"To every nation, every province and every community across the world that is standing with the American people in this hour of need, I offer the thanks of my nation," he said. "The world is more compassionate and hopeful when we act together."

Mr. Bush also called on the United Nations to do more in the U.S.-led fight against AIDS and malaria in Africa. He said foreign aid and debt forgiveness will not eliminate global poverty without the economic catalyst of free trade.

"The United States is ready to eliminate all tariffs and subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same," he pledged. "This is key to overcoming poverty in the world's poorest nations."

Mr. Bush also pushed for various international initiatives to fight terrorism, stop the spread of nuclear weapons and curb the proliferation of chemical and biological weapons.

"We must send a clear message to the rulers of outlaw regimes that sponsor terror and pursue weapons of mass murder: You will not be allowed to threaten the peace and stability of the world," he said.

Although the United Nations did not support the U.S.-led Operation Iraqi Freedom in 2003, Mr. Bush yesterday praised the world body for supporting the fledgling democracy that has resulted from that war.

"The whole world has a vital interest in the success of a free Iraq, and no civilized nation has an interest in seeing a new terrorist state emerge in that country," he said. "The United Nations and its member states must continue to stand by the Iraqi people as they complete the journey to a fully constitutional government."

After his morning speech at U.N. headquarters, Mr. Bush spent the afternoon meeting with a variety of world leaders, including Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

The Foreign Aid Gap (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

Did the spirit of Bono somehow possess the body of President Bush on Wednesday? How else to explain the president's speech before the United Nations? He sounded more like a crusading anti-poverty rocker — or, worse on the bleeding-heart scale, a European president — than the man whose ambassador to the U.N. has been working behind the scenes to sabotage the world's most important anti-poverty initiative.

"To spread a vision of hope, the United States is determined to help nations that are struggling with poverty," Bush told more than 160 world leaders at the U.N. summit, which runs through Friday. "We are committed to the Millennium Development Goals…. We have a moral obligation to help others — and a moral duty to make sure our actions are effective."

But not, apparently, a moral obligation to live up to our commitments, or even tell the truth about them.

The Millennium Development Goals were approved by the U.N. in 2000. They constitute a revolutionary document, setting out objectives such as halving extreme poverty, reducing disease and child mortality and boosting education in the world's poorest nations by 2015. To make them a reality, U.N. members, including the United States, agreed in 2002 at a summit in Monterrey, Mexico, that wealthy nations would "make concrete efforts" to contribute 0.7% of their national income toward foreign aid by 2015.

At this week's summit, world leaders were supposed to adopt a set of reforms that would have improved the U.N.'s management and strengthened its ability to fight poverty and promote human rights. But John R. Bolton, appointed as ambassador to the U.N. by Bush after the Senate failed to confirm him, threw negotiators into disarray last month by introducing hundreds of last-minute amendments. Among them was the deletion of nearly all references to the millennium goals and the 0.7% target. Under pressure, Bolton relented and allowed the language to remain.

The Bush administration has made it abundantly clear that it has no intention of trying to reach the 0.7% goal. The United States has the second-worst record of the 22 donor nations whose contributions as a percentage of national income are tracked by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, giving just 0.16% in 2004 (only Italy is stingier). The European Union's 15 richest members, despite Italy's poor showing, agreed this year to contribute 0.51% of national income by 2010 and 0.7% by 2015.

Administration officials have said the 0.7% figure is arbitrary, that it represents a goal rather than a concrete commitment, that quality of aid is more important than quantity and that, at any rate, the United States has increased foreign aid dramatically. Wrong or misleading on all counts but the last.

Whether the 0.7% number is arbitrary is irrelevant; what matters is whether it's adequate. By that measure, if anything, it's too timid. The U.N. Millennium Project estimates that even if all the commitments are met, it may fall short of the amount needed to meet the Millennium Development Goals. Though the Monterrey statement wasn't very concrete, such vagueness is typical of international agreements; if heads of state don't intend to follow them, they shouldn't approve them. And the administration's statements on quality would be more convincing if its record in that area weren't so abysmal.

In its Human Development Report released last week, the U.N. identified several problems that make foreign aid less effective than it should be. Sometimes donors make aid contingent on onerous conditions; often they fail to coordinate similar projects, leading to repetition and waste. The United States is a prime offender in nearly every area. Particularly egregious is the practice of "tied aid" — the requirement that aid money be spent on goods and services from the donating country. U.S. aid money is commonly spent on expensive American contractors rather than given directly to poor nations, where it would do far more good.

The administration's best defense is that it has increased foreign aid, albeit from a paltry 0.1% of national income in 2000 to 0.16% last year. President Bush also deserves credit for making foreign aid a priority in a country where African poverty seldom shows up on the political radar screen. Yet this has the effect of making the administration's truculence on the Millennium Development Goals all the more frustrating.

