against Mr. Franklin, an expert on Iran. It accused him of using his position as a desk officer to gather information to hand over to Mr. Rosen or Mr. Weissman, or to an unidentified foreign official, who government officials and lawyers involved in the case have said was Naor Gilon, an Israeli Embassy political officer. The indictment refers to two other foreign government officials, but does not identify them. Both are Israelis, a government official said.

Lawyers for Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman said the charges were unfounded. Abbe Lowell, a lawyer for Mr. Rosen, said in a statement: "The charges in the indictment announced today are entirely unjustified. We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided effort to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process."

John N. Nassikas III, a lawyer for Mr. Weissman, said in a statement that "we are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies."

Plato Cacheris, a lawyer for Mr. Franklin said, "It's not a welcome event, but were not surprised by it."

The United States attorney in Alexandria, Va., Paul J. McNulty, said in a statement that the case was about the protection of national security material.

"When it comes to classified information, there is clear line in the law," Mr. McNulty said. "Today's charges are about crossing that line. Those entrusted with safeguarding our nation's secrets must remain faithful to the trust. Those not authorized to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation may be."

The indictment does not suggest that Aipac, as an organization, is suspected of any wrongdoing. Patrick Dorton, a spokesman for the group, said: "Aipac dismissed Rosen and Weissman because they engaged in conduct that was not part of their jobs, and because this conduct did not comport in any way with the standards that Aipac expects of its employees. Aipac could not condone or tolerate the conduct of the two employees under any circumstances. The organization does not seek, use, or request anything but legally-obtained appropriate information as part of its work."

The charges left unanswered a delicate question. It is unclear what action, if any, the government plans to take against any embassy official who met with Mr. Franklin, Mr. Rosen or Mr. Weissman. Israeli officials have said in the past that it had no part in the case, and a spokesman for the embassy has said that Israeli diplomats conduct themselves in accord with established practices.

So far, there is no indication that any Israeli diplomats have been expelled, although. Mr. Gilon has moved to another post outside of Washington. Efforts to reach an embassy spokesman on Thursday were unsuccessful.

Mr. Franklin's trial had been scheduled for September, but that date is almost certain to be postponed in light of the new charges. He was initially charged in May in a complaint that accused him of passing highly classified information about possible attacks on American forces in Iraq to Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman. When he was indicted in June, he was accused of meeting more than a dozen times with an Israeli Embassy official.

Former Officials With Pro-Israel Group Indicted (KRT)

By Shannon Mccaffrey And Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - The Justice Department indicted two top former officials with a prominent pro-Israel lobbying group Thursday for allegedly conspiring to communicate classified defense information.

U.S. Attorney Paul McNulty said the men were attempting to influence U.S. foreign policy. He said trafficking in information is commonplace in the nation's capital but a "clear line separates classified information from everything else."

"Today's charges are about crossing that clear line," McNulty said.

The indictment paints a more detailed picture of the case against Pentagon analyst Lawrence Franklin, who was charged in May with leaking classified information to the pro-Israel lobbyists about possible attacks by Iran on U.S. forces in Iraq.

The indictment charges Steven Rosen, former foreign policy director for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, with conspiring to communicate classified information.

Franklin, who worked on the Iran desk in Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's office, had also been charged with three counts of communication of national defense information to persons not entitled to receive it. In Thursday's indictment, Rosen was charged with aiding and abetting Franklin in one of those counts by passing along written classified information.

Keith Weissman, a former senior Middle East analyst with AIPAC, was charged with one count of conspiracy to communicate classified national defense information.

Lawyers for Rosen and Weissman denied the allegations.

Rosen's attorney, Abbe Lowell, called the charges "entirely unjustified."

"We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process," Lowell said in a statement.

Weissman's attorney, John Nassikas, said, "We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies. We look forward to challenging them vigorously in court both factually and legally."

People sympathetic to Rosen and Weissman have argued that while Franklin allegedly violated his government security vows, the two former AIPAC employees did little more than trade in information, which is the stuff of daily business in Washington.

AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman earlier this year.

The Israeli government has denied trying to pry secrets from the United States, with officials pointing out that, given the close ties between the two countries, it has no need to spy.

"We're fully confident in the conduct of our diplomats," said Israeli Embassy spokesman David Siegel.

One of the Israeli diplomats whom Franklin allegedly met with, Naor Gilon, recently returned home as "part of the normal diplomatic rotation," Siegel said.

Thursday's indictment adds some new facts to a case that has been shrouded in uncertainty from the beginning.

It charges that Rosen, 63, of Silver Spring, Md., and Weissman, 53, of Bethesda, Md., dealt in secret information as far back as 1999, several years before they are alleged to have met Franklin. Rosen met with "Foreign Official 1" - presumably an Israeli diplomat - on April 13, 1999, and disclosed sensitive intelligence he had picked up regarding terrorist activities in central Asia, it alleges.

Franklin and Rosen first made contact in a phone call on Aug. 15, 2002, after Rosen sought out someone at the Defense Department with expertise on Iran, the indictment alleges.

The three men met at a restaurant in Arlington, Va., in February 2003. In a phone call on the way to that initial meeting, Rosen said he was excited to meet with the "Pentagon guy," who he described as a "real insider."

They remained in contact over the next several months, meeting at various restaurants, and Weissman and Franklin attended a Baltimore Orioles game together, according to the indictment.

Franklin also faxed classified information to Rosen from a Pentagon fax machine, authorities allege.

Rosen and Weissman allegedly fed much of the sensitive information they received to journalists, on topics ranging from the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing in Saudi Arabia to U.S. policy toward Iran. They continued to provide information to reporters even after being contacted by the FBI, the indictment charges.

McNulty said the investigation, which he described as "several years" old, is ongoing. He said there's no basis to charge other individuals, but wouldn't rule that out in the future.

Franklin, 58, of Kearnysville, W.Va., pleaded not guilty to the charges filed against him in May. His lawyer, Plato Cacheris, didn't immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

Two Charged In Pentagon Information Leak (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, Associated Press Writer

AP, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) - Two former employees of a pro-Israel lobbying organization were indicted Thursday on charges they conspired to obtain and disclose classified U.S. defense information.

An indictment unsealed in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, Va., named Steven Rosen, formerly the director of foreign policy issues for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, and Keith Weissman, the organization's former senior Iran analyst.

The five-count indictment also spells out in greater detail the government's case against Pentagon analyst Lawrence A. Franklin, who already was facing charges that he leaked classified military information to an Israeli official and the AIPAC employees.

Rosen and Weissman disclosed sensitive information as far back as 1999 on a variety of topics that included terrorist activities in Central Asia, the bombing of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia, al-Qaida and U.S. policy in Iran, the indictment said. Among their contacts were U.S. and foreign government officials and reporters, the indictment said.

Lawyers for Rosen and Weissman denied the accusations. ``The charges in the indictment announced today are entirely unjustified," said Abbe Lowell, Rosen's attorney. John Nassikas, Weissman's lawyer, said, ``We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies."

Franklin's relationship with the men dates to 2003, the indictment said. Franklin pleaded innocent to the charges when his indictment was first unsealed in June.

Paul McNulty, the U.S. attorney in Alexandria, said the men apparently were motivated by a desire to advance their personal agendas and careers by trading on prized information. ``The facts alleged today tell a story of individuals who put their own interests and their own views of foreign policy ahead of American national security," McNulty said at a news conference.

Although the indictment refers to other U.S. officials who gave Rosen classified materials, McNulty said no other charges are planned, but noted the investigation continues.

Plato Cacheris, Franklin's lawyer, said he had been expecting additional charges. He said Franklin cooperated with investigators for three months in 2004.

The FBI's long-running investigation has focused on whether Franklin, of Kearneysville, W.Va., passed classified U.S. material on Iran to AIPAC, the influential main pro-Israel lobbying organization in Washington, and whether that group in turn passed it on to Israel. Both AIPAC and Israel deny any wrongdoing. Franklin has pleaded innocent.

AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman in April. Rosen, quoted in The New Yorker magazine last month, denied knowingly receiving classified information.

Associated Press reporter Matthew Barakat in Alexandria, Va., contributed to this report.

On the Net:

FBI: http://www.fbi.gov

American Israel Public Affairs Committee: http://www.aipac.org/

Ex-lobby Group Workers Charged With Handing Over US Secrets (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

The Justice Department on Thursday charged two former employees of a powerful pro-Israel lobbying organisation with illegally receiving classified information and disseminating it to a foreign government official.

DOJ_NMG_0002087

Steven Rosen, former foreign policy director at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (Aipac), and Keith Weissman, a former Aipac Middle East analyst, were also charged with passing classified information to the media. Aipac, which has said it is not under investigation, fired the two men in April.

The charges are the latest development in a Federal Bureau of Investigation probe into Larry Franklin, a former Pentagon Iran analyst, who has already been charged with giving the Aipac officials classified information about potential attacks on US forces in Iraq. Mr Franklin, who co-operated with prosecutors earlier in the FBI investigation, has also been charged with providing classified information to a foreign government official and the media, and with illegally keeping classified documents at his home.

"When it comes to classified information, there is a clear line in the law," said Paul McNulty, the US attorney prosecuting the case.

"Today's charges are about crossing that line. Those entrusted with safeguarding our nation's secrets must remain faithful to that trust. Those not authorised to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation may be," he said.

John Nassikas, a lawyer representing Mr Weissman, said: "We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr Weissman strongly denies."

Abbe Lowell, a lawyer for Mr Rosen, said: "We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalise the public's right to participate in the political process."

The indictment, which accuses Mr Weissman and Mr Rosen of conspiring with Mr Franklin to provide classified information illegally to people not entitled to receive it, says Mr Rosen gave a foreign government official information about terrorist activities in Central Asia. Mr Weissman is accused of giving the same official classified information about the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing in Saudi Arabia.

The indictment said Mr Franklin illegally provided information to people not entitled to it "in an effort to advance his own personal foreign policy agenda".

Additional reporting by Scott Heiser

Pro-Israel Lobbyists Charged In US Pentagon Case (REU)

By James Vicini

Reuters, August 4, 2005

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (Reuters) - A federal grand jury indicted two former officials of the pro-Israel lobbying group AIPAC Thursday on charges they received classified national defense information from a Pentagon analyst, court documents show.

The indictment charges Steven Rosen, the former foreign policy director for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, with receiving classified information from analyst Lawrence Franklin and helping Franklin pass on written classified information.

AIPAC's former senior Middle East analyst, Keith Weissman, also was charged with receiving classified information.

Franklin, who worked on the Iran desk within the Office of the Secretary of Defense at the time the government says he disclosed the information, had already been charged with disclosing top-secret information about potential attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq to the two AIPAC employees.

Thursday's indictment also charges him with giving the information to an unidentified diplomat and to Rosen and Weissman, whom AIPAC fired in April.

It accuses Franklin of disclosing to a foreign diplomat classified information about a Middle Eastern country's activities in Iraq. Sources familiar with the investigation have said the diplomat was an Israeli.

Franklin pleaded not guilty to the original charges.

Abbe Lowell, attorney for Rosen, said the charges were unjustified.

"We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process," Lowell said.

Weissman's attorney, John Nissikas, said in a statement, "We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies."

The Israeli diplomat in Washington who met several times with Franklin has been identified as Naor Gilon, head of the political department at Israeli Embassy in Washington and a specialist on proliferation issues.

Gilon returned to Israel a few days ago as part of a long-scheduled rotation, according to an Israeli official in Washington.

U.S. investigators want to question Gilon and other Israeli diplomats about their contacts with Franklin, officials said. (Additional reporting by Deborah Charles and Adam Entous)

Former Pro-Israel Lobbyists Charged In Documents Case (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, August 5, 2005

Aug. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Two former employees of the leading pro-Israel lobbying group in Washington were charged with conspiring to disclose classified U.S. defense information to foreign government officials and members of the media.

Steve Rosen, 63, a former policy director at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, and Keith Weissman, 53, a former senior Iran analyst, were indicted today by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Virginia. They are accused of gathering sensitive government information and conspiring to pass it along to people unauthorized to receive it.

``Washington is a town where information flows virtually non-stop," U.S. Attorney Paul McNulty said at a press conference, held an hour after the indictment was handed down. ``But there is a clear line in the law, and that clear line separates classified information from other types of information."

Also indicted today was Lawrence Franklin, 58, a U.S. Defense Department analyst who was charged in June with giving classified information to unauthorized persons. Today's indictment supersedes and modifies earlier charges against him.

If convicted, the three men face five to 10 years in prison on each of five charges, McNulty said. Franklin, Rosen and Weissman, who aren't in custody, will be arraigned Aug. 16.

``The charges in the indictment announced today are entirely unjustified," Rosen's lawyer Abbe Lowell said in a statement. ``We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process."

Weissman's attorney John Nassikas said his client ``strongly denies" the charges.

`Mix of Motivations'

Franklin a former colonel in the U.S. Air Force Reserve, is accused of handing over classified information about ``a Middle Eastern country," identified in press reports as Iran, to Rosen and Weissman in meetings in 2003 and 2004. He did so for a ``mix of motivations," including a desire to advance his career and his ``personal foreign policy agenda," McNulty said. Franklin wasn't accused of receiving any payment.

More than 80 classified documents were found during a search of Franklin's home in Kearneysville, West Virginia, and a search of his Pentagon office a year ago yielded a classified document containing the information allegedly disclosed, according to a Justice Department criminal complaint.

Rosen and Weissman are accused of receiving the information and passing some of it to an unidentified member of the media. Rosen is also accused of disclosing information obtained from Franklin to a Washington-based think tank, while Weissman gave information to another AIPAC employee, according to the indictment.

AIPAC, which has lobbied Congress and the White House for more than half a century on behalf of Israel, ``did the right thing" and fired Rosen and Weissman this year after an investigation into whether they received classified information from Franklin, McNulty said.

AIPAC

The lobbying group dismissed Rosen and Weissman ``because they engaged in conduct that was not part of their jobs, and because this conduct did not comport in any way with the standards that AIPAC expects of its employees," AIPAC spokesman Patrick Dorton said. ``AIPAC could not condone or tolerate the conduct of the two employees under any circumstances."

The group doesn't seek anything but ``legally obtained, appropriate information" as part of its work, he said.

The investigation is continuing, though McNulty said there is ``no basis for charging anyone else with unlawful disclosure of classified information, at this time."

The case is U.S. v. Franklin, 05cr225, U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.

To contact the reporters on this story: Cary O'Reilly in Washington at caryoreilly@bloomberg.net. Janine Zacharia in Washington at jzacharia@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: August 4, 2005 18:08 EDT

3 Accused Of Disclosing Secrets On Mideast (USAT)

By Toni Locy

USA Today, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Two former officials of a pro-Israel lobbying group and a former Pentagon analyst were charged Thursday with disclosing U.S. government secrets about the Middle East.

In a five-count indictment, a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Va., accused Steven Rosen, 63, and Keith Weissman, 53, of using their positions at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) to develop a relationship with the Defense Department analyst to obtain classified information that they shared with unnamed foreign officials and reporters. The committee is the most powerful pro-Israel lobby in Washington.

The grand jury said the secrets dated to 1999 and dealt with terrorist activity in Central Asia, a 1996 attack in Saudi Arabia that killed 19 U.S. servicemembers, al-Qaeda and U.S. strategy in the Middle East.

The Pentagon analyst, Lawrence Franklin, 58, had been charged earlier this year with illegally keeping more than 80 classified documents in his home in Kearneysville, W.Va. Thursday's indictment adds charges against Franklin, who had cooperated with the FBI before a plea deal fell apart. The grand jury said he also passed secrets to an unnamed foreign official "in an effort to advance his own personal foreign policy agenda."

Franklin's lawyer, Plato Cacheris, did not return phone calls. Weissman's attorney, John Nassikas, said his client denies the charges. Rosen's attorney, Abbe Lowell, called the charges "entirely unjustified."

Some of the charges against Rosen, who was AIPAC's foreign policy director, and Weissman, the group's senior Middle East analyst, are based on a July 2004 meeting between Franklin and Weissman while Franklin was an FBI informant. AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman in April.

Daniel Ayalon, Israel's ambassador to the United States, said there is no need for Israelis to spy here because "the cooperation is so close and intense" between the U.S. and Israeli governments.

2 Lobbyists Indicted In Secrets Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — Two former employees of the nation's most influential pro-Israel lobbying organization were indicted Thursday, accused of engaging in a five-year conspiracy to collect and disseminate U.S. defense secrets.

The federal indictment provides details of encounters the two men had with former Pentagon analyst Lawrence A. Franklin, who was indicted on similar charges in June and was named again Thursday.

But it also paints a picture of a conspiracy that was broader than previously thought, asserting that the onetime aides at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee obtained information from two other unidentified U.S. government officials.

The men are alleged to have passed secrets, including classified information about Al Qaeda and a draft presidential directive concerning U.S. policy toward Iran, to unnamed foreign government officials — believed to be employees of the Israeli Embassy in Washington — and to journalists.

The goal, prosecutors said Thursday, was to "influence persons within and outside the United States government."

A spokesman for the Israeli Embassy, David Siegel, said officials there had broken no laws. He also said that the Israeli government had begun cooperating with federal investigators in the probe.

"We are fully confident in the professionalism of our diplomats," Siegel said. "They conduct themselves in full accordance with diplomatic practice, and we have seen no information that would suggest anything to the contrary.

"The U.S. and Israel share a very strong relationship, and we would have no reason to resort to any wrongdoing," he said. "We have information-sharing at the highest levels on national security issues all the time."

Siegel said the U.S. government had recently approached the embassy, seeking its assistance in the investigation. "We have expressed our willingness to cooperate in the process, and contacts will continue," he said.

The case has hurt the standing of AIPAC, one of Washington's most powerful lobbying groups, and has raised questions about the proper boundaries of sharing sensitive defense information with a close ally. Prosecutors said the case illustrated how a public official had betrayed a trust, and how private lobbyists had succumbed to the temptation of breaking the law to obtain information.

"When it comes to classified information, there is a clear line in the law," said Paul J. McNulty, the U.S. attorney for the eastern district of Virginia in Alexandria, where the grand jury indictment was unsealed Thursday. "Today's charges are about crossing that line."

McNulty said the investigation was continuing and did not rule out the possibility that others might be charged.

Named in the indictment Thursday were Steven J. Rosen, AIPAC's longtime director of foreign policy issues, and Keith Weissman, a senior Middle East analyst. Both were charged with conspiring to "communicate national defense information to persons not entitled to receive it." Rosen was separately charged with improperly communicating classified information.

The indictment also incorporates allegations in the previous indictment against Franklin that had detailed his dealings with Rosen and Weissman without identifying them by name.

Franklin, Rosen and Weissman are scheduled to be arraigned in federal court in Alexandria on Aug. 16.

A spokesman for AIPAC, Patrick Dorton, said Thursday that Rosen and Weissman had been dismissed by the lobbying group earlier this year "because they engaged in conduct that was not part of their jobs and because their conduct did not comport in any way with the standards that AIPAC expects of its employees."

AIPAC, he said, "does not seek, use or request anything but legally obtained appropriate information as part of its work."

Rosen's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, called the federal charges "a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process."

John N. Nassikas, an attorney for Weissman, described his client as "an honest, respected foreign policy analyst and Middle East expert" who was looking forward to contesting the charges in court.

Thursday's charges revealed that federal investigators have been tracking AIPAC and its dealings with the U.S. and Israeli governments for longer than previously thought. Earlier court filings had indicated that investigators were mainly interested in the contacts Rosen and Weissman had with Franklin, who emerged in late 2002 as a potential conduit for information.

But the indictment alleges that the plot to collect and disseminate U.S. secrets began as early as 1999 when, on separate occasions, Rosen obtained intelligence concerning what the indictment describes as "terrorist activities in Central Asia," and Weissman obtained a secret FBI report on the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers complex in Saudi Arabia that killed 19 U.S. servicemen. In each instance, the information was shared with a person whom the indictment calls "Foreign Official 1."

The indictment also describes instances where Rosen and Weissman disclosed classified information after meeting with other unnamed U.S. government officials, including a December 2000 meeting in which the men were leaked "information about classified United States strategy options against a Middle Eastern country."

In March 2002, the indictment says, Rosen obtained classified information about Al Qaeda from one of the unnamed government officials, later disclosing it to a person identified only as "Foreign Official 2."

According to the indictment, the contacts with Franklin began in August 2002, after Rosen called the Defense Department seeking the name of a person with expertise on Iran. He was referred to Franklin, a mid-level analyst who had long been working to harden U.S. policy toward Iran.

Six months later, over breakfast at an Arlington restaurant, Franklin allegedly disclosed to Rosen and Weissman the contents of a classified draft presidential directive on Iran policy. Rosen subsequently passed the information along to the unnamed foreign officials, as well as "a senior fellow at a Washington, D.C., think tank" and members of the media, the indictment alleges. "I'm not supposed to know this," Rosen is said to have told a journalist.

At another meeting, in June 2003, Franklin gave Rosen and Weissman "highly classified" information related to attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq, the indictment alleges.

Ultimately, Franklin agreed to cooperate with the FBI, which monitored a July 2004 meeting outside a department store. During that meeting, Franklin allegedly told Weissman that he had new, highly classified information about plans by Iranian agents to kidnap and kill Israeli intelligence agents in northern Iraq.

Weissman and Rosen passed along that information to a third foreign official who is not named in the indictment but whom sources have identified as Naor Gilon, a former political counselor at the Israeli Embassy in Washington. Gilon recently returned to Israel as part of a normal diplomatic rotation, the embassy said.

The indictment contends that over a two-year period starting in August 2002, Franklin leaked information to the foreign official sources identified as Gilon during meetings at several locations in the Washington area, including the officers' athletic club at the Pentagon and a sandwich shop near the State Department.

FBI agents confronted Rosen and Weissman in August 2004. The indictment says both men "falsely" denied that Franklin had provided them classified information.

Pro-Israel Lobbyists Charged With Disclosing U.S. Secrets (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Two former employees of a pro-Israel lobbying group were indicted yesterday by a federal grand jury in Virginia on charges of illegally receiving and disclosing classified U.S. defense information they obtained from a veteran Pentagon analyst -- who was arrested in May on charges of leaking secret documents.

Steven J. Rosen, of Silver Spring, a 63-year-old former director of foreign policy issues for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), and Keith Weissman, of Bethesda, a 53-year-old former senior Iran analyst at the organization, were accused of receiving national defense information and giving it to unauthorized persons, including an agent of a foreign government.

The analyst, Lawrence A. Franklin, 58, of Kearneysville, W. Va., was arrested by the FBI on charges of illegally disclosing classified information -- nearly two years after he first was identified as suspected of having passed national security documents involving Iran to AIPAC.

Mr. Franklin, who has pleaded not guilty in the case, has been a Defense Department employee since 1979 and held a "top secret" security clearance.

"Those entrusted with safeguarding our nation's secrets must remain faithful to that trust," said U.S. Attorney Paul J. McNulty. "Those not authorized to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation may be."

Arraignment for the three men is scheduled for Aug. 16 before U.S. District Court Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria.

The indictment said Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman, in an effort to "influence persons within and outside the United States," cultivated relationships with Mr. Franklin and others "to gather sensitive U.S. government information, including classified information relating to the national defense."

It said the two men disclosed sensitive information as far back as 1999 on a variety of topics, including terrorist activities in Central Asia, the bombing of the Khobar Towers complex in Saudi Arabia, the activities of terror network al Qaeda, and U.S. policy in Iran, to American and foreign government officials and reporters. The indictment said their relationship with Mr. Franklin began in February 2003.

Mr. Franklin has been under investigation by the FBI for more than three years, accused of handing over classified Defense Department documents on Iran to officials at AIPAC, which then were passed to Israel.

The FBI began surveillance of Mr. Franklin, Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman more than two years ago. The surveillance also is thought to have targeted Naor Gilon, a political adviser at the Israeli Embassy in the District. Last year, FBI agents copied Mr. Rosen's computer hard drive at his AIPAC office after interviews with him and Mr. Weissman.

AIPAC and the Israeli Embassy have denied any wrongdoing. Attorneys for Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman, who left AIPAC in April, have denied any wrongdoing by their clients.

An affidavit by FBI agent Catherine M. Hanna said Mr. Franklin gave a classified document on potential attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq to two unidentified persons with whom he met for lunch June 26, 2003, at an Arlington restaurant.

U.S. Charges Man In Camcorder - Piracy Crackdown (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Filed at 9:58 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - A Missouri man is the first to be indicted under a new federal law that prohibits people from secretly videotaping movies when they are shown in theaters, the U.S. Justice Department said on Thursday.

Curtis Salisbury, 19, used a camcorder to make copies of recent releases ``The Perfect Man'' and ``Bewitched'' and then distributed them through illicit computer networks that specialize in piracy, the Justice Department said.

A law that took effect in April prohibits such behavior.

Salisbury also downloaded several movies and software programs from the computer network, the Justice Department said.

Salisbury, who faces up to 17 years in prison, could not be reached for comment.

Entertainment-industry insiders and tech-savvy hackers use ``warez'' networks, as they're commonly known, to distribute movies, music and software for free, often before they're released to the public.

The files then end up on peer-to-peer networks like Kazaa, where they can be downloaded by millions of people, or burned onto discs and sold on street corners.

Law enforcement officials say most participants in warez networks are generally not motivated by profit. In this instance, Salisbury sought payment for the movies he uploaded, the Justice Department said.

The Justice Department has targeted warez networks before, most recently in a June 30 raid that involved more than a dozen countries.

Salisbury, of St. Charles, Missouri, was arrested as part of that effort. He has been charged with conspiracy and copyright infringement, along with two violations of the camcorder law.

Camcorder piracy accounts for over 90 percent of movies that turn up on the Internet while they're still in theaters, said the head of a movie-industry trade group.

``The creative works of the entertainment industry belong to the millions of people who make them and are not for others to steal or unlawfully distribute,'' said Dan Glickman, head of the Motion Picture Association of America.

Reuters/VNU

First Suspect Indicted Under Camcorder Law (HOLLYREP)

By Brooks Boliek

Hollywood Reporter, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Justice Department officials announced on Thursday the first indictment under a law enacted this year that makes it a federal crime to camcord a movie.

The United States Attorney for the Northern District of California officially charged Curtis Salisbury, 19, of St. Charles, Mo., in a five-count indictment alleging that he used a camcorder in movie theaters to copy recent theatrical releases, then uploaded the copies to a computer network for distribution. Two of the counts were made under the Family Entertainment and Copyright Act of 2005, which President Bush signed in April.

One section of the new law, known as the Artists Rights and Theft Prevention Act, criminalizes the use of recording equipment to make copies of movies in theaters.

"Camcording movies in theaters for online distribution is a crime," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said. "This case represents the first prosecution under the Family Entertainment Copyright Act and demonstrates that the U.S. Attorney's office and its CHIP (Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property) Unit will aggressively employ the tools provided by Congress and the president to combat the theft of intellectual property."

The statute also prohibits the infringement of a work being prepared for commercial distribution by making it available on a computer network accessible to members of the public, where the individual knows the work was intended for commercial distribution. The indictment represents the first use of those provisions by federal prosecutors.

In addition to allegedly camcording and uploading the movies "The Perfect Man" and "Bewitched" to the warez server, the indictment also alleges Salisbury illegally downloaded the movie "Madagascar" and the software video editing programs Sony Sound Forge V8.0, Adobe Premier Pro V7.0 and Adobe Premier Pro V1.5 Proper.

MPAA president and CEO Dan Glickman said the indictment proved the need for the new law.

"Over 90% of initial releases that are pirated are a result of people camcording in movie theaters," Glickman said. "That's why we worked with Congress and the president to pass crucial legislation strengthening penalties against people who camcord movies in theaters and make them available to the public on the Internet. The creative works of the entertainment industry be long to the millions of people who make them and are not for others to steal or unlawfully distribute."

According to the indictment, Salisbury communicated with others about ways to remove identifying features on a film that reveal the originating theater. Additionally, he allegedly discussed receiving payment for the films that he would provide, indicating that he would like to be paid by money order at a post office box when the film is ready for release.

If convicted, he faces three to five years in prison and a fine of $250,000 -- or twice the value of the property involved in the transaction, whichever is greater -- as well as a three-year term of supervised release and a $100 mandatory special assessment.

The prosecution against Salisbury is part of continuing FBI investigation known locally as Operation Copycat, which to date has resulted in the indictments of five individuals in the Northern District of California and the execution of more than 40 searches nationwide. Operation Copycat is the local and largest part of the coordinated international law-enforcement action known as Operation Site Down, which is targeting online piracy.

The indictment is an indication of the seriousness which the government takes intellectual property theft, said MPAA worldwide anti-piracy director John Malcolm.

"We want to thank the U.S. Attorney's Office and the FBI for their efforts to crack down on movie pirates," he said. "Their attention to this growing phenomenon is crucial in our fight to protect copyrights."

Man Is Charged Under New U.S. Film Piracy Law (LAT/BLOOM)

By From Bloomberg News

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

A Missouri man has been accused in an indictment of making video recordings of movies in theaters, the first time someone has been charged under a new federal law outlawing the practice.

Curtis Salisbury, 19, of St. Charles was accused of copying Universal Pictures' "The Perfect Man" and Columbia Pictures' "Bewitched" and distributing the movies over the Internet, the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco said. The indictment Wednesday in San Jose is part of a crackdown on online piracy, officials said.

The Family Entertainment and Copyright Act of 2005, which was signed into law in April by President Bush, makes it a crime to use recording equipment to copy a movie in a theater. Piracy costs the movie industry about $3.5 billion a year in lost sales, according to the Motion Picture Assn. of America.

"The Perfect Man" opened the weekend of June 19, and "Bewitched" opened a week later.

Salisbury could not be reached for comment.

Federal prosecutors are investigating sites on the Internet used to distribute pirated movies, games and software.

Last month, four people were charged in San Jose with copyright violations as part of a nationwide crackdown on the sites.

U.S. Ties Kickbacks To Park District Work (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor And And Liam Ford, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, August 5, 2005

A former Chicago Park District official accepted cash, vacations to ski resorts, a pricey bicycle and even a manicure for steering millions of dollars in work at Millennium Park to a suburban landscaping company, federal authorities charged Thursday.

Shirley McMayon, the Park District's former director of natural resources, pocketed more than $137,000 in financial benefits from two executives of James Michael Inc., the Mundelein-based landscaper, an indictment charged.

DOJ_NMG_0002094

In return for the payoffs, McMayon, 47, now of Park City, Utah, improperly used her influence to steer about $8 million in Park District work to the firm between 2000 and 2004, authorities charged.

Michael Lowecki, the company owner, and Kevin Haas, its former chief operations officer, were also charged in the indictment.

"They used the Park District coffers as sort of their personal playground," U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said at a news conference announcing the charges.

Fitzgerald said that "one of the kickers in this case" was that the contractors didn't pay for the most of the bribes themselves, instead padding their invoices to pass the cost of about $60,000 in payoffs to taxpayers. Among the phony invoices was a bill for about $10,000 for a non-existent global positioning system, he said.

"This is the $10,000 GPS that can't be found," Fitzgerald quipped.

The indictment marked yet another public corruption probe launched by federal investigators. The U.S. investigation of City Hall for political influence in hiring and contracts has been heating up, and former Gov. George Ryan is set to go on trial soon on bribery-related charges.

It is the first federal investigation to reach into the Park District since a former contract-compliance officer was convicted in Operation Silver Shovel in 2000 of falsely certifying a government mole's business as a woman-owned enterprise.

At the news conference, Robert Grant, the special agent in charge of the FBI in Chicago, said the case against McMayon "has led to other investigative leads that are aggressively under investigation."

In a telephone interview, Tim Mitchell, the Park District's general superintendent and chief executive officer, said his office learned of the investigation when it was subpoenaed for records by federal prosecutors in January.

McMayon, known as "Shirl," had resigned her $92,700-a-year post in November, citing personal reasons, Mitchell said.

Jacquelyn Heard, a spokeswoman for Mayor Richard Daley, said that McMayon expressed interest in a job at City Hall "but never saw the mayor on it" and wasn't offered a position.

McMayon pocketed cash and checks totaling about $123,800 and took vacations worth about $7,300 with her family to Wisconsin Dells, Wis., Galena, Ill., and ski resorts in Michigan and Utah--all paid for by Lowecki and Haas, the government alleged. She also was given tickets to a Green Bay Packers football game during a paid vacation to a resort in Elkhart Lake, Wis., authorities said.

Vacations at the Dells

McMayon vacationed for free at one resort at the Dells in May 2000, complained about the accommodations to Lowecki and Haas, and was placed in a more expensive lodge for another Dells vacation two months later, according to the charges and sources.

The landscapers also spent more than $22,000 to pay off McMayon's loan on her 1999 Dodge Durango and paid $250 for her massage, manicure and haircut at a Mario Tricoci salon, about $1,500 for a LeMond Buenos Aires bicycle and more than $4,000 for two computers.

The charges disappointed Roger Post, general manager of Christy Webber Landscapes, which has done limited work for the Park District in recent years.

"We play by the rules, and obviously others were not," Post said. "If people were winning contracts for reasons other than the best bid, it makes you angry."

Outside James Michael's offices Thursday, a handful of former employees picketed, complaining they had been retaliated against for joining a union.

McMayon and Lowecki were each charged with nine counts of fraud and bribery. Haas was charged with two counts of fraud.

McMayon's lawyer, Donald Young, said he expects that McMayon will resolve the charges before trial. "She has been cooperating with the government," Young said.

A lawyer for Lowecki, 45, of Libertyville didn't return telephone calls seeking comment. Attorney Michael Ettinger, who represents Haas, 56, of Gurnee said his client is cooperating in the investigation and expects to plead guilty. Haas left the landscaping firm in November 2001, well before the alleged kickback scheme ended.

Prosecutors Scott Levine and Nancy Miller said McMayon supervised an evaluation committee that made recommendations to the Park District board as to which companies should get contracts. "She was then able to direct more work to James Michael than to other contractors," Levine said at the news conference.

According to a civil lawsuit in Lake County, an attorney for James Michael indicated the firm first obtained "very large" contracts from the Park District in 1999 and 2000 and went through "almost an explosion" in its business. Its business quickly grew about fivefold to $10 million, the lawyer said.

A stray check

In a deposition in that lawsuit, Carleen Haake, a bookkeeper for James Michael, testified she discovered that the firm had paid off McMayon's car loan when she found the check on a copying machine at the office. "They left their original on the glass," she said.

The firm primarily worked at Millennium Park, planting trees and shrubs and mowing lawns, and also installed Christmas lights at the park, Buckingham Fountain and other locations, authorities said.

Millennium Park has become a major Chicago tourist attraction, but during construction, it was mired in controversy as its cost ballooned to about $490 million, more than half to be paid by taxpayers.

Before working at the Park District, McMayon was horticulture manager for the Golden Nugget Mirage Resorts in Las Vegas, according to a biography of her in a 2001 issue of Illinois Parks and Recreation magazine. A graduate of the University of Southwest Louisiana with a degree in horticulture, she also had been director of horticulture for a foundation in Louisiana and had owned a landscaping business.

Her attorney said she is now working at a golf course in Utah.

McMayon was hired by the Chicago Park District in July 1999 as deputy director of landscaping and was promoted to head the new Department of Natural Resources in early 2001.

McMayon was often the public face for beautification efforts in Chicago parks, traveling to conferences across the country and abroad.

Tribune staff reporters Charles Sheehan, Gary Washburn and Lolly Bowean and freelance reporter Barbara Bell contributed to this report.

mo'connor@tribune.com

lford@tribune.com

News Feds: Bribes Unlocked Parks Coffers (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR, ANDREW HERRMANN, NATASHA KORECKI AND TIM NOVAK, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, August 5, 2005

When high-ranking Chicago Park District official Shirley McMayon oversaw acres of trees, lawns and gardens, she got her hands dirty -- with bribe money, federal prosecutors charged Thursday.

McMayon, 47, a horticulturist now living in Park City, Utah, allegedly received more than $120,000 in cash plus free vacations, computers and other goodies for steering about $8 million in Park District landscaping work to a Mundelein company, James Michael Inc. In all, more than $137,000 in cash and benefits went into her pocket from 2000 to 2002, prosecutors allege.

A substantial portion of the landscaping and lighting work was at the city's crown jewel, Millennium Park. But the company did work at other prominent spots, including Garfield, Grant, Jackson, Lincoln, Marquette parks and Gold Star Memorial Park, which commemorates fallen officers. The company bedecked Buckingham Fountain with winter holiday lights. It no longer has Park District contracts.

Chicago Park District Supt. Tim Mitchell, who started in January 2004, said Thursday internal changes make it harder to defraud the district.

"It's very disappointing, but it also angers me because there are a lot of good, hardworking people working six, seven days a week here," Mitchell said.

The landscape company's owner, Michael Lowecki, 45, of Libertyville, and its former controller, John Kevin Haas, 56, of Gurnee allegedly paid the bribes to McMayon, who once oversaw horticulture at some Las Vegas casinos.

Subsidizing the bribes were the taxpayers themselves.

The landscaping company allegedly covered about half the bribes by submitting phony invoices to the Park District for items it never delivered.

2 suspects cooperating

"The defendants in this case used the Park District's coffers as a personal playground," U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said.

At times, Lowecki allegedly transferred money straight into McMayon's bank account.

"Some bribes are less subtle than others," Fitzgerald said.

McMayon is cooperating, and her case is expected to be resolved before trial, said her attorney, Donald Young. At one point during the investigation, she wore a wire, recording Lowecki on tape allegedly agreeing to continue the bribe payments.

Haas, represented by Michael Ettinger and Stephen Simonian, is cooperating, too, and is expected to plead guilty.

"My client has led a law-abiding life," Ettinger said. "He's a good man. He made a mistake."

Lowecki's attorney, Elliot Samuels, defended his client, saying he's hardworking and called Millennium Park a point of pride.

"He did an honest day's work," Samuels said.

Allegations of wrongdoing against the landscaping company came to light more than a year ago in a civil case. In that case, filed in Lake County in 2003, James Michael Inc. sued a former sales worker there for stealing money.

In a deposition in the case, conducted by Lowecki's own civil attorney, a James Michael employee admitted writing checks to McMayon, said attorney Jed Stone. Stone represents the former worker being sued.

"I think there's little question that the landscape company was involved in bizarre conduct," Stone said.

Ex-official At Chicago Parks Took Bribes-prosecutor (REU)

Reuters, August 4, 2005

CHICAGO (Reuters) - Federal prosecutors broadened their probe of public corruption in Illinois and Chicago on Thursday, announcing charges against a former park district official for accepting bribes from a landscaping firm.

Shirley McMayon, who was director of natural resources for the Chicago Park District, was indicted by a grand jury with receiving $137,000 in bribes from a suburban landscaping firm in exchange for contracts for work on Chicago's downtown Millennium Park.

The luxurious $475 million park -- which features outdoor sculpture and a Frank Gehry-designed concert stage -- was hit by numerous cost overruns before opening last summer.

McMayon, 47, is accused of accepting free ski trips, spa visits, and tickets to a Green Bay Packers football game in exchange for steering $8 million worth of contracts to James Michael Inc. and executives Michael Lowecki and Kevin Haas.

"We should be having contracts on the basis of merit," said local U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald. "The system has been compromised."

Since being appointed the top prosecutor in Northern Illinois in 2001, Fitzgerald has unearthed corruption at all levels of state and local government, touching the administrations of former Republican Gov. George Ryan and Chicago Mayor Richard Daley.

These were the first federal charges involving the parks department of the nation's third-largest city after guilty pleas won from workers in various city public works departments.

Fitzgerald, who is also in charge of the Justice Department probe of the leak of a CIA operative's name to journalists, urged other contractors using unfair tactics to come forward before they become targets of investigators.

McMayon, who left her job in December, was charged with nine counts of fraud and bribery, with penalties ranging from five to 20 years in prison and $250,000 fines for each. Haas, who is cooperating with investigators, was charged with two fraud counts, and Lowecki with five fraud counts and three bribery counts.

DOJ_NMG_0002097

Ex-VA Employee Gets Prison Term In Bribery Case (BSUN)

By A Sun Staff Writer

The Baltimore Sun, August 5, 2005

A guilty plea to a bribery conspiracy charge netted a Crofton man one year and one day in prison, Maryland's U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said today.

In addition to the prison term, Judge Frederick J. Motz sentenced Frank McCreary, 42, to two years of supervised release.

McCreary was a Realty Specialist with the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) Regional Office in Baltimore, Rosenstein said. McCreary's duties included soliciting bids from and awarding contracts to contractors for repair work to VA-owned houses, he said.

McCreary's co-defendant in the case, Carmelo Vizzi, 48, of Perry Hall, owned a home improvement business that bid on contracts offered by the VA.

According to court documents, between November 1999 and January 2003, McCreary steered property repair contracts to Vizzi in exchange for money. In cases in which approved contractors were required to submit sealed bids to the VA, Vizzi bribed McCreary by paying him between $250 and $600 per contract awarded, court documents state.

In return, Vizzi received inside information on the lowest bid so he could underbid the competition, the documents state. Rosenstein said the profit to Vizzi's contracting company from sealed bid jobs awarded by McCreary that involved bribes was approximately $355,462. He said McCreary also created fictitious invoices and submitted them to the VA for payment and received money from Vizzi after the invoices were processed.

Vizzi previously pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery and was sentenced to two years in prison.

The FBI and Veterans Administration-Inspector General investigated the case, which was prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Bonnie S. Greenberg.

2 Sentenced Over Fixing Of Tickets (NOTP)

By April Yee, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, August 5, 2005

A former Orleans Parish Traffic Court reporter was sentenced Wednesday to jail, and a former courthouse guard received probation, a fine and community service in a ticket-fixing scam still under investigation by federal officials.

Court reporter Glenda Hamlin and guard Bobby Grant are the fourth and fifth court employees to be sentenced in the ongoing probe.

Grant, who monitored the South Broad Street courthouse for a decade, was sentenced to a year of probation, a $250 fine and 100 hours of community service by U.S. District Judge Ivan L.R. Lemelle.

Another federal judge sentenced Hamlin, a six-year Section D court reporter, to three months in jail, a $250 fine and two months of house arrest. She must wear an electronic monitoring device.

"When you have corruption and bribery in government, it taints the whole government," U.S. District Judge Eldon Fallon said before handing down Hamlin's sentence. "You're in a position of trust. A lot of people depend on you, and you act for the government. You've got that mantle about you."

Grant and Hamlin were in a group of 10 that took advantage of the city's computerized traffic records, accessible only to certain staff members, prosecutors said. With citations dismissed for bribes, the state and city lost out on related fines and court costs. Nor will law enforcement agencies and insurance companies see the citation on the individual's driving record.

Grant was indicted Feb. 24 and pled guilty March 29 to fraud connected with computers. He admitted to taking a $200 bribe in September to arrange the dismissal of outstanding traffic citations, then went to an employee in Traffic Court's Section D who wiped out the citations and split the cash with him.

Hamlin worked in Section D, along with another court reporter and a minute clerk who were indicted for similar charges.

"I know they all interacted," U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said, but he did not say whether Grant had gone to Hamlin to have the tickets erased. Hamlin was indicted March 24 for computer fraud that allegedly happened during the same period that Grant contacted a Section D employee. Grant pleaded guilty April 27.

DOJ_NMG_0002098

"I just want to apologize for my behavior," Hamlin told Fallon. Her parents looked on silently, following her out of the courtroom after the sentencing to sit in the empty hallway.

Both Grant and Hamlin had entered plea bargains, with the understanding that in return for prosecutors' pledge not to charge them further in the ticket-fixing scam, they would "submit to interviews whenever and wherever requested by law enforcement authorities" and "be completely truthful."

Grant's sentence "was exactly what was called for by law," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Al Winters, senior litigation counsel in the cases. He declined to comment on Hamlin's sentence.

Others have been convicted and sentenced in the scam, and several others remain to be sentenced.

Minute clerk Mickey Torregano was put on three years of probation in June. On Thursday, former Assistant City Attorney Edwin Burks was sentenced to three years of probation and a $1,000 fine. James W. Lee, who oversaw traffic violators as they cleaned court buildings for their community service requirement, must pay a $250 fine and perform 100 hours of community service.

"The investigation is not over," Letten said. The probe has lasted more than a year and a half, with video and audio records and testimony from cooperation witnesses.

. . . . . .

April Yee can be reached at ayee@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3321.

Jurors For Gotti Trail Picked (NYNSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, August 5, 2005

A group of seven women and five men made the final cut Thursday as jurors who will decide the fate of John "Junior" Gotti, the son of the late mob boss whose federal racketeering trial begins Monday in Manhattan.

Shortly after Thursday's lunch break, prosecutors and defense attorneys, along with federal Judge Shira Scheindlin, made the final pick of 12 regular jurors and six alternates. One male alternate was later excused, leaving five for the trial.

The panel of regular jurors contains six whites, two blacks and four Hispanics. One Hispanic man said he was on disability for depression, a Hispanic woman is hoping to be a state court officer, while one white male said he worked in engineering.

"It was a very painstaking process, but ultimately we have 12 very carefully examined and, ultimately in our view, open-minded and fair jurors," Gotti's defense attorney Jeffrey Lichtman told reporters outside court.

"In the end, that is all John and myself ever want in a jury," Lichtman said. Jury selection had begun on Monday.

A bespectacled Gotti, who is being held without bail, stood and stretched just before court marshals escorted him back to a holding cell. He didn't comment about the jury.

Asked if his client was going to testify, Lichtman responded cryptically by saying a "trial is a fluid endeavor and we will be making decisions on the fly."

Gotti, who officials said supervised the Gambino crime family after his father's imprisonment in 1992, is on trial for assorted racketeering charges, including the attempted kidnapping of Guardian Angels founder and radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa. Also on trial with Gotti are Michael "Mikey Y" Yannotti and Louis "Louie Black" Mariani.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael McGovern disclosed that the first witness he expects to call Monday will be former Gambino soldier Frank Fappiano, an admitted hitman who has turned government witness. Fappiano last year testified at the trial of Gotti's uncle Peter, who was convicted of federal racketeering charges.

Scheindlin is scheduled Friday to announce her decision about whether the judy gets to hear excerpts from Gotti's 1999 plea to federal charges.

Scheindlin also said she will be ruling on whether evidence of an alleged extortion of Russo's On The Bay restaurant in Howard Beach could be introduced to the jury. Prosecutors said in court that there is no direct evidence that Gotti received any proceeds from such an extortion. But they want to argue that he was part of the Gambino family administration that benefited from the payoffs.

Lawyers' Group To Weigh In On Reporter Confidentiality (SDUT)

By Gina Holland, ASSOCIATED PRESS

The San Diego Union-Tribune, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON – The American Bar Association has resurrected a plan to endorse federal protection for journalists who refuse to reveal their sources to prosecutors, following the high-profile jailing of one reporter and threats against others.

The nations' largest lawyers group, which declined 30 years ago to back a reporter shield law, was debating that issue and others at its annual meeting running through Tuesday in Chicago.

ABA members were hearing from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Supreme Court Justices John Paul Stevens and Stephen Breyer.

Meeting topics include stem cell research, subject of a showdown between the White House and Congress, and the rights of terminally ill patients, prominent this fall when the Supreme Court takes up Oregon's physician-assisted suicide law.

Of course, the unofficial buzz is about high court nominee John Roberts.

Roberts, an ABA member, has not been particularly active in the group, which over the years has angered conservatives with policy positions supporting abortion rights and a freeze on capital punishment.

The ABA's president, Robert Grey Jr., said Roberts' nomination will not be part of the meetings because a committee has not finished reviewing his background and qualifications.

For more than 50 years the association has done examinations of people chosen for federal judgeships, focusing on competence, integrity and temperament. President Bush in 2001 ended the ABA's preferential role in vetting prospective judicial nominees.

Separately, the group's policy-making board will begin taking policy votes on Monday. Endorsement of the shield law would allow the organization to lobby Congress, where bills are pending to protect reporters.

"This is a ripe topic," said Landis Best, a media layer in New York who worked on the proposal. "Not just lawyers and not just journalists are talking about it."

New York Times reporter Judith Miller has been in jail a month in Virginia for refusing to testify to a grand jury investigating the leak of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame.

In June, a federal appeals court upheld civil contempt findings against four journalists, including an Associated Press reporter, whose confidential sources pointed to scientist Wen Ho Lee as an espionage suspect.

Best said that many states have laws that prevent punishments of reporters who keep sources private, but a national law is needed to encourage federal government whistle-blowers and others to provide information to the news media.

Not all lawyers support the proposal.

"The national government has certain kinds of compelling interests that conflict with the right of the press to keep their sources confidential, like national defense and security," said John Yoo, a law professor at the University of California, Berkeley, who worked in the Bush Justice Department from 2001-03.

"It's hard to see the ABA getting people in Congress to place the right to protect anonymous sources above national security," he said.

The subject came before the group after the Supreme Court ruled in 1972 that reporters had no constitutional right to withhold information from grand juries.

A group studied the matter and urged ABA's leaders to endorse a national shield law. It failed 157-122 in 1974.

A report being submitted at the meeting in Chicago says that reporter-source relationships help the public and should be treated like other associations.

"The attorney-client relationship as well as those between physician and patient, priest and penitent, and spouse and spouse, are all protected by our legal system," the report says. "The reporter-source relationship ... should be no less protected."

Man Held In Idaho Abduction-murders Probed In 1997 Murder Of 10-year-old Calif. Boy (FINDLAW/AP)

By Robert Jablon, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, August 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002100

(AP) - RIVERSIDE, California-A convicted sex offender accused of murdering three people in Idaho and killing one of the two children authorities said he abducted from the home is now being investigated in the 1997 kidnapping death of a 10-year-old California boy.

Joseph Edward Duncan III, 42, is linked by a single fingerprint to the scene of the killing of Anthony Martinez, Sheriff Bob Doyle told a press conference on Wednesday.

Duncan was arrested last month after people at an Idaho restaurant spotted 8-year-old Shasta Groene, who went missing with her 9-year-old brother Dylan in May. Dylan's body was later found in Montana.

FBI agents involved in the Idaho investigation contacted Riverside authorities on July 14, and said Duncan mentioned the name Martinez and the general area.

Investigators flew to Idaho to fingerprint Duncan. They tried to interview him but he refused to talk. Confirmation of the fingerprint match was received Monday, the sheriff said.

"We're pretty confident that he's our suspect. ... This is huge," Doyle said. "We followed up 15,000 leads over eight years. You can imagine the elation that everybody has."

In April 1997, Anthony Martinez was forced into a white car in Beaumont as his friends watched. The children were playing when a stranger offered them a dollar to help find his lost cat. Sixteen days later a forest ranger found the boy's nude, bound body in a desert area about 70 miles (110 kilometers) to the east.

The kidnapper was described at the time as blue-eyed and mustachioed. Before the end of that April, authorities had evaluated more than 100 people as suspects.

Duncan has been charged in Idaho with kidnapping and murdering Shasta's mother, Brenda Groene, 40, her boyfriend Mark McKenzie, 37, and Shasta's 13-year-old brother, Slade, at their home outside Coeur d'Alene.

Federal prosecutors have said they will file charges in the abduction of the children and Dylan's death.

Authorities also have said Shasta and Dylan were sexually assaulted. While it is The Associated Press' policy not to identify alleged victims of sexual assault in most cases, the search for Shasta and her brother was so heavily publicized that their names are widely known.

Duncan was sentenced to 20 years in prison for sexually assaulting a 14-year-old boy in Tacoma, Washington, in 1980. Authorities said Duncan was paroled in 1994 and moved into a halfway house in Seattle.

Documents show he got a job as a phone solicitor for a publishing company, went to counseling and later got a second job with a small software company.

In 1996, Duncan tested positive for marijuana during a routine urine test, and he was arrested, then released on parole again, records show. In 1997, he again tested positive for marijuana use, records show. He disappeared with his girlfriend's car, according to parole reports.

He was captured and returned to prison in 1997. He was released in 2000 and enrolled that year at North Dakota State University. At the time of his arrest, Duncan was a fugitive charged with molesting a 6-year-old boy in Minnesota.

CIVIL LAW:

N.C. Wins Back 1789 Copy Of Bill Of Rights (NSDY/AP)

By Emery P. Dalesio, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, August 5, 2005

RALEIGH, N.C. -- An original copy of the Bill of Rights that was given to North Carolina by George Washington back in 1789 was returned to the state Thursday, culminating a bitter legal tug-of-war over the historic document.

Gov. Mike Easley accepted the weathered document after a judge ordered federal marshals to turn it over to the state -- the first time North Carolina has had possession of the document since the end of the Civil War.

"North Carolina's stolen Bill of Rights may have been out of state for nearly 140 years, but never out of mind," Easley said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0002101

Easley signed a receipt accepting possession of the document, in an ivory-colored frame, from U.S. marshals during a quickly announced ceremony inside the antebellum state Capitol from which the document was stolen by an invading Union soldier in 1865. The document is one of the original 13 delivered to the colonies for review before the final Bill of Rights was approved in 1789.

The stolen document was sold by the Union soldier in 1866 to an Ohio buyer, whose family sold it to Connecticut antiques dealer Wayne Pratt in 2000 for $200,000.

In March 2003, an FBI agent posing as a museum buyer pretended to purchase the paper from Pratt and his investor, Robert V. Matthews, for $5 million. Instead, the agent presented a seizure warrant signed by the judge in the case.

Pratt relinquished his ownership claim to the document and has agreed to donate the document to North Carolina. Matthews continues to claim partial ownership of the paper, which has been valued at up to $40 million.

U.S. District Court Judge Terrence Boyle last year awarded the document to North Carolina, but in January, the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., told the judge to reconsider.

Boyle determined the document should return to the possession of the person or entity who owned it before the government's sting operation. He ruled Thursday that Pratt had the clearest right to possession, but had relinquished the claim to North Carolina.

"It's just thievery; it's absolute thievery," said Matthews' attorney, Mike Stratton of New Haven, Conn. "Bob Matthews paid real money, $200,000, to buy a document that's been in private hands for 140 years."

A North Carolina legislative leader praised the decision.

"Justice is finally being done, and we're delighted to have it returned," Senate Majority Leader Tony Rand said on the Senate floor.

Easley said the Bill of Rights will be displayed in the state Museum of History.

* __

Martha Waggoner in Raleigh, N.C., contributed to this story.

Seniors Group Sues Big Tobacco To Recover Money For Medicare (WSJ)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A conservative seniors group filed suit against big U.S. tobacco companies, seeking to recover billions of dollars spent on smoking-related diseases by Medicare, the federal health-insurance program for the elderly.

The case relies on a little-known but recently strengthened provision of Medicare law that allows someone to sue on behalf of Medicare when it pays medical expenses that another party had a legal obligation to cover -- for example, when a corporate health plan has agreed to cover the expenses, or when a business or other party injured the Medicare beneficiary and is liable. If the suit prevails, Medicare collects the damages and the party bringing the suit is eligible for an equal amount. One reason for the provision is that the government doesn't have the resources to prosecute every case.

The lawsuit is the first national action since the Medicare as Second Payer statute was strengthened in 2003. The statute was conceived in the 1980s by the Reagan administration, and the 2003 amendment clarified that if a business or other group injures a Medicare beneficiary, it must be the first payer for medical expenses. Medicare picks up the tab as second payer only if the first payer cannot cover the full expense. The law also seemed to expand the criteria for proving liability for an injury, though that has been disputed. "If someone offers a product or service that injures people and drives up Medicare's costs, Medicare deserves a fair chance to fight back," the amendment's sponsor, Sen. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa), said yesterday.

By taking the action, United Seniors Association Inc., a free-market group that has supported initiatives backed by the pharmaceutical and energy industries, is looking to open the door to a flood of suits against the industry. The group says it would like to reclaim at least $60 billion it estimates Medicare has spent on treatment for smoking-related diseases in the past five years, the statute of limitations on the law.

DOJ_NMG_0002102

"Our motivation is one of taxpayer protection," said Charles Jarvis, the group's chairman and chief executive. "Considering how badly the taxpayers have been injured financially, we believe the responsible parties -- the tobacco companies -- should be reimbursing the taxpayer to the greatest amount possible under the law."

Seeking to prove that tobacco companies are liable, the suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Boston, draws a link between nicotine addiction and smoking-related diseases such as lung cancer and emphysema. It argues that "addiction is the key...[to] the prolonged use of cigarettes that commonly causes these diseases," and that the defendants hid the addictive nature of their products and sought to enhance their addictiveness. The suit concludes: "The Medicare beneficiaries who have suffered from or are suffering from diseases attributable to smoking the defendants' cigarettes did not consent to being exposed to the addictive properties of the defendants' cigarettes."

The suit names Philip Morris USA, a subsidiary of Altria Group; Lorillard Tobacco Co.; Liggett Group Inc.; and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. and two of its subsidiaries. An Altria lawyer said he thought the case would be dismissed, and David Howard, an R.J. Reynolds spokesman, said, "Virtually all courts have rejected third-party health-care reimbursement claims, and in the rulings they've stated that they lack standing to sue because claims by the third parties are too remote from any alleged injury." Lorillard and Liggett declined to comment.

Yesterday's suit doesn't seeking to recover Medicare payments in Florida, where a similar suit has been filed. Last week, the plaintiffs in the Florida case -- two individuals -- were dealt a setback when a judge dismissed it, ruling that liability has to be proven in other cases first. The plaintiffs are appealing.

In 1998, the tobacco industry settled for more than $200 billion with most states for claims related to Medicaid, the health-insurance program for the poor and disabled. Since then, the industry has launched a counteroffensive in the courts. The number of suits against Altria, for example, has fallen roughly 60% in the past five years, and the federal government has had a rocky time in its current attempt to prosecute the companies on civil racketeering charges. That and other cases still loom.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Calif. Youth Prison Head Removed For Force (AP)

By DON THOMPSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, August 5, 2005

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) - The superintendent at the state's most notorious youth prison is being removed from his post for using unreasonable force against a ward and failing to report the incident, corrections officials said Thursday.

Steve Kruse has been on administrative leave since shortly after the May 27 incident at Stockton's N.A. Chaderjian Youth Correctional Facility. His appointment as superintendent will be terminated Wednesday.

Kruse's removal adds to turmoil at the facility, which remains under federal investigation. Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said Thursday an investigation "is active and ongoing" into whether the civil rights of wards at the facility are being violated.

The termination was detailed in a quarterly investigative report released Thursday by Matthew Cate, the prison system's independent inspector general. Kruse was not identified by name in the redacted public report, but he was identified as the employee by numerous corrections employees and by previous reports on the incident.

The inspector general found that Kruse grabbed a handcuffed ward's hair and jaw as he was being escorted to another living unit after a fight involving 44 youths at the prison.

Though the ward was struggling with his escorts, and Kruse said he believed he was using reasonable force in line with department policy, investigators concluded the ward was already safely under others' control.

Neither Kruse nor any employees present immediately reported the incident, which Cate said violated use-of-force rules and a new policy intended to break an informal "code of silence" to cover up wrongdoing.

The Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation is scheduled to submit on Friday its response to a scathing report this spring by the prison system's independent inspector general.

DOJ_NMG_0002103

Further reports are due this fall to a federal judge after national experts found deplorable conditions throughout the youth prison system.

Local Leaders Share Views With Federal Mediator (HAVREDN)

By Larry Kline, Havre Daily News

Havre (MT) Daily News, August 5, 2005

Local government officials, business leaders and residents have been meeting with a U.S. Department of Justice mediator who is in town this week to address what some perceive as racial discrimination in and around Havre.

Mediator Grace Sage is employed by the Justice Department's Community Relations Service and is gathering information to determine whether a problem exists in Havre and what can be done to bridge gaps between neighbors.

The mediator told the Rocky Boy tribal council Tuesday she visited Havre in late June and returned because "it was well within the jurisdiction" of what she does.

Before her June visit, Sage had read a University of Montana School of Journalism Native News Project, which included accounts of mistreatment of Native Americans in some Havre businesses. She also had received an invitation from Havre resident Charlie Grant.

Tribal council member and state Rep. Jonathan Windy Boy, D-Rocky Boy, asked what the end result of her visits would be.

"The expectation is to have people agree there is a problem and ... come together to solve it," she told him. "What we can do is get people on board for mediation, counseling or perhaps training."

Windy Boy was designated as the tribal council's contact person for the mediator.

He offered his opinion on the issue in an interview Wednesday.

"It's always been here," Windy Boy said. "It's been more subtle than it was 50 years ago." Windy Boy remembers seeing signs in business windows that read "No dogs or Indians allowed."

"It's just like any group," he said. "There's always a couple that make it bad for the rest of the community. I'm not saying the whole town is like that. It exists at a certain level."

Racism in Montana is not confined to Havre, he added.

"I've been followed around in stores (in other cities)," Windy Boy said. "This isn't the only town that deals with this."

During the 2005 legislative session, he and a companion were in a Wal-Mart at 2 a.m., and his granddaughter was in need of a diaper. At the checkout, a worker "told us that he hoped she wouldn't pull out her WIC," or Special Supplemental Nutrition Program for Women, Infants and Children vouchers.

"For us to think it doesn't exist in our state, we're fooling ourselves," he added. "It's here in our society." The mediator met individually with city officials and Havre City Council members Wednesday. She declined to be interviewed, but officials later discussed the conversations they had with her.

"She asked for my perceptions," Havre Mayor Bob Rice said. "She said she wasn't judging the community on the word of a few people."

The Native News Project article about Havre did not adequately describe how things are in the city, Rice said.

"I thought that story was very slanted," Rice said.

Discrimination does exist in Havre, just as it does elsewhere, Rice said.

"It's been there and people know about it," he said. "We do have some people that are racist in this town. You have them everywhere. This is a good community. It's unfortunate that this came out the way it did."

Rice said new business ventures being planned for Havre and Rocky Boy will help Native Americans and ease tensions.

"I think Wal-Mart will help," he said about the retail chain's plans to build a supercenter west of Havre. "That's 275 jobs."

The reservation is working on plans for a large casino and an ethanol plant. There is a lot of oil and gas exploration going on right now, Rice said. Those are all positives for the residents of both communities, he added.

City Council member Jack Brandon, who was raised in Chinook, said things have changed over the years.

"I saw more prejudice growing up in Chinook than you would see today," Brandon said. "I think we're better today at judging someone on their merits than we used to be.

"I don't think anything astonishing is going to come out of" Sage's visit, he added. "Hopefully people are more aware that these things do exist and they do something about it."

City Council member Allen "Woody" Woodwick agreed that attitudes have changed, though prejudice does exist to a degree today.

"We have a problem in town, but I hesitate to call it racism," Woodwick said. "More of a prejudice, (which isn't) strictly racial. I do believe it's improved some. You make a little progress here and a little progress there. I don't think there's a magic wand that will make it all go away. I think we need to have some continuing education. We need to just keep working together to overcome it. There's not an ordinance we can draft that tells everybody to be nice to each other. It still boils down to individuals treating each other with respect."

Woodwick and Brandon agreed that the Havre Public Schools' system of organizing its elementary schools by grade level, rather than by neighborhood, ensures that children of different economic and social backgrounds form strong bonds of friendship early in life.

Rocky Boy resident Lloyd Top Sky, who expects to meet soon with Sage, said Native American people face discrimination from white people and also discriminate against each other.

The people in power at Rocky Boy watch out more for family members than the rest of their constituents, he said.

"We're all the same, but on the other hand we're not the same. They discriminate against me because of my name. It's an unfair system," Top Sky said.

"You see it going on even more," he added. "They fund certain people for higher education. Housing's the same way. It's all on the shoulders of the boards and who sits on the boards, but the tribal council?"

"It probably exists," Windy Boy said when asked about Top Sky's comments. "I'm in a position of power, and I try not to conduct business as such. I do whatever it takes to try to help people. I go out of my way to help people.

"If it exists, the constituents would know more than anybody," he added.

The discrimination continues outside of the reservation's border, Top Sky said.

"We seem to be targeted more than anyone else at the city level," he said. "We're always in the paper. We get pulled over more often."

Havre police Lt. Russ Ostwalt said today that Native Americans and other minorities are not targeted by the department.

"There's nothing like that going on here," Ostwalt said. "We have two Native Americans on our Police Department and three females."

Any complaints of that nature are taken seriously, he said, and investigated within the department. Officers receive training on such issues at the state academy and continue their education while employed, he added.

Discrimination is not limited to local government employees, Top Sky said.

"I see it almost every day," he said. "I never said anything. I used to absorb it and leave. I think a lot of the people out here are that way."

Windy Boy said area residents need to cooperate, regardless of their differences.

"We need to continue to move forward collaboratively," he said. "We're not going anywhere, and Havre isn't going anywhere."

Also, Indians contribute a significant amount of dollars toward Havre's economy, and that needs to be acknowledged, he said.

"The level of dollars that Rocky Boy and Fort Belknap bring to (Havre) needs to be recognized," Windy Boy said. "Otherwise, a lot of people are going to start going to Great Falls."

Hill County Commissioner Mike Anderson, a Havre native, said racism is not a widespread problem.

"There are small factions on both sides of the issue, but generally I think that most people aren't discriminatory against other minorities," Anderson said.

He said the mediator had "quite a list" of people to talk to in and around Havre.

"She just wanted to get everybody's input," Anderson said. "She'll see what commonalities there are and come up with some ideas on what can be done to help."

DOJ_NMG_0002105

Havre Area Chamber of Commerce executive director Debbie Vandeberg said the chamber board met with the mediator Wednesday and is keeping the dialogue confidential.

Rice said the chamber has a new idea regarding possible solutions to the issue and may not go forward with resurrecting the defunct Native American Affairs Committee, which consisted of representatives of local and tribal governments, business leaders and community members when it was created 10 years ago. It stopped meeting about six years ago, and Vandeberg, city officials and tribal council members have said they want to revive it.

Vandeberg said the board is making a decision about the status of the committee today. She would not comment further.

Racial Mediator Visits Havre (GFT)

By JARED MILLER, Tribune Regional Reporter

Great Falls (MT) Tribune, August 4, 2005

HAVRE — Officials in Havre and on the Rocky Boy's Reservation are hopeful that a federal mediator visiting this week will help ease racial tensions, but some area residents said the battle against racism will be a tough fight.

Grace Sage, a mediator from the U.S. Justice Department Community Relations Service, interviewed Havre Mayor Bob Rice and some City Council members Wednesday morning. She met briefly on Tuesday with the Chippewa-Cree Business Committee at the nearby Rocky Boy's Reservation.

Sage declined to be interviewed by the press. Community Relations Service Director Sharee Freeman in Washington, D.C., said confidentiality and the mediation process prohibit her from releasing details about Sage's itinerary.

The Community Relations Service is the federal "peacemaker" in conflicts involving matters of race, color or national origin. It was created under the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Sage first visited Havre in June. That trip came in the wake of a report by University of Montana journalism students describing examples of shoddy treatment Indians receives in Havre.

The report included quotes from a clothing store employee who pays extra attention to Indian shoppers to prevent theft. A bartender explained how to tell between a "good Indian" and a "bad Indian" by the way they dress and carry themselves.

Fearing the report might spur retaliation against Indians, concerned citizens contacted the Department of Justice.

Mayor Rice spoke with the mediator for about 20 minutes. He said afterward that he's glad she came to Havre.

"I told her that I was pretty much ashamed of the criticism," Rice said. "I said we have bad people on both sides here, and we do."

Rice also stands firm on his conviction that the UM report was a "highly slanted" account and said he's "deeply hurt by it."

"This is a good community," Rice said. "I think it's unfortunate that this had to come out the way it did."

Rice met with the Chippewa-Cree Business Committee after UM published the report to talk about race issues. He subsequently accepted an invitation to speak at the Rocky Boy Powwow this weekend.

Sage met with the Chippewa-Cree Business Committee on Tuesday, council Chairman John Chance Houle said.

The visit was cut short because Sage was not listed on the agenda, and the council had a full schedule that day, Houle said.

The council later appointed Councilman Jonathan Windy Boy to represent the reservation in future meetings between the Indian and non-Indian leaders, Houle said.

In an interview earlier this week, Windy Boy, who also is a state legislator, said the effort to address racism in Havre is "long overdue."

"I know there has been attempts in the past, but it's something that's needed to get better coordination on the local level," said Windy Boy, who is hopeful that the mediator will achieve results.

Some Havre-area residents interviewed Wednesday were less optimistic that the mediator could help bridge what they see as a formidable racial divide.

Jerrad Gomke, a non-Indian who lives west of Havre, acknowledged that racism against Indians exists in Havre. He doesn't think efforts by the mediator will help.

DOJ_NMG_0002106

"I think she (the mediator) knows what she's going to find — that there is some racism because we live so close to the reservation," Gomke said. "It will just blow over once she leaves."

Beulah Branson, a Frazer-area resident shopping in Havre on Wednesday, said she's also skeptical.

"I think it's fine if they want to try. I don't know how much good it will do," said Branson, who is white. "Surfacely, there might be some change."

Dolores Stump, a tribal member from the nearby Fort Belknap Reservation, said she doubts Indians will ever fully escape racist treatment in Havre. She doesn't think mediation will help.

"It's always been racist up here," said Stump, who shops in Havre about twice a month. "There's certain places you can't go to eat. It's always going to be."

Meanwhile, the Havre Area Chamber of Commerce was set to meet Wednesday night to consider its response to the charges of racism by local businesses.

The chamber initially planned to revive a Native American Affairs Committee, which was created in the 1990s to address similar race issues. It's unclear if that will now occur.

"They are formalizing some alternatives that sound pretty good," Chamber Executive Director Debbie Vandeberg said.

Voting Rights Act: Renewal Of Good Faith (AJC)

By Bob Kemper In Washington, Tom Baxter In Atlanta, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, August 5, 2005

Supporters and critics of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 agree on just one thing: It worked.

The law was adopted amid the violence and bloodshed of the civil rights movement to abolish racism at the ballot box and guarantee black Americans the right to vote.

Black voter turnout since then has varied with the perceived importance of each election, and the last two presidential elections set records for minority participation. Meanwhile, the number of African-Americans elected to public office has increased sixfold.

Key provisions of the Voting Rights Act are up for reauthorization in 2007, though with its 40th anniversary Saturday, the act is already the subject of intense congressional maneuvering. The Rev. Jesse Jackson will lead a march in Atlanta on the anniversary and has launched a national petition drive to urge the White House to extend the provisions of the law.

"We know there's a scheme afoot to make the Voting Rights Act invalid by rebooting the Supreme Court," Jackson said Thursday at a news conference in Atlanta on plans for the march. "We deserve better."

Political posturing

There is talk in Congress of strong bipartisan support for renewing the act, but political tensions remain that may well boil over into a raucous showdown.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean is using the reauthorization effort to portray Republicans as intolerant and to mobilize Democrats to retake the House and Senate in next year's elections. Dean has accused Republicans of "hypocrisy" if they don't support the voting rights act.

But Abigail Thernstrom, vice-chairwoman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and an opponent of reauthorization, argues that Republicans have if anything been timid in avoiding a battle over the issue.

Republican congressional leaders, including House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, have tried to blunt Democratic attacks by publicly praising the act and, at one point, suggesting they might reauthorize it before 2007, possibly in time for the 2006 election campaigns.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday the administration looked forward to working on the reauthorization.

Yet racial and partisan tensions over the issue erupted Wednesday in a Fulton County Commission meeting when Commissioner Emma Darnell introduced a resolution in favor of reauthorization. The four black Democrats on the County Commission voted for it; the three white Republicans, including Chairwoman Karen Handel, voted against.

Not without controversy

DOJ_NMG_0002107

While several provisions of the Voting Rights Act are up for reauthorization, the one most likely to spark controversy is Section 5. It requires nine states — including Georgia — and parts of seven others, each with a long history of discrimination at the ballot box before 1965, to get the approval of the federal government before enacting any changes in their electoral laws. That includes alterations in the boundaries of congressional districts and moving a polling station.

If a congressional battle develops, it could be led by Southern Republicans, some of whom argue the restrictions should either be dropped or be applied to all states.

Brian Robinson, spokesman for Rep. Lynn Westmoreland, (R-Ga.), said, "The congressman feels quite strongly that Section 5 should apply to every state in the nation or it should apply to none of them."

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) took the same position in his 2004 election campaign and said last week he sticks by it.

Need for Section 5?

The Reagan administration raised similar concerns in 1982 when the act was last reauthorized, saying Section 5 had outlived its usefulness and was an unnecessary intrusion by the federal government into state matters.

"Section 5, which was very controversial even in 1965, was intended as a temporary provision, really only to last five years, until this 'emergency' had passed," said Edward Blum of the Center for Equal Opportunity, a conservative think tank. "To say that we still have that emergency or even the shadow of that emergency in 2005 really stretches where race relations really are in this country today."

While they boast of the act's positive impact, those who want Section 5 renewed cite allegations of intimidation of traditionally Democratic black voters in the 2000 and 2004 elections.

"In some quarters there have been deliberate, systemic efforts to suppress minority voters," said Rep. John Lewis, an Atlanta Democrat whose beating by police on the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Ala., in 1965 helped spark adoption of the Voting Rights Act a few months later.

"That reminds me of the Old South," said Lewis, who will join Saturday's march in Atlanta.

Democrats advocating the reauthorization of key sections of the act said they hoped to pass it with bipartisan support. Congressional Republicans, following President Bush's lead in courting black voters, pledged to lead the way.

Rep. Mel Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, said he was working with Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, to ensure that nothing is done to weaken the act.

Kennedy, Specter allies

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said he and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, would co-sponsor the reauthorization bill this fall to ensure support for it on both sides of the aisle.

Frist, a Tennessee Republican, after a congressional pilgrimage to Selma and Montgomery led by Lewis last year, said he was moved to introduce a measure that would make the Voting Rights Act permanent.

Some civil rights lawyers are suspicious and said the changes suggested by Republicans could lead to the act being ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

The act focuses on race, so federal law requires that a clear record of discrimination be established in jurisdictions covered by the act and that those jurisdictions be strictly monitored.

Civil rights lawyers said it would be impossible to establish evidence of discrimination in all states. So if the law is expanded and made permanent, they said, the Supreme Court is likely to strike it down.

"It's a Trojan Horse," said Theodore Shaw of the NAACP's Legal Defense and Educational Fund. "It sounds like a good idea [but] it is a threat."

Thernstrom, who has written extensively against the reauthorization of the act, said a court challenge is likely if Section 5 is extended, because it was originally intended as a temporary measure, and conditions have changed dramatically since 1965.

ID requirement reviewed

Because of the Voting Rights Act, Georgia had to have its recently redrawn congressional districts approved by the Justice Department before they could be made permanent.

DOJ_NMG_0002108

The federal government is now reviewing a Georgia law that would require voters to present a photo ID to cast their ballots. The law must pass muster with the federal governement even though it has been adopted by the state Legislature and signed by the governor.

Fulton County officials invoked the Voting Rights Act this year in an effort to prevent Sandy Springs from becoming a city, saying it would hurt black people living in other parts of the county. The federal government disagreed and allowed Sandy Springs to incorporate.

The Voting Rights Act re-emerges on Capitol Hill at a time when African-American participation in national elections has reached near-record levels — despite charges that minority voters have been prevented from voting or had their votes discounted in certain places.

The Civil Rights Project at Harvard University, an organization devoted to civil rights research, found after the 2000 presidential election that nearly 2 million votes were not counted and that a disproportionately high number of those came from predominantly black counties.

Civil rights groups around the country reported during the 2004 campaign that black voters were receiving letters and phone calls falsely telling them they were ineligible to vote. Polling stations in predominantly minority precincts reported a shortage of voting machines, and in some cases polls closed while people were waiting in line to vote.

Despite those obstacles, nearly 54 percent of registered black voters cast ballots in 2000 and more than 56 percent in 2004, according to census figures.

Staff writer Add Seymour Jr. contributed to this article.

40 Years Later, Black Electorate Still Has Long Way To Go (CLE/KRT)

By Amanda Ruggeri

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - When President Lyndon B. Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act, he sought to banish hurdles that kept African-Americans from voting - and, as he told Congress, that barred them from "the full blessings of American life."

The act, amended three times and up for renewal in 2007, remains one of the key pieces of legislation for racial equality. Because it banned discriminatory practices, long gone are the literacy tests and violence that once threatened blacks at the polls.

But on the eve of the act's 40th anniversary on Saturday, not everyone agrees that it has banished discrimination from the voting booth. Turnout rates for black voters still lag behind those of whites, and blacks remain represented at disproportionately low rates by black officials. Cases of attempted voter disenfranchisement have been documented as recently as the last presidential election.

Given the facts, experts and legislators agree, the federal law was a major steppingstone for equality. But minorities still have a long way to go.

"The Voting Rights Act enabled black people, generally, to be able to register and cast their vote without fear of bodily harm or economic pressures," said former Rep. Bill Clay, D-Mo., a civil rights activist who lobbied Congress to pass the act.

"The fear now is that there is lack of enforcement," said Clay, who in 1968 became the first African-American from Missouri elected to Congress. He retired in 2000.

Kenneth Warren, a political scientist at St. Louis University, agreed that many obstacles still exist for minority voters. As a frequent expert witness at court hearings on voting practices, Warren said discrimination, at least in subtle forms, still pervades politics.

In Ohio in the election last year, for example, voting machines were transferred out of Columbus and into the suburbs. As a result, residents of areas heavily populated by minorities had to wait up to 10 hours to vote, whereas people from more affluent, Republican-leaning regions had little trouble voting.

In a speech Tuesday on the Voting Rights Act, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said 124 election fraud investigations are going on nationwide and dozens of other cases have been closed after investigation. That shows, he said, that enforcing the act is a priority of the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0002109

"The president has directed the full power and might of the Justice Department to enforce the Voting Rights Act," he said. "Our goal is to make voting easier and cheating harder."

Despite violations, experts and politicians agree that the Voting Rights Act's positive effect cannot be denied, particularly in the South.

After the passage in 1870 of the 15th Amendment to the Constitution, guaranteeing every citizen's right to vote regardless of race, many Southern states passed strict voter qualification laws. Literacy tests and poll taxes became commonplace. Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., said it was nearly impossible to vote in the South unless you were white.

He cited one occasion in which a man was asked to give the number of bubbles in a bar of soap. Another time, he said, poll officials targeted a black man in Alabama who happened to hold a doctorate in philosophical theology. "He failed the so-called literacy test," said Lewis, a longtime civil rights activist. "He was told he could not read or write well enough."

Statistics from before and after the Voting Rights Act's passage show significant changes in black political participation, particularly in the South. In the 1964 presidential election, Southern blacks voted 15 percent less than their counterparts in the North. But by last year, the difference was negligible, with some Southern states - including Alabama, Kentucky and South Carolina - exceeding the national black turnout rate of 56.3 percent.

Nationwide, the number of black elected officials has jumped from 1,469 in 1970, the first year the information was collected, to a high of 9,101 in 2001.

Despite the increase of black officials, blacks still make up only 2 percent of all elected officials in the nation. And voters from other minority groups still struggle as well, said Rep. Robert Menendez, D-N.J.

Menendez, along with many other legislators, is already strategizing for the act's extension in 2007. He said one of the most important goals of extension is the reauthorization of key provisions, such as the one that provides assistance to communities proficient in a language other than English.

"One citizen unfairly discouraged from voting is one too many," Menendez said.

Speaking at the Lyndon B. Johnson Memorial Library in Austin, Texas, Gonzales said the Bush administration looks forward to working with Congress on the act's extension, and particularly with regard to minority language provisions.

In his book "Freedom is Not Enough: Black Voters, Black Candidates, and American Presidential Politics," political analyst Ronald Walters says one particular statistic shows how much further minorities have to go to reach parity with whites: According to census figures, the highest turnout of black voters was 58.5 percent. That record was set in 1964, a year before the Voting Rights Act was passed.

The statistic is little-known. It is also contested by political scientists like Warren, who say that because census figures rely on citizens' own reporting of whether they voted, the numbers are often inflated.

But Walters said the census remains the most accurate way of determining voter turnout. Furthermore, he said, the number is less surprising within the context of the 1964 election. President John F. Kennedy had just been assassinated, and Johnson promised to carry on his legacy of civil rights. Americans overwhelmingly responded, turning out to the polls in record numbers. Because no election since has been quite so emotional, neither whites nor blacks have reached that level of political participation again.

Lewis agreed that the events of 1964 pulled blacks to the polls, despite formidable barriers.

"There was a feeling, I think, more than anything else, that people had to go out and vote like they'd never voted before," Lewis said. "And there is this need in America - and not just in the African-American community, but among all Americans - to bring us back to this point again."

In the last election, the population came close. Fifty-six percent of eligible African-Americans voted, along with 60 percent of whites.

Walters said the election last year was especially impressive because it showed the decrease in the disparity between white and black voter turnout. Even in 1964, the gap was nearly 13 percentage points, with nearly 71 percent of eligible white voters flocking to the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0002110

The question, Walters said, is whether African-Americans will realize their full potential as a political bloc. As he celebrates the anniversary of one of the biggest steps toward that potential, he said he encourages African-Americans to strategize for the future.

"We've voted, we've done well," he said. "But now, how do we get more power out of this vote?"

For Miss. Town, Voting Law Helped (USAT)

By Melanie Eversley

USA Today, August 5, 2005

KILMICHAEL, Miss. — For years, black residents here grumbled about bad roads and poor municipal services in their part of town, but they didn't count on the all-white governing board for much help.

Then came the local elections of 2001, when an unprecedented number of African-American candidates brought Kilmichael, population 830, to the cusp of a historic change in leadership. Three weeks before the election, however, the town's mayor and five-member Board of Aldermen canceled the elections.

The Justice Department, calling the move a violation of the Voting Rights Act, stepped in. Two years later, Kilmichael finally voted — and elected its first black mayor, along with three black aldermen.

The episode was a reminder of how the Voting Rights Act — which hits its 40th anniversary Saturday — remains a hedge against discriminatory election practices long after the civil-rights battles in the South. Now, with key parts of the act due to expire in 2007, a debate is building over how far America has come in ensuring racial equality and whether protections for minority voters should be renewed or changed.

The Voting Rights Act requires jurisdictions in 16 states with past discrimination problems, mostly in the South, to have changes in voting rules cleared by the Justice Department or a federal judge. The impact of that part of the law, called Section 5, can be seen in the dramatic increases in registered voters and officeholders among minorities since the mid-1960s.

Two other provisions are up for renewal. One allows the U.S. government to send poll observers to jurisdictions where there have been alleged voting-rights violations. The other provision, added in 1975 in response to the rising number of Latino voters, requires bilingual ballots and language assistance in areas with large numbers of residents who do not speak English.

There appears to be widespread support in Congress for renewing the act, and the White House has expressed support for it. Still, lively debates are likely when the Senate Judiciary Committee begins hearings on it in September.

Democrats such as Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Rep. Raul Grijalva of Arizona are pushing for a stronger law. Among other things, they cite complaints about a lack of voting machines in heavily minority precincts in Ohio during the 2004 elections, and alleged voting irregularities in Florida four years earlier that they say wrongly kept some blacks off of voter registration lists.

The Senate panel also is likely to consider proposals to make it more difficult for governments to concentrate minorities in single voting districts, thereby reducing their power.

“My hope is that there would be strong bipartisan support for renewal,” said Barbara Arnwine, executive director for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

So far, the chief critics of renewing the act have been conservative groups such as the Center for Equal Opportunity, and a few Republicans such as Abigail Thernstrom of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. They say the law was needed at a time when poll taxes and literacy tests often were used to keep blacks from voting in the South, but no longer.

In Kilmichael, the new era of leadership now is a mix of old and new. Mary McCaskill Young, who became the town's first black mayor when she beat incumbent Tommy Rushing in the special election in 2003, lost to Rushing in the town's general election in June. And a black alderman did not seek re-election. There now are two blacks on the Board of Aldermen.

Rushing rejects the notion that white town officials canceled the 2001 election because it appeared that blacks would win elections. He says officials merely wanted to switch from a system in which board members were elected at-large, to one in which voters would choose only a representative for their district.

DOJ_NMG_0002111

The town didn't reschedule the election, and the Justice Department forced it to hold one in 2003 in which aldermen were elected from districts. Jewel Harrison, chairman of the local Democratic Party, says the U.S. government's use of the Voting Rights Act helped ensure equality in Kilmichael.

"I think it put everyone on notice that you just can't do things and get away with it," he said.

Increasingly, Voting Rights Act probes stem from complaints by Latinos, who make up about 14% of the U.S. population and are the nation's fastest-growing ethnic group. (Blacks make up about 12.8%.)

The eastern Pennsylvania city of Reading, long known for its German immigrant population, has attracted a growing number of Latinos. Some families came from Puerto Rico and Mexico in the 1930s and 1940s to work for mushroom growers and steel mills. More recently, many have moved from New York. In the 2000 Census, 37.3% of Reading's nearly 81,000 residents were Latino, up from 18.5% in 1990.

In Reading, there have been complaints about Spanish-speaking residents being harassed at the polls, and accusations that they have been turned away or belittled if they could not read ballot directions or speak English fluently. In 2003, the Justice Department accused Berks County, Pa., of discriminating against Spanish-speaking voters.

Some parts of the Voting Rights Act cited in the Berks County case apply only to people from Puerto Rico and do not expire in 2007. But they are similar to the language provision that is up for renewal.

In 2003, Justice ordered examiners to monitor county elections through June 2007. The county also must provide bilingual election materials, interpreters and other aids for Spanish-speaking voters.

Berks County Commissioner Mark Scott opposed the order. He said his family members from Germany did not need the kind of help that Justice has ordered for Latinos.

"People are capable of a lot more than they are giving themselves credit for," he said.

Those on both sides of the debate say clashes such as the one in Reading are more likely as the nation's demographics change. "I fully support the (Justice Department) coming in," said Jonathan Encarnacion of Centro Hispano, a community group in Reading. "It was something that had to be brought to the surface."

EDITORIAL NOTEBOOK Keep The Voting Rights Act (AAS)

Austin American-Statesman, August 5, 2005

In these early years of the 21st century, it's difficult to comprehend how thoroughly and systematically minorities, especially African Americans, were once denied the right to vote.

In the South, blacks faced poll taxes and literacy tests designed to keep them from voting. Denying and suppressing the minority vote was politics as usual in many southern states, racial discrimination on a national scale.

President Lyndon B. Johnson changed that political landscape forever when he signed the Voting Rights Act of 1965 into law 40 years ago Saturday. Since that day, the act has served as a weapon against discrimination and a reminder of an ugly period in American life.

Even after 40 years, the act is no mere symbol. As U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales noted in a speech in Austin earlier this week, enforcing the Voting Rights Act is a priority at the Justice Department. He said 124 election fraud investigations are ongoing.

Key enforcement provisions in the act are up for reauthorization by Congress in 2007. One of those provisions requires southern states (including Texas) to get Justice Department approval before changing electoral procedures or boundaries. Another requires foreign language ballots in certain districts with large numbers of non-English speakers.

Congress should reauthorize those provisions when they expire. They are still necessary, still being enforced. Four decades hasn't erased all the vestiges of racism and discrimination in the South, and election miscarriages are still a problem. But reauthorization has run into political trouble. The creation of secure political districts protected by the Voting Rights Act vastly increased the number of minority elected officials locally, statewide and nationally.

It also gave rise to Republican majorities and increased Republican power in the South and in Washington. Texas, for example, has solid black and Hispanic congressional districts, but no Democrat in statewide office.

DOJ_NMG_0002112

Reauthorization carries other consequences. A push to make it apply nationally, and not just in the southern states, could doom it to failure in Congress. And attempts to strengthen it to ensure that minority districts are maintained could keep the GOP in power indefinitely.

Political wrangling, however, shouldn't undo the good that was done 40 years ago when the act became law. Its enforcement provisions should be reauthorized by Congress, lest America forget a painful lesson.

Repaying Segregation's Debt (WP)

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

More than most southern states, Virginia has surmounted its segregationist past, not least by becoming, in 1989, the first state to elect an African American governor, L. Douglas Wilder. (Mr. Wilder is now mayor of Richmond, capital of the old Confederacy.) This year the commonwealth has struck another blow to repudiate a unique event in U.S. history and one of segregation's worst chapters: the decision to close some Virginia public schools rather than comply with court-ordered integration after the Supreme Court's 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education . In recent months, dozens of black Virginians, mostly in their fifties and sixties, have been granted the first state scholarships, up to $5,500 each, to get what they were denied five decades ago: a public education.

The scholarships, which follow a resolution by the General Assembly two years ago expressing its "profound regret" at the school closings, do not heal the wounds inflicted by what was then known in Virginia as its policy of "massive resistance" to integration.

In southern Virginia's Prince Edward County, the most zealously anti-segregationist jurisdiction of the day, many black children went unschooled from 1959 to 1963, and some never got to resume their education; others attended makeshift lessons in churches or were sent far away to live with relatives or even strangers so they could continue going to school. Shortchanged by the state, they were unprepared for higher education and certain jobs and careers they might otherwise have had.

Nothing that Virginia can do will fully compensate for that disgraceful episode. Still, the scholarships are an appropriate and admirable act of contrition. As Gov. Mark R. Warner said, "This at least goes a partial way to [repay] the debt we owe to these folks." Even some whites will be eligible for the scholarships; as children they were also denied an education, being unable to afford the private academy established to serve them after the public schools were closed. More than 80 people, many of them still residents of Prince Edward, have already received scholarships for high school or college courses; several thousand more are eligible to apply. John Kluge, a Charlottesville media baron and philanthropist, has matched the state's own $1 million appropriation to fund the scholarship program.

If there is an inspirational note to this story, it belongs to Ken Woodley, the crusading editor of the Farmville Herald in Prince Edward County, who almost single-handedly conceived the idea of scholarships, campaigned for it in print and personally urged it on Mr. Warner and hesitant lawmakers.

In 1959, Mr. Woodley's own newspaper led the local chorus of opposition to integration, denouncing it as a communist plot against racial purity and the American way. Now the newspaper, under the same family ownership, has backed Mr. Woodley, and the state scholarships, to the hilt. That is a measure of Virginia's progress, and a credit to it.

Court Rules UT Can Block Dating E-Mails (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, August 5, 2005

(AP) - AUSTIN, Texas-The University of Texas didn't violate the free-speech rights of an online dating service when it blocked thousands of unsolicited e-mails, a federal appeals court says.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals also found that although White Buffalo Ventures LLC, which operates LonghornSingles.com, complied with the requirements of the federal anti-spam law, known as CAN-SPAM, the university can still set its own anti-spam policy.

White Buffalo had sued the university over 59,000 messages blocked by spam filters in 2003. The Austin-based service had legally obtained the addresses from UT but the university blocked the e-mail messages, saying White Buffalo was part of a larger spam problem that had crashed the computer system.

The university said it was also responding to complaints from students and faculty.

DOJ_NMG_0002113

The court, in a ruling Tuesday, determined that White Buffalo complied with federal law and that its e-mails were not illegal. However, CAN-SPAM does not supersede protection measures employed by an Internet service provider, and the court interpreted ISPs to include the university.

Leading Republican Differs With Bush On Evolution (WP/REU)

By Jon Hurdle, Reuters

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

PHILADELPHIA (Reuters) - A leading Republican senator allied with the religious right differed on Thursday with President Bush's support for teaching an alternative to the theory of evolution known as "intelligent design."

Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, a possible 2008 presidential contender who faces a tough re-election fight next year in Pennsylvania, said intelligent design, which is backed by many religious conservatives, lacked scientific credibility and should not be taught in science classes.

Bush told reporters from Texas on Monday that "both sides" in the debate over intelligent design and evolution should be taught in schools "so people can understand what the debate is about."

"I think I would probably tailor that a little more than what the president has suggested," Santorum, the third-ranking Republican member of the U.S. Senate, told National Public Radio. "I'm not comfortable with intelligent design being taught in the science classroom."

Evangelical Christians have launched campaigns in at least 18 states to make public schools teach intelligent design alongside Charles Darwin's theory of evolution.

Proponents of intelligent design argue that nature is so complex that it could not have occurred by random natural selection, as held by Darwin's 1859 theory of evolution, and so must be the work of an unnamed "intelligent cause."

Santorum is the third-ranking member of the U.S. Senate and has championed causes of the religious right including opposition to gay marriage and abortion.

He is expected to face a stiff challenge from Democrat Bob Casey in his quest for re-election next year in Pennsylvania, a major battleground state in recent presidential elections.

The controversy over intelligent design is a hot topic in Pennsylvania, where the Dover Area School District in south central Pennsylvania has included the theory in its biology curriculum.

The American Civil Liberties Union has sued to block the policy, calling it a violation of the constitutional separation of church and state.

Most Americans believe that God created human beings or guided the process of evolution, according to a CBS poll last November. Two-thirds said they wanted creationism taught alongside evolution in schools.

SCIENCE CURRICULUM

Critics, including many science teachers, say intelligent design cannot be scientifically tested and has no place in a science curriculum.

Santorum sided in part with intelligent-design proponents in saying that there were gaps in the theory of evolution.

"What we should be teaching are the problems and holes -- and I think there are legitimate problems and holes -- in the theory of evolution. What we need to do is to present those fairly, from a scientific point of view," he said in the interview.

"As far as intelligent design is concerned, I really don't believe it has risen to the level of a scientific theory at this point that we would want to teach it alongside of evolution."

Santorum had proposed an unsuccessful measure in 2001 that would have required discussing the "controversy" of evolution when the theory is taught in classes.

Bush's science adviser, John Marburger, was quoted in The New York Times this week as saying intelligent design was not a scientific concept, and that Bush's remarks should be interpreted to mean he thinks the concept should be taught as part of the "social context" in science classes.

Design For Confusion (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

I'd like to nominate Irving Kristol, the neoconservative former editor of The Public Interest, as the father of "intelligent design." No, he didn't play any role in developing the doctrine. But he is the father of the political strategy that lies behind the intelligent design movement - a strategy that has been used with great success by the economic right and has now been adopted by the religious right.

Back in 1978 Mr. Kristol urged corporations to make "philanthropic contributions to scholars and institutions who are likely to advocate preservation of a strong private sector." That was delicately worded, but the clear implication was that corporations that didn't like the results of academic research, however valid, should support people willing to say something more to their liking.

Mr. Kristol led by example, using The Public Interest to promote supply-side economics, a doctrine whose central claim - that tax cuts have such miraculous positive effects on the economy that they pay for themselves - has never been backed by evidence. He would later concede, or perhaps boast, that he had a "cavalier attitude toward the budget deficit."

"Political effectiveness was the priority," he wrote in 1995, "not the accounting deficiencies of government."

Corporations followed his lead, pouring a steady stream of money into think tanks that created a sort of parallel intellectual universe, a world of "scholars" whose careers are based on toeing an ideological line, rather than on doing research that stands up to scrutiny by their peers.

You might have thought that a strategy of creating doubt about inconvenient research results could work only in soft fields like economics. But it turns out that the strategy works equally well when deployed against the hard sciences.

The most spectacular example is the campaign to discredit research on global warming. Despite an overwhelming scientific consensus, many people have the impression that the issue is still unresolved. This impression reflects the assiduous work of conservative think tanks, which produce and promote skeptical reports that look like peer-reviewed research, but aren't. And behind it all lies lavish financing from the energy industry, especially ExxonMobil.

There are several reasons why fake research is so effective. One is that nonscientists sometimes find it hard to tell the difference between research and advocacy - if it's got numbers and charts in it, doesn't that make it science?

Even when reporters do know the difference, the conventions of he-said-she-said journalism get in the way of conveying that knowledge to readers. I once joked that if President Bush said that the Earth was flat, the headlines of news articles would read, "Opinions Differ on Shape of the Earth." The headlines on many articles about the intelligent design controversy come pretty close.

Finally, the self-policing nature of science - scientific truth is determined by peer review, not public opinion - can be exploited by skilled purveyors of cultural resentment. Do virtually all biologists agree that Darwin was right? Well, that just shows that they're elitists who think they're smarter than the rest of us.

Which brings us, finally, to intelligent design. Some of America's most powerful politicians have a deep hatred for Darwinism. Tom DeLay, the House majority leader, blamed the theory of evolution for the Columbine school shootings. But sheer political power hasn't been enough to get creationism into the school curriculum. The theory of evolution has overwhelming scientific support, and the country isn't ready - yet - to teach religious doctrine in public schools.

But what if creationists do to evolutionary theory what corporate interests did to global warming: create a widespread impression that the scientific consensus has shaky foundations?

Creationists failed when they pretended to be engaged in science, not religious indoctrination: "creation science" was too crude to fool anyone. But intelligent design, which spreads doubt about evolution without being too overtly religious, may succeed where creation science failed.

The important thing to remember is that like supply-side economics or global-warming skepticism, intelligent design doesn't have to attract significant support from actual researchers to be effective. All it has to do is create confusion, to make it seem as if there really is a controversy about the validity of evolutionary theory. That, together with the political muscle of the religious right, may be enough to start a process that ends with banishing Darwin from the classroom.

Bill Easing Rules On Pill Is Vetoed By Pataki (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0002115

By Al Baker

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

ALBANY, Aug. 4 - As promised earlier this week, Gov. George E. Pataki vetoed a bill on Thursday that would have made the so-called morning-after pill available to women and girls without a prescription. The veto came just hours after the State Assembly delivered the bill to his desk.

Proponents of the emergency contraception bill, including abortion-rights advocates, most Democrats and some leading Republican colleagues of the governor, had urged him to sign the bill, saying it would help prevent more than 80,000 abortions in New York each year. Opponents of the bill, particularly conservatives, pointed out that its main flaw was that minors would have access to the drug, which prevents pregnancy after sex.

In his veto message, the governor emphasized that his main concern was that the measure would not prevent minors from getting the drug before they consulted a doctor or other medical professional. He said his veto was "based solely on a desire to protect the health and safety of our youngest and most vulnerable women."

He also named other concerns: that the bill did not limit purchases to a single dose and that men could buy it and use it to persuade young girls to have unprotected sex.

The governor also struck a conciliatory note, underlining his support for making emergency contraception available, and he stressed that he would work on a revised bill for the State Legislature to pass when it returns to Albany. "We can do better," Mr. Pataki said in his message. "We can increase women's access to emergency contraception while protecting our children."

Many supporters of the bill said Mr. Pataki's veto amounted to political opportunism, since he has long been a supporter of abortion rights but is now exploring the possibility of a bid for the Republican presidential nomination. Aides to the governor have repeatedly disputed that notion.

"I think it's lousy," Kelli M. Conlin, executive director of Naral Pro-Choice New York, said of the veto. "I think he did the wrong thing; it was politically motivated, and the only thing that gives us solace is that women are eventually going to have access to this important pregnancy prevention tool. It's either going to be through the F.D.A. or a new administration in Albany, but we will win."

Proponents have said that women need to get the pill quickly enough for it to be effective on weekends, when seeing a doctor can be difficult. JoAnn M. Smith, president of Family Planning Advocates of New York State, said young people "are the people who need it most."

Senator Nicholas A. Spano, a Westchester County Republican who sponsored the bill, said he was encouraged that "the governor is indicating his support of the concept," and said he understood the governor's concerns about minors. He said he was committed to reducing the number of abortions in New York and thought there was hope of reaching agreement with the governor. "I don't think any of those are fatal problems," Mr. Spano said of the governor's veto message.

Pataki Vetoes Morning-After Pill Bill (AJC/AP)

By Marc Humbert, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, August 5, 2005

ALBANY, N.Y. — Republican Gov. George Pataki vetoed legislation Thursday that would have allowed pharmacists to dispense the so-called "morning-after pill" without prescriptions.

Pataki, who had announced Sunday that he would veto the measure, said he was most upset that the bill did not require minors to see a physician.

"We can do better," said the governor, who pledged to work with sponsors of the legislation to come up with a proposal he would sign.

Advocates for the bill have said they believe Pataki, with an eye on seeking the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, is using the veto to appeal to conservatives.

"This was driven by politics," said Kelli Conlin, executive director of the New York chapter of National Abortion Rights Action League.

DOJ_NMG_0002116

The morning-after pill contains a higher dose of regular contraception hormones. It prevents pregnancy by delaying a woman's ovulation or preventing fertilization. It also can thin the lining of the uterus, making it difficult for a fertilized egg to implant. Anti-abortion groups see interfering with a fertilized egg as abortion.

The Food and Drug Administration plans to decide by Sept. 1 whether the morning-after pill can be sold without a doctor's prescription. Seven states already permit over-the-counter sales.

Emergency contraceptives can reduce the chance of pregnancy by 89 percent if taken within 72 hours of intercourse, and supporters said making them available without a prescription would help more women get the pills in time.

"As we all know, accidents don't happen during doctors' office hours," Adrienne Verrilli of the Sexuality Information and Education Council said. "They occur at night and on weekends when doctors are difficult to reach."

The governor said he wanted a limit on the number of pills that could be dispensed at one time and did not want men to be able to get them, as would have been permitted under the vetoed legislation.

He also said the bill should require patients getting the morning-after pill to receive counseling on the health risks of unprotected sex.

"I know that there are many New Yorkers who sincerely disagree with this position, and I respect and appreciate their views. But my action today is based solely on a desire to protect the health and safety of our youngest and most vulnerable women."

Republican Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who also is eyeing the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, vetoed similar legislation last month.

ANTITRUST:

Lucent Subpoenaed In Antitrust Probe (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Lucent Technologies Inc. Thursday said it received two subpoenas related to federal investigations into potential antitrust violations and sales of telecommunications equipment to the federal government.

The telecom-equipment vendor said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that one of the subpoenas it received related to an investigation by the Department of Justice into potential antitrust and other violations in connection with the federal E-Rate program.

Lucent said the subpoena requires the company to produce documents before a grand jury of the U.S. District Court in Georgia.

The Murray Hill, N.J., company said the other subpoena was from the Office of Inspector General, General Services Administration, and relates to a federal investigation into certain sales to the federal government of telecommunications equipment and associated maintenance services.

Lucent said it received both subpoenas during the three months ended June 30.

As previously reported, the Justice Department has announced that several companies have been indicted for defrauding the federal E-rate program that dispenses billions of dollars in subsidies for Internet and telecom service in schools and libraries.

The $2.25 billion-a-year E-Rate program is funded by the Universal Service Fund, which is paid for through fees levied on telecom companies. E-Rate is run by Universal Service Administrative Co., which was set up by the Federal Communications Commission.

The fraud schemes alleged by the Justice Department occurred between 1998 and 2003. Charges range from scheming to defraud the FCC and Universal Service Administrative by including the cost of noncovered equipment and fees with those covered by the program to rigging of bids.

Avaya Inc., which was spun off from Lucent in 2000, said in May that it received a subpoena to produce documents for the period from 1997 to 2005 before a grand jury of the U.S. District Court in South Carolina relating to an investigation of potential antitrust violations in connection with the E-Rate program.

DOJ_NMG_0002117

Avaya said it also received a subpoena from the General Services Administration for billing records from 1990 to 2005 corresponding to sales of telecom equipment and maintenance services.

Lucent: Got Subpoenas Tied To Federal Probes (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones Newswires, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Lucent Technologies Inc. (LU) (LU) said Thursday that it received two subpoenas related to federal investigations into potential antitrust violations and sales of telecommunications equipment to the federal government.

The telecom-equipment vendor said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that one of the subpoenas it received related to an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice into potential antitrust and other violations in connection with the federal E-Rate program.

Lucent said the subpoena requires the company to produce documents before a grand jury of the U.S. District Court in Georgia.

The Murray Hill, N.J., company said the other subpoena was from the Office of Inspector General, General Services Administration, and relates to a federal investigation into certain sales to the federal government of telecommunications equipment and associated maintenance services.

Lucent said it received both subpoenas during the three months ended June 30.

As previously reported, the Justice Department has announced that several companies have been indicted for defrauding the federal E-rate program that dispenses billions of dollars in subsidies for Internet and telecom service in schools and libraries.

The $2.25 billion-a-year E-Rate program is funded by the Universal Service Fund, which is paid for through fees levied on telecom companies. E-Rate is run by Universal Service Administrative Co., which was set up by the Federal Communications Commission.

The fraud schemes alleged by the Justice Department occurred between 1998 and 2003. Charges range from scheming to defraud the FCC and Universal Service Administrative by including the cost of noncovered equipment and fees with those covered by the program to rigging of bids.

Avaya Inc. (AV) (AV), which was spun off from Lucent in 2000, said in May that it received a subpoena to produce documents for the period from 1997 to 2005 before a grand jury of the U.S. District Court in South Carolina relating to an investigation of potential antitrust violations in connection with the E-Rate program.

Avaya said it also received a subpoena from the General Services Administration for billing records from 1990 to 2005 corresponding to sales of telecom equipment and maintenance services.

Lucent said in Thursday's filing that it's too early to determine whether these matters will have a material impact on the company's business.

-By Nicolas Brulliard; Dow Jones Newswires; 202-862-1351; nicolas.brulliard@ dowjones.com

Lucent Gets Subpoenas (STREET)

By TSC Staff

TheStreet.com, August 5, 2005

Lucent (LU:NYSE - news - research) was subpoenaed in an ongoing government probe of a federal program to provide schools and libraries with Internet access.

The Murray Hill, N.J., company said in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing Thursday afternoon that it got subpoenas in two separate matters during the quarter ended June 30. The company indicated that one was a Justice Department inquiry into the so-called federal E-rate program. Lucent said it must produce documents before a federal grand jury in Georgia.

The second subpoena relates to a federal investigation into certain sales to the federal government of telecommunications equipment and related maintenance services, Lucent said. The company said it "is too early for us to determine whether either of these matters will have a material effect on our business, financial position, results of operations or cash flows."

Lucent's former corporate offspring Avaya (AV:NYSE - news - research) got similar subpoenas in May, the Record of Hackensack, N.J., reported. Avaya was spun out of Lucent in 2000.

On Thursday, Lucent slipped a nickel to $2.88.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

There's A $500 Energy-conservation Prize Waiting For You In The New Federal Energy Bill (KRT)

By Andres R. Martinez

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - Making energy-efficient improvements to your home could net you a $500 rebate from the government.

The offer's buried in the 1,724-page energy bill that President Bush has said he'll sign next week. It gives consumers a credit off the bottom line of their 2006 or 2007 taxes equal to 10 percent of their energy-saving purchases. The maximum over the two years is $500 and applies to any owner-occupied home or condominium. It's probably a good deal for you, although it's pretty complicated.

Home energy conservation experts say you'll make the most out of the tax credit - and save even more on home energy costs in the long run - with the following approach.

First, pull together your utility bills and figure out what you're spending on energy now. If you have a neighbor with a similar residence, ask what he or she is spending on utilities. If you're a lot higher, you've got a lot to save. Note that if you're in a condo, you'll be eligible for a pro-rated share of any building upgrades.

For most homeowners, the fastest way to earn the rebate - plus long-haul savings - is a "no-brainer," said home energy auditor Lee O'Neil, president of NSpects of Chantilly, Va.: "Have the air sealing (draft protection) and attic insulation done."

This work is relatively cheap - $2,000 to $3,000 for an average single-family home - compared with five times that for replacing old windows. Moreover, the small print of the new law lets homeowners deduct up to $300 for insulation and eliminating drafts, which is what air sealing is all about. The maximum deduction for new windows is $200.

How good a deal this or any other energy-conservation outlay is for you depends on three factors: how much energy you're wasting, how much the improvement costs and how much savings you'll net.

The Environmental Protection Agency helps you figure this out with a nifty interactive Web site that asks you to describe your home, right down to the direction it faces, the window area on each side and the kinds of appliances you've got. It doesn't ask your latitude, which it gets from your ZIP code, but it asks you to detail your energy spending. Ultimately, it comes up with the ways that you can save the most.

The site is http://advisor.lbl.gov/hit/Controller. It's a demanding exercise but more than worth the time - literally.

The new tax rebate applies only to products that are more energy efficient than the minimum federal requirement. Such products bear the government-certified Energy Star label or a 2000 IECC label, indicating that they meet the International Energy Conservation Code.

Among the graded items are windows, heat pumps, water heaters, cooling system components, insulation and doors. For a complete list, go to www.energystar.gov then click on "Products" on the left side.

Energy Star dishwashers, laundry machines and refrigerators qualify for a separate rebate. Dishwashers earn up to $100 based on efficiency, washing machines $100 and refrigerators between $75 and $175. Keep in mind that energy-conserving appliances are often more expensive.

For whatever energy-saving products or services you buy, save your receipts for your taxes, just as you would your charitable deductions. The rebate period begins Jan. 1, 2006, and ends Dec. 31, 2007. You can claim a total of $500 for purchases made between those dates.

Here are some other tips:

-You can still claim a rebate if you replace an Energy Star appliance with another Energy Star appliance. It may not save you much beyond the tax credit, however.

-Don't buy something just because the rebate makes it attractive. "You want an improvement that will save you money over its lifetime in energy costs," said Lowell Ungar, an analyst with the Alliance to Save Energy, a Washington conservation group.

-You may be able to get help from your utility companies. Many offer free advice on-line; some even make house calls.

-If you want independent expert advice, consider getting a certified energy auditor to do a home inspection. It'll cost $300 to $500, though, and that's not covered by the rebate. To find an energy auditor, go to the National Association of State Energy Officials at www.natresnet.org. Click on "Consumer Resources" on the left side.

-Some of the smartest fixes don't cost much money at all. Caulking drafty windows and doors can cut energy costs by 10 percent, according to the U.S. Department of Energy. Yearly maintenance of your heating and cooling systems, which usually costs about $100, can reduce your energy bill by 30 percent or more. Replacing incandescent light bulbs with compact fluorescent ones can cut lighting bills by up to 50 percent, according to the Energy Department. None of these fixes rate a rebate, however.

For more tips on making your home energy efficient visit: www.eere.energy.gov/consumerinfo/

You can also call the Department of Energy's Information Center for the tips in booklet form. The phone number is 1-877-EERE-INF (1-877-337-3463).

Too Much Pork And Too Little Sugar (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Wow, I am so relieved that Congress has finally agreed on an energy bill. Now that's out of the way, maybe Congress will focus on solving our energy problem.

Sorry to be so cynical, but an energy bill that doesn't enjoin our auto companies to sharply improve their mileage standards is just not serious. This bill is what the energy expert Gal Luft calls "the sum of all lobbies." While it contains some useful provisions, it also contains massive pork slabs dished out to the vested interests who need them least - like oil companies - and has no overarching strategy to deal with the new world.

And the world has changed in the past few years. First, the global economic playing field is being leveled, and millions of people who were out of the game - from China, India and the former Soviet empire - are now walking onto the field, each dreaming of a house, a car, a toaster and a microwave. As they move from low-energy to high-energy consumers, they are becoming steadily rising competitors with us for oil.

Second, we are in a war. It is a war against open societies mounted by Islamo-fascists, who are nurtured by mosques, charities and madrasas preaching an intolerant brand of Islam and financed by medieval regimes sustained by our oil purchases.

Yes, we are financing both sides in the war on terrorism: our soldiers and the fascist terrorists. George Bush's failure, on the morning after 9/11, to call on Americans to accept a gasoline tax to curb our oil imports was one of the greatest wasted opportunities in U.S. history.

Does the energy bill begin to remedy that? Hardly. It doesn't really touch the auto companies, which have used most of the technological advances of the last two decades to make our cars bigger and faster, rather than more fuel-efficient. Congress even rejected the idea of rating tires for fuel efficiency, which might have encouraged consumers to buy the most fuel-efficient treads.

The White House? It blocked an amendment that would have required the president to find ways to cut oil use by one million barrels a day by 2015 - on the grounds that it might have required imposing better fuel economy on our carmakers.

We need a strategic approach to energy. We need to redesign work so more people work at home instead of driving in; we need to reconfigure our cars and mass transit; we need a broader definition of what we think of as fuel. And we need a tax policy that both entices, and compels, U.S. firms to be innovative with green energy solutions. This is going to be a huge global industry - as China and India become high-impact consumers - and we should lead it.

Many technologies that could make a difference are already here - from hybrid engines to ethanol. All that is needed is a gasoline tax of $2 a gallon to get consumers and Detroit to change their behavior and adopt them. As Representative Edward Markey noted, auto fuel economy peaked at 26.5 miles per gallon in 1986, and "we've been going backward every since" - even though we have the technology to change that right now. "This is not rocket science," he rightly noted. "It's auto mechanics."

DOJ_NMG_0002120

It's also imagination. "During the 1973 Arab oil embargo Brazil was importing almost 80 percent of its fuel supply," notes Mr. Luft, director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security. "Within three decades it cut its dependence by more than half. ... During that period the Brazilians invested massively in a sugar-based ethanol industry to the degree that about a third of the fuel they use in their vehicles is domestically grown. They also created a fleet that can accommodate this fuel." Half the new cars sold this year in Brazil will run on any combination of gasoline and ethanol. "Bringing hydrocarbons and carbohydrates to live happily together in the same fuel tank," he added, "has not only made Brazil close to energy independence, but has also insulated the Brazilian economy from the harming impact of the current spike in oil prices."

The new energy bill includes support for corn-based ethanol, but, bowing to the dictates of the U.S. corn and sugar lobbies (which oppose sugar imports), it ignores Brazilian-style sugar-based ethanol, even though it takes much less energy to make and produces more energy than corn-based ethanol. We are ready to import oil from Saudi Arabia but not sugar from Brazil.

The sum of all lobbies. ...

It seems as though only a big crisis will force our country to override all the cynical lobbies and change our energy usage. I thought 9/11 was that crisis. It sure was for me, but not, it seems, for this White House, Congress or many Americans. Do we really have to wait for something bigger in order to get smarter?

Indians Continue Wait For Accounts' Resolution (WP)

By Evelyn Nieves

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

BROWNING, Mont. -- Nine years have ticked away since Elouise Cobell sued the government on behalf of as many as 500,000 Native Americans whose land the United States was supposed to manage. But the end of what has become the longest, largest class action lawsuit against the federal government remains nowhere in sight.

Sometimes, when Cobell returns home here to the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in northwest Montana from Washington, where the case is being heard in U.S. District Court, she feels buoyed by a development she thinks might help settle the case once and for all. But the feeling is fleeting.

Last week, a major court victory was still fresh; Judge Royce C. Lamberth had issued his most scathing critique of the Interior Department's handling of the Indians and the case. Lamberth cited Interior's "mismanagement, falsification, spite and obstinate litigiousness," among other failings, and his disgust was palpable.

"Perhaps Interior's past and present leaders have been evil people, deriving their pleasure from inflicting harm on society's most vulnerable," he wrote in the extraordinary, 34-page July 12 ruling, which agreed with the plaintiffs' claim that the department's information was unreliable.

But Cobell was preoccupied by a bill to settle the case that was introduced July 20 by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Byron L. Dorgan (N.D.), chairman and ranking Democrat, respectively, of the Indian Affairs Committee. The bill, which the senators called "a starting point," was far from the remedy Indian leaders had hoped for, Cobell said. And she testified to that point.

"This bill proposes a formula for accounting that looks at the trust records from 1980 to 2005," Cobell said when she returned here from testifying. "The judge has already ruled that Interior has to make an accounting going back to the beginning."

Cobell v. Norton (for Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton) dates to 1996, but the complicated debacle some members of Congress have likened to a "Federal Enron" traces its origins back more than a hundred years.

Under a forced arrangement, in 1887 the government divided much tribal land across the country, which it had not already taken, into separate, private allotments for Indians. It then leased individuals' land, which ranged from 40 to 160 acres, usually to oil, gas, timber, grazing or coal interests. The Treasury Department placed the fees into a trust and was -- and remains -- responsible for doling out checks to the individual Indian trust beneficiaries.

But from the beginning, the plaintiffs say -- and the government has conceded until recently -- the basic recordkeeping for these lands was botched.

In 1994, six years after Congress began oversight hearings into the mismanagement of Indian trusts going back for decades, it passed a law ordering a special trustee to monitor the accounting of the trusts and creating a plan for reforming the system. The 1996 lawsuit followed after the first special trustee resigned in protest of what he said were attempts to obstruct his efforts to reconcile accounts.

DOJ_NMG_0002121

Norton and her predecessor, Bruce Babbitt, have said it is impossible to provide a full historical accounting of the trusts -- there are said to be about 300,000 accounts, incorporating perhaps 500,000 individual beneficiaries, with combined balances in the trust of $500 million to $800 million.

But Interior officials say that as they perform a historical accounting of the trusts ordered by Lamberth -- an effort costing $100 million so far -- their research, performed by using statistical sampling, has shown that the trust holders are owed little for their land. "If you use the facts that we have found so far in the accounting process, the number would be very, very low," James E. Cason, the associate deputy secretary for the Interior, told the Indian Affairs Committee last month.

"In court, the plaintiffs seek a historical accounting but are now working hard to prevent that accounting from occurring," Cason added. "In Congress, they argue against providing funding for that accounting; in court, they argue that the accounting is impossible. . . . Instead of an accounting, they want lots of money."

This stance, fairly new in the history of the lawsuit, infuriates the plaintiffs. What they object to, they say, is the Interior Department's taking money from already underfunded Indian health and education programs to fund its defense against the lawsuit. And they say Interior is basing its accounting on records that date only since 1985.

Interior officials say the Indians keep shifting their figures on the amount of money the government owes them -- from more than $100 billion at one point to, most recently, $27.5 billion (the figure the plaintiffs announced in June as acceptable to settle the case). But the plaintiffs say their figure has changed because as court testimony from Interior officials and court findings have shown, no one can be sure what is owed to trust holders.

Last week the plaintiffs pleaded with the judge to keep computers holding trust data shut down. They argued that the information remained as vulnerable to hackers as it was four years ago, when Lamberth ordered a shutdown of all computers in the Interior Department after an Inspector General's report showed that a computer hacker could move or change trust account balances with ease. The judge has not yet ruled on the matter.

From the start of the Indian trusts, accounting has been a problem. Allotment holders would receive Treasury checks with no additional paperwork. They were not told who leased their land, what it was used for, how much was used, or the price the company paid for obtaining the land's oil, timber or other resource. Allottees complained that they received checks -- sometimes for as little as 2 cents -- that the government did not explain. Many say that practice continues.

Recent history has also revealed problems.

In 1999, Treasury's financial management office destroyed 162 boxes of trust documents as Interior officials were telling the court they were searching for the records. A court-appointed master assigned to oversee the preservation production of documents found that Treasury violated ethical rules for not reporting the documents' destruction for 16 months. He called the trust system "clearly out of control."

In a ruling in 1999 ordering Interior to make a full accounting of the trust, Lamberth declared that "it would be difficult to find a more historically mismanaged federal program."

In 2001, after a 19-month investigation, a federal monitor assigned to provide the judge with assessments of Interior's representations called the department's efforts to provide an accounting in compliance with his order a sham marked by unrealistic responses and evasion.

Last month, when McCain and Dorgan introduced their bill on the Senate floor, Dorgan said: "The Cobell litigation has brought to light a very disturbing problem: The federal government may not know the proper balances of these accounts nor have sufficient documentation to determine the value of these accounts."

The government acknowledges one failure of recordkeeping. As original allotment holders died and their land was inherited by more and more heirs, the paperwork involved in keeping track of beneficiaries proved onerous. Nearly 50,000 active accounts, with a balance of nearly $74 million, languish because, the government says, the beneficiaries' "whereabouts are unknown."

DOJ_NMG_0002122

Cobell, a banker and accountant, said her husband began receiving trust checks a year ago with no documentation. "He doesn't know what they're for," she said, "but he was told they go back from three years ago. He was one of those 'whereabouts unknown,' though we've lived here forever."

Interior has appealed every major ruling in the case. Last week, it appealed Lamberth's July 12 order, in which he ordered Interior to include notices in its correspondence with Indians whose land the government holds in trust, warning them that the government's information may not be credible. Interior was issued a stay pending a ruling next month.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Compton To Crack Down On Gangs, Officials Tell Forum (LAT)

By Megan Garvey

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

Compton officials — joined by an array of community activists and religious leaders — announced Thursday that they plan to seek gang injunctions and start offering rewards of $500 or more for information leading to arrests and convictions, measures intended to help stem this year's rapidly rising homicide count.

Addressing a standing-room-only crowd in the City Council chambers, Mayor Eric J. Perrodin said his community would not tolerate continued violence.

"We are putting criminals and gang members on notice: It's time to pack your bags. Crime is not accepted in Compton," he said.

He told residents that the city also was planning to aggressively pursue abatement of drug houses and rundown properties, and would renew its focus on gang intervention programs.

The meeting was held the night after Michael Buchanan, 18, of Los Angeles was shot to death about 11 p.m. as he walked to his parked car on Evers Avenue.

Buchanan's death was the third slaying in the last week and the city's 43rd this year — more than all of last year. At least another four killings have occurred in unincorporated areas within blocks of the city limits.

At the current pace, Compton's homicide rate would far surpass recent highs in major American cities.

The killings, which have come alongside a rise in gang-related shootings, have residents fearful.

Thursday night, people filled every seat. Some stood in the back or sat on steps or benches outside and listened to the meeting over loudspeakers.

The panel, seated at tables that stretched the width of the room, was made up of City Council members; officials from the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, which patrols Compton; representatives of Los Angeles County Superior Court; nonprofit organizers; pastors; a priest; and ministers from the Nation of Islam.

"We've buried so many children, we've just buried so many children," said Father Stan Bosch, a pastor at Our Lady of Victory/Sacred Heart Church in Compton, his voice trembling. "But I believe we are the hope."

Speaking of racial tensions in the city of 96,000, where Latinos now outnumber African Americans, Bosch said the community needed to reach across ethnic barriers. "I really believe there is healing when we let those boundaries drop and we know each other by name — not by gang name, but by Bobby and Billy and Pedro."

The forum, called Making Neighborhoods Safer, was billed as a chance for community members to offer ideas to prevent and solve crime.

The variety of questions underscored a long list of problems troubling Compton residents, including gang violence, prostitution, graffiti and a lack of guidance or jobs for young people.

But it also revealed many long-standing tensions between the community and law enforcement: the desire of residents to see criminals arrested and prosecuted, the fear of possible police abuse and the hope that their young people can instead be steered in the right direction.

Minister Tony Muhammad, the West Coast representative of the Nation of Islam, expressed concerns about any get-tough approach to crime, cautioning that many young black men wrongly fall into broad concepts of what gang members look like.

DOJ_NMG_0002123

He also questioned deputies' difficulties in solving homicides in the community, given that fewer than a dozen arrests have been made in connection with this year's slayings.

"Let an officer get killed, they catch the shooter in eight hours," Muhammad said. "But a brown or black brother get killed and you can't find anyone who'd talk to you? Watch out, Compton."

Other speakers said that their focus now lay primarily with the victims and that strong action was needed.

"We've got to stop playing with these people and get them off the street," said Royce Esters, president of the civil rights group National Assn. for Equal Justice in America.

"They're killing our sons and daughters. We've got to stop fooling around. I'm saying we need a multitask force, we need the FBI, ATF, the DEA to come in here," Esters said.

Capt. Eric Hamilton, who heads the Compton sheriff's station, said that some of those agencies were at work in the community and that he was open to more partnerships.

But he said that such agencies had come into Compton before without lasting change.

"In my opinion the key is the folks who are out here," he said, gesturing to the audience. "What are you going to do? It's terrible that we've had these murders, terrible. But if you're just here for the dialogue, then it's just an exercise."

The Cancer In Compton (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

The city of Compton has a chance this year to return to the top of the charts — but not with the rap songs that once put the city on the map. With 42 homicides so far in 2005, Compton is on a pace to displace New Orleans as the nation's murder capital.

As always, condemnation of the violence is widespread, as is agreement that something must be done to stop it. And as always, the hard question is what exactly that something is.

At its current pace, Compton, which has about 96,000 residents, would have a murder rate of about 7.5 per 10,000 residents this year. (In New Orleans, there were about 5.6 homicides last year for every 10,000 residents.) The Sheriff's Department, which has been under contract to police Compton since its municipal force was disbanded five years ago, attributes the rise to increased activity among Compton's numerous gangs. Authorities also worry that violence in Compton could spread to many of the surrounding neighborhoods of Los Angeles after a hard-won decrease in violent crime throughout the city.

It's clear that Compton needs more police; it has about 70 officers patrolling an area roughly the size of the LAPD's Southeast Division, which has triple the force. Yet Compton, which spends more than $12 million on its Sheriff's Department contract, is cash-strapped, and federal grants for public safety are increasingly scarce. Moreover, even if the city were to receive more money, Compton's police would still have to win over residents worried about their professionalism. It was only three months ago that deputies shot 120 times at an unarmed suspect in a residential neighborhood.

As justified as their suspicions may be, however, the people of Compton must also realize that a larger force, with better-trained officers, would make their community safer. All parties in Compton — including the police and the City Council — should resist the temptation to bicker and be prepared to work together.

The Sheriff's Department should work harder to recruit deputies who are Compton residents or have a vested interest in the community. The community should be more willing to cooperate with law enforcement in helping to solve crimes.

Mutual trust between the police and the community is key to successful gang prevention and mentorship programs similar to those in Inglewood and East Palo Alto.

First Lady Laura Bush has spoken eloquently about the importance of giving teenagers, especially boys, more hope and greater opportunities. Her focus on the problem is refreshing, but the administration must go beyond rhetoric. Even a modest increase in federal and state gang-prevention programs would help cities such as Compton become safer and better places to live.

It is the larger community — and by that we mean the city and the region — that must acknowledge that gang violence is not merely a local problem but a societal one.

School Employees Charged In Drug Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0002124

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

A federal grand jury in Miami has returned an 84-count indictment charging 29 persons, mostly Miami-Dade County Public Schools employees, with conspiracy to possess the pain killer OxyContin with the intent to distribute and to obtain the drug with counterfeit or fraudulent prescriptions.

Named in the indictment are a doctor from Miami-Dade County, five county school bus drivers, 13 county school bus attendants, two county school custodians, a cook, a county school cashier and a former county school bus driver. Five unspecified persons also were indicted.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) spokesman Garrison K. Courtney said the indictment also includes charges of health care fraud and conspiracy to commit health care fraud.

"The DEA is committed to working with our local counterparts in combating the drug dealers who stalk this community and endanger the welfare and safety of our children," said DEA agent Mark R. Trouville, who heads the agency's Miami field division.

"We will continue to make federal resources available for Miami-Dade County and other communities to help curb the flow of drugs in their neighborhoods and to protect our children," he said. "DEA has zero tolerance for drug traffickers who work with or around our children."

According to the indictment, handed up July 29 but made public yesterday, beginning in January 2003, three of the suspects recruited others, some of whom were Miami-Dade schools employees, to participate in the conspiracy by providing their insurance identification information.

The indictment says some obtained prescriptions for OxyContin that were medically unnecessary from a co-defendant who is a physician. At a later date, some of those charged forged and counterfeited prescriptions for OxyContin using a variety of insurance identification information.

Some of those charged, the indictment says, presented the forged and counterfeit prescriptions at pharmacies in Miami-Dade and Broward counties to obtain OxyContin. They are accused of selling the filled prescriptions for cash.

In addition, the indictment says, others submitted insurance claims to UnitedHealth Group, fraudulently claiming reimbursement for the cost of the prescriptions. It says nearly 100 forged, counterfeit or medically unnecessary prescriptions for the prescription OxyContin -- accounting for thousands of OxyContin tablets -- were presented to the pharmacies.

"Public school employees hold special positions of trust," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta, whose office will prosecute the case. "They serve as role models for our children. Their actions, as much as their words, teach what is right and what is wrong.

"There is no evidence here that these individuals distributed controlled substances to children in their care. These school employees are charged, however, with violating federal drug laws, and that is something that we in Dade County cannot tolerate in our school employees."

Mr. Courtney said each of those charged faces 20 years in prison and $1 million fines, if convicted.

29 Charged In OxyContin Ring At School (FINDLAW/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, August 5, 2005

(AP) - MIAMI-School bus drivers, attendants and other co-workers were charged by federal prosecutors Thursday with taking part in an illegal drug ring involving the powerful painkiller OxyContin.

According to the indictment, Miami-Dade school employees were among 29 people who used more than 100 forged or fraudulent prescriptions to obtain thousands of tablets of OxyContin from South Florida pharmacies.

No teachers were involved, and there was no evidence of drug sales to children, U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said.

The school workers were recruited to use their health-insurance cards as part of the scheme, prosecutors said.

Of those charged in the grand jury indictment, five are Miami-Dade school bus drivers, 13 are school bus attendants and one is a former school bus driver now driving a city bus. Two school custodians, a cook and a cashier were also charged, along with a Miami doctor and five other people.

DOJ_NMG_0002125

Miami-Dade school officials had no immediate comment on the 84-count indictment, which came days before classes begin Monday.

Those charged face up to 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine for each count of possession of OxyContin with intent to distribute, as well as additional prison time for fraud charges, prosecutors said.

OxyContin is legal if prescribed for treatment of severe chronic pain. But it has become an increasing problem on the black market because crushing the time-release tablets and snorting or injecting the powder yields an immediate, heroin-like high. Hundreds of deaths are blamed each year on overdoses.

On the Net:

http://www.dadeschools.net

22 School Employees Arrested In OxyContin Scheme (MH)

By Luisa Yanez

The Miami Herald, August 5, 2005

Miami-Dade School bus drivers, custodians, a cook and a cashier were among the 29 people arrested today for taking part in a scheme to sell the powerful painkiller OxyContin on the street, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced.

"We have no evidence that children or teachers were involved in this scheme," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. ``But these are not the type of people we want around our children."

Joseph Garcia, a spokesman for Miami-Dade schools, said the district learned of the arrests, and the nearly two-year investigation, today. Monday is the first day of school in Miami-Dade County.

"First, we're shocked, then we're grateful that these people were arrested before the start of the school year," Garcia said.

He said disciplinary action will begin immediately against the 22 school employees.

Of those charged in the early morning round-up, five were school bus drivers, 13 were bus attendants, two were custodians, one cook and one a school cashier, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. A Miami doctor and five others were also charged.

The scheme worked something like this:

The school employees were recruited to go to a doctor and use their name and insurance to purchase prescriptions for OxyContin. The doctor was on the take.

The employees then sold the prescriptions to a contact, who then resold the tablets to a street dealer. The tablets were sold on the street for as much as $80 apiece.

OxyContin is legal if prescribed for treatment of chronic pain.

Miami-Dade police the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement took part in the investigation.

22 Miami-Dade School Workers Face Charges For Selling Oxycodone (FLSUNSEN)

By Ihosvani Rodriguez, Miami Bureau

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, August 5, 2005

Federal agents on Thursday rounded up 22 Miami-Dade County school system employees accused of being part of a prescription drug ring that illegally obtained and sold thousands of tablets of the painkiller oxycodone since 2003.

Officials found no evidence the school employees sold the drug to students or used the highly addictive painkillers at work. The employees included five bus drivers, 13 bus attendants, a cook, two custodians and a cashier. A Miami-Dade transit bus driver who was arrested worked previously as a school bus driver.

Authorities unsealed a federal grand jury indictment on Thursday that contained a total of 84 counts against 29 people. The lengthy list of charges includes conspiracy to distribute oxycodone and committing health-care fraud.

Among those charged was a Miami-Dade doctor arrested last year for writing illegal prescriptions for the drug commonly known by its commercial name, OxyContin. Prosecutors said no teachers were involved in the plot.

Investigators said they rushed to make the arrests before next week's start of the school year and expect more arrests to follow, U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said.

DOJ_NMG_0002126

"We needed to take action quickly," Acosta said.

Officials with Miami Dade Schools said they plan to place the employees on administrative leave and replace them before next week.

Schools spokesman Joseph Garcia said there was no indication the bus drivers were under the influence of drugs while working. He said drivers must take a drug test before employment and after an accident and also submit to random drug tests.

A central figure in the case was Dr. Ronald E. Harris, prosecutors said. Authorities identified Harris last year as Florida's top prescriber of OxyContin to Medicaid patients. He was charged last year with drug trafficking after selling undercover police officers 10 OxyContin prescriptions without proof of any medical need. He is awaiting trial.

Officials with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration said Harris' arrest prompted their investigation of the school system employees.

Investigators said the operation was traced back to January 2003, when Harris began selling prescriptions to Ian Stuart and Johnny Blocker, identified as the ring's leaders. Blocker, a bus attendant, paid colleagues for their school employee insurance information to obtain and pay for the prescription drugs, authorities said.

The ringleaders paid school employees up to $100 per prescription, and up to $400 if they went to the pharmacy to obtain the pills personally, said the DEA's special agent-in-charge, Mark Trouville. Most of the prescriptions were filled in the Hollywood and Hallandale areas. Employees then sold the pills to a street dealer, who resold them for as much as $80 a pill.

Altogether, more than 100 forged or medically unnecessary prescriptions for OxyContin were presented to pharmacies, the indictment says. The school system's insurance company, UnitedHealth Group, doled out more than $50,000 to pay for the drugs, according to the indictment.

OxyContin, prescribed for chronic pain, has become a huge force in the black market in recent years. Abusers usually crush the tablets and either snort or inject the powder for an immediate, heroin-like high.

A report released in June by the Florida Medical Examiners Commission said 340 Floridians died from oxcodone overdoses in 2004. The figures include 48 deaths in Broward, 35 in Palm Beach County and 11 in Miami-Dade.

School Workers Charged In Drug Ring Bust (CNN.com)

CNN.com, August 5, 2005

MIAMI (CNN) -- Federal officials on Thursday arrested 29 people in the Miami-Dade County area, including a number of low-level school employees, and charged them with attempting to obtain the narcotic OxyContin to distribute it.

Among the school employees arrested were five bus drivers, 13 bus attendants, two custodians, a cook and a cashier.

The others include a former school bus driver who now is a Miami-Dade County Transit bus driver, a doctor, a sheet metal worker and four others.

"There is no evidence here that these individuals distributed controlled substances to children in their care," said R. Alexander Acosta, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Florida. "These school employees are charged, however, with violating federal drug laws, and that is something that we in Dade County cannot tolerate in our school employees."

OxyContin is a form of the narcotic analgesic oxycodone.

In an 84-count indictment, a federal grand jury in Miami charged them with "conspiracy to possess oxycodone with the intent to distribute and to obtain oxycodone with counterfeited or fraudulent prescriptions, health care fraud and conspiracy to commit health care fraud."

In all, about 100 phony prescriptions were filled at 50 pharmacies in Miami-Dade and Broward counties, representing thousands of pills believed to have been sold on the street, said Alicia Valle, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney in Miami.

She said none of the pills, which one defendant claimed to have sold for as much as $34 apiece, has been confiscated.

Officials allege that, beginning around January 2003, three defendants recruited the others to join in the conspiracy by providing their insurance identification information.

"At a later date, some defendants forged and counterfeited prescriptions for OxyContin using their own and their co-defendants' insurance identification information," officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0002127

Defendants submitted insurance claims to United Health Group, seeking reimbursement for the drug's cost to a tune of about $50,000, the indictment alleges.

One defendant, a Miami doctor identified as Ronald Eugene Harris, has been charged with writing prescriptions that were medically unnecessary.

Authorities say he dropped out of the scheme, and the other defendants changed their modus operandi, stealing prescriptions from another unnamed physician and forging them. The second doctor has not been charged.

Harris last year voluntarily relinquished his license and agreed never to reapply for it, according to the Web site of the Florida Department of Health.

The accused could face maximum penalties of up to 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine for each count of possession with intent to distribute.

The narcotic has been blamed for 340 deaths last year in Florida, 11 of them in Miami.

Selig Renews Call For Tougher Rule On Steroids Users (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Baseball Commissioner Bud Selig renewed his call yesterday for tougher penalties for players caught using steroids and for independent administration of the game's drug-testing program.

At the same time, a leader of the House Committee on Government Reform, which held nationally televised hearings earlier this year about the issue of steroid use, pressed for an outside investigation into the history of the problem in baseball.

Selig's statement, in a news release, appeared to be designed to put pressure on the Major League Baseball Players Association, which had balked at his proposal in April for a "three-strikes-and-you're-out" steroids policy. Selig made his recommendation in a letter on April 25 to Donald Fehr, executive director of the union.

Fehr had said that the existing program, established in January when the union agreed to reopen the collective bargaining agreement, needed time to work. He said that further changes should be negotiated in the collective bargaining process.

He had no comment on Selig's statement yesterday. Fehr has been traveling around the country to meet with players to talk about a variety of issues, including Selig's proposal. Union officials are expected to meet with management before the end of the month.

This week's suspension of Rafael Palmeiro, one of four players with more than 3,000 hits and 500 home runs, has allowed Selig to renew his push. Palmeiro tested positive for stanozolol, a powerful, short-acting steroid, according to a person in baseball with direct knowledge of the test result. That person did not want to be identified because of confidentiality provisions in the testing policy.

In March, Palmeiro testified to Congress that he had never used steroids. On Wednesday, Palmeiro said through his agent that there was another side to this story that he would tell soon.

Henry A. Waxman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House committee, endorsed Selig's call for tougher penalties and independent administration of testing.

"However, I'm disappointed that he isn't trying to find out how this scandal was allowed to happen," Waxman said in a telephone interview. "I think we need a thorough, broad and independent investigation so that we can restore baseball's credibility."

Selig has been considering an in-depth investigation, like the Dowd Report on Pete Rose and gambling in baseball, to try to get to the bottom of the steroids scandal. Congressional leaders indicated in April that they would defer their own plans for an examination of past steroid use if the leaders of the game appointed an independent investigator.

"I'm waiting to hear back from them on that," Waxman said. "I think the Palmeiro matter has even made a greater urgency for this to happen."

Richard Levin, a spokesman for Selig, said yesterday that he had not heard of any progress in the possibility of baseball investigating past steroid use. "The last I heard it was put on hold, and I haven't heard anything since then," Levin said.

DOJ_NMG_0002128

Philip Schiliro, chief of staff for Waxman and the Democrats on the committee, said, "As far as we understood, baseball is continuing to think about it, the union is continuing to think about it, and Congressman Waxman's view is that right now is the time to do it."

Waxman said he would still consider having Congressional staff members investigate the matter if baseball leaders failed to do so. But he added that he had not talked about the subject this week with Tom Davis, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the committee. A spokesman for Davis said he would not have any comment yesterday.

Such an investigation could determine whether some of the game's most hallowed records, including the single-season home run mark set by Mark McGwire and broken by Barry Bonds, were tainted.

Anabolic steroids enhance size, strength, endurance and recovery. Their use is illegal under baseball rules and federal law. Yesterday, the Baltimore Orioles, at Palmeiro's request, canceled a ceremony planned for Aug. 14 to honor him for reaching 3,000 career hits.

Waxman pointed to an interview in The Philadelphia Inquirer yesterday in which Joe Morgan, a highly respected Hall of Famer and an ESPN announcer, blasted steroid users and said the game had tolerated and profited from the abuses during the long-ball era after the 1994 strike. He dismissed the idea that modern power-hitting records could be designated with a footnote about drug use.

"There's not a big enough asterisk to handle all of this," Morgan was quoted as saying, adding, "If you are going to let people into the Hall who have done steroids, then you have to let Pete Rose in, because this has hurt baseball more than what Pete did."

Selig is proposing discipline of 50 games for a first offense, 100 games for a second offense and a lifetime ban for a third offense. The same penalties are proposed for all professional sports by the Drug Free Sports Act, which passed the House Committee on Energy and Commerce on June 29 and awaits further action by Congress. Under the current policy, a player is suspended 10 days for a first offense, 30 for a second, 60 for a third and a year for a fourth. The penalty for a fifth offense could be a lifetime ban.

Eight major league players have been suspended for steroid use this year.

"While I believe the suspensions show that the current program is working, they underscore the need for an even tougher policy," Selig said in his statement yesterday. "There is a deeper issue confronting baseball. It is the integrity of the game and that transcends the viability of the current program."

The statement also said baseball should turn over the administration of its program to an independent authority.

"The intensity that I feel about this issue is greater today than it has ever been," the statement said, "and the time is past due for the Players Association to accept my proposal to eliminate steroids and other performance-enhancing substances from our game."

Selig Urges Acceptance Of Tougher Steroids Policy (USAT)

By Hal Bodley

USA Today, August 5, 2005

Commissioner Bud Selig on Thursday used the high-profile 10-day suspension of Baltimore Orioles first baseman Rafael Palmeiro this week to urge the players union to accept his April 25 proposal calling for a strong steroids testing program.

Selig said in a statement he is saddened by this week's violations — Seattle pitcher Ryan Franklin was also suspended for 10 days — "but they underscore the need for an even tougher policy. There is a deeper issue confronting baseball. It is the integrity of the game and that transcends the viability of the current program."

Palmeiro, one of only four players to reach 3,000 hits and 500 home runs, was suspended on Monday after testing positive for the powerful steroid stanozolol, a baseball person familiar with the process told USA TODAY. Another person familiar with the testing program said the test took place in the second week of May.

Stanozolol, known by its brand name Winstrol, is a strength-building steroid that can be ingested or injected, but is not available in over-the-counter supplements.

DOJ_NMG_0002129

Selig, in Thursday's statement, said "there exists some doubt in the public sector about our sincerity in eliminating steroids from the game. That is wrong. We must create an understanding everywhere that when we say we need to rid the game of steroids, we mean it.

"The best way is to put in place the program that I proposed to the Players Association more than three months ago. We must increase the levels of discipline to 50 games for a first offense, 100 games for a second and a lifetime ban for a third. And, probably most important, we must turn over the administration of our program to an independent authority to, once and for all, end the debate about the transparency of our policy.

"The intensity that I feel about this issue is greater today than it has ever been and the time is past due for the Players Association to accept my proposal to eliminate steroids and other performance-enhancing substances from our game."

Union chief Don Fehr, who has been polling major leaguers about Selig's proposal, has yet to respond publicly to the commissioner's request.

Selig Calls For Stricter Tests (LAT)

By Tim Brown

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

Commissioner Bud Selig called again for stricter drug testing in baseball Thursday, attempting to pressure the players' union into acceding to his plan for a three-strikes-and-you're-out policy.

In the wake of this week's high-profile suspensions of Baltimore Oriole first baseman Rafael Palmeiro and Seattle Mariner pitcher Ryan Franklin, the commissioner's office issued a three-paragraph release that read, in part:

"The intensity that I feel about this issue is greater today than it has ever been and the time is past due for the Players' Association to accept my proposal to eliminate steroids and other performance-enhancing substances from our game."

Union chief Don Fehr has been meeting with players and team player representatives for much of the summer, in part to discuss the possibility of a new policy.

The collective-bargaining agreement expires after the 2006 season but the joint drug-prevention and treatment program runs through 2008.

Shortly after a March congressional hearing at which the current policy was roundly criticized as too lenient, Selig said he would champion a program in which the progression of positive tests would result in suspensions of 50 games, 100 games and a lifetime ban.

A first positive under the existing plan, which was instituted only five months ago, results in a 10-day suspension. Eight major leaguers have been suspended, as have 78 minor leaguers, who serve a 15-game penalty for a first-time offense.

Selig did not mention Palmeiro specifically. On Thursday, the Orioles announced that a pregame ceremony scheduled for Aug. 14 celebrating his 3,000th hit would not be held, per Palmeiro's request.

Joe Foss, Oriole vice chairman and chief operating officer, said in a statement, "Given the circumstances, the club is in agreement with Rafael's wish to not move forward with the ceremonies."

The prominence of Palmeiro, who recently joined Hank Aaron, Willie Mays and Eddie Murray as the only players to have at least 500 home runs and 3,000 hits, has again drawn attention to baseball's policy, however. Many congressional leaders, including members of the House Government Reform Committee, have demanded a more stringent and transparent policy, one that more closely follows the Olympic model.

Congress also is investigating Palmeiro, who tested positive for the steroid stanolozol approximately two months after testifying before the Government Reform Committee that he had never used steroids.

"I am saddened by the recent announcements of violations of baseball's drug program," the statement from Selig read. "Back in March, I said that everyone who tests positive will be suspended and that has come to pass. While I believe the suspensions show that the current program is working, they underscore the need for an even tougher policy. There is a deeper issue confronting baseball. It is the integrity of the game and that transcends the viability of the current program.

"There exists some doubt in the public sector about our sincerity in eliminating steroids from the game. That is wrong. We must create an understanding everywhere that when we say we need to rid the game of steroids, we mean it. The best way is to put in place the program that I proposed to the Players' Association more than three months ago. We must increase the levels of discipline to 50 games for a first offense, 100 games for a second and a lifetime ban for a third. And, probably most important, we must turn over the administration of our program to an independent authority to, once and for all, end the debate about the transparency of our policy."

DOJ_NMG_0002130

Baseball, Palmeiro At Odds (BSUN)

By Jeff Barker

The Baltimore Sun, August 5, 2005

Major League Baseball and Rafael Palmeiro continued to snipe at each other over privacy issues in his steroid case Thursday, making it hard to believe it has been only three weeks since baseball bought a congratulatory newspaper ad to mark the Oriole's 3,000th hit.

Baseball seems embarrassed not only that Palmeiro failed a steroid test, but that his abbreviated explanation - that the drug use was accidental - has quickly become a national punch line.

And it has.

"You can't watch a stand-up comedian without hearing about it," said popular culture expert Robert J. Thompson of Syracuse University. "In the court of public culture, it's automatically-assumed guilt."

The baseball commissioner's office, which has been distancing itself from Palmeiro and his defense, Thursday issued a statement saying the recent steroid-related suspensions of Palmeiro and others show that the sport's drug program needs more teeth.

"While I believe the suspensions show that the current program is working, they underscore the need for an even tougher policy," commissioner Bud Selig said. "There is a deeper issue confronting baseball. It is the integrity of the game, and that transcends the viability of the current program."

Selig has been pushing the Major League Baseball Players Association -so far unsuccessfully -to agree to a new steroids regimen that would include a suspension of 50 games for a first violation, 100 for a second and a lifetime ban for a third offense.

Under the current system, Palmeiro received a suspension of 10 days for an initial violation.

The baseball players union has issues of its own. The union is concerned that baseball, as part of its anti-steroids push, may have violated Palmeiro's privacy rights by leaking information to the media about when Palmeiro failed his drug test and which steroid - it was stanozolol - was uncovered.

Palmeiro's agent, Arn Tellem, has expressed a similar concern, accusing baseball of breaking confidentiality rules and undermining "the integrity" of the drug testing program.

Thursday, baseball denied breaking any rules.

"No information about this test became public until after Mr. Palmeiro's grievance was fully litigated and decided," Rob Manfred, Major League Baseball executive vice president, said in an e-mailed response to a Sun inquiry. "After the decision, Baseball put out its standard press release and said nothing more. Only the player has been talking about the underlying facts publicly," Manfred said.

Tellem offered no immediate reply. But his office e-mailed a copy of a New York Times article from Wednesday identifying the banned substance found in Palmeiro's system. The newspaper attributed the information to "a person in baseball."

The clear suggestion from Tellem's office was that baseball was behind the leak.

Baseball spokesman Richard Levin has said he doesn't know where the disclosures originated.

Among those interested in the leaks is Rep. Henry Waxman of California, the top-ranking Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, which is examining Palmeiro's case.

Waxman said Thursday that the committee would look into the leaks as it gathered facts broadly in Palmeiro's case.

Palmeiro knew about his failed drug test as he chased his 3,000th hit last month. Baseball took out a full-page ad in USA Today to congratulate him.

On March 17, Palmeiro told the congressional committee he never used steroids. He also asked to join the Zero Tolerance Roundtable, an advisory group comprising steroid experts and representatives from various sports.

"You have to realize he asked us to go on it [the roundtable]. He sent in a request," Waxman said. "I guess his idea of zero tolerance is a little more tolerant than we expected it to be."

Palmeiro Calls Off 3,000th Hit Ceremony (BSUN)

The Baltimore Sun, August 5, 2005

The Orioles announced today that the scheduled pre-game ceremonies on Aug. 14 to honor Rafael Palmeiro's 3,000th hit will not be held at the request of Palmeiro.

"Through his agent, Rafael has specifically requested that the planned event not be held," said Joe Foss, Orioles vice chairman and chief operating officer. "Given the circumstances, the club is in agreement with Rafael's wish to not move forward with the ceremonies."

Palmeiro is serving a 10-day suspension for testing positive for steroids. The Orioles' first baseman is also being investigated for perjury after he denied using steroids in his testimony before a House committee.

Palmeiro can return to the Orioles' lineup on Aug. 11.

Steroids In Baseball: The Palmeiro Furor (5 Letters) (NYT)

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

To the Editor:

Re "Baseball Bars Longtime Star for Steroid Use" (front page, Aug. 2):

If Bud Selig, the baseball commissioner, wants to stop or seriously discourage the use of steroids, the solution is simple. Once a player has tested positive for steroids, that player's records should be erased from the annals of baseball and the opportunity for that player to enter the Hall of Fame should be denied.

Rafael Palmeiro's 10-day suspension is a joke. How much of a deterrent to use steroids is a 10-day suspension? Selig, the players and the fans alike must recognize that cheating is not acceptable and definitely must not be condoned, no matter what the excuse may be.

James E. Mangino

North Haven, Conn., Aug. 3, 2005 •

To the Editor:

If baseball wanted to make a strong statement about its integrity and its values, it would immediately install Roger Maris in the Hall of Fame.

By doing so, baseball would be saying: "Here is a man who broke a sacred baseball record that stood for 34 years before he broke it, and that then stood for 37 years until it was broken, if indeed it was legitimately broken. He did it with nothing but a bat and his God-given talents."

What a perfect way for baseball to show what sort of man and performance it reveres!

Robert Lukas

Stony Point, N.Y., Aug. 2, 2005 •

To the Editor:

The only good thing to come out of the baseball steroid fiasco is the thorough embarrassment suffered by the members of Congress who inserted themselves into this controversy.

There is no federal question here, yet sanctimonious politicians held hearings to give Rafael Palmeiro a platform to heroically deny steroid use, to the chirping approval of Tom Davis and Henry Waxman.

Now their faces are covered with egg, yet they still insist on grasping onto the coattails of popular opinion. They should be laughed right out of the hearing room.

In doing bad, Palmeiro did some good.

Larry Maxcy

Yucca Valley, Calif., Aug. 2, 2005 •

To the Editor:

DOJ_NMG_0002132

Murray Chass ("Stupidity and Steroids Come in Many Forms," On Baseball column, Aug. 3) misses the broader point on the steroids issue. Due diligence, not zealotry, is what motivates the actions of Congress. The current policy requires a minimum of only one mandatory random drug test and possible additional testing per year.

Studies show that more than half a million children nationwide have admitted to using steroids. That's a real problem that, if not addressed immediately, will only continue to grow.

The current testing system does not guarantee that we fully understand the scope of the problem. The public is not notified of what drug an athlete tests positive for. Some drugs are not found in supplements, and there can be no legitimate excuse of unknowing ingestion.

Major League Baseball's testing process is secretive, and the penalties are not stemming the tide of steroid use.

If baseball wants to regain credibility, the players association should accept the recommendations that Commissioner Bud Selig has proposed, as well as allow an independent entity to conduct testing and provide for full transparency.

John Sweeney
Member of Congress
20th District, N.Y.
Washington, Aug. 3, 2005 •

To the Editor:

Re "Palmeiro Case Centers on Popular Drug" (Sports pages, Aug. 3):

That professional athletes like Rafael Palmeiro are allegedly taking illegal performance-enhancing steroids is regrettable. But to continually hint without proof that dietary supplements are the cause of failed drug screens serves no one.

If there is verifiable information that a dietary supplement contains a substance that is not listed on the label, as some have suggested, the Food and Drug Administration can and should remove that product from the marketplace.

Professional athletes receive training advice from a battery of experts, including physicians and nutritionists. They and their handlers know what substances, including dietary supplements, they can and cannot take without risking their eligibility to compete.

David Seckman
Exec. Dir. and Chief Executive
National Nutritional Foods Assn.
Washington, Aug. 3, 2005

Steroids Guesswork Raises Unintentional Questions (BSUN)

By Peter Schmuck
The Baltimore Sun, August 5, 2005

ANAHEIM, Calif. -- There is an empty locker between Sammy Sosa and Miguel Tejada in the visitors clubhouse at Angel Stadium, and it shouldn't be too difficult to guess whose nameplate was supposed to be above it.

Save the real guessing for Major League Baseball's steroid policy, which was supposed to restore confidence in the sport in the wake of the BALCO scandal and a string of other troubling revelations, but -- with this latest shocking development -- has only generated more questions about the supposed transparency of the upgraded testing program.

The new system does not require baseball officials to identify the offending substance, so we are left to wait for the tawdry details to leak out piecemeal, which is what happened late last night when several publications, citing unnamed sources, reported Rafael Palmeiro's performance-enhancing drug of choice was stanozolol -- a potent steroid that experts doubt could have been ingested accidentally.

It was another startling body blow for fans who still wanted to believe that Palmeiro was somehow the victim a cruel mistake, but those reports remain unconfirmed and the fact that they are allowed to float around undisputed further diminishes the credibility of whole setup.

DOJ_NMG_0002133

Orioles second baseman Brian Roberts pondered the mysteries of the situation yesterday afternoon and summed up what a lot of players were thinking on the day after Palmeiro's impressive career was soiled by the announcement that he tested positive for a banned substance.

"With as much as we know today, you can look at it and say, 'Who knows? Maybe that could have been me,'" Roberts said. "When you're not getting answers about what people are caught for, how do you know?"

It's a fair question.

Palmeiro and agent Arn Tellem hid behind a confidentiality agreement when they were asked on Monday's conference call what substance Palmeiro ingested, making it that much harder to believe his contention that whatever was in his system got there unintentionally. Now, apparently, we know why.

Roberts was not criticizing Palmeiro. Quite the contrary. He was explaining why he and his teammates remain supportive of their tainted teammate, even as the rest of the baseball world seems to be convinced that he's just another steroid cheat delivering the standard steroid cheat excuse.

"Until we start getting answers, I don't believe in accusing someone when I don't have a clue what the facts are," Roberts said. "I guess somebody has the answers, but we don't."

The new drug program does function under a veil of confidentiality, which is intended to protect the privacy of the player, but it defeats the purpose of the supposedly tougher anti-steroid measures if that veil also is used to provide cover for a player who wants to maintain his innocence in the face of a damning test result.

I'm not saying that player is Palmeiro, but the small mathematical possibility that he was the victim of some sort of supplement contamination or labeling mix-up got a lot smaller when people started throwing around the name of the steroid that sunk Olympic gold medal sprinter Ben Johnson in 1988.

Of course, a red flag already had been raised when Palmeiro declined to provide any information to bolster his claim that the steroid violation was unintentional.

"I would feel that he was being much more honest if he explained exactly what happened ... what did you take," said Hall of Famer Jim Palmer. "Major League Baseball and Raffy have a pact, but there is nothing that says the player can't say anything."

Tellem insisted Monday that all parties are bound by a confidentiality pledge, but it's hard to imagine that it would be in anyone's interest to deny a player the right to defend his good name.

"If you're a Hall of Fame player, it only takes a moment to damage your image," Palmer said. "If you took something accidentally, I think you would do anything you could to clarify the situation. I hope he does that. I hope he does it for baseball. I hope he does it for himself."

Baseball's war on performance-enhancing drugs cleared an important public relations hurdle when a superstar player finally tested positive and accepted his 10-game suspension, but wasn't the real goal of the anti-steroid crusade to create a transparent system that restored full public faith in the national pastime?

And if so, why did Monday's stunning announcement still leave us all guessing?

Baseball's 'Live-Player' Era (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Did Rafael Palmeiro use steroids or didn't he? He said he didn't, and the President of the United States says he believes him.

Why should we care? We care because baseball is the "national pastime," and its meticulous rules, lore and personalities have become an ineffable metaphor for life itself in America. We admire magnificent lifetime achievements, and few are more magnificent than that of Baltimore Orioles first baseman Rafael Palmeiro's combined career total of 500 home runs and 3,000 base hits. If you know baseball, you know that is an astounding and rare human feat.

Baseball now has suspended Mr. Palmeiro for using a banned substance, widely believed to be a steroid, and an arbitrator ruled against his appeal. Mr. Palmeiro said it made "no sense" for him to take drugs in the same year he'd arrive at one of baseball's highest plateaus. George W. Bush, who as owner of the Texas Rangers knew Mr. Palmeiro, says, "I believe him."

DOJ_NMG_0002134

We don't know whom to believe. We do know that we have become fatigued by the steroids issue -- the debates between libertarians (who cares?) and purists (it ain't fair).

So here's a modest proposal. Baseball's fans know about the "dead-ball" era prior to 1920 and the "live-ball" era that followed. Whatever the much-debated cause, stats before and after were like night and day. So let's designate post-1995 the "live-player" era. Professional sports are now populated with chemicalized robots who are often fun to watch. But they are different than what went before. We can call this the "live-player" era, let the old heroes rest in peace and argue into the night about the new heroes like Mr. Palmeiro.

National Forest Yields Record Pot Busts (WCAU-TV)

WCAU-TV Philadelphia, August 4, 2005

Northern California forest officials say it's a title they're not proud of.

Video: Pictures From Record Pot Busts In Sequoia National Forest

Slideshow: Pot Grows In Sequoia National Forest

Last year, Sequoia National Forest topped the list for marijuana cultivation on U.S. Forest Service lands. And this year, they are on track to surpass that amount.

But officials have been taking steps to fight the problem, raiding several farms in the past three days.

Miles and miles of lush greenery surround the Sequoia National Forest. But hidden beneath these towering trees is a darker side full of these marijuana plants.

"It's becoming epidemic," says one person familiar with the problem. She says people have grown pot in the forest for more than 30 years.

But the problem has worsened over the last 10 years.

"They go to quite a bit...I mean they will hike everything up there. … I mean it's just amazing."

When officials say that this is big money, they are not kidding.

In fact about a pound of this stuff could yield about $4,000 in California and across the country you'd get up to twice as much.

Over the past week, county and forest authorities have recovered about 34,000 plants, bringing the total street value, to just under $136 million.

"We'd like to think we're making a dent," said one service official. "Obviously for every plant that comes out of the ground we're collecting, that's money that's not going to the drug cartel's hands."

But raids like this one aren't just about taking the drugs off the streets. It's also about helping the forest bounce back.

The pot that was seized was driven to an undisclosed location in the county, where it will be destroyed.

Bush Praises Colombia's Drug War (DMN)

By David Jackson, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas – President Bush on Thursday lauded Colombia's efforts to fight drug cartels and armed guerrillas, though some observers said the Latin American ally has a long way to go.

Welcoming President Alvaro Uribe to his ranch in Crawford, Mr. Bush said the U.S. anti-drug initiative known as Plan Colombia "is producing results" that include lower levels of crime.

"Our two nations are working together to fight drug trafficking and terrorism," Mr. Bush said after the meeting, "and to promote security, democracy and the rule of law throughout the Americas."

Mr. Uribe, considered Mr. Bush's best friend in Latin America, largely for his vocal support of the Iraq war, thanked the U.S. for its help, including more than $4 billion in aid since 2000.

"Colombia faces a threat from terrorism, funded by drug trafficking," Mr. Uribe said. "This is a threat that can affect the entire neighborhood, that can affect our entire continent."

Colombia remains locked in a four-decade war with left-wing guerrillas seeking to topple the government. The government is also trying to dismantle right-wing paramilitary groups that are battling the leftists.

DOJ_NMG_0002135

The fighters on both the left and right are backed by the various drug cartels. And all the armed organizations, including government security forces, have been accused of human rights abuses.

"The problems are profound," said John Walsh, a senior associate with the Washington Office on Latin America, which analyzes the impact of foreign policy on human rights. "The war rages on. And the drug trafficking – and the extent to which it funds armed groups – is as strong as ever."

Mr. Uribe is seeking to eliminate the rightist paramilitary groups through an amnesty program called Justice and Peace. But that initiative has been criticized as going easy on people suspected of drug running and murder.

In a recent report, Human Rights Watch stated that, "while a genuine demobilization of paramilitaries is obviously an important objective, the process as currently structured is unlikely to achieve its aims. To the contrary, it is likely to compound the country's problems."

Mr. Bush did not mention the Justice and Peace plan during his remarks but said that Colombia is interested in protecting human rights. Before Mr. Uribe's visit, the State Department announced that Colombia is meeting the human rights standards necessary to continue receiving full funding of U.S. aid programs.

The two leaders seemed to get on well. Mr. Bush spoke Spanish to the Colombian press corps and later took his counterpart for a spin around the ranch in a presidential pickup. Asked if he had a driver's license, Mr. Bush replied: "Si."

As the two presidents met, analysts said there is little evidence of a slowdown in Colombian cartel production of cocaine and heroin.

A recent report by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy said that, despite a major aerial spraying campaign, there were more acres of coca production at the end of 2004 than the year before.

Some analysts also pointed out that the American market maintains the Colombian cartels that finance the Colombian wars.

"Anybody who says drug consumption in the United States is a victimless crime hasn't been to Colombia," said Victor Hinojosa, who teaches international politics at Baylor University. "The only law drug traffickers don't break is the law of supply and demand."

Bush Welcomes Colombian Leader (Express-News)

By Gary Martin

The San Antonio Express-News, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD — President Bush pledged continued U.S. aid to fight narco-terrorism in Colombia, telling President Alvaro Uribe on Thursday that success against cocaine traffickers was essential for democracy in the Americas.

"America will continue to stand with the people of Colombia," Bush told a news conference at his Prairie Chapel Ranch here.

And he vowed to push Congress to approve more funds "so Colombia can build on its progress and win its war against the narco-terrorists."

Uribe was in Texas to promote trade and seek additional U.S. aid. He met with Bush at the president's sprawling ranch where the two leaders discussed the violence that has ripped at the heart of the Andean nation for 41 years.

"We have made progress, and we are winning, but we have not won yet," Uribe said in Spanish after the leaders emerged from meetings during the one-day visit.

The news conference came on a day that saw additional U.S. troop fatalities in Iraq, and growing apprehension about the problem-plagued space shuttle Discovery's anticipated return from orbit.

Bush expressed confidence in NASA, just days after he talked with the crew and watched on television the dramatic repairs made to the craft.

"Like a lot of Americans, I was amazed at the procedures that took place," he said.

Terrorism was the theme of comments by Bush and Uribe on Colombia's continued fight with armed groups, some tied to narco-traffickers.

DOJ_NMG_0002136

And the president's support for the Colombian government, even without additional aid, is a significant gesture, said Phil McClean with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"It's to keep the momentum going," said McLean, a former deputy assistant secretary of state for South America who once served as chief of mission in Bogota.

The trip to the ranch also was expected to boost Uribe's political standing at home.

Bush rewards allies of the United States with visits to his ranch, and the meeting between the two leaders was seen as a diplomatic plum for Uribe, whose recently passed "Justice and Peace" law has been criticized by human rights groups.

Over 70,000 civilians have been killed in the past 20 years at the hands of Colombia's armed groups. Human rights groups say the most pressing concern is the violence against women, often sexually assaulted and mutilated before being killed.

"Despite, or perhaps because of the administration's close working relationship with Uribe, the U.S. has failed to use its leverage and influence with the Colombian government to ensure an end to human rights violations by the Colombian military," said Dr. William Schulz, Amnesty International USA executive director.

Dr. Victor Hinojosa, an expert on Latin America at Baylor University, said the scope of the violence and death makes Colombia "the great humanitarian crisis no one has heard about."

But Bush used a joint news conference here to applaud Uribe for the progress being made against armed groups in Colombia, including right-wing paramilitaries and the Marxist guerillas tied to the narcotics trade.

Bush said violent crime in Colombia is down to its lowest levels in 16 years, and the number of kidnappings, murders and terrorist attacks have declined significantly.

"Our strategic partnership is vital to the security, prosperity and freedom of both our countries and the Americas," Bush said.

The United States has sent $3.5 billion in aid to Colombia since 2000 to curb narcotics trafficking and battle with the armed groups accountable for 70 percent of the country's violent deaths.

Earlier this week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice certified Colombia's record on human rights, a measure sought by Congress. The action will release $70 million in funds for programs to combat narco-terrorism.

The Colombian president's trip to Texas included a stop in Houston on Wednesday where he sought foreign investment in the country's burgeoning oil and gas industry.

Uribe spoke to Texas business leaders about the need for growing trade between the two countries to ensure democratic growth in the Andean region.

His meeting with Bush included talks about a free trade agreement, similar to the pact with Central American nations approved by the House of Representatives last week.

He arrived at Bush's ranch in a helicopter. The president and first lady Laura Bush greeted the Colombian couple, shook hands and patted backs before jumping into a Ford 4X4 pickup for a quick trip through the prairie fields and back to the house for meetings and lunch.

The president and first lady served Uribe and wife, Lina, chilled avocado soup, pecan-smoked tenderloin with roasted summer vegetables and a tomato and cucumber salad.

Bush is spending the month of August at his Texas ranch. He will travel to Albuquerque, N.M., on Monday to sign the long-awaited energy bill. The president travels to the Chicago area on Wednesday to sign the transportation bill.

Bush Vows To Sustain Aid For Colombia Drug War (REU)

By Patricia Wilson

Reuters, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas, Aug 4 (Reuters) - U.S. President George W. Bush pledged on Thursday to sustain funding for Colombia's fight against drugs and violence even as a senior State Department official said Washington would like to reduce its anti-narcotics aid.

As a close partner in the region, Colombian President Alvaro Uribe paid a coveted visit to the president's Texas ranch where the two leaders stood side by side on a barren patch of land outside Bush's new office under a blazing sun and declared themselves united in the war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0002137

"We have made progress and we are winning, but we have not won yet," Uribe said. "We cannot leave this task half finished, we must take it all the way to the end."

According to Colombian government figures, killings have declined by 34 percent and kidnappings by 56 percent since Uribe was elected in 2002. Uribe stressed the importance of continuing U.S. cooperation in the four-decades-old conflict with leftist rebels.

The United States has provided more than $3 billion in assistance to Colombia over the past five years as part of an effort to wipe out cocaine and heroin production and crush the long-running leftist insurgency.

A senior State Department official said the United States wanted to reduce its anti-narcotics aid for Bogota after its massive assistance program, Plan Colombia, lapses later this year.

"We would like them to share more of the burden," said the official, who did not want to be identified because the governments had been discussing the assistance in private.

Washington is waiting for Bogota to make a formal request for how much aid it needs following Plan Colombia, the official added.

Critics say the Uribe administration spent hundreds of millions of dollars a year of U.S. aid largely on military hardware and beefing up the armed forces rather than tackling the problems that spawned the guerrilla movements.

BACKING BOGOTA'S STRATEGY

Bush said Bogota's strategy to reduce the illegal drug trade, revitalize Colombia's economy, strengthen its democratic institutions and improve the security of its people was working.

"And we'll ask the Congress to sustain our commitment to follow-on programs for Plan Colombia so Colombia can build on its progress and win its war against the narcoterrorists," Bush told reporters before getting behind the wheel of his white pickup truck to give Uribe a tour of his 1,600-acre (650-hectare) ranch.

Their meeting came in the same week Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice certified Colombia was respecting human rights and distancing itself from paramilitary groups sufficiently to allow U.S. aid to be given to its military.

The decision means about $62 million can be handed over to Colombia as part of the U.S. government's budgets for the 2004 and 2005 fiscal years that run October to October.

A quarter of U.S. aid for the Colombian military is conditioned on its human rights record. Each year, the United States has certified the funds can be handed over.

Uribe said he and Bush discussed human rights "with great seriousness and with great respect."

"I listened intensely and believe that he is interested in following through ... so that the world will hear loud and clear that Colombia is a nation of law and human rights and human dignity," Bush said. (Additional reporting by Saul Hudson)

Bush Welcomes Colombia's Uribe At Ranch (AP)

By DEB RIECHMANN

The Associated Press, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas (AP) - President Bush gave Colombia President Alvaro Uribe a hearty handshake and several friendly pats on the back as he welcomed him to his Texas ranch on Thursday, a gesture that underscores his closeness with Washington's close Latin America partner.

Drug trafficking, terrorism and trade topped the agenda for the meeting at the ranch where Bush likes to conduct homespun diplomacy away for the formality of the White House and Washington.

For Bush, Uribe's visit on Thursday was a way to bolster the leader of a nation that is fighting terrorists and drug lords and working to build better trade relations with the United States.

For Uribe, the trek to Texas came at a critical moment in Colombia where rebels, funded by narcotics trade, kidnapping and extortion, have been struggling to topple the government and establish a Marxist-style state. Outlawed right-wing paramilitary forces also have been battling the rebels. The 40-year-old conflict kills more than 3,000 people every year, mostly civilians, with allegations that human rights abuses are being committed on all sides.

DOJ_NMG_0002138

Uribe was meeting with Bush after recently signing the ``justice and peace" law, which aims to dismantle paramilitary forces that also are heavily involved in drug trafficking and reintegrate them into the legal side of Colombian society. Critics say the new law goes too easy on criminals.

On his way to his meeting with Bush, Uribe stopped Wednesday in Houston to try to assure foreign investors that his country is stable and brimming with economic opportunity despite civil strife. Colombian officials have been holding meetings in Houston and other cities asking foreign investors to help develop new, unexplored oil fields in the South American country.

``In terms of security, we are winning but we haven't won yet," Uribe said in Houston. ``Without security, there is no possibility for investment, for new jobs."

If official visits are evidence of the closeness of U.S.-Colombia relations, then it's clear the two nations are fast friends. Bush visited Colombia in November 2004, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in Bogota in April, the department's third-ranking official was in Colombia last week and now Uribe's visit.

Uribe is hoping the United States will continue sending money to help train and equip Colombian police and armed forces to fight guerillas and paramilitary groups.

Their meeting comes just a day after the State Department announced that Colombia's government and armed forces have met human rights standards needed to qualify for full funding of U.S. assistance programs. Colombia has received more than $3 billion in U.S. aid during the past five years as part of an effort to wipe out cocaine and heroin production and crush the long-running leftist insurgency.

Congress imposed conditions on U.S. assistance to push Colombia to curb human rights abuses. Failing to meet the standards would have meant a cut of about $70 million, according to a State Department estimate.

Amnesty International USA quickly challenged the certification made by Rice.

``This decision is a major blow to the promotion of human rights in Colombia and is based on only the narrowest reading of the law and the thinnest of evidence," said Dr. William F. Schulz, executive director of the group.

During a speech on Wednesday, Nicholas Burns, the State Department's third-ranking official, defended the controversial ``justice and peace" plan, saying it will help ``dismantle the criminal structures of demobilized illegal armed groups, provide for peace with justice and permit continued extradition."

The initiative, however, has been sharply criticized by Human Rights Watch.

The Colombian government is allowing groups that have committed thousands of atrocities, including massacres, killings and kidnappings, to launder illegal fortunes and legitimize their political power, says Jose Miguel Vivanco, Human Rights Watch's director for the Americas.

``The government's approach to demobilization allows paramilitary commanders to put on a show of disarming some troops," Vivanco said. ``But the government has not truly attempted to dismantle their mafia-like networks, seize their illegally acquired fortunes or ensure a full cessation of abuses.'

Uribe Proposes Buying Coca To Foil Drug Trade (WT)

By Carmen Gentile, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

RIO DE JANEIRO -- Colombian President Alvaro Uribe, who met with President Bush in Texas yesterday, has implemented a program to buy coca plants from small-time growers who otherwise would sell their crops to drug traffickers to make cocaine.

Farmers also can turn over opium poppies, the plants used to make heroin.

Under the plan, farmers can go to the nearest police station or army outpost and turn over the plants to officers and soldiers. Prices for the crop will be negotiated on the spot.

"Hand over the coca and take the cash, similar to a country fair: Hand over the pig, take the cash," Mr. Uribe said of the program earlier this week.

The farmers must sign a legally binding agreement to halt cultivation, said Mr. Uribe, who has made a name for himself as a hard-liner bent on cracking down on the nation's Marxist rebels and cooperating with the United States on drug eradication.

Yesterday, Mr. Uribe visited Mr. Bush at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, to discuss bilateral efforts in the war on drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0002139

Mr. Bush is urging Congress to renew Plan Colombia, a five-year-old anti-drug-trafficking program started under President Clinton.

The United States has given Colombia more than $3 billion in anti-drug aid.

Mr. Uribe's coca and opium purchase plan is available only in Colombia's central Meta region, where an ongoing battle between the military and rebels has forced small coca farmers to seek new buyers for their crops.

Rebels in the region typically traffic in the coca to finance their armed struggle against the Colombian government. Mr. Uribe said recent military operations have forced the rebels into hiding, leaving the farmers without buyers.

The program has come under harsh criticism from lawmakers such as Colombian Sen. Rafael Pardo, who said it would encourage small farmers to grow more coca just so they could sell it to the government, a guaranteed and steady paying customer.

Mr. Pardo -- who is a likely presidential candidate in next year's elections -- and other critics say farmers will find ways to continue cultivating illegal crops and selling them to the government, the rebels or right-wing paramilitaries that also produce cocaine for income, or all three.

"People are obviously going to plant more to sell more to the government," said an official in a human rights group in Medellin, the cocaine-producing capital of Colombia.

The program is also likely to ruffle feathers in Washington, where lawmakers recently approved a bill increasing the funding to Colombia for drug eradication.

In the past five years, the United States has spent $3.3 billion on coca-plant eradication through equipment and military training for Colombian soldiers. The plan involves aerial spraying of existing coca crops and encouraging farmers to adopt a legal crop.

Despite U.S. efforts, a recent White House report showed that coca production increased in Colombia last year.

A separate report by the United Nations said drug production has declined in Colombia in the past few years, but was on the rise in other Andean countries, such as Peru and Bolivia.

"Our current approach is the wrong approach," said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat. "We are spending a lot of money down there, and there is no accountability."

Bush Warns Colombian Leader On Human Rights (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas — President Bush urged Congress to continue supporting Colombia's efforts to combat narco-terrorism Thursday even as he warned visiting Colombian President Alvaro Uribe that the United States expected Uribe's government to honor its stated commitment to human rights.

"We did talk about human rights. I talked about human rights," Bush told reporters as Uribe visited the president's Texas ranch. "We talked about specific cases, and I listened intently and believe that he is interested in following through on these cases."

Victims' advocacy groups in Colombia have said that a new so-called Justice and Peace law is too weak. They claim that the measure — which governs the process of dismantling Colombia's paramilitary groups and re-integrating them into Colombian society — allows members to escape charges of atrocities committed against civilians.

In his own remarks, Uribe renewed his commitment to the rule of law and to bring about "transparency" in his government. "We have a democratic government that has full respect for public freedom and that fully intends to defeat terrorism," he said.

Bush said he would ask Congress to "sustain our commitment to follow-on programs for Plan Colombia, so Colombia can build on its progress and win its war against the narco-terrorists."

Plan Colombia is an aid program begun under President Clinton to crack down on drug trafficking and curb the decades-long conflict among the government, Marxist rebels and right-wing militias. Under the plan, the United States has poured more than $3.3 billion in aid into Colombia, the vast majority in the form of law enforcement and military assistance.

DOJ_NMG_0002140

In June, a House committee approved the administration's request for $734.5 million for next year as part of a foreign aid bill.

Though the plan has been credited with reducing killings, massacres of villagers and kidnappings blamed on drug trafficking since 2002, some U.S. lawmakers and groups such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International have said far more needs to be done.

"Despite, or perhaps because of, the administration's close working relationship with Uribe, the U.S. has failed to use its leverage and influence with the Colombian government to ensure an end to human rights violations by the Colombian military," said William F. Schulz, executive director of Amnesty International USA.

"This support is based on half-truths that disguise myriad flaws in Colombian justice," Schultz said in a statement.

Victor Hinojosa, a Baylor University political scientist who specializes in U.S.-Colombian affairs, called Colombia "the greatest humanitarian crisis no one has heard about.'"

At the same time, by granting Uribe a coveted and high-profile visit to his ranch, Bush signaled support for a leader who has strongly backed Bush's Iraq policy, Hinojosa said. "Symbols matter," he said. "And this [visit] is an important symbol that he has U.S. support."

Colombia Warlords Testify About Congress "friends" (REU)

By Jason Webb

Reuters, August 5, 2005

BOGOTA, Colombia, Aug 4 (Reuters) - Two leaders of Colombia's far-right paramilitaries were summoned before the Supreme Court on Thursday to explain a comment that a third of the country's lawmakers were friends of the outlawed group.

Salvatore Mancuso and Vicente Castano, whose illegal United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia is in peace talks with the government, were ordered to testify after Castano made the remark to news magazine Semana in June, the government said.

"I think I can say that more than 35 percent of Congress are friends," Castano had told Semana.

Mancuso, a former AUC military commander, was summoned because he had made a similar remark in 2002 and appeared first before the closed session.

The burly former rancher, who surrendered his weapons to the government in December, was able to travel to the capital Bogota due to immunity from arrest granted by his status as a negotiator in the two-year-old talks.

Asked before the session about a comment he made in 2002, which was widely interpreted to mean the illegal group exercised influence over 30 percent of Colombia's congress, Mancuso told local radio he was merely referring to legislators from areas under paramilitary control.

"That 30 percent was just the percentage of the population and the electorate living in areas protected by the self-defense forces," Mancuso told Radio W.

"We don't have employees or representatives or congressmen who take orders. No. But there are congressmen who understand the nation's problems and the problems of the forgotten rural Colombia."

The AUC has its origins in vigilante gangs set up by cocaine traffickers and cattle ranchers to defend themselves from Marxist rebels and has evolved into an illegal army with uniforms, command structure and control of a large portion of Colombia's huge cocaine trade.

While it often cooperated with sectors of the armed forces to kill leftist guerrillas and their suspected sympathizers, the AUC also took advantage of government military weakness to set itself up as the de facto authority in extensive parts of the country.

Thousands of people are killed every year in Colombia's war, which has dragged on since 1964.

Under President Alvaro Uribe, Colombia's military has grown in strength, and the government began peace talks with the AUC. More than 6,000 paramilitaries have disarmed.

Uribe, who has also launched offensives against Marxist rebels, is enthusiastically backed by the United States which provides hundreds of millions of dollars of military aid a year. Confirming his status as the closest U.S. ally in Latin America, U.S. President George W. Bush met with Uribe at his Texas ranch on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0002141

Under a law passed by Colombia's Congress, paramilitary leaders will face criminal proceedings for their organization's many crimes, which include thousands of killings as well as kidnapping, extortion and torture. But jail time is limited to a maximum of eight years.

KKK Member Pleads Guilty On Making Pipe Bombs To Blow Up Hispanics (CHATT)

Chattanooga (TN) Chattanoogan, August 5, 2005

A Klu Klux Klansman from South Pittsburg entered guilty pleas Thursday in connection with constructing pipe bombs for use in blowing up Hispanic immigrants.

Daniel James Schertz, 27, pleaded guilty to six counts in an appearance before Federal Judge Curtis Collier.

Prosecutor James Brooks said he faces up to 10 years on five of the counts and 20 years on another.

Sentencing is Nov. 4 at 2 p.m.

The pleas were to manufacturing explosives, transporting explosives, teaching others how to make explosives, and possessing a Ruger pistol while under a restraining order.

In an affidavit, ATF Agent Mike Connors said between October 2004 and April 1 of this year, he and a confidential informant investigated activities of Schertz related to his membership in the Ku Klux Klan.

The agent said on April 1 he bought five pipe bombs from Schertz for $750 at his residence at 245 Beene Cemetery Road.

He said he and the informant walked to a shed on the property and he saw two partially completed pipe bombs lying on a workbench. He said Schertz was wearing rubber gloves and appeared to have been working on the pipe bombs.

He said Schertz picked up a black container of gunpowder and "said it was more powerful than the last stuff he used."

The agent said he observed various bomb components in the shed, including spark plugs, spark plug wires, gunpowder, packages of screws and several more pipes still wrapped in plastic.

Agt. Connors said Schertz said he needed to go to Lowe's to get five end caps to complete the pipe bombs.

He said on the way to Lowe's, Schertz began talking about acquiring firearms and accessories. He reached to his right side, ejected the magazine from his Ruger semi-automatic pistol, and said, "These will go right through a vest."

The affidavit says Schertz gave advice on using the pipe bombs to blow up a bus transporting Hispanic workers. He said he would like to "take care of" another specific group of Hispanic immigrants.

They returned to the shed and Schertz completed the pipe bombs, it was stated. He was then paid the $750.

Authorities said Schertz's ex-wife, Shauna Schertz, had a protective order against him.

Ex-Klansman Pleads Guilty In Bomb Building (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Filed at 10:10 p.m. ET

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. (AP) -- A former Ku Klux Klansman charged with building pipe bombs to use against Mexicans and Haitians changed his plea to guilty Thursday.

Daniel Schertz, 27, built five pipe bombs and sold them to an undercover federal agent and a confidential informant for $750 in April, authorities said.

The bombs were to be "detonated on a bus carrying Mexican workers to work in Florida" according to a plea agreement filed Thursday. Schertz also was accused of building and transferring two pipe bombs to the informant in March to harm Haitians in Florida.

Schertz said Thursday that he was guilty of all six charges, including teaching and demonstrating how to make a weapon of mass destruction and interstate transport of explosive material with intent to kill or injure.

Interstate transport of explosives carries a minimum sentence of 10 years, while the other charges combined carry a maximum sentence of 60 years, Assistant U.S. Attorney James Brooks said.

Schertz's attorney, Mike Caputo, said the plea agreement allowed him to "avoid a harsher sentence."

Schertz's former Klan leader, White Knights Imperial Wizard Billy Jeffery, has said Schertz was "banished" from the Klan in mid-May for unrelated disobedience.

Church Fire Ruled Arson (WTVF-TV)

WTVF-TV, CBS 5, Nashville, TN, August 5, 2005

The fire that destroyed the Pentecostal Church of Jesus Christ in Columbia Tuesday night was intentionally set according to fire investigators.

The fire started around 11:30 p.m. Tuesday, two hours after a night service ended at the church.

Several fire departments fought the fire for four hours, and investigators began looking into the cause of the blaze as soon as the flames were extinguished.

Thursday, officials from the ATF said that after examining the scene and conducting several interviews, they determined that the fire was intentionally set.

"A house of worship is a place of peace and where community members come together. Arson puts many at risk of injury or death, including police and fire personnel. The Columbia community can be assured that the combined resources used in this investigation will continue to work vigorously to ultimately bring those responsible to justice", said ATF Special Agent James Cavanaugh.

Church members built the 14,000 square foot church almost 10 years ago, and said they just paid the loan on it two months ago. ATF officials estimated the damage to the church at more than $2 million.

A $1,500 reward has been offered for information leading to the arrest of the person or people responsible for fire. Anyone with information has been asked to call the Arson Hotline at 1-800-762-3017 or the ATF Arson Hotline at 1-888-ATF-FIRE (1-888-283-3473).

IMMIGRATION:

DeLay Criticizes Houston's Policy On Illegal Immigrants (HC)

By Edward Hegstrom

Houston Chronicle, August 5, 2005

SUGAR LAND - House Majority Leader Tom DeLay criticized the city of Houston's "sanctuary" policy toward illegal immigrants in a speech Thursday night.

Speaking to a packed house of Fort Bend County Republican faithful, DeLay said he supported the concept behind legislation introduced by U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., that would withhold federal funding from cities such as Houston that refuse to enforce immigration law.

"It greatly concerns me that the police chief in Houston, Texas, has created a sanctuary in Houston by announcing that he is not going to enforce our laws," the Sugar Land Republican said, in response to a question about Tancredo's bill.

"That is unacceptable, and we hope to address it through Tancredo's legislation or other legislation."

Since 1992, a Houston Police Department policy has officially forbidden officers from enforcing immigration laws in most cases.

Mayor Bill White has said he supports continuing the policy, because he believes immigration is a federal matter and he wants to free police up to protect the city from violent criminals.

Police in Katy also have a court-ordered policy forbidding them from enforcing immigration laws. The order came as the result of a federal lawsuit filed after a 1994 police operation to pick up day laborers.

DeLay, who is seen as a key player on upcoming immigration reform legislation in Congress, said he would support a guest-worker program that would allow immigrants to come legally to the United States and then go home. But he said the government needs to step up enforcement of immigration laws first.

"Before Congress takes any significant legislation, we must secure our nation's borders," he said.

Two major proposalsTwo major pieces of immigration are expected to be considered when Congress returns in September.

One proposal, sponsored by Senators Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and John McCain, R-Ariz., would allow some illegal immigrants to work toward becoming legal residents and then citizens of the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0002143

Senators John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyle, R-Ariz., propose a tougher bill that would allow illegal immigrants to become guest workers, meaning they would have to go home after working here three years or more.

Cornyn and Kyle also propose tougher enforcement, including increased patrols at the border and new requirements on employers seeking to hire workers.

DeLay indicated that he would support legislation even stricter than Cornyn's. He does not believe illegal immigrants already in the country should qualify, and he does not believe guest workers should be allowed to bring their families.

Asked if he would support McCain-Kennedy, he said: "It's not going to do very well in the House, I'll guarantee that."

Places for detaineesDeLay noted that until now, even the federal government has not rounded up illegal immigrants in U.S. cities, because federal agents had no place to detain them. But he said that is changing under the new leadership at the Department of Homeland Security.

He encouraged local police to round up illegal immigrants, and promised that the federal government will find places to house them.

"If you pick up 50 or 100 of them, you can call the National Guard," he said. "Put them in tents."

He also said he did not support educating illegal immigrants or having their U.S.-born children become automatically U.S. citizens. But he said those would be harder to repeal.

DeLay also said he strongly supports legal immigration, which he says makes this country stronger.

He said immigration is a top issue among his constituents.

edward.hegstrom@chron.com

DeLay Pushes Border Security, Sales Tax (GalvestonNews)

By T J Aulds

Galveston County Daily News, August 5, 2005

LA MARQUE — House Majority Leader Tom DeLay received a warm welcome during his first official visit to the city since, thanks to redistricting, he became the area's congressman.

Speaking to the La Marque Rotary Club, which saw increased attendance from neighboring clubs, DeLay spent much of the time introducing himself and his political philosophy.

He spun tales of his early days as a Fort Bend County businessman, who, while running for state office would not even admit he was a Republican, and his ascension to Majority Leader of the U.S. Congress.

Talk of replacing the federal tax system with a national sales tax, tougher standards and accountability for federal judges, border security and the issue of eminent domain seemed to resonate the audience.

He reiterated, too, the continued push for the GOP majority's " most ambitious agenda" with emphasis on homeland security and border issues.

DeLay, whose 22nd Congressional District includes La Marque, portions of Texas City, Santa Fe and much of the North County, got ovations for his views about border security.

"First we need to convince the American people we will secure the border," he said. "Any guest worker program will come later."

He voiced his support of a proposal that would see the governor "deputize people on the border" to assist Border Patrol agents.

Each time the crowd, which included local Republican Party chairman Chris Stevens and a bevy of county GOP movers and shakers, interrupted DeLay's comments with boisterous applause.

But, as has become the norm, DeLay couldn't come to town without meeting with protest.

Santa Fe resident John Fafoutakis was the lone picket outside Gulf Greyhound Park, where the meeting was held.

The Navy veteran who said protesting at DeLay functions was a hobby, held up a sign chastising the congressman for what he called a lack of support for veterans hospitals and medical clinics.

"How come the VA has to constantly fight for its survival with these guys in Congress," said Fafoutakis. "They should be taking care of veterans and each time the funding gets cut by the very people who are putting our troops in harm's way again."