The administration has not met its commitments, and the president has failed to live up to his own inspirational rhetoric. Until it has and he does, speeches like the one Bush delivered on Wednesday will continue to be seen as cynical political ploys.

Hopeful Words: On Helping The Poor (NYT)

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Let's face it: most Americans wouldn't know a Millennium Development Goal, a Monterrey Consensus or a Doha round if all three jumped out and hit them in the head. But those phrases have life-or-death importance to more than two billion people around the world who survive on barely anything. And yesterday at the United Nations, President Bush used them in front of the world.

To understand this good news, here's a quick primer.

The Millennium Development Goals make up an ambitious agenda adopted by the United Nations in 2000. Chief among them is the goal of cutting global poverty in half by 2015. They also call for tackling problems like hunger, disease and women's inequality. The goals include vague wording about how poor nations need to adopt good governance, and how rich nations need to give them money.

As this week's U.N. summit meeting approached, Mr. Bush's flame-throwing U.N. envoy, John Bolton, struck all mention of the Millennium Development Goals from the text of the agreement the world leaders are supposed to sign. After saner heads prevailed, some of that language was restored, although the agreement remains weak. Yesterday, Mr. Bush said it clearly: "We are committed to the Millennium Development Goals." Full stop.

That's important because America, the richest country on earth, is most able to help poor countries reach these goals.

That brings us to the Monterrey Consensus, named for the city in Mexico. (Diplomats like to name things after the city where they decided to do something.) In 2002, many members of the group meeting in New York this week trooped down to Monterrey to figure out how they were going to pay for the Millennium Development Goals. The text they signed said, "We urge developed countries that have not done so to make concrete efforts toward the target of 0.7 percent of gross national product as O.D.A. [official development assistance] to developing countries." Since then, Britain, France and Germany have all announced how they plan to do that by 2015. The United States, which was rated the world's second-stingiest rich country (behind Italy) by a U.N. report this month, gives just 0.18 percent of its G.N.P. to poorer countries. And since Monterrey, Bush administration officials have taken pains to tell everyone that the United States didn't commit to the 0.7 percent goal. But it's right there in Paragraph 42 of the Monterrey Consensus. Yesterday, Mr. Bush said, "I call on all the world's nations to implement the Monterrey Consensus." Including, we hope, America.

We end today's lesson with the Doha round, the trade negotiations begun in (you got it) Doha, Qatar, in 2002. That was just after Sept. 11, 2001, when America and Europe, trying to woo poor countries to join the war against terrorism, finally agreed to start negotiating an end to farm subsidies. Those subsidies hurt farmers in poor countries because they keep the price of products artificially low, giving poor countries little chance on the world market. Since then, no one has cut anything, and the negotiations have degenerated into the usual bickering between Europe and America. Meanwhile, the poor keep starving.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush declared: "The United States is ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same. This is key to overcoming poverty in the world's poorest nations."

These were exactly the right words, and we applaud them. Now, let's get to it. The world is waiting.

Bush Switches U.N. Tone, But Will It Help Iraq In Time? (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2005

Three years ago, in the most undiplomatic of terms, President Bush challenged the United Nations to be relevant by standing up to Saddam Hussein and enforcing its many resolutions against him. A discomfited U.N. Security Council took the challenge. It sent in weapons inspectors. But the United States, impatient to get on with the war, invaded before they finished, cementing Bush's image in much of the world as a go-it-alone cowboy. That no weapons of mass destruction were found further damaged U.S. credibility.

Fast forward to Wednesday for a study in contrasts.

In this year's U.N. address, Bush's world view seemed transformed. He was far more solicitous as he argued that preventing Iraq from becoming a terrorist state is in the world's vital interest. He appealed to other countries to take up the "exciting opportunity for all of us" to build a democracy in Iraq. And he spent much time talking about how countries work best together and just what democracy entails beyond elections.

Bush is right. There's no question a democratic Iraq is in the world's best interest, and other countries could be an enormous help. But persuading them now is unlikely. That much was plain from the skeptical faces of many of the more than 160 world leaders gathered for the U.N. session. Their unspoken message was this: We told you invading Iraq was a bad idea. You ignored us and rushed to war. Now clean up your own mess.

Wednesday's spasm of violence in Baghdad — a dozen bombings that killed at least 160 and wounded 570 — underscored just what a mess the Iraq war has become. And just how little the world has been inclined to pitch in and help. That's in contrast to the Persian Gulf War in 1991, when the first President Bush used diplomacy to form a genuine coalition and get others to pay for most of the war that reversed Saddam's invasion of Kuwait.

In part, George W. Bush is following the path of many second-term presidents who show a better understanding of the way the world works after a steep foreign-policy learning curve. In the short run, the legacy of the administration'sin-your-face approach during Bush's first term is that the United States faces an increasingly lonely task trying to extricate itself from Iraq during his second.

Over time, however, Bush's new attitude toward international cooperation might help turn global opinion around.

After Katrina, Republicans Back A Sea Of Conservative Ideas (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Congressional Republicans, backed by the White House, say they are using relief measures for the hurricane-ravaged Gulf coast to achieve a broad range of conservative economic and social policies, both in the storm zone and beyond.

Some new measures are already taking shape. In the past week, the Bush administration has suspended some union-friendly rules that require federal contractors pay prevailing wages, moved to ease tariffs on Canadian lumber, and allowed more foreign sugar imports to calm rising sugar prices. Just yesterday, it waived some affirmative-action rules for employers with federal contracts in the Gulf region.

Now, Republicans are working on legislation that would limit victims' right to sue, offer vouchers for displaced school children, lift some environment restrictions on new refineries and create tax-advantaged enterprise zones to maximize private-sector participation in recovery and reconstruction. Yesterday, the House overwhelmingly passed a bill that would offer sweeping protection against lawsuits to any person or organization that helps Katrina victims without compensation.

"The desire to bring conservative, free-market ideas to the Gulf Coast is white hot," says Rep. Mike Pence, the Indiana Republican who leads the Republican Study Group, an influential caucus of conservative House members. "We want to turn the Gulf Coast into a magnet for free enterprise. The last thing we want is a federal city where New Orleans once was."

Many of the ideas under consideration have been pushed by the 40-member study group, which is circulating a list of "free-market solutions," including proposals to eliminate regulatory barriers to awarding federal funds to religious groups housing hurricane victims, waiving the estate tax for deaths in the storm-affected states; and making the entire region a "flat-tax free-enterprise zone."

Members of the group met in a closed session Tuesday night at the conservative Heritage Foundation headquarters here to map strategy. Edwin Meese, the former Reagan administration attorney general, has been actively involved.

Rep. Todd Tiahrt (R., Kan.) said that the plans under development "are all part of a philosophy of lowering costs for doing business." He said southern Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama offer a "microcosm" where new ideas can be applied to speed the rebuilding.

The proposals to cut taxes and waive regulations come after Congress quickly approved $62.8 billion in federal spending for the Gulf Coast, and is expected to approve further spending that will push the price tag above $100 billion.

Some of the proposals are attracting fire from Democrats. "They're going back to the playbook on issues like tort reform, school vouchers and freeing business from environmental rules to achieve ideological objectives they haven't been able to get in the normal legislative process," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D., Ill.)

In response, Democrats are pressing for other proposals that suit their ideology. Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois has suggested creating a national emergency airlift program so that U.S. airlines can help evacuate Americans from areas before a natural disaster strike. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Louisiana Democrat Sen. Mary Landrieu unveiled a plan that would, among other things, preserve victims' Medicaid health coverage, provide $2,500 education grants to displaced students and give victims a 180-day extension on outstanding loan payments.

Trial lawyers were quick to attack the bill the House passed yesterday on a voice vote to limit lawsuits against volunteers saying it prevents airlines, hospitals, stadiums, and bus companies from being held accountable for misconduct or negligence. In a statement, the Association of Trial Lawyers of America said, "If a nursing home resident evacuated from New Orleans to a nursing home in a neighboring state dies of untreated, infected pressure sores, the out-of-state home would be protected."

The bill's chief sponsor, Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, said in a statement that the legislation removes the "threat of legal fear that stands between many willing and able Good Samaritans and the victims of Hurricane Katrina." The bill does permit lawsuits for injuries that were caused "by willful, wanton, reckless, or criminal conduct."

Some conservatives expressed concern about the growing reach of the reconstruction effort. "Everyone is attaching their own agenda to this," said William A. Niskanen, a former Reagan White House economic adviser now at the libertarian Cato Institute. "It's being seen as a test of the conservative agenda, from enterprise zones to school vouchers and the repeal of labor laws, and these ideas deserve careful thought," he said. "But [the massive spending] could also create expectations that we can do this every time a disaster hits."

Some of the proposals are unlikely to win quick passage. But congressional tax-writing committees hope to approve legislation within days to offer $5 billion in tax relief and other aid to residents of areas hit by the storm. The legislation would, among other things, let victims withdraw money from retirement accounts without penalty, give tax incentives to those who house evacuees and give companies incentives to hire displaced workers.

Republicans, meanwhile, say they will also press for a new round of energy concessions, including incentives to rebuild and expand offshore drilling and clear the way for new refineries that were dropped from a 500-page energy bill that passed last month.