DOJ_NMG_0002144

DeLay said the protestor's anger was misplaced.

"The VA has gotten the funding it needs, we have always been there for the VA and its hospitals," DeLay said.

Border Vigil To Stand Until New Agents Hired (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Civilian volunteers scheduled to begin a border vigil in California next month will man observation posts along the U.S.-Mexico border until they are relieved by newly hired U.S. Border Patrol agents or National Guard troops, an organizer said yesterday.

"Our borders are not under the operational control of our government. Instead, they are controlled by alien and drug smugglers," said Andy Ramirez, head of the California-based Friends of the Border Patrol (FBP), which has organized the vigil.

"Our mission is to provide a safe living environment for our local citizens until the U.S. government provides the security for which it is responsible," Mr. Ramirez said. "The FBP volunteers will stand their posts until properly relieved."

More than 3,000 civilian volunteers -- including former Border Patrol agents, retired police officers, military personnel and pilots -- have signed up to patrol the U.S.-Mexico border in California beginning Sept. 16 -- Mexican Independence Day.

The vigil was called to highlight what organizers said is the failure of Congress and the White House to secure U.S. borders.

The volunteers are expected to set up observation posts near Calexico, Calif., in an area known as Smuggler's Gulch, and at the Border Field State Park, just north of Tijuana, Mexico. The exact locations of all the sites and patrol areas have not been made public.

The vigil has received the endorsement of James W. Gilchrist, who organized the Minuteman Project in Arizona in April that targeted a 23-mile section of the U.S.-Mexico border. He said the U.S. government has failed to do anything about what he termed a "border crisis."

"President Bush ... says the most solemn duty of the American president is to protect the American people: Mr. Bush, tell it to someone else," he said. "You are derelict of your constitutional oath and duty to protect us by leaving our borders unsecured."

A total of 857 volunteers participated in the 30-day Minuteman vigil, during which they protested lax U.S. immigration-enforcement policies by trying to reduce the flow of illegal aliens along popular immigration and drug-smuggling corridors near Naco, Ariz.

Their goal was to show that increased manpower on the border effectively would deter illegal entry. Organizers said the protest directly resulted in Border Patrol arrests of 349 illegal aliens. Border Patrol field agents said the flow of illegal aliens through the targeted area dropped from 500 apprehensions a day to about 15 a day.

Mr. Ramirez said the California volunteers want to call the country's attention to the "real plight of those who live along the border who are being overrun by illegal aliens and drug smugglers." He said it was "imperative to send a message to Washington, D.C., that open borders and the havoc they create is unacceptable to our citizens."

Day-Laborer Site Rebuffed (WP)

By Carol Morello, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

The Herndon Planning Commission rejected yesterday a controversial proposal to build a tax-supported day-laborer site near a residential neighborhood, but the Town Council still will have the final say and remains on track for a vote later this month.

Officials with the social agency that wants to run the site for up to 150 workers said they are still trying to digest the accumulated criticisms of the plan that preceded the commission's 4 to 3 denial in a vote taken at 2:30 a.m.

"It's been given a blow, but it's not dead," said Bill Threlkeld, director of Project Hope and Harmony, the umbrella group that has applied for permission to build and operate the site, where contractors and homeowners could meet laborers seeking jobs.

Proponents say the challenge will be to address concerns expressed by residents without making so many concessions that day laborers will not want to use the site. Mayor Michael L. O'Reilly said the council, which will take up the matter in two weeks, is almost certain to demand several conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0002145

"We will look at the application to see where change is feasible and realistic," said Joel Mills, a member of Project Hope and Harmony's executive council. "But there is a concern that so many conditions will be placed on how we operate that it becomes less and less feasible to do it successfully."

The designated site on the Loudoun County border would replace an informal site around a 7-Eleven parking lot. Several similar sites have been created throughout the region, including in Silver Spring and Langley Park.

In Herndon, an ordinance is being drafted that would make it a misdemeanor to solicit jobs curbside, but the town cannot legally outlaw day-laborer activity without zoning a site where it is permissible.

Herndon's struggle to cope with a day-laborer site has become a contentious chapter in the national debate over immigration policy. An unknown number of day laborers are in the country illegally; some estimates say as many as 85 percent of day laborers in Herndon are illegal.

Hundreds of critics have spoken out at public hearings like the one that stretched over seven hours Wednesday night into yesterday morning. Residents of nearby developments in Loudoun County as well as Herndon, several of them legal immigrants, said that they feared having strangers traipse through their neighborhoods en route to the site and that they worried its presence would decrease their property values. Others said they did not want their tax dollars used to support an enterprise that helps people who are in the country illegally.

After hearing the last of 130 speakers over the course of two nights, planning commissioners voted on a series of conditions. Among them were a limit of 100 laborers instead of 150, and a requirement that the site be closed on Sundays and federal holidays.

Frequently the debate veered from neighborhood concerns into a discussion of national immigration policy and assimilation.

"This is the United States of America, not the Diverse States of America," said William Tirrell Sr., a commission member who introduced most of the conditions. "We don't segregate ourselves in little pods of people. I'm not a hyphenated American. I'm an American. We need to take these folks and make them part of us. But I will not support tax dollars being used to support an illegal enterprise."

After approving the conditions, the commission voted not to recommend it.

The nonbinding vote was more a signal of the panel's displeasure than a serious hurdle. With some regularity, Herndon's council differs with the planning commission.

Ann V. Hull, a council member who often has criticized day-laborer sites, said she expects Project Hope and Harmony to modify its proposal to address the issues that opponents have raised. She also said she wants the group to justify the prediction that the official site can work.

But O'Reilly, who campaigned last year on a promise to improve the day-laborer situation, said he believes the concerns can be alleviated with a few modifications.

"I do believe this site can work and would work effectively," he said. "We're committed to trying to solve this problem."

Illegal Immigrants, Long Islanders Clash (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

FARMINGVILLE, N.Y. (AP) -- This middle-class Long Island community an hour from New York City and 2,000 miles from the Mexican border has become an unlikely flashpoint in the national debate over illegal immigration, with Hispanics beaten, harassed and evicted in recent weeks.

For more than a decade, immigrants from Mexico or Central America have been drawn to Long Island by the prospect of jobs. Many stand on street corners in Farmingville, waiting for contractors, landscapers and others to offer them a day's work at about $10 an hour. Then at night they go back to their illegally overcrowded single-family homes.

The immigrants, many of whom are believed to have entered the country illegally, have been a source of tension among longtime residents since at least the late 1990s, but things have gotten worse this summer -- so bad that the head of the Mexican Consulate in New York City said Farmingville was "clearly a red zone after the Arizona border" in the abuse of immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0002146

In late June, two men were charged with a hate crime for allegedly berating a Mexican woman and her husband as the couple backed their van out of a parking lot. Within weeks, two more suspects were arrested and accused of yelling racial epithets and throwing a beer bottle at a Hispanic day laborer.

That same day, four people demonstrating at a 7-Eleven in support of day laborers were arrested when they surrounded an anti-immigration protester's car and refused to let him out.

Police are also investigating an attack in nearby Patchogue on a 61-year-old Ecuadorean man. He was beaten by three men who supposedly asked if he had a green card.

The tension was ratcheted up in mid-June, when officials in the town of Brookhaven, which includes Farmingville, and Suffolk County police began evicting men from overcrowded houses, citing health and safety violations. Dozens of people were jammed into the tiny one-family homes.

So far, at least six houses have been shut by authorities -- including three last Friday -- leaving more than 100 men homeless, advocates said.

Advocates claimed the immigrants have been thrown into the streets without warning. One advocate called it "ethnic cleansing."

"Many local officials have punted, saying this is a federal issue and we can't do anything about it. Well, there are some things you can do," Suffolk County Executive Steve Levy responded. "Crack down on those contractors, crack down on illegal housing and create a better relationship with immigration officials."

Levy complained that it is the Mexican government's "failed policies, both economically and otherwise, that have been pushing millions of his residents over the border for a better life in America."

Arturo Sarukhan, head of the Mexican Consulate in New York City, agreed that Mexico needs to solve its economic problems so that its citizens do not leave for a better life in America. But he said officials on Long Island must realize that the day laborers are here to stay and "there is a need to work together."

"At the end of the day, they may or may not like it, but it is the reality," he said.

A spokeswoman for the Town of Brookhaven estimated there are 150 houses, each with dozens of suspected illegal workers, in Farmingville, though some landlords have pre-emptively evicted some tenants for fear of trouble with the law.

"If they're going to throw anybody out of an apartment, they have to give them time," said Carlos Tenorio, a 26-year-old day laborer from Mexico City who has been in Farmingville for about nine months. "These people are not the cause of the problem."

Farmingville saw immigration-related violence a few years ago. In 2000, two Mexican men were beaten by two locals who promised them work. On the Fourth of July 2003, a Mexican family barely escaped with their lives after teens set their house ablaze by shooting fireworks through a window. But tensions appeared to ease after three of the assailants were sent to prison -- two of them for 25 years.

Residents are largely cheering the crackdown on immigrants.

"I think they are doing a terrific job," said Terry Sherwood, who complained that residents in the jammed houses often drink late into the night and urinate and defecate on lawns and backyards. "I don't care who they are, what color they are. I don't care where they come from. Why should people have to live this way?"

Lisa Marino placed a Mexican flag on her front lawn in solidarity with the workers but also applauded efforts by officials to curb illegal housing.

"There's a lack of assimilation," she said of the workers. "You don't leave garbage out, you don't whistle at neighbors. They need to understand that, but by keeping them marginalized, they don't learn that."

Nadia Marin-Molina, an advocate for the day laborers, understands the concerns expressed by neighbors, but insisted "it's a two-way street."

"Some of these same people who are complaining are the people who benefit from the work these guys do," she said. "Because every house has landscaping done, or has to have some job done on their roof, or some painting done."

A Strategy On Border Security (DCExaminer)

By Mike Crapo

DC Examiner, August 5, 2005

In May, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff stated, "The issue of securing the border is a homeland security issue, it's an immigration issue and it's also a humanitarian issue." He is absolutely correct: discussions about securing our 5,500-mile Canadian border, 1,900-mile Mexican border and 95,000 miles of shoreline are only meaningful in the context of defense, immigration and respect for human life. As the Homeland Security Appropriations bill goes to conference, Congress is developing a comprehensive strengthening of our borders as a major component of this legislation. Border security requires tight controls at our borders and follow-up by manpower and technology within our borders.

Annually:

- 16 million cargo containers enter the U.S.
- 500 million people cross our borders, 330 million are non-citizens
- 11 million undocumented aliens live in the U.S.

These numbers represent an enormous and daunting risk that requires us to be proactive in vigilance and preparation. Our borders will be strong, secure and meaningful when they represent freedom and protection for those in compliance with the law.

Effective border security is well-funded and reinforced by laws that carry tough legal consequences for those who break them. Various border and immigration components must be strengthened including more agents, immigration investigators and other enforcement personnel; quality training for these positions; hardware and infrastructure to augment job success, including unmanned aerial vehicles, high-tech sensors and advanced physical barriers; technology upgrades for cargo inspection and identification of fraudulent immigration documents; additional capacity at temporary detention centers.

The FY 2006 Homeland Security Appropriations bill aims to fund 1,000 new border patrol agents, 300 additional immigration investigators and 460 new detention and enforcement agents and officers. This would raise the total numbers to 12,500 border patrol agents, 6,100 criminal investigators, 2,700 immigration enforcement agents and detention officers.

The legislation provides additional funds for training, operations of the fourth northern border airwing and replacement of aging helicopters. More than 2,200 new detention facility beds will be added bringing the total to 22,700 and 41 ports, up from 19, will be utilizing the new Container Security Initiative to screen high-risk cargo before it leaves foreign ports. The bill funds camera and sensor technology and construction along the Mexican and Canadian borders, and calls for the development of advanced radiation portal monitors.

The creation of the Department of Homeland Security has allowed us to integrate homeland defense, focusing particular attention on border security. Funds have been allocated to develop radiological, biological, chemical and nuclear countermeasures, biosurveillance and threat and vulnerability assessments. It has been four years since an attack and while the events in London are only the latest indicators that this war isn't over, our law enforcement has been very successful in deterrence efforts. They are to be commended on their vigilance, while ensuring that individual liberties and freedoms have been meticulously safe-guarded and defended.

It's the responsibility of the federal government to protect us at home. Truly successful homeland defense has another component - personal vigilance. Americans can contribute by being alert. If you see something that doesn't look right, report it. The combination of watchful citizens, effective laws and adequate personnel and resources will preserve our homeland freedom.

Mike Crapo is a Republican senator from Idaho.

Rep. Culberson's Call For Armed State Militias On The Border Is A Reckless Approach To Dangerous Problem. (HC)

Houston Chronicle, August 5, 2005

Republicans and Democrats agree on little these days, but the combined effects of 9/11 and a newly globalized economy have forged consensus on at least one issue: the need for better border control.

The United States' long southern frontier, lawmakers agree, is unacceptably porous. Across it come illegal migrants seeking work, drug runners hauling their wares and terrorists bent on killing U.S. citizens. Recognizing that most illegal border crossers fall in the first category, several federal lawmakers are crafting thoughtful, bipartisan proposals to solve this complex problem. U.S. Rep. John Culberson's plan to create armed border militias is not one of them.

DOJ_NMG_0002148

Last week Culberson introduced a bill that would allow state governors to establish and deploy armed citizen militias on the Canadian and Mexican borders. Billed mainly as an antiterrorist measure, the legislation would also allow militia members to detain ordinary illegal immigrants.

In essence, the militias would be official versions, with police powers, of the Minutemen Civil Defense Corps. That private group patrolled the Arizona border briefly this spring and plans to film Houston day labor sites this fall.

Authorized by the federal government, the militias would be open to all Americans but give priority to residents from border states. As Culberson envisions it, the law would deputize "tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of law-abiding citizens" as auxiliary border guards. Co-sponsored by 46 House members, Culberson's plan would be funded by $6.8 billion in Homeland Security money reserved for emergency workers.

President Bush has called the unofficial Minutemen "vigilantes," but their movement is eminently sensible in at least one respect. It doesn't involve guns. Letting states arm civilians to address a federal problem migrates into a different sphere, one with reckless disregard for the consequences. Culberson's proposal requires states to reject militia hopefuls who have a history of mental illness or crime. However, the militias' very mandate, to "use any means and any force authorized by law," presupposes the use of violent force — otherwise, the proposal would not call for militias to bear arms.

Asked in a phone interview how an armed civilian could possibly confront and overcome drug traffickers or terrorists, Culberson said, "It's probably going to require a very heavy caliber."

Migrants who have trudged 30 miles across a desert are unlikely to have the energy or weaponry for a shootout. Drug runners, on the other hand, would not hesitate to open fire. They have done so frequently after encountering Border Patrol agents.

Armed, amateur border guards have no business confronting either quarry. It takes more than a few weeks of study to master arrest and detainment procedures, immigration and criminal law and search protocols. In the remote, hard-to-monitor expanse of the borderlands, accidental and wrongful deaths inevitably would follow.

Even as a gesture to fearful constituents and not intended to become law, Culberson's invocation of armed civilians enforcing federal policy deflects attention from more constructive proposals to manage the problem of illegal immigration. That 46 fellow lawmakers find Culberson's plan promising is troubling. It's no coincidence that Hispanic groups, law enforcement officers and the Minutemen themselves have all rejected the plan as impractical.

The answer to understaffed federal security agencies, including the Border Patrol, lies in allocating federal money to hire more professionals. The answer to our nation's immigration problems is not nearly so plain. Only one thing is certain: It does not involve civilians with guns.

A Serious Stop Sign (TOWNHALL)

By Rich Tucker

TownHall.com, August 5, 2005

When John Roberts comes before the Senate for his confirmation hearings, there's sure to be plenty of hand wringing about Roe v. Wade. Never mind that the so-called right to privacy isn't found in the Constitution. By digging into the tiny details of the legal arguments involved, lawmakers hope to show us how devoted they are to doing their jobs.

Meanwhile, Congress is ignoring one of its most important jobs -- one that actually is in the Constitution. It's not adequately "providing for the common defense" because it's not protecting our borders.

Nobody knows how many illegal immigrants now live in the United States. Recent estimates range from 11 million to 20 million. Faced with that problem, you'd expect Congress to do everything possible to shore up our borders and stop the flow of new illegals. Sadly, it's not.

Several months ago a correspondent from southern California decided to visit the Mexican border. He found that "in the (populated, highly-patrolled, well-fenced, URBAN) west end of San Diego County there were 10 agents patrolling a 10-mile zone. One four-mile swath had zero agents."

DOJ_NMG_0002149

One agent per mile of border? No wonder those few agents are overwhelmed. This isn't a lack of ability -- it's a lack of effort. The government is making no serious attempt to stop the flood of illegals.

My correspondent, a nurse at an L.A.-area hospital, was so appalled he decided to join a Minuteman patrol team and help the Border Patrol protect the frontier. With just a few volunteers on the scene, the picture a few weeks later was much different. "We shut down four miles of border with 16 people, eight large flashlights, and four cell phones, and didn't pull out until sunup," he reports.

The solution, then, is simple. "Just having enough people would solve the problem instantly. My estimate is that if someone got 500 people to show up per night statewide, the entire illegal traffic along the border of 150 miles from Yuma to the Pacific Ocean could be stopped dead," the man writes. "California wouldn't have an illegal immigration problem." And, thus, neither would the rest of the nation. But it's up to Congress to act, to provide enough agents and position them along the borders.

Illegal immigrants cause a wealth of problems. "Many gang members come to this country from overseas, or from other parts of the North and South American continent," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff notes. In fact, Chertoff says immigration officers have detained more than 1,000 alleged gang members since February, and he estimates 950 of them were illegals.

This is a local problem as well. The town of Herndon, Va. is inundated with day laborers. They gather at a convenience store and wait for employers to offer them jobs. The town, resigned to the idea that it can't prevent the workers from gathering, is considering whether to set aside a designated gathering place. "Our choice is between having a regulated site and an unregulated site," Mayor Michael L. O'Reilly told The Washington Post. "Given those options, I'm in favor of a regulated site."

The paper noted that, "an unknown number of [the day laborers] are in the country illegally." But the only reason we don't know how many of those waiting for jobs are illegals is because we haven't checked.

Here's a simple solution: Local police should take note of the license plate number every time a car picks up day laborers. Pass that information along to the IRS to see if the driver filed 1099 forms for the laborers he hired. The attraction of hiring day laborers is that employers can pay them cash. No questions asked, no forms filed.

But federal law requires that employers collect Social Security taxes on everyone they employ. Crack down on the employers, force them to check for Social Security numbers, and you'll drastically cut down on the number of illegal immigrants getting jobs.

"This country has a great Constitution. It's supposed to be justice for all. Some people think it's just justice for them," Lucio Escobar, a 47-year-old Herndon resident who immigrated from El Salvador 30 years ago, told the Post.

Well, the Constitution does guarantee justice for all -- all U.S. citizens. It's time for Congress to get serious about protecting our borders and cracking down on illegal immigration. Until lawmakers do that, their discussions about protecting the Constitution will amount to little more than hot air.

Rich Tucker is an editor in Washington D.C. and a columnist for Townhall.com

TAX:

Colts Neck Man Convicted Of Tax Evasion (APP)

By JAMES A. QUIRK, STAFF WRITER

Asbury Park (NJ) Press, August 5, 2005

A Colts Neck man was convicted of tax evasion and wire fraud in connection with a scheme to sell vast amounts of an ozone-depleting chemical, which was used to produce methamphetamine in California labs, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

William Rubenstein and Dov Shellef, of Great Neck, N.Y., were convicted July 28 of conspiring to evade approximately $1.9 million in excise taxes due on sales of a chemical called trichlorotrifluoroethane (CFC-113), law enforcement officials said yesterday. The jury returned the guilty verdicts after a five-week trial before U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert in Central Islip, N.Y.

Shellef also was convicted of 87 counts of wire fraud, tax evasion, subscribing to false tax returns and money laundering.

DOJ_NMG_0002150

The investigation began as federal Environmental Protection Agency and Drug Enforcement Administration agents traced the supply of CFC-113 to California "meth labs" that used the product for the illegal manufacture of methamphetamine.

According to the Department of Justice, the investigation revealed that a company called All Discount Lab Supplies was selling CFC-113 to individuals who used the product in meth labs. The principals of All Discount Labs have since pleaded guilty to selling CFC-113 with reasonable cause to believe it was being used for illegal manufacture of methamphetamine.

Although Shellef and Rubenstein were not indicted on drug charges, the investigation revealed that they were major suppliers of CFC-113 to All Discount Labs.

According to the Justice Department, the federal Clean Air Act banned the continued importation and production of CFCs in the U.S. in 1996, though manufacturers were permitted to sell and export chemicals that had been stockpiled prior to the ban. CFCs are used primarily as refrigerants and industrial solvents, and when released travel into the upper atmosphere and destroy ozone.

CFCs are subject to a substantial excise tax, which is imposed to discourage their use and to promote the transition to more ozone-friendly replacement products. The excise tax applied to domestic sales of stockpiled CFCs, but not sales for export.

The Department of Justice gave the following account:

Shellef owned two businesses involved in the purchase and sale of CFC-113; Rubenstein also controlled two businesses involved in the purchase, packaging, warehousing, shipping and sale of CFC-113. Both men purchased large quantities of the chemical. Both men told the chemical manufacturers that they intended to export the CFC-113, and thus the manufacturers did not collect or pay any excise tax on the product.

Beginning July 1997, Shellef and Rubenstein, knowing that they had purchased the CFC-113 tax-free, illegally diverted the product to a number of domestic customers. To conceal these sales, the men removed references to the original manufacturers on drums of the chemical, and relabeled the product. In addition, they created false shipping documents. For all the domestic sales of CFC-113, the unpaid excise taxes totaled approximately $1.9 million.

Rubenstein and Shellef face maximum sentences of 25 years in prison and $500,000 in fines.

KPMG Confident Of Avoiding Tax Trial (FT)

By Andrew Parker

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

KPMG, one of the big four accounting firms, is increasingly confident it can avoid a criminal trial in the US relating to its past sales of tax avoidance schemes to clients.

KPMG's US business is in talks with the Department of Justice about a "deferred prosecution agreement", under which it would be put on probation and criminal charges held in abeyance, according to people briefed about the case.

No decisions have been taken, but the people said a settlement between KPMG and the justice department could also involve a fine of as much as $500m. KPMG is desperate to avoid an indictment because Andersen, once the world's biggest accounting firm, was destroyed after prosecutors pressed obstruction of justice charges against it in 2002.

The firm declined to comment on Thursday, but it has previously acknowledged the existence of an investigation by federal prosecutors into tax services sold to clients covering a period from 1996 to 2002.

KPMG's US business said on June 16 that it took "full responsibility for the unlawful conduct by former KPMG partners during that period, and we deeply regret that it occurred". Robert Bennett, a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, which is representing KPMG, said: "We are fully co-operating with the Department of Justice." He declined to comment further.

The terms of any settlement between KPMG and the justice department would probably involve KPMG committing itself to internal reforms affecting its tax practice and to monitoring by an independent consultant.

KPMG made a plea to avoid indictment in a written submission to the justice department in June, when it highlighted how a criminal trial could have a negative impact on its partnerships outside the US, said one person briefed about the case. Andersen's international network of partnerships collapsed after the indictment of its US business.

KPMG reinforced its plea in a meeting between its lawyers and James Comey, deputy attorney-general, and David Kelley, attorney for the southern district of New York, also in June, said another person briefed about the case.

Federal prosecutors in Mr Kelley's office are leading the investigation into KPMG. His spokesman declined to comment.

A report in February by the Senate permanent sub-committee on investigations concluded that between 1998 and 2003 its US business developed products that were "at times, illegal, or potentially abusive".

The sub-committee said the IRS had calculated in 2002 that three KPMG schemes had resulted in people claiming losses on their tax returns of $5.8bn.

But the report accepted that since 2003 KPMG had dismantled its "abusive tax shelter practice" and strengthened compliance.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Court Nominee Advised Group On Gay Rights (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 - Judge John G. Roberts Jr., the Supreme Court nominee, gave advice to advocates for gay rights a decade ago, helping them win a landmark 1996 ruling protecting gay men and lesbians from state-sanctioned discrimination.

Judge Roberts, at the time an appellate lawyer for the Washington firm of Hogan & Hartson, did not write legal briefs or argue the case, lawyers involved said. But they said he did provide invaluable strategic guidance working pro bono to formulate legal theories and coach them in moot court sessions.

Judge Roberts did not disclose his role in the case to the Senate Judiciary Committee, which asked about pro bono work in a questionnaire. News of his participation was first reported Thursday in The Los Angeles Times, and it set off an immediate scramble on both the left and the right, upending perceptions of the nominee in both camps.

The White House immediately sought to reassure Judge Roberts's conservative backers, telephoning prominent leaders, including Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention, but it appeared that not all of them had been convinced.

The 1996 case, Romer v. Evans, is considered a touchstone in the culture wars, and it produced what the gay rights movement considers its most significant legal victory. By a 6-to-3 vote, the Supreme Court struck down a provision of the Colorado Constitution that nullified existing civil rights protections for gay men and lesbians and also barred the passage of new antidiscrimination laws.

"It's one more piece of the puzzle as we keep trying to find out who John Roberts is," said Kevin Cathcart, executive director of Lambda Legal, the advocacy group that helped bring the Romer case. "Where does this fit in on his judicial philosophy and his view of the Constitution?"

Indeed, Judge Roberts's participation seems to stand in contrast to the picture that has emerged from his days as a young lawyer with the Reagan administration, when he advocated a more conservative approach to civil rights and voting rights. Lawyers in the Romer case said Thursday that Judge Roberts had not discussed its substance with them, but seemed to approach it more as an intellectual challenge.

Even so, reports of his involvement echoed on conservative talk shows Thursday, generating outrage and disbelief. "There's no question this is going to upset people on the right," Rush Limbaugh told his radio listeners. "There's no question the people on the right are going to say: 'Wait a minute. Wait a minute! The guy is doing pro bono work and helping gay activists?' "

A White House spokeswoman, Erin Healy, said Judge Roberts's involvement was minimal. "As in any other case," Ms. Healy said, "it is wrong to equate legal work product with personal opinions."

The lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the Romer case, Jean Dubofsky, said Thursday that she sought out Judge Roberts at the recommendation of Walter Dellinger, then a senior official in the Justice Department under President Bill Clinton. Ms. Dubofsky, a former justice of the Colorado Supreme Court, said she was specifically seeking a conservative who could provide her an insider's road map, of sorts, helping her to anticipate objections from some of the court's more conservative members, like Justice Antonin Scalia and Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist.

DOJ_NMG_0002152

Judge Roberts, who once clerked for Justice Rehnquist and now serves on the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, spent about six hours on the case, Ms. Dubofsky said. "He told me, 'You have to know how to count and to get five votes, you're going to have to pick up the middle.' "

And then, she said, Judge Roberts provided explicit instructions on how to do just that, telling her that she would have to prove to the court it did not have to overturn a previous case, Bowers v. Hardwick, which upheld a ban on homosexual sodomy. He peppered her with questions in a moot court session.

"So when I was asked by Justice Scalia if they would have to overturn Bowers v. Hardwick to rule my way, I said no," Ms. Dubofsky said, adding, "In this particular case if you wanted to get the U.S. Supreme Court turned around on gay rights issues, you didn't have to win every gay rights case floating around out there."

Ultimately, in a forceful opinion by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the court said the Colorado provision had put the state's gay men and lesbians in a "solitary class," singling them out in violation of the Constitution's equal protection guarantee in a manner that was so sweeping as to be inexplicable on any basis other than animus. Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the justices to whom Judge Roberts is most often compared, issued a blistering dissent.

The Romer case proved to be the first step in the Supreme Court's ultimate disavowal of the Bowers decision in its 2003 ruling in the case of Lawrence v. Texas. That ruling, which overturned a Texas sodomy law, has drawn the ire of conservatives at a time when the Supreme Court is expecting still more cases involving gay rights. In November, the court is scheduled to hear a case that grows out of the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy toward gay service members. The question is whether Congress can withhold federal money from universities that restrict military recruiters' access to their students, in an effort to support gay rights. Judge Roberts would join in hearing that case, should he be confirmed by the first Monday in October, as Republicans hope.

Judge Roberts did not mention the Romer case in the response he filed to a questionnaire from the Senate Judiciary Committee, which asked about pro bono work. Committee Democrats said they were not troubled by the omission, because it did not appear that Judge Roberts had spent a significant amount of time on the case. He did list two other cases, including one in which he represented welfare recipients in the District of Columbia who were challenging cuts in their benefits.

Walter A. Smith, who was in charge of pro bono work at Hogan & Hartson from 1993 to 1997, and who worked extensively on the Romer case, said about a dozen lawyers at the firm assisted. He said he had little trouble recruiting Judge Roberts.

"It looked like a challenging, interesting, provocative, important case," said Mr. Smith, who is now the executive director of the D. C. Appleseed Center, a nonpartisan public interest legal group. "Everybody knew that, and I think he believed it was worth his time."

Mr. Smith said part of his job was to match lawyers with cases that would intrigue them, and that his initial instinct was that Judge Roberts would be willing, despite his conservative bent. In the past, Judge Roberts has made it a point to note that lawyers do not always agree with their clients.

"Every good lawyer knows that if there is something in his client's cause that so personally offends you, morally, religiously, if it so offends you that you think it would undermine your ability to do your duty as a lawyer, then you shouldn't take it on, and John wouldn't have," he said. "So at a minimum he had no concerns that would rise to that level."

Liberal critics of Judge Roberts, however, continued to assail him on Thursday as a foe of civil rights. "John Roberts was a key member of a right-wing policy team that waged a comprehensive assault on fundamental constitutional rights," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, a liberal advocacy group, "and that is most relevant to his qualification to be on the Supreme Court."

While some conservatives, including Dr. Land of the Southern Baptist Convention, said they were unconcerned about Judge Roberts's involvement in the Romer case, others signaled that the report had at least raised questions in their eyes.

James C. Dobson, chairman of the evangelical group Focus on the Family, said Judge Roberts's work in the case was "not welcome news to those of us who advocate for traditional values," though he said it did not necessarily mean that Judge Roberts shared the plaintiffs' views.

Colleen Parro, executive director of the Republican National Coalition for Life and one of the few conservatives to raise questions about Judge Roberts, said his work on the case was "cause for more caution and less optimism" about his nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0002153

Partisans Are Unsure About Roberts' Work On Gays' Case (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — Supporters and opponents of Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts were caught off guard Wednesday by news that he worked behind the scenes years ago to assist a gay rights group win a key case before the nation's highest court.

Debate erupted on conservative and liberal Web sites, with partisans on both sides asking whether Roberts' assistance to what is usually considered a liberal cause was an aberration from his otherwise conservative record or a sign his views might be more nuanced than commonly thought.

Social and religious conservatives expressed dismay about his participation in the case but said they are not convinced it amounted to an endorsement of gay rights -- a movement they strongly oppose.

"While this is certainly not welcome news to those of us who advocate for traditional values, it is by no means a given that John Roberts' personal views are reflected in his involvement in this case," the political arm of Focus on the Family, a national organization of conservative Christian, said in a statement. "That's what lawyers do -- represent their firm's clients, whether they agree with what those clients stand for or not."

The White House sought to play down Roberts' participation in the case, known as Romer vs. Evans, in which the Supreme Court in 1996 voted 6-3 to strike down a voter-approved Colorado initiative that would have allowed employers and landlords to exclude gays from jobs and housing.

Roberts, then a lawyer at the Washington firm of Hogan & Hartson, helped gay rights activists prepare their challenge to the initiative as part of his firm's pro bono work.

Roberts did not mention his work on the case in responding to a Senate Judiciary Committee questionnaire that asked for examples of his pro bono work. Roberts' involvement in the case was first reported by the Los Angeles Times on Wednesday.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said Roberts spent less than 10 hours on the case while devoting more than 200 hours to two other pro bono cases in which he was lead counsel.

"There is clearly a difference" between his assistance in the Colorado case and his other pro bono work, Perino said.

Jean Dubofsky, the lead lawyer for gay activists challenging the Colorado initiative, told the Times that Roberts gave her "absolutely crucial" advice in how to argue the case before the Supreme Court.

Some conservative supporters of Roberts denounced Wednesday's focus on the case as an effort to set Republicans against each other.

"The Romer imbroglio is a red herring meant to divide the right," said Sean Rushton, executive director of the Committee for Justice, which helps coordinate strategy on judicial nominations for conservative groups.

Similarly, liberal activists insisted the revelation did not change their concern that Roberts is not as supportive of civil rights as they would like.

"A primary issue for us is to what degree, if any, this work reflects on the judicial philosophy Judge Roberts would bring to the Supreme Court," said Kevin Cathcart, executive director of Lambda Legal, a major gay rights advocacy group.

Cathcart said his group remains concerned about Roberts' "much more extensive advocacy of positions that we oppose."

Still, the revelation is awkward for both sides in the political battle over Roberts, now a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia circuit. He was nominated by President Bush for the Supreme Court in late July to replace Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring.

Some conservative activists have expressed concerns that he may become an "unreliable" justice like David Souter or Anthony Kennedy, who were appointed by Republican presidents but who have not consistently supported conservative positions on the bench.

But Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a central figure among GOP activists, said any conservative who withdrew support of Roberts over his participation in the Colorado case would be wrongheaded.

"The whole case that conservatives have been trying to make is that your personal feelings ought not to count" when you rule from the bench, Norquist said.

DOJ_NMG_0002154

"There may be people who will say -- I want (him) to share my world view and try to impose it on his decisions," Norquist added. "Those people are not a useful part of the effort."

Some liberal activists consider Roberts to be more of a conservative ideologue than he acknowledges, citing in particular his work in the Reagan administration to limit school busing and other programs that sought to promote civil rights for minorities.

"I'm interested in seeing his involvement in this (Colorado) case, but it doesn't diminish our overall concern," said Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice. "A picture is just beginning to emerge of his views, but it's too early to make an overall assessment of his judicial philosophy."

Norm Ornstein, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute who is an expert on relations between the White House and Congress, predicted that Roberts' role in the Colorado case would unnerve ideologues on the right and the left.

"It reinforces the notion that the guy is a lawyer's lawyer," Ornstein said. "To whatever degree people are trying to view Roberts as an ideologue whose first instinct is to take his world view and impose it on whatever decision he's taking -- this cuts against it."

The result, Ornstein said, is that the Romer controversy is likely to help Roberts win more support from moderates.

"This means (he has) an ability to put himself in someone else's shoes," Ornstein said. "That is something that has distinguished the more careful and modest justices from the more expansive, wide-ranging and reckless ones."

Lawyers involved in the Colorado case described Roberts role as small but crucial to the outcome.

Walter A. Smith, Jr., the partner at Hogan and Hartson who ran the firm's pro bono program, said Roberts took part in the firm's initial meeting to consider accepting the case and that his participation, as in all the firm's pro bono cases, was voluntary.

"Anyone who didn't want to work on a case for whatever matter, they didn't have to," Smith said. "He was in on the takeoff and he was in on the landing and was helpful in both."

Smith also said that from a lawyer's point of view, the battle over the Colorado initiative was more a case about equal protection than about rights for gays and lesbians.

He said the critical issue for Roberts -- and eventually for the Supreme Court -- was whether the Colorado initiative took away ordinary rights and legal protections from a disadvantaged group, whether they were a sexual, racial or social minority.

"Does such a law violate the equal protection clause of the constitution? To that extent, it was not a gay rights issue," Smith said.

In Private Practice, Roberts's Record Is Mixed (WP)

By Jo Becker And Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

As a private lawyer, John G. Roberts Jr. represented homeless Washingtonians who had lost their government benefits because of city budget cuts. He advocated environmental protections for Lake Tahoe, Glacier Bay and the Grand Canyon. He spent 25 hours assisting a convicted murderer with a death penalty appeal. He even helped gay rights activists win a landmark Supreme Court anti-discrimination case.

At first blush, these cases would seem to complicate any image of the Supreme Court nominee as a down-the-line conservative. But as details have emerged in recent days, conservative groups have been busy spreading the word to their members and the broader public about what they should think of Roberts's work in private practice: Pay it no mind.

At second blush, Roberts's role is hardly surprising, say people who have worked with him or studied his career. For more than a decade, he practiced appellate law at the Washington firm Hogan & Hartson in a distinctly non-ideological fashion. Now, as liberal and conservative activists pick over his career for evidence of his political and legal philosophy, neither side seems to attach much importance to his diverse practice. And some activists on both sides remain secure in their conviction that he is an emphatic conservative who will move the high court to the right -- never mind his client list.

The Los Angeles Times reported yesterday that in 1996, as part of his firm's pro bono program, Roberts offered limited aid to opponents of a Colorado referendum that allowed discrimination against gays. The case led to a landmark Supreme Court ruling that protects people from discrimination based on their sexual orientation.

DOJ_NMG_0002155

But Nan Aron of the liberal Alliance for Justice said that Roberts's involvement "doesn't say anything about his judicial philosophy." And Sean Rushton of the conservative Committee for Justice called the Colorado case "a red herring meant to divide the right."

"I don't think this is serious," said Bill Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard. "Most conservatives are very pleased. . . . He has a long record, and has been very consistent."

The prevailing view of Roberts as a reliable conservative initially emerged from his résumé as a clerk to then-Associate Justice William H. Rehnquist, aide to President Ronald Reagan, deputy to then-Solicitor General Kenneth W. Starr and nominee of President Bush. That view was solidified by the release of forceful memos he wrote while serving in the Reagan administration, during which he helped shape policies opposing affirmative-action quotas and busing of schoolchildren to achieve desegregation. During the administration of George H.W. Bush, he signed a brief that called Roe v. Wade "wrongly decided."

In recent days, the White House and its allies have grown concerned that the documents released so far have painted Roberts as a rigid ideologue, and they have sought to provide a more complete portrait. Yesterday, the Bush administration released two Reagan-era documents sought by The Washington Post and others under the Freedom of Information Act. The Post request included thousands of other documents, which were not released.

In one memo, Roberts argued that Reagan should not interfere in a Kentucky case involving the display of the Ten Commandments on public property. In the other, he wrote that the bomber of an abortion clinic should not receive any special consideration for a pardon. "No matter how lofty or sincerely held the goal, those who resort to violence to achieve it are criminals," Roberts wrote.

Advisers to the White House have been urging the Bush team to be more aggressive about providing its own narrative of Roberts.

"There needs to be a good branding effort," said one Republican strategist involved in pro-Roberts strategy. "We do need to get out and start defining who this guy is."

Neither side has focused much attention yet on his work from 1986 to 1989 and from 1993 to 2003 at Hogan & Hartson, where he sometimes took on cases that clashed with conservative orthodoxy. For example, he once defended racial preferences for Native Hawaiians -- a case he lost to Theodore B. Olson, a prominent Republican in the appellate bar. On the other hand, Roberts assisted Republican Gov. Jeb Bush at no charge during the Florida presidential election recount in 2000.

"It's good for lawyers to represent clients on all sides of the political spectrum," Olson said. "You can't read anything into his personal feelings about the case."

The Supreme Court hears only about 80 cases a year, so even elite appellate lawyers such as Roberts have to compete for cases, and they rarely turn them down. Olson said that Supreme Court specialists also regularly help less-experienced lawyers prepare as a professional courtesy. And Hogan & Hartson lawyers said the firm has a culture in which every partner and associate is expected to help out on pro bono cases when asked.

That is what happened in the Colorado gay rights case, Romer v. Evans , in which lawyers seeking to strike down the referendum sought the help of Hogan & Hartson. Walter Smith, then head of the firm's pro bono department, turned to Roberts for assistance. Smith said Roberts readily accepted, helping to grill the lawyers handling the case during a mock trial, in which he played the role of Justice Antonin Scalia. Roberts also helped devise a strategy for the case.

"He only put in a few hours, but a few hours with John Roberts is probably worth a few weeks with someone else," Smith said. "John was always willing to help on pro bono cases, regardless of the politics. Not all his conservative brethren felt that way."

On conservative Web sites yesterday, there was scattered negative reaction to the news that Bush's nominee had helped to advance the cause of gay rights. "Frankly, I find it hard to believe that a 'conservative' Roman Catholic would not have declined to participate on moral grounds," one person wrote at http://www.confirmthem.com/ .

John Yoo, a law professor at the University of California at Berkeley who served as a deputy assistant attorney general in the Bush administration, said the pro bono case was unusual for a conservative Republican lawyer. "Usually, conservative lawyers take on the more conservative causes," Yoo said.

DOJ_NMG_0002156

On balance, the conservative establishment remained firmly supportive of Roberts. "While this is certainly not welcome news to those of us who advocate for traditional values, it is by no means a given that John Roberts' personal views are reflected in his involvement in the case," the group Focus on the Family said in a statement.

David Leitch, a former Hogan & Hartson partner, said Roberts never brought politics into his practice.

"We were Republicans, no question about that," said Leitch, who is now the general counsel of the Ford Motor Co. "But I never knew John to turn down a case for ideological reasons. He was there to represent clients. And he did it very well."

Staff writer Peter Baker contributed to this report.

Documents Indicate Roberts Isn't Always Predictably Conservative (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - As a legal adviser to President Reagan, Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. joined a scathing denunciation of abortion-clinic bombers and urged Reagan to stay out of an effort to post tributes to God in Kentucky schools.

Roberts' advice, in documents Knight Ridder obtained before their public release later this month, might help him counter critics who portray him as a doctrinaire conservative. Abortion-rights groups and organizations that advocate a clear separation between church and state oppose his nomination.

Both sides in the nomination debate are scouring court briefs, legal memos and other documents for anything that can help make the case for or against Roberts' ascension to the nation's highest court. The documents that Knight Ridder obtained were leaked by an administration official who wanted to show the nominee as a servant of the law, not of conservative ideology.

In another development that could confound Roberts' liberal critics, the Los Angeles Times has reported that he worked behind the scenes, without charge, for gay rights activists in a 1996 case that led to a Supreme Court ruling protecting homosexuals from discrimination. Roberts, who was then in private practice, was asked to join the case by a colleague at his Washington law firm.

In the abortion-clinic case, Roberts was asked to respond to reports in 1986 that Reagan would consider granting presidential pardons to convicted bombers. The issue arose when leaders from two anti-abortion groups, the American Life League and the Pro-Life Action League, were quoted as saying Reagan was open to the possibility of pardons on a case-by-case basis.

Rep. Romano Mazzoli, a Kentucky Democrat, asked Reagan for an explanation. Roberts and his boss, deputy White House counsel Richard Hauser, suggested a strongly worded response that ruled out favors for clinic bombers.

"The president unequivocally condemns such acts of violence and believes that those responsible should be prosecuted to the full extent of the law," their draft reply said. "No matter how lofty or sincerely held the goal, those who resort to violence to achieve it are criminals. ... Neither the cause that these misguided individuals mistakenly believed they were serving, nor the target of their violence, will in any way be considered to mitigate the seriousness of their offense against our laws."

Roberts forwarded the draft to the White House legislative affairs office in February 1986, but it isn't clear whether it ever was sent to Mazzoli. The issue may have become moot when other White House officials denied that Reagan had offered to consider pardons.

Joe Scheidler, the head of the Pro-Life Action League then and now, shrugged off the draft letter.

"My own lawyer would take the same position," Scheidler said. "I could see Roberts or any other lawyer coming up with that."

Roberts' opinion of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 ruling that legalized abortion nationwide, is one of the most hotly debated issues in his confirmation.

As a deputy solicitor general in the administration of the first President Bush, he joined a brief asserting that Roe "was wrongly decided and should be overruled." He distanced himself from that opinion during his 2003 confirmation hearings to a federal appellate court and declared Roe "the settled law of the land."

Scheidler said he was confident that Roberts would vote to overturn the 1973 ruling if given a chance.

DOJ_NMG_0002157

"It's settled law for now. That doesn't mean it can't be overturned," Scheidler said. "As a Supreme Court justice, he'd have a whole new approach."

In the Kentucky school case, Roberts advised Reagan to stay out of a 1985 effort to require teachers to post the national motto - "In God We Trust" - and the preamble to the state constitution in their classrooms. The preamble declares, "We, the people of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, are grateful to Almighty God for the civil, religious and political liberties we enjoy."

Supporters of the measure wanted Reagan's endorsement to help get it through Kentucky's legislature. At least one White House official seemed to support Reagan's involvement.

"The president's position concerning this issue is clear, and this group is certainly aware of it, but we would like to be sure that a message to them is approved by your office," White House aide Anita Bevacqua wrote in a May 17, 1985, memo to Roberts.

Roberts nixed the idea in his reply a week later. He questioned the constitutionality of the proposal and concluded that "it would be inappropriate" for Reagan to endorse it.

Roberts' critics on the church-state issue point to a brief that he co-authored as a deputy solicitor general on school prayer. The brief defended prayers at graduation ceremonies. The Supreme Court rejected his viewpoint in a 5-4 ruling.

Roberts' Solicitor General Record Gives Clues To Views (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — For many years, the solicitor general was known as the "10th justice," a trusted figure who advised the Supreme Court on the law and whose client was the United States.

But midway through the Reagan administration, the office took on a new role. The solicitor general became not just the government's chief lawyer before the Supreme Court, but the point man for a conservative transformation in the law.

When John G. Roberts Jr., then 34, joined Solicitor General Kenneth W. Starr as his top deputy in fall 1989, they were determined to make the Reagan Revolution a legal reality.

Roberts "was in that position as the principal political deputy to the solicitor general because he was simpatico with the administration," said Washington lawyer Charles J. Cooper, a longtime friend of the Supreme Court nominee. "He agreed with the thrust of what the administration was doing,"

Together, Starr and Roberts for 3 1/2 years pressed a strongly conservative legal agenda.

They argued for limiting the scope of civil-rights laws, ending race-based affirmative action, restoring some prayers to public schools and overruling Roe v. Wade, the case that established a woman's right to have an abortion.

They sought to make it harder for environmentalists to challenge the government in court. They intervened on the side of Operation Rescue to shield abortion protesters from being sued. And they joined Texas state lawyers in arguing that new evidence of a death-row inmate's "actual innocence" did not entitle him to reopen his case in federal court.

In the first right-to-die case to reach the Supreme Court, they intervened on the side of then-Missouri Gov. John Ashcroft to argue that state officials may keep a comatose woman alive over the objections of her family.

"Ken Starr and John Roberts are genuine conservatives," said Christopher J. Wright, a lawyer who worked under them at the solicitor general's office. "They're highly professional and excellent lawyers. But I'm a Democrat, and I can't say I always agreed with them."

Roberts' record at the solicitor general's office under President George H.W. Bush has become the focus of attention for Senate Democrats. They have been studying 81 Supreme Court briefs signed by Roberts between 1989 and 1993, and have asked the White House to disclose the memos he wrote in 16 of those cases.

But the White House so far has refused to provide the memos and other supporting documentation, claiming a lawyer-client privilege. As a result, Roberts' legal philosophy during that highly politicized period can only be gleaned from the public files.

They suggest a strongly, although not uniformly, conservative approach to issues.

DOJ_NMG_0002158

Unlike his position as a young assistant to Attorney General William French Smith in 1981 and 1982, Roberts' post in the solicitor general's office gave him the opportunity to try to reshape the law at the Supreme Court. When teamed with Starr, he was not shy about pressing sharply ideological positions in the court.

The duty and role of the solicitor general was a subject of debate in the 1980s. Reagan's first solicitor general, Rex Lee, quit in frustration, saying he was reluctant to "press the administration's policies at every turn. ... I'm the solicitor general, not the pamphleteer general."

The solicitors who followed Lee, including Charles Fried and Starr, were more willing to advocate the ideological views of the administration.

In the Reagan and first Bush administrations, that meant urging the Supreme Court to overturn Roe v. Wade.

In 1991, for example, when the court took up a free-speech challenge to an abortion regulation, Starr and Roberts filed a brief saying, "We continue to believe that Roe was wrongly decided and should be overruled." The regulation at issue prohibited doctors and nurses at federally funded family-planning clinics from discussing abortion with their patients. The court later upheld the regulation in a 5-4 decision, but without discussing the validity of Roe v. Wade.

The next year, Starr's office intervened in a Pennsylvania dispute to urge the court again to overrule Roe. "The protection of human life -- in and out of the womb -- is certainly the most compelling interest that a state can advance," Starr said.

The Supreme Court rejected the advice, and, in a 5-4 ruling, said women may opt for an abortion during the first six months of pregnancy.

The challenging of Roe -- and the view at the solicitor general's office of its proper role -- was defended by Thomas Merrill, a Columbia University law professor, who worked under Starr and Roberts.

"The president (George H.W. Bush) had campaigned for overruling Roe v. Wade. We in the office knew the administration's position. It was only a question of how to go about achieving that objective," he said.

In 1991, Roberts personally argued a case along with lawyers for Operation Rescue. The protesters had been sued in Virginia over abortion-clinic blockades. The women who sued relied on the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871, which made it illegal for several persons to conspire to deprive individuals of their rights.

Roberts began by saying that he was not defending the actions of the protesters. Rather, he argued, the 19th-century civil-rights law did not apply to their conduct. The law only applied when people were singled out for discrimination, as blacks were by the klan, Roberts said.

"Opposition to abortion is (not) the same as discrimination on the basis of gender," he said, adding that it was "wrong as a matter of law and logic" to make such a claim. In a 6-3 decision, the court agreed with his argument in an opinion written by Justice Antonin Scalia.

The lawyer who represented the women said the Bush administration lawyers should have stayed out of the case. "We were greatly bothered that the federal government was in this case on the side of Operation Rescue," Deborah Ellis, a New York University law professor, recalled recently. "There is a right to abortion, and whether you agree with it or not, it is objectionable that women could be deprived of this right by force."

(The Supreme Court is set to hear a similar case this fall involving blockades at abortion clinics. Lawyers for the National Organization for Women won a lawsuit against leaders of Operation Rescue for using violence and threats against doctors and patients. The court will hear an appeal from the anti-abortion advocates, who say the federal extortion law does not apply to such protests.)

Starr and Roberts also upset women's-rights advocates in 1991 when they intervened on the side of a Georgia school district in a major test of Title IX, the law that bars sex discrimination in schools and colleges.

Christine Franklin, a student, said she had been sexually harassed and abused by a popular coach, who was later dismissed. She sued the school district.

Starr and Roberts urged the court to rule that the law does not give victims of sex discrimination a right to sue. The justices unanimously rejected that view.

During their time together in the solicitor general's office, Starr and Roberts helped win rulings that had broad effect across the United States. They joined a Nebraska case in which the court ruled that student-led Bible clubs had a right to meet at public schools. They joined a Minnesota case in which the court upheld state law requiring a parent be notified before the daughter had an abortion. And they joined an Oklahoma City case in which the court set the stage for ending long-running school busing programs.

DOJ_NMG_0002159

But Roberts was not always on the government's side.

He intervened in a Louisiana case to argue on behalf of an inmate, Keith Hudson, who had been beaten by two prison guards while shackled and handcuffed.

Hudson sued the guards for violating his constitutional rights and won $800 in damages. But the U.S. Court of Appeals in New Orleans threw out the verdict and ruled that prisoners' rights were not violated by abusive treatment that did not cause a significant and permanent injury.

Roberts said he was troubled by the lower court's ruling. While "frivolous" lawsuits from prisoners were a problem, this was not a frivolous case, he said. Nor, he told the court, should the law condone the "unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain" on prisoners.

The Supreme Court agreed in a 7-2 ruling written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Justices Clarence Thomas and Scalia dissented.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which will hold hearings on Roberts' nomination to the Supreme Court, have demanded to see the memos he wrote in several of the cases from his time in Starr's office. They say they want to see how Roberts analyzed the law, and whether the administration's position was also his.

His friend Cooper, also a veteran of the Reagan administration, said it was fair to conclude that Roberts agreed in essence with the legal arguments he made on behalf of the first Bush administration -- although "it would be wrong to conclude he agreed with every line in those briefs."

Within the Justice Department, Roberts was admired for his intelligence and modest manner.

"My most distinct memory is that he played his cards close to the vest," Merrill said. "I briefed him for his first two days there, and he nodded and smiled. He didn't talk much. John never kicked back and philosophized about his view of the law."

GOP To Make Push For Roberts (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

President Bush and his strategists are using the politically fallow month of August to conduct a coordinated campaign to sustain momentum for the nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to the Supreme Court.

The effort has two tracks -- a public offensive that includes the president openly stumping for his nominee and a behind-the-scenes blitz designed to keep Senate Democrats on the defensive.

"Roberts needs to get his hearing done and the confirmation completed so he can be seated before the Supreme Court reconvenes in early October," Mr. Bush said this week in Texas at the start of his monthlong working vacation.

The president is expected to reiterate that sentiment during numerous day trips to various states from his 1,600-acre ranch in Crawford, Texas.

Meanwhile, White House operatives, working closely with the Republican National Committee, are quietly urging regional interest groups in key states to keep up the pressure on Senate Democrats. The groups are writing letters asking for meetings with their senators while they are home for the August recess.

Several Republican strategists who spoke to The Washington Times said the idea is for the groups to demand consultations with their senators because Mr. Bush had consulted with those senators on the nomination.

The effort is targeted at Democrats in conservative states such as Arkansas and Louisiana, rather than liberal states such as Massachusetts.

The interest groups range from local chapters of the Chamber of Commerce and Fraternal Order of Police to less well-known groups such as the Colorado Catholic Lawyers Guild, which has requested a meeting with Sen. Ken Salazar, Colorado Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0002160

In Florida, Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson is being targeted by statewide groups of real-estate agents, restaurateurs and medical professionals. In Iowa, Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin has been asked to meet with the Iowa Sportsmen's Federation. In New Mexico, Democratic Sen. Jeff Bingaman has been targeted by the state's Alliance for Legal Reform and Fraternal Order of Police.

Judging by the limited resistance to the Roberts nomination being mounted by such Democrats so far, Republicans say the effort alreaedy is bearing fruit. As evidence, they cited remarks this week by Democratic Sen. Mark Pryor of Arkansas.

"I don't really see any problems with this confirmation," he told the Washington County Bar Association in Fayetteville. "The White House really reached out to the Senate on this one, and I'd assume that means the confirmation process will go a lot smoother. I think this was a good choice by President Bush."

Another component of the August blitz entails aggressively booking Roberts advocates on local and regional talk radio programs, taking a template from the president's successful re-election campaign.

Republican strategists are quick to emphasize that confirmation of Judge Roberts is by no means guaranteed. They recalled that while the initial rollout of Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas went smoothly, the confirmation process turned ugly.

Mindful of such possibilities, White House officials are braced to respond aggressively to expected attacks against Mr. Roberts by Democrats, liberal interest groups and journalists.

Still, Republicans are heartened that the scorched-earth political warfare that many had predicted has not materialized in the 21/2 weeks since the president nominated Judge Roberts. They are pleased that they were able to quickly gain political altitude with the nomination, racing to cement public opinion before the Democrats could gain traction.

While Mr. Bush and White House operatives spend August lobbying for Judge Roberts, the nominee will spend much of the month studying material in preparation for his Senate confirmation hearings, scheduled for September. He also will undergo rigorous question-and-answer sessions such as the ones practiced by presidential candidates in preparation for debates.

Judge Roberts will be grilled by lawyers from White House Counsel Harriet Miers' office and the Department of Justice, including acting Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, who runs the department's Office of Legal Policy.

Women's Groups Try To Rally For Court Fight (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

The divisive 1991 confirmation hearings of Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas, involving charges of sexual harassment, launched 1992's Year of the Woman. That election's windfall brought four new women to the U.S. Senate and 20 to the House -- and turned women's rights groups into a force to be reckoned with.

Now another Supreme Court appointment battle looms, with abortion rights a likely central issue. But internal squabbles, declining membership and complacency during the Clinton years have left most women's rights groups in weakened shape for the clash over Judge John G. Roberts Jr.

The National Organization for Women's political donations shriveled to $44,000 in 2004 from $327,000 in 1992. Planned Parenthood Federation of America Inc., facing a revolt among affiliates in part because of the politicization of the group, ousted its president in January and hasn't taken a position on the Roberts nomination. NARAL Pro-Choice America's new president was still on an introductory tour to affiliates and donors around the country when the Supreme Court fight started.

The influence of women's groups inside Congress also has eroded. Most Democrats in the Senate "Gang of 14" -- moderates who could prevent a Democratic filibuster -- weren't endorsed by NARAL because they didn't solidly back abortion rights or opposed them. "I do worry about our strength as a movement," says Kate Michelman, NARAL's former president. "What we do in this battle will establish the foundation and create the conditions not only for this one but also for the future."

Abortion-rights groups like NARAL oppose President Bush's nominee, who in a 1990 Supreme Court brief prepared for the Bush administration advocated overturning the landmark Roe v. Wade ruling. More recently, Judge Roberts has moderated his language, but abortion-rights advocates remain wary.

DOJ_NMG_0002161

The troubled state of women's rights groups is shared by many of their traditional allies. Big Labor is falling apart as unions defect from what they claim is a wasteful and antiquated AFL-CIO. Civil-rights groups are fighting a conservative pushback on affirmative action and other issues. And the NAACP, the nation's leading African-American organization, is under investigation by the Internal Revenue Service.

The challenge for Judge Roberts's opponents is exacerbated by Democrats' reconsideration of how to position themselves with a more conservative electorate. Abortion was among the issues that some political analysts said drove church-going voters to President Bush in last year's election. Now, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, an abortion-rights supporter, is urging his party's messengers to speak more about faith and religion and to downplay issues such as abortion.

Meanwhile, an array of conservative organizations is stronger than ever. They spent the Clinton years recruiting members and electing lawmakers, particularly to the Senate. High School Bible clubs flourished and anti-abortion organizations established footholds in colleges and universities across the country. The groups helped create a generation of women more receptive to restricting access to abortions and, because of broader access to birth control, less sympathetic to women with unwanted pregnancies, recent polls and focus groups have found.

The question is whether the Roberts nomination will have the same galvanizing effect as Justice Thomas's. Polls indicate that a majority of young adults, and the general public, oppose overturning Roe v. Wade -- an opening women's rights groups are trying to turn to their advantage.

"Bush has been our number-one membership recruiter," says Kim Gandy, president of NOW, which held dozens of protests the day after Judge Roberts was nominated. NARAL sent emails to 800,000 activists urging them to begin petition drives and contact their senators to express opposition to the nomination. Both groups, and others, added their lawyers to a coalition that is mining Judge Roberts's record for clues on how he might rule on the high court. They also are coordinating with Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee to ensure the nominee is questioned on abortion rights during his hearings next month.

NARAL's new president, Nancy Keenan, witnessed the conservative movement's growing influence during the 1990s when she refereed battles over school curriculum while serving as Montana's school superintendent. When she visited Washington, D.C., back then, she warned liberal allies "there is something afoot in the West; something seems orchestrated and calculated," she recalls. But they remained focused on lobbying the Clinton administration for looser restrictions on abortion funding and other long-thwarted priorities.

Ms. Keenan is revitalizing a program that expands NARAL's mission to protect access to birth control as well as abortion and includes a state-based recruitment drive. The project is critical, she says, because that network of advocates could become the first line of defense if the Supreme Court overturns Roe v. Wade and sends the issue back to state legislatures.

But while operations in Minnesota, New York and California remain strong, organizing has been painstaking work in states where conservatives made big electoral and legislative gains.

Ann O'Hanlon was hired as executive director of the Virginia NARAL affiliate in September 2003 -- a chapter that was closed during the Clinton years. She joined the small but active Pro-Choice Coalition, a Virginia group that lobbies the state legislature, and organized membership-building house parties. By January 2004, her mailing list had expanded to 6,400 and she had recruited two direct-mail fund-raising experts to serve on her volunteer board. Today, she can reach 21,000 people by email and NARAL has a full-time lobbyist in Richmond.

Ms. O'Hanlon and her volunteers are conducting petition drives on the Roberts nomination, and hoping the confirmation fight will invigorate her group and lead to the kind of ballot-box success her predecessors saw with the Thomas fight.

Already, the nomination is playing a role in the Virginia governor's race. Russ Potts, a Republican who says he is a moderate on abortion rights, is running as an independent to succeed retiring Democratic Gov. Mark Warner in November. He is seeking NARAL's endorsement, and in a meeting last week in Richmond, Mr. Potts recalls, he adapted his pitch to reflect concerns that Judge Roberts could help overturn Roe v. Wade.

"Should Roe v. Wade be overturned and sent back to the states, I will veto any attempt to overturn [abortion rights] in Virginia," he says he told Ms. O'Hanlon and other members of the Pro-Choice Coalition.

Groups Step Up Advertising On Roberts Nomination To High Court (BLOOM)

DOJ_NMG_0002162

By Laura Litvan

Bloomberg, August 5, 2005

Aug. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Interest groups are stepping up the campaign over U.S. Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts, airing new advertisements designed to shape public opinion before next month's Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearings.

With bulging war chests that may total $100 million, both sides are gearing up for an expensive fight to prevent their adversaries from gaining an advantage. Still, Republicans control the Senate 55-45, and no Democrats have threatened a filibuster that would be their only chance to stall the nomination.

``There's a lot of folks who are both pro and con who are on automatic pilot," said Princeton University political science Professor Fred Greenstein in response to a question about why the ad campaigns are intensifying.

IndependentCourt.org, a coalition of 75 liberal groups including People for the American Way, this week began running national television ads that demand more information on Roberts's positions on issues. They urge the White House to release more documents from his time as a top Justice Department lawyer.

The Committee for Justice, which supports the nomination, will counter with radio ads targeting about 10 states represented by moderate Democratic senators, said Sean Rushton, the group's executive director. Senators are back in their home states for a monthlong recess and will be hearing from the voters, he said.

``This is when Roberts will be defined and it will set the stage for what kind of confirmation hearings and floor debate he gets," Rushton said.

$100 Million

Both sides will spend about $100 million on the confirmation battle including up to $10 million by business groups, estimates Rogan Kersh, a political science professor at Syracuse University in New York who specializes in lobbying.

``This is what they exist for," he says.

Progress for America, a group supporting Roberts's nomination, has budgeted $18 million for the campaign. It spent more than $40 million in the 2004 elections to help elect Bush.

Senate hearings on Roberts, 50, a federal appeals court judge picked by President George W. Bush to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, will begin Sept. 6 with a likely vote by the full Senate before the Supreme Court reconvenes on Oct. 3.

The first ads to air on the nomination were paid for by Progress for America. It spent $1 million on ads last week that described Roberts as a ``brilliant" lawyer and jurist.

The ads sponsored this week by IndependentCourt.org have been shown on CNN, Fox News Channel and on the NBC affiliate in Washington.

Gathering Petitions

Groups are also gathering petitions during the August congressional recess.

``We're trying to get as many people to take action as possible," said Ted Miller, a spokesman for NARAL Pro-Choice America, which is opposing Roberts's nomination on grounds he might vote to overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court ruling that legalized abortion nationwide.

Some ads and grassroots activities are targeting Democrats in ``red states" that Bush carried in the 2004 election. They are also aimed at the ``Gang of 14," seven centrist Republicans and Democrats who brokered a deal in May to avert a showdown over Bush's appeals court nominees.

That group includes Democrats Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Kent Conrad of North Dakota, who may face close re-election contests in 2006. Others on the list are Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln, both Democrats from Arkansas, which Bush won with 54 percent of the vote in 2004.

Pryor and Nelson have praised Bush for consulting senators before choosing Roberts and haven't taken a position on the nomination.

Lining Up Commitments

DOJ_NMG_0002163

Groups favoring Roberts say they want to line up possible commitments or at least create momentum for the nominee heading into the hearings.

``Anytime you let the momentum fall, it allows time for questions to arise," said John Thomas, a spokesman for the Family Council Action Committee in Little Rock, Arkansas. ``You really want to keep moving forward."

Groups that are questioning Roberts's record are pressing senators to remain neutral for now.

``We're asking them, instead of rushing to a quick decision to take the time to ask hard questions people want to know, like where Judge Roberts stands on abortion and the environment and other issues that affect people's lives," said Cammy Watkins, a conservation organizer for the Nebraska chapter of the Sierra Club.

The board of the American Civil Liberties Union may meet this month to decide whether to oppose Roberts, said Will Potter, an ACLU spokesman. The group has only opposed two Supreme Court nominations: Robert Bork when he was defeated in 1987 and William H. Rehnquist when he was first appointed in 1971.

ACLU Position

``The ACLU isn't going to fly off the handle and give a knee-jerk reaction," said Tim Butz, executive director of the Nebraska chapter of the ACLU. ``We're going to study this thing and make a decision on our schedule so that we're sure we're doing the right thing."

Both sides are gearing for the fight to avoid falling behind.

``August is when a lot of opinions are going to be formed," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, which is urging its 400,000 members who actively participate in such campaigns to lobby senators for Roberts. ``It's our assumption that the left will be advertising very heavily in a lot of these states and trying to reach members that they think are up in the air. You don't want them to have 1,000 letters against, and two letters for."

Judge Roberts's Memos (WP)

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

The request by Democratic senators to see memos written by Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. during his service in the solicitor general's office requires a difficult balancing of legitimate interests: the executive branch's need for confidentiality against a full and informed Senate confirmation proceeding. The request is more measured than the far-reaching demand for solicitor general memos during the nomination of Miguel A. Estrada to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit earlier in the Bush administration. It should not simply be defied. But neither is the administration wrong to try to protect internal deliberations within one of the government's most critical legal offices. Accommodation should be possible, provided it is sought in good faith by both sides.

The demand for memos in Mr. Estrada's case was irresponsible because he was a line attorney in the office; senators had demanded essentially all of his written work. It was an unlimited fishing expedition. Had the administration complied, the free give-and-take within the solicitor general's office would have been poisoned. That is why all living solicitors general of both parties opposed the request.

The Roberts case is different. Judge Roberts was not a line attorney but the political deputy solicitor general -- and administrations have at times chosen to turn over confidential work product when political appointees are nominated to the bench, including in the cases of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and the nomination of Robert H. Bork. A privilege, after all, can be waived. Unlike the case of Mr. Estrada, Democrats have not sought the entire body of Judge Roberts's work but only his memos in 16 cases that they believe might shed light on his legal philosophy. The executive branch has already released mounds of material of indistinguishable sensitivity -- including Judge Roberts's memos to the attorney general early in the Reagan administration. This material was slated under statute and past policy decisions to become public for reasons having nothing to do with the nomination. But at least to some degree it complicates the administration's contention that it can contemplate no disclosure of old attorney-client material.

Still, the administration's concerns are not trivial. Disclosure of internal documents in judicial nominations has typically occurred in response to accusations of impropriety; there is no suggestion of misconduct in this case. To be sure, turning over the material could establish the precedent that confidential attorney-client material becomes fair game whenever senators are curious to know what a particular nominee thought on a particular issue. The risk that this could chill the willingness of line attorneys to give their candid views is a serious concern.

DOJ_NMG_0002164

There is a possible solution that the White House and Senate Democrats should consider. It is not clear that Judge Roberts actually worked on all of the 16 designated cases. Even where he did, deputy solicitors general often don't write detailed memos but frequently annotate case memos written by career assistants, according to former officials of the office. In many of the cases at issue, there may be little or no written work product to examine; and what there is may be distinctly uninformative. An executive privilege dust-up over nothing would be pointless.

The administration should, therefore, begin by specifying what, if any, responsive material actually exists in these cases. This step might narrow the dispute to just a few documents. If those documents seem important to the assessment of Judge Roberts, a procedure could be crafted to allow for examination by senators who wish to satisfy themselves that they contain nothing disqualifying.

Rehnquist Fever Stirs Up Speculation About Retirement (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Supreme Court Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was taken by ambulance to an Arlington hospital yesterday with a fever, but was released promptly.

The brief visit marks his second trip to the hospital in a month and, although much shorter than the two-night stay in July, it still is likely to spawn further speculation that his retirement from the high court could come at any time.

"The chief justice developed a fever today," Supreme Court spokesman Ed Turner said in a brief statement last night. "He was taken to Virginia Hospital Center for evaluation."

Mr. Turner later said the chief justice was evaluated and allowed to go home.

Chief Justice Rehnquist, 80, was diagnosed last year with thyroid cancer and has undergone chemotherapy and radiation treatment. Throughout, the chief justice has maintained a full work schedule and was at the court earlier yesterday.

In July, Chief Justice Rehnquist was admitted to the hospital for two days with the same symptoms.

Then, speculation reached a fevered pitch that he would step down after 33 years on the court and 19 years as chief justice. But instead, he stayed on.

"I want to put to rest the speculation and unfounded rumors of my imminent retirement," he said upon his release from that hospital stay. "I will continue to perform my duties as chief justice as long as my health permits."

If Chief Justice Rehnquist retires, he will give President Bush a second vacancy on the Supreme Court to fill and would begin anew all the political maneuvering on both sides to find a replacement.

The confirmation process for replacing Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her retirement last month, has been smoother than many expected.

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr., her proposed replacement, was applauded by conservatives. But yesterday, the Los Angeles Times reported that he had helped a "gay rights" group win one of the most important Supreme Court cases on homosexuality.

Although Judge Roberts did not write briefs or become deeply involved in Romer v. Evans, which was argued in 1995 and decided in 1996, he did perform pro bono help for Lambda Legal, reviewing filings and helping prepare oral arguments. He also played the role of conservative Justice Antonin Scalia in a mock trial, the Times said.

Judge Roberts was then one of the premier Supreme Court lawyers in the country, working at the Washington firm Hogan & Hartson.

The case, which the homosexual-rights group won on a 6-3 ruling, involved a voter-approved state constitutional amendment in Colorado that barred municipal and local governments from making homosexuals a protected class under civil rights laws.

Conservatives yesterday downplayed the significance of his involvement.

DOJ_NMG_0002165

"The Romer imbroglio is a red herring meant to divide the right," said Sean Rushton of the conservative Committee for Justice. "Roberts was asked by a colleague to represent the conservative view in moot court prep on a pro bono case he did not select and in which he was not centrally involved."

Mr. Rushton added, "It speaks volumes that he was asked to play Scalia."

Rehnquist Treated For Fever (NYT)

By Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who has thyroid cancer, was treated at a hospital yesterday to try to determine the source of a fever, a Supreme Court spokesman said.

The chief justice went home in the early evening without the court or the hospital providing information about the source of the fever.

It was the second time in less than a month that the chief justice, 80, had gone to Virginia Hospital Center in Arlington because of a fever. He spent two nights at the hospital after being admitted on July 12. The cause of the fever in July was not disclosed.

Hours after returning to his home on July 14, the chief justice ended months of speculation about his retirement plans by saying he would continue to serve as long as his health permitted.

The chief justice has been working at the court regularly since his hospitalization in July, said Edward Turner, the court's deputy public information officer.

President Bush has nominated Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who resigned on July 1, two weeks before the chief justice entered the Arlington hospital. Mr. Roberts is preparing for Senate confirmation hearings scheduled to start Sept. 6.

Chief Justice Rehnquist has released only sketchy information about his thyroid cancer, which he disclosed last October. He said that he was being treated with radiation and chemotherapy, and that surgeons had created a hole in his windpipe, a procedure known as a tracheotomy, to ease his breathing.

The chief justice did not say what type of thyroid cancer he had. Most patients with thyroid cancer do not need a tracheotomy. The fact that he had the procedure led many thyroid experts not connected with his case to say that they strongly believed that he had anaplastic thyroid cancer, the most aggressive type of that disease.

On July 14, Chief Justice Rehnquist said that he wanted "to put to rest the speculation and unfounded rumors of my imminent retirement" and that he "will continue to perform my duties as chief justice as long as my health permits."

Rehnquist Has Brief Hospital Stay (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was taken to Virginia Hospital Center in Arlington yesterday after developing a fever, marking the second emergency visit in the past month by the jurist, who has cancer. Rehnquist, 80, who vowed just three weeks ago to keep working "as my health permits," was admitted for "evaluation" and allowed to go home, according to Supreme Court spokesman Ed Turner.

Court officials declined to provide further details. Rehnquist has been undergoing treatment for thyroid cancer since November. He spent two nights at the same hospital last month, also after developing a fever.

His latest visit to the hospital comes amid a fierce political struggle on Capitol Hill over appellate court judge John G. Roberts Jr., who has been nominated by President Bush to succeed retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Rehnquist has long guarded his privacy, and has declined to reveal details about his illness. It was diagnosed in October and resulted in radiation and chemotherapy treatment in November.

Doctors not connected to his case have said that fever-producing infections are common in patients who, like the justice, have a surgical opening in their throat to permit breathing. The opening increases the risk of infection in the lungs, bronchial tubes and trachea.

DOJ_NMG_0002166

Rehnquist resumed work in December and administered the oath of office at Bush's inauguration. He presided over oral arguments in the spring and has continued to work at the court this summer, hiring three law clerks for the term that will begin in October. Officials said Rehnquist worked at the court earlier yesterday.

After his July 14 release from the hospital, Rehnquist issued a statement denying any intention to step down. "I want to put to rest the speculation and unfounded rumors of my imminent retirement," Rehnquist's statement said. "I will continue to perform my duties as long as my health permits."

His symptoms and reported course of treatments have led many outside experts to speculate that Rehnquist may be suffering from anaplastic thyroid cancer, which leaves most of its victims dead within a year of diagnosis. But Rehnquist's emphatic statement last month and his continued work at the court have led others to believe the disease may be less aggressive.

Bush's Loyalty Raises Doubts About His Political Judgment (KRT)

By William Douglas

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - Former Major League Baseball Commissioner Fay Vincent wasn't surprised this week when President Bush supported embattled Baltimore Orioles slugger Rafael Palmeiro after he tested positive for steroids by saying the star first baseman was a trusted friend.

When Bush owned the Texas Rangers in the early 1990s, he was the only team owner to back Vincent in a confidence vote that eventually led to his ouster from baseball's top job in 1992.

"He was very supportive, very outspoken and all alone. I've never forgotten that," Vincent said. "That showed loyalty, an old Bush family trait and an admirable one."

Bush's loyalty to his friends extends from the baseball diamond to the White House, where he's backed beleaguered Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who's mired in an investigation over who leaked the name of an undercover CIA officer, and to John Bolton, whom Bush appointed ambassador to the United Nations despite Senate reservations.

But the president's quick and unequivocal defense of Palmeiro - who's now the subject of a congressional investigation - has raised questions about whether Bush's loyalty undercuts his political judgment.

"It seems that President Bush is falling into the Nixon trap - his administration can do no wrong. His allies and people who support him can do no wrong," said Robert Dallek, a presidential historian. "Palmeiro is above suspicion, Rove is not to be questioned, John Bolton is a stand-up guy.

"The danger is he divorces himself from public reality, political reality, and it erodes his ability to lead the country," Dallek said.

Several analysts said the Palmeiro situation illustrates that point. Bush took a strong stand against steroids in his 2004 State of the Union address, demanding that major league sports take tougher action to eliminate steroid use by athletes.

"The use of performance-enhancing drugs like steroids in baseball, football and other sports is dangerous and it sends the wrong message - that there are shortcuts to accomplishment and that performance is more important than character," Bush said.

But when news of Palmeiro's positive drug test and 10-day suspension by Major League Baseball became public, Bush almost instantly backed the ballplayer, saying Palmeiro spoke truthfully on March 17 when he wagged his finger at the House Government Reform Committee and emphatically denied ever using steroids.

Bush's fondness for Palmeiro - who recently became only the fourth major league player to slam more than 500 home runs and 3,000 base hits - dates back to when Palmeiro played for the Rangers under Bush's ownership.

"Rafael Palmeiro is a friend. He testified in public and I believe him," Bush said Monday. "He's the kind of person that's going to stand up in front of the klieg lights and say he didn't use steroids, and I believe him. Still do."

Bush's quick defense seemed contradictory to some, in light of his previous tough talk on steroids.

DOJ_NMG_0002167

"His defense in this case, so quickly, seemed like an about-face, from taking a stand to a ridiculous statement a fan might make to another fan in a bar," said Richard Lapchick, chairman of the DeVos Sports Business Management Program at the University of Central Florida. "It certainly didn't seem like he thought that one through."

Peter Robey, director of Northeastern University's Center for the Study of Sport in Society, said Bush's defense of Palmeiro dented the president's credibility on an issue that he elevated into the national consciousness.

"He has to be very careful about being consistent," Robey said. "He should temper his support for Palmeiro by coming out with a statement that combines his loyalty to Palmeiro with a drive to rid baseball of steroids. He has to maintain his consistency."

Bush often described himself on the campaign trail as a president who says what he means and means what he says. But Dallek says his consistency sometimes fades when friendship and loyalty arise. He noted that when Rove's name became prominent in the CIA leak investigation, Bush's position on the flap appeared to soften.

In September 2003, Bush had vowed to take "appropriate action" against the culprit. In June 2004, he answered "yes" when asked if he would fire anybody who leaked the agent's name. Last month, his answer was nuanced: "If anyone committed a crime, they will no longer work in my administration."

It's nothing new for a president to stand faithfully behind staff, family and friends.

- Abraham Lincoln rejected calls to remove Gen. Ulysses S. Grant after his Union troops suffered heavy casualties at Shiloh.

- Richard Nixon held onto aides HR Haldeman and John Ehrlichman long after they had become political liabilities in Watergate, though eventually they were forced to resign.

- Jimmy Carter suffered repeated embarrassments from his brother Billy's intervention into public affairs, but never turned against him.

- The first President Bush stood by to the end as his old Texas friend, Sen. John Tower, fought on futilely against Senate opponents who said his drinking made him unfit to serve as secretary of defense.

"This President Bush is close to his father and much like Ronald Reagan in terms of loyalty," said Karen Hult, a political science professor at Virginia Tech. "Loyalty can get presidents into trouble if they hang on to people too long. But loyalty, on the other hand, can enhance (staff) loyalty and raise morale."

Stephen Hess, a political scientist at George Washington University in Washington, believes Bush's judgment isn't clouded by loyalty. The president had no problem in dismissing Lawrence Lindsey, his economic adviser during the 2000 campaign and the head of his Council of Economic Advisers until his ouster in 2002.

"That showed me he'll carry loyalty to a point - which is part of what presidents do," Hess said.

Of course, Lindsey was let go not long after he estimated publicly that a war in Iraq could cost $200 billion, far above Bush loyalists' line at the time, which may have been seen as disloyal. Iraq war costs will exceed $200 billion in the next year.

How Bush Thinks: Intuition Over Intellect (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

As somebody who doesn't have the slightest feeling one way or another about baseball star Rafael Palmeiro, I have to say that it seems pretty clear Palmeiro has used steroids. Palmeiro recently tested positive for steroid use. And then there's former teammate Jose Canseco's allegation that he and Palmeiro both used steroids, which is impossible to verify but would seem to explain why Palmeiro's annual home run total nearly doubled after Canseco joined him on the Texas Rangers. None of this is ironclad proof, but it seems the simplest way to reconcile the available data.

President Bush, though, doesn't see it this way at all. When asked about Palmeiro's positive steroid test, Bush — who knew Palmeiro when the president owned the Rangers — replied, "Rafael Palmeiro is a friend. He testified in public and I believe him. He's the kind of person that's going to stand up in front of the Klieg lights and say he didn't use steroids, and I believe him."

This statement perfectly crystallizes Bush's thinking. Facts don't matter to him. What matters is how he feels about the person in question. In 2001, for instance, Bush met with Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, and the two hit it off. As Bush later told Peggy Noonan, Putin recounted to him a story involving a cross given to him by his mother.

DOJ_NMG_0002168

"I said to him, 'You know, I found that story very interesting. You see, President Putin, I think you judge a person on something other than just politics. I think it's important for me and for you to look for the depth of a person's soul and character. I was touched by the fact your mother gave you the cross.' " Bush publicly testified of Putin, "I was able to get a sense of his soul."

Personally, I put less weight on the fact that Putin got a cross from his mother, and more on the fact that Putin has smothered Russian democracy by outlawing opposition parties, shut down any remotely skeptical media outlet and subjected his critics to political show trials. Yet this sort of evidence has had barely any effect on Bush. Two years later, he was still praising Putin's desire for "a country in which democracy and freedom and rule of law thrive."

Bush is even apt to apply this particular brand of illogic to his own character. In one of the 2000 presidential debates, Al Gore pointed out that Bush as governor of Texas opposed a measure to expand children's healthcare and instead used the money for a tax cut. The debate moderator then asked Bush, "Are those numbers correct? Are his charges correct?" To which Bush replied, "If he's trying to allege that I'm a hardhearted person and I don't care about children, he's absolutely wrong."

The style of Bush's reply is telling. Gore was trying to make a point about Bush's moral priorities by establishing a series of facts about Bush's behavior. Rather than deny having chosen tax cuts over children's healthcare, or explain his rationale for having done so, Bush changed the subject to more comfortable ground: judging people's hearts. He asked the audience to intuit, based on the way he carries himself, that he is a warmhearted person, and thus to reject out of hand any facts that might clash with this impression.

The point isn't just that Bush refuses to engage with facts he finds inconvenient. (Many fail that test.) It's that Bush rejects reason itself. Reason is a process by which we draw our broader conclusions from an accumulation of specific evidence. When the evidence changes ("Hey, this Putin guy seems to be squelching dissent"), our conclusions can also ("Perhaps he doesn't love democracy as much as he said he did!"). Bush, on the other hand, arrives at his beliefs through intuition. His supporters marvel at the unshakeable certainty of his convictions. Well, no wonder.

Philip Stephens: From Acrimony To Misunderstanding (FT)

By Philip Stephens

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

The groans of European policymakers were scarcely audible this week when George W. Bush sent John Bolton to New York as America's new ambassador to the United Nations. To say Mr Bolton has few admirers in Europe is a serious understatement. In my experience, that has never much bothered him. The new ambassador speaks his mind. Hailing as he does from the assertive nationalist school of US politics, Mr Bolton will forever scorn mushy multilateralism.

Yet the response among allies to Mr Bush's decision to override a recalcitrant Senate and press ahead with the appointment was curiously muted. You could say the decision had been widely discounted. A cynic would add that official Europe is, anyway, on vacation. There is, though, something else. The appointment is seen as yesterday's story, a codicil to a troubled phase in transatlantic relations now left behind.

You have to measure the gain against the loss, one senior European told me. As the official in charge of arms control and weapons proliferation issues at the state department, Mr Bolton had wielded considerable and, in European eyes, invariably malign influence. Condoleezza Rice, the new secretary of state, had understood that. At the UN, the expectation (perhaps hope?) is that Mr Bolton will implement policy rather than shape it. It is the policy that matters.

Here, albeit sometimes grudgingly, Europeans admit real changes since Mr Bush's visit to Brussels at the start of his second term. Another sign of that shift came this week with the administration's redefinition of the effort to defeat al-Qaeda inspired terrorism. Talk of a war on terrorism, the leitmotif of Mr Bush's policy after September 11 2001, has been quietly shelved. Senior officials now speak of a struggle against violent extremism and the enemies of freedom.

What difference do a few words make? Potentially a lot. Mr Bush's phrase framed the threat from terrorism in entirely military terms. The words were too easily interpreted as signifying a conflict with Islam rather than with the terrorists seeking to expropriate that faith. The new language points to a broader strategy encompassing diplomacy, politics and economics as well as security. With luck it could provide the basis for a much-needed strategic dialogue with both Europe and moderate Islam.

DOJ_NMG_0002169

There have been other shifts. Mr Bush's stance on Africa and climate change at last month's Gleneagles summit fell far short of European aspirations. Yet even France's Jacques Chirac acknowledged that the US had moved. The same solicitousness was visible in the resolution of a dispute about the role of the International Criminal Court in Darfur and in stronger US support for European diplomacy in Iran.

Elsewhere there have been changes in posture if not policy. Ms Rice's frequent visits to the Middle East underline a determination to make a success of Israel's withdrawal from Gaza. Washington's recent confrontation with a brutal regime in Uzbekistan points to a new sensitivity to charges of American double standards around the world.

None of this has been born of a benevolent altruism in Washington. America's re-engagement with its allies has much more to do with a blunt reassessment of its national interest. The lesson of Mr Bush's first term, and above all, of the bloody chaos in Iraq, is that it is dangerous to exercise power without legitimacy.

There has been a rethink, too, on the European side, not least because of the capacity of transatlantic divisions to fracture European solidarity. "Old" and "new" Europe have become too much of a reality.

What we have now is an absence of transatlantic acrimony and, in many areas (Iraq is an important exception), a predisposition towards co-operation rather than confrontation. That is a big improvement. But it would be a mistake to say it adds up to a reinvigoration of the old alliance. For much of the time Americans and Europeans still look at the world from different ends of the telescope.

The mutual misunderstanding was evident at a recent meeting of senior policymakers and scholars in Venice, hosted by the Council for the United States and Italy. To many of the Europeans present, Iraq still testified to the arrogant unilateralism of the sole superpower. Peering through a different lens, Americans saw a museum in which Europe's political leaders are at once unable to deliver prosperity to their own citizens and unwilling to share the burden of global security.

Behind both analyses lies the reality that Europe is no longer at the centre of America's interests and that Europe's survival no longer rests on a US security guarantee. In this new strategic environment, Europeans crave the institutional order that comes with international law; Americans look out on a Hobbesian world in which US power is the only effective guarantor of western values.

Yet, as Simon Serfaty, a scholar at the Washington-based think-tank CSIS, shows in an excellent new book on the transatlantic relationship*, the one remains dependent on the other. Europe's ambitions for order rely on American power. Washington's necessary quest for legitimacy demands European partnership. The debate, Mr Serfaty rightly argues, should never have been about US power and European weakness but about how their combined strengths can contribute to global order.

Here, though, on the central question of how to marry power with legitimacy, we are far from a new consensus. Vital though it is, the practical transatlantic co-operation we have seen in recent months masks the underlying clash of strategic cultures. Many (not all) of the old shared instincts have been lost.

Mr Serfaty says the alliance can and should be rebuilt around overlapping interests and compatible, if no longer converging, values. The relationship will never reclaim the intimacy of the cold war era but it can be reinvented as a partnership of action. I find this analysis hard to fault. Yet, looking around at the quality of political leadership on both sides of the Atlantic, we should live in hope rather than expectation.

*The Vital Partnership, Rowman & Littlefield

Foreign Policy? Just Get Tips From The Cabby (NYT)

By Clyde Haberman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

A WASHINGTON man who has just taken a job in New York could probably use friendly advice about getting along with his new neighbors.

After all, it can't be easy for John R. Bolton, freshly arrived to represent President Bush at the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0002170

Many of his fellow diplomats are not likely to embrace him, given the harsh remarks he has made about the United Nations. When Secretary General Kofi Annan welcomed the new American ambassador the other day, he smiled through teeth so gritted that he may need an orthodontist.

As for other New Yorkers, they don't collectively think much of Mr. Bolton's boss, judging from the last presidential election.

But despite negative stereotypes and jokes, this city tries to welcome newcomers. Bear in mind, too, what Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico told us a few months ago about the ambassador's job, which he held under President Bill Clinton. Don't just hang out in diplo-land, he advised Mr. Bolton. "You have to engage the city," he said.

In that spirit, we'd like to offer Mr. Bolton some tips on possible places to visit and people to meet.

For instance, he might want to get together with the developer Bruce C. Ratner and also with critics of Mr. Ratner's plan to build a sports arena in Downtown Brooklyn alongside skyscrapers that may rise 60 stories.

Mr. Bolton could advise them on acceptable heights for buildings. He knows a thing or two on that score. It was he who once said of the United Nations: "The Secretariat building has 38 stories. If you lost 10 stories today" - and here he sliced the air with his hand to show how to do it - "it wouldn't make a bit of difference." The man is a born urban planner.

Speaking of developers, the ambassador is probably destined to cross paths with Donald Trump. Several years ago, Mr. Trump annoyed Mr. Annan and some other prominent East Siders by constructing a huge residential tower that opponents feared would overwhelm the United Nations campus.

Despite his stated preference for lopping off the tops of tall buildings, the ambassador might hit it off with Mr. Trump. As evidence, we have the Senate testimony of a former colleague of Mr. Bolton who described him as "a kiss-up, kick-down sort of guy." We don't know about the kiss-up part. But with his overworked "you're fired" routine, Mr. Trump qualifies as a kick-down sort. In Mr. Bolton, he could have the beginning of a beautiful friendship, worthy of Rick and Captain Renault.

To shift gears, don't forget that New York is America's news media capital.

This week, Russia announced that it would bar journalists from ABC News because of unhappiness with their reporting, an action that amounted to an expulsion order. ABC News has its headquarters in New York.

This may be a moment for Mr. Bolton to step up to the plate. Considering his own relationship with the news media, he may already be thinking of a possible retaliatory measure - like suggesting that ABC News also be tossed out of New York.

WHEN he has time, Mr. Bolton could go to Yankee Stadium. Mr. Richardson used to take in ballgames with other diplomats. The new ambassador might especially enjoy meeting George Steinbrenner, the Yankees owner. The two men have things in common.

Mr. Bolton has been accused of misusing intelligence reports to overestimate Syria's ability to acquire unconventional weapons. Similarly, Mr. Steinbrenner has misused scouting reports to overestimate the abilities of a series of ineffectual pitchers. The two men, evidently, share a fondness for faith-based analysis.

No doubt, the ambassador will meet the mayor, Michael R. Bloomberg. Unlike some of his predecessors, Mr. Bloomberg does not have a clearly articulated foreign policy. He is openly pro-Israel, but in general he avoids pronouncements on foreign affairs. Mr. Bolton may spot an opportunity to leave his mark at City Hall.

Perhaps he will learn the city simply by walking it. Foreign policy abounds on sidewalks.

To list a few street names, there is Yitzhak Rabin Way (Israel), Nelson and Winnie Mandela Corner (South Africa), Kudirat Abiola Corner (Nigeria), Brothers to the Rescue Corner (Cuba), United Jerusalem Place (Israel again, though Palestinians have other ideas) and Señor Wences Way (just testing you).

Should you see Mr. Bolton on a stroll, remember to be nice. Never mind this town's prevailing politics. Give him a wave while you're at it. Just use all five fingers, will you?

Democrats See Advantages In Unconventional Candidates (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

DEMOCRATS SEE Ohio near-miss as model for unconventional candidacies.

DOJ_NMG_0002171

After Iraq vet Hackett's 48% special election showing in solid Republican district, Democratic campaign chief Emanuel says "recruiting outside the formula" is key to tapping voter discontent. He touts an Indiana sheriff, a North Carolina football star, and a California pilot in 2006 House races. But Republicans, who triumphed with late spending surge, retain big cash advantage.

"This race was a microcosm for 2006 and ... Republicans won," their House campaign spokesman says. Senate Democrats' committee, however, holds $15 million to $8 million cash edge over Republican counterpart. Hackett now mulls challenging Republican Sen. DeWine next year. Republicans court former Ameritrade chief operating officer Pete Ricketts, who announced his departure yesterday, to challenge Nebraska Democratic Sen. Nelson.

Republican governors group outraises Democrats', $9 million to $5.3 million, in first half 2005.

BUSH SEEKS credit for a stronger economy.

After signing the energy bill in Albuquerque, N.M., Monday, he will join economic advisers Hubbard and Bernanke Tuesday to assess conditions. Fears of a "soft patch" fade, as data on industrial output, capital spending and services portray an economy "firing on all cylinders," says UBS economist Larry Hatheway.

Still, wage increases lag behind despite low unemployment, and high gas prices still damp consumer spirits. A break in house-price increases remains a risk; mortgage rates inch up but stay low. Today's July jobless report will give more clues to the labor market's health.

PARTIES JOCKEY over impact of CIA leak.

Democrats two years ago sought a damage assessment over the outing of Valerie Plame, but Congress still hasn't received one. Such assessments are routinely done for unauthorized disclosures of an agent's identity.

The National Counterintelligence Executive has said the Central Intelligence Agency took steps to mitigate real or potential damage. A CIA spokeswoman declines to comment amid the investigation by special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, who has probed the role of Bush strategist Rove and others. Democrats, who would benefit from showing the leak was costly, say Republicans want to play it down.

A CBS poll shows just 28% of Republicans believe the Bush administration is "telling the entire truth" about the leak.

TICKET TO RIDE: Just-passed highway bill repeals three-decade-old ban on commercial trucking licenses for diabetics. Drivers who use insulin will be medically evaluated on a case-by-case basis. American Diabetes Association Chairman Lawrence Smith hails the change as an antidiscrimination measure with "profound effect."

BIRTHDAY BOY: Treasury Secretary Snow, turning 66, swore in his undersecretary for international affairs, Tim Adams, Tuesday by the pool at the Copacabana Palace Hotel in Rio de Janeiro. Adams used a Portuguese Bible; champagne and cigars followed.

MORALE BOOSTER: Secretary of State Rice visits the Millennium Challenge Corp., under attack for implementing the president's foreign-aid program and still waiting for the White House to replace departing boss Applegarth. Rice thanks staffers for their work and says, "I know there are always bugs to be worked out."

BETTER DAYS?: After high-profile defections, the AFL-CIO seeks strength in vote next month by California Nurses Association on joining the federation. Two-thirds of the 65,000 members would have to approve; union leaders back the move as they battle Gov. Schwarzenegger over hospital-staffing levels.

CONGRESS PREPARES to raise deposit-insurance limits.

The House has tried for years to boost the $100,000 ceiling on insured bank deposits. With Senate Banking Chairman Shelby no longer resisting, Virginia financial consultant Bert Ely gives good odds of success.

Shelby plans to move compromise legislation, backed by colleagues Enzi of Wyoming and Johnson of South Dakota, that would index deposit-insurance increases to inflation. A separate plan to boost coverage of tax-deferred retirement savings accounts to $250,000 may be pared down.

Banking lobbyists predict Bush won't veto deposit-insurance increase, despite past opposition.

MINOR MEMOS: Cheney's trip to services for Saudi King Fahd represents his first overseas funeral as vice president....Former South Carolina Sen. Hollings, in "The American Prospect," says U.S. manufacturing "is so outsourced that an incident with China would cause us to cancel Christmas."

DOJ_NMG_0002172

White House Broadens New Fed Chief Search (DMN)

By Danielle Dimartino

The Dallas Morning News, August 5, 2005

Investors woke Thursday morning to the surprising news that the White House is said to be broadening its search for a replacement for Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, who is due to retire in January, according to a report in the Wall Street Journal.

The three candidates most often cited to fill the post include Ben Bernanke, former Fed governor and current chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. Martin Feldstein of Harvard University and R. Glenn Hubbard of Columbia University have been the other two leading candidates.

In a recent report, Goldman Sachs chief economist Bill Dudley said Mr. Bernanke would be the most appealing to market participants.

"His views are well known; he is judged as highly knowledgeable about monetary policy; and he believes in increased transparency and inflation-targeting," Mr. Dudley noted.

But according to the Journal report, though the leading three candidates have not been ruled out, concerns persist about Mr. Greenspan's successor's ability to function within the financial markets and use business and markets contacts to move beyond the confines of economic data to set monetary policy.

The decision on Mr. Greenspan's replacement could be one of the most important of President Bush's decisions while in office.

Mr. Greenspan, who is 79 and started at the Fed in 1987, has raised the profile of the Fed chairmanship to new levels during his 18 years at the Fed and there are worries that his departure could make for an even more nervous marketplace than that typically associated with the changing of the guard at the nation's central bank.

"Historically, there is some evidence that Fed transitions are associated with more volatile financial markets," Mr. Dudley added. "The Treasury bond, stock and currency markets have tended to be more volatile during the first year of the last three Fed chairman's terms compared to their overall tenures."

Among the alternate candidates mentioned in the Journal article is former Bush advisor Lawrence Lindsey. The two people said to be leading the search for Mr. Greenspan's replacement are Vice President Dick Cheney and National Economic Council Director Allan Hubbard.

There is some speculation that Mr. Greenspan's will stay on past Jan. 31, as is allowed if a replacement has not been found or the Senate approval process remained incomplete, but those close to the Fed chairman have said in recent weeks that he has every intention of stepping down as planned at the end of January.

Cell Lines, Moral Lines (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

It is a good idea to expand federal funding of embryonic stem cell research. It is a bad idea to do that without prohibiting research that uses embryos created specifically to be used in research and destroyed.

What is deeply troubling about the Castle-DeGette stem cell bill, which passed the House and will soon roar through the Senate, is that it combines the good with the bad: expansion with no limit.

The expansion -- federal funding for stem cells derived from some of the thousands of embryos that fertility clinics would otherwise discard -- is good because the president's sincere and principled Aug. 9, 2001, attempt to draw a narrower line has failed. It failed politically because his restriction -- funding research only on stem cells from embryos destroyed before the day of that speech -- seems increasingly arbitrary as we move away from that date.

It failed practically because that cohort of embryos is a diminishing source of cells. Stem cells turn out to be a lot less immortal than we thought. The idea was that once you created a line, it could replicate indefinitely. Therefore you would need only a few lines.

DOJ_NMG_0002173

It turns out, however, that as stem cells replicate, they begin to make genetic errors and to degenerate. After several generations some lines become unusable.

In addition, there has been a new advance since 2001. Whereas stem cells in those days had to be grown on mouse feeder cells, today we can grow stem cells on human feeder cells. That makes them far more (potentially) therapeutically usable.

For both of these reasons, the August 2001 policy is obsolete. Accordingly, Congress will soon federally fund research from embryos newly created in IVF clinics.

It simply will not do for opponents of this expanded research to say that the federal government should not force those Americans who find this research abhorrent to support it with their taxes. By that logic we should never go to war, or impose the death penalty, except by unanimous consent of the entire population. We make many life-or-death decisions as a society as a whole, without being held hostage to the sensibilities of a minority, however substantial and sincere.

Nonetheless, Congress's current vehicle for expanding this research, the Castle-DeGette bill, is extremely dangerous. It expands the reach for a morally problematic area of research -- without drawing any serious moral lines.

The moral problem for that majority of Americans who, like me, don't believe that a zygote or blastocyst has all the attributes and therefore merits all the rights of personhood, is this: Does that mean that everything is permissible with a human embryo?

Don't they understand the real threat? It is not so much the destruction of existing human embryos -- God knows, more than a million are already destroyed every year in abortions, and thousands are doomed to die in fertility clinics. A handful drawn from fertility clinics where they will be destroyed anyway alters no great moral balance.

The real threat to our humanity is the creation of new human life willfully for the sole purpose of making it the means to someone else's end -- dissecting it for its parts the way we would dissect something with no more moral standing than a mollusk or paramecium. The real Brave New World looming before us is the rise of the industry of human manufacture, where human embryos are created not to produce children -- the purpose of IVF clinics -- but for spare body parts.

It is this creation-for-the-purpose-of-destruction that needs to be stopped -- and it does not matter whether that creation occurs by joining sperm and egg (as the Jones Institute in Virginia has already done) or by cloning a cell from an adult, turning it into a human embryo and then destroying it for its stem cells.

Both in my writings and as a member of the President's Council on Bioethics, I have advocated this dual policy: Expand federal funding of stem cell research by using discarded embryos, but couple that with a firm national ban on creating human embryos for any purpose other than the birth of a human baby. We finally have a chance to enact this grand compromise -- but only if a majority of senators insist that the welcome expansion provided in the Castle-DeGette bill, which will yield a near endless supply of embryonic stem cells, cannot take place unless the door is firmly closed now, while we still have the chance, on the manufacture of human embryos for research and destruction.

Ignorance Is Bliss; Sometimes It's Policy (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

The ranch at Crawford hardly compares with the Forbidden City, but George W. Bush has something in common with the Ming emperors of China: He seems determined to make his great nation less ambitious and more ignorant.

He wouldn't see it that way, of course, but the emperors didn't see it that way either. And I don't know how else to explain policies and pronouncements that make the quest for knowledge conditional on politics. That is a prescription for decline.

In the early 1400s the Ming emperor Zhu Di made China into the world's leading maritime nation, sending huge fleets on missions of trade and exploration as far as the Swahili coast of Africa. It should have been just a matter of a few years before Chinese sailors discovered the Americas. But Zhu Di's successors, influenced by court politics, called home the fleets and forbade them to sail again, forfeiting the riches of the New World -- and five centuries of global domination -- to an underdeveloped backwater called Europe.

I guess it's a general rule of political dynasties, in China as well as in Texas, that the blood thins with successive generations.

DOJ_NMG_0002174

Examples? Well, there's the way Bush insists on hamstringing American scientists who are trying to explore the potential medical benefits of therapies involving embryonic stem cells.

You are excused if your eyes glaze over at the mention of the words "stem cells," but it's enough to know that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, in a rare display of backbone, has challenged the president over his suffocating restrictions on federal funding for stem cell research -- and also that the fight is akin to arguing over what kind of lock to put on the barn door while the horse frolics in the next county.

While our leaders disagree, stem cell technology is being developed and advanced in laboratories all around the world, especially in Asia. South Korean researchers have arguably pushed farther than anyone else. At the moment it's still a long shot that embryonic stem cells will prove to be a panacea, but if they do it's increasingly likely that the key discoveries will be made elsewhere -- not in the United States.

And there's no real reason for Bush's position except politics. All that Frist and other reasonable people want is to be able to experiment on surplus embryos from fertility clinics, embryos that otherwise will be destroyed. But the radical pro-life lobby won't be reasonable, so Bush does his best to keep the United States on the sidelines of what is, at the moment, the most exciting field of medical research.

Then there's this administration's almost comical insistence that the firm scientific consensus on global climate change is some kind of mass hallucination. "What global warming?" they ask, as mean temperatures rise, Arctic ice melts, tropical diseases march north and hurricanes rake poor Florida in swarms.

The much-maligned Kyoto treaty isn't the point. Treaty or no treaty, it looks as if sooner or later the world is going to have to find a way to prosper without spewing so much heat-trapping carbon dioxide into the atmosphere. Other nations are busy trying to develop technology and coping mechanisms to prepare for that day. When it comes, we'll be at or near the back of the line.

Maybe we'll line up all our obsolete SUVs along the coast to try to hold back the rising sea.

To round out the trifecta, the other day Bush reiterated his support for teaching "intelligent design" in America's schools along with evolution, as a way of exposing students to different points of view. This really borders on madness.

Intelligent design isn't a scientific theory at all; it's a matter of faith -- Creationism 2.0. Faith is a different kind of truth. Charles Darwin's landmark discovery of evolution, with a few minor modifications and additions over the years, has proved to be one of the sturdiest and most unassailable scientific theories of all time. To the extent that science can say anything is true, evolution is scientifically true. Done. Settled. As Walter Cronkite used to say, "That's the way it is."

To teach American children in science class that intelligent design is an alternative explanation of how birds, anteaters and people came to be birds, anteaters and people is simply to make American children less well educated than children elsewhere.

By all rights, we ought to remember the Ming dynasty for discovering America; instead, we think of gorgeous pottery but not much else. China's current leaders seem determined not to make the same mistake.

Crossing The Stem Cell Line (LAT)

By David Gelernter

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

I would love to join Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and many other conservatives who have decided to support federal funding for wide-ranging research in a hugely promising new area — embryonic stem cells. I'd love to, but I can't.

Stem cells can be made to generate nearly any type of human tissue, including types that might cure disease and save lives. They are taken from human embryos that are destroyed in the process. But the results might help alleviate horrific human suffering.

In 2001, the Bush administration sponsored legislation to allow federal funding of stem cell research. But funded research was restricted to the stem cell colonies in existence at that time. Frist and others would expand funding to cover new stem cell lines created from frozen embryos left over from fertility treatments, embryos that would otherwise be discarded. (It's possible that new techniques could yield stem cells without destroying embryos, but those techniques are still experimental.)

DOJ_NMG_0002175

Why would anyone oppose Frist's new position? Because embryos are potential infants just as infants are potential adults. The human embryo is a tightly closed bud that will bloom one day if we let it. The difference between bud and blossom is only luck and time. If it seems OK to destroy embryos but not full-term fetuses, that's only because embryos look less human. The distinction rests not on justice but on squeamishness.

But this isn't my reason for opposing expanded stem cell funding. I am willing, in principle, to lean on a distinction that is made in the Talmud between "potential" life (such as embryos) and actual life outside the womb. Both must be protected; but actual life ranks higher. If there were nothing more to consider, I'd be willing to use doomed embryos to search for lifesaving new technologies. Reality often forces us to choose between imperfect alternatives.

But to go down that road, I must be able to trust the American public to draw a line and forbid science to step over it.

The doomed frozen embryos Frist is eyeing were created with no thought of mining them for stem cells. But the obvious next step might be to let scientists breed embryos specifically for research, or buy them from dealers. To support Frist, you must be sure that Americans will never permit these ghastly next steps.

Why "ghastly"? Because we can never permit the creation of human life with the intent of using and then killing it. We have no right to construct a world in which two kinds of human embryo exist, one immeasurably precious and the other designed to be cut up for parts. We'd be turning "all men are created equal" into the ugliest kind of lie. (The Talmud, for its part, never allows potential life to be destroyed without a specific, powerful reason.)

Can we trust the American public to forbid the creation of disposable human life? Can we trust ourselves to forbid the premeditated destruction of weak and helpless potential human beings?

No, and the Terri Schiavo case proves it.

Schiavo was weak, helpless, gravely brain-damaged, "dimly wakeful," unable to feed herself — but not dying. Her parents loved her, and she (they believed) continued to love them.

Yet various courts ruled at her husband's request that her life wasn't worth living. And so her caregivers were ordered to stop feeding her. "Even a chip of ice to relieve the pain of a parched mouth and throat was judicially prohibited," wrote Dr. Paul McHugh in Commentary magazine, "and local sheriffs were alerted to prevent it." She died slowly of dehydration. Surveys suggested that the American public didn't care to interfere, and disapproved of politicians who tried to.

CAN THIS same public be trusted to tell the biomedical establishment "this far and no further"? Of course not. When hard moral judgments were required, whatever the "experts" said was good enough for us. We refused to interfere and draw a line. And so we have no right to allow science to set off down this road.

I have permanent, debilitating injuries that stem cell research might conceivably help. But rejecting research that might help you personally is dirt-easy compared to rejecting research that might help a suffering family member. When Americans campaign for unrestricted stem cell research out of despairing love, I can't blame them any more than I can blame Terri Schiavo's parents for pleading for their daughter's life.

How much do our moral scruples really matter to us in the end? An agonizing question.

But I can't line up with Frist, much as I would like to.

The Duplicate Dog (NYT)

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

The cloning of a dog by South Korean scientists is notable mostly for its display of virtuosity and persistence by the research team. Over the past decade, researchers around the world have cloned a number of mammals, including sheep, mice, cows, goats and pigs. But dogs' reproductive physiology was just too idiosyncratic for easy manipulation. So when a South Korean team announced this week that it had cloned an Afghan puppy, the feat evoked awe and admiration from other researchers.

It wasn't easy. A team of about 15 people worked for nearly three years to extract eggs and implant more than 1,000 cloned canine embryos in surrogate mother dogs. They got only three pregnancies, and only one dog that survived into healthy puppyhood. Although the work demonstrated that dogs could indeed be cloned, that's a horrendously poor success rate. Some dog lovers may be salivating for the chance to clone a favored canine, but that prospect seems far off given the arduous nature of the task. An American company, Genetic Savings & Clone, has spent seven years and $19 million in a quest - fruitless so far - to clone a dog.

DOJ_NMG_0002176

The Korean team hopes that cloned dogs may someday be used to study the progression of diseases that are similar in dogs and humans and the use of stem cells to cure them. Conservationists hope that cloning may help them preserve some rare dog species from extinction.

But the larger lesson here is that the Koreans are truly a force to be reckoned with in cloning and stem cell research. This team was the first to clone human embryos and extract stem cells from them, and now it is the first to clone a dog, perhaps the most difficult feat in mammalian cloning. The center of gravity in cloning and stem cell research may be shifting abroad while American efforts are slowed by taboos and financing restrictions.

G.O.P. Wants More Details Of Corzine Aid (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

TRENTON, Aug. 4 - Saying that New Jersey cannot endure another governor hobbled by personal entanglements, New Jersey Republican leaders called Thursday for Senator Jon S. Corzine to disclose any other financial dealings he may have had with a union leader to whom he gave $470,000.

Their statements came after news reports that in 2002 Mr. Corzine provided a $470,000 mortgage to Carla Katz, president of Communications Workers of America Local 1034, which represents 9,000 state workers and will be among the labor groups lobbying the next governor for billions of dollars in wages and benefits.

In an interview with The New York Times on Wednesday, Mr. Corzine, the Democratic candidate for governor, said he and Ms. Katz were dating at the time he made the loan. He forgave the debt in December 2004, several months after they ended their relationship, he said.

Mr. Corzine and Ms. Katz said this week that their past relationship and financial dealings would not prevent them from representing their constituents, but they declined to say whether they had other financial interactions.

Mr. Corzine's Republican opponent in the November election, Douglas R. Forrester, called that response inadequate, saying New Jersey voters had the right to know whether their official duties as governor and union leader might be swayed by their personal and financial relationship.

"I think they should disclose everything, especially if there is any ongoing financial arrangement," he said. "It suggests an all-too-familiar pattern in New Jersey of public officials entangling themselves in relationships that are not private matters but in direct conflict with the public interest."

While Mr. Forrester approached the topic rather gingerly, saying that he respected their right to privacy, other Republicans were more pointed in their criticism of Mr. Corzine.

After months of criticizing the senator for his connection to an assortment of Democratic power brokers and donors, the state Republican chairman, Tom Wilson, invoked the specter of former Gov. James E. McGreevey who resigned after admitting an extramarital affair with Golan Cipel, a man he had appointed a security adviser.

"A year ago Jim McGreevey announced his resignation, saying he wouldn't allow people to use their personal knowledge of him to threaten the workings of state government," Mr. Wilson said in a written statement. "It seems to me that one year later we can simply substitute the name Jon Corzine for Jim McGreevey and Carla Katz for Golan Cipel. This latest revelation indicates a kind of personal relationship that might again subject a governor to the same kinds of pressures and conflicts all over again."

The discussion of the implications of Mr. Corzine's financial relationship with Ms. Katz dominated the day's events in a campaign that has maintained a surprising intensity during the usually quiet summer months.

Political analysts say it is unclear whether the issue will attract New Jersey voters.

"This is one of those stories people are likely to pay attention to because it's like a TV sitcom," said Ingrid Reed, a professor at Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute of Politics. "There's a girlfriend. A wealthy person. She's powerful, he's likely to be powerful. It's the kind of thing people can identify with. But the fact that it's personal may also make it easier for Corzine to explain, too."

DOJ_NMG_0002177

After delivering a speech about domestic security in Jersey City on Thursday, Mr. Corzine found himself facing questions from more than a dozen reporters pressing for more details about his relationship with Ms. Katz.

The senator again declined to say whether he had given her money in addition to the mortgage, but he sought to assure voters that, if elected, his administration would not hesitate to negotiate aggressively with labor unions.

"I don't think there's a conflict," Mr. Corzine said. "The relationship has ended."

Ms. Katz, meanwhile, received support from an assortment of union leaders. Although some labor experts said the money Ms. Katz accepted from Mr. Corzine might create the appearance of a conflict of interest, Candice Johnson, a spokeswoman for the union's national organization, said union officials were not troubled.

"There's nothing illegal or unethical about it," she said. "They had a personal relationship a few years ago. But it's over and she has proven herself a very effective union leader."

Some New Jersey labor leaders said that their confidence in Ms. Katz also remained unshaken.

"It's a personal relationship she had with Jon Corzine, and the decisions we make at the bargaining table have nothing to do with personal relationships," said Hetty Rosenstein, president of Local 1037 of the union. "Carla has been aggressive in representing her members for more than 20 years. There's never been any question about her loyalties. And anyone who knows her knows that she would never let anything distract her from that cause."

Senator Defends Loan To Union Official (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

TRENTON, N.J., Aug. 4 -- Senator and gubernatorial candidate Jon S. Corzine lent the president of New Jersey's largest state workers union $470,000 when the two were romantically involved three years ago, then forgave the debt last year.

Corzine defended the transaction, first described in reports Thursday in the Newark Star-Ledger and the New York Times.

Corzine turned the 10-year mortgage into a gift to Carla Katz last December, according to court documents. The move came a week after he kicked off his campaign for governor and several months after the two stopped dating.

Katz, 46, is president of Local 1034 of the Communications Workers of America. The union local represents 9,000 state workers.

Corzine's involvement with Katz is significant because the two could find themselves on opposite sides of the bargaining table if he wins the November election. Corzine is a Democrat who was elected to the Senate in 2000, and he announced in December that he would run for governor.

The Republican candidate for governor, businessman Doug Forrester, said Corzine's gift to Katz "suggests an all-too-familiar pattern in New Jersey of public officials entangling themselves in relationships that are not private matters but in direct conflict with the public interest."

Speaking after a news conference Thursday on an unrelated matter, Corzine said the loan would not hamper his administration's ability to negotiate with the union.

"I don't think there's a conflict," said Corzine, 58. "The relationship has ended."

The mortgage was found among public documents and land records filed with Hunterdon County. Katz was living in a more than 200-year-old home at the time of the loan and used the money to buy out her ex-husband.

Corzine, a former chief executive of Goldman Sachs, is estimated to have personal wealth of as much as $261 million. He split from his wife of 33 years in 2002.

In separate interviews with the two newspapers, Katz and Corzine both said they were confident the matter would not compromise their constituents in negotiations.

Corzine, who met Katz in 1999 during his Senate campaign, declined to discuss terms of the loan or details of his relationship with her. The Democrat said he forgave the loan after his romance with Katz ended in July 2004 because she did not have the means to repay it.

He declined to say whether he had given Katz or any of her relatives any other financial help.

"I'm a public official, but I also have a private life," Corzine said.

DOJ_NMG_0002178

Katz did not disagree with Corzine's account of the mortgage but declined to discuss the matter with the newspapers.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Klayman revisited

Larry Klayman — longtime foe of former President Bill Clinton, Judicial Watch founder and former Republican candidate for the Senate seat of Florida — is now a practicing barrister. Mr. Klayman has joined the Cleveland-based law firm Walter & Haverfield LLP and will manage the firm's branches in the District and Miami.

But he's still hungry. The tenacious Non-Friend-of-Bill, who filed 80 lawsuits against Mr. Clinton and former first lady Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, from 1994 to 2004, is armed and ready.

"I remain in the game, and will continue to do work in the public interest," Mr. Klayman said yesterday.

"I am now a private lawyer available to take cases that will help the public. Going into the private sector also will enable me to remain politically active," he continued. "And, by the way, I am supporting Katherine Harris in her bid for the Senate seat from Florida."

Mrs. Harris is running for the seat now held by Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson. Mr. Klayman left Judicial Watch in September to run himself, but lost to fellow Republican — and eventual victor — Sen. Mel Martinez.

Oh Bob, Bob, Bob ...

And speaking of Katherine Harris and former President Bill Clinton's advisers, a bombastic broadcast culture moment came at precisely 4:50 yesterday afternoon. During an appearance on CNN's "Strategy Session," syndicated columnist and Plamegate regular Robert Novak cursed with vigor at Clinton campaign guru James Carville, flung off his microphone and then stormed off the set.

And yes, the barnyard obscenity he used made it onto the air.

The pair had been discussing Mrs. Harris' recent accusations that a magazine had doctored photos of her to yield an unattractive outcome. Was Mr. Novak simply defending her honor?

Most think he was peeved because another round of Valerie Plame questions was imminent — by virtue of the fact that apologetic CNN host Ed Henry later told viewers, "I had told him in advance that we would ask him about the CIA leak investigation. Hopefully, we'll be able to ask him about that in the future."

CNN wasn't pleased.

Spokeswoman Edie Emery called the longtime CNN commentator's behavior "inexcusable and unacceptable," adding that Mr. Novak had apologized to CNN, and the network was apologizing to viewers.

"We've asked Mr. Novak to take some time off," she said.

Judge grudge match

Will they duke it out or play nice? A slim majority of Americans say the Supreme Court confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. will result in a brawl between Republicans and Democrats, according to a Gallup Poll released yesterday.

Just more than half — 51 percent — said the hearings would spark a "major fight that would drag on for a long time," and 42 percent said it would be "a relatively easy process." Seven percent said they had no opinion in the matter.

The survey of 1,006 adults was taken from July 22 to July 24.

Grasping for straws

Newsweek writers Richard Wolffe and Holly Bailey have connected enough dots to decide that President Bush is worried about the controversial, ultra-violent "Over There," a 13-part dramatic series about the Iraq war on the FX channel.

"The art-imitates-real-life idea is breaking new ground in both TV and politics, posing a curious question for President Bush and his aides: Could 'Over There' affect the already-fragile poll numbers on Iraq?" they write in the Aug 3 issue.

Please, Mr. Wolffe, Ms. Bailey. Despite huge media hubbub, only 4 million tuned in for the show's debut last week, according to Neilsen. Frankly, it's a surprise the pair didn't conclude that Mr. Bush was worried about Al Gore's new cable channel, too.

DOJ_NMG_0002179

But Newsweek, apparently, can still base a story on a single anonymous source.

"According to one senior Bush aide, the president has voiced a strong interest in the series but hasn't yet seen it for himself," they write. "Bush quizzed his aides last week about how the show was produced and how faithful it was to the conflict. 'Does it really depict what is going on? Do you get a sense of it?' Bush asked. In fact, just a handful of senior aides have seen the show and report it to be 'riveting' and 'pretty vivid.' But the senior aide says, "We don't have an official opinion yet. I don't think enough people have seen it.' "

New Jersey, Part 1

Although one press report this week notes that former New Jersey Gov. James McGreevey is living quietly in a one-bedroom apartment in Rahway, N.J., the man who resigned from office in the name of his own homosexuality may have some excitement just around the corner.

Memoirs, of course.

According to Radar Magazine, Mr. McGreevey is "in the final stages of negotiating a mid-six figure deal" with publishing lioness Judith Regan, whose Harper Collins imprint, Regan Books, is also home to Bernard Kerik, Jenna Jameson, Jose Canseco and Frank Gotti Agnello.

"It will be especially interesting to hear what McGreevey has to say about reports that it was his former homeland security aide Golan Cipel's threats to go public about their affair that led the governor to step down and come out to his family," the magazine noted yesterday, adding that Mr. McGreevey and Mr. Kerik "could get together and share some laughs about the ups and downs of American politics."

New Jersey, Part 2

More drama in the Garden State: Democratic Sen. and gubernatorial candidate Jon Corzine loaned the president of New Jersey's largest state workers union $470,000 to pay her mortgage when the two dated in 2002, then forgave the debt last year.

Mr. Corzine, turned the 10-year mortgage into a gift to former sweetheart Carla Katz just a week after kicking off his campaign for governor and several months after the two stopped dating, the Star-Ledger of Newark reported yesterday.

Miss Katz, 46, is president of the Communications Workers of America, Local 1034, which represents 9,000 state workers and endorsed Mr. Corzine's run for the Senate in 2000.

Mr. Corzine, 58, is a former chief executive of Goldman Sachs Co., worth $261 million and split from his wife of 33 years, three years ago. He insisted the loan would not hamper his administration's ability to negotiate fairly with the union.

"I don't think there's a conflict. The relationship has ended," Mr. Corzine said.

"It is certainly clear that this is more than a relationship between a special-interest group leader and a candidate for public office. You're dealing with the chief representative of the largest bargaining unit under your authority as governor," countered Tom Wilson, the state Republican Party chairman.

NASA Rules Out A Fourth Spacewalk To Repair Shuttle (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

HOUSTON, Aug. 4 - NASA has decided against a fourth spacewalk for the Discovery astronauts that would have involved repairing an insulating blanket that had pulled out near the commander's window.

"We have good news," Julie Payette, the officer in the control room here who handles communication with the crew, told the astronauts at midday. Ms. Payette said mission managers had decided, after a lengthy analysis, that the blanket did not pose a threat and so another spacewalk would not be necessary.

"There is no issue," Ms. Payette, who is also an astronaut, said.

Later, in an afternoon briefing, however, N. Wayne Hale, the deputy manager of the shuttle program, acknowledged that there was still some uncertainty about the risk posed by the blanket. Much of the upper fuselage of the shuttle is covered with such blankets, which are woven of heat-resistant fabric.

The worst of the heat from re-entry is experienced by the leading edges of the wing and the nose, which are covered with a carbon composite that can hold up under temperatures of thousands of degrees. The underside of the shuttle is covered with heat-resistant ceramic tiles that can take almost as much punishment. The top of the craft, however, experiences far less heating, and so NASA covers it with insulation blankets.

DOJ_NMG_0002180

Earlier in the mission, analysts poring over images of the orbiter taken in space saw insulation ballooning at the commander's window.

The damage was apparently caused by a strike by debris during launching, mission managers have said. Analysts were concerned that the puffed-out blanket might expose the orbiter to too much re-entry heat, but were most concerned that the blanket might shed pieces under the stress of re-entry and that those pieces might hit other parts of the craft and cause damage.

The spacewalk would have been the second to make repairs to the shuttle on this mission.

On Wednesday, another astronaut, Stephen K. Robinson, plucked out two protruding gap fillers - thin strips of cloth that ride between tiles - to ensure that the bottom of the orbiter was perfectly smooth. The goal was for the shuttle to avoid abnormal eddies of plasma as it plummets through the atmosphere toward Earth for a landing early Monday.

But any spacewalk, or extravehicular activity, entails risks, and those had to be carefully balanced against the potential for harm posed by the insulating blanket. In her call to the shuttle, Ms. Payette said that a new analysis predicting the course that pieces of the blanket might take did not show a hazard for the shuttle, and that wind-tunnel testing at NASA's Ames research center "came to the same conclusion."

"So, basically, no EVA four," she said in a conversation with one of the astronauts, Soichi Noguchi.

"No EVA four," Mr. Noguchi responded. "That's, I would say, good news."

Efforts to repair the shuttle in orbit have captivated many Americans, including one enjoying his vacation in Crawford, Tex.

"I was amazed at the procedures that took place to repair the craft," President Bush said to reporters at his Texas ranch, where he was meeting with President Álvaro Uribe of Colombia. "It's pretty remarkable."

Mr. Hale said the considerable risks of a spacewalk outweighed the benefit of trying to repair the blanket, especially because mission managers could not figure out a way to do the job effectively. Analysis suggested that the possibility a chunk of blanket might hit some other piece of the shuttle was 11/2 in 100, Mr. Hale said, but many uncertainties remain.

"We are in the first generation of winged space vehicles," he said.

Discovery Gets An All-Clear To Return Next Week (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

HOUSTON, Aug. 4 -- NASA cleared the space shuttle Discovery on Thursday for its flight home next week after concluding that a frayed thermal blanket below the commander's window is not a serious flight hazard.

Wayne Hale, deputy shuttle program manager, said engineers at NASA's Ames Research Center in California tested similar strips of fabric in a wind tunnel overnight at speeds between Mach 1 and Mach 6 -- six times the speed of sound.

Hale said the engineers found that even if the entire blanket tore away at the worst possible time, it had only a 1.5 percent chance of striking Discovery, and, at worst, it could put a hole in the orbiter's rudder brake but not disable it.

"We have released Discovery to reenter," Hale told reporters in a news conference at Johnson Space Center. "We have decided not to take any action on the thermal blanket because we have determined it is a negligible risk at this time."

Formal clearance for reentry is an important milestone in any shuttle flight -- particularly for Discovery, the first shuttle to fly since Columbia disintegrated over Texas 2 1/2 years ago, killing all seven astronauts aboard.

NASA had equipped Discovery with a wide array of new sensors, imaging devices and inspection systems, and it had expected to clear the shuttle four days into the 14-day mission. Instead, during launch the external fuel tank shed a large chunk of foam insulation similar to the one that caused the Columbia disaster. NASA has grounded the shuttle fleet until this problem is solved.

In-space inspections before and during the shuttle's nine-day sojourn at the international space station then turned up two protruding "gap fillers" in the underside heat shielding, and the frayed blanket, a rectangular piece of fabric installed just above the D in "Discovery" painted under mission commander Eileen Collins's window.

DOJ_NMG_0002181

On Wednesday, spacewalker Stephen Robinson made the first in-flight shuttle repair in history when he removed gap fillers, but Hale told reporters that Discovery might need another spacewalk for the thermal blanket.

On Thursday morning, the Hale-led Mission Management Team conducted its daily review with the blanket as the last impediment to reentry clearance.

In Mission Control, shuttle communicator Julie Payette called Discovery shortly after 1 p.m. Eastern time: "We have good news," she said. "The MMT has reached the conclusion that the blanket underneath the . . . window is safe for return. We have new analysis that showed debris . . . would be no issue.

"So, basically, no EVA 4," she concluded, using NASA shorthand for "extravehicular activity" -- a spacewalk.

"That's, I would say, good news," replied Discovery spacewalker Soichi Noguchi.

The astronauts spent the day filling up the Italian-built Rafaello multipurpose logistics module, a cylindrical storage bin that carried nine tons of spare parts and supplies up to the space station and will return with 10 tons of worn-out gear, broken tools and trash.

On Friday, the astronauts will put Rafaello back into Discovery's payload bay and restow other equipment. The shuttle will undock from the station early Saturday and spend Sunday testing flight control systems before landing at Kennedy Space Center in Cape Canaveral, Fla., before dawn Monday.

Scrutiny Of Moonlighting Scientists Criticized (LAT)

By David Willman

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — Ethics officials at the National Institutes of Health often approved senior scientists' requests to moonlight for drug companies and other outside organizations without gathering adequate documentation to help judge whether the arrangements posed conflicts of interest, federal inspectors have found.

In 81% of the recent outside arrangements reviewed by the inspector general of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, ethics officials were found to have approved the deals on the basis of limited information. This and other findings are included in a report by the inspector general that is to be made public today.

"In no instance was the documentation we reviewed adequate for us to make a definitive determination regarding whether an activity was appropriate," the report said. "Inadequate documentation for outside activities can, intentionally or unintentionally, hide potential violations."

The report found that information submitted by the scientists to NIH ethics officials "included insufficient detail regarding the nature of the outside activities, the nature of employees' official job duties, the differences between the outside activities and their official job duties, the outside organizations, and any NIH funding or partnerships with the outside organizations."

The advance descriptions of the outside positions that NIH scientists proposed to take "were too general to demonstrate that employees' official duties would not overlap," the report said.

The inspector general's reviewers "could not determine the appropriateness of eight activities, and they also determined that two of the activities appeared to violate regulations."

The report also said, "It is quite possible that, due to the approach taken in this review, we have underestimated the number of activities that should not have been approved."

A copy of the 72-page report was obtained Thursday by the Los Angeles Times.

The review marks another condemnation of the NIH's recent policies governing moonlighting by agency scientists. In July 2004, the chief of the Office of Government Ethics concluded that the NIH had a "permissive culture" toward conflicts of interest. The lax policies were largely the result of an agencywide lifting of controls in late 1995 by the director of the NIH at the time, Dr. Harold E. Varmus.

Varmus' successor, Dr. Elias A. Zerhouni, announced sweeping restrictions in February, citing reports by The Times in 2003 and 2004 that exposed the payments by pharmaceutical and biotechnology companies of millions of dollars in consulting fees and stock to NIH scientists.

DOJ_NMG_0002182

Zerhouni — prodded by the Department of Health and Human Services, the Office of Government Ethics and congressional leaders from both parties — agreed to prohibit NIH employees from accepting any further payments from pharmaceutical or biotechnology companies.

A group of NIH scientists is actively resisting the tougher ethics rules, which include a provision that would force employees to divest their stock in biomedical companies. They have hired a law and lobbying firm and have called for Zerhouni to relax the ban on consulting for drug companies and to rescind the stock-divestiture provision, which has not yet been implemented.

Zerhouni has said that he is weighing the criticisms and would consider easing the restrictions if he concluded that they were inhibiting the NIH's ability to retain or recruit qualified scientists.

In a written reply to the inspector general, Zerhouni cited the corrective actions that had been taken recently. He said that he generally agreed with the inspector general's findings, conclusions and recommendations.

The inspector general's review focused on the activities from 2001 through 2003 of 174 senior scientists, a fraction of the agency's more than 5,000 researchers.

Of the 174 whose paperwork was reviewed, 69 requested and received approvals to work with outside organizations. The review focused only on those scientists who, as of January 2004, were required to file a publicly accessible financial disclosure report.

Among those covered by the review were directors, deputy directors and scientific directors of the NIH's research institutes. The terms of the inspector general's review excluded many other influential scientists, including laboratory and branch chiefs.

The inspector general found that among the 174 scientists reviewed, NIH ethics officials approved 319 of 355 requested outside engagements — 90% of the total. Of those, 45 involved consulting or scientific-advisory arrangements with biomedical companies.

Other outside activities were described by the report as "teaching/lecturing," speaking, and serving on nonscientific boards or committees.

Representatives of the inspector general acknowledged Thursday in briefings with congressional staff members that their review did not survey all of the NIH scientists who had worked for biomedical companies. Last year, the House Energy and Commerce Committee contacted 20 biomedical companies and learned that those firms alone had employed 81 NIH scientists who had failed to get required permission or to disclose the income.

At a hearing on June 22, 2004, the committee's top Democrat, Rep. John D. Dingell of Michigan, chided the inspector general for conducting what he termed noninvestigative "desk audits." Dingell was not available to comment Thursday, according to an aide.

A spokeswoman for Daniel R. Levinson, Health and Human Services' inspector general, declined to comment.

OTHER NEWS:

Schwarzenegger To Return Gambling Group Donation (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will return a $50,000 donation from a group that is a partner in a tribal casino project after questions were raised about the governor's pledge to limit political contributions, an aide said.

The governor received a $50,000 contribution last week from Yuba County Entertainment LLC, a partner in a proposed hotel-and-casino development near Olivehurst, about 35 miles north of Sacramento.

The Associated Press questioned the donation because Mr. Schwarzenegger made a promise during the 2003 recall campaign not to accept campaign contributions from groups that negotiate directly with his office. He specifically identified Indian tribal gambling as among those special interests.

"After reviewing the nature of the business and realizing there is a connection to a potential Indian gaming location, we feel it is most appropriate to return the funds," said Marty Wilson, who oversees fundraising for Mr. Schwarzenegger's political committee, called the California Recovery Team.

DOJ_NMG_0002183

A company official said it has a variety of business interests in California. "The purpose of the donation was not to primarily back the governor but to back his initiatives that we think are important to the business community," said Alan Waskin, senior vice president and general counsel of Yuba County Entertainment.

Federal regulators must approve the casino project before it can proceed. But if federal approval is given, the tribe would eventually need to negotiate a gambling compact with the governor's office to open the casino.

Critics of the governor said he never should have taken the donation. "It just shows that the governor's fundraising is on automatic pilot," said Jamie Court, president of Santa Monica-based Foundation for Taxpayer and Consumer Rights. "Only when there's a spotlight cast on his activities will he ever think about returning the money."

Offer By Europe Would Give Iran Nuclear Future (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 - In a first test of the new leadership in Iran, European negotiators have prepared a sweeping proposal that raises the possibility of Iran acquiring nuclear reactors and fuel, and of achieving a full political and economic relationship with the West, if it ends nuclear activities suspected to be part of a weapons program, Western diplomats said Thursday.

The European offer, drafted with the tacit approval of the Bush administration, is to be transmitted by the end of this weekend as the latest step in a European-American effort to get Iran to abandon its suspected nuclear arms ambitions. That effort has run into repeated difficulties, most recently over Iran's announced intention to resume uranium conversion and enrichment in defiance of European warnings.

Western diplomats who have read the European offer or who know its contents said that it presented a full spectrum of relationships for Iran with the West, from technology sharing to trade preferences to security guarantees, if the Tehran government cooperates on nuclear matters, and also on improving human rights and combating terrorism. They said it was much more detailed and specific than the more general offers floated by the Europeans earlier this year, but they did not describe the offer in full.

Since it seeks a pledge by Iran to end the uranium conversion and enrichment activities that Iran insists are its prerogative under international accords governing nuclear technology, there is considerable doubt that Iran will accept it, at least right away. Iran suspended its nuclear work during the negotiations.

A senior Iranian official, reached by telephone on Thursday, said when told about the contents of the proposal that it seemed to fall far short of what Iran wanted.

"If the proposal asks Iran to continue its suspension indefinitely, let alone renouncing these activities, I think it will be dead on arrival," said the senior official, whose job involves him directly in these matters but who would not be identified by name because he had not seen the document. "I don't think it's prudent for the Europeans to make this presentation, because it shows that they have not moved their position from that of two years ago."

A European official said: "Our proposal pulls together a whole range of different ideas intended to forge a framework for an arrangement between Iran and the rest of the world. There are lots of political, economic and security elements, but the biggest piece is the offer of cooperation on a civilian nuclear program for Iran. We've never said that Iran cannot have one."

Bush administration officials say they cannot comment on the contents of the proposal, except to say that they approved of it. But the administration maintains that it cannot establish a normal relationship with Iran unless it changes its conduct, not simply in the nuclear sphere but in what the United States and the Europeans say is support of terrorism, particularly against Israel, and its interference in Iraq.

Details of the package were disclosed by diplomats who insisted they not be identified even by country because the package is supposed to be secret and its terms have not yet been formally presented to Iran.

The proposal would bar Iran from operating a "closed" nuclear fuel cycle, in which it would effectively control every aspect of fuel production and disposal. Instead, according to the diplomats who have seen it, the proposal suggests that Iran be allowed to acquire fuel and then transfer the used fuel to another country for disposal, precluding Iran from using it for weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0002184

More specifically, Iran would be obliged to continue its current suspension of the conversion of raw uranium into a gas that can be enriched for use as fuel with the use of centrifuges that international inspectors have found in Iran in several places. The International Atomic Energy Agency, which has said that it is investigating Iran's failure to disclose many elements of its program, would continue to play its inspection role to ensure compliance with the agreement.

While taking a hard line on uranium conversion and enrichment, the diplomats said, the proposal contains a face-saving provision for Iran conceding its right to certain activities it is being asked to give up. The wording, according to one diplomat, says that nothing in an agreement with Iran affects "the inalienable rights of all the parties to develop research, production and use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes."

In some respects, Iran is not likely to be surprised by the basic outlines of the European proposal. France, Germany and Britain - the partners along with the European Union in the negotiations - have held firm to this broad position of barring uranium conversion and enrichment under pressure from Washington.

The view shared in Europe and Washington is that while Iran may have the right to enrich uranium as a signatory to the Nonproliferation Treaty, which governs peaceful nuclear technology in nearly all countries with civilian nuclear programs, Iran has forfeited that right because it has been found over the years to be engaging in clandestine activities.

Iran's anger that it is being asked to give up activities allowed to other countries is at the heart of its repeated announcement that, like it or not, it will resume such work when it chooses. Indeed, Iran announced last week that it was renouncing its pledge of last year to suspend these uranium activities.

On the other hand, the Tehran government has not unilaterally resumed uranium conversion or enrichment. Instead, it has called on the International Atomic Energy Agency to go to its facilities and break the inspectors' seals on equipment that would be used for these activities, and also to install monitors and sensors for the purpose of observing them.

Iran's announcement was made in the days leading up to the inauguration Saturday of the new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who until recently was the mayor of Tehran.

It is widely believed in the West that Iran decided to invite the inspectors before Mr. Ahmadinejad took office in order not to taint him with the move or force him to make one of his first decisions in defiance of the wishes of the Europeans.

Several diplomats said that it was shrewd of Iran, in political terms, to invite the International Atomic Energy Agency to its nuclear facilities to break the seals and install monitors and sensors. That way, these diplomats said, Iran can claim to be showing the world that, while it is proceeding with uranium processing, not a single gram of fuel will go to a weapons program.

The international agency, meanwhile, has been taking its time before installing the sensors and monitors, to give the Europeans time to refine their proposal. The Europeans have rushed the proposal to meet a deadline of this week and have begun hinting that if Iran rejects it outright, or forces the seals to be broken, some countries may call for the agency's board to meet next week to address the matter.

That Iranian tactic, said several Western diplomats, seems clearly intended to woo wavering board members of the agency - notably Russia, China and several other countries with similar enrichment programs - that it is acting in good faith and doing what other countries are allowed to do. They expressed concern about getting enough votes on the board to refer the matter to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions.

Tehran Defiance Spells Collapse Of Nuclear Talks (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

Nearly two years of delicate negotiations between Iran and the European Union over the Islamic republic's nuclear programme could be on the point of collapse on Friday, setting the scene for a confrontation at the UN.

Senior Iranian officials told the Financial Times that talks with France, Germany and the UK – the EU3 – would be over if their latest proposed incentives do not give approval for Tehran to resume work at a key facility at Isfahan.

Ambassadors of the EU3 were expected formally to deliver the package of proposed incentives to Tehran's foreign ministry early on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0002185

However, one senior official involved in the talks said that: "According to our information the EU proposal does not include resumption of conversion activities in Isfahan."

The official added: "This means the end of this round of talks with Europe. Iran has decided to resume activities in Isfahan and no one at home and abroad can stop it."

A senior European diplomat in Tehran conceded that the "proposal is not the one Iranians want".

Under the Paris Agreement reached with the EU3 last year, Iran suspended nuclear fuel cycle activities that western governments suspect are part of a clandestine weapons programme.

The suspension agreed in Paris included processing work at Isfahan, where raw uranium is converted into uranium hexafluoride gas, and the next stage at Natanz where the gas is enriched through centrifuges to provide nuclear fuel.

The EU3, backed by the US, have warned Iran that ending any part of the suspension would lead them to refer the issue to the UN Security Council.

The US drive for punitive action is being led by John Bolton, the new US ambassador to the UN, who failed to win confirmation by the Senate but was still appointed by President George W. Bush.

Some analysts and diplomats are sceptical the Bush administration can win enough support for serious measures to be taken against Iran.

"The American case will be represented by a non-confirmed ambassador who has been accused of distorting intelligence on proliferation issues," commented Ray Takeyh, analyst at the independent US Council on Foreign Relations.

The EU3 is seeking an extraordinary board meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna on Monday. But diplomats do not rule out further talks with Iran.

One EU3 diplomat said the European Union and the US were "on their way" to getting a majority on the IAEA board to take Iran to the Security Council, using the argument that Iran had deceived the UN watchdog for years over its nuclear programme and had been in breach of its safeguards commitments.

Iran insists that its nuclear programme is for civilian use only and that it has a right under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty to develop the nuclear fuel cycle.

Senior Iranian officials said Iran was not bluffing over its threat to reactivate Isfahan as some EU3 diplomats suspect. "We are serious and also upset about Europeans' failure to deliver promises," said one Iranian.

However, the officials said Iran had not decided finally when to break IAEA seals at the facility. While members of the negotiating team want Iran to wait for inspectors from the IAEA to come and monitor, other hardline decision-makers "who now have the upper hand" want an immediate start.

They accused the IAEA of playing for time by saying it needs to send more equipment and said it was possible that Isfahan could "go on stream" this weekend, possibly with foreign reporters present.

Why Pressing Iran Over Nukes Is A Difficult Road (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - The Iranian government is playing what is being called "a game of chicken" with the international community, first threatening to restart a key element of its suspended nuclear program this week, and then putting it off - only to announce it will reopen a sealed uranium conversion plant next week after all.

Regardless of whether the Iranians, who are in the midst of a postelection political transition, follow through on the threat, their recent actions - and the response of Western nations - suggest that a full-blown confrontation between the powers is probably not imminent, experts say.

The Europeans don't want one - and the Americans don't appear to be ready and united for one.

The three European countries that have been negotiating with Iran for a full suspension of its nuclear program did stick together and threaten Iran with reprisals - including referral to the United Nations Security Council - if it proceeded with plans to restart its nuclear efforts. That stand surprised some in the Bush administration and seemed to validate President Bush's second-term veering toward greater cooperation with allies.

DOJ_NMG_0002186

But with the "EU 3," as Britain, Germany, and France are called, set to offer Iran extensive economic incentives in exchange for ending its nuclear ambitions, the Europeans continue to favor a strategy that differs widely from the Americans'.

Iran is on the US list of state sponsors of terrorism, and US officials worry that a nuclear Iran would become a conduit for nuclear materials to other states or terrorist groups.

Divisions over Iran that characterized US policy during the first Bush term are on display again. When the freshly appointed US ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, made his introductory rounds in New York this week, he reportedly broached the subject of Security Council action against Iran in talks with fellow ambassadors.

As the past undersecretary of State for arms control, Mr. Bolton was one of the administration's principal hawks on Iranian nukes.

But Bolton was debuting at the UN even as a new National Intelligence Estimate surfaced, first in an apparent leak to The Washington Post, that doubles to 10 years the estimated time it would take for Iran to develop a nuclear weapon.

For some US experts, the estimate undercuts the viewpoint that action is urgently needed, making a tough international stance with Iran unlikely.

"The US and its allies are not in a position to talk about real, meaningful measures to punish Iran [for proceeding with its nuclear program]," says Daniel Brumberg, an Iran expert at Georgetown University in Washington.

He says the Europeans "are trying to play it tough, but the Iranians know it would be difficult for them to ever go through with it." At the same time, he says the Bush administration is not united on how far and how fast to proceed on Iran - not to mention the "delicate factor" of Iran's influence in Iraq and the cooperation the US needs for progress there. "They are on the horns of a dilemma that is of their own making," he says.

The flurry of discussion over Iran's nuclear ambitions came as Iran installed on Wednesday its new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Western observers expect the new president to adopt a more confrontational tone with the West and particularly the US - an approach closer to that of the reigning conservative mullahs than that of outgoing reformist president Mohammad Khatami.

In a letter to the EU3 foreign ministers, the lead Iranian negotiator in the talks, Hassan Rohani, said that Iran is intent on pursuing both the negotiations with the Europeans and its nuclear program, which he insisted is for peaceful purposes.

For some experts, this is part of the same strategy that has allowed Iran - not to mention North Korea - to advance in nuclear know-how. "We've seen this game before," says Jon Wolfsthal, deputy director of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Project at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Mr. Wolfsthal says recent events appear at first glance to be a boon to the US, since the topic of Iran could reach the Security Council - where the Bush administration has long wanted it - without the blame for a negotiation failure to fall on the US.

But he questions how "successful" the US strategy of not directly negotiating with problematic nuclear wannabes like Iran and North Korea really has been. North Korea is thought to have quadrupled its number of nuclear weapons during the Bush presidency. "If the proof is in the pudding, then the results are not very good," he says.

Iran still wishes to avoid referral to the Security Council, but at the same time it knows that a referral is unlikely to result in any tough sanctions any time soon, most experts agree. "The unanimity isn't there," says Georgetown's Mr. Brumberg. He notes that Russia has close ties to Iran and is building a nuclear reactor there. Iran has also been developing relations with China and India.

US calculations on Iran are influenced by the key role that Iran plays in neighboring Iraq, experts say. With the Bush administration hoping to reduce troops, avoiding destabilizing trouble with Iran will be uppermost in some minds.

Henry Sokolski, director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center, says he sees such political calculations in the intelligence estimate for Iran that now puts any bomb a decade away.

"There may be some involved in the report who are frightened that Bush would use anything more imminent as a pretext to bomb, or others who got cold feet after the Iraq WMD intelligence that went wrong," Mr. Sokolski says.

In any case, he dismisses the estimate, noting the US developed its bomb in less than a decade. "Are we saying the Iranians are further behind technically than we were in 1940? It's absurd."

DOJ_NMG_0002187

Revolutionaries Come Of Age (WSJ)

By Farnaz Fassihi

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

TEHRAN, Iran -- Amir Reza Ashtiani, a 46-year-old Tehran City Council member and a prospective minister in the cabinet of Iran's newly elected president, sat at a district council office in one of Tehran's poorest slums and listened to residents complain about inflation, high taxes and unemployment.

He scribbled notes, shook his head in acknowledgment and promised to discuss their concerns at City Hall. Mr. Ashtiani, an industrial engineer and self-made man who benefited from a revolution that empowered the poor, was born in this neighborhood and remembers splashing in the sewage-filled waters of the narrow canals. Now, he is one of a new breed of Iranian populists that appear likely to sweep into national office on the coattails of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the surprise winner of Iran's presidential election in June.

"We are not like other officials. We won't draw a line between ourselves and the public and look down at them," Mr. Ashtiani says. "We have lived their difficult lives and now that we are on top, we are not going to forget them. This is why we had the revolution."

Iran's president-elect will be sworn into office on Saturday, having been endorsed by Iran's supreme leader Wednesday. He is expected to name to his cabinet men like Mr. Ashtiani, well-educated technocrats -- and die-hard loyalists to the hard-line clerical regime that rules the country.

The group, called usolgaran or "principalists," in a reference to the group's commitment to the principles of Islam, is rapidly rising to power in Iran. Some political analysts see them as the regime's last hope for regaining popularity and staying in power.

"The rise of the Iranian neoconservatives has given the regime a unified voice," says Davoud Bavand, a political analyst in Tehran. But, he adds, it remains to be seen whether they use it to open and nurture the economy or to pursue political rhetoric at the risk of stifling sanctions.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's victory gives hard-liners control of all key sectors of government in Iran: Tehran's city council (which usually sets the agenda for other Iranian cities), Parliament and now the presidency. A turning point came two years ago, when hard-liners won Tehran's city council from the reform movement that had controlled the presidency, Parliament and city council since 1997. The reformers' popularity had waned as voters grew frustrated with their failure to deliver on promises.

Now, it is Mr. Ahmadinejad's turn to deliver on promises, such as improving the life of Iranians besieged by an unemployment rate that stood at 11% last year, inflation that remains stubbornly above 15% and widespread corruption. The success of this domestic agenda is intertwined with foreign policy. It may hinge, above all, on whether Iran's government will back off from its nuclear-enrichment program.

Iran's ruling clerics, who appear in control of the country's nuclear decision making, have been uncompromising in the face of Western demands that Tehran give up all nuclear ambitions, even for peaceful purposes, to assure the country won't use the program to produce weapons. Iran already has announced it plans to restart its enrichment program regardless of pending negotiations with Europe. Both the U.S. and its European allies have stated that such a move by Iran will lead to Iran being referred to the United Nations Security Council for economic sanctions.

So far, Iran has backed off on its rhetoric when the threat of sanctions has become imminent. Western diplomats in Tehran say the regime fears sanctions will cripple an already-troubled economy, increase unemployment and inflation and turn the population against it.

Mr. Ashtiani, who has served as the new president's economic adviser and is being pegged as the next minister of industry, is the son of a shopkeeper and grew up in one of Tehran's poorest districts. In high school he listened to underground speeches at the local mosque. When revolutionary fervor hit the streets in the late '70s and the Shah was ousted, he was a freshman at Tehran University's engineering college and an active student revolutionary.

At the age of 20, he was named the managing director of a food factory the government had confiscated from private owners. Mr. Ashtiani continued his career as manager of various government factories until two years ago, when he resigned to become a full-time city council member.

DOJ_NMG_0002188

Like many of Mr. Ahmadinejad's close aides, Mr. Ashtiani says he owes his success and his political rise to the revolution and will do anything for the regime's survival. "We were willing to give our life for the regime during the war," Mr. Ashtiani says. "Now, we will safeguard it with all our means."

They say they favor privatization, but also promise equal sharing of wealth. They say they recognize that tackling unemployment requires foreign investment, but have announced that Iranian companies will be favored over foreign ones in big projects in the oil-and-gas sector. Mr. Ashtiani and his colleagues say they support reform, but not the gradual democratization and scaling back of the powers of unelected clerics that departing reformist President Mohammad Khatami had promised, but ultimately failed to deliver.

"Reform is wrong if we are talking about upheaval of the system," Mr. Ashtiani says. "We believe that Islam has the answer to everything: economy, politics and social issues. We want reforms that will bring the system closer to the purist visions of Islam and our revolution."

Graphic Novelist Marjane Satrapi On The Life Of A Writer In Exile (WSJ)

By Jeffrey A. Trachtenberg

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

When Marjane Satrapi was only 14 years old, her Iranian family wrangled a visa and sent her to live in Europe. The Islamic Revolution was then unfolding, and all of Iran, including Tehran, was turning increasingly conservative in thought and dress. Ms. Satrapi's parents worried that their only daughter, feisty and head-strong, would end up in harm's way and sent her to live with a family friend in Vienna. In 2003, Bertelsmann AG's Parthenon Press published "Persepolis," Ms. Satrapi's eye-witness memoir told in the form of a graphic novel.

In an intimate story enhanced by her drawings, Ms. Satrapi explains what it was like to be forced to wear a veil; her first crush on a boy; the terror and bloodshed created by the Iraqi invasion, and her growing realization that the Iranian regime was turning more repressive. Ms. Satrapi rebelled by tacking up smuggled posters of Kim Wilde and Iron Maiden. But when she expressed herself publicly by wearing Nike sneakers and a Michael Jackson pin, she was chastised on the streets by Tehran's fundamentalists. It was time, her parents decided for her to move abroad.

Ms. Satrapi recounts her early life in exile in "Persepolis 2," published in hardcover in the U.S. in 2004 and recently issued in paperback. In many ways, this is a much darker book. Although she did well in school, Ms. Satrapi had a difficult time fitting in socially. She missed her parents, and then fell in with a group of oddballs. Later came a serious round of drug use, and a failed love affair. After a fight with her landlord, Ms. Satrapi spent more than two months on the streets in Vienna before becoming seriously ill. After she recovered, she returned home to Iran. Once again, she had trouble fitting in. She eventually married, divorced and then moved to France, where she now lives.

The author, now 35, writes in French and recently published her third book, "Embroideries," which discusses the romantic lives of various generations of Iranian women. Ms. Satrapi, who has 350,000 hardcover and paperback books in print in the U.S., a substantial number in the publishing world, spoke recently to The Wall Street Journal's Jeffrey Trachtenberg by telephone from her home in Paris.

WSJ.com: Do you view yourself as an immigrant or as somebody living in exile?

Marjane Satrapi: I'm in exile. I would rather live in my own country. People have different reasons for emigrating, but most of the time it has to do with economics. I had everything in Iran and left to live in a studio.

WSJ.com: Do you have an Iranian publisher?

Ms. Satrapi: No, but I know the books are read. Iranians who speak a second language most often learn English. There is an underground in Iran, but I haven't gone back for five-and-a-half years, so there are many things of which I'm not aware.

WSJ: Has there been a backlash against your parents in Iran because of your books?

Ms. Satrapi: Nobody has bothered them. Nobody has harassed me, either. The thing is that you don't know what will happen there. You more or less know the risks in France. There are limits. But in Iran everything could be great one day and the next they could put me in jail. I prefer not to take the risk. My parents are grownups; they are not responsible for me. If they have a crazy child, it's not their fault.

DOJ_NMG_0002189

WSJ.com: Can you visit?

Ms. Satrapi: I'm allowed. Nobody will tell me not to come. The issue is whether I can return to France. It depends on so many things. In the Iranian system you have a system within the system. You never know what can happen. You can't count on anything.

WSJ.com: What are the major misconceptions that Americans have about the Middle East?

Ms. Satrapi: Two years ago when I came to America and criticized the [Iraq] war, the only articles that appeared talked about my sunglasses. Nobody talked about the fact that I said the people there are like you. Now what I say is starting to appear in magazines and journals.

WSJ.com: The World Factbook estimates that the median age in Iran is 24, or 12 years younger than the median age in the U.S. What will this mean for the conservatives now running Iran?

Ms. Satrapi: It's an extremely young country, a dynamic country. The young people try. They want more freedom. But the constitution is made in a way that the president and the parliament don't have that much power. The Guardian Council decided everything. It's a completely closed system. But evolution is a process and nothing can stop it. Women have half of the rights of the men, but 64% of Iranian students are women. For me, this is evolution.

WSJ.com: At one point in your second book you suggest that satellite television exposed the people of Iran to a wider world. Did that have any impact?

Ms. Satrapi: Or course. But there was lots of nonsense with MTV and dancing. The Internet is more important. It presents other points of view. People have access everywhere, they get information. Even though I don't go back I can remember 15 years ago that when I showed a little hair I could be stopped in the street. No longer. Now women show almost all their hair. The regime isn't smoother, but social reality has changed. They can't stop everything without getting an explosion.

WSJ.com: Why did the ruling clerics do so well with Iranian voters in the recent election?

Ms. Satrapi: The reason is simple. Many didn't vote because they didn't want to participate. Also, 15% of the population is fanatics. It's the same in every country. But it's also true that poor people voted for them. [Iran is] a rich country, but we have 15 million living in real poverty. The guy who won lives where the poor live and says he isn't corrupt and will share the money. This is something. Once people aren't hungry anymore they will want more freedom.

WSJ.com: You end "Persepolis 2" by noting your grandmother died while you were away. Do you feel resentment that you weren't there to be with her?

Ms. Satrapi: Of course. I'm a person who is in love with my country. I love Iran and the Iranian people and I'm not for a bloody revolution. I'm against war. I'm much more for a slow evolution based on the truth. During the Shah we didn't have to wear a veil. But the country was very macho and you had to be a virgin even if you wore the shortest miniskirt. We looked Westernized and fancy, but we were without depth. Today, women understand that if you want rights you need to work and be economically independent. This is what helps a country go forward. And these things are happening in Iran.

WSJ.com: Did any graphic novelists inspire you?

Ms. Satrapi: I don't come from a culture of comics. I thought they were funny and for adolescents. Then I saw Art Spiegleman's 'Maus." I felt free. I didn't have a complex any more. It was, 'He did it, I can do it too.'

WSJ.com: Do you write your stories first and then draw them?

Ms. Satrapi: No, I become too sentimental and lose my sense of humor. I write and draw at the same time. It's like a baby in the belly. All of it goes on at the same time. At the beginning I have a vague scenario but I never know how I'll finish. What I want to talk about changes a lot. I like to be surprised by the story, which I don't always control.

Multiparty Talks With North Korea Nearing Collapse (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

BEIJING -- Talks aimed at persuading North Korea to give up its nuclear-weapons ambitions teetered on the brink of collapse, with Pyongyang insisting it wouldn't give in to demands that it also abandon atomic-energy programs.

Even usually optimistic China, which is hosting the six-nation talks, hinted that an agreement might be impossible.

DOJ_NMG_0002190

Speaking to a crowd of reporters outside the gates of the North Korean Embassy last night, Kim Kye Gwan, Pyongyang's chief envoy to the talks, said: "We want the right to peaceful nuclear activities. All the countries in the world have this right."

Washington has insisted that North Korea dismantle all its nuclear programs, civil and military, saying it would be too easy to use civilian atomic-energy activities as a cover for maintaining the pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Kim also called on the U.S. to "drop its hostile policy, normalize relations," and reassure North Korea that the Asian nation isn't threatened by U.S. nuclear forces. He said the talks were at a "stalemate," but said Pyongyang would keep negotiating.

Participants at the meetings, representing Japan, Russia and South Korea in addition to the U.S., North Korea and China, have been struggling to draft a joint statement of principles to serve as a guide for eventual settlement of the standoff.

Failure to produce an agreement could derail diplomatic efforts to end the dispute, which began in 2002 when, U.S. officials say, North Korea admitted it was pursuing covert efforts to enrich uranium for nuclear weapons. Pyongyang since has issued repeated denials.

At a news conference, the spokesman for the Chinese delegation, Qin Gang, raised the prospect that the negotiations could end without an agreement. "A joint declaration is not a measure for whether or not the six-party talks are a success," he told reporters.

A lack of progress also could encourage the U.S. to ask the United Nations to condemn or impose sanctions on North Korea. It is far from clear, though, that such a move would receive support from either China or South Korea, which are Pyongyang's main economic benefactors.

Christopher Hill, the top U.S. envoy, said, "There are differences between [North Korea] on the one hand and the other parties on the other." Mr. Hill said the U.S. is pressing for clarity about just what the North Koreans are willing to give up. "We are talking about nuclear weapons," he said. "We cannot have a situation where the North Koreans pretend to abandon their nuclear weapons and we pretend to believe them."

Delegates from the U.S., North Korea and South Korea met yesterday afternoon. Song Min Soon, the chief South Korean negotiator, said the North Koreans "expressed their positions clearly," but he declined to comment further. Mr. Hill would say only that "It was a useful meeting."

Negotiations were set to continue today. But diplomats said progress depends on North Korea's willingness to agree to the joint statement of principles that has, generally, been approved by the other parties.

But despite heavy pressure by China on North Korea, last night's remarks by Pyongyang's chief delegate, didn't strike a compromising tone. Mr. Kim, who is the North's vice foreign minister, said, "We have not been defeated in war and we didn't do anything wrong. Why can't we have peaceful nuclear activities?"

He also said the U.S. would have to withdraw its "nuclear threat" against the North before Pyongyang could agree to give up its weapons programs. North Korea has said Washington must stop providing a "nuclear umbrella" -- essentially the threat of nuclear reprisals -- to protect South Korea, a U.S. ally. The U.S. has rejected the demand.

N. Korea Talks Near Impasse, But Will Go On (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

BEIJING, Aug. 4 -- Diplomats seeking an agreement on principles for North Korean nuclear disarmament decided Thursday to hold further negotiating sessions despite fundamental differences that have left them deadlocked after 10 days of talks.

Christopher Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs and the chief U.S. delegate, said an accord proposed by China on dismantling North Korea's nuclear programs has been accepted by five of the six nations involved in the talks: the United States, South Korea, Japan, Russia and China. North Korea, he told reporters, is the holdout.

Nevertheless, Hill said, delegation leaders meeting Thursday evening resolved to keep trying to whittle away differences for another day or so. At the same time, he added, the United States is insisting on clarity, leaving no room for diplomatic ambiguity or the papering over of disagreements.

DOJ_NMG_0002191

"We cannot have a situation where the North Koreans pretend to abandon their nuclear weapons and where we pretend to believe them," he said.

North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Gye Gwan acknowledged to reporters that the talks had reached a "stalemate," according to the Associated Press.

"We are for denuclearizing, but we also want to possess the right to peaceful nuclear activities," Kim said. "As you know, only one country is opposing that," he said, referring to the United States.

Nuclear Explosion (WSJ)

By Fred C. Ikle

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Sixty years after Hiroshima's fiery destruction by only one bomb, here is where we have arrived: The proliferation of nuclear weapons continues apace, and stopping it is now a top priority of our foreign policy. It was a driving motive for the war against Saddam Hussein, it ceaselessly fuels our conflict with North Korea, it exacerbates our relations with Iran, and we are in fear of terrorists with a nuclear bomb. Eleven American Presidents, from Harry Truman to George W. Bush, sought to prevent this. The U.S. started with a nuclear monopoly. So how did we get into this mess?

'Atomic Bomb'

The news about Hiroshima reached the White House on Aug. 5, 1945 -- precisely 60 years ago. President Truman's statement next morning informed the world of the "atomic bomb" and the Manhattan Project. Four days later, the A-bomb attack on Nagasaki prompted Japan's surrender and ended World War II. Since then, America has devoted immense effort to the nuclear problem -- an intellectual, political, and military endeavor that has no parallel. We know how we entered the Nuclear Age. We do not know how to exit from it.

First we tried arms control to kill the monster in its cradle. The U.S. advanced the Baruch Plan to confine nuclear technology entirely to peaceful uses. After Stalin rejected the plan, we began to build atomic bombs at a leisurely pace: Nine in 1946, 13 in 1947, and, by the time North Korea invaded South Korea, we had some 300 atomic bombs, the Soviet Union perhaps five. Barely 20 years later, each of the two superpowers had tens of thousands of nuclear weapons. This did not come as a surprise. At the outset, our nuclear scientists had predicted that if the total ban on nuclear weapons failed, the superpower arsenals might grow a thousand-fold. They also warned that H-bombs could be built that were a thousand times more destructive than the A-bomb. And they left no doubt that other countries would be able to acquire nuclear weapons.

President Eisenhower became deeply concerned about these trends. Based on careful deliberations, he decided in December 1953 to launch the Atoms for Peace Program at the U.N. His address received more praise -- at home and abroad -- than any other presidential speech. The purpose of Atoms for Peace was to enlist international support against weapons proliferation by donating or selling nuclear technology labeled "peaceful." Spurred by this American multilateralism, a shopping mall opened, making U.S., Soviet, Canadian, French, British, and other reactors available for "peaceful" research and electric power. This "peaceful" technology was sold or donated to Iraq, North Korea, Iran, Vietnam, the Congo, Laos, India, Pakistan, etc. No other U.S. policy, no commercial initiative, no theft of technology has done more to accelerate and expand the global spread of nuclear bombs. There is an echo of Greek tragedy here: Arms control initiatives meant to avert a calamity morph into the agent that exacerbates the feared outcome. * * *

Today, the Bush administration is being pressured to purchase a halt in North Korea's nuclear bomb-making. Members of Congress and editorialists urge the president to "engage" North Korea with generous economic and political gifts. Such "engagement" could award us with the fifth (or would it be the seventh?) arms agreement that North Korea violates. And it would tell other rogue nations that they ought to try the same blackmail.

Currently, we are against nuclear proliferation mainly because of rogue states: North Korea might sell bombs to anyone with cash, a nuclear-armed Iran might embolden Hamas terrorism. During the Cold War, we opposed proliferation because it might destabilize the fragile balance of terror between the superpowers. At that time, the scholastics of nuclear strategy invented enough "deterrence" concepts to fill a library, and many credited "mutual deterrence" for the fact that, since 1945, not a single nuclear attack occurred. The long holiday of non-use is indeed a stellar accomplishment. Yet deterrence does not deserve all the credit. The intervention of providence also helped.

DOJ_NMG_0002192

Deterrence can ward off deliberate attacks; it cannot prevent an accident or dissuade a madman. But such perils must not be ignored. Until 1957, U.S. nuclear weapons had no safety locks, and sometimes just one person (say an airman) might have been given access to a weapon. One man alone could have triggered an unauthorized nuclear detonation. I recall this problem well because I analyzed it at RAND, then an Air Force think tank. My study recommended that two people always be in charge of critical controls and that coded locks be installed to safeguard nuclear weapons and missiles. RAND sent me to brief the Pentagon. Luckily, Gen. Curtis LeMay heard of it, and being a steely guy, he knew how to cut through bureaucratic molasses. He commanded a blizzard of actions to implement every one of the recommendations.

Other risks of an accidental nuclear cataclysm come to mind. In 1980, the Pentagon was alerted that a Soviet missile attack was on its way. That alert was due to computer error. Equally serious incidents might still be secret and dangerous flaws might not yet have been discovered. In light of such unfathomable risks, one has to be something of a wimp to root for Mutual Assured Destruction, the MAD doctrine which bans missile defense but tolerates a confrontation of offensive missiles forces, primed to execute mutual genocide. Failure to grasp the magnitude of this gamble betokens a lack of emotional strength. President Reagan saw through the MAD theorizing and had the courage to call for radical cuts in strategic forces, combined with missile defense. Two decades later, George W. Bush and Vladimir Putin realized that the confrontational nature of MAD would poison U.S.-Russia relations. Yet when President Bush decided to end the missile ban, benignant votaries of arms control became enraged and predicted Russia would respond with a huge expansion of its missile force. Perhaps they were disappointed when Mr. Putin did no such thing. * * *

More episodes from the 60-year search for an exit are worth recalling. But I shall turn to the heart of the matter: two overarching and profoundly serious problems that dominate the nuclear age, casting a dark shadow far into the future. The first of these is that we have become habituated to -- indeed, utterly dependent on -- a world order predicated on the non-use of nuclear weapons. This order might end abruptly. It would be a unique revolution in military affairs if the most powerful weapons in the arsenals of many nations were never used. Yet this uniqueness has become the norm on which trade, economic growth, international relations, as well as the domestic functioning of democratic governments now depend. Not only is the fact of continued non-use vital for our political order, but also the frame of mind that evolved with it. For it allows us to go about our business and plan our lives without the imagery of mushroom clouds superimposed on our hometown.

The paroxysm after 9/11 would be a hiccup compared with the reaction the morning after one or more nuclear bombs caused massive devastation. Several nations might start crash programs to build arsenals. Mass demonstrations would demand the abolition of all nuclear weapons, without the vaguest idea how to implement that utopia. Depending on the nations primarily affected, the first nuclear use since 1945 could trigger a chain reaction of mobilizations, nuclear alerts, even pre-emptive attacks -- within a fraction of the time it took for the assassination in Sarajevo in 1914 to trigger World War I.

The second overarching problem is emerging only now. Gradually, but inexorably, it will become easier for terrorist organizations, insurgent groups, doomsday cults and nihilist gangs to acquire the wherewithal to make nuclear bombs. Three factors contribute to this: (1) Many countries will build nuclear reactors to produce electricity and will need to import plutonium fuel that can be misused to make weapons; (2) the Internet offers access to physics and engineering data that might help a bomb-maker; (3) many governments lack the will or competence to do their part in preventing nuclear terrorism.

When the Soviet Union broke up in 1991, Sens. Sam Nunn and Richard Lugar launched a farsighted program to assist Russia in safeguarding its vast nuclear establishment. Yet Russia's control over its nuclear materials still has many gaps; and Pakistan's political instability threatens the safety of its stockpile. All the more reason for a second line of defense to prevent terrorists from smuggling a nuclear bomb into the U.S. Alas, here, too, incompetence reigns. The government has not yet started a serious research project to develop the essential technology for this mission. To send a man to Mars we have a generously funded, well integrated project; but to detect a smuggled nuclear bomb on its way to a U.S. city we allocate a puny fraction of those funds and scatter it among a multitude of disjointed studies that feed Congressional pork.

Ruthless Rebels

DOJ_NMG_0002193

A global dispersion of the most cataclysmic means for destruction would have no parallel in history. Even the fall of the Roman Empire did not empower ruthless rebels or pseudo-religious cults to extirpate law and order in every corner of the realm. Mercifully the nuclear dispersion has not yet started. But there is nothing now discernible that would prevent it from happening.

While we still have time, we need to think ahead about ways to avert our annihilation from within. To prevail, we must develop the needed technologies and prepare the right strategy -- political and military. We have managed to think ahead before. Well before Pearl Harbor, we prepared the massive wartime conversion of our industry, developed new military strategies, and started the scientific program that led to the Manhattan Project. We will rise to the new challenge -- if we don't lose faith in ourselves.

Mr. Iklé was undersecretary of defense for policy in the Reagan administration. His book, "Annihilation from Within," written at the Center for Strategic & International Studies, will be published by Columbia University Press next year.

Jewish Settler Kills Four Israeli Arabs In Attack On Bus (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

JERUSALEM, Aug. 4 -- A Jewish settler absent without leave from the Israeli army opened fire Thursday on a public bus traveling to an Arab town in northern Israel, killing at least four people and wounding 10. In the immediate aftermath, passengers swarmed the gunman, killing him before he could leave the bus.

In a statement, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called the shooting "a reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist who sought to attack innocent Israeli citizens." Israeli police officials suggested that the attack was an attempt to derail the government's planned evacuation of Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip and four in the West Bank scheduled to begin later this month.

The gunman, identified as Eden Natan Zada, 19, had recently moved to a West Bank settlement known as a stronghold of religious extremists opposed to the evacuation plan, Israeli police officials said.

Witnesses said Zada, wearing the skullcap of a religiously observant Jew, boarded the Egged Bus No. 165 from Haifa clothed in an Israeli army uniform. Jewish and Arab residents of Israel's Lower Galilee regularly ride the route, which passes through the Jewish community of Kiryat Ata before ending in the Arab town of Shfaram.

Ibtihaj Salame, 57, got on the bus at Kiryat Ata, usually the last stop for its Jewish passengers. Salame, a Druze woman with three sons in the Israeli military, was returning home from a medical appointment in Haifa. She said she generally avoids buses for fear of suicide bombers but was forced to take one Thursday after missing her shared taxi.

In a telephone interview a few hours after the 5:30 p.m. shooting, she said she took a seat in front of a man dressed in an army uniform. Salame said that the bus driver asked the soldier to move to the front of the bus but that he refused. As she got off the bus at the second stop in Shfaram, a town of 34,000 people, she heard shots ring out.

"No one spoke to him on the bus other than the driver," Salame said. "No one thought or imagined that he was up to something. But maybe the driver did."

The victims were identified as the bus driver, Michel Bahoud, 55, an Arab Christian from the Lower Galilee region; a Christian woman; a Muslim woman; and a Muslim man. Police said all four were Israeli Arabs.

The event recalled the 1994 attack carried out by Baruch Goldstein, a Jewish settler from New York who gunned down 29 Palestinians in a mosque at the Tomb of the Patriarchs in the West Bank city of Hebron. Goldstein, who was also dressed in an army uniform, was killed before he could leave the mosque. The shooting marked the beginning of a difficult period for the Oslo accords between Israel and the Palestinians signed the previous year.

In his statement, Sharon called Thursday's attack "a terrorist event" and said it was "a deliberate attempt to harm the fabric of relations among all Israeli citizens. Terrorism by civilians against civilians is the most dangerous thing affecting the future of the state of Israel and its stability as a democracy."

The attack also was condemned by leaders of the Yesha Council, the umbrella organization of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza. The organization has staged large demonstrations against the evacuation plan, which Sharon says is needed to ensure Israel's security and the long-term viability of its Jewish majority.

DOJ_NMG_0002194

"We think there is no connection between this and our movement," Shaul Goldstein, the council's deputy chairman, said of the shooting. "He's a terrorist, a lunatic and immoral. He has no connection to my values. He's a criminal and should be treated like one."

Israeli police officials said Zada, the son of secular Jewish parents, had recently moved to the West Bank settlement of Tapuah. Many of the community's roughly 600 residents are followers of the late Meir Kahane, who favored the expulsion of Arabs from Israel and the land it occupied in the 1967 war. Many settlers believe the land was promised to the Jewish people by God.

Kahane's followers founded a yeshiva, or Jewish religious academy, in the settlement. The religious-political movement he inspired, known as Kach, is designated as a terrorist organization by the State Department.

Israeli military officials said Zada, originally from the Israeli town of Rishon Letzion, had been absent from his unit in southern Israel since June 14 in apparent protest against the Gaza evacuation. He joined the army in January and was still undergoing basic training.

In a letter he left at his base, Zada wrote that he "could not be part of an organization that expels Jews," according to a copy published Thursday evening on the Israeli news Web site Ynet.

Nakad Nakad, 40, witnessed the shooting from the balcony of his home in the center of Shfaram. He said he heard shots from inside the bus, then watched as rifle fire sprayed from the windows into the street around it.

"It is clear he intended to kill Arabs inside Shfaram, to have a massacre," said Nakad, a political leader of the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality, a community movement. "That's why he waited for the bus to get inside the town."

Jewish Militant Opens Fire On Bus Of Israeli Arabs, Killing 4 (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

JERUSALEM, Aug. 4 - An Israeli Army deserter dressed in a military uniform opened fire on Thursday aboard a bus carrying Israeli Arab passengers in northern Israel. Four were killed and at least a dozen wounded before an angry crowd beat the gunman to death, according to Israeli authorities and witnesses.

The shooting was one of the deadliest by a Jewish attacker in recent years and appeared to be an attempt to start an upheaval to sabotage Israel's planned evacuation of Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip and part of the West Bank, which is set to begin on Aug. 15. Israeli security services have repeatedly expressed concerns about such a possibility.

The gunman was identified by the military as Eden Natan Zada, 19, though it initially identified him as Eden Tzuberi. He was an army private who was reported absent without leave around mid-June after refusing to take part in preparations for the Gaza pullout.

According to his family and Israeli news media reports, Mr. Zada then went to live in Tapuah, one of the most militant Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called the shootings "a reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist who sought to attack innocent Israeli citizens."

Gideon Ezra, Israel's minister for public security, has spoken in favor of detaining Jewish militants without charges before the Gaza withdrawal, saying it could prevent violence.

The shooting on Thursday is certain to inflame passions on all sides.

"We are witnessing attempts by extreme right-wing people, terrorists, who want to set the region ablaze and feel they have freedom of action," Muhammad Barakeh, an Arab member of Israel's Parliament, was quoted as saying on the Web site of the newspaper Haaretz.

He and the news media said Mr. Zada had been a supporter of the Kach movement, founded by Rabbi Meir Kahane, the anti-Arab militant who was assassinated in New York in 1990. While the movement is outlawed in Israel, many Tapuah residents are believed to be supporters.

Mr. Zada grew up in Rishon Lezion, in central Israel, but went to Tapuah after leaving the army.

DOJ_NMG_0002195

Settler leaders contended that he was not a resident. But his father, Yitzhak, said that his son had been living in Tapuah and that he had informed army officials of his son's whereabouts and told them to repossess his weapon.

"I wasn't afraid that he would do something," he told The Associated Press. "I was afraid of the others" in Tapuah. He said he spoke to his son two days ago, "and he told me he would find the time to return the weapon." The Israeli military said it was investigating why he still had his weapon after he had deserted.

Mr. Zada, who was wearing a skullcap that identified him as an Orthodox Jew, apparently boarded the bus in the northern Israeli city of Haifa and waited until it reached Shefaram, an Arab town several miles to the east, witnesses said.

When the bus reached the town, the driver asked to speak to Mr. Zada, inquiring whether he had intended to come to the town, said Avtihaj Salameh, a passenger quoted by Haaretz. He stood by the driver for several minutes, then opened fire, Mr. Salameh said.

A large crowd then charged the bus and attacked Mr. Zada, beating him to death, witnesses and the news media reported.

Israeli television showed video of bodies on the side of the road, covered in sheets, and the broken windows of the bus.

Jewish militants have carried out a number of attacks against Arabs in the past, but most were directed against Palestinians in the West Bank rather than Arabs who are Israeli citizens. In the deadliest such attack, Baruch Goldstein, an American-born settler in the West Bank, shot dead 29 Muslim worshipers in 1994 at the Tomb of the Patriarchs, a site in Hebron that is holy to Muslims, Jews and Christians.

Issam Makhoul, an Arab member of Israel's Parliament, said Israeli political leaders had "been questioning the legitimacy of our citizenship in the past few years, and today someone took the initiative and acted on this."

Israeli Arabs, who constitute more than 1 million of Israel's 6.8 million citizens, have generally not been directly involved in the violence of the past few years, though a number have been implicated in assisting Palestinian attackers coming to Israel from the West Bank.

As the Gaza pullout approaches, right-wing Israelis have been holding protests, though the latest effort fizzled on Thursday.

Gaza has been declared off limits to nonresidents, but some protesters said they had managed to sneak into the Gaza settlements in recent days.

Bentzi Lieberman, the head of the main settler organization, the Yesha Council, condemned Thursday's shooting. "Murder is murder is murder, and there can be no other response but to denounce it completely and express revulsion," he said.

Earlier on Thursday, an estimated 10,000 Palestinians rallied outside their Parliament building in Gaza City to celebrate the planned Israeli withdrawal. "After 38 years of ugly occupation, they are leaving and they will never come back," the Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Qurei, said of the Israelis.

Israeli Deserter Kills Four On Bus (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

TEL AVIV -- An Israeli military deserter yesterday sprayed bullets at commuters on a bus in an Arab town in northern Israel, killing four and wounding about a dozen in the most brazen act of Jewish terrorism in more than 11 years.

The uniformed soldier, identified as Eden Natan-Zada, was killed by an angry crowd of pedestrians about 30 minutes after being overpowered and arrested.

The shooting, which took place at about 6 p.m. local time, appeared linked to Israel's Aug. 15 withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank.

Israeli authorities had feared that Jewish extremists would resort to terrorist attacks on Arabs to instigate a spurt of violence that could derail the evacuation of about 8,500 settlers.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon condemned the bus attack while expressing hope that community leaders would maintain calm.

"This was a reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist who sought to attack innocent Israeli citizens," Mr. Sharon said.

"This terrorist event was a deliberate attempt to harm the fabric of relations among all Israeli citizens."

DOJ_NMG_0002196

Natan-Zada, 19, who reportedly went absent without leave from the army in recent weeks rather than participate in the withdrawal of Jews from Israeli-occupied territory, fired at the driver and the passengers at point-blank range as the bus entered the town of Shfaram.

Hundreds of local residents swarmed the vehicle, preventing police from evacuating the bodies of the victims for hours.

Israel's Channel 1 reported that Natan-Zada had become involved with members of the outlawed Kach party who lived at a West Bank settler outpost.

Observers drew a parallel between yesterday's attack and a February 1994 massacre of 29 Palestinian worshippers at Hebron's Tomb of the Patriarchs mosque.

The latter was carried out by Baruch Goldstein, a Brooklyn- born physician who was also a member of the Kach movement.

Also, about 25 Palestinians and two Israelis were killed in rioting that followed, nearly derailing the implementation of an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord signed just months earlier.

"This is a terror attack for all intents and purposes. The writing was on the wall," Mohammed Barakeh, an Israeli Arab parliamentarian, said yesterday. "He wasn't alone."

The attack escalated tensions in Israel just days after tens of thousands of police officers were called to southern Israel to stop opponents of the withdrawal from illegally marching into the Gaza settlements.

Israeli press outlets reported that security forces went on high alert in case of rioting during Friday services at the Dome of the Rock mosque in Jerusalem.

Israeli Public Security Minister Gideon Ezra blamed the shooting on anti-disengagement protesters who have advocated law-breaking and military insubordination.

Following the attack, angry residents of Shfaram reportedly threw rocks at the bus and called for revenge.

A security officer said he had handcuffed the attacker after he had emptied his gun clip, but within minutes, the crowd reached him to take revenge. Several policemen who arrived on the scene to restore order were also injured.

"It's been a day of violence. We've lost four innocent residents of Shfaram," said Shfaram Mayor Ersan Yassin. "It's a criminal act."

Israeli Arab leaders said the attack was the result of years of incitement against the county's Arab minority by right-wing leaders.

Israeli Cabinet ministers called for an inquiry into why the soldier, who was known to the Shin Bet intelligence agency as an extremist, was allowed to hold on to his gun so long after going AWOL.

Israel's Yediot Ahronot newspaper reported that the attacker had left a note for his commanders after leaving the army base which said: "Just like I can't desecrate the Sabbath, I can't be part of an army which expels Jews."

Jewish Extremist Opens Fire Inside Bus (KCS)

By Kristen Stevens

The Kansas City Star, August 5, 2005

SHFARAM, Israel - A 19-year-old Israeli soldier opened fire inside a bus Thursday, killing four Israeli Arabs in the deadliest attack on Arabs in Israel by a Jewish extremist since 1990. An angry crowd then killed the gunman.

Thirteen people, including bus passengers and two policemen, were wounded in the shooting, which appeared linked to tensions over the upcoming Israeli pullout from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank.

After the attack, the bruised and bloodied body of the gunman lay on the floor of the bus surrounded by stones - raising the possibility he had been stoned to death.

The military identified the dead soldier as Pvt. Eden Natan-Zada, a resident of the Jewish settlement of Tapuah in the West Bank. Natan-Zada's father, Yitzhak, told The Associated Press his son ran away from his army unit several weeks ago after being told he would have to participate in the Gaza pullout.

Israel Radio said the gunman was bludgeoned to death by the crowd. After the attack, the gunman's body lay on the floor of the bus, and police had covered his head with a black plastic bag. His shirtless upper torso was heavily bruised.

DOJ_NMG_0002197

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon denounced the shooting as "a despicable act by a bloodthirsty terrorist." Settler leaders also condemned the attack.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas called on Israel to prevent Jewish settlers from carrying weapons "because they (the settlers) are dangerous to the security and peace." Many settlers carry arms, which they say they need to protect themselves.

Security officials have been warning for months that Jewish militants, desperate to sabotage Israel's pullout, might attack Arabs to deflect Israeli forces away from the Gaza pullout. The police commissioner, Moshe Karadi, warned the shooting could trigger more violence.

The attack took place on the No. 165, which shuttles between the Arab town of Shfaram in northern Israel and nearby communities. At around 6 p.m., the bearded gunman, who wore an Israeli army uniform, boarded the bus and opened fire. Police said the attacker wore a skullcap, identifying him as an Orthodox Jew.

Four people were killed, including the driver. Police said the four apparently were all residents of Shfaram.

The windows of the bus were shattered. Blood covered the floor and seats of the bus, and stones lay on the floor. A policeman with a bullhorn, standing near the body, addressed a crowd of thousands at the scene.

Several hours later, police slowly drove the bus away as hundreds of Shfaram residents ran alongside the vehicle. Investigators kept collecting evidence inside the bus as it was driven out of town.

Yitzhak Natan-Zada, 49, said he had asked the army to find his son, who fled from his unit after refusing to take part in the Gaza pullout. The elder Natan-Zada said he was worried his son's weapons would fall into the hands of fanatics in Tapuah.

"I wasn't afraid that he would do something. I was afraid of the others," Natan-Zada said by telephone. "I spoke to him two days ago and he was a happy and good-hearted boy and he told me he would find the time to return the weapon."

Tapuah is one of the most extreme Jewish settlements, dominated by followers of U.S.-born Rabbi Meir Kahane, who advocated expelling Arabs from Israel and the West Bank. Kahane was assassinated in New York in 1990.

Israel TV said Natan-Zada was a deserter from his army unit who grew up in the Israeli city of Rishon Letzion and moved to the settlement recently.

There have been several incidents of Jewish extremists attacking Arabs over the years, but rarely inside Israel. In 1990, during the first Palestinian uprising, an Israeli opened fire at a bus stop where Palestinians gathered for job placements, killing seven.

In 1994, Baruch Goldstein, an American-born Jewish settler entered a holy site in the West Bank city of Hebron and opened fire on Muslim worshippers, killing 29 - the bloodiest attack by a Jewish extremist against Palestinians.

Israeli Arabs make up about 20 percent of Israel's population of 6.9 million. They remained in their homes during the 1948-49 war that followed creation of the state of Israel, while hundreds of thousands of others fled or were driven out.

Though Israeli Arabs are full citizens, they have suffered from discrimination by Jewish-dominated governments. Many of their towns and villages lack basic infrastructure, and Arab localities are usually at the top of Israel's unemployment lists.

Anger spilled over in October 2000, when thousands of Arabs rioted in support of the Palestinian uprising, which erupted the month before. Israeli police shot and killed 13 Arabs, further infuriating and alienating many Arab citizens.

In southern Israel, meanwhile, opponents of the pullout ended their second mass protest Thursday, after police blocked their plan to march to Gaza to reinforce the settlements. A few hundred protesters remained behind in the town of Ofakim, including settlers' council head Bentsi Lieberman, who denounced the shooting.

"Murder is murder is murder, and there can be no other response but to denounce it completely and express revulsion," he said.

Karadi said forces had been diverted to deal with the demonstrators, leaving the north of Israel short-handed. "We have sent forces from the center and those from the south who were supposed to be going home have now been diverted to the north," he said.

Israeli Soldier Kills 4 Arabs Aboard Bus (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, August 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002198

TEL AVIV, Israel — An Israeli soldier who fired on Israeli Arab passengers in a bus Thursday evening killed four and wounded 12 in what Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called a "sinful act of a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist."

"Terrorism of citizens against citizens is the most dangerous thing for the future of the State of Israel and the stability of democracy," Sharon said in a statement.

The attack was the deadliest by a Jewish radical since 29 Palestinians were killed in 1994.

Fearing retaliatory riots by Palestinians, police raised the alert in Jerusalem to the second-highest level and deployed more forces, especially around the Temple Mount, or Nobel Sanctuary — sacred to Jews and Muslims — ahead of Friday prayers, Police Chief Superintendent Raffi Yaffe said in a statement.

The gunman, Pvt. Eden Natan Zaada, "sought to derail," Israel's decision to withdraw from Gaza and parts of the northern West Bank, according to Yekutiel Ben Yaacov, a friend and fellow activist against the pullout.

Asi Shariv, Sharon's spokesman, said it was "too early speculate on the attack's effects on the disengagement (settlement pullout)."

Zaada, 19, a resident of the largely secular Israeli city of Rishon Lezion, used his army-issued M-16 rifle to fire on bus passengers in the Arab town of Shfaram in northern Israel. After the shooting, Zaada was beaten to death. Thousands of angry Shfaram residents swarmed the bus. They threw stones at the vehicle and police who arrived to control the riot, according to footage aired on Israel's Channel Two.

The Israeli military's chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, ordered an investigation "into the circumstances leading to the possession of an IDF (Israeli military) weapon by the soldier, who had defected and was of a problematic background," a statement said.

Police were on high alert in Shfaram, a village inhabited mostly by members of the Druze Islamic sect. Israeli Arabs constitute 20% of Israel's population. A statement released by the Israeli police said authorities were deploying more forces to the area.

Ghazi Hamid, editor of the militant group Hamas' weekly Al-Risala, said his group "remains committed to the withdrawal and will not respond to this incident." Hamas' charter calls for the destruction of Israel and the establishment of a Muslim state in its place.

Zaada, the gunman, became intensely religious over the past year, and left his army unit in June after refusing to take part in the pullout, said Ben Yaacov, founder of the extremist Jewish Legion defense group based in the Tapuach settlement. The West Bank settlement is a bastion of members of the Kahane Chai organization, whichIsrael outlawed as a terroristgroup in 1994. In the past year, Zaada spent much of his time in Tapuach, Ben Yaacov said. He called Zaada "the first victim of the disengagement." Ben Yaacov added: "We will be stepping up our efforts to do everything in our power to stop the disengagement, which was (Zaada's) will and testament."

Army Deserter Kills 4 Israeli Arabs On Bus, Gets Beaten To Death (KRT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

JERUSALEM - An Israeli army deserter angry about his nation's imminent plans to shut down Jewish settlements opened fire on passengers in a bus driving through an Arab neighborhood Thursday, killing four Israeli Arabs before a mob besieged and beat him to death, according to police and military officials.

The attack in northern Israel has the potential to inflame tensions at a fragile moment for Israel, which is preparing to dismantle 25 Jewish settlements in occupied Palestinian lands.

Israeli and Palestinian leaders have been working to prevent extremists on both sides from derailing the contentious settlement shutdown. Security forces concerned about Jewish radicals have stepped up security at Jerusalem's Dome of the Rock, one of the holiest sites in Islam and a constant flashpoint for violent protests. Palestinian officials have been working to halt a series of rocket attacks on Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip slated for closure.

DOJ_NMG_0002199

The assailant was identified by the military as Pvt. Eden Nathan Zaada, a 19-year-old Israeli who had recently become a follower of an outlawed right-wing extremist movement and deserted from the army to protest the plans to shut down Jewish settlements.

On Thursday afternoon, Zaada, wearing his army uniform and carrying his military machine gun, boarded a bus in a largely Arab town of Shfaram and opened fire, killing the bus driver and three passengers, police said. Within minutes, angry residents surrounded the bus, chased away police and beat the man to death.

In mid-June, according to Israeli officials, Zaada deserted his unit as the military was preparing its soldiers for the settlement shutdown scheduled to begin in about two weeks.

Zaada's family said he had recently moved to one of the more radical Israeli West Bank settlements, where he reportedly joined followers of Rabbi Meir Kahane, a fiery political figure who was assassinated in 1990 by an Egyptian terrorist after giving a New York City speech.

One of Zaada's friends called him "the first victim of the sadistic disengagement plan."

"I never heard him say anything about an intention to kill people, but I hope that he was not killed in vain and his murder will put an end to the expulsion plan," Yekutiel Ben-Yaakov told the Israeli newspaper Yedioth Ahronoth.