House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton of Texas and Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman James Inhofe are working on bills that would encourage refineries to build new plants and expand existing ones by rolling back environmental rules and making it easier for refineries to navigate regulatory channels in Washington.

Republicans hope Hurricane Katrina prods Congress to approve a second energy bill this fall that includes several provisions that were dropped from the first bill. The National Petrochemical & Refineries Association would like lawmakers to reduce the depreciation period from 10 years to five years in order to stimulate investment. Some refineries are talking about reviving an effort to get liability protection for producing the fuel additive methyl tertiary butyl ether, or MTBE. Both were dropped from the earlier energy bill at the insistence of Democrats.

Bush Plans Speech; Death Toll Rises (LAT)

By Lianne Hart And Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. — As the death toll from Hurricane Katrina climbed to 710 on Wednesday, White House aides said President Bush's address to the nation tonight would call for reconstructing the Gulf Coast using conservative blueprints and private-sector initiatives.

In preparing for his speech to be delivered from New Orleans, the president consulted widely with Republican leaders and conservative thinkers.

With damage estimates as high as $200 billion, massive federal spending appears inevitable. Late Wednesday, the Senate passed a $3.5-billion measure that would provide emergency housing vouchers to more than 350,000 families. That is in addition to nearly $60 billion in emergency aid already authorized.

A day after Bush accepted blame for breakdowns in federal disaster efforts, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco took "full responsibility" for her own mistakes. Blanco did not specify those errors in her televised speech from the statehouse in Baton Rouge. City and federal officials have questioned preparations made by state officials before Katrina struck.

"We must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again," Blanco said.

Earlier in the day, officials said that Blanco and Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen had repaired splintering relations over management of the body retrieval effort in New Orleans, where corpses have floated for days in floodwaters and accumulated in houses and evacuated buildings.

Louisiana officials said they had taken over a lapsed federal contract with a Houston mortuary firm. The arrangement would allow the private company's crews to continue collecting the bodies of flood victims scattered across southern Louisiana.

Blanco had lashed out at the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Tuesday, arguing that its failure to come to terms with Kenyon International Emergency Services Inc. had threatened the operation. Allen, the agency's new point man in the flood-swept Gulf Coast region, at first responded that the state, not FEMA, had full authority for the recovery of bodies.

The conflict centered on who would pay for Kenyon's contract. State officials insisted that FEMA had hired Kenyon and needed to guarantee that Louisiana would be compensated for future costs. FEMA replied that the decision was the state's to make.

After the two officials spoke by phone late Tuesday, Blanco and Allen said Wednesday that they were satisfied with the results. Neither of them provided details, but during her address, Blanco pointedly said that she had asked the federal government to cover all of the state's massive disaster expenses, "just as was done after 9/11."

State officials said that Kenyon had been rehired by Louisiana and that its team of 115 mortuary specialists would stay on through November at a cost of nearly $119,000 a day. State officials would not say if FEMA had agreed to defray any of those expenses.

"To date," Allen said during a news briefing in Baton Rouge, "we've had a well-running organization."

As he defended the pace of the body recovery operation, Allen acknowledged it had started off slowly because "access was made difficult by weather and lack of communication."

Dr. Louis Cataldie, Louisiana's medical incident commander for the disaster, agreed that "things are getting better." He added that "as long as there's one body in the water, we need to be doing a better job."

Officials expect that hundreds — if not thousands — more corpses are lying beneath the floodwaters still covering about 40% of the city.

Wednesday, the official death toll from the hurricane stood at 474 in Louisiana, 218 in Mississippi, 14 in Florida, and two each in Alabama and Georgia.

"This is going to be long, arduous process," Cataldie said. "And it's going to be even longer and more arduous to do the identifications. That's going to take months, maybe years."

The discovery of 34 bodies left in St. Rita's Nursing Home and scores more in several New Orleans hospitals has provoked a widening state inquiry. Louisiana Atty. Gen. Charles C. Foti Jr. filed involuntary manslaughter charges against a couple who owns the St. Bernard Parish nursing home for allegedly failing to evacuate patients..

Foti also said he would look into the circumstances surrounding 45 bodies found inside Memorial Medical Center and an unknown number of corpses left at Charity Hospital. CNN reported that as many as 50 bodies were still at Charity on Wednesday, waiting processing by mortuary teams.

Officials from both hospitals have said that many of the bodies left behind were critically ill patients who died during chaotic evacuations after the facilities were isolated by high water. Both hospitals evacuated hundreds of other patients by boat and by helicopter.

Harry Anderson, a spokesman for Dallas-based Tenet Healthcare Corp., which operated Memorial, said Wednesday that between 10 and 12 of the patients who died were "very sick or frail." Ten more were patients who had died at the hospital before the storm struck.