Israeli and Palestinian leaders condemned the attack and immediately appealed for calm.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called the shooting "a reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist" and "a deliberate attempt to harm the fabric of relations among all Israeli citizens."

Shaul Goldstein, a settlement leader who has helped organize weeks of largely peaceful protests that have brought out tens of thousands of activists, denounced Zaada as "a crazy man and a lunatic" whose actions couldn't be justified.

"He is a terrorist just like any other terrorist with Hamas or Islamic Jihad," Goldstein said. "There is no purpose on Earth that can justify the killing of innocent people."

Zaada's aunt voiced surprise at her nephew's actions.

Yardena Cohen said she knew Zaada had fled the army, opposed the government's settlement shutdown and started living at the West Bank settlement. But she called him the "nicest, warmest person" and never thought he was capable of such violence.

Under the plan, Israel will remove all 8,500 Israeli settlers from the occupied Gaza Strip, along with about 500 others from four isolated settlements in the northern West Bank.

Sharon has cast his initiative as a way to bolster Israel's security, but settlement leaders have condemned it as cowardly capitulation to terrorists.

Saeb Erekat, a senior Palestinian leader, called the attack "a very dangerous incident" and urged Israel to press ahead with the settlement shutdown "in a peaceful and orderly manner."

The incident was the worst such attack since 1994, when a U.S.-born settler opened fire in the Tomb of the Patriarchs, a religious site sacred to Muslims and Jews, killing 29 Palestinians.

Gaza Pullout Tests Limit Of Dissent (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, August 5, 2005

NEVE DEKELIM, GAZA - Ofir Handelsman thinks he holds the power to stop Israel's pullout from Gaza in the palm of his hand. Scribbled across his palm is the fake identity number that enabled him to sneak into Gush Katif, the collection of Jewish settlements in which he and other Israelis intend to make a last stand against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's withdrawal, set for Aug. 17.

Ofir, just 17, carries the build and demeanor of a wrestler. He wears a sleeveless cut-off shirt, an orange cord and whistle around his neck signaling his opposition to the evacuation, and the backpack he is going to live out of for the foreseeable future.

"A few hundred of us came in," he says, slightly breathless as he and his buddies buzz around the Vanilla Sky restaurant, scrounging for a meal Wednesday night. "So many people will come that the army won't be able to remove us - and then, we hope, there won't be a disengagement."

DOJ_NMG_0002200

Some Israelis see Ofir's action as valiant civil disobedience. Others decry flouting of the law. It's a debate that stretches beyond eminent domain to the heart of Israeli identity: property rights of the few vs. security of the many; political compromise vs. scriptural authority; and the right to self-expression vs. a government's right to implement key policies without interference.

Indeed, the country's roads themselves have quickly become a part of this battleground: opponents of disengagement throw nails on roads over which Israeli army jeeps will need to pass. And Wednesday, protesters shut down one of the country's most important arteries - the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway - with a row of burning tires.

Right-wing activists say that in a democracy, they should be free to protest. But Israel's security forces have been trying to limit the demonstrations - initially refusing to permit a large one Wednesday in Ofakim, outside Gaza. The attempt to clamp down, these activists say, is pushing protesters to more extreme measures.

But security officials and proponents of disengagement say that the people in orange - the color of the anti- withdrawal camp - are violating the law in their bid to prevent the execution of a major political decision that was made by the Knesset, Israel's parliament.

When the withdrawal begins, it will be the first time Israel will dismantle established settlements from any territory claimed by Palestinians for their future state. But at the moment, Israel seems more absorbed with the domestic side effects of the disengagement plan. As a result, many liberties are being put to the test in a way they never have before.

On the one hand, Israel is proud of its place as a feisty young democracy in a region awash in autocracies. On the other, the political necessity of carrying out the disengagement plan and the desire to implement it in as orderly a fashion as possible may be pushing Israeli officials to take measures that, some critics say, are more reminiscent of a police state than of a free country.

Even the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI), which considers all Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip to be illegal and strongly supports a withdrawal from these areas, fears that the police may run roughshod over the right to demonstrate.

ACRI made an official complaint about a two weeks ago when the organization learned that the police were stopping buses all over the country, as far as Kiryat Shemona in the far north of Israel - some five hours' drive away. Drivers of buses carrying anti-disengagement protesters were told by police that they would have their licenses revoked if they drove south with the protesters.

"The main thing we see is the police have a tendency to overact," says Yoav Loeff, an ACRI spokesman in Jerusalem.

An important Supreme Court case this week made clear that there is a fine line between demonstrating and being destructive.

The court rejected a petition from two right-wing activists who tried to appeal the army's evacuation of antidisengagement groups who were holed up in a hotel here. In the decision, the judges ruled that the activists were not expressing themselves but delivering a "severe blow to democracy."

"Freedom of expression is not a permit to throw burning tires at policemen or soldiers," Supreme Court Justice Aharon Barak said in the ruling. "Freedom of expression is not a permit to attack one's fellow man; freedom of expression is not a permit to riot."

But for Yair Cohen, who has been living in this settlement since he was evacuated from Yamit in the Sinai, the very fact of being forced out from his home twice in his life is a symbol that Israel is not a true democracy.

"There's got to be a limit in a democracy," says Mr. Cohen, a father of five who stopped to talk after leaving evening prayers at the community's central synagogue here. "No democracy can take a person out of his house against his will. When you have 15,000 soldiers surrounding the demonstrators, that's a democracy?"

Palestinian Troops Face Biggest Test During Pullout (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, August 5, 2005

GAZA CITY — Capt. Hisham Kariri watches as Palestinian National Security Forces cadets carefully hack one another with choreographed karate chops in a rock-strewn Gaza City parade ground.

DOJ_NMG_0002201

Kariri's men, some with graying beards and paunches, are among the 7,500 troops the Palestinian Authority intends to deploy along with tens of thousands of police and militiamen to help secure Israel's evacuation of 21 Jewish settlements in Gaza and four in the West Bank starting Aug. 15.

The Palestinian Authority has committed to thwarting Palestinian militants from launching rockets on Jewish settlers and Israeli soldiers during the pullout. The authority also will try to curb looters expected to swarm on the settlements, says Palestinian Cabinet Secretary Samir Huleile.

But Israel's military is concerned — and ready to react. If the Palestinian security forces don't act to prevent attacks and chaos, Israeli Deputy Defense Minister Zeev Boim says, "We will not hesitate to use land, sea and air forces with full severity to respond to a terror attack." He also warns that Israel could suspend its evacuation "to launch a large-scale military operation into the areas used to fire rockets and missiles."

Palestinian militants fired hundreds of homemade mortars and rockets toward Jewish settlements and towns inside Israel during the past month. Israel's Shin Bet internal security service recorded an 18-month high of 426 attacks against Israeli targets in July.

That's nearly four times the number of attacks in January, according to a statement released Monday by Shin Bet, the Israeli counterpart to the FBI.

Col. Jamal Kayed, commander of the Palestinian National Security Forces in the southern half of Gaza, insists that the 7,500 men under his command during the pullout are capable of preventing attacks.

From his headquarters in Khan Yunis — a Palestinian city abutting Neve Dekalim, Gaza's largest settlement — Kayed acknowledges that a rocket barrage by Palestinian militants such as one that killed an Israeli woman in a farming community two weeks ago could unleash "enormous destruction."

He intends "not to give Israel a reason to attack." His orders, he says, are to "stop the rocket launchers." But "we are not idiots. We will not start a civil war by killing strugglers for freedom," he says, referring to the militants.

These kinds of statements are of particular concern to the Israelis. Boim says his government "is satisfied with the Palestinian government's decision to deploy troops, but we are skeptical that Abu Mazen's (Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas) intention of thwarting terrorist attacks on departing troops and citizens will trickle down to the soldiers."

Kayed says his men will be ordered to prevent and briefly detain men caught firing on Israeli soldiers or settlers. "Israel says we should kill them. I am not interested in killing my own people," he says.

His forces also will remain out of sight of the settlers during the two- to four-week pullout, "because we don't want to cause friction." The buffer zone with the Israelis will be 200-800 yards, he says.

Kayed and other Palestinian security officials have met routinely with their Israeli counterparts to coordinate security during the withdrawal, but Kayed says Israel hasn't disclosed its exact plans for the pullout. Boim says Israel has little inclination to share its plans.

On the sun-blasted sand lot in Gaza, Kariri groans as his men flip head over heels and land with a thud on their backs as they clear imaginary barbed wire. This is not the kind of training Kariri received at the Indian Military Academy in 1998.

As he watches his men struggle to march in step, Kariri says, "In India we had equipment, weapons, everything. Here all we can do is try." Israel destroyed much of the Palestinians' military equipment during the latest uprising, which began in 2000.

Later, in Gaza City, commander Col. Mahmud Rawala, pronounces this battalion "fit for service."

"We are ready," echoes Huleile, the Cabinet secretary-general. "We have done our best, given Israeli restrictions on allowing us to have weapons and ammunition."

With more than 40,000 men on duty, this summer's deployment of Palestinian forces is "by far the largest campaign in Palestinian history," Huleile says.

The Palestinian forces that will ring the Gaza settlements will include about 10,000 police officers and soldiers and 30,000 militiamen from Fatah, the Palestinian Authority's largest faction, he says.

But even with its massive deployment, some Palestinian leaders are doubtful their security forces can complete the mission. Osama al-Farra, mayor of Khan Yunis — the city of 180,000 that stands to absorb 11 settlements after the pullout — worries that containing “souvenir seekers” will be impossible. “Everyone will want to go and see the new area. All our security forces won't be able to stop that movement,” he says.

DOJ_NMG_0002202

Some local Gazans vow to do what Palestinian Authority security won't. Sultana Abu Awad, a mother of 12 and a resident of the Khan Yunis refugee camp, says, “If they (Hamas militants) try and shoot or fire rockets, I will cut their throats.” Militants often use the camp's western neighborhood, where Sultana and her family live, to shoot at or fire rockets at Israelis. Israel has responded by razing dozens of homes in the neighborhood.

Abu Awad's living room wall, riddled by bullets from the Israeli military's return fire, faces the soon-to-be evacuated Jewish settlement of Neve Dekalim. “When they (militants) fire, it brings disaster upon us,” she says, “so we will surround our homes, and if anybody shoots, we will kill him.”

China Restricts News Of Cnooc Bid (WSJ)

By Matt Pottinger

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

BEIJING -- China is heavily restricting domestic news coverage of Cnooc Ltd.'s failed bid to buy American oil company Unocal Corp., a move apparently aimed at muffling criticism of the U.S. before next month's summit meeting between Chinese President Hu Jintao and President Bush.

Editors at Chinese newspapers, Web sites and a television station said they are obeying a recent central-government directive to publish only official Xinhua news agency accounts of the bid. The Propaganda Department of the ruling Communist Party issued the guidelines more than two weeks ago after it became clear Cnooc's $18.5 billion bid for Unocal was faltering amid opposition in Congress.

"We are not allowed to do our own reporting anymore" on Cnooc, said an editor at a major paper published by Wenxin United Press Group. "This is a ban."

Cnooc, China's largest offshore oil producer, on Tuesday abandoned a months-long effort to buy Unocal, of El Segundo, Calif., blaming the political atmosphere in Washington. Thus far, Beijing has refrained from commenting on the aborted bid to distance itself from Cnooc and deflect allegations in Congress that the pursuit of Unocal reflected Chinese state policy.

Chinese people, however, are aware of the news. The Xinhua news agency account that ran in some newspapers was dry and brief, stating that Cnooc had withdrawn its bid because of the poor political climate in the U.S.

"This is a commercial matter," said a Chinese Ministry of Commerce spokesman asked about the failed bid. "As a government department, there is no need to make any comment about this at this time."

But analysts and editors say Beijing has been closely involved in managing the ensuing coverage. The goal is to contain combustible anti-American sentiment that Cnooc's failure might ignite, they say.

"I think the Propaganda Department is trying to cool down the nationalist anger caused by this," said Li Xiguang, who teaches journalism at Tsinghua University in Beijing. "The government wants to have strong ties with the U.S. despite this setback."

Popular dissatisfaction with Washington runs high in China, fueled by American support for Taiwan and perceived U.S. bullying on trade matters. Many Chinese also expressed resentment at the recent revaluation of the country's currency as the latest indication that the U.S. is trying to push China around.

But the leadership in Beijing is intent on keeping relations with Washington as smooth as possible. For a few weeks after Cnooc's announcement in June that it was challenging Chevron Corp. to acquire Unocal, coverage in China's state-owned media was relatively freewheeling, with some criticizing the bid and others attacking U.S. lawmakers' efforts to thwart Cnooc.

But as it became clearer that Unocal would side with Chevron, despite Cnooc's substantially higher bid, the Propaganda Department issued its directive to newsrooms. A staff member of the Shanghai Oriental Morning Post said editors were called into a meeting where their boss informed them of the directive.

"All reports on Cnooc should use stories from Xinhua news agency in order to keep the same tone as the government," the staffer quoted the boss as saying. Editors at four other newspapers and a Shanghai television station contacted by The Wall Street Journal described similar scenes at their offices.

DOJ_NMG_0002203

Beijing's desire for smooth U.S. relations notwithstanding, the Cnooc saga still could cause repercussions for American interests. The handful of permitted commentaries published in recent days have emphasized U.S. hypocrisy on free trade. The China Daily ran an editorial yesterday saying the consequences of the failed Cnooc bid "may be more serious than some U.S. politicians have calculated."

The lack of strongly critical news coverage didn't prevent many Chinese from tracking Cnooc's troubles in America or from drawing conclusions about it. Negative comments about the U.S. were posted on numerous Internet chat rooms.

Notable & Quotable (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

From an editorial in yesterday's China Daily:

China National Offshore Oil Corp has to bear the cost of its abandoned bid for the American oil company Unocal. But the fallout from the bid will not only affect the Chinese side. The idea of the United States as a self-appointed champion of the free market has become questionable. . . .

The unjustified U.S. opposition, largely politically motivated, will . . . poison the current prevailing mood as bilateral economic ties between China and the United States are enhanced. The high-profile takeover battle demonstrated to the world that the United States is not a free economy as it claimed to be. In the U.S. market, an asset for sale has not gone to the buyer that most prized it, because of regulatory concerns fuelled by bogus fears and hidden interests.

Apparently, Unocal shareholders chose to accept the cheaper offer free of regulatory risk. But the politicized regulatory matter has, in fact, deprived them of the chance to maximize value, as the market should allow.

. . . [T]he explicit message the takeover battle sends to the world is that American business is defined by political needs. . . . In the long run, the casualty will be on U.S. competitiveness if the market is to play second fiddle to protectionism with political patronage.

Aggressive Search By Cnooc For New Oil And Gas Seen (NYT)

By David Lague, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

BEIJING, Aug. 4 - The Chinese energy company Cnooc is preparing to mount an aggressive international search for oil and gas supplies in the aftermath of its failed bid for Unocal, oil industry experts say.

In announcing on Tuesday that it would abandon its $18.5 billion offer, Cnooc, shorthand for the China National Offshore Oil Corporation, signaled that it would continue to work with foreign governments and companies in its search for overseas oil and gas reserves.

Energy market experts now expect Cnooc, which is controlled by the Beijing government, to explore opportunities throughout the Asia-Pacific region, Central Asia, Russia and West Africa to find energy supplies for China's booming economy.

"Cnooc lost the battle over Unocal, but it will continue to wage the war toward acquiring overseas energy assets to support China's growing energy needs," said Kurt A. Barrow, an analyst in Singapore with the energy consultant Purvin & Gertz.

The hostile reaction in Washington to Cnooc's bid was a pointed reminder to the Chinese that politics remains a major obstacle to their plans to increase energy security. China's growing oil imports have helped drive prices near record highs as competition for energy emerges as a point of friction among the big manufacturing economies.

Given its rebuff in the United States, said Ma Shang, an energy industry analyst with Fitch Ratings in Beijing, Cnooc should place less emphasis on big investments in Southeast Asia and South America, regions where Washington exerts strong political influence. Instead, Cnooc should follow PetroChina, which has secured substantial reserves in Central Asia.

"Because the energy market regards Cnooc as a state-owned enterprise," Mr. Ma said, "its overseas acquisitions are more political compared with other global players. Cnooc should look to Central Asia or Russia. Compared to the U.S., these regions and Russia are more friendly to China."

Many analysts say that Cnooc, which is listed on stock markets in New York and Hong Kong, is unlikely to find investment targets as attractive as Unocal, but that its political backing and access to cheap money will continue to make it competitive in world markets.

DOJ_NMG_0002204

And Chinese energy companies have other advantages. Some have invested in places like Sudan, Iran and Myanmar, where the major international oil companies are unwilling or unable to operate, Mr. Barrow said.

Cnooc plans to become an important supplier of liquefied natural gas to China, and there are signs that it will concentrate on investment in natural gas reserves in Asia.

Experts suggested two such targets: Woodside Petroleum of Australia, which operates the North West Shelf natural gas project and owns 16.7 percent of it; and the Gorgon natural gas development, led by Chevron. Cnooc is already linked to both ventures, which have substantial reserves off northwest Australia.

In a complex agreement in 2002, Cnooc formed a joint venture with the North West Shelf project's six partners, including Chevron, to take a stake of about 5 percent in the gas fields. Cnooc's share of the reserves is equivalent to liquefied natural gas shipments of about 3.3 million metric tons a year over two decades starting in 2006, and with an estimated value of $20 billion. The venture supplies as much as 10 percent of Japan's liquefied gas imports.

Analysts say that Woodside would be an ideal investment for Cnooc as it seeks to become China's leading supplier of liquefied gas. Ownership of Woodside would also give Cnooc access to advanced deepwater exploration and development technology, a consideration that experts say was a major factor in its bid for Unocal.

Shell is the biggest shareholder in Woodside, with 34 percent. The Australian government in 2001 rejected a takeover bid from Shell because it would have given a foreign company control over the extraction and marketing of a major Australian energy resource. But China is soon expected to become Australia's biggest trading partner, which might make officials in Canberra more flexible if Cnooc pursued Woodside.

In 2003, Cnooc signed an agreement with the Gorgon partners - Chevron, Exxon Mobil and Shell - that called on them to "place a significant volume of Gorgon L.N.G. for use in the growing Chinese market." Cnooc was reported to be seeking a 12.5 percent stake in the project.

But talks with the Gorgon partners have failed so far to produce an agreement on price. Scott Walker, a spokesman for the venture, based in Perth, Australia, said that discussions were continuing.

Niger's Anguish Is Reflected In Its Dying Children (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

ELKOKIYA, Niger, Aug. 3 - At sunset Wednesday, in an unmarked grave in a cemetery rimmed by millet fields, the men of this mud-walled village buried Baby Boy Saminou, the latest casualty of the hunger ravaging 3.6 million farmers and herders in this destitute nation.

At 16 months, he was little bigger than some newborns, with the matchstick limbs and skeletal ribs of the severely malnourished. He had died three hours earlier in the intensive care unit of a field hospital run by Doctors Without Borders, where 30 others like him still lie with their mothers on metal cots.

One in five is dying - the result, many say, of a belated response by the outside world to a disaster predicted in detail nine months ago.

Niger's latest hunger problem, like Baby Boy Saminou's tragedy, is more complex than it first appears. As aid begins to trickle into some of the nearly 4,000 villages across southern Niger that need help - the vanguard of a flood of food brought forth by television images of shrunken babies - the rich world's response to Niger's worst nutrition crisis since the 1985 famine is, in fact, proving too late for many.

Unseen on television, however, are the shrunken infants who die all but unnoticed even in so-called normal years. Of each 1,000 children born alive in this, the world's second-poorest nation, a staggering 262 fail to reach their fifth birthdays.

Five of Baby Boy Saminou's seven brothers and sisters were among them. The longest-surviving of those who died reached 4 years of age. Asked what killed the last three, Saminou's father, Saidou Ida, said simply, "Malnutrition."

International aid officials and charity workers here say that the world's dilatory reaction to Niger's woes is hard to excuse. Some of them also say that Niger's miseries this year are merely a worsened version of its perennial ones - and that until Niger addresses its problems of primitive farming, primitive health care and primitive social conditions, infants will continue to die unnoticed in numbers that dwarf any hunger emergency.

DOJ_NMG_0002205

"That is the bigger question that both Niger and the international community, everyone, needs to answer," Marcus Prior, the West Africa spokesman for the World Food Program, said in an interview in Maradi, the regional city where little Saminou died. "We feel that we've tried to raise awareness. But at the same time, this is something that's a recurring problem."

That it is a perennial problem, Mr. Prior and others stress, in no way minimizes the urgency of Niger's current disaster - erratic rainfall and severe food shortages in the agricultural and herding belts where many of Niger's 11 million to 12 million people live. Together, they are pushing the death rate for small children even higher than Niger's customary one-in-four level, and killing off the livestock upon which the nation's nomads depend.

How many people need aid depends on the yardstick used. About 1.2 million of Niger's 3.6 million rural farmers and herders are described as "extremely vulnerable" to food shortages and in need of food aid, according to an assessment of Niger's crisis conducted four months ago by the United Nations, major charities and Niger's government. Of those, about 874,000 urgently need free food, the latest assessment concluded late last month, and that number could rise until the harvest is completed in October.

But that does not mean that nearly 900,000 people will starve; the vast bulk of the hungry will somehow survive. Most of those who do die will be young children. But even among those, most will not die of starvation.

"Children will likely die from malnourishment, but a substantial proportion is probably dying from conditions related to poor water quality, or other non-food-related problems," FEWS Net, a famine warning service financed with United States assistance, reported late last month.

Much of this disaster was suspected last November, when experts monitoring Niger's farms found a 220,000-ton shortfall - about 7.5 percent of the normal crop - in the harvest of grains, especially the millet that is the staple of most people's diet.

Among others, the United Nations World Food Program and Doctors Without Borders sounded alarms, and Niger's government, with World Food Program approval, quickly asked donors to give Niger 71,000 tons of food aid and $3 million for the 400,000 most vulnerable farmers and herders.

By May, it had received fewer than 7,000 tons of food and one $323,000 donation, from Luxembourg.

"I think everyone knew that a crisis was going on," said Johanne Sekkenes, the Niger mission head of Doctors Without Borders, in an interview in Niamey, the capital. "But the answer given at the time, from governments and international agencies in Niger, was that the ongoing, normal development programs should be reinforced."

Niger's government ruled out both free food aid and health care to hungry families, preferring to sell surplus millet at subsidized prices in an effort to force the price of scarce millet down. But millet prices skyrocketed, forcing families to sell cattle and other goods to buy food.

The charity has angrily accused governments of allowing children to die, albeit not intentionally, so that the free market in grain would not be disrupted. Others say that Niger is on a steady course toward future disasters, free aid or not. Even with huge numbers of dying children, the average woman bears seven babies, and the population is growing at a rate that by 2026 will double the number of people on a land that already is straining its capacity.

Moreover, Niger has few of the modern tools that might enable it to feed itself, meaning that charities must make up a food shortage virtually every year.

"You've seen the kind of tools people use to farm," Mr. Prior said. "You've seen the lack of irrigation and the total dependency on what falls from the sky. I doubt you've seen any fertilizer or modern technology being used."

When the rainy season arrived in June, bringing malaria and other diseases with it, children weakened by lack of food began to fall ill and die in numbers even greater than in normal years.

Doctors Without Borders has treated more than 14,000 children at six centers this year, more than double the 2004 total. It has nearly 5,000 under treatment today. Admissions at its centers rose by a quarter from mid-July to August.

Among the newcomers was Baby Boy Saminou, whose 40-year-old mother, Mariama, brought him to the charity's Maradi hospital Wednesday from her village of about 2,500, down a rutted road 15 miles away. The boy was receiving free food, and had visited the Doctors Without Borders clinic five days earlier with a mouth infection. But his condition worsened last weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0002206

"I didn't even have time to talk to her, the baby was so bad," Chantelle Umtoni, 34, the chief of the intensive care ward, said as she watched the mother and child from her desk Wednesday afternoon. "He has severe anemia. He has severe malaria. He was dehydrated - completely dry. And he had heart failure."

Indeed, doctors restarted his heart as they plugged bags of blood and intravenous fluid into him and clapped an oxygen mask on his face to assist his labored breathing.

Dr. Umtoni said she gave the boy a 50-50 chance of living. Dire as they are, such cases are not unusual.

"We average 30, 35 children every day," she said. "All of them are malnourished, severely malnourished. That's already a severe disease by itself. Add atop that malaria and anemia, and they come in a bit too late."

Mariama sat by her child, draped in the same brilliant orange-and-green cloth she wore, and watched him as she toted up her family. Of eight children, five were dead. The two survivors, she said, are 15 and 17 years old.

As she spoke, a nurse, Boraka Abdou, put a stethoscope to the baby's chest, listened, then summoned Dr. Umtoni. She listened intently. Then, wordlessly, the two removed his oxygen mask and catheters. Mariama stared at her dead child, impassive, then covered him in a red scarf.

An hour later, she was home, having ridden the 15 miles with her baby in her arms, tears running down her face.

Outside her compound, she gave the dead child to her mother-in-law, who washed its face. Then she sat on a wooden bowl used to grind millet and wailed, inconsolable. Women, hearing the news, came to grieve with her. The two women bathed Baby Boy Saminou and wrapped him in a white T-shirt for a traditional Islamic burial.

The village chief, Moussa Djidji, said that at least 10 of the village's children had died since January.

Hunger Reaches Crisis Level In Niger (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

MARADI, Niger — The frail baby boy she cradles has arms no thicker than her finger. His belly has hollowed and his skin has sagged as his weight has dropped.

Rakiya Nassirou weeps constantly over her son, wondering what is happening to him and whether God is angry with her. But 6-month-old Rabiou is not her only worry. Another boy, 3-year-old Moussa, is with her at this feeding station run by Doctors Without Borders. Nassirou left four more children and her sick husband back home in their village two weeks ago with no food.

The aid agencies now scrambling to save these children say it didn't have to be this way.

In the best of circumstances, they acknowledge, hunger shadows Niger and its neighbors along the southern edge of the Sahara desert. Malnutrition, malaria, diarrhea and other ills kill one in four children before the age of 5.

But last fall, things got much worse. The rains failed. Then the locusts, the worst infestation in 15 years, arrived.

A United Nations appeal last November for help for Niger was virtually ignored. Another appeal in March for $16 million resulted in about $1 million in contributions. Even as world attention was focused on Africa at last month's Group of 8 summit of the world's richest nations, little happened. Niger was offered debt forgiveness, but nothing was done about the hunger issue.

The crisis underscores one of the long-standing problems faced by international relief agencies. It is much easier to raise money once starvation has set in and children are dying than to prod donors to prevent a looming crisis.

Now, the World Food Program estimates 2.5 million of Niger's nearly 12 million people are at risk of hunger; 1.6 million of them need immediate help. And the crisis is spreading. An additional 1.5 million people in neighboring Mali, Mauritania and Burkino Faso need food aid.

Only recent television footage of starving children have started making a difference.

"We are going into the worst period of the year, in the coming four to five weeks, with the rainy period and diarrhea. And this is the last month before the harvest, meaning there are few food stocks and they are running very low," said Johanne Sekkenes, head of mission at Doctors Without Borders in Niamey, Niger's capital.

Doctors Without Borders is admitting nearly 1,300 children a week to its emergency feeding program in the Maradi region, 340 miles east of Niamey. The numbers are still rising.

DOJ_NMG_0002207

It has treated almost 15,000 severely malnourished children since January, 5 percent of whom died. According to UNICEF, 192,000 malnourished children need help, 32,000 of whom are severely malnourished and facing death.

Niger is three times the size of California, but two-thirds is desert and only 15 percent of the land is suitable for farming. It is regarded as the second-poorest country on Earth, ahead only of Sierra Leone, another West African country.

Most of the population depends on herding and subsistence agriculture. It rarely raises a blip on the radar of international affairs. The last time it made headlines was before the Iraq war, when reports surfaced that yellowcake uranium from Niger had found its way to Saddam Hussein. The report turned out to be false.

Women often bear the brunt of Niger's crises, since many men travel to neighboring countries for work, often for years at a time.

Nassirou fears that the revolving cycle of hunger is not the result of fickle rains, but the wrath of God.

"Maybe God curses us," she said. "God blames us."

"I hope God will give us life and health and take us out of this poverty."

Lying on a blanket at the feeding center, she added: "I cry because I cannot understand what is happening to my son. I cry because I don't know what to do. I have been crying ever since I got here.

"I'll do anything for him to get better," she said, gazing down at her baby with melting eyes. "There's nothing more precious than a child."

Dr. Chantal Umutoni, in the intensive care unit at the feeding station, said she was sad and angry over the delayed international response.

"Maybe those lives could have been saved," she said.

On Thursday, a starving boy named Mamane Sani Abdou, 13 months, was admitted, a frail, listless child with starkly protruding ribs and stick-like limbs which flopped by his side. His mother, Babi Abdou, 20, fed him a few spoonfuls of enriched therapeutic milk, which he coughed up before sagging back, panting desperately at the effort.

Before, "he used to drink a whole cup of milk," said Abdou, who said her boy first fell ill after being circumcised two months ago. She spent all her savings, about $12, first on traditional medicine, then Western medicine.

On Wednesday, a child in similar condition, 16-month-old Saidou Saiman, came into intensive care at 11 a.m., "too sick to even make a sound," Umutoni said. Just after midday, his heart failed. He was resuscitated, but died at about 4 p.m.

His mother composed herself and took the dead child home for burial.

"She was trying to be strong," the doctor said.

The crisis extends well beyond Maradi.

On Wednesday, Fatu Haliss tried to spoonfeed her son, Alassan, but the 1-year-old cried and spat it out. The boy's face is gaunt, reduced to a bony skull, making his eyes look large and round. He weighs about seven pounds, about a half a pound less than when he arrived at a feeding center in Tahoua, 230 miles northeast of Niamey, about two weeks ago.

Her family provides a bitter example of Niger's poverty. The woman's parents are both dead. She has not heard from her husband since he left to work in neighboring Libya more than a year ago.

She has lost more children than have lived. Two were born dead. Four others "died normally," as she puts it. Four are alive, including Alassan, "the thinnest child I ever had."

"Many small children died in our village," she said.

She spent her last money on half a bag of rice to leave with her children when she brought Alassan to the feeding center, but fears it may have run out by now. Worse, her crop needs tending, or it could fail.

"I have nobody at home. My husband left and I have to work in the field. I need to get back home. I have nothing else to eat, only my crop. It could die and then who will feed me? I have nobody to feed me."

For Umutoni, it is tough watching these children, who arrive only when they already near death.

"Children who are very sick and malnourished are often very quiet. But when you start to nourish them, they start to make more noise. Their eyes become more lively, and shining," she said. "You see life in their eyes."

In Tense Sudan, Divisions Resurface (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0002208

By Emily Wax

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

JUBA, Sudan, Aug. 4 -- The mood of this rattled country, after the sudden death Sunday of the former rebel leader John Garang, is etched on the fearful faces of northern Arab merchants, surrounded by suitcases and nylon sacks, as they wait in the airport to flee further attacks by southerners.

The once-lively central market of this southern city is a deserted maze of smoldering fires and burned metal roofs after three days of rioting. Goats and children pick through the rubble of charred soda bottles, detergent boxes and plastic roses.

The hastily dug earth in a cemetery marks the sites where Arab families quickly buried their dead, as required by Muslim law, leaving unmarked graves and retreating to the shelter of military bases.

Officials said at least 13 people were killed in Juba, 720 miles south of the capital, Khartoum, during three days of mob violence, looting and ethnic tensions that erupted after Garang's death in a helicopter crash. In the Khartoum area, officials said 111 people had died and several hundred were injured. Another 1,500 were arrested.

The clashes in north and south have been mirror images, taking on the very themes of the civil war that ended in January with a peace deal negotiated by the government and Garang -- mostly African southerners feeling marginalized by the Arab-led north, mostly Muslim northerners feeling their religion and political position under threat from the south, which is mainly animist and Christian.

Garang, 60, was rewarded for helping to bring peace by becoming Sudan's senior vice president after leading rebels during the 21-year civil war.

Now, in the city where he is to be buried Saturday, the country's raw anger, and its deep ethnic and religious divides, are very much out in the open.

Juba, a city of about 350,000 on the Nile River that is tenuously under the control of 60,000 government troops, feels more like a frontline camp readying for war than a future regional capital preparing for a state funeral.

"All of the people here want to kill us," said Abdullah Ali Tabeb, an Arab merchant who said his family's cigarette and flour shops were set on fire. He said he had spent the last four days at the airport, with only water and biscuits to nourish him, in hopes of getting out. "They told the Arabs to go to Khartoum. They don't like us. We need peace."

Less than a mile away, Samuel Fadil, 37, an African southerner, surveyed the charred remains of three storefronts his father had rented to Arab traders. Despite his loss, he said, he sympathized with the looters and could understand their anger.

"People suspect that the Arabs killed our father Garang," he said, pointing at a still-burning shop. "We have no other source of income. But I am still much more angry over the death of Garang." There has been no report of foul play in the crash; both Garang's movement and the government have called it an accident.

Throughout Wednesday night and into Thursday morning, gunshots rang out across the city. Half-burned public minibuses were abandoned on the roads. Children in ragged clothes grabbed sodas from shop debris. Soldiers guarded a soccer park called Freedom Square, now a temporary jail for looters.

In different corners of Juba, the division of opinion on Garang's death was as wide as the Nile.

Many southerners said they were convinced that the fatal crash was not an accident in bad weather but a plot to weaken the former rebel movement, cause ethnic chaos and deflect attention from the government's autocratic hold on power. Many northerners rushed to take the government's side, partly in exchange for protection from attack.

The government announced that it would deploy a large force of elite troops here during Garang's funeral, which is to be attended by President Omar Hassan Bashir, as there were fears the event could spark new violence. Meanwhile, Garang's body was being flown to various cities in the south so mourners could pay respects.

On Wednesday, armed members of the Sudan People's Liberation Movement, Garang's former rebel group, arrived to help government forces restore calm -- and to protect the group's leaders.

Some analysts said they saw the government's military move as a warning to other brewing rebel movements, especially in the troubled western region of Darfur, where 2 million people have been displaced in a separate conflict.

"The mood of the country is manipulated in this divide-and-rule fashion," said Ollie Dinar, an African scholar in Khartoum. "Sudan's government has once again won. The people are now attacking each other instead of the government."

DOJ_NMG_0002209

Dinar said images of southerners burning and looting have been played repeatedly on government television stations, provoking Arabs in Khartoum to fight back.

Whether calm will return, no one is sure.

The abrupt shift from peace to chaos began Sunday, as news spread that Garang's helicopter had crashed en route home from an official visit to Uganda.

In Juba, a group of Arabs lowered the rebel flag and called out to southerners, "Your man has died," said Joseph Abuk, 47, a teacher.

"There were extremely sarcastic and painful comments made," Abuk said. He said the years of civil war had created a deep "lack of trust between us Africans and Arabs. When it comes to the death of Garang," he added, "people are going to go beyond the simple appearance of issues."

Soon, he recounted, young followers of Garang went to the market with sticks and guns. In a "spontaneous burst of anger," he said, they started "burning everything." Arab merchants jumped into buses and fled to army facilities for protection.

Abuk, echoing many southerners' suspicions, suggested that Garang's helicopter could have been sabotaged in the air by terrorists or mercenaries on board.

But Adel Ismail, 45, an Arab merchant waiting wearily at the airport three days after being chased from his shop, said northerners and southerners alike respected Garang and did not want him dead.

"They've put in their minds that we killed Garang," Ismail said, his eyes watering. "I came to Juba to work after the peace deal. Everything was good here."

On Monday, Ismail said, he ran two miles to an army barracks, fleeing a mob of angry youths. On the way, a southern African woman hid him and made him tea. "The southerners are not all bad," he said, looking depressed.

In the eerily quiet dirt streets of Juba, hundreds of heavily armed government troops patrolled Wednesday and Thursday with AK-47s and grenades hanging from their belts. Antiaircraft guns bristled on the airport roof.

Under the peace deal reached in January, the government is scheduled to scale down its military presence and hand over control of the city within two years. Southerners said they view Garang's burial here, in a city they long fought to claim, as an important political gesture.

But Juba did not seem ready for the tens of thousands of mourners expected to arrive for Saturday's funeral.

Few women and children ventured into the rubble-strewn streets, and the few shoppers found prices for sugar and flour had suddenly doubled. Jane Martin, 30, bought a basket of burned onions to cook for her seven children.

"The prices are high. In the night, we don't sleep well," Martin said. "When there are gunshots, my children run and hide under the bed."

She glanced nervously around the burned market, at the government troops and the barbed wire surrounding Freedom Square, and at the rebel troops driving by in pickup trucks. Then, gripping her basket of onions, she turned and hurried home.

Sudan Rebel Leader Is Mourned As Widow Appeals For Calm (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

RUMBEK, Sudan, Aug. 4 - The body of John Garang, the rebel-turned-politician, began crisscrossing Sudan on Thursday as his followers held hastily arranged memorial services aimed at unifying the long-divided country that he helped bring to the brink of peace.

In Kurmuk, the site of a major battle during Mr. Garang's 21-year insurgency, thousands of people stood silently when the cargo plane carrying his coffin touched down at the airstrip. One look at the wooden box carried off the plane by uniformed rebel soldiers, and many in the crowd began to ululate.

It was a somber scene but one that also represented Mr. Garang's stated dream - Sudanese Muslims and Christians standing side by side, united.

Farther north in Khartoum, where Mr. Garang's death in a helicopter crash on Saturday led to deadly riots between predominantly Christian southerners living in the capital and mainly Muslim northerners, tensions remained high. The police began rounding up people suspected of inciting the violence, The Associated Press reported. State news media reported that more than 1,400 people were arrested in Khartoum while dozens were arrested in Juba, the major city in southern Sudan, where rioting also broke out.

DOJ_NMG_0002210

Mr. Garang's widow, Rebecca, used the memorial service in Kurmuk to call for calm, urging those wishing to honor her husband not to work against the peace agreement he signed with the government in January, under which he had become the country's vice president.

"My husband is alive, not dead, because he has brought Sudan to peace," she said.

Mr. Garang's Sudan People's Liberation Army took Kurmuk in 1997 in a surprise attack that was a major turning point in the rebel movement. At the time, the rebels had been torn by internal dissention and were widely discounted as a serious threat to the government.

Kurmuk is not far from a hydroelectric plant that provides the bulk of the power to Khartoum. The proximity of the rebels to the dam alarmed the leaders in Khartoum.

Kurmuk also represents the line between north and south, and is a mixture of faiths and allegiances.

On the airstrip, where locals had trekked for miles and spent as long as 10 hours waiting for the plane to land on Thursday, a priest and an imam took turns on the podium.

Even where to bury Mr. Garang has stirred debate. Mr. Garang's family members preferred Panyagor, the village in Upper Nile region where he was born. But the family yielded to the new rebel leadership, which chose Juba, where he will be buried on Saturday.

Juba was a contentious choice because throughout the war it was a government town that the rebels never managed to take. Under the peace agreement, Juba was to be turned over to the rebels in July. Mr. Garang had begun sending teams of rebel soldiers to the town, but major contingents of government soldiers still remain in garrisons there.

Mr. Garang visited Rumbek in January after the peace agreement was signed and was met by tens of thousands of residents. There was silence this evening when Mr. Garang's body returned here. His coffin was met by an honor guard, and at first the only sound was the clicking of their boots in the sand. But then a woman's cry rang out and then another's. One of the soldiers carrying his coffin took a hand off the box to wipe tears out of his eyes.

After John Garang (WP)

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

Helicopters do crash, especially in bad weather, and the weekend crash that killed John Garang, the longtime leader of Sudan's southern rebels, does not appear to have been the result of foul play. The helicopter in which Mr. Garang was flying belonged to an ally, Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni ally; it was flying over territory controlled by Mr. Garang's own Sudan People's Liberation Movement. Even so, the suspicion of foul play has triggered violent urban protests that could unravel Sudan's fragile north-south peace accord. By Wednesday more than 100 people had died in riots in the capital, Khartoum. In the southern town of Juba, rioters attacked shops and homes owned by ethnic Arabs associated with the northern government. At least 13 people have died.

The challenge now -- both for Sudan's leaders and for the United States and other outsiders -- is to keep the north-south peace process moving in the hope that this violence will die down. So far, all parties appear to be responding as they ought to. The Bush administration immediately dispatched two senior State Department officials to the country. Sudan's president promised a joint north-south commission to investigate the causes of the helicopter crash and appealed for calm. Most promisingly of all, the southern liberation movement has appointed a new leader to succeed Mr. Garang without tearing itself into factions and has urged restraint from its followers. "It is just my husband who has died. His vision is alive," Mr. Garang's widow, Rebecca, told Reuters, alluding to his aspiration for a united and peaceful Sudan in which non-Arabs enjoy full rights.

African rebel movements, and indeed many African governments, are often led by strongmen who carry more on their shoulders than any individual should. Mr. Garang fit this mold: He made decisions without consulting colleagues; he did little to build political institutions in the areas of the south that he controlled or within his own movement; he was happy to embody the political aspirations of Sudan's non-Arab peoples. This ill-fated approach excluded orderly preparation for a succession and may leave other leaders without the stature necessary to persuade ordinary citizens to trust in a peace deal with the hated government. If that proves to be the case, then Sudan's north-south war may resume, dashing all hopes of using north-south reconciliation as the basis for peace in the western region of Darfur, where the government has committed genocide. But, in the speed and smoothness of his emergence as the new southern leader, Salva Kiir Mayardit holds out the hope that he can fill Mr. Garang's shoes ably. The Bush administration and its allies should encourage and support him. After decades of civil war and millions of casualties, Sudan has suffered more than enough.

DOJ_NMG_0002211

Coup May Alter Mauritania's U.S. Ties (WSJ)

By Yaroslav Trofimov

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Despite world-wide condemnation of this week's military putsch, Mauritania's new ruling junta has consolidated its hold over one of America's and Israel's most collaborative allies in the Arab world.

Wednesday's bloodless coup d'etat ousted long-serving President Maaouiya Ould Taya, who was visiting Saudi Arabia at the time. Hours later, the new junta -- which calls itself the Military Council for Justice and Democracy -- named as Mauritania's temporary leader Col. Ely Mohammed Vall, one of the deposed president's closest aides and head of the country's police and intelligence services.

The U.S, the African Union and the European Union all condemned the coup, with the State Department calling for "peaceful return to order under the constitution and the established government of President Taya." But as street celebrations erupted in the Mauritanian capital of Nouakchott, it seemed increasingly unlikely that Mr. Taya, who is staying in Niger, will be able to return to power.

The new junta's communiqué, read on national television, decried the "totalitarian practices of the deposed regime" and promised to create "true democratic institutions" after a two-year transitional period. Such progressive language notwithstanding, the junta consists of senior military officers who, like Col. Vall, held senior jobs in Mr. Taya's government, and who themselves were involved in the recent crackdowns on the Islamist opposition.

"They can't really carry out reforms, because they themselves are part and parcel of the regime," said Alain Antil, an Africa specialist at the French Institute for International Relations in Paris.

Mauritania, with a population of three million, is one of the poorest Arab countries -- but it has discovered oil in its offshore fields, with production slated to start next year. This lure of oil revenue has intensified conflicts within the ruling establishment, helping to provoke a series of coup attempts in recent years.

While democracy is unlikely to bloom in Nouakchott soon, Mauritania's foreign policy may well change in coming weeks. Mr. Taya, who came to power in a 1984 coup, used to be a passionate Arab nationalist and backed Saddam Hussein in the 1991 Gulf War; he also maintained close links with former colonial power France.

But, in 1999, French authorities detained a Mauritanian army captain on suspicion of human-rights abuses against black-skinned Mauritanians. Angered by the move, Mr. Taya immediately froze most cooperation with France and turned to the U.S. That same year, at a ceremony hosted in Washington by then-Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, Mauritania became the first Arab nation to establish full diplomatic relations with Israel without being required to do so by a peace treaty returning conquered land.

This relationship with Israel, which was denounced by the Arab League and regularly criticized on pan-Arab TV stations, became the rallying point for the Mauritanian opposition, which managed to organize violent street protests during a visit by Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom in May.

A desire to sever these ties with Israel "is the only issue that unites the quasitotality of Mauritanians," Mr. Antil said. He expects the new junta to curtail the Israeli connections and to scale down cooperation with Washington -- which recently deployed a small military contingent in Mauritania to train local security forces -- in favor of improved relations with France.

The same expectation is widespread in the Arab world, where the media mostly ran positive reports about the coup and suggested the plotters may have had tacit French support.

Thousands Back Junta In Mauritania (NYT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0002212

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Filed at 9:42 p.m. ET

NOUAKCHOTT, Mauritania (AP) -- Thousands rallied Thursday to support the military junta that toppled Mauritania's pro-Western president a day earlier, as the African country's top leader met with the U.S. and French ambassadors.

The meetings with the envoys of former colonial power France and counterterrorism partner America were among the first Col. Ely Ould Mohamed Vall held, and appeared designed to assure the international community it had nothing to fear from the new regime.

The junta also issued a statement announcing the dissolution of the country's bicameral legislature.

Western and other African nations and the United Nations condemned the coup. The African Union's Peace and Security Council suspended Mauritania on Thursday until "the restoration of constitutional order in the country."

But many Mauritanians applauded the ouster of President Maaoya Sid'Ahmed Ould Taya, saying he was a brutal dictator and that they hoped the junta would keep its promise to usher in democracy. Taya was out of the country when the junta struck.

Tens of thousands of people swept through Nouakchott on Thursday on foot and in cars to express their support for the junta. Some carried huge portraits of Vall.

Vall made no public statements Thursday. U.S. Ambassador Joseph LeBaron refused to comment on the meeting and other diplomats were not immediately available.

Mauritanian officials said Vall had assured the ambassadors that his junta would quickly arrange elections. The junta has promised to yield to democratic rule within two years.

U.S. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said LeBaron has also spoken with Taya's chief of staff in Niger, where Taya's plane was diverted when news of the coup broke. "We intend to work with the African Union ... to restore constitutional rule in Mauritania."

When asked if that included continued support of Taya, Casey said, "The president is the head of the constitutional government in Mauritania."

Shops, businesses and the international airport reopened and traffic was flowing again in Mauritania's capital Thursday.

This sparsely populated nation on the northwestern edge of the Sahara had been strictly controlled by Taya, who had seized power in a coup and tried to legitimize his rule in the 1990s through elections the opposition says were fraudulent.

Taya dealt ruthlessly with those who opposed him. He had allied his overwhelmingly Muslim nation with the United States in the war on terror and with Israel.

The junta had indicated in statements Wednesday it planned no changes in foreign policy.

A Crucible In Turkey (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

EREGLI, Turkey - A fierce-looking banner strung between two trees in this hillside town on the Black Sea sums up how the locals here feel about the steel factory that is their principal employer: "Erdemir is our sweat," it proclaims. "Each of us would die for it."

Turkey recently put this state-controlled company, its biggest steel maker, on the auction block.

With 13 suitors lining up to bid, including firms from Russia, Britain and South Korea, Erdemir could become one of Turkey's most successful privatizations - a potent symbol of its economic progress as Turkey begins arduous negotiations this fall to join the European Union.

But first the sale has to happen.

The auction process has run into an unexpected surge of opposition from political leaders and business executives, who argue that privatizing the company is not necessary, given its profits.

Moreover, they add, Turkey cannot afford to surrender a strategic asset, especially when Europeans seem increasingly reluctant to admit the Turks into their club of nations.

DOJ_NMG_0002213

Then there are the factory's 7,500 workers, who fear they could lose their jobs under a foreign owner. Protests have erupted here and in other cities, as Erdemir has become a fraught symbol of Turkey's uneasy passage from its sheltered past into a free-market future.

"This is a real test for Turkey," said Metin Kilci, the president of the Turkish Privatization Administration, which hopes to sell Erdemir by the end of the year and follow it with sales of other state assets, including an insurance company, a sugar factory and the Istanbul Hilton.

The Turkish government has won kudos for stabilizing the economy, with the help of loans from the International Monetary Fund, after a deep crisis in 2001 brought this nation of 69 million to the brink of bankruptcy. Turkey's output grew nearly 9 percent last year, a pace that rivaled that of China.

The government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan is also credited with taming decades of sky-high inflation, which had turned Turkey's currency, the lira, into something close to funny money.

But the process of privatizing state-owned companies has been dogged for 20 years by legal challenges and political interference. As Turkey bids for a place in the European Union - a step the United States supports - it is eager to show its resolve to open its economy.

"We would be more than happy if a foreign company wins this tender," Mr. Kilci said in an interview in Ankara, the nation's capital.

Mr. Kilci expressed disappointment that the United States Steel Corporation was not on the initial list of potential bidders, and said he hoped it might join in later. U.S. Steel, based in Pittsburgh, owns factories in Slovakia and Serbia. A spokeswoman for the company declined to comment.

Analysts, however, said a sale to any foreign buyer could still be blocked. The chamber of commerce here has filed a suit opposing a sale. National opposition is robust and well organized. And there is a receptive audience for dark warnings about foreigners taking advantage of Turks. The dispute has been featured on the front pages for weeks.

"There's a Turkish saying, 'We serve foreigners the best meat - the lamb without the bones,' " said Cemal Senturk, who represents local manufacturers that buy steel plates from Erdemir.

Turkey's attitude toward outsiders has not been softened by the chilly reception it is getting these days in Europe. Although its campaign to join the union is still officially on track, with membership negotiations scheduled to start in early October, popular sentiment in Europe has turned noticeably against it.

Some of that is fueled by fears that low-cost Turkish workers will take European jobs. Some is linked to security concerns that have intensified since the London bombings: as a Muslim country, Turkey cannot escape the taint of radical Islamic militancy, even if it is a moderate secular society.

Politics reflects the popular mood. In Germany, Angela Merkel, a conservative leader who opposes Turkey's bid, is leading in polls six weeks before an election for chancellor. In France, the politician of the moment is Nicolas Sarkozy, the interior minister and would-be president, who has also expressed qualms about Turkey.

"The Turks are quite angry," said Katinka Barysch, the chief economist of the Center for European Reform, a research group in London, who recently wrote a report about Turkey. "They think, 'We've done so much for the E.U., now the E.U. needs to do something for us.' "

In the case of Erdemir and its steel operation, critics say Europe's biggest contribution would be to skim off the cream of its output.

The company currently supplies about one-third of Turkey's demand for flat steel, which is used to make ships, cars, machinery and household appliances. If a foreign buyer took over Erdemir, people here say the company would export the high-quality steel to Western Europe, forcing Turkish companies to switch to lower-quality steel imported from Ukraine or Kazakhstan.

"The foreigners are very profit-oriented," Mr. Senturk said. "Why would they care about the problems in Turkey?"

Twenty-three Turkish manufacturers that buy steel from Erdemir have banded together to submit their own bid for the company. But they face well-financed rivals, like Mittal Steel of London and Arcelor, based in Luxembourg, which are the world's two largest steel makers.

DOJ_NMG_0002214

Owning a steel plant in Turkey is attractive, analysts say, because the country has become a hub for auto manufacturing: Ford, Toyota, Renault and Fiat make cars here. Arcelor has ties to Renault, analysts say, and might like a Turkish factory to supply the local Renault plant.

More broadly, the global steel industry is ripe for consolidation. After two years of voracious demand, much of it driven by China's economy, analysts predict a sharp slowdown in sales, which could result in a surplus. Acquisitive giants like Mittal, which already owns 8.6 percent of Erdemir's shares, are seizing the chance to add to their holdings.

The Turkish government knows it has a brief window in which it can command a premium price. "Steel is a cyclical business," Mr. Kilci said. "In five years, it might be losing money again."

Erdemir was founded in 1960 and began production in 1965. It lost a total of $169 million from 2001 to 2002, which were difficult years for the steel industry, before rebounding with a profit of $261 million in 2003 and $473 million last year.

Although the Turkish state owns only 46 percent of Erdemir's shares, it controls the board and appoints senior management. Even those managers sounded dubious when asked why Turkey should sell it.

"That's the question I constantly keep asking," said A. Kerim Dervisoglu, who became the chief executive in 2003.

Mr. Dervisoglu trimmed the work force to 7,500 people, from 8,400. He upgraded the factory's two hot-rolling mills, which expanded their production capacity. And he began construction of a cavernous new mill, which will turn out large plates of steel suitable for shipbuilding.

On Tuesday, days after this interview, Erdemir announced that Mr. Dervisoglu had stepped down as chief executive because of poor health. Analysts in Istanbul said his exit most likely reflected his feelings about the sale.

The pressure to divest Erdemir is also driven by Turkey's parlous public finances. The Turkish government is running a budget deficit equivalent to 8 percent of its gross domestic product. The company, which is publicly traded, has a market capitalization of $2.5 billion. Given a premium for change of control, that implies Ankara could realize $1.5 billion for its stake.

Beyond that, privatizations are a handy way to attract foreign investors. Turkey lured only $1.2 billion in foreign direct investment last year, a paltry number for an economy of its size. Foreigners have been put off by the cumbersome regulations and, until recently, the gyrating economy.

While Erdemir is making money, some critics say its financial prowess has been wildly exaggerated.

"It's making a profit because the demand for steel is going crazy in places like China," said Ishak Alaton, the chairman of Alarko Holding, a conglomerate with interests in construction, fisheries and resort hotels. "If it were in private hands, it would make 10 times the profit."

Mr. Alaton said a cabal of government bureaucrats and business people was fomenting opposition to the sale of Erdemir out of a desire to maintain control of a lucrative asset.

The opportunities for corruption are easy to see. Mr. Kilci noted that Erdemir had always supplied the president of the privatization administration with a free car - in his case, an Audi A6. "After we privatize Erdemir, I'll have to switch to a Fiat," he said with a wry laugh.

Critics, however, say the government's headlong rush to sell a thriving company could weaken public support for future sales. "It gives the impression of being ideological rather than rational or economic," said Gunhan Karakullukcu, an economist and business consultant.

Here in Erdemir's hometown, the feelings are mostly personal. The company has built schools, movie theaters and sports centers for Eregli, and donated property for employees to build houses. It even sponsors an annual "love, peace and friendship" festival.

"This is not only financial," said Semsi Durdu, a Hyundai dealer who depends on the factory's workers for a good portion of his sales. "There's a lot of emotion attached to it."

Fox Admits Dim Results On Security (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado

The Dallas Morning News, August 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002215

MEXICO CITY – President Vicente Fox's office acknowledged Thursday that its anti-crime operation strategy hasn't produced the "results we expected, or wanted" and vowed to intensify the campaign in the days ahead.

The comments by presidential spokesman Ruben Aguilar were the first official confirmation that violence has worsened since Operation Safe Mexico began June 13, and they buttress concerns expressed by both U.S. and Mexican law enforcement officials of a sense of increased lawlessness. They point to escalating violence not just along the U.S.-Mexico border but also in the key states of Guerrero and Jalisco.

No details were offered on how Mr. Fox will beef up his campaign.

In Tampico, in the border state of Tamaulipas, Mr. Fox said the government's campaign will be "tough, difficult and long" and vowed to redouble efforts to return security to the streets of Nuevo Laredo and other cities affected by the drug war.

Meanwhile, law enforcement officials in Laredo remain on high alert.

"We thought that by having the Mexican military presence we would see violence in Nuevo Laredo subside," said Webb County Sheriff Rick Flores. "But the homicides have increased. Cops in Nuevo Laredo are dying. One of my deputies was met with fire [along the banks of the Rio Grande]. So this validates what we have been saying all along: The situation is serious and worsening. It's a time bomb, and if we don't address it now, it will come back to bite us in the rear because this stuff is spreading to our side, too."

Mr. Aguilar's comments come as the U.S. State Department, which has already issued three warnings to Americans venturing into Nuevo Laredo, wrestles with whether to reopen its consulate in Nuevo Laredo. Last Friday, U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza ordered the office shut, blaming increased violence.

Mr. Garza and Interior Secretary Carlos Abascal met for an hour Wednesday and decided that the consulate will reopen in the "days ahead," although no definite time frame was offered. An official in Washington said that Monday is "a likely day, if the situation warrants it."

"We're still reviewing security in Nuevo Laredo, and a decision on resuming normal operations has not been made," said another U.S. official, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

So far this year, more than 800 people have been killed nationwide as a result of a bloody drug war in which high-powered weapons, grenades and bazookas are used.

The state of Tamaulipas has reported 228 murders, with at least 106 people – including nearly 20 police officers – killed in Nuevo Laredo alone.

On Monday, Mexican police discovered the bodies of two men on a road outside Nuevo Laredo. One victim, identified as Horacio Diaz Garcia, had been shot 19 times. On his body was a written message to the Sinaloa cartel whose alleged leaders – Edgar Valdez Villarreal, alias "Barbie"; Joaquin "Chapo" Guzmán; and Arturo Beltran – are waging war with the Gulf cartel to take over the distribution route along Interstate 35.

The note read: "[Expletive] Barbie and Arturo Beltran, you won't take over, not even with the support of the Mexican special forces, not even by killing innocent people."

Papers Reveal British Aid For Israeli Nukes (WT/UPI)

By Hannah K. Strange, United Press International

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

LONDON -- Britain secretly sold Israel a key ingredient for its nuclear program in 1958, declassified documents have revealed.

Official government papers released by the British National Archives detail a deal to export 20 tons of heavy water for about $2.7 million. The ingredient was vital to plutonium production at the top-secret Dimona nuclear reactor in Israel's Negev desert.

The British government did not place any "peaceful use only" condition on the sale of the heavy water. "It would be somewhat overzealous for us to insist on safeguards," a civil servant explained.

Ministers in Prime Minister Harold Macmillan's government were unaware of the deal, which apparently was conducted entirely by civil servants. It also was kept secret from the Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0002216

In one of the documents, Foreign Office official Donald Cape concluded: "On the whole I would prefer not to mention this to the Americans."

When questioned by the British Broadcasting Corp., Mr. Cape said he could remember nothing about the episode.

Washington had refused Israeli requests to purchase heavy water without a guarantee that it would be used for exclusively peaceful purposes.

The heavy water was surplus from a consignment that Britain bought from Norway. Though shipped from a British port, it was presented as a deal between Israel and Norway.

Robert McNamara, who served as the U.S. secretary of defense from 1961 to 1968, said he was "astonished" by the cover-up.

"It is very surprising to me we were not told because we shared information about the nuclear bomb very closely with the British," he told the BBC.

By the time Israel requested more heavy water in 1961, the existence of the Dimona reactor had been exposed by the press, as had Israel's probable weapons program, and Britain refused a further sale, the documents reveal.

Hugh Stephenson of the Foreign Office wrote: "I am quite sure we should not agree to this sale. The Israeli project is much too live an issue for us to get mixed up in it again."

Israel has never acknowledged or denied having nuclear weapons, and has not conducted any public nuclear tests. It also has refused to sign the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Israel began showing an interest in acquiring nuclear weapons shortly after its creation in 1948, and formed the Israeli Atomic Energy Commission in 1952.

Construction of the Dimona facility began in the late 1950s, with France secretly providing assistance with reactor design and construction, according to Washington-based Web site GlobalSecurity.org.

In 1968, the CIA concluded that Israel had begun to produce nuclear weapons, but it wasn't until 1986 that the international community was afforded a glimpse of the true extent of the Israeli program.

Mordechai Vanunu, who had worked as a technician at Dimona, gave the Times of London detailed information about Israel's nuclear program, on the basis of which analysts concluded that Israel had up to 200 warheads. However before he could reveal more, he was trapped by the Israeli intelligence service Mossad and imprisoned for 18 years as a traitor.

The I.R.A.'s Gift Of Gab (NYT)

By Ed Moloney

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Most people in Northern Ireland, in the Irish Republic or among Irish-Americans hope that last week's statement by the Irish Republican Army ending its armed campaign against British rule of Northern Ireland and embracing only peaceful and democratic methods is truly the "step of unparalleled magnitude" that Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain claims to see.

Yet there are good reasons to be cautious. The I.R.A.'s words are welcome, but there's an old Irish saw applicable here, which says that fine words butter no parsnips. The I.R.A. and leaders of its political wing, Sinn Fein, like Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness, have made impressive, even dramatic promises in the past but subsequent deeds failed to match them.

Not only that, but the moves made by the I.R.A. last week were cost-free. The last shots fired in anger by the I.R.A. at British security forces were in the summer of 1997, and the reality is that its campaign against Britain has been over for years. Last week's statement was merely an admission of an already established fact.

Equally, Sinn Fein, and those among its leadership who double as I.R.A. leaders and commanders, have committed themselves before to peaceful and democratic methods. Indeed, Mr. Adams would not have been allowed into political talks in 1998 about Northern Ireland's future unless he had subscribed to principles embodying such a commitment.

In spite of that pledge, I.R.A. activity, albeit at a much lower level, persisted and pitched the Irish peace process into one crisis after another. A real sign of change would have been an announcement that the I.R.A. was disbanding, but that was absent from the statement, as was any pledge to end recruitment.

DOJ_NMG_0002217

The events that provoked last week's statement - the robbery of more than $50 million from a Belfast bank last December and the subsequent killing of a Belfast Catholic, Robert McCartney, by what are generally believed to be I.R.A. members - showed that the conventional test of I.R.A. sincerity, its willingness to disarm transparently, was made largely irrelevant. The I.R.A. didn't need tons of Semtex explosives or heavy machine guns to commit those crimes. All it needed was a few motivated members. The problem was not I.R.A. weapons but the I.R.A. itself.

The experience of the last 11 years of the Irish peace process is that continued I.R.A. activity has sapped the trust of the majority Protestant community and made its political leaders reluctant to enter into a power-sharing government with Sinn Fein in 1998.

But Sinn Fein has turned that to its electoral advantage, charging Protestants with bigotry, and seeking sympathy and solidarity from Catholics in both Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic. The result is that Sinn Fein is now the largest Catholic party in Northern Ireland and has seats in the London, Dublin, Belfast and European Parliaments. Final peace has been delayed for narrow political gain.

The I.R.A.'s refusal to begin disbanding is one big reason instability still exists. The Belfast bank robbery illustrated the way such instability can be fostered.

While the I.R.A.'s war against Britain has diminished during the last eight years, the organization's drift into racketeering has accelerated. Ian Pearson, a former security minister in Northern Ireland, recently called the I.R.A. "perhaps the most sophisticated organized criminal grouping" anywhere in Europe. Few experts expect such activity will cease because of last week's statement.

The criminality linked to groups like the I.R.A. is staggering. One recent British government report estimated that there were 140 paramiltary-associated criminal gangs, many with international connections, operating in an area that in terms of population is about the size of the Bronx. In 2002, the police confiscated more counterfeit currency and goods - CD's, DVD's, watches, clothes, software - in Northern Ireland than in all of Britain. Cigarette and gasoline smuggling, protection rackets, armed robberies and hijackings are rife.

The I.R.A.'s involvement in this illegal activity has produced a leadership cadre that has combined ruthless paramilitary activism with lucrative criminal sidelines. Figures with no visible means of support have in the last few years suddenly become property moguls and business owners with luxury vacation houses in Ireland and in foreign resorts.

The Bush administration's attempts to press both London and Dublin to act against these criminals have met with limited success. Suspicion is widespread that Mr. Blair and his counterpart in Dublin, Bertie Ahern, would rather leave that problem alone because they fear moving against paramilitary crime would cause discontent in I.R.A. ranks with Mr. Adams's stewardship.

There are other signs that in Britain and Ireland the political will to tackle this crime is lacking. A proposal by Ronald Goldstock, former director of New York State's Organized Crime Task Force, to introduce laws similar to those spelled out in United States' Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act was rejected by Mr. Blair's government. The authorities in Dublin and London have the power to confiscate criminal assets but have yet to use it against major I.R.A. figures.

Rooting out the forces behind paramilitary racketeering is not only the right thing to do, it is the sensible course as well. Pouring the necessary resources into pursuing these criminals would help remove a potential source of future instability in the peace process and convince skeptics that the influence of groups like the I.R.A. is on the wane. But failure to do so will turn last week's announcement into just another in a long line of false beginnings.

DOJ_NMG_0002218

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, AUGUST 5, 2005 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Al-Qaeda Vows More Attacks Against U.S., Britain (USAT) 4
Bush Defiant After New Terrorist Threats (WP) 4
Bush Stands Firm In Face Of Mounting Toll (WT)..... 5
Al-Qaeda Deputy Blames Blair For London Bombs (FT) 6
Al Qaeda's No. 2 Blames Blair, Issues Warning (WP) 7
Al Qaeda To West: It's About Policies (CSM)..... 9
Al-Qaida's No. 2 Threatens London, U.S. (KCS)..... 10
Video Messages Aim To Reassert Al-Qaeda Leadership (FT) ... 11
Unit That Lost 9 Men Wednesday 'was Like A Family' (USAT) .. 12
Confronting Their Losses, Ohio Families Are Shaken (NYT)..... 13
Clusters Of Casualties Strike Towns (USAT) 14
Deadly Attacks Put New Pressure On Bush (AJC/AP) 15
President: Tape Proves Iraq Part Of Terror War (DMN) 16
Terror War Strategies (WT) 16
America Has Two Choices In Iraq: Exit Or Success (FT) 17
Was Hiroshima Hell Or High-water Mark? (USAT)..... 18
GWOT That? (WSJ)..... 19
Maryland Man Tied To Terrorism Plot (NYT) 19
Md. Man Charged With Supporting Terrorist Group (BSUN) 20
Md. Man Accused Of Plot To Aid Terrorists (WP) 20
Md. Man Accused In Terrorist Support Plan (PHI) 21
Man Charged With Conspiring To Support Terror Group (NYNSDY)..... 21
NY Accuses Maryland Man Of Supporting Terror Group (REU). 22
Britain Goes On High Alert, Spurred By Hint Of Attack (NYT) 22
Londoners Use Public Transport Warily (LAT) 24
Two Women Charged In London Bomb Probe (AJC/AP) 25
Rumsfeld: London Attacks Not Retaliation (AJC/AP) 26
Muslim Edict Slammed For Not Condemning Al Qaeda (WT/AP)26
London's Bombs Go Off Inside America's Head (WSJ) 27
Qaeda On The Run? Raids Seem To Belie Pakistani's Word (NYT) 28
Pakistani Court Rules Against Islamic Bill (NYT)..... 30
Afghanistan's Forgotten War (NYT)..... 30
Tampa Prof Expressed 'Pride' In Suicide Bombing In Gaza Strip (BRAH)..... 31
Talks Centered On Payment To Jihad Members (TAMPTRIB) .. 31
Man Gets 3 Years For Sales Linked To Nuclear Arms (LAT) 31

Patriot Act:

NY Lawmakers Try Prying Anti-terror Dollars From Washington (AP)..... 33

Homeland Response:

Justice Department Effort To Eavesdrop On Airline Passengers Challenged (GOVEXEC) 33
Assessments Find Threat Of Suicide Attacks In U.S. (NYT)..... 34
US Military To Increase Domestic Surveillance (CSM) 35
Civil-liberties Board Struggles Into Existence (WP/REU) 36
Under 11th Circuit Ruling, Domestic Terror Acts Can Bring Stiffer Penalties (LAW) 37
'Safety Net' Group Created For Iranian-Americans (SFChron/AP) 38
Rights Groups Focus On Iranians (MERCN)..... 38
New York Police Sued Over Subway Searches (WP)..... 39
NYC Sued Over Police Subway Bag Searches (AJC/AP) 39
Homeland Security To Conduct Gas Tests In Midtown, Subways (NSDY)..... 40
Eight Charged In DMV Bribe Scheme (SFC) 41
8 Charged In DMV Bribery Scheme (BAYCITY) 42
2 Jailed In Immigration Papers Plot (VP)..... 42
Still Not Ready In The ER (WP)..... 43

War News:

U.S. Contends Campaign Has Cut Suicide Attacks (NYT) 44
U.S. Defends Operations In Western Iraq (NSDY/AP)..... 45
Battle For Control Of Western Iraq's Routes Escalates (FT)..... 46
U.S. Toll Rises By 4 In Iraq; Reserves Hit Hard In Recent Attacks (WP)..... 47
U.N. Condemns Attacks In Iraq As 'Horrific' (WT) 48
Iraq's Prime Minister Unveils Plan For Better Border Security (KRT) 48
Iraqi Women Urge U.S. To Protect Their Rights (WT) 49
The Enemy Of Hope (LAT)..... 50
Voice Of Experience (USAT) 51
Don't Tie Our Hands (USAT) 51
U.S. Plans To Transfer Afghan Prisoners (NYT/REU) 52
Afghanistan Agrees To Accept Detainees (WP)..... 52
Afghans Held At Guantanamo Will Be Sent To Home Country (USAT)..... 54

U.S. To Repatriate 110 Afghans Jailed At Guantanamo Bay (LAT) ... 54
Oil-for-Food Probe To Accuse Director (WP) ... 55
Report To Accuse Sevan Of Kickbacks (WT/AP) ... 56
Kickbacks Alleged In Oil-for-Food Probe (NYT/AP) ... 57
Cash Crunch Forces Army Base To Send Contract Workers Home (KRT) ... 58
Inside The Ring (WT) ... 59
Once-liberal Basra Trades Cultural Freedom For Security (KRT) 60
Clubs Provide A Getaway From Turmoil Of Baghdad (USAT) ... 62
A Future Beyond A Funeral (WP) ... 62
Pentagon Agrees To Issue Photos Of Coffins Of Iraq War Dead (NYT) ... 63
Lawsuit Forces Release Of More Casualty Images (WP) ... 64
Pentagon Web Site Bans Politics (WP) ... 64
NATO Will Be Ready In 2006 To Take Over From U.S. Forces In Afghanistan, General Says (NSDY/AP) ... 65

DOJ:

Deputy Attorney General Comey To Take Post At Lockheed Martin (WSJ) ... 66
Lockheed Names Justice Department's Comey To GC Post (AP) ... 66
U.S. Deputy AG Comey To Join Lockheed Martin (REU) ... 67

Corporate Scandals:

U.S. Probes Allegations Of Bribery At DaimlerChrysler (WSJ) ... 67
SEC Urges Judge To Let Scrushy Case Proceed (LAT/BLOOM) 68
Greenberg Fires Back At Directors (NYT) ... 69
Greenberg Defends AIG's Accounting, Rebuts Allegations (WSJ) ... 70
New SEC Chief Vows Agency Will Be 'Investors' Advocate' (WSJ) ... 70
New SEC Chief Vows To Reduce Jargon (FT) ... 71
Stock Options: Do They Make Bosses Cheat? (NYT) ... 71
Delphi Negotiates With GM, UAW About Big Revamp (WSJ) ... 72
Delayed Reaction At Morgan Stanley, Board Slowly Faced Its Purcell Problem (WSJ) ... 73
US Regulators Plan 1-Year Job Restriction On Bank Examiners (DOWJONES) ... 76

Criminal Law:

U.S. Indicts 2 In Case Of Divulged Secrets (WP) ... 76
Israel Lobbyists Facing Charges In Secrets Case (NYT) ... 77
Former Officials With Pro-Israel Group Indicted (KRT) ... 79
Two Charged In Pentagon Information Leak (AP) ... 80
Ex-lobby Group Workers Charged With Handing Over US Secrets (FT) ... 80
Pro-Israel Lobbyists Charged In US Pentagon Case (REU) ... 84
Former Pro-Israel Lobbyists Charged In Documents Case (Update2) (BLOOM) ... 81
3 Accused Of Disclosing Secrets On Mideast (USAT) ... 82
2 Lobbyists Indicted In Secrets Case (LAT) ... 83
Pro-Israel Lobbyists Charged With Disclosing U.S. Secrets (WT) 84
U.S. Charges Man In Camcorder - Piracy Crackdown (NYT/REU) ... 85
First Suspect Indicted Under Camcorder Law (HOLLYREP) ... 85
Man Is Charged Under New U.S. Film Piracy Law (LAT/BLOOM) ... 86
U.S. Ties Kickbacks To Park District Work (CHIT) ... 86
News Feds: Bribes Unlocked Parks Coffers (CHIST) ... 88
Ex-official At Chicago Parks Took Bribes-prosecutor (REU) ... 89
Ex-VA Employee Gets Prison Term In Bribery Case (BSUN) ... 89
2 Sentenced Over Fixing Of Tickets (NOTP) ... 90
Jurors For Gotti Trail Picked (NYNSDY) ... 90
Lawyers' Group To Weigh In On Reporter Confidentiality (SDUT) ... 91
Man Held In Idaho Abduction-murders Probed In 1997 Murder Of 10-year-old Calif. Boy (FINDLAW/AP) ... 92

Civil Law:

N.C. Wins Back 1789 Copy Of Bill Of Rights (NSDY/AP) ... 93
Seniors Group Sues Big Tobacco To Recover Money For Medicare (WSJ) ... 93

Civil Rights:

Calif. Youth Prison Head Removed For Force (AP) ... 94
Local Leaders Share Views With Federal Mediator (HAVREDN) 95
Racial Mediator Visits Havre (GFT) ... 96
Voting Rights Act: Renewal Of Good Faith (AJC) ... 97
40 Years Later, Black Electorate Still Has Long Way To Go (CLE/KRT) ... 99
For Miss. Town, Voting Law Helped (USAT) ... 101
EDITORIAL NOTEBOOK Keep The Voting Rights Act (AAS) ... 102
Repaying Segregation's Debt (WP) ... 102
Court Rules UT Can Block Dating E-Mails (FINDLAW/AP) ... 103
Leading Republican Differs With Bush On Evolution (WP/REU) 103
Design For Confusion (NYT) ... 104
Bill Easing Rules On Pill Is Vetoed By Pataki (NYT) ... 105
Pataki Vetoes Morning-After Pill Bill (AJC/AP) ... 105

Antitrust:

Lucent Subpoenaed In Antitrust Probe (WP/AP) ... 106
Lucent: Got Subpoenas Tied To Federal Probes (DOWJONES) 107
Lucent Gets Subpoenas (STREET) ... 107

Environment/Indian Affairs:

There's A $500 Energy-conservation Prize Waiting For You In The New Federal Energy Bill (KRT) ... 108
Too Much Pork And Too Little Sugar (NYT) ... 109
Indians Continue Wait For Accounts' Resolution (WP) ... 110

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Compton To Crack Down On Gangs, Officials Tell Forum (LAT) 111
The Cancer In Compton (LAT) ... 112
School Employees Charged In Drug Case (WT) ... 113
29 Charged In OxyContin Ring At School (FINDLAW/AP) ... 113
22 School Employees Arrested In OxyContin Scheme (MH) ... 114
22 Miami-Dade School Workers Face Charges For Selling Oxycodone (FLSUNSEN) ... 114
School Workers Charged In Drug Ring Bust (CNN.com) ... 115
Selig Renews Call For Tougher Rule On Steroids Users (NYT) 116
Selig Urges Acceptance Of Tougher Steroids Policy (USAT) ... 117

DOJ_NMG_0002220

Selig Calls For Stricter Tests (LAT) 117
Baseball, Palmeiro At Odds (BSUN) 118
Palmeiro Calls Off 3,000th Hit Ceremony (BSUN) 119
Steroids In Baseball: The Palmeiro Furor (5 Letters) (NYT)..... 119
Steroids Guesswork Raises Unintentional Questions (BSUN).. 120
Baseball's 'Live-Player' Era (WSJ)..... 121
National Forest Yields Record Pot Busts (WCAU-TV) 122
Bush Praises Colombia's Drug War (DMN)..... 122
Bush Welcomes Colombian Leader (Express-News) 125
Bush Vows To Sustain Aid For Colombia Drug War (REU)..... 124
Bush Welcomes Colombia's Uribe At Ranch (AP) 125
Uribe Proposes Buying Coca To Foil Drug Trade (WT) 126
Bush Warns Colombian Leader On Human Rights (LAT)..... 126
Colombia Warlords Testify About Congress "friends" (REU) 127
KKK Member Pleads Guilty On Making Pipe Bombs To Blow Up Hispanics (CHATT)..... 128
Ex-Klansman Pleads Guilty In Bomb Building (NYT/AP) 128
Church Fire Ruled Arson (WTVF-TV)..... 128

Immigration:

DeLay Criticizes Houston's Policy On Illegal Immigrants (HC).. 129
DeLay Pushes Border Security, Sales Tax (GalvestonNews)... 130
Border Vigil To Stand Until New Agents Hired (WT) 130
Day-Laborer Site Rebuffed (WP)..... 131
Illegal Immigrants, Long Islanders Clash (NYT/AP) 132
A Strategy On Border Security (DCExaminer) 133
Rep. Culberson's Call For Armed State Militias On The Border Is A Reckless Approach To Dangerous Problem. (HC)..... 134
A Serious Stop Sign (TOWNHALL) 134

Tax:

Colts Neck Man Convicted Of Tax Evasion (APP)..... 135
KPMG Confident Of Avoiding Tax Trial (FT) 136

Congress-Administration:

Court Nominee Advised Group On Gay Rights (NYT) 137
Partisans Are Unsure About Roberts' Work On Gays' Case (LAT) 138
In Private Practice, Roberts's Record Is Mixed (WP) 140
Documents Indicate Roberts Isn't Always Predictably Conservative (KRT) 141
Roberts' Solicitor General Record Gives Clues To Views (LAT)142
GOP To Make Push For Roberts (WT) 144
Women's Groups Try To Rally For Court Fight (WSJ) 145
Groups Step Up Advertising On Roberts Nomination To High Court (BLOOM)..... 146
Judge Roberts's Memos (WP)..... 147
Rehnquist Fever Stirs Up Speculation About Retirement (WT) 148
Rehnquist Treated For Fever (NYT)..... 149
Rehnquist Has Brief Hospital Stay (WP) 149
Bush's Loyalty Raises Doubts About His Political Judgment (KRT) 150
How Bush Thinks: Intuition Over Intellect (LAT)..... 151
Philip Stephens: From Acrimony To Misunderstanding (FT)..... 152
Foreign Policy? Just Get Tips From The Cabby (NYT)..... 153
Democrats See Advantages In Unconventional Candidates (WSJ) 154
White House Broadens New Fed Chief Search (DMN)..... 155
Cell Lines, Moral Lines (WP) 155
Ignorance Is Bliss; Sometimes It's Policy (WP) 156
Crossing The Stem Cell Line (LAT) 157
The Duplicate Dog (NYT)..... 158
G.O.P. Wants More Details Of Corzine Aid (NYT) 158
Senator Defends Loan To Union Official (WP/AP) 159
Inside Politics (WT) 160
NASA Rules Out A Fourth Spacewalk To Repair Shuttle (NYT)161
Discovery Gets An All-Clear To Return Next Week (WP)..... 162
Scrutiny Of Moonlighting Scientists Criticized (LAT) 163

Other News:

Schwarzenegger To Return Gambling Group Donation (WSJ/AP) 164
Offer By Europe Would Give Iran Nuclear Future (NYT) 164
Tehran Defiance Spells Collapse Of Nuclear Talks (FT)..... 166
Why Pressing Iran Over Nukes Is A Difficult Road (CSM) 167
Revolutionaries Come Of Age (WSJ) 168
Graphic Novelist Marjane Satrapi On The Life Of A Writer In Exile (WSJ) 169
Multiparty Talks With North Korea Nearing Collapse (WSJ) 170
N. Korea Talks Near Impasse, But Will Go On (WP) 171
Nuclear Explosion (WSJ) 171
Jewish Settler Kills Four Israeli Arabs In Attack On Bus (WP).. 173
Jewish Militant Opens Fire On Bus Of Israeli Arabs, Killing 4 (NYT) 174
Israeli Deserter Kills Four On Bus (WT) 175
Jewish Extremist Opens Fire Inside Bus (KCS) 176
Israeli Soldier Kills 4 Arabs Aboard Bus (USAT) 177
Army Deserter Kills 4 Israeli Arabs On Bus, Gets Beaten To Death (KRT)..... 178
Gaza Pullout Tests Limit Of Dissent (CSM)..... 179
Palestinian Troops Face Biggest Test During Pullout (USAT).. 180
China Restricts News Of Cnooc Bid (WSJ)..... 181
Notable & Quotable (WSJ)..... 182
Aggressive Search By Cnooc For New Oil And Gas Seen (NYT)182
Niger's Anguish Is Reflected In Its Dying Children (NYT)..... 183
Hunger Reaches Crisis Level In Niger (LAT)..... 185
In Tense Sudan, Divisions Resurface (WP) 186
Sudan Rebel Leader Is Mourned As Widow Appeals For Calm (NYT) 187
After John Garang (WP) 188
Coup May Alter Mauritania's U.S. Ties (WSJ)..... 189
Thousands Back Junta In Mauritania (NYT/AP)..... 189
A Crucible In Turkey (NYT)..... 190
Fox Admits Dim Results On Security (DMN)..... 192
Papers Reveal British Aid For Israeli Nukes (WT/UPI)..... 193
The I.R.A.'s Gift Of Gab (NYT) 193

DOJ_NMG_0002221

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al-Qaeda Vows More Attacks Against U.S., Britain (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — Great Britain and the United States must leave Iraq immediately or face more terrorist attacks, al-Qaeda's No. 2 man said on a videotape broadcast on an Arab satellite network Thursday.

On the tape, broadcast on Al-Jazeera, Ayman al-Zawahiri, deputy to al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, jabbed his finger at the camera and promised more violent attacks as long as U.S., British and other non-Muslim forces remain in Iraq. The message came one month after terrorists linked to al-Qaeda bombed three subway trains and a bus in London on July 7. The attacks killed 52 people and the four bombers.

"Our message to you is clear, strong and final: There will be no salvation until you withdraw from our land, stop stealing our oil and resources and end support for infidel, corrupt rulers," Zawahiri said. The last remark was probably a reference to the Saudi royal family, long a target of al-Qaeda attacks, and to the newly elected and Shiite-dominated government in Iraq, which is fighting al-Qaeda allies mounting a violent insurgency.

U.S. intelligence, though still conducting voice analysis, has determined the tape was recorded recently and is genuine, CIA spokesman Paul Gimigliano said.

In an unusual move, President Bush responded directly to the broadcast. He called Zawahiri an apostle of an "ideology that is dark, dim and backwards."

In London, about 6,000 police officers conducted a massive security sweep on streets and in the subway system. Deputy Chief Constable Andy Trotter said police were not responding to a specific terrorist threat but seeking to reassure the public it was safe to travel.

The tape is "good propaganda" for military Islamists, said terrorism expert Brian Jenkins of the RAND Corp. think tank. He said al-Qaeda doesn't expect the United States to withdraw from Iraq.

Instead, Jenkins said, the tape is meant to tell Muslim audiences al-Qaeda is "still here. We are still running things."

Gimigliano said Zawahiri's tape follows an al-Qaeda pattern of issuing videotaped statements after terrorist attacks. "They're identifying with success and hoping to inspire more," Gimigliano said. This was the third videotape from Zawahiri this year. He appeared somewhat grayer than in previous tapes. He issued an audiotape in February.

Zawahiri's reference to the London attacks indicates the tape was made in the past month. Taahir Hoorzook from the Qatar-based Al-Jazeera told the Associated Press that the tape appeared at one of the network's offices, but he didn't specify which one.

In the excerpts aired by Al-Jazeera, Zawahiri sat in sunlight before a tan cloth background. He said future attacks would dwarf those of the past, a threat al-Qaeda has made before. He indicated the focus will be on domestic targets, including more in London, as well as against U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan.

A major question confronting Western intelligence is whether Zawahiri and bin Laden are calling the shots on terrorist attacks or merely taking credit after the fact for the actions of loosely affiliated terrorist groups. Ben Venski of the think tank IntelCenter, which closely tracks al-Qaeda statements, said it would be foolish to assume al-Qaeda is not directing attacks. RAND's Jenkins said that if al-Qaeda can get propaganda tapes into the hands of Al-Jazeera, it can probably also communicate secretly with its own operatives.

Future attacks, Zawahiri said, "will make you forget the horrible things in Vietnam and Afghanistan." The Egyptian doctor demanded "immediate withdrawal" from Iraq and said if forces remained, they would suffer "tens of thousands of dead, and double that figure in disabled and wounded."

Bush Defiant After New Terrorist Threats (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Tex. -- President Bush said Thursday that the United States will not be bullied by this week's killings of 25 service members in Iraq or what he called the "dark, dim, backwards" views propagated by al Qaeda's number two commander, Ayman Zawahiri, and other terrorists.

Speaking shortly after Zawahiri broadcast a new taped warning that the United States and its allies would suffer thousands of deaths if it did not pull out of Iraq, Bush struck a defiant tone, saying the United States will stay on the offensive to "complete the job in Iraq." He spoke dismissively of Zawahiri, his followers and their ideology and said the twin U.S. strategies to defeat terrorists inside and outside Iraq are working.

DOJ_NMG_0002222

"We owe it to the American people, and other freedom-loving countries, to bring these killers to justice," Bush said in a news conference at his ranch here, where he met with Colombian President Alvaro Uribe. Terrorism was at the top of their agenda.

Bush, who hoped to turn attention to his domestic agenda this month, once again found himself consoling families, defending the war and insisting the United States will not reduce troop levels until it is clear the Iraqi army is strong enough to fend off the insurgents.

Some administration officials have been urging Bush to adopt a new language on terrorism, putting less emphasis on terms like "war" and more on the idea that the United States and allies are engaged in a long-term ideological struggle to push the Islamic world toward a peaceful and democratic future. On Thursday, however, Bush did not temper his words as he denounced "killers" intent on imposing "their dark vision on the world."

For the second straight day, Bush paid tribute to the 21 U.S. Marines from an Ohio regiment who were killed this week in combat, 14 of whom were blown up by a powerful roadside bomb on Wednesday. The people of Brook Park, where many of the soldiers were from, "have suffered mightily over the last couple of days," he said. The overall U.S. death toll topped 1,800 this week. "We're laying the foundation for peace for generations to come," Bush said. A new Associated Press-Ipsos poll shows approval for Bush's handling of Iraq at its lowest level yet -- 38 percent.

One week after a top U.S. commander suggested U.S. troops might begin to pull out next year if sufficient progress is made toward creating a new government and Iraqi military, Bush said the drawdown will begin "as soon as possible" but did not affix a timetable for such action.

In the short news conference, Bush also said he was confident that NASA officials would make wise decisions in bringing the Discovery space shuttle mission to a safe and successful conclusion. It's "important for the American people to understand, that, one, exploration is important; two, there will be some good coming out of exploration; and, three, that we've got a new vision embraced by NASA and its pioneers," he said. The rest of Bush's day was spent on his ranch, where he played host to Uribe for private talks and a family lunch.

Uribe faces his own terrorist threat at home, one that is jeopardizing the stability of both Colombia's government and its economic markets. He came to Crawford looking for a political lift and continued assistance from the United States. "The great enemy of Colombian democracy is terrorism," Uribe said.

Uribe's government is at war with rebels, funded largely by the drug trade, who have kidnapped and killed thousands of people in an attempt to impose a Marxist-style ideology in Colombia. In their private meeting, Bush said, they talked about terrorism, trade and human rights. Like U.S. relations with many nations involved in the war on terror, the relationship with Colombia is complicated by charges that the Uribe government encourages -- or turns a blind eye to -- abuses against its people and the spirit of democracy. "This was discussed with great seriousness and with great respect," Uribe said.

In the days leading up to Bush and Uribe's meeting, Amnesty International and other human rights groups challenged Bush to demand Uribe address questions about government collusion with paramilitary groups and provide impartial investigations of human rights violations.

The State Department announced this week that Colombia has met the human right standards required to receive U.S. financial assistance. The United States has provided more than $3 billion in assistance to Colombia over the past five years to help the government clamp down on cocaine and heroin production and defeat the leftist insurgency. About 25 percent of U.S. aid is conditioned on meeting human rights standards.

Of his talks with Uribe, Bush said: "I listened intensely and believe that he is interested in following through . . . so that the world will hear loud and clear that Colombia is a nation of law and human rights and human dignity."

Human rights advocates were distressed, criticizing Bush for being too credulous toward his visitor. "President Bush betrays his stated commitment to uphold human rights when he accepts President Uribe's rhetoric at face value," William F. Schulz, executive director of Amnesty International USA, said in a statement.

Bush Stands Firm In Face Of Mounting Toll (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas -- President Bush yesterday vowed that America will not be swayed by a surge in U.S. deaths in Iraq or a new threat from a top al Qaeda leader who warns that the United States will suffer tens of thousands of military dead if it does not withdraw.

DOJ_NMG_0002223

"We will stay on the offense against these people," the president said of the comments by Ayman al-Zawahri, al Qaeda's second in command. "They're terrorists and they're killers and they will kill innocent people ... so they can impose their dark vision on the world," Mr. Bush said as he stood alongside Colombian President Alvaro Uribe.

Al-Zawahri -- who Mr. Bush said was "part of the team that attacked us" on September 11, 2001 -- yesterday warned Britain and the United States of more attacks in a new videotape shown on Al Jazeera television and rebroadcast around the world.

"These policies [of British Prime Minister Tony Blair] will bring them more destruction after the explosions of London," al-Zawahri said, four weeks to the day after 52 persons were killed by four suicide attackers in transport bombings.

Al-Zawahri demanded that "all the infidel armies withdraw from the land of Muhammad," accused the U.S. and its allies of "stealing our oil and wealth," and compared the military situation in Afghanistan and Iraq to the war in Vietnam.

"If you go on with the same policy of aggression against Muslims, you will see, God willing, what will make you forget the horrible things in Vietnam," he said.

But Mr. Bush vowed to "stay the course" in Iraq.

"We owe it to the American people and other freedom-loving countries to bring these killers to justice," he told reporters at his Texas ranch.

Mr. Bush said al Qaeda's "goal is to drive us out of the broader Middle East."

"The comments by the number two man of al Qaeda make it clear Iraq is a part of this war on terror, and we're at war. He's saying, you know, leave ... as I have told the American people, the people like Zawahri have an ideology that is dark, dim, backwards," Mr. Bush said. "He's threatening. They have come up against a nation that will defend itself."

The president said he will not give in to "thugs" because "we've had these kinds of clashes before and we have prevailed."

"We have prevailed because we're right, we have prevailed because we adhere to a hopeful philosophy, and we have prevailed because we would not falter," he said.

Mr. Bush invited the Colombian president to his ranch -- the 14th world leader to be bestowed such an honor -- to talk about terrorism and the problem of narcotics trafficking, which funds many terror cells.

Mr. Uribe said that both he and Mr. Bush consider the war against international terrorism a top priority of both their countries.

"The great enemy of Colombian democracy is terrorism ... and our great partner in defeating it has been the government and people of the United States," he said in Spanish. "U.S. cooperation has been exemplary. It has gone beyond rhetoric. ... All democratic countries should know that."

Mr. Bush vowed continued U.S. aid to help Colombia fight narco-terrorism and to allow the country to continue to build its budding economy. "America will continue to stand with the people of Colombia," he said.

Their meeting came just a day after the State Department announced Colombia has met human rights standards needed to qualify for full funding of future U.S. assistance programs.

During a short question-and-answer session with reporters, Mr. Bush also paid tribute to Marines who died over the past few days in bombings in Iraq, including a community from near Columbus, Ohio, which suffered more than 20 dead.

He said that the community of Brook Park "suffered mightily in the last couple of days. ... I hope they can take comfort in the fact that millions of their fellow citizens pray for them."

Mr. Bush also reminded Americans that there has been progress in Iraq, where 8 million people risked their lives in January to vote in free elections "in the face of Zawahris and Zarqawis and these killers."

He reiterated his plan to bring U.S. troops home "as soon as possible," which he said "means when those Iraqis are prepared to fight."

"As Iraq stands up, our coalition will stand down. The Iraqis want to live in a free society. Zawahri doesn't want them to live in a free society. And that's the clash of ideologies -- freedom versus tyranny," he said.

Al-Qaeda Deputy Blames Blair For London Bombs (FT)

By Peter Spiegel And Ft Reporters

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

The UK's support for the US-led occupation of Iraq is the reason for the recent bombing campaign in London, according to a video issued on Thursday by Al-Qaeda's second in command, Ayman al-Zawahiri.

The deputy leader of Al-Qaeda blamed Tony Blair, UK prime minister, for the attacks and threatened that more would follow.

"Blair has brought to you destruction in central London and there will more of that, God willing," Mr al-Zawahiri said.

DOJ_NMG_0002224

Four weeks to the day after the first deadly London bombs, Osama bin Laden's deputy made his remarks in video footage aired on the pan-Arab television station al-Jazeera.

Mr Al-Zawahiri, an Egyptian, also warned the US of further attacks, saying the horrors would be worse than Vietnam.

"As for you, the Americans, what you have seen in New York and Washington, what losses that you see in Afghanistan and Iraq, despite the media blackout, is merely the losses of the initial clashes,'' he said. "If you go on with the same policy of aggression against Muslims, you will see, with God's will, what will make you forget the horrible things in Vietnam and Afghanistan."

President George W. Bush dismissed the threats, saying the US would "complete the job" in Iraq.

"The comments by the number two man of al-Qaeda make it clear Iraq is a part of this war on terror, and we're at war," he said at his ranch in Crawford, Texas. "People like Zawahiri have an ideology that is dark, dim, backwards."

Mr Al-Zawahiri said Osama bin Laden had offered a truce to Western countries, asking them to pull out their armies from Iraq and Afghanistan in order to live in peace.

"To the people of the crusader coalition ... our blessed Sheikh Osama has offered you a truce so that you leave Muslim land. As he said you will not dream of security until we live it as a reality in Palestine and until all your infidel armies leave Prophet Mohammad's lands," he said.

"Our message to you is clear, strong and final: there will be no salvation until you withdraw from our land, stop stealing our oil and resources and end support for infidel [Arab] rulers," Mr Al-Zawahiri added.

Al-Qaeda has increasingly used the Iraq campaign as a lightning rod for its followers in video and audio tapes issued to the news media. In December, Mr bin Laden released a tape endorsing the insurgency and its suspected leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who Mr bin Laden dubbed the "imir" of the al-Qaeda organisation "in the land of the two rivers."

The new tape by al-Zawahiri also follows a recent trend by al-Qaeda's senior leadership to attempt to influence internal politics of countries involved in Iraq. In November, just days ahead of the US presidential election, Mr bin Laden issued a video tape blaming George W. Bush and the US government for provoking terrorist attacks against the west.

"[American policy] means the throwing of millions of pounds of bombs and explosives at millions of children in Iraq, as Bush junior did, in order to remove an old agent and replace him with a new puppet to assist in the pilfering of Iraq's oil and other outrages," Mr bin Laden said in the November tape.

"Is defending oneself, and punishing the aggressor in kind, objectionable terrorism? If it is such, then it is unavoidable for us."

In addition, the March 11, 2004 bombings in Madrid occurred just days before the Spanish election; at the time, Spain had thousands of troops in Iraq.

Despite the attempts by al-Qaeda's leadership to maintain a high profile, however, it is not clear whether recent bombing campaigns in Western countries are directly linked to the shadowy organisation.

Italian police investigating Hamdi Issac, the Ethiopian-born Briton who was arrested in Rome and is suspected of involvement in the July 21 attempted bombings, suggested that Mr Issac and the other bombers were probably unconnected to any larger terrorism network, raising the possibility that there is a new breed of Islamic militants that has no link to al-Qaeda structures.

US intelligence says the senior leadership group surrounding Osama bin Laden remains isolated, unable to direct or to commission specific attacks on western targets. However, experts and officials believe that Mr bin Laden and his deputy may be using audio and video tapes to radicalise western Muslims in targeted countries.

Despite mounting evidence that a majority of Britons see a link between the bombs and British policy in the Middle East and Afghanistan, Mr Blair has insisted that the occupation of Iraq is no "justification" for terrorism.

Mr al-Zawahiri's video statement on Thursday came on a day when police again flooded the UK capital to reassure Londoners.

Al Qaeda's No. 2 Blames Blair, Issues Warning (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

LONDON, Aug. 4 -- Al Qaeda's second-in-command said in a video statement Thursday that the London transit bombings were retribution for British military intervention in Muslim countries and warned of "more destruction" if Britain doesn't withdraw. He also threatened new attacks on Americans.

The statement from Ayman Zawahiri was issued on a day in which London commuters rode trains and buses amid some of the tightest security since World War II, due to fears of a repeat of the attacks of July 7 and 21. No attack occurred. Instead, the four-week anniversary of the July 7 explosions brought the first statement clearly from al Qaeda about the violence.

DOJ_NMG_0002225

Prime Minister Tony Blair "has brought you destruction in central London and, God willing, will bring more destruction," Zawahiri said, addressing the "English people" in a statement broadcast on the al-Jazeera satellite television channel.

"Our message to you is crystal clear: Your salvation will only come in your withdrawal from our land, in stopping the robbing of our oil and resources, and in stopping your support for the corrupt and corrupting leaders."

Officials at the prime minister's Downing Street office provided no comment. Blair has previously rejected claims that the transit bombings were a result of Britain's role in the Iraq war, and politicians across the spectrum have stood by him.

Zawahiri, wearing a white tunic and black turban and posed next to a rifle, did not directly assert al Qaeda's responsibility for the attacks. But he said that since Britons "shed rivers of blood in our land, we exploded volcanoes of anger in your land."

His statement accused U.S. leaders of concealing from Americans that "there is no exit from Iraq except in immediate withdrawal." He called the casualties of Sept. 11, 2001, "merely the losses from the initial clashes."

President Bush, speaking in Crawford, Tex., said that the comments "make it clear Iraq is a part of this war on terror, and we're at war. He's saying, you know, leave. . . . People like Zawahiri have a ideology that is dark, dim, backwards. He's threatening. They have come up against a nation that will defend itself."

British police are questioning at least 17 people in connection with the attacks of July 21, including four men suspected of carrying bombs onto three subway trains and a double-decker bus. Those bombs failed to explode, but startled Londoners into thinking that the July 7 explosions, in which four presumed bombers and 52 other people died, might have been the beginning of a coordinated campaign of violence.

Investigators are attempting to determine if the bombers in the two plots were linked or directed by al Qaeda or some other international group.

"I tend to think it's not al Qaeda-linked, but it's al Qaeda-inspired," said Rime Allaf, a Middle East specialist at Chatham House, a private foreign affairs research center in London. "Al Qaeda's not shy about claiming responsibility."

Zawahiri has issued three previous statements this year by audio or video recording. The CIA and the National Counterterrorism Center were studying the latest, and U.S. officials said it appeared to be authentic. It differs from the past three videos in that Zawahiri wears a black turban rather than a white one and appears to be outside in front of a light-colored cloth rather than in a studio-like setting.

Christopher Blanchard, an analyst who has closely followed al Qaeda's public statements at the Congressional Research Service, called the tape an example of "pragmatic messianism" by Zawahiri. "Al Qaeda's fractured leadership apparently continues to believe that it can undermine support for current U.S. policies by directly addressing and threatening the American people," he said.

The first person to be charged in the bombings was ordered by a London judge Thursday to be held in custody until a hearing on Aug. 11. Ismael Abdurahman, 23, is charged with withholding information from police about one of the suspects in the July 21 attacks.

On Thursday, police charged two London sisters with similar offenses.

In New York on Wednesday evening, Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly told a gathering of business leaders that the bombs were made of easily obtained ingredients, the Associated Press reported. "It's . . . like these terrorists went to a hardware store or some beauty supply store," Kelly said.

Kelly said the bombers transported the bombs in beverage coolers to keep them from degrading, and that the bombs were probably detonated by cell phone alarms. Kelly said the information came from New York detectives who went to London to monitor the investigation.

London police were on extremely high alert Thursday, fearing that other bombers might follow an established pattern. The July 21 attacks occurred exactly two weeks after the July 7 bombings, and Thursday was two weeks after the second attack. Police were stationed at most subway entrances around the city, and public address systems on subway cars repeatedly warned passengers to be vigilant and report suspicious packages or people.

Thursday also marked the first time London's subway was operating at full capacity since the first bombs exploded during morning rush hour on July 7.

In interviews, many subway riders said they were not afraid. "You're more likely to get run over by a bus than to be killed in a terror attack," said Rob Parker, 36, a management consultant catching a train at the St. James's Park subway station. He said the al Qaeda tape was worrisome, but he would not alter his commuting routine because of it.

He did not hold the British government responsible for provoking the violence. "At the end of the day, we're a democracy and we voted to put people in office and make decisions," Parker said. "No one has a crystal ball. I thought that the Iraq war was the right thing to do."

DOJ_NMG_0002226

London pollster and political analyst Stephen Shakespeare said the al Qaeda warning would probably boost Blair's political standing, which has already been helped by the government's firm, organized response to the bombings and a wave of national solidarity in the face of attack. The message will undermine critics who say he has overstated the threat, Shakespeare said.

The potential effect on Britain's 1.6 million Muslims is less clear. Shakespeare said his organization's recent polls show that while most feel loyal to Britain, about a third of Muslims polled feel a "divided loyalty" and 5 or 6 percent support the bombings.

Inayat Bunglawala, spokesman for the Muslim Council of Britain, a coalition of moderate Muslim groups, said the tape was probably intended to "incite others to go from being disaffected to taking up bombs."

"But I don't think it will contribute to that," he said. "What will contribute is the policies our country has been engaged in. We have always viewed Iraq as a disaster area for our country. . . . The solution is to remove the sources of anger among Muslim youth."

But Allaf, the Middle East specialist, said she believed the tape would add to the radicalization of Muslim youth in Britain. The most notable aspect of Zawahiri's address, she said, was that it was "logical and lucid" and would appeal to a wider audience than the rhetoric of "crazy mullahs."

Al Qaeda To West: It's About Policies (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, August 5, 2005

BAGHDAD - With an AK-47 at his side, Ayman al-Zawahiri, Al Qaeda's No. 2, appeared in a videotape broadcast Thursday and claimed that the 7/7 bombings were payback for British participation in America's "policy of aggression against Muslims."

The video is another Al Qaeda message apparently intended to turn Western democracies against their leaders by explaining acts of terrorism as rational decisions from a group with specific political goals. It challenges the position of British Prime Minister Tony Blair and Bush administration officials, who have insisted that the London attacks have nothing to do with Iraq and that terror attacks will continue regardless of policy.

"By linking the bombings to Iraq, he basically sent the message that no matter what Blair says, Iraq is the reason," says Bob Ayers, a counterterrorism expert at Chatham House, a think tank in London. "He's calling Blair a liar."

This latest tape was released on a day when an unprecedented police security operation was under way in London.

While Mr. Zawahiri didn't directly take credit for the London attacks, he promised more attacks on Britain, the US, and other allies, saying "tens of thousands" more American troops will be killed in Iraq if there isn't an immediate withdrawal.

It was one of three taped statements, all aired on Al Jazeera, that Zawahiri has made since the end of February, a pattern of rising communication from the Al Qaeda leaders that appears to belie statements from Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf that Osama bin Laden and his aides are on the run.

Zawahiri, an Egyptian exile whose terrorist career began at home and who hates the Egyptian regime of Hosni Mubarak, did not mention the terrorist attack on Egypt's resort town of Sharm el-Sheikh on July 23. The omission, analysts speculate, suggests the tape was made before the Sharm attacks, and the second subway attacks in London.

While some of his audio and video tapes seem generally targeted at mobilizing Al Qaeda's "base," filled with Islamic illusions and glorification of martyrs designed to reassure adherents and draw new members, this communication from Al Qaeda's chief ideologue falls into a category of tapes that targets primarily a Western audience.

Rather than casting his jihad as an inevitable clash of civilizations, he frames acts of terrorism as justified by the US-led wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and offers to end attacks on the West if a full withdrawal is made from "Muslim lands."

"Blair has brought to you destruction in central London, and he will bring you more destruction, God willing," Zawahiri said, addressing the British people.

"As for you Americans, what you have seen in New York and Washington, what losses you see in Afghanistan and Iraq, despite the media blackout, are merely the losses of the initial clashes," he said. "If you go on with the same policy of aggression against Muslims, you will see, God willing, things that will make you forget the horrors of Vietnam and Afghanistan."

"To the people of the crusader coalition ... our blessed Sheikh Osama has offered you a truce so that you leave Muslim land. As he said you will not dream of security until we live it as a reality in Palestine," he said. "Our message to you is clear, strong and final: There will be no salvation until you withdraw from our land, stop stealing our oil and resources and end support for infidel [Arab] rulers."

Analysts cautioned that Zawahiri's statement is not evidence of direct Al Qaeda knowledge of the London attacks, and said it probably fits into Al Qaeda's evolution into an ideological motivator, rather than organizer, of attacks.

"Such messages are usually a call-to-arms, sort of top-down guidance to go forth and do your thing," says Ayers. He says while Al Qaeda was "tightly organized" before the invasion of Afghanistan, the dispersal of members since has left a "confederation of groups that adhere to the same fundamental principles.... essentially they are functionally autonomous groups."

DOJ_NMG_0002227

Magnus Ranstorp, a terrorism expert at St. Andrews University in Scotland, agrees. "This is more of him rallying the troops - giving the green light to carry out attacks.... Here we have a clarion call to action. It is serving as an inspiration for like-minded extremists."

Some analysts, though, see it as an oblique claim of responsibility. "In many ways, this videotape can almost be seen as a claim of responsibility, bin Laden style," says Evan Kohlmann, a terrorism expert and author in New York. "When Al Qaeda is responsible for a big operation like the embassy bombings, 9/11, or London, it is much more characteristic for them to issue a statement such as this one, hinting at Al Qaeda involvement without removing that shadowy mystical aura that Al Qaeda leaders love to propagate."

Both Messrs. Kohlmann and Ranstorp point out that Zawahiri tapes are frequently followed by new attacks. "Zawahiri's latest ode may once again herald renewed terrorist violence. Even beyond the West, countries like Saudi Arabia, the UAE, Kuwait, and Pakistan are steeling themselves for possible future strikes," says Kohlmann.

The coordinated bombings of Madrid's train system in March 2004, which killed more than 200 people, came just days before elections in Spain that brought to power Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero, who had vowed to pull Spanish troops from the US coalition in Iraq. Though it's not clear whether that attack swayed voters enough to alter the result of the election, it's seen that way on jihadi websites.

US intelligence analysts say it's likely that bin Laden and Zawahiri are living in the mountains along the lawless border between Pakistan and Afghanistan, something that President Musharraf appeared to confirm at a press conference last month. He said Pakistani troops in the Waziristan region had obliterated Al Qaeda's "command and communications" infrastructure, and said the group is now relying on couriers who take "months" to carry messages out of the region.

But this video was recorded since the first London attack, less than a month ago. It shows Zawahiri sitting on the ground, outside, with a brown backdrop. "It is also a reminder that the US has failed in its mission to bring the ultimate mastermind to justice," says Ranstorp.

Ranstorp notes that Zawahiri has made repeated threats against Pakistan. "There is a duality to the message," he says. "There's the focus of making Iraq like Vietnam for the Americans, but there's also a threat to Pakistan. It could accelerate the confrontation between Musharraf and the the extremist religious elements."

Al-Qaida's No. 2 Threatens London, U.S. (KCS)

By Steven R. Hurst

The Kansas City Star, August 5, 2005

CAIRO, Egypt - Al-Qaida's No. 2 embraced the London suicide bombings Thursday, warned Britain that more destruction lies ahead and promised tens of thousands of U.S. casualties in Iraq in a brazen assertion of the terror group's global reach.

Ayman al-Zawahri also renewed terror threats to other countries with troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, claiming they had shunned Osama bin Laden's offer last year of a truce if foreign forces left the battleground.

In the tape, parts of which were broadcast by Al-Jazeera, al-Zawahri made no direct claim that al-Qaida carried out the July 7 attacks in the British capital, but sought instead to blame the carnage on Prime Minister Tony Blair's decision to deploy and keep troops in Iraq. Britain maintains 8,500 forces mainly in southern Iraq.

"Blair has brought to you destruction in central London, and he will bring more of that, God willing," al-Zawahri said.

President Bush dismissed al-Zawahri's threat, saying, "We will stay on the offense against these people. They're terrorists and they're killers and they will kill innocent people ... so they can impose their dark vision on the world."

In London, Blair's Downing Street office declined to comment.

Jeremy Bennie, a terrorism analyst for Jane's Defense Weekly, said al-Zawahri appeared to be trying to put an al-Qaida stamp on the July 7 attacks on the London transit system. The bombings killed 56 people, including four attackers.

"He has tacitly taken responsibility by claiming al-Qaida is in control of the situation, even as most people aren't really sure bin Laden and al-Zawahri still are capable of organizing such an attack," Bennie said by telephone.

Thursday marked the seventh time al-Zawahri has used videotapes or audiotapes to speak for al-Qaida since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States. The latest appearance followed the Egyptian physician's pattern of issuing threats of further death and destruction if the United States and its allies in Iraq and Afghanistan refuse to withdraw troops from the region, including Saudi Arabia - home to two of Islam's holiest shrines.

Al-Zawahri issued the fresh threats with a Kalashnikov rifle propped against a woven cloth background that moved with the wind and showed the sunlight, suggesting the scene was filmed outdoors. He wore a white robe and black turban and emphatically wagged his finger while speaking.

DOJ_NMG_0002228

The black turban - a change from the white turban he has worn in past videos - is "a sign that it's time of war," said Montasser el-Zayat, an Egyptian attorney who defends Islamic radicals and who spent three years in prison with al-Zawahri. The prophet Muhammad and his followers wore black turbans during their invasions in the Arabian Peninsula, he said.

Al-Zawahri is "exploiting the whole atmosphere following London and Sharm el-Sheik explosions to carry out the sort of instigation that propels more operations," el-Zayat said. At least 64 people were killed in the July 23 attacks in the Egyptian Red Sea resort of Sharm el-Sheik.

As the Iraqi insurgency led by bin Laden's Jordanian comrade Abu Musab al-Zarqawi continues to kill Iraqis and Americans, al-Zawahri promised more savagery.

"What you have seen in New York and Washington, you Americans, and the losses you see in Afghanistan and Iraq - despite all the media blackout - are merely the losses from the initial clashes," he said.

"If you go on with the same policy of aggression against Muslims, you will see, God willing, what will make you forget the horrible things in Vietnam," he said.

"There is no exit from Iraq except in immediate withdrawal. Any delay in taking that decision means nothing but more dead, more losses," he said. "If you don't leave today, certainly you will leave tomorrow, but after tens of thousands of dead and double the number of disabled and wounded."

Al-Zawahri threatened other nations who have sent troops alongside U.S. forces in Iraq and Afghanistan, saying they "will harvest the fruits of their cooperation soon, God willing."

He also called for Arab militaries, intellectuals and businessmen to start working to get rid of "corrupt" regimes in the Middle East and "start prepare for change, starting now, whatever it takes of time or effort."

Bennie said al-Zawahri may have been using the video as a vehicle for reissuing an offer of a truce.

"This seems to say you have another chance to pull out and you won't be hit again," the analyst said, declaring the statement coercive and not credible.

He noted that most observers believed the March 11, 2004, Madrid train attacks, which killed 191 people, were designed to push Spaniards to vote for the Socialist opposition in elections three days later. In the voting, the Conservative government which had sent troops to Iraq was swept from power. The new government ordered Spanish troops to return home.

"That didn't prevent a foiled attempt to bomb a high-speed train carrying a thousand people after the election. And members of the cell still had the wherewithal to blow themselves up when cornered," Bennie said.

Taahir Hoorzook, of the media relations department in Al-Jazeera, said the broadcaster received the new tape Thursday at one of its offices, though he would not specify its location.

The tape is about five minutes long and Al-Jazeera aired only 10 percent of it, he said. The rest was rhetoric that "we found not newsworthy," Hoorzook said.

Video Messages Aim To Reassert Al-Qaeda Leadership (FT)

By Peter Spiegel

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

The videotape of al-Qaeda deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri broadcast on Thursday is the latest in a series of recent messages sent by the terrorism network's top leaders that analysts believe may be part of a campaign to reassert themselves, even as they remain isolated by US and Pakistani forces.

Since April 2004 there have been at least nine tapes from al-Qaeda's two leaders – Mr al-Zawahiri and Osama bin Laden – all of which have drawn close scrutiny from security agencies and terrorism analysts, since Mr bin Laden has repeatedly said his public statements were important sources for those wishing to understand the network's ideology and political goals.

A report sent to Capitol Hill in June by the Congressional Research Service (CRS), the non-partisan analysis agency, found that despite Mr bin Laden's limited ability to provide command and control to al-Qaeda operatives he and other leaders have stepped up their issuance of such tapes.

Given the increased public profile of foreign fighters in Iraq, and the concomitant rise of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian militant believed to be leading the Iraqi insurgency, the CRS report said there was a growing belief that Mr bin Laden and his aides were trying to use the public pronouncements to return themselves to the centre of the jihadist campaign.

"The ideological content and highly political tone of the recent statements have led some terrorism analysts to speculate that the messages may signal a renewed attempt by bin Laden and his associates to create a lasting leadership role for themselves and the al-Qaeda organisation as the vanguard of an emerging, loosely organised internationalist movement," the report stated.

"Others have argued that the presently limited operational capabilities of al-Qaeda's central leaders have inspired them to revive ideological outreach efforts."

DOJ_NMG_0002229

As part of that effort, the tapes have increasingly used Iraq as a touchstone for the jihadi cause. Many of them are addressed directly to Western audiences, in what appears to be an effort to discourage support for European and US foreign policies in the Islamic world.

Mr Zawahiri used that tactic again yesterday, blaming the London attacks on the policies of Tony Blair, the British prime minister. Mr bin Laden took a similar attack before the November US presidential elections, in which he blamed President George W. Bush's policies in Iraq for continued attacks on US interests.

The CRS argued that the shift towards Iraq was a reflection of Mr bin Laden's "pragmatic messianism", in which his overall goals the expulsion of Western forces and influences from the Muslim world, and the creation of a pan-Islamic state ruled by religious law remain constant, but his short-term tactical goals shift.

The report notes that Mr bin Laden has, in the past, cited the presence of US troops in Saudi Arabia – since withdrawn – and the ongoing Arab-Israeli conflict as rallying cries, only to drop the causes in later appeals. Similarly, Mr bin Laden's earlier broadcasts mentioned Iraq only on occasion, but analysts note that since a December tape, in which the al-Qaeda leader specifically embraced Mr Zarqawi, mentions of Iraq have increased.

Despite the repeated mention of Iraq, analysts emphasise that the underlying ideology of al-Qaeda has not changed and continues to focus on getting rid of Western influences from the Middle East and creating a puritanical Islamic state.

That theme was repeated by Mr Zawahiri's broadcast yesterday. Although the attack on Mr Blair was prominent in the excerpts broadcast on al-Jazeera, the Arabic television news channel, much of it was dedicated to al-Qaeda's insistence that attacks will continue until allied forces are withdrawn.

Unit That Lost 9 Men Wednesday 'was Like A Family' (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, August 5, 2005

COLUMBUS, Ohio — The Marine reservists — about 160 of them — came to an industrial park here one weekend a month to train. The men of Lima Company — cops, college students, former active duty Marines — were sent to Iraq in March.

Sixteen from Lima Company have been killed in action since then, the highest death toll in any Marine reserve unit serving in Iraq, said Capt. Chris Logan, a Marine spokesman. Nine Marines from the company were among 14 killed Wednesday by a roadside bomb.

"It was like a family," said Kristin Earhart, fighting back tears as she stood outside Lima Company headquarters. Her boyfriend, Lance Cpl. Dustin Derga, 24, died in a firefight on May 8.

Earhart was comforted by her best friend, Ashley Boots, who was engaged to another Lima Company Marine, Lance Cpl. Nicholas Erdy. Three days later Erdy was killed.

Erdy and Derga were best friends, too, dating a pair of best friends. Now the men are gone, and the women are struggling to recover from the loss. "It's been difficult," says Earhart, a senior airman in the Ohio Air National Guard.

The men of Lima Company, part of the Marines' 3rd Battalion, 25th Regiment, came from all over Ohio and beyond.

Marines and family members describe the men of the Ohio company as deeply committed, even gung-ho. Some men who'd left the unit rejoined when they heard it was going to Iraq, said Master Sgt. Steve Walter. Others joined Lima Company, rather than units closer to their homes because they wanted to be in the infantry.

The battalion is part of a dangerous operation to disrupt the movement of insurgents and weapons from the border with Syria to central Iraq.

Lima Company was activated in January and trained for two months before leaving the USA. Once in Iraq, the Marines were assigned to Security And Stabilization Operations and began a dangerous tour of duty.

"The casualties have been very high for us," said Lima Company Gunnery Sgt. Larry Bowman, who was sent home after being injured in May. "The area we were in the Al-Anbar province, the Marines called the wild wild West."

The training and combat have brought the unit together.

"You never have friends like you have when you're in an infantry unit in harm's way," says Walter, a Columbus police officer in civilian life.

President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld paid tribute Thursday to the fallen Marines. The Defense Department released the names of 13 of those killed Wednesday. They are Lance Corporals: Timothy M. Bell Jr., 22, of West Chesterfield, Ohio; Eric J. Bernholtz, 23, of Grove City, Ohio; Nicholas William B. Bloem, 20, of Belgrade, Mont.; Michael Cifuentes, 25, of Fairfield, Ohio; Grant Fraser, 22, of Anchorage, Alaska; Aaron Reed, 21, of Chillicothe, Ohio, Edward Schroeder, 23, of Columbus, Ohio; Kevin Waruinge, 22, of Tampa, Fla.; William Wightman, 22, of Sabina, Ohio; Cpl. David Kenneth J. Kreuter, 26, of Cincinnati; Cpl. David S. Stewart, 24, of Bogalusa, La.; Sgt. Bradley J. Harper, 25, of Dresden, Ohio; Sgt. Justin F. Hoffman, 27, of Delaware, Ohio.

DOJ_NMG_0002230

Eight of them were from Lima Company: Bell, Bernholtz, Cifuentes, Hoffman, Kreuter, Reed, Schroeder and Wightman.

Missy Luttrell says her nephew, “Brett” Wightman, was gung-ho from an early age.

“I can remember plain as day, he was 3, and playing with his G.I. Joes,” she remembered Thursday. “He said, ‘Aunt Missy, I'm going to be one of these guys some day.' And he was.”

Wightman was a superb athlete in high school, she said, captain of his football team as a fullback who also excelled in track.

“He's a very funny, bright, good-looking kid,” Luttrell said. “Just look at his picture.”

At Miami University in Oxford, Ohio, faculty and staff grieved Thursday for Cifuentes. A member of the marching band as an undergraduate, Cifuentes continued his studies as a graduate student and planned to become a teacher.

He was engaged to another Miami graduate, Tara Reynolds. The couple planned to marry next year.

“He was extremely devoted and focused young man,” said Jeffrey Wanko, an assistant professor of teacher education.

Tom Fennell, president of the Acacia fraternity, where Cifuentes had been an adviser, recalled him as “a great guy, who went above and beyond.”

Aaron Reed ran track and cross-country and was president of the class of 2001 at Southeastern High School in Chillicothe.

Principal Leonard Steyer said that staff at the school had been stopping by Reed's mother's home to offer help with chores on her farm. The two-story brick farmhouse sits at the end of a dusty gravel road, flanked by four silos and fields of tall corn.

Columbus Mayor Michael Coleman's youngest son, Lance Cpl. J.D. Coleman, is in Lima Company.

“When the phone rings, we are not sure what is going to be said on the other end,” the mayor said.

Lima Company is scheduled to return home in September or October, Logan said.

Confronting Their Losses, Ohio Families Are Shaken (NYT)

By John Kifner

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Aug. 4 - In tiny farming communities and the edges of gritty Rust Belt cities across central Ohio, families, neighbors and friends took in the news that 20 Marine reservists serving with units based here and in a Cleveland suburb were killed in Iraq this week with a mixture of pride in the young men's dedication and a growing unease with the war.

People were hanging American flags all over Sabina, population 2,800, where the corn and soybean fields were bursting along Ohio Route 22, to honor Lance Cpl. William Brett Wightman, 22, who was killed on Wednesday along with 13 other marines and an Iraqi interpreter when a roadside bomb blew up their lightly armored amphibious troop carrier in the hard-fought western province of Anbar.

"I could feel it," his mother, Pam Saville, said of the moment she heard the news that the marines from Lima Company, based in Columbus, were killed. "It was something inside me.

"Brett's unit has been hit so hard recently," Mrs. Saville said, recalling two marines killed in July and another five Ohio reservists from the same company in May.

"And at that moment," she went on, " I felt proud of Brett, but also angry about our country being there."

Sitting nearby, shaking with anger and clutching her younger step-brother's dress uniform, Stephanie Finley spoke of the bravado the young marines shared.

"When I talked to him a month ago, he said he loved what he was doing," Ms. Finley said. "He said he would go back if he had to.

"I love my brother, and that's why I tried to talk him out of going in the Marines. I didn't want him to go to Iraq because I don't believe in what we're doing there."

And, despite Sabina's patriotic display of flags, Ms. Finley's doubts seemed shared by a number of people in the small town where nearly everyone knew Corporal Wightman.

"With that young man getting killed, it's close to home now," said Ronald Simmons, a retired carpenter and lifelong Sabina resident. "I don't like it. I'm ready for the troops to come home."

After graduating from the local high school, Mr. Wightman worked for about a year for a concrete company, Gradeco Paving, run by Tom and Cathy Woods.

"His loss feels so close," Ms. Woods said of the tight-knit relationships in the town. "For a while now, I've felt we have done what we can do in Iraq. It's time to bring the soldiers home."

Michael Bigelow, a friend of the Wightman family, who had served in Iraq with a Marine reserve unit based in Cincinnati from last August to March, said he sensed a change in the troops' attitudes. They shifted, he said, from believing they were helping the Iraqis to simply wanting to protect each other.

DOJ_NMG_0002231

"Losing Brett makes me want to go back to Iraq," Mr. Bigelow said. "But to go back for the other soldiers. I feel like we're beating a dead horse over there."

The marines killed in the two incidents this week - the roadside bombing on Wednesday, and an ambush on Monday which killed six Marine snipers working on foot - were serving with the Third Battalion, 25th Marines, Fourth Marine Division, which was mobilized last January and arrived in Iraq in March to be attached to the Second Marine Expeditionary Force.

In the standard Marine formation, the battalion has a headquarters and service element, which is based in the Cleveland suburb of Brook Park, three rifle companies, including Lima, based in Columbus and a weapons company, which has heavier fire power like mortars and machine guns, which is based in Akron. The snipers came from the headquarters element, but one of the Monday casualties, Lance Cpl. Daniel N. Deyarmin, was reportedly attached to the weapons company.

Pentagon officials still have not released all the names, but marines here said that because of the practice of mixing in or attaching marines from other units, not all of the casualties would actually be from Ohio. Sometimes the troops are originally part of other commands, but added to a unit because special skills - like a sniper - are needed or sometimes simply to fill out a unit to its proper number.

Thus, while the six troops killed in Monday's ambush were operating in three-man sniper teams, one of the men, Lance Cpl. Roger D. Castleberry, 26, actually came from another reserve unit based in Texas.

Master Sgt. Stephen Walter of Lima Company said that 5 of the 14 killed in the improvised explosive device attack on Wednesday were not part of the original mobilization from the Marine armory here near Rickenbacker International Airport. That would include the crew of the amphibious vehicle, usually three marines.

Speaking at his ranch in Texas on Thursday, President Bush paid tribute to the marines from Brook Park.

"The people of Brook Park and the family members of those who lost their life I hope they can take comfort in the fact that millions of their fellow citizens pray for them, hope they also take comfort in the understanding that the sacrifice was made in a noble cause," Mr. Bush said.

For some parents, their sadness was tempered with pride in what their sons had become.

"My son was the last of the John Waynes, but tougher," said Timothy Bell, of West Chester, Ohio.

His son, Timothy Jr., 22, was a lance corporal who was one of the Lima company casualties. His stepmother, Vivien Bell, said that his parting words when he left for Iraq were, simply, "This is what I was born to do."

Rosemary Palmer, a teacher in the Cleveland schools, and her husband, Paul Schroeder, a business consultant, on the other hand, had long opposed the war and had tried to persuade their son, Edward Schroeder, 23, known as Augie, not to join the Marines.

But after Sept. 11, Ms. Palmer said in an interview Thursday at their modest green-shingled home where a bright red Marine Corps flag with its gold eagle, globe and anchor flew, "I knew Augie would step up."

He had always volunteered, as a Boy Scout, an emergency medical technician, a lifeguard, a player, it seemed, on almost all the school teams. He wanted to be a policeman, or, maybe, his mother said, a stand-up comic.

The couple were preparing to go to the funeral of one of the marines who had been killed on Monday when news came of the deaths at Haditha, a dusty town near the Syrian border. Like Mrs. Saville, she had a mother's intuition.

"We knew," she told reporters later, of the moment when the two marines, in their pressed uniforms arrived at the door. "They didn't even get a chance to knock."

"Every time one of these kids gets killed, a little piece of us died," she said. "Even if it wasn't your kid, it was one of his buddies.

"It's not faceless marines fighting the war. Augie fought it. We want people to see Augie's picture and say 'Damn, that could have been my kid.' "

Clusters Of Casualties Strike Towns (USAT)

By Dave Moniz

USA Today, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon's reliance on National Guard and Reserve troops to fight the war in Iraq has brought clusters of combat deaths to U.S. towns for the first time in more than 50 years.

The deaths of 19 Marine reservists from an Ohio unit in the past week highlight the risks to part-time military units, which earlier this year hit a peak of about 40% of U.S. troop strength in Iraq.

Since the Civil War, when entire towns shared in the grief of combat losses, the active-duty military has shifted away from using locally based units. The heavy use of Guard and Reserve units in Iraq has undercut a tradition that kept most of these troops out of combat since World War II and Korea. The military also restricted the number of family members required to serve in combat following World War II after multiple siblings died in battle.

When a large number of casualties hits a community, it causes “a pocket of trauma,” says Jim Martin, a retired Army colonel who teaches military culture at Bryn Mawr College in Pennsylvania. “It's aunts, uncles, nephews, nieces, boyfriends and girlfriends. … It's not just 20 families, it's 200 families.”

In January, four Marine reservists from a combat engineer unit in Lynchburg, Va., were killed in an ambush near Baghdad. In May 2004, five men from a Navy Reserve unit in Jacksonville died in a mortar attack near Ramadi. Two days earlier, two other members of that unit were killed.

Such concentrations of casualties were once common, as during the Normandy invasion on June 6, 1944, when 19 men from a Bedford, Va., unit were killed.

Few Guard and Reserve troops were deployed during the Vietnam War. After that war, the Pentagon shifted large numbers of critical support jobs to the Guard and Reserves. That made it difficult to go to war without part-time units.

Guard and Reserve troops were mobilized broadly for the 1991 Persian Gulf War, which ended with relatively few casualties. One exception: a missile attack that killed 13 Pennsylvania reservists.

Deadly Attacks Put New Pressure On Bush (AJC/AP)

By Tom Raum, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — The deadly recent attacks on American troops in Iraq are increasing the pressure on President Bush to develop an exit strategy. The U.S. death toll from the war is now over 1,800, and a new AP-Ipsos poll shows the lowest approval yet for Bush's handling of Iraq, just 38 percent.

The president's fellow Republicans are growing nervous as they head into an election year.

Yet the administration must also confront the possibility that a U.S. drawdown of troops — tentatively planned to begin next spring — could further embolden the insurgents and throw Iraq into civil war.

"We will stay the course. We will complete the job in Iraq," Bush pledged anew during a news conference on his Texas ranch with Colombian President Alvaro Uribe.

Bush suggested his resolve was only strengthened by a videotaped warning earlier Thursday from al-Qaida's second-in-command, Ayman al-Zawahri, threatening more terror attacks in Britain and tens of thousands of U.S. military deaths if the United States doesn't withdraw.

There has been little outward sign of progress in U.S.-led efforts to defeat the insurgency and to beef up the Iraqi army and police so they can take over security responsibilities and allow an orderly withdrawal of American forces.

Particularly lethal bombings over the past few weeks, including a roadside bomb that claimed the lives of 14 Marines on Wednesday, have made the situation look even bleaker than U.S. military experts suggest it is.

That translates into a continued erosion of public support for Bush's Iraq policy at home.

An AP-Ipsos poll taken Monday through Wednesday indicated that just 38 percent of Americans approve of Bush's handling of Iraq. A year ago, the public was evenly divided on Iraq, and Bush's stance on the war and terrorism helped him to election victory.

Bush has lost support most dramatically among younger women, especially those who live in the suburbs, and among men with a high school education or less.

Despite the horrific headlines, many military analysts say that attacks on U.S. troops have actually remained constant in recent weeks while attacks on Iraqi civilians have increased.

"As tragic as they are, they don't establish a pattern that says U.S. casualties are getting consistently worse," said Anthony H. Cordesman, an Iraq expert and former Pentagon intelligence official. He attributed recent deaths of Marines to the fact that "these are more aggressive military patrols going into hostile areas."

Even so, Bush faces a real dilemma, said Cordesman, now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "The president's legacy, if he fails in Iraq, historically is an absolute disaster. President Bush and the Bush administration can scarcely ignore that problem."

"If you pull out troops too quickly now, and you see the situation in Iraq collapse before the midterm elections, the impact is going to be far more serious than if you keep the troops in at reasonable levels," Cordesman said.

Regardless of whether attacks against U.S. troops are increasing overall or remaining constant, the deaths over the past few days of Marines in western Iraq — including multiple losses for the community of Brook Park, Ohio — underscore that things in Iraq are not going well.

Jeff Mers, commander of a VFW post that has raised money and sent care packages to the Columbus-based Marine company that suffered the heaviest losses, said that even before this week's attacks, he and other veterans were dazed from attending funerals.

DOJ_NMG_0002233

"I think I've been to nine of these just in central Ohio in the past few months," he said.

Bush called the fallen Marines a "grim reminder" that America is still at war.

The war will be a major factor in the 2006 midterm congressional races and could be one in the 2008 presidential race, said Stephen Cimbala, a Pennsylvania State University political scientist who has studied the impact of wars on American politics.

"If you look at it from a Republican point of view, by the 2006 congressional elections, you're going to want to have a timetable in place for withdrawal of U.S. forces and their replacement by Iraqis. And by the fall of 2008, you will want to have most U.S. forces out of there," Cimbala said.

President: Tape Proves Iraq Part Of Terror War (DMN)

By David Jackson

The Dallas Morning News, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas – While paying tribute to the Marines who have fallen in Iraq this week, President Bush said Thursday that the latest al-Qaeda tape makes clear that "Iraq is a part of this war on terror."

Al-Qaeda terrorists "will kill innocent people trying to get us to withdraw from the world so they can impose their dark vision on the world," Mr. Bush said after a meeting with Colombian President Alvaro Uribe.

Mr. Bush may face increasing political pressure over Iraq, given the spasm of violence that has killed at least 24 Americans in Iraq in recent days. That includes a roadside bomb near Syria that killed 14 Marines.

He singled out the Cleveland suburb where many of the killed Marines came from, saying the people of Brook Park, Ohio, have "suffered mightily over the last couple of days."

"I hope they can take comfort in the fact that millions of their fellow citizens pray for them," he said.

Mr. Bush added, "I hope they also take comfort in the understanding that the sacrifice was made in a noble cause," a phrase he used for the second time in two days.

In a new videotape broadcast Thursday, Ayman al-Zawahiri, top aide to al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, promised tens of thousands American deaths if the U.S. did not withdraw from Iraq and other Muslim countries.

He also threatened more attacks in London, saying British Prime Minister Tony Blair would be to blame for his support of the Iraq effort.

Mr. Bush, noting al-Qaeda's role in the terrorist attacks of 9-11, said, "I vowed then that we would stay on the offense against these people."

That includes Iraq, where Mr. Bush said a growing democracy would spread to other parts of the Middle East, bringing freedom and reducing the appeal of terrorism.

"We're laying the foundation of peace for generations to come," he said.

Critics of the Iraq war said there is no evidence Saddam Hussein's government was involved in 9-11 or had a working partnership with al-Qaeda.

Some anti-war activists plan a demonstration for Saturday near the presidential ranch in Crawford.

"We want our loved ones' sacrifices to be honored by bringing our nation's sons and daughters home from the travesty that is Iraq IMMEDIATELY," said a statement from one of the protest organizers, Gold Star Families for Peace.

Terror War Strategies (WT)

By Dianne Feinstein

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

We have watched terrorism grow with increasing malevolence over the past decade. Today, no country is secure. No individual is beyond its bounds.

A virulent, radical ideology has spread throughout the globe that says terror is acceptable, that targeting innocents is not just allowed but a "duty" of its followers.

Let me quote from Osama bin Laden's 1998 fatwa against the United States and the West:

"The ruling to kill the Americans and their allies -- civilians and military -- is an individual duty for every Muslim who can do it in any country in which it is possible to do it, in order to liberate the al-Aqsa Mosque and the holy mosque from their grip, and in order for their armies to move out of all the lands of Islam, defeated and unable to threaten any Muslim."

This is what we face and fight against. The threat has not diminished in the nearly four years since September 11, 2001.

I believe it is even more important the United States and our allies redouble our efforts in the war against terrorism. This means continuing to seek out and kill or capture key members of al Qaeda. This means remaining vigilant in our efforts to prevent and interdict terrorist operations. And it means improving our gathering and sharing of intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0002234

I also believe the United States must develop strong relationships with moderate Muslims at the highest levels. President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice should invest the time and energy to develop close ties with those in the Muslim world who are a force for peace and reconciliation, not of fanaticism and violence.

This could take many forms:

· Developing a Muslim council with which the president confers monthly.

· High-level meetings with leading moderate Muslim figures during administration travel to the Middle East.

· Financial investment in Muslim programs and schools that encourage tolerance and diversity.

· Revamping Radio Sawa to include more sophisticated news programming on issues that appeal to young people.

· Sponsoring forums and trips to the U.S. for elected centrist Muslim individuals to spend time with U.S. legislators.

· Relying on intelligence community operatives to undercut the message and political activities of radical clerics who preach hatred of the West.

But the United States and our allies cannot win this battle alone. A key part of the solution lies within the Islamic community as well. Muslim religious leaders must join the battle against terror. They have to fight this virulent ideology.

Too often terrorists are nurtured and protected. This begins in religious schools (madrassas), where this violent ideology is frequently taught. It continues when terrorists find shelter and camaraderie in mosques, bookstores and meeting places.

What else can explain that Osama bin Laden, Ayman al Zawahiri, Mullah Omar, Abu Musab Zarqawi, Hamza Rabi'a, and dozens of other terrorist leaders are still at large?

To be sure, there are a few who are speaking out:

· In the wake of the London bombings, for instance, the Grand Mufti of Saudi Arabia, Sheik Abdul Aziz Al-Asheikh, said operations "targeting peaceful people are not condoned by Islam and are indeed prohibited by our religion."

· The Muslim Council of Britain, said it "utterly condemns the perpetrators of what appears to be a series of coordinated attacks."

· The Fiqh Council of North America issued a fatwa this week in Washington denouncing those who commit terror in the name of Islam.

· Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's incoming ambassador to the United States, has said, "Muslim scholars must come out loudly and strongly against suicidal bombing regardless of where, when and why they have happened."

· And a group of 170 Muslim religious leaders has agreed decrees by bin Laden and other Islamacists are not legitimate, because they are not trained within the traditional eight schools of Islamic jurisprudence.

But as Prince al-Faisal has said, these messages have not "resonated enough in the world media." What's clear to me is there needs to be a clarion call from those clerics who are in fact trained in Islamic jurisprudence to denounce terror and issue religious decrees (fatwas) against the targeting of innocents -- over and over again.

This needs to go out on radio, on TV, in newspapers, on the street and in the mosques.

The United States cannot relent in the war against terror, and I don't suggest we do so. But I strongly believe the carnage ultimately can be stopped from within the Islamic world.

Without strong, intense and constant denunciation within the Muslim community, I am afraid this terror will only metastasize and spread.

So I hope our government, our allies and all governments who deplore terror would urge the leaders of the Muslim faith to step forward and ostracize those who kill and maim innocents in the name of Islam.

Dianne Feinstein is a Democratic member of the United States Senate from California.

America Has Two Choices In Iraq: Exit Or Success (FT)

By Anthony Cordesman

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

No one can question the fact that the months since the Iraqi election have been grim. Whatever US politicians may say, US intelligence experts see no decline in the insurgency in Iraq. Insurgent tactics have changed to focus increasingly on Iraqi officials and -military, security and police personnel. Bloody suicide bombings of Shias, Kurds and Sunnis supporting the government have been combined with more ambushes, kidnappings and assassinations of Americans, Britons, Iraqis and any other target that could help push the country towards civil war, paralyse the political process and drive foreigners out. There are bad days and good ones, and a single improvised bomb can kill 14 US troops, as we saw this week.

The political process remains highly uncertain. No one knows whether a constitution will be drafted on time and, if so, whether it will resolve any critical issues, and whether enough provinces will vote to support it. The prospect of yet another government and election is equally uncertain. Tensions between Arab Sunni and Shia are growing, alongside Kurdish demands for federalism and control of oil revenue. The role of religion in the state is a significant issue. Basra risks becoming a Shia fundamentalist enclave, and tensions in Baghdad, Mosul and Kirkuk are high.

DOJ_NMG_0002235

Economic success seems equally distant. Regardless of US-led efforts to put a spin on current developments, far too much of the aid process is a failure. Once wartime profiteering is subtracted, most areas of the economy are in decline and unemployment is at the crisis level – particularly in the Sunni areas that are the source of most insurgency. Electricity, water and other services are barely creeping back to prewar levels, and crime is a big economic and personal problem – one with more impact on the lives of many -Iraqis than the insurgency.

Yet, the odds are still far too close to call in Iraq. The insurgents have no sanctuaries and do not seem to be increasing in number. They win no battles. The number of trained Iraqi forces has expanded from about 96,000 in 2004 to more than 173,000, and is rapidly growing towards a target of 270,000. The number of Iraqi combat battalions available has gone from just one in July 2004 to more than 100 today. More than 40 per cent of these battalions can play a useful role in security efforts and a handful can stand alone in demanding missions. If Coalition and Iraqi government plans succeed, they will reach serious numbers of deployable battalions by year-end and by 2006, will be a major force of military, security and police units.

Despite Iraq's considerable problems, the country's new leaders have sought to be inclusive and have resisted ethnic and religious purges and confrontations. The political process has moved forward. Despite economic problems, Iraqis largely remain optimistic about their future. The situation is fragile but certainly not hopeless.

This is the context in which all the conflicting media reports about looming US withdrawals should be kept. No one can guarantee that a "success strategy" will work, but the Bush administration and senior commanders in Iraq still see continuing commitment as a better option than any form of "exit strategy". Anyone who talks seriously to the policymakers and military planners involved knows they are not trying to rush US forces out before the political process stabilises and before Iraqi forces can take over a large part of the mission.

Even then, US planners are talking only of phased reductions. The Bush administration would like to reduce US forces from about 130,000 to well below 100,000 no later than the summer of 2006, and by early 2006 if possible. It would like to reduce the profile of Coalition forces in dealing with Iraqis by the end of 2006, if possible. "Possible", however, means reacting to the pace of Iraqi success – not some fixed time-table for reductions. It also means leaving strong elements of US forces as long as they are needed, and sustaining US military and economic aid for five to 10 years. Furthermore, senior administration officials know too well how the Bush legacy from the kind of exit that meant defeat would be viewed, and how a move towards such failure would affect the mid-term election in November 2006. In short, the Bush administration is still pursuing a success strategy rather than an exit strategy. It could fail, as could the effort to create a modern and more democratic Iraq. But it also could succeed.

The writer, chair of strategy at the Center for Strategic Studies in Washington, is author of Iraqi Force Development, (CSIS/Praeger) to be published in November

Was Hiroshima Hell Or High-water Mark? (USAT)

By Al Neuharth

USA Today, August 5, 2005

Sixty years ago this weekend, Aug. 6, 1945, a single atomic bomb was dropped from a U.S. B-29 on Hiroshima, Japan. Eight days later, World War II ended.

The anniversary has sparked renewed debate over whether President Harry Truman did the right thing in unleashing the big bomb or whether we should have fought the war to its end the conventional way. Facts:

·The A-bomb on Hiroshima and another dropped on Nagasaki three days later killed 210,000 Japanese.

·Before those bombs, 1.1 million Japanese and more than 102,000 U.S. military died in the Pacific war.

·Hundreds of thousands or perhaps millions more Japanese military and civilians and U.S. military would have died if a land invasion of Japan had taken place.

The A-bomb led to much deadlier nuclear weapons. Both the United States and the U.S.S.R. (basically Russia) developed tens of thousands of them during the Cold War. Now, six other countries — China, France, Great Britain, India, Israel and Pakistan — each have dozens or hundreds of nuclear warheads. North Korea claims it has a few too. But the certainty of retaliation and mass destruction has kept nuclear weapons possessors from using them.

The A-bomb indeed was hell for Japanese who lived in or near Hiroshima and Nagasaki. But it also was the high-water mark of WWII because it ended the hell for all others fighting that conflict.

Truman will be remembered as the president who brought us both victory and peace in a war that was justified and necessary. By contrast, self-proclaimed "War President" George Bush has brought us neither victory nor peace in the Iraq war, which former president Jimmy Carter this week called "unnecessary and unjust."

DOJ_NMG_0002236

GWOT That? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Words matter. Which is why we are glad to see that in a speech in Grapevine, Texas, on Wednesday, President Bush employed the phrase "war on terror" five times and the word "war" 15 times, 13 in reference to the global war on terror and two citing World War II.

The news here is that Mr. Bush's choice of words is being widely interpreted as a rebuke of National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Joint Chiefs Chairman General Richard Myers, who lately have been favoring the formulation "global struggle against violent extremism" over "global war on terror." Or, in Beltwayese, G-SAVE vs. GWOT.

The G-SAVE crowd is not wrong. Defeating Islamic terrorism will require diplomatic, economic and political means as well as military ones -- as the President himself has said repeatedly. But to quote from another speech Mr. Bush gave last year in Fort Myers, Florida, after Richard Holbrooke, John Kerry's foreign policy adviser, called the war on terror a "metaphor": "Anyone who thinks we are fighting a metaphor does not understand the enemy we face. You cannot win a war if you are not convinced we're even in one." Calling it anything less than "war" also runs the risk of minimizing the sacrifices of America's service men and women.

To those who are not persuaded that the U.S. is at war, may we suggest a ride on the London Underground, a night at a Bali hotel, or a visit to Ground Zero in downtown Manhattan? These are the many faces of the global war on terror.

Maryland Man Tied To Terrorism Plot (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

A Maryland man was arrested yesterday and accused of conspiring to aid terrorism by training to become a jihadist fighter in camps in Pakistan, federal authorities said.

The man, Mahmud Faruq Brent, was accused of traveling to Pakistan in the months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to receive training in camps operated by Lashkar-e-Taiba, a group loosely affiliated with Al Qaeda whose primary goal is to fight against Indian forces in the disputed province of Kashmir.

The Pakistani group was declared a foreign terrorist organization by the United States in December 2001.

Mr. Brent, who the authorities said also went by the name of Mahmud al Mutazzim, was an associate of Tarik Shah, a New York jazz musician who was arrested on May 28 on terrorism charges in a federal sting operation.

According to a criminal complaint against Mr. Brent that was unsealed yesterday, Mr. Brent, in telephone calls and in at least one meeting, described his stay in the camps to Mr. Shah.

Mr. Brent told Mr. Shah that he had been in the mountains in Pakistan training with "the mujahadeen, the fighters," the complaint says.

Although Mr. Brent has a home in Baltimore, he was arrested in Newark. His home was searched early yesterday afternoon by agents from the Baltimore Joint Terrorism Task Force. He made his first court appearance late yesterday before a magistrate judge in Federal District Court in Manhattan.

The complaint says that Mr. Shah, who was also a martial arts expert, trained Mr. Brent in martial arts when the two men lived in Beacon, N.Y., in 2001 before the Sept. 11 attacks. In recent months, the two men had discussed plans to make a martial arts training video for Muslims in the United States interested in becoming militants, the complaint says.

There are no allegations that Mr. Brent or Mr. Shah were actively planning any violent terrorist action.

The arrest of Mr. Brent is the latest episode in the investigation of Mr. Shah, 42, and an associate, Rafiq Sabir, 50, a medical doctor from Boca Raton, Fla., who was arrested on the same day as Mr. Shah.

He and Dr. Sabir were accused of swearing an oath of allegiance to Al Qaeda. Mr. Shah was charged with offering to provide martial arts training to jihad fighters, while Dr. Sabir was accused of offering medical assistance.

Both men have pleaded not guilty to the charges, which resulted from an undercover operation in which an F.B.I. agent posed as a recruiter for Al Qaeda.

Federal agents linked Mr. Brent to Mr. Shah through a telephone number for Mr. Brent in an address book belonging to Mr. Shah that the New York police found during a search after Mr. Shah's arrest in December 2003 on larceny charges.

The complaint against Mr. Brent shows that Mr. Shah, although he has vehemently denied the charges against him, cooperated briefly with the authorities. On the day he was arrested, Mr. Shah called Mr. Brent on instructions from F.B.I. agents and arranged to meet him that day at a hotel near Columbia, Md., the complaint says. Federal agents made a video recording of the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0002237

During their meeting, the complaint says, Mr. Brent described to Mr. Shah how difficult it had been to reach the camps and said that all his connections to Pakistan were "kinda gone."

But he said that his visit to the camps had been "one of the better decisions of my life" and that he hoped that "Allah would bless him" for his efforts. Passport records show that Mr. Brent was in Pakistan from February to June 2002.

The complaint says that Mr. Shah has no cooperation agreement with the government at this time.

Md. Man Charged With Supporting Terrorist Group (BSUN)

By Matthew Dolan, Sun Staff

The Baltimore Sun, August 5, 2005

A Baltimore County man was charged with providing support to a terrorist organization, federal prosecutors in New York announced today.

Mahmud Faruq Brent, also known as Mahmud Al Mutazzim, has been charged in a criminal complaint with one count of conspiracy to provide material support or resources to the Lashkar-e-Taiba foreign terrorist organization.

Brent was scheduled to appear in U.S. District Court in New York City this afternoon. The FBI searched his home in Gwynn Oak earlier today.

The complaint alleges that Brent, of Gwynn Oak, conspired to provide material support or resources to Lashkar-e-Taiba from 2001 until May of this year by attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan.

Lashkar was designated as a Foreign Terrorist Organization by the U.S. government in December 2001.

The complaint also alleges that Brent received martial arts training from Tarik Shah, who is presently under indictment in the Southern District of New York on similar charges.

Federal prosecutors accuse Shah of being in possession of an address book containing telephone numbers for "Mahmud Almutazzim" and "Sayfullah." Telephone records reveal that one of the numbers listed for "Almutazzim" was one listed to Brent's wife at his home in Gwynn Oak.

The number for "Sayfullah" was linked to an address used by Seifullah Chapman, prosecutors said. Chapman has already been convicted in the Eastern District of Virginia on terrorism and firearms charges as part of the Virginia Jihad Network prosecutions.

In a recorded conversation with an undercover FBI agent, Shah allegedly mentioned the names of several students with whom he had studied martial arts and who had gone overseas to training camps in Afghanistan and Yemen. Among the students was "Mahmud Al Mutazzim," according to court papers.

It is alleged, among other things, that Shah reported that Al Mutazzim had told him how "difficult" it was to be back in the United States and not to be in training. Shah allegedly said that Al Mutazzim could be trusted because he was a longtime student of his who, after leaving school, started "seeking the way to become Mujahideen."

According to the criminal complaint, Shah also allegedly told the undercover agent that he intended to call Al Mutazzim to enlist his help to prepare a demonstration video to be used for martial arts training of jihadists.

Phone records reveal a subsequent 16-minute telephone call between phones used by Shah and Al Mutazzim, court papers say.

Shah admitted after his arrest in May that he had trained Al Mutazzim in martial arts when they both lived in Beacon, N.Y., in 2001. Together, court papers say, they often watched martial arts training videos and other videos about jihad in Bosnia.

During this period, Al Mutazzim allegedly introduced Shah to Seifullah Chapman in the Washington area.

Prosecutors said that later, when Al Mutazzim returned to the United States in or about 2002, he mentioned to Shah that he had gone to a "camp."

The complaint says that after his arrest, Shah agreed to meet with Brent at a hotel near Columbia and secretly record the conversation for the FBI. According to the federal complaint, Shah said he wanted to travel, and Brent replied that his "connections were kinda gone." He said his only connection was "doing time now."

In that recording, according to prosecutors, Brent said that he didn't know names but that the camps he had attended were "really organized."

Md. Man Accused Of Plot To Aid Terrorists (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

Federal authorities yesterday charged a Baltimore County resident with conspiring to support a terrorist organization, alleging that he said during a conversation secretly recorded by the FBI that he had attended a terrorist training camp in Pakistan.

Mahmud Faruq Brent, a U.S. citizen who once worked as a paramedic in Silver Spring, is accused of supporting Lashkar-e-Taiba, a militant Islamic group that the U.S. government has designated a terrorist organization. Brent was arrested in Newark yesterday morning and appeared later in federal court in Manhattan.

A criminal complaint filed there says the FBI listened in during a conversation between Brent, who also uses the name Mahmud Al Mutazzim, and Tarik Shah of New York, a jazz musician and self-described martial arts expert. Shah was arrested in May and has pleaded not guilty to charges that he provided material support to al Qaeda.

The complaint against Brent alleges that Shah told authorities after his arrest that he had trained Brent in martial arts and that Brent was committed to jihad. The complaint says Shah agreed to arrange a meeting with Brent at a hotel near Columbia. The FBI monitored that meeting using video and audio surveillance, the complaint says.

According to the complaint, Brent said during the meeting that he had traveled to Pakistan and trained with mujaheddin. Brent called the decision to go to the camps "one of the better decisions in my life" and urged Shah to seek similar training, the complaint says.

Brent spoke of the difficulties he encountered in reaching the camps and said Shah's decision would come down to a question of "how much" he was willing to "sacrifice" and whether he was willing to "take a risk," the complaint says. Brent said that he was moved by videotapes of Muslims "suffering" and that the tapes "kind of like pushed me over the, over the edge," it says.

An attorney for Brent did not return phone calls late yesterday seeking comment. Attempts to reach his family members at phone numbers listed in the complaint and elsewhere were unsuccessful.

The complaint also links Brent to Seifullah Chapman, a member of the "Virginia jihad network" who has been sentenced to 65 years in prison for conspiring to support Lashkar-e-Taiba and other offenses. Chapman was charged with taking part in paramilitary training, including playing paintball in the Virginia countryside, to prepare for holy war abroad. The complaint says Chapman wrote a letter in support of an application for an expedited passport that Brent filed in 2000.

The complaint says that Lashkar-e-Taiba translates roughly as "Army of the Pure" and that the group claims to have trained thousands of militants to fight in Afghanistan, Kashmir, Chechnya, Kosovo and elsewhere. The United States designated it a foreign terrorist organization in 2001 after the Indian government blamed it for an attack on parliament that killed 12.

Md. Man Accused In Terrorist Support Plan (PHI)

By Larry Neumeister

The Philadelphia Inquirer, August 5, 2005

NEW YORK - A Maryland man was charged with conspiring to help a terrorist organization after describing the time he spent at a terrorist training camp in Pakistan as "one of the better decisions in my life," prosecutors said Thursday.

Mahmud Faruq Brent, of Gwynn Oak, Md., allegedly boasted that he had agreed to provide whatever assistance was necessary.

Authorities began investigating Brent after they found an address book with telephone numbers for him when they arrested Tarik Shah, 42, of New York. Shah pleaded not guilty to terrorism charges earlier this summer.

Brent was charged in a criminal complaint filed in federal court in Manhattan with conspiracy to provide material support to the Lashkar-e-Taiba organization, which the U.S. designated a terrorist organization in 2001.

Brent was charged after Shah agreed to meet with him and let the FBI record the encounter, according to a news release by federal prosecutors, the FBI and New York police.

During the taped conversation at a hotel in Columbia, Md., Brent indicated he had traveled to Pakistan and into the mountains for training "and stuff" with "the mujahideen, the fighters," the release said.

Brent was being held in Manhattan and was scheduled to appear in court later Thursday. A telephone call to his lawyer was not immediately returned.

Man Charged With Conspiring To Support Terror Group (NYNSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, August 5, 2005

In an offshoot of an earlier case involving a Bronx musician, federal investigators in Manhattan Thursday announced the arrest of a Maryland man on charges he provided material support to a terrorist group in Pakistan.

In a criminal complaint unsealed in federal district court in Manhattan, Mahmud Faruq Brent of Gwynn Oak, Md., was charged with conspiring to provide material support or resources to the group Lashkar-e-Taiba for more than four years.

The group, also known by the initials LET, was designated by the United States as a terrorist group in late 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0002239

Officials also said that they were led to Brent by Tarik Shah, a musician and martial arts trainer who was arrested in May on similar charges of aiding al-Qaida. After Shah was arrested on May 28, he provided more details about Brent, who was also known by the moniker "Mahmud Al Mutazzim," according to a statement released by federal prosecutors in Manhattan.

Shah admitted after his arrest that he had trained Brent in martial arts in 2001 in Beacon, N.Y., officials said. After his arrest, Shah then agreed to tape record a conversation he had with Brent in a hotel room near Columbia, Md., said officials. During the conversation, Brent indicated that he had gone to a training camp to train with mujahedeen and had pledged to provide whatever "assistance" he could in the hopes of being blessed by God, investigators said.

Brent was recorded saying that he had watched videotapes of Muslim brothers "suffering" and the experience "kind of like pushed me over the, over the edge ... about going there," according to the 13-page complaint filed Thursday.

When Brent indicated he had traveled to Pakistan he said that he didn't stay in the cities but had gone to mountains to train with "the mujahideen, the fighters," the complaint stated.

The complaint stated the travel records indicated that Brent had traveled to Pakistan in February 2002 and stayed about four months. He then traveled from the United Arab Emirates back to the United States in November 2002, according to the complaint.

Officials didn't have a date of birth for Brent. The complaint stated that a records check showed that Brent had been working as a paramedic at the Medical Services Company in Silver Spring, Md., from December 2003 to about November 2004.

An arraignment for Brent was scheduled for late Thursday before federal magistrate-judge Frank Maas in Manhattan.

NY Accuses Maryland Man Of Supporting Terror Group (REU)

Reuters, August 4, 2005

NEW YORK (Reuters) - The FBI and New York police on Thursday announced the arrest of a Maryland man accused of conspiring to provide material support to the militant Lashkar-e-Taiba group.

Mahmud Faruq Brent, of Gwynn Oak, Maryland, attended a terrorist training camp in Pakistan run by Lashkar, according to the federal complaint.

Lashkar-e-Taiba, a Pakistan-based Kashmiri separatist group, was designated by the United States as a foreign terrorist organization in December 2001.

An address book and telephone records tied Brent, also known as Mahmud Al Mutazzim, to New York martial arts expert Tarik Shah, who is facing similar federal charges in New York.

After Shah's arrest on May 28, he admitted he had trained Al Mutazzim in martial arts and had talked with him about their experiences in overseas training camps.

The day of his arrest, Shah, who pleaded not guilty to charges at his arraignment in New York federal court in June, met with Brent in Maryland and allowed the FBI to record their talk and ruminations about the training camps.

Court papers also said telephone records showed a connection between Brent and Seifullah Chapman, who has been convicted in the Virginia of multiple terrorism and firearms charges as part of the Virginia Jihad Network prosecutions.

Shah was arrested in May along with a Florida doctor, accused of conspiring to aid al Qaeda members. Prosecutors said the men were taped pledging support to Osama bin Laden.

Joining in the investigation that led to Brent's arrest were members of the New Jersey and Maryland Joint Terrorism Task Forces.

Britain Goes On High Alert, Spurred By Hint Of Attack (NYT)

By Don Van Natta Jr.

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

LONDON, Aug. 4 - Exactly four weeks after a team of bombers attacked London with a deadly strike, the British police on Thursday mounted their largest security campaign here since World War II as intelligence officials said they had picked up information that another team might be planning a synchronized bombing in London or elsewhere in Britain.

The most recent information came from a cellular phone text message intercepted recently and the interrogation of a suspected terrorist being held outside Britain, said senior counterterrorism and intelligence officials based in Britain, Europe and the United States. The actual text of the message was not made available. The officials said the information was not specific about the timing of such an attack, or whether the team was already in place.

A senior American police official said he was told by his counterpart in Scotland Yard that the latest intelligence information was "specific enough to worry them that something is coming."

A senior intelligence official based in Europe, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said, "The British have told us - they feel sure there will be a third wave of attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0002240

Scotland Yard officials declined to comment about the latest intelligence or about the intensifying speculation in the British press. Earlier this week The Sunday Times reported that "a third Islamist terror cell is planning multiple suicide bomb attacks against tube trains and other 'soft' targets in central London."

A Metropolitan Police spokesman, who spoke on condition of anonymity, would only say, "We have to assume there are more people of the same mind-set who want to attack London."

On Thursday, British officials said they were surprised that new details about explosives used in the two attacks in London had been disclosed in New York City during a briefing that police officials gave to local security directors. The officials said they were not consulted by the New York police before the briefing on Wednesday.

Paul J. Browne, the New York City Police Department's chief spokesman, said he was in error when he told reporters that department officials had cleared the material in the briefing with their British counterparts. The error, he said, resulted in a misunderstanding he had with another New York police official. But Mr. Browne said the department was comfortable with the briefing and noted that the information provided to the security directors came from open sources and was not classified.

Also on Thursday, a videotape was broadcast showing Ayman al-Zawahiri, Al Qaeda's deputy to Osama bin Laden, declaring that there would be more bloodshed in London. Mr. Zawahiri said any additional terror attacks would be the fault of the British prime minister, Tony Blair. "Blair has brought to you destruction in central London, and he will bring more of that, God willing," Mr. Zawahiri said in the tape, which was broadcast on the satellite channel Al Jazeera. The tape's authenticity could not be immediately verified.

He also threatened more attacks against the United States unless it withdrew its troops from Muslim countries. "Our message to you is clear, strong and final - there will be no salvation until you withdraw from our land, stop stealing our oil and resources and end support for infidel rulers," Mr. Zawahiri said.

President Bush said the videotaped comments by Mr. Zawahiri "make it clear that Iraq is a part of this war on terror, and we're at war." Mr. Bush, speaking during a joint appearance at his ranch with the president of Colombia, Álvaro Uribe, said that Mr. Zawahiri and people like him "have a ideology that is dark, dim, backwards."

"They're terrorists and they're killers," he said. "And they will kill innocent people trying to get us to withdraw from the world so they can impose their dark vision on the world."

So far, there has been no link established between Al Qaeda and either attack in London.

Two other American officials played down the significance of the cellphone text, saying that British investigators are so concerned about another attack that some pieces of information take on added significance. A high-ranking American law enforcement official said he was aware of the reports of a cellphone text and a human source confirming the worry about another attack, but he added, "I think the immediacy of it has been toned down."

Both the police and the public are clearly jittery about the possibility of an attack. Some commuters acknowledged on Thursday that they had changed their habits as a result.

"I'm really scared about getting on the tube," said Philippa Embley, 25, a personal assistant who travels during off-peak hours from her home in Surrey to work in north London. "Still, because it's not rush hour, I feel it's a bit safer."

On Thursday, a glorious summer day in the capital, an estimated 6,000 police officers from the Metropolitan Police and British Transport Police patrolled the London Underground and the city's red double-decker buses. The extraordinary show of force came exactly four weeks after a team of four terrorists used bombs to kill 52 people and themselves on three subway trains and a city bus. Exactly two weeks ago, another four-man bombing team tried a copycat attack but their homemade bombs failed to explode. They fled, but all four suspects, British citizens of East African descent, were captured last week in one of Britain's largest international manhunts.

Passenger traffic on London's subways is down 15 percent, or 450,000 passengers a day, and down as much as 30 percent on weekends, according to government figures. Bus passenger numbers have remained steady at about six million per day.

Officials for Transport for London, the city's public transport authority, said the downturn in passengers correlated with the lines and stations closed because of the July 7 attacks. "Now that the network is largely back in action, we're expecting things to climb back to normal," said Richard Dodd, a spokesman for Transport for London.

Also on Thursday, the first person charged in connection with the botched bombing attacks was ordered by a British court to remain in custody. Ismael Abdurahman, 23, from southeast London, appeared at a 10-minute hearing in Bow Street Magistrate's Court before being led to jail. Mr. Abdurahman is charged with withholding information and helping a suspected bomber, Hussain Osman, also known as Hamdi Issac, with avoiding capture in the first several days after July 21. Mr. Osman had fled to Italy after the July 21 attacks. He is being held in Rome awaiting extradition to Britain, where he is expected to face terrorism charges.

DOJ_NMG_0002241

The police also charged two women under antiterrorism laws with failing to give the police information after the July 21 attacks, Reuters reported. The police said the women, Yeshshiembet Girma, 28, and Muluemebet Girma, 21, of London, would appear in court on Friday. They were arrested on July 27 in a raid in the Stockwell area of south London.

Londoners Use Public Transport Warily (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

LONDON — It was a quiet, jittery morning, one that had become all too common.

Six thousand police officers blanketed the city Thursday, four weeks after blasts shattered subway cars and a bus, two weeks since a second attempt to bomb the Underground. Commuters streamed past bomb-sniffing dogs. They hurried beneath sniper scopes, studied the faces of people around them. They wriggled in their seats and some swallowed hard when trains clattered away from platforms and roared through tunnels toward the next stop.

It was a morning to cope, a morning of new threats. Many Londoners feared militants would strike again on the four-week anniversary of the July 7 attack. The rush hour was uneventful, but then came another jolt. In a videotape broadcast Thursday, Ayman Zawahiri, Osama bin Laden's lieutenant, told Britain that Prime Minister Tony Blair's support of U.S. policies in the Middle East had "brought you destruction to the heart of London, and he will bring you more destruction, God willing."

The ride out of London was more nerve-wracking than the journey in.

The city's Piccadilly subway line reopened stops that had been closed by bomb damage. But many commuters chose alternate routes, bypassing the yellow florescent jackets and the black guns of police. Since July 7, when four bombs killed 56 people and left grainy photos of militants lingering on TV, subway riders have dropped by 30 percent on weekends and as much as 15 percent on weekdays, according to the city's transportation service.

"I was on the tube, and a white guy next to me was staring at a dark-skinned guy," said Anetta Bentley, a shop worker in Notting Hill. "The dark-skinned guy look at him and said, `Why you looking at me? Why you looking at me? You want to check my rucksack.' But everyone was looking at him and his rucksack. We couldn't help it. It's strange and not easy getting back to normal."

Above the Covent Garden subway stop, Ismael Abdurahman, 23, appeared in Bow Street Magistrate's Court wearing a navy blue jacket and matching pants. He blew a kiss to two women sitting in the gallery and became the first suspect indicted in connection with the July 23 failed bombings of the same subway system. He is charged with withholding information that allowed alleged bomber Hamdi Issac to escape to Italy.

"The defendant will be contesting the charge as he has no involvement in any terrorist activity whatsoever," said Abdurahman's lawyer, Anne Faul. Judge Timothy Workman denied bail and Abdurahman, facing a maximum penalty of five years in prison, waved again to the two women, one of them weeping, before he was led away. Two other suspects were charged later in the day with the same offense of withholding information on the alleged attackers, according to the BBC.

The subways rattled on. Double-decker buses meandered through traffic, past Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, skirting the fringes of Buckingham Palace. Cell phones rang, tourists unfolded maps and the largest police presence in decades gripped the city. Farther north, beyond Ladbroke Grove and Queens Way, Richard Moss, an electrical engineering student, walked with a backpack on an overpass above rusty train tracks. He knew that July 7 and July 21 were both Thursdays, and wondered what would happen this Thursday.

"Some Londoners are apprehensive. Others are moving forward and getting on with their lives," he said. "But we're doing these things individually. We've somehow lost a sense of community. Instead of cultures coming together and fusing, we're doing it all apart and we've got to stop that.

"I'm not scared to take the subways or buses, but my girlfriend is. She has that sense of not being sure. You used to know what terrorists looked like, but now they look like everybody. My uncle lives about 10 minutes that way (he pointed west) and two of the guys they arrested in the bombings lived right next door to him and he didn't even know."

A man was talking on a TV in a nearby cafe. He wore a black turban and a white tunic. A rifle leaned next to him.

In a five-minute long tape delivered to Al-Jazeera Thursday, Zawahiri talked about destruction and threatened Britain and the United States. "If you go on with the same policy of aggression against Muslims," he warned, "You will see horror that will make you forget what you had seen in Vietnam."

"There is no exit from Iraq except in immediate withdrawal," said Zawahiri. "Any delay in taking that decision means nothing but more dead, more losses."

Blair's office declined to comment, but in a news conference at his Crawford, Texas ranch, President Bush responded: "They're terrorists and they're killers. And they will kill innocent people trying to get us to withdraw from the world so they can impose their dark vision on the world. We will stay the course; we will complete the job in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0002242

Two Women Charged In London Bomb Probe (AJC/AP)

By Jill Lawless, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, August 5, 2005

LONDON — British police investigating the botched London subway attack of July 21 said Thursday they had charged two sisters for failing to disclose information under anti-terror laws. The city's nerves were further rattled by a message from al-Qaida warning of more bloodshed, but people made efforts to carry on.

In a show of force, officers armed with submachine guns patrolled uncrowded subway stations and police helicopters hovered over city streets as one of the busiest Underground lines reopened Thursday — four weeks to the day after suicide bombers killed 52 people.

Undercover officers mixed with a lighter-than-usual load of subway commuters — many Londoners no doubt mindful that terrorists had attempted similar attacks exactly two weeks after the deadly July 7 transit bombings.

"People didn't seem frightened or apprehensive, they were just reading their newspapers and getting on with things, just as the English do," said commuter Pat Wish.

It is clear, however, that the attacks have changed the city.

London's transport authority said subway ridership — normally 3 million passengers daily — had fallen between 5 percent and 15 percent on weekdays and 30 percent on weekends. Hotels have reported cancelations and large downtown stores say sales are down.

There are signs of fraying in London's famously diverse social fabric, too. London police have recorded a 600 percent increase in crimes motivated by religious hatred since the suicide bombings.

"I'm a little bit anxious, I suppose," said Robert Allen, 20, as he waited to board a subway at King's Cross station. "I can't help feeling wary of people who get on the train, and watching what they're doing."

Officials stressed there was no specific intelligence pointing to a third attack, but mounted an operation involving 6,000 officers aimed at reassuring the public. Both the July 7 bombings and the July 21 failed attacks occurred on Thursdays.

Officers armed with automatic rifles and pistols patrolled stations and streets. Police helicopters hovered above, and traffic was heavier than normal.

"This is a major threat and we are doing everything we can, both covert and undercover policing, to try to stop another attack," said Deputy Chief Constable Andy Trotter of the Transport Police.

In a message broadcast Thursday, al-Qaida No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahri linked the attacks to Prime Minister Tony Blair's decision to send troops to Iraq. "Blair has brought to you destruction in central London, and he will bring more of that, God willing," al-Zawahri said.

He did not directly claim responsibility for the attacks in London.

Blair's Downing Street office declined to comment, but Blair has strongly rejected any links between the attacks and Britain's presence in Iraq.

Many Britons feel differently.

"The war in Iraq has turned into a quagmire that neither side can win, and now it's spreading to Britain via these terrorist bombings," said Shawn Fahy, a 23-year-old store clerk.

Police have not established firm links between the London bombings and al-Qaida, or between the two sets of bombings. In both cases, attackers targeted three subway trains and a bus, but on July 21 the devices failed to explode fully and no one was hurt.

Transport authorities on Thursday reopened the Piccadilly Line, the subway line worst-hit on July 7. Service had been suspended over much of the route since a bomb exploded on a train near King's Cross station, killing 26 commuters and the attacker.

Mayor Ken Livingstone said the reopening was "a major milestone in London's recovery."

But morning rush hour was noticeably lighter on the Tube. Commuters granted the rare luxury of a seat buried themselves in newspapers or listened to headphones as the train passed the spot between King's Cross and Russell Square stations where the bomber struck.

"The trains are really empty, which is a bit spooky," said Christine Hough, 51, an Underground employee. "People aren't coming back in the numbers that were expected."

Meanwhile, police charged sisters Yeshshiembet Girma, 29, and Muluemebet Girma, 21, of separate addresses in south London, with failing to disclose information under anti-terror laws.

The women, who were arrested July 27, were the second and third people to be charged in Britain in connection with the July 21 attacks. They were to appear in court on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0002243

The first person appeared in court Thursday. Ismael Abdurahman, 23, from southeast London, faces charges of withholding information that helped suspected subway bomber Hamdi Issac avoid capture.

Issac, suspected of trying to blow up a subway train July 21, later was detained in Rome. Britain has asked that Issac, also known as Osman Hussain, be extradited. His lawyer said a hearing was set for Aug. 17.

London police are continuing to detain 12 other suspects without charge, and Italy has three suspects. Police believe they have all the July 21 bombers in custody. There have been no arrests in the July 7 attacks, in which the four bombers are believed to have died.

At a briefing Wednesday, New York Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said the bombers used a peroxide-based explosive called HMDT, or hexamethylene triperoxide diamine, that can be made using ordinary ingredients such as hair bleach. New York officials said the explosives were stored in a commercial refrigerator, transported in beverage coolers and set off with cell phones.

"Initially it was thought that perhaps the materials were high-end military explosives that were smuggled, but it turns out not to be the case," Kelly said. "It's more like these terrorists went to a hardware store or some beauty supply store."

Police spokesman Paul Browne initially said the department had clearance to present the information. On Thursday, however, he said he had been mistaken but insisted "all the information in the briefing was from open and unclassified sources."

Rumsfeld: London Attacks Not Retaliation (AJC/AP)

By Ryan Pearson, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, August 5, 2005

LOS ANGELES — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Thursday rejected as "nonsense" the notion that recent terrorist attacks in London were retaliation for the U.S.-led war in Iraq.

"Some people seem confused about the motivations and intentions of terrorists and about our coalition's defense of the still young democracies in Afghanistan and Iraq," Rumsfeld said in a speech to the Los Angeles World Affairs Council.

"They seem to cling to the discredited theory that the recent attacks in London and elsewhere, for example, are really in retaliation for the war in Iraq or for the so-called occupation of Afghanistan," he added. "That is nonsense."

In a videotape broadcast earlier Thursday, the second-in-command for the al-Qaida terrorist network, Ayman al-Zawahri, threatened more destruction in London, saying that British Prime Minister Tony Blair would be to blame.

Al-Zawahri also threatened the United States with tens of thousands of military dead if it does not withdraw its troops from Iraq immediately.

In his speech, Rumsfeld reiterated his oft-stated assertion that Syria is helping the insurgency in Iraq. He said it is acting as a haven for Baathist former members of the Saddam Hussein regime who fled Baghdad after the U.S. invasion, and allowing insurgents to cross its border with Iraq. He said the Syrians are making a mistake.

"What they're doing is harmful ultimately to themselves," he said. "They're going to have to live in that neighborhood, and Iraq doesn't like what Syria is doing. And Iraq is going to be in that neighborhood for a very long time and it's a bigger country and it will be a more powerful country."

Rumsfeld, meanwhile, paid tribute to the 21 Marines killed this week in Iraq, including the 14 killed Wednesday by a single roadside bomb near the city of Haditha in western Iraq.

"Patriots, they were determined to stop the terrorists from reclaiming Iraq and from launching more attacks on our people," he said. "Our nation needed them, called on them in battle, and mourns them now in death."

Rumsfeld spoke broadly about President Bush's rationale for fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan — "the only way to defeat terrorism is to go after them where they are" — but said little about the administration's plan for turning over the security mission in Iraq to the Iraqis. He did suggest that the goal is within reach.

"Once Iraq is safely in the hands of the Iraqi people, and a government that they elected under a new constitution ... , our troops will be able to ... come home with the honor they will have earned," he said, without elaborating.

In response to a question from his audience about the U.S. military strategy in Iraq, Rumsfeld said that a key to getting U.S. forces out of Iraq is getting enough Iraqi government forces trained to take over.

"We're passing off pieces of real estate to the Iraqis as fast as they are capable of taking it over," he said.

Muslim Edict Slammed For Not Condemning Al Qaeda (WT/AP)

By Rachel Zoll, Associated Press

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

The fatwa condemning religious extremism recently issued by American Muslim groups was so broad it was meaningless, and should have denounced specific terrorist groups including al Qaeda, critics within the U.S. Muslim community say.

DOJ_NMG_0002244

Critics also say the declaration seemed geared more toward improving the faith's image rather than starting an honest discussion about Islamic teaching.

"The bulk of the Islamic tradition as it exists does stand against these lunatic, savage attacks on civilians," said Omid Safi, a Colgate University religion professor and chairman of the Progressive Muslim Union, an American reform group.

"But I would be more inclined to say there are elements of extremism in many parts of our tradition. Rather than simply saying these are not a part of Islam, I would acknowledge that these trends are there and do away with them."

Muqtedar Khan, a political scientist at the University of Delaware and author of "American Muslims: Bridging Faith and Freedom," said it appeared the main aim of last week's fatwa was protecting U.S. Muslim groups from criticism. And the edict may have fallen short of even that goal, he said.

"They should have been at least specific about events, if not individuals or organizations. They did not condemn al Qaeda or [Osama] bin Laden. It would have had more punch to end all these claims that American Muslims are not doing enough to end terrorism if they had," Mr. Khan said.

Ibrahim Hooper, spokesman for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a Washington-based group that endorsed the fatwa, said no specific groups were named because "it would have been a laundry list."

"I think you can safely regard anyone listed on the State Department list [of terrorist groups] as included," Mr. Hooper said. That list includes the Islamic militant group Hamas, which many Palestinians believe is waging a legitimate fight against Israel.

"It's not likely that someone who is already considering some act of terrorism would be dissuaded by this, but you never know if you're going to prevent someone from going on the ideological road that would lead them to this activity," Mr. Hooper said.

Muslims around the world have been under renewed pressure to denounce terrorism following last month's deadly bombings in Britain and Egypt, along with the drumbeat of insurgent attacks on civilians and coalition troops in Iraq.

The U.S. fatwa, written by the Fiqh Council of North America, an advisory committee on Islamic law, said nothing in Islam justifies terrorism targeting civilians. The council further declared that Muslims were obligated to help law enforcement protect civilians from attacks.

Fiqh Council chairman Muzammil H. Siddiqi said the edict applied even when a Muslim country has been taken over by a foreign power. In Britain last month, two groups of Muslim leaders separately denounced the July 7 London attacks, but one said suicide bombing could still be justified against an occupying power, while another said it could not.

"Occupation is wrong, of course, but at the same time this is not the way," Mr. Siddiqi said.

Yet Abdullahi An-Na'im, who specializes in Islamic law and human rights at Emory University, said the American fatwa was misleading. He said the scholars could not say "in good faith" that Islamic law, called Shariah, required Muslims to assist an invader.

"What is Shariah's position on an invasion or occupation of a Muslim country by a non-Muslim country? Put bluntly in those terms, I don't think that any credible scholar could say this is legitimate," Mr. An-Na'im said. "If the same group of scholars were asked to issue a fatwa over the U.S. invasion and occupation of Iraq, which is the underlying thing, what would that fatwa be and how would Americans feel about it?"

The debate is complicated by the fact that Islam has no ordained clergy or central authority, like a pope, who can hand down definitive teaching.

Islamic leaders with conflicting views on violence regularly claim they are authorized to issue the edicts. Islam in America itself is a mix of millions of immigrants and U.S.-born converts with diverse outlooks.

London's Bombs Go Off Inside America's Head (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

On September 11, 2001, Islamic terrorists flew two planes into the World Trade Center, one into the Pentagon and one into rural Pennsylvania. In just over an hour, they killed nearly 3,000 Americans. Not more than a year later, nothing was more important in the lives of many Americans than that they extinguish the Patriot Act and drive George Bush and every remnant of his presidency from office, including the "unconstitutional" war on terror.

March 11, 2004, terrorists cut from the same Islamic cloth as September 11 blew up four Spanish commuter trains, covering Madrid's main station with parts of 191 dead people and 1,460 others, often horribly wounded. But the needle hardly moved in the politics of "George Bush's war on terror." In the U.S., nothing was more important than "closing" a holding pen for Islamic terrorists in Cuba.

July 7, 2005: the London bombings. In the four weeks since this happened, I have talked about it, on the West Coast and East Coast, with people one could describe as "non-Bush voters." To a man and woman, they say in so many words that the time has come to "get tough on the terrorists." One event, London, appears to have caused an internal reassessment among some Americans formerly ambivalent about the war on terror.

Profiling, a forbidden thought in some political quarters since hyper-thyroidic New Jersey state cops were rousting black people on the turnpike, is a subject for polite company. After years of reading how our "policies" were creating Islamic recruits to jihad, the London bombing has created recruits for the war on terror.

What happened?

Reality happened. September 11 was, in a sense, unreal. T.S. Eliot reflected in 1922 on "unreal" post-war London: "I had not thought death had undone so many/Sighs, short and infrequent, were exhaled/And each man fixed his eyes before his feet." I think for some, what happened that day -- passenger planes flown into buildings, the slow death of the towers -- was just too much, off the charts, a trauma and a personal concussion. Something like that.

July 7 London was more comprehensible. Americans were able to absorb London more clinically, observers from afar. London also happened to an English-speaking people, so every televised comment back to the U.S., from the first witnesses to the police reports of apprehended and named terrorists, was understood and internalized. Then the British media, God bless them, reduced the madness to one, right cliché: The bombers are our neighbors. Three years in, the battle lines finally come clear.

The American psyche, or some part of it, has seemed disinclined to believe terrorists could be anything other than invaders from another planet. Seasonal, like the hurricanes. No matter that the Lackawanna Six, who pleaded guilty to terrorism charges, were as much "the neighbors" in upstate New York as the bombers from London's suburbs. No matter that the trial of the 1993 World Trade Center bombers revealed they too were "the neighbors," or worse, a fifth column.

No matter. Within a year of September 11, one of the most controversial, bitterly contested parts of the Patriot Act was the provision on surveillance of books checked out at the library.

We had become captive to the wrong media cliché. Saying 9/11 "changed everything" meant nothing. That allowed another cliché to take hold and define the policy debate after 9/11: Whatever else, we can't "sacrifice our fundamental values." (I think much of this had to do with the fact that the opposition personally didn't like the Patriot Act's designated evangelist, John Ashcroft, especially after hearing he held Bible readings at work.)

The London bombings imprinted on hard-wired political minds the crude fact that Islamic terrorists have reduced the taking of lives they don't like to a banality. They play cricket or go rafting, and then they blow up the neighbors. It was easier than ever to connect the dots of the July 7 narrative: The London "neighbors" look like they're out to get us.

No, we are not going to flush John Locke and Thomas Jefferson down the toilet. "Speech," no matter how stupid, will remain free and protected; vocalized incitement to violence against the neighbors won't. Some of the Patriot Act's most aggressive measures, such as searches of personal and business records, almost surely will be sunsetted in the final bill. Courts will pre-clear and review some investigations. The FBI Director himself must press his seal to library and bookstore searches. * * *

Tony Blair said last week that after September 11 much of the world "turned over and went back to sleep again." So why won't Ambien and Valium induce again the sleep of fatal innocence? The sleeper cells, if they're sharp, will play cricket and pump gas for two years while the West's politicians and editorialists convince the new anti-terror recruits that the war's tactics are still worse than the threat.

I think the burden for preventing that, for consolidating the new center-left recruits, lies with President Bush. The post-9/11 slumber was both psychological and political. It became a partisan mindset. London was electroshock therapy. Mr. Bush needs to speak to his public opposition, suggest some understanding of their former discomfort and restate the stakes. Why? Because the widest and deepest possible popular opposition to Islam's homicidal strain is crucial to ending it. Their primary target is the public will. They need to see, not now but two years from now, amid a presidential election, that on July 7, they blew it.

Qaeda On The Run? Raids Seem To Belie Pakistani's Word (NYT)

By David Rohde And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Aug. 4 - President Pervez Musharraf has declared that his forces have smashed sanctuaries of Al Qaeda and have its last remnants "on the run" in his country's remote tribal reaches.

"They are in penny pockets in the mountains," he said in an interview on Friday of last week in his official military office. "We have severed their vertical and horizontal communication lines."

Yet with less than two months before parliamentary elections in Afghanistan, Al Qaeda, the Taliban and their assorted allies appear to be regrouping in the rugged tribal redoubts in this country's northwest and unleashing ever more frequent attacks on both sides of the border, Afghan and Pakistani officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0002246

Attacks in Afghanistan's south and east have grown in number, ruthlessness and sophistication. Meanwhile, Pakistan's tribal areas, particularly North and South Waziristan, have been engulfed in fresh violence: in the last two months, Pakistani government installations have increasingly come under fire, and tribal leaders seen to be colluding with the authorities have become ripe assassination targets.

United States intelligence officials have repeatedly said that Osama bin Laden is likely to be holed up in the Hindu Kush mountains along the frontier. Lately, Afghan and Pakistani officials have traded barbs about who is harboring whom, and who has failed to find them.

In Afghanistan, aides to President Hamid Karzai have grown increasingly vocal about what they call Pakistan's accommodation of pro-Taliban forces.

The Afghan government had believed that Pakistan was cooperating in stemming the Taliban insurgency after presidential elections passed peacefully last October, said Javed Ludin, chief of staff to President Karzai. But recent attacks, he charged, showed the opposite.

"We were mistaken, and in fact they were preparing," Mr. Ludin said of the Taliban.

General Musharraf's strategy against militants hiding in Pakistan's lawless mountains, as well as its urban swamps, has once more come under sharp scrutiny. Investigators looking into the July 7 London bombings are still trying to determine what two of the four bombers did, and whom they met, when they arrived in the Pakistani port city of Karachi last winter.

At the same time, though American officials are unbowed in their public support of the general, the increased attacks on Pakistani, Afghan and American forces along the border have raised fresh questions about his ability to neutralize militant groups operating there.

In the interview and at an earlier news conference for foreign journalists last Friday, General Musharraf made it clear that he had chosen to act cautiously against militancy for fear of inciting a popular uprising against his government.

"I don't bluff, but I do act with realism," he said at the news conference. "There are a lot of gray areas. Those gray areas have to be addressed with a lot of prudence and a lot of understanding."

Critics question the intentions and effectiveness of his three-and-a-half-year-old counterinsurgency strategy. Some wonder whether the general's foot soldiers, namely in the army and intelligence services, fully buy into his American-backed agenda, particularly as American policy on everything from Iraq to Israel to Guantánamo Bay feeds anti-American fire in this country. General Musharraf, as a result, finds himself having to tread carefully to not be seen as an American stooge.

Others point out that General Musharraf's drive to quash militancy comes in the face of a quarter-century-long practice of using many of those same Islamic guerrillas as part of Pakistani foreign policy.

General Musharraf himself acknowledged on Friday that Pakistani soldiers and intelligence agents trained, armed and dispatched up to 30,000 mujahedeen fighters, Pakistanis and foreigners, to topple the Soviets in Afghanistan in the 1980's. The tribal areas were the birthplace of that movement, which at the time had the support of the United States.

In his nation's defense, General Musharraf also angrily points out that Pakistan, for the first time, has dispatched troops to the lawless, semiautonomous tribal areas in an attempt to flush out Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters. Today, nearly 75,000 are said to patrol the border, and 250 have been killed.

The resurgent Taliban, the Pakistanis insist, are blossoming inside Afghanistan. Whatever the case, violence on Pakistan's side of the border has taken a vicious turn upward.

In recent weeks, at least one intelligence official and two tribal leaders known for helping government authorities against militants operating in their areas have been killed. Ten days ago, in a series of coordinated attacks, 40 rockets were fired in the direction of army and paramilitary posts across North Waziristan. On Thursday, five Pakistani soldiers were killed in a land mine blast in North Waziristan.

Asad Munir, the Peshawar-based secretary to the governor responsible for the tribal regions, said last week that he suspected fighters loyal to the Taliban, Al Qaeda and the renegade Afghan mujahedeen leader Gulbuddin Hekmatyar.

Mr. Munir said he believed the attacks were most likely being directed by commanders operating on both sides of the border. North Waziristan alone, he said, sheltered roughly 150 such commanders.

"The chilling effect is basically your informers, your sources dry up," he said. "Locally, people would be reluctant to meet an army officer or someone from intelligence agencies out of sheer fear."

In a telephone interview last week from an unnamed location in South Waziristan, a militant commander who refused to be identified for fear of undermining his group's operations boasted that his fighters were indeed crossing into Afghanistan, using routes beyond the two Waziristans.

"There are countless tracks and routes," he said. "We are better organized and better skilled to fight an enemy that is high-tech and sophisticated. To fight a snake you have to come down to the level of a snake."

DOJ_NMG_0002247

The current setbacks come after years of warnings that senior Al Qaeda leaders, including possibly Mr. bin Laden, are using the tribal areas as a safe haven.

In 2002, a senior Pakistani official described South Waziristan as the hub of Al Qaeda operations worldwide. In 2004 Pakistani investigators said a Pakistani computer engineer confessed to receiving messages by courier from Al Qaeda leaders hiding in South Waziristan, and relaying them to operatives via the Internet.

After a military offensive in South Waziristan in 2004, Pakistani officials boasted that they had cleaned up the area. A year later, even Pakistan's staunchest backers say they are no longer sure of Pakistan's control over South Waziristan. There are also new questions about whether militant operations are now being guided from inside North Waziristan. Several infiltrations into Afghanistan have originated from around Miram Shah there.

United States forces, who roam inside Afghanistan, are prohibited from operating on the ground on the Pakistani side of the border. Still, Pakistani officials said this month that 24 suspected fighters killed by American forces were found on the Pakistani side of the border; whether American troops chased them in "hot pursuit" remains unclear.

In the southern Afghan province of Zabul, a former Taliban field commander who identified himself as Mullah Said Mir said Wednesday that he was among a group of fighters who crossed back and forth from the Pakistani city of Quetta.

At a militant training camp in Quetta, he said, he had witnessed, as recently as a month ago, Taliban fighters training young Afghans with remote control bombs.

Pakistani Court Rules Against Islamic Bill (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Aug. 4 - Pakistan's Supreme Court ruled Thursday that some parts of a bill passed by the Islamist-led legislature in the North-West Frontier Province were unconstitutional, prompting the Islamists to say they would write a new draft.

The proposed bill - known as the accountability bill - set off a huge outcry in the country.

Human rights advocates and moderate elements of Pakistani civil society cringe at the thought of restricting the personal freedom that the Constitution guarantees. Many Pakistanis also view the bill as an effort similar to that of the former Taliban rulers in neighboring Afghanistan to impose strict enforcement of Islamic codes of conduct on everyday life.

But the measure's proponents, an alliance of conservative Islamic parties, see the move as a step toward putting into effect the Islamic laws they promised their supporters.

The conflict over the legislation is part of a tussle between the government of Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the president, who says he is trying to extricate the country from religious extremism, and the Islamic parties.

The assembly of the North-West Frontier Province passed the bill in July over opposition protests. It would empower religious police to ensure that residents of the province comply with Islamic values.