The remaining corpses, Anderson said, were those of patients from a long-term care facility operated by another firm, LifeCare Holdings Inc., on the hospital's seventh floor. LifeCare officials did not return several calls. But Anderson said many of those patients relied on electric respirators and could not be saved despite efforts by nurses to manually ventilate their breathing.

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said on CNN's "Larry King Live" on Wednesday that he hoped to allow as many as 180,000 New Orleans residents to return to their homes "in a week or two" in city neighborhoods that were not devastated by Katrina's floods. More than 80% of the city's 500,000 residents fled before the hurricane struck, and about 50,000 were evacuated in Katrina's immediate aftermath.

A federal emergency bill passed Wednesday night in the Senate would provide emergency housing vouchers averaging $600 a month for as many as six months for more than 350,000 displaced Gulf Coast families.

The measure offered by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) was attached on a voice vote to an unrelated spending bill. The Senate is slated to pass the overall bill today, but a final version needs to be worked out with the House, which passed its own version in June.

Congress also moved Wednesday to reinforce the health and welfare safety net for Katrina's evacuees, promising speedy action on a new bill that would significantly expand Medicaid, unemployment and welfare benefits. The proposal has the support of Senate leaders and could go to the floor as early as today. It would cost an estimated $5 billion to $7 billion through 2006.

While a Senate panel launched the first formal inquiry into the government's much-criticized response to the hurricane, the Senate Republican majority defeated a bid by Democrats to establish an independent commission to investigate the disaster effort.

In a strict party-line vote, Republicans blocked a bid by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) to establish the independent panel. After the vote, Clinton said she called for the independent probe because "it is simply not appropriate for government to investigate itself."

At the White House, officials readied for Bush' national address from New Orleans. Aides billed the speech as Bush's chance to recover from lost political momentum and wed conservative ideals to the pressing need to redesign the broken city. The televised speech, to be delivered at 6 p.m. PDT, is expected to last about 30 minutes.

"The president wants people to think big," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. "Most importantly, he believes that it should be driven locally, in terms of the vision and the planning, with the full support of the federal government."

Advisors also want the speech to hew to conservative notions of small government and ample business opportunities. Aides have broached ideas with Republican leaders in Congress and analysts at conservative think tanks.

Ideas they discussed include a strong role for the private sector and charitable organizations along with a package of housing and education vouchers and tax breaks to encourage business activity in the region.

"Bush has a very well defined vision of what government should do and how it should do it," said Michael Franc, a vice president of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research organization consulted by the White House. "This is a moment to teach or explain to the American people how his values apply to this catastrophic situation."

Bush's Vow: To Rebuild Better (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush will tell the nation tonight that he's committed to rebuilding New Orleans and the Gulf Coast, while eliminating the poverty and joblessness that were exposed in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Dan Bartlett, Bush's counselor, said the president will reflect on “the horrific suffering” in the region and “outline the beginnings of a vision of the future.”

In a prime-time speech from New Orleans, Bush also will pledge more federal help providing housing, health care and education to evacuees. “We want to see a region that is better and stronger than before,” said Bush spokesman Scott McClellan.

Two Bush advisers with direct knowledge of the speech said the president is considering the appointment of a high-profile “czar” to oversee recovery efforts. But one said the White House is checking whether that would be allowed under federal law. The aides insisted on anonymity to avoid pre-empting Bush's remarks at 9:02 p.m. ET. The speech is expected to be about 30 minutes long and will be aired by the major networks.

Twelve Senate Republicans wrote to Bush Wednesday asking him to create a White House office to coordinate reconstruction.

The speech is part of a White House plan to show the president's concern and commitment to the devastated region after criticism about initial slow responses by Bush and federal agencies.

Bush's statement Tuesday that he takes responsibility for those problems was part of the plan. On Friday, he will speak at a service for storm victims at Washington's National Cathedral.

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll released this week found that six in 10 African-Americans said the fact that most victims were poor and black was a factor in delays in the federal response.

"The president is very cognizant of both the realities and the perceptions," Bartlett said. The fact that so many "African-American people think there was a sense of discrimination or negligence is very troubling." But, he said, "Those feelings aren't instantly created and won't be instantly healed."

Bush To Request More Aid Funding (Washington Post)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jim Vandehei

Washington Post, September 15, 2005

President Bush will call tonight for an unprecedented federal commitment to rebuild New Orleans and other areas obliterated by Hurricane Katrina, putting the United States on pace to spend more in the next year on the storm's aftermath than it has over three years on the Iraq war, according to White House and congressional officials.

With the federal tab for Katrina already nearly quadruple the cost of the country's previous most expensive natural disaster cleanup, Bush plans to offer federal assistance to help flood victims find jobs, get housing and health care, and attend school, according to White House aides.

In a speech from the flood zone, Bush will commit the federal government to what many predict will become the largest reconstruction effort ever on U.S. soil.

The president will call on Washington to resist spending money unwisely, but some in his own party are already starting to recoil at a price tag expected to exceed $200 billion -- about the cost of the Iraq war and reconstruction efforts. As emergency expenditures soar -- with new commitments as high as $2 billion a day -- some budget analysts and conservative groups are warning that the Katrina spending has combined with earlier fiscal decisions in ways that will wreak havoc on the government's finances for years to come.

Bush and Republican congressional leaders, by contrast, are calculating that the U.S. economy can safely absorb a sharp spike in spending and budget deficits, and that the only way to regain public confidence after the stumbling early response to the disaster is to spend whatever it takes to rebuild the region and help Katrina's victims get back on their feet.

"I think absolutely it's going to convert the political landscape in Washington," Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) said of Katrina's impact. "We do have a social safety net in this country. Those aren't just words. Government has a role to play in people's lives."

Hours before Bush speaks, the Louisiana congressional delegation will present its tab for reconstruction and rebuilding efforts, which could put pressure on Bush to spend money in areas not currently on his agenda. In addition, aides said yesterday that nearly 2.5 million have registered with the Federal Emergency Management Agency for help and that Education Department officials estimate the number of displaced students to be approaching 400,000. Officials from several departments raced yesterday to complete proposals that Bush can talk about in his speech and in the days to follow.

The Education Department, for instance, is readying plans to waive No Child Left Behind requirements for some states; to provide cash assistance to school districts absorbing students; and to finance new schoolbooks, demolition and reconstruction of school buildings, and temporary trailers and new teachers for schools bursting with Katrina evacuees, Republican aides said.

The way in which the administration plans to spend money -- and not just the amount -- is raising caution flags. In a letter he plans to send to Bush today, Rep. Mike Turner (R-Ohio) said the president should scrap the administration's plan to deploy as many as 300,000 mobile homes to temporarily house people. Turner said the victims would be better served by market-rate and subsidized housing already in place in other regions of the country. A dozen Republicans also lobbied Bush to appoint a disaster czar to oversee the reconstruction and relief efforts in the South, an idea the president has, thus far, resisted.

Administration officials concede that the hurricane and its aftermath could push the budget deficit back above $400 billion next year, or about 3 percent of the country's gross domestic product, just as the tide of federal red ink that rolled over Washington during Bush's first term had begun to recede.

Since Katrina struck, Congress has already spent $62.3 billion, dwarfing the inflation-adjusted $17.8 billion that Congress spent on hurricanes Andrew, Iniki and Omar, which struck in 1992, and the $15.2 billion emergency appropriation for the Northridge, Calif., earthquake of 1994. The entire Persian Gulf War of 1991 cost less than $83 billion in today's dollars.

The libertarian Cato Institute warned yesterday of a looming "budget disaster." In meetings with GOP congressional leaders and White House aides, some Republican lawmakers have expressed alarm about the growing price tag and concern that vast sums could be wasted without proper oversight.

White House officials have told Congress that the $51.8 billion approved late last week will fund the disaster relief effort only through the first week of October, and senior congressional appropriations aides have told the White House that they need to see the next request by next week. Republicans say the next bill could exceed $50 billion.

The scale of the disaster has not even come into focus, largely because many agencies have not been allowed into the disaster zone to assess the damage, according to congressional appropriations aides, who are trying to examine the costs to the government, agency by agency.

Nearly 1,000 drinking-water and sewer systems -- 391 in Mississippi, 606 in Louisiana and one in Alabama -- remain shut down. Repairing and rebuilding such systems could cost between $3 billion and $10 billion, much of it on the tab of the Environmental Protection Agency.

Before Katrina struck, the federal highway emergency relief fund already faced a $120 million backlog of road repairs. With so many crumbled bridges and washed-out highways after the storm, the fund's deficit will now be in the billions, appropriations aides said.

The Air Force will seek as much as $4 billion to repair damaged Gulf-state facilities, a House Appropriations Committee aide said. An additional $2 billion to $4 billion will be needed to finance the mobilization of the National Guard, the evacuation of military personnel and military-family support programs. Damage to national parks, forests and wildlife refuges is estimated to approach $300 million.

Once the administration makes its request, congressional officials expect a cascade of demands from lawmakers. Farm-state members have signaled that they will seek substantial relief for midwestern grain farmers, whose shipments of grain down the Mississippi River were disrupted by Katrina. Even before the storm, parched farms in Illinois, Missouri and parts of Iowa had prompted farm-state lawmakers to seek relief.