Afghanistan's Forgotten War (NYT)

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Afghanistan is out of the headlines, but its war against the Taliban goes on. These days, it is not going well. One of the most important reasons for that is the ambivalence of Pakistan, the nation that originally helped create, nurture and train the Taliban. Even now, Pakistan's military ruler, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, seems to invest far more energy in explaining his government's tolerance of Taliban activities than he does in trying to shut them down.

General Musharraf has provided logistical help to Pentagon operations and cooperation to American law enforcement agencies trying to track down Al Qaeda leaders. But his aid has been frustratingly selective. He has been an intermittent collaborator in the fight against international terrorism rather than a fully committed ally. Washington has been understandably reluctant to push him for more consistency, not wanting to risk losing the help he does offer.

Pakistan's passive enabling of the Taliban, however, is too important and dangerous for Washington to overlook. The current Taliban offensive is killing American soldiers - at least 38 have died in action so far this year, as well as hundreds of Afghans. It also endangers next month's parliamentary elections.

Successful elections are crucial to extending the geographical reach of Afghanistan's new national institutions. And they can provide needed political accountability for President Hamid Karzai, who now rules without an elected Parliament. Afghanistan will be a functioning democracy only when citizens can take their grievances against the central government to elected local representatives instead of to armed local warlords. Those grievances are real. Some governors and police chiefs Mr. Karzai has appointed are thuggish and corrupt. Antidrug efforts go after poor farmers while traffickers thrive. Alternative development lags. A lack of judges stymies the rule of law.

DOJ_NMG_0002248

Earlier this year, there were reasons to be hopeful about Afghanistan's future. The presidential election had gone off remarkably smoothly, and the absence of major attacks on polling places suggested that Pakistan was at last responding to Washington's pleas to rein in the Taliban. Mr. Karzai had begun easing notorious warlords out of cabinet ministries and provincial governorships. More money was being directed at antinarcotics efforts.

But once the snows began to melt this March, Taliban fighters started showing up in greater numbers and with suspiciously sophisticated gear in regions of Afghanistan that border Pakistan. Afghan military and intelligence officers are convinced that they are coming from Pakistani training camps.

General Musharraf says that he has sent tens of thousands of troops to police border areas. Yet well-supplied Taliban fighters keep showing up to battle American troops in Afghanistan. He insists that the training camps are still shut down and that he is committed to thwarting the Taliban, but says he must proceed cautiously so he doesn't inflame militant groups in Pakistan. That would be more persuasive had the general not spent close to six years marginalizing mainstream parties and cutting deals with Islamic extremists to reinforce his rule.

When questioned about why he has repeatedly violated his promises to restore civilian democracy, General Musharraf argues that he must retain power because Pakistan needs his strong and effective hand. Washington needs to ask him why that strong hand seems so helpless against the Taliban.

Tampa Prof Expressed 'Pride' In Suicide Bombing In Gaza Strip (BRAH)

The Bradenton Herald, August 5, 2005

TAMPA, Fla. - Sami Al-Arian expressed "pride" after learning of a 1994 suicide bombing attack that killed three Israelis, according to testimony Thursday in the former college professor's trial on charges of supporting a pro-Palestinian terrorist group.

Investigators intercepted a fax sent to Al-Arian's home bearing the logo of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad and claiming responsibility for an attack near Netzarim, Gaza Strip. A man on a bicycle carrying a bomb blew himself up among a group of Israelis.

Al-Arian faxed a message to the Damascus headquarters of the group that read: "Pride and glory overwhelmed us. May God bless your efforts and accept our martyrs," according to transcripts and testimony Thursday from FBI agent Kerry Myers.

Similarly, co-defendant Hatem Naji Fariz expressed pleasure during a wiretapped phone call upon hearing of another suicide attack, at Beit Lid, Israel, in 1995, which killed 22, saying the attack was accomplished by the "jihad movement" and commenting, "the whole world is pleased...", according to transcripts.

Myers, who is expected to be on the witness stand for weeks, has not been cross-examined by defense attorneys.

Al-Arian, Fariz and two others face a 53-count indictment alleging they used various charitable and educational entities in Tampa as fundraising fronts for the PIJ, which has claimed responsibility for more than 100 deaths in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The defendants deny they were involved in supporting any violent acts and say they are being persecuted for pro-Palestinian views unpopular in the United States.

Talks Centered On Payment To Jihad Members (TAMPTRIB)

By ELAINE SILVESTRINI

Tampa Tribune, August 5, 2005

TAMPA - Prosecutors read more transcripts of telephone conversations and faxes to jurors at the Sami Al-Arian trial Thursday morning.

The conversations centered on the fact that Islamic Jihad members outside the Middle East were not getting paid. They included Ramadan Shallah, Sameeh Hammoudeh and Bashir Nafi.

Al-Arian also faxed a proposal to unite the Islamic Jihad and Hamas to a phone number in the United Arab Emirates. And he received faxes from Islamic Jihad headquarters in Damascus, Syria, describing a recent attack and the arrests of Islamic Jihad members in the occupied territories of Israel.

Man Gets 3 Years For Sales Linked To Nuclear Arms (LAT)

By Josh Meyer

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — A federal judge sentenced black market trader Asher Karni to three years in prison Thursday, saying he wanted to warn others that the illegal sale of U.S. high-tech products could help foreign governments or terrorists obtain nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0002249

After hearing Karni apologize for selling blacklisted U.S. electronic components to companies in Pakistan and India, U.S. District Judge Richard M. Urbina told the former Israeli army major that no amount of contrition could make up for the potential threat posed by his actions.

"I want you to know how serious I think your conduct was," Urbina told Karni, emphasizing that he was sentencing him to a prison term longer than that requested by his defense lawyers to send a message to the public.

Citing Karni's extensive cooperation in an ongoing nuclear trafficking investigation, lawyers for the South Africa-based businessman had sought a 19-month sentence. That would have freed Karni immediately because he has been in federal custody since his arrest Jan. 1, 2004, at Denver International Airport.

Urbina shaved six years off the maximum term Karni could have received under complex federal sentencing guidelines, saying he was doing so because of Karni's cooperation.

But the judge said he was deeply troubled by Karni's central role in a conspiracy to sell U.S. high-tech components to firms in Pakistan and India that Washington believes are part of those countries' nuclear-weapons and missile programs.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Jay I. Bratt told the judge that Karni sold blacklisted products to entities in Pakistan and India on at least 17 occasions, a much larger number than authorities had previously disclosed.

Bratt, a veteran prosecutor in the U.S. Attorney's Office transnational/major crimes section, described the Karni case as perhaps the most serious threat to national security that he has encountered.

Urbina said he was most alarmed by Karni's admitted use in 2003 of a web of intermediaries to buy 200 precision electrical switches, known as triggered spark gaps, from a Massachusetts firm and then ship them to a business associate in Islamabad, the Pakistani capital.

At the time, Urbina said, Karni and the associate, Humayun Khan, knew that the U.S. government prohibited the sale of the components to Pakistan because of their potential use in detonating nuclear warheads. The two men went to great lengths to camouflage the end user, the judge said.

But two Commerce Department agents had received a tip from an informant in South Africa and were monitoring the shipment. They disabled the first shipment of 66 spark gaps before Karni received them and forwarded them to Khan, and later used Karni's cooperation to obtain a grand jury indictment of the Islamabad arms merchant, who had close ties to the Pakistani military.

Khan, who is no relation to Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan, who operated a global network that smuggled nuclear technology, has denied wrongdoing in interviews with the Los Angeles Times. U.S. authorities would not say Thursday whether they had requested his extradition from Pakistan. Pakistani officials also have had no comment on the case, except to deny trying to illegally purchase U.S. technology for their nuclear weapons program.

Bratt said in court Thursday that the U.S. government still did not know for whom Khan was purchasing the spark gaps or where the disabled components were.

But Bratt told the judge that the buyer was either the government of Pakistan and its nuclear program, another country that Pakistan was secretly helping with its nuclear program or a Pakistani political organization that supported "jihadist elements" or other rogue groups.

"The choices for the true recipient of the triggered spark gaps are not comforting," Bratt said.

He also told Urbina that, based on wiretapped conversations with several of his employees, Karni appeared to have tried to continue his trafficking operations even while in federal custody after his arrest.

Urbina, like Bratt, stopped short of specifically identifying the Islamabad government as the end user of the components Karni sent to Pakistan.

But he said unnamed foreign governments and terrorists "have become incredibly creative in finding ways to wreak death and destruction. These are incredibly malevolent people who wish to be armed with very bad things," such as nuclear weapons.

In the courtroom for Karni's sentencing were the two Commerce Department agents who have been investigating him and his alleged co-conspirators for the last two years.

The agents, James Brigham and David Poole, said they could not comment on the case or on their continuing investigation, for which they have tried to travel to Pakistan to conduct interviews.

They and others have been unable to do so, authorities have confirmed, in part because the departments of Commerce and Homeland Security have failed to gain adequate support from within the Bush administration to pressure Pakistan into letting them in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0002250

PATRIOT ACT:

NY Lawmakers Try Prying Anti-terror Dollars From Washington (AP)

By DEVLIN BARRETT, The Associated Press

AP, August 4, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) — Two New York lawmakers are trying to use the Patriot Act to get cities and regions at risk of terror attacks more federal help, a new legislative tactic designed to sidestep opposition from some senators from rural states.

Advertisement

House members Nita Lowey, D-Westchester, and John Sweeney, R-Clifton Park, have seen past efforts blocked in the Senate, where small states have greater influence.

Lowey and Sweeney are trying to change the way the government doles out security aid, so more of it is distributed based on risk. They've already helped engineer three successful House votes to change the funding formula, including one overwhelming 409-10 vote, but so far the Senate has failed to pass similar measures.

"It is very frustrating that the Senate has not been able to understand the error of their actions," said Lowey, who is hoping that by attaching her measure to the reauthorized Patriot Act — a top priority of the White House and Republican leaders — she and Sweeney may break the legislative logjam.

"This change is going to come, it's just a question of when and it's just a question of that small minority recognizing this is a question of national defense and not about pork," said Sweeney. "This really has nothing to do with New York City, this has to do with threat and threat information."

In the years since the 2001 attacks, the government has distributed a minimum percentage, some 0.75 percent, of security dollars to each state. For the current budget year, that meant about $11 million for each state before additional money was offered based on risk factors.

Sweeney and Lowey's amendment to the Patriot Act would lower that minimum percentage, freeing up more money to be distributed by risk. That money most often goes to protect metropolitan areas and critical infrastructure around the country.

Sen. Susan Collins, chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, has worked to make the minimum 0.55 percent, not nearly as low as Sweeney and Lowey would like.

Collins, R-Maine, argues her approach strikes the right balance between protecting cities and securing rural areas, and still boosts money for urban areas. Advocates for cities, including members of the 9/11 commission, contend much more of the money should be distributed based on risk.

Sweeney represents a mostly rural district but has been one of the loudest voices in the House for changing the way security funds are distributed.

"We need to change the culture of `just grab whatever pot of money you can and bring it home,' because we have to reduce our vulnerability," said Sweeney.

Senate and House negotiators must meet later this year to hammer out differences between the House and Senate versions of the Patriot Act reauthorization bill. The House version contains the Sweeney and Lowey amendment.

The Bush administration has pushed for the quick passage of the bill to reauthorize key provisions of the Patriot Act. The act was passed in response to the Sept. 11 attacks, and some provisions are set to expire at the end of the year.

The Patriot Act allowed expanded surveillance of terror suspects, increased use of material witness warrants to hold suspects incommunicado, and permitted secret proceedings in immigration cases.

The act has been criticized by some conservatives and liberals as weakening civil liberties.

Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., has spent the week meeting with intelligence officials in the Middle East, and said the anti-terror work being done in other countries proves the need of extending the Patriot Act.

"Law enforcement has to have strong powers because it is such a treacherous enemy and we can't have our hands tied behind our backs in any way," King said in a telephone interview from Egypt.

King has also visited with security officials from Jordan, Israel, and Austria.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Justice Department Effort To Eavesdrop On Airline Passengers Challenged (GOVEXEC)

By Chris Strohm

Government Executive, August 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002251

Two privacy groups asked the Federal Communications Commission this week to reject a proposal that would give the Justice Department sweeping new powers to eavesdrop on cell phone calls and Internet usage by airline passengers.

The Justice and the Homeland Security departments submitted several proposals to the FCC in May and July seeking authority to monitor the electronic communications of airline passengers. The proposals would allow Justice to record all electronic activity without a court order, identify any user by seat number, and automatically interrupt or shut down any communication.

In a petition filed Wednesday, the Center for Democracy and Technology and the Electronic Frontier Foundation argue that the FCC does not have jurisdiction to address the full range of constitutional, privacy and civil liberties concerns that are raised by the proposal. The groups also say the proposal would place undefined burdens on industry to comply.

CDT and EFF say that any action by the commission would violate the Constitution as well as the Administrative Procedures Act and the Communications Assistance for Law Enforcement Act. The groups claim that Justice is trying to do an end run around Congress and get the FCC to give it new authorities without proper public debate.

The Justice Department did not return a telephone call seeking comment Thursday.

"The commission should decline DoJ's requests, and should instead defer to Congress, which is the only body that can in the first instance consider the constitutional and policy problems raised by such unprecedented proposals," the groups wrote.

"We do not dispute the fact that law enforcement is able, under existing laws and without any action by the commission, to obtain a court order that permits the interception of the electronic communications of people in airplanes," the groups added. "Instead, the critical issues are whether the commission has any statutory authority whatsoever to impose anticipatory, full-time and warrantless interception of information about all communications of all airline passengers--a proposal seemingly drawn directly from George Orwell's 1984--and whether law enforcement should be given extraordinarily invasive design control over air-to-ground communications."

Assessments Find Threat Of Suicide Attacks In U.S. (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 - Confidential government assessments say that Al Qaeda remains intent on attacking targets in the United States and that suicide bombings are clearly "a preferred method of attack among extremists" in the wake of last month's terror attacks in London.

The July 7 attacks on the London transit system, as well as others overseas, have prompted American officials to reassess potential threats to targets in the United States. Their conclusions, circulated among law enforcement officials by the Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, differ little from many earlier assessments since the Sept. 11 attacks but make clear that officials see Al Qaeda as a continued threat at home.

Although American intelligence officials "do not believe the London attack necessarily presumes a similar attack against rail or mass transit targets in the United States, there has been consistent threat reporting for some time suggesting that terrorists may have an interest in targeting mass transit systems," according to a security bulletin on July 20.

A second security bulletin also prepared after the London bombings warned that in addition to setting off bombs on trains and subways, Al Qaeda might seek to derail trains or crash a truck carrying flammable material into trains.

Intelligence officials are also concerned that terrorists linked to Al Qaeda or other terrorist groups may again turn to airplanes as a method of attack by sending operatives to flight training schools or using "an increased number of operatives" in the aviation industry to evade tightened airport security measures.

Still another target considered vulnerable by intelligence officials are high-rise apartment buildings. In one potential terrorist plot that officials have previously linked to ones considered by Jose Padilla, an American citizen now imprisoned as an enemy combatant, the bulletin says Al Qaeda may consider renting rooms in a high-rise building and using natural gas as an explosive to destroy it. But it cautions that the feasibility of such a plot is questionable.

The bulletin suggests that fresh intelligence collected as recently as this spring showed that Al Qaeda "remains interested in striking the homeland to undermine U.S. security and damage the U.S. economy." Since the London bombings, American officials have tightened security at many mass transit systems and have been combing leads from Queens to Oregon in search of possible connections to the attacks. So far, officials say they have found no hard evidence to suggest any complicity or knowledge by anyone in the United States, nor have they found any evidence to suggest plans under way for an attack here.

"We have no specific credible information to indicate that an attack in the United States is imminent or that Al Qaeda operatives are in the United States to conduct a homeland attack," one of the intelligence bulletins concluded.

With federal officials seeking to provide law enforcement officers with quicker and more useful information to guard against terror attacks, some local officials have become more aggressive in developing their own policies and procedures.

DOJ_NMG_0002252

A group of police chiefs, frustrated by what they see as the slow pace of information from federal officials, has begun creating a network to share terrorist-related intelligence.

And the International Association of Chiefs of Police, with 20,000 members worldwide, has issued new training guidelines to its members advising them to have officers shoot a suicide bomber in the head to avoid a life-threatening detonation.

The new guidelines, which were developed before the London bombings and first reported Thursday by The Washington Post, represent a more deadly posture in dealing with the threat of possible suicide bombers, said Joseph Estey, who is president of the chiefs' association and the police chief in Hartford, Vt.

"These are new circumstances for us to deal with, and this is an aggressive policy to respond to a narrow set of circumstances," Chief Estey said in an interview Thursday. If an officer believes he is confronting a suicide bomber who may be about to explode a bomb, he said, the new guidelines "call for a head shot, which unfortunately is the securest way of disabling someone who may have a suicide device and may try to detonate it."

Chief Estey acknowledged that the shooting death last month in a London subway of a Brazilian man, whom the police mistakenly thought was a suicide bomber, underscored the tragic possibilities if the police make the wrong decision.

For an officer to make a spot decision on whether someone is a would-be suicide bomber "is a real tough question, and there are situations where you're not sure," he said. "But when you're making those decisions on the fly, you have to have the greater public good in mind and try to save other people's lives."

US Military To Increase Domestic Surveillance (CSM)

By Tom Regan

The Christian Science Monitor, August 5, 2005

The US Defense Department has developed a new counterterrorism strategy "that would increase military activities on American soil, particularly in the area of intelligence gathering." FoxNews reported Monday that this has caused a great deal of concern among civil liberties advocates who fear the possibility of the military "encroaching" on domestic law. "Do we want, as a free people, with the notion of privacy enshrined in the Constitution and based on the very clear limits and defined role of government, to be in a society where not just the police, but the military are on the street corners gathering intelligence on citizens, sharing that data, manipulating that data?" asked former Rep. Bob Barr (R) of Georgia, a constitutional law expert and civil libertarian. The plan, known as the "Strategy for Homeland Defense and Support," was released in early July without background briefings or a formal news conference. The document says the US government must have a "a multi-layered, preventive approach to national defense" in order to counter an "unconventional" enemy like Al Qaeda, which can attack anywhere at any time.

The Washington Post reported last month that the plan does not ask for new legal authority to use US military forces on US soil (which is prohibited by the Posse Comitatus act of 1848), and draws a "distinct line" between a leading role in overseas operations and a support role in domestic affairs.

In a related development, The New York Times reported in July that senior Pentagon planners are "challenging" the idea the US needs to be able to fight two wars on two fronts at the same time. Instead, they want to focus on fighting just one war, and "devoting more resources to defending American territory and antiterrorism efforts." In a nutshell, strategies that order the military to be prepared for two wars would argue for more high-technology weapons, in particular warplanes. An emphasis on one war and counterterrorism duties would require lighter, more agile forces - perhaps fewer troops, but more Special Operations units - and a range of other needs, such as intelligence, language and communications specialists. It's well-known that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld has long favored a "lighter, more agile force."

But critics of the Pentagon's new counterterrorism strategy still don't like what they see. Timothy H. Edgar, a national security specialist with the American Civil Liberties Union, said that while certain sections of the document have language that limits military action, they seem at odds with other sections. "They seem to be trying to have it both ways," Mr. Edgar told the Post.

Meanwhile, Mr. Barr says the Pentagon's plan is yet another attempt to revive the failed Total Information Awareness (TIA) project, which he called a "massive, centralized information database using public and private records of individuals" that was killed by Congress in 2002. "This is TIA back with a vengeance," said Barr. "What they have come up with here is a much vaguer and much broader concept that sounds more innocuous. [The Pentagon] is getting much smarter in how to sell these things." James Carafano, a homeland security analyst with the conservative Heritage Foundation, disagreed with Barr, telling Fox News that "there is nothing new here" in the Pentagon's plan. "There are no new threats to privacy or constitutionality. I just think it's about doing [intelligence] more efficiently and effectively."

FloridaToday.com argued in an editorial Tuesday that there is already evidence that the government is abusing existing law to subvert the First Amendment rights of those opposed to the US government's policies. Last month, the FBI was forced under the Freedom of Information Act to reveal it has collected at least 3,500 pages of files on groups that have opposed Bush White House policies on the Patriot Act, Iraq war, civil rights and the environment.

DOJ_NMG_0002253

Among those targeted were the American Civil Liberties Union and Greenpeace. The FBI won't say what's in the files, and the ACLU has filed a lawsuit we hope it wins to find out.

Meanwhile the ACLU is criticizing the FBI's plans to "create a National Security Service within the FBI that reports to the Director of National Intelligence." "Spies and cops have different roles and operate under different rules for a very important reason: to ensure that our law enforcement agencies stay within the Constitution, [said Mr. Edgar]. This proposal could erode the FBI's law enforcement ethic and put parts of the FBI under the effective control of a spymaster who reports to the president - not the attorney general."

Also, in recent interviews with FoxNews former intelligence agents for the US military and the CIA claimed the "intelligence community" ignored threats from Osama bin Laden that were "detailed in television documentaries, books and all over the Internet in scores of languages" before 9/11 because they were "open source." These agents say this overreliance on 'secret' information "has caused an institutional bias against publicly available information that could otherwise help identify terrorist threats across the globe before the damage is done." "Everything we needed to know to prevent 9/11 was either known to elements of the US government but not shared across agency boundaries, or openly published in foreign language media we chose to ignore," said Robert Steele, a former clandestine officer who now heads Open Source Solutions Network Inc., a global provider of open source networking and analysis training.

"[Al Qaeda] was publishing its plans and intentions publicly for years," Steele said. "All of the literature is quite clear." Finally, the Associated Press reported Wednesday that government watchdogs are investigating "slow responses" by the FBI to requests from local law enforcement officials and if these incidents show "FBI reluctance to adjust to law enforcement changes emphasizing cooperation after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks."

Civil-liberties Board Struggles Into Existence (WP/REU)

By Caroline Drees, Security Correspondent, Reuters

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - A civil-liberties board ordered by the U.S. Congress last year has never met to discuss its job of protecting rights in the fight against terrorism, and critics say it is a toothless, underfunded shell with inadequate support from President Bush.

Lawmakers including some Republicans, civil-rights advocates, a member of the Sept. 11 Commission and a member of the Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board have expressed concerns.

Lanny Davis, the only prominent liberal among the five people Bush nominated after a six-month delay, said he had not received a call from anyone related to the board since it was formally announced in June. Davis said he could not comment on specifics because the members had not yet met.

All four other panel members declined to comment.

The inactivity comes at a time when Congress is nearing reauthorization of several provisions of the Patriot Act, a controversial law that gave the government new powers to go after suspected terrorists.

Asked why it was taking so long to set the board up, Connecticut Republican Rep. Christopher Shays charged, "It's not a priority for the administration."

The intelligence reform law of December 2004 called for the oversight board in response to a recommendation from the Sept. 11 Commission, which feared increased governmental powers needed to fight terrorism could erode civil liberties.

Top White House officials have said the board would address those concerns, and get the resources needed to do the job.

But almost eight months after its inception, the critics say the panel still only exists on paper, and lacks the money, power and presidential backing to ensure the entire government respects Americans' rights.

The Bush-appointed panel "is a very watered-down board without the kinds of powers which I believe are necessary to provide credibility and authority, such as independent subpoena power ... and a bipartisan process in selection," said Richard Ben-Veniste, a former Sept. 11 commissioner.

WATCHDOG

"We don't think the board serves as a credible watchdog," said Tim Edgar, national security policy counsel at the American Civil Liberties Union.

One frequent complaint concerns the board's budget. Bush requested $750,000, which Congress doubled to $1.5 million.

The Department of Homeland Security's privacy office, with a similar mission limited to that department, alone has a roughly $13 million budget, said Bennie Thompson, the top Democrat on the U.S. House of Representatives Homeland Security Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0002254

"I don't think you can do it for a million and a half," Shays said.

Critics, including Thompson, also ask why it took Bush half a year to nominate the five board members when it acted much faster to implement other, more complex parts of the 2004 law. The U.S. Senate must still confirm the chairman and vice chairman after it returns from its summer recess.

Shays, New York Democratic Rep. Carolyn Maloney and other lawmakers have proposed an amendment granting the panel greater independence and powers, including subpoena authority.

Right now, Maloney said, "It does not have teeth. It does not have enforcement. It does not have strength behind it."

Asked for comment, the White House sent a copy of a June letter to Republican Sen. Susan Collins and Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman that said it would ensure the board had the resources to fulfill its mission and would re-examine the issue once the panel was up and running.

The two senators had written to the White House expressing concerns about the board's budget, as well as delays in setting it up and implementing other parts of the 2004 law.

"As we work to make America safer, it is equally important that we are careful to preserve the very liberties that we seek to protect," Collins told Reuters. "The board is critical in this regard."

Mary Fetchet, whose son died in the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001, criticized the slow pace, "I am really shocked that in many instances in Washington I feel that there's this attempt to go back to the status quo, while I feel there should be a sense of urgency."

Under 11th Circuit Ruling, Domestic Terror Acts Can Bring Stiffer Penalties (LAW)

By Carl Jones, Daily Business Review

Law.com, August 5, 2005

Terrorism against civilians does not need to cross international boundaries for a terrorist to receive a longer sentence than suggested by federal sentencing guidelines, the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled.

The unanimous decision reversed a Fort Lauderdale, Fla., federal judge's finding that he could not reach a higher sentence by treating Stephen John Jordi as a terrorist on his guilty plea in an alleged plot to firebomb abortion clinics in Florida.

The three-judge panel's unanimous ruling Monday could open the door to stiffer sentences for domestic terrorism against civilians.

Although recent U.S. Supreme Court decisions have made federal sentencing guidelines advisory rather than mandatory, guidelines must still be considered before a judge decides a sentence.

The panel agreed with prosecutors that U.S. District Judge James I. Cohn could have gone higher than the guidelines. At issue in U.S. v. Jordi are rules developed by the U.S. Sentencing Commission to help judges interpret the guidelines.

"The district court determined the guideline range and then improperly determined that it could not grant an upward departure," wrote U.S. District Judge L. Scott Coogler of Alabama who was sitting on the panel by designation. "As a result, the guidelines were improperly applied and, thus, were not appropriately consulted."

Under the guidelines, an enhancement, or increased sentence, for a particular offense is an option when crimes like murder, kidnapping and arson were committed in an attempt to intimidate the government.

In Jordi's case, the government invoked a footnote allowing judges to consider an "upward departure," which is at the judge's discretion.

The Coconut Creek man was arrested in November 2003 just before the firebombing campaign was to begin. Jordi had checked out possible targets in South Florida but later shifted his focus north.

Jordi corresponded with imprisoned anti-abortion activist Paul Hill, who fatally shot a doctor and volunteer escort outside a Pensacola, Fla., women's clinic in 1994. Hill was executed in September 2003.

"I do not have the means to kill abortion doctors, but I do have the means to bomb clinics," Jordi told an informant. "Maybe that way I can dissuade other doctors from performing abortions."

He was indicted on charges of attempted arson, distributing information on the manufacture of an explosive device and possessing an unlicensed handgun silencer.

The government dropped the other charges in exchange for Jordi's guilty plea to attempted arson, which carries a five-year sentence by statute.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney John Schlesinger, now a Miami-Dade Circuit judge, argued that Jordi should receive a stiffer sentence because his plans to target churches he thought were too liberal, abortion clinics and gay bars were meant to "intimidate and coerce a civilian population."

Prosecutors contended that qualified him for an increased sentence under the sentencing guidelines applying the Antiterrorism and Death Penalty Act of 1996 and asked for a prison term of seven to 10 years.

At Jordi's sentencing hearing, Cohn said, "A higher sentencing range would more appropriately address the seriousness of the defendant's conduct." But he agreed with Assistant Federal Defenders Anne Lyons and Michael Spivack that the statutory definition of terrorism required that the crime "transcend national boundaries."

Cohn denied the government request for a harsher sentence than advised by the guidelines handbook and imposed a five-year prison term, setting the stage for the government's appeal.

The 11th Circuit said geography is not an issue in the sentencing guidelines for terrorism targeting civilians. The panel said guidelines require a two-pronged test: intent to scare civilians and whether the underlying crime is listed in the anti-terrorism law.

The 11th Circuit quoted the sentencing commission's reasoning in the U.S. Sentencing Guidelines manual: "The amendment adds an encouraged, structured upward departure ... for offenses that involve terrorism but do not otherwise qualify as offenses that involved or were intended to promote 'federal crimes of terrorism' for purposes of the terrorism adjustment."

Circuit Judges Joel Dubina and Charles Wilson also heard the appeal.

Jordi's sentence was vacated and his case was sent back to Cohn for resentencing.

'Safety Net' Group Created For Iranian-Americans (SFChron/AP)

San Francisco Chronicle/AP, August 4, 2005

Civil rights groups are creating what they call a "safety net" for Iranian-Americans.

Organizers of a campaign called "Iranian-American Know Your Rights" will hold town-hall meetings and try to bring together Iranian-Americans with FBI and Department of Homeland Security representatives.

The first meeting is planned for Los Angeles later in August or September.

"In the last 10 months, our office has received an unprecedented number of Iranian-American calls ... saying they're being subjected to FBI interviews and surveillance, security-clearance denials after they've had them for 25 years," said Banafsheh Akhlaghi, president of the National Legal Sanctuary for Community Advancement, a San Francisco civil rights group.

Valerie Smith, a spokeswoman for the Department of Homeland Security in Washington D.C., said Thursday the organization is "deeply committed to preserving civil rights and liberties."

She said Homeland Security leaders have met with similar groups and relayed their concerns.

"We attempt to foster relationships with communities — it's one of the most important things we can do," she said.

Rights Groups Focus On Iranians (MERCN)

By Katherine Corcoran

The San Jose Mercury News, August 5, 2005

Several prominent civil rights groups are coming together to create a safety net for Iranian-Americans, who have reported a spate of discrimination cases in the Bay Area in recent months -- from more FBI interrogations to loss of longtime security clearances.

Called Iranian American Know Your Rights, the campaign is designed to get information to a community, largely in the South Bay and on the Peninsula, that is traditionally highly educated and professional, but also very low profile.

``In the last 10 months, our office has received an unprecedented number of Iranian-American calls . . . saying they're being subjected to FBI interviews and surveillance, security-clearance denials after they've had them for 25 years," said Banafsheh Akhlaghi, president of the National Legal Sanctuary for Community Advancement, a San Francisco-based civil rights group for Muslims and people of Middle Eastern and South Asian heritage.

167 complaints

Akhlaghi said the rise coincides with the Bush administration's tough talk on Iran, the same phenomenon that occurred among Afghans and Iraqis in this country just before the United States declared war on their home countries. Her office has received 167 complaint calls since last fall, and for the first time since Sept. 11, 2001, the vast majority are from Iranian-Americans.

In her previous work as an immigration attorney, most calls have come from residents of other Middle Eastern or South Asian communities.

``Each time the government speaks out about one of these countries, it seeps into the society as well," she said.

Like other immigrant communities, many Iranian-Americans are afraid to report discrimination cases, particularly to federal agencies.

Services listed

The campaign includes spreading information about services available to help fight discrimination through the Internet and Iranian and mainstream media. They also plan town-hall meetings, bringing members of the Iranian-American community together with representatives of the FBI and Department of Homeland Security to build better relations. The first such meeting is planned for Los Angeles later in August or September.

DOJ_NMG_0002256

Along with the National Legal Sanctuary and the ACLU, groups involved include Amnesty International, the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights, the federal Equal Opportunity Employment Commission and the Iranian American Political Action Committee. The groups are focusing on fighting racial profiling, providing free legal representation and offering help with employment discrimination.

The campaign is part of an overall effort since Sept. 11, 2001, to track discrimination and hate crimes against Middle Eastern and South Asian communities. But Bay Area Iranian-Americans require special efforts, said Dalia Hashad of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Iranians are Persian, not Arabic, and speak Farsi.

``We weren't reaching the communities through our traditional outreach," Hashad said, ``going to mosques and putting stuff out in Arabic."

New York Police Sued Over Subway Searches (WP)

By Michelle Garcia

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

NEW YORK, Aug 4 -- The New York Civil Liberties Union sued the city's police department Thursday, calling the random search of subway riders' bags unconstitutional and ineffective.

The lawsuit -- filed in a federal court on behalf of five subway passengers, including the son of a retired police captain and a naturalized citizen -- alleges that the program violates constitutional rights that protect against illegal searches and guarantee due process.

New York City's transit system is the first in the nation to institute regular, random checks of passenger bags. The searches began July 21, after terrorist suicide bombings two weeks earlier in London's transit system killed 52 bystanders. Critics not aligned with civil liberties activists also say the searches are ineffective but say they want police to begin racial profiling of passengers to emphasize searches of young men of Middle Eastern or Asian descent.

Civil liberties advocates said searches that are not based on suspicion do little to protect the public, particularly when mass-transit riders who refuse to submit to the searches are allowed to enter the subway system at another station.

"People are allowed to walk away, ensuring that only innocent people are searched," said Donna Lieberman, executive director of the NYCLU, who called the searches a "civil liberties surcharge on a Metrocard."

The searches are performed on a rough mathematical formula of one out of five to 10 people depending on foot traffic, according to police officials.

New York subways move 4.7 million passengers, nearly half of the nation's mass-transit riders. New Jersey riders boarding trains to New York recently became subjected to similar searches.

Gail Donoghue, special counsel in the city's legal department, called the NYCLU "shortsighted" and said in a written statement that the program "preserves the important balance between protecting our City and preserving individual rights."

City police officials said they have received no complaints about the policy.

The Supreme Court has approved the use of checkpoints in special circumstances, but in 2000 the court ruled that random searches could not be employed for the "ordinary enterprise of investigating crimes."

A plaintiff in the NYCLU lawsuit, Joseph Gehring Jr., the son of a retired police captain and a "lifelong Republican," said he began avoiding police checkpoints after his bags were searched. "I've been forced to act like a criminal in my own city when I have done nothing wrong," said Gehring, who lamented a lack of opposition by New Yorkers to the program. "We are becoming accustomed to having our liberties taken away."

New York state Assemblyman Dov Hikind (D) plans to introduce legislation in the state legislature within two months that will empower police officers to single out people based on national origin and ethnicity.

"Police officers need to keep specific attention to young people -- Middle Eastern, South Asian -- based on a profile that is so obvious," Hikind said.

New York City Council member James S. Oddo (R) said he will introduce a nonbinding resolution in support of the legislation.

On a Manhattan-bound subway, Princess Alexander, 38, offered her conditional support for the police searches, saying, "This is what we have to live with right now." But Alexander, an office manager, said she is opposed to racial profiling. "We have been singled out," said Alexander, who is black.

NYC Sued Over Police Subway Bag Searches (AJC/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0002257

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, August 5, 2005

NEW YORK — Five city subway riders and a civil liberties group sued the city Thursday to stop random police inspections of bags in subways, calling the searches ineffective, unconstitutional and a publicity stunt that does not enhance safety.

"It's a needle-in-the-haystack approach to law enforcement," said Donna Lieberman, executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union, which filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

She and other members of the group who spoke at a news conference to announce the lawsuit said they want police to stop terrorists and improve safety, but not with useless measures designed to give subway riders a false sense of security.

Christopher Dunn, the New York Civil Liberties Union's associate legal director, said the policy announced July 21 was akin to a random search of people's bags and packages on public streets and a violation of a fundamental civil right.

But Gail Donoghue, a city lawyer, said the subway searches meet all legal requirements and preserve "the important balance between protecting our city and preserving individual rights."

She added, "We believe the NYCLU is shortsighted in failing to recognize this. We are confident our position will prevail in court."

Spot checks by the NYCLU since the policy began show that police conduct the searches at few stations with little effect since anyone can refuse the search and enter the subway's 468 stations at another point, he said.

As a result, he said, only innocent people are subjected to the unreasonable search and seizure that the Constitution outlaws.

"What is the point of searching a bunch of grandmas going down the subway steps with their Macy's bags?" he asked.

Mayor Michael Bloomberg said he was disappointed that the NYCLU was challenging the tactic.

"The plan that we've come up with, where it's random and fair to everybody and adds to the security of this city, is the appropriate thing, and I'm just sorry that they've chosen to go in this direction," he said.

Among five plaintiffs was Brendan MacWade, 32, who escaped the World Trade Center towers after they were struck by hijacked planes on Sept. 11, 2001.

"I want to catch terrorists as much as any politicians or officials but this policy does not work," he said.

Homeland Security To Conduct Gas Tests In Midtown, Subways (NSDY)

By Bryn Nelson

Long Island Newsday, August 5, 2005

Amid heightened anti-terrorism vigilance in New York City's subways, a mammoth Department of Homeland Security-sponsored project starting as early as Saturday will seek to answer how harmful gases might disperse through midtown's streets and the warren of subway tunnels beneath them.

The simulation, which will use colorless, odorless and harmless "tracer" gases, follows a smaller effort in March that focused on the Madison Square Garden area. This time, a team of more than 150 researchers and volunteers working on the Urban Dispersion Program's second field study will fan out over a much larger section of midtown, ranging from 37th to 59th streets and from 10th to Third avenues, and including stations along the Broadway subway line and other lines in the area.

Scientists will release the gases at four of eight possible locations above ground, depending on the wind, within an office building and on a subway platform of the Broadway line at 50th Street and Seventh Avenue.

Six separate experiments are planned over the next three weeks, with specific dates dependent on the weather, and the subway portion planned for the final three release dates.

"We'll be looking at the interaction of the subways in how the gases are dispersed," said Paul Kalb, a senior research engineer at Brookhaven National Laboratory. "If we release on the ground level, the street level, some of the material may be drawn into the subways and moved around that way."

Likewise, releasing a gas in the subway will tell researchers whether that gas remains within the tunnel system or drifts up to street level, and how it disperses.

One of the substances is known as PFT, or perfluorocarbon tracer gas, a safe and extensively used labeling compound. Jerry Allwine, the project's lead scientist and an engineer with the Pacific Northwest National Laboratory in Richland, Wash., said the second type of benign tracer gas, known as sulfur hexafluoride, also has been used for years. With it, scientists can measure exposure rates at one-second intervals.

To collect the reams of data expected from the experiments, electronic monitors will be positioned on rooftops, in subway stations, in baskets hanging from lampposts, in a half-dozen unmarked vans, and in the pockets of volunteers simulating the movements of pedestrians and subway riders.

Another experiment in a midtown office building will analyze how air flows inside and exchanges with the air outside.

For more information, see http://urbandispersion.pnl.gov.

Eight Charged In DMV Bribe Scheme (SFC)

By Henry K. Lee, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, August 5, 2005

(08-04) 12:14 PDT Oakland (SF Chronicle) -- Eight people, including four employees of the state Department of Motor Vehicles office in Oakland, have been charged in a scheme in which some of the DMV workers allegedly accepted thousands of dollars in bribes in exchange for providing driver licenses, identification cards and registration stickers for cars that did not pass smog tests, authorities said today.

Four of the defendants, including three DMV employees, appeared in U.S. District Court in Oakland this morning on charges that they accepted bribes to sell identification documents to non-U.S. citizens. All four were ordered to return to court Friday for further proceedings.

"The federal charges unsealed today allege that public employees accepted cash bribes to provide seemingly valid driver licenses to individuals not lawfully present in the United States," San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said in a statement. "Upon learning of these allegations, federal and state law enforcement agencies aggressively pursued this investigation in an effort to identify all the employees engaging in such conduct."

The DMV employees who appeared in court were Brachelle Fifer, 43, Stephanie Davis, 37, and Leneka Pendergrass, 27, all of Oakland. They were immediately released from custody, and all three declined comment outside court.

Another DMV employee, Frances Aliganga, 53, of Fairfield and Veronica Rivera, 53, of Daly City were indicted on charges of conspiring to defraud the DMV. Rivera, who is not a DMV employee, allegedly served as a "broker" of fraudulently obtained documents.

From about November 2003 through June 2005, authorities said, Rivera recruited individuals who were living illegally in the United States and offered to sell them a California driver license or ID card for $3,000 to $4,500 each.

Rivera allegedly provided fraudulently obtained -- but real -- social security numbers that her clients could use in their DMV applications. After accepting approximately half of the bribe payment in cash, Rivera arranged for her clients to meet with DMV employee Aliganga, who along with Fifer, Davis and Pendergrass worked at the DMV office at 5300 Claremont Ave. in Oakland, according to the indictment.

Aliganga processed the clients' applications, provided them with temporary driver licenses and had valid driver licenses mailed to them, authorities said.

To bypass legal requirements, Aliganga entered into DMV computers information indicating that clients had provided proof of legal presence when no such documentation had been provided. Federal prosecutors said she entered fraudulent social security numbers for some clients and had driver licenses issued to clients who had not taken either a written or driving examination.

In return for her circumventing required steps and falsifying information, Aliganga received from Rivera a share of the cash bribe that each client paid to Rivera, authorities said. According to the indictment, Aliganga's and Rivera's scheme resulted in the issuance of more than 200 fraudulent California driver licenses and ID cards.

Fifer was charged with conspiring to commit fraud for entering false information into the DMV computer system to circumvent legal requirements, including proof of citizenship, to issue driver licenses to clients who paid cash bribes. She accepted $100 in cash each time she helped one of Rivera's clients get a license, and Aliganga also paid Fifer as part of the scheme, authorities said.

Davis and Shahid Hamid, 45, an Oakland video store owner who is not a DMV employee, were charged with selling vehicle registration stickers to individuals whose vehicles never passed a required smog test and selling California driver licenses to individuals who had taken neither a written examination nor a driving examination.

Hamid, sometimes in connection with another individual, then worked with and through DMV employee Davis, who processed the fraudulent vehicle registration or fraudulent driver license in exchange for a cash payment, typically $100 to $200 to bypass the smog requirements and $500 to issue a fraudulent driver license.

Pendergrass and non-DMV employees Keith Williams, 40, and Adrian Gomez Zepeda, 31, both of Oakland, were charged with providing California driver licenses and identification cards to individuals by illegally obtaining the identity of another person and issuing driver licenses to their clients that reflected the name and personal identifiers of another individual.

To execute the scheme, the two allowed their clients to circumvent various required DMV procedures, authorities said. Williams and Zepeda also allegedly recruited individuals willing to pay hundreds of dollars to obtain a fraudulent driver license or to register a vehicle that could not pass California smog requirements.

The fraudulent driver licenses and vehicle registrations allegedly were then processed by Pendergrass.

DOJ_NMG_0002259

8 Charged In DMV Bribery Scheme (BAYCITY)

Bay City News Wires, August 5, 2005

OAKLAND, Calif. -- The U.S. attorney's office announced Thursday that eight people, including four California Department of Motor Vehicles employees, have been charged in an alleged scheme to provide false identification documents to more than 200 non-U.S. citizens.

Prosecutors allege that DMV employees accepted bribes of up to $4,500 in exchange for providing California driver's licenses and identification cards to people who are in the United States illegally.

In an indictment returned on July 14 and unsealed Thursday, DMV employee Frances Aliganga, 53, of Fairfield, and alleged broker Veronica Rivera, 53, of Daly City, are charged with conspiring to defraud the DMV, the state of California and the people of California of "the right to Aliganga's honest services."

According to the indictment, from about November 2003 through June 2005, Rivera, who was not a DMV employee, recruited non-citizens and offered to sell them a California driver's license or identification card for $3,000 to $4,500 each.

Rivera allegedly provided fraudulently obtained, but real, Social Security numbers the clients could use in their DMV applications. After accepting approximately half of the bribe payment in cash, Rivera allegedly arranged for her clients to meet with Aliganga, who was a licensing and registration examiner at the DMV office in Oakland.

According to the indictment, Aliganga then processed these clients' applications and provided them with temporary driver licenses, and then caused valid driver's licenses to be mailed to them.

The indictment alleges that Aliganga entered into DMV computers that clients had provided proof of legal presence when, in fact, no such documentation was provided. She also is accused of entering fraudulent Social Security numbers for some clients. Some clients never took, let alone passed, written or driving exams.

Rivera gave Aliganga a share of the cash bribe that each client paid her, prosecutors said.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said in a statement, "Law enforcement has taken, and will continue to take, appropriate measures to minimize potential threats posed by this alleged conduct."

A second criminal complaint alleges that Brachelle Fifer, 43, of Oakland, input false information into the DMV computer system to circumvent legal requirements, including proof of citizenship, to issue driver's licenses to clients who paid cash bribes.

The complaint alleges that Fifer accepted $100 in cash each time she helped one of Rivera's clients get a California driver's license, and that Aliganga also paid Fifer for her role in the scheme.

A third complaint alleges that DMV employee Stephanie Denise Davis, 37, of Oakland, and Shahid Hamid, 45, of Oakland, sold vehicle registration stickers to individuals whose vehicles never passed a required smog test. They are also accused of selling driver's licenses to people who never took written or driving tests.

In a fourth complaint, DMV employee Leneka Pendergrass, 27, of Oakland, and non-DMV employees Keith Williams, 40, of Oakland, and Adrian Gomez Zepeda, 31, are charged with conspiring to provide California driver's licenses and identification cards to individuals by illegally using the identities of other people.

All four of the charged DMV employees -- Aliganga, Fifer, Davis, and Pendergrass -- were employed at the branch at 5300 Claremont Ave. in Oakland.

Aliganga and Rivera were previously charged by a criminal complaint and appeared before Magistrate Judge Wayne D. Brazil in Oakland in late June.

Rivera was released on a $500,000 bond secured by her home and various property of her relatives. Aliganga remains in custody.

Aliganga and Rivera are scheduled to appear before U.S. District Court Judge Claudia Wilken in Oakland on Monday.

Fifer, Davis, Hamid and Pendergrass were arrested Wednesday and were set to make their initial appearances before Brazil Thursday morning in Oakland. Zepeda is in custody on unrelated state charges.

The prosecution is the result of a two-year investigation by the FBI, the DMV, the Internal Revenue Service and the California Highway Patrol.

2 Jailed In Immigration Papers Plot (VP)

By TIM MCGLONE, The Virginian-Pilot

Virginian-Pilot, August 5, 2005

NORFOLK — A federal judge Thursday ordered a Central American man jailed on charges of producing phony immigration documents after learning that he had been convicted of manslaughter 15 years ago but had never been deported.

Margarito Diaz is one of two men charged in an investigation of mass-produced phony identifications used by illegal immigrants to remain in the country and obtain employment.

DOJ_NMG_0002260

Federal authorities arrested Diaz this week after executing a search warrant at his residence in Accomac in Accomack County . Another suspect, Perfecto Perez, was arrested after a similar raid at his home in Parksley, also in Accomack County.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael C. Moore said in court that Diaz "admitted he was involved in the large-scale production of documents."

The phony documents, Moore added, would have put illegal immigrants "on the fast track to U.S. citizenship."

Diaz has remained in this country despite a deportation order in 1990 following his conviction for involuntary manslaughter and failing to stop and provide aid at an accident, according to Moore and state court records. Moore said Diaz was involved in an alcohol-related fatal crash.

Records in Northampton County Circuit Court show that Diaz was convicted after being tried in 1989. Moore said Diaz served one year and 10 months in prison. Further details of the fatal crash were unavailable.

Court records show that Diaz is from Guatemala and that he has had an application for asylum pending at an immigration court in Northern Virginia. Immigration officials did not return calls for more information .

Magistrate James E. Bradberry ordered Diaz and Perez jailed without bond. But Bradberry had harsh words for immigration officials, questioning why Diaz was allowed to remain in the country. Immigration "has done absolutely nothing in the last 10 years," Bradberry said.

"It's only 9/11 that all of a sudden has gotten them off their butts," he added, referring to the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Agents from Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the FBI and the Virginia State Police conducted the raids.

At Diaz's home, agents found equipment, including a laminating machine, and paperwork capable of producing 500 fake identifications, including Social Security cards and permanent resident cards, Moore said. They also found $30,000 and a gun, he said.

Undercover agents in October had purchased two pairs of the documents from Diaz and in June purchased two pairs from Perez, according to court records. Each pair cost $120. Authorities said they were operating independently of each other.

Authorities would not comment on how many fake documents may have been sold or whether any were used in South Hampton Roads.

There have been numerous cases in recent years of illegal immigrants caught with phony work papers at area shipyards and military bases.

Diaz said in court papers that he worked in construction, earning $1,600 a month. He said he pays $375 a month for rent and supports three children.

Perez said in court records that he works for a Perdue chicken plant earning $1,800 a month and that he supports two children.

Reach Tim McGlone at (757) 446-2343 or tim.mcglone@pilotonline.com.

Still Not Ready In The ER (WP)

By Arthur Kellerman

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

One of the fundamental responsibilities of government is to coolly and dispassionately assess health threats against the populace and take decisive action to counter these threats.

Faced with the twin specters of mass casualties from international terrorism and emerging biological threats, our government has failed to take effective action on either front.

International terrorism's weapon of choice is explosives -- improvised and otherwise. The London attacks and the devastating Madrid bombings are only some of the more recent examples. Over the past decade terrorist bombings have caused many civilian deaths and injuries in Israel, Russia, Bali, Colombia, Iraq, Spain, Egypt, Yemen, Kenya, Tanzania, Argentina, Afghanistan, the Philippines and other places, including two U.S. embassies in Africa.

But unfortunately, rather than strengthen our nation's beleaguered emergency and trauma care system to meet this threat, the federal government has turned a blind eye to the problem. Across the United States, underfunded emergency rooms and trauma centers lack sufficient beds to meet their daily mission, much less absorb large numbers of victims from a terrorist attack. Few ambulance personnel know how to assess a blast scene or properly evaluate multiple casualties from a bombing. The tiny amount of federal funding ($3.5 million) devoted to trauma systems planning and development is being targeted for elimination by the House.

One reason we are so ill-prepared is that the bulk of federal preparedness funds have been poured into bioterrorism, a frightening but less likely threat. Over the past three years, billions in taxpayer dollars have been spent to purchase "sniffer stations," mount an ill-fated and ultimately unsuccessful vaccination campaign against smallpox, and stockpile antibiotics. There are 17 federally funded Centers for Public Health Preparedness in the United States that focus exclusively on biological and other exotic weapons of mass destruction. There is not one focused on civilian injuries from explosives.

DOJ_NMG_0002261

But at least we are safer from biological agents, right? Well, no. Two years after SARS had a devastating impact in Southeast Asia and in Toronto -- arguably one of the most medically sophisticated cities in the world -- we are woefully unprepared to handle a recurrence of severe acute respiratory syndrome. We are even less capable of meeting a far more deadly threat: the emergence of a pandemic strain of influenza from Southeast Asia.

In 1918-19 the Spanish flu killed 20 million to 40 million people worldwide -- more than 500,000 in the United States alone. Many of the victims were young, healthy adults. Despite knowledge that pandemic strains occur every 10 to 50 years, and despite increasingly worrisome reports from Southeast Asia, we are woefully unprepared to protect the United States from an outbreak of pandemic flu. Federal officials are "meeting," but a national plan for countering pandemic flu has not progressed beyond the draft stage. State-level planning and preparedness efforts vary widely; no specific deadline exists for their completion. Despite overwhelming evidence that many hospitals are already diverting ambulances because of overcrowding, the Health Resources and Services Administration does not plan a meeting to discuss the lack of hospital "surge capacity" before next fall.

A year after the flu vaccine debacle, the United States still lacks sufficient production to meet its needs. Six to eight months of lead time are required to create a new vaccine. The virulence of the avian strain emerging in Southeast Asia is posing huge technical challenges to vaccine makers. Our approach to distributing vaccine and antiviral agents is woefully inadequate. Front-line paramedics, nurses and ER doctors lack adequate protective equipment for respiratory pathogens. Many cannot even get a shot of flu vaccine. America's most mission-critical hospital resources are struggling to meet daily demands, much less the additional burden of an epidemic.

It is ironic that our government's single-minded focus on "bioterrorism" has left us less well prepared to handle either an emerging biological threat (such as SARS or avian influenza) or a terrorist strike (which will most likely involve the use of explosives). Unless we quickly rethink our priorities and broadly allocate resources to meet the most plausible threats to the U.S. population, our only option will be a "faith-based initiative."

Pray that nothing happens.

The writer is professor and chair of emergency medicine at the Emory University School of Medicine in Atlanta.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Contends Campaign Has Cut Suicide Attacks (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Aug. 4 - A day after losing 15 marines in fighting along the Euphrates River, the American military command here said Thursday that suicide attacks had declined as a result of its three-month campaign to stem the flow of foreign fighters coming down the river valley from Syria.

Brig. Gen. C. Donald Alston, chief spokesman for the American command, said 13 car bombings occurred in Iraq last week, only three of which were suicide bombings, the lowest weekly figures since the current counterinsurgency campaign in western Anbar Province began. The military regards car bombings, suicide bombings in particular, as a rough measure of foreign fighter activity because it contends that most of the suicide bombers are foreign militants.

"When I look at the bar charts, the statistics are a clear indication that the tempo of suicide attacks has decreased," General Alston said, noting that the percentage of car bombings involving suicide bombers was as high as 60 percent a few months ago. He expressed optimism that the flow of foreign fighters was ebbing. "This is not an expanding insurgency," he said.

Fourteen marines were killed when a roadside bomb hit their vehicle on Wednesday near Haditha, in western Iraq, and the American military said Thursday that another marine was killed Wednesday by small arms fire during operations in Ramadi, a volatile city about 70 miles farther down the Euphrates, west of Baghdad.

At least 24 marines have been killed in the last week in fighting along the Euphrates, one of the bloodiest periods for American forces in months.

The explosives that killed the marines and an Iraqi civilian near Haditha on Wednesday were three antitank mines stacked atop one another and buried under a highway on which the American vehicle was traveling, an American military officer in Washington said Thursday. It was unclear whether the mines had been remotely detonated or had been triggered using a fuse, said the officer, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the conclusion about the cause of the blast was preliminary and under review.

DOJ_NMG_0002262

The marines were in an amphibious assault vehicle. A Marine spokesman, Austin Johnson, said Thursday that the Marines have about 100 of the vehicles in Iraq, and that each has been reinforced with corrugated steel armor plates. The undercarriages have no additional protection, although Marine officials are discussing how to add such protection. But several senior military officials said Thursday that there would have been no effective protection against a triple-stacked mine. The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Thursday condemning terrorist attacks in Iraq. In his first public remarks as the new American ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton urged Syria, Iran and other member states to cooperate in preventing the flow of terrorists, weapons and money to Iraq.

Foreign fighters, mostly Saudis and Egyptians, senior American military officers said, have been entering Iraq from Syria along Iraq's vast western border.

Most of those fighters are believed to enter north of where the Euphrates River crosses into Iraq. Because the American military presence has until recently been on the south side of the river, the north side had become something of a sanctuary for insurgents moving foreign fighters south along the river to Baghdad and north across desert tracks to Mosul.

Only a few bridges cross the Euphrates between the Syrian border and Haditha, a small farming town where an American Marine base protects a dam and a hydroelectric plant that supplies power to Baghdad. Even fewer of the bridges are substantial enough for armored vehicles to cross the Euphrates safely.

The American military began addressing the flow of foreign fighters in May with a major operation along the Syrian border north of the Euphrates. The military said it had killed at least 125 foreign fighters in those operations, convincing Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, that it was time to focus on the area.

A combat outpost was built on the north side of the river near Rawah to give logistical support to special operations forces moving by helicopter on raids on the north side of the river, General Alston said. An Army quick reaction force was sent to aid the raiders if they had trouble. An Iraqi unit was based nearby to control the bridge and help patrol the area.

"Now we own the Rawah bridge, and they can't move across the river," a senior officer in Baghdad, who agreed to describe the campaign on the condition of anonymity, said Wednesday, adding that "the operations are making it harder and harder for them to move around."

The marines based at Haditha have begun a major hunt for insurgents south of the river.

Operations and intelligence officers say they do not believe that more than a few dozen insurgents operate in the area but that the new military presence north of the river has caused a response.

"We struck a nerve," the senior officer said.

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari announced Thursday that his government had drawn up a 12-point plan for improving security in the country, including turbulent Anbar Province. He said the specifics would remain secret, but that the initiative was necessary to spur Iraqi forces toward assuming full responsibility for security in much of the country as soon as possible.

A suicide bomber blew himself up at noon on Thursday about 30 miles south of Kirkuk in the north, killing four other people, including two members of a Shiite militia, said an Iraqi army officer in the region. The militia members, loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, were traveling south in a convoy and later attacked a village near the scene of the bombing, the official said.

Three policemen were reported killed in Kirkuk in a separate car bombing, Iraq's Interior Ministry said.

Kirkuk is one of Iraq's main oil centers. Its future will be hotly debated at a meeting of Iraq's political leaders beginning Friday in Baghdad. Kurds want the government to force out Arabs who were resettled in the city under Saddam Hussein. But despite an agreement by the transitional government last year to move Arabs out, the current, elected government of Mr. Jafaari has resisted the plan.

The new American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, angered many Kurds in a surprise visit to the city on Wednesday when he told the City Council that the United States would not support the deportation of Arabs.

"We cannot accept this statement and consider it as a tool to marginalize the Kurds in the city," said Babakr Kirkukli, a senior Kurdish politician and member of the council.

Two bodies bearing marks of torture were found Thursday in eastern Baghdad, the Iraqi Interior Ministry reported, and in Amiriya in western Baghdad, a roadside bomb wounded two civilians. In a separate incident in Amiriya, armed men attacked a convoy of cars belonging to Mehdi al-Hafidh, a former minister of the transitional government that left power after elections this year. One guard was killed. Mr. Hafidh was not in the convoy.

In neighboring Jordan, the government arrested 17 men it said were linked to Al Qaeda in Iraq and were plotting to attack American military personnel who frequent Jordan's five-star hotels while on leave in Iraq, The Associated Press reported.

U.S. Defends Operations In Western Iraq (NSDY/AP)

By Tini Tran, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, August 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002263

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The U.S. military defended its operations in western Iraq, insisting it is reducing insurgent attacks despite the deaths of 14 Marines in a huge bombing. Four more U.S. service members were killed in action, the military said Thursday.

Iraq's prime minister sought to assure his demoralized public that the government is on top of the security situation, announcing a new plan for restoring order and declaring "we are in a state of war."

U.S. military spokesman Brig. Gen. Donald Alston said American military operations in Anbar province, which includes the area where the Marines died, have succeeded in disrupting insurgent activities.

"We still have deaths. We still have suicide car bombs," he said. "But the numbers we see indicate (the insurgents) can't generate the same tempo, and I think that's because we've had some degree of effect in interdicting these forces."

Alston cited figures showing there were 13 car bombs in Iraq last week -- the lowest weekly number since April. "There's a clear indication to me that the tempo has decreased."

U.S. troops have stepped up operations in recent months in Anbar province, the center of the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency and a major avenue for foreign fighters infiltrating the country from Syria.

Alston warned that militants will likely rally their forces in a concerted effort to derail the country's political progress, including a referendum on the constitution in October and an election in December.

U.S. commanders have warned that although the number of vehicle and roadside bombings are decreasing, they are increasing in potency and sophistication. Bombs on the roads or planted in vehicles account for 70-80 percent of the U.S. deaths in Iraq, command spokesman Lt. Col. Steven Boylan said.

The blast that killed the 14 Marines and their civilian translator on Wednesday was so powerful that it flipped the 25-ton vehicle and engulfed it in a huge fireball. The extremist Ansar al-Sunnah Army claimed responsibility in a Web posting and said its fighters used two bombs to destroy the vehicle.

A roadside bomb late Wednesday killed three U.S. soldiers in Baghdad, the U.S. command said. A Marine was killed Wednesday by small arms fire in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province 70 miles west of Baghdad, the command added.

Officials in Georgia said the three soldiers killed in Baghdad were assigned to the 48th Brigade of the Georgia National Guard. The 48th has lost 11 soldiers since arriving in Iraq in May.

At least 1,826 members of the U.S. military have died since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

During a news conference Thursday, Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari announced a new 12-point security plan. He gave few details but said it included steps to improve intelligence, protect infrastructure and prevent foreign fighters from entering the country.

"We will not hesitate in saying this: We are in a state of war. It is one of the most dangerous types of war because it is not a conventional or a war of borders," he said.

Al-Jaafari noted that the United States and its coalition partners were trying to boost Iraqi forces to take over security from multinational forces.

"The people believe that they should depend on themselves and it is a matter of time. Iraq is now taking major steps in training its forces," he said.

Earlier in the day, Interior Minister Bayan Jabr said Iraqi security forces have started a nationwide operation to protect the country's estimated 544 voter registration centers for the constitutional referendum and election.

In Washington, Sen. Joseph Biden, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, called the Iraq campaign a tough situation "that's going to get tougher before it gets easier."

"The truth of the matter is that we've made some pretty significant miscalculations in term of policy from the outset, and we leave these Marines in a very, very tough spot," Biden said Thursday on CBS's "The Early Show."

Battle For Control Of Western Iraq's Routes Escalates (FT)

By Neil MacDonald

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

Iraqi insurgent bombers have dragged US armoured patrols into an escalating battle over the highways and back roads of western Iraq, a senior US military spokesman said on Thursday.

However, despite a series of lethal attacks on US forces this week in western Iraq, which have claimed the lives of 28 US soldiers in the past four days, US commanders saw no reason to change their overall approach to the counter-insurgency battle, the spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0002264

Brigadier General Donald Alston also denied that Haditha, the Euphrates valley town around which most of the attacks have taken place, was becoming “another Falluja” referring to the insurgent stronghold that was subject to a US military siege in November last year.

Nevertheless, Brig Gen Alston said the size of the bomb that killed 14 marines aboard an amphibious assault vehicle near Haditha on Wednesday showed that the insurgents continued to adapt their attacks on US forces.

The bomb, or improvised explosive device, killed all but one of 15 marine reservists aboard an amphibious assault vehicle, along with their interpreter

Brig Gen Alston said the size of the device indicated that the insurgents “have been motivated” to increase the potency of their bombs after the US had, in turn, upgraded the armour protecting their vehicles.

A roadside bomb late on Wednesday killed three US soldiers in Baghdad, the US command said. A marine was killed the same day by small arms fire in Ramadi. Both sides in Iraq's two-year-old guerrilla war were constantly adapting their practices to gain the advantage, Brig Gen Alston said. “We're never static when it comes to protecting our forces.”

The deadly attacks on marine reservists around Haditha have raised questions about whether these lightly protected shock troops are adequately equipped for the protracted counter-insurgency battle that has unfolded in the Euphrates valley since May.

While the destroyed marine vehicle was lighter than the Bradley infantry carriers in use with the US army, its armoured protection exceeded the minimum protection previously allowed on US combat vehicles.

Higher armour standards for all US combat vehicles this year reflected a high-level decision “to respond to this threat posed by the terrorists”, Gen Alson said. “Naturally, in response, the terrorists try to adapt.”

While civilians make an easy target, the guerrillas have also producing more sophisticated devices to keep up the pressure on US patrols, Gen Alston said.

Shaped charges, for example, can direct the force of a blast to maximise its effect. Some of the devices being used most recently in western Iraq are reportedly of a type previously used by Hizbollah, the south Lebanese resistance group.

U.S. Toll Rises By 4 In Iraq; Reserves Hit Hard In Recent Attacks (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

BAGHDAD, Aug. 4 -- The U.S. military said Thursday that four more GIs were killed Wednesday, a Marine in the central city of Ramadi and three soldiers in a car bombing in southwest Baghdad.

Their deaths, along with those of 14 Marines in western Iraq announced earlier, brought Wednesday's U.S. toll to 18.

The start of August has been among the bloodiest stretches for American forces since the 2003 invasion of Iraq, and non-active-duty service members have been hit hardest. Twenty-one Marines killed in three separate incidents this week were reservists, and the soldiers killed Wednesday were from the Georgia National Guard.

About 30 percent of the 138,000 U.S. troops in Iraq are from the National Guard and reserves.

The news of more U.S. fatalities came on a day in which the Iraqi prime minister announced a new security plan and said Iraqi forces were making the country safer, while the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq told reporters that data showed the tempo of insurgent attacks was decreasing.

"The security situation is improving, especially Iraqi security forces with regard to both quality and quantity," said Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, who outlined a 12-point security program for Iraq on Thursday afternoon.

Under the new plan, four separate intelligence services will be consolidated into a central operation, and responsibility for security of the country's infrastructure -- such as oil pipelines and the power grid -- will be put in the hands of Deputy Prime Minister Ahmed Chalabi. Jafari provided few other details, beyond general pledges to do things such as secure Iraq's borders and improve relations with its neighbors.

At a news conference later, Air Force Brig. Gen. Donald Alston, the military spokesman, said the insurgents "can't generate the same tempo" of attacks as in previous months. The 13 car bombs detonated across Iraq last week represented the fewest since April, Alston said, although he declined to provide data for other forms of insurgent attacks such as roadside bombs.

"This is not an expanding insurgency," Alston added. "What we are seeing is probably the opposite."

Insurgent tactics have gotten more effective and sophisticated, Alston acknowledged, saying the rebels have modified their attacks to counteract improvements in the armor applied to U.S. vehicles, using larger and more lethal forms of explosives. "What we are seeing is an adaptive enemy," he said.

In Baghdad, the three soldiers killed Wednesday night were from the 48th Brigade of the Georgia National Guard, which arrived in Iraq in May. A spokeswoman with the unit, 2nd Lt. Selena Owens, said another soldier was seriously wounded.

The 48th Brigade has lost 11 members in insurgent attacks in less than two weeks and another in a noncombat incident. Thursday evening, she said, soldiers held a memorial service for four soldiers killed by a roadside bomb Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0002265

Elsewhere in Iraq on Thursday, three policemen were killed in the northern city of Kirkuk, and 20 miles to the south, in Daquq, a suicide car bomb detonated near a convoy of vehicles bearing followers of Shiite Muslim cleric Moqtada Sadr. Four were killed and five wounded, according to Iraqi army Lt. Col. Halkot Omar.

U.N. Condemns Attacks In Iraq As 'Horrific' (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

NEW YORK -- The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously yesterday to condemn recent "shameless and horrific attacks" in Iraq and called on Iraq'sneighbors to halt the flow of terrorists and weapons.

The U.S.- and British-sponsored resolution "condemns without reservation and in the strongest terms the terrorist attacks that have taken place in Iraq, and regards any act of terrorism as a threat to peace and security."

The council met one day after 14 Marines and their civilian interpreter were killed in western Iraq during a particularly bloody week for U.S. forces.

"This resolution highlights the critical importance of cooperation among all member states to halt the flow of terrorists, weapons and terrorist financing to Iraq," said U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton in his first council appearance since being appointed by President Bush.

Mr. Bolton called on Iran and Syria to honor international commitments to promote stability in the region.

Iraqi Ambassador Samir Sumaida'ie said, "Iraq is paying in blood and treasure, the blood of its innocent civilians and the wealth it badly needs for reconstruction and healing, in a fight against this multiheaded modern-day monster."

Britain, Brazil, France, Greece, China, Romania, Algeria and Argentina also spoke in support of the resolution, which warns that "acts of terrorism must not be allowed to disrupt Iraq's political and economic transition currently taking place."

Russian Deputy Ambassador Alexander Konuzin endorsed the resolution, but also called for a "time frame and conditions for the withdrawal of all foreign forces" from Iraq.

"Without solving these items, the reasons for the continuation of terrorist activity in Iraq will not be ended," Mr. Konuzin said.

American military commanders are concerned that insurgents are pouring over the borders, primarily from Iran and Syria.

Attacks against Iraqi civilians and security forces, as well as U.S. forces, have intensified in recent weeks: foreign diplomats have been kidnapped and killed; Iraqi officials and drafters of a constitution have been assassinated; Iraqi police stations and markets have been targeted.

Since Monday, 21 U.S. Marines and soldiers have died in increasingly ferocious and sophisticated attacks.

Mr. Sumaida'ie, the Iraqi ambassador, told reporters after the council session that Syria had assured Baghdad that it is trying to stem the flow of terrorists "but we keep seeing this."

Mr. Sumaida'ie, whose nephew was killed during a raid by U.S. forces two months ago, said that Iraq's security is foremost the responsibility of the Iraqi government.

Most of the attacks are carried out by Saddamists, Islamists and organized crime cells, the ambassador said.

Iraq's Prime Minister Unveils Plan For Better Border Security (KRT)

By Hannah Allam And Richard Chin

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq - The Iraqi government on Thursday announced an ambitious plan for improved border protection and intelligence gathering and for the formation of an elite Iraqi force to prepare the embattled country for an eventual drawdown of American troops.

Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari's announcement of the 12-point security program follows a particularly bloody week for U.S. forces battling Sunni Muslim insurgents in western Iraq. At least 24 Marines have been killed in action in the last week, underscoring the sophistication and persistence of an enemy that fledgling Iraqi forces are so far unable to combat on their own.

President Bush, speaking in Crawford, Texas, dismissed a threat by Ayman al-Zawahri, the No. 2 al-Qaida leader, to kill tens of thousands of U.S. troops in Iraq.

"We will stay the course," Bush said. "We will complete the job in Iraq. And the job is this: We'll help the Iraqis develop a democracy."

Bush also expressed condolences for the families of the Marines killed in Iraq.

"I hope they can take comfort in the fact that millions of their fellow citizens pray for them. I hope they also take comfort in the understanding that the sacrifice was made in a noble cause," Bush said.

In Baghdad, al-Jaafari said multinational forces would stay in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0002266

"The multinational forces have a role to play. If not, we would have already asked them to leave," al-Jaafari told a news conference in Baghdad. The security plan "is an entirely Iraqi plan, with an Iraqi perspective, Iraqi timing and an Iraqi way of dealing with matters."

Also on Thursday, the U.S. military said three soldiers died when their vehicle was hit by a car bomb in southwest Baghdad Wednesday night and that a Marine was shot to death in Ramadi, the capital of the volatile Anbar province west of Baghdad.

The Marine was killed Wednesday, the same day 14 other Marines and their Iraqi translator died in the town of Haditha when their armored vehicle was ripped apart in the deadliest roadside bombing of a U.S. combat vehicle since the war began.

The Army of Ansar al-Sunnah, a well-known insurgent group with ties to al-Qaida, claimed responsibility for the attack in an Internet posting Thursday that couldn't be verified.

On Monday, six Marines died near Haditha when their foot patrol came under small-arms fire, and a Marine fighting near Hit was killed by a suicide car bombing.

The bombing in Haditha destroyed a lightly armored amphibious assault vehicle used by Marines that was designed to carry troops from ship to shore for use in land operations and wasn't intended for day-to-day inland patrolling, according to military analysts.

But military spokesman U.S. Brig. Gen. Donald Alston said Thursday that the vehicles had "Level 2" protection, which is described in a military press release as a vehicle with improved armoring.

"That decision by the leadership to deploy that much armor was in response to the threat imposed by the terrorists," he said.

Alston said, however, that it was a "quite potent" bomb that hit the Marines.

He said insurgents have been improving their bomb technology and tactics in response to the increased armoring.

"I think what we're seeing here is an adaptive enemy," he said. "We're seeing occasionally these exceptional bombs. We do not see this kind of lethality every day."

Alston said the attacks show that the military is pressuring the insurgency in the Euphrates River valley.

"This is ground that they need to sustain themselves and they are being denied that ground," he said.

He said in the last couple weeks the number of car bombings has decreased to its lowest level in the last few months.

He warned that insurgents may step up their efforts in response to a new constitution that Iraqi leaders are developing.

But he said, "This is not an expanding insurgency."

"What we're seeing is probably the opposite," Alston said.

Alston also lashed out at a video posted on the Internet that allegedly shows one of the Marines killed near Haditha.

"The shameful act of exploiting dead bodies to promote their cause is deplorable," he said.

Iraq's premier offered few details on the 12-point security plan.

One of the cornerstones of the plan is better coordination among Iraq's intelligence agencies. Among the other measures: the formation of an elite Iraqi quick-reaction force, the creation of a War Information Office to counter insurgent propaganda, and increased security along Iraq's borders - especially with Syria, Saudi Arabia and Iran - to staunch the flow of insurgents and weapons.

In other violence Thursday:

-Gunmen stormed the Baghdad home of Haider Mohammed al-Dujaili, the director of public relations for Deputy Prime Minister Ahmad Chalabi, and executed him in front of his wife and children.

-Two Iraqi commandos from the elite Wolf Brigade were killed in a car bombing near a Shiite shrine in the city of Daquq, north of Baghdad. The blast also killed two members of a visiting delegation from the rebel cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia.

-Iraq's former planning minister, Mahdi al-Hafidh, survived an assassination attempt on Baghdad's notorious airport road. Gunmen opened fire on his car, injuring one of his guards and three civilian passers-by, according to Iraqi authorities.

Chin reports for the St. Paul Pioneer Press. Knight Ridder Newspapers special correspondent Mohammed al Awsy contributed to this report.

Iraqi Women Urge U.S. To Protect Their Rights (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Iraqi women took their fight for equal rights to American lawmakers yesterday, urging them to use their influence to see that women's rights are protected in the new constitution.

With just 10 days until delegates in Baghdad present the final draft of Iraq's basic law, it is still not clear how large a role will be given to Islamic Shariah law, which traditionally subordinates women to men.

DOJ_NMG_0002267

"The [American] men and women, the brave people who went there to free [Iraqis] from Saddam [Hussein], they didn't free them to put them under another dictatorship; that is very clear to all of us," said Basma Fakri, president of the Women's Alliance for a Democratic Iraq.

During an appearance in Washington yesterday, she said it was entirely appropriate for President Bush, the Senate and House to let Iraq's constitutional negotiators know "that Iraq should be free."

"That was the mission. We don't want to go back in time, we don't want to create another dictatorship. That should be clear and loud to the Iraqi government and to the constitutional committee," she said.

The appeal has had some success in Washington, where the House passed a resolution last week that "strongly encourages Iraq's Transitional National Assembly to adopt a constitution that grants women equal rights under the law and to work to protect such rights."

The resolution also "pledges to support the efforts of Iraqi women to fully participate in a democratic Iraq."

However, with Congress in recess during the crucial last two weeks of the constitution-writing process, little more pressure is likely. Calls to several congressional offices yesterday found mainly staffers who were unwilling or unable to comment on the issue.

One exception was the office of Rep. Frank R. Wolf, Virginia Republican. Spokesman Dan Scandling said Mr. Wolf sent a letter to the Bush administration Wednesday night "expressing concern about religious freedoms and other potential rights' erosion" in Iraq.

Early drafts of the new Iraqi constitution said Shariah law, which sharply limits women's rights to own and inherit property among other things, should be the main source of all law in Iraq. The drafts also declared that women will hold at least 25 percent of legislative seats only in the first two terms.

A draft that became public on Wednesday amended the key clause to say that Islam would be "one of the main sources" of the law. The Iraqi women welcomed the change but said continued pressure was needed.

The women also are demanding that all international treaties regarding human rights and women's rights be honored in the constitution, and that guarantees of female representation in the parliament and government be made permanent.

"The draft constitution as we have seen is a cause for alarm and a call for action," Miss Fakri said.

Tanya Gilly-Khailany, representing the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies, said women's rights activists have presented their case to U.S. officials, the United Nations, British Foreign Minister Jack Straw and the European Union.

Zainab al-Suwaij, executive director of the American Islamic Congress, rejected arguments put forward by officials of Iraq's dominant Shi'ite coalition that Iraq's culture was not ready to go beyond Shariah law.

"Iraq has a very high population of educated people and they are all aware of women's rights, and we are not asking for anything beyond the norm of our culture and religion," she said.

Women had many rights in the early years of Saddam Hussein's rule and were active in the workplace, but these rights steadily deteriorated toward the end of his dictatorship as he tried to court Islamic support.

The insurgency, which has targeted all sectors of Iraq's society, also has hit women hard, killing professional women and threatening those not wearing Islamic head coverings. Christian women regularly wear scarves and long skirts to avoid being targeted on the streets.

The Enemy Of Hope (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

U.S. generals have warned for months that insurgents in Iraq are increasing the sophistication of their tactics to match countermeasures by U.S. forces. Wednesday's roadside bombing that killed 14 Marines demonstrates the truth of that message — and the ever more deadly danger to American troops.

With the U.S. death toll now past 1,800, the need for a constitution that knits together Iraq's three disparate groups is ever more evident. The interim assembly is writing the country's basic law and is supposed to publish it a week from Monday. Kurds, Sunni Arabs and Shiites are arguing over fundamental issues, including the role of Islamic law and the rights of women.

A constitution will be a step forward. But it would be a mistake to infuse Aug. 15 with too much significance. There have been other supposedly transformative events — the capture of Saddam Hussein in December 2003, the transfer of sovereignty from U.S. occupiers to Iraqis in June 2004, the Iraqi parliamentary elections last January — that have failed to end the violence in Iraq.

Agreement on important issues, followed by approval of the constitution and new elections for a national assembly by year's end, could well give Iraqis a sense that they are represented by lawmakers in a way that was impossible under Hussein. And that could weaken support for the militants who kill not just U.S. troops but Iraqi civilians as well.

DOJ_NMG_0002268

Against this hope, however, lies the horrific reality of this week. The servicemen killed Wednesday were from the same Ohio Reserve unit that lost five Marines in Iraq on Monday. Their deaths brought to Brook Park the sorrow so often felt in military towns, such as Camp Pendleton, that are home to regular forces.

The 14 Marines killed were riding in a troop carrier in western Iraq, an entry route for fighters from Syria.

A huge roadside bomb flipped the 25-ton vehicle over and sent it into flames. Military spokesman Brig. Gen. Carter Ham said recent months brought a decrease in the number of attacks from improvised explosive devices but an increase in the power and lethality of the explosives planted in the path of U.S. vehicles. New weapons have been modified to concentrate the area of an explosion and increase the likelihood that it can penetrate armored vehicles.

The U.N. Security Council on Thursday condemned the violence in Iraq and urged other nations to prevent the movement of fighters, weapons and terrorist financing into the country. That would be a help in fighting insurgents.

Longer term, Iraq needs more trained police and soldiers to help U.S. forces and eventually replace them, and an elected, representative government that can make Iraqis safe in their homes and on the streets — and satisfy neighboring countries that the threat of an invasion from Baghdad is part of the past.

Voice Of Experience (USAT)

USA Today, August 5, 2005

During the Vietnam War, Navy Lt. Cmdr. John McCain was held captive for 5½ years in North Vietnam, where he was placed in solitary confinement and tortured repeatedly. McCain, now a Republican senator from Arizona and the nation's most celebrated ex-POW, has a crisp message for the Bush White House and Pentagon about how to treat detainees: You've got it wrong.

As a fix, McCain is sponsoring a pair of amendments to the defense bill awaiting the return of Congress in September. In short, the amendments would:

·Bar the military from treating detainees in “cruel, inhuman or degrading” ways.

·Require military interrogators to stick to interrogation methods laid out in the Army field manual, the traditional guidepost.

This might sound uncontroversial, but the White House and Pentagon are fiercely resisting McCain's measures.

Vice President Cheney describes the amendments as intrusions on presidential authority. From the Pentagon's perspective, McCain wants to solve a problem that has already been taken care of.

Last month, however, top military brass offered Congress conflicting testimony about what interrogation methods are allowed. If they can't keep that straight, McCain wonders, how can lower-ranked military interrogators? A classified annex in the new Army manual will solve the problem of terrorists knowing the techniques, the senator says.

McCain and the senators who support him worry about the consequences of the constant trickle of horror stories. Recent reports cast more doubt on claims that the use of dogs and other abuses at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison were isolated incidents confined to lower-level deviants working the night shift.

This week, The Washington Post reported on the death of an Iraqi general who, in November 2003, was beaten and then stuffed headfirst into a sleeping bag, where he died.

In June, Time laid out disturbing details behind the questioning of Mohamed al-Kahtani in late 2002 at the U.S. prison camp in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, which included treating the suspected Saudi terrorist as a dog.

It's tempting to support a “whatever it takes” policy for interrogating suspects believed to have knowledge of terror plots. But a former POW like McCain recognizes the downsides.

Abusing terror suspects only invites abuse of captured U.S. soldiers in current and future conflicts. Moreover, the abuses undermine the critical public diplomacy part of the war on terror by convincing Muslims that U.S. commitment to justice and human rights is hollow.

The Pentagon is making some progress. On Thursday, it announced that Afghans held at Guantanamo Bay would be returned to their country. That should help ease the international focus on Guantanamo.

More is needed. McCain's legislation would provide clear standards for the treatment of detainees and prisoners, something that's been sorely lacking. In a recent exchange about his amendments, McCain answered a senator who questioned whether terrorists should be treated as POWs. Replied McCain: This is not about terrorists. This is about who we are.

If Bush administration officials want to get past the prisoner-abuse scandals, they should listen to someone who learned those lessons the hard way at the Hanoi Hilton.

Don't Tie Our Hands (USAT)

By Lawrence Di Rita

USA Today, August 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002269

Intelligence is one of America's most important tool in the global war on terror. Since the Sept. 11 attacks, interrogations of captured terrorists have provided valuable information helping the United States understand the organizational structure of al-Qaeda, its methods and locations for terrorist recruitment, and the extent of its presence in this country. Intelligence from detainees has stopped attacks and saved American lives.

This kind of valuable, actionable intelligence has come from the rigorous, professional and humane interrogations of captured terrorists and their affiliates and supporters — interrogations that have saved countless American lives.

In a joint resolution after the 9/11 attacks, the Congress recognized the president's "authority under the Constitution to take actions to deter and prevent acts of international terrorism against the United States." That authority was strongly re-affirmed by the U.S. Court of Appeals last month with regard to the military trials of enemy combatants.

But some want to limit this authority by making Congress — not military commanders, the secretary of Defense and the commander in chief — the arbiter of standards for interrogating captured terrorists.

This proposed change, which would essentially limit interrogation methods to those published in a U.S. Army field manual, would hamper the country's ability to readily adapt and update interrogation methods to obtain intelligence from al-Qaeda detainees who we know are trained to resist known interrogation techniques, and trained to allege that they were abused by their interrogators.

America's enemies are dangerously familiar with many of the U.S. Army-approved procedures for interrogations. While the Army field manual properly serves as the basis for interrogations, restricting techniques to those published in the manual would make it still easier for captured terrorists to anticipate and resist interrogations.

The U.S. military has successfully detained and interrogated nearly 70,000 individuals since 9/11. The vast majority of these interrogations have been conducted professionally and with impressive results. Where policies were violated, people are being held accountable and, where necessary, procedures revised and improved. The concerns behind well-intended but unneeded legislation are taken and addressed with energy.

Now is not the time to tie the hands of military commanders. We must have the flexibility to adapt to a ruthless, thinking enemy.

Lawrence Di Rita is special assistant to the secretary of Defense and chief spokesman for the Defense Department.

U.S. Plans To Transfer Afghan Prisoners (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 (Reuters) - The United States will return about 110 Afghan prisoners now at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to Afghanistan, where the Afghan government will decide whether to detain or release them, American and Afghan officials said Thursday.

The Pentagon said an additional 350 Afghans detained by the American military at Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan would be handed over to the Afghan government after other facilities were built and guards trained.

The agreement on the "gradual transfer" of Afghan prisoners, among about 510 terrorism suspects held at the United States Naval Base at Guantánamo Bay, was reached after President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan said during a visit to Washington last spring that he wanted custody of his countrymen.

Although Washington has already handed over hundreds of Afghans captured since American and coalition forces helped topple the Taliban, Thursday's formal agreement is expected to speed up the process for the rest.

Only four of the hundreds of prisoners held at Guantánamo have been charged with crimes. Most were swept up during the fighting in Afghanistan and held for three years, prompting complaints by human rights groups and charges from former prisoners that they were tortured.

Afghanistan Agrees To Accept Detainees (WP)

By Josh White And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

The Bush administration is negotiating the transfer of nearly 70 percent of the detainees at the U.S. detention facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, to three countries as part of a plan, officials said, to share the burden of keeping suspected terrorists behind bars.

U.S. officials announced yesterday that they have reached an agreement with the government of Afghanistan to transfer most of its nationals to Kabul's "exclusive" control and custody. There are 110 Afghan detainees at Guantanamo and 350 more at the Bagram airfield near Kabul. Their transfers could begin in the next six months.

DOJ_NMG_0002270

Pierre-Richard Prosper, ambassador at large for war crimes, who led a U.S. delegation to the Middle East this week, said similar agreements are being pursued with Saudi Arabia and Yemen, whose nationals make up a significant percentage of the Guantanamo population. Prosper held talks in Saudi Arabia on Sunday and Monday, but negotiations were cut off after the announcement of King Fahd's death.

The decision to move more than 20 percent of the detainees at Guantanamo to Afghanistan and to largely clear out the detention center at Bagram is part of a broader plan to significantly reduce the population of "enemy combatants" in U.S. custody. Senior U.S. officials said yesterday's agreement is the first major step toward whittling down the Guantanamo population to a core group of people the United States expects to hold indefinitely.

"This is not an effort to shut down Guantanamo. Rather, the arrangement we have reached with the government of Afghanistan is the latest step in what has long been our policy -- that we need to keep dangerous enemy combatants off the battlefield," Matthew Waxman, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, said shortly after leaving Kabul with Prosper. "We, the U.S., don't want to be the world's jailer. We think a more prudent course is to shift that burden onto our coalition partners."

The negotiations come amid intense international and domestic pressure on U.S. detention operations, with allegations of mistreatment and abuse as well as concern that detainees have been held for years without being prosecuted for their alleged crimes. Legal problems have also plagued the prosecutorial process at Guantanamo, which has been blocked for months as detainees' attorneys present challenges in U.S. federal courts.

"The Guantanamo issue is clearly a liability for the Bush administration, and emptying it has become a priority," said John Sifton, a specialist on Afghanistan and detainee issues at Human Rights Watch, an international monitoring group. "It's not a victory for human rights if a whole set of people deprived of their liberty are then moved to another place and continued to be deprived of their liberty unlawfully."

The agreement with Afghanistan is the largest of its kind so far. Prosper said yesterday that the U.S. government is working to send 129 Saudis and 107 Yemenis from Guantanamo to the custody of their home countries. If the U.S. government is able to arrange the transfer of detainees who came from all three countries, the population at the U.S. facility will drop by 68 percent, from 510 to 164.

Because the United States could hold on to those detainees who are considered by officials to pose the greatest terrorist threat, the numbers could change slightly. Negotiations depend on the cooperation of the other nations.

"We're now engaging the countries with the largest populations, so we expect to see the largest potential movement from Guantanamo," Prosper said in an interview from Dubai. "So if we can reach an understanding with these countries that will allow us to return them with the greatest assurances, then this will be the biggest movement yet out of Guantanamo."

Prosper and Waxman said that before such transfers can occur, the detainees' home countries must commit to taking steps that will prevent enemy combatants from re-engaging in hostile activity, and commit to treating the detainees humanely.

A major obstacle to the transfer of detainees to Afghanistan is infrastructure. U.S. officials have agreed to help Afghanistan build an appropriate prison and to train its guards.

One possible interim solution under consideration is that Afghan detainees at Guantanamo could be transferred to Bagram until permanent facilities are built. Prosper said such facilities could allow a gradual transfer over the next six months.

The United States considers all the remaining detainees to be medium- or high-risk and therefore not eligible for release once handed over, as has happened with about 70 detainees released earlier to about a dozen countries.

Over the past year, U.S. military authorities have released several dozen Afghans that have been determined as not posing a threat. But President Hamid Karzai has repeatedly called on the United States to hand over all Afghan citizens. He raised the issue during a meeting with President Bush in May.

"I don't expect it will be too long before the actual transfer of detainees will start. It should be a matter of months to build the facilities," said Karim Rahimi, a spokesman for Karzai.

Senior military officials and members of Congress have said in recent days that the goal is to reduce the population at Guantanamo to a point at which the detainees who are the highest security risks can be held at the modern prison buildings there, while the rest of the facility could be "mothballed" for possible future use. Guantanamo's Camp V and the future Camp VI are modeled after U.S. domestic prisons.

In a military fact sheet about "the future" of Guantanamo, developed in early July, defense officials indicated that the operational priority of the facility is to shift from intelligence gathering to long-term detention.

The document noted that "the significant majority of detainees are no longer regularly interrogated" and that officials expect the population to decrease.

DOJ_NMG_0002271

"The way that we've looked at it is that in waging the war against al Qaeda and the Taliban, we will continue to capture enemy fighters and need to prevent them from returning to the battlefield," Waxman said. "But it need not be the U.S. who detains them for the long term."

Afghans Held At Guantanamo Will Be Sent To Home Country (USAT)

By Steven Komarow

USA Today, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration agreed Thursday to transfer up to 110 Afghan inmates from Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, to their home country, the biggest single step yet toward reducing the population of the prison camp.

The deal comes as some members of Congress are pressing the Bush administration to close the Guantanamo prison. The facility was built after the Sept. 11 attacks and the invasion of Afghanistan to hold suspects in the war on terrorism. Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., and others say the prison has become a recruiting tool for anti-American terrorist groups because it has gained a reputation for cruelty.

Matthew Waxman, deputy assistant secretary of Defense for detainee affairs, said the agreement was not a prelude to closing the Guantanamo prison. However, he said the administration hopes to make similar arrangements with other countries. “We, the United States, don't want to be the world's jailer,” he said.

The arrangement is the result of weeks of talks that followed a visit to Washington in May by Afghan President Hamid Karzai. During the visit, President Bush turned down Karzai's request to take custody of Afghan citizens being held by U.S. forces, including the 110 at Guantanamo and about 350 at a U.S. facility in Afghanistan.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said in June that the United States doesn't want to hold detainees at Guantanamo but couldn't send them home because their countries lack proper holding facilities. Under the terms of the new arrangement, the United States will help Afghanistan build prison space to hold the men, as well as train the guards. The Afghan government will “ensure that they do not pose a continuing threat,” but it will have full authority to release detainees as it sees fit. Waxman said those terms could be replicated in other agreements.

The United States has transferred more than 200 Guantanamo detainees to about a dozen countries, some for continued incarceration and others for release. The Afghan transfers, which would take place as prison space becomes available, would cut the current population of about 510 by about a fifth. Besides Afghans, the prison's largest groups are Saudis and Yemeni.

Air Force Maj. Todd Vician, a Pentagon spokesman, said the agreement does not alter the U.S. position that Guantanamo's detainees are dangerous. “Don't confuse transfer with release,” he said.

Vician said the timing will depend on when Afghanistan is ready to take the detainees. Karzai has complained of mistreatment of the detainees and has said most were not terrorists.

Karzai's spokesman, Karim Rahimi, told the Associated Press in Kabul that the agreement means all Afghans held by the U.S. military will be transferred.

However, the joint declaration says only that “many” detainees will be transferred, giving the United States flexibility to keep considered especially dangerous or who might still provide valuable information.

U.S. To Repatriate 110 Afghans Jailed At Guantanamo Bay (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — U.S. military officials will gradually hand over 110 Afghan prisoners to Afghanistan's government in the largest repatriation of detainees from the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, since it was converted to a military prison for terrorism suspects three years ago, the Pentagon said Thursday.

In addition, U.S. authorities plan to turn over about 350 other Afghans who are in U.S. custody in Afghanistan after new prison space is built to accommodate them, officials said. Under a new agreement between the countries, Afghan authorities would then decide which prisoners to detain and which to release, Pentagon officials said.

The agreement will move the Bush administration a step closer to dealing with the troublesome diplomatic problems caused by the Guantanamo Bay prison.

The indefinite detentions of about 510 Guantanamo Bay prisoners are viewed in many parts of the world and by critics in the United States as human rights violations, and administration officials have debated whether to close the facility amid charges that detainees have been abused.

The agreement to release the Afghans also will help relieve domestic political pressure on Afghan President Hamid Karzai, whose fragile government has faced demonstrations and popular unrest on the issue. Karzai, a close U.S. ally, pressed President Bush during a visit to the United States in May to release more prisoners.

DOJ_NMG_0002272

Most of the detainees in question were swept up by U.S. forces that invaded Afghanistan in 2001 to fight the Taliban government and its Al Qaeda allies. Four detainees held at the base have been charged with crimes under a controversial military commission system that has been challenged in U.S. courts.

Pentagon officials portrayed the repatriation as part of a long-term effort to turn over as many detainees as possible to their home countries.

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said the agreement with Afghanistan reflected "ongoing efforts to transfer detainees to their home countries, as appropriate, and when we receive the assurances that the … detainees do not pose a continuing threat."

The U.S. military already has returned hundreds of Afghans taken prisoner in the region. U.S. officials have released or transferred more than 240 Guantanamo Bay detainees to about a dozen home countries. U.S. officials have acknowledged that a few of the released Afghans have rejoined the Taliban-led insurgency.

A senior defense official said Thursday's announcement should not be seen as a sign that the Pentagon was going to return prisoners to their native countries either to be quickly released or to be tortured.

"We're not cutting corners in terms of letting dangerous people go free," the official said. "And we're not cutting corners in terms of getting assurances from other countries that the prisoners will be treated humanely."

The official said the transfer of prisoners to Afghan authorities would happen when the Afghan government proved it was capable of handling a large detainee population.

"We're not going to put them on a plane, drop them in Kabul, tell them 'good luck,' and send them on their way," the official said. "That doesn't serve our interests, and it doesn't serve the interests of the Afghan government."

In Kabul, a spokesman for Karzai, Karim Rahimi, told Associated Press that the returnees would include "all Afghan detainees that are with the U.S. forces."

The 350 prisoners being held in Afghanistan are under U.S. control at Bagram air base, north of the capital Kabul.

Under the agreement, U.S. authorities will provide money to build new prison space in Afghanistan, and will train Afghan personnel to manage the facilities.

The announcement came after a meeting in Kabul between Karzai, Pierre-Richard Prosper, the U.S. ambassador at large for war crimes, and Matthew Waxman, the Pentagon's deputy assistant secretary for detainee affairs.

In his May visit, Karzai and Bush discussed violent demonstrations in Afghanistan over the detainees, and Karzai sought U.S. concessions on the issue.

U.S. officials had blamed the demonstrations on a magazine report that suggested U.S. military personnel had desecrated prisoners' Korans. Although the report, in Newsweek, was retracted, an Army report in June documented several instances of Koran desecration.

Pentagon officials have said for some time that they want to increase the number of repatriations, but have been held back by a series of problems.

Some countries, such as Afghanistan, haven't had the money or prison space to accommodate detainees. U.S. authorities have been unwilling to send prisoners back to other countries because, under the home countries' laws, the detainees would be freed.

U.S. authorities were reluctant to repatriate others for fear that in their home countries they might be treated in ways that would be unacceptably harsh by U.S. standards.

Bush administration officials debated as recently as June whether to close the Guantanamo Bay prison as a way of relieving a public relations headache. Even Bush seemed to suggest at one point that closing it was a possibility.

But defenders of the current system, including Vice President Dick Cheney, convinced others in the administration that keeping Guantanamo Bay open was the best option.

They argued that the United States would need a substitute facility that would look much like Guantanamo Bay.

They also maintained that the detainees had yielded valuable intelligence information, and noted that U.S. taxpayers had paid about $300 million to build the prison.

Oil-for-Food Probe To Accuse Director (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Aug. 4 -- A U.N.-established inquiry into corruption in the $64 billion oil-for-food program will accuse the defunct program's director, Benon V. Sevan, of receiving cash kickbacks for steering lucrative Iraqi oil contracts to an Egyptian oil trader, according to Sevan's lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0002273

Former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul A. Volcker, who is heading the independent inquiry committee, is to release a third interim report Tuesday that the lawyer, Eric L. Lewis, said in a statement will also accuse Sevan, of Cyprus, of refusing to cooperate.

Lewis said Sevan is being made a scapegoat to deflect criticism of Secretary General Kofi Annan. Lewis said that the allegations, which were outlined in a confidential letter from the Volcker committee to Sevan last week, are "flatly false" and that he is going public to get his client's side of the story out before Volcker issues the report. "Mr. Sevan never took anything from anyone," he said.

The Volcker committee has been investigating misconduct in the United Nations' largest humanitarian program for more than a year, and previously accused Sevan of improperly directing business to an associate. But next week's report will represent the first time that the committee will accuse Sevan of benefiting from those activities.

The letter, portions of which were read to The Washington Post, accused Sevan of having "corruptly . . . derived personal pecuniary benefit from the oil for food program." It accused Sevan of receiving "cash proceeds from the sale of oil" from 1998 to 2002 by Iraq to the Africa Middle East Petroleum Co. (AMEP), which is registered in Panama.

The letter alleged that Sevan, working in concert with a friend, profited "with knowledge that some of the oil from which he benefited was purchased by means of payment to Iraq of an illegal surcharge in violation of U.N. sanctions and the oil for food program."

Michael Holtzman, a spokesman for Volcker, declined to comment on the letter's authenticity, saying that the committee will release its findings on Sevan's role in the oil-for-food program as scheduled on Tuesday. But a senior investigator said last week that the report will move "the ball further" on its investigation into suspected payments to Sevan. The investigator said the amounts under scrutiny may appear small to billionaire oil traders but could provide "a nice cushion" for international civil servants.

The committee previously expressed suspicion in a February report about $160,000 deposited into a Cyprus bank account controlled by Sevan's aunt.

Lewis acknowledged that Sevan, who is in Cyprus, has declined Volcker's requests for face-to-face interviews. Lewis said that the committee's investigators had used a previous session to catch Sevan off guard with hard-to-answer questions about events that occurred six years earlier, and then accused him of lying when he did not answer them accurately.

Lewis said the panel had applied a "double standard" in its investigation into allegations that Annan directed business to a Swiss firm that paid Annan's son, Kojo, while it engaged in millions of dollars in business through the oil-for-food program. He noted that investigators gave Annan the benefit of the doubt when he did not report two meetings he had held with the firm's chairman until confronted with records of the meetings.

Lewis insisted that Sevan has been cooperating, providing more than 80 boxes of professional and private documents, as well as bank, real estate and telephone records, and also offering to respond in writing to written questions. Lewis said Sevan "has made his professional and financial life an open book."

Lewis accused the Volcker inquiry of denying Sevan due process in a year-long investigation that has relied heavily on dubious top former Iraqi officials who remain in custody and whose full testimony has not been made available to Sevan. He also said that Volcker's panel has hindered Sevan from cross-examining witnesses or from accessing the documents and testimony he needs to defend himself.

"The committee set out from the beginning of its politically charged investigation to scapegoat him and spare others to whom he reported," Lewis said.

The program was established in December 1996 to allow Iraq, which had been subject to U.N. economic sanctions since its 1990 invasion of Kuwait, to sell oil to buy food, medicine and other humanitarian goods. The program eased the sanctions' burden on ordinary Iraqis, but it also gave the former Iraqi government an opportunity to skim billions of dollars in illicit kickbacks from companies trading with Iraq through the humanitarian program.

The revelations triggered a U.N. investigation and several congressional probes into U.N. management of the program. The U.S. attorney's office of the southern district of New York and the Manhattan district attorney's office have also begun criminal investigations into the program, including Sevan's role.

Annan appointed Volcker in April 2004 to look into allegations that senior U.N. officials, including Sevan, had improperly benefited from the program. A February report by Volcker concluded that Sevan had engaged in "a grave conflict of interest" by soliciting lucrative rights to buy Iraqi oil on behalf of AMEP's Egyptian president, a cousin of former secretary general Boutros Boutros-Ghali. That report also indicated that payments may have been channeled through Boutros-Ghali's brother-in-law. There is no evidence linking Boutros-Ghali, whose role in creating the program is also being scrutinized, to the alleged payoffs.

Report To Accuse Sevan Of Kickbacks (WT/AP)

By Nick Wadhams, Associated Press

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

NEW YORK -- Investigators have concluded that the United Nations' former chief of the Iraq oil-for-food program, Benon Sevan, took kickbacks under the $64 billion program and refused to cooperate with their probe, his attorney said yesterday.

Although the amount of money Mr. Sevan is thought to have taken isn't known, the findings would be a major blow to the United Nations because of his stature in the organization and the control he had over the oil-for-food program.

Eric Lewis, the attorney, denied the charges in a statement that appeared timed to pre-empt the investigation's report.

"The committee's allegations are baseless," he said. "Mr. Sevan never took a penny, as he has said from the beginning."

The United Nations-appointed Independent Inquiry Committee, led by former Federal Reserve chief Paul Volcker, plans to release its findings about Mr. Sevan on Tuesday. The world body is paying Mr. Sevan a symbolic $1 a year to keep him on the payroll so he will cooperate.

Mr. Volcker's committee refused to comment yesterday on Mr. Lewis' assertions.

"Our final judgment on [Mr. Sevan] will be rendered on Tuesday," said committee spokesman Mike Holtzman.

The oil-for-food program, started in December 1996 to help ordinary Iraqis cope with U.N. sanctions imposed after dictator Saddam Hussein's 1990 invasion of Kuwait, quickly became a lifeline for 90 percent of the country's citizens.

Under the program, Saddam's regime could sell oil, provided the proceeds were used to buy humanitarian goods or pay war reparations.

In a bid to curry favor and end the sanctions, Saddam is suspected of giving former government officials, activists, journalists and U.N. officials vouchers for Iraqi oil that could be resold at a profit.

Mr. Lewis said the committee has concluded that a small trading company called African Middle East Petroleum (AMEP) paid Mr. Sevan for his help in winning lucrative oil contracts from Saddam's regime.

Mr. Volcker's team has been investigating the oil-for-food program for more than a year. The committee concluded in February that Mr. Sevan solicited oil allocations from Saddam's regime on behalf of AMEP from 1998 to 2001. It accused Mr. Sevan, who has refused to meet with investigators since February, of a "grave conflict of interest."

The team found $160,000 in what it called "unexplained funds" belonging to Mr. Sevan, who said the funds came from an aunt in his native Cyprus.

After the February report, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan announced disciplinary proceedings against Mr. Sevan but said he would wait until the report came out before making a decision.

Kickbacks Alleged In Oil-for-Food Probe (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Filed at 6:26 p.m. ET

NEW YORK (AP) -- Investigators have concluded that the former chief of the Iraq oil-for-food program, Benon Sevan, took kickbacks under the $64 billion humanitarian operation and refused to cooperate with their probe, his lawyer said Thursday.

While the amount of money Sevan allegedly took wasn't immediately known -- and may be as little as $160,000 -- the findings would be a major blow because of his stature in the organization and the control he had over it. Sevan is also being investigated by the Manhattan District Attorney's office and could face criminal charges.

The Independent Inquiry Committee plans to release its findings about Sevan on Tuesday, and had sent advance notice to Sevan's lawyer, Eric Lewis, last week. Lewis revealed the findings early and vehemently denied both claims against Sevan, whom the U.N. is paying a symbolic one dollar a year to keep him on payroll so he'll cooperate.

"The fact is, the committee's allegations are baseless," Lewis said in a statement. "Mr. Sevan never took a penny, as he has said from the beginning."

The committee, led by former U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, refused to comment on Lewis' claims. Committee spokesman Mike Holtzman had said earlier Sevan would be one subject of the Tuesday report.

"Our final judgment on him will be rendered on Tuesday," Holtzman said.

The oil-for-food program, launched in December 1996 to help ordinary Iraqis cope with U.N. sanctions imposed after Saddam Hussein's 1990 invasion of Kuwait, quickly became a lifeline for 90 percent of the country's population of 26 million.

Under the program, Saddam's regime could sell oil, provided the proceeds went to buy humanitarian goods or pay war reparations. Saddam's government decided on the goods it wanted, who should provide them and who could buy Iraqi oil. But the Security Council committee overseeing sanctions monitored the contracts.

In a bid to curry favor and end sanctions, Saddam allegedly gave former government officials, activists, journalists and U.N. officials vouchers for Iraqi oil that could then be resold at a profit.

According to Lewis, the committee will find that a small trading company called African Middle East Petroleum Co. Ltd. Inc. paid Sevan in exchange for his helping it win oil contracts from Saddam Hussein's regime. It will say that he acted "in concert" with a friend named Fred Nadler, who is the brother-in-law of former U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

Lewis said the letter of findings that Volcker's team sent to him does not spell how much he got in kickbacks.

Volcker's team has been investigating oil-for-food for more than a year. In an interim report released in February, the committee concluded that Sevan solicited oil allocations from Saddam Hussein's regime on behalf of the company, known as AMEP, between 1998 and 2001. It said Nadler was essentially his middleman and accused Sevan of a "grave conflict of interest."

In its report, Volcker's team mentioned $160,000 in "unexplained funds" belonging to Sevan. Sevan had disclosed the money earlier, saying it was from an aunt in Cyprus.

Lewis said Volcker's committee will also say that Sevan refused to cooperate with its investigators, apparently because he would not meet face-to-face with them in recent months. Lewis acknowledged that Sevan had refused to do so since January because investigators accused him of lying or changing his testimony when he didn't remember meetings or phone calls he'd had years before.

He said instead Sevan had agreed to respond to written questions.

Lewis accused Volcker's team of treating Sevan unfairly by concealing evidence from him, relying on secret interviews with jailed members of Saddam's former regime and questioning his integrity when he couldn't remember phone calls that took place years before.

He said it was trying to look tough and appease critics in the United States who have accused it of bungling the investigation.

"The IIC wants cartoon villains, not the truth," Lewis said in the statement. "Mr. Sevan has now reached a point in his dealings with the IIC where he questions the Committee's commitment to objective and evenhanded fact-finding and doubts he can receive a fair hearing in this forum."

After the February report, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan announced disciplinary proceedings against Sevan but said he would wait until the report came out before making a decision.

It is almost certain that Sevan would be fired if the United Nations accepts the Volcker committee claims.

Cash Crunch Forces Army Base To Send Contract Workers Home (KRT)

By Joseph L. Galloway

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - Robbing Peter to pay Paul is a historic tool in the arcane process of balancing military budgets, but this year Army commanders seem to be taking early and unusual measures to keep the lights on and basic services working.

At one base, Fort Rucker, Ala., the home of Army Aviation for half a century, temporary stop-work orders were issued Monday to 120 contract employees, who were sent home to wait without pay for further developments.

Disappearing with those employees were such services as mowing the grass, maintaining the chemical-parts washers for flight line mechanics, providing government cars and the gasoline they run on, photography and graphic services, photocopying services, storage of household goods for families on the move and counseling for families in crisis.

Officers at Fort Rucker even lost service to their hand-held BlackBerry e-mail devices.

One of the key goals of Army transformation is to privatize upward of 60,000 jobs, replacing uniformed soldiers with civilians under contract and thus freeing soldiers to join the global war on terrorism. But if the Army runs short of money at year's end, the civilians are sent home and the jobs go undone. The budget year for the military ends Sept. 30.

Army spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson described the actions at Fort Rucker as "remedial measures that have no impact on the safety and health of our soldiers and families." He added that Fort Rucker had to take more and stronger measures than other bases have to date.

The Army's new head of installation management, Lt. Gen. David Barno, said he'd "redirected $20 million to Fort Rucker" on Thursday to help it deal with its shortage of cash and that he expected that some of the money would be used to re-establish contract services.

Barno told Knight Ridder he was in the process of "talking face to face with all the facilities managers in the Army, by video conference." He said he talked to 11 managers Thursday and that "none of them were at the point of stopping any services."

Barno blamed part of the problem on large increases in the cost of fuel this year. The Army has spent $720 million more on fuel than had been budgeted. Fuel is a key expense at Fort Rucker, which trains nearly 3,000 helicopter pilots a year for the Army and other services.

DOJ_NMG_0002276

"In none of this is there any risk to our ability to fight the wars we are fighting," Barno said. He also said the developments didn't pose any real threat to the Army's job-privatization program.

"What we don't want is soldiers out there cutting grass when we are in the middle of a war," said Barno, a former U.S. ground commander in Afghanistan.

The end-of-the-year money problem is perennial, and hardly confined to the Army. In past years, the Navy has been forced to ground squadrons of jet fighters when it ran out of money for fuel.

The problem is compounded this year because Congress recessed for its summer break without passing the Defense Appropriations Act. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., stopped consideration of the bill after the White House objected to provisions that would have required drafting new rules for the treatment of suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and other facilities.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Sleeper cell

Among the 520 detainees at Guantanamo Bay is a U.S.-educated Kuwaiti who has not offered much in the way of details about how al Qaeda operates.

The man went to college in South Florida and speaks excellent English. He traveled to Afghanistan sometime before the October 2001 invasion and was captured on the battlefield.

U.S. officials think he was in America to set up al Qaeda "sleeper cells," such as the ones that carried out the September 11 attacks. But so far, he has not admitted to such activity nor provided names of possible cellmates.

French option

We hear from a reliable defense source that senior French military officials do not think ongoing efforts will stop Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

Instead, the French high command talks privately of containing Iran once it becomes a nuclear power.

President Bush, of course, has other ideas. He wants European negotiators to insist that Tehran's Islamic hard-liners end the country's nuclear weapons ambitions.

More than a few retired U.S. military officers say they would not be surprised if Mr. Bush ordered air strikes on Iran's nuclear facilities if no commitment comes by late 2008 as the president's second, and final, term ends.

Pantano's release

The Marine Corps has approved a request from 1st Lt. Ilario Pantano to resign, effective Aug. 26.

The Corps had wanted Lt. Pantano to return to Iraq, after its murder case against him crumbled during a pretrial hearing and after the investigating officer slammed the government's main witness as unreliable.

The Corps accused Lt. Pantano of slaying two Iraqi insurgent suspects in April 2004; Lt. Pantano said he fired in self-defense, a claim that was borne out by evidence uncovered by his defense attorney, Charles Gittins.

After the charges were dropped, Lt. Pantano submitted his resignation. His unit, meanwhile, went back to the volatile Anbar Province, doing what Lt. Pantano's platoon was doing a year before — hunting down insurgents.

Mr. Gittins declined to comment on the officer's plans. Lt. Pantano's story is compelling. Born in New York City, he served as a Marine in the 1991 Persian Gulf War and then worked as a stockbroker and TV producer until the September 11 attacks. He volunteered to rejoin the Marines because he wanted to fight terrorists and found himself in Anbar leading a platoon of young Marines.

Navy's X-Craft

The Navy this week added the first of a new type of high-technology, low-cost coastal patrol boat known as the Littoral Surface Craft-Experimental (LSC-X), or X-Craft.

The ship, known as the Sea Fighter, can move at speeds of up to 50 knots and has a range of some 4,000 nautical miles.

The ship joined the Navy's 3rd Fleet in San Diego and is the first of a series of low-cost weapons being promoted by Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. The new catamaran-design hull is meant for high speed in coastal waters.

Defense officials say the X-Craft could be a valuable weapon if any conflict breaks out with China over Taiwan. The Navy says the X-Craft is needed to deal with 21st-century threats.

"Today's absence of a global naval threat to the United States has replaced the need to fight conflicts in the open ocean with the requirement to project sea-based power ashore," the Navy said of the new boat.

DOJ_NMG_0002277

The boat will be used for battle force protection, mine countermeasures, anti-submarine warfare, amphibious assault support and humanitarian support missions.

"This is the wave of the future," Mr. Hunter said. "We make a lot of speeches about military transformation, but this ship is real transformation."

Gitmo react

Spokesmen for Democratic Sens. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii have gotten back to us about the senators' recent trip to Guantanamo Bay.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Kennedy said the staff member traveling with the senator did not remember receiving any complaints from the soldiers who met with the senator.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Akaka said the senator had a good meeting with Hawaii-origin soldiers and could not remember any complaints coming his way from service members. "For the most part, it was very positive," the spokeswoman said.

We reported that some prison staff complained about the anti-Gitmo statements uttered by some Democratic senators. Mr. Kennedy is a leading critic of how terror suspects are treated at Guantanamo.

Warner ire

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, was one of the earliest to come out for Sen. Bill Frist of Tennessee as Senate majority leader.

But he is not all that pleased these days with Mr. Frist. That's because the majority leader yanked Mr. Warner's cherished defense authorization bill off the floor last month, when he could not get 60 votes to end debate.

To Mr. Frist, the gambit worked. He fought off unwanted Democratic amendments to the defense bill and then won passage of a pro-gun legislation.

Asked about the Warner-Frist relationship, the chairman's spokesman, John Ullyot, said, "He intends to work with the Senate leadership to get a bill authorized this fall. Senator Warner has a very good working relationship with Majority Leader Frist."

Warner's staff

Judy Ansley, director of the Senate Armed Services Committee majority staff, is leaving this month to take a post at the National Security Council, European division.

Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, is bringing a former senior staffer, Charles Abell, out of the Pentagon to take her place. Mr. Abell is now principal deputy undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness. Next year will be Mr. Warner's last as chairman because of term limits. Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, is next in line.

Once-liberal Basra Trades Cultural Freedom For Security (KRT)

By Leila Fadel

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

BASRA, Iraq - Statues of generals from Saddam Hussein's Baath party once lined up on the corniche, a walkway along the Shatt al Arab waterway in this southern port city. They pointed menacingly across the water to Iran, and ships at anchor obscured the view of the blue horizon and the illuminating light of the moon.

Saddam and his military brass are now gone, and families instead fill the walkway that looks out over open waters in this city once brutally oppressed by the deposed dictator.

Basra is enjoying an economic and religious renaissance, even as the rise of conservative Shiite Islam has put a chill on its traditionally flourishing cultural scene.

Men dressed in the traditional white gowns called dishdashas dangle their legs over the railing as they eat sandwiches from nearby vendors, who rent water pipes and sell fresh nuts to sightseers. Women and children lay blankets in the grass, eat homemade sandwiches and drink sodas from a cooler.

As dusk approaches life begins in Basra, about 350 miles from the violent capital city of Baghdad. People don't need to hide from insurgent gunmen and suicide bombers, who roam the capital's dark streets.

New stores are opening in the city center to serve the droves of people shopping and eating out. One restaurant, G Core, had its grand opening in the main shopping district less than two weeks ago, and dozens of people crowded into the fast-food restaurant built with faux marble and modern steel stools. They enjoyed the complimentary burgers and fries in a classy version of a fast-food joint in the United States.

Taxis are easy to spot but often already full. At 9 p.m. supermarkets are filled with men and women running errands.

The city flaunts its Shiite identity in the streets, after decades of oppression under Saddam. Portraits of Imam Ali and Imam Hussein, two of the most prominent historical Shiite figures as well as Iraq's major Shiite clerics, are hot items at outdoor markets. A portrait of Jesus appears occasionally among the religious paraphernalia.

Many Shiite Iraqis who lived in exile in Iran have flooded back into the country. Miraad Jaber, 35, was exiled when she was a child. Now she sits in a Basra park with her daughters, whom she raised in Iran.

"Loving this country was a problem. I was exiled for more than 25 years," she said. "I felt homesick for the heat of Basra."

Jaber is happy to take her daughters out at night.

"The Islamist parties control the security situation, and it makes it safe," she said.

But the parties are also a source of fear in the birthplace of much of Iraq's poetry and music. Basra is called "the Mother of the Oud," a Middle Eastern lute, in a famous Iraqi song. Residents of other Iraqi cities know that the best dancers come from this land of dates and palm trees.

But in the music district of Saymar the oud is silent now and the drums are lonely, hanging in the breeze with no musicians to play them. There's more fear than joy here.

Moustafa Dawood and Ahmed Aboud own a small music shop. They surround themselves with rows of colorful drums. Golden trumpets hang in a wood and glass cabinet lined with red velvet. The handmade instruments put their lives at risk.

The store next door has been firebombed four times, the store behind them was bombed twice and many of their colleagues have been beaten in the streets by men in police patrol cars and men who attach themselves to Shiite religious parties, they said. The provincial council is dominated by these parties, including the Badr Organization, a political group derived from the armed military wing of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the Shiite political group that plays a leading role in Iraq's governing coalition.

Sometimes, men rent an instrument from the shop, sign it out in the old, beat-up blue journal and then bring it back in pieces, calling their business haram, or forbidden.

"Ever since we opened our eyes for the first time, we played music," Aboud said behind an old wooden desk in his store.

"But we don't want to be beaten with the butt of a gun," Dawood added.

Now they stash their instruments in the trunk of their car as they head to a wedding or to beat the drums at religious Shiite ceremonies such as Ashura, which commemorates the slaughter of Hussein, the son of Ali, at the Battle of Karbala.

Two years ago they would strum and drum on music row as they left their shop for a wedding, and would keep blowing into trumpets and beating drums until the celebration ended.

A collage of photos in the shop shows Dawood and 19 colleagues smiling and playing music in happier times, next to a picture of Imam Ali. Maybe he'll become a taxi driver or a chickpea street vendor, he said.

"We were fatter then. Now we are scared and thin," Dawood said.

In the once more liberal city many restaurants are divided now for single men and for families, liquor stores are closed and ice cream shops are the place to hang out. They light up the city center at night, but no bachelors walk inside. They stand at service windows and wait for a cone rather than mingle with young women inside eating multicolored scoops in plastic cups with their families.

Haifa Ali drank strawberry juice on a recent Saturday night with her two daughters and son on Al Jazaer street, a busy shopping and restaurant area.

"Life is beautiful," she said as she sipped her juice, unafraid in the bustling night. "But these Islamist parties are pressuring our daughters to veil."

One of her daughters, Walaa Tahsin, 20, is the sole unveiled woman in the shop.

"She's a rebel," said her sister, Wissam Tahsin, 24. "To avoid gossip I put it on."

Ali chose to cover her hair, but today's social and political pressures in the southern city have pushed her daughter to wear the veil.

"It's peaceful but there is no fun for them," she said. "I pray and fast and cover, but it's not good to pressure young people. It should be their choice."

Across the city a newly opened park is filled with children late into the evening on a recent weekend. A woman sits with her 40-day-old child, children play on the swings and large families drink from juice boxes and talk, an unfamiliar sight for travelers from the capital.

The people remain unchanged in Basra, as war after war passes through this city of blue skies and towering palm trees weighed down by dates.

They welcome strangers into their homes for Basra's famous fish, Zubaidi (pomfret). They offer tea and cold soda and describe the sweetness of the golden dates.

Garbage still fills the streets but homes have electricity for 10 to 12 hours a day, compared with as few as four to five before the war.

They never know when another war will come. But they will always open the door and insist on cooking a meal for a stranger as they talk about their city of dates, poetry and culture.

DOJ_NMG_0002279

"I am the daughter of Basra," Ali said. "We will never lose our kindness."

Clubs Provide A Getaway From Turmoil Of Baghdad (USAT)

USA Today, August 5, 2005

BAGHDAD — Under Saddam Hussein's rule, the Hunting Club was an exclusive refuge for privileged members of his government and supporters of the regime. Food and recreation were plentiful, even when much of the country was struggling during sanctions imposed by the United Nations in 1990-2003.

Today, the Hunting Club is still exclusive, but membership is based on educational achievement and ability to pay dues, club director Hassanain Fadhil says.

The club offers respite from the city's daily violence and summer heat. The pools — there are separate facilities for men and women — provide an escape from the daily power outages that leave much of the city sweltering. The club also has a sauna, restaurants, sports fields and large banquet halls.

Retiree Salim Sa'doun, 50, says he uses the pool frequently. “I am happy to be a member of the Hunting Club and to achieve my dream,” he said. Midday, the restaurants are filled with families and friends huddled over tables of kebab and other local fare.

Clubs became popular in the capital during the 1960s, says Muhammed Sa'eed, a manager at the Yarmouk Club. Today, there are 32 clubs in Baghdad. Most have swimming pools, restaurants and halls for weddings or other occasions. Annual dues at the more popular clubs can be hundreds of dollars per year for a family membership, so membership is generally limited to middle class and wealthy Iraqis.

The Yarmouk Club was established in 1960 for army officers and their families. After the war, the Iraqi Islamic Party protected it from looters. Later, people who lived in the neighborhood took over the facility and turned it into a community center with paid memberships.

The club has gymnasiums, restaurants, a soccer team and tennis courts. Once supported by the government, Yarmouk and other clubs have to be self-sustaining today. Sa'eed, the Yarmouk manager, says the club derives much of its income from renting out its banquet facilities for weddings and other occasions.

The Jadriya Club was practically the private domain of Saddam's sons, Uday and Qusay. Anyone who wanted a membership had to get approval from Uday, says Ihab Adwar, deputy director of the club.

The luxurious club was looted of furnishings and some of Uday's finest horses in the chaos after the U.S.-led invasion. Today, the facility is struggling to get back on its feet with a new clientele.

“We think that the club will start to be profitable after no less than 10 years,” Adwar says.

A Future Beyond A Funeral (WP)

By Ed O'Connell

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

BAGHDAD -- Touring a print shop downtown last summer, I tried to draw out one of the workers, a shy boy of 17 or so, about his daily life. Head down and hands behind his back, he spoke of the searing emptiness facing Iraqi youth; there are no discos, few cafes and little opportunity to interact with the opposite sex. His parents had banned visits to the local mosque after work, for fear he might be recruited by insurgents. So he returned every evening to an overcrowded home shared by many relatives and retreated upstairs to sit on the edge of his bed. "I . . . stare at the wall for a few hours," he said. And it struck me that Iraq's youth are experiencing a living death, one in which ending the pain of everyday life might be an attractive option.

The West must do a better job of bringing opportunity and dignity to these Muslim youths. If we can't, the terrorists will continue to prey upon such vulnerable young people, convincing them that the path to glory and dignity lies along the road of suicide bombings and explosive devices. It seems obvious that the success of the terrorist movement rests on the vulnerability of youth worldwide. In military parlance, halting this trend would be considered the deep fight.

Take a walk along the dusty roads at the Baghdad Correctional Facility (Abu Ghraib), which is now mostly outdoors, and you'll see many ghostlike faces -- local teenagers who took $50 or $100 to plant an IED, shoot a mortar or fire a machine gun at coalition troops. No one told them that if they didn't die, they would end up penned in with 20 other lost souls in a tent surrounded by barbed wire. For the foreigners in their midst, inglorious imprisonment in a faraway land was surely not what the young jihadists had signed up for. Angered as I might have been by their attacks on my countrymen, I still wondered, How do we rehabilitate some of these wayward souls? Or are they simply lost causes? And, more important, how do we persuade them not to join the insurgency in the first place?

One enemy video I obtained last summer shows a teenage boy awakened in the middle of the night and brought to a field to say his last goodbyes to his comrades before carrying out his suicide bombing mission. Toting their weapons, they circle around him. The bomber looks tired and somewhat reluctant, but forces a smile. The terrorist leaders have staged the ultimate act for him. He could not back down, even if he wanted to. It is tantamount to forced suicide.

DOJ_NMG_0002280

Another enemy video shows an attack from the triggerman's vantage point as he patiently waits for the right moment to detonate a bomb inside an old car a hundred yards down a busy Baghdad street. After U.S. soldiers pass by, a young boy and a girl walk between them and the car. Yet the bomber does not hesitate to detonate, and in the last frame, a fireball roars up the street toward the boy and girl. In Iraq, the young insurgents-for-hire are increasingly killing other Iraqi youths.

If the terrorists place no value on life, then we must give Iraq's youth something to live for. We know that terrorists recruit Muslim youths when they make pilgrimages to holy sites. We know they often convince these young people that joining the insurgency is a way to redeem past sins or a family's lost dignity. Yet we are failing to give Iraq's young people much to feel dignified about. Western companies are making massive profits providing services to the coalition; why aren't we building an entrepreneurial class from within the ranks of Iraq's young? As it is, these kids walk their own land with sticks, picking up garbage in Baghdad's once attractive parks.

The West must help bring opportunity and hope to the young people of the Muslim world. President Bush's longtime aide Karen Hughes is coming on board to improve America's image in the Muslim world. I propose that Hughes make promoting life and opportunity for Muslim youth one of her top initiatives. She should start by focusing on entrepreneurial opportunities, recreational activities and the opening of doors for young women. Recall the long lines of Iraqi women in black chadors waiting to vote in January's elections? This scene surprised many Americans, but not me. Mothers are revered in Iraq -- they bring life. While we dawdled, failing to take advantage of the momentum created by the success of the first Iraqi national elections, Iraqi mothers were acting. They began to openly challenge the terrorists and local insurgents for taking their children and tearing their families and communities apart. In this high-stakes battle we need all Iraqi mothers on our side -- Sunni, Shiite and Kurd.

We should recruit Islamic social, political and religious leaders to join us in this initiative. We must not be condescending in our approach. We must be open and show our Muslim partners that even a powerful nation such as ours has social problems with its youth.

Muslim youths must be allowed to imagine the power of building a life rather than just existing. With Muslim leaders as partners we can shatter the culture of despair and nothingness that breeds thinking about death among the young. Promoting a culture of life and opportunity is the real battle we cannot afford to lose.

The writer, a retired lieutenant colonel in the Air Force, is a senior research analyst at Rand Corp. working in Iraq and the Middle East.

Pentagon Agrees To Issue Photos Of Coffins Of Iraq War Dead (NYT)

By John Files

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 - Under the terms of a legal settlement announced on Thursday, the Pentagon will make available "as expeditiously as possible" some photographs of the coffins of service members killed in Iraq. The agreement runs counter to a longstanding Pentagon policy that bars the public release of such photographs. But in response to requests under the Freedom of Information Act, the Pentagon has already released hundreds of such photographs this year, and it agreed under the settlement to continue to do so.

The agreement responded to a Freedom of Information Act suit filed in October in Federal District Court here that sought all photographs and video images that showed coffins or similar items that held the remains of American military personnel at Dover Air Force Base, Del., beginning in February 2003.

The Pentagon has strictly enforced a policy barring news photographs showing the coffins. That policy has been in place since the Persian Gulf war in 1991, and President Bush has said it protects the privacy of the families of the dead.

Ralph Begleiter, a journalism professor at the University of Delaware who was a lead plaintiff in the current suit, said the Pentagon's agreement to release the photographs represented a "significant victory for the honor of those who have made the ultimate sacrifice in war for their country, as well as for their families, for all service personnel and for the American people."

The settlement was announced by Mr. Begleiter, along with the National Security Archive, a research institute on foreign affairs that is affiliated with George Washington University, which provided counsel for the case. The archive has used the Freedom of Information Act in other cases to obtain information about government operations.

The Pentagon issued a statement, saying, "As with all information, including images, the Department of Defense has an obligation and a responsibility to strike a balance between our strong desire to be as transparent as possible and the legitimate concerns to protect the privacy of military families and as necessary, operational security."

But there was no indication that the government would permit news organizations to begin taking such photographs.

DOJ_NMG_0002281

Under President Bill Clinton, the policy against taking such photographs was not rigorously enforced, and Mr. Clinton took part in numerous ceremonies that honored dead service members. Under Mr. Bush, the Pentagon issued a directive in March 2003 stating that there would be no news coverage of "deceased military personnel returning to or departing from" air bases.

In June 2004, that policy won the backing of the Senate, when lawmakers defeated a Democratic measure to instruct the Pentagon to allow such pictures.

Lawsuit Forces Release Of More Casualty Images (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

In response to a lawsuit, the Pentagon has released a few dozen new and uncensored images of flag-draped coffins of U.S. troops and agreed to process "as expeditiously as possible" future Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) requests for photo and video images of returning war casualties.

The decision was called a victory for open government by the National Security Archive, a nongovernmental research group here that helped the litigation. "We forced the Pentagon to admit that release of these images was not a mistake but was in fact required by law," said Thomas Blanton, director of the archive, which posted the images on its Web site yesterday. As a result, he said the parties to the suit agreed July 28 to dismiss the case.

University of Delaware professor Ralph Begleiter sued in October 2004, and in April the Pentagon released 721 images of coffins taken by military photographers in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere. The latest release includes five new images as well as 27 others that had been censored with black rectangles, obscuring the faces of chaplains and service members in honor ceremonies.

Since the Persian Gulf War, the government has gradually tightened restrictions on the public release of images of returning war casualties, most recently at the onset of the Iraq war. The policy has sparked intense debate among the public and military. Some contend the images honor U.S. military sacrifice; others consider them tantamount to an antiwar statement.

The latest controversy arose after Dover Air Force Base, the main port for returning U.S. military remains, released 350 images -- including airplane cargo bays filled with flag-draped coffins -- during a spike in fighting in Iraq in April 2004. The Pentagon said that decision, in response to a FOIA request, was a mistake and ordered that no more photographs be released.

Begleiter's suit was filed to demonstrate that under the act, such photographs must be released as long as they do not harm national security or violate privacy laws.

The Pentagon yesterday said "further consideration" of a Begleiter appeal led it to release the latest photographs in an "unredacted form," meaning without the blacked-out faces. "The Department of Defense has an obligation and a responsibility to strike a balance between our strong desire to be as transparent as possible and the legitimate concerns to protect the privacy of military families and as necessary, operational security," a spokesman said.

Pentagon Web Site Bans Politics (WP)

By Robert Macmillan And Mary Specht

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

The Defense Department has removed messages containing political commentary from a Web site designed for people to show their support for U.S. forces serving in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Most of the postings at America Supports You (http://americasupportsyou.mil) express love and encouragement -- "The greatest nation in the world is kept that way by men and women like you," reads one message -- without partisan asides.

But among the 60,000-plus messages were at least a few dozen -- found with the site's search function -- that equated troop support with backing the Bush administration's political goals. Still others lambasted Democratic politicians such as John F. Kerry and Edward M. Kennedy, the senators from Massachusetts.

One message said: "I thank you Mr. President for all you have done and standing up to the one's who don't believe in you. My theory is that if they don't like it here; we will pay their way out. Can you put that in the budget?"

Another said: "I show my support verbally in public and by donations to the RNC and reelect George W. Bush campaigns."

Both those messages, visible on the site two weeks ago, are gone.

The decision to remove such messages reflects a policy posted on the site last week warning that political speech will be barred. Last month the Wall Street Journal reported that two antiwar messages had disappeared from the site, but at the time the site had no posted policy on political statements.

Now, "we are not including messages with political commentary -- pro or con," said Allison Barber, deputy assistant defense secretary and creator of the Web site, which opened in November. "Frankly, this a site to support the troops and thankfully, our men and women in the military volunteer to defend our country no matter who is in political office."

DOJ_NMG_0002282

Yesterday, though, several messages remained that both support and oppose the Bush administration and the U.S. military presence in Iraq and Afghanistan. For example, one said: "We very much support the troops serving but do not support the administration's handling of the conflicts where they are currently asked to serve. Please, bring them home as soon as possible."

Posting political content on Web site operated and financed by the government may not violate any rules, several experts said, but they warned that it creates an image problem.

The military "should not be seen as promoting a political agenda," said Lawrence M. Noble, head of the Center for Responsive Politics and former general counsel for the Federal Election Commission.

MacMillan is a staff writer for washingtonpost.com. Specht is a news intern for washingtonpost.com.

NATO Will Be Ready In 2006 To Take Over From U.S. Forces In Afghanistan, General Says (NSDY/AP)

The Associated Press

Long Island Newsday, August 5, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan -- A NATO-led international force is set to expand and will be ready to assume responsibility for security across all of Afghanistan by the end of next year, freeing up many of the 17,600 American troops battling militants here, a NATO general said Thursday.

The announcement follows a surge in fighting between U.S.-led forces and Taliban rebels ahead of elections next month. The bloodshed has led the military to rush in an airborne infantry battalion of about 700 troops on standby in Fort Bragg, N.C.

On Thursday, a roadside bomb exploded near a U.S. military vehicle in eastern Afghanistan, killing an American service member and wounding another as well as an Afghan soldier, a U.S. military statement said.

Washington has long urged NATO to move forward with a plan to expand its 10,000-strong force into Afghanistan's volatile south and east.

"We are in a position that we can take over the responsibility for all of Afghanistan in the course of the next year," said Gen. Gerhard Back, who oversees the International Security Assistance Force mission from his base in Brunssum, the Netherlands.

He said he expects the deployment of extra NATO forces to relieve a "substantial" number of troops from the U.S.-led coalition, which also includes some 3,100 soldiers from 19 other nations.

Back said NATO troops would need "more robust" rules of engagement, which govern when and how forces can engage the insurgents.

He spoke to reporters after a ceremony marking the change of the command of ISAF, the NATO-led force, from a Turkish general to Italian Lt. Gen. Mauro Del Vecchio. The force is made up of troops from 36 nations.

ISAF already maintains security in the capital, Kabul, and the country's north and west. It plans to increase its size by an unspecified amount and take over from the U.S.-led coalition in the violence-wracked south early next year, before gradually moving into the east.

ISAF spokesman Riccardo Cristoni said most American troops who stay in Afghanistan after NATO takes responsibility for security nationwide would come under NATO command.

But he said it was not clear whether the United States would also keep a separate force dedicated to hunting Osama bin Laden and other al-Qaida leaders believed to be hiding along the mountainous Afghan-Pakistani border.

U.S. military spokeswoman Lt. Cindy Moore said commanders were still planning how many troops would remain here next year.

Washington has long sought to reduce the number of its troops in Afghanistan. In May, Maj. Gen. Jason Kamiya, the operational commander of U.S. forces in Afghanistan, said he was optimistic there would be a "modest reduction" this summer -- but that has not happened.

NATO has also boosted the size of its force in the past few weeks in response to the violence and in preparation for legislative elections on Sept. 18. It plans to bring in another 2,000 troops before the vote.

More than 900 people have been killed in fighting since March, when winter snows melted on mountain passes the insurgents use and the rebels launched major offensives across the country.

Afghan, NATO and American officials have warned that the spike in fighting may threaten the elections, which is the next key step toward democracy after a quarter-century of war.

"Some sources of instability like Taliban, al-Qaida and other elements might still pose a danger to the democratic process in Afghanistan," said Hikmet Cetin, the top civilian representative for NATO in Afghanistan. "We are aware that at the critical juncture for Afghans' future, the security situation could not be taken for granted."

DOJ_NMG_0002283

The attack that killed the U.S. service member Thursday occurred near a base at Urgun in Paktika province, which borders Pakistan. It came just over a week after two other U.S. service members were killed in separate attacks.

The death brings to 174 the number of U.S. troops killed in and around Afghanistan since Operation Enduring Freedom began in 2001.

DOJ:

Deputy Attorney General Comey To Take Post At Lockheed Martin (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Squeo, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

The nation's No. 2 law-enforcement official, Deputy Attorney General James Comey, is expected to join Lockheed Martin Corp. as senior vice president and general counsel when he leaves the government this month, according to people familiar with the matter.

Mr. Comey, perhaps best known in recent years for spearheading a crackdown on corporate fraud, previously had prosecuted numerous organized-crime and terrorism cases, including those involving crime boss John Gambino and the 1996 Khobar Towers terrorist attack on a U.S. military facility in Saudi Arabia. President Bush appointed him to the senior Justice Department post in December 2003.

Separately, David N. Kelley, who succeeded Mr. Comey as U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York in early 2004, is leaving that post to join law firm Cahill Gordon & Reindel LLP. He will start at the firm in the fall as a litigation group partner.

Mr. Comey's hiring by Lockheed, which will take effect Oct. 1, will add legal firepower to the executive team at the nation's largest defense contractor, which often faces a variety of legal claims, ranging from environmental cleanups to false claims and securities suits.

Directors at Lockheed, Bethesda, Md., are expected to vote on Mr. Comey's compensation this morning. Mr. Comey declined to comment.

Mr. Comey, 44 years old, is expected to be succeeded at the Justice Department by Timothy Flanigan, general counsel at Tyco International Ltd. and former White House deputy counsel.

At the Justice Department, Mr. Comey has overseen day-to-day operations, serving as the point person at department headquarters for U.S. attorneys nationwide and leading the Corporate Fraud Task Force, an interagency group created by the president amid numerous corporate-accounting scandals. To that end, federal prosecutors have charged more than 1,300 individuals with various related crimes since the group's formation in July 2002.

As U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, Mr.Comey directed corporate-fraud cases involving WorldCom Inc., Adelphia Communications Corp. and ImClone Systems Inc., as well as aiding the government's response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. From 1996 to 2001, he was the managing Assistant U.S. Attorney in Richmond, Va.

The departure of Mr. Kelley, 45, a career prosecutor, was expected. He is a Democrat and presidents usually nominate U.S. attorneys from their own party. Mr. Kelley will be succeeded by Michael J. Garcia, whom President Bush nominated earlier this year. Mr. Garcia, a top Department of Homeland Security official, was confirmed by the Senate.

--Kara Scannell contributed to this article.

Lockheed Names Justice Department's Comey To GC Post (AP)

AP, August 5, 2005

Lockheed Martin Corp., the nation's largest defense contractor, said Thursday that the second-ranking official at the Justice Department will become the company's general counsel.

Deputy Attorney General James Comey, 44, will join Lockheed in October, replacing Frank Menaker Jr., 65, as its top lawyer. Comey, who was appointed in 2003 by President Bush, said in April that he planned to leave the Justice Department in the fall.

At Justice, he led the agency's corporate fraud task force, overseeing the prosecution of firms such as WorldCom and Enron Corp. He had served earlier as U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, and handled the investigation of the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia while working at the U.S. attorney's office in Virginia.

Menaker, who has served as general counsel at Lockheed since March 1995, will retire at the end of January 2006.

Lockheed also said the former deputy secretary of Homeland Security, James Loy, was elected to the company's board of directors. Loy was also the first director of the Transportation Security Administration.

Lockheed shares fell 13 cents to close at $62.82 Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange.

U.S. Deputy AG Comey To Join Lockheed Martin (REU)

Reuters, August 5, 2005

U.S. Deputy Attorney General James Comey, who made his name prosecuting corporate executives, is to join the nation's No. 1 defense contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. as general counsel, a source familiar with the matter said on Thursday.

Comey, the No. 2 U.S. legal official behind Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, led the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, overseeing prosecutions of executives at Adelphia Communications Corp. , ImClone Systems Inc. and WorldCom. He also handled a number of high-profile terror and drug cases.

The Lockheed appointment is set to start on Oct. 1. The move was first reported in The Wall Street Journal.

Comey, who was named Deputy Attorney General in October 2003, said in April he planned to resign and move into the private sector.

Before serving in Washington, Comey was U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, where he made his name prosecuting an organized crime case against the Gambino family.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

U.S. Probes Allegations Of Bribery At DaimlerChrysler (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke And Stephen Power

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

The Justice Department is pursuing a criminal investigation of allegations that DaimlerChrysler AG's Mercedes unit paid bribes in at least a dozen countries and that senior executives may have been aware of the practice.

The investigation is an escalation of a civil inquiry by the Securities and Exchange Commission that was disclosed late last year. That inquiry was triggered by a former Chrysler accountant in Detroit who alleged in a lawsuit last year that the company kept dozens of secret bank accounts to bribe foreign officials.

The investigation comes at a difficult time for DaimlerChrysler. Last week, Chief Executive Jürgen Schrempp unexpectedly said he would retire at the end of this year, well ahead of the April 2008 expiration of his contract, amid weak financial results and other setbacks at the company, the world's fifth-largest auto maker as measured by sales.

German federal authorities joined the investigation as well, people close to the case said, after the July 22 suicide of Rudi Kornmayer, managing director of the company's plant in Nigeria. The 53-year-old executive shot himself in a park in Esslingen, Germany, police said. Investigators are reviewing a suicide note that refers to the bribery inquiry, those close to the case said.

DaimlerChrysler operations in Latin America and Africa are among those under scrutiny, a person close to the case said, but the nature and purpose of the alleged payments hasn't been disclosed.

In financial disclosures on July 28, DaimlerChrysler reported it has identified "accounts, transactions and related payments that are subject to special scrutiny." The company said it is cooperating fully with investigators and "voluntarily sharing...information from its own internal investigation" in response to subpoenas from U.S. authorities.

A spokesman at DaimlerChrysler's Stuttgart, Germany, headquarters declined to amplify that statement or discuss the death of Mr. Kornmayer, who headed the company's Nigerian operations. A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment.

Historically, there has been recurring tension between the U.S. and foreign companies over enforcement of U.S. anti-corruption laws. Foreign bribes by companies or individuals were outlawed by the 1977 Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, and in recent years the U.S. has pushed other countries to adopt similar laws. But bribery remains common in parts of Africa and Latin America, and in many oil-producing nations.

Bribery is illegal across the European Union. But before passage of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development Anti-Bribery Convention in 1997, several European governments, including Germany's, openly allowed tax deductions for bribery overseas, according to Transparency International, a Berlin-based nonprofit group dedicated to fighting corruption. Germany's parliament ratified the convention in 1999.

The U.S. has stepped up enforcement of its anti-bribery law in recent years, and a growing number of companies have been disclosing possible foreign bribery in the wake of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-accountability law. The largest such case to date was settled earlier this year, when defense contractor Titan Corp. paid $28.5 million in fines and other penalties for $3.5 million in alleged bribes in the African nation of Benin, part of which was used in a presidential election campaign to secure the award of a telecommunications contract, according to a government filing in federal court in San Diego. The bribery investigation had derailed a planned acquisition of Titan by Lockheed Martin Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0002285

The DaimlerChrysler inquiry stems from a wrongful-dismissal lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit last year and settled last month. The plaintiff in that case, former Chrysler accountant David Bazzetta, alleged he was fired in part because he complained to superiors about secret bank accounts kept by the company's Mercedes unit.

Mr. Bazzetta said he first learned of the accounts at a corporate audit executive committee meeting in Stuttgart in July 2001. At the time Mr. Bazzetta's allegations were disclosed, Dieter Zetsche, then-CEO of Chrysler Group, told The Wall Street Journal "there is no evidence supporting" the allegations.

Mr. Bazzetta also claimed, according to court filings, that a senior audit manager told the group that foreign bribery had once been a "common practice" and that Mercedes managers in a few countries were resisting efforts to "wind down" the practice to come into compliance with U.S. law. DaimlerBenz AG and Chrysler Corp. merged in 1998; the company is subject to U.S. bribery law because its shares are listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. Bazzetta said in his lawsuit that he was told by his supervisor to "forget what was said" and that "issues that arise in corporate audit must remain in corporate audit." He also said he was told that Mr. Schrempp and other executives had been briefed by a senior auditor on 40 secret accounts that still existed and that the money was "buried deep within [the] balance sheet." The accounts still existed, Mr. Bazzetta asserted in his lawsuit, "because the chief executives of the business units not only favored this practice but believed it a necessary cost of doing business."

Terms of the settlement between Mr. Bazzetta and DaimlerChrysler are confidential, said his attorney, Sue Ellen Eisenberg of law firm Eisenberg & Bogas, Bloomfield Hills, Mich. Mr. Bazzetta later met with investigators and provided further details of the 2001 meeting. She said Mr. Bazzetta would not comment. Mr. Bazzetta's suit doesn't say how the accounts were used by country managers or whether they still are in existence.

In its SEC filing last week, DaimlerChrysler said it "has not yet reached any definitive conclusions as to whether, or to what extent, these transactions and payments may constitute violations of applicable law." If the Justice Department or SEC find that violations have occurred, the company said, "They could seek criminal or civil sanctions, including monetary penalties against DaimlerChrysler and certain of its employees, as well as changes to its business practices and compliance programs."

DaimlerChrysler also announced $17.8 million in adjustments to "certain payable accounts related to consolidated subsidiaries." The changes are insignificant given DaimlerChrysler's vast size, but may be a clue to the size of the alleged improper payments. Company officials declined to explain the accounting changes or detail how they relate to the bribery investigation. The statement also said, "It is possible that further adjustments may be required as the company completes its investigation."

The DaimlerChrysler investigation comes amid probes at other high-profile German companies that have put some of the country's traditional corporate practices under a microscope. German prosecutors are looking into allegations that a former Volkswagen AG executive set up phony businesses abroad to enrich himself at the expense of Volkswagen business partners, and that the company's personnel department gave union leaders unrestricted access to a corporate travel account that paid for plush hotels and other perks.

While allegations of corruption at Volkswagen and other companies have garnered widespread publicity in Germany recently, most corporations are more sensitive to perceptions of wrongdoing, and have tightened ethics codes to prohibit behavior that would previously have been tolerated, said Dagmar Schröder, managing director of Transparency International's Germany chapter.

SEC Urges Judge To Let Scrushy Case Proceed (LAT/BLOOM)

By From Bloomberg News

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

HealthSouth Corp. founder Richard Scrushy should face civil-fraud charges for his role in "one of the largest financial frauds in U.S. history," the Securities and Exchange Commission said Thursday in urging a judge to let the case proceed.

The SEC's filing in federal court in Birmingham, Ala., called Scrushy "desperate" for asking last month that the lawsuit be dismissed because of the agency's collaboration with the Justice Department. Any guidance given to the SEC was within acceptable rules, the agency said.

"Scrushy wants this court to create new law, from scratch, that would obligate the SEC to keep suspects apprised of developments in parallel DOJ investigations," the SEC said. "Scrushy wants the SEC to become the con man's ear in the Justice Department."

Scrushy is accused by the SEC of lying to investors and signing false financial reports. The lawsuit is one of several stemming from fraud that happened under Scrushy's watch from 1996 to 2002 at HealthSouth, the largest U.S. operator of rehabilitation medicine services. Scrushy, who is fighting to regain control of the company he started in 1984, was acquitted June 28 of criminal charges.

Arthur Leach, Scrushy's lawyer, said he hadn't yet read the SEC filing and couldn't comment.

Greenberg Fires Back At Directors (NYT)

By Jenny Anderson

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Maurice R. Greenberg, the former chairman and chief executive of the giant insurer American International Group, has challenged the rationale for its $4 billion income restatement, calling many of the items "exaggerated and unnecessary."

In a document presented to regulators yesterday, Mr. Greenberg's lawyers point to many people, including the company's audit committee and PricewaterhouseCoopers, as being equally responsible for overseeing the company's complex accounting. It suggests that the company's huge restatement was carried out to justify Mr. Greenberg's ouster earlier this year.

The document, known as a white paper, is a gamble for Mr. Greenberg. He is named in a suit brought by the New York attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, which claims that he and others manipulated A.I.G.'s financial statements and misled regulators, and he continues to be under criminal and civil investigation by federal authorities. In late May, A.I.G. restated five years of results, lowering its net income over that time by $4 billion, or 10 percent.

The paper is "a shot across the bow of the regulators who clearly are contemplating bringing criminal charges," said Robert A. Mintz, head of the white-collar defense practice of the law firm McCarter & English and a former federal prosecutor. "It's a signal that this is clearly a winnable fight and it's far from a black and white case."

Mr. Greenberg's lawyers challenge many of the restatement items and question what they call the board's rash judgment to force Mr. Greenberg's resignation before any charges were brought. The intense regulatory environment, they write, does not explain the whole picture.

"The rush to judgment may also be explained in part by the outside directors' interest in legitimizing their removal of Mr. Greenberg," the paper says, "whose 38-year record in creating stockholder value is beyond dispute in American business history and by understanding the long-held ambitions of at least one or two such directors to take a leading role at A.I.G."

Chris Winans, an A.I.G. spokesman, said: "We have not been given access to the so-called white paper and we have no comment on it. We stand by our decision as fully disclosed in our recent 10(k) filing with the S.E.C."

Darren Dopp, a spokesman for Mr. Spitzer, said, "We'll let the case and the facts speak for themselves."

Among the items that the paper challenges are an $850 million charge for asbestos and environmental reserves and a decision to expense already awarded long-term compensation. It also examines the role played by both A.I.G.'s audit committee and PricewaterhouseCoopers for approving many of the transactions now deemed improper.

A spokesman for PricewaterhouseCoopers could not be reached for comment.

Mr. Greenberg's lawyers question A.I.G.'s reversal on how to account for stock awarded to A.I.G. employees by Starr International, a private company that ultimately became a vehicle to offer incentive compensation to A.I.G. employees. In its 10(k) filing, A.I.G. states that it did not previously expense the compensation because "the amounts had been determined not to be material."

As a result of that program, A.I.G. stockholders enjoyed a lower rate of dilution than other companies because Starr International, rather than A.I.G., could offer the compensation. According to the paper, Starr International has offered information to A.I.G. that would enable it to save hundreds of millions of dollars through a tax deduction. A.I.G. has not responded to that offer, Mr. Greenberg's lawyers wrote.

"These changes to the form 10(k) may be an attempt by new management to set the bar as low as possible on the investment community's expectations of A.I.G.'s earnings going forward," the paper says.

The report does not detail Mr. Greenberg's role in a so-called finite insurance transaction with General Re, a subsidiary of Berkshire Hathaway, which Mr. Spitzer accuses Mr. Greenberg of orchestrating solely to dress up A.I.G.'s financials.

The report says the accounting community continues to debate the issue of when finite reinsurance contracts qualify as reinsurance accounting, calling the issue "complex and highly subjective."

But the document does not address Mr. Greenberg's motives in seeking the transaction. His lawyers say they have not received the documents necessary to review the matter properly.

The report takes shots at various individuals inside A.I.G. Mr. Spitzer's complaint alleges that management made accounting adjustments, known as top-level adjustments, to improve its results. Mr. Greenberg's lawyers say no top-level entries were made without consultation with PricewaterhouseCoopers, adding that Martin J. Sullivan, the current chief executive of A.I.G., was "involved in certain top-level adjustments to general insurance loss reserves."

Mr. Sullivan has not been accused of any wrongdoing. Through Mr. Winans, he declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0002287

Greenberg Defends AIG's Accounting, Rebuts Allegations (WSJ)

By Theo Francis And Ian McDonald

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Attorneys for former American International Group Inc. Chairman and Chief Executive Maurice R. "Hank" Greenberg defended many of the accounting decisions made on his watch, telling regulators that the company's auditor and current AIG executives knew of moves the company recently reversed.

In a 51-page document, the lawyers say that AIG's longtime auditor, PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, Chief Executive Martin J. Sullivan and Chief Financial Officer Steven J. Bensinger, among others, were aware of accounting moves that the company has reversed under pressure from regulators.

In late May AIG restated five years of financial results, shaving its reported profit through 2004 by 10%, or $3.9 billion, and cutting its net worth by 3%. The company's shares have fallen 16% since it disclosed state and federal subpoenas in February.

The document suggests current managers are eager to take sizable charges now partly to make the firm's future results looks stronger by comparison. The changes behind the restatement "may be an effort by new management to set the bar as low as possible on the investment community's expectations of AIG's earnings going forward," according to the document. The outside directors also have "an interest in legitimizing their removal of Mr. Greenberg," the document says.

The document, which was reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, marks Mr. Greenberg's first detailed attempt since he was forced out in March to rebut allegations that he and others improperly manipulated AIG's books to burnish the company's otherwise strong results. Those allegations are made in AIG's latest annual report and in a lawsuit filed in May by the New York attorney general and the state insurance department against the company, Mr. Greenberg and another former executive. The latest document first was described in an editorial published yesterday in the Journal.

An AIG spokesman said the company stands by its restatement. "We have not been given access to the so-called white paper...and we have no comment on it," he said. Messrs. Sullivan and Bensinger also had no comment, he said. AIG has said that an internal review this year turned up new information that led the company to re-evaluate past accounting decisions. A PricewaterhouseCoopers spokesman said the firm hasn't seen the document and declined to comment.

AIG and New York regulators are in the early stages of settlement talks, people familiar with the talks say. Mr. Greenberg's attorneys previously have said he would contest the New York lawsuit's allegations, as has an attorney for the other defendant.

A spokesman for the New York attorney general's office confirmed receiving the document but declined to comment. A New York insurance department spokesman declined to comment and said the agency hadn't received the document from Mr. Greenberg's legal team.

The attorneys argue in the document that Mr. Greenberg was "not responsible for developing and implementing the accounting policies of AIG." Other top officials knew of many decisions, the document states. Both PricewaterhouseCoopers and AIG's interim chairman, Frank Zarb, for example, knew of the accounting treatment AIG used for "covered calls," derivative transactions that AIG in May said had been improperly booked, the document says. Mr. Zarb couldn't be reached to comment.

In criticizing AIG's decision to increase its reserves for liabilities related to asbestos and pollution losses -- a move that reduced net income by $850 million -- the document notes that Mr. Bensinger, now financial chief, had been responsible for presenting AIG's earlier figures to ratings companies.

New SEC Chief Vows Agency Will Be 'Investors' Advocate' (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

In his first day on the job, Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox sought to allay concerns that he'll kowtow to business, telling SEC staff that "the Department of Commerce serves our country's businesses. We are the investors' advocate."

The arrival of Mr. Cox, a former Republican congressman from Southern California, has been viewed with skepticism by some who fear he may take a more business-friendly approach to regulation and enforcement than his predecessor, William Donaldson.

At a staff meeting yesterday morning, Mr. Cox told staffers those predictions "often have as much factual basis as a WorldCom prospectus" and said anyone who tries to take advantage of the investing public "will find themselves a powerful adversary in the SEC."

His brief remarks underscored the delicate balancing act that awaits Mr. Cox, who will have to weigh the needs of investors against the growing concerns of business that the SEC has become too aggressive. He acknowledged that the SEC "faces some thorny issues" as it looks to implement controversial new rules, including an overhaul of stock trading, the registration of hedge-fund advisers and new mutual-fund governance requirements. Mr. Donaldson pushed those rules through on a 3-2 vote with the support of the SEC's two Democratic commissioners and over the objections of Republican Commissioners Paul Atkins and Cynthia Glassman.

DOJ_NMG_0002288

Mr. Cox didn't offer specifics of his own agenda yesterday other than to say he wants to improve disclosure both on Wall Street and within the SEC. He said he wants the SEC to renew its focus on the "plain English" doctrine, implemented under former Chairman Arthur Levitt, intended to make Wall Street documents more intelligible to investors. He said that same goal should also apply to the SEC's written rules and regulations, which can be massive and hard to understand. "The SEC has to practice what it preaches," he said.

Mr. Cox is expected to spend some time getting up to speed on the SEC's activities and initiatives and is also expected to start interviewing staff for several open positions, including the agency's head of investment management and its market-regulation division.

New SEC Chief Vows To Reduce Jargon (FT)

By Andrew Parker

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

Christopher Cox, the new Republican chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, signalled on Thursday that providing investors with more user-friendly financial information would be a theme of his leadership.

Mr Cox, on his first day as the chief US financial regulator, complained about the lack of "plain English" in company proxy statements and mutual fund prospectuses.

He also warned that the SEC faced some "truly thorny issues" in implementing rules on stock trading, hedge fund oversight and mutual fund governance that were finalised by William Donaldson, his predecessor.

Mr Cox used a speech at the SEC headquarters in Washington to set out his concerns about the lack of comprehensible information for retail investors.

"When a company issues a proxy statement, should the millions of ordinary Americans who own the company's stock be able to read and understand it?" he asked.

"It is all well and good that their broker's lawyer could understand it. But what about the individual investors themselves - is disclosure for them too?"

Mr Cox praised an initiative on plain English in financial information by Arthur Levitt, the former Democratic chairman of the SEC.

"Chairman Levitt's vision was dead-on," he said. "How hard do you think it would be today to find offensive legalese in almost any mutual fund prospectus or proxy statement?"

He also emphasised the need for the SEC to practise what it preached, and to make sure its own rules and publications contained plain English. Mr Cox joked about speculation, running up to the Senate's confirmation of him as SEC chairman last week, on whether the regulator would be business-friendly or investor-friendly under his leadership.

As a Republican congressman for the past 17 years, he developed a business-friendly legislative track record. Mr Cox on Thursday said the SEC was "the investor's advocate". "During my chairmanship, anyone who attempts to drive a wedge between the interests of business and interests of investors in that business will find themselves confronted by a relentless and powerful adversary in the Securities and Exchange Commission," he said.

He added that it should not be necessary for the interests of business and investors to be in conflict, given that shareholders owned companies.

Mr Cox signalled that he would retain Linda Thomsen, who was appointed SEC director of enforcement in May by Mr Donaldson.

The senior SEC staff serve at the pleasure of the chairman, and there has been media speculation that Mr Cox might want changes to personnel.

Stock Options: Do They Make Bosses Cheat? (NYT)

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

QUESTION for shareholders: If the company's directors give lots of options to the chief executive, should you be happy or nervous?

The traditional answer from academia was that big options grants were good. They aligned the interests of executives with shareholders, and they helped to offset the tendency of executives to avoid risky but potentially profitable investments.

DOJ_NMG_0002289

But it turns out that the conclusions were based more on optimistic theories than data. Now, with option grants having become the largest portion of chief executive compensation - worth more than either salary or bonus for the average boss - analysis of data on corporate performance provides some disturbing results.

It appears that really big options grants make it more likely that companies will fudge their numbers and that companies with such grants are more likely to go broke.

One study, to be presented this weekend at a meeting of the Academy of Management in Honolulu, compared 435 companies that were forced to restate their financial statements with similar companies that did not run into such problems.

The report found that the higher the proportion of the boss's pay in stock options, the more likely the company was to be forced to restate profits. For companies where bosses got 92 percent or more of their pay in options, about a fifth ended up faking their books within five years.

That conclusion would be more persuasive if the authors, Jared Harris, a doctoral candidate at the University of Minnesota, and Philip Bromley, a management professor there, had looked at all companies that are so generous with options.

But it makes a lot of sense. Those executives whose well-being most depends on the stock going up are most likely to do what they can to arrange that, by fair means or foul.

IT is not just options that seem to correlate with fraud, the study found. Bosses of companies that are doing much worse than their competitors may feel a need to cheat. And companies that turn in a very good year have a propensity for faking numbers the next year.

"A firm with an exceptional year faces a difficult problem," the authors write. "If the high performance the year before was partly luck, then the firm may be unable to replicate the high performance, but the market will view failing to do so negatively. Trying to equal past performance, such firms may resort to financial misrepresentation."

Another study that shows the dangers of excessive options comes from Moody's, the bond rating service. The study's authors, Kenneth A. Bertsch and Christopher Mann, found that companies with the highest-paid bosses, adjusted for things like company size and performance, were far more likely to default on debt or to suffer major cuts in bond ratings.

There is, they note, a relatively benign explanation: such companies are taking risks to benefit shareholders, and while some of the risks do not work out, others do. But they offer two other possible explanations. One is that high management pay reflects weak board oversight. The other is that incentive pay packages can "create an environment that ultimately leads to fraud."

Stock options may not produce fraud but they do magnify its rewards. As the Harris-Bromley article notes: "It is easy to be honest if $1 is at stake; it is harder to be honest if $10 million is available."

The lesson for corporate boards is that if they think it is a good idea to lavish stock options on top management, they also need to be vigilant in putting in safeguards to prevent and discover fraud. As Mr. Harris put it, "it does look like the more options you pay your C.E.O., the more likely the firm is to cheat."

Delphi Negotiates With GM, UAW About Big Revamp (WSJ)

By Joseph B. White

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Delphi Corp. Chairman and Chief Executive Officer Robert S. "Steve" Miller said the automotive supplier is in discussions with former parent General Motors Corp. and the United Auto Workers about a comprehensive restructuring of Delphi's unprofitable U.S. operations aimed at avoiding bankruptcy reorganization.

Mr. Miller, a veteran leader of large-scale corporate restructurings, said discussions with GM and the union "are very constructive and give me hope that we can restructure out of court." But Mr. Miller said that if Delphi can't reach agreements with GM and the UAW that substantially cut its U.S. labor costs and allow for restructuring or sale of unprofitable businesses, the company can't continue on its current course until September 2007, when its current UAW contract expires.

Delphi had a $403 million loss in the first quarter, and has forecast a loss for the year. "We don't have the wherewithal to go another two years losing money at that rate," Mr. Miller said in an interview at Delphi headquarters. Mr. Miller took the helm at Delphi July 1, succeeding former Chairman and Chief Executive Officer J.T. Battenberg III, who announced his retirement in February.

Delphi had $28.62 billion in revenue and a $4.75 billion loss in 2004. Delphi has been wrestling with management turmoil linked to revelations of accounting irregularities. The company at the end of last month restated earnings for 2001 through 2003. The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating. No Delphi executives have been charged with wrongdoing.

Delphi's operating crisis became acute during the first half of this year as GM, which accounts for 49% of Delphi's total business, slashed production amid slowing sales.

DOJ_NMG_0002290

One result of the GM cuts is that Delphi has about 4,000 UAW workers who are laid off but receiving pay and benefits from Delphi under the master UAW contract. Delphi President Rodney O'Neal, in comments at an industry conference earlier this week, said payments to laid-off workers are costing Delphi $300 million to $400 million a year.

Most of Delphi's roughly 25,000 UAW workers earn the same wages and benefits as GM hourly workers. Most of Delphi's supplier competitors pay even their unionized U.S. workers a fraction of Delphi's $27-an-hour rate. Delphi's pension plan is $4.7 billion underfunded, according to a July 29 report by analysts at Standard & Poor's Corp. The company has a retiree health-care liability of $10 billion.

Mr. Miller said a $2.8 billion refinancing plan completed in June has given the company time to "come to an orderly resolution" of restructuring talks with GM and the union.

A GM spokesman said the company wouldn't comment on talks with Delphi. Union officials couldn't be reached.

GM doesn't have equity ties to Delphi, and Delphi employees aren't GM employees. However, GM could be liable for a portion of pension and retiree health benefits for Delphi's UAW employees, should Delphi seek a bankruptcy-court reorganization and terminate its pension plans. Delphi workers also have a limited right to return to GM, if GM has job openings.

Moreover, GM would have an incentive to avoid the potential disruption to its operations from a Delphi collapse. For example, a bankruptcy court could order GM to pay Delphi higher prices.

What will be critical to Delphi's effort to avoid a bankruptcy reorganization, Mr. Miller said, is the support of Delphi's suppliers and customers. Suppliers could demand immediate payment for goods delivered to Delphi. Potential customers could decide not to award Delphi business for fear that the company would fail to perform.

Mr. Miller didn't disclose specifics for his restructuring plan. He said Delphi will concentrate on high-technology products -- including nonautomotive ventures.

Delayed Reaction At Morgan Stanley, Board Slowly Faced Its Purcell Problem (WSJ)

By Ann Davis And Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

On a sunny day in early June, near the top of a 60-story glass tower with panoramic views of Boston, three independent Morgan Stanley directors heard a stern critique from money managers at the hedge fund Highfields Capital Management LP.

Morgan Stanley Chief Executive Philip Purcell risked being ousted in a proxy fight the next spring, the Highfields managers said. Yet the Morgan Stanley board had allowed two designated successors to leave and the firm was suffering an alarming exodus of talent, they said.

The meeting with Highfields was the last significant event before directors and Mr. Purcell decided he should step down, according to interviews with two people knowledgeable about board deliberations. On June 13 he announced he would resign and he left the firm on June 30.

Based on interviews with directors, investors and others, a picture emerges of a board that came to grips painfully slowly with the extent of Mr. Purcell's unpopularity. By some directors' own accounts, the board initially misjudged attacks on Mr. Purcell by retired Morgan Stanley executives, seeing the complaints as carping about his personal style rather than as an issue that threatened the company's performance.

The tale serves as a caution for boards in an era when their role in corporate governance is drawing more scrutiny. The damage from delay when directors fail to spread their antennae widely is especially great at a Wall Street securities firm like Morgan Stanley, where the most valuable assets can walk out the door and never return.

That's precisely what happened during the three months between the first stirrings of revolt in March and Mr. Purcell's resignation in June: Dozens of key Morgan Stanley staffers quit and joined rival companies or are considering starting their own firms. Replacing those people is an issue that Mr. Purcell's successor, John Mack, is trying to address.

As this year dawned, directors had reason to believe all was calm at Morgan Stanley. The firm was a big player in the dot-com boom of the late 1990s and had suffered in the collapse. But in 2003 and 2004, Morgan Stanley's profits rebounded and the stock price climbed back somewhat.

"Performance had turned up," says recently named lead director Miles Marsh, a mild-mannered native of South Africa who used to lead a paper-products company. Earnings per share rose 18% in 2004 and Morgan Stanley was No. 1 in stock underwriting, he notes.

When eight prominent Morgan Stanley alumni called for Mr. Purcell's removal in a March 3 letter, many of the directors saw little more than sour grapes. It was well-known that many Morgan Stanley old-timers had an animus toward Mr. Purcell, who led Dean Witter, Discover & Co. into its merger with Morgan Stanley in 1997. Mr. Purcell nudged out Mr. Mack, a Morgan Stanley veteran, in 2001 by not ceding the CEO job as Mr. Mack thought they had agreed.

DOJ_NMG_0002291

"It struck us that the complaints against Phil were more personal than based on performance," says Michael Miles, a former CEO of Philip Morris Cos. Mr. Miles was one of Dean Witter's directors when it went public in 1993 and since the Morgan Stanley merger has chaired the committee that recommends new directors and oversees board procedure.

On March 14, the directors solicited views from about a dozen top executives, asking them what they thought of Morgan Stanley's strategy and leadership. Star investment banker Joseph Perella was at a conference in Mexico with 60 clients. In a 20-minute call, Mr. Perella told three directors he believed Mr. Purcell's leadership style wasn't working, according to a person told of the call at the time. A spokesman for Mr. Perella, Tim Metz, declined to comment.

Mr. Perella said Mr. Purcell, who lived in New York during the week but typically returned to his family's home near Chicago on weekends, had little involvement in Manhattan's civic or charitable affairs and was little-known among clients and employees.

"But Joe, these are all soft issues," Mr. Marsh responded, people familiar with the call said. Mr. Marsh asked Mr. Perella to focus on "hard" issues such as business strategy and execution, according to a person familiar with the conversation.

One director even sought to squelch a doubter on the board. At a mid-March board meeting, Laura D'Andrea Tyson, a former Clinton administration economic official who is dean of the London Business School, said directors should take the criticism of Mr. Purcell's record more seriously. Director Charles Knight, former CEO of Emerson Electric Co., rebuked Ms. Tyson, calling her comment inappropriate, people familiar with the exchange say.

Depth of Feeling

Several encounters suggest directors misunderstood the depth of feeling among people in Morgan Stanley's institutional securities business, which underwrites and trades stocks and bonds as well as advising corporations on mergers. That business, the traditional core of Morgan Stanley, generates 60% of the firm's profits.

At one point Mr. Miles compared Mr. Purcell to management icon Jack Welch, the former head of General Electric Co., and the dissidents to lower-level employees. "Can you imagine 10 engineers from the GE engine plant in Cincinnati who don't like how the engine division is being operated writing a letter to the GE board saying Jack Welch should be fired?" Mr. Miles asked some bankers, say people familiar with his remarks. Mr. Miles meant to refer to Mr. Welch's more controversial early years as chief executive, when his cost cuts earned him the nickname "Neutron Jack."

In fact, the dissidents included a former chairman and a former president of Morgan Stanley. On April 2, Mr. Perella spoke for an hour with Mr. Miles and said the troops were in disarray, according to people familiar with the conversation. Mr. Perella asked about arranging a meeting between bankers and directors, these people say. The meeting had been suggested by Paul Taubman, co-head of mergers and acquisitions.

Mr. Miles responded tartly that if the purpose of the meeting was to tell directors that Mr. Purcell should resign, it wouldn't be much of a meeting because the board is "100% behind Phil." He advised Mr. Perella to tell his people to "go back to work." And he urged Mr. Perella to "put the genie back in the bottle" by helping quell the dissent, people familiar with the discussion say.

On April 13, Mr. Perella and the head of investment banking, Terry Meguid, resigned. Mr. Perella went on to land an assignment advising MBNA Corp. on its purchase by Bank of America Corp. -- a $35 billion deal announced in June that Morgan Stanley wasn't involved in.

The week after Mr. Perella resigned, Messrs. Miles and Purcell visited the Baltimore headquarters of T. Rowe Price Group Inc., a shareholder and client. The two men said Morgan Stanley's business was fine and the problem was the alumni attack itself, according to people familiar with the meeting. Mr. Purcell gave himself a grade of 8 out of 10 and said the firm needed to get out of the newspapers, these people say.

Some T. Rowe officials were taken aback at the way Mr. Purcell didn't take responsibility for the firm's flagging morale. People at the meeting recall T. Rowe analyst Jeff Arricale blurting: "No, Phil, you're the problem!" Mr. Miles, while praising management's performance, bristled when someone implied that the board was too stubborn about considering new leadership. "The board is not in Phil's pocket. There are no wallflowers here," he said, according to people at the meeting.

The board took steps to interview more employees. On the weekend of April 23 and 24, Messrs. Miles and Marsh secretly contacted Raymond McGuire, Morgan Stanley's other co-head of mergers. Mr. McGuire, who himself would leave the firm in May to join Citigroup Inc., urged them to talk to others to get "a true picture of the state of affairs," according to people familiar with the discussion.

The following week, directors interviewed around 50 employees in one-on-one sessions in New York and London and in telephone calls to Asia and elsewhere. They got an earful. One of those interviewed was Mr. Taubman, the co-head of mergers. Around that time, people who talked to him say, Mr. Taubman was bringing up a recent announcement by the directors that there was no compelling reason to remove Mr. Purcell. These people say Mr. Taubman asked: What was the compelling reason for Mr. Purcell to be the CEO? Mr. Taubman declined to comment.

The tide was turning. Mr. Marsh, the former paper executive, says that after the interviews, "it became apparent to us that a management change seemed inevitable. The situation had progressed to a point where we could not go back."

New Divisions

A board meeting on Saturday, April 30, at a suburban Chicago office park housing Morgan Stanley's credit-card operations exposed new divisions among the directors. The board and Mr. Purcell agreed on modest governance changes. Mr. Purcell said those moves plus the hiring of a new vice chairman, merger lawyer David Heleniak from Shearman & Sterling, would be enough to calm the storm, say people familiar with the meeting.

At one stage, the outside directors asked Mr. Purcell and his co-presidents with board seats to leave the room. Mr. Knight, the director who had clashed with Ms. Tyson in March, and Klaus Zumwinkel, chairman of the management board of Germany's Deutsche Post AG, said they supported Mr. Purcell and didn't see any reason to discuss the matter since the board had already decided on it, according to several accounts of the meeting. Messrs. Knight and Zumwinkel had to leave early. They declined through spokesmen to comment for this article.

The attempt to cut off debate bothered some other directors, people familiar with the meeting say. Once Messrs. Knight and Zumwinkel left, the discussion turned more freewheeling. Mr. Miles, who had recently declared the board's 100% support for Mr. Purcell, now encouraged open debate. The directors who had interviewed Morgan Stanley employees briefed the others on what they had heard.

Howard Davies, director of the London School of Economics and Political Science, said employees in London whom he had interviewed felt company morale was unlikely to improve under Mr. Purcell. "I'm not sure we're going to get though this problem without change," he told the others, a person familiar with the meeting says. Ms. Tyson said she might quit the board if it refused to go beyond modest governance changes and Mr. Davies was considering a similar move. But both were persuaded to stay as they heard other directors including Mr. Marsh show an openness to bigger changes, say people familiar with the meeting.

Mr. Marsh argued that management had to be accountable for the firm's lack of cohesion. He questioned the wisdom of backing Mr. Purcell, asking: "Do you think we're really doing the right thing here?"

Publicly, the board gave no hint of the developing split to avoid worsening the uproar. It announced on the night of Sunday, May 1, that directors had "unanimously" concluded a management change wasn't in shareholders' interest.

As May wore on, says Mr. Marsh, it became apparent that "the level of noise was not abating." In mid-May, a Florida state jury found Morgan Stanley had defrauded financier Ronald Perelman, and the firm was ordered to pay $1.45 billion. The judge angrily accused Morgan Stanley of withholding evidence. Mr. Davies, an audit committee member, soon began questioning members of the legal department about how the Florida lawsuit had been handled.

As the board continued to mull Mr. Purcell's fate, the exodus continued. Among others, a nine-person team of derivatives specialists and traders who had been working to build new products for individual investors left for Wachovia Corp. Mr. McGuire jumped to Citigroup on May 23.

The next day, Highfields sent a letter urging directors to choose a new leader. Highfields, which owned 2.5 million Morgan shares as of March 31, had a history of publicly challenging managers including a confrontation in 2001 with Enron Corp.'s then-CEO, Jeffrey Skilling.

On June 3, three directors -- Mr. Marsh, Mr. Knight and Robert Kidder, former CEO of Borden Chemical Inc. -- sat down with Highfields founders Jonathon Jacobson and Richard Grubman in the Highfields office on the 51st floor of the John Hancock tower in Boston.

In a businesslike presentation, without attacking Mr. Purcell personally, one of the Highfields founders warned the directors they had "a bigger problem than you know you have," people familiar with the meeting say. Messrs. Jacobson and Grubman asked if the directors were ready to fight a proxy battle in 2006 when alumni might urge shareholders to withhold support for Mr. Purcell's re-election. The Highfields team noted that Mr. Purcell had failed to identify his own successors, pushing them out instead. It was urgent to solve the succession issue quickly, they said.

This time, the directors didn't push back. While a few were still perceived as holdouts for Mr. Purcell, the chief executive had heard about the Highfields meeting and was signaling that he was prepared to step down, say people familiar with the matter. The board convened an emergency meeting in Chicago on Wednesday, June 8, to discuss his departure, and continued negotiating his exit through the weekend.

Mr. Marsh says the board tried to act as quickly as possible. "The decision to change leadership was resolved in a three-month period from April to June." he says. "It's very important for a board to achieve consensus and that often takes some time."

As the end neared, directors awarded Mr. Purcell about $44 million in exit pay plus a $62.3 million retirement package. It gave a co-president, Stephen Crawford, closely aligned with Mr. Purcell $32 million when he resigned in July.

Now a pension fund has sued directors for continuing to support Mr. Purcell as the franchise deteriorated and for approving the lavish pay deals. Some institutional shareholders are discussing an effort to vote out the directors at next spring's annual meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0002293

US Regulators Plan 1-Year Job Restriction On Bank Examiners (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones Newswires, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- U.S. regulators on Thursday proposed rules to enforce a new law restricting senior bank examiners from working for the banks they supervise for one year after leaving their jobs.

Starting Dec. 17 the job restriction, included in an intelligence and anti- terrorism law enacted late last year, would apply to examiners at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and the Office of Thrift Supervision.

The legal requirement followed a year-long probe by the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations into money laundering allegations involving Riggs Bank N.A., which has since been acquired by PNC Financial Services Group (PNC) (PNC).

The Senate subcommittee found the OCC was slow to respond while Riggs helped corrupt leaders from Chile and Equatorial Guinea. Questions surrounded R. Ashley Lee, the regulatory agency's examiner in-charge at Riggs from 1998 to 2002, who left to become Riggs' chief risk officer. Lee was put on leave while the U.S. Justice Department investigated ethics violations.

The proposed restriction would apply to employees of bank regulators who serve as senior examiners for two or more months during their final year of employment with the agencies.

These individuals would be barred for one year from knowingly accepting compensation "as an employee, officer, director or consultant from that institution or holding company, or from certain related entities," the regulators said in a joint statement. Potential penalties for violation would include a ban on employment in the banking industry for up to five years and fines of up to $250,000.

The regulators are accepting public comment on their proposal for 60 days from its publication in the Federal Register Friday.

-By Campion Walsh; Dow Jones Newswires; 202 862 9249; campion.walsh@ dowjones.com

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Indicts 2 In Case Of Divulged Secrets (WP)

By Dan Eggen And Jamie Stockwell

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

Two former employees of an influential pro-Israel lobbying group were indicted yesterday on charges that they illegally received and passed on classified information to foreign officials and reporters over a period of five years, part of a case that has complicated relations between the United States and one of its closest allies.

Although no foreign government is named in the indictment, U.S. government sources have identified Israel as the country at the center of the probe. The Israeli Embassy in Washington also confirmed yesterday that it has been "approached" by investigators in the case.

The 26-page indictment, handed up in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, represents the first formal allegations of criminal wrongdoing against the former employees of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. AIPAC is widely recognized as one of the most powerful lobbying organizations in Washington and has carefully cultivated close ties to Congress and the Bush administration.

The indictment also recasts the government's allegations against Lawrence A. Franklin, a Defense Department analyst who had already been charged with disclosing secret information about possible attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq and other topics. One of six original counts was dropped against Franklin, 58, of Kearneysville, W.Va.

Former AIPAC director of foreign policy issues Steven J. Rosen, 63, of Silver Spring was indicted on two counts related to unlawful disclosure of "national defense information" obtained from Franklin and other unidentified government officials since 1999 on topics including Iran, Saudi Arabia and al Qaeda. A former AIPAC analyst, Keith Weissman, 53, of Bethesda, was indicted on one count of conspiracy to illegally communicate classified information.

Rosen was instrumental in making AIPAC a formidable political force and helped pioneer the strategy of lobbying the executive branch as energetically as Capitol Hill, beginning in the Reagan administration. The FBI's long-running investigation -- which has involved clandestine wiretaps and other surveillance dating back several years -- has angered many political supporters of Israel and has caused friction between the two governments.

DOJ_NMG_0002294

AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman but continues to pay their legal fees. "AIPAC dismissed Rosen and Weissman because they engaged in conduct that was not part of their jobs, and because this conduct did not comport in any way with the standards that AIPAC expects of its employees," said Patrick Dorton, a spokesman for AIPAC.

A spokesman for the Israeli Embassy in Washington, David Siegel, said that Israel was formally approached by U.S. investigators in the case several weeks ago and that "we've expressed our willingness to cooperate in this process." He denied any wrongdoing by embassy diplomats.

Attorneys for Rosen and Weissman also vigorously disputed the charges.

"The charges in the indictment announced today are entirely unjustified," Abbe Lowell, Rosen's attorney, said in a statement. Lowell said he expects the trial to "show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process."

Weissman's attorney, John Nissikas, said in a statement: "We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies."

Franklin's attorney, Plato Cacheris, said the charges were "not welcome but expected." Cacheris said he may request that Franklin be prosecuted separately from the others.

The indictment alleges that, beginning in April 1999, Rosen and, later, Weissman sought to influence people in the United States government, including Franklin, with whom they first met in February 2003, and used those contacts to gather sensitive and classified information.

In announcing the charges in Alexandria, U.S. Attorney Paul J. McNulty said that while "Washington is a town in which the flow of information is virtually nonstop," there is a clear distinction in the law that "separates classified information from everything else."

"Today's charges are about crossing that line," McNulty said. "Those entrusted with safeguarding our nation's secrets must remain faithful to that trust. Those not authorized to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation might be."

The motivation of Rosen and Weissman McNulty said, was simply to "advance their foreign policy agendas and personal careers."

McNulty said prosecutors had no immediate plans to charge anyone else in the case but said the investigation was continuing. In addition to unidentified U.S. and foreign government officials, the indictment refers to an unknown number of journalists who were in contact with Rosen and, in some cases, allegedly received classified information. Sources familiar with the case have said that one of the reporters in contact with Rosen and Weissman was Glenn Kessler of The Washington Post.

Rosen faces up to 20 years in prison and Weissman faces up to 10 years; both are scheduled to appear in court Aug. 16. Franklin, who pleaded not guilty to the earlier charges, faces up to 45 years in prison if convicted on all counts, officials said.

Israel Lobbyists Facing Charges In Secrets Case (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 - Two former officials of a pro-Israel lobbying group were charged in an indictment filed Thursday with illegally conspiring to gather and disclose classified national security information to journalists and an unnamed foreign power that government officials identified as Israel.

The indictment accused Steven J. Rosen and Keith Weissman, formerly senior staff members at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, with improperly disclosing national security information beginning in April 1999. The group dismissed the two men last April.

As the committee's director of foreign policy issues, Mr. Rosen was a highly visible figure in Washington who helped the organization define its lobbying agenda on the Middle East and forged important relationships with powerful conservatives in the Bush administration. Mr. Weissman was a senior Middle East analyst.

The charges in the long-running inquiry were expected, but nevertheless unusual. Neither Mr. Rosen nor Mr. Weissman, who have denied any wrongdoing, held security clearances.

They were not government employees and they operated in a foreign policy world in which private lobbyists, public officials and journalists often trade delicate information about executive branch decision-making that is related to other countries.

The indictment did not accuse any journalist of wrongdoing, but cited several conversations that Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman had with unidentified journalists as "overt acts" that furthered the conspiracy. Government officials have said investigators want to interview reporters who talked with either of the two men. It is not clear who the journalists are or whether any them have been interviewed.

DOJ_NMG_0002295

The indictment said the two men had disclosed classified information about a number of subjects, including American policy in Iran, terrorism in central Asia, Al Qaeda and the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers apartment in Saudi Arabia, which killed 23 Americans, mainly military personnel.

Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman were each charged with a single count of conspiracy; Mr. Rosen was also charged with an additional count of passing classified information. The government has never offered a motive for the actions the men are accused of taking. The indictment said Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman had seemed keenly aware of the delicateness of information they had obtained from at least three American officials, including Lawrence A. Franklin, a former Defense Department analyst who met the two men in February 2003. The indictment did not name the other two American officials.

Mr. Franklin has already been charged in the case, and he was the subject of additional charges in Thursday's indictment. Mr. Franklin, Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman are scheduled to be arraigned on Aug. 16 before Judge T. S. Ellis III of Federal District Court in Alexandria, Va.

The indictment charged that Mr. Franklin, Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman had talked about the classified nature of the material they shared, referring to it in conversations with each other, as well as with foreign officials and journalists, as "extremely sensitive" or "secret." At one point, the indictment said, Mr. Franklin seemed to know that he was disclosing secrets, warning Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman against discussing classified information about possible attacks on American forces in Iraq.

The offenses charged in the indictment fall under the Espionage Act, but no one has been charged with spying. Although the statutes do not explicitly apply only to government officials with security clearances, prosecutors have not often pursued cases like the one against Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman. They are accused of transferring classified information to journalists and foreign government officials that could be "used to the injury" of the United States or "to the advantage" another country.

Among the meetings with journalists, the indictment charged, was one that occurred in December 2000 after Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman met with an unidentified American official. It said that Mr. Rosen met with an unidentified "member of the media" to whom he gave classified information dealing with United States strategy options involving an unnamed Middle Eastern country and internal American deliberations about those options.

The indictment contained additional charges against Mr. Franklin, an expert on Iran. It accused him of using his position as a desk officer to gather information to hand over to Mr. Rosen or Mr. Weissman, or to an unidentified foreign official, who government officials and lawyers involved in the case have said was Naor Gilon, an Israeli Embassy political officer. The indictment refers to two other foreign government officials, but does not identify them. Both are Israelis, a government official said.

Lawyers for Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman said the charges were unfounded. Abbe Lowell, a lawyer for Mr. Rosen, said in a statement: "The charges in the indictment announced today are entirely unjustified. We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided effort to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process."

John N. Nassikas III, a lawyer for Mr. Weissman, said in a statement that "we are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies."

Plato Cacheris, a lawyer for Mr. Franklin said, "It's not a welcome event, but were not surprised by it."

The United States attorney in Alexandria, Va., Paul J. McNulty, said in a statement that the case was about the protection of national security material.

"When it comes to classified information, there is clear line in the law," Mr. McNulty said. "Today's charges are about crossing that line. Those entrusted with safeguarding our nation's secrets must remain faithful to the trust. Those not authorized to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation may be."

The indictment does not suggest that Aipac, as an organization, is suspected of any wrongdoing. Patrick Dorton, a spokesman for the group, said: "Aipac dismissed Rosen and Weissman because they engaged in conduct that was not part of their jobs, and because this conduct did not comport in any way with the standards that Aipac expects of its employees. Aipac could not condone or tolerate the conduct of the two employees under any circumstances. The organization does not seek, use, or request anything but legally-obtained appropriate information as part of its work."

The charges left unanswered a delicate question. It is unclear what action, if any, the government plans to take against any embassy official who met with Mr. Franklin, Mr. Rosen or Mr. Weissman. Israeli officials have said in the past that it had no part in the case, and a spokesman for the embassy has said that Israeli diplomats conduct themselves in accord with established practices.

So far, there is no indication that any Israeli diplomats have been expelled, although. Mr. Gilon has moved to another post outside of Washington. Efforts to reach an embassy spokesman on Thursday were unsuccessful.

Mr. Franklin's trial had been scheduled for September, but that date is almost certain to be postponed in light of the new charges. He was initially charged in May in a complaint that accused him of passing highly classified information about possible attacks on American forces in Iraq to Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman. When he was indicted in June, he was accused of meeting more than a dozen times with an Israeli Embassy official.

DOJ_NMG_0002296

Former Officials With Pro-Israel Group Indicted (KRT)

By Shannon Mccaffrey And Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - The Justice Department indicted two top former officials with a prominent pro-Israel lobbying group Thursday for allegedly conspiring to communicate classified defense information.

U.S. Attorney Paul McNulty said the men were attempting to influence U.S. foreign policy. He said trafficking in information is commonplace in the nation's capital but a "clear line separates classified information from everything else."

"Today's charges are about crossing that clear line," McNulty said.

The indictment paints a more detailed picture of the case against Pentagon analyst Lawrence Franklin, who was charged in May with leaking classified information to the pro-Israel lobbyists about possible attacks by Iran on U.S. forces in Iraq.

The indictment charges Steven Rosen, former foreign policy director for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, with conspiring to communicate classified information.

Franklin, who worked on the Iran desk in Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's office, had also been charged with three counts of communication of national defense information to persons not entitled to receive it. In Thursday's indictment, Rosen was charged with aiding and abetting Franklin in one of those counts by passing along written classified information.

Keith Weissman, a former senior Middle East analyst with AIPAC, was charged with one count of conspiracy to communicate classified national defense information.

Lawyers for Rosen and Weissman denied the allegations.

Rosen's attorney, Abbe Lowell, called the charges "entirely unjustified."

"We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process," Lowell said in a statement.

Weissman's attorney, John Nassikas, said, "We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies. We look forward to challenging them vigorously in court both factually and legally."

People sympathetic to Rosen and Weissman have argued that while Franklin allegedly violated his government security vows, the two former AIPAC employees did little more than trade in information, which is the stuff of daily business in Washington.

AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman earlier this year.

The Israeli government has denied trying to pry secrets from the United States, with officials pointing out that, given the close ties between the two countries, it has no need to spy.

"We're fully confident in the conduct of our diplomats," said Israeli Embassy spokesman David Siegel.

One of the Israeli diplomats whom Franklin allegedly met with, Naor Gilon, recently returned home as "part of the normal diplomatic rotation," Siegel said.

Thursday's indictment adds some new facts to a case that has been shrouded in uncertainty from the beginning.

It charges that Rosen, 63, of Silver Spring, Md., and Weissman, 53, of Bethesda, Md., dealt in secret information as far back as 1999, several years before they are alleged to have met Franklin. Rosen met with "Foreign Official 1" - presumably an Israeli diplomat - on April 13, 1999, and disclosed sensitive intelligence he had picked up regarding terrorist activities in central Asia, it alleges.

Franklin and Rosen first made contact in a phone call on Aug. 15, 2002, after Rosen sought out someone at the Defense Department with expertise on Iran, the indictment alleges.

The three men met at a restaurant in Arlington, Va., in February 2003. In a phone call on the way to that initial meeting, Rosen said he was excited to meet with the "Pentagon guy," who he described as a "real insider."

They remained in contact over the next several months, meeting at various restaurants, and Weissman and Franklin attended a Baltimore Orioles game together, according to the indictment.

Franklin also faxed classified information to Rosen from a Pentagon fax machine, authorities allege.

Rosen and Weissman allegedly fed much of the sensitive information they received to journalists, on topics ranging from the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing in Saudi Arabia to U.S. policy toward Iran. They continued to provide information to reporters even after being contacted by the FBI, the indictment charges.

McNulty said the investigation, which he described as "several years" old, is ongoing. He said there's no basis to charge other individuals, but wouldn't rule that out in the future.