Lawmakers from the Northeast have said they will push for $800 million or more in assistance to offset the soaring price of home heating oil. And state governments from Washington and South Dakota to West Virginia and South Carolina are expected to seek federal dollars to offset the cost of housing Katrina survivors.

The White House has declared 41 states and the District of Columbia either major disaster areas or in states of emergency, allowing federal aid to flow to any state that takes in an evacuee.

Against calls to trim spending elsewhere to accommodate the emergency, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) did little to close those floodgates when he suggested this week that the Republican-controlled Congress had already trimmed all the fat from federal spending. "My answer to those that want to offset the spending is 'Sure, bring me the offsets,' " he said. "I will be glad to do it, but no one is able to come up with any yet."

Against this tide, conservative think tanks are taking up DeLay's challenge. But their suggested spending cuts may only underscore Congress's flagging resolve.

To reach $62 billion in savings, Cato Institute analysts Chris Edwards and Stephen Slivinski have proposed cutting NASA in half, slashing energy research and subsidies just as Congress is gearing up to increase them in the face of soaring gasoline prices, cutting the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' budget by $4.6 billion after its levees failed to protect New Orleans, and eliminating $4.2 billion in homeland security grants while lawmakers are debating the nation's lack of preparedness.

Help Is On The Way, But It's Unclear Where (USAT)

By Mimi Hall, Kevin Johnson And Mike Linn

USA Today, September 15, 2005

More than 100 tractor-trailers packed with water, ice and other critical hurricane-relief supplies have been sitting at an Air Force base in Montgomery, Ala., for nearly a week while the federal government pays $600 a day for each truck.

The idle trucks, called up by the Federal Emergency Management Agency to deliver supplies, are just the latest example of the waste, bureaucratic errors and miscommunication that continue to foul Hurricane Katrina relief efforts.

"When somebody gets paid 600 bucks to sit and not burn fuel, that's a pretty good profit margin," said Alabama Food Services President Buck Hamilton, who is being paid by FEMA for about six truckloads of ice.

His shipments waited at similar truck staging areas in Mississippi. "Would you like to get paid $600 a day to sit and do nothing?" he said. "It's hard to criticize."

Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., doesn't think so. He said Wednesday that Congress should create a special inspector general for hurricane relief, similar to the position overseeing spending on Iraq reconstruction. "It is imperative that those most in need receive assistance and that no resources are wasted," Pence said.

FEMA spokesman Butch Kinerney said the agency needs to have plenty of trucks at the ready. Many of those that have been waiting at Maxwell-Gunter Air Force Base are now headed for Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina to "pre-position" for Hurricane Ophelia. "We stage vehicles and equipment and supplies all over the country really any time a disaster is pending," he said.

Other FEMA problems:

•A convoy of 100 trucks full of supplies spent a week traveling to Meridian, Miss., and Selma, Ala., before being sent to Memphis last Saturday night.

The city's emergency chief, Claude Talford, was roused around midnight to find out that the trucks were lining up on one of his city's main streets. He didn't know they were coming, and neither did state officials. "They just showed up on our doorstep," he said.

•In St. Louis, officials were asked by FEMA last week to prepare for up to 2,500 evacuees. After a small city was constructed in an airport hangar, FEMA called and said no evacuees were coming. The city has spent "hundreds of thousands of dollars," said Gary Christmann, chief of the city's emergency management department. "We considered that this was an outstanding drill."

•In Oregon, FEMA requests for assistance changed virtually daily. Holly Armstrong, spokeswoman for Gov. Ted Kulongoski, said FEMA called on Sept. 2 to request shelter in the Portland area for 1,000 evacuees. Officials scrambled, and Nike offered to donate clothes.

Two days later, FEMA said to hold off. On Sept. 7, FEMA said 500 evacuees would show up Sept. 10. Then FEMA told the state no one was coming.

The governor is now reviewing his own state's readiness. Among the considerations, Armstrong said: "How much do you really want to count on FEMA?"

Katrina Erodes Support In U.S. For Iraq War (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Hurricane Katrina has accelerated the erosion in public support for the Iraq war as President Bush's core of supporters dwindles and economic pessimism turns Americans' attention inward.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll1 shows that cutting spending on Iraq is Americans' top choice for financing the recovery from Katrina. Shaken by high gas prices and bracing for further jolts, Americans have turned negative about Mr. Bush across the board -- on handling the economy, foreign policy, and even the war on terrorism.

The president's overall approval has fallen to a record-low for Mr. Bush of 40%, reflecting a shrunken core of base supporters. That promises to have repercussions for his domestic agenda on issues like Social Security, taxes and immigration, and leaves Mr. Bush with a steeper challenge on his most significant second-term priority: using American power and resources to transform Iraq and the broader Middle East.