Franklin, 58, of Kearnysville, W.Va., pleaded not guilty to the charges filed against him in May. His lawyer, Plato Cacheris, didn't immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

Two Charged In Pentagon Information Leak (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, Associated Press Writer

AP, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON (AP) - Two former employees of a pro-Israel lobbying organization were indicted Thursday on charges they conspired to obtain and disclose classified U.S. defense information.

An indictment unsealed in U.S. District Court in Alexandria, Va., named Steven Rosen, formerly the director of foreign policy issues for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, and Keith Weissman, the organization's former senior Iran analyst.

The five-count indictment also spells out in greater detail the government's case against Pentagon analyst Lawrence A. Franklin, who already was facing charges that he leaked classified military information to an Israeli official and the AIPAC employees.

Rosen and Weissman disclosed sensitive information as far back as 1999 on a variety of topics that included terrorist activities in Central Asia, the bombing of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia, al-Qaida and U.S. policy in Iran, the indictment said. Among their contacts were U.S. and foreign government officials and reporters, the indictment said.

Lawyers for Rosen and Weissman denied the accusations. ``The charges in the indictment announced today are entirely unjustified," said Abbe Lowell, Rosen's attorney. John Nassikas, Weissman's lawyer, said, ``We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies."

Franklin's relationship with the men dates to 2003, the indictment said. Franklin pleaded innocent to the charges when his indictment was first unsealed in June.

Paul McNulty, the U.S. attorney in Alexandria, said the men apparently were motivated by a desire to advance their personal agendas and careers by trading on prized information. ``The facts alleged today tell a story of individuals who put their own interests and their own views of foreign policy ahead of American national security," McNulty said at a news conference.

Although the indictment refers to other U.S. officials who gave Rosen classified materials, McNulty said no other charges are planned, but noted the investigation continues.

Plato Cacheris, Franklin's lawyer, said he had been expecting additional charges. He said Franklin cooperated with investigators for three months in 2004.

The FBI's long-running investigation has focused on whether Franklin, of Kearneysville, W.Va., passed classified U.S. material on Iran to AIPAC, the influential main pro-Israel lobbying organization in Washington, and whether that group in turn passed it on to Israel. Both AIPAC and Israel deny any wrongdoing. Franklin has pleaded innocent.

AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman in April. Rosen, quoted in The New Yorker magazine last month, denied knowingly receiving classified information.

Associated Press reporter Matthew Barakat in Alexandria, Va., contributed to this report.

On the Net:

FBI: http://www.fbi.gov

American Israel Public Affairs Committee: http://www.aipac.org/

Ex-lobby Group Workers Charged With Handing Over US Secrets (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

The Justice Department on Thursday charged two former employees of a powerful pro-Israel lobbying organisation with illegally receiving classified information and disseminating it to a foreign government official.

Steven Rosen, former foreign policy director at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (Aipac), and Keith Weissman, a former Aipac Middle East analyst, were also charged with passing classified information to the media. Aipac, which has said it is not under investigation, fired the two men in April.

The charges are the latest development in a Federal Bureau of Investigation probe into Larry Franklin, a former Pentagon Iran analyst, who has already been charged with giving the Aipac officials classified information about potential attacks on US forces in Iraq. Mr Franklin, who co-operated with prosecutors earlier in the FBI investigation, has also been charged with providing classified information to a foreign government official and the media, and with illegally keeping classified documents at his home.

DOJ_NMG_0002298

"When it comes to classified information, there is a clear line in the law," said Paul McNulty, the US attorney prosecuting the case.

"Today's charges are about crossing that line. Those entrusted with safeguarding our nation's secrets must remain faithful to that trust. Those not authorised to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation may be," he said.

John Nassikas, a lawyer representing Mr Weissman, said: "We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr Weissman strongly denies."

Abbe Lowell, a lawyer for Mr Rosen, said: "We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalise the public's right to participate in the political process."

The indictment, which accuses Mr Weissman and Mr Rosen of conspiring with Mr Franklin to provide classified information illegally to people not entitled to receive it, says Mr Rosen gave a foreign government official information about terrorist activities in Central Asia. Mr Weissman is accused of giving the same official classified information about the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing in Saudi Arabia.

The indictment said Mr Franklin illegally provided information to people not entitled to it "in an effort to advance his own personal foreign policy agenda".

Additional reporting by Scott Heiser

Pro-Israel Lobbyists Charged In US Pentagon Case (REU)

By James Vicini

Reuters, August 4, 2005

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (Reuters) - A federal grand jury indicted two former officials of the pro-Israel lobbying group AIPAC Thursday on charges they received classified national defense information from a Pentagon analyst, court documents show.

The indictment charges Steven Rosen, the former foreign policy director for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, with receiving classified information from analyst Lawrence Franklin and helping Franklin pass on written classified information.

AIPAC's former senior Middle East analyst, Keith Weissman, also was charged with receiving classified information.

Franklin, who worked on the Iran desk within the Office of the Secretary of Defense at the time the government says he disclosed the information, had already been charged with disclosing top-secret information about potential attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq to the two AIPAC employees.

Thursday's indictment also charges him with giving the information to an unidentified diplomat and to Rosen and Weissman, whom AIPAC fired in April.

It accuses Franklin of disclosing to a foreign diplomat classified information about a Middle Eastern country's activities in Iraq. Sources familiar with the investigation have said the diplomat was an Israeli.

Franklin pleaded not guilty to the original charges.

Abbe Lowell, attorney for Rosen, said the charges were unjustified.

"We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process," Lowell said.

Weissman's attorney, John Nissikas, said in a statement, "We are disappointed that the government has decided to pursue these charges, which Mr. Weissman strongly denies."

The Israeli diplomat in Washington who met several times with Franklin has been identified as Naor Gilon, head of the political department at Israeli Embassy in Washington and a specialist on proliferation issues.

Gilon returned to Israel a few days ago as part of a long-scheduled rotation, according to an Israeli official in Washington.

U.S. investigators want to question Gilon and other Israeli diplomats about their contacts with Franklin, officials said. (Additional reporting by Deborah Charles and Adam Entous)

Former Pro-Israel Lobbyists Charged In Documents Case (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, August 5, 2005

Aug. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Two former employees of the leading pro-Israel lobbying group in Washington were charged with conspiring to disclose classified U.S. defense information to foreign government officials and members of the media.

Steve Rosen, 63, a former policy director at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, and Keith Weissman, 53, a former senior Iran analyst, were indicted today by a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Virginia. They are accused of gathering sensitive government information and conspiring to pass it along to people unauthorized to receive it.

DOJ_NMG_0002299

``Washington is a town where information flows virtually non-stop," U.S. Attorney Paul McNulty said at a press conference, held an hour after the indictment was handed down. ``But there is a clear line in the law, and that clear line separates classified information from other types of information."

Also indicted today was Lawrence Franklin, 58, a U.S. Defense Department analyst who was charged in June with giving classified information to unauthorized persons. Today's indictment supersedes and modifies earlier charges against him.

If convicted, the three men face five to 10 years in prison on each of five charges, McNulty said. Franklin, Rosen and Weissman, who aren't in custody, will be arraigned Aug. 16.

``The charges in the indictment announced today are entirely unjustified," Rosen's lawyer Abbe Lowell said in a statement. ``We expect that the trial will show that this prosecution represents a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process."

Weissman's attorney John Nassikas said his client ``strongly denies" the charges.

`Mix of Motivations'

Franklin a former colonel in the U.S. Air Force Reserve, is accused of handing over classified information about ``a Middle Eastern country," identified in press reports as Iran, to Rosen and Weissman in meetings in 2003 and 2004. He did so for a ``mix of motivations," including a desire to advance his career and his ``personal foreign policy agenda," McNulty said. Franklin wasn't accused of receiving any payment.

More than 80 classified documents were found during a search of Franklin's home in Kearneysville, West Virginia, and a search of his Pentagon office a year ago yielded a classified document containing the information allegedly disclosed, according to a Justice Department criminal complaint.

Rosen and Weissman are accused of receiving the information and passing some of it to an unidentified member of the media. Rosen is also accused of disclosing information obtained from Franklin to a Washington-based think tank, while Weissman gave information to another AIPAC employee, according to the indictment.

AIPAC, which has lobbied Congress and the White House for more than half a century on behalf of Israel, ``did the right thing" and fired Rosen and Weissman this year after an investigation into whether they received classified information from Franklin, McNulty said.

AIPAC

The lobbying group dismissed Rosen and Weissman ``because they engaged in conduct that was not part of their jobs, and because this conduct did not comport in any way with the standards that AIPAC expects of its employees," AIPAC spokesman Patrick Dorton said. ``AIPAC could not condone or tolerate the conduct of the two employees under any circumstances."

The group doesn't seek anything but ``legally obtained, appropriate information" as part of its work, he said.

The investigation is continuing, though McNulty said there is ``no basis for charging anyone else with unlawful disclosure of classified information, at this time."

The case is U.S. v. Franklin, 05cr225, U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.

To contact the reporters on this story: Cary O'Reilly in Washington at caryoreilly@bloomberg.net. Janine Zacharia in Washington at jzacharia@bloomberg.net. Last Updated: August 4, 2005 18:08 EDT

3 Accused Of Disclosing Secrets On Mideast (USAT)

By Toni Locy

USA Today, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Two former officials of a pro-Israel lobbying group and a former Pentagon analyst were charged Thursday with disclosing U.S. government secrets about the Middle East.

In a five-count indictment, a federal grand jury in Alexandria, Va., accused Steven Rosen, 63, and Keith Weissman, 53, of using their positions at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) to develop a relationship with the Defense Department analyst to obtain classified information that they shared with unnamed foreign officials and reporters. The committee is the most powerful pro-Israel lobby in Washington.

The grand jury said the secrets dated to 1999 and dealt with terrorist activity in Central Asia, a 1996 attack in Saudi Arabia that killed 19 U.S. servicemembers, al-Qaeda and U.S. strategy in the Middle East.

The Pentagon analyst, Lawrence Franklin, 58, had been charged earlier this year with illegally keeping more than 80 classified documents in his home in Kearneysville, W.Va. Thursday's indictment adds charges against Franklin, who had cooperated with the FBI before a plea deal fell apart. The grand jury said he also passed secrets to an unnamed foreign official “in an effort to advance his own personal foreign policy agenda.”

DOJ_NMG_0002300

Franklin's lawyer, Plato Cacheris, did not return phone calls. Weissman's attorney, John Nassikas, said his client denies the charges. Rosen's attorney, Abbe Lowell, called the charges “entirely unjustified.”

Some of the charges against Rosen, who was AIPAC's foreign policy director, and Weissman, the group's senior Middle East analyst, are based on a July 2004 meeting between Franklin and Weissman while Franklin was an FBI informant. AIPAC fired Rosen and Weissman in April.

Daniel Ayalon, Israel's ambassador to the United States, said there is no need for Israelis to spy here because “the cooperation is so close and intense” between the U.S. and Israeli governments.

2 Lobbyists Indicted In Secrets Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — Two former employees of the nation's most influential pro-Israel lobbying organization were indicted Thursday, accused of engaging in a five-year conspiracy to collect and disseminate U.S. defense secrets.

The federal indictment provides details of encounters the two men had with former Pentagon analyst Lawrence A. Franklin, who was indicted on similar charges in June and was named again Thursday.

But it also paints a picture of a conspiracy that was broader than previously thought, asserting that the onetime aides at the American Israel Public Affairs Committee obtained information from two other unidentified U.S. government officials.

The men are alleged to have passed secrets, including classified information about Al Qaeda and a draft presidential directive concerning U.S. policy toward Iran, to unnamed foreign government officials — believed to be employees of the Israeli Embassy in Washington — and to journalists.

The goal, prosecutors said Thursday, was to "influence persons within and outside the United States government."

A spokesman for the Israeli Embassy, David Siegel, said officials there had broken no laws. He also said that the Israeli government had begun cooperating with federal investigators in the probe.

"We are fully confident in the professionalism of our diplomats," Siegel said. "They conduct themselves in full accordance with diplomatic practice, and we have seen no information that would suggest anything to the contrary.

"The U.S. and Israel share a very strong relationship, and we would have no reason to resort to any wrongdoing," he said. "We have information-sharing at the highest levels on national security issues all the time."

Siegel said the U.S. government had recently approached the embassy, seeking its assistance in the investigation. "We have expressed our willingness to cooperate in the process, and contacts will continue," he said.

The case has hurt the standing of AIPAC, one of Washington's most powerful lobbying groups, and has raised questions about the proper boundaries of sharing sensitive defense information with a close ally. Prosecutors said the case illustrated how a public official had betrayed a trust, and how private lobbyists had succumbed to the temptation of breaking the law to obtain information.

"When it comes to classified information, there is a clear line in the law," said Paul J. McNulty, the U.S. attorney for the eastern district of Virginia in Alexandria, where the grand jury indictment was unsealed Thursday. "Today's charges are about crossing that line."

McNulty said the investigation was continuing and did not rule out the possibility that others might be charged.

Named in the indictment Thursday were Steven J. Rosen, AIPAC's longtime director of foreign policy issues, and Keith Weissman, a senior Middle East analyst. Both were charged with conspiring to "communicate national defense information to persons not entitled to receive it." Rosen was separately charged with improperly communicating classified information.

The indictment also incorporates allegations in the previous indictment against Franklin that had detailed his dealings with Rosen and Weissman without identifying them by name.

Franklin, Rosen and Weissman are scheduled to be arraigned in federal court in Alexandria on Aug. 16.

A spokesman for AIPAC, Patrick Dorton, said Thursday that Rosen and Weissman had been dismissed by the lobbying group earlier this year "because they engaged in conduct that was not part of their jobs and because their conduct did not comport in any way with the standards that AIPAC expects of its employees."

AIPAC, he said, "does not seek, use or request anything but legally obtained appropriate information as part of its work."

Rosen's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, called the federal charges "a misguided attempt to criminalize the public's right to participate in the political process."

John N. Nassikas, an attorney for Weissman, described his client as "an honest, respected foreign policy analyst and Middle East expert" who was looking forward to contesting the charges in court.

DOJ_NMG_0002301

Thursday's charges revealed that federal investigators have been tracking AIPAC and its dealings with the U.S. and Israeli governments for longer than previously thought. Earlier court filings had indicated that investigators were mainly interested in the contacts Rosen and Weissman had with Franklin, who emerged in late 2002 as a potential conduit for information.

But the indictment alleges that the plot to collect and disseminate U.S. secrets began as early as 1999 when, on separate occasions, Rosen obtained intelligence concerning what the indictment describes as "terrorist activities in Central Asia," and Weissman obtained a secret FBI report on the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers complex in Saudi Arabia that killed 19 U.S. servicemen. In each instance, the information was shared with a person whom the indictment calls "Foreign Official 1."

The indictment also describes instances where Rosen and Weissman disclosed classified information after meeting with other unnamed U.S. government officials, including a December 2000 meeting in which the men were leaked "information about classified United States strategy options against a Middle Eastern country."

In March 2002, the indictment says, Rosen obtained classified information about Al Qaeda from one of the unnamed government officials, later disclosing it to a person identified only as "Foreign Official 2."

According to the indictment, the contacts with Franklin began in August 2002, after Rosen called the Defense Department seeking the name of a person with expertise on Iran. He was referred to Franklin, a mid-level analyst who had long been working to harden U.S. policy toward Iran.

Six months later, over breakfast at an Arlington restaurant, Franklin allegedly disclosed to Rosen and Weissman the contents of a classified draft presidential directive on Iran policy. Rosen subsequently passed the information along to the unnamed foreign officials, as well as "a senior fellow at a Washington, D.C., think tank" and members of the media, the indictment alleges. "I'm not supposed to know this," Rosen is said to have told a journalist.

At another meeting, in June 2003, Franklin gave Rosen and Weissman "highly classified" information related to attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq, the indictment alleges.

Ultimately, Franklin agreed to cooperate with the FBI, which monitored a July 2004 meeting outside a department store. During that meeting, Franklin allegedly told Weissman that he had new, highly classified information about plans by Iranian agents to kidnap and kill Israeli intelligence agents in northern Iraq.

Weissman and Rosen passed along that information to a third foreign official who is not named in the indictment but whom sources have identified as Naor Gilon, a former political counselor at the Israeli Embassy in Washington. Gilon recently returned to Israel as part of a normal diplomatic rotation, the embassy said.

The indictment contends that over a two-year period starting in August 2002, Franklin leaked information to the foreign official sources identified as Gilon during meetings at several locations in the Washington area, including the officers' athletic club at the Pentagon and a sandwich shop near the State Department.

FBI agents confronted Rosen and Weissman in August 2004. The indictment says both men "falsely" denied that Franklin had provided them classified information.

Pro-Israel Lobbyists Charged With Disclosing U.S. Secrets (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Two former employees of a pro-Israel lobbying group were indicted yesterday by a federal grand jury in Virginia on charges of illegally receiving and disclosing classified U.S. defense information they obtained from a veteran Pentagon analyst -- who was arrested in May on charges of leaking secret documents.

Steven J. Rosen, of Silver Spring, a 63-year-old former director of foreign policy issues for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), and Keith Weissman, of Bethesda, a 53-year-old former senior Iran analyst at the organization, were accused of receiving national defense information and giving it to unauthorized persons, including an agent of a foreign government.

The analyst, Lawrence A. Franklin, 58, of Kearneysville, W. Va., was arrested by the FBI on charges of illegally disclosing classified information -- nearly two years after he first was identified as suspected of having passed national security documents involving Iran to AIPAC.

Mr. Franklin, who has pleaded not guilty in the case, has been a Defense Department employee since 1979 and held a "top secret" security clearance.

"Those entrusted with safeguarding our nation's secrets must remain faithful to that trust," said U.S. Attorney Paul J. McNulty. "Those not authorized to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation may be."

Arraignment for the three men is scheduled for Aug. 16 before U.S. District Court Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria.

DOJ_NMG_0002302

The indictment said Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman, in an effort to "influence persons within and outside the United States," cultivated relationships with Mr. Franklin and others "to gather sensitive U.S. government information, including classified information relating to the national defense."

It said the two men disclosed sensitive information as far back as 1999 on a variety of topics, including terrorist activities in Central Asia, the bombing of the Khobar Towers complex in Saudi Arabia, the activities of terror network al Qaeda, and U.S. policy in Iran, to American and foreign government officials and reporters. The indictment said their relationship with Mr. Franklin began in February 2003.

Mr. Franklin has been under investigation by the FBI for more than three years, accused of handing over classified Defense Department documents on Iran to officials at AIPAC, which then were passed to Israel.

The FBI began surveillance of Mr. Franklin, Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman more than two years ago. The surveillance also is thought to have targeted Naor Gilon, a political adviser at the Israeli Embassy in the District. Last year, FBI agents copied Mr. Rosen's computer hard drive at his AIPAC office after interviews with him and Mr. Weissman.

AIPAC and the Israeli Embassy have denied any wrongdoing. Attorneys for Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman, who left AIPAC in April, have denied any wrongdoing by their clients.

An affidavit by FBI agent Catherine M. Hanna said Mr. Franklin gave a classified document on potential attacks on U.S. forces in Iraq to two unidentified persons with whom he met for lunch June 26, 2003, at an Arlington restaurant.

U.S. Charges Man In Camcorder - Piracy Crackdown (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Filed at 9:58 p.m. ET

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - A Missouri man is the first to be indicted under a new federal law that prohibits people from secretly videotaping movies when they are shown in theaters, the U.S. Justice Department said on Thursday.

Curtis Salisbury, 19, used a camcorder to make copies of recent releases ``The Perfect Man" and ``Bewitched" and then distributed them through illicit computer networks that specialize in piracy, the Justice Department said.

A law that took effect in April prohibits such behavior.

Salisbury also downloaded several movies and software programs from the computer network, the Justice Department said.

Salisbury, who faces up to 17 years in prison, could not be reached for comment.

Entertainment-industry insiders and tech-savvy hackers use ``warez" networks, as they're commonly known, to distribute movies, music and software for free, often before they're released to the public.

The files then end up on peer-to-peer networks like Kazaa, where they can be downloaded by millions of people, or burned onto discs and sold on street corners.

Law enforcement officials say most participants in warez networks are generally not motivated by profit. In this instance, Salisbury sought payment for the movies he uploaded, the Justice Department said.

The Justice Department has targeted warez networks before, most recently in a June 30 raid that involved more than a dozen countries.

Salisbury, of St. Charles, Missouri, was arrested as part of that effort. He has been charged with conspiracy and copyright infringement, along with two violations of the camcorder law.

Camcorder piracy accounts for over 90 percent of movies that turn up on the Internet while they're still in theaters, said the head of a movie-industry trade group.

``The creative works of the entertainment industry belong to the millions of people who make them and are not for others to steal or unlawfully distribute," said Dan Glickman, head of the Motion Picture Association of America.

Reuters/VNU

First Suspect Indicted Under Camcorder Law (HOLLYREP)

By Brooks Boliek

Hollywood Reporter, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Justice Department officials announced on Thursday the first indictment under a law enacted this year that makes it a federal crime to camcord a movie.

The United States Attorney for the Northern District of California officially charged Curtis Salisbury, 19, of St. Charles, Mo., in a five-count indictment alleging that he used a camcorder in movie theaters to copy recent theatrical releases, then uploaded the copies to a computer network for distribution. Two of the counts were made under the Family Entertainment and Copyright Act of 2005, which President Bush signed in April.

DOJ_NMG_0002303

One section of the new law, known as the Artists Rights and Theft Prevention Act, criminalizes the use of recording equipment to make copies of movies in theaters.

"Camcording movies in theaters for online distribution is a crime," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said. "This case represents the first prosecution under the Family Entertainment Copyright Act and demonstrates that the U.S. Attorney's office and its CHIP (Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property) Unit will aggressively employ the tools provided by Congress and the president to combat the theft of intellectual property."

The statute also prohibits the infringement of a work being prepared for commercial distribution by making it available on a computer network accessible to members of the public, where the individual knows the work was intended for commercial distribution. The indictment represents the first use of those provisions by federal prosecutors.

In addition to allegedly camcording and uploading the movies "The Perfect Man" and "Bewitched" to the warez server, the indictment also alleges Salisbury illegally downloaded the movie "Madagascar" and the software video editing programs Sony Sound Forge V8.0, Adobe Premier Pro V7.0 and Adobe Premier Pro V1.5 Proper.

MPAA president and CEO Dan Glickman said the indictment proved the need for the new law.

"Over 90% of initial releases that are pirated are a result of people camcording in movie theaters," Glickman said. "That's why we worked with Congress and the president to pass crucial legislation strengthening penalties against people who camcord movies in theaters and make them available to the public on the Internet. The creative works of the entertainment industry belong to the millions of people who make them and are not for others to steal or unlawfully distribute."

According to the indictment, Salisbury communicated with others about ways to remove identifying features on a film that reveal the originating theater. Additionally, he allegedly discussed receiving payment for the films that he would provide, indicating that he would like to be paid by money order at a post office box when the film is ready for release.

If convicted, he faces three to five years in prison and a fine of $250,000 -- or twice the value of the property involved in the transaction, whichever is greater -- as well as a three-year term of supervised release and a $100 mandatory special assessment.

The prosecution against Salisbury is part of continuing FBI investigation known locally as Operation Copycat, which to date has resulted in the indictments of five individuals in the Northern District of California and the execution of more than 40 searches nationwide. Operation Copycat is the local and largest part of the coordinated international law-enforcement action known as Operation Site Down, which is targeting online piracy.

The indictment is an indication of the seriousness which the government takes intellectual property theft, said MPAA worldwide anti-piracy director John Malcolm.

"We want to thank the U.S. Attorney's Office and the FBI for their efforts to crack down on movie pirates," he said. "Their attention to this growing phenomenon is crucial in our fight to protect copyrights."

Man Is Charged Under New U.S. Film Piracy Law (LAT/BLOOM)

By From Bloomberg News

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

A Missouri man has been accused in an indictment of making video recordings of movies in theaters, the first time someone has been charged under a new federal law outlawing the practice.

Curtis Salisbury, 19, of St. Charles was accused of copying Universal Pictures' "The Perfect Man" and Columbia Pictures' "Bewitched" and distributing the movies over the Internet, the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco said. The indictment Wednesday in San Jose is part of a crackdown on online piracy, officials said.

The Family Entertainment and Copyright Act of 2005, which was signed into law in April by President Bush, makes it a crime to use recording equipment to copy a movie in a theater. Piracy costs the movie industry about $3.5 billion a year in lost sales, according to the Motion Picture Assn. of America.

"The Perfect Man" opened the weekend of June 19, and "Bewitched" opened a week later.

Salisbury could not be reached for comment.

Federal prosecutors are investigating sites on the Internet used to distribute pirated movies, games and software.

Last month, four people were charged in San Jose with copyright violations as part of a nationwide crackdown on the sites.

U.S. Ties Kickbacks To Park District Work (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor And And Liam Ford, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, August 5, 2005

A former Chicago Park District official accepted cash, vacations to ski resorts, a pricey bicycle and even a manicure for steering millions of dollars in work at Millennium Park to a suburban landscaping company, federal authorities charged Thursday.

Shirley McMayon, the Park District's former director of natural resources, pocketed more than $137,000 in financial benefits from two executives of James Michael Inc., the Mundelein-based landscaper, an indictment charged.

In return for the payoffs, McMayon, 47, now of Park City, Utah, improperly used her influence to steer about $8 million in Park District work to the firm between 2000 and 2004, authorities charged.

Michael Lowecki, the company owner, and Kevin Haas, its former chief operations officer, were also charged in the indictment.

"They used the Park District coffers as sort of their personal playground," U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said at a news conference announcing the charges.

Fitzgerald said that "one of the kickers in this case" was that the contractors didn't pay for the most of the bribes themselves, instead padding their invoices to pass the cost of about $60,000 in payoffs to taxpayers. Among the phony invoices was a bill for about $10,000 for a non-existent global positioning system, he said.

"This is the $10,000 GPS that can't be found," Fitzgerald quipped.

The indictment marked yet another public corruption probe launched by federal investigators. The U.S. investigation of City Hall for political influence in hiring and contracts has been heating up, and former Gov. George Ryan is set to go on trial soon on bribery-related charges.

It is the first federal investigation to reach into the Park District since a former contract-compliance officer was convicted in Operation Silver Shovel in 2000 of falsely certifying a government mole's business as a woman-owned enterprise.

At the news conference, Robert Grant, the special agent in charge of the FBI in Chicago, said the case against McMayon "has led to other investigative leads that are aggressively under investigation."

In a telephone interview, Tim Mitchell, the Park District's general superintendent and chief executive officer, said his office learned of the investigation when it was subpoenaed for records by federal prosecutors in January.

McMayon, known as "Shirl," had resigned her $92,700-a-year post in November, citing personal reasons, Mitchell said.

Jacquelyn Heard, a spokeswoman for Mayor Richard Daley, said that McMayon expressed interest in a job at City Hall "but never saw the mayor on it" and wasn't offered a position.

McMayon pocketed cash and checks totaling about $123,800 and took vacations worth about $7,300 with her family to Wisconsin Dells, Wis., Galena, Ill., and ski resorts in Michigan and Utah--all paid for by Lowecki and Haas, the government alleged. She also was given tickets to a Green Bay Packers football game during a paid vacation to a resort in Elkhart Lake, Wis., authorities said.

Vacations at the Dells

McMayon vacationed for free at one resort at the Dells in May 2000, complained about the accommodations to Lowecki and Haas, and was placed in a more expensive lodge for another Dells vacation two months later, according to the charges and sources.

The landscapers also spent more than $22,000 to pay off McMayon's loan on her 1999 Dodge Durango and paid $250 for her massage, manicure and haircut at a Mario Tricoci salon, about $1,500 for a LeMond Buenos Aires bicycle and more than $4,000 for two computers.

The charges disappointed Roger Post, general manager of Christy Webber Landscapes, which has done limited work for the Park District in recent years.

"We play by the rules, and obviously others were not," Post said. "If people were winning contracts for reasons other than the best bid, it makes you angry."

Outside James Michael's offices Thursday, a handful of former employees picketed, complaining they had been retaliated against for joining a union.

McMayon and Lowecki were each charged with nine counts of fraud and bribery. Haas was charged with two counts of fraud.

McMayon's lawyer, Donald Young, said he expects that McMayon will resolve the charges before trial. "She has been cooperating with the government," Young said.

A lawyer for Lowecki, 45, of Libertyville didn't return telephone calls seeking comment. Attorney Michael Ettinger, who represents Haas, 56, of Gurnee said his client is cooperating in the investigation and expects to plead guilty. Haas left the landscaping firm in November 2001, well before the alleged kickback scheme ended.

Prosecutors Scott Levine and Nancy Miller said McMayon supervised an evaluation committee that made recommendations to the Park District board as to which companies should get contracts. "She was then able to direct more work to James Michael than to other contractors," Levine said at the news conference.

According to a civil lawsuit in Lake County, an attorney for James Michael indicated the firm first obtained "very large" contracts from the Park District in 1999 and 2000 and went through "almost an explosion" in its business. Its business quickly grew about fivefold to $10 million, the lawyer said.

A stray check

In a deposition in that lawsuit, Carleen Haake, a bookkeeper for James Michael, testified she discovered that the firm had paid off McMayon's car loan when she found the check on a copying machine at the office. "They left their original on the glass," she said.

The firm primarily worked at Millennium Park, planting trees and shrubs and mowing lawns, and also installed Christmas lights at the park, Buckingham Fountain and other locations, authorities said.

Millennium Park has become a major Chicago tourist attraction, but during construction, it was mired in controversy as its cost ballooned to about $490 million, more than half to be paid by taxpayers.

Before working at the Park District, McMayon was horticulture manager for the Golden Nugget Mirage Resorts in Las Vegas, according to a biography of her in a 2001 issue of Illinois Parks and Recreation magazine. A graduate of the University of Southwest Louisiana with a degree in horticulture, she also had been director of horticulture for a foundation in Louisiana and had owned a landscaping business.

Her attorney said she is now working at a golf course in Utah.

McMayon was hired by the Chicago Park District in July 1999 as deputy director of landscaping and was promoted to head the new Department of Natural Resources in early 2001.

McMayon was often the public face for beautification efforts in Chicago parks, traveling to conferences across the country and abroad.

Tribune staff reporters Charles Sheehan, Gary Washburn and Lolly Bowean and freelance reporter Barbara Bell contributed to this report.

mo'connor@tribune.com

lford@tribune.com

News Feds: Bribes Unlocked Parks Coffers (CHIST)

By STEVE WARMBIR, ANDREW HERRMANN, NATASHA KORECKI AND TIM NOVAK, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, August 5, 2005

When high-ranking Chicago Park District official Shirley McMayon oversaw acres of trees, lawns and gardens, she got her hands dirty -- with bribe money, federal prosecutors charged Thursday.

McMayon, 47, a horticulturist now living in Park City, Utah, allegedly received more than $120,000 in cash plus free vacations, computers and other goodies for steering about $8 million in Park District landscaping work to a Mundelein company, James Michael Inc. In all, more than $137,000 in cash and benefits went into her pocket from 2000 to 2002, prosecutors allege.

A substantial portion of the landscaping and lighting work was at the city's crown jewel, Millennium Park. But the company did work at other prominent spots, including Garfield, Grant, Jackson, Lincoln, Marquette parks and Gold Star Memorial Park, which commemorates fallen officers. The company bedecked Buckingham Fountain with winter holiday lights. It no longer has Park District contracts.

Chicago Park District Supt. Tim Mitchell, who started in January 2004, said Thursday internal changes make it harder to defraud the district.

"It's very disappointing, but it also angers me because there are a lot of good, hardworking people working six, seven days a week here," Mitchell said.

The landscape company's owner, Michael Lowecki, 45, of Libertyville, and its former controller, John Kevin Haas, 56, of Gurnee allegedly paid the bribes to McMayon, who once oversaw horticulture at some Las Vegas casinos.

Subsidizing the bribes were the taxpayers themselves.

The landscaping company allegedly covered about half the bribes by submitting phony invoices to the Park District for items it never delivered.

2 suspects cooperating

"The defendants in this case used the Park District's coffers as a personal playground," U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said.

At times, Lowecki allegedly transferred money straight into McMayon's bank account.

"Some bribes are less subtle than others," Fitzgerald said.

DOJ_NMG_0002306

McMayon is cooperating, and her case is expected to be resolved before trial, said her attorney, Donald Young. At one point during the investigation, she wore a wire, recording Lowecki on tape allegedly agreeing to continue the bribe payments.

Haas, represented by Michael Ettinger and Stephen Simonian, is cooperating, too, and is expected to plead guilty.

"My client has led a law-abiding life," Ettinger said. "He's a good man. He made a mistake."

Lowecki's attorney, Elliot Samuels, defended his client, saying he's hardworking and called Millennium Park a point of pride.

"He did an honest day's work," Samuels said.

Allegations of wrongdoing against the landscaping company came to light more than a year ago in a civil case. In that case, filed in Lake County in 2003, James Michael Inc. sued a former sales worker there for stealing money.

In a deposition in the case, conducted by Lowecki's own civil attorney, a James Michael employee admitted writing checks to McMayon, said attorney Jed Stone. Stone represents the former worker being sued.

"I think there's little question that the landscape company was involved in bizarre conduct," Stone said.

Ex-official At Chicago Parks Took Bribes-prosecutor (REU)

Reuters, August 4, 2005

CHICAGO (Reuters) - Federal prosecutors broadened their probe of public corruption in Illinois and Chicago on Thursday, announcing charges against a former park district official for accepting bribes from a landscaping firm.

Shirley McMayon, who was director of natural resources for the Chicago Park District, was indicted by a grand jury with receiving $137,000 in bribes from a suburban landscaping firm in exchange for contracts for work on Chicago's downtown Millennium Park.

The luxurious $475 million park -- which features outdoor sculpture and a Frank Gehry-designed concert stage -- was hit by numerous cost overruns before opening last summer.

McMayon, 47, is accused of accepting free ski trips, spa visits, and tickets to a Green Bay Packers football game in exchange for steering $8 million worth of contracts to James Michael Inc. and executives Michael Lowecki and Kevin Haas.

"We should be having contracts on the basis of merit," said local U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald. "The system has been compromised."

Since being appointed the top prosecutor in Northern Illinois in 2001, Fitzgerald has unearthed corruption at all levels of state and local government, touching the administrations of former Republican Gov. George Ryan and Chicago Mayor Richard Daley.

These were the first federal charges involving the parks department of the nation's third-largest city after guilty pleas won from workers in various city public works departments.

Fitzgerald, who is also in charge of the Justice Department probe of the leak of a CIA operative's name to journalists, urged other contractors using unfair tactics to come forward before they become targets of investigators.

McMayon, who left her job in December, was charged with nine counts of fraud and bribery, with penalties ranging from five to 20 years in prison and $250,000 fines for each. Haas, who is cooperating with investigators, was charged with two fraud counts, and Lowecki with five fraud counts and three bribery counts.

Ex-VA Employee Gets Prison Term In Bribery Case (BSUN)

By A Sun Staff Writer

The Baltimore Sun, August 5, 2005

A guilty plea to a bribery conspiracy charge netted a Crofton man one year and one day in prison, Maryland's U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said today.

In addition to the prison term, Judge Frederick J. Motz sentenced Frank McCreary, 42, to two years of supervised release.

McCreary was a Realty Specialist with the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) Regional Office in Baltimore, Rosenstein said. McCreary's duties included soliciting bids from and awarding contracts to contractors for repair work to VA-owned houses, he said.

McCreary's co-defendant in the case, Carmelo Vizzi, 48, of Perry Hall, owned a home improvement business that bid on contracts offered by the VA.

According to court documents, between November 1999 and January 2003, McCreary steered property repair contracts to Vizzi in exchange for money. In cases in which approved contractors were required to submit sealed bids to the VA, Vizzi bribed McCreary by paying him between $250 and $600 per contract awarded, court documents state.

In return, Vizzi received inside information on the lowest bid so he could underbid the competition, the documents state. Rosenstein said the profit to Vizzi's contracting company from sealed bid jobs awarded by McCreary that involved bribes was approximately $355,462. He said McCreary also created fictitious invoices and submitted them to the VA for payment and received money from Vizzi after the invoices were processed.

DOJ_NMG_0002307

Vizzi previously pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit bribery and was sentenced to two years in prison.

The FBI and Veterans Administration-Inspector General investigated the case, which was prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Bonnie S. Greenberg.

2 Sentenced Over Fixing Of Tickets (NOTP)

By April Yee, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, August 5, 2005

A former Orleans Parish Traffic Court reporter was sentenced Wednesday to jail, and a former courthouse guard received probation, a fine and community service in a ticket-fixing scam still under investigation by federal officials.

Court reporter Glenda Hamlin and guard Bobby Grant are the fourth and fifth court employees to be sentenced in the ongoing probe.

Grant, who monitored the South Broad Street courthouse for a decade, was sentenced to a year of probation, a $250 fine and 100 hours of community service by U.S. District Judge Ivan L.R. Lemelle.

Another federal judge sentenced Hamlin, a six-year Section D court reporter, to three months in jail, a $250 fine and two months of house arrest. She must wear an electronic monitoring device.

"When you have corruption and bribery in government, it taints the whole government," U.S. District Judge Eldon Fallon said before handing down Hamlin's sentence. "You're in a position of trust. A lot of people depend on you, and you act for the government. You've got that mantle about you."

Grant and Hamlin were in a group of 10 that took advantage of the city's computerized traffic records, accessible only to certain staff members, prosecutors said. With citations dismissed for bribes, the state and city lost out on related fines and court costs. Nor will law enforcement agencies and insurance companies see the citation on the individual's driving record.

Grant was indicted Feb. 24 and pled guilty March 29 to fraud connected with computers. He admitted to taking a $200 bribe in September to arrange the dismissal of outstanding traffic citations, then went to an employee in Traffic Court's Section D who wiped out the citations and split the cash with him.

Hamlin worked in Section D, along with another court reporter and a minute clerk who were indicted for similar charges.

"I know they all interacted," U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said, but he did not say whether Grant had gone to Hamlin to have the tickets erased. Hamlin was indicted March 24 for computer fraud that allegedly happened during the same period that Grant contacted a Section D employee. Grant pleaded guilty April 27.

"I just want to apologize for my behavior," Hamlin told Fallon. Her parents looked on silently, following her out of the courtroom after the sentencing to sit in the empty hallway.

Both Grant and Hamlin had entered plea bargains, with the understanding that in return for prosecutors' pledge not to charge them further in the ticket-fixing scam, they would "submit to interviews whenever and wherever requested by law enforcement authorities" and "be completely truthful."

Grant's sentence "was exactly what was called for by law," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Al Winters, senior litigation counsel in the cases. He declined to comment on Hamlin's sentence.

Others have been convicted and sentenced in the scam, and several others remain to be sentenced.

Minute clerk Mickey Torregano was put on three years of probation in June. On Thursday, former Assistant City Attorney Edwin Burks was sentenced to three years of probation and a $1,000 fine. James W. Lee, who oversaw traffic violators as they cleaned court buildings for their community service requirement, must pay a $250 fine and perform 100 hours of community service.

"The investigation is not over," Letten said. The probe has lasted more than a year and a half, with video and audio records and testimony from cooperation witnesses.

. . . . . .

April Yee can be reached at ayee@timespicayune.com or (504) 826-3321.

Jurors For Gotti Trail Picked (NYNSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

New York Newsday, August 5, 2005

A group of seven women and five men made the final cut Thursday as jurors who will decide the fate of John "Junior" Gotti, the son of the late mob boss whose federal racketeering trial begins Monday in Manhattan.

DOJ_NMG_0002308

Shortly after Thursday's lunch break, prosecutors and defense attorneys, along with federal Judge Shira Scheindlin, made the final pick of 12 regular jurors and six alternates. One male alternate was later excused, leaving five for the trial.

The panel of regular jurors contains six whites, two blacks and four Hispanics. One Hispanic man said he was on disability for depression, a Hispanic woman is hoping to be a state court officer, while one white male said he worked in engineering.

"It was a very painstaking process, but ultimately we have 12 very carefully examined and, ultimately in our view, open-minded and fair jurors," Gotti's defense attorney Jeffrey Lichtman told reporters outside court.

"In the end, that is all John and myself ever want in a jury," Lichtman said. Jury selection had begun on Monday.

A bespectacled Gotti, who is being held without bail, stood and stretched just before court marshals escorted him back to a holding cell. He didn't comment about the jury.

Asked if his client was going to testify, Lichtman responded cryptically by saying a "trial is a fluid endeavor and we will be making decisions on the fly."

Gotti, who officials said supervised the Gambino crime family after his father's imprisonment in 1992, is on trial for assorted racketeering charges, including the attempted kidnapping of Guardian Angels founder and radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa. Also on trial with Gotti are Michael "Mikey Y" Yannotti and Louis "Louie Black" Mariani.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael McGovern disclosed that the first witness he expects to call Monday will be former Gambino soldier Frank Fappiano, an admitted hitman who has turned government witness. Fappiano last year testified at the trial of Gotti's uncle Peter, who was convicted of federal racketeering charges.

Scheindlin is scheduled Friday to announce her decision about whether the judy gets to hear excerpts from Gotti's 1999 plea to federal charges.

Scheindlin also said she will be ruling on whether evidence of an alleged extortion of Russo's On The Bay restaurant in Howard Beach could be introduced to the jury. Prosecutors said in court that there is no direct evidence that Gotti received any proceeds from such an extortion. But they want to argue that he was part of the Gambino family administration that benefited from the payoffs.

Lawyers' Group To Weigh In On Reporter Confidentiality (SDUT)

By Gina Holland, ASSOCIATED PRESS

The San Diego Union-Tribune, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON – The American Bar Association has resurrected a plan to endorse federal protection for journalists who refuse to reveal their sources to prosecutors, following the high-profile jailing of one reporter and threats against others.

The nations' largest lawyers group, which declined 30 years ago to back a reporter shield law, was debating that issue and others at its annual meeting running through Tuesday in Chicago.

ABA members were hearing from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Supreme Court Justices John Paul Stevens and Stephen Breyer.

Meeting topics include stem cell research, subject of a showdown between the White House and Congress, and the rights of terminally ill patients, prominent this fall when the Supreme Court takes up Oregon's physician-assisted suicide law.

Of course, the unofficial buzz is about high court nominee John Roberts.

Roberts, an ABA member, has not been particularly active in the group, which over the years has angered conservatives with policy positions supporting abortion rights and a freeze on capital punishment.

The ABA's president, Robert Grey Jr., said Roberts' nomination will not be part of the meetings because a committee has not finished reviewing his background and qualifications.

For more than 50 years the association has done examinations of people chosen for federal judgeships, focusing on competence, integrity and temperament. President Bush in 2001 ended the ABA's preferential role in vetting prospective judicial nominees.

Separately, the group's policy-making board will begin taking policy votes on Monday. Endorsement of the shield law would allow the organization to lobby Congress, where bills are pending to protect reporters.

"This is a ripe topic," said Landis Best, a media layer in New York who worked on the proposal. "Not just lawyers and not just journalists are talking about it."

New York Times reporter Judith Miller has been in jail a month in Virginia for refusing to testify to a grand jury investigating the leak of the identity of undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame.

In June, a federal appeals court upheld civil contempt findings against four journalists, including an Associated Press reporter, whose confidential sources pointed to scientist Wen Ho Lee as an espionage suspect.

Best said that many states have laws that prevent punishments of reporters who keep sources private, but a national law is needed to encourage federal government whistle-blowers and others to provide information to the news media.

Not all lawyers support the proposal.

"The national government has certain kinds of compelling interests that conflict with the right of the press to keep their sources confidential, like national defense and security," said John Yoo, a law professor at the University of California, Berkeley, who worked in the Bush Justice Department from 2001-03.

"It's hard to see the ABA getting people in Congress to place the right to protect anonymous sources above national security," he said.

The subject came before the group after the Supreme Court ruled in 1972 that reporters had no constitutional right to withhold information from grand juries.

A group studied the matter and urged ABA's leaders to endorse a national shield law. It failed 157-122 in 1974.

A report being submitted at the meeting in Chicago says that reporter-source relationships help the public and should be treated like other associations.

"The attorney-client relationship as well as those between physician and patient, priest and penitent, and spouse and spouse, are all protected by our legal system," the report says. "The reporter-source relationship ... should be no less protected."

Man Held In Idaho Abduction-murders Probed In 1997 Murder Of 10-year-old Calif. Boy (FINDLAW/AP)

By Robert Jablon, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, August 5, 2005

(AP) - RIVERSIDE, California-A convicted sex offender accused of murdering three people in Idaho and killing one of the two children authorities said he abducted from the home is now being investigated in the 1997 kidnapping death of a 10-year-old California boy.

Joseph Edward Duncan III, 42, is linked by a single fingerprint to the scene of the killing of Anthony Martinez, Sheriff Bob Doyle told a press conference on Wednesday.

Duncan was arrested last month after people at an Idaho restaurant spotted 8-year-old Shasta Groene, who went missing with her 9-year-old brother Dylan in May. Dylan's body was later found in Montana.

FBI agents involved in the Idaho investigation contacted Riverside authorities on July 14, and said Duncan mentioned the name Martinez and the general area.

Investigators flew to Idaho to fingerprint Duncan. They tried to interview him but he refused to talk. Confirmation of the fingerprint match was received Monday, the sheriff said.

"We're pretty confident that he's our suspect. ... This is huge," Doyle said. "We followed up 15,000 leads over eight years. You can imagine the elation that everybody has."

In April 1997, Anthony Martinez was forced into a white car in Beaumont as his friends watched. The children were playing when a stranger offered them a dollar to help find his lost cat. Sixteen days later a forest ranger found the boy's nude, bound body in a desert area about 70 miles (110 kilometers) to the east.

The kidnapper was described at the time as blue-eyed and mustachioed. Before the end of that April, authorities had evaluated more than 100 people as suspects.

Duncan has been charged in Idaho with kidnapping and murdering Shasta's mother, Brenda Groene, 40, her boyfriend Mark McKenzie, 37, and Shasta's 13-year-old brother, Slade, at their home outside Coeur d'Alene.

Federal prosecutors have said they will file charges in the abduction of the children and Dylan's death.

Authorities also have said Shasta and Dylan were sexually assaulted. While it is The Associated Press' policy not to identify alleged victims of sexual assault in most cases, the search for Shasta and her brother was so heavily publicized that their names are widely known.

Duncan was sentenced to 20 years in prison for sexually assaulting a 14-year-old boy in Tacoma, Washington, in 1980. Authorities said Duncan was paroled in 1994 and moved into a halfway house in Seattle.

Documents show he got a job as a phone solicitor for a publishing company, went to counseling and later got a second job with a small software company.

In 1996, Duncan tested positive for marijuana during a routine urine test, and he was arrested, then released on parole again, records show. In 1997, he again tested positive for marijuana use, records show. He disappeared with his girlfriend's car, according to parole reports.

He was captured and returned to prison in 1997. He was released in 2000 and enrolled that year at North Dakota State University. At the time of his arrest, Duncan was a fugitive charged with molesting a 6-year-old boy in Minnesota.

DOJ_NMG_0002310

CIVIL LAW:

N.C. Wins Back 1789 Copy Of Bill Of Rights (NSDY/AP)

By Emery P. Dalesio, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, August 5, 2005

RALEIGH, N.C. -- An original copy of the Bill of Rights that was given to North Carolina by George Washington back in 1789 was returned to the state Thursday, culminating a bitter legal tug-of-war over the historic document.

Gov. Mike Easley accepted the weathered document after a judge ordered federal marshals to turn it over to the state -- the first time North Carolina has had possession of the document since the end of the Civil War.

"North Carolina's stolen Bill of Rights may have been out of state for nearly 140 years, but never out of mind," Easley said in a statement.

Easley signed a receipt accepting possession of the document, in an ivory-colored frame, from U.S. marshals during a quickly announced ceremony inside the antebellum state Capitol from which the document was stolen by an invading Union soldier in 1865. The document is one of the original 13 delivered to the colonies for review before the final Bill of Rights was approved in 1789.

The stolen document was sold by the Union soldier in 1866 to an Ohio buyer, whose family sold it to Connecticut antiques dealer Wayne Pratt in 2000 for $200,000.

In March 2003, an FBI agent posing as a museum buyer pretended to purchase the paper from Pratt and his investor, Robert V. Matthews, for $5 million. Instead, the agent presented a seizure warrant signed by the judge in the case.

Pratt relinquished his ownership claim to the document and has agreed to donate the document to North Carolina. Matthews continues to claim partial ownership of the paper, which has been valued at up to $40 million.

U.S. District Court Judge Terrence Boyle last year awarded the document to North Carolina, but in January, the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., told the judge to reconsider.

Boyle determined the document should return to the possession of the person or entity who owned it before the government's sting operation. He ruled Thursday that Pratt had the clearest right to possession, but had relinquished the claim to North Carolina.

"It's just thievery; it's absolute thievery," said Matthews' attorney, Mike Stratton of New Haven, Conn. "Bob Matthews paid real money, $200,000, to buy a document that's been in private hands for 140 years."

A North Carolina legislative leader praised the decision.

"Justice is finally being done, and we're delighted to have it returned," Senate Majority Leader Tony Rand said on the Senate floor.

Easley said the Bill of Rights will be displayed in the state Museum of History.

* __

Martha Waggoner in Raleigh, N.C., contributed to this story.

Seniors Group Sues Big Tobacco To Recover Money For Medicare (WSJ)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- A conservative seniors group filed suit against big U.S. tobacco companies, seeking to recover billions of dollars spent on smoking-related diseases by Medicare, the federal health-insurance program for the elderly.

The case relies on a little-known but recently strengthened provision of Medicare law that allows someone to sue on behalf of Medicare when it pays medical expenses that another party had a legal obligation to cover -- for example, when a corporate health plan has agreed to cover the expenses, or when a business or other party injured the Medicare beneficiary and is liable. If the suit prevails, Medicare collects the damages and the party bringing the suit is eligible for an equal amount. One reason for the provision is that the government doesn't have the resources to prosecute every case.

The lawsuit is the first national action since the Medicare as Second Payer statute was strengthened in 2003. The statute was conceived in the 1980s by the Reagan administration, and the 2003 amendment clarified that if a business or other group injures a Medicare beneficiary, it must be the first payer for medical expenses. Medicare picks up the tab as second payer only if the first payer cannot cover the full expense. The law also seemed to expand the criteria for proving liability for an injury, though that has been disputed. "If someone offers a product or service that injures people and drives up Medicare's costs, Medicare deserves a fair chance to fight back," the amendment's sponsor, Sen. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa), said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0002311

By taking the action, United Seniors Association Inc., a free-market group that has supported initiatives backed by the pharmaceutical and energy industries, is looking to open the door to a flood of suits against the industry. The group says it would like to reclaim at least $60 billion it estimates Medicare has spent on treatment for smoking-related diseases in the past five years, the statute of limitations on the law.

"Our motivation is one of taxpayer protection," said Charles Jarvis, the group's chairman and chief executive. "Considering how badly the taxpayers have been injured financially, we believe the responsible parties -- the tobacco companies -- should be reimbursing the taxpayer to the greatest amount possible under the law."

Seeking to prove that tobacco companies are liable, the suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Boston, draws a link between nicotine addiction and smoking-related diseases such as lung cancer and emphysema. It argues that "addiction is the key...[to] the prolonged use of cigarettes that commonly causes these diseases," and that the defendants hid the addictive nature of their products and sought to enhance their addictiveness. The suit concludes: "The Medicare beneficiaries who have suffered from or are suffering from diseases attributable to smoking the defendants' cigarettes did not consent to being exposed to the addictive properties of the defendants' cigarettes."

The suit names Philip Morris USA, a subsidiary of Altria Group; Lorillard Tobacco Co.; Liggett Group Inc.; and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. and two of its subsidiaries. An Altria lawyer said he thought the case would be dismissed, and David Howard, an R.J. Reynolds spokesman, said, "Virtually all courts have rejected third-party health-care reimbursement claims, and in the rulings they've stated that they lack standing to sue because claims by the third parties are too remote from any alleged injury." Lorillard and Liggett declined to comment.

Yesterday's suit doesn't seeking to recover Medicare payments in Florida, where a similar suit has been filed. Last week, the plaintiffs in the Florida case -- two individuals -- were dealt a setback when a judge dismissed it, ruling that liability has to be proven in other cases first. The plaintiffs are appealing.

In 1998, the tobacco industry settled for more than $200 billion with most states for claims related to Medicaid, the health-insurance program for the poor and disabled. Since then, the industry has launched a counteroffensive in the courts. The number of suits against Altria, for example, has fallen roughly 60% in the past five years, and the federal government has had a rocky time in its current attempt to prosecute the companies on civil racketeering charges. That and other cases still loom.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Calif. Youth Prison Head Removed For Force (AP)

By DON THOMPSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, August 5, 2005

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP) - The superintendent at the state's most notorious youth prison is being removed from his post for using unreasonable force against a ward and failing to report the incident, corrections officials said Thursday.

Steve Kruse has been on administrative leave since shortly after the May 27 incident at Stockton's N.A. Chaderjian Youth Correctional Facility. His appointment as superintendent will be terminated Wednesday.

Kruse's removal adds to turmoil at the facility, which remains under federal investigation. Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said Thursday an investigation "is active and ongoing" into whether the civil rights of wards at the facility are being violated.

The termination was detailed in a quarterly investigative report released Thursday by Matthew Cate, the prison system's independent inspector general. Kruse was not identified by name in the redacted public report, but he was identified as the employee by numerous corrections employees and by previous reports on the incident.

The inspector general found that Kruse grabbed a handcuffed ward's hair and jaw as he was being escorted to another living unit after a fight involving 44 youths at the prison.

Though the ward was struggling with his escorts, and Kruse said he believed he was using reasonable force in line with department policy, investigators concluded the ward was already safely under others' control.

Neither Kruse nor any employees present immediately reported the incident, which Cate said violated use-of-force rules and a new policy intended to break an informal "code of silence" to cover up wrongdoing.

The Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation is scheduled to submit on Friday its response to a scathing report this spring by the prison system's independent inspector general.

Further reports are due this fall to a federal judge after national experts found deplorable conditions throughout the youth prison system.

DOJ_NMG_0002312

Local Leaders Share Views With Federal Mediator (HAVREDN)

By Larry Kline, Havre Daily News

Havre (MT) Daily News, August 5, 2005

Local government officials, business leaders and residents have been meeting with a U.S. Department of Justice mediator who is in town this week to address what some perceive as racial discrimination in and around Havre.

Mediator Grace Sage is employed by the Justice Department's Community Relations Service and is gathering information to determine whether a problem exists in Havre and what can be done to bridge gaps between neighbors.

The mediator told the Rocky Boy tribal council Tuesday she visited Havre in late June and returned because "it was well within the jurisdiction" of what she does.

Before her June visit, Sage had read a University of Montana School of Journalism Native News Project, which included accounts of mistreatment of Native Americans in some Havre businesses. She also had received an invitation from Havre resident Charlie Grant.

Tribal council member and state Rep. Jonathan Windy Boy, D-Rocky Boy, asked what the end result of her visits would be.

"The expectation is to have people agree there is a problem and ... come together to solve it," she told him. "What we can do is get people on board for mediation, counseling or perhaps training."

Windy Boy was designated as the tribal council's contact person for the mediator.

He offered his opinion on the issue in an interview Wednesday.

"It's always been here," Windy Boy said. "It's been more subtle than it was 50 years ago." Windy Boy remembers seeing signs in business windows that read "No dogs or Indians allowed."

"It's just like any group," he said. "There's always a couple that make it bad for the rest of the community. I'm not saying the whole town is like that. It exists at a certain level."

Racism in Montana is not confined to Havre, he added.

"I've been followed around in stores (in other cities)," Windy Boy said. "This isn't the only town that deals with this."

During the 2005 legislative session, he and a companion were in a Wal-Mart at 2 a.m., and his granddaughter was in need of a diaper. At the checkout, a worker "told us that he hoped she wouldn't pull out her WIC," or Special Supplemental Nutrition Program for Women, Infants and Children vouchers.

"For us to think it doesn't exist in our state, we're fooling ourselves," he added. "It's here in our society." The mediator met individually with city officials and Havre City Council members Wednesday. She declined to be interviewed, but officials later discussed the conversations they had with her.

"She asked for my perceptions," Havre Mayor Bob Rice said. "She said she wasn't judging the community on the word of a few people."

The Native News Project article about Havre did not adequately describe how things are in the city, Rice said.

"I thought that story was very slanted," Rice said.

Discrimination does exist in Havre, just as it does elsewhere, Rice said.

"It's been there and people know about it," he said. "We do have some people that are racist in this town. You have them everywhere. This is a good community. It's unfortunate that this came out the way it did."

Rice said new business ventures being planned for Havre and Rocky Boy will help Native Americans and ease tensions.

"I think Wal-Mart will help," he said about the retail chain's plans to build a supercenter west of Havre. "That's 275 jobs."

The reservation is working on plans for a large casino and an ethanol plant. There is a lot of oil and gas exploration going on right now, Rice said. Those are all positives for the residents of both communities, he added.

City Council member Jack Brandon, who was raised in Chinook, said things have changed over the years.

"I saw more prejudice growing up in Chinook than you would see today," Brandon said. "I think we're better today at judging someone on their merits than we used to be.

"I don't think anything astonishing is going to come out of" Sage's visit, he added. "Hopefully people are more aware that these things do exist and they do something about it."

City Council member Allen "Woody" Woodwick agreed that attitudes have changed, though prejudice does exist to a degree today.

"We have a problem in town, but I hesitate to call it racism," Woodwick said. "More of a prejudice, (which isn't) strictly racial. I do believe it's improved some. You make a little progress here and a little progress there. I don't think there's a magic wand that will make it all go away. I think we need to have some continuing education. We need to just keep working together to overcome it. There's not an ordinance we can draft that tells everybody to be nice to each other. It still boils down to individuals treating each other with respect."

DOJ_NMG_0002313

Woodwick and Brandon agreed that the Havre Public Schools' system of organizing its elementary schools by grade level, rather than by neighborhood, ensures that children of different economic and social backgrounds form strong bonds of friendship early in life.

Rocky Boy resident Lloyd Top Sky, who expects to meet soon with Sage, said Native American people face discrimination from white people and also discriminate against each other.

The people in power at Rocky Boy watch out more for family members than the rest of their constituents, he said.

"We're all the same, but on the other hand we're not the same. They discriminate against me because of my name. It's an unfair system," Top Sky said.

"You see it going on even more," he added. "They fund certain people for higher education. Housing's the same way. It's all on the shoulders of the boards and who sits on the boards, but the tribal council?"

"It probably exists," Windy Boy said when asked about Top Sky's comments. "I'm in a position of power, and I try not to conduct business as such. I do whatever it takes to try to help people. I go out of my way to help people.

"If it exists, the constituents would know more than anybody," he added.

The discrimination continues outside of the reservation's border, Top Sky said.

"We seem to be targeted more than anyone else at the city level," he said. "We're always in the paper. We get pulled over more often."

Havre police Lt. Russ Ostwalt said today that Native Americans and other minorities are not targeted by the department.

"There's nothing like that going on here," Ostwalt said. "We have two Native Americans on our Police Department and three females."

Any complaints of that nature are taken seriously, he said, and investigated within the department. Officers receive training on such issues at the state academy and continue their education while employed, he added.

Discrimination is not limited to local government employees, Top Sky said.

"I see it almost every day," he said. "I never said anything. I used to absorb it and leave. I think a lot of the people out here are that way."

Windy Boy said area residents need to cooperate, regardless of their differences.

"We need to continue to move forward collaboratively," he said. "We're not going anywhere, and Havre isn't going anywhere."

Also, Indians contribute a significant amount of dollars toward Havre's economy, and that needs to be acknowledged, he said.

"The level of dollars that Rocky Boy and Fort Belknap bring to (Havre) needs to be recognized," Windy Boy said. "Otherwise, a lot of people are going to start going to Great Falls."

Hill County Commissioner Mike Anderson, a Havre native, said racism is not a widespread problem.

"There are small factions on both sides of the issue, but generally I think that most people aren't discriminatory against other minorities," Anderson said.

He said the mediator had "quite a list" of people to talk to in and around Havre.

"She just wanted to get everybody's input," Anderson said. "She'll see what commonalities there are and come up with some ideas on what can be done to help."

Havre Area Chamber of Commerce executive director Debbie Vandeberg said the chamber board met with the mediator Wednesday and is keeping the dialogue confidential.

Rice said the chamber has a new idea regarding possible solutions to the issue and may not go forward with resurrecting the defunct Native American Affairs Committee, which consisted of representatives of local and tribal governments, business leaders and community members when it was created 10 years ago. It stopped meeting about six years ago, and Vandeberg, city officials and tribal council members have said they want to revive it.

Vandeberg said the board is making a decision about the status of the committee today. She would not comment further.

Racial Mediator Visits Havre (GFT)

By JARED MILLER, Tribune Regional Reporter

Great Falls (MT) Tribune, August 4, 2005

HAVRE — Officials in Havre and on the Rocky Boy's Reservation are hopeful that a federal mediator visiting this week will help ease racial tensions, but some area residents said the battle against racism will be a tough fight.

Grace Sage, a mediator from the U.S. Justice Department Community Relations Service, interviewed Havre Mayor Bob Rice and some City Council members Wednesday morning. She met briefly on Tuesday with the Chippewa-Cree Business Committee at the nearby Rocky Boy's Reservation.

Sage declined to be interviewed by the press. Community Relations Service Director Sharee Freeman in Washington, D.C., said confidentiality and the mediation process prohibit her from releasing details about Sage's itinerary.

The Community Relations Service is the federal "peacemaker" in conflicts involving matters of race, color or national origin. It was created under the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Sage first visited Havre in June. That trip came in the wake of a report by University of Montana journalism students describing examples of shoddy treatment Indians receives in Havre.

The report included quotes from a clothing store employee who pays extra attention to Indian shoppers to prevent theft. A bartender explained how to tell between a "good Indian" and a "bad Indian" by the way they dress and carry themselves.

Fearing the report might spur retaliation against Indians, concerned citizens contacted the Department of Justice.

Mayor Rice spoke with the mediator for about 20 minutes. He said afterward that he's glad she came to Havre.

"I told her that I was pretty much ashamed of the criticism," Rice said. "I said we have bad people on both sides here, and we do."

Rice also stands firm on his conviction that the UM report was a "highly slanted" account and said he's "deeply hurt by it."

"This is a good community," Rice said. "I think it's unfortunate that this had to come out the way it did."

Rice met with the Chippewa-Cree Business Committee after UM published the report to talk about race issues. He subsequently accepted an invitation to speak at the Rocky Boy Powwow this weekend.

Sage met with the Chippewa-Cree Business Committee on Tuesday, council Chairman John Chance Houle said.

The visit was cut short because Sage was not listed on the agenda, and the council had a full schedule that day, Houle said.

The council later appointed Councilman Jonathan Windy Boy to represent the reservation in future meetings between the Indian and non-Indian leaders, Houle said.

In an interview earlier this week, Windy Boy, who also is a state legislator, said the effort to address racism in Havre is "long overdue."

"I know there has been attempts in the past, but it's something that's needed to get better coordination on the local level," said Windy Boy, who is hopeful that the mediator will achieve results.

Some Havre-area residents interviewed Wednesday were less optimistic that the mediator could help bridge what they see as a formidable racial divide.

Jerrad Gomke, a non-Indian who lives west of Havre, acknowledged that racism against Indians exists in Havre. He doesn't think efforts by the mediator will help.

"I think she (the mediator) knows what she's going to find — that there is some racism because we live so close to the reservation," Gomke said. "It will just blow over once she leaves."

Beulah Branson, a Frazer-area resident shopping in Havre on Wednesday, said she's also skeptical.

"I think it's fine if they want to try. I don't know how much good it will do," said Branson, who is white. "Surfacely, there might be some change."

Dolores Stump, a tribal member from the nearby Fort Belknap Reservation, said she doubts Indians will ever fully escape racist treatment in Havre. She doesn't think mediation will help.

"It's always been racist up here," said Stump, who shops in Havre about twice a month. "There's certain places you can't go to eat. It's always going to be."

Meanwhile, the Havre Area Chamber of Commerce was set to meet Wednesday night to consider its response to the charges of racism by local businesses.

The chamber initially planned to revive a Native American Affairs Committee, which was created in the 1990s to address similar race issues. It's unclear if that will now occur.

"They are formalizing some alternatives that sound pretty good," Chamber Executive Director Debbie Vandeberg said.

Voting Rights Act: Renewal Of Good Faith (AJC)

By Bob Kemper In Washington, Tom Baxter In Atlanta, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, August 5, 2005

Supporters and critics of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 agree on just one thing: It worked.

The law was adopted amid the violence and bloodshed of the civil rights movement to abolish racism at the ballot box and guarantee black Americans the right to vote.

Black voter turnout since then has varied with the perceived importance of each election, and the last two presidential elections set records for minority participation. Meanwhile, the number of African-Americans elected to public office has increased sixfold.

DOJ_NMG_0002315

Key provisions of the Voting Rights Act are up for reauthorization in 2007, though with its 40th anniversary Saturday, the act is already the subject of intense congressional maneuvering. The Rev. Jesse Jackson will lead a march in Atlanta on the anniversary and has launched a national petition drive to urge the White House to extend the provisions of the law.

"We know there's a scheme afoot to make the Voting Rights Act invalid by rebooting the Supreme Court," Jackson said Thursday at a news conference in Atlanta on plans for the march. "We deserve better."

Political posturing

There is talk in Congress of strong bipartisan support for renewing the act, but political tensions remain that may well boil over into a raucous showdown.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean is using the reauthorization effort to portray Republicans as intolerant and to mobilize Democrats to retake the House and Senate in next year's elections. Dean has accused Republicans of "hypocrisy" if they don't support the voting rights act.

But Abigail Thernstrom, vice-chairwoman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and an opponent of reauthorization, argues that Republicans have if anything been timid in avoiding a battle over the issue.

Republican congressional leaders, including House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, have tried to blunt Democratic attacks by publicly praising the act and, at one point, suggesting they might reauthorize it before 2007, possibly in time for the 2006 election campaigns.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Tuesday the administration looked forward to working on the reauthorization.

Yet racial and partisan tensions over the issue erupted Wednesday in a Fulton County Commission meeting when Commissioner Emma Darnell introduced a resolution in favor of reauthorization. The four black Democrats on the County Commission voted for it; the three white Republicans, including Chairwoman Karen Handel, voted against.

Not without controversy

While several provisions of the Voting Rights Act are up for reauthorization, the one most likely to spark controversy is Section 5. It requires nine states — including Georgia — and parts of seven others, each with a long history of discrimination at the ballot box before 1965, to get the approval of the federal government before enacting any changes in their electoral laws. That includes alterations in the boundaries of congressional districts and moving a polling station.

If a congressional battle develops, it could be led by Southern Republicans, some of whom argue the restrictions should either be dropped or be applied to all states.

Brian Robinson, spokesman for Rep. Lynn Westmoreland, (R-Ga.), said, "The congressman feels quite strongly that Section 5 should apply to every state in the nation or it should apply to none of them."

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) took the same position in his 2004 election campaign and said last week he sticks by it.

Need for Section 5?

The Reagan administration raised similar concerns in 1982 when the act was last reauthorized, saying Section 5 had outlived its usefulness and was an unnecessary intrusion by the federal government into state matters.

"Section 5, which was very controversial even in 1965, was intended as a temporary provision, really only to last five years, until this 'emergency' had passed," said Edward Blum of the Center for Equal Opportunity, a conservative think tank. "To say that we still have that emergency or even the shadow of that emergency in 2005 really stretches where race relations really are in this country today."

While they boast of the act's positive impact, those who want Section 5 renewed cite allegations of intimidation of traditionally Democratic black voters in the 2000 and 2004 elections.

"In some quarters there have been deliberate, systemic efforts to suppress minority voters," said Rep. John Lewis, an Atlanta Democrat whose beating by police on the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Ala., in 1965 helped spark adoption of the Voting Rights Act a few months later.

"That reminds me of the Old South," said Lewis, who will join Saturday's march in Atlanta.

Democrats advocating the reauthorization of key sections of the act said they hoped to pass it with bipartisan support. Congressional Republicans, following President Bush's lead in courting black voters, pledged to lead the way.

Rep. Mel Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, said he was working with Rep. James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, to ensure that nothing is done to weaken the act.

Kennedy, Specter allies

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said he and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, would co-sponsor the reauthorization bill this fall to ensure support for it on both sides of the aisle.

Frist, a Tennessee Republican, after a congressional pilgrimage to Selma and Montgomery led by Lewis last year, said he was moved to introduce a measure that would make the Voting Rights Act permanent.

Some civil rights lawyers are suspicious and said the changes suggested by Republicans could lead to the act being ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

The act focuses on race, so federal law requires that a clear record of discrimination be established in jurisdictions covered by the act and that those jurisdictions be strictly monitored.

Civil rights lawyers said it would be impossible to establish evidence of discrimination in all states. So if the law is expanded and made permanent, they said, the Supreme Court is likely to strike it down.

"It's a Trojan Horse," said Theodore Shaw of the NAACP's Legal Defense and Educational Fund. "It sounds like a good idea [but] it is a threat."

Thernstrom, who has written extensively against the reauthorization of the act, said a court challenge is likely if Section 5 is extended, because it was originally intended as a temporary measure, and conditions have changed dramatically since 1965.

ID requirement reviewed

Because of the Voting Rights Act, Georgia had to have its recently redrawn congressional districts approved by the Justice Department before they could be made permanent.

The federal government is now reviewing a Georgia law that would require voters to present a photo ID to cast their ballots. The law must pass muster with the federal governement even though it has been adopted by the state Legislature and signed by the governor.

Fulton County officials invoked the Voting Rights Act this year in an effort to prevent Sandy Springs from becoming a city, saying it would hurt black people living in other parts of the county. The federal government disagreed and allowed Sandy Springs to incorporate.

The Voting Rights Act re-emerges on Capitol Hill at a time when African-American participation in national elections has reached near-record levels — despite charges that minority voters have been prevented from voting or had their votes discounted in certain places.

The Civil Rights Project at Harvard University, an organization devoted to civil rights research, found after the 2000 presidential election that nearly 2 million votes were not counted and that a disproportionately high number of those came from predominantly black counties.

Civil rights groups around the country reported during the 2004 campaign that black voters were receiving letters and phone calls falsely telling them they were ineligible to vote. Polling stations in predominantly minority precincts reported a shortage of voting machines, and in some cases polls closed while people were waiting in line to vote.

Despite those obstacles, nearly 54 percent of registered black voters cast ballots in 2000 and more than 56 percent in 2004, according to census figures.

Staff writer Add Seymour Jr. contributed to this article.

40 Years Later, Black Electorate Still Has Long Way To Go (CLE/KRT)

By Amanda Ruggeri

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - When President Lyndon B. Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act, he sought to banish hurdles that kept African-Americans from voting - and, as he told Congress, that barred them from "the full blessings of American life."

The act, amended three times and up for renewal in 2007, remains one of the key pieces of legislation for racial equality. Because it banned discriminatory practices, long gone are the literacy tests and violence that once threatened blacks at the polls.

But on the eve of the act's 40th anniversary on Saturday, not everyone agrees that it has banished discrimination from the voting booth. Turnout rates for black voters still lag behind those of whites, and blacks remain represented at disproportionately low rates by black officials. Cases of attempted voter disenfranchisement have been documented as recently as the last presidential election.

Given the facts, experts and legislators agree, the federal law was a major steppingstone for equality. But minorities still have a long way to go.

"The Voting Rights Act enabled black people, generally, to be able to register and cast their vote without fear of bodily harm or economic pressures," said former Rep. Bill Clay, D-Mo., a civil rights activist who lobbied Congress to pass the act.

"The fear now is that there is lack of enforcement," said Clay, who in 1968 became the first African-American from Missouri elected to Congress. He retired in 2000.

Kenneth Warren, a political scientist at St. Louis University, agreed that many obstacles still exist for minority voters. As a frequent expert witness at court hearings on voting practices, Warren said discrimination, at least in subtle forms, still pervades politics.

DOJ_NMG_0002317

In Ohio in the election last year, for example, voting machines were transferred out of Columbus and into the suburbs. As a result, residents of areas heavily populated by minorities had to wait up to 10 hours to vote, whereas people from more affluent, Republican-leaning regions had little trouble voting.

In a speech Tuesday on the Voting Rights Act, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said 124 election fraud investigations are going on nationwide and dozens of other cases have been closed after investigation. That shows, he said, that enforcing the act is a priority of the Justice Department.

"The president has directed the full power and might of the Justice Department to enforce the Voting Rights Act," he said. "Our goal is to make voting easier and cheating harder."

Despite violations, experts and politicians agree that the Voting Rights Act's positive effect cannot be denied, particularly in the South.

After the passage in 1870 of the 15th Amendment to the Constitution, guaranteeing every citizen's right to vote regardless of race, many Southern states passed strict voter qualification laws. Literacy tests and poll taxes became commonplace. Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., said it was nearly impossible to vote in the South unless you were white.

He cited one occasion in which a man was asked to give the number of bubbles in a bar of soap. Another time, he said, poll officials targeted a black man in Alabama who happened to hold a doctorate in philosophical theology. "He failed the so-called literacy test," said Lewis, a longtime civil rights activist. "He was told he could not read or write well enough."

Statistics from before and after the Voting Rights Act's passage show significant changes in black political participation, particularly in the South. In the 1964 presidential election, Southern blacks voted 15 percent less than their counterparts in the North. But by last year, the difference was negligible, with some Southern states - including Alabama, Kentucky and South Carolina - exceeding the national black turnout rate of 56.3 percent.

Nationwide, the number of black elected officials has jumped from 1,469 in 1970, the first year the information was collected, to a high of 9,101 in 2001.

Despite the increase of black officials, blacks still make up only 2 percent of all elected officials in the nation. And voters from other minority groups still struggle as well, said Rep. Robert Menendez, D-N.J.

Menendez, along with many other legislators, is already strategizing for the act's extension in 2007. He said one of the most important goals of extension is the reauthorization of key provisions, such as the one that provides assistance to communities proficient in a language other than English.

"One citizen unfairly discouraged from voting is one too many," Menendez said.

Speaking at the Lyndon B. Johnson Memorial Library in Austin, Texas, Gonzales said the Bush administration looks forward to working with Congress on the act's extension, and particularly with regard to minority language provisions.

In his book "Freedom is Not Enough: Black Voters, Black Candidates, and American Presidential Politics," political analyst Ronald Walters says one particular statistic shows how much further minorities have to go to reach parity with whites: According to census figures, the highest turnout of black voters was 58.5 percent. That record was set in 1964, a year before the Voting Rights Act was passed.

The statistic is little-known. It is also contested by political scientists like Warren, who say that because census figures rely on citizens' own reporting of whether they voted, the numbers are often inflated.

But Walters said the census remains the most accurate way of determining voter turnout. Furthermore, he said, the number is less surprising within the context of the 1964 election. President John F. Kennedy had just been assassinated, and Johnson promised to carry on his legacy of civil rights. Americans overwhelmingly responded, turning out to the polls in record numbers. Because no election since has been quite so emotional, neither whites nor blacks have reached that level of political participation again.

Lewis agreed that the events of 1964 pulled blacks to the polls, despite formidable barriers.

"There was a feeling, I think, more than anything else, that people had to go out and vote like they'd never voted before," Lewis said. "And there is this need in America - and not just in the African-American community, but among all Americans - to bring us back to this point again."

In the last election, the population came close. Fifty-six percent of eligible African-Americans voted, along with 60 percent of whites.

Walters said the election last year was especially impressive because it showed the decrease in the disparity between white and black voter turnout. Even in 1964, the gap was nearly 13 percentage points, with nearly 71 percent of eligible white voters flocking to the polls.

The question, Walters said, is whether African-Americans will realize their full potential as a political bloc. As he celebrates the anniversary of one of the biggest steps toward that potential, he said he encourages African-Americans to strategize for the future.

DOJ_NMG_0002318

"We've voted, we've done well," he said. "But now, how do we get more power out of this vote?"

For Miss. Town, Voting Law Helped (USAT)

By Melanie Eversley

USA Today, August 5, 2005

KILMICHAEL, Miss. — For years, black residents here grumbled about bad roads and poor municipal services in their part of town, but they didn't count on the all-white governing board for much help.

Then came the local elections of 2001, when an unprecedented number of African-American candidates brought Kilmichael, population 830, to the cusp of a historic change in leadership. Three weeks before the election, however, the town's mayor and five-member Board of Aldermen canceled the elections.

The Justice Department, calling the move a violation of the Voting Rights Act, stepped in. Two years later, Kilmichael finally voted — and elected its first black mayor, along with three black aldermen.

The episode was a reminder of how the Voting Rights Act — which hits its 40th anniversary Saturday — remains a hedge against discriminatory election practices long after the civil-rights battles in the South. Now, with key parts of the act due to expire in 2007, a debate is building over how far America has come in ensuring racial equality and whether protections for minority voters should be renewed or changed.

The Voting Rights Act requires jurisdictions in 16 states with past discrimination problems, mostly in the South, to have changes in voting rules cleared by the Justice Department or a federal judge. The impact of that part of the law, called Section 5, can be seen in the dramatic increases in registered voters and officeholders among minorities since the mid-1960s.

Two other provisions are up for renewal. One allows the U.S. government to send poll observers to jurisdictions where there have been alleged voting-rights violations. The other provision, added in 1975 in response to the rising number of Latino voters, requires bilingual ballots and language assistance in areas with large numbers of residents who do not speak English.

There appears to be widespread support in Congress for renewing the act, and the White House has expressed support for it. Still, lively debates are likely when the Senate Judiciary Committee begins hearings on it in September.

Democrats such as Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Rep. Raul Grijalva of Arizona are pushing for a stronger law. Among other things, they cite complaints about a lack of voting machines in heavily minority precincts in Ohio during the 2004 elections, and alleged voting irregularities in Florida four years earlier that they say wrongly kept some blacks off of voter registration lists.

The Senate panel also is likely to consider proposals to make it more difficult for governments to concentrate minorities in single voting districts, thereby reducing their power.

“My hope is that there would be strong bipartisan support for renewal,” said Barbara Arnwine, executive director for the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law.

So far, the chief critics of renewing the act have been conservative groups such as the Center for Equal Opportunity, and a few Republicans such as Abigail Thernstrom of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. They say the law was needed at a time when poll taxes and literacy tests often were used to keep blacks from voting in the South, but no longer.

In Kilmichael, the new era of leadership now is a mix of old and new. Mary McCaskill Young, who became the town's first black mayor when she beat incumbent Tommy Rushing in the special election in 2003, lost to Rushing in the town's general election in June. And a black alderman did not seek re-election. There now are two blacks on the Board of Aldermen.

Rushing rejects the notion that white town officials canceled the 2001 election because it appeared that blacks would win elections. He says officials merely wanted to switch from a system in which board members were elected at-large, to one in which voters would choose only a representative for their district.

The town didn't reschedule the election, and the Justice Department forced it to hold one in 2003 in which aldermen were elected from districts. Jewel Harrison, chairman of the local Democratic Party, says the U.S. government's use of the Voting Rights Act helped ensure equality in Kilmichael.

“I think it put everyone on notice that you just can't do things and get away with it,” he said.

Increasingly, Voting Rights Act probes stem from complaints by Latinos, who make up about 14% of the U.S. population and are the nation's fastest-growing ethnic group. (Blacks make up about 12.8%.)

The eastern Pennsylvania city of Reading, long known for its German immigrant population, has attracted a growing number of Latinos. Some families came from Puerto Rico and Mexico in the 1930s and 1940s to work for mushroom growers and steel mills. More recently, many have moved from New York. In the 2000 Census, 37.3% of Reading's nearly 81,000 residents were Latino, up from 18.5% in 1990.

DOJ_NMG_0002319

In Reading, there have been complaints about Spanish-speaking residents being harassed at the polls, and accusations that they have been turned away or belittled if they could not read ballot directions or speak English fluently. In 2003, the Justice Department accused Berks County, Pa., of discriminating against Spanish-speaking voters.

Some parts of the Voting Rights Act cited in the Berks County case apply only to people from Puerto Rico and do not expire in 2007. But they are similar to the language provision that is up for renewal.

In 2003, Justice ordered examiners to monitor county elections through June 2007. The county also must provide bilingual election materials, interpreters and other aids for Spanish-speaking voters.

Berks County Commissioner Mark Scott opposed the order. He said his family members from Germany did not need the kind of help that Justice has ordered for Latinos.

"People are capable of a lot more than they are giving themselves credit for," he said.

Those on both sides of the debate say clashes such as the one in Reading are more likely as the nation's demographics change. "I fully support the (Justice Department) coming in," said Jonathan Encarnacion of Centro Hispano, a community group in Reading. "It was something that had to be brought to the surface."

EDITORIAL NOTEBOOK Keep The Voting Rights Act (AAS)

Austin American-Statesman, August 5, 2005

In these early years of the 21st century, it's difficult to comprehend how thoroughly and systematically minorities, especially African Americans, were once denied the right to vote.

In the South, blacks faced poll taxes and literacy tests designed to keep them from voting. Denying and suppressing the minority vote was politics as usual in many southern states, racial discrimination on a national scale.

President Lyndon B. Johnson changed that political landscape forever when he signed the Voting Rights Act of 1965 into law 40 years ago Saturday. Since that day, the act has served as a weapon against discrimination and a reminder of an ugly period in American life.

Even after 40 years, the act is no mere symbol. As U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales noted in a speech in Austin earlier this week, enforcing the Voting Rights Act is a priority at the Justice Department. He said 124 election fraud investigations are ongoing.

Key enforcement provisions in the act are up for reauthorization by Congress in 2007. One of those provisions requires southern states (including Texas) to get Justice Department approval before changing electoral procedures or boundaries. Another requires foreign language ballots in certain districts with large numbers of non-English speakers.

Congress should reauthorize those provisions when they expire. They are still necessary, still being enforced. Four decades hasn't erased all the vestiges of racism and discrimination in the South, and election miscarriages are still a problem. But reauthorization has run into political trouble. The creation of secure political districts protected by the Voting Rights Act vastly increased the number of minority elected officials locally, statewide and nationally.

It also gave rise to Republican majorities and increased Republican power in the South and in Washington. Texas, for example, has solid black and Hispanic congressional districts, but no Democrat in statewide office.

Reauthorization carries other consequences. A push to make it apply nationally, and not just in the southern states, could doom it to failure in Congress. And attempts to strengthen it to ensure that minority districts are maintained could keep the GOP in power indefinitely.

Political wrangling, however, shouldn't undo the good that was done 40 years ago when the act became law. Its enforcement provisions should be reauthorized by Congress, lest America forget a painful lesson.

Repaying Segregation's Debt (WP)

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

More than most southern states, Virginia has surmounted its segregationist past, not least by becoming, in 1989, the first state to elect an African American governor, L. Douglas Wilder. (Mr. Wilder is now mayor of Richmond, capital of the old Confederacy.) This year the commonwealth has struck another blow to repudiate a unique event in U.S. history and one of segregation's worst chapters: the decision to close some Virginia public schools rather than comply with court-ordered integration after the Supreme Court's 1954 ruling in Brown v. Board of Education . In recent months, dozens of black Virginians, mostly in their fifties and sixties, have been granted the first state scholarships, up to $5,500 each, to get what they were denied five decades ago: a public education.

The scholarships, which follow a resolution by the General Assembly two years ago expressing its "profound regret" at the school closings, do not heal the wounds inflicted by what was then known in Virginia as its policy of "massive resistance" to integration.

DOJ_NMG_0002320

In southern Virginia's Prince Edward County, the most zealously anti-segregationist jurisdiction of the day, many black children went unschooled from 1959 to 1963, and some never got to resume their education; others attended makeshift lessons in churches or were sent far away to live with relatives or even strangers so they could continue going to school. Shortchanged by the state, they were unprepared for higher education and certain jobs and careers they might otherwise have had.

Nothing that Virginia can do will fully compensate for that disgraceful episode. Still, the scholarships are an appropriate and admirable act of contrition. As Gov. Mark R. Warner said, "This at least goes a partial way to [repay] the debt we owe to these folks." Even some whites will be eligible for the scholarships; as children they were also denied an education, being unable to afford the private academy established to serve them after the public schools were closed. More than 80 people, many of them still residents of Prince Edward, have already received scholarships for high school or college courses; several thousand more are eligible to apply. John Kluge, a Charlottesville media baron and philanthropist, has matched the state's own $1 million appropriation to fund the scholarship program.

If there is an inspirational note to this story, it belongs to Ken Woodley, the crusading editor of the Farmville Herald in Prince Edward County, who almost single-handedly conceived the idea of scholarships, campaigned for it in print and personally urged it on Mr. Warner and hesitant lawmakers.

In 1959, Mr. Woodley's own newspaper led the local chorus of opposition to integration, denouncing it as a communist plot against racial purity and the American way. Now the newspaper, under the same family ownership, has backed Mr. Woodley, and the state scholarships, to the hilt. That is a measure of Virginia's progress, and a credit to it.

Court Rules UT Can Block Dating E-Mails (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, August 5, 2005

(AP) - AUSTIN, Texas-The University of Texas didn't violate the free-speech rights of an online dating service when it blocked thousands of unsolicited e-mails, a federal appeals court says.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals also found that although White Buffalo Ventures LLC, which operates LonghornSingles.com, complied with the requirements of the federal anti-spam law, known as CAN-SPAM, the university can still set its own anti-spam policy.

White Buffalo had sued the university over 59,000 messages blocked by spam filters in 2003. The Austin-based service had legally obtained the addresses from UT but the university blocked the e-mail messages, saying White Buffalo was part of a larger spam problem that had crashed the computer system.

The university said it was also responding to complaints from students and faculty.

The court, in a ruling Tuesday, determined that White Buffalo complied with federal law and that its e-mails were not illegal. However, CAN-SPAM does not supersede protection measures employed by an Internet service provider, and the court interpreted ISPs to include the university.

Leading Republican Differs With Bush On Evolution (WP/REU)

By Jon Hurdle, Reuters

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

PHILADELPHIA (Reuters) - A leading Republican senator allied with the religious right differed on Thursday with President Bush's support for teaching an alternative to the theory of evolution known as "intelligent design."

Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, a possible 2008 presidential contender who faces a tough re-election fight next year in Pennsylvania, said intelligent design, which is backed by many religious conservatives, lacked scientific credibility and should not be taught in science classes.

Bush told reporters from Texas on Monday that "both sides" in the debate over intelligent design and evolution should be taught in schools "so people can understand what the debate is about."

"I think I would probably tailor that a little more than what the president has suggested," Santorum, the third-ranking Republican member of the U.S. Senate, told National Public Radio. "I'm not comfortable with intelligent design being taught in the science classroom."

Evangelical Christians have launched campaigns in at least 18 states to make public schools teach intelligent design alongside Charles Darwin's theory of evolution.

Proponents of intelligent design argue that nature is so complex that it could not have occurred by random natural selection, as held by Darwin's 1859 theory of evolution, and so must be the work of an unnamed "intelligent cause."

Santorum is the third-ranking member of the U.S. Senate and has championed causes of the religious right including opposition to gay marriage and abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0002321

He is expected to face a stiff challenge from Democrat Bob Casey in his quest for re-election next year in Pennsylvania, a major battleground state in recent presidential elections.

The controversy over intelligent design is a hot topic in Pennsylvania, where the Dover Area School District in south central Pennsylvania has included the theory in its biology curriculum.

The American Civil Liberties Union has sued to block the policy, calling it a violation of the constitutional separation of church and state.

Most Americans believe that God created human beings or guided the process of evolution, according to a CBS poll last November. Two-thirds said they wanted creationism taught alongside evolution in schools.

SCIENCE CURRICULUM

Critics, including many science teachers, say intelligent design cannot be scientifically tested and has no place in a science curriculum.

Santorum sided in part with intelligent-design proponents in saying that there were gaps in the theory of evolution.

"What we should be teaching are the problems and holes -- and I think there are legitimate problems and holes -- in the theory of evolution. What we need to do is to present those fairly, from a scientific point of view," he said in the interview.

"As far as intelligent design is concerned, I really don't believe it has risen to the level of a scientific theory at this point that we would want to teach it alongside of evolution."

Santorum had proposed an unsuccessful measure in 2001 that would have required discussing the "controversy" of evolution when the theory is taught in classes.

Bush's science adviser, John Marburger, was quoted in The New York Times this week as saying intelligent design was not a scientific concept, and that Bush's remarks should be interpreted to mean he thinks the concept should be taught as part of the "social context" in science classes.

Design For Confusion (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

I'd like to nominate Irving Kristol, the neoconservative former editor of The Public Interest, as the father of "intelligent design." No, he didn't play any role in developing the doctrine. But he is the father of the political strategy that lies behind the intelligent design movement - a strategy that has been used with great success by the economic right and has now been adopted by the religious right.

Back in 1978 Mr. Kristol urged corporations to make "philanthropic contributions to scholars and institutions who are likely to advocate preservation of a strong private sector." That was delicately worded, but the clear implication was that corporations that didn't like the results of academic research, however valid, should support people willing to say something more to their liking.

Mr. Kristol led by example, using The Public Interest to promote supply-side economics, a doctrine whose central claim - that tax cuts have such miraculous positive effects on the economy that they pay for themselves - has never been backed by evidence. He would later concede, or perhaps boast, that he had a "cavalier attitude toward the budget deficit."

"Political effectiveness was the priority," he wrote in 1995, "not the accounting deficiencies of government."

Corporations followed his lead, pouring a steady stream of money into think tanks that created a sort of parallel intellectual universe, a world of "scholars" whose careers are based on toeing an ideological line, rather than on doing research that stands up to scrutiny by their peers.

You might have thought that a strategy of creating doubt about inconvenient research results could work only in soft fields like economics. But it turns out that the strategy works equally well when deployed against the hard sciences.

The most spectacular example is the campaign to discredit research on global warming. Despite an overwhelming scientific consensus, many people have the impression that the issue is still unresolved. This impression reflects the assiduous work of conservative think tanks, which produce and promote skeptical reports that look like peer-reviewed research, but aren't. And behind it all lies lavish financing from the energy industry, especially ExxonMobil.

There are several reasons why fake research is so effective. One is that nonscientists sometimes find it hard to tell the difference between research and advocacy - if it's got numbers and charts in it, doesn't that make it science?

Even when reporters do know the difference, the conventions of he-said-she-said journalism get in the way of conveying that knowledge to readers. I once joked that if President Bush said that the Earth was flat, the headlines of news articles would read, "Opinions Differ on Shape of the Earth." The headlines on many articles about the intelligent design controversy come pretty close.

DOJ_NMG_0002322

Finally, the self-policing nature of science - scientific truth is determined by peer review, not public opinion - can be exploited by skilled purveyors of cultural resentment. Do virtually all biologists agree that Darwin was right? Well, that just shows that they're elitists who think they're smarter than the rest of us.

Which brings us, finally, to intelligent design. Some of America's most powerful politicians have a deep hatred for Darwinism. Tom DeLay, the House majority leader, blamed the theory of evolution for the Columbine school shootings. But sheer political power hasn't been enough to get creationism into the school curriculum. The theory of evolution has overwhelming scientific support, and the country isn't ready - yet - to teach religious doctrine in public schools.

But what if creationists do to evolutionary theory what corporate interests did to global warming: create a widespread impression that the scientific consensus has shaky foundations?

Creationists failed when they pretended to be engaged in science, not religious indoctrination: "creation science" was too crude to fool anyone. But intelligent design, which spreads doubt about evolution without being too overtly religious, may succeed where creation science failed.

The important thing to remember is that like supply-side economics or global-warming skepticism, intelligent design doesn't have to attract significant support from actual researchers to be effective. All it has to do is create confusion, to make it seem as if there really is a controversy about the validity of evolutionary theory. That, together with the political muscle of the religious right, may be enough to start a process that ends with banishing Darwin from the classroom.

Bill Easing Rules On Pill Is Vetoed By Pataki (NYT)

By Al Baker

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

ALBANY, Aug. 4 - As promised earlier this week, Gov. George E. Pataki vetoed a bill on Thursday that would have made the so-called morning-after pill available to women and girls without a prescription. The veto came just hours after the State Assembly delivered the bill to his desk.

Proponents of the emergency contraception bill, including abortion-rights advocates, most Democrats and some leading Republican colleagues of the governor, had urged him to sign the bill, saying it would help prevent more than 80,000 abortions in New York each year. Opponents of the bill, particularly conservatives, pointed out that its main flaw was that minors would have access to the drug, which prevents pregnancy after sex.

In his veto message, the governor emphasized that his main concern was that the measure would not prevent minors from getting the drug before they consulted a doctor or other medical professional. He said his veto was "based solely on a desire to protect the health and safety of our youngest and most vulnerable women."

He also named other concerns: that the bill did not limit purchases to a single dose and that men could buy it and use it to persuade young girls to have unprotected sex.

The governor also struck a conciliatory note, underlining his support for making emergency contraception available, and he stressed that he would work on a revised bill for the State Legislature to pass when it returns to Albany. "We can do better," Mr. Pataki said in his message. "We can increase women's access to emergency contraception while protecting our children."

Many supporters of the bill said Mr. Pataki's veto amounted to political opportunism, since he has long been a supporter of abortion rights but is now exploring the possibility of a bid for the Republican presidential nomination. Aides to the governor have repeatedly disputed that notion.

"I think it's lousy," Kelli M. Conlin, executive director of Naral Pro-Choice New York, said of the veto. "I think he did the wrong thing; it was politically motivated, and the only thing that gives us solace is that women are eventually going to have access to this important pregnancy prevention tool. It's either going to be through the F.D.A. or a new administration in Albany, but we will win."

Proponents have said that women need to get the pill quickly enough for it to be effective on weekends, when seeing a doctor can be difficult. JoAnn M. Smith, president of Family Planning Advocates of New York State, said young people "are the people who need it most."

Senator Nicholas A. Spano, a Westchester County Republican who sponsored the bill, said he was encouraged that "the governor is indicating his support of the concept," and said he understood the governor's concerns about minors. He said he was committed to reducing the number of abortions in New York and thought there was hope of reaching agreement with the governor. "I don't think any of those are fatal problems," Mr. Spano said of the governor's veto message.

Pataki Vetoes Morning-After Pill Bill (AJC/AP)

By Marc Humbert, Associated Press Writer

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, August 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002323

ALBANY, N.Y. — Republican Gov. George Pataki vetoed legislation Thursday that would have allowed pharmacists to dispense the so-called "morning-after pill" without prescriptions.

Pataki, who had announced Sunday that he would veto the measure, said he was most upset that the bill did not require minors to see a physician.

"We can do better," said the governor, who pledged to work with sponsors of the legislation to come up with a proposal he would sign.

Advocates for the bill have said they believe Pataki, with an eye on seeking the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, is using the veto to appeal to conservatives.

"This was driven by politics," said Kelli Conlin, executive director of the New York chapter of National Abortion Rights Action League.

The morning-after pill contains a higher dose of regular contraception hormones. It prevents pregnancy by delaying a woman's ovulation or preventing fertilization. It also can thin the lining of the uterus, making it difficult for a fertilized egg to implant. Anti-abortion groups see interfering with a fertilized egg as abortion.

The Food and Drug Administration plans to decide by Sept. 1 whether the morning-after pill can be sold without a doctor's prescription. Seven states already permit over-the-counter sales.

Emergency contraceptives can reduce the chance of pregnancy by 89 percent if taken within 72 hours of intercourse, and supporters said making them available without a prescription would help more women get the pills in time.

"As we all know, accidents don't happen during doctors' office hours," Adrienne Verrilli of the Sexuality Information and Education Council said. "They occur at night and on weekends when doctors are difficult to reach."

The governor said he wanted a limit on the number of pills that could be dispensed at one time and did not want men to be able to get them, as would have been permitted under the vetoed legislation.

He also said the bill should require patients getting the morning-after pill to receive counseling on the health risks of unprotected sex.

"I know that there are many New Yorkers who sincerely disagree with this position, and I respect and appreciate their views. But my action today is based solely on a desire to protect the health and safety of our youngest and most vulnerable women."

Republican Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, who also is eyeing the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, vetoed similar legislation last month.

ANTITRUST:

Lucent Subpoenaed In Antitrust Probe (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Lucent Technologies Inc. Thursday said it received two subpoenas related to federal investigations into potential antitrust violations and sales of telecommunications equipment to the federal government.

The telecom-equipment vendor said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that one of the subpoenas it received related to an investigation by the Department of Justice into potential antitrust and other violations in connection with the federal E-Rate program.

Lucent said the subpoena requires the company to produce documents before a grand jury of the U.S. District Court in Georgia.

The Murray Hill, N.J., company said the other subpoena was from the Office of Inspector General, General Services Administration, and relates to a federal investigation into certain sales to the federal government of telecommunications equipment and associated maintenance services.

Lucent said it received both subpoenas during the three months ended June 30.

As previously reported, the Justice Department has announced that several companies have been indicted for defrauding the federal E-rate program that dispenses billions of dollars in subsidies for Internet and telecom service in schools and libraries.

The $2.25 billion-a-year E-Rate program is funded by the Universal Service Fund, which is paid for through fees levied on telecom companies. E-Rate is run by Universal Service Administrative Co., which was set up by the Federal Communications Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0002324

The fraud schemes alleged by the Justice Department occurred between 1998 and 2003. Charges range from scheming to defraud the FCC and Universal Service Administrative by including the cost of noncovered equipment and fees with those covered by the program to rigging of bids.

Avaya Inc., which was spun off from Lucent in 2000, said in May that it received a subpoena to produce documents for the period from 1997 to 2005 before a grand jury of the U.S. District Court in South Carolina relating to an investigation of potential antitrust violations in connection with the E-Rate program.

Avaya said it also received a subpoena from the General Services Administration for billing records from 1990 to 2005 corresponding to sales of telecom equipment and maintenance services.

Lucent: Got Subpoenas Tied To Federal Probes (DOWJONES)

Dow Jones Newswires, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- Lucent Technologies Inc. (LU) (LU) said Thursday that it received two subpoenas related to federal investigations into potential antitrust violations and sales of telecommunications equipment to the federal government.

The telecom-equipment vendor said in a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission that one of the subpoenas it received related to an investigation by the U.S. Department of Justice into potential antitrust and other violations in connection with the federal E-Rate program.

Lucent said the subpoena requires the company to produce documents before a grand jury of the U.S. District Court in Georgia.

The Murray Hill, N.J., company said the other subpoena was from the Office of Inspector General, General Services Administration, and relates to a federal investigation into certain sales to the federal government of telecommunications equipment and associated maintenance services.

Lucent said it received both subpoenas during the three months ended June 30.

As previously reported, the Justice Department has announced that several companies have been indicted for defrauding the federal E-rate program that dispenses billions of dollars in subsidies for Internet and telecom service in schools and libraries.

The $2.25 billion-a-year E-Rate program is funded by the Universal Service Fund, which is paid for through fees levied on telecom companies. E-Rate is run by Universal Service Administrative Co., which was set up by the Federal Communications Commission.

The fraud schemes alleged by the Justice Department occurred between 1998 and 2003. Charges range from scheming to defraud the FCC and Universal Service Administrative by including the cost of noncovered equipment and fees with those covered by the program to rigging of bids.

Avaya Inc. (AV) (AV), which was spun off from Lucent in 2000, said in May that it received a subpoena to produce documents for the period from 1997 to 2005 before a grand jury of the U.S. District Court in South Carolina relating to an investigation of potential antitrust violations in connection with the E-Rate program.

Avaya said it also received a subpoena from the General Services Administration for billing records from 1990 to 2005 corresponding to sales of telecom equipment and maintenance services.

Lucent said in Thursday's filing that it's too early to determine whether these matters will have a material impact on the company's business.

-By Nicolas Brulliard; Dow Jones Newswires; 202-862-1351; nicolas.brulliard@ dowjones.com

Lucent Gets Subpoenas (STREET)

By TSC Staff

TheStreet.com, August 5, 2005

Lucent (LU:NYSE - news - research) was subpoenaed in an ongoing government probe of a federal program to provide schools and libraries with Internet access.

The Murray Hill, N.J., company said in a Securities and Exchange Commission filing Thursday afternoon that it got subpoenas in two separate matters during the quarter ended June 30. The company indicated that one was a Justice Department inquiry into the so-called federal E-rate program. Lucent said it must produce documents before a federal grand jury in Georgia.

The second subpoena relates to a federal investigation into certain sales to the federal government of telecommunications equipment and related maintenance services, Lucent said. The company said it "is too early for us to determine whether either of these matters will have a material effect on our business, financial position, results of operations or cash flows."

Lucent's former corporate offspring Avaya (AV:NYSE - news - research) got similar subpoenas in May, the Record of Hackensack, N.J., reported. Avaya was spun out of Lucent in 2000.

On Thursday, Lucent slipped a nickel to $2.88.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

There's A $500 Energy-conservation Prize Waiting For You In The New Federal Energy Bill (KRT)

By Andres R. Martinez

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - Making energy-efficient improvements to your home could net you a $500 rebate from the government.

The offer's buried in the 1,724-page energy bill that President Bush has said he'll sign next week. It gives consumers a credit off the bottom line of their 2006 or 2007 taxes equal to 10 percent of their energy-saving purchases. The maximum over the two years is $500 and applies to any owner-occupied home or condominium. It's probably a good deal for you, although it's pretty complicated.

Home energy conservation experts say you'll make the most out of the tax credit - and save even more on home energy costs in the long run - with the following approach.

First, pull together your utility bills and figure out what you're spending on energy now. If you have a neighbor with a similar residence, ask what he or she is spending on utilities. If you're a lot higher, you've got a lot to save. Note that if you're in a condo, you'll be eligible for a pro-rated share of any building upgrades.

For most homeowners, the fastest way to earn the rebate - plus long-haul savings - is a "no-brainer," said home energy auditor Lee O'Neil, president of NSpects of Chantilly, Va.: "Have the air sealing (draft protection) and attic insulation done."

This work is relatively cheap - $2,000 to $3,000 for an average single-family home - compared with five times that for replacing old windows. Moreover, the small print of the new law lets homeowners deduct up to $300 for insulation and eliminating drafts, which is what air sealing is all about. The maximum deduction for new windows is $200.

How good a deal this or any other energy-conservation outlay is for you depends on three factors: how much energy you're wasting, how much the improvement costs and how much savings you'll net.

The Environmental Protection Agency helps you figure this out with a nifty interactive Web site that asks you to describe your home, right down to the direction it faces, the window area on each side and the kinds of appliances you've got. It doesn't ask your latitude, which it gets from your ZIP code, but it asks you to detail your energy spending. Ultimately, it comes up with the ways that you can save the most.

The site is http://advisor.lbl.gov/hit/Controller. It's a demanding exercise but more than worth the time - literally.

The new tax rebate applies only to products that are more energy efficient than the minimum federal requirement. Such products bear the government-certified Energy Star label or a 2000 IECC label, indicating that they meet the International Energy Conservation Code.

Among the graded items are windows, heat pumps, water heaters, cooling system components, insulation and doors. For a complete list, go to www.energystar.gov then click on "Products" on the left side.

Energy Star dishwashers, laundry machines and refrigerators qualify for a separate rebate. Dishwashers earn up to $100 based on efficiency, washing machines $100 and refrigerators between $75 and $175. Keep in mind that energy-conserving appliances are often more expensive.

For whatever energy-saving products or services you buy, save your receipts for your taxes, just as you would your charitable deductions. The rebate period begins Jan. 1, 2006, and ends Dec. 31, 2007. You can claim a total of $500 for purchases made between those dates.

Here are some other tips:

-You can still claim a rebate if you replace an Energy Star appliance with another Energy Star appliance. It may not save you much beyond the tax credit, however.

-Don't buy something just because the rebate makes it attractive. "You want an improvement that will save you money over its lifetime in energy costs," said Lowell Ungar, an analyst with the Alliance to Save Energy, a Washington conservation group.

-You may be able to get help from your utility companies. Many offer free advice on-line; some even make house calls.

-If you want independent expert advice, consider getting a certified energy auditor to do a home inspection. It'll cost $300 to $500, though, and that's not covered by the rebate. To find an energy auditor, go to the National Association of State Energy Officials at www.natresnet.org. Click on "Consumer Resources" on the left side.

-Some of the smartest fixes don't cost much money at all. Caulking drafty windows and doors can cut energy costs by 10 percent, according to the U.S. Department of Energy. Yearly maintenance of your heating and cooling systems, which usually costs about $100, can reduce your energy bill by 30 percent or more. Replacing incandescent light bulbs with compact fluorescent ones can cut lighting bills by up to 50 percent, according to the Energy Department. None of these fixes rate a rebate, however.

DOJ_NMG_0002326

For more tips on making your home energy efficient visit: www.eere.energy.gov/consumerinfo/

You can also call the Department of Energy's Information Center for the tips in booklet form. The phone number is 1-877-EERE-INF (1-877-337-3463).

Too Much Pork And Too Little Sugar (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Wow, I am so relieved that Congress has finally agreed on an energy bill. Now that's out of the way, maybe Congress will focus on solving our energy problem.

Sorry to be so cynical, but an energy bill that doesn't enjoin our auto companies to sharply improve their mileage standards is just not serious. This bill is what the energy expert Gal Luft calls "the sum of all lobbies." While it contains some useful provisions, it also contains massive pork slabs dished out to the vested interests who need them least - like oil companies - and has no overarching strategy to deal with the new world.

And the world has changed in the past few years. First, the global economic playing field is being leveled, and millions of people who were out of the game - from China, India and the former Soviet empire - are now walking onto the field, each dreaming of a house, a car, a toaster and a microwave. As they move from low-energy to high-energy consumers, they are becoming steadily rising competitors with us for oil.

Second, we are in a war. It is a war against open societies mounted by Islamo-fascists, who are nurtured by mosques, charities and madrasas preaching an intolerant brand of Islam and financed by medieval regimes sustained by our oil purchases.

Yes, we are financing both sides in the war on terrorism: our soldiers and the fascist terrorists. George Bush's failure, on the morning after 9/11, to call on Americans to accept a gasoline tax to curb our oil imports was one of the greatest wasted opportunities in U.S. history.

Does the energy bill begin to remedy that? Hardly. It doesn't really touch the auto companies, which have used most of the technological advances of the last two decades to make our cars bigger and faster, rather than more fuel-efficient. Congress even rejected the idea of rating tires for fuel efficiency, which might have encouraged consumers to buy the most fuel-efficient treads.

The White House? It blocked an amendment that would have required the president to find ways to cut oil use by one million barrels a day by 2015 - on the grounds that it might have required imposing better fuel economy on our carmakers.

We need a strategic approach to energy. We need to redesign work so more people work at home instead of driving in; we need to reconfigure our cars and mass transit; we need a broader definition of what we think of as fuel. And we need a tax policy that both entices, and compels, U.S. firms to be innovative with green energy solutions. This is going to be a huge global industry - as China and India become high-impact consumers - and we should lead it.

Many technologies that could make a difference are already here - from hybrid engines to ethanol. All that is needed is a gasoline tax of $2 a gallon to get consumers and Detroit to change their behavior and adopt them. As Representative Edward Markey noted, auto fuel economy peaked at 26.5 miles per gallon in 1986, and "we've been going backward every since" - even though we have the technology to change that right now. "This is not rocket science," he rightly noted. "It's auto mechanics."

It's also imagination. "During the 1973 Arab oil embargo Brazil was importing almost 80 percent of its fuel supply," notes Mr. Luft, director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security. "Within three decades it cut its dependence by more than half. ... During that period the Brazilians invested massively in a sugar-based ethanol industry to the degree that about a third of the fuel they use in their vehicles is domestically grown. They also created a fleet that can accommodate this fuel." Half the new cars sold this year in Brazil will run on any combination of gasoline and ethanol. "Bringing hydrocarbons and carbohydrates to live happily together in the same fuel tank," he added, "has not only made Brazil close to energy independence, but has also insulated the Brazilian economy from the harming impact of the current spike in oil prices."

The new energy bill includes support for corn-based ethanol, but, bowing to the dictates of the U.S. corn and sugar lobbies (which oppose sugar imports), it ignores Brazilian-style sugar-based ethanol, even though it takes much less energy to make and produces more energy than corn-based ethanol. We are ready to import oil from Saudi Arabia but not sugar from Brazil.

The sum of all lobbies. ...

It seems as though only a big crisis will force our country to override all the cynical lobbies and change our energy usage. I thought 9/11 was that crisis. It sure was for me, but not, it seems, for this White House, Congress or many Americans. Do we really have to wait for something bigger in order to get smarter?

DOJ_NMG_0002327

Indians Continue Wait For Accounts' Resolution (WP)

By Evelyn Nieves

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

BROWNING, Mont. -- Nine years have ticked away since Elouise Cobell sued the government on behalf of as many as 500,000 Native Americans whose land the United States was supposed to manage. But the end of what has become the longest, largest class action lawsuit against the federal government remains nowhere in sight.

Sometimes, when Cobell returns home here to the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in northwest Montana from Washington, where the case is being heard in U.S. District Court, she feels buoyed by a development she thinks might help settle the case once and for all. But the feeling is fleeting.

Last week, a major court victory was still fresh; Judge Royce C. Lamberth had issued his most scathing critique of the Interior Department's handling of the Indians and the case. Lamberth cited Interior's "mismanagement, falsification, spite and obstinate litigiousness," among other failings, and his disgust was palpable.

"Perhaps Interior's past and present leaders have been evil people, deriving their pleasure from inflicting harm on society's most vulnerable," he wrote in the extraordinary, 34-page July 12 ruling, which agreed with the plaintiffs' claim that the department's information was unreliable.

But Cobell was preoccupied by a bill to settle the case that was introduced July 20 by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Byron L. Dorgan (N.D.), chairman and ranking Democrat, respectively, of the Indian Affairs Committee. The bill, which the senators called "a starting point," was far from the remedy Indian leaders had hoped for, Cobell said. And she testified to that point.

"This bill proposes a formula for accounting that looks at the trust records from 1980 to 2005," Cobell said when she returned here from testifying. "The judge has already ruled that Interior has to make an accounting going back to the beginning."

Cobell v. Norton (for Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton) dates to 1996, but the complicated debacle some members of Congress have likened to a "Federal Enron" traces its origins back more than a hundred years.

Under a forced arrangement, in 1887 the government divided much tribal land across the country, which it had not already taken, into separate, private allotments for Indians. It then leased individuals' land, which ranged from 40 to 160 acres, usually to oil, gas, timber, grazing or coal interests. The Treasury Department placed the fees into a trust and was -- and remains -- responsible for doling out checks to the individual Indian trust beneficiaries.

But from the beginning, the plaintiffs say -- and the government has conceded until recently -- the basic recordkeeping for these lands was botched.

In 1994, six years after Congress began oversight hearings into the mismanagement of Indian trusts going back for decades, it passed a law ordering a special trustee to monitor the accounting of the trusts and creating a plan for reforming the system. The 1996 lawsuit followed after the first special trustee resigned in protest of what he said were attempts to obstruct his efforts to reconcile accounts.

Norton and her predecessor, Bruce Babbitt, have said it is impossible to provide a full historical accounting of the trusts -- there are said to be about 300,000 accounts, incorporating perhaps 500,000 individual beneficiaries, with combined balances in the trust of $500 million to $800 million.

But Interior officials say that as they perform a historical accounting of the trusts ordered by Lamberth -- an effort costing $100 million so far -- their research, performed by using statistical sampling, has shown that the trust holders are owed little for their land. "If you use the facts that we have found so far in the accounting process, the number would be very, very low," James E. Cason, the associate deputy secretary for the Interior, told the Indian Affairs Committee last month.

"In court, the plaintiffs seek a historical accounting but are now working hard to prevent that accounting from occurring," Cason added. "In Congress, they argue against providing funding for that accounting; in court, they argue that the accounting is impossible. . . . Instead of an accounting, they want lots of money."

This stance, fairly new in the history of the lawsuit, infuriates the plaintiffs. What they object to, they say, is the Interior Department's taking money from already underfunded Indian health and education programs to fund its defense against the lawsuit. And they say Interior is basing its accounting on records that date only since 1985.

Interior officials say the Indians keep shifting their figures on the amount of money the government owes them -- from more than $100 billion at one point to, most recently, $27.5 billion (the figure the plaintiffs announced in June as acceptable to settle the case). But the plaintiffs say their figure has changed because as court testimony from Interior officials and court findings have shown, no one can be sure what is owed to trust holders.

Last week the plaintiffs pleaded with the judge to keep computers holding trust data shut down. They argued that the information remained as vulnerable to hackers as it was four years ago, when Lamberth ordered a shutdown of all computers in the Interior Department after an Inspector General's report showed that a computer hacker could move or change trust account balances with ease. The judge has not yet ruled on the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0002328

From the start of the Indian trusts, accounting has been a problem. Allotment holders would receive Treasury checks with no additional paperwork. They were not told who leased their land, what it was used for, how much was used, or the price the company paid for obtaining the land's oil, timber or other resource. Allottees complained that they received checks -- sometimes for as little as 2 cents -- that the government did not explain. Many say that practice continues.

Recent history has also revealed problems.

In 1999, Treasury's financial management office destroyed 162 boxes of trust documents as Interior officials were telling the court they were searching for the records. A court-appointed master assigned to oversee the preservation production of documents found that Treasury violated ethical rules for not reporting the documents' destruction for 16 months. He called the trust system "clearly out of control."

In a ruling in 1999 ordering Interior to make a full accounting of the trust, Lamberth declared that "it would be difficult to find a more historically mismanaged federal program."

In 2001, after a 19-month investigation, a federal monitor assigned to provide the judge with assessments of Interior's representations called the department's efforts to provide an accounting in compliance with his order a sham marked by unrealistic responses and evasion.

Last month, when McCain and Dorgan introduced their bill on the Senate floor, Dorgan said: "The Cobell litigation has brought to light a very disturbing problem: The federal government may not know the proper balances of these accounts nor have sufficient documentation to determine the value of these accounts."

The government acknowledges one failure of recordkeeping. As original allotment holders died and their land was inherited by more and more heirs, the paperwork involved in keeping track of beneficiaries proved onerous. Nearly 50,000 active accounts, with a balance of nearly $74 million, languish because, the government says, the beneficiaries' "whereabouts are unknown."

Cobell, a banker and accountant, said her husband began receiving trust checks a year ago with no documentation. "He doesn't know what they're for," she said, "but he was told they go back from three years ago. He was one of those 'whereabouts unknown,' though we've lived here forever."

Interior has appealed every major ruling in the case. Last week, it appealed Lamberth's July 12 order, in which he ordered Interior to include notices in its correspondence with Indians whose land the government holds in trust, warning them that the government's information may not be credible. Interior was issued a stay pending a ruling next month.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Compton To Crack Down On Gangs, Officials Tell Forum (LAT)

By Megan Garvey

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

Compton officials — joined by an array of community activists and religious leaders — announced Thursday that they plan to seek gang injunctions and start offering rewards of $500 or more for information leading to arrests and convictions, measures intended to help stem this year's rapidly rising homicide count.

Addressing a standing-room-only crowd in the City Council chambers, Mayor Eric J. Perrodin said his community would not tolerate continued violence.

"We are putting criminals and gang members on notice: It's time to pack your bags. Crime is not accepted in Compton," he said.

He told residents that the city also was planning to aggressively pursue abatement of drug houses and rundown properties, and would renew its focus on gang intervention programs.

The meeting was held the night after Michael Buchanan, 18, of Los Angeles was shot to death about 11 p.m. as he walked to his parked car on Evers Avenue.

Buchanan's death was the third slaying in the last week and the city's 43rd this year — more than all of last year. At least another four killings have occurred in unincorporated areas within blocks of the city limits.

At the current pace, Compton's homicide rate would far surpass recent highs in major American cities.

The killings, which have come alongside a rise in gang-related shootings, have residents fearful.

Thursday night, people filled every seat. Some stood in the back or sat on steps or benches outside and listened to the meeting over loudspeakers.

DOJ_NMG_0002329

The panel, seated at tables that stretched the width of the room, was made up of City Council members; officials from the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, which patrols Compton; representatives of Los Angeles County Superior Court; nonprofit organizers; pastors; a priest; and ministers from the Nation of Islam.

"We've buried so many children, we've just buried so many children," said Father Stan Bosch, a pastor at Our Lady of Victory/Sacred Heart Church in Compton, his voice trembling. "But I believe we are the hope."

Speaking of racial tensions in the city of 96,000, where Latinos now outnumber African Americans, Bosch said the community needed to reach across ethnic barriers. "I really believe there is healing when we let those boundaries drop and we know each other by name — not by gang name, but by Bobby and Billy and Pedro."

The forum, called Making Neighborhoods Safer, was billed as a chance for community members to offer ideas to prevent and solve crime.

The variety of questions underscored a long list of problems troubling Compton residents, including gang violence, prostitution, graffiti and a lack of guidance or jobs for young people.

But it also revealed many long-standing tensions between the community and law enforcement: the desire of residents to see criminals arrested and prosecuted, the fear of possible police abuse and the hope that their young people can instead be steered in the right direction.

Minister Tony Muhammad, the West Coast representative of the Nation of Islam, expressed concerns about any get-tough approach to crime, cautioning that many young black men wrongly fall into broad concepts of what gang members look like.

He also questioned deputies' difficulties in solving homicides in the community, given that fewer than a dozen arrests have been made in connection with this year's slayings.

"Let an officer get killed, they catch the shooter in eight hours," Muhammad said. "But a brown or black brother get killed and you can't find anyone who'd talk to you? Watch out, Compton."

Other speakers said that their focus now lay primarily with the victims and that strong action was needed.

"We've got to stop playing with these people and get them off the street," said Royce Esters, president of the civil rights group National Assn. for Equal Justice in America.

"They're killing our sons and daughters. We've got to stop fooling around. I'm saying we need a multitask force, we need the FBI, ATF, the DEA to come in here," Esters said.

Capt. Eric Hamilton, who heads the Compton sheriff's station, said that some of those agencies were at work in the community and that he was open to more partnerships.

But he said that such agencies had come into Compton before without lasting change.

"In my opinion the key is the folks who are out here," he said, gesturing to the audience. "What are you going to do? It's terrible that we've had these murders, terrible. But if you're just here for the dialogue, then it's just an exercise."

The Cancer In Compton (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

The city of Compton has a chance this year to return to the top of the charts — but not with the rap songs that once put the city on the map. With 42 homicides so far in 2005, Compton is on a pace to displace New Orleans as the nation's murder capital.

As always, condemnation of the violence is widespread, as is agreement that something must be done to stop it. And as always, the hard question is what exactly that something is.

At its current pace, Compton, which has about 96,000 residents, would have a murder rate of about 7.5 per 10,000 residents this year. (In New Orleans, there were about 5.6 homicides last year for every 10,000 residents.) The Sheriff's Department, which has been under contract to police Compton since its municipal force was disbanded five years ago, attributes the rise to increased activity among Compton's numerous gangs. Authorities also worry that violence in Compton could spread to many of the surrounding neighborhoods of Los Angeles after a hard-won decrease in violent crime throughout the city.

It's clear that Compton needs more police; it has about 70 officers patrolling an area roughly the size of the LAPD's Southeast Division, which has triple the force. Yet Compton, which spends more than $12 million on its Sheriff's Department contract, is cash-strapped, and federal grants for public safety are increasingly scarce. Moreover, even if the city were to receive more money, Compton's police would still have to win over residents worried about their professionalism. It was only three months ago that deputies shot 120 times at an unarmed suspect in a residential neighborhood.

As justified as their suspicions may be, however, the people of Compton must also realize that a larger force, with better-trained officers, would make their community safer. All parties in Compton — including the police and the City Council — should resist the temptation to bicker and be prepared to work together.

The Sheriff's Department should work harder to recruit deputies who are Compton residents or have a vested interest in the community. The community should be more willing to cooperate with law enforcement in helping to solve crimes.

Mutual trust between the police and the community is key to successful gang prevention and mentorship programs similar to those in Inglewood and East Palo Alto.

First Lady Laura Bush has spoken eloquently about the importance of giving teenagers, especially boys, more hope and greater opportunities. Her focus on the problem is refreshing, but the administration must go beyond rhetoric. Even a modest increase in federal and state gang-prevention programs would help cities such as Compton become safer and better places to live.

It is the larger community — and by that we mean the city and the region — that must acknowledge that gang violence is not merely a local problem but a societal one.

School Employees Charged In Drug Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

A federal grand jury in Miami has returned an 84-count indictment charging 29 persons, mostly Miami-Dade County Public Schools employees, with conspiracy to possess the pain killer OxyContin with the intent to distribute and to obtain the drug with counterfeit or fraudulent prescriptions.

Named in the indictment are a doctor from Miami-Dade County, five county school bus drivers, 13 county school bus attendants, two county school custodians, a cook, a county school cashier and a former county school bus driver. Five unspecified persons also were indicted.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) spokesman Garrison K. Courtney said the indictment also includes charges of health care fraud and conspiracy to commit health care fraud.

"The DEA is committed to working with our local counterparts in combating the drug dealers who stalk this community and endanger the welfare and safety of our children," said DEA agent Mark R. Trouville, who heads the agency's Miami field division.

"We will continue to make federal resources available for Miami-Dade County and other communities to help curb the flow of drugs in their neighborhoods and to protect our children," he said. "DEA has zero tolerance for drug traffickers who work with or around our children."

According to the indictment, handed up July 29 but made public yesterday, beginning in January 2003, three of the suspects recruited others, some of whom were Miami-Dade schools employees, to participate in the conspiracy by providing their insurance identification information.

The indictment says some obtained prescriptions for OxyContin that were medically unnecessary from a co-defendant who is a physician. At a later date, some of those charged forged and counterfeited prescriptions for OxyContin using a variety of insurance identification information.

Some of those charged, the indictment says, presented the forged and counterfeit prescriptions at pharmacies in Miami-Dade and Broward counties to obtain OxyContin. They are accused of selling the filled prescriptions for cash.

In addition, the indictment says, others submitted insurance claims to UnitedHealth Group, fraudulently claiming reimbursement for the cost of the prescriptions. It says nearly 100 forged, counterfeit or medically unnecessary prescriptions for the prescription OxyContin -- accounting for thousands of OxyContin tablets -- were presented to the pharmacies.

"Public school employees hold special positions of trust," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta, whose office will prosecute the case. "They serve as role models for our children. Their actions, as much as their words, teach what is right and what is wrong.

"There is no evidence here that these individuals distributed controlled substances to children in their care. These school employees are charged, however, with violating federal drug laws, and that is something that we in Dade County cannot tolerate in our school employees."

Mr. Courtney said each of those charged faces 20 years in prison and $1 million fines, if convicted.

29 Charged In OxyContin Ring At School (FINDLAW/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, August 5, 2005

(AP) - MIAMI-School bus drivers, attendants and other co-workers were charged by federal prosecutors Thursday with taking part in an illegal drug ring involving the powerful painkiller OxyContin.

According to the indictment, Miami-Dade school employees were among 29 people who used more than 100 forged or fraudulent prescriptions to obtain thousands of tablets of OxyContin from South Florida pharmacies.

No teachers were involved, and there was no evidence of drug sales to children, U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said.

The school workers were recruited to use their health-insurance cards as part of the scheme, prosecutors said.

DOJ_NMG_0002331

Of those charged in the grand jury indictment, five are Miami-Dade school bus drivers, 13 are school bus attendants and one is a former school bus driver now driving a city bus. Two school custodians, a cook and a cashier were also charged, along with a Miami doctor and five other people.

Miami-Dade school officials had no immediate comment on the 84-count indictment, which came days before classes begin Monday.

Those charged face up to 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine for each count of possession of OxyContin with intent to distribute, as well as additional prison time for fraud charges, prosecutors said.

OxyContin is legal if prescribed for treatment of severe chronic pain. But it has become an increasing problem on the black market because crushing the time-release tablets and snorting or injecting the powder yields an immediate, heroin-like high. Hundreds of deaths are blamed each year on overdoses.

On the Net:

http://www.dadeschools.net

22 School Employees Arrested In OxyContin Scheme (MH)

By Luisa Yanez

The Miami Herald, August 5, 2005

Miami-Dade School bus drivers, custodians, a cook and a cashier were among the 29 people arrested today for taking part in a scheme to sell the powerful painkiller OxyContin on the street, the U.S. Attorney's Office announced.

"We have no evidence that children or teachers were involved in this scheme," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. ``But these are not the type of people we want around our children."

Joseph Garcia, a spokesman for Miami-Dade schools, said the district learned of the arrests, and the nearly two-year investigation, today. Monday is the first day of school in Miami-Dade County.

"First, we're shocked, then we're grateful that these people were arrested before the start of the school year," Garcia said.

He said disciplinary action will begin immediately against the 22 school employees.

Of those charged in the early morning round-up, five were school bus drivers, 13 were bus attendants, two were custodians, one cook and one a school cashier, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. A Miami doctor and five others were also charged.

The scheme worked something like this:

The school employees were recruited to go to a doctor and use their name and insurance to purchase prescriptions for OxyContin. The doctor was on the take.

The employees then sold the prescriptions to a contact, who then resold the tablets to a street dealer. The tablets were sold on the street for as much as $80 apiece.

OxyContin is legal if prescribed for treatment of chronic pain.

Miami-Dade police the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement took part in the investigation.

22 Miami-Dade School Workers Face Charges For Selling Oxycodone (FLSUNSEN)

By Ihosvani Rodriguez, Miami Bureau

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, August 5, 2005

Federal agents on Thursday rounded up 22 Miami-Dade County school system employees accused of being part of a prescription drug ring that illegally obtained and sold thousands of tablets of the painkiller oxycodone since 2003.

Officials found no evidence the school employees sold the drug to students or used the highly addictive painkillers at work. The employees included five bus drivers, 13 bus attendants, a cook, two custodians and a cashier. A Miami-Dade transit bus driver who was arrested worked previously as a school bus driver.

Authorities unsealed a federal grand jury indictment on Thursday that contained a total of 84 counts against 29 people. The lengthy list of charges includes conspiracy to distribute oxycodone and committing health-care fraud.

Among those charged was a Miami-Dade doctor arrested last year for writing illegal prescriptions for the drug commonly known by its commercial name, OxyContin. Prosecutors said no teachers were involved in the plot.

Investigators said they rushed to make the arrests before next week's start of the school year and expect more arrests to follow, U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said.

"We needed to take action quickly," Acosta said.

DOJ_NMG_0002332

Officials with Miami Dade Schools said they plan to place the employees on administrative leave and replace them before next week.

Schools spokesman Joseph Garcia said there was no indication the bus drivers were under the influence of drugs while working. He said drivers must take a drug test before employment and after an accident and also submit to random drug tests.

A central figure in the case was Dr. Ronald E. Harris, prosecutors said. Authorities identified Harris last year as Florida's top prescriber of OxyContin to Medicaid patients. He was charged last year with drug trafficking after selling undercover police officers 10 OxyContin prescriptions without proof of any medical need. He is awaiting trial.

Officials with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration said Harris' arrest prompted their investigation of the school system employees.

Investigators said the operation was traced back to January 2003, when Harris began selling prescriptions to Ian Stuart and Johnny Blocker, identified as the ring's leaders. Blocker, a bus attendant, paid colleagues for their school employee insurance information to obtain and pay for the prescription drugs, authorities said.

The ringleaders paid school employees up to $100 per prescription, and up to $400 if they went to the pharmacy to obtain the pills personally, said the DEA's special agent-in-charge, Mark Trouville. Most of the prescriptions were filled in the Hollywood and Hallandale areas. Employees then sold the pills to a street dealer, who resold them for as much as $80 a pill.

Altogether, more than 100 forged or medically unnecessary prescriptions for OxyContin were presented to pharmacies, the indictment says. The school system's insurance company, UnitedHealth Group, doled out more than $50,000 to pay for the drugs, according to the indictment.

OxyContin, prescribed for chronic pain, has become a huge force in the black market in recent years. Abusers usually crush the tablets and either snort or inject the powder for an immediate, heroin-like high.

A report released in June by the Florida Medical Examiners Commission said 340 Floridians died from oxcodone overdoses in 2004. The figures include 48 deaths in Broward, 35 in Palm Beach County and 11 in Miami-Dade.

School Workers Charged In Drug Ring Bust (CNN.com)

CNN.com, August 5, 2005

MIAMI (CNN) -- Federal officials on Thursday arrested 29 people in the Miami-Dade County area, including a number of low-level school employees, and charged them with attempting to obtain the narcotic OxyContin to distribute it.

Among the school employees arrested were five bus drivers, 13 bus attendants, two custodians, a cook and a cashier.

The others include a former school bus driver who now is a Miami-Dade County Transit bus driver, a doctor, a sheet metal worker and four others.

"There is no evidence here that these individuals distributed controlled substances to children in their care," said R. Alexander Acosta, U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Florida. "These school employees are charged, however, with violating federal drug laws, and that is something that we in Dade County cannot tolerate in our school employees."

OxyContin is a form of the narcotic analgesic oxycodone.

In an 84-count indictment, a federal grand jury in Miami charged them with "conspiracy to possess oxycodone with the intent to distribute and to obtain oxycodone with counterfeited or fraudulent prescriptions, health care fraud and conspiracy to commit health care fraud."

In all, about 100 phony prescriptions were filled at 50 pharmacies in Miami-Dade and Broward counties, representing thousands of pills believed to have been sold on the street, said Alicia Valle, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney in Miami.

She said none of the pills, which one defendant claimed to have sold for as much as $34 apiece, has been confiscated.

Officials allege that, beginning around January 2003, three defendants recruited the others to join in the conspiracy by providing their insurance identification information.

"At a later date, some defendants forged and counterfeited prescriptions for OxyContin using their own and their co-defendants' insurance identification information," officials said.

Defendants submitted insurance claims to United Health Group, seeking reimbursement for the drug's cost to a tune of about $50,000, the indictment alleges.

One defendant, a Miami doctor identified as Ronald Eugene Harris, has been charged with writing prescriptions that were medically unnecessary.

Authorities say he dropped out of the scheme, and the other defendants changed their modus operandi, stealing prescriptions from another unnamed physician and forging them. The second doctor has not been charged.

Harris last year voluntarily relinquished his license and agreed never to reapply for it, according to the Web site of the Florida Department of Health.

DOJ_NMG_0002333

The accused could face maximum penalties of up to 20 years in prison and a $1 million fine for each count of possession with intent to distribute.

The narcotic has been blamed for 340 deaths last year in Florida, 11 of them in Miami.

Selig Renews Call For Tougher Rule On Steroids Users (NYT)

By Duff Wilson

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Baseball Commissioner Bud Selig renewed his call yesterday for tougher penalties for players caught using steroids and for independent administration of the game's drug-testing program.

At the same time, a leader of the House Committee on Government Reform, which held nationally televised hearings earlier this year about the issue of steroid use, pressed for an outside investigation into the history of the problem in baseball.

Selig's statement, in a news release, appeared to be designed to put pressure on the Major League Baseball Players Association, which had balked at his proposal in April for a "three-strikes-and-you're-out" steroids policy. Selig made his recommendation in a letter on April 25 to Donald Fehr, executive director of the union.

Fehr had said that the existing program, established in January when the union agreed to reopen the collective bargaining agreement, needed time to work. He said that further changes should be negotiated in the collective bargaining process.

He had no comment on Selig's statement yesterday. Fehr has been traveling around the country to meet with players to talk about a variety of issues, including Selig's proposal. Union officials are expected to meet with management before the end of the month.

This week's suspension of Rafael Palmeiro, one of four players with more than 3,000 hits and 500 home runs, has allowed Selig to renew his push. Palmeiro tested positive for stanozolol, a powerful, short-acting steroid, according to a person in baseball with direct knowledge of the test result. That person did not want to be identified because of confidentiality provisions in the testing policy.

In March, Palmeiro testified to Congress that he had never used steroids. On Wednesday, Palmeiro said through his agent that there was another side to this story that he would tell soon.

Henry A. Waxman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House committee, endorsed Selig's call for tougher penalties and independent administration of testing.

"However, I'm disappointed that he isn't trying to find out how this scandal was allowed to happen," Waxman said in a telephone interview. "I think we need a thorough, broad and independent investigation so that we can restore baseball's credibility."

Selig has been considering an in-depth investigation, like the Dowd Report on Pete Rose and gambling in baseball, to try to get to the bottom of the steroids scandal. Congressional leaders indicated in April that they would defer their own plans for an examination of past steroid use if the leaders of the game appointed an independent investigator.

"I'm waiting to hear back from them on that," Waxman said. "I think the Palmeiro matter has even made a greater urgency for this to happen."

Richard Levin, a spokesman for Selig, said yesterday that he had not heard of any progress in the possibility of baseball investigating past steroid use. "The last I heard it was put on hold, and I haven't heard anything since then," Levin said.

Philip Schiliro, chief of staff for Waxman and the Democrats on the committee, said, "As far as we understood, baseball is continuing to think about it, the union is continuing to think about it, and Congressman Waxman's view is that right now is the time to do it."

Waxman said he would still consider having Congressional staff members investigate the matter if baseball leaders failed to do so. But he added that he had not talked about the subject this week with Tom Davis, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the committee. A spokesman for Davis said he would not have any comment yesterday.

Such an investigation could determine whether some of the game's most hallowed records, including the single-season home run mark set by Mark McGwire and broken by Barry Bonds, were tainted.

Anabolic steroids enhance size, strength, endurance and recovery. Their use is illegal under baseball rules and federal law. Yesterday, the Baltimore Orioles, at Palmeiro's request, canceled a ceremony planned for Aug. 14 to honor him for reaching 3,000 career hits.

Waxman pointed to an interview in The Philadelphia Inquirer yesterday in which Joe Morgan, a highly respected Hall of Famer and an ESPN announcer, blasted steroid users and said the game had tolerated and profited from the abuses during the long-ball era after the 1994 strike. He dismissed the idea that modern power-hitting records could be designated with a footnote about drug use.

DOJ_NMG_0002334

"There's not a big enough asterisk to handle all of this," Morgan was quoted as saying, adding, "If you are going to let people into the Hall who have done steroids, then you have to let Pete Rose in, because this has hurt baseball more than what Pete did."

Selig is proposing discipline of 50 games for a first offense, 100 games for a second offense and a lifetime ban for a third offense. The same penalties are proposed for all professional sports by the Drug Free Sports Act, which passed the House Committee on Energy and Commerce on June 29 and awaits further action by Congress. Under the current policy, a player is suspended 10 days for a first offense, 30 for a second, 60 for a third and a year for a fourth. The penalty for a fifth offense could be a lifetime ban.

Eight major league players have been suspended for steroid use this year.

"While I believe the suspensions show that the current program is working, they underscore the need for an even tougher policy," Selig said in his statement yesterday. "There is a deeper issue confronting baseball. It is the integrity of the game and that transcends the viability of the current program."

The statement also said baseball should turn over the administration of its program to an independent authority.

"The intensity that I feel about this issue is greater today than it has ever been," the statement said, "and the time is past due for the Players Association to accept my proposal to eliminate steroids and other performance-enhancing substances from our game."

Selig Urges Acceptance Of Tougher Steroids Policy (USAT)

By Hal Bodley

USA Today, August 5, 2005

Commissioner Bud Selig on Thursday used the high-profile 10-day suspension of Baltimore Orioles first baseman Rafael Palmeiro this week to urge the players union to accept his April 25 proposal calling for a strong steroids testing program.

Selig said in a statement he is saddened by this week's violations — Seattle pitcher Ryan Franklin was also suspended for 10 days — "but they underscore the need for an even tougher policy. There is a deeper issue confronting baseball. It is the integrity of the game and that transcends the viability of the current program."

Palmeiro, one of only four players to reach 3,000 hits and 500 home runs, was suspended on Monday after testing positive for the powerful steroid stanozolol, a baseball person familiar with the process told USA TODAY. Another person familiar with the testing program said the test took place in the second week of May.

Stanozolol, known by its brand name Winstrol, is a strength-building steroid that can be ingested or injected, but is not available in over-the-counter supplements.

Selig, in Thursday's statement, said "there exists some doubt in the public sector about our sincerity in eliminating steroids from the game. That is wrong. We must create an understanding everywhere that when we say we need to rid the game of steroids, we mean it.

"The best way is to put in place the program that I proposed to the Players Association more than three months ago. We must increase the levels of discipline to 50 games for a first offense, 100 games for a second and a lifetime ban for a third. And, probably most important, we must turn over the administration of our program to an independent authority to, once and for all, end the debate about the transparency of our policy.

"The intensity that I feel about this issue is greater today than it has ever been and the time is past due for the Players Association to accept my proposal to eliminate steroids and other performance-enhancing substances from our game."

Union chief Don Fehr, who has been polling major leaguers about Selig's proposal, has yet to respond publicly to the commissioner's request.

Selig Calls For Stricter Tests (LAT)

By Tim Brown

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

Commissioner Bud Selig called again for stricter drug testing in baseball Thursday, attempting to pressure the players' union into acceding to his plan for a three-strikes-and-you're-out policy.

In the wake of this week's high-profile suspensions of Baltimore Oriole first baseman Rafael Palmeiro and Seattle Mariner pitcher Ryan Franklin, the commissioner's office issued a three-paragraph release that read, in part:

"The intensity that I feel about this issue is greater today than it has ever been and the time is past due for the Players' Association to accept my proposal to eliminate steroids and other performance-enhancing substances from our game."

Union chief Don Fehr has been meeting with players and team player representatives for much of the summer, in part to discuss the possibility of a new policy.

DOJ_NMG_0002335

The collective-bargaining agreement expires after the 2006 season but the joint drug-prevention and treatment program runs through 2008.

Shortly after a March congressional hearing at which the current policy was roundly criticized as too lenient, Selig said he would champion a program in which the progression of positive tests would result in suspensions of 50 games, 100 games and a lifetime ban.

A first positive under the existing plan, which was instituted only five months ago, results in a 10-day suspension. Eight major leaguers have been suspended, as have 78 minor leaguers, who serve a 15-game penalty for a first-time offense.

Selig did not mention Palmeiro specifically. On Thursday, the Orioles announced that a pregame ceremony scheduled for Aug. 14 celebrating his 3,000th hit would not be held, per Palmeiro's request.

Joe Foss, Oriole vice chairman and chief operating officer, said in a statement, "Given the circumstances, the club is in agreement with Rafael's wish to not move forward with the ceremonies."

The prominence of Palmeiro, who recently joined Hank Aaron, Willie Mays and Eddie Murray as the only players to have at least 500 home runs and 3,000 hits, has again drawn attention to baseball's policy, however. Many congressional leaders, including members of the House Government Reform Committee, have demanded a more stringent and transparent policy, one that more closely follows the Olympic model.

Congress also is investigating Palmeiro, who tested positive for the steroid stanolozol approximately two months after testifying before the Government Reform Committee that he had never used steroids.

"I am saddened by the recent announcements of violations of baseball's drug program," the statement from Selig read. "Back in March, I said that everyone who tests positive will be suspended and that has come to pass. While I believe the suspensions show that the current program is working, they underscore the need for an even tougher policy. There is a deeper issue confronting baseball. It is the integrity of the game and that transcends the viability of the current program.

"There exists some doubt in the public sector about our sincerity in eliminating steroids from the game. That is wrong. We must create an understanding everywhere that when we say we need to rid the game of steroids, we mean it. The best way is to put in place the program that I proposed to the Players' Association more than three months ago. We must increase the levels of discipline to 50 games for a first offense, 100 games for a second and a lifetime ban for a third. And, probably most important, we must turn over the administration of our program to an independent authority to, once and for all, end the debate about the transparency of our policy."

Baseball, Palmeiro At Odds (BSUN)

By Jeff Barker

The Baltimore Sun, August 5, 2005

Major League Baseball and Rafael Palmeiro continued to snipe at each other over privacy issues in his steroid case Thursday, making it hard to believe it has been only three weeks since baseball bought a congratulatory newspaper ad to mark the Oriole's 3,000th hit.

Baseball seems embarrassed not only that Palmeiro failed a steroid test, but that his abbreviated explanation - that the drug use was accidental - has quickly become a national punch line.

And it has.

"You can't watch a stand-up comedian without hearing about it," said popular culture expert Robert J. Thompson of Syracuse University. "In the court of public culture, it's automatically-assumed guilt."

The baseball commissioner's office, which has been distancing itself from Palmeiro and his defense, Thursday issued a statement saying the recent steroid-related suspensions of Palmeiro and others show that the sport's drug program needs more teeth.

"While I believe the suspensions show that the current program is working, they underscore the need for an even tougher policy," commissioner Bud Selig said. "There is a deeper issue confronting baseball. It is the integrity of the game, and that transcends the viability of the current program."

Selig has been pushing the Major League Baseball Players Association -so far unsuccessfully -to agree to a new steroids regimen that would include a suspension of 50 games for a first violation, 100 for a second and a lifetime ban for a third offense.

Under the current system, Palmeiro received a suspension of 10 days for an initial violation.

The baseball players union has issues of its own. The union is concerned that baseball, as part of its anti-steroids push, may have violated Palmeiro's privacy rights by leaking information to the media about when Palmeiro failed his drug test and which steroid - it was stanozolol - was uncovered.

Palmeiro's agent, Arn Tellem, has expressed a similar concern, accusing baseball of breaking confidentiality rules and undermining "the integrity" of the drug testing program.

DOJ_NMG_0002336

Thursday, baseball denied breaking any rules.

"No information about this test became public until after Mr. Palmeiro's grievance was fully litigated and decided," Rob Manfred, Major League Baseball executive vice president, said in an e-mailed response to a Sun inquiry. "After the decision, Baseball put out its standard press release and said nothing more. Only the player has been talking about the underlying facts publicly," Manfred said.

Tellem offered no immediate reply. But his office e-mailed a copy of a New York Times article from Wednesday identifying the banned substance found in Palmeiro's system. The newspaper attributed the information to "a person in baseball."

The clear suggestion from Tellem's office was that baseball was behind the leak.

Baseball spokesman Richard Levin has said he doesn't know where the disclosures originated.

Among those interested in the leaks is Rep. Henry Waxman of California, the top-ranking Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, which is examining Palmeiro's case.

Waxman said Thursday that the committee would look into the leaks as it gathered facts broadly in Palmeiro's case.

Palmeiro knew about his failed drug test as he chased his 3,000th hit last month. Baseball took out a full-page ad in USA Today to congratulate him.

On March 17, Palmeiro told the congressional committee he never used steroids. He also asked to join the Zero Tolerance Roundtable, an advisory group comprising steroid experts and representatives from various sports.

"You have to realize he asked us to go on it [the roundtable]. He sent in a request," Waxman said. "I guess his idea of zero tolerance is a little more tolerant than we expected it to be."

Palmeiro Calls Off 3,000th Hit Ceremony (BSUN)

The Baltimore Sun, August 5, 2005

The Orioles announced today that the scheduled pre-game ceremonies on Aug. 14 to honor Rafael Palmeiro's 3,000th hit will not be held at the request of Palmeiro.

"Through his agent, Rafael has specifically requested that the planned event not be held," said Joe Foss, Orioles vice chairman and chief operating officer. "Given the circumstances, the club is in agreement with Rafael's wish to not move forward with the ceremonies."

Palmeiro is serving a 10-day suspension for testing positive for steroids. The Orioles' first baseman is also being investigated for perjury after he denied using steroids in his testimony before a House committee.

Palmeiro can return to the Orioles' lineup on Aug. 11.

Steroids In Baseball: The Palmeiro Furor (5 Letters) (NYT)

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

To the Editor:

Re "Baseball Bars Longtime Star for Steroid Use" (front page, Aug. 2):

If Bud Selig, the baseball commissioner, wants to stop or seriously discourage the use of steroids, the solution is simple. Once a player has tested positive for steroids, that player's records should be erased from the annals of baseball and the opportunity for that player to enter the Hall of Fame should be denied.

Rafael Palmeiro's 10-day suspension is a joke. How much of a deterrent to use steroids is a 10-day suspension? Selig, the players and the fans alike must recognize that cheating is not acceptable and definitely must not be condoned, no matter what the excuse may be.

James E. Mangino

North Haven, Conn., Aug. 3, 2005 ·

To the Editor:

If baseball wanted to make a strong statement about its integrity and its values, it would immediately install Roger Maris in the Hall of Fame.

By doing so, baseball would be saying: "Here is a man who broke a sacred baseball record that stood for 34 years before he broke it, and that then stood for 37 years until it was broken, if indeed it was legitimately broken. He did it with nothing but a bat and his God-given talents."

What a perfect way for baseball to show what sort of man and performance it reveres!

Robert Lukas

Stony Point, N.Y., Aug. 2, 2005 ·

To the Editor:

DOJ_NMG_0002337

The only good thing to come out of the baseball steroid fiasco is the thorough embarrassment suffered by the members of Congress who inserted themselves into this controversy.

There is no federal question here, yet sanctimonious politicians held hearings to give Rafael Palmeiro a platform to heroically deny steroid use, to the chirping approval of Tom Davis and Henry Waxman.

Now their faces are covered with egg, yet they still insist on grasping onto the coattails of popular opinion. They should be laughed right out of the hearing room.

In doing bad, Palmeiro did some good.

Larry Maxcy

Yucca Valley, Calif., Aug. 2, 2005 ·

To the Editor:

Murray Chass ("Stupidity and Steroids Come in Many Forms," On Baseball column, Aug. 3) misses the broader point on the steroids issue. Due diligence, not zealotry, is what motivates the actions of Congress. The current policy requires a minimum of only one mandatory random drug test and possible additional testing per year.

Studies show that more than half a million children nationwide have admitted to using steroids. That's a real problem that, if not addressed immediately, will only continue to grow.

The current testing system does not guarantee that we fully understand the scope of the problem. The public is not notified of what drug an athlete tests positive for. Some drugs are not found in supplements, and there can be no legitimate excuse of unknowing ingestion.

Major League Baseball's testing process is secretive, and the penalties are not stemming the tide of steroid use.

If baseball wants to regain credibility, the players association should accept the recommendations that Commissioner Bud Selig has proposed, as well as allow an independent entity to conduct testing and provide for full transparency.

John Sweeney

Member of Congress

20th District, N.Y.

Washington, Aug. 3, 2005 ·

To the Editor:

Re "Palmeiro Case Centers on Popular Drug" (Sports pages, Aug. 3):

That professional athletes like Rafael Palmeiro are allegedly taking illegal performance-enhancing steroids is regrettable. But to continually hint without proof that dietary supplements are the cause of failed drug screens serves no one.

If there is verifiable information that a dietary supplement contains a substance that is not listed on the label, as some have suggested, the Food and Drug Administration can and should remove that product from the marketplace.

Professional athletes receive training advice from a battery of experts, including physicians and nutritionists. They and their handlers know what substances, including dietary supplements, they can and cannot take without risking their eligibility to compete.

David Seckman

Exec. Dir. and Chief Executive

National Nutritional Foods Assn.

Washington, Aug. 3, 2005

Steroids Guesswork Raises Unintentional Questions (BSUN)

By Peter Schmuck

The Baltimore Sun, August 5, 2005

ANAHEIM, Calif. -- There is an empty locker between Sammy Sosa and Miguel Tejada in the visitors clubhouse at Angel Stadium, and it shouldn't be too difficult to guess whose nameplate was supposed to be above it.

Save the real guessing for Major League Baseball's steroid policy, which was supposed to restore confidence in the sport in the wake of the BALCO scandal and a string of other troubling revelations, but -- with this latest shocking development -- has only generated more questions about the supposed transparency of the upgraded testing program.

The new system does not require baseball officials to identify the offending substance, so we are left to wait for the tawdry details to leak out piecemeal, which is what happened late last night when several publications, citing unnamed sources, reported Rafael Palmeiro's performance-enhancing drug of choice was stanozolol -- a potent steroid that experts doubt could have been ingested accidentally.

DOJ_NMG_0002338

It was another startling body blow for fans who still wanted to believe that Palmeiro was somehow the victim a cruel mistake, but those reports remain unconfirmed and the fact that they are allowed to float around undisputed further diminishes the credibility of whole setup.

Orioles second baseman Brian Roberts pondered the mysteries of the situation yesterday afternoon and summed up what a lot of players were thinking on the day after Palmeiro's impressive career was soiled by the announcement that he tested positive for a banned substance.

"With as much as we know today, you can look at it and say, 'Who knows? Maybe that could have been me,'" Roberts said. "When you're not getting answers about what people are caught for, how do you know?"

It's a fair question.

Palmeiro and agent Arn Tellem hid behind a confidentiality agreement when they were asked on Monday's conference call what substance Palmeiro ingested, making it that much harder to believe his contention that whatever was in his system got there unintentionally. Now, apparently, we know why.

Roberts was not criticizing Palmeiro. Quite the contrary. He was explaining why he and his teammates remain supportive of their tainted teammate, even as the rest of the baseball world seems to be convinced that he's just another steroid cheat delivering the standard steroid cheat excuse.

"Until we start getting answers, I don't believe in accusing someone when I don't have a clue what the facts are," Roberts said. "I guess somebody has the answers, but we don't."

The new drug program does function under a veil of confidentiality, which is intended to protect the privacy of the player, but it defeats the purpose of the supposedly tougher anti-steroid measures if that veil also is used to provide cover for a player who wants to maintain his innocence in the face of a damning test result.

I'm not saying that player is Palmeiro, but the small mathematical possibility that he was the victim of some sort of supplement contamination or labeling mix-up got a lot smaller when people started throwing around the name of the steroid that sunk Olympic gold medal sprinter Ben Johnson in 1988.

Of course, a red flag already had been raised when Palmeiro declined to provide any information to bolster his claim that the steroid violation was unintentional.

"I would feel that he was being much more honest if he explained exactly what happened ... what did you take," said Hall of Famer Jim Palmer. "Major League Baseball and Raffy have a pact, but there is nothing that says the player can't say anything."

Tellem insisted Monday that all parties are bound by a confidentiality pledge, but it's hard to imagine that it would be in anyone's interest to deny a player the right to defend his good name.

"If you're a Hall of Fame player, it only takes a moment to damage your image," Palmer said. "If you took something accidentally, I think you would do anything you could to clarify the situation. I hope he does that. I hope he does it for baseball. I hope he does it for himself."

Baseball's war on performance-enhancing drugs cleared an important public relations hurdle when a superstar player finally tested positive and accepted his 10-game suspension, but wasn't the real goal of the anti-steroid crusade to create a transparent system that restored full public faith in the national pastime?

And if so, why did Monday's stunning announcement still leave us all guessing?

Baseball's 'Live-Player' Era (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Did Rafael Palmeiro use steroids or didn't he? He said he didn't, and the President of the United States says he believes him.

Why should we care? We care because baseball is the "national pastime," and its meticulous rules, lore and personalities have become an ineffable metaphor for life itself in America. We admire magnificent lifetime achievements, and few are more magnificent than that of Baltimore Orioles first baseman Rafael Palmeiro's combined career total of 500 home runs and 3,000 base hits. If you know baseball, you know that is an astounding and rare human feat.

Baseball now has suspended Mr. Palmeiro for using a banned substance, widely believed to be a steroid, and an arbitrator ruled against his appeal. Mr. Palmeiro said it made "no sense" for him to take drugs in the same year he'd arrive at one of baseball's highest plateaus. George W. Bush, who as owner of the Texas Rangers knew Mr. Palmeiro, says, "I believe him."

We don't know whom to believe. We do know that we have become fatigued by the steroids issue -- the debates between libertarians (who cares?) and purists (it ain't fair).

So here's a modest proposal. Baseball's fans know about the "dead-ball" era prior to 1920 and the "live-ball" era that followed. Whatever the much-debated cause, stats before and after were like night and day. So let's designate post-1995 the "live-player" era. Professional sports are now populated with chemicalized robots who are often fun to watch. But they are different than what went before. We can call this the "live-player" era, let the old heroes rest in peace and argue into the night about the new heroes like Mr. Palmeiro.

DOJ_NMG_0002339

National Forest Yields Record Pot Busts (WCAU-TV)

WCAU-TV Philadelphia, August 4, 2005

Northern California forest officials say it's a title they're not proud of.

Video: Pictures From Record Pot Busts In Sequoia National Forest

Slideshow: Pot Grows In Sequoia National Forest

Last year, Sequoia National Forest topped the list for marijuana cultivation on U.S. Forest Service lands. And this year, they are on track to surpass that amount.

But officials have been taking steps to fight the problem, raiding several farms in the past three days.

Miles and miles of lush greenery surround the Sequoia National Forest. But hidden beneath these towering trees is a darker side full of these marijuana plants.

"It's becoming epidemic," says one person familiar with the problem. She says people have grown pot in the forest for more than 30 years.

But the problem has worsened over the last 10 years.

"They go to quite a bit...I mean they will hike everything up there. … I mean it's just amazing."

When officials say that this is big money, they are not kidding.

In fact about a pound of this stuff could yield about $4,000 in California and across the country you'd get up to twice as much.

Over the past week, county and forest authorities have recovered about 34,000 plants, bringing the total street value, to just under $136 million.

"We'd like to think we're making a dent," said one service official. "Obviously for every plant that comes out of the ground we're collecting, that's money that's not going to the drug cartel's hands."

But raids like this one aren't just about taking the drugs off the streets. It's also about helping the forest bounce back.

The pot that was seized was driven to an undisclosed location in the county, where it will be destroyed.

Bush Praises Colombia's Drug War (DMN)

By David Jackson, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas – President Bush on Thursday lauded Colombia's efforts to fight drug cartels and armed guerrillas, though some observers said the Latin American ally has a long way to go.

Welcoming President Alvaro Uribe to his ranch in Crawford, Mr. Bush said the U.S. anti-drug initiative known as Plan Colombia "is producing results" that include lower levels of crime.

"Our two nations are working together to fight drug trafficking and terrorism," Mr. Bush said after the meeting, "and to promote security, democracy and the rule of law throughout the Americas."

Mr. Uribe, considered Mr. Bush's best friend in Latin America, largely for his vocal support of the Iraq war, thanked the U.S. for its help, including more than $4 billion in aid since 2000.

"Colombia faces a threat from terrorism, funded by drug trafficking," Mr. Uribe said. "This is a threat that can affect the entire neighborhood, that can affect our entire continent."

Colombia remains locked in a four-decade war with left-wing guerrillas seeking to topple the government. The government is also trying to dismantle right-wing paramilitary groups that are battling the leftists.

The fighters on both the left and right are backed by the various drug cartels. And all the armed organizations, including government security forces, have been accused of human rights abuses.

"The problems are profound," said John Walsh, a senior associate with the Washington Office on Latin America, which analyzes the impact of foreign policy on human rights. "The war rages on. And the drug trafficking – and the extent to which it funds armed groups – is as strong as ever."

Mr. Uribe is seeking to eliminate the rightist paramilitary groups through an amnesty program called Justice and Peace. But that initiative has been criticized as going easy on people suspected of drug running and murder.

In a recent report, Human Rights Watch stated that, "while a genuine demobilization of paramilitaries is obviously an important objective, the process as currently structured is unlikely to achieve its aims. To the contrary, it is likely to compound the country's problems."

DOJ_NMG_0002340

Mr. Bush did not mention the Justice and Peace plan during his remarks but said that Colombia is interested in protecting human rights. Before Mr. Uribe's visit, the State Department announced that Colombia is meeting the human rights standards necessary to continue receiving full funding of U.S. aid programs.

The two leaders seemed to get on well. Mr. Bush spoke Spanish to the Colombian press corps and later took his counterpart for a spin around the ranch in a presidential pickup. Asked if he had a driver's license, Mr. Bush replied: "Si."

As the two presidents met, analysts said there is little evidence of a slowdown in Colombian cartel production of cocaine and heroin.

A recent report by the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy said that, despite a major aerial spraying campaign, there were more acres of coca production at the end of 2004 than the year before.

Some analysts also pointed out that the American market maintains the Colombian cartels that finance the Colombian wars.

"Anybody who says drug consumption in the United States is a victimless crime hasn't been to Colombia," said Victor Hinojosa, who teaches international politics at Baylor University. "The only law drug traffickers don't break is the law of supply and demand."

Bush Welcomes Colombian Leader (Express-News)

By Gary Martin

The San Antonio Express-News, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD — President Bush pledged continued U.S. aid to fight narco-terrorism in Colombia, telling President Alvaro Uribe on Thursday that success against cocaine traffickers was essential for democracy in the Americas.

"America will continue to stand with the people of Colombia," Bush told a news conference at his Prairie Chapel Ranch here.

And he vowed to push Congress to approve more funds "so Colombia can build on its progress and win its war against the narco-terrorists."

Uribe was in Texas to promote trade and seek additional U.S. aid. He met with Bush at the president's sprawling ranch where the two leaders discussed the violence that has ripped at the heart of the Andean nation for 41 years.

"We have made progress, and we are winning, but we have not won yet," Uribe said in Spanish after the leaders emerged from meetings during the one-day visit.

The news conference came on a day that saw additional U.S. troop fatalities in Iraq, and growing apprehension about the problem-plagued space shuttle Discovery's anticipated return from orbit.

Bush expressed confidence in NASA, just days after he talked with the crew and watched on television the dramatic repairs made to the craft.

"Like a lot of Americans, I was amazed at the procedures that took place," he said.

Terrorism was the theme of comments by Bush and Uribe on Colombia's continued fight with armed groups, some tied to narco-traffickers.

And the president's support for the Colombian government, even without additional aid, is a significant gesture, said Phil McClean with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"It's to keep the momentum going," said McLean, a former deputy assistant secretary of state for South America who once served as chief of mission in Bogota.

The trip to the ranch also was expected to boost Uribe's political standing at home.

Bush rewards allies of the United States with visits to his ranch, and the meeting between the two leaders was seen as a diplomatic plum for Uribe, whose recently passed "Justice and Peace" law has been criticized by human rights groups.

Over 70,000 civilians have been killed in the past 20 years at the hands of Colombia's armed groups. Human rights groups say the most pressing concern is the violence against women, often sexually assaulted and mutilated before being killed.

"Despite, or perhaps because of the administration's close working relationship with Uribe, the U.S. has failed to use its leverage and influence with the Colombian government to ensure an end to human rights violations by the Colombian military," said Dr. William Schulz, Amnesty International USA executive director.

Dr. Victor Hinojosa, an expert on Latin America at Baylor University, said the scope of the violence and death makes Colombia "the great humanitarian crisis no one has heard about."

But Bush used a joint news conference here to applaud Uribe for the progress being made against armed groups in Colombia, including right-wing paramilitaries and the Marxist guerillas tied to the narcotics trade.

Bush said violent crime in Colombia is down to its lowest levels in 16 years, and the number of kidnappings, murders and terrorist attacks have declined significantly.

DOJ_NMG_0002341

"Our strategic partnership is vital to the security, prosperity and freedom of both our countries and the Americas," Bush said.

The United States has sent $3.5 billion in aid to Colombia since 2000 to curb narcotics trafficking and battle with the armed groups accountable for 70 percent of the country's violent deaths.

Earlier this week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice certified Colombia's record on human rights, a measure sought by Congress. The action will release $70 million in funds for programs to combat narco-terrorism.

The Colombian president's trip to Texas included a stop in Houston on Wednesday where he sought foreign investment in the country's burgeoning oil and gas industry.

Uribe spoke to Texas business leaders about the need for growing trade between the two countries to ensure democratic growth in the Andean region.

His meeting with Bush included talks about a free trade agreement, similar to the pact with Central American nations approved by the House of Representatives last week.

He arrived at Bush's ranch in a helicopter. The president and first lady Laura Bush greeted the Colombian couple, shook hands and patted backs before jumping into a Ford 4X4 pickup for a quick trip through the prairie fields and back to the house for meetings and lunch.

The president and first lady served Uribe and wife, Lina, chilled avocado soup, pecan-smoked tenderloin with roasted summer vegetables and a tomato and cucumber salad.

Bush is spending the month of August at his Texas ranch. He will travel to Albuquerque, N.M., on Monday to sign the long-awaited energy bill. The president travels to the Chicago area on Wednesday to sign the transportation bill.

Bush Vows To Sustain Aid For Colombia Drug War (REU)

By Patricia Wilson

Reuters, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas, Aug 4 (Reuters) - U.S. President George W. Bush pledged on Thursday to sustain funding for Colombia's fight against drugs and violence even as a senior State Department official said Washington would like to reduce its anti-narcotics aid.

As a close partner in the region, Colombian President Alvaro Uribe paid a coveted visit to the president's Texas ranch where the two leaders stood side by side on a barren patch of land outside Bush's new office under a blazing sun and declared themselves united in the war on terror.

"We have made progress and we are winning, but we have not won yet," Uribe said. "We cannot leave this task half finished, we must take it all the way to the end."

According to Colombian government figures, killings have declined by 34 percent and kidnappings by 56 percent since Uribe was elected in 2002. Uribe stressed the importance of continuing U.S. cooperation in the four-decades-old conflict with leftist rebels.

The United States has provided more than $3 billion in assistance to Colombia over the past five years as part of an effort to wipe out cocaine and heroin production and crush the long-running leftist insurgency.

A senior State Department official said the United States wanted to reduce its anti-narcotics aid for Bogota after its massive assistance program, Plan Colombia, lapses later this year.

"We would like them to share more of the burden," said the official, who did not want to be identified because the governments had been discussing the assistance in private.

Washington is waiting for Bogota to make a formal request for how much aid it needs following Plan Colombia, the official added.

Critics say the Uribe administration spent hundreds of millions of dollars a year of U.S. aid largely on military hardware and beefing up the armed forces rather than tackling the problems that spawned the guerrilla movements.

BACKING BOGOTA'S STRATEGY

Bush said Bogota's strategy to reduce the illegal drug trade, revitalize Colombia's economy, strengthen its democratic institutions and improve the security of its people was working.

"And we'll ask the Congress to sustain our commitment to follow-on programs for Plan Colombia so Colombia can build on its progress and win its war against the narcoterrorists," Bush told reporters before getting behind the wheel of his white pickup truck to give Uribe a tour of his 1,600-acre (650-hectare) ranch.

Their meeting came in the same week Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice certified Colombia was respecting human rights and distancing itself from paramilitary groups sufficiently to allow U.S. aid to be given to its military.

DOJ_NMG_0002342

The decision means about $62 million can be handed over to Colombia as part of the U.S. government's budgets for the 2004 and 2005 fiscal years that run October to October.

A quarter of U.S. aid for the Colombian military is conditioned on its human rights record. Each year, the United States has certified the funds can be handed over.

Uribe said he and Bush discussed human rights "with great seriousness and with great respect."

"I listened intensely and believe that he is interested in following through ... so that the world will hear loud and clear that Colombia is a nation of law and human rights and human dignity," Bush said. (Additional reporting by Saul Hudson)

Bush Welcomes Colombia's Uribe At Ranch (AP)

By DEB RIECHMANN

The Associated Press, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas (AP) - President Bush gave Colombia President Alvaro Uribe a hearty handshake and several friendly pats on the back as he welcomed him to his Texas ranch on Thursday, a gesture that underscores his closeness with Washington's close Latin America partner.

Drug trafficking, terrorism and trade topped the agenda for the meeting at the ranch where Bush likes to conduct homespun diplomacy away for the formality of the White House and Washington.

For Bush, Uribe's visit on Thursday was a way to bolster the leader of a nation that is fighting terrorists and drug lords and working to build better trade relations with the United States.

For Uribe, the trek to Texas came at a critical moment in Colombia where rebels, funded by narcotics trade, kidnapping and extortion, have been struggling to topple the government and establish a Marxist-style state. Outlawed right-wing paramilitary forces also have been battling the rebels. The 40-year-old conflict kills more than 3,000 people every year, mostly civilians, with allegations that human rights abuses are being committed on all sides.

Uribe was meeting with Bush after recently signing the ``justice and peace'' law, which aims to dismantle paramilitary forces that also are heavily involved in drug trafficking and reintegrate them into the legal side of Colombian society. Critics say the new law goes too easy on criminals.

On his way to his meeting with Bush, Uribe stopped Wednesday in Houston to try to assure foreign investors that his country is stable and brimming with economic opportunity despite civil strife. Colombian officials have been holding meetings in Houston and other cities asking foreign investors to help develop new, unexplored oil fields in the South American country.

``In terms of security, we are winning but we haven't won yet,'' Uribe said in Houston. ``Without security, there is no possibility for investment, for new jobs.''

If official visits are evidence of the closeness of U.S.-Colombia relations, then it's clear the two nations are fast friends. Bush visited Colombia in November 2004, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was in Bogota in April, the department's third-ranking official was in Colombia last week and now Uribe's visit.

Uribe is hoping the United States will continue sending money to help train and equip Colombian police and armed forces to fight guerillas and paramilitary groups.

Their meeting comes just a day after the State Department announced that Colombia's government and armed forces have met human rights standards needed to qualify for full funding of U.S. assistance programs. Colombia has received more than $3 billion in U.S. aid during the past five years as part of an effort to wipe out cocaine and heroin production and crush the long-running leftist insurgency.

Congress imposed conditions on U.S. assistance to push Colombia to curb human rights abuses. Failing to meet the standards would have meant a cut of about $70 million, according to a State Department estimate.

Amnesty International USA quickly challenged the certification made by Rice.

``This decision is a major blow to the promotion of human rights in Colombia and is based on only the narrowest reading of the law and the thinnest of evidence,'' said Dr. William F. Schulz, executive director of the group.

During a speech on Wednesday, Nicholas Burns, the State Department's third-ranking official, defended the controversial ``justice and peace'' plan, saying it will help ``dismantle the criminal structures of demobilized illegal armed groups, provide for peace with justice and permit continued extradition.''

The initiative, however, has been sharply criticized by Human Rights Watch.

The Colombian government is allowing groups that have committed thousands of atrocities, including massacres, killings and kidnappings, to launder illegal fortunes and legitimize their political power, says Jose Miguel Vivanco, Human Rights Watch's director for the Americas.

DOJ_NMG_0002343

``The government's approach to demobilization allows paramilitary commanders to put on a show of disarming some troops," Vivanco said. ``But the government has not truly attempted to dismantle their mafia-like networks, seize their illegally acquired fortunes or ensure a full cessation of abuses.'

Uribe Proposes Buying Coca To Foil Drug Trade (WT)

By Carmen Gentile, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

RIO DE JANEIRO -- Colombian President Alvaro Uribe, who met with President Bush in Texas yesterday, has implemented a program to buy coca plants from small-time growers who otherwise would sell their crops to drug traffickers to make cocaine.

Farmers also can turn over opium poppies, the plants used to make heroin.

Under the plan, farmers can go to the nearest police station or army outpost and turn over the plants to officers and soldiers. Prices for the crop will be negotiated on the spot.

"Hand over the coca and take the cash, similar to a country fair: Hand over the pig, take the cash," Mr. Uribe said of the program earlier this week.

The farmers must sign a legally binding agreement to halt cultivation, said Mr. Uribe, who has made a name for himself as a hard-liner bent on cracking down on the nation's Marxist rebels and cooperating with the United States on drug eradication.

Yesterday, Mr. Uribe visited Mr. Bush at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, to discuss bilateral efforts in the war on drugs.

Mr. Bush is urging Congress to renew Plan Colombia, a five-year-old anti-drug-trafficking program started under President Clinton.

The United States has given Colombia more than $3 billion in anti-drug aid.

Mr. Uribe's coca and opium purchase plan is available only in Colombia's central Meta region, where an ongoing battle between the military and rebels has forced small coca farmers to seek new buyers for their crops.

Rebels in the region typically traffic in the coca to finance their armed struggle against the Colombian government. Mr. Uribe said recent military operations have forced the rebels into hiding, leaving the farmers without buyers.

The program has come under harsh criticism from lawmakers such as Colombian Sen. Rafael Pardo, who said it would encourage small farmers to grow more coca just so they could sell it to the government, a guaranteed and steady paying customer.

Mr. Pardo -- who is a likely presidential candidate in next year's elections -- and other critics say farmers will find ways to continue cultivating illegal crops and selling them to the government, the rebels or right-wing paramilitaries that also produce cocaine for income, or all three.

"People are obviously going to plant more to sell more to the government," said an official in a human rights group in Medellin, the cocaine-producing capital of Colombia.

The program is also likely to ruffle feathers in Washington, where lawmakers recently approved a bill increasing the funding to Colombia for drug eradication.

In the past five years, the United States has spent $3.3 billion on coca-plant eradication through equipment and military training for Colombian soldiers. The plan involves aerial spraying of existing coca crops and encouraging farmers to adopt a legal crop.

Despite U.S. efforts, a recent White House report showed that coca production increased in Colombia last year.

A separate report by the United Nations said drug production has declined in Colombia in the past few years, but was on the rise in other Andean countries, such as Peru and Bolivia.

"Our current approach is the wrong approach," said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat. "We are spending a lot of money down there, and there is no accountability."

Bush Warns Colombian Leader On Human Rights (LAT)

By Edwin Chen

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

CRAWFORD, Texas — President Bush urged Congress to continue supporting Colombia's efforts to combat narco-terrorism Thursday even as he warned visiting Colombian President Alvaro Uribe that the United States expected Uribe's government to honor its stated commitment to human rights.

"We did talk about human rights. I talked about human rights," Bush told reporters as Uribe visited the president's Texas ranch. "We talked about specific cases, and I listened intently and believe that he is interested in following through on these cases."

DOJ_NMG_0002344

Victims' advocacy groups in Colombia have said that a new so-called Justice and Peace law is too weak. They claim that the measure — which governs the process of dismantling Colombia's paramilitary groups and re-integrating them into Colombian society — allows members to escape charges of atrocities committed against civilians.

In his own remarks, Uribe renewed his commitment to the rule of law and to bring about "transparency" in his government. "We have a democratic government that has full respect for public freedom and that fully intends to defeat terrorism," he said.

Bush said he would ask Congress to "sustain our commitment to follow-on programs for Plan Colombia, so Colombia can build on its progress and win its war against the narco-terrorists."

Plan Colombia is an aid program begun under President Clinton to crack down on drug trafficking and curb the decades-long conflict among the government, Marxist rebels and right-wing militias. Under the plan, the United States has poured more than $3.3 billion in aid into Colombia, the vast majority in the form of law enforcement and military assistance.

In June, a House committee approved the administration's request for $734.5 million for next year as part of a foreign aid bill.

Though the plan has been credited with reducing killings, massacres of villagers and kidnappings blamed on drug trafficking since 2002, some U.S. lawmakers and groups such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International have said far more needs to be done.

"Despite, or perhaps because of, the administration's close working relationship with Uribe, the U.S. has failed to use its leverage and influence with the Colombian government to ensure an end to human rights violations by the Colombian military," said William F. Schulz, executive director of Amnesty International USA.

"This support is based on half-truths that disguise myriad flaws in Colombian justice," Schultz said in a statement.

Victor Hinojosa, a Baylor University political scientist who specializes in U.S.-Colombian affairs, called Colombia "the greatest humanitarian crisis no one has heard about.'"

At the same time, by granting Uribe a coveted and high-profile visit to his ranch, Bush signaled support for a leader who has strongly backed Bush's Iraq policy, Hinojosa said. "Symbols matter," he said. "And this [visit] is an important symbol that he has U.S. support."

Colombia Warlords Testify About Congress "friends" (REU)

By Jason Webb

Reuters, August 5, 2005

BOGOTA, Colombia, Aug 4 (Reuters) - Two leaders of Colombia's far-right paramilitaries were summoned before the Supreme Court on Thursday to explain a comment that a third of the country's lawmakers were friends of the outlawed group.

Salvatore Mancuso and Vicente Castano, whose illegal United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia is in peace talks with the government, were ordered to testify after Castano made the remark to news magazine Semana in June, the government said.

"I think I can say that more than 35 percent of Congress are friends," Castano had told Semana.

Mancuso, a former AUC military commander, was summoned because he had made a similar remark in 2002 and appeared first before the closed session.

The burly former rancher, who surrendered his weapons to the government in December, was able to travel to the capital Bogota due to immunity from arrest granted by his status as a negotiator in the two-year-old talks.

Asked before the session about a comment he made in 2002, which was widely interpreted to mean the illegal group exercised influence over 30 percent of Colombia's congress, Mancuso told local radio he was merely referring to legislators from areas under paramilitary control.

"That 30 percent was just the percentage of the population and the electorate living in areas protected by the self-defense forces," Mancuso told Radio W.

"We don't have employees or representatives or congressmen who take orders. No. But there are congressmen who understand the nation's problems and the problems of the forgotten rural Colombia."

The AUC has its origins in vigilante gangs set up by cocaine traffickers and cattle ranchers to defend themselves from Marxist rebels and has evolved into an illegal army with uniforms, command structure and control of a large portion of Colombia's huge cocaine trade.

While it often cooperated with sectors of the armed forces to kill leftist guerrillas and their suspected sympathizers, the AUC also took advantage of government military weakness to set itself up as the de facto authority in extensive parts of the country.

Thousands of people are killed every year in Colombia's war, which has dragged on since 1964.

Under President Alvaro Uribe, Colombia's military has grown in strength, and the government began peace talks with the AUC. More than 6,000 paramilitaries have disarmed.

DOJ_NMG_0002345

Uribe, who has also launched offensives against Marxist rebels, is enthusiastically backed by the United States which provides hundreds of millions of dollars of military aid a year. Confirming his status as the closest U.S. ally in Latin America, U.S. President George W. Bush met with Uribe at his Texas ranch on Thursday.

Under a law passed by Colombia's Congress, paramilitary leaders will face criminal proceedings for their organization's many crimes, which include thousands of killings as well as kidnapping, extortion and torture. But jail time is limited to a maximum of eight years.

KKK Member Pleads Guilty On Making Pipe Bombs To Blow Up Hispanics (CHATT)

Chattanooga (TN) Chattanoogan, August 5, 2005

A Klu Klux Klansman from South Pittsburg entered guilty pleas Thursday in connection with constructing pipe bombs for use in blowing up Hispanic immigrants.

Daniel James Schertz, 27, pleaded guilty to six counts in an appearance before Federal Judge Curtis Collier.

Prosecutor James Brooks said he faces up to 10 years on five of the counts and 20 years on another.

Sentencing is Nov. 4 at 2 p.m.

The pleas were to manufacturing explosives, transporting explosives, teaching others how to make explosives, and possessing a Ruger pistol while under a restraining order.

In an affidavit, ATF Agent Mike Connors said between October 2004 and April 1 of this year, he and a confidential informant investigated activities of Schertz related to his membership in the Ku Klux Klan.

The agent said on April 1 he bought five pipe bombs from Schertz for $750 at his residence at 245 Beene Cemetery Road.

He said he and the informant walked to a shed on the property and he saw two partially completed pipe bombs lying on a workbench. He said Schertz was wearing rubber gloves and appeared to have been working on the pipe bombs.

He said Schertz picked up a black container of gunpowder and "said it was more powerful than the last stuff he used."

The agent said he observed various bomb components in the shed, including spark plugs, spark plug wires, gunpowder, packages of screws and several more pipes still wrapped in plastic.

Agt. Connors said Schertz said he needed to go to Lowe's to get five end caps to complete the pipe bombs.

He said on the way to Lowe's, Schertz began talking about acquiring firearms and accessories. He reached to his right side, ejected the magazine from his Ruger semi-automatic pistol, and said, "These will go right through a vest."

The affidavit says Schertz gave advice on using the pipe bombs to blow up a bus transporting Hispanic workers. He said he would like to "take care of" another specific group of Hispanic immigrants.

They returned to the shed and Schertz completed the pipe bombs, it was stated. He was then paid the $750.

Authorities said Schertz's ex-wife, Shauna Schertz, had a protective order against him.

Ex-Klansman Pleads Guilty In Bomb Building (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Filed at 10:10 p.m. ET

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. (AP) -- A former Ku Klux Klansman charged with building pipe bombs to use against Mexicans and Haitians changed his plea to guilty Thursday.

Daniel Schertz, 27, built five pipe bombs and sold them to an undercover federal agent and a confidential informant for $750 in April, authorities said.

The bombs were to be "detonated on a bus carrying Mexican workers to work in Florida" according to a plea agreement filed Thursday. Schertz also was accused of building and transferring two pipe bombs to the informant in March to harm Haitians in Florida.

Schertz said Thursday that he was guilty of all six charges, including teaching and demonstrating how to make a weapon of mass destruction and interstate transport of explosive material with intent to kill or injure.

Interstate transport of explosives carries a minimum sentence of 10 years, while the other charges combined carry a maximum sentence of 60 years, Assistant U.S. Attorney James Brooks said.

Schertz's attorney, Mike Caputo, said the plea agreement allowed him to "avoid a harsher sentence."

Schertz's former Klan leader, White Knights Imperial Wizard Billy Jeffery, has said Schertz was "banished" from the Klan in mid-May for unrelated disobedience.

Church Fire Ruled Arson (WTVF-TV)

WTVF-TV, CBS 5, Nashville, TN, August 5, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0002346

The fire that destroyed the Pentecostal Church of Jesus Christ in Columbia Tuesday night was intentionally set according to fire investigators.

The fire started around 11:30 p.m. Tuesday, two hours after a night service ended at the church.

Several fire departments fought the fire for four hours, and investigators began looking into the cause of the blaze as soon as the flames were extinguished.

Thursday, officials from the ATF said that after examining the scene and conducting several interviews, they determined that the fire was intentionally set.

"A house of worship is a place of peace and where community members come together. Arson puts many at risk of injury or death, including police and fire personnel. The Columbia community can be assured that the combined resources used in this investigation will continue to work vigorously to ultimately bring those responsible to justice", said ATF Special Agent James Cavanaugh.

Church members built the 14,000 square foot church almost 10 years ago, and said they just paid the loan on it two months ago. ATF officials estimated the damage to the church at more than $2 million.

A $1,500 reward has been offered for information leading to the arrest of the person or people responsible for fire. Anyone with information has been asked to call the Arson Hotline at 1-800-762-3017 or the ATF Arson Hotline at 1-888-ATF-FIRE (1-888-283-3473).

IMMIGRATION:

DeLay Criticizes Houston's Policy On Illegal Immigrants (HC)

By Edward Hegstrom

Houston Chronicle, August 5, 2005

SUGAR LAND - House Majority Leader Tom DeLay criticized the city of Houston's "sanctuary" policy toward illegal immigrants in a speech Thursday night.

Speaking to a packed house of Fort Bend County Republican faithful, DeLay said he supported the concept behind legislation introduced by U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., that would withhold federal funding from cities such as Houston that refuse to enforce immigration law.

"It greatly concerns me that the police chief in Houston, Texas, has created a sanctuary in Houston by announcing that he is not going to enforce our laws," the Sugar Land Republican said, in response to a question about Tancredo's bill.

"That is unacceptable, and we hope to address it through Tancredo's legislation or other legislation."

Since 1992, a Houston Police Department policy has officially forbidden officers from enforcing immigration laws in most cases.

Mayor Bill White has said he supports continuing the policy, because he believes immigration is a federal matter and he wants to free police up to protect the city from violent criminals.

Police in Katy also have a court-ordered policy forbidding them from enforcing immigration laws. The order came as the result of a federal lawsuit filed after a 1994 police operation to pick up day laborers.

DeLay, who is seen as a key player on upcoming immigration reform legislation in Congress, said he would support a guest-worker program that would allow immigrants to come legally to the United States and then go home. But he said the government needs to step up enforcement of immigration laws first.

"Before Congress takes any significant legislation, we must secure our nation's borders," he said.

Two major proposalsTwo major pieces of immigration are expected to be considered when Congress returns in September.

One proposal, sponsored by Senators Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and John McCain, R-Ariz., would allow some illegal immigrants to work toward becoming legal residents and then citizens of the United States.

Senators John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyle, R-Ariz., propose a tougher bill that would allow illegal immigrants to become guest workers, meaning they would have to go home after working here three years or more.

Cornyn and Kyle also propose tougher enforcement, including increased patrols at the border and new requirements on employers seeking to hire workers.

DeLay indicated that he would support legislation even stricter than Cornyn's. He does not believe illegal immigrants already in the country should qualify, and he does not believe guest workers should be allowed to bring their families.

Asked if he would support McCain-Kennedy, he said: "It's not going to do very well in the House, I'll guarantee that."

DOJ_NMG_0002347

Places for detaineesDeLay noted that until now, even the federal government has not rounded up illegal immigrants in U.S. cities, because federal agents had no place to detain them. But he said that is changing under the new leadership at the Department of Homeland Security.

He encouraged local police to round up illegal immigrants, and promised that the federal government will find places to house them.

"If you pick up 50 or 100 of them, you can call the National Guard," he said. "Put them in tents."

He also said he did not support educating illegal immigrants or having their U.S.-born children become automatically U.S. citizens. But he said those would be harder to repeal.

DeLay also said he strongly supports legal immigration, which he says makes this country stronger.

He said immigration is a top issue among his constituents.

edward.hegstrom@chron.com

DeLay Pushes Border Security, Sales Tax (GalvestonNews)

By TJ Aulds

Galveston County Daily News, August 5, 2005

LA MARQUE — House Majority Leader Tom DeLay received a warm welcome during his first official visit to the city since, thanks to redistricting, he became the area's congressman.

Speaking to the La Marque Rotary Club, which saw increased attendance from neighboring clubs, DeLay spent much of the time introducing himself and his political philosophy.

He spun tales of his early days as a Fort Bend County businessman, who, while running for state office would not even admit he was a Republican, and his ascension to Majority Leader of the U.S. Congress.

Talk of replacing the federal tax system with a national sales tax, tougher standards and accountability for federal judges, border security and the issue of eminent domain seemed to resonate the audience.

He reiterated, too, the continued push for the GOP majority's " most ambitious agenda" with emphasis on homeland security and border issues.

DeLay, whose 22nd Congressional District includes La Marque, portions of Texas City, Santa Fe and much of the North County, got ovations for his views about border security.

"First we need to convince the American people we will secure the border," he said. "Any guest worker program will come later."

He voiced his support of a proposal that would see the governor "deputize people on the border" to assist Border Patrol agents.

Each time the crowd, which included local Republican Party chairman Chris Stevens and a bevy of county GOP movers and shakers, interrupted DeLay's comments with boisterous applause.

But, as has become the norm, DeLay couldn't come to town without meeting with protest.

Santa Fe resident John Fafoutakis was the lone picket outside Gulf Greyhound Park, where the meeting was held.

The Navy veteran who said protesting at DeLay functions was a hobby, held up a sign chastising the congressman for what he called a lack of support for veterans hospitals and medical clinics.

"How come the VA has to constantly fight for its survival with these guys in Congress," said Fafoutakis. "They should be taking care of veterans and each time the funding gets cut by the very people who are putting our troops in harm's way again."

DeLay said the protestor's anger was misplaced.

"The VA has gotten the funding it needs, we have always been there for the VA and its hospitals," DeLay said.

Border Vigil To Stand Until New Agents Hired (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Civilian volunteers scheduled to begin a border vigil in California next month will man observation posts along the U.S.-Mexico border until they are relieved by newly hired U.S. Border Patrol agents or National Guard troops, an organizer said yesterday.

"Our borders are not under the operational control of our government. Instead, they are controlled by alien and drug smugglers," said Andy Ramirez, head of the California-based Friends of the Border Patrol (FBP), which has organized the vigil.

"Our mission is to provide a safe living environment for our local citizens until the U.S. government provides the security for which it is responsible," Mr. Ramirez said. "The FBP volunteers will stand their posts until properly relieved."

DOJ_NMG_0002348

More than 3,000 civilian volunteers -- including former Border Patrol agents, retired police officers, military personnel and pilots -- have signed up to patrol the U.S.-Mexico border in California beginning Sept. 16 -- Mexican Independence Day.

The vigil was called to highlight what organizers said is the failure of Congress and the White House to secure U.S. borders.

The volunteers are expected to set up observation posts near Calexico, Calif., in an area known as Smuggler's Gulch, and at the Border Field State Park, just north of Tijuana, Mexico. The exact locations of all the sites and patrol areas have not been made public.

The vigil has received the endorsement of James W. Gilchrist, who organized the Minuteman Project in Arizona in April that targeted a 23-mile section of the U.S.-Mexico border. He said the U.S. government has failed to do anything about what he termed a "border crisis."

"President Bush ... says the most solemn duty of the American president is to protect the American people: Mr. Bush, tell it to someone else," he said. "You are derelict of your constitutional oath and duty to protect us by leaving our borders unsecured."

A total of 857 volunteers participated in the 30-day Minuteman vigil, during which they protested lax U.S. immigration-enforcement policies by trying to reduce the flow of illegal aliens along popular immigration and drug-smuggling corridors near Naco, Ariz.

Their goal was to show that increased manpower on the border effectively would deter illegal entry. Organizers said the protest directly resulted in Border Patrol arrests of 349 illegal aliens. Border Patrol field agents said the flow of illegal aliens through the targeted area dropped from 500 apprehensions a day to about 15 a day.

Mr. Ramirez said the California volunteers want to call the country's attention to the "real plight of those who live along the border who are being overrun by illegal aliens and drug smugglers." He said it was "imperative to send a message to Washington, D.C., that open borders and the havoc they create is unacceptable to our citizens."

Day-Laborer Site Rebuffed (WP)

By Carol Morello, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

The Herndon Planning Commission rejected yesterday a controversial proposal to build a tax-supported day-laborer site near a residential neighborhood, but the Town Council still will have the final say and remains on track for a vote later this month.

Officials with the social agency that wants to run the site for up to 150 workers said they are still trying to digest the accumulated criticisms of the plan that preceded the commission's 4 to 3 denial in a vote taken at 2:30 a.m.

"It's been given a blow, but it's not dead," said Bill Threlkeld, director of Project Hope and Harmony, the umbrella group that has applied for permission to build and operate the site, where contractors and homeowners could meet laborers seeking jobs.

Proponents say the challenge will be to address concerns expressed by residents without making so many concessions that day laborers will not want to use the site. Mayor Michael L. O'Reilly said the council, which will take up the matter in two weeks, is almost certain to demand several conditions.

"We will look at the application to see where change is feasible and realistic," said Joel Mills, a member of Project Hope and Harmony's executive council. "But there is a concern that so many conditions will be placed on how we operate that it becomes less and less feasible to do it successfully."

The designated site on the Loudoun County border would replace an informal site around a 7-Eleven parking lot. Several similar sites have been created throughout the region, including in Silver Spring and Langley Park.

In Herndon, an ordinance is being drafted that would make it a misdemeanor to solicit jobs curbside, but the town cannot legally outlaw day-laborer activity without zoning a site where it is permissible.

Herndon's struggle to cope with a day-laborer site has become a contentious chapter in the national debate over immigration policy. An unknown number of day laborers are in the country illegally; some estimates say as many as 85 percent of day laborers in Herndon are illegal.

Hundreds of critics have spoken out at public hearings like the one that stretched over seven hours Wednesday night into yesterday morning. Residents of nearby developments in Loudoun County as well as Herndon, several of them legal immigrants, said that they feared having strangers traipse through their neighborhoods en route to the site and that they worried its presence would decrease their property values. Others said they did not want their tax dollars used to support an enterprise that helps people who are in the country illegally.

After hearing the last of 130 speakers over the course of two nights, planning commissioners voted on a series of conditions. Among them were a limit of 100 laborers instead of 150, and a requirement that the site be closed on Sundays and federal holidays.

DOJ_NMG_0002349

Frequently the debate veered from neighborhood concerns into a discussion of national immigration policy and assimilation.

"This is the United States of America, not the Diverse States of America," said William Tirrell Sr., a commission member who introduced most of the conditions. "We don't segregate ourselves in little pods of people. I'm not a hyphenated American. I'm an American. We need to take these folks and make them part of us. But I will not support tax dollars being used to support an illegal enterprise."

After approving the conditions, the commission voted not to recommend it.

The nonbinding vote was more a signal of the panel's displeasure than a serious hurdle. With some regularity, Herndon's council differs with the planning commission.

Ann V. Hull, a council member who often has criticized day-laborer sites, said she expects Project Hope and Harmony to modify its proposal to address the issues that opponents have raised. She also said she wants the group to justify the prediction that the official site can work.

But O'Reilly, who campaigned last year on a promise to improve the day-laborer situation, said he believes the concerns can be alleviated with a few modifications.

"I do believe this site can work and would work effectively," he said. "We're committed to trying to solve this problem."

Illegal Immigrants, Long Islanders Clash (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

FARMINGVILLE, N.Y. (AP) -- This middle-class Long Island community an hour from New York City and 2,000 miles from the Mexican border has become an unlikely flashpoint in the national debate over illegal immigration, with Hispanics beaten, harassed and evicted in recent weeks.

For more than a decade, immigrants from Mexico or Central America have been drawn to Long Island by the prospect of jobs. Many stand on street corners in Farmingville, waiting for contractors, landscapers and others to offer them a day's work at about $10 an hour. Then at night they go back to their illegally overcrowded single-family homes.

The immigrants, many of whom are believed to have entered the country illegally, have been a source of tension among longtime residents since at least the late 1990s, but things have gotten worse this summer -- so bad that the head of the Mexican Consulate in New York City said Farmingville was "clearly a red zone after the Arizona border" in the abuse of immigrants.

In late June, two men were charged with a hate crime for allegedly berating a Mexican woman and her husband as the couple backed their van out of a parking lot. Within weeks, two more suspects were arrested and accused of yelling racial epithets and throwing a beer bottle at a Hispanic day laborer.

That same day, four people demonstrating at a 7-Eleven in support of day laborers were arrested when they surrounded an anti-immigration protester's car and refused to let him out.

Police are also investigating an attack in nearby Patchogue on a 61-year-old Ecuadorean man. He was beaten by three men who supposedly asked if he had a green card.

The tension was ratcheted up in mid-June, when officials in the town of Brookhaven, which includes Farmingville, and Suffolk County police began evicting men from overcrowded houses, citing health and safety violations. Dozens of people were jammed into the tiny one-family homes.

So far, at least six houses have been shut by authorities -- including three last Friday -- leaving more than 100 men homeless, advocates said.

Advocates claimed the immigrants have been thrown into the streets without warning. One advocate called it "ethnic cleansing."

"Many local officials have punted, saying this is a federal issue and we can't do anything about it. Well, there are some things you can do," Suffolk County Executive Steve Levy responded. "Crack down on those contractors, crack down on illegal housing and create a better relationship with immigration officials."

Levy complained that it is the Mexican government's "failed policies, both economically and otherwise, that have been pushing millions of his residents over the border for a better life in America."

Arturo Sarukhan, head of the Mexican Consulate in New York City, agreed that Mexico needs to solve its economic problems so that its citizens do not leave for a better life in America. But he said officials on Long Island must realize that the day laborers are here to stay and "there is a need to work together."

"At the end of the day, they may or may not like it, but it is the reality," he said.

A spokeswoman for the Town of Brookhaven estimated there are 150 houses, each with dozens of suspected illegal workers, in Farmingville, though some landlords have pre-emptively evicted some tenants for fear of trouble with the law.

DOJ_NMG_0002350

"If they're going to throw anybody out of an apartment, they have to give them time," said Carlos Tenorio, a 26-year-old day laborer from Mexico City who has been in Farmingville for about nine months. "These people are not the cause of the problem."

Farmingville saw immigration-related violence a few years ago. In 2000, two Mexican men were beaten by two locals who promised them work. On the Fourth of July 2003, a Mexican family barely escaped with their lives after teens set their house ablaze by shooting fireworks through a window. But tensions appeared to ease after three of the assailants were sent to prison -- two of them for 25 years.

Residents are largely cheering the crackdown on immigrants.

"I think they are doing a terrific job," said Terry Sherwood, who complained that residents in the jammed houses often drink late into the night and urinate and defecate on lawns and backyards. "I don't care who they are, what color they are. I don't care where they come from. Why should people have to live this way?"

Lisa Marino placed a Mexican flag on her front lawn in solidarity with the workers but also applauded efforts by officials to curb illegal housing.

"There's a lack of assimilation," she said of the workers. "You don't leave garbage out, you don't whistle at neighbors. They need to understand that, but by keeping them marginalized, they don't learn that."

Nadia Marin-Molina, an advocate for the day laborers, understands the concerns expressed by neighbors, but insisted "it's a two-way street."

"Some of these same people who are complaining are the people who benefit from the work these guys do," she said. "Because every house has landscaping done, or has to have some job done on their roof, or some painting done."

A Strategy On Border Security (DCExaminer)

By Mike Crapo

DC Examiner, August 5, 2005

In May, Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff stated, "The issue of securing the border is a homeland security issue, it's an immigration issue and it's also a humanitarian issue." He is absolutely correct: discussions about securing our 5,500-mile Canadian border, 1,900-mile Mexican border and 95,000 miles of shoreline are only meaningful in the context of defense, immigration and respect for human life. As the Homeland Security Appropriations bill goes to conference, Congress is developing a comprehensive strengthening of our borders as a major component of this legislation. Border security requires tight controls at our borders and follow-up by manpower and technology within our borders.

Annually:

- 16 million cargo containers enter the U.S.
- 500 million people cross our borders, 330 million are non-citizens
- 11 million undocumented aliens live in the U.S.

These numbers represent an enormous and daunting risk that requires us to be proactive in vigilance and preparation. Our borders will be strong, secure and meaningful when they represent freedom and protection for those in compliance with the law.

Effective border security is well-funded and reinforced by laws that carry tough legal consequences for those who break them. Various border and immigration components must be strengthened including more agents, immigration investigators and other enforcement personnel; quality training for these positions; hardware and infrastructure to augment job success, including unmanned aerial vehicles, high-tech sensors and advanced physical barriers; technology upgrades for cargo inspection and identification of fraudulent immigration documents; additional capacity at temporary detention centers.

The FY 2006 Homeland Security Appropriations bill aims to fund 1,000 new border patrol agents, 300 additional immigration investigators and 460 new detention and enforcement agents and officers. This would raise the total numbers to 12,500 border patrol agents, 6,100 criminal investigators, 2,700 immigration enforcement agents and detention officers.

The legislation provides additional funds for training, operations of the fourth northern border airwing and replacement of aging helicopters. More than 2,200 new detention facility beds will be added bringing the total to 22,700 and 41 ports, up from 19, will be utilizing the new Container Security Initiative to screen high-risk cargo before it leaves foreign ports. The bill funds camera and sensor technology and construction along the Mexican and Canadian borders, and calls for the development of advanced radiation portal monitors.

The creation of the Department of Homeland Security has allowed us to integrate homeland defense, focusing particular attention on border security. Funds have been allocated to develop radiological, biological, chemical and nuclear countermeasures, biosurveillance and threat and vulnerability assessments. It has been four years since an attack and while the events in London are only the latest indicators that this war isn't over, our law enforcement has been very successful in deterrence efforts. They are to be commended on their vigilance, while ensuring that individual liberties and freedoms have been meticulously safe-guarded and defended.

DOJ_NMG_0002351

It's the responsibility of the federal government to protect us at home. Truly successful homeland defense has another component - personal vigilance. Americans can contribute by being alert. If you see something that doesn't look right, report it. The combination of watchful citizens, effective laws and adequate personnel and resources will preserve our homeland freedom.

Mike Crapo is a Republican senator from Idaho.

Rep. Culberson's Call For Armed State Militias On The Border Is A Reckless Approach To Dangerous Problem. (HC)

Houston Chronicle, August 5, 2005

Republicans and Democrats agree on little these days, but the combined effects of 9/11 and a newly globalized economy have forged consensus on at least one issue: the need for better border control.

The United States' long southern frontier, lawmakers agree, is unacceptably porous. Across it come illegal migrants seeking work, drug runners hauling their wares and terrorists bent on killing U.S. citizens. Recognizing that most illegal border crossers fall in the first category, several federal lawmakers are crafting thoughtful, bipartisan proposals to solve this complex problem. U.S. Rep. John Culberson's plan to create armed border militias is not one of them.

Last week Culberson introduced a bill that would allow state governors to establish and deploy armed citizen militias on the Canadian and Mexican borders. Billed mainly as an antiterrorist measure, the legislation would also allow militia members to detain ordinary illegal immigrants.

In essence, the militias would be official versions, with police powers, of the Minutemen Civil Defense Corps. That private group patrolled the Arizona border briefly this spring and plans to film Houston day labor sites this fall.

Authorized by the federal government, the militias would be open to all Americans but give priority to residents from border states. As Culberson envisions it, the law would deputize "tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands of law-abiding citizens" as auxiliary border guards. Co-sponsored by 46 House members, Culberson's plan would be funded by $6.8 billion in Homeland Security money reserved for emergency workers.

President Bush has called the unofficial Minutemen "vigilantes," but their movement is eminently sensible in at least one respect. It doesn't involve guns. Letting states arm civilians to address a federal problem migrates into a different sphere, one with reckless disregard for the consequences. Culberson's proposal requires states to reject militia hopefuls who have a history of mental illness or crime. However, the militias' very mandate, to "use any means and any force authorized by law," presupposes the use of violent force — otherwise, the proposal would not call for militias to bear arms.

Asked in a phone interview how an armed civilian could possibly confront and overcome drug traffickers or terrorists, Culberson said, "It's probably going to require a very heavy caliber."

Migrants who have trudged 30 miles across a desert are unlikely to have the energy or weaponry for a shootout. Drug runners, on the other hand, would not hesitate to open fire. They have done so frequently after encountering Border Patrol agents.

Armed, amateur border guards have no business confronting either quarry. It takes more than a few weeks of study to master arrest and detainment procedures, immigration and criminal law and search protocols. In the remote, hard-to-monitor expanse of the borderlands, accidental and wrongful deaths inevitably would follow.

Even as a gesture to fearful constituents and not intended to become law, Culberson's invocation of armed civilians enforcing federal policy deflects attention from more constructive proposals to manage the problem of illegal immigration. That 46 fellow lawmakers find Culberson's plan promising is troubling. It's no coincidence that Hispanic groups, law enforcement officers and the Minutemen themselves have all rejected the plan as impractical.

The answer to understaffed federal security agencies, including the Border Patrol, lies in allocating federal money to hire more professionals. The answer to our nation's immigration problems is not nearly so plain. Only one thing is certain: It does not involve civilians with guns.

A Serious Stop Sign (TOWNHALL)

By Rich Tucker

TownHall.com, August 5, 2005

When John Roberts comes before the Senate for his confirmation hearings, there's sure to be plenty of hand wringing about Roe v. Wade. Never mind that the so-called right to privacy isn't found in the Constitution. By digging into the tiny details of the legal arguments involved, lawmakers hope to show us how devoted they are to doing their jobs.

Meanwhile, Congress is ignoring one of its most important jobs -- one that actually is in the Constitution. It's not adequately "providing for the common defense" because it's not protecting our borders.

DOJ_NMG_0002352

Nobody knows how many illegal immigrants now live in the United States. Recent estimates range from 11 million to 20 million. Faced with that problem, you'd expect Congress to do everything possible to shore up our borders and stop the flow of new illegals. Sadly, it's not.

Several months ago a correspondent from southern California decided to visit the Mexican border. He found that "in the (populated, highly-patrolled, well-fenced, URBAN) west end of San Diego County there were 10 agents patrolling a 10-mile zone. One four-mile swath had zero agents."

One agent per mile of border? No wonder those few agents are overwhelmed. This isn't a lack of ability -- it's a lack of effort. The government is making no serious attempt to stop the flood of illegals.

My correspondent, a nurse at an L.A.-area hospital, was so appalled he decided to join a Minuteman patrol team and help the Border Patrol protect the frontier. With just a few volunteers on the scene, the picture a few weeks later was much different. "We shut down four miles of border with 16 people, eight large flashlights, and four cell phones, and didn't pull out until sunup," he reports.

The solution, then, is simple. "Just having enough people would solve the problem instantly. My estimate is that if someone got 500 people to show up per night statewide, the entire illegal traffic along the border of 150 miles from Yuma to the Pacific Ocean could be stopped dead," the man writes. "California wouldn't have an illegal immigration problem." And, thus, neither would the rest of the nation. But it's up to Congress to act, to provide enough agents and position them along the borders.

Illegal immigrants cause a wealth of problems. "Many gang members come to this country from overseas, or from other parts of the North and South American continent," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff notes. In fact, Chertoff says immigration officers have detained more than 1,000 alleged gang members since February, and he estimates 950 of them were illegals.

This is a local problem as well. The town of Herndon, Va. is inundated with day laborers. They gather at a convenience store and wait for employers to offer them jobs. The town, resigned to the idea that it can't prevent the workers from gathering, is considering whether to set aside a designated gathering place. "Our choice is between having a regulated site and an unregulated site," Mayor Michael L. O'Reilly told The Washington Post. "Given those options, I'm in favor of a regulated site."

The paper noted that, "an unknown number of [the day laborers] are in the country illegally." But the only reason we don't know how many of those waiting for jobs are illegals is because we haven't checked.

Here's a simple solution: Local police should take note of the license plate number every time a car picks up day laborers. Pass that information along to the IRS to see if the driver filed 1099 forms for the laborers he hired. The attraction of hiring day laborers is that employers can pay them cash. No questions asked, no forms filed.

But federal law requires that employers collect Social Security taxes on everyone they employ. Crack down on the employers, force them to check for Social Security numbers, and you'll drastically cut down on the number of illegal immigrants getting jobs.

"This country has a great Constitution. It's supposed to be justice for all. Some people think it's just justice for them," Lucio Escobar, a 47-year-old Herndon resident who immigrated from El Salvador 30 years ago, told the Post.

Well, the Constitution does guarantee justice for all -- all U.S. citizens. It's time for Congress to get serious about protecting our borders and cracking down on illegal immigration. Until lawmakers do that, their discussions about protecting the Constitution will amount to little more than hot air.

Rich Tucker is an editor in Washington D.C. and a columnist for Townhall.com

TAX:

Colts Neck Man Convicted Of Tax Evasion (APP)

By JAMES A. QUIRK, STAFF WRITER

Asbury Park (NJ) Press, August 5, 2005

A Colts Neck man was convicted of tax evasion and wire fraud in connection with a scheme to sell vast amounts of an ozone-depleting chemical, which was used to produce methamphetamine in California labs, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

William Rubenstein and Dov Shellef, of Great Neck, N.Y., were convicted July 28 of conspiring to evade approximately $1.9 million in excise taxes due on sales of a chemical called trichlorotrifluoroethane (CFC-113), law enforcement officials said yesterday. The jury returned the guilty verdicts after a five-week trial before U.S. District Judge Joanna Seybert in Central Islip, N.Y.

Shellef also was convicted of 87 counts of wire fraud, tax evasion, subscribing to false tax returns and money laundering.

DOJ_NMG_0002353

The investigation began as federal Environmental Protection Agency and Drug Enforcement Administration agents traced the supply of CFC-113 to California "meth labs" that used the product for the illegal manufacture of methamphetamine.

According to the Department of Justice, the investigation revealed that a company called All Discount Lab Supplies was selling CFC-113 to individuals who used the product in meth labs. The principals of All Discount Labs have since pleaded guilty to selling CFC-113 with reasonable cause to believe it was being used for illegal manufacture of methamphetamine.

Although Shellef and Rubenstein were not indicted on drug charges, the investigation revealed that they were major suppliers of CFC-113 to All Discount Labs.

According to the Justice Department, the federal Clean Air Act banned the continued importation and production of CFCs in the U.S. in 1996, though manufacturers were permitted to sell and export chemicals that had been stockpiled prior to the ban. CFCs are used primarily as refrigerants and industrial solvents, and when released travel into the upper atmosphere and destroy ozone.

CFCs are subject to a substantial excise tax, which is imposed to discourage their use and to promote the transition to more ozone-friendly replacement products. The excise tax applied to domestic sales of stockpiled CFCs, but not sales for export.

The Department of Justice gave the following account:

Shellef owned two businesses involved in the purchase and sale of CFC-113; Rubenstein also controlled two businesses involved in the purchase, packaging, warehousing, shipping and sale of CFC-113. Both men purchased large quantities of the chemical. Both men told the chemical manufacturers that they intended to export the CFC-113, and thus the manufacturers did not collect or pay any excise tax on the product.

Beginning July 1997, Shellef and Rubenstein, knowing that they had purchased the CFC-113 tax-free, illegally diverted the product to a number of domestic customers. To conceal these sales, the men removed references to the original manufacturers on drums of the chemical, and relabeled the product. In addition, they created false shipping documents. For all the domestic sales of CFC-113, the unpaid excise taxes totaled approximately $1.9 million.

Rubenstein and Shellef face maximum sentences of 25 years in prison and $500,000 in fines.

KPMG Confident Of Avoiding Tax Trial (FT)

By Andrew Parker

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

KPMG, one of the big four accounting firms, is increasingly confident it can avoid a criminal trial in the US relating to its past sales of tax avoidance schemes to clients.

KPMG's US business is in talks with the Department of Justice about a "deferred prosecution agreement", under which it would be put on probation and criminal charges held in abeyance, according to people briefed about the case.

No decisions have been taken, but the people said a settlement between KPMG and the justice department could also involve a fine of as much as $500m. KPMG is desperate to avoid an indictment because Andersen, once the world's biggest accounting firm, was destroyed after prosecutors pressed obstruction of justice charges against it in 2002.

The firm declined to comment on Thursday, but it has previously acknowledged the existence of an investigation by federal prosecutors into tax services sold to clients covering a period from 1996 to 2002.

KPMG's US business said on June 16 that it took "full responsibility for the unlawful conduct by former KPMG partners during that period, and we deeply regret that it occurred". Robert Bennett, a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, which is representing KPMG, said: "We are fully co-operating with the Department of Justice." He declined to comment further.

The terms of any settlement between KPMG and the justice department would probably involve KPMG committing itself to internal reforms affecting its tax practice and to monitoring by an independent consultant.

KPMG made a plea to avoid indictment in a written submission to the justice department in June, when it highlighted how a criminal trial could have a negative impact on its partnerships outside the US, said one person briefed about the case. Andersen's international network of partnerships collapsed after the indictment of its US business.

KPMG reinforced its plea in a meeting between its lawyers and James Comey, deputy attorney-general, and David Kelley, attorney for the southern district of New York, also in June, said another person briefed about the case.

Federal prosecutors in Mr Kelley's office are leading the investigation into KPMG. His spokesman declined to comment.

A report in February by the Senate permanent sub-committee on investigations concluded that between 1998 and 2003 its US business developed products that were "at times, illegal, or potentially abusive".

The sub-committee said the IRS had calculated in 2002 that three KPMG schemes had resulted in people claiming losses on their tax returns of $5.8bn.

But the report accepted that since 2003 KPMG had dismantled its "abusive tax shelter practice" and strengthened compliance.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Court Nominee Advised Group On Gay Rights (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 - Judge John G. Roberts Jr., the Supreme Court nominee, gave advice to advocates for gay rights a decade ago, helping them win a landmark 1996 ruling protecting gay men and lesbians from state-sanctioned discrimination.

Judge Roberts, at the time an appellate lawyer for the Washington firm of Hogan & Hartson, did not write legal briefs or argue the case, lawyers involved said. But they said he did provide invaluable strategic guidance working pro bono to formulate legal theories and coach them in moot court sessions.

Judge Roberts did not disclose his role in the case to the Senate Judiciary Committee, which asked about pro bono work in a questionnaire. News of his participation was first reported Thursday in The Los Angeles Times, and it set off an immediate scramble on both the left and the right, upending perceptions of the nominee in both camps.

The White House immediately sought to reassure Judge Roberts's conservative backers, telephoning prominent leaders, including Richard Land of the Southern Baptist Convention, but it appeared that not all of them had been convinced.

The 1996 case, Romer v. Evans, is considered a touchstone in the culture wars, and it produced what the gay rights movement considers its most significant legal victory. By a 6-to-3 vote, the Supreme Court struck down a provision of the Colorado Constitution that nullified existing civil rights protections for gay men and lesbians and also barred the passage of new antidiscrimination laws.

"It's one more piece of the puzzle as we keep trying to find out who John Roberts is," said Kevin Cathcart, executive director of Lambda Legal, the advocacy group that helped bring the Romer case. "Where does this fit in on his judicial philosophy and his view of the Constitution?"

Indeed, Judge Roberts's participation seems to stand in contrast to the picture that has emerged from his days as a young lawyer with the Reagan administration, when he advocated a more conservative approach to civil rights and voting rights. Lawyers in the Romer case said Thursday that Judge Roberts had not discussed its substance with them, but seemed to approach it more as an intellectual challenge.

Even so, reports of his involvement echoed on conservative talk shows Thursday, generating outrage and disbelief. "There's no question this is going to upset people on the right," Rush Limbaugh told his radio listeners. "There's no question the people on the right are going to say: 'Wait a minute. Wait a minute! The guy is doing pro bono work and helping gay activists?' "

A White House spokeswoman, Erin Healy, said Judge Roberts's involvement was minimal. "As in any other case," Ms. Healy said, "it is wrong to equate legal work product with personal opinions."

The lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the Romer case, Jean Dubofsky, said Thursday that she sought out Judge Roberts at the recommendation of Walter Dellinger, then a senior official in the Justice Department under President Bill Clinton. Ms. Dubofsky, a former justice of the Colorado Supreme Court, said she was specifically seeking a conservative who could provide her an insider's road map, of sorts, helping her to anticipate objections from some of the court's more conservative members, like Justice Antonin Scalia and Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist.

Judge Roberts, who once clerked for Justice Rehnquist and now serves on the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, spent about six hours on the case, Ms. Dubofsky said. "He told me, 'You have to know how to count and to get five votes, you're going to have to pick up the middle.' "

And then, she said, Judge Roberts provided explicit instructions on how to do just that, telling her that she would have to prove to the court it did not have to overturn a previous case, Bowers v. Hardwick, which upheld a ban on homosexual sodomy. He peppered her with questions in a moot court session.

"So when I was asked by Justice Scalia if they would have to overturn Bowers v. Hardwick to rule my way, I said no," Ms. Dubofsky said, adding, "In this particular case if you wanted to get the U.S. Supreme Court turned around on gay rights issues, you didn't have to win every gay rights case floating around out there."

Ultimately, in a forceful opinion by Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, the court said the Colorado provision had put the state's gay men and lesbians in a "solitary class," singling them out in violation of the Constitution's equal protection guarantee in a manner that was so sweeping as to be inexplicable on any basis other than animus. Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justices Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the justices to whom Judge Roberts is most often compared, issued a blistering dissent.

The Romer case proved to be the first step in the Supreme Court's ultimate disavowal of the Bowers decision in its 2003 ruling in the case of Lawrence v. Texas. That ruling, which overturned a Texas sodomy law, has drawn the ire of conservatives at a time when the Supreme Court is expecting still more cases involving gay rights. In November, the court is scheduled to hear a case that grows out of the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy toward gay service members. The question is whether Congress can withhold federal money from universities that restrict military recruiters' access to their students, in an effort to support gay rights. Judge Roberts would join in hearing that case, should he be confirmed by the first Monday in October, as Republicans hope.

DOJ_NMG_0002355

Judge Roberts did not mention the Romer case in the response he filed to a questionnaire from the Senate Judiciary Committee, which asked about pro bono work. Committee Democrats said they were not troubled by the omission, because it did not appear that Judge Roberts had spent a significant amount of time on the case. He did list two other cases, including one in which he represented welfare recipients in the District of Columbia who were challenging cuts in their benefits.

Walter A. Smith, who was in charge of pro bono work at Hogan & Hartson from 1993 to 1997, and who worked extensively on the Romer case, said about a dozen lawyers at the firm assisted. He said he had little trouble recruiting Judge Roberts.

"It looked like a challenging, interesting, provocative, important case," said Mr. Smith, who is now the executive director of the D. C. Appleseed Center, a nonpartisan public interest legal group. "Everybody knew that, and I think he believed it was worth his time."

Mr. Smith said part of his job was to match lawyers with cases that would intrigue them, and that his initial instinct was that Judge Roberts would be willing, despite his conservative bent. In the past, Judge Roberts has made it a point to note that lawyers do not always agree with their clients.

"Every good lawyer knows that if there is something in his client's cause that so personally offends you, morally, religiously, if it so offends you that you think it would undermine your ability to do your duty as a lawyer, then you shouldn't take it on, and John wouldn't have," he said. "So at a minimum he had no concerns that would rise to that level."

Liberal critics of Judge Roberts, however, continued to assail him on Thursday as a foe of civil rights. "John Roberts was a key member of a right-wing policy team that waged a comprehensive assault on fundamental constitutional rights," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, a liberal advocacy group, "and that is most relevant to his qualification to be on the Supreme Court."

While some conservatives, including Dr. Land of the Southern Baptist Convention, said they were unconcerned about Judge Roberts's involvement in the Romer case, others signaled that the report had at least raised questions in their eyes.

James C. Dobson, chairman of the evangelical group Focus on the Family, said Judge Roberts's work in the case was "not welcome news to those of us who advocate for traditional values," though he said it did not necessarily mean that Judge Roberts shared the plaintiffs' views.

Colleen Parro, executive director of the Republican National Coalition for Life and one of the few conservatives to raise questions about Judge Roberts, said his work on the case was "cause for more caution and less optimism" about his nomination.

Partisans Are Unsure About Roberts' Work On Gays' Case (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — Supporters and opponents of Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts were caught off guard Wednesday by news that he worked behind the scenes years ago to assist a gay rights group win a key case before the nation's highest court.

Debate erupted on conservative and liberal Web sites, with partisans on both sides asking whether Roberts' assistance to what is usually considered a liberal cause was an aberration from his otherwise conservative record or a sign his views might be more nuanced than commonly thought.

Social and religious conservatives expressed dismay about his participation in the case but said they are not convinced it amounted to an endorsement of gay rights -- a movement they strongly oppose.

"While this is certainly not welcome news to those of us who advocate for traditional values, it is by no means a given that John Roberts' personal views are reflected in his involvement in this case," the political arm of Focus on the Family, a national organization of conservative Christian, said in a statement. "That's what lawyers do -- represent their firm's clients, whether they agree with what those clients stand for or not."

The White House sought to play down Roberts' participation in the case, known as Romer vs. Evans, in which the Supreme Court in 1996 voted 6-3 to strike down a voter-approved Colorado initiative that would have allowed employers and landlords to exclude gays from jobs and housing.

Roberts, then a lawyer at the Washington firm of Hogan & Hartson, helped gay rights activists prepare their challenge to the initiative as part of his firm's pro bono work.

DOJ_NMG_0002356

Roberts did not mention his work on the case in responding to a Senate Judiciary Committee questionnaire that asked for examples of his pro bono work. Roberts' involvement in the case was first reported by the Los Angeles Times on Wednesday.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said Roberts spent less than 10 hours on the case while devoting more than 200 hours to two other pro bono cases in which he was lead counsel.

"There is clearly a difference" between his assistance in the Colorado case and his other pro bono work, Perino said.

Jean Dubofsky, the lead lawyer for gay activists challenging the Colorado initiative, told the Times that Roberts gave her "absolutely crucial" advice in how to argue the case before the Supreme Court.

Some conservative supporters of Roberts denounced Wednesday's focus on the case as an effort to set Republicans against each other.

"The Romer imbroglio is a red herring meant to divide the right," said Sean Rushton, executive director of the Committee for Justice, which helps coordinate strategy on judicial nominations for conservative groups.

Similarly, liberal activists insisted the revelation did not change their concern that Roberts is not as supportive of civil rights as they would like.

"A primary issue for us is to what degree, if any, this work reflects on the judicial philosophy Judge Roberts would bring to the Supreme Court," said Kevin Cathcart, executive director of Lambda Legal, a major gay rights advocacy group.

Cathcart said his group remains concerned about Roberts' "much more extensive advocacy of positions that we oppose."

Still, the revelation is awkward for both sides in the political battle over Roberts, now a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia circuit. He was nominated by President Bush for the Supreme Court in late July to replace Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring.

Some conservative activists have expressed concerns that he may become an "unreliable" justice like David Souter or Anthony Kennedy, who were appointed by Republican presidents but who have not consistently supported conservative positions on the bench.

But Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform and a central figure among GOP activists, said any conservative who withdrew support of Roberts over his participation in the Colorado case would be wrongheaded.

"The whole case that conservatives have been trying to make is that your personal feelings ought not to count" when you rule from the bench, Norquist said.

"There may be people who will say -- I want (him) to share my world view and try to impose it on his decisions," Norquist added. "Those people are not a useful part of the effort."

Some liberal activists consider Roberts to be more of a conservative ideologue than he acknowledges, citing in particular his work in the Reagan administration to limit school busing and other programs that sought to promote civil rights for minorities.

"I'm interested in seeing his involvement in this (Colorado) case, but it doesn't diminish our overall concern," said Nan Aron, president of the liberal Alliance for Justice. "A picture is just beginning to emerge of his views, but it's too early to make an overall assessment of his judicial philosophy."

Norm Ornstein, a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute who is an expert on relations between the White House and Congress, predicted that Roberts' role in the Colorado case would unnerve ideologues on the right and the left.

"It reinforces the notion that the guy is a lawyer's lawyer," Ornstein said. "To whatever degree people are trying to view Roberts as an ideologue whose first instinct is to take his world view and impose it on whatever decision he's taking -- this cuts against it."

The result, Ornstein said, is that the Romer controversy is likely to help Roberts win more support from moderates.

"This means (he has) an ability to put himself in someone else's shoes," Ornstein said. "That is something that has distinguished the more careful and modest justices from the more expansive, wide-ranging and reckless ones."

Lawyers involved in the Colorado case described Roberts role as small but crucial to the outcome.

Walter A. Smith, Jr., the partner at Hogan and Hartson who ran the firm's pro bono program, said Roberts took part in the firm's initial meeting to consider accepting the case and that his participation, as in all the firm's pro bono cases, was voluntary.

"Anyone who didn't want to work on a case for whatever matter, they didn't have to," Smith said. "He was in on the takeoff and he was in on the landing and was helpful in both."

Smith also said that from a lawyer's point of view, the battle over the Colorado initiative was more a case about equal protection than about rights for gays and lesbians.

He said the critical issue for Roberts -- and eventually for the Supreme Court -- was whether the Colorado initiative took away ordinary rights and legal protections from a disadvantaged group, whether they were a sexual, racial or social minority.

"Does such a law violate the equal protection clause of the constitution? To that extent, it was not a gay rights issue," Smith said.

DOJ_NMG_0002357

In Private Practice, Roberts's Record Is Mixed (WP)

By Jo Becker And Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

As a private lawyer, John G. Roberts Jr. represented homeless Washingtonians who had lost their government benefits because of city budget cuts. He advocated environmental protections for Lake Tahoe, Glacier Bay and the Grand Canyon. He spent 25 hours assisting a convicted murderer with a death penalty appeal. He even helped gay rights activists win a landmark Supreme Court anti-discrimination case.

At first blush, these cases would seem to complicate any image of the Supreme Court nominee as a down-the-line conservative. But as details have emerged in recent days, conservative groups have been busy spreading the word to their members and the broader public about what they should think of Roberts's work in private practice: Pay it no mind.

At second blush, Roberts's role is hardly surprising, say people who have worked with him or studied his career. For more than a decade, he practiced appellate law at the Washington firm Hogan & Hartson in a distinctly non-ideological fashion. Now, as liberal and conservative activists pick over his career for evidence of his political and legal philosophy, neither side seems to attach much importance to his diverse practice. And some activists on both sides remain secure in their conviction that he is an emphatic conservative who will move the high court to the right -- never mind his client list.

The Los Angeles Times reported yesterday that in 1996, as part of his firm's pro bono program, Roberts offered limited aid to opponents of a Colorado referendum that allowed discrimination against gays. The case led to a landmark Supreme Court ruling that protects people from discrimination based on their sexual orientation.

But Nan Aron of the liberal Alliance for Justice said that Roberts's involvement "doesn't say anything about his judicial philosophy." And Sean Rushton of the conservative Committee for Justice called the Colorado case "a red herring meant to divide the right."

"I don't think this is serious," said Bill Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard. "Most conservatives are very pleased. . . . He has a long record, and has been very consistent."

The prevailing view of Roberts as a reliable conservative initially emerged from his résumé as a clerk to then-Associate Justice William H. Rehnquist, aide to President Ronald Reagan, deputy to then-Solicitor General Kenneth W. Starr and nominee of President Bush. That view was solidified by the release of forceful memos he wrote while serving in the Reagan administration, during which he helped shape policies opposing affirmative-action quotas and busing of schoolchildren to achieve desegregation. During the administration of George H.W. Bush, he signed a brief that called Roe v. Wade "wrongly decided."

In recent days, the White House and its allies have grown concerned that the documents released so far have painted Roberts as a rigid ideologue, and they have sought to provide a more complete portrait. Yesterday, the Bush administration released two Reagan-era documents sought by The Washington Post and others under the Freedom of Information Act. The Post request included thousands of other documents, which were not released.

In one memo, Roberts argued that Reagan should not interfere in a Kentucky case involving the display of the Ten Commandments on public property. In the other, he wrote that the bomber of an abortion clinic should not receive any special consideration for a pardon. "No matter how lofty or sincerely held the goal, those who resort to violence to achieve it are criminals," Roberts wrote.

Advisers to the White House have been urging the Bush team to be more aggressive about providing its own narrative of Roberts.

"There needs to be a good branding effort," said one Republican strategist involved in pro-Roberts strategy. "We do need to get out and start defining who this guy is."

Neither side has focused much attention yet on his work from 1986 to 1989 and from 1993 to 2003 at Hogan & Hartson, where he sometimes took on cases that clashed with conservative orthodoxy. For example, he once defended racial preferences for Native Hawaiians -- a case he lost to Theodore B. Olson, a prominent Republican in the appellate bar. On the other hand, Roberts assisted Republican Gov. Jeb Bush at no charge during the Florida presidential election recount in 2000.

"It's good for lawyers to represent clients on all sides of the political spectrum," Olson said. "You can't read anything into his personal feelings about the case."

The Supreme Court hears only about 80 cases a year, so even elite appellate lawyers such as Roberts have to compete for cases, and they rarely turn them down. Olson said that Supreme Court specialists also regularly help less-experienced lawyers prepare as a professional courtesy. And Hogan & Hartson lawyers said the firm has a culture in which every partner and associate is expected to help out on pro bono cases when asked.

That is what happened in the Colorado gay rights case, Romer v. Evans , in which lawyers seeking to strike down the referendum sought the help of Hogan & Hartson. Walter Smith, then head of the firm's pro bono department, turned to Roberts for assistance. Smith said Roberts readily accepted, helping to grill the lawyers handling the case during a mock trial, in which he played the role of Justice Antonin Scalia. Roberts also helped devise a strategy for the case.

DOJ_NMG_0002358

"He only put in a few hours, but a few hours with John Roberts is probably worth a few weeks with someone else," Smith said. "John was always willing to help on pro bono cases, regardless of the politics. Not all his conservative brethren felt that way."

On conservative Web sites yesterday, there was scattered negative reaction to the news that Bush's nominee had helped to advance the cause of gay rights. "Frankly, I find it hard to believe that a 'conservative' Roman Catholic would not have declined to participate on moral grounds," one person wrote at http://www.confirmthem.com/ .

John Yoo, a law professor at the University of California at Berkeley who served as a deputy assistant attorney general in the Bush administration, said the pro bono case was unusual for a conservative Republican lawyer. "Usually, conservative lawyers take on the more conservative causes," Yoo said.

On balance, the conservative establishment remained firmly supportive of Roberts. "While this is certainly not welcome news to those of us who advocate for traditional values, it is by no means a given that John Roberts' personal views are reflected in his involvement in the case," the group Focus on the Family said in a statement.

David Leitch, a former Hogan & Hartson partner, said Roberts never brought politics into his practice.

"We were Republicans, no question about that," said Leitch, who is now the general counsel of the Ford Motor Co. "But I never knew John to turn down a case for ideological reasons. He was there to represent clients. And he did it very well."

Staff writer Peter Baker contributed to this report.

Documents Indicate Roberts Isn't Always Predictably Conservative (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - As a legal adviser to President Reagan, Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. joined a scathing denunciation of abortion-clinic bombers and urged Reagan to stay out of an effort to post tributes to God in Kentucky schools.

Roberts' advice, in documents Knight Ridder obtained before their public release later this month, might help him counter critics who portray him as a doctrinaire conservative. Abortion-rights groups and organizations that advocate a clear separation between church and state oppose his nomination.

Both sides in the nomination debate are scouring court briefs, legal memos and other documents for anything that can help make the case for or against Roberts' ascension to the nation's highest court. The documents that Knight Ridder obtained were leaked by an administration official who wanted to show the nominee as a servant of the law, not of conservative ideology.

In another development that could confound Roberts' liberal critics, the Los Angeles Times has reported that he worked behind the scenes, without charge, for gay rights activists in a 1996 case that led to a Supreme Court ruling protecting homosexuals from discrimination. Roberts, who was then in private practice, was asked to join the case by a colleague at his Washington law firm.

In the abortion-clinic case, Roberts was asked to respond to reports in 1986 that Reagan would consider granting presidential pardons to convicted bombers. The issue arose when leaders from two anti-abortion groups, the American Life League and the Pro-Life Action League, were quoted as saying Reagan was open to the possibility of pardons on a case-by-case basis.

Rep. Romano Mazzoli, a Kentucky Democrat, asked Reagan for an explanation. Roberts and his boss, deputy White House counsel Richard Hauser, suggested a strongly worded response that ruled out favors for clinic bombers.

"The president unequivocally condemns such acts of violence and believes that those responsible should be prosecuted to the full extent of the law," their draft reply said. "No matter how lofty or sincerely held the goal, those who resort to violence to achieve it are criminals. ... Neither the cause that these misguided individuals mistakenly believed they were serving, nor the target of their violence, will in any way be considered to mitigate the seriousness of their offense against our laws."

Roberts forwarded the draft to the White House legislative affairs office in February 1986, but it isn't clear whether it ever was sent to Mazzoli. The issue may have become moot when other White House officials denied that Reagan had offered to consider pardons.

Joe Scheidler, the head of the Pro-Life Action League then and now, shrugged off the draft letter.

"My own lawyer would take the same position," Scheidler said. "I could see Roberts or any other lawyer coming up with that."

Roberts' opinion of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 ruling that legalized abortion nationwide, is one of the most hotly debated issues in his confirmation.

DOJ_NMG_0002359

As a deputy solicitor general in the administration of the first President Bush, he joined a brief asserting that Roe "was wrongly decided and should be overruled." He distanced himself from that opinion during his 2003 confirmation hearings to a federal appellate court and declared Roe "the settled law of the land."

Scheidler said he was confident that Roberts would vote to overturn the 1973 ruling if given a chance.

"It's settled law for now. That doesn't mean it can't be overturned," Scheidler said. "As a Supreme Court justice, he'd have a whole new approach."

In the Kentucky school case, Roberts advised Reagan to stay out of a 1985 effort to require teachers to post the national motto - "In God We Trust" - and the preamble to the state constitution in their classrooms. The preamble declares, "We, the people of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, are grateful to Almighty God for the civil, religious and political liberties we enjoy."

Supporters of the measure wanted Reagan's endorsement to help get it through Kentucky's legislature. At least one White House official seemed to support Reagan's involvement.

"The president's position concerning this issue is clear, and this group is certainly aware of it, but we would like to be sure that a message to them is approved by your office," White House aide Anita Bevacqua wrote in a May 17, 1985, memo to Roberts.

Roberts nixed the idea in his reply a week later. He questioned the constitutionality of the proposal and concluded that "it would be inappropriate" for Reagan to endorse it.

Roberts' critics on the church-state issue point to a brief that he co-authored as a deputy solicitor general on school prayer. The brief defended prayers at graduation ceremonies. The Supreme Court rejected his viewpoint in a 5-4 ruling.

Roberts' Solicitor General Record Gives Clues To Views (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — For many years, the solicitor general was known as the "10th justice," a trusted figure who advised the Supreme Court on the law and whose client was the United States.

But midway through the Reagan administration, the office took on a new role. The solicitor general became not just the government's chief lawyer before the Supreme Court, but the point man for a conservative transformation in the law.

When John G. Roberts Jr., then 34, joined Solicitor General Kenneth W. Starr as his top deputy in fall 1989, they were determined to make the Reagan Revolution a legal reality.

Roberts "was in that position as the principal political deputy to the solicitor general because he was simpatico with the administration," said Washington lawyer Charles J. Cooper, a longtime friend of the Supreme Court nominee. "He agreed with the thrust of what the administration was doing,"

Together, Starr and Roberts for 3 1/2 years pressed a strongly conservative legal agenda.

They argued for limiting the scope of civil-rights laws, ending race-based affirmative action, restoring some prayers to public schools and overruling Roe v. Wade, the case that established a woman's right to have an abortion.

They sought to make it harder for environmentalists to challenge the government in court. They intervened on the side of Operation Rescue to shield abortion protesters from being sued. And they joined Texas state lawyers in arguing that new evidence of a death-row inmate's "actual innocence" did not entitle him to reopen his case in federal court.

In the first right-to-die case to reach the Supreme Court, they intervened on the side of then-Missouri Gov. John Ashcroft to argue that state officials may keep a comatose woman alive over the objections of her family.

"Ken Starr and John Roberts are genuine conservatives," said Christopher J. Wright, a lawyer who worked under them at the solicitor general's office. "They're highly professional and excellent lawyers. But I'm a Democrat, and I can't say I always agreed with them."

Roberts' record at the solicitor general's office under President George H.W. Bush has become the focus of attention for Senate Democrats. They have been studying 81 Supreme Court briefs signed by Roberts between 1989 and 1993, and have asked the White House to disclose the memos he wrote in 16 of those cases.

But the White House so far has refused to provide the memos and other supporting documentation, claiming a lawyer-client privilege. As a result, Roberts' legal philosophy during that highly politicized period can only be gleaned from the public files.

They suggest a strongly, although not uniformly, conservative approach to issues.

Unlike his position as a young assistant to Attorney General William French Smith in 1981 and 1982, Roberts' post in the solicitor general's office gave him the opportunity to try to reshape the law at the Supreme Court. When teamed with Starr, he was not shy about pressing sharply ideological positions in the court.

DOJ_NMG_0002360

The duty and role of the solicitor general was a subject of debate in the 1980s. Reagan's first solicitor general, Rex Lee, quit in frustration, saying he was reluctant to "press the administration's policies at every turn. ... I'm the solicitor general, not the pamphleteer general."

The solicitors who followed Lee, including Charles Fried and Starr, were more willing to advocate the ideological views of the administration.

In the Reagan and first Bush administrations, that meant urging the Supreme Court to overturn Roe v. Wade.

In 1991, for example, when the court took up a free-speech challenge to an abortion regulation, Starr and Roberts filed a brief saying, "We continue to believe that Roe was wrongly decided and should be overruled." The regulation at issue prohibited doctors and nurses at federally funded family-planning clinics from discussing abortion with their patients. The court later upheld the regulation in a 5-4 decision, but without discussing the validity of Roe v. Wade.

The next year, Starr's office intervened in a Pennsylvania dispute to urge the court again to overrule Roe. "The protection of human life -- in and out of the womb -- is certainly the most compelling interest that a state can advance," Starr said.

The Supreme Court rejected the advice, and, in a 5-4 ruling, said women may opt for an abortion during the first six months of pregnancy.

The challenging of Roe -- and the view at the solicitor general's office of its proper role -- was defended by Thomas Merrill, a Columbia University law professor, who worked under Starr and Roberts.

"The president (George H.W. Bush) had campaigned for overruling Roe v. Wade. We in the office knew the administration's position. It was only a question of how to go about achieving that objective," he said.

In 1991, Roberts personally argued a case along with lawyers for Operation Rescue. The protesters had been sued in Virginia over abortion-clinic blockades. The women who sued relied on the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871, which made it illegal for several persons to conspire to deprive individuals of their rights.

Roberts began by saying that he was not defending the actions of the protesters. Rather, he argued, the 19th-century civil-rights law did not apply to their conduct. The law only applied when people were singled out for discrimination, as blacks were by the klan, Roberts said.

"Opposition to abortion is (not) the same as discrimination on the basis of gender," he said, adding that it was "wrong as a matter of law and logic" to make such a claim. In a 6-3 decision, the court agreed with his argument in an opinion written by Justice Antonin Scalia.

The lawyer who represented the women said the Bush administration lawyers should have stayed out of the case. "We were greatly bothered that the federal government was in this case on the side of Operation Rescue," Deborah Ellis, a New York University law professor, recalled recently. "There is a right to abortion, and whether you agree with it or not, it is objectionable that women could be deprived of this right by force."

(The Supreme Court is set to hear a similar case this fall involving blockades at abortion clinics. Lawyers for the National Organization for Women won a lawsuit against leaders of Operation Rescue for using violence and threats against doctors and patients. The court will hear an appeal from the anti-abortion advocates, who say the federal extortion law does not apply to such protests.)

Starr and Roberts also upset women's-rights advocates in 1991 when they intervened on the side of a Georgia school district in a major test of Title IX, the law that bars sex discrimination in schools and colleges.

Christine Franklin, a student, said she had been sexually harassed and abused by a popular coach, who was later dismissed. She sued the school district.

Starr and Roberts urged the court to rule that the law does not give victims of sex discrimination a right to sue. The justices unanimously rejected that view.

During their time together in the solicitor general's office, Starr and Roberts helped win rulings that had broad effect across the United States. They joined a Nebraska case in which the court ruled that student-led Bible clubs had a right to meet at public schools. They joined a Minnesota case in which the court upheld state law requiring a parent be notified before the daughter had an abortion. And they joined an Oklahoma City case in which the court set the stage for ending long-running school busing programs.

But Roberts was not always on the government's side.

He intervened in a Louisiana case to argue on behalf of an inmate, Keith Hudson, who had been beaten by two prison guards while shackled and handcuffed.

Hudson sued the guards for violating his constitutional rights and won $800 in damages. But the U.S. Court of Appeals in New Orleans threw out the verdict and ruled that prisoners' rights were not violated by abusive treatment that did not cause a significant and permanent injury.

DOJ_NMG_0002361

Roberts said he was troubled by the lower court's ruling. While "frivolous" lawsuits from prisoners were a problem, this was not a frivolous case, he said. Nor, he told the court, should the law condone the "unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain" on prisoners.

The Supreme Court agreed in a 7-2 ruling written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Justices Clarence Thomas and Scalia dissented.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which will hold hearings on Roberts' nomination to the Supreme Court, have demanded to see the memos he wrote in several of the cases from his time in Starr's office. They say they want to see how Roberts analyzed the law, and whether the administration's position was also his.

His friend Cooper, also a veteran of the Reagan administration, said it was fair to conclude that Roberts agreed in essence with the legal arguments he made on behalf of the first Bush administration -- although "it would be wrong to conclude he agreed with every line in those briefs."

Within the Justice Department, Roberts was admired for his intelligence and modest manner.

"My most distinct memory is that he played his cards close to the vest," Merrill said. "I briefed him for his first two days there, and he nodded and smiled. He didn't talk much. John never kicked back and philosophized about his view of the law."

GOP To Make Push For Roberts (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

President Bush and his strategists are using the politically fallow month of August to conduct a coordinated campaign to sustain momentum for the nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to the Supreme Court.

The effort has two tracks -- a public offensive that includes the president openly stumping for his nominee and a behind-the-scenes blitz designed to keep Senate Democrats on the defensive.

"Roberts needs to get his hearing done and the confirmation completed so he can be seated before the Supreme Court reconvenes in early October," Mr. Bush said this week in Texas at the start of his monthlong working vacation.

The president is expected to reiterate that sentiment during numerous day trips to various states from his 1,600-acre ranch in Crawford, Texas.

Meanwhile, White House operatives, working closely with the Republican National Committee, are quietly urging regional interest groups in key states to keep up the pressure on Senate Democrats. The groups are writing letters asking for meetings with their senators while they are home for the August recess.

Several Republican strategists who spoke to The Washington Times said the idea is for the groups to demand consultations with their senators because Mr. Bush had consulted with those senators on the nomination.

The effort is targeted at Democrats in conservative states such as Arkansas and Louisiana, rather than liberal states such as Massachusetts.

The interest groups range from local chapters of the Chamber of Commerce and Fraternal Order of Police to less well-known groups such as the Colorado Catholic Lawyers Guild, which has requested a meeting with Sen. Ken Salazar, Colorado Democrat.

In Florida, Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson is being targeted by statewide groups of real-estate agents, restaurateurs and medical professionals. In Iowa, Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin has been asked to meet with the Iowa Sportsmen's Federation. In New Mexico, Democratic Sen. Jeff Bingaman has been targeted by the state's Alliance for Legal Reform and Fraternal Order of Police.

Judging by the limited resistance to the Roberts nomination being mounted by such Democrats so far, Republicans say the effort alreaedy is bearing fruit. As evidence, they cited remarks this week by Democratic Sen. Mark Pryor of Arkansas.

"I don't really see any problems with this confirmation," he told the Washington County Bar Association in Fayetteville. "The White House really reached out to the Senate on this one, and I'd assume that means the confirmation process will go a lot smoother. I think this was a good choice by President Bush."

Another component of the August blitz entails aggressively booking Roberts advocates on local and regional talk radio programs, taking a template from the president's successful re-election campaign.

Republican strategists are quick to emphasize that confirmation of Judge Roberts is by no means guaranteed. They recalled that while the initial rollout of Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas went smoothly, the confirmation process turned ugly.

Mindful of such possibilities, White House officials are braced to respond aggressively to expected attacks against Mr. Roberts by Democrats, liberal interest groups and journalists.

DOJ_NMG_0002362

Still, Republicans are heartened that the scorched-earth political warfare that many had predicted has not materialized in the 21/2 weeks since the president nominated Judge Roberts. They are pleased that they were able to quickly gain political altitude with the nomination, racing to cement public opinion before the Democrats could gain traction.

While Mr. Bush and White House operatives spend August lobbying for Judge Roberts, the nominee will spend much of the month studying material in preparation for his Senate confirmation hearings, scheduled for September. He also will undergo rigorous question-and-answer sessions such as the ones practiced by presidential candidates in preparation for debates.

Judge Roberts will be grilled by lawyers from White House Counsel Harriet Miers' office and the Department of Justice, including acting Assistant Attorney General Rachel Brand, who runs the department's Office of Legal Policy.

Women's Groups Try To Rally For Court Fight (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

The divisive 1991 confirmation hearings of Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas, involving charges of sexual harassment, launched 1992's Year of the Woman. That election's windfall brought four new women to the U.S. Senate and 20 to the House -- and turned women's rights groups into a force to be reckoned with.

Now another Supreme Court appointment battle looms, with abortion rights a likely central issue. But internal squabbles, declining membership and complacency during the Clinton years have left most women's rights groups in weakened shape for the clash over Judge John G. Roberts Jr.

The National Organization for Women's political donations shriveled to $44,000 in 2004 from $327,000 in 1992. Planned Parenthood Federation of America Inc., facing a revolt among affiliates in part because of the politicization of the group, ousted its president in January and hasn't taken a position on the Roberts nomination. NARAL Pro-Choice America's new president was still on an introductory tour to affiliates and donors around the country when the Supreme Court fight started.

The influence of women's groups inside Congress also has eroded. Most Democrats in the Senate "Gang of 14" -- moderates who could prevent a Democratic filibuster -- weren't endorsed by NARAL because they didn't solidly back abortion rights or opposed them. "I do worry about our strength as a movement," says Kate Michelman, NARAL's former president. "What we do in this battle will establish the foundation and create the conditions not only for this one but also for the future."

Abortion-rights groups like NARAL oppose President Bush's nominee, who in a 1990 Supreme Court brief prepared for the Bush administration advocated overturning the landmark Roe v. Wade ruling. More recently, Judge Roberts has moderated his language, but abortion-rights advocates remain wary.

The troubled state of women's rights groups is shared by many of their traditional allies. Big Labor is falling apart as unions defect from what they claim is a wasteful and antiquated AFL-CIO. Civil-rights groups are fighting a conservative pushback on affirmative action and other issues. And the NAACP, the nation's leading African-American organization, is under investigation by the Internal Revenue Service.

The challenge for Judge Roberts's opponents is exacerbated by Democrats' reconsideration of how to position themselves with a more conservative electorate. Abortion was among the issues that some political analysts said drove church-going voters to President Bush in last year's election. Now, Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, an abortion-rights supporter, is urging his party's messengers to speak more about faith and religion and to downplay issues such as abortion.

Meanwhile, an array of conservative organizations is stronger than ever. They spent the Clinton years recruiting members and electing lawmakers, particularly to the Senate. High School Bible clubs flourished and anti-abortion organizations established footholds in colleges and universities across the country. The groups helped create a generation of women more receptive to restricting access to abortions and, because of broader access to birth control, less sympathetic to women with unwanted pregnancies, recent polls and focus groups have found.

The question is whether the Roberts nomination will have the same galvanizing effect as Justice Thomas's. Polls indicate that a majority of young adults, and the general public, oppose overturning Roe v. Wade -- an opening women's rights groups are trying to turn to their advantage.

"Bush has been our number-one membership recruiter," says Kim Gandy, president of NOW, which held dozens of protests the day after Judge Roberts was nominated. NARAL sent emails to 800,000 activists urging them to begin petition drives and contact their senators to express opposition to the nomination. Both groups, and others, added their lawyers to a coalition that is mining Judge Roberts's record for clues on how he might rule on the high court. They also are coordinating with Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee to ensure the nominee is questioned on abortion rights during his hearings next month.

NARAL's new president, Nancy Keenan, witnessed the conservative movement's growing influence during the 1990s when she refereed battles over school curriculum while serving as Montana's school superintendent. When she visited Washington,

DOJ_NMG_0002363

D.C., back then, she warned liberal allies "there is something afoot in the West; something seems orchestrated and calculated," she recalls. But they remained focused on lobbying the Clinton administration for looser restrictions on abortion funding and other long-thwarted priorities.

Ms. Keenan is revitalizing a program that expands NARAL's mission to protect access to birth control as well as abortion and includes a state-based recruitment drive. The project is critical, she says, because that network of advocates could become the first line of defense if the Supreme Court overturns Roe v. Wade and sends the issue back to state legislatures.

But while operations in Minnesota, New York and California remain strong, organizing has been painstaking work in states where conservatives made big electoral and legislative gains.

Ann O'Hanlon was hired as executive director of the Virginia NARAL affiliate in September 2003 -- a chapter that was closed during the Clinton years. She joined the small but active Pro-Choice Coalition, a Virginia group that lobbies the state legislature, and organized membership-building house parties. By January 2004, her mailing list had expanded to 6,400 and she had recruited two direct-mail fund-raising experts to serve on her volunteer board. Today, she can reach 21,000 people by email and NARAL has a full-time lobbyist in Richmond.

Ms. O'Hanlon and her volunteers are conducting petition drives on the Roberts nomination, and hoping the confirmation fight will invigorate her group and lead to the kind of ballot-box success her predecessors saw with the Thomas fight.

Already, the nomination is playing a role in the Virginia governor's race. Russ Potts, a Republican who says he is a moderate on abortion rights, is running as an independent to succeed retiring Democratic Gov. Mark Warner in November. He is seeking NARAL's endorsement, and in a meeting last week in Richmond, Mr. Potts recalls, he adapted his pitch to reflect concerns that Judge Roberts could help overturn Roe v. Wade.

"Should Roe v. Wade be overturned and sent back to the states, I will veto any attempt to overturn [abortion rights] in Virginia," he says he told Ms. O'Hanlon and other members of the Pro-Choice Coalition.

Groups Step Up Advertising On Roberts Nomination To High Court (BLOOM)

By Laura Litvan

Bloomberg, August 5, 2005

Aug. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Interest groups are stepping up the campaign over U.S. Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts, airing new advertisements designed to shape public opinion before next month's Senate Judiciary Committee confirmation hearings.

With bulging war chests that may total $100 million, both sides are gearing up for an expensive fight to prevent their adversaries from gaining an advantage. Still, Republicans control the Senate 55-45, and no Democrats have threatened a filibuster that would be their only chance to stall the nomination.

``There's a lot of folks who are both pro and con who are on automatic pilot," said Princeton University political science Professor Fred Greenstein in response to a question about why the ad campaigns are intensifying.

IndependentCourt.org, a coalition of 75 liberal groups including People for the American Way, this week began running national television ads that demand more information on Roberts's positions on issues. They urge the White House to release more documents from his time as a top Justice Department lawyer.

The Committee for Justice, which supports the nomination, will counter with radio ads targeting about 10 states represented by moderate Democratic senators, said Sean Rushton, the group's executive director. Senators are back in their home states for a monthlong recess and will be hearing from the voters, he said.

``This is when Roberts will be defined and it will set the stage for what kind of confirmation hearings and floor debate he gets," Rushton said.

$100 Million

Both sides will spend about $100 million on the confirmation battle including up to $10 million by business groups, estimates Rogan Kersh, a political science professor at Syracuse University in New York who specializes in lobbying.

``This is what they exist for," he says.

Progress for America, a group supporting Roberts's nomination, has budgeted $18 million for the campaign. It spent more than $40 million in the 2004 elections to help elect Bush.

Senate hearings on Roberts, 50, a federal appeals court judge picked by President George W. Bush to succeed retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, will begin Sept. 6 with a likely vote by the full Senate before the Supreme Court reconvenes on Oct. 3.

The first ads to air on the nomination were paid for by Progress for America. It spent $1 million on ads last week that described Roberts as a ``brilliant" lawyer and jurist.

DOJ_NMG_0002364

The ads sponsored this week by IndependentCourt.org have been shown on CNN, Fox News Channel and on the NBC affiliate in Washington.

Gathering Petitions

Groups are also gathering petitions during the August congressional recess.

``We're trying to get as many people to take action as possible," said Ted Miller, a spokesman for NARAL Pro-Choice America, which is opposing Roberts's nomination on grounds he might vote to overturn Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court ruling that legalized abortion nationwide.

Some ads and grassroots activities are targeting Democrats in ``red states" that Bush carried in the 2004 election. They are also aimed at the ``Gang of 14," seven centrist Republicans and Democrats who brokered a deal in May to avert a showdown over Bush's appeals court nominees.

That group includes Democrats Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Kent Conrad of North Dakota, who may face close re-election contests in 2006. Others on the list are Mark Pryor and Blanche Lincoln, both Democrats from Arkansas, which Bush won with 54 percent of the vote in 2004.

Pryor and Nelson have praised Bush for consulting senators before choosing Roberts and haven't taken a position on the nomination.

Lining Up Commitments

Groups favoring Roberts say they want to line up possible commitments or at least create momentum for the nominee heading into the hearings.

``Anytime you let the momentum fall, it allows time for questions to arise," said John Thomas, a spokesman for the Family Council Action Committee in Little Rock, Arkansas. ``You really want to keep moving forward."

Groups that are questioning Roberts's record are pressing senators to remain neutral for now.

``We're asking them, instead of rushing to a quick decision to take the time to ask hard questions people want to know, like where Judge Roberts stands on abortion and the environment and other issues that affect people's lives," said Cammy Watkins, a conservation organizer for the Nebraska chapter of the Sierra Club.

The board of the American Civil Liberties Union may meet this month to decide whether to oppose Roberts, said Will Potter, an ACLU spokesman. The group has only opposed two Supreme Court nominations: Robert Bork when he was defeated in 1987 and William H. Rehnquist when he was first appointed in 1971.

ACLU Position

``The ACLU isn't going to fly off the handle and give a knee- jerk reaction," said Tim Butz, executive director of the Nebraska chapter of the ACLU. ``We're going to study this thing and make a decision on our schedule so that we're sure we're doing the right thing."

Both sides are gearing for the fight to avoid falling behind.

``August is when a lot of opinions are going to be formed," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union, which is urging its 400,000 members who actively participate in such campaigns to lobby senators for Roberts. ``It's our assumption that the left will be advertising very heavily in a lot of these states and trying to reach members that they think are up in the air. You don't want them to have 1,000 letters against, and two letters for."

Judge Roberts's Memos (WP)

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

The request by Democratic senators to see memos written by Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. during his service in the solicitor general's office requires a difficult balancing of legitimate interests: the executive branch's need for confidentiality against a full and informed Senate confirmation proceeding. The request is more measured than the far-reaching demand for solicitor general memos during the nomination of Miguel A. Estrada to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit earlier in the Bush administration. It should not simply be defied. But neither is the administration wrong to try to protect internal deliberations within one of the government's most critical legal offices. Accommodation should be possible, provided it is sought in good faith by both sides.

The demand for memos in Mr. Estrada's case was irresponsible because he was a line attorney in the office; senators had demanded essentially all of his written work. It was an unlimited fishing expedition. Had the administration complied, the free give-and-take within the solicitor general's office would have been poisoned. That is why all living solicitors general of both parties opposed the request.

The Roberts case is different. Judge Roberts was not a line attorney but the political deputy solicitor general -- and administrations have at times chosen to turn over confidential work product when political appointees are nominated to the bench, including in the cases of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and the nomination of Robert H. Bork. A privilege, after all, can be waived. Unlike the case of Mr. Estrada, Democrats have not sought the entire body of Judge Roberts's work but only his memos in 16 cases that they believe might shed light on his legal philosophy. The executive branch has already released mounds of material of indistinguishable sensitivity -- including Judge Roberts's memos to the attorney general early in the Reagan administration. This material was slated under statute and past policy decisions to become public for reasons having nothing to do with the nomination. But at least to some degree it complicates the administration's contention that it can contemplate no disclosure of old attorney-client material.

DOJ_NMG_0002365

Still, the administration's concerns are not trivial. Disclosure of internal documents in judicial nominations has typically occurred in response to accusations of impropriety; there is no suggestion of misconduct in this case. To be sure, turning over the material could establish the precedent that confidential attorney-client material becomes fair game whenever senators are curious to know what a particular nominee thought on a particular issue. The risk that this could chill the willingness of line attorneys to give their candid views is a serious concern.

There is a possible solution that the White House and Senate Democrats should consider. It is not clear that Judge Roberts actually worked on all of the 16 designated cases. Even where he did, deputy solicitors general often don't write detailed memos but frequently annotate case memos written by career assistants, according to former officials of the office. In many of the cases at issue, there may be little or no written work product to examine; and what there is may be distinctly uninformative. An executive privilege dust-up over nothing would be pointless.

The administration should, therefore, begin by specifying what, if any, responsive material actually exists in these cases. This step might narrow the dispute to just a few documents. If those documents seem important to the assessment of Judge Roberts, a procedure could be crafted to allow for examination by senators who wish to satisfy themselves that they contain nothing disqualifying.

Rehnquist Fever Stirs Up Speculation About Retirement (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Supreme Court Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was taken by ambulance to an Arlington hospital yesterday with a fever, but was released promptly.

The brief visit marks his second trip to the hospital in a month and, although much shorter than the two-night stay in July, it still is likely to spawn further speculation that his retirement from the high court could come at any time.

"The chief justice developed a fever today," Supreme Court spokesman Ed Turner said in a brief statement last night. "He was taken to Virginia Hospital Center for evaluation."

Mr. Turner later said the chief justice was evaluated and allowed to go home.

Chief Justice Rehnquist, 80, was diagnosed last year with thyroid cancer and has undergone chemotherapy and radiation treatment. Throughout, the chief justice has maintained a full work schedule and was at the court earlier yesterday.

In July, Chief Justice Rehnquist was admitted to the hospital for two days with the same symptoms.

Then, speculation reached a fevered pitch that he would step down after 33 years on the court and 19 years as chief justice. But instead, he stayed on.

"I want to put to rest the speculation and unfounded rumors of my imminent retirement," he said upon his release from that hospital stay. "I will continue to perform my duties as chief justice as long as my health permits."

If Chief Justice Rehnquist retires, he will give President Bush a second vacancy on the Supreme Court to fill and would begin anew all the political maneuvering on both sides to find a replacement.

The confirmation process for replacing Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who announced her retirement last month, has been smoother than many expected.

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr., her proposed replacement, was applauded by conservatives. But yesterday, the Los Angeles Times reported that he had helped a "gay rights" group win one of the most important Supreme Court cases on homosexuality.

Although Judge Roberts did not write briefs or become deeply involved in Romer v. Evans, which was argued in 1995 and decided in 1996, he did perform pro bono help for Lambda Legal, reviewing filings and helping prepare oral arguments. He also played the role of conservative Justice Antonin Scalia in a mock trial, the Times said.

Judge Roberts was then one of the premier Supreme Court lawyers in the country, working at the Washington firm Hogan & Hartson.

The case, which the homosexual-rights group won on a 6-3 ruling, involved a voter-approved state constitutional amendment in Colorado that barred municipal and local governments from making homosexuals a protected class under civil rights laws.

DOJ_NMG_0002366

Conservatives yesterday downplayed the significance of his involvement.

"The Romer imbroglio is a red herring meant to divide the right," said Sean Rushton of the conservative Committee for Justice. "Roberts was asked by a colleague to represent the conservative view in moot court prep on a pro bono case he did not select and in which he was not centrally involved."

Mr. Rushton added, "It speaks volumes that he was asked to play Scalia."

Rehnquist Treated For Fever (NYT)

By Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who has thyroid cancer, was treated at a hospital yesterday to try to determine the source of a fever, a Supreme Court spokesman said.

The chief justice went home in the early evening without the court or the hospital providing information about the source of the fever.

It was the second time in less than a month that the chief justice, 80, had gone to Virginia Hospital Center in Arlington because of a fever. He spent two nights at the hospital after being admitted on July 12. The cause of the fever in July was not disclosed.

Hours after returning to his home on July 14, the chief justice ended months of speculation about his retirement plans by saying he would continue to serve as long as his health permitted.

The chief justice has been working at the court regularly since his hospitalization in July, said Edward Turner, the court's deputy public information officer.

President Bush has nominated Judge John G. Roberts Jr. to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who resigned on July 1, two weeks before the chief justice entered the Arlington hospital. Mr. Roberts is preparing for Senate confirmation hearings scheduled to start Sept. 6.

Chief Justice Rehnquist has released only sketchy information about his thyroid cancer, which he disclosed last October. He said that he was being treated with radiation and chemotherapy, and that surgeons had created a hole in his windpipe, a procedure known as a tracheotomy, to ease his breathing.

The chief justice did not say what type of thyroid cancer he had. Most patients with thyroid cancer do not need a tracheotomy. The fact that he had the procedure led many thyroid experts not connected with his case to say that they strongly believed that he had anaplastic thyroid cancer, the most aggressive type of that disease.

On July 14, Chief Justice Rehnquist said that he wanted "to put to rest the speculation and unfounded rumors of my imminent retirement" and that he "will continue to perform my duties as chief justice as long as my health permits."

Rehnquist Has Brief Hospital Stay (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was taken to Virginia Hospital Center in Arlington yesterday after developing a fever, marking the second emergency visit in the past month by the jurist, who has cancer. Rehnquist, 80, who vowed just three weeks ago to keep working "as my health permits," was admitted for "evaluation" and allowed to go home, according to Supreme Court spokesman Ed Turner.

Court officials declined to provide further details. Rehnquist has been undergoing treatment for thyroid cancer since November. He spent two nights at the same hospital last month, also after developing a fever.

His latest visit to the hospital comes amid a fierce political struggle on Capitol Hill over appellate court judge John G. Roberts Jr., who has been nominated by President Bush to succeed retiring Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Rehnquist has long guarded his privacy, and has declined to reveal details about his illness. It was diagnosed in October and resulted in radiation and chemotherapy treatment in November.

Doctors not connected to his case have said that fever-producing infections are common in patients who, like the justice, have a surgical opening in their throat to permit breathing. The opening increases the risk of infection in the lungs, bronchial tubes and trachea.

Rehnquist resumed work in December and administered the oath of office at Bush's inauguration. He presided over oral arguments in the spring and has continued to work at the court this summer, hiring three law clerks for the term that will begin in October. Officials said Rehnquist worked at the court earlier yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0002367

After his July 14 release from the hospital, Rehnquist issued a statement denying any intention to step down. "I want to put to rest the speculation and unfounded rumors of my imminent retirement," Rehnquist's statement said. "I will continue to perform my duties as long as my health permits."

His symptoms and reported course of treatments have led many outside experts to speculate that Rehnquist may be suffering from anaplastic thyroid cancer, which leaves most of its victims dead within a year of diagnosis. But Rehnquist's emphatic statement last month and his continued work at the court have led others to believe the disease may be less aggressive.

Bush's Loyalty Raises Doubts About His Political Judgment (KRT)

By William Douglas

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - Former Major League Baseball Commissioner Fay Vincent wasn't surprised this week when President Bush supported embattled Baltimore Orioles slugger Rafael Palmeiro after he tested positive for steroids by saying the star first baseman was a trusted friend.

When Bush owned the Texas Rangers in the early 1990s, he was the only team owner to back Vincent in a confidence vote that eventually led to his ouster from baseball's top job in 1992.

"He was very supportive, very outspoken and all alone. I've never forgotten that," Vincent said. "That showed loyalty, an old Bush family trait and an admirable one."

Bush's loyalty to his friends extends from the baseball diamond to the White House, where he's backed beleaguered Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who's mired in an investigation over who leaked the name of an undercover CIA officer, and to John Bolton, whom Bush appointed ambassador to the United Nations despite Senate reservations.

But the president's quick and unequivocal defense of Palmeiro - who's now the subject of a congressional investigation - has raised questions about whether Bush's loyalty undercuts his political judgment.

"It seems that President Bush is falling into the Nixon trap - his administration can do no wrong. His allies and people who support him can do no wrong," said Robert Dallek, a presidential historian. "Palmeiro is above suspicion, Rove is not to be questioned, John Bolton is a stand-up guy.

"The danger is he divorces himself from public reality, political reality, and it erodes his ability to lead the country," Dallek said.

Several analysts said the Palmeiro situation illustrates that point. Bush took a strong stand against steroids in his 2004 State of the Union address, demanding that major league sports take tougher action to eliminate steroid use by athletes.

"The use of performance-enhancing drugs like steroids in baseball, football and other sports is dangerous and it sends the wrong message - that there are shortcuts to accomplishment and that performance is more important than character," Bush said.

But when news of Palmeiro's positive drug test and 10-day suspension by Major League Baseball became public, Bush almost instantly backed the ballplayer, saying Palmeiro spoke truthfully on March 17 when he wagged his finger at the House Government Reform Committee and emphatically denied ever using steroids.

Bush's fondness for Palmeiro - who recently became only the fourth major league player to slam more than 500 home runs and 3,000 base hits - dates back to when Palmeiro played for the Rangers under Bush's ownership.

"Rafael Palmeiro is a friend. He testified in public and I believe him," Bush said Monday. "He's the kind of person that's going to stand up in front of the klieg lights and say he didn't use steroids, and I believe him. Still do."

Bush's quick defense seemed contradictory to some, in light of his previous tough talk on steroids.

"His defense in this case, so quickly, seemed like an about-face, from taking a stand to a ridiculous statement a fan might make to another fan in a bar," said Richard Lapchick, chairman of the DeVos Sports Business Management Program at the University of Central Florida. "It certainly didn't seem like he thought that one through."

Peter Robey, director of Northeastern University's Center for the Study of Sport in Society, said Bush's defense of Palmeiro dented the president's credibility on an issue that he elevated into the national consciousness.

"He has to be very careful about being consistent," Robey said. "He should temper his support for Palmeiro by coming out with a statement that combines his loyalty to Palmeiro with a drive to rid baseball of steroids. He has to maintain his consistency."

Bush often described himself on the campaign trail as a president who says what he means and means what he says. But Dallek says his consistency sometimes fades when friendship and loyalty arise. He noted that when Rove's name became prominent in the CIA leak investigation, Bush's position on the flap appeared to soften.

In September 2003, Bush had vowed to take "appropriate action" against the culprit. In June 2004, he answered "yes" when asked if he would fire anybody who leaked the agent's name. Last month, his answer was nuanced: "If anyone committed a crime, they will no longer work in my administration."

DOJ_NMG_0002368

It's nothing new for a president to stand faithfully behind staff, family and friends.

- Abraham Lincoln rejected calls to remove Gen. Ulysses S. Grant after his Union troops suffered heavy casualties at Shiloh.

- Richard Nixon held onto aides HR Haldeman and John Ehrlichman long after they had become political liabilities in Watergate, though eventually they were forced to resign.

- Jimmy Carter suffered repeated embarrassments from his brother Billy's intervention into public affairs, but never turned against him.

- The first President Bush stood by to the end as his old Texas friend, Sen. John Tower, fought on futilely against Senate opponents who said his drinking made him unfit to serve as secretary of defense.

"This President Bush is close to his father and much like Ronald Reagan in terms of loyalty," said Karen Hult, a political science professor at Virginia Tech. "Loyalty can get presidents into trouble if they hang on to people too long. But loyalty, on the other hand, can enhance (staff) loyalty and raise morale."

Stephen Hess, a political scientist at George Washington University in Washington, believes Bush's judgment isn't clouded by loyalty. The president had no problem in dismissing Lawrence Lindsey, his economic adviser during the 2000 campaign and the head of his Council of Economic Advisers until his ouster in 2002.

"That showed me he'll carry loyalty to a point - which is part of what presidents do," Hess said.

Of course, Lindsey was let go not long after he estimated publicly that a war in Iraq could cost $200 billion, far above Bush loyalists' line at the time, which may have been seen as disloyal. Iraq war costs will exceed $200 billion in the next year.

How Bush Thinks: Intuition Over Intellect (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

As somebody who doesn't have the slightest feeling one way or another about baseball star Rafael Palmeiro, I have to say that it seems pretty clear Palmeiro has used steroids. Palmeiro recently tested positive for steroid use. And then there's former teammate Jose Canseco's allegation that he and Palmeiro both used steroids, which is impossible to verify but would seem to explain why Palmeiro's annual home run total nearly doubled after Canseco joined him on the Texas Rangers. None of this is ironclad proof, but it seems the simplest way to reconcile the available data.

President Bush, though, doesn't see it this way at all. When asked about Palmeiro's positive steroid test, Bush — who knew Palmeiro when the president owned the Rangers — replied, "Rafael Palmeiro is a friend. He testified in public and I believe him. He's the kind of person that's going to stand up in front of the Klieg lights and say he didn't use steroids, and I believe him."

This statement perfectly crystallizes Bush's thinking. Facts don't matter to him. What matters is how he feels about the person in question. In 2001, for instance, Bush met with Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, and the two hit it off. As Bush later told Peggy Noonan, Putin recounted to him a story involving a cross given to him by his mother.

"I said to him, 'You know, I found that story very interesting. You see, President Putin, I think you judge a person on something other than just politics. I think it's important for me and for you to look for the depth of a person's soul and character. I was touched by the fact your mother gave you the cross.' " Bush publicly testified of Putin, "I was able to get a sense of his soul."

Personally, I put less weight on the fact that Putin got a cross from his mother, and more on the fact that Putin has smothered Russian democracy by outlawing opposition parties, shut down any remotely skeptical media outlet and subjected his critics to political show trials. Yet this sort of evidence has had barely any effect on Bush. Two years later, he was still praising Putin's desire for "a country in which democracy and freedom and rule of law thrive."

Bush is even apt to apply this particular brand of illogic to his own character. In one of the 2000 presidential debates, Al Gore pointed out that Bush as governor of Texas opposed a measure to expand children's healthcare and instead used the money for a tax cut. The debate moderator then asked Bush, "Are those numbers correct? Are his charges correct?" To which Bush replied, "If he's trying to allege that I'm a hardhearted person and I don't care about children, he's absolutely wrong."

The style of Bush's reply is telling. Gore was trying to make a point about Bush's moral priorities by establishing a series of facts about Bush's behavior. Rather than deny having chosen tax cuts over children's healthcare, or explain his rationale for having done so, Bush changed the subject to more comfortable ground: judging people's hearts. He asked the audience to intuit, based on the way he carries himself, that he is a warmhearted person, and thus to reject out of hand any facts that might clash with this impression.

The point isn't just that Bush refuses to engage with facts he finds inconvenient. (Many fail that test.) It's that Bush rejects reason itself. Reason is a process by which we draw our broader conclusions from an accumulation of specific evidence. When the evidence changes ("Hey, this Putin guy seems to be squelching dissent"), our conclusions can also ("Perhaps he doesn't love democracy as much as he said he did!"). Bush, on the other hand, arrives at his beliefs through intuition. His supporters marvel at the unshakeable certainty of his convictions. Well, no wonder.

DOJ_NMG_0002369

Philip Stephens: From Acrimony To Misunderstanding (FT)

By Philip Stephens

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

The groans of European policymakers were scarcely audible this week when George W. Bush sent John Bolton to New York as America's new ambassador to the United Nations. To say Mr Bolton has few admirers in Europe is a serious understatement. In my experience, that has never much bothered him. The new ambassador speaks his mind. Hailing as he does from the assertive nationalist school of US politics, Mr Bolton will forever scorn mushy multilateralism.

Yet the response among allies to Mr Bush's decision to override a recalcitrant Senate and press ahead with the appointment was curiously muted. You could say the decision had been widely discounted. A cynic would add that official Europe is, anyway, on vacation. There is, though, something else. The appointment is seen as yesterday's story, a codicil to a troubled phase in transatlantic relations now left behind.

You have to measure the gain against the loss, one senior European told me. As the official in charge of arms control and weapons proliferation issues at the state department, Mr Bolton had wielded considerable and, in European eyes, invariably malign influence. Condoleezza Rice, the new secretary of state, had understood that. At the UN, the expectation (perhaps hope?) is that Mr Bolton will implement policy rather than shape it. It is the policy that matters.

Here, albeit sometimes grudgingly, Europeans admit real changes since Mr Bush's visit to Brussels at the start of his second term. Another sign of that shift came this week with the administration's redefinition of the effort to defeat al-Qaeda inspired terrorism. Talk of a war on terrorism, the leitmotif of Mr Bush's policy after September 11 2001, has been quietly shelved. Senior officials now speak of a struggle against violent extremism and the enemies of freedom.

What difference do a few words make? Potentially a lot. Mr Bush's phrase framed the threat from terrorism in entirely military terms. The words were too easily interpreted as signifying a conflict with Islam rather than with the terrorists seeking to expropriate that faith. The new language points to a broader strategy encompassing diplomacy, politics and economics as well as security. With luck it could provide the basis for a much-needed strategic dialogue with both Europe and moderate Islam.

There have been other shifts. Mr Bush's stance on Africa and climate change at last month's Gleneagles summit fell far short of European aspirations. Yet even France's Jacques Chirac acknowledged that the US had moved. The same solicitousness was visible in the resolution of a dispute about the role of the International Criminal Court in Darfur and in stronger US support for European diplomacy in Iran.

Elsewhere there have been changes in posture if not policy. Ms Rice's frequent visits to the Middle East underline a determination to make a success of Israel's withdrawal from Gaza. Washington's recent confrontation with a brutal regime in Uzbekistan points to a new sensitivity to charges of American double standards around the world.

None of this has been born of a benevolent altruism in Washington. America's re-engagement with its allies has much more to do with a blunt reassessment of its national interest. The lesson of Mr Bush's first term, and above all, of the bloody chaos in Iraq, is that it is dangerous to exercise power without legitimacy.

There has been a rethink, too, on the European side, not least because of the capacity of transatlantic divisions to fracture European solidarity. "Old" and "new" Europe have become too much of a reality.

What we have now is an absence of transatlantic acrimony and, in many areas (Iraq is an important exception), a predisposition towards co-operation rather than confrontation. That is a big improvement. But it would be a mistake to say it adds up to a reinvigoration of the old alliance. For much of the time Americans and Europeans still look at the world from different ends of the telescope.

The mutual misunderstanding was evident at a recent meeting of senior policymakers and scholars in Venice, hosted by the Council for the United States and Italy. To many of the Europeans present, Iraq still testified to the arrogant unilateralism of the sole superpower. Peering through a different lens, Americans saw a museum in which Europe's political leaders are at once unable to deliver prosperity to their own citizens and unwilling to share the burden of global security.

Behind both analyses lies the reality that Europe is no longer at the centre of America's interests and that Europe's survival no longer rests on a US security guarantee. In this new strategic environment, Europeans crave the institutional order that comes with international law; Americans look out on a Hobbesian world in which US power is the only effective guarantor of western values.

Yet, as Simon Serfaty, a scholar at the Washington-based think-tank CSIS, shows in an excellent new book on the transatlantic relationship*, the one remains dependent on the other. Europe's ambitions for order rely on American power. Washington's necessary quest for legitimacy demands European partnership. The debate, Mr Serfaty rightly argues, should never have been about US power and European weakness but about how their combined strengths can contribute to global order.

DOJ_NMG_0002370

Here, though, on the central question of how to marry power with legitimacy, we are far from a new consensus. Vital though it is, the practical transatlantic co-operation we have seen in recent months masks the underlying clash of strategic cultures. Many (not all) of the old shared instincts have been lost.

Mr Serfaty says the alliance can and should be rebuilt around overlapping interests and compatible, if no longer converging, values. The relationship will never reclaim the intimacy of the cold war era but it can be reinvented as a partnership of action. I find this analysis hard to fault. Yet, looking around at the quality of political leadership on both sides of the Atlantic, we should live in hope rather than expectation.

*The Vital Partnership, Rowman & Littlefield

Foreign Policy? Just Get Tips From The Cabby (NYT)

By Clyde Haberman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

A WASHINGTON man who has just taken a job in New York could probably use friendly advice about getting along with his new neighbors.

After all, it can't be easy for John R. Bolton, freshly arrived to represent President Bush at the United Nations.

Many of his fellow diplomats are not likely to embrace him, given the harsh remarks he has made about the United Nations. When Secretary General Kofi Annan welcomed the new American ambassador the other day, he smiled through teeth so gritted that he may need an orthodontist.

As for other New Yorkers, they don't collectively think much of Mr. Bolton's boss, judging from the last presidential election.

But despite negative stereotypes and jokes, this city tries to welcome newcomers. Bear in mind, too, what Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico told us a few months ago about the ambassador's job, which he held under President Bill Clinton. Don't just hang out in diplo-land, he advised Mr. Bolton. "You have to engage the city," he said.

In that spirit, we'd like to offer Mr. Bolton some tips on possible places to visit and people to meet.

For instance, he might want to get together with the developer Bruce C. Ratner and also with critics of Mr. Ratner's plan to build a sports arena in Downtown Brooklyn alongside skyscrapers that may rise 60 stories.

Mr. Bolton could advise them on acceptable heights for buildings. He knows a thing or two on that score. It was he who once said of the United Nations: "The Secretariat building has 38 stories. If you lost 10 stories today " - and here he sliced the air with his hand to show how to do it - "it wouldn't make a bit of difference." The man is a born urban planner.

Speaking of developers, the ambassador is probably destined to cross paths with Donald Trump. Several years ago, Mr. Trump annoyed Mr. Annan and some other prominent East Siders by constructing a huge residential tower that opponents feared would overwhelm the United Nations campus.

Despite his stated preference for lopping off the tops of tall buildings, the ambassador might hit it off with Mr. Trump. As evidence, we have the Senate testimony of a former colleague of Mr. Bolton who described him as "a kiss-up, kick-down sort of guy." We don't know about the kiss-up part. But with his overworked "you're fired" routine, Mr. Trump qualifies as a kick-down sort. In Mr. Bolton, he could have the beginning of a beautiful friendship, worthy of Rick and Captain Renault.

To shift gears, don't forget that New York is America's news media capital.

This week, Russia announced that it would bar journalists from ABC News because of unhappiness with their reporting, an action that amounted to an expulsion order. ABC News has its headquarters in New York.

This may be a moment for Mr. Bolton to step up to the plate. Considering his own relationship with the news media, he may already be thinking of a possible retaliatory measure - like suggesting that ABC News also be tossed out of New York.

WHEN he has time, Mr. Bolton could go to Yankee Stadium. Mr. Richardson used to take in ballgames with other diplomats. The new ambassador might especially enjoy meeting George Steinbrenner, the Yankees owner. The two men have things in common.

Mr. Bolton has been accused of misusing intelligence reports to overestimate Syria's ability to acquire unconventional weapons. Similarly, Mr. Steinbrenner has misused scouting reports to overestimate the abilities of a series of ineffectual pitchers. The two men, evidently, share a fondness for faith-based analysis.

No doubt, the ambassador will meet the mayor, Michael R. Bloomberg. Unlike some of his predecessors, Mr. Bloomberg does not have a clearly articulated foreign policy. He is openly pro-Israel, but in general he avoids pronouncements on foreign affairs. Mr. Bolton may spot an opportunity to leave his mark at City Hall.

Perhaps he will learn the city simply by walking it. Foreign policy abounds on sidewalks.

DOJ_NMG_0002371

To list a few street names, there is Yitzhak Rabin Way (Israel), Nelson and Winnie Mandela Corner (South Africa), Kudirat Abiola Corner (Nigeria), Brothers to the Rescue Corner (Cuba), United Jerusalem Place (Israel again, though Palestinians have other ideas) and Señor Wences Way (just testing you).

Should you see Mr. Bolton on a stroll, remember to be nice. Never mind this town's prevailing politics. Give him a wave while you're at it. Just use all five fingers, will you?

Democrats See Advantages In Unconventional Candidates (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

DEMOCRATS SEE Ohio near-miss as model for unconventional candidacies.

After Iraq vet Hackett's 48% special election showing in solid Republican district, Democratic campaign chief Emanuel says "recruiting outside the formula" is key to tapping voter discontent. He touts an Indiana sheriff, a North Carolina football star, and a California pilot in 2006 House races. But Republicans, who triumphed with late spending surge, retain big cash advantage.

"This race was a microcosm for 2006 and ... Republicans won," their House campaign spokesman says. Senate Democrats' committee, however, holds $15 million to $8 million cash edge over Republican counterpart. Hackett now mulls challenging Republican Sen. DeWine next year. Republicans court former Ameritrade chief operating officer Pete Ricketts, who announced his departure yesterday, to challenge Nebraska Democratic Sen. Nelson.

Republican governors group outraises Democrats', $9 million to $5.3 million, in first half 2005.

BUSH SEEKS credit for a stronger economy.

After signing the energy bill in Albuquerque, N.M., Monday, he will join economic advisers Hubbard and Bernanke Tuesday to assess conditions. Fears of a "soft patch" fade, as data on industrial output, capital spending and services portray an economy "firing on all cylinders," says UBS economist Larry Hatheway.

Still, wage increases lag behind despite low unemployment, and high gas prices still damp consumer spirits. A break in house-price increases remains a risk; mortgage rates inch up but stay low. Today's July jobless report will give more clues to the labor market's health.

PARTIES JOCKEY over impact of CIA leak.

Democrats two years ago sought a damage assessment over the outing of Valerie Plame, but Congress still hasn't received one. Such assessments are routinely done for unauthorized disclosures of an agent's identity.

The National Counterintelligence Executive has said the Central Intelligence Agency took steps to mitigate real or potential damage. A CIA spokeswoman declines to comment amid the investigation by special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, who has probed the role of Bush strategist Rove and others. Democrats, who would benefit from showing the leak was costly, say Republicans want to play it down.

A CBS poll shows just 28% of Republicans believe the Bush administration is "telling the entire truth" about the leak.

TICKET TO RIDE: Just-passed highway bill repeals three-decade-old ban on commercial trucking licenses for diabetics. Drivers who use insulin will be medically evaluated on a case-by-case basis. American Diabetes Association Chairman Lawrence Smith hails the change as an antidiscrimination measure with "profound effect."

BIRTHDAY BOY: Treasury Secretary Snow, turning 66, swore in his undersecretary for international affairs, Tim Adams, Tuesday by the pool at the Copacabana Palace Hotel in Rio de Janeiro. Adams used a Portuguese Bible; champagne and cigars followed.

MORALE BOOSTER: Secretary of State Rice visits the Millennium Challenge Corp., under attack for implementing the president's foreign-aid program and still waiting for the White House to replace departing boss Applegarth. Rice thanks staffers for their work and says, "I know there are always bugs to be worked out."

BETTER DAYS?: After high-profile defections, the AFL-CIO seeks strength in vote next month by California Nurses Association on joining the federation. Two-thirds of the 65,000 members would have to approve; union leaders back the move as they battle Gov. Schwarzenegger over hospital-staffing levels.

CONGRESS PREPARES to raise deposit-insurance limits.

The House has tried for years to boost the $100,000 ceiling on insured bank deposits. With Senate Banking Chairman Shelby no longer resisting, Virginia financial consultant Bert Ely gives good odds of success.

Shelby plans to move compromise legislation, backed by colleagues Enzi of Wyoming and Johnson of South Dakota, that would index deposit-insurance increases to inflation. A separate plan to boost coverage of tax-deferred retirement savings accounts to $250,000 may be pared down.

Banking lobbyists predict Bush won't veto deposit-insurance increase, despite past opposition.

DOJ_NMG_0002372

MINOR MEMOS: Cheney's trip to services for Saudi King Fahd represents his first overseas funeral as vice president....Former South Carolina Sen. Hollings, in "The American Prospect," says U.S. manufacturing "is so outsourced that an incident with China would cause us to cancel Christmas."

White House Broadens New Fed Chief Search (DMN)

By Danielle Dimartino

The Dallas Morning News, August 5, 2005

Investors woke Thursday morning to the surprising news that the White House is said to be broadening its search for a replacement for Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, who is due to retire in January, according to a report in the Wall Street Journal.

The three candidates most often cited to fill the post include Ben Bernanke, former Fed governor and current chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. Martin Feldstein of Harvard University and R. Glenn Hubbard of Columbia University have been the other two leading candidates.

In a recent report, Goldman Sachs chief economist Bill Dudley said Mr. Bernanke would be the most appealing to market participants.

"His views are well known; he is judged as highly knowledgeable about monetary policy; and he believes in increased transparency and inflation-targeting," Mr. Dudley noted.

But according to the Journal report, though the leading three candidates have not been ruled out, concerns persist about Mr. Greenspan's successor's ability to function within the financial markets and use business and markets contacts to move beyond the confines of economic data to set monetary policy.

The decision on Mr. Greenspan's replacement could be one of the most important of President Bush's decisions while in office.

Mr. Greenspan, who is 79 and started at the Fed in 1987, has raised the profile of the Fed chairmanship to new levels during his 18 years at the Fed and there are worries that his departure could make for an even more nervous marketplace than that typically associated with the changing of the guard at the nation's central bank.

"Historically, there is some evidence that Fed transitions are associated with more volatile financial markets," Mr. Dudley added. "The Treasury bond, stock and currency markets have tended to be more volatile during the first year of the last three Fed chairman's terms compared to their overall tenures."

Among the alternate candidates mentioned in the Journal article is former Bush advisor Lawrence Lindsey. The two people said to be leading the search for Mr. Greenspan's replacement are Vice President Dick Cheney and National Economic Council Director Allan Hubbard.

There is some speculation that Mr. Greenspan's will stay on past Jan. 31, as is allowed if a replacement has not been found or the Senate approval process remained incomplete, but those close to the Fed chairman have said in recent weeks that he has every intention of stepping down as planned at the end of January.

Cell Lines, Moral Lines (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

It is a good idea to expand federal funding of embryonic stem cell research. It is a bad idea to do that without prohibiting research that uses embryos created specifically to be used in research and destroyed.

What is deeply troubling about the Castle-DeGette stem cell bill, which passed the House and will soon roar through the Senate, is that it combines the good with the bad: expansion with no limit.

The expansion -- federal funding for stem cells derived from some of the thousands of embryos that fertility clinics would otherwise discard -- is good because the president's sincere and principled Aug. 9, 2001, attempt to draw a narrower line has failed. It failed politically because his restriction -- funding research only on stem cells from embryos destroyed before the day of that speech -- seems increasingly arbitrary as we move away from that date.

It failed practically because that cohort of embryos is a diminishing source of cells. Stem cells turn out to be a lot less immortal than we thought. The idea was that once you created a line, it could replicate indefinitely. Therefore you would need only a few lines.

It turns out, however, that as stem cells replicate, they begin to make genetic errors and to degenerate. After several generations some lines become unusable.

In addition, there has been a new advance since 2001. Whereas stem cells in those days had to be grown on mouse feeder cells, today we can grow stem cells on human feeder cells. That makes them far more (potentially) therapeutically usable.

DOJ_NMG_0002373

For both of these reasons, the August 2001 policy is obsolete. Accordingly, Congress will soon federally fund research from embryos newly created in IVF clinics.

It simply will not do for opponents of this expanded research to say that the federal government should not force those Americans who find this research abhorrent to support it with their taxes. By that logic we should never go to war, or impose the death penalty, except by unanimous consent of the entire population. We make many life-or-death decisions as a society as a whole, without being held hostage to the sensibilities of a minority, however substantial and sincere.

Nonetheless, Congress's current vehicle for expanding this research, the Castle-DeGette bill, is extremely dangerous. It expands the reach for a morally problematic area of research -- without drawing any serious moral lines.

The moral problem for that majority of Americans who, like me, don't believe that a zygote or blastocyst has all the attributes and therefore merits all the rights of personhood, is this: Does that mean that everything is permissible with a human embryo?

Don't they understand the real threat? It is not so much the destruction of existing human embryos -- God knows, more than a million are already destroyed every year in abortions, and thousands are doomed to die in fertility clinics. A handful drawn from fertility clinics where they will be destroyed anyway alters no great moral balance.

The real threat to our humanity is the creation of new human life willfully for the sole purpose of making it the means to someone else's end -- dissecting it for its parts the way we would dissect something with no more moral standing than a mollusk or paramecium. The real Brave New World looming before us is the rise of the industry of human manufacture, where human embryos are created not to produce children -- the purpose of IVF clinics -- but for spare body parts.

It is this creation-for-the-purpose-of-destruction that needs to be stopped -- and it does not matter whether that creation occurs by joining sperm and egg (as the Jones Institute in Virginia has already done) or by cloning a cell from an adult, turning it into a human embryo and then destroying it for its stem cells.

Both in my writings and as a member of the President's Council on Bioethics, I have advocated this dual policy: Expand federal funding of stem cell research by using discarded embryos, but couple that with a firm national ban on creating human embryos for any purpose other than the birth of a human baby. We finally have a chance to enact this grand compromise -- but only if a majority of senators insist that the welcome expansion provided in the Castle-DeGette bill, which will yield a near endless supply of embryonic stem cells, cannot take place unless the door is firmly closed now, while we still have the chance, on the manufacture of human embryos for research and destruction.

Ignorance Is Bliss; Sometimes It's Policy (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

The ranch at Crawford hardly compares with the Forbidden City, but George W. Bush has something in common with the Ming emperors of China: He seems determined to make his great nation less ambitious and more ignorant.

He wouldn't see it that way, of course, but the emperors didn't see it that way either. And I don't know how else to explain policies and pronouncements that make the quest for knowledge conditional on politics. That is a prescription for decline.

In the early 1400s the Ming emperor Zhu Di made China into the world's leading maritime nation, sending huge fleets on missions of trade and exploration as far as the Swahili coast of Africa. It should have been just a matter of a few years before Chinese sailors discovered the Americas. But Zhu Di's successors, influenced by court politics, called home the fleets and forbade them to sail again, forfeiting the riches of the New World -- and five centuries of global domination -- to an underdeveloped backwater called Europe.

I guess it's a general rule of political dynasties, in China as well as in Texas, that the blood thins with successive generations.

Examples? Well, there's the way Bush insists on hamstringing American scientists who are trying to explore the potential medical benefits of therapies involving embryonic stem cells.

You are excused if your eyes glaze over at the mention of the words "stem cells," but it's enough to know that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, in a rare display of backbone, has challenged the president over his suffocating restrictions on federal funding for stem cell research -- and also that the fight is akin to arguing over what kind of lock to put on the barn door while the horse frolics in the next county.

While our leaders disagree, stem cell technology is being developed and advanced in laboratories all around the world, especially in Asia. South Korean researchers have arguably pushed farther than anyone else. At the moment it's still a long shot that embryonic stem cells will prove to be a panacea, but if they do it's increasingly likely that the key discoveries will be made elsewhere -- not in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0002374

And there's no real reason for Bush's position except politics. All that Frist and other reasonable people want is to be able to experiment on surplus embryos from fertility clinics, embryos that otherwise will be destroyed. But the radical pro-life lobby won't be reasonable, so Bush does his best to keep the United States on the sidelines of what is, at the moment, the most exciting field of medical research.

Then there's this administration's almost comical insistence that the firm scientific consensus on global climate change is some kind of mass hallucination. "What global warming?" they ask, as mean temperatures rise, Arctic ice melts, tropical diseases march north and hurricanes rake poor Florida in swarms.

The much-maligned Kyoto treaty isn't the point. Treaty or no treaty, it looks as if sooner or later the world is going to have to find a way to prosper without spewing so much heat-trapping carbon dioxide into the atmosphere. Other nations are busy trying to develop technology and coping mechanisms to prepare for that day. When it comes, we'll be at or near the back of the line.

Maybe we'll line up all our obsolete SUVs along the coast to try to hold back the rising sea.

To round out the trifecta, the other day Bush reiterated his support for teaching "intelligent design" in America's schools along with evolution, as a way of exposing students to different points of view. This really borders on madness.

Intelligent design isn't a scientific theory at all; it's a matter of faith -- Creationism 2.0. Faith is a different kind of truth. Charles Darwin's landmark discovery of evolution, with a few minor modifications and additions over the years, has proved to be one of the sturdiest and most unassailable scientific theories of all time. To the extent that science can say anything is true, evolution is scientifically true. Done. Settled. As Walter Cronkite used to say, "That's the way it is."

To teach American children in science class that intelligent design is an alternative explanation of how birds, anteaters and people came to be birds, anteaters and people is simply to make American children less well educated than children elsewhere.

By all rights, we ought to remember the Ming dynasty for discovering America; instead, we think of gorgeous pottery but not much else. China's current leaders seem determined not to make the same mistake.

Crossing The Stem Cell Line (LAT)

By David Gelernter

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

I would love to join Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and many other conservatives who have decided to support federal funding for wide-ranging research in a hugely promising new area — embryonic stem cells. I'd love to, but I can't.

Stem cells can be made to generate nearly any type of human tissue, including types that might cure disease and save lives. They are taken from human embryos that are destroyed in the process. But the results might help alleviate horrific human suffering.

In 2001, the Bush administration sponsored legislation to allow federal funding of stem cell research. But funded research was restricted to the stem cell colonies in existence at that time. Frist and others would expand funding to cover new stem cell lines created from frozen embryos left over from fertility treatments, embryos that would otherwise be discarded. (It's possible that new techniques could yield stem cells without destroying embryos, but those techniques are still experimental.)

Why would anyone oppose Frist's new position? Because embryos are potential infants just as infants are potential adults. The human embryo is a tightly closed bud that will bloom one day if we let it. The difference between bud and blossom is only luck and time. If it seems OK to destroy embryos but not full-term fetuses, that's only because embryos look less human. The distinction rests not on justice but on squeamishness.

But this isn't my reason for opposing expanded stem cell funding. I am willing, in principle, to lean on a distinction that is made in the Talmud between "potential" life (such as embryos) and actual life outside the womb. Both must be protected; but actual life ranks higher. If there were nothing more to consider, I'd be willing to use doomed embryos to search for lifesaving new technologies. Reality often forces us to choose between imperfect alternatives.

But to go down that road, I must be able to trust the American public to draw a line and forbid science to step over it.

The doomed frozen embryos Frist is eyeing were created with no thought of mining them for stem cells. But the obvious next step might be to let scientists breed embryos specifically for research, or buy them from dealers. To support Frist, you must be sure that Americans will never permit these ghastly next steps.

Why "ghastly"? Because we can never permit the creation of human life with the intent of using and then killing it. We have no right to construct a world in which two kinds of human embryo exist, one immeasurably precious and the other designed to be cut up for parts. We'd be turning "all men are created equal" into the ugliest kind of lie. (The Talmud, for its part, never allows potential life to be destroyed without a specific, powerful reason.)

Can we trust the American public to forbid the creation of disposable human life? Can we trust ourselves to forbid the premeditated destruction of weak and helpless potential human beings?

No, and the Terri Schiavo case proves it.

DOJ_NMG_0002375

Schiavo was weak, helpless, gravely brain-damaged, "dimly wakeful," unable to feed herself — but not dying. Her parents loved her, and she (they believed) continued to love them.

Yet various courts ruled at her husband's request that her life wasn't worth living. And so her caregivers were ordered to stop feeding her. "Even a chip of ice to relieve the pain of a parched mouth and throat was judicially prohibited," wrote Dr. Paul McHugh in Commentary magazine, "and local sheriffs were alerted to prevent it." She died slowly of dehydration. Surveys suggested that the American public didn't care to interfere, and disapproved of politicians who tried to.

CAN THIS same public be trusted to tell the biomedical establishment "this far and no further"? Of course not. When hard moral judgments were required, whatever the "experts" said was good enough for us. We refused to interfere and draw a line. And so we have no right to allow science to set off down this road.

I have permanent, debilitating injuries that stem cell research might conceivably help. But rejecting research that might help you personally is dirt-easy compared to rejecting research that might help a suffering family member. When Americans campaign for unrestricted stem cell research out of despairing love, I can't blame them any more than I can blame Terri Schiavo's parents for pleading for their daughter's life.

How much do our moral scruples really matter to us in the end? An agonizing question.

But I can't line up with Frist, much as I would like to.

The Duplicate Dog (NYT)

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

The cloning of a dog by South Korean scientists is notable mostly for its display of virtuosity and persistence by the research team. Over the past decade, researchers around the world have cloned a number of mammals, including sheep, mice, cows, goats and pigs. But dogs' reproductive physiology was just too idiosyncratic for easy manipulation. So when a South Korean team announced this week that it had cloned an Afghan puppy, the feat evoked awe and admiration from other researchers.

It wasn't easy. A team of about 15 people worked for nearly three years to extract eggs and implant more than 1,000 cloned canine embryos in surrogate mother dogs. They got only three pregnancies, and only one dog that survived into healthy puppyhood. Although the work demonstrated that dogs could indeed be cloned, that's a horrendously poor success rate. Some dog lovers may be salivating for the chance to clone a favored canine, but that prospect seems far off given the arduous nature of the task. An American company, Genetic Savings & Clone, has spent seven years and $19 million in a quest - fruitless so far - to clone a dog.

The Korean team hopes that cloned dogs may someday be used to study the progression of diseases that are similar in dogs and humans and the use of stem cells to cure them. Conservationists hope that cloning may help them preserve some rare dog species from extinction.

But the larger lesson here is that the Koreans are truly a force to be reckoned with in cloning and stem cell research. This team was the first to clone human embryos and extract stem cells from them, and now it is the first to clone a dog, perhaps the most difficult feat in mammalian cloning. The center of gravity in cloning and stem cell research may be shifting abroad while American efforts are slowed by taboos and financing restrictions.

G.O.P. Wants More Details Of Corzine Aid (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

TRENTON, Aug. 4 - Saying that New Jersey cannot endure another governor hobbled by personal entanglements, New Jersey Republican leaders called Thursday for Senator Jon S. Corzine to disclose any other financial dealings he may have had with a union leader to whom he gave $470,000.

Their statements came after news reports that in 2002 Mr. Corzine provided a $470,000 mortgage to Carla Katz, president of Communications Workers of America Local 1034, which represents 9,000 state workers and will be among the labor groups lobbying the next governor for billions of dollars in wages and benefits.

In an interview with The New York Times on Wednesday, Mr. Corzine, the Democratic candidate for governor, said he and Ms. Katz were dating at the time he made the loan. He forgave the debt in December 2004, several months after they ended their relationship, he said.

Mr. Corzine and Ms. Katz said this week that their past relationship and financial dealings would not prevent them from representing their constituents, but they declined to say whether they had other financial interactions.

DOJ_NMG_0002376

Mr. Corzine's Republican opponent in the November election, Douglas R. Forrester, called that response inadequate, saying New Jersey voters had the right to know whether their official duties as governor and union leader might be swayed by their personal and financial relationship.

"I think they should disclose everything, especially if there is any ongoing financial arrangement," he said. "It suggests an all-too-familiar pattern in New Jersey of public officials entangling themselves in relationships that are not private matters but in direct conflict with the public interest."

While Mr. Forrester approached the topic rather gingerly, saying that he respected their right to privacy, other Republicans were more pointed in their criticism of Mr. Corzine.

After months of criticizing the senator for his connection to an assortment of Democratic power brokers and donors, the state Republican chairman, Tom Wilson, invoked the specter of former Gov. James E. McGreevey who resigned after admitting an extramarital affair with Golan Cipel, a man he had appointed a security adviser.

"A year ago Jim McGreevey announced his resignation, saying he wouldn't allow people to use their personal knowledge of him to threaten the workings of state government," Mr. Wilson said in a written statement. "It seems to me that one year later we can simply substitute the name Jon Corzine for Jim McGreevey and Carla Katz for Golan Cipel. This latest revelation indicates a kind of personal relationship that might again subject a governor to the same kinds of pressures and conflicts all over again."

The discussion of the implications of Mr. Corzine's financial relationship with Ms. Katz dominated the day's events in a campaign that has maintained a surprising intensity during the usually quiet summer months.

Political analysts say it is unclear whether the issue will attract New Jersey voters.

"This is one of those stories people are likely to pay attention to because it's like a TV sitcom," said Ingrid Reed, a professor at Rutgers University's Eagleton Institute of Politics. "There's a girlfriend. A wealthy person. She's powerful, he's likely to be powerful. It's the kind of thing people can identify with. But the fact that it's personal may also make it easier for Corzine to explain, too."

After delivering a speech about domestic security in Jersey City on Thursday, Mr. Corzine found himself facing questions from more than a dozen reporters pressing for more details about his relationship with Ms. Katz.

The senator again declined to say whether he had given her money in addition to the mortgage, but he sought to assure voters that, if elected, his administration would not hesitate to negotiate aggressively with labor unions.

"I don't think there's a conflict," Mr. Corzine said. "The relationship has ended."

Ms. Katz, meanwhile, received support from an assortment of union leaders. Although some labor experts said the money Ms. Katz accepted from Mr. Corzine might create the appearance of a conflict of interest, Candice Johnson, a spokeswoman for the union's national organization, said union officials were not troubled.

"There's nothing illegal or unethical about it," she said. "They had a personal relationship a few years ago. But it's over and she has proven herself a very effective union leader."

Some New Jersey labor leaders said that their confidence in Ms. Katz also remained unshaken.

"It's a personal relationship she had with Jon Corzine, and the decisions we make at the bargaining table have nothing to do with personal relationships," said Hetty Rosenstein, president of Local 1037 of the union. "Carla has been aggressive in representing her members for more than 20 years. There's never been any question about her loyalties. And anyone who knows her knows that she would never let anything distract her from that cause."

Senator Defends Loan To Union Official (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

TRENTON, N.J., Aug. 4 -- Senator and gubernatorial candidate Jon S. Corzine lent the president of New Jersey's largest state workers union $470,000 when the two were romantically involved three years ago, then forgave the debt last year.

Corzine defended the transaction, first described in reports Thursday in the Newark Star-Ledger and the New York Times.

Corzine turned the 10-year mortgage into a gift to Carla Katz last December, according to court documents. The move came a week after he kicked off his campaign for governor and several months after the two stopped dating.

Katz, 46, is president of Local 1034 of the Communications Workers of America. The union local represents 9,000 state workers.

Corzine's involvement with Katz is significant because the two could find themselves on opposite sides of the bargaining table if he wins the November election. Corzine is a Democrat who was elected to the Senate in 2000, and he announced in December that he would run for governor.

DOJ_NMG_0002377

The Republican candidate for governor, businessman Doug Forrester, said Corzine's gift to Katz "suggests an all-too-familiar pattern in New Jersey of public officials entangling themselves in relationships that are not private matters but in direct conflict with the public interest."

Speaking after a news conference Thursday on an unrelated matter, Corzine said the loan would not hamper his administration's ability to negotiate with the union.

"I don't think there's a conflict," said Corzine, 58. "The relationship has ended."

The mortgage was found among public documents and land records filed with Hunterdon County. Katz was living in a more than 200-year-old home at the time of the loan and used the money to buy out her ex-husband.

Corzine, a former chief executive of Goldman Sachs, is estimated to have personal wealth of as much as $261 million. He split from his wife of 33 years in 2002.

In separate interviews with the two newspapers, Katz and Corzine both said they were confident the matter would not compromise their constituents in negotiations.

Corzine, who met Katz in 1999 during his Senate campaign, declined to discuss terms of the loan or details of his relationship with her. The Democrat said he forgave the loan after his romance with Katz ended in July 2004 because she did not have the means to repay it.

He declined to say whether he had given Katz or any of her relatives any other financial help.

"I'm a public official, but I also have a private life," Corzine said.

Katz did not disagree with Corzine's account of the mortgage but declined to discuss the matter with the newspapers.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

Klayman revisited

Larry Klayman — longtime foe of former President Bill Clinton, Judicial Watch founder and former Republican candidate for the Senate seat of Florida — is now a practicing barrister. Mr. Klayman has joined the Cleveland-based law firm Walter & Haverfield LLP and will manage the firm's branches in the District and Miami.

But he's still hungry. The tenacious Non-Friend-of-Bill, who filed 80 lawsuits against Mr. Clinton and former first lady Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, from 1994 to 2004, is armed and ready.

"I remain in the game, and will continue to do work in the public interest," Mr. Klayman said yesterday.

"I am now a private lawyer available to take cases that will help the public. Going into the private sector also will enable me to remain politically active," he continued. "And, by the way, I am supporting Katherine Harris in her bid for the Senate seat from Florida."

Mrs. Harris is running for the seat now held by Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson. Mr. Klayman left Judicial Watch in September to run himself, but lost to fellow Republican — and eventual victor — Sen. Mel Martinez.

Oh Bob, Bob, Bob ...

And speaking of Katherine Harris and former President Bill Clinton's advisers, a bombastic broadcast culture moment came at precisely 4:50 yesterday afternoon. During an appearance on CNN's "Strategy Session," syndicated columnist and Plamegate regular Robert Novak cursed with vigor at Clinton campaign guru James Carville, flung off his microphone and then stormed off the set.

And yes, the barnyard obscenity he used made it onto the air.

The pair had been discussing Mrs. Harris' recent accusations that a magazine had doctored photos of her to yield an unattractive outcome. Was Mr. Novak simply defending her honor?

Most think he was peeved because another round of Valerie Plame questions was imminent — by virtue of the fact that apologetic CNN host Ed Henry later told viewers, "I had told him in advance that we would ask him about the CIA leak investigation. Hopefully, we'll be able to ask him about that in the future."

CNN wasn't pleased.

Spokeswoman Edie Emery called the longtime CNN commentator's behavior "inexcusable and unacceptable," adding that Mr. Novak had apologized to CNN, and the network was apologizing to viewers.

"We've asked Mr. Novak to take some time off," she said.

Judge grudge match

Will they duke it out or play nice? A slim majority of Americans say the Supreme Court confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. will result in a brawl between Republicans and Democrats, according to a Gallup Poll released yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0002378

Just more than half — 51 percent — said the hearings would spark a "major fight that would drag on for a long time," and 42 percent said it would be "a relatively easy process." Seven percent said they had no opinion in the matter.

The survey of 1,006 adults was taken from July 22 to July 24.

Grasping for straws

Newsweek writers Richard Wolffe and Holly Bailey have connected enough dots to decide that President Bush is worried about the controversial, ultra-violent "Over There," a 13-part dramatic series about the Iraq war on the FX channel.

"The art-imitates-real-life idea is breaking new ground in both TV and politics, posing a curious question for President Bush and his aides: Could 'Over There' affect the already-fragile poll numbers on Iraq?" they write in the Aug 3 issue.

Please, Mr. Wolffe, Ms. Bailey. Despite huge media hubbub, only 4 million tuned in for the show's debut last week, according to Neilsen. Frankly, it's a surprise the pair didn't conclude that Mr. Bush was worried about Al Gore's new cable channel, too.

But Newsweek, apparently, can still base a story on a single anonymous source.

"According to one senior Bush aide, the president has voiced a strong interest in the series but hasn't yet seen it for himself," they write. "Bush quizzed his aides last week about how the show was produced and how faithful it was to the conflict. 'Does it really depict what is going on? Do you get a sense of it?' Bush asked. In fact, just a handful of senior aides have seen the show and report it to be 'riveting' and 'pretty vivid.' But the senior aide says, "We don't have an official opinion yet. I don't think enough people have seen it.' "

New Jersey, Part 1

Although one press report this week notes that former New Jersey Gov. James McGreevey is living quietly in a one-bedroom apartment in Rahway, N.J., the man who resigned from office in the name of his own homosexuality may have some excitement just around the corner.

Memoirs, of course.

According to Radar Magazine, Mr. McGreevey is "in the final stages of negotiating a mid-six figure deal" with publishing lioness Judith Regan, whose Harper Collins imprint, Regan Books, is also home to Bernard Kerik, Jenna Jameson, Jose Canseco and Frank Gotti Agnello.

"It will be especially interesting to hear what McGreevey has to say about reports that it was his former homeland security aide Golan Cipel's threats to go public about their affair that led the governor to step down and come out to his family," the magazine noted yesterday, adding that Mr. McGreevey and Mr. Kerik "could get together and share some laughs about the ups and downs of American politics."

New Jersey, Part 2

More drama in the Garden State: Democratic Sen. and gubernatorial candidate Jon Corzine loaned the president of New Jersey's largest state workers union $470,000 to pay her mortgage when the two dated in 2002, then forgave the debt last year.

Mr. Corzine, turned the 10-year mortgage into a gift to former sweetheart Carla Katz just a week after kicking off his campaign for governor and several months after the two stopped dating, the Star-Ledger of Newark reported yesterday.

Miss Katz, 46, is president of the Communications Workers of America, Local 1034, which represents 9,000 state workers and endorsed Mr. Corzine's run for the Senate in 2000.

Mr. Corzine, 58, is a former chief executive of Goldman Sachs Co., worth $261 million and split from his wife of 33 years, three years ago. He insisted the loan would not hamper his administration's ability to negotiate fairly with the union.

"I don't think there's a conflict. The relationship has ended," Mr. Corzine said.

"It is certainly clear that this is more than a relationship between a special-interest group leader and a candidate for public office. You're dealing with the chief representative of the largest bargaining unit under your authority as governor," countered Tom Wilson, the state Republican Party chairman.

NASA Rules Out A Fourth Spacewalk To Repair Shuttle (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

HOUSTON, Aug. 4 - NASA has decided against a fourth spacewalk for the Discovery astronauts that would have involved repairing an insulating blanket that had pulled out near the commander's window.

"We have good news," Julie Payette, the officer in the control room here who handles communication with the crew, told the astronauts at midday. Ms. Payette said mission managers had decided, after a lengthy analysis, that the blanket did not pose a threat and so another spacewalk would not be necessary.

"There is no issue," Ms. Payette, who is also an astronaut, said.

DOJ_NMG_0002379

Later, in an afternoon briefing, however, N. Wayne Hale, the deputy manager of the shuttle program, acknowledged that there was still some uncertainty about the risk posed by the blanket. Much of the upper fuselage of the shuttle is covered with such blankets, which are woven of heat-resistant fabric.

The worst of the heat from re-entry is experienced by the leading edges of the wing and the nose, which are covered with a carbon composite that can hold up under temperatures of thousands of degrees. The underside of the shuttle is covered with heat-resistant ceramic tiles that can take almost as much punishment. The top of the craft, however, experiences far less heating, and so NASA covers it with insulation blankets.

Earlier in the mission, analysts poring over images of the orbiter taken in space saw insulation ballooning at the commander's window.

The damage was apparently caused by a strike by debris during launching, mission managers have said. Analysts were concerned that the puffed-out blanket might expose the orbiter to too much re-entry heat, but were most concerned that the blanket might shed pieces under the stress of re-entry and that those pieces might hit other parts of the craft and cause damage.

The spacewalk would have been the second to make repairs to the shuttle on this mission.

On Wednesday, another astronaut, Stephen K. Robinson, plucked out two protruding gap fillers - thin strips of cloth that ride between tiles - to ensure that the bottom of the orbiter was perfectly smooth. The goal was for the shuttle to avoid abnormal eddies of plasma as it plummets through the atmosphere toward Earth for a landing early Monday.

But any spacewalk, or extravehicular activity, entails risks, and those had to be carefully balanced against the potential for harm posed by the insulating blanket. In her call to the shuttle, Ms. Payette said that a new analysis predicting the course that pieces of the blanket might take did not show a hazard for the shuttle, and that wind-tunnel testing at NASA's Ames research center "came to the same conclusion."

"So, basically, no EVA four," she said in a conversation with one of the astronauts, Soichi Noguchi.

"No EVA four," Mr. Noguchi responded. "That's, I would say, good news."

Efforts to repair the shuttle in orbit have captivated many Americans, including one enjoying his vacation in Crawford, Tex.

"I was amazed at the procedures that took place to repair the craft," President Bush said to reporters at his Texas ranch, where he was meeting with President Álvaro Uribe of Colombia. "It's pretty remarkable."

Mr. Hale said the considerable risks of a spacewalk outweighed the benefit of trying to repair the blanket, especially because mission managers could not figure out a way to do the job effectively. Analysis suggested that the possibility a chunk of blanket might hit some other piece of the shuttle was 11/2 in 100, Mr. Hale said, but many uncertainties remain.

"We are in the first generation of winged space vehicles," he said.

Discovery Gets An All-Clear To Return Next Week (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

HOUSTON, Aug. 4 -- NASA cleared the space shuttle Discovery on Thursday for its flight home next week after concluding that a frayed thermal blanket below the commander's window is not a serious flight hazard.

Wayne Hale, deputy shuttle program manager, said engineers at NASA's Ames Research Center in California tested similar strips of fabric in a wind tunnel overnight at speeds between Mach 1 and Mach 6 -- six times the speed of sound.

Hale said the engineers found that even if the entire blanket tore away at the worst possible time, it had only a 1.5 percent chance of striking Discovery, and, at worst, it could put a hole in the orbiter's rudder brake but not disable it.

"We have released Discovery to reenter," Hale told reporters in a news conference at Johnson Space Center. "We have decided not to take any action on the thermal blanket because we have determined it is a negligible risk at this time."

Formal clearance for reentry is an important milestone in any shuttle flight -- particularly for Discovery, the first shuttle to fly since Columbia disintegrated over Texas 2 1/2 years ago, killing all seven astronauts aboard.

NASA had equipped Discovery with a wide array of new sensors, imaging devices and inspection systems, and it had expected to clear the shuttle four days into the 14-day mission. Instead, during launch the external fuel tank shed a large chunk of foam insulation similar to the one that caused the Columbia disaster. NASA has grounded the shuttle fleet until this problem is solved.

In-space inspections before and during the shuttle's nine-day sojourn at the international space station then turned up two protruding "gap fillers" in the underside heat shielding, and the frayed blanket, a rectangular piece of fabric installed just above the D in "Discovery" painted under mission commander Eileen Collins's window.

On Wednesday, spacewalker Stephen Robinson made the first in-flight shuttle repair in history when he removed gap fillers, but Hale told reporters that Discovery might need another spacewalk for the thermal blanket.

DOJ_NMG_0002380

On Thursday morning, the Hale-led Mission Management Team conducted its daily review with the blanket as the last impediment to reentry clearance.

In Mission Control, shuttle communicator Julie Payette called Discovery shortly after 1 p.m. Eastern time: "We have good news," she said. "The MMT has reached the conclusion that the blanket underneath the . . . window is safe for return. We have new analysis that showed debris . . . would be no issue.

"So, basically, no EVA 4," she concluded, using NASA shorthand for "extravehicular activity" -- a spacewalk.

"That's, I would say, good news," replied Discovery spacewalker Soichi Noguchi.

The astronauts spent the day filling up the Italian-built Rafaello multipurpose logistics module, a cylindrical storage bin that carried nine tons of spare parts and supplies up to the space station and will return with 10 tons of worn-out gear, broken tools and trash.

On Friday, the astronauts will put Rafaello back into Discovery's payload bay and restow other equipment. The shuttle will undock from the station early Saturday and spend Sunday testing flight control systems before landing at Kennedy Space Center in Cape Canaveral, Fla., before dawn Monday.

Scrutiny Of Moonlighting Scientists Criticized (LAT)

By David Willman

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON — Ethics officials at the National Institutes of Health often approved senior scientists' requests to moonlight for drug companies and other outside organizations without gathering adequate documentation to help judge whether the arrangements posed conflicts of interest, federal inspectors have found.

In 81% of the recent outside arrangements reviewed by the inspector general of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, ethics officials were found to have approved the deals on the basis of limited information. This and other findings are included in a report by the inspector general that is to be made public today.

"In no instance was the documentation we reviewed adequate for us to make a definitive determination regarding whether an activity was appropriate," the report said. "Inadequate documentation for outside activities can, intentionally or unintentionally, hide potential violations."

The report found that information submitted by the scientists to NIH ethics officials "included insufficient detail regarding the nature of the outside activities, the nature of employees' official job duties, the differences between the outside activities and their official job duties, the outside organizations, and any NIH funding or partnerships with the outside organizations."

The advance descriptions of the outside positions that NIH scientists proposed to take "were too general to demonstrate that employees' official duties would not overlap," the report said.

The inspector general's reviewers "could not determine the appropriateness of eight activities, and they also determined that two of the activities appeared to violate regulations."

The report also said, "It is quite possible that, due to the approach taken in this review, we have underestimated the number of activities that should not have been approved."

A copy of the 72-page report was obtained Thursday by the Los Angeles Times.

The review marks another condemnation of the NIH's recent policies governing moonlighting by agency scientists. In July 2004, the chief of the Office of Government Ethics concluded that the NIH had a "permissive culture" toward conflicts of interest. The lax policies were largely the result of an agencywide lifting of controls in late 1995 by the director of the NIH at the time, Dr. Harold E. Varmus.

Varmus' successor, Dr. Elias A. Zerhouni, announced sweeping restrictions in February, citing reports by The Times in 2003 and 2004 that exposed the payments by pharmaceutical and biotechnology companies of millions of dollars in consulting fees and stock to NIH scientists.

Zerhouni — prodded by the Department of Health and Human Services, the Office of Government Ethics and congressional leaders from both parties — agreed to prohibit NIH employees from accepting any further payments from pharmaceutical or biotechnology companies.

A group of NIH scientists is actively resisting the tougher ethics rules, which include a provision that would force employees to divest their stock in biomedical companies. They have hired a law and lobbying firm and have called for Zerhouni to relax the ban on consulting for drug companies and to rescind the stock-divestiture provision, which has not yet been implemented.

Zerhouni has said that he is weighing the criticisms and would consider easing the restrictions if he concluded that they were inhibiting the NIH's ability to retain or recruit qualified scientists.

In a written reply to the inspector general, Zerhouni cited the corrective actions that had been taken recently. He said that he generally agreed with the inspector general's findings, conclusions and recommendations.

DOJ_NMG_0002381

The inspector general's review focused on the activities from 2001 through 2003 of 174 senior scientists, a fraction of the agency's more than 5,000 researchers.

Of the 174 whose paperwork was reviewed, 69 requested and received approvals to work with outside organizations. The review focused only on those scientists who, as of January 2004, were required to file a publicly accessible financial disclosure report.

Among those covered by the review were directors, deputy directors and scientific directors of the NIH's research institutes. The terms of the inspector general's review excluded many other influential scientists, including laboratory and branch chiefs.

The inspector general found that among the 174 scientists reviewed, NIH ethics officials approved 319 of 355 requested outside engagements — 90% of the total. Of those, 45 involved consulting or scientific-advisory arrangements with biomedical companies.

Other outside activities were described by the report as "teaching/lecturing," speaking, and serving on nonscientific boards or committees.

Representatives of the inspector general acknowledged Thursday in briefings with congressional staff members that their review did not survey all of the NIH scientists who had worked for biomedical companies. Last year, the House Energy and Commerce Committee contacted 20 biomedical companies and learned that those firms alone had employed 81 NIH scientists who had failed to get required permission or to disclose the income.

At a hearing on June 22, 2004, the committee's top Democrat, Rep. John D. Dingell of Michigan, chided the inspector general for conducting what he termed noninvestigative "desk audits." Dingell was not available to comment Thursday, according to an aide.

A spokeswoman for Daniel R. Levinson, Health and Human Services' inspector general, declined to comment.

OTHER NEWS:

Schwarzenegger To Return Gambling Group Donation (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will return a $50,000 donation from a group that is a partner in a tribal casino project after questions were raised about the governor's pledge to limit political contributions, an aide said.

The governor received a $50,000 contribution last week from Yuba County Entertainment LLC, a partner in a proposed hotel-and-casino development near Olivehurst, about 35 miles north of Sacramento.

The Associated Press questioned the donation because Mr. Schwarzenegger made a promise during the 2003 recall campaign not to accept campaign contributions from groups that negotiate directly with his office. He specifically identified Indian tribal gambling as among those special interests.

"After reviewing the nature of the business and realizing there is a connection to a potential Indian gaming location, we feel it is most appropriate to return the funds," said Marty Wilson, who oversees fundraising for Mr. Schwarzenegger's political committee, called the California Recovery Team.

A company official said it has a variety of business interests in California. "The purpose of the donation was not to primarily back the governor but to back his initiatives that we think are important to the business community," said Alan Waskin, senior vice president and general counsel of Yuba County Entertainment.

Federal regulators must approve the casino project before it can proceed. But if federal approval is given, the tribe would eventually need to negotiate a gambling compact with the governor's office to open the casino.

Critics of the governor said he never should have taken the donation. "It just shows that the governor's fundraising is on automatic pilot," said Jamie Court, president of Santa Monica-based Foundation for Taxpayer and Consumer Rights. "Only when there's a spotlight cast on his activities will he ever think about returning the money."

Offer By Europe Would Give Iran Nuclear Future (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON, Aug. 4 - In a first test of the new leadership in Iran, European negotiators have prepared a sweeping proposal that raises the possibility of Iran acquiring nuclear reactors and fuel, and of achieving a full political and economic relationship with the West, if it ends nuclear activities suspected to be part of a weapons program, Western diplomats said Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0002382

The European offer, drafted with the tacit approval of the Bush administration, is to be transmitted by the end of this weekend as the latest step in a European-American effort to get Iran to abandon its suspected nuclear arms ambitions. That effort has run into repeated difficulties, most recently over Iran's announced intention to resume uranium conversion and enrichment in defiance of European warnings.

Western diplomats who have read the European offer or who know its contents said that it presented a full spectrum of relationships for Iran with the West, from technology sharing to trade preferences to security guarantees, if the Tehran government cooperates on nuclear matters, and also on improving human rights and combating terrorism. They said it was much more detailed and specific than the more general offers floated by the Europeans earlier this year, but they did not describe the offer in full.

Since it seeks a pledge by Iran to end the uranium conversion and enrichment activities that Iran insists are its prerogative under international accords governing nuclear technology, there is considerable doubt that Iran will accept it, at least right away. Iran suspended its nuclear work during the negotiations.

A senior Iranian official, reached by telephone on Thursday, said when told about the contents of the proposal that it seemed to fall far short of what Iran wanted.

"If the proposal asks Iran to continue its suspension indefinitely, let alone renouncing these activities, I think it will be dead on arrival," said the senior official, whose job involves him directly in these matters but who would not be identified by name because he had not seen the document. "I don't think it's prudent for the Europeans to make this presentation, because it shows that they have not moved their position from that of two years ago."

A European official said: "Our proposal pulls together a whole range of different ideas intended to forge a framework for an arrangement between Iran and the rest of the world. There are lots of political, economic and security elements, but the biggest piece is the offer of cooperation on a civilian nuclear program for Iran. We've never said that Iran cannot have one."

Bush administration officials say they cannot comment on the contents of the proposal, except to say that they approved of it. But the administration maintains that it cannot establish a normal relationship with Iran unless it changes its conduct, not simply in the nuclear sphere but in what the United States and the Europeans say is support of terrorism, particularly against Israel, and its interference in Iraq.

Details of the package were disclosed by diplomats who insisted they not be identified even by country because the package is supposed to be secret and its terms have not yet been formally presented to Iran.

The proposal would bar Iran from operating a "closed" nuclear fuel cycle, in which it would effectively control every aspect of fuel production and disposal. Instead, according to the diplomats who have seen it, the proposal suggests that Iran be allowed to acquire fuel and then transfer the used fuel to another country for disposal, precluding Iran from using it for weapons.

More specifically, Iran would be obliged to continue its current suspension of the conversion of raw uranium into a gas that can be enriched for use as fuel with the use of centrifuges that international inspectors have found in Iran in several places. The International Atomic Energy Agency, which has said that it is investigating Iran's failure to disclose many elements of its program, would continue to play its inspection role to ensure compliance with the agreement.

While taking a hard line on uranium conversion and enrichment, the diplomats said, the proposal contains a face-saving provision for Iran conceding its right to certain activities it is being asked to give up. The wording, according to one diplomat, says that nothing in an agreement with Iran affects "the inalienable rights of all the parties to develop research, production and use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes."

In some respects, Iran is not likely to be surprised by the basic outlines of the European proposal. France, Germany and Britain - the partners along with the European Union in the negotiations - have held firm to this broad position of barring uranium conversion and enrichment under pressure from Washington.

The view shared in Europe and Washington is that while Iran may have the right to enrich uranium as a signatory to the Nonproliferation Treaty, which governs peaceful nuclear technology in nearly all countries with civilian nuclear programs, Iran has forfeited that right because it has been found over the years to be engaging in clandestine activities.

Iran's anger that it is being asked to give up activities allowed to other countries is at the heart of its repeated announcement that, like it or not, it will resume such work when it chooses. Indeed, Iran announced last week that it was renouncing its pledge of last year to suspend these uranium activities.

On the other hand, the Tehran government has not unilaterally resumed uranium conversion or enrichment. Instead, it has called on the International Atomic Energy Agency to go to its facilities and break the inspectors' seals on equipment that would be used for these activities, and also to install monitors and sensors for the purpose of observing them.

Iran's announcement was made in the days leading up to the inauguration Saturday of the new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who until recently was the mayor of Tehran.

DOJ_NMG_0002383

It is widely believed in the West that Iran decided to invite the inspectors before Mr. Ahmadinejad took office in order not to taint him with the move or force him to make one of his first decisions in defiance of the wishes of the Europeans.

Several diplomats said that it was shrewd of Iran, in political terms, to invite the International Atomic Energy Agency to its nuclear facilities to break the seals and install monitors and sensors. That way, these diplomats said, Iran can claim to be showing the world that, while it is proceeding with uranium processing, not a single gram of fuel will go to a weapons program.

The international agency, meanwhile, has been taking its time before installing the sensors and monitors, to give the Europeans time to refine their proposal. The Europeans have rushed the proposal to meet a deadline of this week and have begun hinting that if Iran rejects it outright, or forces the seals to be broken, some countries may call for the agency's board to meet next week to address the matter.

That Iranian tactic, said several Western diplomats, seems clearly intended to woo wavering board members of the agency - notably Russia, China and several other countries with similar enrichment programs - that it is acting in good faith and doing what other countries are allowed to do. They expressed concern about getting enough votes on the board to refer the matter to the United Nations Security Council for possible sanctions.

Tehran Defiance Spells Collapse Of Nuclear Talks (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, August 5, 2005

Nearly two years of delicate negotiations between Iran and the European Union over the Islamic republic's nuclear programme could be on the point of collapse on Friday, setting the scene for a confrontation at the UN.

Senior Iranian officials told the Financial Times that talks with France, Germany and the UK – the EU3 – would be over if their latest proposed incentives do not give approval for Tehran to resume work at a key facility at Isfahan.

Ambassadors of the EU3 were expected formally to deliver the package of proposed incentives to Tehran's foreign ministry early on Friday.

However, one senior official involved in the talks said that: "According to our information the EU proposal does not include resumption of conversion activities in Isfahan."

The official added: "This means the end of this round of talks with Europe. Iran has decided to resume activities in Isfahan and no one at home and abroad can stop it."

A senior European diplomat in Tehran conceded that the "proposal is not the one Iranians want".

Under the Paris Agreement reached with the EU3 last year, Iran suspended nuclear fuel cycle activities that western governments suspect are part of a clandestine weapons programme.

The suspension agreed in Paris included processing work at Isfahan, where raw uranium is converted into uranium hexafluoride gas, and the next stage at Natanz where the gas is enriched through centrifuges to provide nuclear fuel.

The EU3, backed by the US, have warned Iran that ending any part of the suspension would lead them to refer the issue to the UN Security Council.

The US drive for punitive action is being led by John Bolton, the new US ambassador to the UN, who failed to win confirmation by the Senate but was still appointed by President George W. Bush.

Some analysts and diplomats are sceptical the Bush administration can win enough support for serious measures to be taken against Iran.

"The American case will be represented by a non-confirmed ambassador who has been accused of distorting intelligence on proliferation issues," commented Ray Takeyh, analyst at the independent US Council on Foreign Relations.

The EU3 is seeking an extraordinary board meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna on Monday. But diplomats do not rule out further talks with Iran.

One EU3 diplomat said the European Union and the US were "on their way" to getting a majority on the IAEA board to take Iran to the Security Council, using the argument that Iran had deceived the UN watchdog for years over its nuclear programme and had been in breach of its safeguards commitments.

Iran insists that its nuclear programme is for civilian use only and that it has a right under the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty to develop the nuclear fuel cycle.

Senior Iranian officials said Iran was not bluffing over its threat to reactivate Isfahan as some EU3 diplomats suspect. "We are serious and also upset about Europeans' failure to deliver promises," said one Iranian.

However, the officials said Iran had not decided finally when to break IAEA seals at the facility. While members of the negotiating team want Iran to wait for inspectors from the IAEA to come and monitor, other hardline decision-makers "who now have the upper hand" want an immediate start.

DOJ_NMG_0002384

They accused the IAEA of playing for time by saying it needs to send more equipment and said it was possible that Isfahan could "go on stream" this weekend, possibly with foreign reporters present.

Why Pressing Iran Over Nukes Is A Difficult Road (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, August 5, 2005

WASHINGTON - The Iranian government is playing what is being called "a game of chicken" with the international community, first threatening to restart a key element of its suspended nuclear program this week, and then putting it off - only to announce it will reopen a sealed uranium conversion plant next week after all.

Regardless of whether the Iranians, who are in the midst of a postelection political transition, follow through on the threat, their recent actions - and the response of Western nations - suggest that a full-blown confrontation between the powers is probably not imminent, experts say.

The Europeans don't want one - and the Americans don't appear to be ready and united for one.

The three European countries that have been negotiating with Iran for a full suspension of its nuclear program did stick together and threaten Iran with reprisals - including referral to the United Nations Security Council - if it proceeded with plans to restart its nuclear efforts. That stand surprised some in the Bush administration and seemed to validate President Bush's second-term veering toward greater cooperation with allies.

But with the "EU 3," as Britain, Germany, and France are called, set to offer Iran extensive economic incentives in exchange for ending its nuclear ambitions, the Europeans continue to favor a strategy that differs widely from the Americans'.

Iran is on the US list of state sponsors of terrorism, and US officials worry that a nuclear Iran would become a conduit for nuclear materials to other states or terrorist groups.

Divisions over Iran that characterized US policy during the first Bush term are on display again. When the freshly appointed US ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, made his introductory rounds in New York this week, he reportedly broached the subject of Security Council action against Iran in talks with fellow ambassadors.

As the past undersecretary of State for arms control, Mr. Bolton was one of the administration's principal hawks on Iranian nukes.

But Bolton was debuting at the UN even as a new National Intelligence Estimate surfaced, first in an apparent leak to The Washington Post, that doubles to 10 years the estimated time it would take for Iran to develop a nuclear weapon.

For some US experts, the estimate undercuts the viewpoint that action is urgently needed, making a tough international stance with Iran unlikely.

"The US and its allies are not in a position to talk about real, meaningful measures to punish Iran [for proceeding with its nuclear program]," says Daniel Brumberg, an Iran expert at Georgetown University in Washington.

He says the Europeans "are trying to play it tough, but the Iranians know it would be difficult for them to ever go through with it." At the same time, he says the Bush administration is not united on how far and how fast to proceed on Iran- not to mention the "delicate factor" of Iran's influence in Iraq and the cooperation the US needs for progress there. "They are on the horns of a dilemma that is of their own making," he says.

The flurry of discussion over Iran's nuclear ambitions came as Iran installed on Wednesday its new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Western observers expect the new president to adopt a more confrontational tone with the West and particularly the US - an approach closer to that of the reigning conservative mullahs than that of outgoing reformist president Mohammad Khatami.

In a letter to the EU3 foreign ministers, the lead Iranian negotiator in the talks, Hassan Rohani, said that Iran is intent on pursuing both the negotiations with the Europeans and its nuclear program, which he insisted is for peaceful purposes.

For some experts, this is part of the same strategy that has allowed Iran - not to mention North Korea - to advance in nuclear know-how. "We've seen this game before," says Jon Wolfsthal, deputy director of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Project at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Mr. Wolfsthal says recent events appear at first glance to be a boon to the US, since the topic of Iran could reach the Security Council - where the Bush administration has long wanted it - without the blame for a negotiation failure to fall on the US.

But he questions how "successful" the US strategy of not directly negotiating with problematic nuclear wannabes like Iran and North Korea really has been. North Korea is thought to have quadrupled its number of nuclear weapons during the Bush presidency. "If the proof is in the pudding, then the results are not very good," he says.

Iran still wishes to avoid referral to the Security Council, but at the same time it knows that a referral is unlikely to result in any tough sanctions any time soon, most experts agree. "The unanimity isn't there," says Georgetown's Mr. Brumberg. He notes that Russia has close ties to Iran and is building a nuclear reactor there. Iran has also been developing relations with China and India.

DOJ_NMG_0002385

US calculations on Iran are influenced by the key role that Iran plays in neighboring Iraq, experts say. With the Bush administration hoping to reduce troops, avoiding destabilizing trouble with Iran will be uppermost in some minds.

Henry Sokolski, director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center, says he sees such political calculations in the intelligence estimate for Iran that now puts any bomb a decade away.

"There may be some involved in the report who are frightened that Bush would use anything more imminent as a pretext to bomb, or others who got cold feet after the Iraq WMD intelligence that went wrong," Mr. Sokolski says.

In any case, he dismisses the estimate, noting the US developed its bomb in less than a decade. "Are we saying the Iranians are further behind technically than we were in 1940? It's absurd."

Revolutionaries Come Of Age (WSJ)

By Farnaz Fassihi

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

TEHRAN, Iran -- Amir Reza Ashtiani, a 46-year-old Tehran City Council member and a prospective minister in the cabinet of Iran's newly elected president, sat at a district council office in one of Tehran's poorest slums and listened to residents complain about inflation, high taxes and unemployment.

He scribbled notes, shook his head in acknowledgment and promised to discuss their concerns at City Hall. Mr. Ashtiani, an industrial engineer and self-made man who benefited from a revolution that empowered the poor, was born in this neighborhood and remembers splashing in the sewage-filled waters of the narrow canals. Now, he is one of a new breed of Iranian populists that appear likely to sweep into national office on the coattails of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the surprise winner of Iran's presidential election in June.

"We are not like other officials. We won't draw a line between ourselves and the public and look down at them," Mr. Ashtiani says. "We have lived their difficult lives and now that we are on top, we are not going to forget them. This is why we had the revolution."

Iran's president-elect will be sworn into office on Saturday, having been endorsed by Iran's supreme leader Wednesday. He is expected to name to his cabinet men like Mr. Ashtiani, well-educated technocrats -- and die-hard loyalists to the hard-line clerical regime that rules the country.

The group, called usolgaran or "principalists," in a reference to the group's commitment to the principles of Islam, is rapidly rising to power in Iran. Some political analysts see them as the regime's last hope for regaining popularity and staying in power.

"The rise of the Iranian neoconservatives has given the regime a unified voice," says Davoud Bavand, a political analyst in Tehran. But, he adds, it remains to be seen whether they use it to open and nurture the economy or to pursue political rhetoric at the risk of stifling sanctions.

Mr. Ahmadinejad's victory gives hard-liners control of all key sectors of government in Iran: Tehran's city council (which usually sets the agenda for other Iranian cities), Parliament and now the presidency. A turning point came two years ago, when hard-liners won Tehran's city council from the reform movement that had controlled the presidency, Parliament and city council since 1997. The reformers' popularity had waned as voters grew frustrated with their failure to deliver on promises.

Now, it is Mr. Ahmadinejad's turn to deliver on promises, such as improving the life of Iranians besieged by an unemployment rate that stood at 11% last year, inflation that remains stubbornly above 15% and widespread corruption. The success of this domestic agenda is intertwined with foreign policy. It may hinge, above all, on whether Iran's government will back off from its nuclear-enrichment program.

Iran's ruling clerics, who appear in control of the country's nuclear decision making, have been uncompromising in the face of Western demands that Tehran give up all nuclear ambitions, even for peaceful purposes, to assure the country won't use the program to produce weapons. Iran already has announced it plans to restart its enrichment program regardless of pending negotiations with Europe. Both the U.S. and its European allies have stated that such a move by Iran will lead to Iran being referred to the United Nations Security Council for economic sanctions.

So far, Iran has backed off on its rhetoric when the threat of sanctions has become imminent. Western diplomats in Tehran say the regime fears sanctions will cripple an already-troubled economy, increase unemployment and inflation and turn the population against it.

Mr. Ashtiani, who has served as the new president's economic adviser and is being pegged as the next minister of industry, is the son of a shopkeeper and grew up in one of Tehran's poorest districts. In high school he listened to underground speeches at the local mosque. When revolutionary fervor hit the streets in the late '70s and the Shah was ousted, he was a freshman at Tehran University's engineering college and an active student revolutionary.

DOJ_NMG_0002386

At the age of 20, he was named the managing director of a food factory the government had confiscated from private owners. Mr. Ashtiani continued his career as manager of various government factories until two years ago, when he resigned to become a full-time city council member.

Like many of Mr. Ahmadinejad's close aides, Mr. Ashtiani says he owes his success and his political rise to the revolution and will do anything for the regime's survival. "We were willing to give our life for the regime during the war," Mr. Ashtiani says. "Now, we will safeguard it with all our means."

They say they favor privatization, but also promise equal sharing of wealth. They say they recognize that tackling unemployment requires foreign investment, but have announced that Iranian companies will be favored over foreign ones in big projects in the oil-and-gas sector. Mr. Ashtiani and his colleagues say they support reform, but not the gradual democratization and scaling back of the powers of unelected clerics that departing reformist President Mohammad Khatami had promised, but ultimately failed to deliver.

"Reform is wrong if we are talking about upheaval of the system," Mr. Ashtiani says. "We believe that Islam has the answer to everything: economy, politics and social issues. We want reforms that will bring the system closer to the purist visions of Islam and our revolution."

Graphic Novelist Marjane Satrapi On The Life Of A Writer In Exile (WSJ)

By Jeffrey A. Trachtenberg

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

When Marjane Satrapi was only 14 years old, her Iranian family wrangled a visa and sent her to live in Europe. The Islamic Revolution was then unfolding, and all of Iran, including Tehran, was turning increasingly conservative in thought and dress. Ms. Satrapi's parents worried that their only daughter, feisty and head-strong, would end up in harm's way and sent her to live with a family friend in Vienna. In 2003, Bertelsmann AG's Parthenon Press published "Persepolis," Ms. Satrapi's eye-witness memoir told in the form of a graphic novel.

In an intimate story enhanced by her drawings, Ms. Satrapi explains what it was like to be forced to wear a veil; her first crush on a boy; the terror and bloodshed created by the Iraqi invasion, and her growing realization that the Iranian regime was turning more repressive. Ms. Satrapi rebelled by tacking up smuggled posters of Kim Wilde and Iron Maiden. But when she expressed herself publicly by wearing Nike sneakers and a Michael Jackson pin, she was chastised on the streets by Tehran's fundamentalists. It was time, her parents decided for her to move abroad.

Ms. Satrapi recounts her early life in exile in "Persepolis 2," published in hardcover in the U.S. in 2004 and recently issued in paperback. In many ways, this is a much darker book. Although she did well in school, Ms. Satrapi had a difficult time fitting in socially. She missed her parents, and then fell in with a group of oddballs. Later came a serious round of drug use, and a failed love affair. After a fight with her landlord, Ms. Satrapi spent more than two months on the streets in Vienna before becoming seriously ill. After she recovered, she returned home to Iran. Once again, she had trouble fitting in. She eventually married, divorced and then moved to France, where she now lives.

The author, now 35, writes in French and recently published her third book, "Embroideries," which discusses the romantic lives of various generations of Iranian women. Ms. Satrapi, who has 350,000 hardcover and paperback books in print in the U.S., a substantial number in the publishing world, spoke recently to The Wall Street Journal's Jeffrey Trachtenberg by telephone from her home in Paris.

WSJ.com: Do you view yourself as an immigrant or as somebody living in exile?

Marjane Satrapi: I'm in exile. I would rather live in my own country. People have different reasons for emigrating, but most of the time it has to do with economics. I had everything in Iran and left to live in a studio.

WSJ.com: Do you have an Iranian publisher?

Ms. Satrapi: No, but I know the books are read. Iranians who speak a second language most often learn English. There is an underground in Iran, but I haven't gone back for five-and-a-half years, so there are many things of which I'm not aware.

WSJ: Has there been a backlash against your parents in Iran because of your books?

Ms. Satrapi: Nobody has bothered them. Nobody has harassed me, either. The thing is that you don't know what will happen there. You more or less know the risks in France. There are limits. But in Iran everything could be great one day and the next they could put me in jail. I prefer not to take the risk. My parents are grownups; they are not responsible for me. If they have a crazy child, it's not their fault.

WSJ.com: Can you visit?

Ms. Satrapi: I'm allowed. Nobody will tell me not to come. The issue is whether I can return to France. It depends on so many things. In the Iranian system you have a system within the system. You never know what can happen. You can't count on anything.

DOJ_NMG_0002387

WSJ.com: What are the major misconceptions that Americans have about the Middle East?

Ms. Satrapi: Two years ago when I came to America and criticized the [Iraq] war, the only articles that appeared talked about my sunglasses. Nobody talked about the fact that I said the people there are like you. Now what I say is starting to appear in magazines and journals.

WSJ.com: The World Factbook estimates that the median age in Iran is 24, or 12 years younger than the median age in the U.S. What will this mean for the conservatives now running Iran?

Ms. Satrapi: It's an extremely young country, a dynamic country. The young people try. They want more freedom. But the constitution is made in a way that the president and the parliament don't have that much power. The Guardian Council decided everything. It's a completely closed system. But evolution is a process and nothing can stop it. Women have half of the rights of the men, but 64% of Iranian students are women. For me, this is evolution.

WSJ.com: At one point in your second book you suggest that satellite television exposed the people of Iran to a wider world. Did that have any impact?

Ms. Satrapi: Or course. But there was lots of nonsense with MTV and dancing. The Internet is more important. It presents other points of view. People have access everywhere, they get information. Even though I don't go back I can remember 15 years ago that when I showed a little hair I could be stopped in the street. No longer. Now women show almost all their hair. The regime isn't smoother, but social reality has changed. They can't stop everything without getting an explosion.

WSJ.com: Why did the ruling clerics do so well with Iranian voters in the recent election?

Ms. Satrapi: The reason is simple. Many didn't vote because they didn't want to participate. Also, 15% of the population is fanatics. It's the same in every country. But it's also true that poor people voted for them. [Iran is] a rich country, but we have 15 million living in real poverty. The guy who won lives where the poor live and says he isn't corrupt and will share the money. This is something. Once people aren't hungry anymore they will want more freedom.

WSJ.com: You end "Persepolis 2" by noting your grandmother died while you were away. Do you feel resentment that you weren't there to be with her?

Ms. Satrapi: Of course. I'm a person who is in love with my country. I love Iran and the Iranian people and I'm not for a bloody revolution. I'm against war. I'm much more for a slow evolution based on the truth. During the Shah we didn't have to wear a veil. But the country was very macho and you had to be a virgin even if you wore the shortest miniskirt. We looked Westernized and fancy, but we were without depth. Today, women understand that if you want rights you need to work and be economically independent. This is what helps a country go forward. And these things are happening in Iran.

WSJ.com: Did any graphic novelists inspire you?

Ms. Satrapi: I don't come from a culture of comics. I thought they were funny and for adolescents. Then I saw Art Spiegleman's 'Maus." I felt free. I didn't have a complex any more. It was, 'He did it, I can do it too.'

WSJ.com: Do you write your stories first and then draw them?

Ms. Satrapi: No, I become too sentimental and lose my sense of humor. I write and draw at the same time. It's like a baby in the belly. All of it goes on at the same time. At the beginning I have a vague scenario but I never know how I'll finish. What I want to talk about changes a lot. I like to be surprised by the story, which I don't always control.

Multiparty Talks With North Korea Nearing Collapse (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

BEIJING -- Talks aimed at persuading North Korea to give up its nuclear-weapons ambitions teetered on the brink of collapse, with Pyongyang insisting it wouldn't give in to demands that it also abandon atomic-energy programs.

Even usually optimistic China, which is hosting the six-nation talks, hinted that an agreement might be impossible.

Speaking to a crowd of reporters outside the gates of the North Korean Embassy last night, Kim Kye Gwan, Pyongyang's chief envoy to the talks, said: "We want the right to peaceful nuclear activities. All the countries in the world have this right."

Washington has insisted that North Korea dismantle all its nuclear programs, civil and military, saying it would be too easy to use civilian atomic-energy activities as a cover for maintaining the pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Kim also called on the U.S. to "drop its hostile policy, normalize relations," and reassure North Korea that the Asian nation isn't threatened by U.S. nuclear forces. He said the talks were at a "stalemate," but said Pyongyang would keep negotiating.

Participants at the meetings, representing Japan, Russia and South Korea in addition to the U.S., North Korea and China, have been struggling to draft a joint statement of principles to serve as a guide for eventual settlement of the standoff.

DOJ_NMG_0002388

Failure to produce an agreement could derail diplomatic efforts to end the dispute, which began in 2002 when, U.S. officials say, North Korea admitted it was pursuing covert efforts to enrich uranium for nuclear weapons. Pyongyang since has issued repeated denials.

At a news conference, the spokesman for the Chinese delegation, Qin Gang, raised the prospect that the negotiations could end without an agreement. "A joint declaration is not a measure for whether or not the six-party talks are a success," he told reporters.

A lack of progress also could encourage the U.S. to ask the United Nations to condemn or impose sanctions on North Korea. It is far from clear, though, that such a move would receive support from either China or South Korea, which are Pyongyang's main economic benefactors.

Christopher Hill, the top U.S. envoy, said, "There are differences between [North Korea] on the one hand and the other parties on the other." Mr. Hill said the U.S. is pressing for clarity about just what the North Koreans are willing to give up. "We are talking about nuclear weapons," he said. "We cannot have a situation where the North Koreans pretend to abandon their nuclear weapons and we pretend to believe them."

Delegates from the U.S., North Korea and South Korea met yesterday afternoon. Song Min Soon, the chief South Korean negotiator, said the North Koreans "expressed their positions clearly," but he declined to comment further. Mr. Hill would say only that "It was a useful meeting."

Negotiations were set to continue today. But diplomats said progress depends on North Korea's willingness to agree to the joint statement of principles that has, generally, been approved by the other parties.

But despite heavy pressure by China on North Korea, last night's remarks by Pyongyang's chief delegate, didn't strike a compromising tone. Mr. Kim, who is the North's vice foreign minister, said, "We have not been defeated in war and we didn't do anything wrong. Why can't we have peaceful nuclear activities?"

He also said the U.S. would have to withdraw its "nuclear threat" against the North before Pyongyang could agree to give up its weapons programs. North Korea has said Washington must stop providing a "nuclear umbrella" -- essentially the threat of nuclear reprisals -- to protect South Korea, a U.S. ally. The U.S. has rejected the demand.

N. Korea Talks Near Impasse, But Will Go On (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

BEIJING, Aug. 4 -- Diplomats seeking an agreement on principles for North Korean nuclear disarmament decided Thursday to hold further negotiating sessions despite fundamental differences that have left them deadlocked after 10 days of talks.

Christopher Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs and the chief U.S. delegate, said an accord proposed by China on dismantling North Korea's nuclear programs has been accepted by five of the six nations involved in the talks: the United States, South Korea, Japan, Russia and China. North Korea, he told reporters, is the holdout.

Nevertheless, Hill said, delegation leaders meeting Thursday evening resolved to keep trying to whittle away differences for another day or so. At the same time, he added, the United States is insisting on clarity, leaving no room for diplomatic ambiguity or the papering over of disagreements.

"We cannot have a situation where the North Koreans pretend to abandon their nuclear weapons and where we pretend to believe them," he said.

North Korean Vice Foreign Minister Kim Gye Gwan acknowledged to reporters that the talks had reached a "stalemate," according to the Associated Press.

"We are for denuclearizing, but we also want to possess the right to peaceful nuclear activities," Kim said. "As you know, only one country is opposing that," he said, referring to the United States.

Nuclear Explosion (WSJ)

By Fred C. Ikle

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Sixty years after Hiroshima's fiery destruction by only one bomb, here is where we have arrived: The proliferation of nuclear weapons continues apace, and stopping it is now a top priority of our foreign policy. It was a driving motive for the war against Saddam Hussein, it ceaselessly fuels our conflict with North Korea, it exacerbates our relations with Iran, and we are in fear of terrorists with a nuclear bomb. Eleven American Presidents, from Harry Truman to George W. Bush, sought to prevent this. The U.S. started with a nuclear monopoly. So how did we get into this mess?

'Atomic Bomb'

DOJ_NMG_0002389

The news about Hiroshima reached the White House on Aug. 5, 1945 -- precisely 60 years ago. President Truman's statement next morning informed the world of the "atomic bomb" and the Manhattan Project. Four days later, the A-bomb attack on Nagasaki prompted Japan's surrender and ended World War II. Since then, America has devoted immense effort to the nuclear problem -- an intellectual, political, and military endeavor that has no parallel. We know how we entered the Nuclear Age. We do not know how to exit from it.

First we tried arms control to kill the monster in its cradle. The U.S. advanced the Baruch Plan to confine nuclear technology entirely to peaceful uses. After Stalin rejected the plan, we began to build atomic bombs at a leisurely pace: Nine in 1946, 13 in 1947, and, by the time North Korea invaded South Korea, we had some 300 atomic bombs, the Soviet Union perhaps five. Barely 20 years later, each of the two superpowers had tens of thousands of nuclear weapons. This did not come as a surprise. At the outset, our nuclear scientists had predicted that if the total ban on nuclear weapons failed, the superpower arsenals might grow a thousand-fold. They also warned that H-bombs could be built that were a thousand times more destructive than the A-bomb. And they left no doubt that other countries would be able to acquire nuclear weapons.

President Eisenhower became deeply concerned about these trends. Based on careful deliberations, he decided in December 1953 to launch the Atoms for Peace Program at the U.N. His address received more praise -- at home and abroad -- than any other presidential speech. The purpose of Atoms for Peace was to enlist international support against weapons proliferation by donating or selling nuclear technology labeled "peaceful." Spurred by this American multilateralism, a shopping mall opened, making U.S., Soviet, Canadian, French, British, and other reactors available for "peaceful" research and electric power. This "peaceful" technology was sold or donated to Iraq, North Korea, Iran, Vietnam, the Congo, Laos, India, Pakistan, etc. No other U.S. policy, no commercial initiative, no theft of technology has done more to accelerate and expand the global spread of nuclear bombs. There is an echo of Greek tragedy here: Arms control initiatives meant to avert a calamity morph into the agent that exacerbates the feared outcome. * * *

Today, the Bush administration is being pressured to purchase a halt in North Korea's nuclear bomb-making. Members of Congress and editorialists urge the president to "engage" North Korea with generous economic and political gifts. Such "engagement" could award us with the fifth (or would it be the seventh?) arms agreement that North Korea violates. And it would tell other rogue nations that they ought to try the same blackmail.

Currently, we are against nuclear proliferation mainly because of rogue states: North Korea might sell bombs to anyone with cash, a nuclear-armed Iran might embolden Hamas terrorism. During the Cold War, we opposed proliferation because it might destabilize the fragile balance of terror between the superpowers. At that time, the scholastics of nuclear strategy invented enough "deterrence" concepts to fill a library, and many credited "mutual deterrence" for the fact that, since 1945, not a single nuclear attack occurred. The long holiday of non-use is indeed a stellar accomplishment. Yet deterrence does not deserve all the credit. The intervention of providence also helped.

Deterrence can ward off deliberate attacks; it cannot prevent an accident or dissuade a madman. But such perils must not be ignored. Until 1957, U.S. nuclear weapons had no safety locks, and sometimes just one person (say an airman) might have been given access to a weapon. One man alone could have triggered an unauthorized nuclear detonation. I recall this problem well because I analyzed it at RAND, then an Air Force think tank. My study recommended that two people always be in charge of critical controls and that coded locks be installed to safeguard nuclear weapons and missiles. RAND sent me to brief the Pentagon. Luckily, Gen. Curtis LeMay heard of it, and being a steely guy, he knew how to cut through bureaucratic molasses. He commanded a blizzard of actions to implement every one of the recommendations.

Other risks of an accidental nuclear cataclysm come to mind. In 1980, the Pentagon was alerted that a Soviet missile attack was on its way. That alert was due to computer error. Equally serious incidents might still be secret and dangerous flaws might not yet have been discovered. In light of such unfathomable risks, one has to be something of a wimp to root for Mutual Assured Destruction, the MAD doctrine which bans missile defense but tolerates a confrontation of offensive missiles forces, primed to execute mutual genocide. Failure to grasp the magnitude of this gamble betokens a lack of emotional strength. President Reagan saw through the MAD theorizing and had the courage to call for radical cuts in strategic forces, combined with missile defense. Two decades later, George W. Bush and Vladimir Putin realized that the confrontational nature of MAD would poison U.S.-Russia relations. Yet when President Bush decided to end the missile ban, benignant votaries of arms control became enraged and predicted Russia would respond with a huge expansion of its missile force. Perhaps they were disappointed when Mr. Putin did no such thing. * * *

More episodes from the 60-year search for an exit are worth recalling. But I shall turn to the heart of the matter: two overarching and profoundly serious problems that dominate the nuclear age, casting a dark shadow far into the future. The first of these is that we have become habituated to -- indeed, utterly dependent on -- a world order predicated on the non-use of nuclear weapons. This order might end abruptly. It would be a unique revolution in military affairs if the most powerful weapons in the arsenals of many nations were never used. Yet this uniqueness has become the norm on which trade, economic growth, international relations, as well as the domestic functioning of democratic governments now depend. Not only is the fact of continued non-use vital for our political order, but also the frame of mind that evolved with it. For it allows us to go about our business and plan our lives without the imagery of mushroom clouds superimposed on our hometown.

DOJ_NMG_0002390

The paroxysm after 9/11 would be a hiccup compared with the reaction the morning after one or more nuclear bombs caused massive devastation. Several nations might start crash programs to build arsenals. Mass demonstrations would demand the abolition of all nuclear weapons, without the vaguest idea how to implement that utopia. Depending on the nations primarily affected, the first nuclear use since 1945 could trigger a chain reaction of mobilizations, nuclear alerts, even pre-emptive attacks -- within a fraction of the time it took for the assassination in Sarajevo in 1914 to trigger World War I.

The second overarching problem is emerging only now. Gradually, but inexorably, it will become easier for terrorist organizations, insurgent groups, doomsday cults and nihilist gangs to acquire the wherewithal to make nuclear bombs. Three factors contribute to this: (1) Many countries will build nuclear reactors to produce electricity and will need to import plutonium fuel that can be misused to make weapons; (2) the Internet offers access to physics and engineering data that might help a bomb-maker; (3) many governments lack the will or competence to do their part in preventing nuclear terrorism.

When the Soviet Union broke up in 1991, Sens. Sam Nunn and Richard Lugar launched a farsighted program to assist Russia in safeguarding its vast nuclear establishment. Yet Russia's control over its nuclear materials still has many gaps; and Pakistan's political instability threatens the safety of its stockpile. All the more reason for a second line of defense to prevent terrorists from smuggling a nuclear bomb into the U.S. Alas, here, too, incompetence reigns. The government has not yet started a serious research project to develop the essential technology for this mission. To send a man to Mars we have a generously funded, well integrated project; but to detect a smuggled nuclear bomb on its way to a U.S. city we allocate a puny fraction of those funds and scatter it among a multitude of disjointed studies that feed Congressional pork.

Ruthless Rebels

A global dispersion of the most cataclysmic means for destruction would have no parallel in history. Even the fall of the Roman Empire did not empower ruthless rebels or pseudo-religious cults to extirpate law and order in every corner of the realm. Mercifully the nuclear dispersion has not yet started. But there is nothing now discernible that would prevent it from happening.

While we still have time, we need to think ahead about ways to avert our annihilation from within. To prevail, we must develop the needed technologies and prepare the right strategy -- political and military. We have managed to think ahead before. Well before Pearl Harbor, we prepared the massive wartime conversion of our industry, developed new military strategies, and started the scientific program that led to the Manhattan Project. We will rise to the new challenge -- if we don't lose faith in ourselves.

Mr. Iklé was undersecretary of defense for policy in the Reagan administration. His book, "Annihilation from Within," written at the Center for Strategic & International Studies, will be published by Columbia University Press next year.

Jewish Settler Kills Four Israeli Arabs In Attack On Bus (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

JERUSALEM, Aug. 4 -- A Jewish settler absent without leave from the Israeli army opened fire Thursday on a public bus traveling to an Arab town in northern Israel, killing at least four people and wounding 10. In the immediate aftermath, passengers swarmed the gunman, killing him before he could leave the bus.

In a statement, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called the shooting "a reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist who sought to attack innocent Israeli citizens." Israeli police officials suggested that the attack was an attempt to derail the government's planned evacuation of Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip and four in the West Bank scheduled to begin later this month.

The gunman, identified as Eden Natan Zada, 19, had recently moved to a West Bank settlement known as a stronghold of religious extremists opposed to the evacuation plan, Israeli police officials said.

Witnesses said Zada, wearing the skullcap of a religiously observant Jew, boarded the Egged Bus No. 165 from Haifa clothed in an Israeli army uniform. Jewish and Arab residents of Israel's Lower Galilee regularly ride the route, which passes through the Jewish community of Kiryat Ata before ending in the Arab town of Shfaram.

Ibtihaj Salame, 57, got on the bus at Kiryat Ata, usually the last stop for its Jewish passengers. Salame, a Druze woman with three sons in the Israeli military, was returning home from a medical appointment in Haifa. She said she generally avoids buses for fear of suicide bombers but was forced to take one Thursday after missing her shared taxi.

In a telephone interview a few hours after the 5:30 p.m. shooting, she said she took a seat in front of a man dressed in an army uniform. Salame said that the bus driver asked the soldier to move to the front of the bus but that he refused. As she got off the bus at the second stop in Shfaram, a town of 34,000 people, she heard shots ring out.

DOJ_NMG_0002391

"No one spoke to him on the bus other than the driver," Salame said. "No one thought or imagined that he was up to something. But maybe the driver did."

The victims were identified as the bus driver, Michel Bahoud, 55, an Arab Christian from the Lower Galilee region; a Christian woman; a Muslim woman; and a Muslim man. Police said all four were Israeli Arabs.

The event recalled the 1994 attack carried out by Baruch Goldstein, a Jewish settler from New York who gunned down 29 Palestinians in a mosque at the Tomb of the Patriarchs in the West Bank city of Hebron. Goldstein, who was also dressed in an army uniform, was killed before he could leave the mosque. The shooting marked the beginning of a difficult period for the Oslo accords between Israel and the Palestinians signed the previous year.

In his statement, Sharon called Thursday's attack "a terrorist event" and said it was "a deliberate attempt to harm the fabric of relations among all Israeli citizens. Terrorism by civilians against civilians is the most dangerous thing affecting the future of the state of Israel and its stability as a democracy."

The attack also was condemned by leaders of the Yesha Council, the umbrella organization of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza. The organization has staged large demonstrations against the evacuation plan, which Sharon says is needed to ensure Israel's security and the long-term viability of its Jewish majority.

"We think there is no connection between this and our movement," Shaul Goldstein, the council's deputy chairman, said of the shooting. "He's a terrorist, a lunatic and immoral. He has no connection to my values. He's a criminal and should be treated like one."

Israeli police officials said Zada, the son of secular Jewish parents, had recently moved to the West Bank settlement of Tapuah. Many of the community's roughly 600 residents are followers of the late Meir Kahane, who favored the expulsion of Arabs from Israel and the land it occupied in the 1967 war. Many settlers believe the land was promised to the Jewish people by God.

Kahane's followers founded a yeshiva, or Jewish religious academy, in the settlement. The religious-political movement he inspired, known as Kach, is designated as a terrorist organization by the State Department.

Israeli military officials said Zada, originally from the Israeli town of Rishon Letzion, had been absent from his unit in southern Israel since June 14 in apparent protest against the Gaza evacuation. He joined the army in January and was still undergoing basic training.

In a letter he left at his base, Zada wrote that he "could not be part of an organization that expels Jews," according to a copy published Thursday evening on the Israeli news Web site Ynet.

Nakad Nakad, 40, witnessed the shooting from the balcony of his home in the center of Shfaram. He said he heard shots from inside the bus, then watched as rifle fire sprayed from the windows into the street around it.

"It is clear he intended to kill Arabs inside Shfaram, to have a massacre," said Nakad, a political leader of the Democratic Front for Peace and Equality, a community movement. "That's why he waited for the bus to get inside the town."

Jewish Militant Opens Fire On Bus Of Israeli Arabs, Killing 4 (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

JERUSALEM, Aug. 4 - An Israeli Army deserter dressed in a military uniform opened fire on Thursday aboard a bus carrying Israeli Arab passengers in northern Israel. Four were killed and at least a dozen wounded before an angry crowd beat the gunman to death, according to Israeli authorities and witnesses.

The shooting was one of the deadliest by a Jewish attacker in recent years and appeared to be an attempt to start an upheaval to sabotage Israel's planned evacuation of Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip and part of the West Bank, which is set to begin on Aug. 15. Israeli security services have repeatedly expressed concerns about such a possibility.

The gunman was identified by the military as Eden Natan Zada, 19, though it initially identified him as Eden Tzuberi. He was an army private who was reported absent without leave around mid-June after refusing to take part in preparations for the Gaza pullout.

According to his family and Israeli news media reports, Mr. Zada then went to live in Tapuah, one of the most militant Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called the shootings "a reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist who sought to attack innocent Israeli citizens."

Gideon Ezra, Israel's minister for public security, has spoken in favor of detaining Jewish militants without charges before the Gaza withdrawal, saying it could prevent violence.

The shooting on Thursday is certain to inflame passions on all sides.

DOJ_NMG_0002392

"We are witnessing attempts by extreme right-wing people, terrorists, who want to set the region ablaze and feel they have freedom of action," Muhammad Barakeh, an Arab member of Israel's Parliament, was quoted as saying on the Web site of the newspaper Haaretz.

He and the news media said Mr. Zada had been a supporter of the Kach movement, founded by Rabbi Meir Kahane, the anti-Arab militant who was assassinated in New York in 1990. While the movement is outlawed in Israel, many Tapuah residents are believed to be supporters.

Mr. Zada grew up in Rishon Lezion, in central Israel, but went to Tapuah after leaving the army.

Settler leaders contended that he was not a resident. But his father, Yitzhak, said that his son had been living in Tapuah and that he had informed army officials of his son's whereabouts and told them to repossess his weapon.

"I wasn't afraid that he would do something," he told The Associated Press. "I was afraid of the others" in Tapuah. He said he spoke to his son two days ago, "and he told me he would find the time to return the weapon." The Israeli military said it was investigating why he still had his weapon after he had deserted.

Mr. Zada, who was wearing a skullcap that identified him as an Orthodox Jew, apparently boarded the bus in the northern Israeli city of Haifa and waited until it reached Shefaram, an Arab town several miles to the east, witnesses said.

When the bus reached the town, the driver asked to speak to Mr. Zada, inquiring whether he had intended to come to the town, said Avtihaj Salameh, a passenger quoted by Haaretz. He stood by the driver for several minutes, then opened fire, Mr. Salameh said.

A large crowd then charged the bus and attacked Mr. Zada, beating him to death, witnesses and the news media reported.

Israeli television showed video of bodies on the side of the road, covered in sheets, and the broken windows of the bus.

Jewish militants have carried out a number of attacks against Arabs in the past, but most were directed against Palestinians in the West Bank rather than Arabs who are Israeli citizens. In the deadliest such attack, Baruch Goldstein, an American-born settler in the West Bank, shot dead 29 Muslim worshipers in 1994 at the Tomb of the Patriarchs, a site in Hebron that is holy to Muslims, Jews and Christians.

Issam Makhoul, an Arab member of Israel's Parliament, said Israeli political leaders had "been questioning the legitimacy of our citizenship in the past few years, and today someone took the initiative and acted on this."

Israeli Arabs, who constitute more than 1 million of Israel's 6.8 million citizens, have generally not been directly involved in the violence of the past few years, though a number have been implicated in assisting Palestinian attackers coming to Israel from the West Bank.

As the Gaza pullout approaches, right-wing Israelis have been holding protests, though the latest effort fizzled on Thursday.

Gaza has been declared off limits to nonresidents, but some protesters said they had managed to sneak into the Gaza settlements in recent days.

Bentzi Lieberman, the head of the main settler organization, the Yesha Council, condemned Thursday's shooting. "Murder is murder is murder, and there can be no other response but to denounce it completely and express revulsion," he said.

Earlier on Thursday, an estimated 10,000 Palestinians rallied outside their Parliament building in Gaza City to celebrate the planned Israeli withdrawal. "After 38 years of ugly occupation, they are leaving and they will never come back," the Palestinian prime minister, Ahmed Qurei, said of the Israelis.

Israeli Deserter Kills Four On Bus (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

TEL AVIV -- An Israeli military deserter yesterday sprayed bullets at commuters on a bus in an Arab town in northern Israel, killing four and wounding about a dozen in the most brazen act of Jewish terrorism in more than 11 years.

The uniformed soldier, identified as Eden Natan-Zada, was killed by an angry crowd of pedestrians about 30 minutes after being overpowered and arrested.

The shooting, which took place at about 6 p.m. local time, appeared linked to Israel's Aug. 15 withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank.

Israeli authorities had feared that Jewish extremists would resort to terrorist attacks on Arabs to instigate a spurt of violence that could derail the evacuation of about 8,500 settlers.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon condemned the bus attack while expressing hope that community leaders would maintain calm.

"This was a reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist who sought to attack innocent Israeli citizens," Mr. Sharon said.

DOJ_NMG_0002393

"This terrorist event was a deliberate attempt to harm the fabric of relations among all Israeli citizens."

Natan-Zada, 19, who reportedly went absent without leave from the army in recent weeks rather than participate in the withdrawal of Jews from Israeli-occupied territory, fired at the driver and the passengers at point-blank range as the bus entered the town of Shfaram.

Hundreds of local residents swarmed the vehicle, preventing police from evacuating the bodies of the victims for hours.

Israel's Channel 1 reported that Natan-Zada had become involved with members of the outlawed Kach party who lived at a West Bank settler outpost.

Observers drew a parallel between yesterday's attack and a February 1994 massacre of 29 Palestinian worshippers at Hebron's Tomb of the Patriarchs mosque.

The latter was carried out by Baruch Goldstein, a Brooklyn- born physician who was also a member of the Kach movement.

Also, about 25 Palestinians and two Israelis were killed in rioting that followed, nearly derailing the implementation of an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord signed just months earlier.

"This is a terror attack for all intents and purposes. The writing was on the wall," Mohammed Barakeh, an Israeli Arab parliamentarian, said yesterday. "He wasn't alone."

The attack escalated tensions in Israel just days after tens of thousands of police officers were called to southern Israel to stop opponents of the withdrawal from illegally marching into the Gaza settlements.

Israeli press outlets reported that security forces went on high alert in case of rioting during Friday services at the Dome of the Rock mosque in Jerusalem.

Israeli Public Security Minister Gideon Ezra blamed the shooting on anti-disengagement protesters who have advocated law-breaking and military insubordination.

Following the attack, angry residents of Shfaram reportedly threw rocks at the bus and called for revenge.

A security officer said he had handcuffed the attacker after he had emptied his gun clip, but within minutes, the crowd reached him to take revenge. Several policemen who arrived on the scene to restore order were also injured.

"It's been a day of violence. We've lost four innocent residents of Shfaram," said Shfaram Mayor Ersan Yassin. "It's a criminal act."

Israeli Arab leaders said the attack was the result of years of incitement against the county's Arab minority by right-wing leaders.

Israeli Cabinet ministers called for an inquiry into why the soldier, who was known to the Shin Bet intelligence agency as an extremist, was allowed to hold on to his gun so long after going AWOL.

Israel's Yediot Ahronot newspaper reported that the attacker had left a note for his commanders after leaving the army base which said: "Just like I can't desecrate the Sabbath, I can't be part of an army which expels Jews."

Jewish Extremist Opens Fire Inside Bus (KCS)

By Kristen Stevens

The Kansas City Star, August 5, 2005

SHFARAM, Israel - A 19-year-old Israeli soldier opened fire inside a bus Thursday, killing four Israeli Arabs in the deadliest attack on Arabs in Israel by a Jewish extremist since 1990. An angry crowd then killed the gunman.

Thirteen people, including bus passengers and two policemen, were wounded in the shooting, which appeared linked to tensions over the upcoming Israeli pullout from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank.

After the attack, the bruised and bloodied body of the gunman lay on the floor of the bus surrounded by stones - raising the possibility he had been stoned to death.

The military identified the dead soldier as Pvt. Eden Natan-Zada, a resident of the Jewish settlement of Tapuah in the West Bank. Natan-Zada's father, Yitzhak, told The Associated Press his son ran away from his army unit several weeks ago after being told he would have to participate in the Gaza pullout.

Israel Radio said the gunman was bludgeoned to death by the crowd. After the attack, the gunman's body lay on the floor of the bus, and police had covered his head with a black plastic bag. His shirtless upper torso was heavily bruised.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon denounced the shooting as "a despicable act by a bloodthirsty terrorist." Settler leaders also condemned the attack.

Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas called on Israel to prevent Jewish settlers from carrying weapons "because they (the settlers) are dangerous to the security and peace." Many settlers carry arms, which they say they need to protect themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0002394

Security officials have been warning for months that Jewish militants, desperate to sabotage Israel's pullout, might attack Arabs to deflect Israeli forces away from the Gaza pullout. The police commissioner, Moshe Karadi, warned the shooting could trigger more violence.

The attack took place on the No. 165, which shuttles between the Arab town of Shfaram in northern Israel and nearby communities. At around 6 p.m., the bearded gunman, who wore an Israeli army uniform, boarded the bus and opened fire. Police said the attacker wore a skullcap, identifying him as an Orthodox Jew.

Four people were killed, including the driver. Police said the four apparently were all residents of Shfaram.

The windows of the bus were shattered. Blood covered the floor and seats of the bus, and stones lay on the floor. A policeman with a bullhorn, standing near the body, addressed a crowd of thousands at the scene.

Several hours later, police slowly drove the bus away as hundreds of Shfaram residents ran alongside the vehicle. Investigators kept collecting evidence inside the bus as it was driven out of town.

Yitzhak Natan-Zada, 49, said he had asked the army to find his son, who fled from his unit after refusing to take part in the Gaza pullout. The elder Natan-Zada said he was worried his son's weapons would fall into the hands of fanatics in Tapuah.

"I wasn't afraid that he would do something. I was afraid of the others," Natan-Zada said by telephone. "I spoke to him two days ago and he was a happy and good-hearted boy and he told me he would find the time to return the weapon."

Tapuah is one of the most extreme Jewish settlements, dominated by followers of U.S.-born Rabbi Meir Kahane, who advocated expelling Arabs from Israel and the West Bank. Kahane was assassinated in New York in 1990.

Israel TV said Natan-Zada was a deserter from his army unit who grew up in the Israeli city of Rishon Letzion and moved to the settlement recently.

There have been several incidents of Jewish extremists attacking Arabs over the years, but rarely inside Israel. In 1990, during the first Palestinian uprising, an Israeli opened fire at a bus stop where Palestinians gathered for job placements, killing seven.

In 1994, Baruch Goldstein, an American-born Jewish settler entered a holy site in the West Bank city of Hebron and opened fire on Muslim worshippers, killing 29 - the bloodiest attack by a Jewish extremist against Palestinians.

Israeli Arabs make up about 20 percent of Israel's population of 6.9 million. They remained in their homes during the 1948-49 war that followed creation of the state of Israel, while hundreds of thousands of others fled or were driven out.

Though Israeli Arabs are full citizens, they have suffered from discrimination by Jewish-dominated governments. Many of their towns and villages lack basic infrastructure, and Arab localities are usually at the top of Israel's unemployment lists.

Anger spilled over in October 2000, when thousands of Arabs rioted in support of the Palestinian uprising, which erupted the month before. Israeli police shot and killed 13 Arabs, further infuriating and alienating many Arab citizens.

In southern Israel, meanwhile, opponents of the pullout ended their second mass protest Thursday, after police blocked their plan to march to Gaza to reinforce the settlements. A few hundred protesters remained behind in the town of Ofakim, including settlers' council head Bentsi Lieberman, who denounced the shooting.

"Murder is murder is murder, and there can be no other response but to denounce it completely and express revulsion," he said.

Karadi said forces had been diverted to deal with the demonstrators, leaving the north of Israel short-handed. "We have sent forces from the center and those from the south who were supposed to be going home have now been diverted to the north," he said.

Israeli Soldier Kills 4 Arabs Aboard Bus (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, August 5, 2005

TEL AVIV, Israel — An Israeli soldier who fired on Israeli Arab passengers in a bus Thursday evening killed four and wounded 12 in what Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called a “sinful act of a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist.”

“Terrorism of citizens against citizens is the most dangerous thing for the future of the State of Israel and the stability of democracy,” Sharon said in a statement.

The attack was the deadliest by a Jewish radical since 29 Palestinians were killed in 1994.

Fearing retaliatory riots by Palestinians, police raised the alert in Jerusalem to the second-highest level and deployed more forces, especially around the Temple Mount, or Nobel Sanctuary — sacred to Jews and Muslims — ahead of Friday prayers, Police Chief Superintendent Raffi Yaffe said in a statement.

The gunman, Pvt. Eden Natan Zaada, “sought to derail,” Israel's decision to withdraw from Gaza and parts of the northern West Bank, according to Yekutiel Ben Yaacov, a friend and fellow activist against the pullout.

DOJ_NMG_0002395

Asi Shariv, Sharon's spokesman, said it was “too early speculate on the attack's effects on the disengagement (settlement pullout).”

Zaada, 19, a resident of the largely secular Israeli city of Rishon Lezion, used his army-issued M-16 rifle to fire on bus passengers in the Arab town of Shfaram in northern Israel. After the shooting, Zaada was beaten to death. Thousands of angry Shfaram residents swarmed the bus. They threw stones at the vehicle and police who arrived to control the riot, according to footage aired on Israel's Channel Two.

The Israeli military's chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, ordered an investigation “into the circumstances leading to the possession of an IDF (Israeli military) weapon by the soldier, who had defected and was of a problematic background,” a statement said.

Police were on high alert in Shfaram, a village inhabited mostly by members of the Druze Islamic sect. Israeli Arabs constitute 20% of Israel's population. A statement released by the Israeli police said authorities were deploying more forces to the area.

Ghazi Hamid, editor of the militant group Hamas' weekly Al-Risala, said his group “remains committed to the withdrawal and will not respond to this incident.” Hamas' charter calls for the destruction of Israel and the establishment of a Muslim state in its place.

Zaada, the gunman, became intensely religious over the past year, and left his army unit in June after refusing to take part in the pullout, said Ben Yaacov, founder of the extremist Jewish Legion defense group based in the Tapuach settlement. The West Bank settlement is a bastion of members of the Kahane Chai organization, whichIsrael outlawed as a terroristgroup in 1994. In the past year, Zaada spent much of his time in Tapuach, Ben Yaacov said. He called Zaada “the first victim of the disengagement.” Ben Yaacov added: “We will be stepping up our efforts to do everything in our power to stop the disengagement, which was (Zaada's) will and testament.”

Army Deserter Kills 4 Israeli Arabs On Bus, Gets Beaten To Death (KRT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

Knight Ridder, August 5, 2005

JERUSALEM - An Israeli army deserter angry about his nation's imminent plans to shut down Jewish settlements opened fire on passengers in a bus driving through an Arab neighborhood Thursday, killing four Israeli Arabs before a mob besieged and beat him to death, according to police and military officials.

The attack in northern Israel has the potential to inflame tensions at a fragile moment for Israel, which is preparing to dismantle 25 Jewish settlements in occupied Palestinian lands.

Israeli and Palestinian leaders have been working to prevent extremists on both sides from derailing the contentious settlement shutdown. Security forces concerned about Jewish radicals have stepped up security at Jerusalem's Dome of the Rock, one of the holiest sites in Islam and a constant flashpoint for violent protests. Palestinian officials have been working to halt a series of rocket attacks on Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip slated for closure.

The assailant was identified by the military as Pvt. Eden Nathan Zaada, a 19-year-old Israeli who had recently become a follower of an outlawed right-wing extremist movement and deserted from the army to protest the plans to shut down Jewish settlements.

On Thursday afternoon, Zaada, wearing his army uniform and carrying his military machine gun, boarded a bus in a largely Arab town of Shfaram and opened fire, killing the bus driver and three passengers, police said. Within minutes, angry residents surrounded the bus, chased away police and beat the man to death.

In mid-June, according to Israeli officials, Zaada deserted his unit as the military was preparing its soldiers for the settlement shutdown scheduled to begin in about two weeks.

Zaada's family said he had recently moved to one of the more radical Israeli West Bank settlements, where he reportedly joined followers of Rabbi Meir Kahane, a fiery political figure who was assassinated in 1990 by an Egyptian terrorist after giving a New York City speech.

One of Zaada's friends called him "the first victim of the sadistic disengagement plan."

"I never heard him say anything about an intention to kill people, but I hope that he was not killed in vain and his murder will put an end to the expulsion plan," Yekutiel Ben-Yaakov told the Israeli newspaper Yedioth Ahronoth.

Israeli and Palestinian leaders condemned the attack and immediately appealed for calm.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon called the shooting "a reprehensible act by a bloodthirsty Jewish terrorist" and "a deliberate attempt to harm the fabric of relations among all Israeli citizens."

Shaul Goldstein, a settlement leader who has helped organize weeks of largely peaceful protests that have brought out tens of thousands of activists, denounced Zaada as "a crazy man and a lunatic" whose actions couldn't be justified.

DOJ_NMG_0002396

"He is a terrorist just like any other terrorist with Hamas or Islamic Jihad," Goldstein said. "There is no purpose on Earth that can justify the killing of innocent people."

Zaada's aunt voiced surprise at her nephew's actions.

Yardena Cohen said she knew Zaada had fled the army, opposed the government's settlement shutdown and started living at the West Bank settlement. But she called him the "nicest, warmest person" and never thought he was capable of such violence.

Under the plan, Israel will remove all 8,500 Israeli settlers from the occupied Gaza Strip, along with about 500 others from four isolated settlements in the northern West Bank.

Sharon has cast his initiative as a way to bolster Israel's security, but settlement leaders have condemned it as cowardly capitulation to terrorists.

Saeb Erekat, a senior Palestinian leader, called the attack "a very dangerous incident" and urged Israel to press ahead with the settlement shutdown "in a peaceful and orderly manner."

The incident was the worst such attack since 1994, when a U.S.-born settler opened fire in the Tomb of the Patriarchs, a religious site sacred to Muslims and Jews, killing 29 Palestinians.

Gaza Pullout Tests Limit Of Dissent (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, August 5, 2005

NEVE DEKELIM, GAZA - Ofir Handelsman thinks he holds the power to stop Israel's pullout from Gaza in the palm of his hand. Scribbled across his palm is the fake identity number that enabled him to sneak into Gush Katif, the collection of Jewish settlements in which he and other Israelis intend to make a last stand against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's withdrawal, set for Aug. 17.

Ofir, just 17, carries the build and demeanor of a wrestler. He wears a sleeveless cut-off shirt, an orange cord and whistle around his neck signaling his opposition to the evacuation, and the backpack he is going to live out of for the foreseeable future.

"A few hundred of us came in," he says, slightly breathless as he and his buddies buzz around the Vanilla Sky restaurant, scrounging for a meal Wednesday night. "So many people will come that the army won't be able to remove us - and then, we hope, there won't be a disengagement."

Some Israelis see Ofir's action as valiant civil disobedience. Others decry flouting of the law. It's a debate that stretches beyond eminent domain to the heart of Israeli identity: property rights of the few vs. security of the many; political compromise vs. scriptural authority; and the right to self-expression vs. a government's right to implement key policies without interference.

Indeed, the country's roads themselves have quickly become a part of this battleground: opponents of disengagement throw nails on roads over which Israeli army jeeps will need to pass. And Wednesday, protesters shut down one of the country's most important arteries - the Jerusalem-Tel Aviv highway - with a row of burning tires.

Right-wing activists say that in a democracy, they should be free to protest. But Israel's security forces have been trying to limit the demonstrations - initially refusing to permit a large one Wednesday in Ofakim, outside Gaza. The attempt to clamp down, these activists say, is pushing protesters to more extreme measures.

But security officials and proponents of disengagement say that the people in orange - the color of the anti- withdrawal camp - are violating the law in their bid to prevent the execution of a major political decision that was made by the Knesset, Israel's parliament.

When the withdrawal begins, it will be the first time Israel will dismantle established settlements from any territory claimed by Palestinians for their future state. But at the moment, Israel seems more absorbed with the domestic side effects of the disengagement plan. As a result, many liberties are being put to the test in a way they never have before.

On the one hand, Israel is proud of its place as a feisty young democracy in a region awash in autocracies. On the other, the political necessity of carrying out the disengagement plan and the desire to implement it in as orderly a fashion as possible may be pushing Israeli officials to take measures that, some critics say, are more reminiscent of a police state than of a free country.

Even the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI), which considers all Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip to be illegal and strongly supports a withdrawal from these areas, fears that the police may run roughshod over the right to demonstrate.

ACRI made an official complaint about a two weeks ago when the organization learned that the police were stopping buses all over the country, as far as Kiryat Shemona in the far north of Israel - some five hours' drive away. Drivers of buses carrying anti-disengagement protesters were told by police that they would have their licenses revoked if they drove south with the protesters.

DOJ_NMG_0002397

"The main thing we see is the police have a tendency to overact," says Yoav Loeff, an ACRI spokesman in Jerusalem.

An important Supreme Court case this week made clear that there is a fine line between demonstrating and being destructive.

The court rejected a petition from two right-wing activists who tried to appeal the army's evacuation of antidisengagement groups who were holed up in a hotel here. In the decision, the judges ruled that the activists were not expressing themselves but delivering a "severe blow to democracy."

"Freedom of expression is not a permit to throw burning tires at policemen or soldiers," Supreme Court Justice Aharon Barak said in the ruling. "Freedom of expression is not a permit to attack one's fellow man; freedom of expression is not a permit to riot."

But for Yair Cohen, who has been living in this settlement since he was evacuated from Yamit in the Sinai, the very fact of being forced out from his home twice in his life is a symbol that Israel is not a true democracy.

"There's got to be a limit in a democracy," says Mr. Cohen, a father of five who stopped to talk after leaving evening prayers at the community's central synagogue here. "No democracy can take a person out of his house against his will. When you have 15,000 soldiers surrounding the demonstrators, that's a democracy?"

Palestinian Troops Face Biggest Test During Pullout (USAT)

By Matthew Gutman

USA Today, August 5, 2005

GAZA CITY — Capt. Hisham Kariri watches as Palestinian National Security Forces cadets carefully hack one another with choreographed karate chops in a rock-strewn Gaza City parade ground.

Kariri's men, some with graying beards and paunches, are among the 7,500 troops the Palestinian Authority intends to deploy along with tens of thousands of police and militiamen to help secure Israel's evacuation of 21 Jewish settlements in Gaza and four in the West Bank starting Aug. 15.

The Palestinian Authority has committed to thwarting Palestinian militants from launching rockets on Jewish settlers and Israeli soldiers during the pullout. The authority also will try to curb looters expected to swarm on the settlements, says Palestinian Cabinet Secretary Samir Huleile.

But Israel's military is concerned — and ready to react. If the Palestinian security forces don't act to prevent attacks and chaos, Israeli Deputy Defense Minister Zeev Boim says, “We will not hesitate to use land, sea and air forces with full severity to respond to a terror attack.” He also warns that Israel could suspend its evacuation “to launch a large-scale military operation into the areas used to fire rockets and missiles.”

Palestinian militants fired hundreds of homemade mortars and rockets toward Jewish settlements and towns inside Israel during the past month. Israel's Shin Bet internal security service recorded an 18-month high of 426 attacks against Israeli targets in July.

That's nearly four times the number of attacks in January, according to a statement released Monday by Shin Bet, the Israeli counterpart to the FBI.

Col. Jamal Kayed, commander of the Palestinian National Security Forces in the southern half of Gaza, insists that the 7,500 men under his command during the pullout are capable of preventing attacks.

From his headquarters in Khan Yunis — a Palestinian city abutting Neve Dekalim, Gaza's largest settlement — Kayed acknowledges that a rocket barrage by Palestinian militants such as one that killed an Israeli woman in a farming community two weeks ago could unleash “enormous destruction.”

He intends “not to give Israel a reason to attack.” His orders, he says, are to “stop the rocket launchers.” But “we are not idiots. We will not start a civil war by killing strugglers for freedom,” he says, referring to the militants.

These kinds of statements are of particular concern to the Israelis. Boim says his government “is satisfied with the Palestinian government's decision to deploy troops, but we are skeptical that Abu Mazen's (Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas) intention of thwarting terrorist attacks on departing troops and citizens will trickle down to the soldiers.”

Kayed says his men will be ordered to prevent and briefly detain men caught firing on Israeli soldiers or settlers. “Israel says we should kill them. I am not interested in killing my own people,” he says.

His forces also will remain out of sight of the settlers during the two- to four-week pullout, “because we don't want to cause friction.” The buffer zone with the Israelis will be 200-800 yards, he says.

Kayed and other Palestinian security officials have met routinely with their Israeli counterparts to coordinate security during the withdrawal, but Kayed says Israel hasn't disclosed its exact plans for the pullout. Boim says Israel has little inclination to share its plans.

DOJ_NMG_0002398

On the sun-blasted sand lot in Gaza, Kariri groans as his men flip head over heels and land with a thud on their backs as they clear imaginary barbed wire. This is not the kind of training Kariri received at the Indian Military Academy in 1998.

As he watches his men struggle to march in step, Kariri says, “In India we had equipment, weapons, everything. Here all we can do is try.” Israel destroyed much of the Palestinians' military equipment during the latest uprising, which began in 2000.

Later, in Gaza City, commander Col. Mahmud Rawala, pronounces this battalion “fit for service.”

“We are ready,” echoes Huleile, the Cabinet secretary-general. “We have done our best, given Israeli restrictions on allowing us to have weapons and ammunition.”

With more than 40,000 men on duty, this summer's deployment of Palestinian forces is “by far the largest campaign in Palestinian history,” Huleile says.

The Palestinian forces that will ring the Gaza settlements will include about 10,000 police officers and soldiers and 30,000 militiamen from Fatah, the Palestinian Authority's largest faction, he says.

But even with its massive deployment, some Palestinian leaders are doubtful their security forces can complete the mission. Osama al-Farra, mayor of Khan Yunis — the city of 180,000 that stands to absorb 11 settlements after the pullout — worries that containing “souvenir seekers” will be impossible. “Everyone will want to go and see the new area. All our security forces won't be able to stop that movement,” he says.

Some local Gazans vow to do what Palestinian Authority security won't. Sultana Abu Awad, a mother of 12 and a resident of the Khan Yunis refugee camp, says, “If they (Hamas militants) try and shoot or fire rockets, I will cut their throats.” Militants often use the camp's western neighborhood, where Sultana and her family live, to shoot at or fire rockets at Israelis. Israel has responded by razing dozens of homes in the neighborhood.

Abu Awad's living room wall, riddled by bullets from the Israeli military's return fire, faces the soon-to-be evacuated Jewish settlement of Neve Dekalim. “When they (militants) fire, it brings disaster upon us,” she says, “so we will surround our homes, and if anybody shoots, we will kill him.”

China Restricts News Of Cnooc Bid (WSJ)

By Matt Pottinger

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

BEIJING -- China is heavily restricting domestic news coverage of Cnooc Ltd.'s failed bid to buy American oil company Unocal Corp., a move apparently aimed at muffling criticism of the U.S. before next month's summit meeting between Chinese President Hu Jintao and President Bush.

Editors at Chinese newspapers, Web sites and a television station said they are obeying a recent central-government directive to publish only official Xinhua news agency accounts of the bid. The Propaganda Department of the ruling Communist Party issued the guidelines more than two weeks ago after it became clear Cnooc's $18.5 billion bid for Unocal was faltering amid opposition in Congress.

"We are not allowed to do our own reporting anymore" on Cnooc, said an editor at a major paper published by Wenxin United Press Group. "This is a ban."

Cnooc, China's largest offshore oil producer, on Tuesday abandoned a months-long effort to buy Unocal, of El Segundo, Calif., blaming the political atmosphere in Washington. Thus far, Beijing has refrained from commenting on the aborted bid to distance itself from Cnooc and deflect allegations in Congress that the pursuit of Unocal reflected Chinese state policy.

Chinese people, however, are aware of the news. The Xinhua news agency account that ran in some newspapers was dry and brief, stating that Cnooc had withdrawn its bid because of the poor political climate in the U.S.

"This is a commercial matter," said a Chinese Ministry of Commerce spokesman asked about the failed bid. "As a government department, there is no need to make any comment about this at this time."

But analysts and editors say Beijing has been closely involved in managing the ensuing coverage. The goal is to contain combustible anti-American sentiment that Cnooc's failure might ignite, they say.

"I think the Propaganda Department is trying to cool down the nationalist anger caused by this," said Li Xiguang, who teaches journalism at Tsinghua University in Beijing. "The government wants to have strong ties with the U.S. despite this setback."

Popular dissatisfaction with Washington runs high in China, fueled by American support for Taiwan and perceived U.S. bullying on trade matters. Many Chinese also expressed resentment at the recent revaluation of the country's currency as the latest indication that the U.S. is trying to push China around.

But the leadership in Beijing is intent on keeping relations with Washington as smooth as possible. For a few weeks after Cnooc's announcement in June that it was challenging Chevron Corp. to acquire Unocal, coverage in China's state-owned media was relatively freewheeling, with some criticizing the bid and others attacking U.S. lawmakers' efforts to thwart Cnooc.

DOJ_NMG_0002399

But as it became clearer that Unocal would side with Chevron, despite Cnooc's substantially higher bid, the Propaganda Department issued its directive to newsrooms. A staff member of the Shanghai Oriental Morning Post said editors were called into a meeting where their boss informed them of the directive.

"All reports on Cnooc should use stories from Xinhua news agency in order to keep the same tone as the government," the staffer quoted the boss as saying. Editors at four other newspapers and a Shanghai television station contacted by The Wall Street Journal described similar scenes at their offices.

Beijing's desire for smooth U.S. relations notwithstanding, the Cnooc saga still could cause repercussions for American interests. The handful of permitted commentaries published in recent days have emphasized U.S. hypocrisy on free trade. The China Daily ran an editorial yesterday saying the consequences of the failed Cnooc bid "may be more serious than some U.S. politicians have calculated."

The lack of strongly critical news coverage didn't prevent many Chinese from tracking Cnooc's troubles in America or from drawing conclusions about it. Negative comments about the U.S. were posted on numerous Internet chat rooms.

Notable & Quotable (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

From an editorial in yesterday's China Daily:

China National Offshore Oil Corp has to bear the cost of its abandoned bid for the American oil company Unocal. But the fallout from the bid will not only affect the Chinese side. The idea of the United States as a self-appointed champion of the free market has become questionable. . . .

The unjustified U.S. opposition, largely politically motivated, will . . . poison the current prevailing mood as bilateral economic ties between China and the United States are enhanced. The high-profile takeover battle demonstrated to the world that the United States is not a free economy as it claimed to be. In the U.S. market, an asset for sale has not gone to the buyer that most prized it, because of regulatory concerns fuelled by bogus fears and hidden interests.

Apparently, Unocal shareholders chose to accept the cheaper offer free of regulatory risk. But the politicized regulatory matter has, in fact, deprived them of the chance to maximize value, as the market should allow.

. . . [T]he explicit message the takeover battle sends to the world is that American business is defined by political needs. . . . In the long run, the casualty will be on U.S. competitiveness if the market is to play second fiddle to protectionism with political patronage.

Aggressive Search By Cnooc For New Oil And Gas Seen (NYT)

By David Lague, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

BEIJING, Aug. 4 - The Chinese energy company Cnooc is preparing to mount an aggressive international search for oil and gas supplies in the aftermath of its failed bid for Unocal, oil industry experts say.

In announcing on Tuesday that it would abandon its $18.5 billion offer, Cnooc, shorthand for the China National Offshore Oil Corporation, signaled that it would continue to work with foreign governments and companies in its search for overseas oil and gas reserves.

Energy market experts now expect Cnooc, which is controlled by the Beijing government, to explore opportunities throughout the Asia-Pacific region, Central Asia, Russia and West Africa to find energy supplies for China's booming economy.

"Cnooc lost the battle over Unocal, but it will continue to wage the war toward acquiring overseas energy assets to support China's growing energy needs," said Kurt A. Barrow, an analyst in Singapore with the energy consultant Purvin & Gertz.

The hostile reaction in Washington to Cnooc's bid was a pointed reminder to the Chinese that politics remains a major obstacle to their plans to increase energy security. China's growing oil imports have helped drive prices near record highs as competition for energy emerges as a point of friction among the big manufacturing economies.

Given its rebuff in the United States, said Ma Shang, an energy industry analyst with Fitch Ratings in Beijing, Cnooc should place less emphasis on big investments in Southeast Asia and South America, regions where Washington exerts strong political influence. Instead, Cnooc should follow PetroChina, which has secured substantial reserves in Central Asia.

"Because the energy market regards Cnooc as a state-owned enterprise," Mr. Ma said, "its overseas acquisitions are more political compared with other global players. Cnooc should look to Central Asia or Russia. Compared to the U.S., these regions and Russia are more friendly to China."

Many analysts say that Cnooc, which is listed on stock markets in New York and Hong Kong, is unlikely to find investment targets as attractive as Unocal, but that its political backing and access to cheap money will continue to make it competitive in world markets.

DOJ_NMG_0002400

And Chinese energy companies have other advantages. Some have invested in places like Sudan, Iran and Myanmar, where the major international oil companies are unwilling or unable to operate, Mr. Barrow said.

Cnooc plans to become an important supplier of liquefied natural gas to China, and there are signs that it will concentrate on investment in natural gas reserves in Asia.

Experts suggested two such targets: Woodside Petroleum of Australia, which operates the North West Shelf natural gas project and owns 16.7 percent of it; and the Gorgon natural gas development, led by Chevron. Cnooc is already linked to both ventures, which have substantial reserves off northwest Australia.

In a complex agreement in 2002, Cnooc formed a joint venture with the North West Shelf project's six partners, including Chevron, to take a stake of about 5 percent in the gas fields. Cnooc's share of the reserves is equivalent to liquefied natural gas shipments of about 3.3 million metric tons a year over two decades starting in 2006, and with an estimated value of $20 billion. The venture supplies as much as 10 percent of Japan's liquefied gas imports.

Analysts say that Woodside would be an ideal investment for Cnooc as it seeks to become China's leading supplier of liquefied gas. Ownership of Woodside would also give Cnooc access to advanced deepwater exploration and development technology, a consideration that experts say was a major factor in its bid for Unocal.

Shell is the biggest shareholder in Woodside, with 34 percent. The Australian government in 2001 rejected a takeover bid from Shell because it would have given a foreign company control over the extraction and marketing of a major Australian energy resource. But China is soon expected to become Australia's biggest trading partner, which might make officials in Canberra more flexible if Cnooc pursued Woodside.

In 2003, Cnooc signed an agreement with the Gorgon partners - Chevron, Exxon Mobil and Shell - that called on them to "place a significant volume of Gorgon L.N.G. for use in the growing Chinese market." Cnooc was reported to be seeking a 12.5 percent stake in the project.

But talks with the Gorgon partners have failed so far to produce an agreement on price. Scott Walker, a spokesman for the venture, based in Perth, Australia, said that discussions were continuing.

Niger's Anguish Is Reflected In Its Dying Children (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

ELKOKIYA, Niger, Aug. 3 - At sunset Wednesday, in an unmarked grave in a cemetery rimmed by millet fields, the men of this mud-walled village buried Baby Boy Saminou, the latest casualty of the hunger ravaging 3.6 million farmers and herders in this destitute nation.

At 16 months, he was little bigger than some newborns, with the matchstick limbs and skeletal ribs of the severely malnourished. He had died three hours earlier in the intensive care unit of a field hospital run by Doctors Without Borders, where 30 others like him still lie with their mothers on metal cots.

One in five is dying - the result, many say, of a belated response by the outside world to a disaster predicted in detail nine months ago.

Niger's latest hunger problem, like Baby Boy Saminou's tragedy, is more complex than it first appears. As aid begins to trickle into some of the nearly 4,000 villages across southern Niger that need help - the vanguard of a flood of food brought forth by television images of shrunken babies - the rich world's response to Niger's worst nutrition crisis since the 1985 famine is, in fact, proving too late for many.

Unseen on television, however, are the shrunken infants who die all but unnoticed even in so-called normal years. Of each 1,000 children born alive in this, the world's second-poorest nation, a staggering 262 fail to reach their fifth birthdays.

Five of Baby Boy Saminou's seven brothers and sisters were among them. The longest-surviving of those who died reached 4 years of age. Asked what killed the last three, Saminou's father, Saidou Ida, said simply, "Malnutrition."

International aid officials and charity workers here say that the world's dilatory reaction to Niger's woes is hard to excuse. Some of them also say that Niger's miseries this year are merely a worsened version of its perennial ones - and that until Niger addresses its problems of primitive farming, primitive health care and primitive social conditions, infants will continue to die unnoticed in numbers that dwarf any hunger emergency.

"That is the bigger question that both Niger and the international community, everyone, needs to answer," Marcus Prior, the West Africa spokesman for the World Food Program, said in an interview in Maradi, the regional city where little Saminou died. "We feel that we've tried to raise awareness. But at the same time, this is something that's a recurring problem."

That it is a perennial problem, Mr. Prior and others stress, in no way minimizes the urgency of Niger's current disaster - erratic rainfall and severe food shortages in the agricultural and herding belts where many of Niger's 11 million to 12 million people live. Together, they are pushing the death rate for small children even higher than Niger's customary one-in-four level, and killing off the livestock upon which the nation's nomads depend.

DOJ_NMG_0002401

How many people need aid depends on the yardstick used. About 1.2 million of Niger's 3.6 million rural farmers and herders are described as "extremely vulnerable" to food shortages and in need of food aid, according to an assessment of Niger's crisis conducted four months ago by the United Nations, major charities and Niger's government. Of those, about 874,000 urgently need free food, the latest assessment concluded late last month, and that number could rise until the harvest is completed in October.

But that does not mean that nearly 900,000 people will starve; the vast bulk of the hungry will somehow survive. Most of those who do die will be young children. But even among those, most will not die of starvation.

"Children will likely die from malnourishment, but a substantial proportion is probably dying from conditions related to poor water quality, or other non-food-related problems," FEWS Net, a famine warning service financed with United States assistance, reported late last month.

Much of this disaster was suspected last November, when experts monitoring Niger's farms found a 220,000-ton shortfall - about 7.5 percent of the normal crop - in the harvest of grains, especially the millet that is the staple of most people's diet.

Among others, the United Nations World Food Program and Doctors Without Borders sounded alarms, and Niger's government, with World Food Program approval, quickly asked donors to give Niger 71,000 tons of food aid and $3 million for the 400,000 most vulnerable farmers and herders.

By May, it had received fewer than 7,000 tons of food and one $323,000 donation, from Luxembourg.

"I think everyone knew that a crisis was going on," said Johanne Sekkenes, the Niger mission head of Doctors Without Borders, in an interview in Niamey, the capital. "But the answer given at the time, from governments and international agencies in Niger, was that the ongoing, normal development programs should be reinforced."

Niger's government ruled out both free food aid and health care to hungry families, preferring to sell surplus millet at subsidized prices in an effort to force the price of scarce millet down. But millet prices skyrocketed, forcing families to sell cattle and other goods to buy food.

The charity has angrily accused governments of allowing children to die, albeit not intentionally, so that the free market in grain would not be disrupted. Others say that Niger is on a steady course toward future disasters, free aid or not. Even with huge numbers of dying children, the average woman bears seven babies, and the population is growing at a rate that by 2026 will double the number of people on a land that already is straining its capacity.

Moreover, Niger has few of the modern tools that might enable it to feed itself, meaning that charities must make up a food shortage virtually every year.

"You've seen the kind of tools people use to farm," Mr. Prior said. "You've seen the lack of irrigation and the total dependency on what falls from the sky. I doubt you've seen any fertilizer or modern technology being used."

When the rainy season arrived in June, bringing malaria and other diseases with it, children weakened by lack of food began to fall ill and die in numbers even greater than in normal years.

Doctors Without Borders has treated more than 14,000 children at six centers this year, more than double the 2004 total. It has nearly 5,000 under treatment today. Admissions at its centers rose by a quarter from mid-July to August.

Among the newcomers was Baby Boy Saminou, whose 40-year-old mother, Mariama, brought him to the charity's Maradi hospital Wednesday from her village of about 2,500, down a rutted road 15 miles away. The boy was receiving free food, and had visited the Doctors Without Borders clinic five days earlier with a mouth infection. But his condition worsened last weekend.

"I didn't even have time to talk to her, the baby was so bad," Chantelle Umtoni, 34, the chief of the intensive care ward, said as she watched the mother and child from her desk Wednesday afternoon. "He has severe anemia. He has severe malaria. He was dehydrated - completely dry. And he had heart failure."

Indeed, doctors restarted his heart as they plugged bags of blood and intravenous fluid into him and clapped an oxygen mask on his face to assist his labored breathing.

Dr. Umtoni said she gave the boy a 50-50 chance of living. Dire as they are, such cases are not unusual.

"We average 30, 35 children every day," she said. "All of them are malnourished, severely malnourished. That's already a severe disease by itself. Add atop that malaria and anemia, and they come in a bit too late."

Mariama sat by her child, draped in the same brilliant orange-and-green cloth she wore, and watched him as she toted up her family. Of eight children, five were dead. The two survivors, she said, are 15 and 17 years old.

As she spoke, a nurse, Boraka Abdou, put a stethoscope to the baby's chest, listened, then summoned Dr. Umtoni. She listened intently. Then, wordlessly, the two removed his oxygen mask and catheters. Mariama stared at her dead child, impassive, then covered him in a red scarf.

An hour later, she was home, having ridden the 15 miles with her baby in her arms, tears running down her face.

DOJ_NMG_0002402

Outside her compound, she gave the dead child to her mother-in-law, who washed its face. Then she sat on a wooden bowl used to grind millet and wailed, inconsolable. Women, hearing the news, came to grieve with her. The two women bathed Baby Boy Saminou and wrapped him in a white T-shirt for a traditional Islamic burial.

The village chief, Moussa Djidji, said that at least 10 of the village's children had died since January.

Hunger Reaches Crisis Level In Niger (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon

The Los Angeles Times, August 5, 2005

MARADI, Niger — The frail baby boy she cradles has arms no thicker than her finger. His belly has hollowed and his skin has sagged as his weight has dropped.

Rakiya Nassirou weeps constantly over her son, wondering what is happening to him and whether God is angry with her. But 6-month-old Rabiou is not her only worry. Another boy, 3-year-old Moussa, is with her at this feeding station run by Doctors Without Borders. Nassirou left four more children and her sick husband back home in their village two weeks ago with no food.

The aid agencies now scrambling to save these children say it didn't have to be this way.

In the best of circumstances, they acknowledge, hunger shadows Niger and its neighbors along the southern edge of the Sahara desert. Malnutrition, malaria, diarrhea and other ills kill one in four children before the age of 5.

But last fall, things got much worse. The rains failed. Then the locusts, the worst infestation in 15 years, arrived.

A United Nations appeal last November for help for Niger was virtually ignored. Another appeal in March for $16 million resulted in about $1 million in contributions. Even as world attention was focused on Africa at last month's Group of 8 summit of the world's richest nations, little happened. Niger was offered debt forgiveness, but nothing was done about the hunger issue.

The crisis underscores one of the long-standing problems faced by international relief agencies. It is much easier to raise money once starvation has set in and children are dying than to prod donors to prevent a looming crisis.

Now, the World Food Program estimates 2.5 million of Niger's nearly 12 million people are at risk of hunger; 1.6 million of them need immediate help. And the crisis is spreading. An additional 1.5 million people in neighboring Mali, Mauritania and Burkino Faso need food aid.

Only recent television footage of starving children have started making a difference.

"We are going into the worst period of the year, in the coming four to five weeks, with the rainy period and diarrhea. And this is the last month before the harvest, meaning there are few food stocks and they are running very low," said Johanne Sekkenes, head of mission at Doctors Without Borders in Niamey, Niger's capital.

Doctors Without Borders is admitting nearly 1,300 children a week to its emergency feeding program in the Maradi region, 340 miles east of Niamey. The numbers are still rising.

It has treated almost 15,000 severely malnourished children since January, 5 percent of whom died. According to UNICEF, 192,000 malnourished children need help, 32,000 of whom are severely malnourished and facing death.

Niger is three times the size of California, but two-thirds is desert and only 15 percent of the land is suitable for farming. It is regarded as the second-poorest country on Earth, ahead only of Sierra Leone, another West African country.

Most of the population depends on herding and subsistence agriculture. It rarely raises a blip on the radar of international affairs. The last time it made headlines was before the Iraq war, when reports surfaced that yellowcake uranium from Niger had found its way to Saddam Hussein. The report turned out to be false.

Women often bear the brunt of Niger's crises, since many men travel to neighboring countries for work, often for years at a time.

Nassirou fears that the revolving cycle of hunger is not the result of fickle rains, but the wrath of God.

"Maybe God curses us," she said. "God blames us."

"I hope God will give us life and health and take us out of this poverty."

Lying on a blanket at the feeding center, she added: "I cry because I cannot understand what is happening to my son. I cry because I don't know what to do. I have been crying ever since I got here.

"I'll do anything for him to get better," she said, gazing down at her baby with melting eyes. "There's nothing more precious than a child."

Dr. Chantal Umutoni, in the intensive care unit at the feeding station, said she was sad and angry over the delayed international response.

"Maybe those lives could have been saved," she said.

On Thursday, a starving boy named Mamane Sani Abdou, 13 months, was admitted, a frail, listless child with starkly protruding ribs and stick-like limbs which flopped by his side. His mother, Babi Abdou, 20, fed him a few spoonfuls of enriched therapeutic milk, which he coughed up before sagging back, panting desperately at the effort.

DOJ_NMG_0002403

Before, "he used to drink a whole cup of milk," said Abdou, who said her boy first fell ill after being circumcised two months ago. She spent all her savings, about $12, first on traditional medicine, then Western medicine.

On Wednesday, a child in similar condition, 16-month-old Saidou Saiman, came into intensive care at 11 a.m., "too sick to even make a sound," Umutoni said. Just after midday, his heart failed. He was resuscitated, but died at about 4 p.m.

His mother composed herself and took the dead child home for burial.

"She was trying to be strong," the doctor said.

The crisis extends well beyond Maradi.

On Wednesday, Fatu Haliss tried to spoonfeed her son, Alassan, but the 1-year-old cried and spat it out. The boy's face is gaunt, reduced to a bony skull, making his eyes look large and round. He weighs about seven pounds, about a half a pound less than when he arrived at a feeding center in Tahoua, 230 miles northeast of Niamey, about two weeks ago.

Her family provides a bitter example of Niger's poverty. The woman's parents are both dead. She has not heard from her husband since he left to work in neighboring Libya more than a year ago.

She has lost more children than have lived. Two were born dead. Four others "died normally," as she puts it. Four are alive, including Alassan, "the thinnest child I ever had."

"Many small children died in our village," she said.

She spent her last money on half a bag of rice to leave with her children when she brought Alassan to the feeding center, but fears it may have run out by now. Worse, her crop needs tending, or it could fail.

"I have nobody at home. My husband left and I have to work in the field. I need to get back home. I have nothing else to eat, only my crop. It could die and then who will feed me? I have nobody to feed me."

For Umutoni, it is tough watching these children, who arrive only when they already near death.

"Children who are very sick and malnourished are often very quiet. But when you start to nourish them, they start to make more noise. Their eyes become more lively, and shining," she said. "You see life in their eyes."

In Tense Sudan, Divisions Resurface (WP)

By Emily Wax

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

JUBA, Sudan, Aug. 4 -- The mood of this rattled country, after the sudden death Sunday of the former rebel leader John Garang, is etched on the fearful faces of northern Arab merchants, surrounded by suitcases and nylon sacks, as they wait in the airport to flee further attacks by southerners.

The once-lively central market of this southern city is a deserted maze of smoldering fires and burned metal roofs after three days of rioting. Goats and children pick through the rubble of charred soda bottles, detergent boxes and plastic roses.

The hastily dug earth in a cemetery marks the sites where Arab families quickly buried their dead, as required by Muslim law, leaving unmarked graves and retreating to the shelter of military bases.

Officials said at least 13 people were killed in Juba, 720 miles south of the capital, Khartoum, during three days of mob violence, looting and ethnic tensions that erupted after Garang's death in a helicopter crash. In the Khartoum area, officials said 111 people had died and several hundred were injured. Another 1,500 were arrested.

The clashes in north and south have been mirror images, taking on the very themes of the civil war that ended in January with a peace deal negotiated by the government and Garang -- mostly African southerners feeling marginalized by the Arab-led north, mostly Muslim northerners feeling their religion and political position under threat from the south, which is mainly animist and Christian.

Garang, 60, was rewarded for helping to bring peace by becoming Sudan's senior vice president after leading rebels during the 21-year civil war.

Now, in the city where he is to be buried Saturday, the country's raw anger, and its deep ethnic and religious divides, are very much out in the open.

Juba, a city of about 350,000 on the Nile River that is tenuously under the control of 60,000 government troops, feels more like a frontline camp readying for war than a future regional capital preparing for a state funeral.

"All of the people here want to kill us," said Abdullah Ali Tabeb, an Arab merchant who said his family's cigarette and flour shops were set on fire. He said he had spent the last four days at the airport, with only water and biscuits to nourish him, in hopes of getting out. "They told the Arabs to go to Khartoum. They don't like us. We need peace."

Less than a mile away, Samuel Fadil, 37, an African southerner, surveyed the charred remains of three storefronts his father had rented to Arab traders. Despite his loss, he said, he sympathized with the looters and could understand their anger.

DOJ_NMG_0002404

"People suspect that the Arabs killed our father Garang," he said, pointing at a still-burning shop. "We have no other source of income. But I am still much more angry over the death of Garang." There has been no report of foul play in the crash; both Garang's movement and the government have called it an accident.

Throughout Wednesday night and into Thursday morning, gunshots rang out across the city. Half-burned public minibuses were abandoned on the roads. Children in ragged clothes grabbed sodas from shop debris. Soldiers guarded a soccer park called Freedom Square, now a temporary jail for looters.

In different corners of Juba, the division of opinion on Garang's death was as wide as the Nile.

Many southerners said they were convinced that the fatal crash was not an accident in bad weather but a plot to weaken the former rebel movement, cause ethnic chaos and deflect attention from the government's autocratic hold on power. Many northerners rushed to take the government's side, partly in exchange for protection from attack.

The government announced that it would deploy a large force of elite troops here during Garang's funeral, which is to be attended by President Omar Hassan Bashir, as there were fears the event could spark new violence. Meanwhile, Garang's body was being flown to various cities in the south so mourners could pay respects.

On Wednesday, armed members of the Sudan People's Liberation Movement, Garang's former rebel group, arrived to help government forces restore calm -- and to protect the group's leaders.

Some analysts said they saw the government's military move as a warning to other brewing rebel movements, especially in the troubled western region of Darfur, where 2 million people have been displaced in a separate conflict.

"The mood of the country is manipulated in this divide-and-rule fashion," said Ollie Dinar, an African scholar in Khartoum. "Sudan's government has once again won. The people are now attacking each other instead of the government."

Dinar said images of southerners burning and looting have been played repeatedly on government television stations, provoking Arabs in Khartoum to fight back.

Whether calm will return, no one is sure.

The abrupt shift from peace to chaos began Sunday, as news spread that Garang's helicopter had crashed en route home from an official visit to Uganda.

In Juba, a group of Arabs lowered the rebel flag and called out to southerners, "Your man has died," said Joseph Abuk, 47, a teacher.

"There were extremely sarcastic and painful comments made," Abuk said. He said the years of civil war had created a deep "lack of trust between us Africans and Arabs. When it comes to the death of Garang," he added, "people are going to go beyond the simple appearance of issues."

Soon, he recounted, young followers of Garang went to the market with sticks and guns. In a "spontaneous burst of anger," he said, they started "burning everything." Arab merchants jumped into buses and fled to army facilities for protection.

Abuk, echoing many southerners' suspicions, suggested that Garang's helicopter could have been sabotaged in the air by terrorists or mercenaries on board.

But Adel Ismail, 45, an Arab merchant waiting wearily at the airport three days after being chased from his shop, said northerners and southerners alike respected Garang and did not want him dead.

"They've put in their minds that we killed Garang," Ismail said, his eyes watering. "I came to Juba to work after the peace deal. Everything was good here."

On Monday, Ismail said, he ran two miles to an army barracks, fleeing a mob of angry youths. On the way, a southern African woman hid him and made him tea. "The southerners are not all bad," he said, looking depressed.

In the eerily quiet dirt streets of Juba, hundreds of heavily armed government troops patrolled Wednesday and Thursday with AK-47s and grenades hanging from their belts. Antiaircraft guns bristled on the airport roof.

Under the peace deal reached in January, the government is scheduled to scale down its military presence and hand over control of the city within two years. Southerners said they view Garang's burial here, in a city they long fought to claim, as an important political gesture.

But Juba did not seem ready for the tens of thousands of mourners expected to arrive for Saturday's funeral.

Few women and children ventured into the rubble-strewn streets, and the few shoppers found prices for sugar and flour had suddenly doubled. Jane Martin, 30, bought a basket of burned onions to cook for her seven children.

"The prices are high. In the night, we don't sleep well," Martin said. "When there are gunshots, my children run and hide under the bed."

She glanced nervously around the burned market, at the government troops and the barbed wire surrounding Freedom Square, and at the rebel troops driving by in pickup trucks. Then, gripping her basket of onions, she turned and hurried home.

Sudan Rebel Leader Is Mourned As Widow Appeals For Calm (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

RUMBEK, Sudan, Aug. 4 - The body of John Garang, the rebel-turned-politician, began crisscrossing Sudan on Thursday as his followers held hastily arranged memorial services aimed at unifying the long-divided country that he helped bring to the brink of peace.

In Kurmuk, the site of a major battle during Mr. Garang's 21-year insurgency, thousands of people stood silently when the cargo plane carrying his coffin touched down at the airstrip. One look at the wooden box carried off the plane by uniformed rebel soldiers, and many in the crowd began to ululate.

It was a somber scene but one that also represented Mr. Garang's stated dream - Sudanese Muslims and Christians standing side by side, united.

Farther north in Khartoum, where Mr. Garang's death in a helicopter crash on Saturday led to deadly riots between predominantly Christian southerners living in the capital and mainly Muslim northerners, tensions remained high. The police began rounding up people suspected of inciting the violence, The Associated Press reported. State news media reported that more than 1,400 people were arrested in Khartoum while dozens were arrested in Juba, the major city in southern Sudan, where rioting also broke out.

Mr. Garang's widow, Rebecca, used the memorial service in Kurmuk to call for calm, urging those wishing to honor her husband not to work against the peace agreement he signed with the government in January, under which he had become the country's vice president.

"My husband is alive, not dead, because he has brought Sudan to peace," she said.

Mr. Garang's Sudan People's Liberation Army took Kurmuk in 1997 in a surprise attack that was a major turning point in the rebel movement. At the time, the rebels had been torn by internal dissention and were widely discounted as a serious threat to the government.

Kurmuk is not far from a hydroelectric plant that provides the bulk of the power to Khartoum. The proximity of the rebels to the dam alarmed the leaders in Khartoum.

Kurmuk also represents the line between north and south, and is a mixture of faiths and allegiances.

On the airstrip, where locals had trekked for miles and spent as long as 10 hours waiting for the plane to land on Thursday, a priest and an imam took turns on the podium.

Even where to bury Mr. Garang has stirred debate. Mr. Garang's family members preferred Panyagor, the village in Upper Nile region where he was born. But the family yielded to the new rebel leadership, which chose Juba, where he will be buried on Saturday.

Juba was a contentious choice because throughout the war it was a government town that the rebels never managed to take. Under the peace agreement, Juba was to be turned over to the rebels in July. Mr. Garang had begun sending teams of rebel soldiers to the town, but major contingents of government soldiers still remain in garrisons there.

Mr. Garang visited Rumbek in January after the peace agreement was signed and was met by tens of thousands of residents. There was silence this evening when Mr. Garang's body returned here. His coffin was met by an honor guard, and at first the only sound was the clicking of their boots in the sand. But then a woman's cry rang out and then another's. One of the soldiers carrying his coffin took a hand off the box to wipe tears out of his eyes.

After John Garang (WP)

The Washington Post, August 5, 2005

Helicopters do crash, especially in bad weather, and the weekend crash that killed John Garang, the longtime leader of Sudan's southern rebels, does not appear to have been the result of foul play. The helicopter in which Mr. Garang was flying belonged to an ally, Ugandan President Yoweri Museveni ally; it was flying over territory controlled by Mr. Garang's own Sudan People's Liberation Movement. Even so, the suspicion of foul play has triggered violent urban protests that could unravel Sudan's fragile north-south peace accord. By Wednesday more than 100 people had died in riots in the capital, Khartoum. In the southern town of Juba, rioters attacked shops and homes owned by ethnic Arabs associated with the northern government. At least 13 people have died.

The challenge now -- both for Sudan's leaders and for the United States and other outsiders -- is to keep the north-south peace process moving in the hope that this violence will die down. So far, all parties appear to be responding as they ought to. The Bush administration immediately dispatched two senior State Department officials to the country. Sudan's president promised a joint north-south commission to investigate the causes of the helicopter crash and appealed for calm. Most promisingly of all, the southern liberation movement has appointed a new leader to succeed Mr. Garang without tearing itself into factions and has urged restraint from its followers. "It is just my husband who has died. His vision is alive," Mr. Garang's widow, Rebecca, told Reuters, alluding to his aspiration for a united and peaceful Sudan in which non-Arabs enjoy full rights.

DOJ_NMG_0002406

African rebel movements, and indeed many African governments, are often led by strongmen who carry more on their shoulders than any individual should. Mr. Garang fit this mold: He made decisions without consulting colleagues; he did little to build political institutions in the areas of the south that he controlled or within his own movement; he was happy to embody the political aspirations of Sudan's non-Arab peoples. This ill-fated approach excluded orderly preparation for a succession and may leave other leaders without the stature necessary to persuade ordinary citizens to trust in a peace deal with the hated government. If that proves to be the case, then Sudan's north-south war may resume, dashing all hopes of using north-south reconciliation as the basis for peace in the western region of Darfur, where the government has committed genocide. But, in the speed and smoothness of his emergence as the new southern leader, Salva Kiir Mayardit holds out the hope that he can fill Mr. Garang's shoes ably. The Bush administration and its allies should encourage and support him. After decades of civil war and millions of casualties, Sudan has suffered more than enough.

Coup May Alter Mauritania's U.S. Ties (WSJ)

By Yaroslav Trofimov

The Wall Street Journal, August 5, 2005

Despite world-wide condemnation of this week's military putsch, Mauritania's new ruling junta has consolidated its hold over one of America's and Israel's most collaborative allies in the Arab world.

Wednesday's bloodless coup d'etat ousted long-serving President Maaouiya Ould Taya, who was visiting Saudi Arabia at the time. Hours later, the new junta -- which calls itself the Military Council for Justice and Democracy -- named as Mauritania's temporary leader Col. Ely Mohammed Vall, one of the deposed president's closest aides and head of the country's police and intelligence services.

The U.S, the African Union and the European Union all condemned the coup, with the State Department calling for "peaceful return to order under the constitution and the established government of President Taya." But as street celebrations erupted in the Mauritanian capital of Nouakchott, it seemed increasingly unlikely that Mr. Taya, who is staying in Niger, will be able to return to power.

The new junta's communiqué, read on national television, decried the "totalitarian practices of the deposed regime" and promised to create "true democratic institutions" after a two-year transitional period. Such progressive language notwithstanding, the junta consists of senior military officers who, like Col. Vall, held senior jobs in Mr. Taya's government, and who themselves were involved in the recent crackdowns on the Islamist opposition.

"They can't really carry out reforms, because they themselves are part and parcel of the regime," said Alain Antil, an Africa specialist at the French Institute for International Relations in Paris.

Mauritania, with a population of three million, is one of the poorest Arab countries -- but it has discovered oil in its offshore fields, with production slated to start next year. This lure of oil revenue has intensified conflicts within the ruling establishment, helping to provoke a series of coup attempts in recent years.

While democracy is unlikely to bloom in Nouakchott soon, Mauritania's foreign policy may well change in coming weeks. Mr. Taya, who came to power in a 1984 coup, used to be a passionate Arab nationalist and backed Saddam Hussein in the 1991 Gulf War; he also maintained close links with former colonial power France.

But, in 1999, French authorities detained a Mauritanian army captain on suspicion of human-rights abuses against black-skinned Mauritanians. Angered by the move, Mr. Taya immediately froze most cooperation with France and turned to the U.S. That same year, at a ceremony hosted in Washington by then-Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, Mauritania became the first Arab nation to establish full diplomatic relations with Israel without being required to do so by a peace treaty returning conquered land.

This relationship with Israel, which was denounced by the Arab League and regularly criticized on pan-Arab TV stations, became the rallying point for the Mauritanian opposition, which managed to organize violent street protests during a visit by Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom in May.

A desire to sever these ties with Israel "is the only issue that unites the quasitotality of Mauritanians," Mr. Antil said. He expects the new junta to curtail the Israeli connections and to scale down cooperation with Washington -- which recently deployed a small military contingent in Mauritania to train local security forces -- in favor of improved relations with France.

The same expectation is widespread in the Arab world, where the media mostly ran positive reports about the coup and suggested the plotters may have had tacit French support.

Thousands Back Junta In Mauritania (NYT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0002407

By The Associated Press
The New York Times, August 5, 2005
Filed at 9:42 p.m. ET

NOUAKCHOTT, Mauritania (AP) -- Thousands rallied Thursday to support the military junta that toppled Mauritania's pro-Western president a day earlier, as the African country's top leader met with the U.S. and French ambassadors.

The meetings with the envoys of former colonial power France and counterterrorism partner America were among the first Col. Ely Ould Mohamed Vall held, and appeared designed to assure the international community it had nothing to fear from the new regime.

The junta also issued a statement announcing the dissolution of the country's bicameral legislature.

Western and other African nations and the United Nations condemned the coup. The African Union's Peace and Security Council suspended Mauritania on Thursday until "the restoration of constitutional order in the country."

But many Mauritanians applauded the ouster of President Maaoya Sid'Ahmed Ould Taya, saying he was a brutal dictator and that they hoped the junta would keep its promise to usher in democracy. Taya was out of the country when the junta struck.

Tens of thousands of people swept through Nouakchott on Thursday on foot and in cars to express their support for the junta. Some carried huge portraits of Vall.

Vall made no public statements Thursday. U.S. Ambassador Joseph LeBaron refused to comment on the meeting and other diplomats were not immediately available.

Mauritanian officials said Vall had assured the ambassadors that his junta would quickly arrange elections. The junta has promised to yield to democratic rule within two years.

U.S. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said LeBaron has also spoken with Taya's chief of staff in Niger, where Taya's plane was diverted when news of the coup broke. "We intend to work with the African Union ... to restore constitutional rule in Mauritania."

When asked if that included continued support of Taya, Casey said, "The president is the head of the constitutional government in Mauritania."

Shops, businesses and the international airport reopened and traffic was flowing again in Mauritania's capital Thursday.

This sparsely populated nation on the northwestern edge of the Sahara had been strictly controlled by Taya, who had seized power in a coup and tried to legitimize his rule in the 1990s through elections the opposition says were fraudulent.

Taya dealt ruthlessly with those who opposed him. He had allied his overwhelmingly Muslim nation with the United States in the war on terror and with Israel.

The junta had indicated in statements Wednesday it planned no changes in foreign policy.

A Crucible In Turkey (NYT)

By Mark Landler
The New York Times, August 5, 2005

EREGLI, Turkey - A fierce-looking banner strung between two trees in this hillside town on the Black Sea sums up how the locals here feel about the steel factory that is their principal employer: "Erdemir is our sweat," it proclaims. "Each of us would die for it."

Turkey recently put this state-controlled company, its biggest steel maker, on the auction block.

With 13 suitors lining up to bid, including firms from Russia, Britain and South Korea, Erdemir could become one of Turkey's most successful privatizations - a potent symbol of its economic progress as Turkey begins arduous negotiations this fall to join the European Union.

But first the sale has to happen.

The auction process has run into an unexpected surge of opposition from political leaders and business executives, who argue that privatizing the company is not necessary, given its profits.

Moreover, they add, Turkey cannot afford to surrender a strategic asset, especially when Europeans seem increasingly reluctant to admit the Turks into their club of nations.

Then there are the factory's 7,500 workers, who fear they could lose their jobs under a foreign owner. Protests have erupted here and in other cities, as Erdemir has become a fraught symbol of Turkey's uneasy passage from its sheltered past into a free-market future.

"This is a real test for Turkey," said Metin Kilci, the president of the Turkish Privatization Administration, which hopes to sell Erdemir by the end of the year and follow it with sales of other state assets, including an insurance company, a sugar factory and the Istanbul Hilton.

DOJ_NMG_0002408

The Turkish government has won kudos for stabilizing the economy, with the help of loans from the International Monetary Fund, after a deep crisis in 2001 brought this nation of 69 million to the brink of bankruptcy. Turkey's output grew nearly 9 percent last year, a pace that rivaled that of China.

The government of Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan is also credited with taming decades of sky-high inflation, which had turned Turkey's currency, the lira, into something close to funny money.

But the process of privatizing state-owned companies has been dogged for 20 years by legal challenges and political interference. As Turkey bids for a place in the European Union - a step the United States supports - it is eager to show its resolve to open its economy.

"We would be more than happy if a foreign company wins this tender," Mr. Kilci said in an interview in Ankara, the nation's capital.

Mr. Kilci expressed disappointment that the United States Steel Corporation was not on the initial list of potential bidders, and said he hoped it might join in later. U.S. Steel, based in Pittsburgh, owns factories in Slovakia and Serbia. A spokeswoman for the company declined to comment.

Analysts, however, said a sale to any foreign buyer could still be blocked. The chamber of commerce here has filed a suit opposing a sale. National opposition is robust and well organized. And there is a receptive audience for dark warnings about foreigners taking advantage of Turks. The dispute has been featured on the front pages for weeks.

"There's a Turkish saying, 'We serve foreigners the best meat - the lamb without the bones,' " said Cemal Senturk, who represents local manufacturers that buy steel plates from Erdemir.

Turkey's attitude toward outsiders has not been softened by the chilly reception it is getting these days in Europe. Although its campaign to join the union is still officially on track, with membership negotiations scheduled to start in early October, popular sentiment in Europe has turned noticeably against it.

Some of that is fueled by fears that low-cost Turkish workers will take European jobs. Some is linked to security concerns that have intensified since the London bombings: as a Muslim country, Turkey cannot escape the taint of radical Islamic militancy, even if it is a moderate secular society.

Politics reflects the popular mood. In Germany, Angela Merkel, a conservative leader who opposes Turkey's bid, is leading in polls six weeks before an election for chancellor. In France, the politician of the moment is Nicolas Sarkozy, the interior minister and would-be president, who has also expressed qualms about Turkey.

"The Turks are quite angry," said Katinka Barysch, the chief economist of the Center for European Reform, a research group in London, who recently wrote a report about Turkey. "They think, 'We've done so much for the E.U., now the E.U. needs to do something for us.' "

In the case of Erdemir and its steel operation, critics say Europe's biggest contribution would be to skim off the cream of its output.

The company currently supplies about one-third of Turkey's demand for flat steel, which is used to make ships, cars, machinery and household appliances. If a foreign buyer took over Erdemir, people here say the company would export the high-quality steel to Western Europe, forcing Turkish companies to switch to lower-quality steel imported from Ukraine or Kazakhstan.

"The foreigners are very profit-oriented," Mr. Senturk said. "Why would they care about the problems in Turkey?"

Twenty-three Turkish manufacturers that buy steel from Erdemir have banded together to submit their own bid for the company. But they face well-financed rivals, like Mittal Steel of London and Arcelor, based in Luxembourg, which are the world's two largest steel makers.

Owning a steel plant in Turkey is attractive, analysts say, because the country has become a hub for auto manufacturing: Ford, Toyota, Renault and Fiat make cars here. Arcelor has ties to Renault, analysts say, and might like a Turkish factory to supply the local Renault plant.

More broadly, the global steel industry is ripe for consolidation. After two years of voracious demand, much of it driven by China's economy, analysts predict a sharp slowdown in sales, which could result in a surplus. Acquisitive giants like Mittal, which already owns 8.6 percent of Erdemir's shares, are seizing the chance to add to their holdings.

The Turkish government knows it has a brief window in which it can command a premium price. "Steel is a cyclical business," Mr. Kilci said. "In five years, it might be losing money again."

Erdemir was founded in 1960 and began production in 1965. It lost a total of $169 million from 2001 to 2002, which were difficult years for the steel industry, before rebounding with a profit of $261 million in 2003 and $473 million last year.

Although the Turkish state owns only 46 percent of Erdemir's shares, it controls the board and appoints senior management. Even those managers sounded dubious when asked why Turkey should sell it.

"That's the question I constantly keep asking," said A. Kerim Dervisoglu, who became the chief executive in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0002409

Mr. Dervisoglu trimmed the work force to 7,500 people, from 8,400. He upgraded the factory's two hot-rolling mills, which expanded their production capacity. And he began construction of a cavernous new mill, which will turn out large plates of steel suitable for shipbuilding.

On Tuesday, days after this interview, Erdemir announced that Mr. Dervisoglu had stepped down as chief executive because of poor health. Analysts in Istanbul said his exit most likely reflected his feelings about the sale.

The pressure to divest Erdemir is also driven by Turkey's parlous public finances. The Turkish government is running a budget deficit equivalent to 8 percent of its gross domestic product. The company, which is publicly traded, has a market capitalization of $2.5 billion. Given a premium for change of control, that implies Ankara could realize $1.5 billion for its stake.

Beyond that, privatizations are a handy way to attract foreign investors. Turkey lured only $1.2 billion in foreign direct investment last year, a paltry number for an economy of its size. Foreigners have been put off by the cumbersome regulations and, until recently, the gyrating economy.

While Erdemir is making money, some critics say its financial prowess has been wildly exaggerated.

"It's making a profit because the demand for steel is going crazy in places like China," said Ishak Alaton, the chairman of Alarko Holding, a conglomerate with interests in construction, fisheries and resort hotels. "If it were in private hands, it would make 10 times the profit."

Mr. Alaton said a cabal of government bureaucrats and business people was fomenting opposition to the sale of Erdemir out of a desire to maintain control of a lucrative asset.

The opportunities for corruption are easy to see. Mr. Kilci noted that Erdemir had always supplied the president of the privatization administration with a free car - in his case, an Audi A6. "After we privatize Erdemir, I'll have to switch to a Fiat," he said with a wry laugh.

Critics, however, say the government's headlong rush to sell a thriving company could weaken public support for future sales. "It gives the impression of being ideological rather than rational or economic," said Gunhan Karakullukcu, an economist and business consultant.

Here in Erdemir's hometown, the feelings are mostly personal. The company has built schools, movie theaters and sports centers for Eregli, and donated property for employees to build houses. It even sponsors an annual "love, peace and friendship" festival.

"This is not only financial," said Semsi Durdu, a Hyundai dealer who depends on the factory's workers for a good portion of his sales. "There's a lot of emotion attached to it."

Fox Admits Dim Results On Security (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado

The Dallas Morning News, August 5, 2005

MEXICO CITY – President Vicente Fox's office acknowledged Thursday that its anti-crime operation strategy hasn't produced the "results we expected, or wanted" and vowed to intensify the campaign in the days ahead.

The comments by presidential spokesman Ruben Aguilar were the first official confirmation that violence has worsened since Operation Safe Mexico began June 13, and they buttress concerns expressed by both U.S. and Mexican law enforcement officials of a sense of increased lawlessness. They point to escalating violence not just along the U.S.-Mexico border but also in the key states of Guerrero and Jalisco.

No details were offered on how Mr. Fox will beef up his campaign.

In Tampico, in the border state of Tamaulipas, Mr. Fox said the government's campaign will be "tough, difficult and long" and vowed to redouble efforts to return security to the streets of Nuevo Laredo and other cities affected by the drug war.

Meanwhile, law enforcement officials in Laredo remain on high alert.

"We thought that by having the Mexican military presence we would see violence in Nuevo Laredo subside," said Webb County Sheriff Rick Flores. "But the homicides have increased. Cops in Nuevo Laredo are dying. One of my deputies was met with fire [along the banks of the Rio Grande]. So this validates what we have been saying all along: The situation is serious and worsening. It's a time bomb, and if we don't address it now, it will come back to bite us in the rear because this stuff is spreading to our side, too."

Mr. Aguilar's comments come as the U.S. State Department, which has already issued three warnings to Americans venturing into Nuevo Laredo, wrestles with whether to reopen its consulate in Nuevo Laredo. Last Friday, U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza ordered the office shut, blaming increased violence.

Mr. Garza and Interior Secretary Carlos Abascal met for an hour Wednesday and decided that the consulate will reopen in the "days ahead," although no definite time frame was offered. An official in Washington said that Monday is "a likely day, if the situation warrants it."

DOJ_NMG_0002410

"We're still reviewing security in Nuevo Laredo, and a decision on resuming normal operations has not been made," said another U.S. official, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

So far this year, more than 800 people have been killed nationwide as a result of a bloody drug war in which high-powered weapons, grenades and bazookas are used.

The state of Tamaulipas has reported 228 murders, with at least 106 people – including nearly 20 police officers – killed in Nuevo Laredo alone.

On Monday, Mexican police discovered the bodies of two men on a road outside Nuevo Laredo. One victim, identified as Horacio Diaz Garcia, had been shot 19 times. On his body was a written message to the Sinaloa cartel whose alleged leaders – Edgar Valdez Villarreal, alias "Barbie"; Joaquin "Chapo" Guzmán; and Arturo Beltran – are waging war with the Gulf cartel to take over the distribution route along Interstate 35.

The note read: "[Expletive] Barbie and Arturo Beltran, you won't take over, not even with the support of the Mexican special forces, not even by killing innocent people."

Papers Reveal British Aid For Israeli Nukes (WT/UPI)

By Hannah K. Strange, United Press International

The Washington Times, August 5, 2005

LONDON -- Britain secretly sold Israel a key ingredient for its nuclear program in 1958, declassified documents have revealed.

Official government papers released by the British National Archives detail a deal to export 20 tons of heavy water for about $2.7 million. The ingredient was vital to plutonium production at the top-secret Dimona nuclear reactor in Israel's Negev desert.

The British government did not place any "peaceful use only" condition on the sale of the heavy water. "It would be somewhat overzealous for us to insist on safeguards," a civil servant explained.

Ministers in Prime Minister Harold Macmillan's government were unaware of the deal, which apparently was conducted entirely by civil servants. It also was kept secret from the Americans.

In one of the documents, Foreign Office official Donald Cape concluded: "On the whole I would prefer not to mention this to the Americans."

When questioned by the British Broadcasting Corp., Mr. Cape said he could remember nothing about the episode.

Washington had refused Israeli requests to purchase heavy water without a guarantee that it would be used for exclusively peaceful purposes.

The heavy water was surplus from a consignment that Britain bought from Norway. Though shipped from a British port, it was presented as a deal between Israel and Norway.

Robert McNamara, who served as the U.S. secretary of defense from 1961 to 1968, said he was "astonished" by the cover-up.

"It is very surprising to me we were not told because we shared information about the nuclear bomb very closely with the British," he told the BBC.

By the time Israel requested more heavy water in 1961, the existence of the Dimona reactor had been exposed by the press, as had Israel's probable weapons program, and Britain refused a further sale, the documents reveal.

Hugh Stephenson of the Foreign Office wrote: "I am quite sure we should not agree to this sale. The Israeli project is much too live an issue for us to get mixed up in it again."

Israel has never acknowledged or denied having nuclear weapons, and has not conducted any public nuclear tests. It also has refused to sign the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Israel began showing an interest in acquiring nuclear weapons shortly after its creation in 1948, and formed the Israeli Atomic Energy Commission in 1952.

Construction of the Dimona facility began in the late 1950s, with France secretly providing assistance with reactor design and construction, according to Washington-based Web site GlobalSecurity.org.

In 1968, the CIA concluded that Israel had begun to produce nuclear weapons, but it wasn't until 1986 that the international community was afforded a glimpse of the true extent of the Israeli program.

Mordechai Vanunu, who had worked as a technician at Dimona, gave the Times of London detailed information about Israel's nuclear program, on the basis of which analysts concluded that Israel had up to 200 warheads. However before he could reveal more, he was trapped by the Israeli intelligence service Mossad and imprisoned for 18 years as a traitor.

The I.R.A.'s Gift Of Gab (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0002411

By Ed Moloney

The New York Times, August 5, 2005

Most people in Northern Ireland, in the Irish Republic or among Irish-Americans hope that last week's statement by the Irish Republican Army ending its armed campaign against British rule of Northern Ireland and embracing only peaceful and democratic methods is truly the "step of unparalleled magnitude" that Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain claims to see.

Yet there are good reasons to be cautious. The I.R.A.'s words are welcome, but there's an old Irish saw applicable here, which says that fine words butter no parsnips. The I.R.A. and leaders of its political wing, Sinn Fein, like Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness, have made impressive, even dramatic promises in the past but subsequent deeds failed to match them.

Not only that, but the moves made by the I.R.A. last week were cost-free. The last shots fired in anger by the I.R.A. at British security forces were in the summer of 1997, and the reality is that its campaign against Britain has been over for years. Last week's statement was merely an admission of an already established fact.

Equally, Sinn Fein, and those among its leadership who double as I.R.A. leaders and commanders, have committed themselves before to peaceful and democratic methods. Indeed, Mr. Adams would not have been allowed into political talks in 1998 about Northern Ireland's future unless he had subscribed to principles embodying such a commitment.

In spite of that pledge, I.R.A. activity, albeit at a much lower level, persisted and pitched the Irish peace process into one crisis after another. A real sign of change would have been an announcement that the I.R.A. was disbanding, but that was absent from the statement, as was any pledge to end recruitment.

The events that provoked last week's statement - the robbery of more than $50 million from a Belfast bank last December and the subsequent killing of a Belfast Catholic, Robert McCartney, by what are generally believed to be I.R.A. members - showed that the conventional test of I.R.A. sincerity, its willingness to disarm transparently, was made largely irrelevant. The I.R.A. didn't need tons of Semtex explosives or heavy machine guns to commit those crimes. All it needed was a few motivated members. The problem was not I.R.A. weapons but the I.R.A. itself.

The experience of the last 11 years of the Irish peace process is that continued I.R.A. activity has sapped the trust of the majority Protestant community and made its political leaders reluctant to enter into a power-sharing government with Sinn Fein in 1998.

But Sinn Fein has turned that to its electoral advantage, charging Protestants with bigotry, and seeking sympathy and solidarity from Catholics in both Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic. The result is that Sinn Fein is now the largest Catholic party in Northern Ireland and has seats in the London, Dublin, Belfast and European Parliaments. Final peace has been delayed for narrow political gain.

The I.R.A.'s refusal to begin disbanding is one big reason instability still exists. The Belfast bank robbery illustrated the way such instability can be fostered.

While the I.R.A.'s war against Britain has diminished during the last eight years, the organization's drift into racketeering has accelerated. Ian Pearson, a former security minister in Northern Ireland, recently called the I.R.A. "perhaps the most sophisticated organized criminal grouping" anywhere in Europe. Few experts expect such activity will cease because of last week's statement.

The criminality linked to groups like the I.R.A. is staggering. One recent British government report estimated that there were 140 paramiltary-associated criminal gangs, many with international connections, operating in an area that in terms of population is about the size of the Bronx. In 2002, the police confiscated more counterfeit currency and goods - CD's, DVD's, watches, clothes, software - in Northern Ireland than in all of Britain. Cigarette and gasoline smuggling, protection rackets, armed robberies and hijackings are rife.

The I.R.A.'s involvement in this illegal activity has produced a leadership cadre that has combined ruthless paramilitary activism with lucrative criminal sidelines. Figures with no visible means of support have in the last few years suddenly become property moguls and business owners with luxury vacation houses in Ireland and in foreign resorts.

The Bush administration's attempts to press both London and Dublin to act against these criminals have met with limited success. Suspicion is widespread that Mr. Blair and his counterpart in Dublin, Bertie Ahern, would rather leave that problem alone because they fear moving against paramilitary crime would cause discontent in I.R.A. ranks with Mr. Adams's stewardship.

There are other signs that in Britain and Ireland the political will to tackle this crime is lacking. A proposal by Ronald Goldstock, former director of New York State's Organized Crime Task Force, to introduce laws similar to those spelled out in United States' Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act was rejected by Mr. Blair's government. The authorities in Dublin and London have the power to confiscate criminal assets but have yet to use it against major I.R.A. figures.

Rooting out the forces behind paramilitary racketeering is not only the right thing to do, it is the sensible course as well. Pouring the necessary resources into pursuing these criminals would help remove a potential source of future instability in the peace process and convince skeptics that the influence of groups like the I.R.A. is on the wane. But failure to do so will turn last week's announcement into just another in a long line of false beginnings.

DOJ_NMG_0002412

DOJ_NMG_0002413

From: McDowell, Cynthia
Sent: Friday, August 05, 2005 9:45 AM
To: Andrea Bottner; Andrew Emrich; Brad Schlozman; Bruce Mcdonald; Carl Nichols; Carl Peed; Cheri Nolan; Clifford White; Crystal Roberts; Cybele Daley; Dan Meron; Deborah Rhodes; Deborah Spagnoli; Domingo Herraiz; Donald Gambatesa; Edward McNally; Elizabeth Kessler; Gregory Katsas; Howard Nielson; Jeffrey Bucholtz; Jeffrey Clark; Jeffrey Taylor; John Richter; Jonathan Cohn; Joseph Bianco; Kelly Johnson; Kristi Macklin; Kyle Sampson; Laura Parsky; Lily Swenson; Luis Reyes; Makan Delrahim; Michael Battle; Monica Goodling; Neil Gorsuch; Nicholas Tzitzon; Pat O'Brien; Patrick Hofer; Patrick Philbin; Paul Clement; Rachel Brand; Raul Yanes; Rebecca Seidel; Richard Hertling; Richard Morrison; Robert Flores; Sean McLaughlin; Sharee Freeman; Steve Bradbury; Steven McFarland; Stuart Nash; Tasia Scolinos; Theodore Ullyot; Thomas Barnett; Tracy Henke; Uttam Dhillon; Wan Kim; Alex MacLean; Amy Grimsrud; Andrew Ames; Andrew Beach; Angela Williamson; Asheesh Agarwal; Ben Curtis; Beth Collins Cook; Brian Cohen; Bruce Taylor; C. Kevin Marshall; Candice Chiu; Carrie Nelson; Connor Flaherty; Courtney Elwood; Cynthia Magnuson; Cynthia McKnight; Deborah Underhill; Ebony Lee; Elizabeth Apisson; Eric Akers; Eric Holland; Evan Gilbert; Gordon Todd; Grant Nichols; Jaclyn Lesch; James OConnell; Jan Williams; Jana White; Janet Potter; Jason Torchinsky; Jennifer Korn; Jessica Gavora; John Eddy; John Irving; John Nowacki; Julie Warren; Kerri Strug; Kiahna Sellers; Kimberly Smith; Lara Reynolds; Lindsey de la Torre; Mark Metcalf; Mary Neumayr; Matt David; Matt Robinson; Matt Roper; Matthew Miranda; Michael Costigan; Michael Tierney; Miriam Moore; Molly Donlin; Natalie Voris; Neal Jungeblut; Omar Vargas; Patrick McArthur; Price Roe; Raquel Sours; Rena Comisac; Ryan Bounds; Sandra Malloy; Shane Chambers; Stephanie McNees; Stuart Nash; Theodore Cooperstein; Tim Racicot; Trent Luckinbill; Tucker McNeil; Wanda Martinson; William Otis; William Woodruff
Subject: The Appointees Friday Weekly - August 5, 2005

THE APPOINTEES FRIDAY WEEKLY

Friday, August 5, 2005

==========

Dear Appointees,

Have you recently gotten engaged, married, celebrated the birth of a baby, enjoyed a wedding anniversary? Please let Cynthia know your good news for the next DOJ Newsletter.

DOJ_NMG_0002414

- LIVE JAZZ TONIGHT: Friday, August 5: "The DC Project" World Beat Jazz, National Gallery of Art's Sculpture Garden, 9th & Constitution Ave. 5:00-8:00 p.m.
- DOJ News: JCON System Scheduled Outing - Sunday, August 7
- Family Area Events: County Fairs! Safe, Friendly, Affordable, Wholesome
- New Area Restaurant: Sushi-Go-Round and Tapas - Open August 8
- Tidbits: Lawn Mower Racing…the Latest Craze!
- Tidbits: Farewell to John Eddy, Deputy White House Liaison

Have a great week!

Regards,

The DOJ Office of White House Liaison
Jan Williams, John Eddy, and Cynthia McDowell

~

DOJ News:
JCON SYSTEM SCHEDULED OUTAGES - SATURDAY-SUNDAY, AUGUST 6-7

Customer Affected: All JCON JMD Customers located in the PHB Building
All Dial-in Users
When: Saturday, August 6, 2005. 6:00 am until 6:00 pm
Unavailable Services: Exchange email, H:\ Drive, Network Printers, Dial-in Remote access Available Services: BlackBerry Email Services Email
Logging on to JCON Network
G:\ Drive
Internet Access
Local Printers
M:\ Drive
Pin to Pin BlackBerry Messaging
Required Action: Please "Shutdown and Power off" your workstation before leaving.

~
Customer Affected: All JCON JMD Customers located in the Main Building
When: Sunday, August 7, 2005, 12:01 am until 4:00 am
Unavailable Services: H:\ Drive, Network Printers
Available Services: BlackBerry Email Services
Email
Logging on to JCON Network
G:\ Drive
Internet Access
Local Printers
M:\ Drive
Pin to Pin BlackBerry Messaging
Required Action: Please "Shutdown and Power off" your workstation before leaving.

~

Family Area Events:

COUNTY FAIRS! Agriculture and family bonding…an old-fashioned county fair and atmosphere to combat our high-tech world.

DOJ_NMG_0002415

The size, location and events at the fairs may vary, but the basic premise remains the same: safe, friendly, community-building activities based on agriculture shows, musical performances and children's contests for entertainment. Despite the multitude of contests going on, everyone seems to be there to support one another…kids compete with each other yet are all for each other…it's a solid family-oriented activity that builds self-confidence in its participants.

Most of the children at the fairs are members of 4-H, a national youth organization that began at the turn of the last century and is now an arm of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Cooperative Extension System. Children choose their project, set out to learn practical skills, initiative, leadership and follow-through by following the requirements of the project, keeping financial records and competing with other 4-H'ers to be the best of show. They also learn critical analysis skills and the ability to express their thoughts systematically through judging contests. The projects can include anything from baking and crafts to photography, but at most fairs, 4-H members show their horses, beef and dairy cows, sheep, pigs, chickens, rabbits and goats, receiving prizes ribbons and small monetary awards for their efforts in the showmanship, market and breeding classes. Some fairs also support a livestock auction where local buyers pay above market value for top ribbons, knowing the proceeds will go towards financing the exhibitor's college education.

It is true that farmers are in many ways a disappearing breed. According to the 2000 U.S. Census, just 1.9 percent of the employed labor force works in agriculture, compared to 4 percent in 1970. But the children at the fairs seem eager to follow in their parents' footsteps and appear to have the time of their lives. It's reported that the fairs are "something to bring the kids to that doesn't cost an arm and a leg, and folks can have good old-fashioned fun."

Washington Weekend, The Washington Times, July 28, 2005

- Fairfax County 4-H Fair and Frying Pan Park Farm Show, August 6-7. 703-324-5369 or www.4hfairfax.org <http://www.4hfairfax.org>
- Howard County Fair, August. 6-13. 410-442-1022 or www.howardcountyfair.com <http://www.howardcountyfair.com>
- Culpeper-Madison-Rappahannock Fair Carnival, August 9-13. 540-825-3335 or info@cmrfair.com <mailto:info@cmrfair.com>
- Prince William County Fair, August 12-20. 703-368-0173 or www.pwcfair.com <http://www.pwcfair.com>
- Montgomery County Agricultural Fair, August 12-20. 301-926-3100 or www.mcagfair.com <http://www.mcagfair.com>
- Clarke County Fair, August 14-20. 540-955-2530 or www.ccfairva.com <http://www.ccfairva.com>
- Arlington County Fair, August 18-21. 703-228-3289 or www.arlingtoncountyfair.org <http://www.arlingtoncountyfair.org>
- Page Valley Agricultural and Industrial Fair, August 21-27. 540-843-3247 or www.pagevalleyfair.com <http://www.pagevalleyfair.com>
- Maryland State Fair, August 26-Sept. 5. 410-252-0200 or www.marylandstatefair.com <http://www.marylandstatefair.com>
- Shenandoah County Fair, August 26-Sept. 3. 540-459-3867 or www.shencofair.com <http://www.shencofair.com>
- Prince George's County Fair, Sept. 8-11. 301-579-2598 or www.countyfair.org <http://www.countyfair.org>
- Anne Arundel County Fair, Sept. 14-18. 410-923-3400 or www.aacountyfair.org <http://www.aacountyfair.org>
- Charles County Fair, Sept. 15-18. 301-932-1234 or www.charlescountyfair.com <http://www.charlescountyfair.com>

DOJ_NMG_0002416

- The Great Frederick Fair, Sept. 16-24. 301-301-663-5895 or www.thegreat-frederickfair.com <http://www.thegreat-frederickfair.com>
- St. Mary's County Fair, Sept. 22-25. 301-475-8434.
- State Fair of Virginia, Sept. 22-October 2. 804-569-3244 or www.statefair.com <http://www.statefair.com>
- Calvert County Fair, Sept. 28-Oct. 2. 410-535-0026.

~

New Area Restaurant:

OPEN AUGUST 8 - SUSHI-GO-ROUND and TAPAS

Located in G Street Alley, adjacent to the MCI Center near the Regal Cinema entrance.
Metro: Gallery Pl-Chinatown; Gallery Place, 7th and H streets, NW, Washington, DC.
PH 202.393.2825.

~

Tidbits:

LAWN MOWER RACING…the Latest Craze

Yes, that's right…lawn mowers. The sport began in England more than 30 years ago by motor sports fans put out by the high cost of the car racing sport. They figured everybody has a lawn mower, why not just race them? The sport began on this side of the Atlantic in 1992 as a publicity stunt for a company that makes a fuel stabilizer, and it's been gaining speed ever since. The U.S. Lawn Mower Racing Association (USLMRA) has six classes for races with stock being the slowest (6 mph). The fast lane is reserved for the Factory Experimental class in which speeds can exceed 90 mph. For nationally sanctioned races, drivers compile points and compete; no prize money is awarded at races. USLMRA has a broadcast deal with ESPN and there is a video game in the works with 500 members in 21 chapters nationwide. The focus is on inexpensive fun with the family. The only requirements concern safety.

~

JOHN EDDY 'S DEPARTURE

Farewell to John Eddy, Deputy White House Liaison, as he departs the U.S. Department of Justice today to direct The Victory Team of the Republican National Committee.

~

Have a great week!

Cynthia R. McDowell
Internal Communications Coordinator
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Room 5317
Washington, D.C. 20530
Tel: [redacted], Fax: (202) 514-3546

"The road of Providence is uneven and unpredictable - yet we know where it leads: It leads to freedom."
President George W. Bush, February 2, 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0002417

DOJ_NMG_0002418

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.72559-000001

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Friday, August 05, 2005 2:31 PM
To: Eddy, John
Subject: FW: The Appointees Friday Weekly - August 5, 2005

Tracking:

Recipient	Read
Eddy, John	Read: 8/5/2005 2:32 PM

John, I'm very sorry to see you go so soon after I've arrived. Thank you for all your help in getting me situated here and best of luck at the RNC! I know you will have a great time. Say hello to my friend Ken Mehlman and stay in touch. Warm regards, Neil

-----Original Message-----
From: McDowell, Cynthia
Sent: Friday, August 05, 2005 9:45 AM
To: Andrea Bottner; Andrew Emrich; Brad Schlozman; Bruce Mcdonald; Carl Nichols; Carl Peed; Cheri Nolan; Clifford White; Crystal Roberts; Cybele Daley; Dan Meron; Deborah Rhodes; Deborah Spagnoli; Domingo Herraiz; Donald Gambatesa; Edward McNally; Elizabeth Kessler; Gregory Katsas; Howard Nielson; Jeffrey Bucholtz; Jeffrey Clark; Jeffrey Taylor; John Richter; Jonathan Cohn; Joseph Bianco; Kelly Johnson; Kristi Macklin; Kyle Sampson; Laura Parsky; Lily Swenson; Luis Reyes; Makan Delrahim; Michael Battle; Monica Goodling; Neil Gorsuch; Nicholas Tzitzon; Pat O'Brien; Patrick Hofer; Patrick Philbin; Paul Clement; Rachel Brand; Raul Yanes; Rebecca Seidel; Richard Hertling; Richard Morrison; Robert Flores; Sean McLaughlin; Sharee Freeman; Steve Bradbury; Steven McFarland; Stuart Nash; Tasia Scolinos; Theodore Ullyot; Thomas Barnett; Tracy Henke; Uttam Dhillon; Wan Kim; Alex MacLean; Amy Grimsrud; Andrew Ames; Andrew Beach; Angela Williamson; Asheesh Agarwal; Ben Curtis; Beth Collins Cook; Brian Cohen; Bruce Taylor; C. Kevin Marshall; Candice Chiu; Carrie Nelson; Connor Flaherty; Courtney Elwood; Cynthia Magnuson; Cynthia McKnight; Deborah Underhill; Ebony Lee; Elizabeth Apisson; Eric Akers; Eric Holland; Evan Gilbert; Gordon Todd; Grant Nichols; Jaclyn Lesch; James OConnell; Jan Williams; Jana White; Janet Potter; Jason Torchinsky; Jennifer Korn; Jessica Gavora; John Eddy; John Irving; John Nowacki; Julie Warren; Kerri Strug; Kiahna Sellers; Kimberly Smith; Lara Reynolds; Lindsey de la Torre; Mark Metcalf; Mary Neumayr; Matt David; Matt Robinson; Matt Roper; Matthew Miranda; Michael Costigan; Michael Tierney; Miriam Moore; Molly Donlin; Natalie Voris; Neal Jungeblut; Omar Vargas; Patrick McArthur; Price Roe; Raquel Sours; Rena Comisac; Ryan Bounds; Sandra Malloy; Shane Chambers; Stephanie McNees; Stuart Nash; Theodore Cooperstein; Tim Racicot; Trent Luckinbill; Tucker McNeil; Wanda Martinson; William Otis; William Woodruff
Subject: The Appointees Friday Weekly - August 5, 2005

THE APPOINTEES FRIDAY WEEKLY

Friday, August 5, 2005

==========

Dear Appointees,

Have you recently gotten engaged, married, celebrated the birth of a baby, enjoyed a wedding anniversary? Please let Cynthia know your good news for the next DOJ Newsletter.

- LIVE JAZZ TONIGHT: Friday, August 5: "The DC Project" World Beat Jazz, National Gallery of Art's Sculpture Garden, 9th & Constitution Ave. 5:00-8:00 p.m.

- DOJ News: JCON System Scheduled Outing - Sunday, August 7
- Family Area Events: County Fairs! Safe, Friendly, Affordable, Wholesome
- New Area Restaurant: Sushi-Go-Round and Tapas - Open August 8
- Tidbits: Lawn Mower Racing…the Latest Craze!
- Tidbits: Farewell to John Eddy, Deputy White House Liaison

Have a great week!

Regards,

The DOJ Office of White House Liaison
Jan Williams, John Eddy, and Cynthia McDowell

~

DOJ News:

JCON SYSTEM SCHEDULED OUTAGES - SATURDAY-SUNDAY, AUGUST 6-7

Customer Affected:	All JCON JMD Customers located in the PHB Building All Dial-in Users
When:	Saturday, August 6, 2005. 6:00 am until 6:00 pm
Unavailable Services:	Exchange email, H:\ Drive, Network Printers, Dial-in Remote access
Available Services:	BlackBerry Email Services Email Logging on to JCON Network G:\ Drive Internet Access Local Printers M:\ Drive Pin to Pin BlackBerry Messaging
Required Action:	Please "Shutdown and Power off" your workstation before leaving.

~

Customer Affected:	All JCON JMD Customers located in the Main Building
When:	Sunday, August 7, 2005, 12:01 am until 4:00 am
Unavailable Services:	H:\ Drive, Network Printers
Available Services:	BlackBerry Email Services Email Logging on to JCON Network G:\ Drive Internet Access Local Printers M:\ Drive Pin to Pin BlackBerry Messaging
Required Action:	Please "Shutdown and Power off" your workstation before leaving.

~

Family Area Events:

COUNTY FAIRS! Agriculture and family bonding…an old-fashioned county fair and atmosphere to combat our high-tech world.

The size, location and events at the fairs may vary, but the basic premise remains the same: safe, friendly, community-building activities based on agriculture shows, musical performances and children's contests for entertainment. Despite the multitude of contests going on, everyone seems to be there to support one another…kids compete with each other yet are all for each other…it's a solid family-oriented activity that builds self-confidence in its participants.

DOJ_NMG_0002421

Most of the children at the fairs are members of 4-H, a national youth organization that began at the turn of the last century and is now an arm of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Cooperative Extension System. Children choose their project, set out to learn practical skills, initiative, leadership and follow-through by following the requirements of the project, keeping financial records and competing with other 4-H'ers to be the best of show. They also learn critical analysis skills and the ability to express their thoughts systematically through judging contests. The projects can include anything from baking and crafts to photography, but at most fairs, 4-H members show their horses, beef and dairy cows, sheep, pigs, chickens, rabbits and goats, receiving prizes ribbons and small monetary awards for their efforts in the showmanship, market and breeding classes. Some fairs also support a livestock auction where local buyers pay above market value for top ribbons, knowing the proceeds will go towards financing the exhibitor's college education.

It is true that farmers are in many ways a disappearing breed. According to the 2000 U.S. Census, just 1.9 percent of the employed labor force works in agriculture, compared to 4 percent in 1970. But the children at the fairs seem eager to follow in their parents' footsteps and appear to have the time of their lives. It's reported that the fairs are "something to bring the kids to that doesn't cost an arm and a leg, and folks can have good old-fashioned fun."

Washington Weekend, The Washington Times, July 28, 2005

- Fairfax County 4-H Fair and Frying Pan Park Farm Show, August 6-7. 703-324-5369 or www.4hfairfax.org <http://www.4hfairfax.org>
- Howard County Fair, August. 6-13. 410-442-1022 or www.howardcountyfair.com <http://www.howardcountyfair.com>
- Culpeper-Madison-Rappahannock Fair Carnival, August 9-13. 540-825-3335 or info@cmrfair.com <mailto:info@cmrfair.com>
- Prince William County Fair, August 12-20. 703-368-0173 or www.pwcfair.com <http://www.pwcfair.com>
- Montgomery County Agricultural Fair, August 12-20. 301-926-3100 or www.mcagfair.com <http://www.mcagfair.com>
- Clarke County Fair, August 14-20. 540-955-2530 or www.ccfairva.com <http://www.ccfairva.com>
- Arlington County Fair, August 18-21. 703-228-3289 or www.arlingtoncountyfair.org <http://www.arlingtoncountyfair.org>
- Page Valley Agricultural and Industrial Fair, August 21-27. 540-843-3247 or www.pagevalleyfair.com <http://www.pagevalleyfair.com>
- Maryland State Fair, August 26-Sept. 5. 410-252-0200 or www.marylandstatefair.com <http://www.marylandstatefair.com>
- Shenandoah County Fair, August 26-Sept. 3. 540-459-3867 or www.shencofair.com <http://www.shencofair.com>
- Prince George's County Fair, Sept. 8-11. 301-579-2598 or www.countyfair.org <http://www.countyfair.org>
- Anne Arundel County Fair, Sept. 14-18. 410-923-3400 or www.aacountyfair.org <http://www.aacountyfair.org>
- Charles County Fair, Sept. 15-18. 301-932-1234 or www.charlescountyfair.com <http://www.charlescountyfair.com>
- The Great Frederick Fair, Sept. 16-24. 301-301-663-5895 or www.thegreat-frederickfair.com <http://www.thegreat-frederickfair.com>
- St. Mary's County Fair, Sept. 22-25. 301-475-8434.

DOJ_NMG_0002422

- State Fair of Virginia, Sept. 22-October 2. 804-569-3244 or www.statefair.com <http://www.statefair.com>
- Calvert County Fair, Sept. 28-Oct. 2. 410-535-0026.

~

New Area Restaurant:

OPEN AUGUST 8 - SUSHI-GO-ROUND and TAPAS

Located in G Street Alley, adjacent to the MCI Center near the Regal Cinema entrance.
Metro: Gallery Pl-Chinatown; Gallery Place, 7th and H streets, NW, Washington, DC.
PH 202.393.2825.

~

Tidbits:

LAWN MOWER RACING…the Latest Craze

Yes, that's right…lawn mowers. The sport began in England more than 30 years ago by motor sports fans put out by the high cost of the car racing sport. They figured everybody has a lawn mower, why not just race them? The sport began on this side of the Atlantic in 1992 as a publicity stunt for a company that makes a fuel stabilizer, and it's been gaining speed ever since. The U.S. Lawn Mower Racing Association (USLMRA) has six classes for races with stock being the slowest (6 mph). The fast lane is reserved for the Factory Experimental class in which speeds can exceed 90 mph. For nationally sanctioned races, drivers compile points and compete; no prize money is awarded at races. USLMRA has a broadcast deal with ESPN and there is a video game in the works with 500 members in 21 chapters nationwide. The focus is on inexpensive fun with the family. The only requirements concern safety.

~

JOHN EDDY 'S DEPARTURE

Farewell to John Eddy, Deputy White House Liaison, as he departs the U.S. Department of Justice today to direct The Victory Team of the Republican National Committee.

~

Have a great week!

Cynthia R. McDowell
Internal Communications Coordinator
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Room 5317
Washington, D.C. 20530
Tel: [redacted] Fax: (202) 514-3546

"The road of Providence is uneven and unpredictable - yet we know where it leads: It leads to freedom."
President George W. Bush, February 2, 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0002423

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.72510-000001

Gorsuch, Neil M

From: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Monday, August 08, 2005 8:56 AM
To: Nielson, Howard
Subject: RE: Farewell

It is very much the Department's loss. But, as a westerner I must admit more than a little envy. Best of luck and please do stay in touch. Neil

-----Original Message-----
From: Nielson, Howard
Sent: Monday, August 08, 2005 1:49 AM
To: McDowell, Cynthia; Bottner, Andrea; Emrich, Andrew (ENRD); Schlozman, Brad (CRT); McDonald, Bruce; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Peed, Carl; Nolan, Cheri; White, Clifford; Roberts, Crystal; Daley, Cybele; Meron, Daniel (CIV); Rhodes, Deborah; Spagnoli, Deborah A. (USPC); Herraiz, Domingo S.; [redacted] (USMS); McNally, Edward; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Clark, Jeffrey B. (ENRD); Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Richter, John; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Bianco, Joseph F.; Johnson, Kelly A. (ENRD); Macklin, Kristi R; Sampson, Kyle; Parsky, Laura; Swenson, Lily F; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Delrahim, Makan; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Goodling, Monica (USAEO); Gorsuch, Neil M; Tzitzon, Nicholas; O'Brien, Pat (ODAG); Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Philbin, Patrick (ODAG); Clement, Paul D; Brand, Rachel; Yanes, Raul; Seidel, Rebecca; Hertling, Richard; Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Flores, Robert; Rosenstein, Rod J. (TAX); McLaughlin, Sean; Freeman, Sharee; Bradbury, Steve; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); Nash, Stuart; Scolinos, Tasia; Ullyot, Theodore; Barnett, Thomas O.; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Dhillon, Uttam; Kim, Wan (CRT); MacLean, Alex (CRT); Grimsrud, Amy N; Ames, Andrew; Beach, Andrew; Williamson, Angela U; Agarwal, Asheesh; Curtis, Ben (CRT); Porritt, Ben; Cook, Elisebeth C; Cohen, Brian; Taylor, Bruce (CRM); Marshall, C. Kevin; Chiu, Candice; Nelson, Carrie; Flaherty, Connor; Elwood, Courtney; Magnuson, Cynthia; McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); Underhill, Deborah; Lee, Ebony; Apisson, Elizabeth M; Akers, Eric J.; Holland, Eric W; Gilbert, Evan M. (TAX); Todd, Gordon (CRT); Nichols, Grant W; Lesch, Jaclyn; OConnell, James; Williams, Jan; White, Jana; Potter, Janet; Torchinsky, Jason (CRT); Korn, Jennifer; Gavora, Jessica; Eddy, John; Nowacki, John; Ganter, Jonathan; Warren, Julie; Strug, Kerri; Madden, Kevin; Sellers, Kiahna; Smith, Kimberly A; Reynolds, Lara; de la Torre, Lindsey; Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); David, Matt; Dummermuth, Matt (CRT); Robinson, Matt; Roper, Matt M; Miranda, Matthew; Costigan, Michael; Tierney, Michael; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Donlin, Molly; Voris, Natalie; Jungeblut, Neal P.; Vargas, Omar (ODAG); McArthur, Patrick; Roe, Price (OCIO); Sours, Raquel; Comisac, Rena; Coughlin, Robert; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Malloy, Sandra; Chambers, Shane P; McNees, Stephanie L. (EOUSA); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Racicot, Tim (ENRD); Luckinbill, Trent W.; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Martinson, Wanda; Otis, William G.; Woodruff, William; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Keisler, Peter D. (CIV); O'Connor, Eileen J. (AAG/TAX)
Subject: Farewell

[redacted]

Sincerely,

Howard

McDowell, Cynthia

From: McDowell, Cynthia
Sent: Monday, August 15, 2005 2:56 PM
To: Andrea Bottner; Andrew Emrich; Brad Schlozman; Bruce Mcdonald; Carl Nichols; Carl Peed; Cheri Nolan; Clifford White; Crystal Roberts; Cybele Daley; Dan Meron; Deborah Rhodes; Deborah Spagnoli; Domingo Herraiz; Donald Gambatesa; Edward McNally; Elizabeth Kessler; Gregory Katsas; Howard Nielson; Jeffrey Bucholtz; Jeffrey Clark; Jeffrey Taylor; John Richter; Jonathan Cohn; Joseph Bianco; Kelly Johnson; Kristi Macklin; Kyle Sampson; Laura Parsky; Lily Swenson; Luis Reyes; Makan Delrahim; Michael Battle; Monica Goodling; Neil Gorsuch; Nicholas Tzitzon; Pat O'Brien; Patrick Hofer; Patrick Philbin; Paul Clement; Rachel Brand; Raul Yanes; Rebecca Seidel; Richard Hertling; Richard Morrison; Robert Flores; Sean McLaughlin; Sharee Freeman; Steve Bradbury; Steven McFarland; Stuart Nash; Tasia Scolinos; Theodore Ullyot; Thomas Barnett; Tracy Henke; Uttam Dhillon; Wan Kim; Alex MacLean; Amy Grimsrud; Andrew Ames; Andrew Beach; Angela Williamson; Asheesh Agarwal; Ben Curtis; Beth Collins Cook; Brian Cohen; Bruce Taylor; C. Kevin Marshall; Candice Chiu; Carrie Nelson; Connor Flaherty; Courtney Elwood; Cynthia Magnuson; Cynthia McKnight; Deborah Underhill; Ebony Lee; Elizabeth Apisson; Eric Akers; Eric Holland; Evan Gilbert; Gordon Todd; Grant Nichols; Jaclyn Lesch; James OConnell; Jan Williams; Jana White; Janet Potter; Jason Torchinsky; Jennifer Korn; Jessica Gavora; John Eddy; John Irving; John Nowacki; Julie Warren; Kerri Strug; Kiahna Sellers; Kimberly Smith; Lara Reynolds; Lindsey de la Torre; Mark Metcalf; Mary Neumayr; Matt David; Matt Robinson; Matt Roper; Matthew Miranda; Michael Costigan; Michael Tierney; Miriam Moore; Molly Donlin; Natalie Voris; Neal Jungeblut; Omar Vargas; Patrick McArthur; Price Roe; Raquel Sours; Rena Comisac; Ryan Bounds; Sandra Malloy; Shane Chambers; Stephanie McNees; Stuart Nash; Theodore Cooperstein; Tim Racicot; Trent Luckinbill; Tucker McNeil; Wanda Martinson; William Otis; William Woodruff
Subject: REMINDER: DAG Comey's Farewell Ceremony, 3:00 PM, Great Hall
Importance: High

Deputy Attorney General's Farewell Ceremony is Today!

All DOJ employees are invited to attend the Farewell Ceremony for James B. Comey, 51st Deputy Attorney General. The ceremony will be held in The Great Hall at 3:00 p.m., Monday, August 15, 2005. For those unable to attend and for employees in field locations, the ceremony will be aired on JusticeVision and Justice Television Network. A reception will follow.

Cynthia R. McDowell
Internal Communications Coordinator
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Room 5317

Washington, D.C. 20530
Tel: (202) 514-9376, Fax: (202) 514-3546

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Friday, September 02, 2005 11:04 AM
To: Allen, Gary (CIV); Apisson, Elizabeth M; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Eubanks, Sharon (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D. (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Morgan, Julian (CIV); Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Thirolf, Eugene; Wiggins, Mike; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 9/2/05 Civil Division News

Hartford Libraries Watch as U.S. Makes Demands

Anti-smoking groups seek tougher tobacco sanctions

Press Release: USN tobacco lawsuit

Blagojevich, Madigan take further action to stop BRAC; Officials head to federal court for restraining order

To save Otis, leaders weigh legal options

Black farmer claims discrimination by USDA

Plantiff marches forward to secure money owed to Native Americans

Is Canada sub-contracting torture?

The New York Times
September 2, 2005

Hartford Libraries Watch as U.S. Makes Demands

By ALISON LEIGH COWAN

Librarians in Connecticut say they are closely following a federal case in a Bridgeport courthouse involving a demand for library records, both to learn more about the identity of the people at the center of the case and to underscore their concerns about such orders.

Weeks earlier, the Federal Bureau of Investigation had quietly demanded that one of their peers turn over library records under the USA Patriot Act. The case became public after the subject of the demand retained the American Civil Liberties Union to challenge the constitutionality of the request, as well as the order of silence that accompanied it.

Librarians from Stamford, Westport and Bridgeport were observers in the courtroom during an emergency hearing on Wednesday before Judge Janet C. Hall in Federal District Court in downtown Bridgeport as lawyers discussed objections to the nondisclosure order. There, Carlton Greene, a lawyer for the Justice Department in Washington, and Kevin J. O'Connor, the United States attorney for the district of Connecticut, defended the need for secrecy and other powers granted under the Patriot Act to aid in the investigation of terrorism.

Challenging every assertion was Ann Beeson, a lawyer for the civil liberties union. The judge is expected to issue her ruling on the order of silence within the next week.

Among the spectators that day was Alice Knapp, the president of the Connecticut Library Association; she is the director of public services for Stamford's Ferguson Library.

Ms. Knapp said the case provided some validation for librarians who had been complaining that the library provisions in the Patriot Act were a breach of privacy and could be invoked too easily. She said it rebutted comments by some supporters of the Patriot Act, who have said that librarians and their customers have little to fear from the act.

"Here, we have a case where it is, in fact, being used," she said, "and all of the things we were concerned about, about the right of our patrons to have privacy, are justified."

In the case being heard in the Bridgeport courtroom, authorities issued a document called a national security letter to request information, asserting that the information was needed in an investigation of terrorism. The subject of the investigation and the circumstances were not disclosed. In addition, the recipient of the letter is permanently barred from disclosing the request.

In the Bridgeport case, the civil liberties union has argued that the recipient of the letter did not even know if he had the right to consult a lawyer or others in his organization - a concern that the lawyer for the government said was unfounded.

The recipient has remained unidentified, though it has gone into court to lift the order of silence so it can speak out against the Patriot Act before Congress, which is considering whether to extend important elements of the act after this year.

Careful reading of court records released on Wednesday in the Bridgeport case, with large sections heavily blacked out, indicate that the recipient of the national security letter was a library consortium based in Connecticut, not a public library.

One affidavit by the recipient says that such consortiums provide back-office services to libraries as well as "staff expertise, training, consultation, troubleshooting and customization services to its customers."

The language is identical to that found in the "about us" section of the Web site of Library Connection in Windsor, Conn., a nonprofit consortium that serves 26 libraries in the Hartford area.

Other details in the court record about the recipient organization's governing structure and the executive who agreed to accept the letter also bolster the growing impression within library circles that it may be the Windsor consortium.

For instance, the affidavit relates how the executive was initially unsure whom he was allowed to consult and ultimately told the executive committee members on his board.

Of the four consortiums in Connecticut, "Library Connection is the only one that has an executive committee," said Michael Simonds, the chief executive of Bibliomation Inc. of Middlebury, Conn., the largest of the four.

The executive director of Library Connection did not answer messages left over three days on his office phone and e-mail seeking comment.

A member of the Library Connection board referred a reporter to the American Civil Liberties Union.

"I'd really discourage anyone from making guesses because obviously this whole issue is under a gag order," the board member said. Asked about Library Connection, an A.C.L.U. lawyer said she would call back. The call was not returned by deadline on Thursday.

END

Reuters
9/1/05

Anti-smoking groups seek tougher tobacco sanctions

By Peter Kaplan

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Anti-smoking and health groups have urged that cigarette makers be required to fund a long-term, $4.8 billion-a-year, anti-smoking program if the U.S. government prevails in its racketeering case against the industry.

Six anti-smoking groups told a federal judge that a 10-year, $14 billion remedy sought by the Justice Department is inadequate and that the program should not end until nearly all smokers who want to quit have succeeded in kicking the habit.

They also sought a $600-million-a-year "counter-marketing" campaign to deter youth smoking and warn the public about the dangers of secondhand smoke and low-tar cigarettes.

"The government's proposal does not go far enough in altering the economic incentives of the defendants or eliminating a sufficient number of these smokers to deprive the defendants of the benefits of continuing to find ways to keep these individuals as smokers," they said in a 112-page filing with the court.

The groups, including the American Cancer Society, the American Heart Association and the American Lung Association, made the filing late Wednesday.

They were invited by U.S. District Judge Gladys Kessler in July to outline their views on what remedies should be imposed on the tobacco industry if she finds in favor of government charges that the industry deceived the public for decades about the hazards of smoking.

They have criticized the legal remedies being sought by the government as inadequate ever since June, when Justice Department lawyers scaled back their original plans for sanctions against the industry.

The government asked Kessler to require cigarette makers to fund a $10 billion quit-smoking program and pay $4 billion for an anti-smoking education campaign to remedy decades of alleged fraud by the industry.

But that angered anti-smoking groups because it was only a fraction of the $130 billion, 25-year program recommended by a government witness.

A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on the anti-smoking groups' proposal.

The $4.8 billion proposed program would include $3.2 billion for a nationwide quit-smoking program; $1 billion a year for research to develop new smoking cessation therapies and training; and $600 million for a media campaign.

It also would limit print advertisements by cigarette companies to black-and-white text.

The anti-smoking groups also would require steeper declines in youth smoking rates than the Justice Department and would impose stiffer penalties on the companies if they are not met, according to William Corr, executive director of the Campaign for Tobacco Free Kids.

Of the 45.4 million smokers in the United States, about 70 percent now say they would like to quit, according to the anti-smoking groups' court filing. The programs would continue until that figure declined to 10 percent.

The "counter-marketing" campaign would continue until youth smoking rates in the United States declined substantially.

Altria Group Inc.'s associate general counsel, William Ohlemeyer, said in a statement that the filing was "procedural only, involving no new evidence, facts or witnesses." The company plans a response to the court later.

Targeted in the 1999 lawsuit are: Altria and its Philip Morris unit; Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco unit, which has a tracking stock, Carolina Group; Vector Group Ltd.'s Liggett Group; Reynolds American Inc.'s R.J. Reynolds Tobacco unit; and British American Tobacco Plc unit, British American Tobacco Investments Ltd.

The companies deny they illegally conspired to promote smoking and say the federal government has no grounds to pursue them or impose additional restrictions after they drastically overhauled marketing practices in a 1998 states settlement.

END

AP - US Newswire
September 1, 2005

Press Release: USN tobacco lawsuit

WASHINGTON, Sept. 1 /U.S. Newswire/ -- The six public health organizations that intervened in the federal government's tobacco lawsuit filed a brief Wednesday urging the judge to strengthen the remedies proposed by the government, including imposing additional restrictions on tobacco marketing and increasing both the amounts the tobacco companies must pay to fund smoking cessation, youth tobacco prevention and public education programs and the duration of those programs.

The brief was filed by the American Cancer Society, American Heart Association, American Lung Association, Americans for Nonsmokers' Rights, the National African American Tobacco Prevention Network and the Tobacco-Free Kids Action Fund (a 501(c)4 affiliate of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids). Judge Gladys Kessler on July 22 granted a motion to intervene filed by the six groups, making them formal parties to the lawsuit and granting them similar opportunities as the government and the tobacco company defendants to present arguments to the court.

Critically, the six public health organizations support the U.S Government's conclusion that the evidence presented in this case demonstrates that the defendant tobacco companies continue to engage in serious, massive wrongful acts that mislead the American public about the health effects of their products, make their products appealing to youth and deter addicted smokers from quitting. The brief emphasizes the need to ensure that the remedies address all special populations including African- American; Asian American/Pacific Islander; Latino/Hispanic; Native American/Alaska Native; Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender (LGBT); and low socio-economic status individuals. Thus, the public health groups join with the U.S. Government in urging the court to find that the defendant tobacco companies have violated RICO law.

Remedies recommended by the public health groups in addition to or in place of those recommended by the Department of Justice include the following:

Smoking Cessation: Instead of a $2 billion a year, five-year smoking cessation program, the tobacco companies would be required to pay $4.8 billion annually to fund a comprehensive smoking cessation program. The program would be available to all smokers who want to quit. Currently, 70 percent of the nation's 45.4 million adult smokers say they want to quit. The program would continue until less than 10 percent of those smokers who say they want to quit are still smokers. Although no time limit is set for the smoking cessation program, if this smoking cessation goal is not met, the tobacco companies would have to pay $48 billion during its first 10 years and as much as $96 billion over 20 years to fund the cessation program. The payments end once the smoking cessation goal is met. This provides a significant financial incentive for the companies not to engage in deceptive marketing intended to deter smokers from quitting, as they have often done in the past.

Public Education and Countermarketing: The tobacco companies would be required to pay $600 million a year (instead of the $400 million a year proposed by the Government) for at least 10 years to fund public education and countermarketing campaigns in three areas -youth smoking prevention; the risks of light and low-tar cigarettes (and other cigarettes that the tobacco companies have claimed reduce health risks); and the dangers of secondhand smoke. These programs would continue for at least 10 years, but would continue until certain goals are met. The youth smoking prevention program would continue until the youth smoking rate is reduced to less than five percent. The other public education programs would continue until 90 percent of the public is fully informed about the risks of light and low tar cigarettes and secondhand smoke. Because their payments would end when these goals are achieved, the tobacco companies again would have a significant financial incentive not to market to youth or deceive the public about health risks of their products and the dangers of secondhand smoke. Funding for public education and countermarketing would total $6 billion over 10 years and up to $12 billion over 20 years if the goals of the various campaigns are not achieved.

Total funding for the cessation and public education programs proposed by the health groups would be $5.4 billion a year, $54 billion over 10 years and up to $108 billion over 20 years if smoking cessation, youth smoking reduction and public education goals are not met. In contrast, the government has proposed requiring the tobacco companies to pay just $14 billion over 10 years to fund cessation and public education programs - $10 billion over five years for cessation ($2 billion a year) and $4 billion over 10 years for public education and countermarketing campaigns ($400 million a year).

As noted above, the smoking cessation and public education campaigns would continue until smoking reduction and public education goals are met rather than for a required number of years. This approach is intended to prevent and restrain future wrongdoing by creating economic disincentives for the tobacco companies to continue to engage in such wrongdoing. If they continue to engage in wrongful practices that deter smokers from quitting, they will have to continue to pay for the cessation program. If they continue to addict children and deceive the public, they will continue to have to pay for the youth prevention and public education campaigns.

Restrictions on Tobacco Marketing and Other Practices: In light of the overwhelming evidence presented at the trial of continued tobacco industry marketing that impacts youth, the public health groups proposed adding new restrictions supported by the evidence presented by the Government, but omitted from the Government's proposed order, while endorsing those proposed by the government as well. Key new restrictions include the elimination of the kind of imagery that appeals to children by limiting cigarette advertising to black text on white background in magazines and other publications with large youth readership (more than two million youth readers or more than 15 percent youth readership) or in any retail outlets open to youth; prohibiting tobacco companies from including information on youth in their consumer databases or from collecting any data or records about youth; and prohibiting motor sport or other brand name sponsorships that result in exposure to youth (the government had limited the sponsorship restriction to motor sports).

Youth Smoking Reduction Targets and Penalties: The health groups proposed strengthening the government's proposal for establishing youth smoking reduction targets and financial penalties if the tobacco companies fail to meet these targets. The changes would require that the goal of reducing youth smoking rates by 42 percent from 2003 level be met by 2010 instead of 2013 (the latter was proposed by the government); base the targets on monthly rather than daily youth smoking rates (in order to hold the tobacco companies accountable for both youth who are experimenting with tobacco and those who have become regular smokers); and increase financial penalties when targets are missed. These changes are necessary to insure that it is no longer economically beneficial for the defendant tobacco companies to market to our nation's youth.

Compliance and Enforcement: The health groups proposed expanding the authority and jurisdiction of the Independent Investigations Officer who would be appointed by the court to ensure remedies imposed in this case are effectively implemented and enforced.

Because of the tobacco companies long history of evading specific restrictions on their conduct and the strong economic incentives they have to continue to engage in wrongdoing, including marketing to youth and deceiving smokers in order to deter them from quitting, the public health groups urged the court to impose a comprehensive set of remedies that include: 1) prohibitions on specific wrongful practices; 2) economic disincentives that make it unprofitable for the tobacco companies to continue to engage in wrongdoing; and 3) effective enforcement of the remedies to prevent the tobacco companies from evading them as they have in the past.

"It is essential that the Court adopt a comprehensive remedial approach to prevent and restrain the defendants from continuing to engage in the type of fraud and deception that has been a part, and remains a part, of this industry's standard operating procedure," the public health groups state in their brief.

END

State Journal-Register (Springfield, IL)
Friday, September 2, 2005

Blagojevich, Madigan take further action to stop BRAC; Officials head to federal court for restraining order

By ADRIANA COLINDRES
STATE CAPITOL BUREAU

Published Friday, September 02, 2005

Hoping to thwart plans to transfer the 183rd Fighter Wing's F-16s from Springfield to Fort Wayne, Ind., Illinois officials on Thursday went to federal court to ask for a temporary restraining order.

A hearing on the motion is scheduled for 10 a.m. today in U.S. District Court in Springfield.

The motion was filed by Gov. Rod Blagojevich and Attorney General Lisa Madigan. They seek to stop U.S. Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and the Base Closure and Realignment Commission (BRAC) from moving the F-16s out of Springfield.

Last week, the BRAC commission endorsed the Pentagon's recommendation to move the 183rd's jets, headquartered at Abraham Lincoln Capital Airport.

Blagojevich believes the BRAC decision is illegal and "absolutely unjustifiable," said spokesman Andrew Ross. "It makes absolutely no sense, when our nation is at a heightened alert, to do something that would threaten our homeland security."

"We have common sense and the law on our side," he added.

Blagojevich and Madigan maintain the Pentagon's May recommendation to move the aircraft violates federal law that requires governors to consent to any type of realignment involving a state's National Guard bases.

Thursday's legal action by the pair follows a lawsuit they filed July 21 against the Defense Department in an attempt to block the transfer. A Pennsylvania court upheld a similar lawsuit filed by that state's attorney general.

In a news release, Madigan said the Pennsylvania court "concluded that the secretary of defense cannot deactivate a National Guard unit without the governor's consent. The same reasoning should apply to the claim we are bringing."

Blagojevich and Madigan also cited the state's 11 nuclear power plants and 28 locks and dams on the Illinois, Mississippi and Ohio rivers as homeland-security needs requiring the protection of the Springfield flying unit. Transferring the F-16s from Springfield to Fort Wayne would leave Illinois with two Air National Guard flying units: the 126th Air Refueling Wing at Scott Air Force Base near Belleville and the 182nd Airlift Wing in Peoria.

If the 183rd is realigned, its 15 active F-16s will be sent to Fort Wayne International Airport to become part of another Air Guard unit, and 163 full-time personnel will leave the Springfield base.

Ernie Slottag, spokesman for Mayor Tim Davlin, said the city supports Madigan and Blagojevich's latest legal effort to keep the F-16s in town. City officials had been expecting the lawsuit to be filed, he said.

The BRAC commission must publicly release its final report by Thursday and will send it to President Bush, who has until Sept. 23 to approve or disapprove the list. The recommendations must then be sent to Congress by Nov. 7. Lawmakers may disapprove the list through a joint resolution, but that did not happen in any of the four previous rounds of base closings.

END

Cape Cod Times
Sept. 2, 2005

To save Otis, leaders weigh legal options

By KEVIN DENNEHY
STAFF WRITER

A cold reality faces state leaders preparing a legal fight to save Otis Air National Guard Base: No federal judge has overturned a decision to close a military base since the Base Realignment and Closure Commission Act was passed in the late 1980s.

And even though recent courtroom victories in Pennsylvania and Connecticut offer hope that Air Guard units nationwide could be spared, there's no guarantee that Pentagon-owned fighter jets wouldn't be sent elsewhere.

Even still, analysts familiar with the base closure process say that, for once, states trying to preserve Air Guard units at least have a legitimate legal case.

Across the country, governors have argued that the federal government can't tamper with state National Guard units without gubernatorial consent since the units, like state militia of earlier generations, is answerable to the governor. In Pennsylvania last week, a federal district court judge agreed.

The question of states' rights and federalism, in fact, may be the one issue that could spare air bases like Otis.

"That's the kind of question that can wind up very easily in the Supreme Court," said Jeremiah Gertler, an analyst during the 1995 BRAC process and a fellow with the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"If so, it could be even longer before the question is resolved, and Otis is closed."

And in the case of the BRAC process, he said, timing is crucial. According to federal law, the Department of Defense must shut down the bases on the BRAC list within six years or the closures become moot.

"No lawsuit has ever been sustained against the BRAC commission," said Jimmy Dishner, a retired Air Force general from Orleans who helped Massachusetts officials craft their defense of Otis this summer. "But maybe this could be the first."

State and local leaders have tried to make the case for Otis since the Pentagon recommended it for closure in May.

Last week, however, their lobbying was dealt a blow when the BRAC commission backed the plan. However, instead of sending the Cape-based F-15s to fighter wings in New Jersey and Florida, they've recommended that they be moved to Barnes Air Base in Westfield.

Less than a week before the commission's Sept. 8 deadline to submit a final report to President Bush, there remain three options for a base to stay open:

n The president can suggest a change to the commission, which he is unlikely to do.

n The Congress will then have a chance to defeat the entire BRAC round, though it has not done that in four previous rounds of base closure.

n Litigation.

In recent days, staff members for Gov. Mitt Romney and Attorney General Thomas Reilly have met to review their legal options, and discussed whether it would be better to wait until after President Bush weighs in.

No timetable has been set, said Felix Browne, a Romney spokesman. Nor, he said, is there any urgency since the base will remain open for at least two years.

Otis supporters are still trying to gauge what specifically the BRAC vote means for Otis.

"There's a lack of clarity on what they decided," said Mark Forest, a legislative aide to U.S. Rep. William Delahunt, the Cape's congressman. "But they clearly went beyond the law."

In other states, there has been reason for optimism.

A federal judge last week ruled that the Pentagon had no authority to move a Pennsylvania Air National Guard unit without consent of the governor following a lawsuit by Gov. Ed Rendell.

And in Connecticut this week, a federal judge temporarily delayed the closing of a Connecticut Air National Guard base until a court can rule on the same argument. A hearing will be held before a U.S. District Court judge in Connecticut on Wednesday, the day before the BRAC commission releases its final report to Bush.

"The point of our suit was to get the Air Guard base at (Bradley International Airport) off the list before it even goes to the president," said Judd Everhart, press secretary for Connecticut Gov. Jodi Rell.

"It was very important that we move quickly."

Stripping the Guard

Among those to submit legal briefs as part of the Pennsylvania suit was the National Guard Association, which has protested Air Force consolidation plans that would strip the jets from about one-third of the nation's Air Guard bases.

The cut in resources will force Guardsmen to either move with their equipment or retire, predicts John Goheen, an association spokesman. At bases like Otis, he said, experienced pilots are likely to leave the Guard.

"We're certainly looking at everything that can be done to protect the Guard, to protect state rights in this matter," he said.

Notwithstanding the legal appeal of the Pennsylvania decision by the Department of Defense - which is expected - the judge's decisions still won't save the bases themselves.

The Pentagon still owns the fighter jets at these Air Guard bases, Gertler said, and in most cases, the land on which the bases are built.

The federal government, for instance, owns about one-third of the land on Otis, which occupies a portion of the 7,000-acre southern corner of the Massachusetts Military Reservation.

So while the Pennsylvania legal decision may preserve the state's 111th Fighter Wing, it won't likely keep the fighter jets where the governor wants them.

Christopher Hellman, a defense analyst with the Center for Arms Control and Non-proliferation, said lawyers are scrambling to become well-versed on the legal implications of the Air Guard challenges since there is no case law.

Likewise, issues of gubernatorial consent have not been raised during previous BRAC rounds because the Department of Defense stayed away from closing or realigning Guard assets.

Loren Thompson, a defense analyst with the Washington-based Lexington Institute, said the legal cases being submitted across the country may have some merit.

But he doesn't expect them to change any of the final recommendations, whether in the court room or through delays.

During this process, the U.S. Air Force sought to consolidate its forces, and streamline its relationship between active duty bases and reserve bases like Otis.

"The decision was part of a much broader plan rather than a commentary on Otis," he said. "And once a decision has been made, the legislation is so powerful and so unforgiving, it's hard to reverse a decision."

END

Amsterdam News (NY, NY)
9/2/2005

Black farmer claims discrimination by USDA

by TALISE D. MOORER
Amsterdam News Staff

For nearly a decade, farmer Leonard Hunter has been pursuing the United States government for funds that he says are still owed to him from years of being persecuted.

Hunter, 65, of Mount Vernon, says that he has been targeted by the government since joining with over 26,000 other Black farmers from across the country who sued the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) because they were denied access to loans and other resources that were granted to white farmers predominantly operating in the South.

Hunter, who has over 39 years of agricultural experience and has owned and controlled hundreds of acres of land in upstate New York and other parts of the country, says that his upstate New York property had to be sold to cut his losses after a long wait for a reply on his loan from the Farm Service Administration (FSA) in Middletown, New York. The FSA is the local arm of the USDA.

Hunter claims to have undergone extensive and costly preparations to meet FSA standards, but time after time, his application was denied. Officials cited that he lacked appropriate farming experience.
That explanation seemed strange to Hunter, who says that his farming experience is impeccable. For years, he grew crops of okra on the parcel of land that he could no longer afford to own. Recently, he had to sell the property.

"They just don't want to give access to resources to Black farmers in New York, and by the looks of it, anywhere in the United States," said Hunter. “Black farmers in this country are being told in effect to get out of the agricultural business; it's as simple as that.”

Hunter's story is part of a growing frustration that Black farmers have encountered in dealing with the USDA. In a class-action suit filed in 1997 and a subsequent lawsuit filed a few years later, Black farmers sought $20.5 billion from the government, citing that they were denied resources.

Under a settlement agreement with the Black farmers, the USDA agreed to pay $50,000, acknowledging that Black farmers had been overlooked, and in some cases, discriminated against.

Hunter, who was active in the 1999 settlement case from its early stages, has not been victorious so far. Though some other Black farmers have collected $50,000 from the government based on a consent decree, he is fighting for more, saying his losses over the years exceeded the amount that the government was willing to pay. Of the 94,000 farmers who sought retribution in the 1999 settlement, only 13,764 were deemed eligible to receive payment.

But Ed Lloyd, a spokesman for the USDA, says that the agency has been in full compliance with the agreements of the settlement.

“We have complied with everything that was a part of the 1999 Pigford Consent Decree and we have done everything in accordance with guidance from the court to make it happen,” said Lloyd. “The court appointed arbitrators to monitor the process and they made determinations on claims that had any merit."

But Hunter insists that he has been overlooked. Needing an outside voice, the farmer contacted Harvard law professor Charles Ogletree after stumbling across an article about reparations in Parade Magazine that featured commentary by the legal scholar.

Hunter said Ogletree was familiar with the Black farmers' lawsuit and took his case on a pro bono basis. Ogletree said that he represented Hunter and accompanied him to a recent deposition where Hunter says that USDA attorneys violated his civil rights by asking questions that probed into his sex life and other personal matters not related to his farming experience.

"I felt violated by the disrespectful way that the U.S. attorney intruded on my personal life, questioning me about my sex life," said Hunter. "I fail to see how my sex life has anything to do with farming."

Hunter said that he was repeatedly asked by lawyers if he had sex with his business partner.

"That's irrelevant, and none of their business," said Hunter. "This is how low they'll go to try and assassinate my character, and it's the typical mentality of the Department of Agriculture, particularly among those in the county offices who decide who gets what to farm their land."

Anxious to move into the next phase of litigation, Hunter and his colleagues are expected to entertain yet another legal suit, comprising a class of Black farmers who say they are in pursuit of damages exceeding the proposed $50,000 settlement offered by the government.

Gary Grant, president of the Black Farmers and Agriculturalists, an advocacy group for Black farmers based in North Carolina, said that many of the farmers who joined in the Pigford Class Action suit since its filing in 1999 have endured substantial losses. He said that they have been awaiting justice in the form of monetary relief based on a settlement between the parties, formulated on the heels of the USDA's own internal investigation and finding of discrimination.

Under this agreement, farmers who pursued payment under what is called Track-A were entitled to a negotiated $50,000. Those seeking payment under Track B are considering restitution in amounts greater than $50,000 and must provide documented losses before they can be compensated, a suspicious burden, according to Grant, when one considers there is a finding of fault in a class action claim.

"They have used everything that they possibly could to try to deny Black farmers, including the destruction of character," said Grant.

Ogletree said that he supports compensation for Black farmers even though legal obstacles have made the fight more difficult.

"The problem in all of these cases is that thousands of Black farmers can't verify their claims because most of the evidence is in the hands of the government informing authorities and not the farmers," said Ogletee, who added that the regional offices of USDA have often misplaced farmers' documents. "These Black farmers across the nation have worked exceedingly hard to live the American dream, and this litigation for many of them has become an American nightmare," said Ogletree.

But Lloyd, of the USDA, dismissed Hunter's allegations, saying that the USDA has actively been working to right historical wrongs.

"When there is a finding of discrimination or wrongdoing, we expect to be held accountable for our actions and we will fix it, not for some, but for all farmers and ranchers despite their backgrounds."

Meanwhile, Hunter and his fellow farmers tarry the results of a proposed moratorium on Black farmer foreclosures proffered by the Federation of Southern Cooperatives and a collaboration of Black farmer organizations, calling for action by the current U.S. Secretary of Agriculture Mike Johanns. The proposal also urges Johanns to set up an independent commission to fully review each case slated for foreclosure and to examine policies affecting income, disqualifications and any other reasons that could be perceived as discriminatory.

“We have been presented with a moratorium on behalf of the farmers and the secretary is presently reviewing it,” said Lloyd, adding that the USDA recently set up direct sales opportunities through an agreement the department has with the Marriott Corporation to purchase directly from small farmers.

“Other ways we have addressed concerns is through providing farmers with technical assistance, establishing a minority farms registry with voting member on the committee that decides applications, and by doing a better job of disseminating information about resources farmers are eligible for,” added Lloyd.

Despite receiving a hollow victory in court in terms of the judgment Hunter and others received on paper, they feel the gatekeepers have succeeded in preventing them from receiving compensation. They also say that the need for diversity on the regional and county levels of the USDA remains unmet.

“When you think about this problem, at least philosophically, Black people were initially brought to this country to be farmers and till the land,” said Hunter. “For someone to say I don't have the wherewithal to put okra into the ground is in and of itself racist.”

END

Farmington, NM, Daily Times
Sept. 2, 2005

Plantiff marches forward to secure money owed to Native Americans

By Ryan Hall, The Daily Times

HUERFANO — The plaintiff in a landmark lawsuit filed nine years ago, that could potentially result in nearly $30 billion being paid to 500,000 Indians nationwide, visited with residents Thursday morning at the Chapter House here to update the case.

Elouise Cobell filed a lawsuit against the government, Cobell vs. Norton, in June 1996, asking for an accounting of the Individual Indian Trust Accounts. The fund was set up to pay money owed Indians for land taken by the government.

A previous decision in the case calls for the account records from 1887 through the present to be examined to determine how much is owed.

Any settlement or decision in the case would result in increased payments for more than 500,000 Indians, including 40,000-50,000 Navajos in the “checkerboard” area of New Mexico, according to a previous statement by Mike Wero of the Navajo Nation Washington Office.

The accounts are a trust set up and managed by the United States government, containing lease payments for land, as well as royalties for oil, grazing and timbering done on properties owned by Indians. The properties were part of a division of land completed in 1887 which granted male members of several tribes 160 acres apiece.

More than 4,000 parcels belonging to Navajos in New Mexico are part of that trust, leading to Wero’s estimate that 40,000-50,000 Navajos would be affected by any potential payout.

Throughout the process of the suit, accounting errors have been identified and important documents were found to have been destroyed.

Cobell said her legal team has estimated the total fund, including compound interest, should be $176 billion. She has previously stated she would be satisfied with a $27.5 billion settlement, as long as the money was placed in a court registry and not with the U.S. Treasury, who is a defendant in the case.

“This case is about fixing an accounting system,” she told the crowd.

Cobell said Thursday the reason for the concession was an aging Native population.
“There’s so many people dying without their inheritance,” she said.

Prior to speaking to the more than 100 residents who attended the meeting in Huerfano, Cobell said the nine-year suit has taken its toll, but she believes it is worth it when she meets with Indians.

“It’s rewarding when you see so many people it affects,” she said, gesturing toward the crowd prior to her speech.
Cobell, accompanied by her attorneys, then addressed the audience, outlining several victories and wins in the appellate court over the past nine years.

“It’s somewhat sad to be here [nearly] 10 years after a lawsuit was filed,” she said. “I am so happy we are a people who are not going to give up. This is our money.”

According to Cobell, she has won decisions granting an accounting of the trust account and an inclusion of compound interest on any decision. She noted courts have also ruled the government’s method of securing the electronic funds has been found to be inadequate, most recently in a July 12 decision.

“It was an absolutely excellent decision for all of us,” Cobell said.

Under the current system, the government is not protecting sensitive data regarding payments and personnel information, according to Cobell. She added the government’s own inspector general recently gave the system a failing grade.

The case now moves back to the larger question that spawned it in the first place: What land is owned by Indians and how much money is owed them for the use of that land?

"“That’s the big battle,” Cobell said, echoing a statement made before the meeting, “They can’t do an account. If they would admit it, this would be all over.”

While the fight over the trust account continues in court, a settlement proposed in July in Congress continues to be debated. Hearings have been held on the bill, but it has not yet been voted on.
Cobell said she agrees with portions of the legislation, but is upset the settlement would not date back to 1887, which the court has established it should, nor does it place the money in the court registry. Any settlement achieved under the bill would be placed in the U.S. Treasury, which Cobell said she has little faith in, as they are currently a defendant.

Despite the long-standing litigation and a less than satisfactory Congressional attempt at a settlement, Cobell said she is motivated to continue the fight and believes in the end Indians will prevail and get the money she believes they are owed.

“It’s affecting the poorest people in the country. We are going to win,” she said. “Stay strong, stay united, there will be victory.”

END

Ottawa Citizen

Sept. 2, 2005

Is Canada sub-contracting torture?

OTTAWA - It will take more than the Maher Arar inquiry to figure out whether Ottawa is sub-contracting the torture of Canadian citizens to oppressive regimes in other countries.

That's the opinion of a trio of human-rights watchers.

Judge Dennis O'Connor has spent more than a year examining the case of the 34-year-old Ottawa engineer who was arrested by U.S. authorities in 2002 and deported to his native Syria.

Arar, who'd been under surveillance in Canada before his U.S. arrest, has denied any terrorist activity.

He says he was tortured by the Syrians into falsely confessing to having links to Al Qaida.

Alex Neve, of Amnesty International, says Prime Minister Martin should instruct federal lawyers at the Arar inquiry to encourage the judge to probe as widely as possible.

Warren Allmand, a former Liberal cabinet minister, says he fears there are other cases in which the Martin government condoned the mistreatment of terrorist suspects abroad.

END

McDowell, Cynthia

From: McDowell, Cynthia
Sent: Friday, September 2, 2005 12:25 PM
To: Andrea Bottner; Andrew Emrich; Brad Schlozman; Brent McIntosh; Bruce Mcdonald; Carl Nichols; Carl Peed; Cheri Nolan; Clifford White; Crystal Roberts; Cybele Daley; Dan Meron; Dana Boente; Deborah Rhodes; Deborah Spagnoli; Domingo Herraiz; Donald Gambatesa; Edward McNally; Elizabeth Kessler; Greg Harris; Gregory Katsas; James Clinger; Jeffrey Bucholtz; Jeffrey Clark; Jeffrey Taylor; John Richter; Jonathan Cohn; Joseph Bianco; Kelly Johnson; Kristi Macklin; Kyle Sampson; Laura Parsky; Lily Swenson; Luis Reyes; Matthew Friedrich; Michael Battle; Monica Goodling; Neil Gorsuch; Nicholas Tzitzon; Pat O'Brien; Patrick Hofer; Patrick Philbin; Rachel Brand; Raul Yanes; Rebecca Seidel; Richard Hertling; Richard Morrison; Robert Flores; Sean McLaughlin; Sharee Freeman; Steve Bradbury; Steven McFarland; Stuart Nash; Tasia Scolinos; Theodore Ullyot; Thomas Barnett; Tracy Henke; Uttam Dhillon; Wan Kim; Alex MacLean; Andrew Ames; Andrew Beach; Angela Williamson; Asheesh Agarwal; Ben Curtis; Beth Collins Cook; Brian Cohen; Bruce Taylor; C. Kevin Marshall; Candice Chiu; Carrie Nelson; Chris Gober; Connor Flaherty; Courtney Elwood; Cynthia Magnuson; Cynthia McKnight; Deborah Underhill; Ebony Lee; Elizabeth Apisson; Eric Akers; Eric Holland; Gordon Todd; Grant Nichols; Jaclyn Lesch; James OConnell; Jan Williams; Jana White; Janet Potter; Jason Torchinsky; Jennifer Korn; Jessica Gavora; John Irving; John Nowacki; Julie Warren; Kerri Strug; Kiahna Sellers; Kimberly Smith; Lara Reynolds; Laura Keehner; Lindsey de la Torre; Mark Metcalf; Mary Neumayr; Matt David; Matt Robinson; Matt Roper; Matthew Miranda; Michael Costigan; Miriam Moore; Molly Donlin; Natalie Voris; Neal Jungeblut; Omar Vargas; Patrick McArthur; Payson Peabody; Price Roe; Raquel Sours; Rena Comisac; Ryan Bounds; Sandra Malloy; Shane Chambers; Theodore Cooperstein; Tim Racicot; Timothy Hagle; Trent Luckinbill; Tucker McNeil; Wanda Martinson; William Otis; William Woodruff
Subject: Opportunity: Be a DHS/FEMA volunteer for Hurricane Katrina needs - DEADLINE 2:30 PM TODAY
Importance: High

Dear Political Appointee,

DHS/FEMA is interested in collecting a list of political appointees who would be interested in assisting in the following areas of support given the volume of work from Hurricane Katrina.

1.) Administrative/General Support

2.) Legislative Affairs

3.) Communications/Public Affairs

4.) Community Relations

5.) Public Liaison

The immediate need will likely be for support at the FEMA headquarters in D.C. but some folks may be asked to travel to the affected area.

Please note that many volunteers may not be utilized due to a high response rate. DHS/FEMA will reach out to individuals who express interest and utilize those individuals on an as-needed basis. DO NOT contact DHS/FEMA directly.

If you are interested in volunteering in this effort, you must:

- Have the approval of your supervisor(s);
- Identify an area above where your skills would be a relevant asset to the needs;
- RSVP to Cynthia McDowell (DOJ) by 2:30PM TODAY and give this information:
  - Full Name:
  - DOB:
  - SSN:
  - Direct Phone No.:
  - Cell Phone No.:
  - Email Address:
  - YES or NO answer if you are Willing to Deploy:

Together, we will do our part to assist in this time of need.

Regards,

DOJ Office of White House Liaison
Jan Williams, Cynthia McDowell

~
Cynthia R. McDowell
Internal Communications Coordinator
U.S. Department of Justice
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, N.W., Room 5317
Washington, D.C. 20530
Tel: (202) 514-9376, Fax: (202) 514-3546

Keisler, Peter D. (CIV)

From: Keisler, Peter D. (CIV)
Sent: Saturday, September 03, 2005 1:03 PM
To: McDowell, Cynthia; Bottner, Andrea; Emrich, Andrew (ENRD); Schlozman, Brad (CRT); McIntosh, Brent; McDonald, Bruce; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Peed, Carl; Nolan, Cheri; White, Clifford; Roberts, Crystal; Williams, Jan; Daley, Cybele; Meron, Daniel (CIV); Boente, Dana J. (TAX); Rhodes, Deborah; Spagnoli, Deborah A. (USPC); Herraiz, Domingo S.; [redacted] (USMS); McNally, Edward; Kessler, Elizabeth A; Harris, Greg; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Clinger, James H; Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Clark, Jeffrey B. (ENRD); Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Richter, John (CRM); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Bianco, Joseph F.; Johnson, Kelly A. (ENRD); Macklin, Kristi R; Sampson, Kyle; Parsky, Laura; Swenson, Lily F; Reyes, Luis (SMO); Friedrich, Matthew; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Goodling, Monica (USAEO); Gorsuch, Neil M; Tzitzon, Nicholas; O'Brien, Pat (ODAG); Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX); Philbin, Patrick (ODAG); Brand, Rachel; Yanes, Raul; Seidel, Rebecca; Hertling, Richard; Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Flores, Robert; McLaughlin, Sean; Freeman, Sharee; Bradbury, Steve; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Scolinos, Tasia; Ullyot, Theodore; Barnett, Thomas O.; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Dhillon, Uttam; Kim, Wan (CRT); MacLean, Alex (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Keisler, Peter D. (CIV); [redacted]@verizon.net; Beach, Andrew; Williamson, Angela U; Agarwal, Asheesh; Curtis, Ben (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cohen, Brian; Taylor, Bruce (CRM); Marshall, C. Kevin; Chiu, Candice; Nelson, Carrie; Gober, Chris; Flaherty, Connor; Elwood, Courtney; Magnuson, Cynthia; McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); Underhill, Deborah; Lee, Ebony; Apisson, Elizabeth M; Akers, Eric J.; Holland, Eric W; Todd, Gordon (CRT); Nichols, Grant W; Lesch, Jaclyn; OConnell, James; White, Jana; Potter, Janet; Torchinsky, Jason (CRT); Korn, Jennifer; Gavora, Jessica; Irving, John (ODAG); Nowacki, John; Warren, Julie; Strug, Kerri; Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Reynolds, Lara; Keehner, Laura; de la Torre, Lindsey; Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Neumayr, Mary (ENRD); DAVID, MATT (USAVAE); Robinson, Matt; Roper, Matt M; Miranda, Matthew; Costigan, Michael; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Donlin, Molly; Voris, Natalie; Jungeblut, Neal P.; Vargas, Omar (ODAG); McArthur, Patrick; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Roe, Price (OCIO); Sours, Raquel; Comisac, Rena; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Malloy, Sandra; Chambers, Shane P; Cooperstein, Theodore M; Racicot, Tim (ENRD); Hagle, Timothy; Luckinbill, Trent W.; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Martinson, Wanda; Otis, William G.; Woodruff, William Subject: Hurricane Katrina -- HHS Call Center

Dear Colleagues:

I went to HHS this morning in connection with the email sent our yesterday seeking volunteers for their Katrina Call Center, but when I arrived I was told that the need for people to staff the Call Center was -- at least for the moment -- far less than what had been anticipated. (Apparently, people are contacting HHS through the website much more than by telephone, which is good because it's more efficient.) So, at least as of this morning, they didn't need me or anybody else. They are understandably reluctant to tell us simply to ignore the original request for help, however, because the situation could change. They ultimately suggested that people who wish to volunteer call one of two phone numbers -- (202) 260-7179 or (202) 260-6933 -- before coming over to HHS, to find out in advance whether there's a need at that particular time for people to come in. This is a change from the original request, which was that people who wish to participate just show up (and send an email indicating when they plan to do so), so they asked me to pass this new information along to everyone.

Peter Keisler

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Tuesday, September 06, 2005 8:37 AM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: Attorney General's News Briefing 9/6/05
Attachments: agnb050906.pdf; agnb050906.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Charges Against Virginia Man Arrested In Elaborate Raid Dropped. 3

Investigators Say London Subway Bomber Video Is Authentic. 3

DOJ Statement On Detention Of Foreigners Decried. 3

Patriot Act:

Long Beach, CA, Mulls Opposition To Patriot Act. 3

Homeland Response:

Report Questions Efficacy Of Airline Screening Program. 3

US Muslims Seek To Limit Appeal Of Extremists. 4

9/11 Commission Successor Seeks Information On Able Danger....4

DHS General Counsel Understands Both Private, Public Sector. 4

War News:

US Sets Trap For Insurgents Fleeing Tall Afar. 4

Saddam Trial Will Begin October 19. 4

Insurgents Allied With Zarqawi Claim Control Of Iraqi Border Town....5

Al Qaeda Group Claims Responsibility For Interior Ministry Attack. 5

Top Iraqi Officials Criticize Arab Leaders For Lack Of Support. 5

Annan Says Iraq Worse Terror Problem Than Taliban-Era Afghanistan. 6

Bush Urged To Emphasize National Security When Discussing Iraq. 6

Iraqi Youth Experiencing Traumatic Events. 6

Iraq Veteran Records Experiences In Poetry. 6

Officials Say US, Afghan Troops Killed 25 Insurgents In Two Raids....6

Anarchy In Baghdad After US Invasion Described. 7

Former Officials In Soviet-Backed Government Taking Part In Afghan Elections....7

Corporate Scandals:

Corporate Scandal Tip Lines Pose Dilemma. 7

Criminal Law:

US Faces Dilemma In Cuban Spy Cases. 7

FBI Widens Niagara Falls Corruption Probe. 8

Alleged ALF Member Pleads Guilty To Animal Enterprise Terrorism In Mink Releases. 8

Tennessee Lawmakers Await Possible Additional Arrests In FBI Probe. 8

Cleveland Corruption Probe Figures Sentenced To Prison. 8

Fugitive Accused Of Elaborate Counterfeiting Scheme In Philadelphia....9

Baltimore USA To Tackle Gang Crimes. 9

PG Co. MD Records 6th Homicide In 5 Days. 9

Civil Law:

Lobby Shops Look To Build On Success In Latest BRAC Round. 10

Civil Rights:

9th Circuit Rules Sexual Content Not Needed For Harassment Claims. 10

11h Circuit Rules Georgia Jail Was Justified In Strip Search. 10

Foes Of New Georgia Voter ID Law To File Suit. 10

Gender Pay Gap Attributed To Factors Other Than Discrimination. 11

California Set To Vote On Gay Marriage Bill As Massachusetts Decisions Near....11

Antitrust:

Wal-Mart Chief Raises Eyebrows By Suggesting Antitrust Probe Of UK Competitor. 11

Recording Industry Hails Australian Ruling Against Kazaa. 11

Chiron Directors Reject Novartis Takeover Offer....13

Environment:

Federal Government Urged To Fund $14 Billion Coastal Restoration Project. 13
SCOTUS Ruling On Eminent Domain Sparks Backlash. 13
Government-Funded Cowboys Protect Against Invasion Of Cattle Fever Tick. 13
Editor Says Landowners Should Manage Property In Public Interest. 14
Caimans Are Making A Comeback In Brazil. 14

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

House Judiciary Leaders Penning Tough Anti-Steroids Measure. 14
Prosecutors Drop Fraud Charges Against DEA's Clark. 15
US Army Soldier Headed Colombia-To-US Cocaine Smuggling Ring. 15
Gun Control Initiatives Weaken In South. 15
1.7 Million Children Live In Homes With A Loaded, Unlocked Gun. 16

Immigration:

Fox Says US Shares Responsibility For Illegal Immigration. . 16
Union Organizers Focus On Low-Wage, Immigrant Workers. 16

Tax:

Jailed Telecom Tycoon Said To Be Trying To Move Assets. 16

Congress-Administration:

Bush Visits Hurricane Zone For Second Time. 17
Brown's Qualifications Questioned As Criticism of FEMA Relief Effort Continues. 21
Congress To Investigate DHS Response To Katrina. 23
Congress Shifts Priorities To Respond To Katrina. 24
Bill Clinton Criticizes Federal Response, Calls For "Katrina Commission. 25
Former Presidents Bush, Clinton Visit Victims In Houston. 25
Chertoff Appoints Coast Guard Admiral To Run Recovery Efforts In New Orleans. 26
Breached Levees Repaired In New Orleans, Pumping Begins. 26
Chertoff Notes "Tremendous" Challenge Of Moving New Orleans Residents. 28
About 10,000 Remain In New Orleans. 30
New Orleans Mayor Says Up To 10,000 May Be Dead. 30
Nearly 50,000 National Guard, DHS Personnel Involved In Relief Effort. 31
Recovery Efforts In Mississippi Beginning To Meet Needs. ... 32
Halliburton Subsidiary At Work On Navy Facilities Repairs. ... 32
Rice Defends Bush Against Charge That Katrina Response Was Racist. 33
Chertoff, Brown Criticized For Hurricane Response. 33
SEC Extends Filing Deadline In Storm Zone. 35
Blair Sends Foreign Service Officers To US As International Aid Continues Flow. 35
Hurricane Creates Unique Problems For Non-Citizens. 36
Insurance Premiums Expected To Rise Along Gulf Coast. 36
Bush Nominates Roberts To Be Chief Justice. 36
Democrats Plan To "Rough Up" Roberts During Hearings. ... 38
House GOP Divided Over Social Security Reform Strategy. .. 42
Cheney Reportedly Purchasing Home Near Rumsfeld's. 42
With New Judges, DC Circuit Gears Up For Full Judicial Slate. 42
Report Criticizes Education Department PR Grants. 42

Other News:

No Gasoline Supply Disruptions Over Labor Day As Price Reaches New High. 43
US Economy Seen As Demonstrating Resilience In Wake Of Katrina. 43
Russia Opposes Reporting Iran To Security Council. 45
Palestinian Forces Get First Look At Abandoned Jewish Settlements. 45
Recent Elections Reverse Gains By Radical Islamists In Pakistan. 45
India May Remove Troops From Kashmir. 45
Lebanese President Faces Growing Pressure To Resign. 46
Business Groups Warn Doha Round Of Trade Talks On Verge Of Failure. 46
China, EU Reach Deal On Textiles. 46
Chinese Oil Company Moves To Sell Kazakhstan Acquisition. 46
Ukrainian Official Resigns To Protest Alleged Corruption. 47
Report Says Chernobyl Caused Less Harm Than Anticipated. 47
Indonesian Plane Crash Kills At Least 147. 47

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington. 47

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 49

DOJ_NMG_0002449

TERRORISM NEWS:

Charges Against Virginia Man Arrested In Elaborate Raid Dropped. The Washington Post (9/5, A4, Sheridan) reports, "The scene was emblematic of the war on terror: a government helicopter clattering over a home in Burke as gun-toting agents smashed through the door and handcuffed the owner, a Lebanese immigrant. Hassan Khalil, 37, was arrested by agents with a local terrorism task force this May and charged with immigration fraud. But now, officials say, the charge has been dropped. The reason: a mistake in Khalil's immigration records." The Post adds, "Authorities have declined to comment on what brought Khalil to their attention or whether he could face further accusations . He was charged in May with lying on his citizenship application by failing to note an arrest by U.S. officials in the early 1990s for being in the country illegally."

Investigators Say London Subway Bomber Video Is Authentic. Newsweek (9/12) reports in its "Periscope" column, "American and British investigators say a new video featuring a July 7 London subway bomber and Qaeda chief deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri is authentic. These counterterror officials, who asked not to be named because of the sensitive subject matter, say the tape, aired last Thursday by Al-Jazeera, appears to affirm a link between Al Qaeda and the July 7 attacks -- but it doesn't prove Zawahiri or Qaeda head Osama bin Laden ordered them."

DOJ Statement On Detention Of Foreigners Decried. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (9/5) journalist Nat Hentoff writes, "I thought I was inured to learning about further evidence of this administration's disregard for our system of justice as it abuses international law and our statutes in the CIA's kidnapping of terrorism suspects to be sent to other nations. But an Aug. 9 statement in Brooklyn federal court by Mary Mason of the Justice Department's Constitutional Torts Section astonished me by its breadth of disregard for what we prize as our rule of law. … This is what Mrs. Mason, speaking for the U.S. government, said in federal court: 'Foreign citizens who change planes at airports in the United States can legally be seized, detained without charges, deprived of access to a lawyer or the courts, and even denied basic necessities like food.'"

PATRIOT ACT:

Long Beach, CA, Mulls Opposition To Patriot Act. The Long Beach (CA) Press-Telegram (9/5, Gewirtz) reports, "The City Council will be asked Tuesday to oppose provisions of the controversial USA PATRIOT Act that a citizens' group says will threaten civil liberty protections." The Press-Telegram continues, "Councilwomen Bonnie Lowenthal and Tonia Reyes Uranga will make the request, asking the council to support a recently adopted resolution in the State Senate that urges Congress to amend the act." The Press-Telegram adds, "Several cities, including Los Angeles, San Jose and San Francisco, have adopted similar measures in recent months regarding civil liberty aspects of the act. But whether the council will tackle the issue is unclear. … In the past, council members have had contentious debates over whether they should weigh in on various issues in front of the federal government. In March 2003, the council withdrew two contested resolutions after a debate over how, or whether, to address the war in Iraq. In June 2004, the council split 4-4 on a resolution to oppose the Federal Marriage Amendment. … Councilman Frank Colonna, who has opposed several past council efforts at intervention beyond the city's authority, said Tuesday's item falls into that category. … But Edith Pollach with the Long Beach Civil Liberties Defense Coalition said the council should take up the issue. She said nearly two dozen local groups will urge support for the measure Tuesday."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Report Questions Efficacy Of Airline Screening Program. The Washington Times (9/6, Seper) reports an airline anti-terrorism screening plan "may not be able to tell the Department of Homeland Security how many passenger records are being screened or project the number of terrorist-watch-list 'hits' to be sent to the nation's Terrorist Screening Center (TSC)." The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General "said the program shortfalls, found in a lengthy audit, have hurt the TSC's ability to plan its role in the government's new 'Secure Flight' program, an initiative to let the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) compare the names of commercial airline passengers with TSC's consolidated terrorist watch list."

DOJ_NMG_0002450

US Muslims Seek To Limit Appeal Of Extremists. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Sataline) reports, "Calling the terrorist attacks on London a wake-up call, Muslim-American organizations have launched a number of programs that are designed, in part, to prevent or root out disgruntled Muslims who might be tempted to use their religion to justify violence." The Islamic Society of North America "plans to distribute tens of thousands of pamphlets at mosques and cultural centers that spell out the Quran's injunctions against violence." Another "broad-based organization, the Muslim Public Affairs Council, is expanding its program to teach local mosques to partner with local communities and law enforcement."

9/11 Commission Successor Seeks Information On Able Danger. The Washington Times (9/5, Waterman) reports, "Members of the September 11 commission think they have been left swinging in the wind by the growing revelations about a secret Pentagon program that may have identified the ringleader of the hijackings as an al Qaeda operative more than a year before the attacks. 'Other people have questions they need to answer,' said Al Felzenberg, spokesman for the commission's embattled successor body, the 9/11 Public Discourse Project." The Times notes, "At the center of the controversy are claims that the secret project, code-named Able Danger, in 2000 produced a chart bearing the names -- and in some people's recollections, photographs -- of about 60 people thought linked to al Qaeda. Among the names was that of Mohamed Atta, the ringleader of the attacks. If the claims turn out to be true, it will entail a major rewrite of the commission's accounts of the missed opportunities to thwart the attacks."

DHS General Counsel Understands Both Private, Public Sector. The Legal Times (9/5, Blum) reports, "If any lawyer knows the Department of Homeland Security inside and out, it's Philip Perry. … Three years ago, as a senior White House lawyer, Perry helped create the new department. Later, as a partner at Washington's Latham & Watkins, he actively lobbied the DHS on behalf of two Fortune 500 companies. Then, about three months ago, the 41-year-old completed the circle, joining the agency as its general counsel." The Times continues, "In many ways, Perry is following Washington's most common career path. Lawyers in the capital have always swung between the federal government and law firms. But if you want to get off on the right foot with Perry, you better not refer to that flight pattern as the 'revolving door.' … 'The term "revolving door" implies people going in and out of government in order to obtain monetary gain,' Perry says. 'The reason people go into government is to serve their country. It's not appropriate to describe that as a revolving door.'" The Times adds, "Perry, who is married to Vice President Dick Cheney's oldest daughter, Elizabeth, has held three jobs in the Bush administration. In his current post—the first to require Senate confirmation—Perry oversees roughly 1,500 lawyers. In addition to its usual portfolio, his office is now handling legal aspects of the government's response to the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina. And, in fact, Perry canceled a planned Labor Day weekend fishing excursion with his father-in-law to deal with the crisis. … Perry's work ethic seems to match that of his notoriously intense boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. During August, when much of official Washington tends to dawdle, Perry pushed his staff to complete work on 30 separate regulations."

WAR NEWS:

US Sets Trap For Insurgents Fleeing Tall Afar. The Washington Post (9/5, A24, Finer) reports, "Under the cover of a moonless night, U.S. soldiers on Sunday strung nearly a mile of razor-sharp concertina wire across the northern edge of a [Tall Afar] neighborhood dominated by insurgents to prevent them from fleeing without a showdown. Several small teams of five or six troops quickly uncoiled spools of wire and fastened it along the deserted sidewalk of a broad thoroughfare. The cordon was intended to prevent insurgents from blending in with the hundreds of people who fled the city during heavy clashes Sunday. … More than 5,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered Tall Afar on Friday in a broad sweep for insurgents who have held sway in the northern city since a previous U.S. invasion, and subsequent withdrawal, last September. In three days of fighting, as many as 200 insurgents have been killed. Two U.S. and four Iraqi soldiers have been wounded, none seriously."

Saddam Trial Will Begin October 19. The Financial Times (9/5, Negus) reports Saddam Hussein will "go on trial on October 19 on charges related to the repression of Shia in a central Iraqi town in 1982," said Laith Kubba, the prime ministerial spokesman. Kubba "was subsequently quoted as saying that Mr Hussein could be executed shortly after his trial -- possibly raising objections from the Kurds and other groups anxious to see crimes against their communities brought to trial." Saddam's "co-defendants would include Barzan Ibrahim, his half-brother and then-chief of intelligence, Taha Yassin Ramadan, former vice-president, former top judge Awad Badar Al-Bandar, and four former local members of the ruling Ba'ath party."

DOJ_NMG_0002451

The New York Times (9/5, Oppel) reports, "After the failed attack on Mr. Hussein, Iraqi officials executed men and boys from Dujail, a largely Shiite town 35 miles north of Baghdad. Investigators for the special tribunal that will try Mr. Hussein have said another 1,500 Dujail residents were later ordered incarcerated in a prison in a desolate stretch of desert near the Saudi Arabian border."

The Washington Post (9/5, A25, Knickmeyer) reports, "The Iraqi government is considering waiving further proceedings against former president Saddam Hussein if he is convicted at his trial on charges stemming from the massacre of 143 Shiite Muslims in 1982, a senior spokesman said Sunday." Kubba "said Sunday that if Hussein is convicted in the first case, any sentence is likely to be carried out as swiftly as possible." The Post adds, "The Shiite-led interim government is believed to have chosen the case in part because of its narrow focus and the possibility of tracing the killings back to Hussein. Other accusations against him, including state-orchestrated massacres of thousands of Kurds and Shiites, are much broader."

Insurgents Allied With Zarqawi Claim Control Of Iraqi Border Town. The Washington Post (9/6, A20, Knickmeyer, Finer) reports, "Fighters loyal to militant leader Abu Musab Zarqawi asserted control over the key Iraqi border town of Qaim on Monday, killing U.S. collaborators and enforcing strict Islamic law, according to tribal members, officials, residents and others in the town and nearby villages." Residents said "the foreign-led fighters controlled by Zarqawi, a Jordanian, apparently had been exerting authority in the town, within two miles of the Syrian border, since at least the start of the weekend. A sign posted at an entrance to the town declared, 'Welcome to the Islamic Republic of Qaim.'" Meanwhile, the US Army "warned noncombatants to leave a portion of the northeastern city of Tall Afar ahead of an expected assault on an insurgent stronghold there."

Al Qaeda Group Claims Responsibility For Interior Ministry Attack. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 16, :15, Gibson) reported, "In Baghdad, a major attack on the Iraqi Interior Ministry. Up to 30 gunmen descended on the ministry in 10 cars, and opened fire with rocket propelled grenades, mortars, and automatic rifles. Two policemen were killed and five were wounded. The Iraqi wing of Al Qaeda said on a Website it launched the attack."

USA Today/AP (9/6, Yacoub) reports, "The insurgents, who fired automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades, withdrew after about 15 minutes. There was no report of insurgent casualties." The Washington Post (9/6) also reports the AP story.

US Bracing For More Confrontations With Insurgents As Elections Approach. The New York Times (9/6, Moss) reports the American military "recently moved into this small town" of Faris "10 miles south of Falluja, one of the most violent locales in Iraq, to secure it for the coming elections, and the insurgents took all of a day to respond. They fired a rocket that missed the Americans and landed instead in a nearby playground, killing a 12-year-old boy and wounding eight other children." Some residents "are directing their anger not at the insurgents but at the marines, whose arrival, they say, drew the attack." The military is "bracing for a surge of situations like this one as American and Iraqi forces race to establish security for the referendum on the new Iraqi constitution to be held on Oct. 15." Faris and Ameriya "have been without police officers since February, when the police force collapsed in the face of withering attacks by insurgents, who then used the communities as safe havens from which to mount their attacks, Marine officers said, and to intimidate civilians."

Top Iraqi Officials Criticize Arab Leaders For Lack Of Support. The New York Times (9/6, Worth) reports that in "an unusual public rebuke, President Jalal Talabani angrily criticized other Arab states on Monday, saying they had insulted Iraq by not sending diplomats to Baghdad and had not sent condolence letters about the stampede last week in which almost 1,000 Shiite pilgrims were killed." Talabani, "a Kurd, amplified complaints by other Iraqi leaders about the Arab states' failure to recognize the stampede, which caused the highest one-day death toll since the American-led invasion. The complaints, aimed at mostly Sunni leaders, hinted at a sectarian bias against Iraq, where Shiites are about 60 percent of the population." Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shiite, "hinted at similar criticism on Monday when asked about the emir of Qatar, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, who donated $100 million to the American victims of Hurricane Katrina but nothing to the victims of the stampede." The Times adds the comments by Talabani and Jaafari "came at a time of heightened tension with other Arab nations. Last week Amr Moussa, the secretary general of the Arab League, issued a public criticism of Iraq's new constitution - largely written by Shiites and Kurds - in which he echoed the criticisms by some Sunni Arabs in Iraq." But "some Iraqi leaders asked why Mr. Moussa was willing to denounce the new draft constitution now, after the Arab League had been notably silent about Iraq's lack of a constitution under Saddam Hussein."

DOJ_NMG_0002452

Annan Says Iraq Worse Terror Problem Than Taliban-Era Afghanistan. The Washington Times (9/6) reports UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said the "US-led invasion of Iraq has turned the country into a new hub of terrorism worse than Afghanistan under the Taliban." Annan also said "in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp. that he expected to face blame over the Iraqi oil-for-food program when investigators deliver a report this week." Annan "told BBC World Service radio that the war was contributing to Muslim anger throughout the world." Annan said, "I think there are many Muslims that are extremely unhappy today. Unhappy because they feel victimized, they feel isolated, they feel victimized in their own society, they feel victimized in the West, and they feel this profiling against them. And the Iraqi situation has not helped matters. In fact, one used to be worried about Afghanistan being the center of terrorist activities. My sense is that Iraq has become a major problem, and in fact, it's worse than Afghanistan." The Times adds that regarding the "oil-for-food investigation, Mr. Annan said he believed chief investigator Paul Volcker would criticize him and others involved in the $64 billion program."

Bush Urged To Emphasize National Security When Discussing Iraq. In his Roll Call column (9/6), executive editor Morton Kondracke says President Bush has "made an important shift as he tries to bolster public support for the Iraq war, moving from idealism to a hard national security argument. He needs to stress the new message more. Unpopular though the idea may be, he may also have to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq in order to have any hope of defeating the insurgency. And, for sure, he has to get the Pentagon to stop talking about drawing down U.S. troop levels next year and get with Bush's own program: The United States stays until Iraq is secure." Bush "continues to make it clear that America is at war. What he must do now is make it unmistakable to the American people what the stakes of the war are and provide adequate forces to win it."

Iraqi Youth Experiencing Traumatic Events. The Washington Post (9/6, C1, Shadid) reports in the experience of 16-year-old Iraqi girl Amal Salman in Baghdad. Since she "had begun keeping her diary in 2003, Amal had witnessed the events of a lifetime: an invasion and the only government she knew toppled in a few weeks; an occupation; promises of prosperity and the disappointment that followed; an insurgency and the specter of civil war." But one Thursday morning "was the first time she had seen death" after a series of car bombings.

Iraq Veteran Records Experiences In Poetry. The New York Times (9/6, Kelley) reports vet José Díaz, 35, "who came to the United States from Cuba on the Mariel boatlift in 1980, has written a poem included in 'Voices in Wartime' (Whit Press, 2005), an anthology that explores the experience of war through literature."

Officials Say US, Afghan Troops Killed 25 Insurgents In Two Raids. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Watson) reports US and Afghan forces "killed 25 suspected Taliban fighters and captured dozens more in operations in two southern provinces over two days, Afghan and U.S. officials said." On Monday, US and Afghan forces "killed 12 suspected militants and detained nine others in a raid in Zabol province, the U.S. military said." The operation in Zabol "followed a raid in neighboring Kandahar province in which U.S. and Afghan forces killed 13 suspected Taliban fighters, and captured dozens more, in a remote area where a political candidate was kidnapped and executed last week, a provincial official said."

The New York Times (9/6, Gall) reports Afghan and US forces "have mounted an operation in recent days in a remote mountainous district of southern Afghanistan in pursuit of a group of insurgents." Afghan and American officials said "that 13 insurgents suspected of ties to the country's former Taliban rulers had been killed and more than 40 people had been detained." The area of combat "is the same district, Ghorak, where suspected Taliban insurgents kidnapped, and claimed to have killed, five people on Saturday - a local election candidate, a government official and three police officers. An American spokesman, Col. James Yonts, said the operation was not directly linked to their abduction, but was based on intelligence about enemy activity."

DOJ_NMG_0002453

Anarchy In Baghdad After US Invasion Described. In the second installment of a three part series, the Washington Post (9/5, C1, Shadid) reports, "On April 10, 2003, the day after the fall of President Saddam Hussein, the veil had been lifted but no one was sure what it revealed. … Emotions -- euphoria, vindictiveness, desperation, confusion -- surged up from the people after years of silence and restraint. The city seemed like a dazed inmate stumbling out of his cell and squinting into the harsh sunlight. Some spoke of anarchy: Armed civilians had begun to crack the monopoly on violence held only weeks earlier by Hussein's government and the American military forces now occupying Iraq. Thousands of residents hurried to plunder everything from trucks and wooden carts to the urinals, copper pipes and electrical wiring of public buildings. Hospitals and embassies fell prey, along with ministries, government offices, Baath Party headquarters and the stone mansions, faced in onyx, of Hussein's lieutenants.

Former Officials In Soviet-Backed Government Taking Part In Afghan Elections. The New York Times (9/5, Gall) reports, "The political return of dozens of former Communists, among them General Shahnawaz Tanai, 54, who was Afghan chief of staff, then defense minister in the brutal Soviet occupation in the 1980's, is one of the most contentious issues of this election campaign. General Tanai is perhaps most infamous for leading a coup in 1990, with the renegade mujahedeen commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, against President Muhammad Najibullah. The coup failed and he fled to Pakistan, where he lived in exile until Aug. 7. The general is not running in Afghanistan's parliamentary and provincial elections on Sept. 18, but he is calculating on winning a sizable bloc in Parliament with candidates from his Afghanistan Peace Movement Party and two other parties of former Communists who have joined him in a coalition. They are fielding 200 candidates around the country, most of them former Communists and some Soviet-era ministers and participants in the half a dozen coups of the last three decades."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Corporate Scandal Tip Lines Pose Dilemma. The Wall Street Journal (Reilly, Nassauer) reports, "In the wake of scandals at Enron and WorldCom, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act directed companies listed in the U.S. to set up so-called whistle-blower hot lines for employees everywhere to confidentially report potential corporate abuses. … But those anonymous tip lines now pose unforeseen problems in Europe, where data-protection laws make it difficult to accuse someone of impropriety anonymously. These laws go beyond basic privacy concerns: They hold that citizens have a right to know who is collecting data about them, and they also may include restrictions on revealing corporate information to outsiders." The Journal continues, "A French agency, for example, has ruled that anonymous whistle-blower tip lines don't guarantee adequate protection for people accused of wrongdoing. … As a result, many U.S. and European companies are in a legal bind: If they set up whistle-blower hot lines in subsidiaries in France, and possibly elsewhere in Europe, they might run afoul of local laws. If they don't, they might violate Sarbanes-Oxley, the 2002 corporate-governance law enforced by the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Journal adds, "Companies are being told 'I have to either chop off my left hand or my right hand,' said Christopher Kuner, a partner at law firm Hunton & Williams in Brussels who specializes in international privacy and data-protection law. … The impasse underscores the far-reaching, and often unanticipated, impact of Sarbanes-Oxley, which executives on both sides of the Atlantic have complained is overly restrictive and has even led some European firms to seek to "deregister" their U.S. stocks. … Two U.S. companies -- McDonald's Corp. and Exide Technologies -- are the first test cases of the potential whistle-blower impasse. In late May, both companies were told by France's Data Protection Authority, known as the CNIL, that planned ethics hot lines at units they operate in France were illegal. Both companies declined to offer specific detail about how they are addressing the decision."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US Faces Dilemma In Cuban Spy Cases. The Los Angeles Times (9/5, Williams) reports, "They're known in Cuba as the Five Heroes and their faces, names and the details of their seven-year legal drama are familiar to schoolchildren and sugar cane cutters across the Communist island." The Times continues, "The Cuban Five, as they are known in the U.S., were convicted four years ago here in Miami of spying for President Fidel Castro and sentenced to maximum-security prisons for terms of 15 years to life. Cubans' reaction to the case rivals the collective fury that mobilized them to demand the return of castaway Elian Gonzalez in 2000." The Times adds, "Since a federal appeals court overturned the quintet's espionage convictions last month on grounds that their trial venue was tainted by fierce anti-Castro sentiments, the U.S. government must decide whether to request a retrial. … The case has been one of the most divisive issues between Washington and Havana since the five were arrested in 1998. The men admitted to being Cuban agents but have insisted throughout that they were only gathering intelligence on radical and sometimes violent exile groups to protect Castro and their Cuban homeland. … U.S. prosecutors, who contended the five were spreading disinformation, posing a threat to exiles and trying to steal military secrets because one of the men worked as a laborer at a Key West naval air station, won convictions in June 2001. The Miami federal court also found alleged ringleader Gerardo Hernandez guilty of murder conspiracy, based on allegations that he provided intelligence to Havana that led to the deaths of four Cuban exiles shot down by Cuban MIGs in international airspace in 1996."

DOJ_NMG_0002454

FBI Widens Niagara Falls Corruption Probe. The Niagara Falls (NY) Reporter (9/5, Hudson) reports, "The widening federal corruption probe of Mayor Vincenzo V. Anello has City Hall employees edgy as more grand jury subpoenas draw an increasing number of civil servants into the tawdry case." The Reporter continues, "On Aug. 25, city Law Department Clerk Donna Winstanley was summoned to testify in the scandal. Winstanley, who is responsible for the department's time/date stamp machine, was ordered to bring Anello's financial disclosure statements for the years 2002, 2003 and 2004, along with any charts or other records designed to track when the documents were actually filed." The Reporter adds, "Sources familiar with the original documents say that some filings, for different years, appear to have been done at the same time and with the same pen. Federal agents are particularly interested in the filing for 2004, the year when Anello accepted more than $45,000 in unsecured "loans" from prominent downtown developer 'Smokin" Joe Anderson and Kathy Kajfasz, sister of John Kajfasz, a principal in the group Anello gifted with 18 holes of the Hyde Park Golf Course. … At the time, Anello was serving as a city councilman and the payments were made just before and immediately after his election as mayor. None of his disclosure forms was stamped with the time or date, and the public documents only came to light following Freedom of Information Act requests by the Niagara Falls Reporter and the Niagara Gazette."

Alleged ALF Member Pleads Guilty To Animal Enterprise Terrorism In Mink Releases. The AP (9/4) reports alleged ALF member Peter Daniel Young, "accused of freeing thousands of minks across the U.S. Midwest has pleaded guilty and faces two years in prison. … Young pleaded guilty Friday to two counts of animal enterprise terrorism." The AP notes, "Young and his accomplice, Justin Samuel, both disappeared after they were indicted in 1998, but Samuel was captured in Belgium the following year. He struck a deal with prosecutors and served two years in prison."

Tennessee Lawmakers Await Possible Additional Arrests In FBI Probe. The AP (9/6, Gouras) reports, "All lawmakers can do is watch and wait as a federal probe into bribery and corruption at the state Capitol continues to sink colleagues. Legislators said they have heard the rumors that more arrests are on the way, but don't know if it will include local officials like the one nabbed last week or more state lawmakers. … 'I believe the Department of Justice and the FBI know a lot more about these investigations than I do,' said House Speaker Jimmy Naifeh." The AP notes, "Lawmakers are trying their best at damage control, though, and are rushing work by a special panel to draft tougher ethics laws for the state. But leaders say new guilty pleas or arrests won't force them to rush their work, or change their plans."

Cleveland Corruption Probe Figures Sentenced To Prison. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (9/3, Tobin) reports former East Cleveland Mayor Emmanuel Onunwor, two years since he "tearfully admitted to FBI agents that he took bribes from businessman Nate Gray," was sentenced to nine years in prison on Friday. Additionally, "four others were sentenced Friday in the corruption scheme in which bribes were exchanged for public contracts in Cleveland, East Cleveland, Houston and New Orleans. Ricardo Teamor, a onetime associate of former Cleveland Mayor Michael R. White, was sentenced to four months in prison and four months of house arrest." Former Houston building services director Monique McGilbra "was sentenced to three years in prison" for "accepting cash and lavish gifts such as a $700 purse and all-expenses-paid trips to New Orleans from Gray and two businessmen trying to get contracts with Houston. Former Honeywell executive Brent Jividen…was sentenced to 2½ years in prison" for "bribing McGilbra with gifts," and Oliver Spellman "was given two years' probation for accepting bribes from Gray while serving as chief of staff to the mayor of Houston."

DOJ_NMG_0002455

The Houston Chronicle (9/3, Feldstein) also reports on the sentencings and notes, "federal officials have said more investigations are ongoing in Houston but have declined to offer details."

Fugitive Accused Of Elaborate Counterfeiting Scheme In Philadelphia. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/4, Shiffman) reports Hong Kong fugitive Joseph Mo Pun Lau "was already an established identity thief by late 2003, according to the FBI. Using a crude tool, agents said, he fished envelopes from street-corner mail-collection boxes throughout the Philadelphia suburbs, counterfeiting whatever checks and credit cards he found inside." But "rustrated by the slow, risky and unpredictable process of snaring letters one at a time," Lau "surreptitiously videotaped letter carriers as they opened the boxes, zooming in on their keys. Lau used those images to calculate measurements for the grooves in the keys and created brass duplicates. … 'The FBI is not aware of anything else like this,' bureau spokeswoman Jerri Williams said." The Inquirer notes, "Lau's gang stole $140,000 worth of checks, counterfeited them, and deposited them in 16 different bank accounts, according to an affidavit by Philadelphia-based FBI Agent Catherine L. Nowery."

Baltimore USA To Tackle Gang Crimes. The Baltimore Sun (9/6, Dolan) reports, "Justice Department officials have approved funding of a new federal prosecutor to exclusively handle gang-related prosecutions inside Maryland's U.S. attorney's office." The Sun continues, "The move comes after a sweeping indictment last month against 19 suspected members of the Hispanic gang MS-13 who were arrested on federal racketeering charges that include a string of homicides and attempted killings in Montgomery and Prince George's counties." The Sun adds, "U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein, who took office this summer, said he told Justice Department officials that the state had an urgent need to beef up its prosecutorial resources to focus on gangs in suburban Washington and on gun-related crime in the Baltimore region. … His office has 65 prosecutors split between the state's two federal courts in Baltimore and Greenbelt. Rosenstein plans to fill five vacant slots within the next few months. A new agreement with the city will bring two additional prosecutors to Baltimore to handle gun-related prosecutions." The Sun notes, "Andrea Smith, an assistant U.S. attorney in Baltimore who helps coordinate the local Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force, said the new anti-gang prosecutor should help prosecutors who have used a similar strategy against drug-related, violent organizations, such as the Lexington Terrace gang in the city."

PG Co. MD Records 6th Homicide In 5 Days. The Washington Times (9/6, Cella) reports that a double shooting early yesterday in Suitland left one man dead, "marking the sixth homicide in Prince George's County in the first five days of September." Police said the shooting occurred in the 4600 block of Chelsea Way at about 1 am. Kenneth Stanford, 22, of the 4700 block of Hudson Avenue had been shot several times. He was taken to a hospital, where he died. Also shot was a 28-year-old man, who was hospitalized. The paper notes the killing brings the number of homicides this year in Prince George's County to 119, up from 96 at this time last year. The Times adds the county "has experienced a spate of violence since Thursday, when Charmaine Edwards, 21, of Southwest was found fatally shot in her car on Keystone Manor Drive in Morningside. Four persons were fatally shot in the county Friday. Three of those killings occurred in the daylight hours. Police said that as of now there is no indication the killings are related. The Times also reported Anne Arundel County police charged Brandon Iam Kellam, 16, with second-degree murder after the stabbing death of a 17-year-old boy outside a Glen Burnie mall Saturday night and that Metropolitan Police in DC are investigating a fatal shooting that happened at about 9 p.m. Saturday in the 3700 block of Hayes Street Northeast.

DOJ_NMG_0002456

CIVIL LAW:

Lobby Shops Look To Build On Success In Latest BRAC Round. The Hill (9/6, Tiron) reports in its "Business and Lobbying" column, "Some high-powered Washington lobbying shops are banking on their freshly collected laurels to get even more business from the communities that hired them to get military bases off the Pentagon's chopping block. As the independent Base Closure and Realignment (BRAC) Commission is getting ready to send its final deliberations to President Bush on Sept. 8, lobbyists are monitoring the BRAC process here in Washington while corralling communities to extend their contracts. … Among Washington lobbying shops scoring large victories for their clients are the Rhoads Group and Kutak Rock LLP, which represented Ellsworth Air Force Base in South Dakota; the Washington Group, which defended the Naval Submarine Base New London in Connecticut; Patton Boggs, which represented the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard in Maine; Akin Gump, which worked for the states of New York, Kansas, Maryland and Arkansas; and Spectrum Group, which represented the state of Louisiana and a large Defense Finance and Accounting Service center in Cleveland. … While several lobbying shops contacted by The Hill said that they did not receive so-called "success fees" for their work on BRAC, Keith Ashdown with Taxpayers for Common Sense said that it is possible for these firms to have an understanding with the communities to be retained for several more years."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

9th Circuit Rules Sexual Content Not Needed For Harassment Claims. The California Recorder (9/6, Scheck) reports, "You don't have to be a groper, lecher or explicit misogynist to get sued for sex-based harassment, a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Friday." The Recorder continues, "The opinion, in a case originating at an Alaska teachers union, said that Thomas Harvey, a manager accused of 'shouting, 'screaming,' foul language, invading employees' personal space ... and [making] threatening gestures' may be sued for gender-based discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, even though his acts were not overtly motivated by the victims' gender. … 'We hold that offensive conduct that is not facially sex-specific nonetheless may violate Title VII if there is sufficient circumstantial evidence of qualitative and quantitative differences in the harassment suffered by female and male employees,' wrote Senior Judge Alfred Goodwin in a unanimous decision." The Recorder notes, "Senior Judge Melvin Brunetti and Judge William Fletcher concurred. In the case, male and female employees agreed that women bore the brunt of Harvey's outbursts. … Employment lawyers said the opinion offers encouragement to plaintiff lawyers whose clients don't fit the traditional mold of harassment victims. … The opinion stands to strengthen plaintiffs' arguments that adverse effects of an employer's behavior are more important than intent."

11h Circuit Rules Georgia Jail Was Justified In Strip Search. The Fulton County Daily Report (9/6, Simonson) reports, "Atlanta's federal appeals court, with apparent reluctance, ruled Wednesday that a North Georgia county's policy of strip-searching every prisoner booked into jail violated the Constitution." The Report continues, "The court also noted that the policy didn't necessarily violate the rights of individual prisoners who were searched, so long as jailers had 'reasonable suspicion' that a detainee might possess weapons or contraband. … The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals made the ruling in the case of Janet M. Hicks, who sued Habersham County's sheriff and jail supervisor after she was strip-searched following her 2001 misdemeanor arrest for a domestic-violence dispute with her estranged husband. Hicks v. Moore, No. 03-13686." The Report adds, "According to the 11th Circuit's ruling, Hicks was strip-searched by a female sheriff's department employee and was not touched during the search. … About three years ago -- and after Hicks' strip search -- the sheriff in charge of the jail at that time, Richard Moore, changed the jail's policy, and the facility no longer strip-searches everyone who is booked. … A unanimous three-judge panel ruled that the jail did not violate Hicks' rights, because her arrest for a violent crime justified a strip search. The 11th Circuit effectively ended Hicks' federal case against the jail and reversed a district court ruling that denied the Habersham government employees' motion for summary judgment."

Foes Of New Georgia Voter ID Law To File Suit. The New York Times/AP (9/6) reports, "Opponents of a new Georgia law requiring voters to show photo identification at the polls are planning a federal lawsuit challenging the measure, which they fear will lower voter turnout. The bill eliminates the use of formerly accepted forms of voter identification like Social Security cards, birth certificates or utility bills. … Under the Voting Rights Act, Georgia and other states with a history of suppressing minority voting must get federal permission to change their voting laws." Democrats "had argued that the idea was a political move by the Republican Party to depress voting among minorities, the elderly and the poor, all traditional bases for Democrats." The ACLU "is representing the plaintiffs in the case."

DOJ_NMG_0002457

Gender Pay Gap Attributed To Factors Other Than Discrimination. In an op-ed for the New York Times (9/5) Warren Farrell author of "Why Men Earn More," writes, "Nothing disturbs working women more than the statistics often mentioned on Labor Day showing that they are paid only 76 cents to men's dollar for the same work. … When I was on the board of the National Organization for Women in New York City, I blamed discrimination for that gap." However, "After years of research, I discovered 25 differences in the work-life choices of men and women. All 25 lead to men earning more money, but to women having better lives. … I want my daughters to know that people who work 44 hours a week make, on average, more than twice the pay of someone working 34 hours a week. And that pharmacists now earn almost as much as doctors. But only by abandoning our focus on discrimination against women can we discover these opportunities for women."

California Set To Vote On Gay Marriage Bill As Massachusetts Decisions Near. The Washington Times (9/6, Wetzstein) reports, "A bill legalizing homosexual 'marriage' in California is scheduled to go up for its second vote in the state Assembly this week, amid vigorous lobbying." Opponents "think California lawmakers legally cannot enact same-sex 'marriage' because voters approved Proposition 22, which says only marriages involving one man and one woman are valid in California." Meanwhile, Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly "is expected to issue his decision" this week "on whether to certify a constitutional marriage amendment filed by a citizens' group called VoteOnMarriage.org." Foes of the amendment "say it is unconstitutional in light of the 2003 Goodridge decision, which legalized same-sex 'marriage' in Massachusetts." Also, on Sept. 14, "the Massachusetts legislature is scheduled to meet in a constitutional convention to offer a second vote on a marriage amendment that passed last year. The amendment, which would disallow same-sex 'marriage' but create civil unions, is unpopular," but "if Mr. Reilly rejects VoteOnMarriage.org's amendment, some lawmakers may decide to vote in favor of the civil-union amendment."

ANTITRUST:

Wal-Mart Chief Raises Eyebrows By Suggesting Antitrust Probe Of UK Competitor. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Iritani) reports, "Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the retail giant infamous for crushing competitors and putting mom-and-pop retailers out of business, is now worried that its British rival might be too big." The Times continues, "H. Lee Scott Jr., Wal-Mart's chief executive, told a London newspaper last week that British authorities should be concerned about a retail chain having too much market clout." The Times adds, "Tesco, Britain's largest supermarket, has a 30% share of the food market and is expanding fast, thanks in part to an aggressive discounting program. Wal-Mart-owned Asda Group Ltd., Britain's second-largest retail chain, controls 16% of the market. … 'As you get over 30% and higher, I am sure there is a point where government is compelled to intervene, particularly in the U.K., where you have the planning laws that make it difficult to compete,' Scott told the Times of London, adding that 'at some point, the government has to look at it.'" The Times notes, "Those remarks raised some eyebrows in the United States, where the Bentonville, Ark., retailer is regularly accused of abusing its clout to squeeze pennies out of its supply chain, trounce its competition and expand its sales. … 'Wal-Mart is asking for an antitrust investigation of a competitor?' asked Albert Foer, president of the American Antitrust Institute in Washington, a think tank. 'How delicious.'"

Recording Industry Hails Australian Ruling Against Kazaa. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (9/6) EMI Music Chairman Alain Levy writes, "Monday's court ruling in Australia against Kazaa, the biggest brand name in international music piracy, is the latest sign of a turning tide in our industry's efforts to create a thriving pro-consumer, legitimate digital music business. It is also a reminder that even with the greatest music, the best technology and the most willing fans, we cannot create this bright digital future alone: public education and proper enforcement of intellectual property rights, by courts and by governments, have a vital part to play as well. This applies to any record company, from the largest major to the smallest." Levy adds, "A big public awakening has happened on the issue – helped by waves of industry information campaigns. Probably more significant still, the lawsuits taken out in 12 countries, which now total over 14,000, have clearly played an important part in deterring would-be illegal file-sharers and containing internet piracy. These strategies must be sustained because they are working."

DOJ_NMG_0002458

The WP (9/6, Corder) reports, "Hailed as a victory by the recording industry that brought the suit, the decision has implications well beyond Australia, where Kazaa executives are based, because Kazaa's users span the globe. In some ways, it mirrors the US Supreme Court's June ruling that Hollywood and the music industry can sue technology companies that encourage their customers to steal music and movies over the Internet."

Recording Industry Makes Gains Against Music Piracy. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (9/6) EMI Music Chairman Alain Levy writes, "Monday's court ruling in Australia against Kazaa, the biggest brand name in international music piracy, is the latest sign of a turning tide in our industry's efforts to create a thriving pro-consumer, legitimate digital music business. It is also a reminder that even with the greatest music, the best technology and the most willing fans, we cannot create this bright digital future alone: public education and proper enforcement of intellectual property rights, by courts and by governments, have a vital part to play as well. This applies to any record company, from the largest major to the smallest." Levy continues, "The ruling from Australia has important implications for our business. The Sydney court has not only reinforced the message handed down on Grokster from a unanimous US Supreme Court in July – namely that internet file- sharing services can be liable for music piracy. The world's best-known, and until recently its biggest unauthorized file-sharing service, has been found liable for facilitating copyright theft and ordered to stop. The message for similar networks that distribute copyrighted repertoire on a mass scale without permission is clear: it is time to change your ways or stop. Change your systems; respect copyright; use technology responsibly to benefit the music community and not to harm it. These are momentous rulings for a creative, intellectual property business like EMI, as well as for the artists we invest in and for the legitimate digital market we are working to create. Investment in music is our business and protection of our content is central to everything we do. Our ability to invest in music, and to offer it to our consumers via downloads, ring tones or other digital formats, is integrally dependent on our ability to contain music piracy. Taken together, the Grokster and Kazaa judgments are crucial milestones for us." Levy adds, "The digital music market is up and running, and our challenge now is to build on the successful start. I am confident and I take little notice of the skeptics. A few years ago no one held much hope for record companies breaking into what was then a 100 per cent internet pirate market. The mood is very different today. Virtually all our front line music is available in a huge array of digital channels. Music is becoming easier to buy than to steal. But the tide is turning for other reasons, too. Public attitudes are shifting towards good and responsible practices in downloading music. A big public awakening has happened on the issue – helped by waves of industry information campaigns. Probably more significant still, the lawsuits taken out in 12 countries, which now total over 14,000, have clearly played an important part in deterring would-be illegal file-sharers and containing internet piracy. These strategies must be sustained because they are working."

The Washington Post/AP (9/6, 8:37 PM, Corder) reports an Australian judge yesterday orders "ordered distributors of the popular file-swapping program Kazaa to alter the software, which millions have downloaded, so it can no longer be used for music piracy." The paper adds, "Hailed as a victory by the recording industry that brought the suit, the decision has implications well beyond Australia, where Kazaa executives are based, because Kazaa's users span the globe. In some ways, it mirrors the US Supreme Court's June ruling that Hollywood and the music industry can sue technology companies that encourage their customers to steal music and movies over the Internet." The Post notes Federal Court Judge Murray Wilcox determined in Monday's ruling that Kazaa's owners and distributors, led by Sharman Networks Ltd., took no action to rein in illegal file-sharing despite posted warnings on their Web site urging Kazaa users not to swap copyright material. Wilcox said it had been in the financial interest of Sharman and its partners "to maximize, not minimize, music file-sharing." He found six of the 10 defendants, including Sharman, its Sydney-based chief executive Nikki Hemming, as well as Altnet, a Sharman software partner, guilty of copyright infringement and ordered them to pay 90 percent of the record industry's costs in the case. A hearing will be set later to establish damages. The Post continues, "In a brief statement, Sharman said it would appeal and Kazaa software remained available online, with more than 800,000 downloads reported last week and 390 million total since Kazaa first became available in 2001. Sharman says its software is no different from a tape recorder or photocopier _ and that Kazaa could not control copyright infringement by users."

DOJ_NMG_0002459

Chiron Directors Reject Novartis Takeover Offer. The Financial Times (9/6, Politi) reports that Chiron's independent directors have rejected drug maker Novartis $4.5 billion take over offer. A statement from Chiron board members called the Novartis in adequate. Chiron "also decided to make clear that Novartis's proposal had not been solicited by the company, conflicting with the impression given by Novartis last week." The Times says Novartis now faces "an uphill battle in its attempt to take full control of Chiron." The rejection "means Novartis might become embroiled in a long-running struggle to gain control of the company, which it is courting to gain access to the fast-growing market for vaccines.'

ENVIRONMENT:

Federal Government Urged To Fund $14 Billion Coastal Restoration Project. In an appearance on NBC's Face The Nation (9/4, Russert) Mike Tidwell, author of "Bayou Farewell," commented, "You can't just fix the levees in New Orleans. We now have to have a massive coastal restoration project where we get the water out of the Mississippi River in a controlled fashion toward the Barrier islands, restore the wetlands. If you don't commit to this plan which is this $14 billion, costs of the Big Dig in Boston or two weeks of spending Iraq, you shouldn't fix a single window in New Orleans. You shouldn't pick up a single piece of debris because to do one without the other is to set the table for another nightmare."

NYTimes Praises Plan To Restore Louisiana Wetlands. The New York Times (9/5) editorializes, "Before Congress is a $14 billion plan to restore the vanishing wetlands and barrier islands off the Louisiana coast that in times past would have served as a buffer against the storm. The House has approved a modest $1.9 billion down payment on this plan, but it needs a push from President Bush and the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, to ensure Senate approval." The plan "would involve some delicate re-engineering of the natural system and is not without risk. Still, it could provide a measure of redemption for years of environmental carelessness for which Congress itself is largely responsible." The program before Congress "was hatched by the state's politicians and in its universities and drafted by the Army Corps of Engineers. It is supported by both industry and advocacy groups like the National Audubon Society and Environmental Defense, which helped with its design. It would start small, with three or four carefully calibrated pilot programs to divert water flow to the marshes, then go from there."

SCOTUS Ruling On Eminent Domain Sparks Backlash. The Washington Post (9/6, A2, Reid) reports that "the U.S. Supreme Court ruled on June 23 that the Constitution does not stop cities from seizing homes to make way for commercial development projects." Now, "all over the country, the court's decision in Kelo v. City of New London has sparked a furious reaction, with politicians of both parties proposing new legislation that would sharply limit the kind of seizure the court's decision validated. As a result, a decision first seen as a key legal victory for cities that want to use eminent domain for private projects has turned into a major setback on the political front for pro-development interests. The popular backlash has slowed or blocked many pending projects, as developers, their bankers and local governments suddenly face public furor." The Post notes, "Three states have already passed new laws in response to the Kelo decision. The statutes in Alabama and Texas sharply curtail eminent-domain condemnations for private development. … Delaware's new statute permits condemnation but sets new procedural requirements for local governments. Larry Morandi, an analyst at the National Conference of State Legislatures, predicts a rush of new laws next winter, when 44 state legislatures will be back in session. 'Most if not all state legislatures will be dealing with eminent-domain laws next year,' Morandi said. 'The outcry has been so sharp that many states already have task forces or study committees at work on this issue this summer. Most of the proposed legislation is designed to restrict the kind of governmental action that the court upheld in Kelo.'"

Government-Funded Cowboys Protect Against Invasion Of Cattle Fever Tick. The Washington Post (9/6, A23, Moreno) reports on a "small force of hardy men whose mission for almost 70 years has been to keep the dreaded Texas cattle fever tick confined to 900 miles of winding riverfront along the Mexican border." These USDA employees have "managed to marry his cowboying skills and love of desolate open range with benefits and a federal pension." They "make up the nation's front line against a scourge that decimated the cattle industry in 1906 and continues to be a threat as long as the cattle fever tick thrives south of the border and Mexican cows stray or are smuggled across the Rio Grande. … Today, the riders are fighting the worst infestation of cattle fever ticks in 30 years and are doing so in the face of budgetary shortfalls and bureaucratic turf wars."

DOJ_NMG_0002460

Editor Says Landowners Should Manage Property In Public Interest. Jonathan Weber, founder and editor in chief of NewWest.Net, an online publication about the Rocky Mountain West, writes in the New York Times (9/6), "When it comes to public access, state and local officials - and voters - need to recognize that the heavy bias toward property rights that exists throughout the West is something that will increasingly serve a small minority of wealthy landowners, not mom-and-pop homesteaders or family farmers. This imbalance needs to change. County commissioners, who are often on the front lines, can't allow themselves to be intimidated by the threat of litigation over access issues. And they need strong back-up from state attorneys general. But a big part of the solution is in the hands of the landowners themselves. In an era of economic policies that are producing an ever-larger group of the super-rich, those who are wealthier than the rest of us have a responsibility to manage their properties at least partly in the public interest. They need to meet with their neighbors, get involved with the community and find compromises that work for everyone. In most cases, the locals will be more than receptive to even small gestures. After all, who wants to fight when the fish are biting?"

Caimans Are Making A Comeback In Brazil. The New York Times (9/6, Rohter) reports from Mamiraua, Brazil, "As dusk falls, the waters here gradually come alive. One after another, caimans begin to stick their armored heads above the surface, and before long this isolated, tree-lined channel feeding the Amazon is teeming with crocodilians as large as 15 feet long. Their thrashing, splashing and grunting reverberates all through the night. Just a generation ago the caiman, a cousin of the American alligator, was driven so near extinction by the demand for its skin and meat that the government banned hunting it. But efforts to protect the black and spectacled caiman (pronounced KAY-men) have proved so successful that the population has exploded and the beast has now become a pest and, according to some, a threat." The Times adds, "Peasants along the rivers complain that caimans devour their livestock, and they are clamoring for the right to resume hunting. Even small children are occasionally attacked at the river's edge, leading local newspapers and radio stations to say the officials in far away Brasília know nothing about the hard realities of river life. The loudest and most constant protests, however, come from fishermen in areas like this, 450 miles west of Manaus, the capital of Amazonas State. They complain that the resurgent caimans destroy their nets, which can cost between $50 and $200, and consume large quantities of the same game fish that they need to catch and sell to feed their families."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

House Judiciary Leaders Penning Tough Anti-Steroids Measure. USA Today (9/6, Kiely) reports House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner "plans to unveil a new proposal this week to crack down on steroid use in sports, another sign of the growing determination by Congress to impose tougher testing standards and penalties on pro sports." Sensenbrenner and Judiciary ranking Democrat John Conyers are co-authoring a bill that "would put the Justice Department in charge of developing 'minimum standards' for testing and penalties. Participation in the program would be voluntary, but Sensenbrenner says there will be 'incentives' to encourage pro sports leagues to sign up. He did not elaborate on what those incentives might be. But in baseball's case the Judiciary Committee could threaten to lift the sport's antitrust exemption. Lawmakers are returning to Congress this week for the first time since news broke of Baltimore Orioles star Rafael Palmeiro's 10-day suspension last month for steroid use. That has stoked many members' exasperation. 'That's called a vacation; that's not a suspension,' said Rep. Chris Shays, R-Conn." In Congress, "frustration with professional sports in general, and Major League Baseball in particular, is growing. As they prepared to return to town this week from a month-long August recess, a number of Republican and Democratic lawmakers said the Palmeiro revelations would build momentum for federally mandated drug tests and penalties in pro sports. 'Obviously the current approach on steroids both in professional sports and amateur sports is not working,' says Sensenbrenner. The bill will be the sixth measure introduced in Congress this year to regulate steroids in pro sports. All of the bills have bipartisan support. All would impose much stiffer penalties than the one levied on Palmeiro."

DOJ_NMG_0002461

Orioles Send Palmeiro Home. The AP (9/5) reports Palmeiro "was sent home to Texas to rehabilitate knee and ankle injuries, leaving his baseball future unclear during a season in which he was suspended for a positive steroids test. Palmeiro's season unraveled soon after he collected his 3,000th career hit on July 15. He received a 10-day suspension on Aug. 1 for failing a drug test, and upon his return was booed by fans in Baltimore and on the road. He is 2-for-26 with one RBI since coming back, and has been bothered the past two weeks by injuries to his left ankle and right knee. The Orioles still expect him to play this month, but decided Monday that the first baseman should go home to recover."

Chiefs Offensive Lineman Suspended Over Steroids. The AP (9/3) reported, "Kansas City Chiefs offensive lineman John Welbourn has been suspended for four games for violation of the league's steroid policy. 'John has been suspended,' coach Dick Vermeil told The Associated Press on Saturday. 'We are moving forward. I really can't say any more than that right now.'"

Prosecutors Drop Fraud Charges Against DEA's Clark. The AP (9/3) reported, "Prosecutors have dropped the fraud charges against a man whose wife falsely claimed to have cancer and collected thousands of dollars in donations. Salt Lake County prosecutors said Wednesday they no longer felt they could prove Drug Enforcement Agency officer Jeff James Clark was part of the scam perpetrated by his wife, Tania Clark." Tania Clark, "who has pleaded guilty to felony counts of theft and theft by deception in Utah and Salt Lake counties, is taking sole responsibility for the crimes, said Deputy Salt Lake County District Attorney Robert Stott." Jeff Clark's job status "remains uncertain, DEA spokeswoman Karen Flowers said Thursday, and he remains on unpaid administrative leave."

US Army Soldier Headed Colombia-To-US Cocaine Smuggling Ring. The AP (9/3, Housego) wrote, "U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Daniel Rosas was deployed to Colombia as part of the large U.S. mission to fight drug trafficking, but before long he found the lure of cocaine money too hard to resist. He formed a smuggling ring involving U.S. soldiers that was eventually busted, deeply embarrassing U.S. officials." A deposition "shows Rosas' scheme was so amateurish that at one point he made a deal with a stranger he met in a Mexican nightclub bathroom and even saw a $140,000 payment vanish in the mail. The authenticity of Rosas' sworn statement was recently confirmed by a Colombian official familiar with the case. The document provides for the first time a detailed look into how the drug ring operated and shows that, with stunning ease, it was able to send 170 pounds of cocaine from Colombia to the United States, subject to only cursory searches at best from U.S. Customs agents." In a sworn statement to military investigators in March, Rosas said, "They never suspected that any military or civilian personnel would bring back contraband. They did not use dogs, they very rarely checked our carryon bags but never checked our equipment that was loaded on the pallets." US Ambassador William Wood said that "in the wake of the arrests on March 28 that U.S. soldiers leaving Colombia would be subjected to stricter searches. The case infuriated many Colombians who said President Alvaro Uribe should revoke treaties granting immunity to U.S. soldiers serving in Colombia. Rosas, 23, of McAllen, Texas, is behind bars awaiting court-martial along with two other U.S. soldiers. A fourth soldier, Spc. Francisco Rosa, pleaded guilty on Aug. 10 to using, possessing and distributing cocaine and making a false official statement. He was sentenced to five years in prison, demoted to the rank of private and will receive a bad conduct discharge."

Gun Control Initiatives Weaken In South. The Boston Globe (9/6, Wirzbicki) reports, "Even as Boston struggles against a tide of smuggled handguns, some state governments in the South are loosening their gun control laws in ways that critics say will make it easier for traffickers to bring illegal firearms into the Northeast." The Globe continues, "Under pressure from the National Rifle Association, South Carolina abolished a state law last year that limited to one the number of handguns individuals can buy in a month, a measure that was designed in 1975 to prevent trafficking." The Globe adds, "Virginia, which was the epicenter of gun smuggling into New York and Boston before it passed a one-gun-per-month law in 1993, weakened that rule in 2004 and gun control advocates fear that it could soon be abolished. … Academic studies have shown that limits on monthly gun purchases help limit smuggling, but lobbyists for gun manufacturers call such laws ''gun rationing' and say they infringe on Second Amendment gun ownership rights. … Over the past five years the overall trend on the state level has been toward lax gun laws, said David Hemenway, a professor at the Harvard School of Public Health who studies gun crime. That has left states such as Massachusetts and New York, which retain their strict gun limits, increasingly isolated."

DOJ_NMG_0002462

1.7 Million Children Live In Homes With A Loaded, Unlocked Gun. A survey published today in the Pediatrics online journal found that 1.7 million US children live in homes with loaded, unlocked firearms. USA Today (9/6, Elias) reports, "One-third of adults have handguns, rifles or shotguns at home, says the CDC report. But states vary greatly in the percentage of adults who keep weapons, and in how many with children at home store their guns loaded and unlocked. The states with the highest percentage of adults who have children at home and leave guns unlocked and loaded are Alabama, Alaska, Arkansas, Idaho, Montana and Wyoming. … The Pediatrics report says that of 1,400 children and teens shot to death in 2002, about 90% were home when it happened."

IMMIGRATION:

Fox Says US Shares Responsibility For Illegal Immigration. The New York Times (9/5, Thompson) reports Mexican President Vicente Fox "responded over the weekend to criticism from American authorities about a recent surge in violence and illegal immigration along the border, saying that the United States shares responsibility for the problems and should work harder with Mexico to fix them." Fox "said he rejected 'forcefully' the statements by the Bush administration and governors of border states, contending that they had unfairly depicted Mexico as a safe haven for organized crime, though his government has arrested more leading drug traffickers and dismantled more cartels than any of its predecessors. He also said Mexican immigrants had been portrayed unfairly as potential terrorists when they had in fact become a pillar of the American economy.

Union Organizers Focus On Low-Wage, Immigrant Workers. Several "insurgent unions" are hoping to revive the labor movement by focusing n low-wage and immigrant workers, the New York Times (9/6, Greenhouse) reports. This summer, the United Food and Commercial Workers, "joined the Teamsters and the Service Employees International Union in breaking away from the A.F.L.-C.I.O., with those three unions promising to devote far more energy to recruiting workers than the rest of organized labor has. Two organizing drives aimed at poultry workers…are among the early battles in this effort to reinvigorate labor."

TAX:

Jailed Telecom Tycoon Said To Be Trying To Move Assets. The Legal Times (9/5, McLure) reports, "Even from jail, Walter Anderson, the D.C. telecom tycoon accused of concealing $450 million from the Internal Revenue Service, continued to try to hide money overseas, federal prosecutors say." The Times continues, "On Aug. 24, prosecutors filed in court a transcript of a taped jailhouse phone call from Anderson to an overseas business associate that they say shows him trying to move assets beyond the government's reach. On March 22, Anderson placed a collect call to the associate from the D.C. Correctional Treatment Facility to discuss moving an investment from a Cayman Island company to a blind trust on the Isle of Man." The Times adds, "In the transcript, Anderson says Chadbourne & Parke corporate attorney Hwan Kim was advising him on the offshore deal. 'I had a meeting with my attorney, Hwan Kim," Anderson says in the call. "I explained to him the logic that we were trying to create some full separation. He understands completely what we're trying to do. He said that there are a number of different ways to do it . . . he simply suggested that if you could decide which lawyer you want to do it on your side, he'll see if his firm has somebody appropriate to do it on the other side.' Moments later, Anderson tells the business associate: 'The main thing we have to make sure [is] it's reversible, in some way . . . so that when we clean up the mess, we can reverse it.' The transcript makes no mention of how much money would be involved."

DOJ_NMG_0002463

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Visits Hurricane Zone For Second Time. President Bush yesterday visited the hurricane zone for a second time, amid reports of friction between the White House and local officials such as Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco. The network coverage of the visit tended to have a skeptical edge, with reporters casting the visit as part of a PR effort by the Administration to show it is effectively managing the situation. Meanwhile, the historical stakes for the Administration in the recovery are being portrayed as high, with NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert placing the current crisis on the same scale as the war in Iraq and 9/11. Russert said on NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 7, 1:15), "The President obviously understands with his return visit today that he has to make up for lost ground. The recovery effort and how well it goes will be enormous to historians on how they judge the Bush second term."

While the coverage of Bush's visit was largely negative, the news coming out of the hurricane zone was more positive, with progress reported in the rescue of stranded residents in hard-hit areas of New Orleans, in sealing the breach in a major levee, in the delivery of aid to the zone, and in the relocation of refugees. On the network news, coverage of the suffering and human tragedy, mostly in New Orleans, was still a large component of the newscasts. However, there was a noticeable increase in the depiction of the stepped-up rescue and recovery efforts as workers and aid began reaching even the hardest-hit areas. NBC had the most negative coverage, with approximately 65% of its images depicting human grief and suffering versus 35% relief and recovery. CBS, which ran an abbreviated newscast, was the most positive, with an approximately 70% of its imagery showing scenes of recovery. ABC ran an extended, hour-long newscast, with about 60% of its footage depicting relief efforts.

ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Gibson) reported the visit was "another chance" for the President "to demonstrate that he and his Administration are on top of the relief effort." ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Woodruff) said Bush "returned to the hurricane zone today, including a visit to a Baton Rouge prayer center, now home to hundreds of people from New Orleans." Bush was shown saying, "This is a long-term project to help these people. This country is going to be committed to doing what it takes to get people back on their feet."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/5, Blitzer) reported that Bush returned to the hurricane zone "amid blistering criticism of the federal government's response to the Katrina catastrophe." CNN called the decision "a response, at least in part, to very angry allegations that he and the Federal government were slow to respond to this crisis."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/5, Bash) reported that "one of the things that some were looking for when the President went down to the region for the first time on Friday was what some call a bullhorn moment," like the one after the 9/11 attacks when Bush stood in the rubble of the World Trade Center. Many believe that moment "sort of shifted what had been at the time some heavy criticism of the President's immediate response after 9/11. There are some who are looking for those moments. Some here at the White House and some Bush allies were a little bit disappointed that perhaps that didn't happen the first time."

Fox News Special Report (9/5) reported that Bush returned to Baton Rouge "when the criticism is growing harsher by the day, directed to the federal government and the response in New Orleans." Bush "focused on the positive. He said earlier today the US response has been amazing. Touching down in Baton Rouge he headed for an evacuation center."

A majority of local TV stations led with largely positive stories about Bush's second visit to the area in four days. Typical of coverage was the lead story from WEAR-TV Mobile (9/5, 5:02 p.m.) that Bush "sought to comfort Hurricane Katrina victims. Promising them a huge effort to alleviate their suffering, the President toured parts of Louisiana and Mississippi, where the scope of the disaster is still not fully known." The President was shown saying, "The good people of this region know there's a lot of work to be done and we'll continue working with the local and state people to get it done." Likewise, WTVY-TV Dothan, Alabama (9/5, 6:03 p.m.) lead its broadcast with a report that "President Bush toured areas devastated by Hurricane Katrina today. His first stop was at the Bethany World Prayer Center in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. The President took time to thank members of the community who have been helping Hurricane Katrina victims."

Nationally, local TV continued to extensively cover Katrina. Much of the coverage also centered around Bush's visit to the Gulf Coast. For example, WABC-TV New York (9/5, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "The President arrived in Baton Rouge for a second tour of [the] hurricane-ravaged" region. The station added that the First Lady accompanied the President on the trip.

DOJ_NMG_0002464

A number of stations pointed out that some significant repair work has been accomplished in New Orleans. KDFW-TV Dallas (9/5, 10:03 p.m.) reported, "Seven days after Hurricane Katrina started the events [in New Orleans], two of the three major breaks in the city's levee system have been plugged." WRC-TV Washington (9/5, 11:01 p.m.) added, "One week after Hurricane Katrina, they are finally starting to pump the floodwater out of New Orleans." The station also noted, however, "Tonight, the Mayor of New Orleans says as many as 10,000 people may be dead," and many other stations covering the Katrina story reported this information as well.

The New York Times (9/6, Purdum) says "just how well Mr. Bush would endure the political challenges posed by the hurricane, much less prevail over them, remained a question on Monday." Having been "faulted by some as not spending enough time last week with black victims of the flooding in New Orleans, Mr. Bush was flanked at one point on Monday by prominent blacks, including Mayor Kip Holden of Baton Rouge and Bishop T. D. Jakes, a prominent Pentecostal minister from Dallas who has been courted by the White House in efforts to reach out to black voters."

Reuters (9/6, Zakaria) says Bush has been "under fierce criticism for his government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina," under fire "from Democrats and Republicans alike for a sluggish federal response to a flood that has made hundreds of thousands homeless and is feared to have killed several thousands along the northern Gulf of Mexico coast."

The New York Times (9/6, Bumiller, Haberman) adds that, addressing "a group of mostly black victims at a makeshift shelter, the Bethany World Prayer Center, in Baton Rouge," Bush said, "There's a lot of work to be done," adding that "Americans' response to the disaster had been 'amazing' and that 'this country is going to be committed to doing what it takes to help people get back on their feet.'" The President's trip was "an effort to calm the region and part of a major White House campaign to stem the political damage from the hurricane."

Rift Between Administration, Blanco Examined. The AP (9/6, Loven) reports, "Like estranged in-laws at a holiday gathering, President Bush and Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco kept their distance as both toured a relief center for storm victims Monday. … State and federal officials are all facing public criticism for a slow response to the crisis. Behind the scenes, each suggests the other is to blame." The AP adds, "In front of the cameras during Bush's visit to the Gulf Coast states on Monday, the president and Blanco said little to each other, focusing instead on thanking relief workers. 'I know I don't need to make any other introduction other than "Mr. President,"' Blanco said tersely, turning the microphone over to Bush after praising emergency management officials during a stop with Bush at an emergency operations center."

ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 9, 3:15, Woodruff) reported, "State and Federal officials are not always on the same page. The Governor of Louisiana has refused to hand over control of the National Guard to the Federal Government. There are even wire reports that she was not even told exactly when the President would be coming to her state."

The CBS Evening News (9/5, lead story, 3:50, Schieffer) added "there is so little coordination and so much friction between national and local officials that the Governor's office learned of the President's itinerary from a news reporter." CBS (Roberts) added the New Orleans devastation is "something President Bush still hasn't seen for himself. He returned to Louisiana today, but only to Baton Rouge to meet with survivors. Later in Mississippi, he insisted he's got the picture." President Bush: "I understand the damage, I understand the devastation, I understand the destruction, I understand how long it's going to take, and we're with you." Roberts: "Now that help has arrived, local officials, who felt so abandoned last week, are willing to move on."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Barry, Gold, Zucchino) notes Bush yesterday "planted a kiss on the governor's cheek," but "their staffs continued their wrangling."

The New York Times (9/6, Bumiller, Haberman) adds that "Bush comforted victims in Poplarville, Miss., and Baton Rouge, La., but he found himself ensnared in a dispute with Louisiana's Democratic governor, Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who learned of Mr. Bush's trip from news reports."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/5, Blitzer) reported, "The White House is denying today that it tried to exclude" Blanco "from traveling with Mr. Bush A good deal of political fingerpointing in this crisis has been between the Democratic governor of Louisiana and the Bush administration." CNN (Feyerick) added, "The explanation that's coming from the White House is that they tried to reach the governor yesterday, but no one called them back. The Governor says otherwise. She said that they got no official word that the president was even going to be in the area. And it wasn't until somebody from her office actually called over to the White House, to Andy Card, that, in fact, they were told that, yes, he was going to be arriving in Louisiana." One of the "reasons of the falling out…is the White House wanted to try to federalize the National Guard so that they could have control of it. But the Louisiana Governor said, no, she needed to keep control, because she wanted to make sure that they could continue to perform law enforcement actions. And that meant keeping order on the ground, and that meant firing if they had to, something that they would not have been able to do had they been under the power of the government."

DOJ_NMG_0002465

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/5, Feyerick) added Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff "said there is a unity in the operations. That he made it clear that everybody is getting along, everybody is acting like a professional, and they're all in agreement as to how to move forward."

Katrina Response Seen As Second Benchmark For Bush Presidency. On NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 7, 1:15), anchor Brian Williams spoke with Tim Russert. Williams: "I think most Americans would have told you prior to Katrina, the US response and now the argument over it, that the Bush Presidency thus far would have been judged, its benchmark event would have been Iraq, especially coming out of 9/11. Tim, is the ballgame now this storm and the response to it?" Russert: "In large part, yes, Brian. I think it joins Iraq but doesn't replace it. People believe in their Presidents. Generally, a President gets a large spike in the poll ratings after handling a crisis. That has not occurred with this particular crisis because there's been serious criticism of the government's response -- Federal, state, and local. This President has to demonstrate extraordinary leadership in rebuilding the Gulf region as well as conducting the war in Iraq in order to maintain a second term that is seen as successful. That is an extraordinarily large challenge."

The Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Feldmann) also compares the current crisis to 9/11, adding Bush "faces perhaps the most profound test of executive and political skill of his life."

Nagin Says He Doesn't Think Bush Got Right Information. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 10, 3:20, Sawyer) interviewed New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin. Sawyer: "Do you think the President delayed, because he didn't have enough information? Do you think he didn't have the right instinct? What do you think happened at that moment?" Nagin: "The President? I think the President was suffering from the same thing I was suffering from initially. I would ask questions. They would tell me what was supposed to happen. I would follow up to find out what really happened. And it wasn't happening. And I don't think the right information got to the President. Because when I finally got to him and talked to him, he immediately dispatched this incredible general who came down here. And I've been talking about him, General Honore. And things started to happen."

Bartlett Says Bush Will Order Probe Of Federal Response. USA Today (9/6, Keen, Benedetto) reports, "After angry complaints last week about delays in mobilizing federal help for hurricane victims, criticism of Bush's light-hearted recollection Friday of his youthful partying in New Orleans and failed efforts to blame local and state officials for problems, the president and his aides tried Monday to regain a sense of equilibrium." Bush counselor Dan Bartlett "said Monday that after the situation is under control, Bush will order an inquiry into delays in federal aid. 'We want to know what happened and how,' Bartlett said."

Barbour's Strong Defense Of Bush Noted, Analyzed. The New York Times (9/6, Cooper) reports, "The Bush administration has been stung by criticism of its handling of Hurricane Katrina by anguished Louisiana officials and by nervous Republicans from across the country, but it has one stalwart defender right in the heart of the devastated region -- Gov. Haley Barbour of Mississippi." Barbour has consistently "praised President Bush and a federal response to the storm that even the president later called 'not acceptable.' At one point last week, when Mr. Barbour's glowing assessment was challenged by an interviewer on CNN, he asked 'if this is an interview or an argument.'" Barbour's praise "has put him at odds with some other Mississippi officials who have bemoaned the slow response in their areas and has put him at risk of sounding like a Pollyanna to Mississippians still struggling in the storm's aftermath." But "the strategy is unsurprising for a canny political strategist like Mr. Barbour -- a former political director in the Reagan White House, chairman of the Republican Party, and powerful Washington lobbyist -- who won the governorship two years ago by in part emphasizing the strength of his close ties to President Bush."

"Flurry Of Emails" Among Bush Aides Described. USA Today (9/6, Keen, Benedetto) reports, "In a flurry of e-mail exchanges late Saturday night when they learned about Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death, President Bush's top advisers debated -- after their most difficult week since 9/11 -- what calamity might be next. Their worried conversations continued in meetings at the White House before 8 a.m. on Sunday." They "concluded that for Bush's remaining 40 months in office, they should expect almost anything, said a top adviser who works closely with Bush. 'We've just kind of realized that if things are going to happen, they're going to happen to this president,' he said, refusing to be identified because he was not authorized to describe internal discussions."

DOJ_NMG_0002466

Weak Katrina Response Could Hurt Bush's Sway Over GOP. Roll Call (9/6, Preston) reports President Bush's "command over the Republican Congress is showing signs of weakening as a result of the growing unease over the U.S. mission in Iraq, the lack of a definitive plan to overhaul the nation's Social Security system and rising energy costs." But "complicating matters for Bush is the devastation wrought on the Gulf Coast by Hurricane Katrina, and the subsequent criticism from some local officials of the federal government's alleged failure to respond quickly enough with relief aide." Now, the White House "must work to shore up support among Republican Members even as it tries to advance Bush's goal on Social Security, said Senators, senior aides and GOP strategists."

WSJournal Says White House "Slowly Recovering From Its First-Week Stumbles." The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A28) editorializes, "The White House is slowly recovering from its first-week stumbles responding to Katrina, with President Bush taking his second trip to New Orleans yesterday. His quick elevation of John Roberts to Chief Justice is another welcome sign of energy. … But Mr. Bush can't afford to stop there, because the aftermath of Katrina poses a threat to his entire second term. … What Americans want now is proof that their government understands the nature of the challenge and is acting forcefully to meet it. On this point, Mr. Bush is going to have to recognize the obvious initial failure of the Department of Homeland Security in its first big post-9/11 test. The President created this latest huge federal bureaucracy, against the advice of many of us, and we're still waiting for evidence that it has done anything but reshuffle the Beltway furniture. If FEMA can't now handle the diaspora out of New Orleans to Houston, Baton Rouge and other cities, the political retribution will be fierce."

Scholar Says Iraq Fixation Hurt Bush Reactions To 9/11, Katrina. In a Financial Times (9/6) op-ed, New America Foundation fellow Michael Lind writes, "In early 2001, shortly after President George W. Bush was inaugurated and before 9/11, the Federal Emergency Management Agency warned of the three most devastating disasters that could strike the US: a terrorist attack on New York City, a hurricane flooding New Orleans and a San Francisco earthquake. The Bush administration was focused on its priority: Iraq. The first foreseen disaster took place on September 11 2001, when al-Qaeda flew hijacked jets into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The federal government was taken by surprise. New York City's first responders were hampered by communications problems and poor planning for this long-predicted event. The Bush administration's response to the mass murder committed by al-Qaeda was warped by the focus on Iraq. Many in Washington believe that the administration failed to send sufficient troops to Afghanistan because it was with-holding forces for the invasion of Iraq. … Supporters of the war in Iraq predicted that the dominos would fall in the Middle East. Instead, the dominos are falling across America."

More Criticism Of Bush. John Tierney, in his column for the New York Times (9/6, Tierney) writes of President Bush that when one campaigns as "the great leader whose arm rescues Americans in their moment of need, they expect you to deal with a hurricane, too." Tierney adds that FEMA, "often criticized for ineptitude, became even less efficient after it was swallowed by [DHS], a bureaucracy consumed with terrorism. The department has spent billions on new federal airport screeners - with no discernible public benefit - while giving short shrift to natural disasters. The federal officials who had been laboring on a one-size-fits-all strategy were unprepared for the peculiarities of New Orleans, like the high percentage of people without cars. The local officials who knew about that problem didn't do anything about it - and then were furious when Mr. Bush didn't solve it for them. Why didn't the man on the mound come through for them?"

Nicholas Kristof, in his column for the New York Times (9/6, Kristof) writes, "The wretchedness coming across our television screens from Louisiana" illustrates "the Bush administration's ongoing reluctance or ineptitude in helping the poorest Americans. The scenes in New Orleans reminded me of the suffering I saw after a similar storm killed 130,000 people in Bangladesh in 1991 - except that Bangladesh's government showed more urgency in trying to save its most vulnerable citizens." Kristof adds, "If it's shameful that we have bloated corpses on New Orleans streets, it's even more disgraceful that the infant mortality rate in America's capital is twice as high as in China's capital."

DOJ_NMG_0002467

In his Washington Post (9/6, A25) column, Eugene Robinson writes, "After a tragically incompetent beginning, the effort to give urgent care to the multitudes from New Orleans whose homes and livelihoods have been obliterated is finally in high gear. The problem now is that nobody knows where it's headed. … A few days in and around this ground zero have convinced me that there are two things the federal government failed to do, and that for these failures there's ultimately no one to blame but the president. First, an administration that since Sept. 11, 2001, has told us a major terrorist strike is inevitable should have had in place a well-elaborated plan for evacuating a major American city. … Second, someone should have thought about what to do with hundreds of thousands of evacuees, both in the days after a disaster and in the long term."

Katrina Seen As Reawakening Tough, Scrutinizing Media. USA Today (9/6, 3D, Johnson) reports that journalists covering Katrina "on the scene showed their human -- and often angry and frustrated -- face as they questioned the slow response over the weekend." Fox News anchor Shepard Smith "fumed on-air" Friday, "The government said, 'You go here, and you'll get help,' or 'You go in that Superdome and you'll get help.' And they didn't get help. They got locked in there. And they watched people being killed around them." Fordham University communications professor Paul Levinson said, "The media rose to the occasion, shone their light on the desolation and the needy, and kept it focused there until the cavalry finally began to arrive." Some media observers say Katrina's "media legacy may be a return to a post-Watergate-like era of tougher scrutiny of the federal government and public policy issues."

USA Today (9/6, 1D, Johnson) also reports that while the "media shelf life for natural disasters is notoriously short," journalists and observers "predict that mounting questions about U.S. government preparation, policies and response to Hurricane Katrina will result in intense news coverage for months." Bob Lichter of the Center for Media and Public Affairs said Katrina "doesn't just have legs, it has tentacles. Its implications reach into hot-button controversies involving race, poverty, economics and partisan politics. The reach of this story will make the O.J. Simpson case look like a news brief."

Brown's Qualifications Questioned As Criticism of FEMA Relief Effort Continues. FEMA Director Michael Brown continues to draw fire for his handling of the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. As reports emerge that his most recent job was with the International Arabian Horse Association, many are now saying that he has scant emergency management experience on his resume. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 7, 2:40, Gibson) reported there are "some very real questions about the Federal official ultimately in charge of relief efforts." ABC (Ross) added, "Michael Brown had virtually no experience with emergency management when the President put him in the top FEMA job two years ago. And his official resume omits the job he previously held. Brown was a top official of an Arabian horse association, which asked him to resign in 2001, according to the association's secretary." Rep. Bennie Thompson: "I can't see for the life of me, what heading a horse association has to do with responding to domestic preparedness." Former FEMA regional director John Copenhaver: "It would appear that it has become a political patronage job." Meanwhile, "The Bush Administration "continued to support Brown today, as President Bush did last Friday, on his first visit to the scene." President Bush: "And Brown, you're doing a heckuva of a job. The FEMA director's working 24-7."

NBC Today Show (9/5, 7:08 am, Myers) reported that there are "new questions about whether Brown is qualified to run the largest relief effort in history." International Arabian Horse Association officials tell NBC News that Brown resigned under pressure from the horse show job and many who worked with him were stunned when he became director of FEMA." Copenhaver was shown saying, "I have a hard time understanding how experience with Arabian horse association translates into the capability to run the federal emergency management agency."

Brown, meanwhile, is defending FEMA's response to the hurricane. NBC Nightly News (9/5, lead story, 3:20, Seigenthaler) reported, "Anger is all around, and while evacuees welcomed the President in Baton Rouge today…politicians, aid workers, and reporters continue to hammer officials at every level, forcing FEMA Director Michael Brown today to defend his qualifications for the job." Brown: "Last year's historic four hurricanes have struck Florida, so, yeah, I've been through a few disasters in my life." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/5, Dobbs) added, "Brown today forcefully defended himself against charges he's unfit to lead the agency in this time of crisis. Brown said at a press conference that he's well qualified for the task of heading up the government relief effort. … The critics say Brown had no experience in disaster relief before joining FEMA in 2001. And they point out his last private sector job was managing a horse show circuit." CNN (Sylvester) added, "FEMA's bungling of the recovery efforts has put Brown's emergency management credentials, or lack thereof, in the spotlight."

DOJ_NMG_0002468

A minority of local TV stations in the Gulf Coast area lead their broadcasts by reporting on the press conference, in which Brown had to "defend his qualifications for the job." WVTM-TV Birmingham (9/5, 10:03 pm) showed Brown saying, "I've been through a few disasters in my life." Lt. Gen. Russel Honore was shown saying, "All those smart business guys out there who say have we or have we not done this right, and have some fancy computer matrix, get down here and get some damn gas down here, and come down here and get the phones working!" WALA-TV Mobile (9/5, 5:30 pm) added, "During a press conference, FEMA said it was prepared for the hurricane."

The New Orleans Times-Picayune has joined those criticizing Brown, and is now calling for the resignation of top FEMA officials. In an editorial, the New Orleans Times-Picayune (9/5) wrote an open letter to President Bush, asking the President to please forgive them if they "wait to see proof of" his promise to make what is not working right before they believe him. The paper claims to "have good reason for" its skepticism. The Times Picayune goes on to say that despite New Orleans' "multiple points of entry, our nation's bureaucrats spent days after last week's hurricane wringing their hands, lamenting the fact that they could neither rescue the city's stranded victims nor bring them food, water and medical supplies. Meanwhile there were journalists, including some who work for The Times-Picayune, going in and out of the city via the Crescent City Connection." "We're angry," the paper writes, "Mr. President, and we'll be angry long after our beloved city and surrounding parishes have been pumped dry. Our people deserved rescuing. Many who could have been were not. That's to the government's shame." ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 10, 3:20, Woodruff) noted the letter, and the fact that it called "for the resignation of every Federal official at the Federal agency in charge of relief here, including its director, Michael Brown."

The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Hsu, Glasser) reports in a front page article that Brown is being called "the accidental director" and has been "caricatured as the failed head of an Arabian horse sporting group who was plucked from obscurity to become President Bush's point man for the worst natural disaster in US history." After what has been seen as a slow federal response, "politicians and officials in both parties have derided Brown's qualifications to head the nation's chief disaster-response agency -- as well as the performance of the agency and its federal, state and local partners." Meanwhile, "As recently as three weeks ago, state emergency managers urged Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and his deputy, Michael P. Jackson, to ease the department's focus on terrorism, warning that the shift away from traditional disaster management left FEMA a bureaucratic backwater less able to respond to natural events such as hurricanes and earthquakes. The Times-Picayune, Louisiana's largest newspaper, published an open letter on Sunday to President Bush, calling for every FEMA official to be fired, 'Director Michael Brown especially,' joining critics in the state and Congress."

FEMA's purported failure in the aftermath of Katrina was a major topic on cable TV news shows last night. For example, CNN security analyst Clark Kent Ervin, a former DHS inspector general who left his post reluctantly, said on CNN's The Situation Room (9/5) that FEMA's handling of the response is "inexcusable. There's absolutely no excuse for it. This is the kind of thing that ought to have been planned for. Asked about suggestions of incompetence on the part of FEMA Director Michael Brown, Ervin said, "I know Michael Brown and I think he's a wonderful fellow. He's actually been praised for the response to the hurricanes in Florida last year. So, I must say that I'm rather surprised by the response at this point. This was, as I say, not just foreseeable but it was actually foreseen, so it's inexcusable." Ervin added that it is clear Brown is "in over his head."

CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (9/5, 7:15 p.m.) evaluated government response to Katrina, reporting that critics along the Gulf Coast have said that FEMA's relief had been "inadequate or missing." The report continues, "Chertoff, who oversees FEMA, says for the scope of the disaster, things are going well." However, "his own FEMA director now says he was surprised by the storm's power. Surprised people did not evacuate, surprised levees failed, though that was all predicted by many experts for many years."

MSNBC's Countdown With Keith Olbermann (9/5, 8:01 p.m.) reported, "The director of the National Hurricane Center has told the newspaper of the New Orleans Times-Picayune" that Brown and Chertoff "both listened to electronic briefings before Hurricane Katrina, during which the hurricane center warned the storm could overtop the levees or even breach them. 'It's not,' said Dr. Max Mayfield, 'like this was a surprise.' Secretary Chertoff and President Bush both continue to say it was."

DOJ_NMG_0002469

Congress Likely To Consider Separating FEMA From DHS. The Hill (9/6, Snyder) reports lawmakers are "pledging an across-the-board response to help Hurricane Katrina victims recover and to fix problems the storm and its aftermath exposed. Efforts are likely to include the removal of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) from the Department of Homeland Security to speed recovery efforts and expansion of energy production to areas outside the Gulf of Mexico to ease future price shocks, congressional and outside experts said."

State, Local Officials Also Held Responsible For Poor Response. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (9/6, A28), Bob Williams, president of the Evergreen Freedom Foundation, writes that it isn't fair "to dump on the federal officials and avoid those most responsible -- local and state officials who failed to do their job as the first responders. The plain fact is, lives were needlessly lost in New Orleans due to the failure of Louisiana's governor, Kathleen Blanco, and the city's mayor, Ray Nagin." Williams adds that corrective action must be taken with FEMA as well, but "if citizens expect FEMA to be a first responder to terrorist attacks or other local emergencies (earthquakes, forest fires, volcanoes), they will be disappointed. The federal government's role is to offer aid upon request."

Livingston Critical Of Blanco For Not Declaring Martial Law. The Hill (9/6, Dufour) adds in its "Under the Dome" column that former Rep. Bob Livingston "was particularly critical of Gov. Kathleen Blanco (D) for failing to declare martial law promptly to deter widespread looting. 'I raised hell with the governor for not declaring martial law,' he said Thursday. 'I told her last [Wednesday] night I was going on 'Hannity & Colmes' and criticize her for not doing that, and 20 minutes later, she did.'"

Katrina Aftermath Could Provide Opportunity For Terrorists. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A10, Solomon) reports, "The Bush administration has spent billions of dollars developing government agencies and technologies to better predict and respond to disasters since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But security experts said the delays in helping Katrina's victims in New Orleans and elsewhere along the Gulf Coast indicate the relief process has become more cumbersome, opening opportunities for terrorists. Business consultants and security experts are advising clients to tighten safety measures since al Qaeda or other terrorist networks might find it advantageous to strike when tens of thousands of federal troops and other homeland-security resources are deployed to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama."

Congress To Investigate DHS Response To Katrina. USA Today (9/6, Hall) reports Katrina "has become the Homeland Security Department's first big test. Since the department was created after the 9/11 attacks to prevent and respond to catastrophes, it has spent tens of billions of dollars, studied disaster scenarios of every imaginable kind and run some of the nation's biggest emergency response drills." But it "wasn't ready for the power of Katrina. Today, as workers struggle to provide better relief for survivors, Congress will begin investigating why the government's response was so slow." Sens. Susan Collins and Joe Lieberman, "leaders of the Senate homeland security committee, will discuss their committee's plan for an inquiry into the response by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). The agency is the disaster-response division of the Homeland Security Department." Some, "including Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., say Bush should appoint an independent national commission similar to the commission that investigated the 9/11 attacks."

In a lengthy article examining the Federal government's response, the Wall Street Journal (9/6, A1, Block, Schatz, Fields and Cooper) reports, "Now that Hurricane Katrina has left the Gulf Coast flooded and New Orleans in ruins, the question ricocheting around the nation and the world is this: How could the world's biggest superpower fail so badly in protecting and rescuing its residents from a natural disaster so frequently foretold? The answer is sure to receive intense scrutiny this fall in Congress and around the nation, especially given revived fears that the U.S. is ill-prepared for a terrorist attack." Though there have been "missteps" at the local level, "so far, the federal government is bearing the brunt of criticism, given its vast resources and unique role in responding to major disasters. Critics say the response shows that the nation's disaster-response system, rebuilt in the wake of the 2001 terrorist attacks, is woefully inadequate." The Journal adds, "Many of last week's problems are rooted in January 2003, when the Bush administration, urged on by some members of Congress, created the Homeland Security Department."

DOJ_NMG_0002470

Hillary Clinton Calls For 9/11-Style Inquiry. The New York Daily News (9/5, McAuliff) reported that with "many blaming the growing scope of Katrina's devastation on the Bush administration, Sen. Hillary Clinton called yesterday for a 9/11-style probe into how the federal government responded to the crisis." Sen. Clinton's "call echoed statements of Republicans such as Arizona's Sen. John Kyl, chairman of the Technology and Homeland Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, who plans a hearing and has said the catastrophe in New Orleans could have a lot in common with a terror attack."

DHS Said To Have Failed First Major Test. USA Today (9/6) editorializes, "Every level of government that was supposed to prepare for the storm and its aftermath failed miserably." FEMA's response was "not only a human tragedy but also an international embarrassment for the USA. That bungled response should serve as an alert to the rest of the nation. After spending four years and tens of billions of dollars since 9/11 on 'all-hazards preparedness,' FEMA's parent, the Homeland Security Department, failed its first major test."

Congress Shifts Priorities To Respond To Katrina. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Fialka) reports that after "approving a cash infusion for hurricane relief, Congress is focusing on three legislative priorities for responding to Katrina: moving energy supplies, resettling displaced people, and restoring economically critical Gulf ports." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "said the chamber's primary legislative business will include hurricane-related measures and appropriations bills." Majority Whip Roy Blunt said the House "may consider legislation designed to ease supply by expanding on the administration's authority to waive fuel standards and environmental requirements." The Journal adds lawmakers "also will weigh allowing exploration for oil and gas along the coast of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska, and letting states lease federal offshore land to companies exploring for natural gas along the Atlantic, Pacific and Gulf coasts." Frist said "that he would delay indefinitely a vote scheduled for today on the estate tax."

The Washington Times (9/6, Hurt) reports Senate Republicans "agreed yesterday to postpone consideration of the bill to fully and permanently repeal the death tax that had been scheduled for this week." Majority Leader Bill Frist "promised to return to the bill as soon as possible but wanted to clear the legislative decks this week -- lawmakers' first after a month's recess -- to consider what could be done to help deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Hook) also says Frist "said he would cancel a vote scheduled for this week on repealing the estate tax — a controversial measure that Democrats had decried as inappropriate relief for the wealthy at a time when so many poor storm victims are suffering in the South." Frist also "announced the postponement of confirmation hearings on the nomination of John G. Roberts Jr. to the U.S. Supreme Court, which had been scheduled to start Tuesday." Frist said the "decision to postpone the hearings' start -- at least until Thursday, but not beyond Monday -- was to honor Rehnquist and not in response to some Democrats' contention that more preparation time is needed now that Roberts is being considered for the court's top post." The agenda "changes come on the eve of Congress' return from a month-long August recess — a return that will be marked by a striking change in political climate. Republicans left town at the end of July buoyed by their success in passing energy, highway and trade legislation and eager to tackle other priorities, such as overhauling Social Security and repealing the estate tax." But as they "reconvene this week, their agenda and mood will be darkened by more sobering realities: a vast swath of the U.S. ravaged by Katrina; skyrocketing gas prices; the death of the chief justice; and spreading turmoil in Iraq."

The New York Times (9/6, Kirkpatrick) adds Republicans said committees "would announce plans for hearings into the apparently flawed response and increasing oil and gasoline prices." Democrats said they "expected the aftermath of the storm to be a reminder of the importance of federal power in the hearings on the selection of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. for the Supreme Court." Frist said he "expected the Senate energy committee to look at 'price gouging, the excessive oil profits and what responsibility oil companies have in the skyrocketing fuel prices.'" Congressional leaders "are to meet President Bush on Tuesday to discuss relief efforts, and a group of cabinet secretaries, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, are to brief the full Senate at the end of the day." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "called for an investigation of the disaster response by a commission modeled after the 9/11 panel. Mr. Reid faulted the White House as failing to take responsibility."

The Washington Times (9/6, Lambro) notes Congress "quickly approved an interim $10.5 billion assistance bill last week as the first step in the early recovery efforts, but congressional officials said a far more expansive aid package is expected in the next several weeks."

DOJ_NMG_0002471

Blumenauer Had Presciently Warned Of New Orleans' Peril. The Hill (9/6, Cusack) reports one "of the most outspoken legislators on preparing" New Orleans "for a storm like Hurricane Katrina was a Democrat from Oregon." Earlier this year, Rep. Earl Blumenauer "delivered a speech on the House floor that drew parallels between the 2004 tsunami in Southeast Asia and the vulnerability of New Orleans. Blumenauer's predictions of a catastrophe came true as Katrina flooded New Orleans, leading to a death toll that is expected to climb into the thousands." On Jan. 26, Blumenauer "said a hurricane hitting New Orleans would lead to a '30-foot wall of water hitting the city, causing thousands of deaths and $100 billion in damage.'"

Republicans Face Scrambled Political Environment. The Washington Post (9/6, A6, Murray, Babington) reports Republicans "face a far more troubling political landscape than the one they left a month ago, according to lawmakers in both parties." Democrats are "sounding emboldened. One sign of GOP unease: The Senate was supposed to vote this week on whether to permanently repeal the estate tax, but Frist said yesterday that the bill will be temporarily shelved." Lawmakers in "both parties said the surging price of gas and spot shortages are leading concerns in their states and districts, and Democrats will try to get the upper hand by calling for price caps and a requirement that oil companies and refineries disclose their pricing policies. Frist said Republicans would proceed with legislation to allow oil drilling in the Alaska wilderness." Although congressional Republicans facing reelection "are unhappy with Bush's slide in the polls, there's no sense of panic, said Stu Rothenberg, who writes an independent political newsletter." Rothenberg said, "But inevitably, if we continue to see a softening in the president's numbers, every Republican is going to be expressing some concern, if not alarm."

Bill Clinton Criticizes Federal Response, Calls For "Katrina Commission." Former President Bill Clinton criticized the federal response to the disaster yesterday. Speaking to a CNN (9/5) camera crew, Clinton said, "Our government failed those people in the beginning, and I take it now there is no dispute about it; 100 percent of the people recognize that, that it was a failure. And I personally believe there should be a serious analysis of it. I have my own ideas about what caused it, and -- but I don't think we should do it now. I think that in a few weeks we should have some sort of Katrina commission."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Barry, Gold, Zucchino) reports that when asked "why FEMA did not move more quickly," Clinton said, "That's a question you should be asking them. It has something to do with how they reorganized after I left." The Washington Post (9/6, A11, Rein) reports, "With the administration facing public criticism for a slow response to the crisis, there was no sign of friction between the president's father and Clinton."

Former Presidents Bush, Clinton Visit Victims In Houston. In a reprise of their roles as fundraisers for relief efforts for the Indonesian tsunami, former Presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton have teamed up again to raise funds for the victims of Katrina. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 5, :25, Woodruff) reported, "In Houston today, former Presidents Bush and Clinton formally began their program to help people by raising money, for people affected by the hurricane. They hope the new fund would help people that would otherwise be overlooked by government programs. 'How are we going to find jobs for these people,' asked President Clinton? 'Where are they really going to live?' So many of them feel lost."

In a later story, ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 11, 2:05, Gibson) reported the former presidents "went in to meet the people affected in the Astrodome. They got hugs, prayers, stories of travails. And they got an earful." Former President Clinton: "A lot of them, it hit them out of the blue. One day, everything's normal. 48 hours later, their house is under water and they have nothing left. People they know and love are dead." The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 4, 0:30, Roberts) reported, "Former Presidents Bush and Clinton visited the Houston Astrodome today, which is now filled to capacity. They were there to offer comfort and to help raise money for storm victims." NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 4, 0:30, Williams) reported, "Also today, 41 and 42 are trying to combine to post a much bigger number. In Houston today at the Astrodome, former Presidents Bush and Clinton announced the establishment of a fund for the victims of Katrina, the same sort of effort after the two of them made after the tsunami in Asia. Several large corporations have made multi-million-dollar donations."

DOJ_NMG_0002472

Clinton Seen As Coming To Bush's Aid. The New York Times (9/6, Nagourney, Broder) reports, "Mr. Clinton's visit to the Houston shelter on Monday is the latest time the former president has come to the current president's aid in his second term, from early in the year when Mr. Bush was criticized for his slow response to the tsunami, to initially defending the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina at the White House last week, to praising the credentials of Judge John G. Roberts Jr., Mr. Bush's choice for the Supreme Court. And it offered what many Democrats described as a vivid, if slightly disconcerting, insight into the complicated and increasingly transactional relationship between the Bush and Clinton families."

Bush 41 Says Some Criticism Of Bush 43 Has Been "Grossly Unfair." Former President George Bush was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (9/5) about criticism of the Federal response. Bush said, "I think any time there's a crisis people want to blame someone. I've never been much for the Monday morning quarterbacking and to be very candid. I think some of the criticism had been grossly unfair, particularly when they suggest the president doesn't care and all of that. You have to understand that people that are hurting are going to criticize. I thought President Clinton put it pretty well today when he said, 'Let's get on with it and then there will be plenty of time to assign blame.'" Bush added, "Certainly I'm not satisfied but I'm just talking about the blame game and there was one particularly vicious comment that the president didn't care, was insensitive on ethnicity. Insensitive about race. Now that one hurt because I know this president and I know he does care and you know what can he do? He can just go out and do what he's doing today, showing that the federal government is involved, has been involved, will continue to be involved."

Chertoff Appoints Coast Guard Admiral To Run Recovery Efforts In New Orleans. USA Today (9/6, Hall) reports, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, who flew to the gulf region over the weekend to take control of the relief effort, appointed Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad Allen on Monday to run recovery efforts in New Orleans. Chertoff will fly back to Washington for one day today to meet with members of President Bush's Cabinet and members of Congress."

US May Look To Foreign Countries For Ideas On How To Protect New Orleans. The New York Times (9/6, Broad) reports that following a 1953 flood that killed nearly 2,000 people, the Dutch, "at a cost of some $8 billion over a quarter century,...erected a futuristic system of coastal defenses that is admired around the world today as one of the best barriers against the sea's fury - one that could withstand the kind of storm that happens only once in 10,000 years. The Dutch case is one of many in which low-lying cities and countries with long histories of flooding have turned science, technology and raw determination into ways of forestalling disaster." In the United States, experts say such projects "are worth studying for inspiration about how to rebuild New Orleans once the deadly waters of Hurricane Katrina recede into history."

Expert Questions Sense Of Rebuilding. Klaus Jacob, geophysicist and adjunct professor at Columbia University's School of International and Public Affairs, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (9/6, A25) asks, "should we rebuild New Orleans, 10 feet below sea level, just so it can be wiped out again? Some say we can raise and strengthen the levees to fully protect the city. Here is some unpleasant truth: The higher the defenses, the deeper the floods that will inevitably follow." Jacob adds, "This is not a natural disaster. It is a social, political, human and -- to a lesser degree -- engineering disaster."

Breached Levees Repaired In New Orleans, Pumping Begins. USA Today (9/6, O'Driscoll) reports, "There were signs of progress amid the devastation. Repairs were completed on two flood walls that broke last week and allowed floodwaters to gush into New Orleans. Water levels had dropped 1 foot after a day of pumping. Electricity had been restored to some areas." The Washington Times/AP (9/6, Simpson) adds "officials warned that it might take weeks to pump floodwaters from the city."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A19, Carrns, Hudson, Searcey) reports, "Officials with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which is in charge of repairing the levees, are balking at putting a firm time frame -- or price tag -- on the drainage effort, saying the situation is dynamic and too many variables remain. Over the weekend, portable pumps began arriving to supplement the city's existing network of permanent pumping stations, known as some of the most powerful in the world. An official with the Corps of Engineers' Mississippi Valley division said at a briefing Sunday in Baton Rouge that it could take between one to three months to drain the water, after all the pumps are operational." The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Roig-Franzia) reports, "There are entire swaths of New Orleans where no one can go without a boat, or hip waders. … But a few go anyway, searching for stranded pets or stranded neighbors, or both. The city -- the worst parts, at least, the deeply flooded east -- is best approached by water.

DOJ_NMG_0002473

Meanwhile, the CBS Evening News (9/5, lead story, 3:50, Schieffer) reported that a "week after Hurricane Katrina, the water level in these neighborhoods has only gone down about a foot. Getting it all out will take more than a month, yet amazingly, many of these people don't want to leave." It's "the sort of urban survival the city's police chief just can't understand." Downtown, "security is still the main focus. The city is an armed camp."

Army Corps Of Engineers Fills Levee Breach. The Army Corps of Engineers yesterday said there was significant progress in sealing the breach of one of the levees that collapsed in the aftermath of Katrina. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Woodruff) reported, "Today, the Army Corps of Engineer said they had filled one of the holes in the city's levees. Work continued to try and fill the other gaps and get the pumps started. Officials say it could take as long as six months to drain the water from the city." NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 3, 1:55, Williams) reported, "There was this piece of good news today with the help of the Army Corps Of engineers: The 17th Street Canal has been repaired. It was the breach there that sent a sea of water from Pontchartrain into downtown New Orleans and beyond. That fix is just a start."

However, residents of the lower Ninth Ward, which was flooded when the levee broke, believe the city may have purposely broken it. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 2, 2:30, Woodruff) reported, "One thing people in the city are talking about is why so many neighborhoods were spared, while so many others were nearly completely destroyed. Today, we got into a neighborhood around the industrial canal, where there was a major breach in the levee system. It's the place where thousands of the city's poorest residents live. And where thousands of them may have died." ABC (Muir) added, "14,000 people lived" in New Orleans' lower Ninth Ward, "and authorities expect the death toll will be great." People "are so bitter, so disenfranchised in this neighborhood, they actually think the city did it, blowing up the levee to save richer neighborhoods like the French Quarter."

Suburban Parish Allows Residents To Return To Homes Temporarily. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Barry, Gold, Zucchino) reports, "Between 20,000 and 30,000 evacuees from suburban Jefferson Parish, just outside New Orleans, returned to their homes at dawn today, taking advantage of an offer by parish officials to stay for four days. Thousands came supplied with coolers crammed with food and water to sustain them until parish sheriff's deputies force everyone to leave again Thursday. … The residents' return came as parish officials were condemning the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other national and state relief organizations for failing to offer assistance. On Monday, a week after the hurricane, the parish still had not received outside aid, officials said." The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Zucchino) adds, "The parish's temporary return offer, which was criticized by some parish officials as too dangerous, began at 6 a.m. sharp, when police removed cruisers that had blocked a four-lane highway at the western edge of the parish."

USA Today (9/6, O'Driscoll) reports, "Dubbed 'residents-in-exile' by parish council president Aaron Broussard, they won't be allowed home again until power, water and other key services are restored. That could take weeks. … Most who endured several miles of bumper-to-bumper traffic to get into Jefferson Parish early Monday found that neighborhoods were wind-blown and shredded but dry or only damp; the high waters have receded." NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 2, 2:10, Williams) reported, "It has now been a week since Katrina slammed into the Gulf Coast and today, some who got out were allowed to get back in to see what the storm has done and to salvage whatever may be left there. The line of cars was miles long as the folks of hard-hit Jefferson Parish, west of New Orleans, went back to what they used to call home."

Other Areas Remain Devastated. The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 3, 0:30, Roberts) reported, "We've got a camera down into Plaquemines Parish over the weekend, which is very much further south of here. And down there, the devastation is just almost complete, and city officials are coping with absolutely no resources from the Federal Government."

Some Gulf Oil Rigs Back On Line. USA Today (9/6, Davidson) reports, "Gulf Coast oil production rigs and refineries shuttered by Hurricane Katrina began to ease their way back into operation over the holiday weekend in moves expected to help relieve U.S. price run-ups and fears of shortages. Yet facilities generating 70% of the oil and more than half of the natural gas in the Gulf of Mexico remain closed down, the U.S. Minerals Management Service said.

DOJ_NMG_0002474

And though several Gulf Coast refineries restarted or were poised to do so this week, four others that account for more than 5% of U.S. capacity were expected to remain shut for weeks or months."

Electricity Restored To Some Parts Of New Orleans. The New York Times (9/6, Feder) reports that Entergy, the power company for New Orleans "has restored energy to "half of [its] affected customers by Monday evening, mainly in places well away from New Orleans. And even in New Orleans itself, the company had restored some power by nightfall Monday, including to the Convention Center, the warehouse district and the docks where cruise ships tie up. Electricity was also flowing to some parts of the French Quarter, Harrah's Casino and a few hotels near Canal Street. Entergy sent its first work crews into the city on Sunday to see how much could be restored using equipment that had not been flooded and the underground part of the network, made to withstand flooding."

Official Says Superdome Will Have To Be Torn Down. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 9, 3:15, Koppel) reported, "The Superdome still stands. But according to an executive of the company that manages the facility, it will have to be torn down and rebuilt." Superdome official Walter Reuther: "The roof has been peeled back. It's still under water, as of right now." Koppel: "So, you're going to have to get a whole, new sports stadium in here?" Reuther: "Yes, I think so." Koppel: "The old French Quarter, still standing, still charming. But the hospitality industry that is the lifeblood of New Orleans, that is still months, if not years away, from welcoming any tourists back here."

New Orleans Residents Were Surprised By Gradual Flooding. The USA Today (9/6, O'Driscoll) reports, "The fall of New Orleans was a catastrophe with an added cruelty: hours of false hope, when it seemed the city had been spared the worst, not doomed to a sodden grave. By noon last Monday, people thought the crisis had passed; by noon the next day, they knew it had just begun. In between came that moment of exquisite horror when each person still in the city grasped that destruction would come not by great wind or mighty wave, but by water rising inch by inch."

Chertoff Notes "Tremendous" Challenge Of Moving New Orleans Residents. The Financial Times (9/6, Chaffin, McNulty, Roberts) reports, "It is becoming clear that the next phase of the tragedy may involve an exodus of people unparalleled in modern American history. 'We are basically moving the city of New Orleans to other parts of the country,' said Michael Chertoff, secretary of homeland security. 'This is a tremendous medium-term and long-term challenge.'" The Times adds, "Authorities are also scouring military bases, sports stadiums, hotels and other facilities for lodging. As well as placing huge strain on state and federal resources, the disaster presents politicians with the sensitive question of how much rebuilding will take place in New Orleans and the surrounding areas."

More Than One Million Gulf Coast Residents May Be Homeless For Months. The Washington Post (9/6, A18, Kaufman) reports, "more than 1 million people who will be out of their Gulf Coast homes for months to come." Texas Gov. Rick Perry "declared that his state was full and could take no more. Electronic highway signs in Houston directed bus drivers with evacuees to Fort Chaffee, Ark., but that facility quickly filled up as 9,000 people arrived within 16 hours Saturday. Arkansas officials asked for the signs to be removed. With shelter space in the deep South filling up, the Federal Emergency Management Agency yesterday began to airlift storm survivors to states as far away as Michigan, Utah and California. … In all, FEMA officials said, more than a quarter million people are living in shelters set up by the American Red Cross, the National Guard, local churches and municipal officials in cities from Albuquerque to Memphis."

The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 2, 2:15, Roberts) reported Baton Rouge is "struggling to cope" with refugees from New Orleans. CBS (Strassmann) added, "Evacuees have doubled this city's population, overwhelming every city shelter, every church or charity, every hospital."

ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 3, :25, Woodruff) reported, "About half the people dispersed from the flood zone have been sent to Texas. But the Governor of Texas is now saying he cannot handle anymore people. And has ordered a major airlift to make the overflow of the people to other states. Arkansas has accepted 50,000. Tennessee 13,000. Tens of thousands more are scattered from Oklahoma to California. And many of the people say they have no reason to go back to New Orleans."

USA Today (9/6, Kasindorf) reports, "Federal, state and local officials are grappling with housing the homeless after a stumbling start. … What comes next for governments: Planning longer-term quarters for the most impoverished of the displaced, who may be dispersed to even more disorienting surroundings outside the Deep South." USA Today notes, "There are signs of local uneasiness, too.

DOJ_NMG_0002475

Unnerved by TV reports of looting and sniping in New Orleans, some homeowners near the Astrodome hired security guards. In Baton Rouge, the display cases for guns at the Wal-Mart in the Cortana Mall have been empty since Thursday." An employees said "buyers made a run on the weapons as evacuees began making the 80-mile trip from New Orleans. Wal-Mart stores have since stopped selling guns."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Moore) reports, "Displaced residents" of this New Orleans "especially the poorest blacks…are pondering whether they will try to return to a town…that has suffered decades of crime, corruption and grinding poverty."

FEMA Housing Elderly Victims On Docked Cruise Ships. The New York Times (9/6, Beck, Andrews) reports, "Phase 1 of the government's plan to provide desperately needed transitional housing for tens of thousands of hurricane evacuees is scheduled to begin this morning, when homeless elderly people from various Texas locations board 30 buses destined for two Carnival cruise ships in Galveston, Tex. … The two ships, each capable of holding 2,600 people, will remain docked in Galveston; another, with an occupancy of 1,800, will be in Mobile, Ala. They will be used primarily for elderly victims and people with special health problems, with families a second priority, according to James McIntyre, a FEMA spokesman."

DHS Delays Plans For DC Airlift. The Washington Post (9/6, B1, Harris, Labbe) reports, "The proposed airlift of 400 Hurricane Katrina evacuees to the D.C. Armory yesterday was temporarily delayed by federal officials who sought more time to develop a comprehensive national plan for placing victims across the country, authorities said. 'We temporarily paused some airlifts while we identified cities and states who were ready and willing to receive these evacuees,' said Russ Knocke, spokesman for the U.S. Department of Homeland Security."

Texas Struggles To Assimilate Hundreds Of Thousands Of Refugees. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Perry) reports Houston "is the ad-hoc home to more than 100,000 evacuees in shelters, motels, hotels and private homes. Officials expect many of the evacuees will not return to their former homes. The impact on Houston…has been swift. The City Council met in emergency session. Two schools closed due to declining enrollment are being reopened to enroll children from evacuee families." USA Today (9/6, Reed) reports, "In Houston, Dallas and San Antonio, sports arenas and convention centers are hosting thousands of evacuees. In Fort Worth, they are settling into convention and meeting halls, a high school athletics complex, an unfinished jail and even a nearly deserted terminal at the an old general aviation airport."

NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 9, 2:00, Williams) reported, "Tonight, one week after Katrina hit, hundreds of thousands of evacuees are finding comfort a long way from home. The ripple effect of this disaster is now sending people to shelters all over the United States. So far, the state of Texas is shouldering the biggest burden and finding it more than the state can bear." NBC (Allen) added Texas has "been willing to do its part. More than 20,000 volunteers have stepped up in Houston alone. But in just a week, the city has lost $10 million in convention business. Governor Rick Perry plans an airlift in the next few days to other states willing to help, like Arizona."

Hurricane Could Spur Business Boom In Houston. The New York Times (9/6, Romero) reports, "Perhaps no city in the United States is in a better spot than Houston to turn Katrina's tragedy into opportunity. And businesses here are already scrambling to profit in the hurricane's aftermath. Oil services companies based here are racing to carry out repairs to damaged offshore platforms in the Gulf of Mexico. … The Port of Houston is preparing for an increase in traffic as shippers divert cargoes away from the damaged ports of Pascagoula, Miss., and New Orleans. Owners of office space here are witnessing a surge in leasing as New Orleans companies, including that city's oldest bank, scramble to set up new headquarters in Houston, helping to shore up its sagging property market."

Evacuees May Put Permanent Strain On Surrounding Regions' Economies. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A1, Cordoba, Bandler, Zimmerman) reports, "The massive displacement is also creating new fault lines. Many refugees, having lost nearly everything or having had little to lose in the first place, are seeking more than shelter from the storm. They're seeking new lives, competing with locals for jobs and crowding their children into new schools. … Interviews with evacuees from New Orleans suggest that some have no intention of returning. Even a modest job in a new home may represent an improvement over what they left behind."

Arrival Of Displaced Poor Reveals Tension Within Black Community. The Washington Post (9/6, A19, Haygood) reports that Baton Rouge Mayor Melvin "Kip"

DOJ_NMG_0002476

Holden "issued a stem-winding warning that he would not tolerate 'lawlessness' from arriving Hurricane Katrina evacuees. … Many blacks here -- and those arriving from New Orleans -- were suddenly wondering whether this city was about to turn into a kind of ground zero of class warfare between blacks and blacks. Holden himself is black, which had the potency of lifting the debate above the usual black-white fault lines." According to the Post, "Holden's comments seemed to bring to the surface the reality that local resources may well be strapped; that the holding-on blacks of this community realize there is sudden competition, from other blacks, for help in escaping poverty."

About 10,000 Remain In New Orleans. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Woodruff) reported, "In New Orleans, the evacuation has become, at long last, a fairly streamlined operation. Only about 10,000 people remain in the city. Still, one week after Katrina hit here, the situation can be summed up by the headline of Louisiana's largest newspaper, which called this 'The 7th Day of Hell.' As the National Guard and relief agencies try to reclaim the city, it's abundantly clear that one of the commodities needed most is leadership. With the Army now here, the change, obvious. The evacuation of New Orleans has picked up speed. Outside the once-chaotic convention center, helicopters lined up in the air -- one behind the other -- flying out hundreds of people an hour, some of them sick and injured." The city "wants everyone out. New Orleans' police chief said today there is no longer justification to stay." Deputy Police Chief Warren Riley: "There are no jobs. There is no food. There is no reason to stay. The city has simply been destroyed."

NBC Nightly News (9/5, lead story, 3:20, Seigenthaler) added, "Seven days after this storm hit, rescue workers are still trying to save lives and, in some cases, pleading with people to leave their homes. They don't call them 'diehards' for nothing. In New Orleans today, rescue workers found plenty of men and women who can wait to leave."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Gold, Zucchino, Braun) reports, "Search teams pressing to evacuate the living and find the dead after a full week under the high-water sway of Hurricane Katrina found their efforts complicated Monday by the refusal of hundreds of residents to leave the paralyzed city. … A senior New Orleans police official said Monday that some 10,000 inhabitants remained in the city, hidden inside flooded residences, apartments and housing projects, surviving on foraged scraps and food drops by the military. Searchers have been frustrated by hundreds of holdouts who have refused to leave their homes, fearing possessions will be pillaged, pets will die and their way of life will be erased."

The Dallas Morning News (9/6, Hancock) reports, "By persuasion and by force, authorities worked Monday to complete the biggest evacuation of an American city in modern times. Despite a week of flooding, hellish conditions and slim prospects that the city would be livable for months, some people still didn't want to leave. … In the Garden District, police backed by California National Guardsmen stopped pedestrians and bicyclists at a major intersection and ordered them into vans even after some protested that they would be leaving friends and family behind." The Morning News adds, "In New Orleans, the effort to impose order involved about 4,000 U.S. Army troops and Marines, National Guardsmen and law enforcement officers from across the country." Mayor Nagin "declared that the city had the authority to force residents to evacuate. He would not say if authorities were doing that, but he announced that people who refuse to leave will no longer be given drinking water."

Many Still Ignoring Evacuation Order. The Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Jonsson) reports that thousands of New Orleans residents refuse to leave the city. "Such decisions perturb emergency-response officials, who warn that public-health risks posed by the fetid floodwater may worsen, and that two months of flood conditions may await residents who insist upon staying put. A stubborn resistance to leaving, they add, will only waste time and resources of an already-overtaxed search-and-rescue operation."

New Orleans Mayor Says Up To 10,000 May Be Dead. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution/AP (9/6, Simpson) reports New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin "upticked his estimate of the probable death toll in his city from merely thousands, telling NBC's 'Today' show, 'It wouldn't be unreasonable to have 10,000.'" ABC World News Tonight (9/5, lead story, 4:20, Gibson) reported, "The emphasis is gradually changing from rescues of the stranded, to recovery of the dead. The Mayor of New Orleans says the death toll could reach 10,000." NBC Nightly News (9/5, lead story, 3:20, Williams) reported, "The news today, more like a prediction, could not be more grim: Even as an army of relief workers now descend on the area, there are fears as many as 10,000 people may be dead." ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 10, 3:20, Sawyer) interviewed New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, who said the death toll will "be significant. And it will probably shock the nation." Sawyer: "When you look around, the kind of water you have still standing, are you looking at three months to get it out? Two months to get it out?"

DOJ_NMG_0002477

The Miami Herald/Knight Ridder (9/6, Kavanaugh, Pompilio, Merzer) reports, "Ghastly new evidence of Hurricane Katrina's horror emerged Monday night when a sheriff reported the recovery of 22 bodies lashed together around a pole - a desperate, futile attempt to survive the storm. Sheriff Jack Stephens of St. Bernard Parish, just east of New Orleans, said rescuers found the bodies tied with rope and wrapped around a pole in the tiny village of Violet along the eastern bank of the Mississippi River. … And more: Biloxi Mayor A.J. Holloway said he expected the death toll in his Mississippi city to exceed that of Hurricane Camille, which killed 200 people in 1969." The CBS Evening News (9/5, lead story, 3:50, Schieffer) reported, "New Orleans tonight is a city of the dead. Nearly everyone in the city who survived the hurricane has been evacuated, but authorities are finding bodies everywhere: In attics, floating in the streets, crumpled in wheelchairs. No one really knows how many have died, but if the Mayor is right when he says 10,000, that will be more than three times the death toll on 9/11."

Small Town Hosting Mortuary For New Orleans Region Victims. The New York Times (9/6, Applebome) reports that at a warehouse in San Gabriel, LA "refrigerated trucks on Sunday began the task of bringing what is expected to be thousands of bodies to the temporary mortuary set up to process victims of Hurricane Katrina." Although Nagin claimed as many as 10,000 may be dead in New Orleans alone, "so far only 23 bodies have been brought to the mortuary, and the official death toll for Louisiana stands at 71." The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Dwyer, Fletcher) reports, "Although the storm's announced death toll was just over 200 on Monday, officials began to brace themselves and the public for a body count that could reach well into the thousands. … The bodies of those left dead in Katrina's wake were scheduled to start to arrive Monday in a massive warehouse outside Baton Rouge. Lifted from the fetid waters swamping this city, they will be transported in refrigerated trucks to the temporary morgue. A similar morgue has been set up in Mississippi."

Many Victims May Never Be Identified. The AP (9/6, Dahlberg) reports, "Most of the dead from Hurricane Katrina don't have names yet. Many will never be identified because their bodies decomposed in the floodwaters and heat before they were found. … Identifying the dead will be a daunting task, made even more desperate because many will likely be bloated and decomposed by the time they're taken away. FEMA officials said they would try to locate dental records, but urged family members to bring in photos, fingerprints or even a toothbrush or provide DNA samples."

Cholera-Like Disease Found Among New Orleans Evacuees. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Gold) reports, "Authorities said Monday that some of Hurricane Katrina's evacuees have contracted a bacterial disease that is considered a more benign cousin of cholera, but is potentially fatal in people whose immune systems have been compromised. Officials at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta said the bacterium, vibrio vulnificus, may have been picked up by people with open wounds who were forced to wade through polluted floodwaters for a long time."

HHS Providing Vaccines, Emergency Medical Supplies. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A10, McKay, Chase, Lueck) reports, "Doctors are seeing many patients with infected wounds and gastrointestinal illnesses, and worry that more are coming in the days ahead. … To prevent disease outbreaks, the federal Health and Human Services Department shipped 90,000 doses of tetanus vaccine, 22,000 doses of Hepatitis A vaccine and 36,000 doses of Hepatitis B vaccine over the weekend to states and health facilities, said HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson. The department also has provided antibiotics as well as medications for chronic illnesses such as heart disease, diabetes and anxiety. Overall, the government said it has deployed 100 tons of medications and other supplies for victims of the hurricane."

Temporary Clinics Confront Array Of Challenges. The Washington Post (9/6, A10, Connolly) reports, "Legions of doctors and nurses are frantically patching together a new medical care network to handle the swelling flow of Hurricane Katrina's victims. The extraordinary process includes the task of converting basketball arenas, an abandoned Kmart and even the New Orleans airport into working hospitals and clinics. … With an influx of patients who are predominantly poor and in poor health, the emergency medical challenges are compounded by longer-term issues of managing chronic conditions such as high blood pressure, heart disease, diabetes and mental illness."

Nearly 50,000 National Guard, DHS Personnel Involved In Relief Effort. The

DOJ_NMG_0002478

Washington Post (9/6, A1, Dwyer, Fletcher) reports, "Federal agents, troops and law enforcement officers from around the country continued to pour into New Orleans, and police officials expressed confidence the city was mostly safe from the marauding gangs that had terrorized citizens in the storm's chaotic aftermath. The rapidly growing scale of the effort was evident in the official statistics of federal personnel involved as of midday Monday: 38,000 National Guardsmen, 6,000 FEMA responders and 4,000 from the U.S. Coast Guard, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The USS Iwo Jima, an amphibious assault ship, pulled into New Orleans port Monday and will assist in aid efforts."

USA Today (9/6, Johnson, Kelley) reports, "The surge of rescues of hurricane victims slowed to a trickle Monday as emergency workers steeled themselves for the shift from joyful rescues of those who survived to the grim task of recovering the bodies of those who didn't. One Army medical evacuation unit saw their rescues ebb from 200 Thursday to one Monday."

Iraq War Veterans Among Guard Troops Patrolling New Orleans. The Washington Post (9/6, A10, Tyson) reports, "Spec. Frank Atkinson, wearing his tan desert fatigues from his recent deployment in Iraq, alternately drove a Humvee through downtown New Orleans streets littered with debris and putrid garbage and held suspected looters at gunpoint with his M-4 rifle. 'It's just so much like Iraq, it's not funny,' said Atkinson, of Woodlawn, Ark … The Arkansas contingent is among the estimated 16,000 National Guard troops from 40 states flowing into greater New Orleans to help curb the rash of crime sparked by Hurricane Katrina. An additional 24,000 guardsman and 7,200 active-duty ground troops are committed to relief efforts across the Gulf Coast. Paratroops from the 82nd Airborne Division 'locked down' the historic French Quarter on Monday, according to city and military officials. But the massive military effort remains severely disjointed and hampered by a lack of basic communication between units, Army officers here say. Ground commanders for New Orleans have been functioning without the ability to track the location of some units reporting to them -- something unheard of in Iraq, the officers say." The USA Today (9/6, Johnson) reports, "Maj. Patrick Bossetta has been to Iraq and back, but the helicopter pilot with the Louisiana National Guard still has difficulty believing that the devastation spread below him on countless rescue missions is his beloved New Orleans."

One-Third Of New Orleans Police Force Not Reporting For Duty. The New York Times (9/6, Treaster, Desantis) reports, "The last week has been a series of nonstop rescue missions, shootouts in the night and forays into foul-smelling shelters in response to gunshots and reports of rape for…the New Orleans police force. And like most everyone else in New Orleans, police officers have been traumatized by the loss of homes and family members. Morale on the police force is in tatters. About 500 officers - a third of the force and far more than previously estimated - have dropped out of the daily lineup. Some of them may still be in houses cut off by the storm or may have simply gone off to help their families and will eventually return. But most of the missing officers have either told their superiors that they were quitting or simply walked off the job. Two officers have shot themselves to death."

Recovery Efforts In Mississippi Beginning To Meet Needs. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 13, 3:05, Gibson) reported, "We have focused, mainly, tonight, on the problems of New Orleans, and the movement of evacuees. But Mississippi is not to be forgotten, for it suffered such a blow. Survivors in that state knew it would take many days for help to get to them, especially with a situation so dire in New Orleans. Still, thousands of people are sleeping outside. Cut off from the rest of the world. Waiting for food, water and medicine. Today, help began getting through." ABC (von Fremd) added, "For so many here still suffering, the calvary is no longer just on the way, it has arrived. By air, land and sea, the National Guard, FEMA and utility companies have thrown this devastated community a lifeline." Enormous "amounts of free food and water are piled high. And everyone here is welcome to help themselves. Electricity has already been restored to portions of Gulfport. And ice is literally spilling out of helicopters courtesy of the Mississippi National Guard."

Halliburton Subsidiary At Work On Navy Facilities Repairs. Kellogg, Brown & Root Services. Inc., a subsidiary of the Halliburton Co., "has begun tapping a $500 million Navy contract to do emergency repairs at Gulf Coast naval and Marine facilities damaged by Hurricane Katrina," reports the Washington Post/AP (9/5, A20, Baldor). KBR won the contract last July "to provide debris removal and other emergency work associated with natural disasters. Jan Davis, a spokeswoman for the Naval Facilities Engineering

DOJ_NMG_0002479

Command, said yesterday that KBR would receive $12 million for work at the Naval Air Station at Pascagoula, Miss., the Naval Station at Gulfport, Miss., and Stennis Space Center in Mississippi. KBR will receive $4.6 million for work at two smaller Navy facilities in New Orleans and others in the South."

Rice Defends Bush Against Charge That Katrina Response Was Racist. The AP (9/5, Jordan) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice defended President Bush on Sunday against charges that the government's sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina showed racial insensitivity. 'Nobody, especially the president, would have left people unattended on the basis of race,' the administration's highest-ranking black said as she toured damaged parts of her native Alabama." Later, during a service at the Pilgrim Rest AME Zion church outside Mobile, "Rice nodded in agreement as the Rev. Malone Smith Jr. advised the congregation, 'Wait for the Lord.'" The Washington Times (9/5) notes "it was a sort of homecoming for Miss Rice, an Alabama native and granddaughter of a Presbyterian minister." Her visit "came as some black leaders, including the Rev. Jesse Jackson, have complained bitterly about the slow response to the disaster, whose victims have been disproportionately black and poor."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (9/5, Broder) reports from Houston, "Many blacks voiced suspicions that thousands of people were left to suffer and die in the floodwaters because they were, for the most part, poor and black. … Interviews with African-American church leaders, local politicians and residents here made clear the damage that the faltering relief effort has had on their perceptions of the Bush administration." Bush "and his chief political advisers have mounted an effort to try to court more conservative black voters, particularly since the 2004 election, by encouraging black Republican candidacies and reaching out to black churches." But "their outreach efforts appear to have been significantly set back." The New York Times (9/5, Deparle) runs an additional story on the race issue, which says, "The white people got out. Most of them, anyway. If television and newspaper images can be deemed a statistical sample, it was mostly black people who were left behind. … What a shocked world saw exposed in New Orleans last week wasn't just a broken levee. It was a cleavage of race and class, at once familiar and startlingly new, laid bare in a setting where they suddenly amounted to matters of life and death."

Storm Said To Highlight Divide Between "Haves And Have Nots." The New York Times (9/5, Wilgoren) says the storm "cleaved a harsh chasm among the region's refugees, providing a stark portrait of the vast divide between America's haves and have-nots. … John Edwards, the former senator whose presidential primary campaign last year was based on the theme that America is a country torn in two by race and class, sent an e-mail to supporters last week, saying that the hurricane's destruction exposed 'a harsher example of two Americas.'"

Chertoff, Brown Criticized For Hurricane Response. All three news magazines feature Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath on their covers this week. All three state there's widespread criticism of the Federal response to the disaster. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Mulrine) sees "an almost palpable sense of anger at the sluggish and, in some places, seemingly nonexistent government response to the crisis. 'We are extremely pleased with the response of every element of the federal government' to Katrina, said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, in charge of coordinating Washington's plan. Reacting to the growing chorus of criticism the same day, Chertoff's deputy, Michael Brown, the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, fumed: 'I think everyone in the country needs to take a big collective breath.'" U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Gilgoff) adds that FEMA and the Department of Homeland Security "came under fire for their management of the rescue effort. … Jane Bullock, a former FEMA chief of staff and 22-year agency veteran, says the current federal effort demonstrates a weakened FEMA in a post-9/11 world. … There was also criticism late last week that FEMA chief Michael Brown and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff lacked long-term experience in disaster preparedness." US News also reports, "Federal officials offered a vigorous defense," but, "among those who seemed miffed was President Bush," who, "expressed frustration at the response effort, saying 'the results are not acceptable.'" US News cover package also includes reports on healthcare workers who are trying to help victims despite shortages of nearly every necessity, and the Great Mississippi Flood of 1927.

Newsweek (9/12) adds, "FEMA's current head, Michael Brown, has appeared over his head and even a little clueless in news interviews. He is far from the sort of take-charge presence New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani conveyed after 9/11."

DOJ_NMG_0002480

FEMA's Brown Under Fire. FEMA Director Michael Brown has been the focus of much criticism following his agency's response to Hurricane Katrina. NBC Nightly News (5/28, story 7, 2:40, Seigenthaler) last night ran a report critical of Brown's qualifications. NBC (Myers) added, "This was Michael Brown's biggest job before landing at FEMA, supervising judges at Arabian Horse shows. The embattled FEMA director doesn't mention in his official biography that for nine years he was commissioner of the International Arabian Horse Association. Association officials tell NBC News he resigned under pressure from that job." Brown was "brought into FEMA by his college roommate, President Bush's campaign director Joe Allbaugh. His only experiences with emergency services was in the mid 70's. He became FEMA director when Allbaugh left." John Capenhaver, former FEMA official: "His lack of experience in emergency management may have played a role." Myers: "Critics say he doesn't seem on top of the situation. The day the levees broke, he said 'I don't want to alarm anyone that New Orleans is filling up like a bowl, that isn't happening.' Then he said of those at the convention center." Brown: "The Federal Government just learned of those people today." Myers: "Tonight, Homeland Security officials defend Brown. They say he was a senior FEMA manager during 9/11 and is working day and night to save lives in the largest relief effort in American history."

The New York Times (9/5, Shane, Lipton, Drew) reports that while rescuers were still trying to reach people stranded by the floods, perhaps the only consensus among local, state and federal officials was that the system had failed." But" furious state and local officials insisted that the real problem was that the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which Mr. Chertoff's department oversees, failed to deliver urgently needed help and, through incomprehensible red tape, even thwarted others' efforts to help. 'We wanted soldiers, helicopters, food and water,' said Denise Bottcher, press secretary for Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana. 'They wanted to negotiate an organizational chart.'"

The New York Times (9/5, Applebome, Drew, Longman, Revkin) reports, "As flood waters rose on Tuesday, Senator Mary L. Landrieu tried to impress upon colleagues in Washington that this was America's tsunami, but she said that the more she pleaded, the more she felt she was not being heard. … 'I have been with Michael Brown since the minute he landed in this center,' Ms. Landrieu said Friday in Baton Rouge, referring to the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, 'and I have been telling him from the moment he arrived about the urgency of the situation.' But, she said, 'I just have to tell you that he had a difficult time understanding the enormity of the task before us.' … By Wednesday, with little visible response from the federal government, Ms. Landrieu said that she talked to FEMA officials. 'I started to sense they were thinking I was a little overwrought, that maybe I was exaggerating a little bit,' she said. When she pressed Mr. Brown on when he was going to finally get buses to pick up the people who had been trapped at the Superdome, 'he just mumbled,' she said. Mayor Nagin said that he could not remember whether he spoke to President Bush on Wednesday or Thursday, but that the president acknowledged the federal government could have done more and promised to fix the situation."

Some Calling For Chertoff To "Get The Ax." Meanwhile, U.S. News and World Report (9/5, 9/12) reports that some in Washington are "calling for Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to get the ax. Administration officials, however, said that firing Chertoff would not be smart in the midst of the Katrina disaster."

Blame For Hurricane Response Placed On Officials At All Levels. Time (9/12, Gibbs) says Katrina shattered "a hope that four years after the greatest man-made disaster in our history, we had got smarter about catastrophe, more nimble and visionary in our ability to respond. Is it really possible, after so many commissions and commitments, bureaucracies scrambled and rewired, emergency supplies stockpiled and prepositioned, that when a disaster strikes, the whole newfangled system just seizes up and can't move?" Time adds that "the treatment of the living, black and poor and old and sick, was a disgrace." An "angry debate opened about how much the demands of the Iraq war, on both the budget and the National Guard, were eating into the country's ability to protect itself at home. Louisiana Republican Congressman Jim McCrery…argues that Katrina revealed how much doesn't work." Time (9/12, Ripley) adds that while deconstructing Katrina will take years, "it is already clear that the blame can be well distributed, from the White House to emergency-management officials at federal, state and local levels, all the way down to the cops who abandoned their posts in New Orleans. … New Orleans officials were supremely unprepared; that was never a secret among people in the disaster business. Meanwhile, throughout the state and Federal governments, much money and willpower had shifted to fighting terrorism, a major risk and vital effort but much less of a sure thing than natural disasters. Because of tax cuts and budget pressures at all levels, many emergency-response capabilities…have slipped. If Hurricane Katrina turns out to be the biggest disaster in U.S. history to date, it will also be the least surprising." Time notes, "On Friday, hours after even the President had shifted to calling the government's response 'not acceptable,' the No. 2 at FEMA sounded as though he had been monitoring a different hurricane. 'I am actually very impressed with the mobilization of man and machine to help our friends in this unfortunate area,' Patrick Rhode told TIME. 'I think it's one of the most impressive search-and-rescue operations this country has ever conducted domestically.'"

DOJ_NMG_0002481

GOP Worries Hurricane Response Could Hurt Them In 2006. U.S. News and World Report (9/12a) reports in its "White House Week" column that several GOP strategists "worried that the slow federal response would seriously hurt the party in 2006."

Hurricane's Greatest Economic Impact Could Be On Auto Industry. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Lavelle) says Katrina's "biggest economic impact could be on the form of transportation most Americans know best--the auto. General Motors…has been banking heavily o n a brand-new series of big utility vehicles, due next year, to help reverse a financial nose dive. But $3 gas…could end America's love affair with big haulers."

German Official Says Hurricane Was Result Of Global Warming. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Hayden, Barnett) reports that Germany's environment minister, Jurgen Trittin, "suggested that the hurricane's severity was at least partly a result of global warming and charged that 'the American president is closing his eyes to the economic and human costs' of refusing to sign the Kyoto Protocol, which seeks to limit production of climate-warming greenhouse gases." While there have been "more Atlantic hurricanes recently," most scientists "agree that the increased frequency is caused by a natural cycle, not global warming. … Still, there is growing evidence that global warming is making the storms stronger and wetter."

SEC Extends Filing Deadline In Storm Zone.

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Solomon, Hughes) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission will extend filing deadlines and suspend requirements to deliver documents to areas affected by Hurricane Katrina." Meanwhile, "the agency warned that it is 'on the lookout for Katrina-related securities scams' and vowed to vigorously prosecute those who try to defraud hurricane victims."

Blair Sends Foreign Service Officers To US As International Aid Continues Flow.

USA Today (9/6, Soriano) reports, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair, assailed for doing too little to help Britons caught in Hurricane Katrina, apologized Monday and sent foreign service officers to aid survivors." USA Today notes, "News of the disaster has dominated British and continental European media since Katrina struck last week." The Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Ford) adds, "Governments around the world rushed aid and relief teams to America's stricken southern states on Monday - some repaying past favors the United States has offered them to recover from natural disasters - while their citizens continued to express amazement and dismay at the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. In a dramatic reversal of usual roles, small nations such as Sri Lanka - badly hit by last December's tsunami - have extended their hands to the most powerful country on earth. And after initial ambivalence, American officials were accepting offers of help from over 50 countries with thanks."

Nuland Offers Thanks NATO For Support. Reuters (9/6) reports Victoria Nuland, the U.S. ambassador to NATO "thanked European allies on Monday for generous pledges of support in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, which has devastated New Orleans and U.S. Gulf Coast states."

Afghanistan To Give $100,000 For Hurricane Relief. The Washington Times (9/6, Harper) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Impoverished Afghanistan will give $100,000 for Katrina relief efforts, the U.S. Embassy has announced. U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann thanked the Afghan people Sunday during a ceremony at which the aid was pledged by the government on behalf of the people of Afghanistan."

DC Fundraisers Planned To Aid Hurricane Victims. Roll Call (9/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that "fundraisers galore have been planned all over town, mostly to benefit the Red Cross and all, of course, promising libations and entertainment for the recess weary. The biggie of the Big Easy parties is Wednesday night at the lobbying firm Jones Day, a joint fundraiser by the Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Florida state societies. The folk-funky group Down Dexter is opening for the popular Wil Gravatt Band. Organizers were hoping to convince former Louisiana Sen. John Breaux (D) to serve as VIP emcee for the event. Reps. Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.), Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and Charlie Melancon (D-La.) were among those who had RSVP'd as of Friday afternoon. Admission prices come in three ranges: $20, $1,000 and $2,000 per person. The party's fundraising goal is $50,000, all of which will go to the American Red Cross Disaster Relief Fund for victims of Hurricane Katrina. For the non-lushes who want to help disaster victims — or for those who can at least burn the candle at both ends — there will be a Gulf Coast Relief Run on Sept. 17 in Old Town Alexandria. The 5K race is being sponsored by Roll Call, the Great Harvest Bread Company and Mizuno USA. … The cost to enter the race is $25, which includes a T-shirt. Again, all proceeds will go toward the Red Cross relief fund."

DOJ_NMG_0002482

Hurricane Creates Unique Problems For Non-Citizens. The New York Times (9/6, Urbina) reports, "Hurricane Katrina has left its victims feeling vulnerable and uncertain, but for many noncitizens trapped here, the anxiety is especially acute because they worry that they will jeopardize their legal status if they try to leave." Meanwhile, "The Mexican government has opened two mobile consulates in the affected areas, one in Mobile, Ala., and the other in Baton Rouge, La., to begin looking for tens of thousands of their citizens reported missing. The authorities in Mexico estimated that 145,000 Mexicans live in the area."

Insurance Premiums Expected To Rise Along Gulf Coast. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, D2, Francis) reports that with total economic losses expected to exceed $100 billion, Katrina could be "the costliest US storm on record." With that, "Home and car owners in the Gulf Coast states can expect to see substantial increases in their insurance premiums in coming months, while rate rises could spread more broadly if insurance-company losses from Hurricane Katrina continue to climb."

Bush Nominates Roberts To Be Chief Justice. President Bush yesterday renominated Judge John Roberts to be chief justice of the United States. Media consensus is that Roberts will be able to gain Senate approval with relative ease. Bush's move is being portrayed as a quick way to fill the post vacated by the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist.

Last night, ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 6, 2:45, Moran) reported, "Roberts looks to be a pretty safe choice. And Mr. Bush needs that badly now. This morning in the Oval Office, President Bush said the man he'd already nominated to the Supreme Court was ready to serve as its leader." President Bush: "Both those who've worked with him and those who have faced him in the courtroom speak with admiration of his striking ability as a lawyer and his natural gifts as a leader." Moran: "The President also made clear he believes Judge Roberts can be quickly confirmed by the Senate." The "first reactions from Senate Democrats to Mr. Bush's move were cautious."

The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 5, 1:45, Andrews) reported, "This nomination to chief justice for Judge Roberts gives the President tremendous advantages" because "no serious political opposition has been raised" to his nomination. And so "the President and most Republicans believe he can be confirmed as chief justice relatively quickly in time for the court. It gives the President the justice he wants in the job that he wants when he wants him."

On the NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 6, 0:45, Brown), Washington bureau chief and moderator of 'Meet the Press,' Tim Russert said, "They will be robust hearings, but everyone I spoken to, Democrats and Republicans, believe Judge Roberts will be confirmed." Likewise, the Washington Post (9/6, A1, Baker) says that after Bush's announcement, "there was no indication" that Roberts' nomination "faces any significant threat."

The most contentious issue after Bush's announcement was the timing of the confirmation hearings. A Reuters (9/6, Ferraro) dispatch says "a congressional aide said the hearing would start next Monday." However, says USA Today (9/6, Kiely), "some liberal Democrats are arguing for a delay to let senators and the public better assess the impact that filling two vacancies will have on the nation's highest court." Sen. Edward Kennedy "said the Senate should postpone a decision on whether Roberts replaces the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist until President Bush announces how he plans to fill the other court vacancy."

Kennedy, says the Washington Times (9/6, Hurt), has called on "a highly trusted private lawyer" whom he used in the 1994 election battle against now Gov. Matt Romney "to dig up dirt on his opponent." James Flug "has rejoined Mr. Kennedy's staff and will advise him during the Supreme Court confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. 'Jim Flug is the 8,000-pound gorilla who will be driving this thing,' said Makan Delrahim, former Judiciary Committee staff director for Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican." Flug "isn't the only operative brought back for Supreme Court vacancy fights. Michael O'Neill, former nominations counsel to Mr. Hatch, was hired earlier this year to be chief counsel to Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania."

DOJ_NMG_0002483

The Washington Post (9/6, C1, Leibovich) notes Roberts "would be the youngest chief justice since John Marshall, who was 45 when he was sworn in 204 years ago. Fifty is Young Turk territory among Supreme Court justices, if not for the rest of us. Among chief justices, 50 is a Turk in diapers." Confirmation would fix "Roberts as a seminal figure in the annals of whiz kids."

Reuters (9/6, Vicini) reports Roberts "may succeed the late legal giant, who was one of his earliest conservative mentors. A generation ago, Roberts served as a young law clerk to Rehnquist, helping the then associate justice research and write court opinions." NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 5, 1:55, P. Williams) also reported it was "a bittersweet moment for Roberts, a Rehnquist friend and former law clerk." Judge Roberts: "If I am confirmed, I would succeed a man I deeply respect and admire, a man who has been very kind to me for 25 years." Pete Williams: "His hearings, scheduled to start tomorrow, have now been delayed a week at most in deference to the Rehnquist funeral services. While some liberal groups today said a nomination to chief justice should subject Roberts to even greater scrutiny, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee would not go that far." Sen. Patrick Leahy (D) Vermont: "I think you still ask the same basic question. Will this person protect your rights, my rights and everybody else's rights?"

The Legal Times (9/5, Mauro) reports, "The death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist late on Saturday ends his historic 33-year career on the Supreme Court and presents President George W. Bush with a rare challenge to fill a new vacancy just as John Roberts Jr., his nominee to Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Court, was about to face Senate hearings." The Times continues, "Bush answered part of that challenge swiftly, nominating Roberts on Monday to replace Rehnquist as chief justice. In an early morning announcement from the Oval Office, the president said he hoped the Senate would confirm Roberts before the Court sits for its next term Oct. 3." The Times adds, "The Senate is expected to begin Roberts' confirmation hearings as chief justice either Thursday or next Monday. The opening of his previously scheduled confirmation hearings, for the position of associate justice, initially was to be Tuesday, but that was canceled until after Rehnquist's funeral on Wednesday."

The New York Times (9/6, Greenhouse) also analyzes Roberts' experience as Rehnquist's clerk, at time when he "learned how not to be chief justice." Now "he will, if the Senate confirms him, have the rare chance to put those lessons into practice."

Some stories this morning note the similarities in both men's judicial philosophies. The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Lane) runs a story titled "Roberts Was Influenced By Critics Of The Warren Court," in which it says Roberts "has consistently espoused a clear view of federal judicial intervention: Less is more. This same principle was held dear by the man Roberts served as a Supreme Court clerk, the late William H. Rehnquist."

The Washington Times (9/6, Taylor) says "Ted Cruz, who clerked for Chief Justice Rehnquist during the mid-1990s, recalled that he and fellow clerks once asked their boss whom he considered to be the most superior Supreme Court litigator. 'He chuckled a little and said with a smile that he thought he could probably get the majority of his colleagues to agree that John Roberts was the best Supreme Court lawyer in the country,' said Mr. Cruz, now solicitor general of Texas."

The Washington Post (9/6, A4, Jackman) reports, "The flag-draped coffin of Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist will be carried up the long marble stairs to the Supreme Court's main entrance this morning as two days of memorial observances begin. After a brief prayer service at the court at 10 a.m., the public may pay respects to the chief justice as his body lies in repose at the court from 10:30 a.m. to 10 p.m. today and from 10 a.m. to noon tomorrow." Ceremonies "will conclude with the chief justice's burial at Arlington National Cemetery tomorrow afternoon, which will be private. Rehnquist, 80, died of thyroid cancer Saturday at his home in Arlington."

As Many As 25 Democrats May Vote To Confirm Roberts. The Capitol Hill newspaper The Hill (9/6, Schor) reports, "Members of the Senate Democrats' K Street inner circle are predicting that as many as 25 Democrats will vote to confirm John Roberts as chief justice of the United States. Several attendees of the Monday Group, as Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's (D-Nev.) biweekly lobbyist meetings are known, said the Democrats could suffer politically if their Roberts strategy misfires. … 'It's not a good thing for Democrats to be dragged into a visible, high-profile battle on him for weeks when Congress ought to be dealing with issues the public really cares about,' one key Democratic lobbyist said. 'That's the biggest danger for Democrats, if they get sucked into something like that because of the ideological left.'"

DOJ_NMG_0002484

Democrats Plan To "Rough Up" Roberts During Hearings. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Halloran) reports that Supreme Court Nominee John Roberts will likely win support from the Senate Judiciary Committee, but "the hearings may still have their share of drama. Will the nominee get any Democrats' votes? How will Democrats position themselves, especially those with an eye on congressional and presidential elections to come?" US News adds, "The down-and-dirty fight everyone expected over the first appointment to the high court in 11 years simply hasn't happened." U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Schulte) adds that Democrats on the panel "intend to rough him up a bit."

Newsweek (9/12) says in its "Periscope" column that Roberts "will confront 18 senators eager to score political points and rack up minutes on the cable news channels. While the senators will try to press Roberts for specifics on controversial topics like civil rights, abortion and congressional authority, Roberts will attempt to keep his answers as general as possible without seeming to stonewall. … Senators want to pin down Roberts's judicial philosophy, but they know the direct approach may not work." Committee Chairman Arlen Specter "says he plans to press Roberts on whether Roe…is a 'superprecedent' not to be tampered with. A source close to the prep who requested anonymity to speak more freely about the process says Roberts will likely follow the lead of Clarence Thomas, who confirmed a constitutional right to privacy encompassing contraception but steered clear of specifics on abortion in his hearings."

Colleagues Say Roberts' SG Role Not So Ideological. The Legal Times (9/5, Mauro) reports, "After weeks of document dumps and media scrutiny of John Roberts Jr.'s copious writings, the Supreme Court nominee goes before the Senate Judiciary Committee this week with one important part of his professional life still a mystery." The Times continues, "Roberts' three years and three months as principal deputy solicitor general (the so-called political deputy), from 1989 to 1993, produced easily as much paper as his earlier jobs in government. But except for briefs filed with the Supreme Court, all of it—including memorandums on cases—remains sealed, to the chagrin of Democrats and groups that oppose his nomination." The Times adds, "That part of Roberts' life is likely to provoke questioning from Senate Democrats who are intent on seeing if the conservative views he expressed as a young Reagan White House aide burned as brightly in his psyche a decade later. 'The SG materials may be the only real source that reflects his own mature personal thinking,' said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) in an Aug. 10 statement. … Adds Nan Aron, president of Alliance for Justice, 'At this point, the American people know next to nothing about the legal views Judge Roberts expressed during the most important, most influential period of his career as a lawyer.' The group announced its opposition to Roberts last week. … So far, the only formal White House response has been to release a list of the Supreme Court cases Roberts handled— among them, 717 case recommendations, 77 briefs on the merits, and 31 petitions for certiorari. But the Bush administration won't release the texts, holding to the position taken during Miguel Estrada's bid for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit in 2002: that releasing the memos he wrote in the SG's office would chill much-needed candor. … Beyond the posturing and politics of the dispute, however, some question how valuable the documents would be, asserting that the tussle results from a gross misunderstanding of the job Roberts held under Solicitor General Kenneth Starr during the first Bush administration."

Judiciary Committee Ready For Nomination Star Turn. The Legal Times (9/5, Goldman) reports, "This week's Supreme Court confirmation hearings promise to be as theatrical as Congress gets. But the telegenic John Roberts Jr. will, in some respects, be a supporting actor, sharing the stage with 18 senators who view the hearings as their own star vehicle." The Times continues, "More than simply trying to pin down the elusive Roberts on his jurisprudence, the Senate Judiciary Committee's 10 Republicans and eight Democrats will be putting their own ambitions and agendas on display." The Times adds, "Rival Democrats will be trying to electrify their party base by showing who can be the toughest on the nominee, while Republicans will be seeking to burnish their own national credentials, competing to place Roberts' more controversial statements in the most benign light. … It is a committee of extremes — both liberal and conservative — and, even by Senate standards, of powerful egos. Six members have either run for president or are contemplating a bid (or in Delaware Democrat Joseph Biden Jr.'s case, another bid) in the 2008 election. … And there's another dynamic at play: A Supreme Court confirmation gives Congress a rare chance to tell the Court what it thinks about its co-equal branch."

DOJ_NMG_0002485

Specter Profiled. U.S. News and World Report (9/12, Samuel) profiles Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, reporting, "It is hard to know what to expect from Arlen Specter. Which is why it will be so fascinating to watch him this week as he chairs the Judiciary Committee's hearings on Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts."

White House Says Bush Always Had Roberts In Mind For Chief Justice. The Washington Post (9/6, A1, Baker) reports that after Bush's announcement, "there was no indication" that Roberts' nomination "faces any significant threat." Bush, adds the Post, "always had Roberts in mind for the next chief justice, aides said yesterday." Roberts "was first secretly interviewed for a Supreme Court slot in April in anticipation that the cancer-stricken Rehnquist would retire or die. When O'Connor surprised the White House by announcing her retirement in July and Rehnquist declared that he was not stepping down, Bush decided to appoint Roberts to O'Connor's seat. Even then, aides said yesterday that the president intended to elevate Roberts to chief justice whenever the job came open. 'This had been something in the back of the president's mind in case such a scenario came into being, if the chief justice had retired,' said White House press secretary Scott McClellan. 'The president, when he met with [Roberts], knew he was a natural-born leader.'"

Columnist E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (9/6, A25), "Why did President Bush pull such a quick switch yesterday and name Judge John Roberts to be chief justice of the United States? There are several theories, but here's the most sensible: Bush had always planned to make Roberts chief someday. … Roberts's combination of a conciliatory personality with firmly conservative convictions made him the perfect choice to lead the judicial revolution Bush would like to unleash. Successful chief justices need to be good politicians, and Roberts's political gifts were much in evidence this summer as he seemed to be charming his way toward relatively easy Senate approval."

Motivation Behind Bush's "Safe" Choice Examined. Some reports in today's newspapers attribute Bush's choice of Roberts, a "safe" candidate, to what they saw as his weakened political standing. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Cummings, Bravin), for example, reports this morning, "At a time of increasing political weakness, President Bush tapped John Roberts as his nominee for chief justice, choosing to avoid -- or at least delay -- a fresh ideological battle over the Supreme Court." The New York Times (9/6, Stevenson) also says that with his choice, Bush "avoided the fiery ideological fight that would have been ignited had he chosen to elevate Justice Antonin Scalia, a favorite of many conservatives, or turned to a sitting federal judge with a clearer and more extensive conservative record of opinions on social issues than Judge Roberts has." The theme was echoed by Democratic Sen. Charles E. Schumer, who "said there were signs that Mr. Bush was pulling his ideological punches because of political weakness. 'If he had been in a stronger position, he would have nominated Scalia as chief justice,' Mr. Schumer said."

Likewise, the Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Richey, Chaddock) says "Bush is seeking to avoid a Senate showdown," while the AP (9/6, Fournier) added "Bush chose the path of least resistance," acting "with unusual haste as the war in Iraq and Hurricane Katrina sap his political strength." Roberts "was the safest choice Bush could make."

In an analysis piece, USA Today (9/6, Biskupic) says "a key question in the coming weeks will be whether the White House…now has the appetite for a knock-down, drag-out fight over a Supreme Court nomination."

Comparing Roberts to Scalia, the Washington Post (9/6, A3, Lane) says Bush's nominee is "not only younger" but "also mellower." He is also known "for his astute political judgments in the Reagan administration and his cordial personal relations with many liberal attorneys."

Focus Turns To O'Connor Replacement. With Bush's decision to nominate Judge Roberts to be chief justice, attention quickly focused on who the President will nominate to replace Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. The Financial Times (9/6, Waldmeir) reports this morning Bush said "he would choose a nominee 'in a timely fashion', and a White House spokesman said he called Justice O'Connor from Air Force One to discuss the decision." The Washington Post (9/6, A6, Becker) adds that "with conservatives and liberals alike saying that Roberts is on track to be confirmed, the focus was already shifting to what both sides believe will be the real battle: Bush's yet-to-be-named pick to replace…O'Connor." O'Connor's seat "is critical because she often provided a swing vote on such controversial issues as affirmative action, abortion and prayer in public places."

DOJ_NMG_0002486

USA Today (9/6, Memmott) reports "a relatively quiet debate among interest groups is expected to become the more bitter, multimillion-dollar slugfest opposing sides have long anticipated. 'Watch for World War III,' conservative lawyer John Hinderaker wrote Monday on Power Line, his widely read Web log, or blog." Interest groups "plan to ramp up their rhetoric, TV ad campaigns and grass-roots lobbying even though Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death may not fundamentally change the court."

The CBS Evening News (9/5, story 5, 1:45, Andrews) reported, "The guessing is that the Democrats believe the President, because he's in trouble over Katrina, will be under pressure to name a centrist. Conservatives will push hard for a hard-line conservative." The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Savage, Weinstein) says that if the President chooses Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales or Judge Edith Brown Clement "from the federal appellate court in New Orleans, the change may not tip the balance of the court to the right. Both are seen as moderate conservatives, somewhat akin to O'Connor." But Bush "could select a nominee with more conservative credentials, such as Judges J. Michael Luttig and J. Harvie Wilkinson of Virginia, Edith H. Jones of Texas or Janice Rogers Brown, the former California Supreme Court justice who was confirmed this summer to the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington. Any of those nominations would set off a political battle in the Senate." Bush also could turn to Judges Emilio Garza or Priscilla R. Owen, "both Texas conservatives, or to Larry D. Thompson, a former deputy attorney general who is highly regarded by Bush insiders and now serves as general counsel to Pepsico."

ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 6, 2:45, Moran) reported, "As he considers his options this time, Mr. Bush faces new political considerations." Former White House counsel Brad Berenson: "There's even more pressure now than there was back in July to pick a woman or a minority, for the simple reason this is the President's second at-bat and he chose a white man the first time around."

NBC Nightly News (9/5, story 5, 1:55, P. Williams) reported, "In announcing her plans in July, O'Connor said she'd stay on the court until her successor is confirmed. But with her replacement likely to come soon after the term starts, O'Connor's return would be largely symbolic." Fox News' Special Report (9/5) said the White House "expects that Sandra Day O'Connor will be on the Supreme Court when it starts the fall section in October and want Robbers in the chief chair. If there is a delay, the most senior judge would have to fill in. He is 30-year court veteran and liberal justice, John Paul Stevens."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Cummings, Bravin) says that "pleasing" the GOP conservative base "would risk alienating moderate voters already cooling to Republicans ahead of the 2006 mid-term elections. … Nodding to those sensitivities, the president could name his friend from Texas, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, to fill the slot."

USA Today (9/6, Kiely) quotes Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid saying, "Justice O'Connor has been a voice of moderation and reason on the court and should be replaced by someone… like her."

The AP (9/6, Hunt) refers to Bush's "historic opportunity to reshape the Supreme Court," while the Dallas Morning News (9/6, Jackson) adds "the eventual nominee, and perhaps Judge Roberts, may be more vulnerable to opposition because of Mr. Bush's weakened political state, analysts said, citing the Iraq war and criticism of the federal response to Hurricane Katrina."

The Washington Times (9/6, Sammon) also says "O'Connor, who had not seen Mr. Bush's televised announcement minutes earlier, reaffirmed her willingness to remain on the court until a successor is nominated and confirmed, said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino." Bush "is not expected to nominate another justice until Judge Roberts is confirmed."

Knight Ridder (9/6) adds O'Connor "may be expected to return to the bench while confirmation proceedings take place." But "that raises further complications: She can't hear cases in October or November and then have her successor vote on them when they're decided in January or later." The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Savage) makes the same point in a story headlined "O'Connor's Staying On Might Tie Up The Court."

Professor Says Ethics Questions About Roberts Are Unfounded. In a piece based on an ethics opinion he wrote at the request of Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Ronald D. Rotunda, a law professor at George Mason University, writes in the Washington Post (9/6, A25), "Does John Roberts have an ethics problem? Three ethics professors argue that Roberts, whom President Bush has just nominated to be chief justice, should have disqualified himself from a case he helped decide earlier this year while serving as a judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C.

DOJ_NMG_0002487

Circuit. The case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which concerns a key issue in the administration's war on terrorism, may be headed for the Supreme Court, and at the time of the appeals court ruling, Roberts was being considered for a vacancy on the high court, though it did not yet exist.' The professors say that "in not disqualifying himself, Roberts violated the 'appearance of impartiality.'" Rotunda adds, "Judges are offered other jobs all the time. A Supreme Court justice may become chief justice, or, like Justice Arthur Goldberg, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. Appeals court judges may become Cabinet officers. Trial judges may become appellate judges. … Do we really want to give the president or attorney general the power to force recusal of one or more judges on a panel simply by asking the judge if he might be interested in a different position that is not yet open but that eventually will be? … Conflict-of-interest charges should not be raised lightly, and historical precedents and case law show the allegations against Roberts are unfounded."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (9/6) editorializes that elevating Roberts to Chief "was a logical decision, both politically and on the merits. The Senate and media have been investigating the nominee since July, and have found superlatives with nary a negative. The Judge is in a position to be rapidly confirmed and ready to preside by the time the High Court begins its new term on October 3." The Journal adds, "More importantly, what we have learned about Judge Roberts suggests that he shares Chief Justice Rehnquist's judicial philosophy. If Mr. Bush now follows with the nomination of an equally distinguished conservative for the Court's second opening, the Roberts Court will be able to continue the legal restoration that the late Chief Rehnquist began but was never able to finish."

The New York Times (9/6) writes in an editorial, "If Mr. Bush thought Mr. Roberts had already impressed both the public and the Senate with his intelligence and sincerity, he figured correctly." But "if he regards the judge as a known commodity whose confirmation should be a shoo-in, he is wrong. The Senate did not have enough information to make an informed judgment about Mr. Roberts when he was the nominee for just one of the nine seats on the court. Now it simply becomes more important than ever that he be questioned thoroughly about his views."

In its editorial, the Washington Post (9/6) says, "Before nominating Judge Roberts, Mr. Bush consulted widely and emerged with a candidate Senate Democrats have -- by and large, anyway -- treated with respect. As he once again considers a nominee to replace Justice O'Connor, Mr. Bush would do a public service by consulting widely and meaningfully."

USA Today (9/6) editorializes that "as impressive as Roberts has appeared, the most important question about him remains largely unanswered: How would a Chief Justice Roberts affect the country? As the youngest chief justice since 1801, Roberts, 50, would be a potent influence on society for a generation or more." USA Today adds, "Much will be made at the hearings of the doctrine that Roberts should not be asked to say how he might rule in cases coming before the Supreme Court." But "that should not deter senators from demanding to know how he views issues more generally and cases already decided -- and the standards he would use to overturn settled law. To suggest that the Senate should simply ignore the impact Roberts would have on constituents is to suggest that it stick its collective head in the sand."

The Los Angeles Times (9/6) says in an editorial Bush "has wisely nominated John G. Roberts Jr.…to become the next chief justice. It's a smart move. Roberts has the intellect and temperament to lead the court and the federal judiciary," and selecting a newcomer "tends to preserve good relations among the nine justices. The elevation of either Scalia or Thomas would have proven highly contentious and divisive in Washington, and maybe even on the court." The Times states, "In their questioning of Roberts, senators should focus special attention on his views on the proper deference that courts owe the executive branch in a time of war. … The extent of presidential power in the war on terror is likely to loom large in the Supreme Court docket for years, and it's a subject that Roberts, a former White House lawyer, should be asked to address in his hearings." As for the new opening on the court, the Times argues that Alberto Gonzales "should be disqualified…for encouraging the administration to disregard international law in conducting the war on terror."

Randy E. Barnett, an author and law professor, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/6), "As the president now decides who next to nominate, he would uphold the Constitution by selecting a person with a firm and demonstrated commitment to the Rehnquist Court's New Federalism legacy. Only such a choice would continue the movement to restore the 'first principles' of constitutionally limited government that William Rehnquist affirmed so eloquently."

Laurence H. Tribe, a professor of constitutional law at Harvard, writes in today's New York Times (9/6), "Rehnquist's goal of weakening the checks on presidential power happily met decisive opposition within the court, although I worry that the seeds he planted to that end might yet bear dangerous fruit. No pleasure in argument could overcome my sadness at the Supreme Court's performance in the 2000 election, or my disappointment at how far the chief justice succeeded in his goals of lowering the wall of separation between church and state, shrinking Congress's power and reducing the protections accorded the mostly poor people of color who are suspected or accused of crime."

DOJ_NMG_0002488

House GOP Divided Over Social Security Reform Strategy. The Washington Times (9/5, Fagan) reports, "House Republican leaders, who weeks ago pledged to take the lead on Social Security, still say they will act this fall, but the party remains divided, as some of their members push for a personal accounts bill, some want a broader package and others don't want to act at all." House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas "has insisted on his broad retirement package, which emphasizes pension reform and private savings. It is expected to include a Social Security proposal, introduced by Republican Reps. Jim McCrery of Louisiana and E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida, that would use the system's surplus to create voluntary private accounts. Some Republicans and outside advocates would like a vote on the McCrery-Shaw bill by itself, and a few last week said House leaders have decided unofficially to do that." However House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said, "If it's done, it will be done as part of the retirement security package."

Cheney Reportedly Purchasing Home Near Rumsfeld's. The Washington Post (9/5, B1, Morse) reports, "They've grown used to having a secretary of defense in their midst. … Now, residents of this Eastern Shore retreat [St. Michaels, MD] are preparing for someone even bigger to buy a house down the road: the vice president. Whether it's true -- that Dick and Lynne Cheney are buying an estate here -- could not be confirmed. Those closest to the deal -- Cheney's office, the purported sellers, the listing agent -- aren't talking."

With New Judges, DC Circuit Gears Up For Full Judicial Slate. The Legal Times (9/5, Henning) reports, "The federal appeals court in Washington, where oral arguments resume this week after a nearly three-month summer hiatus, is facing a season of change." The Times continues, "The departure of Judge John Roberts Jr. to Capitol Hill for hearings on his nomination to the Supreme Court and the arrival of Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas Griffith on the circuit court's bench resulted in a reshuffling of panels and argument dates for the fall." The Times adds, "Lawyers with upcoming cases before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit say they've received oral argument dates later than usual. As of late last week, the court had posted its calendar through the end of October. … The court's argument calendar, which continues to take shape, opens with the pleas of Guantánamo Bay prisoners. Over the next two months the court will also hear cases involving immunity and liability for public officials such as police officers and will revisit long-running litigation that pits states and interest groups against the federal government."

The Legal Times (9/5, Henning) reports, "Nothing says welcome to Washington to a new judge like a case full of acronyms that only wonkish Beltway dwellers can appreciate. … That's how Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas Griffith will be initiated into the complex but largely nonideological work of refereeing federal agencies on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit." The Times continues, "Before Brown this month will be a dispute over a plan that would create a hunting season for the trumpeter swan, and Griffith will hear an appeal involving the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration. … But in other cases, the judges could have the opportunity to place a personal stamp." The Times notes, "In Gregory Thomas v. George Washington University, Brown will hear the case of a man with a paralyzed leg who is appealing a lower court decision that threw out a favorable jury verdict. Gregory Thomas, a medical resident at GW who lost his position, sued the university for race and disability discrimination. The school claims his performance was poor and that he has an impairment, as opposed to a disability covered by the Americans With Disabilities Act."

Report Criticizes Education Department PR Grants. USA Today (9/6, 7D, Toppo) reports, "Federal investigators probing the Education Department's public relations contracts have found a pattern of deals in which advocacy organizations received grants totaling nearly $4.7 million to promote Bush administration education priorities in newspaper columns and brochures, but didn't disclose that they received taxpayer funds, as required by law." USED Inspector General John Higgins recommended that "the department needs to do a better job monitoring how millions of dollars in grants are spent." U.S. Secretary of Education

DOJ_NMG_0002489

Margaret Spelling "agreed with most of the investigators' findings."

OTHER NEWS:

No Gasoline Supply Disruptions Over Labor Day As Price Reaches New High. The New York Times (9/6, Bajaj) reports as Americans "began heading home from the Labor Day weekend, gasoline stations today continued to report spot shortages, but the country appeared, at least as of this afternoon, to have avoided the massive supply problems that some had feared." Officials said they "continued to make progress in resuming the production and distribution of gasoline and other fuels, which was severely disrupted by Hurricane Katrina last week. But they noted that most refineries and oil production in and along the Gulf of Mexico remained shut down for the seventh day in a row."

USA Today (9/6, Woodyard) reports the national average price for gasoline "crossed the $3-a-gallon mark for the first time Monday in the latest AAA survey, tying the record for highest ever on an inflation-adjusted basis." Although motorists "in hurricane-whipped areas along the Gulf of Mexico faced gas lines, some resorts across the nation reported strong Labor Day crowds despite soaring fuel prices." A gallon "of regular-grade gas hit $3.057 a gallon Monday, up 19 cents from $2.867 earlier in the weekend, the AAA said. On an inflation-adjusted basis, that's equal to the peak of $1.417 set in March 1981."

The New York Times (9/6, Bajaj, Pérez-Peña) reports analysts and industry executives "warned that fuel prices were likely to remain high and that the nation's oil supply system might not return to normal operations for several weeks, perhaps longer." Even as the Federal Government "and other nations started releasing crude oil and gasoline into a thirsting world market and pipelines resumed sending supplies from the Gulf Coast, specialists said there were few quick fixes for the biggest remaining bottleneck: refining." As many as "four refineries, processing about 4 percent of the nation's oil supplies, might stay out of service for weeks or months. Of the remaining six refineries that shut down last week because of Hurricane Katrina, several were starting to resume production over the long weekend, but it will take them several days to get back to full speed."

States Move To Cut Gasoline Excise Taxes. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Matthews) reports that to "soften the blow of higher fuel prices and disrupted supplies, the federal government took steps to increase the supply of diesel fuel as some states moved to suspend gasoline excise taxes." The Internal Revenue Service "said it will temporarily allow all vehicles, including commercial trucks, to use dyed diesel fuel without being subject to a penalty. Dyed diesel usually is restricted to farming and government activities that aren't subject to excise taxes. Under the IRS easing, the usual diesel tax still will be owed when dyed diesel is used in nonexempt ways, but an additional penalty will be waived. California and Michigan also lifted state penalties on the use of dyed diesel fuel." States that suspend gas taxes "stand to lose millions of dollars in revenues that are usually used for road and other highway projects. Even states that don't suspend gas taxes could see revenues drop if drivers cut back on gas purchases due to rising pump prices."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush For Long-Term Handling Of Gasoline Demand. The New York Times (9/6) says in an editorial, "The ability of the Gulf Coast's many refineries to turn the oil into gasoline has been devastated, as has the ability to transport the gasoline that does become available. Those supply bottlenecks are chiefly responsible for this past week's higher prices at the pump. President Bush's immediate response is to lend oil from the government's Strategic Petroleum Reserve to refineries and to streamline the refining process by temporarily relaxing environmental standards - sound stopgap measures to help ensure a steady supply of gasoline. The International Energy Agency, whose members are 26 rich nations, has also made a big contribution, pledging on Friday to supply world markets with an additional 60 million barrels of oil and gasoline over the next 30 days, half of which would come from the United States' emergency stockpiles." But it "would be wrong to think - and act - as if this crisis is fundamentally a supply shock. Rather, it is a supply shock on top of blatantly excessive demand. The near-term responses from Mr. Bush and the international agency, welcome as they are, will not solve the larger problems laid bare by Katrina. Worse, Mr. Bush's record on energy issues does not suggest that he is up to that task."

US Economy Seen As Demonstrating Resilience In Wake Of Katrina. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, A1, Hilsenrath, lp) reports in a front page story that the US economy's "shock absorbers kicked in within days of one of the worst natural disasters in its history, offering hope that the massive jolt to the country's energy and transportation systems won't produce a long-lived, serious economic contraction." The "release of emergency oil and gasoline from global stockpiles, created in the 1970s to counter supply interruptions, sent crude-oil prices down to about pre-hurricane levels in European trading." Long-term interest rates "fell despite the prospect of higher inflation, cushioning home buyers and businesses. Temporary-help agencies began to place some workers displaced by the storm. New Orleans's main newspaper, the Times-Picayune, kept publishing on the Internet when printing on paper was impossible. Computerized logistics enabled railroad CSX Corp. to reroute freight normally exchanged with Western railroads at New Orleans to be sent north." Hurricane Katrina is "the biggest test in years of the economy's resilience. But recent history offers encouraging, though by no means definitive evidence of the U.S. economy's ability to bounce back from shocks. Economic growth has become significantly less volatile during the past two decades, a trend some economists dub 'the Great Moderation.'"

DOJ_NMG_0002490

USA Today (9/6, Jones) reports "dozens of Southern cities from Baton Rouge to Pensacola are coping with a displaced populace numbering in the hundreds of thousands and awaiting the spillover of billions of dollars in disaster aid." Natural disasters "whipsaw local economies as they move from devastation and into rebuilding. That's nothing new. But this time, the disaster was a coiled snake that has lashed out at the nation." Katrina and "the flooding triggered by levee failures will have a total economic cost of $100 billion, Risk Management Solutions, a catastrophe-risk-modeling firm, said Friday. Most of the damage done by the levee break is likely not insured. Still, bond-rating company Fitch said Friday that the insured portion of losses could go above $25 billion, surpassing the Sept. 11 terror attack ($20.1 billion in 2004 dollars) and Hurricane Andrew ($20.5 billion) as the largest insured loss in history."

With Port Of New Orleans Out Of Service, Farmers Face Shipping Problems. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 14, 2:20, Gibson) reported, "It is now a week to the day after Katrina hit. And shipping along the Mississippi River and its tributaries is still at a standstill. $100 billion in goods move up and down the Mississippi every year. That's 25% of all US exports. And 17% of all imports. The storm hit one region. Its economic impact is affecting all regions." ABC (Reynolds) added, "From St. Paul to St. Louis and all along the big river, they sit on the water with no place to go. The corn, coal, steel or lumber that fuels the nation's commerce -- all stalled." Most "of the nation's industrial imports, such as steel, plywood and rubber, comes through the Port of New Orleans. And more than half of the nation's grain goes out through the port." It's "too soon to say how consumers will fare overall. But commodities like coffee and sugar in addition to gasoline, are expected to become more expensive."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Fialka) reports "Midwest farm interests represented by Republicans like" House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Rep. Roy Blunt "have a major stake in reconstructing New Orleans. Another port -- Gulfport, Miss. -- is crucial to Southern poultry interests, but New Orleans has a wider regional reach, handling 71% of corn and 65% of soybean exports last year." The disruptions "have hit Midwest farmers at a difficult time. Storage facilities already are strained from big crops last year, and commodity prices have been falling amid efforts to empty grain elevators in time for new crops. If sales can't be completed, there is a risk of grain being stored outside, thereby reducing its value and the return to the farmer." With "rising energy and fertilizer prices and a summer drought in the eastern Midwest, including Speaker Hastert's Illinois district, there are sure to be demands for expanded agriculture assistance as part of any disaster package."

States Reporting Increase In Unemployment Applications. USA Today (9/6, Armour) reports thousands of employees "are finding themselves suddenly without paychecks after Hurricane Katrina. Some are rushing to get state aid while others are looking for new jobs." Some states are "reporting an increase in residents requesting benefits." In Louisiana, those "who are not getting paid because of the hurricane can file for disaster unemployment assistance or unemployment benefits, says Ed Pratt, a spokesman with the Louisiana Department of Labor. They are eligible for up to $256 a week." Mississippi workers "are eligible for unemployment or disaster unemployment assistance of up to $210 a week," and Alabama residents "are eligible for unemployment or disaster assistance and can apply through call centers. They can get up to $220 a week."

WPost Calls Economic Recovery "Lagging And Uneven." The Washington Post (9/6, A24) editorializes, "The Census Bureau's annual report on income, poverty and health insurance in the United States" underscores "the lagging and uneven nature of the economic recovery since the 2001 recession. According to the new data, 4 million more people were living in poverty in 2004 than in 2001, and 4.6 million more people lacked health insurance." In addition, the "percentage of people with employer-based health insurance fell for the fourth year in a row," and "it's not at all certain that states will be willing or able to maintain coverage for working Americans hovering at the edge of poverty. In the wake of this data and the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist…was wise to postpone this week's planned vote to repeal the estate tax. Lawmakers need to remember in the weeks to come that this is an economic recovery that continues to leave too many Americans behind."

DOJ_NMG_0002491

Russia Opposes Reporting Iran To Security Council. The Financial Times (9/6, Wagstyl, Khalaf) reports that Russia yesterday ruled out an early decision to report Iran to the Security Council. A senior Kremlin official "said Iran had not violated the rules of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Its nuclear programme, he said, should continue to be dealt with at the governing board of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, without involving the Security Council." The Times notes that the move "undermines US and European efforts to build international consensus for a diplomatic reprimand this month."

Iran appears to be changing tactics in an effort to minimize the risk of UN Security Council action over its nuclear program, reports the Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Peterson). The Monitor says the Security Council "which in turn is undermining the carrot-and-stick approach used by the EU and Washington in recent years to convince Iran to end all nuclear efforts." Gary Samore, a nonproliferation official during the Clinton administration and vice president of the MacArthur Foundation in Chicago, said high oil prices "may give Tehran confidence that the council would not jeopardize the flow of Iran's petroleum into the market. ... Other factors include American preoccupation with Iraq, and the decisive victory of Mr. Ahmadinejad at the polls last June."

Palestinian Forces Get First Look At Abandoned Jewish Settlements. Palestinian security forces on Monday toured Jewish settlements razed during Israel's withdrawal from Gaza. USA Today (9/6) reports that the tour "of the settlements in southern Gaza by Palestinian commanders and Israeli military officials was the first time Palestinian officials had been allowed into the communities. Israel removed all 8,500 settlers from Gaza last month."

Egypt Vows To Help Make Gaza Foundation Of Palestinian State. Meanwhile, in an interview with the Washington Times (9/6, Phillips) Egyptian Prime Minister Ahmed Nazif "pledged to help make the Gaza Strip the foundation of a Palestinian state 'in every sense' and urged other countries to join Cairo in the push for Middle East peace. 'If we want Gaza to be the basis for a new Palestinian state long term, we have to provide [the residents] with homes and jobs, with security,' Mr. Nazif told The Washington Times. … Mr. Nazif said Cairo will make sure that Gaza has access to the outside world through Egyptian seaports and airports 'to prevent the strip of territory being a prison' for its residents."

Recent Elections Reverse Gains By Radical Islamists In Pakistan. In what the Christian Science Monitor (9/6, Khan) calls a "surprising blow to religious extremists" in Pakistan, voters in recent elections "reversed the gains made by radical Islamists who came to power in two out of the country's four provinces in 2002. They had played a strong opposition role in the federal parliament and posed a formidable challenge to President Pervez Musharraf's vow to bring 'enlightened moderation' to Pakistani society." The Monitor adds, "The unexpected defeat of the Islamists came in the North Western Frontier Province (NWFP), which neighbors Afghanistan. The province had been ruled since 2002 by the Muttahida Majlis-e-Amal (MMA), an umbrella group of six religious parties, including the vanguard radical party Jamaat-e-Islami."

India May Remove Troops From Kashmir. Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh's office said yesterday that India will pull troops back from Kashmir if militant infiltration and violence ends. The New York Times (9/6, Sengupta) reports that the announcement came "after a rare meeting with Kashmiri separatists."

Presence Of Hindu Militants In Kashmir Indicates Insurgency May Not Be Only Religious. The Washington Times (9/6, Rahman) reports the "killing last month of a Hindu militant and the arrests of two others are raising doubts about the government's assertion that the bloody insurgency in Kashmir is being fought simply in the interests of Islamic militancy." Indian forces "killed Uttam Singh, 23, and three Muslim jihadis on Aug. 19. The night-long gunbattle came during an attempt by a group of militants to kill or abduct an Indian Muslim soldier from his house in the border region of Kashmir." Police "later discovered that Mr. Singh, alias Saifullah, was one of two Hindu sector commanders in Hizbul-Kashmir, a rebel group that seeks to include all of Kashmir in Pakistan." A senior officer "at the Defense Ministry in New Delhi subsequently acknowledged that four other Hindu militants had been killed fighting alongside the Kashmiri jihadis in the past three years. However, he would not accept the notion they might have been willing combatants."

DOJ_NMG_0002492

Lebanese President Faces Growing Pressure To Resign. Lebanon's President Emile Lahoud is facing growing pressure to resign. The New York Times (9/6, Fattah) reports that Lahoud "has clung to office even as his Syrian backers have been forced to withdraw from the country. … He keeps a low profile, rarely making public appearances or giving interviews. But as hard as he may try to remain out of sight, he has been on many minds here in recent days, as Lebanese have taken to predicting his imminent political demise." The Times adds "In a defiant statement last week, Mr. Lahoud insisted that he intended to complete his term in office, which ends in 2007. 'I will continue to fulfill my responsibilities to safeguard the Constitution, Lebanese laws and the integrity of Lebanese territory,' the statement said."

Business Groups Warn Doha Round Of Trade Talks On Verge Of Failure. A statement from a group of six business associations, including the US Business Roundtable, warns that the Doha round of global trade talks may be "on the verge of failure." The Financial Times (9/6, Beattie) reports that the statement "says delay in the agricultural talks is holding up progress in goods and services liberalisation, which is economically far more significant. … The warning comes as the WTO returns to work after its summer break, with four months remaining before December's ministerial meeting in Hong Kong. Progress in the talks has been slow. … Without a significant breakthrough in the agricultural talks and, particularly, a commitment from the EU and US to cut farm tariffs rather than the lesser goal of ending export subsidies, the big emerging markets such as India and Brazil are unlikely to agree radical liberalisation of their goods and services markets."

China, EU Reach Deal On Textiles. China and the European Commission reached an agreement Monday to end their dispute over the importation of cheap Chinese textiles. The Financial Times (9/6, Hall, Parker) reports, "After marathon talks in Beijing stretching into the early hours of Monday morning, Peter Mandelson, EU trade commissioner, and Bo Xilai, his Chinese counterpart, agreed to release Chinese garments impounded at Europe's ports 'as soon as possible.' Mr Mandelson said the two sides had agreed to 'sensible, reasonable, burden-sharing' regarding the fate of 77m Chinese sweaters, trousers and bras impounded at the EU's borders. The Commission proposes to wave through half of the impounded garments. China accepted that the rest would be deducted either from its 2006 textile quota, or switched to other unfilled-quota categories."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Browne, Bianchi, von Reppert-Bismarck, Champion) reports, "Both sides hailed the textile accord, which still needs the approval of EU member countries, as a fair compromise. … EU officials and diplomats expect European governments to approve the agreement today."

Chinese Oil Company Moves To Sell Kazakhstan Acquisition. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Singer, Chazan) reports, "China National Petroleum Corp., which last month triumphed in a bidding war to buy a strategically important oil company with operations in neighboring Kazakhstan, is in talks to sell as much as half of the $4.18 billion acquisition to Kazakhstan's state-owned oil firm even before the first deal is closed, according to people familiar with the matter. A deal by CNPC, as China National Petroleum is called, to sell a 33% to 50% stake in PetroKazakhstan Inc., a Canadian company with operations in the oil-rich central-Asian state, to KazMunaiGaz, the state-owned oil company, is expected to be sealed in the next few weeks, these people said. The price tag on such a deal with KMG, as the state firm is known, wasn't clear."

Columnist Says Bush, Hu Have Urgent Issues To Discuss. George Melloan writes in his Wall Street Journal column (9/6), "The Katrina disaster offered the White House a plausible reason to postpone tomorrow's planned visit from Chinese President Hu Jintao, but the delay was unfortunate. President George W. Bush needs to discuss some important issues with Mr. Hu." Bush 'and Mr. Hu need to come to a better understanding, setting aside spurious issues and dwelling on ways the two countries can cooperate to keep China on the course it desires, to become a 'modernized, medium-level developed country.' Mr. Bush can offer wise counsel: To do that, it will have to become more democratic."

DOJ_NMG_0002493

Ukrainian Official Resigns To Protest Alleged Corruption. A top aide to Ukrainian President Viktor Yuschenko said yester day he has resigned from the government because of corruption allegations around Yushchenko. The Washington Times/AP (9/6, Lisova) reports that Oleksandr Zinchenko, who resigned Saturday, was a chief organizer of the "Orange Revolution" protests. He said "the situation had grown 'even worse' than under former President Leonid Kuchma."

Report Says Chernobyl Caused Less Harm Than Anticipated. A new report has found that the after effects of the accident at Chernobyl nuclear power plant 20 years ago have proved less dire than predicted. The New York Times (9/6) says the report, which was prepared by a panel of more than 100 experts convened by United Nations agencies, "says huge compensation programs for people in the Chernobyl region have become 'a major barrier to the region's recovery,' both by creating a culture of dependency and by soaking up a high percentage of the region's resources. It recommends that the compensation programs be cut back."

The Washington Post (9/6, A22, Finn) adds that the report says the governments of Ukraine, Belarus and Russia, "the three countries most affected by radioactive fallout from Chernobyl, should strive to end the 'paralyzing fatalism' of tens of thousands of their citizens who wrongly believe they are still at risk of an early death." The 600-page report "found that as of the middle of this year, the accident had caused fewer than 50 deaths directly attributable to radiation, most of them among emergency workers who died in the first months after the accident."

The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Fialka) reports, "The 600-page report said that almost 99% of children diagnosed with thyroid cancer after the incident survived. It found 'no convincing evidence' that the incidence of leukemia rose among the population exposed to radiation in Russia and Ukraine."

Indonesian Plane Crash Kills At Least 147. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 15, :25, Gibson) reported, "A Boeing 737, taking off in Indonesia, shook violently, jerked to the left, and smashed into a row of houses on a busy street. At least 147 people died, many of them on the ground. Miraculously, as many as 16 passengers aboard the jet survived, including an 18-month-old child, wrapped in his mother's arms. She survived, as well."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH —Makes a statement on efforts to assist students and school districts displaced by the hurricane, Rose Garden; 10 a.m. Meets with Cabinet, Cabinet Room; 11:15 a.m. Meets with representatives from National Voluntary and Charitable Organizations, Roosevelt Room.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 12 p.m. Meets for morning business. At 2:15 p.m., considers the cloture motion on S.147 - Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization bill.

1:30 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Hearings begin on the nomination of Judge John G. Roberts, Jr., for the Supreme Court. Ten-minute opening statements by committee members will be followed by the oath to be taken by Judge Roberts and his opening statement. Location: Caucus Room, Room 325, Russell.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Hearing to examine gasoline prices and factors contributing to current high prices such as global oil demand, constraints on refinery capacity, and increased speculation in the futures market. Energy Information Administration Administrator Guy Caruso, Commodity Futures Trading Commission Chief Economist James Overdahl, Johnnie Burton of the Interior Department, Robert Darbelnet of AAA, Bob Slaughter of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association, oil analyst John Dowd, of New York, others. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 2 p.m. The House meets for legislative business. Votes will be postponed until 6:30 p.m. Highlights: Suspensions (2 bills): 1) H.Res. 360 - Commemorating the 60th anniversary of V-J Day and the end of World War II in the Pacific. 2) S.J.Res. 19 - A joint resolution calling upon the President to issue a proclamation recognizing the 30th anniversary of the Helsinki Final Act.

5 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting on rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0002494

Other: CHINESE PRESIDENT HU JINTAO _ Highlights: Evening. Arrives at Andrews AFB.

TERRORISM SUMMIT _ The New America Foundation sponsors a forum on America's approach to countering terrorism, ``Terrorism, Security, and America's Purpose: Towards a More Comprehensive Strategy." Highlights: 8:15 a.m. Steven Clemons, New America Foundation. 9 a.m. Welcoming remarks, James Fallows, Atlantic Monthly, and chairman of the board, New America Foundation; Stephen Heintz, president, Rockefeller Brothers Fund. 9:15 a.m. Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calilf., ranking member, Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence; George Soros, chairman, Soros Fund Management, and chairman, Open Society Institute; Mitchell Reiss, former director of policy planning, State Department, and vice provost, College of William & Mary; James Steinberg, Brookings Institution, former deputy national security advisor to the President; Rita Hauser, International Peace Academy, and RAND Corp.; Roger Cressey, former director, transnational threats, National Security Council, and president, Good Harbor Consulting LLC; moderator David Ensor, CNN. 10:30 a.m. Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., ranking member, Committee on Foreign Relations. 11 a.m. Robert Pape, University of Chicago, author; Nir Rosen, author, New America Foundation; Yosri Fonda, Al-Jazeera; Andrew Kohut, Pew Research Center for People and the Press; Michael Lind, New America Foundation, author; moderator Robert Kuttner, The American Prospect. 12:15 p.m. Jon Huntsman, Jr., governor of Utah; Gen. Wesley Clark, former supreme allied commander, NATO, former candidate for President. 2 p.m. Tom Clancy, novelist. 2:30 p.m. Dimitri Simes, president, The Nixon Center; Anatol Lieven, New America Foundation, author; Flynt Leverett, Brookings Institution, formerly National Security Council; Kenneth Roth, president, Human Rights Watch; Michael McFaul, Stanford University, Hoover Institution; moderator Morton Halperin, formerly National Security Council, executive director, Open Society Policy Center. 3:45 p.m. Gerold Yonas, Sandia National Weapons Laboratories; Henry Schuster, CNN; Diego Hidalgo, president, FRIDE, publisher; Richard Vague, chairman, American Respect.com; Stephen Walt, Harvard University, author; Juliette Kayyem, Kennedy School of Government, Harvard University; Lawrence Korb, Center for American Progress, former assistant secretary of defense. 5:15 p.m. Anne-Marie Slaughter, Princeton University; Jonah Goldberg, National Review Online; Grover Norquist, president, Americans for Tax Reform, American Conservative Union member of the board; Reuel Marc Gerecht, American Enterprise Institute; Brig. Gen. James Cullen, U.S. Army (Ret.); moderator Michael Barone, US News & World Report. 6:15 p.m. Reception, Ted Sorensen, former special counsel to President Kennedy. 6:15 p.m. Executive session, private meeting, John Ashcroft, former attorney general. 7:15 p.m. Dinner, Rita Hauser, RAND Corp.; Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Streets, NW.

CSIS-CHINESE PRESIDENT HU JINTAO_ Highlights: 9:30 a.m. CSIS hosts a briefing by analysts for members of the press corps on issues surrounding Chinese President Hu Jintao's visit to Washington, with Bates Gill, Ambassador Richard McCormack, Bonnie Glaser, and Frank Verrastro, all of CSIS. CSIS, B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

FORUM-CHINESE PRESIDENT HU JINTAO_ 1:30 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. A forum will be held on Chinese President Hu Jintao's upcoming visit to the U.S. and the challenges he is facing amid China's political situation and how they will shape his agenda and decision-making, ``Two Years Later: A Look at Hu Jintao's Rule in China." Participants include moderator Dr. John Li, senior research fellow, Association for Asian Research, and panelists T. Kumar, advocacy director for Asia & Pacific, Amnesty International USA; Wei Jingsheng, chairman, Overseas Chinese Democracy Coalition; Jingduan Yang, MD, spokesman for the Washington DC area Falun Dafa Practitioners Association; Frank Gong, columnist, Chinascope magazine; and Rebiya Kadeer, Uyghur businesswoman and dissident. National Press Club, Holeman Lounge. Contact: Brian Marple, 202-375-4100.

REHNQUIST-LEGACY _ 7 a.m. Young activists honor the pro-life legacy of Chief Justice William Rehnquist during prayer service outside the Supreme Court. Location: Public sidewalk in front of the Supreme Court.

MUSLIM DEMOCRACY _ 10 a.m. - 12:15 p.m. The Wilson Center's Middle East Program and the National Endowment for Democracy co-sponsor a discussion, ``From Islamism to Muslim Democracy: The Challenges of Political Inclusion in Muslim Countries." Speakers are Anwar Ibrahim, former deputy prime minister, Malaysia, and Saad Eddin Ibrahim, professor of political sociology, American University in Cairo, and chairman of the board, Ibn Khaldun Center for Development Studies, Cairo, Egypt; commentators Larry Diamond, senior fellow, The Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, Stanford University, and Vali Nasr, professor, Department of National Security Affairs, Naval

DOJ_NMG_0002495

Postgraduate School, Monterey, Calif.; chair Carl Gershman, president, National Endowment for Democracy. Location: Woodrow Wilson Center, 6th Floor Auditorium, Ronald Reagan Building, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

KATRINA INVESTIGATION _ 11:15 a.m. Senators Susan Collins and Joe Lieberman will hold a press conference to discuss the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee investigation of Hurricane Katrina preparedness and relief efforts as they pertain to the Gulf Coast. Location: Senate Radio-TV Gallery.

BORK _ 12:30 p.m. The National Press Club hosts a luncheon address by Robert Bork of the Hudson Institute. Location: National Press Club.

GAZA-MEDIA _ 1 p.m. Americans for Peace Now and the American Task Force on Palestine co-host a luncheon forum on media coverage of the Gaza and Northern West Bank disengagement that Israel began earlier this month, with journalists Yaron Deckel, Israeli Television Channel 1; Nadia Bilbassey, Al Arabiyya Television; Natan Guttman, the Jerusalem Post; and Claude Salhani, United Press International. Location: Center for Strategic and International Studies, Conference Room B-1, Rooms B & C, 1800 K St. NW.

CANADA-US ENERGY _ 11 p.m. There will be a background briefing on Alberta's oil sands and the Canada-US energy relationship. Briefers are Murray Smith, Alberta's representative in Washington, D.C.; and Paul Connors, energy counselor at the Canadian Embassy. Location: Canadian Embassy, 501 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

NO-FLY LISTS _ 7 p.m. - 9:30 p.m. The Georgetown University Law Center hosts a panel discussion, ``No-Fly Lists & National Security." Panelists are David Cole, professor of law, Georgetown University Law Center; Paul Rosenzweig, senior legal research fellow, Heritage Foundation; Tim Sparapani, legislative counsel on privacy issues, American Civil Liberties Union; Daniel Sutherland, officer for civil rights & civil liberties, Department of Homeland Security; and Ahmed Younis, national director, Muslim Public Affairs Council. Location: Georgetown University Law Center, Gewirz Student Center, 12th Floor, 120 F St. NW.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Hundreds Refuse To Evacuate."
"Survival, Hour By Hour."
"Roberts Tapped For Chief Justice."
"L.A. Cuts Back Year-Round Schools."
"Some Of The Dispossessed Say They Won't Return."

USA Today:
"'Destroyed' City Clears Out."
"Picking Roberts For Court's Top Job Raises Stakes."
"Waves Of Evacuees Swamp Host Cities."

New York Times:
"Bush Makes Return Visit; 2 Levees Secured."
"President Names Roberts As Choice For Chief Justice."

Washington Post:
"Bush Nominates Roberts As Chief Justice."
"Along Gulf, Aiding The Living And Counting The Dead."

Washington Times:
"2 Orleans Levees Closed."
"Roberts Picked For Chief Justice."
"Egypt Vows To Build A Palestinian Gaza."
"Congress Comes Back To A Busy Agenda."

Detroit Free Press:
"After A Week In Hell, Welcome To Michigan."
"Splintered Unions Get In Step For Mechanics."
"Storm Victims Return To Sift Through Debris."
"Greater Role, More Jobs May Boost Clout Of Detroit Arsenal."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Leak Plugged."
"Roberts Gets Call For Chief Justice."

Dallas Morning News:
"'No Reason To Stay,' But Some Won't Leave."
"Residents Allowed To Survey Jefferson Parish Damage."
"Would-Be Rescuers Cool Their Heels."
"Roberts Tapped To Lead Court."

Houston Chronicle:
"A Perilous Journey Home."
"Roberts' Nomination As Chief May Avoid Senate Fight."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: New Orleans Recovery; New Orleans Flooding; Texas-New Orleans Refugees; Hurricane Refugees; Bush, Clinton Fundraising; Roberts-Chief Justice; FEMA Director's Experience; New Orleans-Families Divided; New Orleans-Relief Problems; Bush-Hurricane Zone; Bush, Clinton

DOJ_NMG_0002496

Fundraising; International Aid; Mississippi Recovery; Mississippi Shipping Paralyzed; Indonesia Plane Crash; Baghdad-Interior Ministry Attacked; Katrina-Religious Faith.
CBS: New Orleans Recovery; Baton Rouge-New Orleans Refugees; Destroyed New Orleans Parish; Texas-New Orleans Refugees; Roberts-Chief Justice, Analysis.
NBC: New Orleans Situation; New Orleans-Returning Residents; New Orleans-Repairs; Bush, Clinton Fundraising; Roberts-Chief Justice; Roberts Nomination-Analysis; Bush's Katrina Response-Analysis; Indonesia Plane Crash; Texas-New Orleans Refugees; Hurricane Survivor-Family Reunion; New Orleans-Families Divided; Katrina-Wrap-Up.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: New Orleans-Levee Repairs; Bush-Hurricane Zone Visit; Hurricane-Evacuees; Bush-Roberts.
CBS: New Orleans-Levee Repairs; New Orleans Damage; Bush-Hurricane Zone Visit; Lewis Telethon.
NPR: New Orleans Police; Surgeon General-Disease Warning; Roberts; Oil Prices; New Orleans-Levee Repairs; Hurricane Relief Efforts; Indonesia-Plane Crash.

Copyright 2005 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 2005 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Charges Against Virginia Man Arrested In Elaborate Raid Dropped. ... 3
Investigators Say London Subway Bomber Video Is Authentic. ... 3
DOJ Statement On Detention Of Foreigners Decried. ... 3

Patriot Act:
Long Beach, CA, Mulls Opposition To Patriot Act. ... 3

Homeland Response:
Report Questions Efficacy Of Airline Screening Program. ... 3
US Muslims Seek To Limit Appeal Of Extremists. ... 3
9/11 Commission Successor Seeks Information On Able Danger. ... 4
DHS General Counsel Understands Both Private, Public Sector.. 4

War News:
US Sets Trap For Insurgents Fleeing Tall Afar. ... 4
Saddam Trial Will Begin October 19. ... 4
Insurgents Allied With Zarqawi Claim Control Of Iraqi Border Town. ... 5
Al Qaeda Group Claims Responsibility For Interior Ministry Attack. ... 5
Top Iraqi Officials Criticize Arab Leaders For Lack Of Support. ... 5
Annan Says Iraq Worse Terror Problem Than Taliban-Era Afghanistan. ... 5
Bush Urged To Emphasize National Security When Discussing Iraq. ... 6
Iraqi Youth Experiencing Traumatic Events. ... 6
Iraq Veteran Records Experiences In Poetry. ... 6
Officials Say US, Afghan Troops Killed 25 Insurgents In Two Raids. ... 6
Anarchy In Baghdad After US Invasion Described. ... 6
Former Officials In Soviet-Backed Government Taking Part In Afghan Elections. ... 6

Corporate Scandals:
Corporate Scandal Tip Lines Pose Dilemma. ... 7

Criminal Law:
US Faces Dilemma In Cuban Spy Cases. ... 7
FBI Widens Niagara Falls Corruption Probe. ... 7
Alleged ALF Member Pleads Guilty To Animal Enterprise Terrorism In Mink Releases. ... 8
Tennessee Lawmakers Await Possible Additional Arrests In FBI Probe. ... 8
Cleveland Corruption Probe Figures Sentenced To Prison. ... 8
Fugitive Accused Of Elaborate Counterfeiting Scheme In Philadelphia. ... 8
Baltimore USA To Tackle Gang Crimes. ... 8
PG Co. MD Records 6th Homicide In 5 Days. ... 8

Civil Law:
Lobby Shops Look To Build On Success In Latest BRAC Round. ... 9

Civil Rights:
9th Circuit Rules Sexual Content Not Needed For Harassment Claims. ... 9
11h Circuit Rules Georgia Jail Was Justified In Strip Search. ... 9
Foes Of New Georgia Voter ID Law To File Suit. ... 10
Gender Pay Gap Attributed To Factors Other Than Discrimination. ... 10
California Set To Vote On Gay Marriage Bill As Massachusetts Decisions Near. ... 10

Antitrust:
Wal-Mart Chief Raises Eyebrows By Suggesting Antitrust Probe Of UK Competitor. ... 10
Recording Industry Hails Australian Ruling Against Kazaa. ... 10
Chiron Directors Reject Novartis Takeover Offer. ... 11

Environment:
Federal Government Urged To Fund $14 Billion Coastal Restoration Project. ... 12
SCOTUS Ruling On Eminent Domain Sparks Backlash. ... 12
Government-Funded Cowboys Protect Against Invasion Of Cattle Fever Tick. ... 12
Editor Says Landowners Should Manage Property In Public Interest. ... 12
Caimans Are Making A Comeback In Brazil. ... 13

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
House Judiciary Leaders Penning Tough Anti-Steroids Measure. 13
Prosecutors Drop Fraud Charges Against DEA's Clark. ... 13
US Army Soldier Headed Colombia-To-US Cocaine Smuggling Ring. ... 14
Gun Control Initiatives Weaken In South. ... 14

1.7 Million Children Live In Homes With A Loaded, Unlocked Gun. 14

Immigration:

Fox Says US Shares Responsibility For Illegal Immigration. 14
Union Organizers Focus On Low-Wage, Immigrant Workers. 14

Tax:

Jailed Telecom Tycoon Said To Be Trying To Move Assets..... 15

Congress-Administration:

Bush Visits Hurricane Zone For Second Time. 15
Brown's Qualifications Questioned As Criticism of FEMA Relief Effort Continues. 19
Congress To Investigate DHS Response To Katrina. 21
Congress Shifts Priorities To Respond To Katrina. 21
Bill Clinton Criticizes Federal Response, Calls For "Katrina Commission. 22
Former Presidents Bush, Clinton Visit Victims In Houston..... 22
Chertoff Appoints Coast Guard Admiral To Run Recovery Efforts In New Orleans. 23
Breached Levees Repaired In New Orleans, Pumping Begins... 23
Chertoff Notes "Tremendous" Challenge Of Moving New Orleans Residents. 25
About 10,000 Remain In New Orleans. 26
New Orleans Mayor Says Up To 10,000 May Be Dead. 27
Nearly 50,000 National Guard, DHS Personnel Involved In Relief Effort..... 28
Recovery Efforts In Mississippi Beginning To Meet Needs. 29
Halliburton Subsidiary At Work On Navy Facilities Repairs. 29
Rice Defends Bush Against Charge That Katrina Response Was Racist. 29
Chertoff, Brown Criticized For Hurricane Response..... 29
SEC Extends Filing Deadline In Storm Zone..... 31
Blair Sends Foreign Service Officers To US As International Aid Continues Flow. 31
Hurricane Creates Unique Problems For Non-Citizens..... 32
Insurance Premiums Expected To Rise Along Gulf Coast..... 32
Bush Nominates Roberts To Be Chief Justice. 32
Democrats Plan To "Rough Up" Roberts During Hearings..... 33
House GOP Divided Over Social Security Reform Strategy. 37
Cheney Reportedly Purchasing Home Near Rumsfeld's. 37
With New Judges, DC Circuit Gears Up For Full Judicial Slate. . 37
Report Criticizes Education Department PR Grants..... 37

Other News:

No Gasoline Supply Disruptions Over Labor Day As Price Reaches New High. 38
US Economy Seen As Demonstrating Resilience In Wake Of Katrina..... 38
Russia Opposes Reporting Iran To Security Council. 39
Palestinian Forces Get First Look At Abandoned Jewish Settlements. 40
Recent Elections Reverse Gains By Radical Islamists In Pakistan. 40
India May Remove Troops From Kashmir..... 40
Lebanese President Faces Growing Pressure To Resign. 40
Business Groups Warn Doha Round Of Trade Talks On Verge Of Failure. 40
China, EU Reach Deal On Textiles. 41
Chinese Oil Company Moves To Sell Kazakhstan Acquisition. .. 41
Ukrainian Official Resigns To Protest Alleged Corruption. 41
Report Says Chernobyl Caused Less Harm Than Anticipated. .. 41
Indonesian Plane Crash Kills At Least 147..... 41

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington. 42

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 43

DOJ_NMG_0002499

TERRORISM NEWS:

Charges Against Virginia Man Arrested In Elaborate Raid Dropped. The Washington Post (9/5, A4, Sheridan) reports, "The scene was emblematic of the war on terror: a government helicopter clattering over a home in Burke as gun-toting agents smashed through the door and handcuffed the owner, a Lebanese immigrant. Hassan Khalil, 37, was arrested by agents with a local terrorism task force this May and charged with immigration fraud. But now, officials say, the charge has been dropped. The reason: a mistake in Khalil's immigration records." The Post adds, "Authorities have declined to comment on what brought Khalil to their attention or whether he could face further accusations . He was charged in May with lying on his citizenship application by failing to note an arrest by U.S. officials in the early 1990s for being in the country illegally."

Investigators Say London Subway Bomber Video Is Authentic. Newsweek (9/12) reports in its "Periscope" column, "American and British investigators say a new video featuring a July 7 London subway bomber and Qaeda chief deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri is authentic. These counterterror officials, who asked not to be named because of the sensitive subject matter, say the tape, aired last Thursday by Al-Jazeera, appears to affirm a link between Al Qaeda and the July 7 attacks -- but it doesn't prove Zawahiri or Qaeda head Osama bin Laden ordered them."

DOJ Statement On Detention Of Foreigners Decried. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (9/5) journalist Nat Hentoff writes, "I thought I was inured to learning about further evidence of this administration's disregard for our system of justice as it abuses international law and our statutes in the CIA's kidnapping of terrorism suspects to be sent to other nations. But an Aug. 9 statement in Brooklyn federal court by Mary Mason of the Justice Department's Constitutional Torts Section astonished me by its breadth of disregard for what we prize as our rule of law. … This is what Mrs. Mason, speaking for the U.S. government, said in federal court: 'Foreign citizens who change planes at airports in the United States can legally be seized, detained without charges, deprived of access to a lawyer or the courts, and even denied basic necessities like food.'"

PATRIOT ACT:

Long Beach, CA, Mulls Opposition To Patriot Act. The Long Beach (CA) Press-Telegram (9/5, Gewirtz) reports, "The City Council will be asked Tuesday to oppose provisions of the controversial USA PATRIOT Act that a citizens' group says will threaten civil liberty protections." The Press-Telegram continues, "Councilwomen Bonnie Lowenthal and Tonia Reyes Uranga will make the request, asking the council to support a recently adopted resolution in the State Senate that urges Congress to amend the act." The Press-Telegram adds, "Several cities, including Los Angeles, San Jose and San Francisco, have adopted similar measures in recent months regarding civil liberty aspects of the act. But whether the council will tackle the issue is unclear. … In the past, council members have had contentious debates over whether they should weigh in on various issues in front of the federal government. In March 2003, the council withdrew two contested resolutions after a debate over how, or whether, to address the war in Iraq. In June 2004, the council split 4-4 on a resolution to oppose the Federal Marriage Amendment. … Councilman Frank Colonna, who has opposed several past council efforts at intervention beyond the city's authority, said Tuesday's item falls into that category. … But Edith Pollach with the Long Beach Civil Liberties Defense Coalition said the council should take up the issue. She said nearly two dozen local groups will urge support for the measure Tuesday."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Report Questions Efficacy Of Airline Screening Program. The Washington Times (9/6, Seper) reports an airline anti-terrorism screening plan "may not be able to tell the Department of Homeland Security how many passenger records are being screened or project the number of terrorist-watch-list 'hits' to be sent to the nation's Terrorist Screening Center (TSC)." The Justice Department's Office of Inspector General "said the program shortfalls, found in a lengthy audit, have hurt the TSC's ability to plan its role in the government's new 'Secure Flight' program, an initiative to let the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) compare the names of commercial airline passengers with TSC's consolidated terrorist watch list."

US Muslims Seek To Limit Appeal Of Extremists. The Wall Street Journal (9/6, Sataline) reports, "Calling the terrorist attacks on London a wake-up call, Muslim-American organizations have launched a number of programs that are designed, in part, to prevent or root out disgruntled Muslims who might be tempted to use their religion to justify violence." The Islamic Society of North America "plans to distribute tens of thousands of pamphlets at mosques and cultural centers that spell out the Quran's injunctions against violence." Another "broad-based organization, the Muslim Public Affairs Council, is expanding its program to teach local mosques to partner with local communities and law enforcement."

DOJ_NMG_0002500

9/11 Commission Successor Seeks Information On Able Danger. The Washington Times (9/5, Waterman) reports, "Members of the September 11 commission think they have been left swinging in the wind by the growing revelations about a secret Pentagon program that may have identified the ringleader of the hijackings as an al Qaeda operative more than a year before the attacks. 'Other people have questions they need to answer,' said Al Felzenberg, spokesman for the commission's embattled successor body, the 9/11 Public Discourse Project." The Times notes, "At the center of the controversy are claims that the secret project, code-named Able Danger, in 2000 produced a chart bearing the names -- and in some people's recollections, photographs -- of about 60 people thought linked to al Qaeda. Among the names was that of Mohamed Atta, the ringleader of the attacks. If the claims turn out to be true, it will entail a major rewrite of the commission's accounts of the missed opportunities to thwart the attacks."

DHS General Counsel Understands Both Private, Public Sector. The Legal Times (9/5, Blum) reports, "If any lawyer knows the Department of Homeland Security inside and out, it's Philip Perry. … Three years ago, as a senior White House lawyer, Perry helped create the new department. Later, as a partner at Washington's Latham & Watkins, he actively lobbied the DHS on behalf of two Fortune 500 companies. Then, about three months ago, the 41-year-old completed the circle, joining the agency as its general counsel." The Times continues, "In many ways, Perry is following Washington's most common career path. Lawyers in the capital have always swung between the federal government and law firms. But if you want to get off on the right foot with Perry, you better not refer to that flight pattern as the 'revolving door.' … 'The term "revolving door" implies people going in and out of government in order to obtain monetary gain,' Perry says. 'The reason people go into government is to serve their country. It's not appropriate to describe that as a revolving door.'" The Times adds, "Perry, who is married to Vice President Dick Cheney's oldest daughter, Elizabeth, has held three jobs in the Bush administration. In his current post—the first to require Senate confirmation—Perry oversees roughly 1,500 lawyers. In addition to its usual portfolio, his office is now handling legal aspects of the government's response to the devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina. And, in fact, Perry canceled a planned Labor Day weekend fishing excursion with his father-in-law to deal with the crisis. … Perry's work ethic seems to match that of his notoriously intense boss, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. During August, when much of official Washington tends to dawdle, Perry pushed his staff to complete work on 30 separate regulations."

WAR NEWS:

US Sets Trap For Insurgents Fleeing Tall Afar. The Washington Post (9/5, A24, Finer) reports, "Under the cover of a moonless night, U.S. soldiers on Sunday strung nearly a mile of razor-sharp concertina wire across the northern edge of a [Tall Afar] neighborhood dominated by insurgents to prevent them from fleeing without a showdown. Several small teams of five or six troops quickly uncoiled spools of wire and fastened it along the deserted sidewalk of a broad thoroughfare. The cordon was intended to prevent insurgents from blending in with the hundreds of people who fled the city during heavy clashes Sunday. … More than 5,000 U.S. and Iraqi soldiers entered Tall Afar on Friday in a broad sweep for insurgents who have held sway in the northern city since a previous U.S. invasion, and subsequent withdrawal, last September. In three days of fighting, as many as 200 insurgents have been killed. Two U.S. and four Iraqi soldiers have been wounded, none seriously."

Saddam Trial Will Begin October 19. The Financial Times (9/5, Negus) reports Saddam Hussein will "go on trial on October 19 on charges related to the repression of Shia in a central Iraqi town in 1982," said Laith Kubba, the prime ministerial spokesman. Kubba "was subsequently quoted as saying that Mr Hussein could be executed shortly after his trial -- possibly raising objections from the Kurds and other groups anxious to see crimes against their communities brought to trial." Saddam's "co-defendants would include Barzan Ibrahim, his half-brother and then-chief of intelligence, Taha Yassin Ramadan, former vice-president, former top judge Awad Badar Al-Bandar, and four former local members of the ruling Ba'ath party."

The New York Times (9/5, Oppel) reports, "After the failed attack on Mr. Hussein, Iraqi officials executed men and boys from Dujail, a largely Shiite town 35 miles north of Baghdad. Investigators for the special tribunal that will try Mr. Hussein have said another 1,500 Dujail residents were later ordered incarcerated in a prison in a desolate stretch of desert near the Saudi Arabian border."

The Washington Post (9/5, A25, Knickmeyer) reports, "The Iraqi government is considering waiving further proceedings against former president Saddam Hussein if he is convicted at his trial on charges stemming from the massacre of 143 Shiite Muslims in 1982, a senior spokesman said Sunday." Kubba "said Sunday that if Hussein is convicted in the first case, any sentence is likely to be carried out as swiftly as possible." The Post adds, "The Shiite-led interim government is believed to have chosen the case in part because of its narrow focus and the possibility of tracing the killings back to Hussein. Other accusations against him, including state-orchestrated massacres of thousands of Kurds and Shiites, are much broader."

DOJ_NMG_0002501

Insurgents Allied With Zarqawi Claim Control Of Iraqi Border Town. The Washington Post (9/6, A20, Knickmeyer, Finer) reports, "Fighters loyal to militant leader Abu Musab Zarqawi asserted control over the key Iraqi border town of Qaim on Monday, killing U.S. collaborators and enforcing strict Islamic law, according to tribal members, officials, residents and others in the town and nearby villages." Residents said "the foreign-led fighters controlled by Zarqawi, a Jordanian, apparently had been exerting authority in the town, within two miles of the Syrian border, since at least the start of the weekend. A sign posted at an entrance to the town declared, 'Welcome to the Islamic Republic of Qaim.'" Meanwhile, the US Army "warned noncombatants to leave a portion of the northeastern city of Tall Afar ahead of an expected assault on an insurgent stronghold there."

Al Qaeda Group Claims Responsibility For Interior Ministry Attack. ABC World News Tonight (9/5, story 16, :15, Gibson) reported, "In Baghdad, a major attack on the Iraqi Interior Ministry. Up to 30 gunmen descended on the ministry in 10 cars, and opened fire with rocket propelled grenades, mortars, and automatic rifles. Two policemen were killed and five were wounded. The Iraqi wing of Al Qaeda said on a Website it launched the attack."

USA Today/AP (9/6, Yacoub) reports, "The insurgents, who fired automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades, withdrew after about 15 minutes. There was no report of insurgent casualties." The Washington Post (9/6) also reports the AP story.

US Bracing For More Confrontations With Insurgents As Elections Approach. The New York Times (9/6, Moss) reports the American military "recently moved into this small town" of Faris "10 miles south of Falluja, one of the most violent locales in Iraq, to secure it for the coming elections, and the insurgents took all of a day to respond. They fired a rocket that missed the Americans and landed instead in a nearby playground, killing a 12-year-old boy and wounding eight other children." Some residents "are directing their anger not at the insurgents but at the marines, whose arrival, they say, drew the attack." The military is "bracing for a surge of situations like this one as American and Iraqi forces race to establish security for the referendum on the new Iraqi constitution to be held on Oct. 15." Faris and Ameriya "have been without police officers since February, when the police force collapsed in the face of withering attacks by insurgents, who then used the communities as safe havens from which to mount their attacks, Marine officers said, and to intimidate civilians."

Top Iraqi Officials Criticize Arab Leaders For Lack Of Support. The New York Times (9/6, Worth) reports that in "an unusual public rebuke, President Jalal Talabani angrily criticized other Arab states on Monday, saying they had insulted Iraq by not sending diplomats to Baghdad and had not sent condolence letters about the stampede last week in which almost 1,000 Shiite pilgrims were killed." Talabani, "a Kurd, amplified complaints by other Iraqi leaders about the Arab states' failure to recognize the stampede, which caused the highest one-day death toll since the American-led invasion. The complaints, aimed at mostly Sunni leaders, hinted at a sectarian bias against Iraq, where Shiites are about 60 percent of the population." Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shiite, "hinted at similar criticism on Monday when asked about the emir of Qatar, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani, who donated $100 million to the American victims of Hurricane Katrina but nothing to the victims of the stampede." The Times adds the comments by Talabani and Jaafari "came at a time of heightened tension with other Arab nations. Last week Amr Moussa, the secretary general of the Arab League, issued a public criticism of Iraq's new constitution - largely written by Shiites and Kurds - in which he echoed the criticisms by some Sunni Arabs in Iraq." But "some Iraqi leaders asked why Mr. Moussa was willing to denounce the new draft constitution now, after the Arab League had been notably silent about Iraq's lack of a constitution under Saddam Hussein."

Annan Says Iraq Worse Terror Problem Than Taliban-Era Afghanistan. The Washington Times (9/6) reports UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said the "US-led invasion of Iraq has turned the country into a new hub of terrorism worse than Afghanistan under the Taliban." Annan also said "in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp. that he expected to face blame over the Iraqi oil-for-food program when investigators deliver a report this week." Annan "told BBC World Service radio that the war was contributing to Muslim anger throughout the world." Annan said, "I think there are many Muslims that are extremely unhappy today. Unhappy because they feel victimized, they feel isolated, they feel victimized in their own society, they feel victimized in the West, and they feel this profiling against them. And the Iraqi situation has not helped matters. In fact, one used to be worried about Afghanistan being the center of terrorist activities. My sense is that Iraq has become a major problem, and in fact, it's worse than Afghanistan." The Times adds that regarding the "oil-for-food investigation, Mr. Annan said he believed chief investigator Paul Volcker would criticize him and others involved in the $64 billion program."

DOJ_NMG_0002502

Bush Urged To Emphasize National Security When Discussing Iraq. In his Roll Call column (9/6), executive editor Morton Kondracke says President Bush has "made an important shift as he tries to bolster public support for the Iraq war, moving from idealism to a hard national security argument. He needs to stress the new message more. Unpopular though the idea may be, he may also have to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq in order to have any hope of defeating the insurgency. And, for sure, he has to get the Pentagon to stop talking about drawing down U.S. troop levels next year and get with Bush's own program: The United States stays until Iraq is secure." Bush "continues to make it clear that America is at war. What he must do now is make it unmistakable to the American people what the stakes of the war are and provide adequate forces to win it."

Iraqi Youth Experiencing Traumatic Events. The Washington Post (9/6, C1, Shadid) reports in the experience of 16-year-old Iraqi girl Amal Salman in Baghdad. Since she "had begun keeping her diary in 2003, Amal had witnessed the events of a lifetime: an invasion and the only government she knew toppled in a few weeks; an occupation; promises of prosperity and the disappointment that followed; an insurgency and the specter of civil war." But one Thursday morning "was the first time she had seen death" after a series of car bombings.

Iraq Veteran Records Experiences In Poetry. The New York Times (9/6, Kelley) reports vet José Díaz, 35, "who came to the United States from Cuba on the Mariel boatlift in 1980, has written a poem included in 'Voices in Wartime' (Whit Press, 2005), an anthology that explores the experience of war through literature."

Officials Say US, Afghan Troops Killed 25 Insurgents In Two Raids. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Watson) reports US and Afghan forces "killed 25 suspected Taliban fighters and captured dozens more in operations in two southern provinces over two days, Afghan and U.S. officials said." On Monday, US and Afghan forces "killed 12 suspected militants and detained nine others in a raid in Zabol province, the U.S. military said." The operation in Zabol "followed a raid in neighboring Kandahar province in which U.S. and Afghan forces killed 13 suspected Taliban fighters, and captured dozens more, in a remote area where a political candidate was kidnapped and executed last week, a provincial official said."

The New York Times (9/6, Gall) reports Afghan and US forces "have mounted an operation in recent days in a remote mountainous district of southern Afghanistan in pursuit of a group of insurgents." Afghan and American officials said "that 13 insurgents suspected of ties to the country's former Taliban rulers had been killed and more than 40 people had been detained." The area of combat "is the same district, Ghorak, where suspected Taliban insurgents kidnapped, and claimed to have killed, five people on Saturday - a local election candidate, a government official and three police officers. An American spokesman, Col. James Yonts, said the operation was not directly linked to their abduction, but was based on intelligence about enemy activity."

Anarchy In Baghdad After US Invasion Described. In the second installment of a three part series, the Washington Post (9/5, C1, Shadid) reports, "On April 10, 2003, the day after the fall of President Saddam Hussein, the veil had been lifted but no one was sure what it revealed. … Emotions -- euphoria, vindictiveness, desperation, confusion -- surged up from the people after years of silence and restraint. The city seemed like a dazed inmate stumbling out of his cell and squinting into the harsh sunlight. Some spoke of anarchy: Armed civilians had begun to crack the monopoly on violence held only weeks earlier by Hussein's government and the American military forces now occupying Iraq. Thousands of residents hurried to plunder everything from trucks and wooden carts to the urinals, copper pipes and electrical wiring of public buildings. Hospitals and embassies fell prey, along with ministries, government offices, Baath Party headquarters and the stone mansions, faced in onyx, of Hussein's lieutenants.

Former Officials In Soviet-Backed Government Taking Part In Afghan Elections. The New York Times (9/5, Gall) reports, "The political return of dozens of former Communists, among them General Shahnawaz Tanai, 54, who was Afghan chief of staff, then defense minister in the brutal Soviet occupation in the 1980's, is one of the most contentious issues of this election campaign. General Tanai is perhaps most infamous for leading a coup in 1990, with the renegade mujahedeen commander Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, against President Muhammad Najibullah. The coup failed and he fled to Pakistan, where he lived in exile until Aug. 7. The general is not running in Afghanistan's parliamentary and provincial elections on Sept. 18, but he is calculating on winning a sizable bloc in Parliament with candidates from his Afghanistan Peace Movement Party and two other parties of former Communists who have joined him in a coalition. They are fielding 200 candidates around the country, most of them former Communists and some Soviet-era ministers and participants in the half a dozen coups of the last three decades."

DOJ_NMG_0002503

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Corporate Scandal Tip Lines Pose Dilemma. The Wall Street Journal (Reilly, Nassauer) reports, "In the wake of scandals at Enron and WorldCom, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act directed companies listed in the U.S. to set up so-called whistle-blower hot lines for employees everywhere to confidentially report potential corporate abuses. … But those anonymous tip lines now pose unforeseen problems in Europe, where data-protection laws make it difficult to accuse someone of impropriety anonymously. These laws go beyond basic privacy concerns: They hold that citizens have a right to know who is collecting data about them, and they also may include restrictions on revealing corporate information to outsiders." The Journal continues, "A French agency, for example, has ruled that anonymous whistle-blower tip lines don't guarantee adequate protection for people accused of wrongdoing. … As a result, many U.S. and European companies are in a legal bind: If they set up whistle-blower hot lines in subsidiaries in France, and possibly elsewhere in Europe, they might run afoul of local laws. If they don't, they might violate Sarbanes-Oxley, the 2002 corporate-governance law enforced by the Securities and Exchange Commission." The Journal adds, "Companies are being told 'I have to either chop off my left hand or my right hand,' said Christopher Kuner, a partner at law firm Hunton & Williams in Brussels who specializes in international privacy and data-protection law. … The impasse underscores the far-reaching, and often unanticipated, impact of Sarbanes-Oxley, which executives on both sides of the Atlantic have complained is overly restrictive and has even led some European firms to seek to "deregister" their U.S. stocks. … Two U.S. companies -- McDonald's Corp. and Exide Technologies -- are the first test cases of the potential whistle-blower impasse. In late May, both companies were told by France's Data Protection Authority, known as the CNIL, that planned ethics hot lines at units they operate in France were illegal. Both companies declined to offer specific detail about how they are addressing the decision."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US Faces Dilemma In Cuban Spy Cases. The Los Angeles Times (9/5, Williams) reports, "They're known in Cuba as the Five Heroes and their faces, names and the details of their seven-year legal drama are familiar to schoolchildren and sugar cane cutters across the Communist island." The Times continues, "The Cuban Five, as they are known in the U.S., were convicted four years ago here in Miami of spying for President Fidel Castro and sentenced to maximum-security prisons for terms of 15 years to life. Cubans' reaction to the case rivals the collective fury that mobilized them to demand the return of castaway Elian Gonzalez in 2000." The Times adds, "Since a federal appeals court overturned the quintet's espionage convictions last month on grounds that their trial venue was tainted by fierce anti-Castro sentiments, the U.S. government must decide whether to request a retrial. … The case has been one of the most divisive issues between Washington and Havana since the five were arrested in 1998. The men admitted to being Cuban agents but have insisted throughout that they were only gathering intelligence on radical and sometimes violent exile groups to protect Castro and their Cuban homeland. … U.S. prosecutors, who contended the five were spreading disinformation, posing a threat to exiles and trying to steal military secrets because one of the men worked as a laborer at a Key West naval air station, won convictions in June 2001. The Miami federal court also found alleged ringleader Gerardo Hernandez guilty of murder conspiracy, based on allegations that he provided intelligence to Havana that led to the deaths of four Cuban exiles shot down by Cuban MIGs in international airspace in 1996."

FBI Widens Niagara Falls Corruption Probe. The Niagara Falls (NY) Reporter (9/5, Hudson) reports, "The widening federal corruption probe of Mayor Vincenzo V. Anello has City Hall employees edgy as more grand jury subpoenas draw an increasing number of civil servants into the tawdry case." The Reporter continues, "On Aug. 25, city Law Department Clerk Donna Winstanley was summoned to testify in the scandal. Winstanley, who is responsible for the department's time/date stamp machine, was ordered to bring Anello's financial disclosure statements for the years 2002, 2003 and 2004, along with any charts or other records designed to track when the documents were actually filed." The Reporter adds, "Sources familiar with the original documents say that some filings, for different years, appear to have been done at the same time and with the same pen. Federal agents are particularly interested in the filing for 2004, the year when Anello accepted more than $45,000 in unsecured "loans" from prominent downtown developer 'Smokin'' Joe Anderson and Kathy Kajfasz, sister of John Kajfasz, a principal in the group Anello gifted with 18 holes of the Hyde Park Golf Course. … At the time, Anello was serving as a city councilman and the payments were made just before and immediately after his election as mayor. None of his disclosure forms was stamped with the time or date, and the public documents only came to light following Freedom of Information Act requests by the Niagara Falls Reporter and the Niagara Gazette."

DOJ_NMG_0002504

Alleged ALF Member Pleads Guilty To Animal Enterprise Terrorism In Mink Releases. The AP (9/4) reports alleged ALF member Peter Daniel Young, "accused of freeing thousands of minks across the U.S. Midwest has pleaded guilty and faces two years in prison. … Young pleaded guilty Friday to two counts of animal enterprise terrorism." The AP notes, "Young and his accomplice, Justin Samuel, both disappeared after they were indicted in 1998, but Samuel was captured in Belgium the following year. He struck a deal with prosecutors and served two years in prison."

Tennessee Lawmakers Await Possible Additional Arrests In FBI Probe. The AP (9/6, Gouras) reports, "All lawmakers can do is watch and wait as a federal probe into bribery and corruption at the state Capitol continues to sink colleagues. Legislators said they have heard the rumors that more arrests are on the way, but don't know if it will include local officials like the one nabbed last week or more state lawmakers. … 'I believe the Department of Justice and the FBI know a lot more about these investigations than I do,' said House Speaker Jimmy Naifeh." The AP notes, "Lawmakers are trying their best at damage control, though, and are rushing work by a special panel to draft tougher ethics laws for the state. But leaders say new guilty pleas or arrests won't force them to rush their work, or change their plans."

Cleveland Corruption Probe Figures Sentenced To Prison. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (9/3, Tobin) reports former East Cleveland Mayor Emmanuel Onunwor, two years since he "tearfully admitted to FBI agents that he took bribes from businessman Nate Gray," was sentenced to nine years in prison on Friday. Additionally, "four others were sentenced Friday in the corruption scheme in which bribes were exchanged for public contracts in Cleveland, East Cleveland, Houston and New Orleans. Ricardo Teamor, a onetime associate of former Cleveland Mayor Michael R. White, was sentenced to four months in prison and four months of house arrest." Former Houston building services director Monique McGilbra "was sentenced to three years in prison" for "accepting cash and lavish gifts such as a $700 purse and all-expenses-paid trips to New Orleans from Gray and two businessmen trying to get contracts with Houston. Former Honeywell executive Brent Jividen…was sentenced to 2½ years in prison" for "bribing McGilbra with gifts," and Oliver Spellman "was given two years' probation for accepting bribes from Gray while serving as chief of staff to the mayor of Houston."

The Houston Chronicle (9/3, Feldstein) also reports on the sentencings and notes, "federal officials have said more investigations are ongoing in Houston but have declined to offer details."

Fugitive Accused Of Elaborate Counterfeiting Scheme In Philadelphia. The Philadelphia Inquirer (9/4, Shiffman) reports Hong Kong fugitive Joseph Mo Pun Lau "was already an established identity thief by late 2003, according to the FBI. Using a crude tool, agents said, he fished envelopes from street-corner mail-collection boxes throughout the Philadelphia suburbs, counterfeiting whatever checks and credit cards he found inside." But "rustrated by the slow, risky and unpredictable process of snaring letters one at a time," Lau "surreptitiously videotaped letter carriers as they opened the boxes, zooming in on their keys. Lau used those images to calculate measurements for the grooves in the keys and created brass duplicates. … 'The FBI is not aware of anything else like this,' bureau spokeswoman Jerri Williams said." The Inquirer notes, "Lau's gang stole $140,000 worth of checks, counterfeited them, and deposited them in 16 different bank accounts, according to an affidavit by Philadelphia-based FBI Agent Catherine L. Nowery."

Baltimore USA To Tackle Gang Crimes. The Baltimore Sun (9/6, Dolan) reports, "Justice Department officials have approved funding of a new federal prosecutor to exclusively handle gang-related prosecutions inside Maryland's U.S. attorney's office." The Sun continues, "The move comes after a sweeping indictment last month against 19 suspected members of the Hispanic gang MS-13 who were arrested on federal racketeering charges that include a string of homicides and attempted killings in Montgomery and Prince George's counties." The Sun adds, "U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein, who took office this summer, said he told Justice Department officials that the state had an urgent need to beef up its prosecutorial resources to focus on gangs in suburban Washington and on gun-related crime in the Baltimore region. … His office has 65 prosecutors split between the state's two federal courts in Baltimore and Greenbelt. Rosenstein plans to fill five vacant slots within the next few months. A new agreement with the city will bring two additional prosecutors to Baltimore to handle gun-related prosecutions." The Sun notes, "Andrea Smith, an assistant U.S. attorney in Baltimore who helps coordinate the local Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force, said the new anti-gang prosecutor should help prosecutors who have used a similar strategy against drug-related, violent organizations, such as the Lexington Terrace gang in the city."

PG Co. MD Records 6th Homicide In 5 Days. The Washington Times (9/6, Cella) reports that a double shooting early yesterday in Suitland left one man dead,

DOJ_NMG_0002505

"marking the sixth homicide in Prince George's County in the first five days of September." Police said the shooting occurred in the 4600 block of Chelsea Way at about 1 am. Kenneth Stanford, 22, of the 4700 block of Hudson Avenue had been shot several times. He was taken to a hospital, where he died. Also shot was a 28-year-old man, who was hospitalized. The paper notes the killing brings the number of homicides this year in Prince George's County to 119, up from 96 at this time last year. The Times adds the county "has experienced a spate of violence since Thursday, when Charmaine Edwards, 21, of Southwest was found fatally shot in her car on Keystone Manor Drive in Morningside. Four persons were fatally shot in the county Friday. Three of those killings occurred in the daylight hours. Police said that as of now there is no indication the killings are related. The Times also reported Anne Arundel County police charged Brandon Iam Kellam, 16, with second-degree murder after the stabbing death of a 17-year-old boy outside a Glen Burnie mall Saturday night and that Metropolitan Police in DC are investigating a fatal shooting that happened at about 9 p.m. Saturday in the 3700 block of Hayes Street Northeast.

CIVIL LAW:

Lobby Shops Look To Build On Success In Latest BRAC Round. The Hill (9/6, Tiron) reports in its "Business and Lobbying" column, "Some high-powered Washington lobbying shops are banking on their freshly collected laurels to get even more business from the communities that hired them to get military bases off the Pentagon's chopping block. As the independent Base Closure and Realignment (BRAC) Commission is getting ready to send its final deliberations to President Bush on Sept. 8, lobbyists are monitoring the BRAC process here in Washington while corralling communities to extend their contracts. … Among Washington lobbying shops scoring large victories for their clients are the Rhoads Group and Kutak Rock LLP, which represented Ellsworth Air Force Base in South Dakota; the Washington Group, which defended the Naval Submarine Base New London in Connecticut; Patton Boggs, which represented the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard in Maine; Akin Gump, which worked for the states of New York, Kansas, Maryland and Arkansas; and Spectrum Group, which represented the state of Louisiana and a large Defense Finance and Accounting Service center in Cleveland. … While several lobbying shops contacted by The Hill said that they did not receive so-called "success fees" for their work on BRAC, Keith Ashdown with Taxpayers for Common Sense said that it is possible for these firms to have an understanding with the communities to be retained for several more years."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

9th Circuit Rules Sexual Content Not Needed For Harassment Claims. The California Recorder (9/6, Scheck) reports, "You don't have to be a groper, lecher or explicit misogynist to get sued for sex-based harassment, a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Friday." The Recorder continues, "The opinion, in a case originating at an Alaska teachers union, said that Thomas Harvey, a manager accused of 'shouting, 'screaming,' foul language, invading employees' personal space ... and [making] threatening gestures' may be sued for gender-based discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, even though his acts were not overtly motivated by the victims' gender. … 'We hold that offensive conduct that is not facially sex-specific nonetheless may violate Title VII if there is sufficient circumstantial evidence of qualitative and quantitative differences in the harassment suffered by female and male employees,' wrote Senior Judge Alfred Goodwin in a unanimous decision." The Recorder notes, "Senior Judge Melvin Brunetti and Judge William Fletcher concurred. In the case, male and female employees agreed that women bore the brunt of Harvey's outbursts. … Employment lawyers said the opinion offers encouragement to plaintiff lawyers whose clients don't fit the traditional mold of harassment victims. … The opinion stands to strengthen plaintiffs' arguments that adverse effects of an employer's behavior are more important than intent."

11h Circuit Rules Georgia Jail Was Justified In Strip Search. The Fulton County Daily Report (9/6, Simonson) reports, "Atlanta's federal appeals court, with apparent reluctance, ruled Wednesday that a North Georgia county's policy of strip-searching every prisoner booked into jail violated the Constitution." The Report continues, "The court also noted that the policy didn't necessarily violate the rights of individual prisoners who were searched, so long as jailers had 'reasonable suspicion' that a detainee might possess weapons or contraband. … The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals made the ruling in the case of Janet M. Hicks, who sued Habersham County's sheriff and jail supervisor after she was strip-searched following her 2001 misdemeanor arrest for a domestic-violence dispute with her estranged husband. Hicks v. Moore, No. 03-13686." The Report adds, "According to the 11th Circuit's ruling, Hicks was strip-searched by a female sheriff's department employee and was not touched during the search. … About three years ago -- and after Hicks' strip search -- the sheriff in charge of the jail at that time, Richard Moore, changed the jail's policy, and the facility no longer strip-searches everyone who is booked. … A unanimous three-judge panel ruled that the jail did not violate Hicks' rights, because her arrest for a violent crime justified a strip search. The 11th Circuit effectively ended Hicks' federal case against the jail and reversed a district court ruling that denied the Habersham government employees' motion for summary judgment."

DOJ_NMG_0002506

Foes Of New Georgia Voter ID Law To File Suit. The New York Times/AP (9/6) reports, "Opponents of a new Georgia law requiring voters to show photo identification at the polls are planning a federal lawsuit challenging the measure, which they fear will lower voter turnout. The bill eliminates the use of formerly accepted forms of voter identification like Social Security cards, birth certificates or utility bills. … Under the Voting Rights Act, Georgia and other states with a history of suppressing minority voting must get federal permission to change their voting laws." Democrats "had argued that the idea was a political move by the Republican Party to depress voting among minorities, the elderly and the poor, all traditional bases for Democrats." The ACLU "is representing the plaintiffs in the case."

Gender Pay Gap Attributed To Factors Other Than Discrimination. In an op-ed for the New York Times (9/5) Warren Farrell author of "Why Men Earn More," writes, "Nothing disturbs working women more than the statistics often mentioned on Labor Day showing that they are paid only 76 cents to men's dollar for the same work. … When I was on the board of the National Organization for Women in New York City, I blamed discrimination for that gap." However, "After years of research, I discovered 25 differences in the work-life choices of men and women. All 25 lead to men earning more money, but to women having better lives. … I want my daughters to know that people who work 44 hours a week make, on average, more than twice the pay of someone working 34 hours a week. And that pharmacists now earn almost as much as doctors. But only by abandoning our focus on discrimination against women can we discover these opportunities for women."

California Set To Vote On Gay Marriage Bill As Massachusetts Decisions Near. The Washington Times (9/6, Wetzstein) reports, "A bill legalizing homosexual 'marriage' in California is scheduled to go up for its second vote in the state Assembly this week, amid vigorous lobbying." Opponents "think California lawmakers legally cannot enact same-sex 'marriage' because voters approved Proposition 22, which says only marriages involving one man and one woman are valid in California." Meanwhile, Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly "is expected to issue his decision" this week "on whether to certify a constitutional marriage amendment filed by a citizens' group called VoteOnMarriage.org." Foes of the amendment "say it is unconstitutional in light of the 2003 Goodridge decision, which legalized same-sex 'marriage' in Massachusetts." Also, on Sept. 14, "the Massachusetts legislature is scheduled to meet in a constitutional convention to offer a second vote on a marriage amendment that passed last year. The amendment, which would disallow same-sex 'marriage' but create civil unions, is unpopular," but "if Mr. Reilly rejects VoteOnMarriage.org's amendment, some lawmakers may decide to vote in favor of the civil-union amendment."

ANTITRUST:

Wal-Mart Chief Raises Eyebrows By Suggesting Antitrust Probe Of UK Competitor. The Los Angeles Times (9/6, Iritani) reports, "Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the retail giant infamous for crushing competitors and putting mom-and-pop retailers out of business, is now worried that its British rival might be too big." The Times continues, "H. Lee Scott Jr., Wal-Mart's chief executive, told a London newspaper last week that British authorities should be concerned about a retail chain having too much market clout." The Times adds, "Tesco, Britain's largest supermarket, has a 30% share of the food market and is expanding fast, thanks in part to an aggressive discounting program. Wal-Mart-owned Asda Group Ltd., Britain's second-largest retail chain, controls 16% of the market. … 'As you get over 30% and higher, I am sure there is a point where government is compelled to intervene, particularly in the U.K., where you have the planning laws that make it difficult to compete,' Scott told the Times of London, adding that 'at some point, the government has to look at it.'" The Times notes, "Those remarks raised some eyebrows in the United States, where the Bentonville, Ark., retailer is regularly accused of abusing its clout to squeeze pennies out of its supply chain, trounce its competition and expand its sales. … 'Wal-Mart is asking for an antitrust investigation of a competitor?' asked Albert Foer, president of the American Antitrust Institute in Washington, a think tank. 'How delicious.'"

Recording Industry Hails Australian Ruling Against Kazaa. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (9/6) EMI Music Chairman Alain Levy writes, "Monday's court ruling in Australia against Kazaa, the biggest brand name in international music piracy, is the latest sign of a turning tide in our industry's efforts to create a thriving pro-consumer, legitimate digital music business. It is also a reminder that even with the greatest music, the best technology and the most willing fans, we cannot create this bright digital future alone: public education and proper enforcement of intellectual property rights, by courts and by governments, have a vital part to play as well. This applies to any record company, from the largest major to the smallest." Levy adds, "A big public awakening has happened on the issue – helped by waves of industry information campaigns. Probably more significant still, the lawsuits taken out in 12 countries, which now total over 14,000, have clearly played an important part in deterring would-be illegal file-sharers and containing internet piracy. These strategies must be sustained because they are working."

DOJ_NMG_0002507

The WP (9/6, Corder) reports, "Hailed as a victory by the recording industry that brought the suit, the decision has implications well beyond Australia, where Kazaa executives are based, because Kazaa's users span the globe. In some ways, it mirrors the US Supreme Court's June ruling that Hollywood and the music industry can sue technology companies that encourage their customers to steal music and movies over the Internet."

Recording Industry Makes Gains Against Music Piracy. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (9/6) EMI Music Chairman Alain Levy writes, "Monday's court ruling in Australia against Kazaa, the biggest brand name in international music piracy, is the latest sign of a turning tide in our industry's efforts to create a thriving pro-consumer, legitimate digital music business. It is also a reminder that even with the greatest music, the best technology and the most willing fans, we cannot create this bright digital future alone: public education and proper enforcement of intellectual property rights, by courts and by governments, have a vital part to play as well. This applies to any record company, from the largest major to the smallest." Levy continues, "The ruling from Australia has important implications for our business. The Sydney court has not only reinforced the message handed down on Grokster from a unanimous US Supreme Court in July – namely that internet file- sharing services can be liable for music piracy. The world's best-known, and until recently its biggest unauthorized file-sharing service, has been found liable for facilitating copyright theft and ordered to stop. The message for similar networks that distribute copyrighted repertoire on a mass scale without permission is clear: it is time to change your ways or stop. Change your systems; respect copyright; use technology responsibly to benefit the music community and not to harm it. These are momentous rulings for a creative, intellectual property business like EMI, as well as for the artists we invest in and for the legitimate digital market we are working to create. Investment in music is our business and protection of our content is central to everything we do. Our ability to invest in music, and to offer it to our consumers via downloads, ring tones or other digital formats, is integrally dependent on our ability to contain music piracy. Taken together, the Grokster and Kazaa judgments are crucial milestones for us." Levy adds, "The digital music market is up and running, and our challenge now is to build on the successful start. I am confident and I take little notice of the skeptics. A few years ago no one held much hope for record companies breaking into what was then a 100 per cent internet pirate market. The mood is very different today. Virtually all our front line music is available in a huge array of digital channels. Music is becoming easier to buy than to steal. But the tide is turning for other reasons, too. Public attitudes are shifting towards good and responsible practices in downloading music. A big public awakening has happened on the issue – helped by waves of industry information campaigns. Probably more significant still, the lawsuits taken out in 12 countries, which now total over 14,000, have clearly played an important part in deterring would-be illegal file-sharers and containing internet piracy. These strategies must be sustained because they are working."

The Washington Post/AP (9/6, 8:37 PM, Corder) reports an Australian judge yesterday orders "ordered distributors of the popular file-swapping program Kazaa to alter the software, which millions have downloaded, so it can no longer be used for music piracy." The paper adds, "Hailed as a victory by the recording industry that brought the suit, the decision has implications well beyond Australia, where Kazaa executives are based, because Kazaa's users span the globe. In some ways, it mirrors the US Supreme Court's June ruling that Hollywood and the music industry can sue technology companies that encourage their customers to steal music and movies over the Internet." The Post notes Federal Court Judge Murray Wilcox determined in Monday's ruling that Kazaa's owners and distributors, led by Sharman Networks Ltd., took no action to rein in illegal file-sharing despite posted warnings on their Web site urging Kazaa users not to swap copyright material. Wilcox said it had been in the financial interest of Sharman and its partners "to maximize, not minimize, music file-sharing." He found six of the 10 defendants, including Sharman, its Sydney-based chief executive Nikki Hemming, as well as Altnet, a Sharman software partner, guilty of copyright infringement and ordered them to pay 90 percent of the record industry's costs in the case. A hearing will be set later to establish damages. The Post continues, "In a brief statement, Sharman said it would appeal and Kazaa software remained available online, with more than 800,000 downloads reported last week and 390 million total since Kazaa first became available in 2001. Sharman says its software is no different from a tape recorder or photocopier _ and that Kazaa could not control copyright infringement by users."

Chiron Directors Reject Novartis Takeover Offer. The Financial Times (9/6, Politi) reports that Chiron's independent directors have rejected drug maker Novartis $4.5 billion take over offer. A statement from Chiron board members called the Novartis in adequate. Chiron "also decided to make clear that Novartis's proposal had not been solicited by the company, conflicting with the impression given by Novartis last week." The Times says Novartis now faces "an uphill battle in its attempt to take full control of Chiron." The rejection "means Novartis might become embroiled in a long-running struggle to gain control of the company, which it is courting to gain access to the fast-growing market for vaccines.'

DOJ_NMG_0002508

ENVIRONMENT:

Federal Government Urged To Fund $14 Billion Coastal Restoration Project. In an appearance on NBC's Face The Nation (9/4, Russert) Mike Tidwell, author of "Bayou Farewell," commented, "You can't just fix the levees in New Orleans. We now have to have a massive coastal restoration project where we get the water out of the Mississippi River in a controlled fashion toward the Barrier islands, restore the wetlands. If you don't commit to this plan which is this $14 billion, costs of the Big Dig in Boston or two weeks of spending Iraq, you shouldn't fix a single window in New Orleans. You shouldn't pick up a single piece of debris because to do one without the other is to set the table for another nightmare."

NYTimes Praises Plan To Restore Louisiana Wetlands. The New York Times (9/5) editorializes, "Before Congress is a $14 billion plan to restore the vanishing wetlands and barrier islands off the Louisiana coast that in times past would have served as a buffer against the storm. The House has approved a modest $1.9 billion down payment on this plan, but it needs a push from President Bush and the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, to ensure Senate approval." The plan "would involve some delicate re-engineering of the natural system and is not without risk. Still, it could provide a measure of redemption for years of environmental carelessness for which Congress itself is largely responsible." The program before Congress "was hatched by the state's politicians and in its universities and drafted by the Army Corps of Engineers. It is supported by both industry and advocacy groups like the National Audubon Society and Environmental Defense, which helped with its design. It would start small, with three or four carefully calibrated pilot programs to divert water flow to the marshes, then go from there."

SCOTUS Ruling On Eminent Domain Sparks Backlash. The Washington Post (9/6, A2, Reid) reports that "the U.S. Supreme Court ruled on June 23 that the Constitution does not stop cities from seizing homes to make way for commercial development projects." Now, "all over the country, the court's decision in Kelo v. City of New London has sparked a furious reaction, with politicians of both parties proposing new legislation that would sharply limit the kind of seizure the court's decision validated. As a result, a decision first seen as a key legal victory for cities that want to use eminent domain for private projects has turned into a major setback on the political front for pro-development interests. The popular backlash has slowed or blocked many pending projects, as developers, their bankers and local governments suddenly face public furor." The Post notes, "Three states have already passed new laws in response to the Kelo decision. The statutes in Alabama and Texas sharply curtail eminent-domain condemnations for private development. … Delaware's new statute permits condemnation but sets new procedural requirements for local governments. Larry Morandi, an analyst at the National Conference of State Legislatures, predicts a rush of new laws next winter, when 44 state legislatures will be back in session. 'Most if not all state legislatures will be dealing with eminent-domain laws next year,' Morandi said. 'The outcry has been so sharp that many states already have task forces or study committees at work on this issue this summer. Most of the proposed legislation is designed to restrict the kind of governmental action that the court upheld in Kelo.'"

Government-Funded Cowboys Protect Against Invasion Of Cattle Fever Tick. The Washington Post (9/6, A23, Moreno) reports on a "small force of hardy men whose mission for almost 70 years has been to keep the dreaded Texas cattle fever tick confined to 900 miles of winding riverfront along the Mexican border." These USDA employees have "managed to marry his cowboying skills and love of desolate open range with benefits and a federal pension." They "make up the nation's front line against a scourge that decimated the cattle industry in 1906 and continues to be a threat as long as the cattle fever tick thrives south of the border and Mexican cows stray or are smuggled across the Rio Grande. … Today, the riders are fighting the worst infestation of cattle fever ticks in 30 years and are doing so in the face of budgetary shortfalls and bureaucratic turf wars."

Editor Says Landowners Should Manage Property In Public Interest. Jonathan Weber, founder and editor in chief of NewWest.Net, an online publication about the Rocky Mountain West, writes in the New York Times (9/6), "When it comes to public access, state and local officials - and voters - need to recognize that the heavy bias toward property rights that exists throughout the West is something that will increasingly serve a small minority of wealthy landowners, not mom-and-pop homesteaders or family farmers. This imbalance needs to change. County commissioners, who are often on the front lines, can't allow themselves to be intimidated by the threat of litigation over access issues. And they need strong back-up from state attorneys general. But a big part of the solution is in the hands of the landowners themselves. In an era of economic policies that are producing an ever-larger group of the super-rich, those who are wealthier than the rest of us have a responsibility to manage their properties at least partly in the public interest. They need to meet with their neighbors, get involved with the community and find compromises that work for everyone. In most cases, the locals will be more than receptive to even small gestures. After all, who wants to fight when the fish are biting?"

DOJ_NMG_0002509