A plurality of Americans has favored reducing troop levels in Iraq for most of the year. Now, 55% favor bringing soldiers home, while just 36% back Mr. Bush's position that current levels should be maintained to help secure peace and stability.

"His standing to prosecute that case has been made more difficult," says Republican pollster Bill McInturff, who helps conduct the Journal/NBC Poll. Adds Democratic counterpart Peter Hart: It's "going to be very hard to just move straight forward" on Iraq.

To be sure, the survey contains some bright spots for Mr. Bush. Federal appeals court Judge John Roberts, his nominee to succeed the late William Rehnquist as chief justice of the Supreme Court, has drawn respectable support and little intense opposition. Some 38% say they support Judge Roberts for that post, while just 20% oppose him and 41% don't know enough to say.

And while Senate Democrats press Judge Roberts in Judiciary Committee hearings to state his views on key issues, 57% of Americans say the nominee shouldn't be required to spell them out since those issues may come before the court. Democrats enjoy firmer support in public opinion for their demand for more documents about Judge Roberts's previous government service; 41% say the White House should make additional documents public, outpacing the 31% who say Democrats already have enough information.

Yet the poll's findings about Americans' priorities show the work facing Mr. Bush, who is scheduled to deliver a nationally televised address tonight on the recovery from Katrina. Some 60% say rebuilding the Gulf Coast should be a higher national priority than establishing democracy in Iraq; 5% say Iraq, while 34% say the two are equally important.

The White House says the administration can handle both at once, but by 51%-37% Americans say the Iraq war wasn't worth its human and financial costs.

The proportion of Republicans disapproving of Mr. Bush's job performance has doubled to 15% from 7% in January, with pronounced defections among moderates within Mr. Bush's party.

Katrina has contributed to that decline in support. By a 58%-38% margin, Americans say they are dissatisfied with the Bush administration's response to the catastrophe. Reflecting the absence of the traditional rally behind the commander in chief during national emergencies, just 48% approve of the president's handling of the matter; 80% approved of how he handled the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, while 64% backed the actions of his father, President George H.W. Bush, following Hurricane Andrew in 1992. The survey of 1,013 adults, conducted Sept. 9-12, has a margin for error of 3.1 percentage points.

In particular, Katrina appears to have shaken public regard on two attributes that sustained Mr. Bush through earlier political challenges. The public now splits evenly, 41%-41%, on assessments of Mr. Bush's ability to handle a crisis; at the outset of his second term in January, he received positive marks for crisis-management ability by a 56%-28% margin. A bare 43%-40% plurality rates him positively for having "strong leadership qualities," down from 52%-30% in January.

The crisis along the Gulf Coast may have also damaged the long-term effort by Mr. Bush's strategists to expand Republican support among members of minority groups. Fully 70% of African-Americans say the Bush administration would have reacted to Katrina with greater urgency had the affected areas been mostly white suburbs rather than mostly black inner-city neighborhoods. Nearly seven in 10 whites reject that assertion.

Hispanics are divided evenly on the question. But the president's overall rating among Hispanics, who were split on his job performance in January, is now negative by a two-to-one margin.

Mr. Bush's signature domestic priority, overhauling the Social Security system with private investment accounts, was already in political trouble before the hurricane. Assessments of the administration's handling of Social Security -- 28% say they are satisfied while 60% aren't -- are more negative than assessments of how it handled the response to Katrina.

Beyond Social Security, the domestic political landscape has been buffeted in a way that complicates challenges facing the White House and Republicans in the 2006 midterm elections. Following the gas-price spikes immediately after the hurricane, six in 10 Americans now expect pump prices to continue rising.

In fact, the public now ranks gas prices as the country's top economic issue. Just 6% assign top importance to federal taxes, the issue that Mr. Bush and Republicans planned to elevate next year through a yet-unspecified overhaul of the tax system.

Of particular concern to lawmakers facing voters next year, Americans have turned pessimistic on the outlook for the economy. Some 49% expect the economy to get worse over the next 12 months, triple the 16% who expect it to improve. In January, those numbers were essentially reversed.

At the same time, Katrina may have left the public feeling slightly more nervous about security at home. Fully 75% of Americans now say the U.S. isn't adequately prepared for a nuclear, biological or chemical attack, up from 66% who expressed that concern in 2002.

The net effect may be increased pressure on members of the Republican majority to strike an independent course on a range of issues, resisting appeals for party discipline that have been effective for most of Mr. Bush's presidency. Those pressures will be greatest in the Northeast and Midwest, where Mr. Bush's approval rating stands at 32% and 36%, respectively.

"All these [results] suggest unstable days ahead in the Republican caucus," says Mr. McInturff, whose firm advises many Republican lawmakers.

Support For Bush Continues To Drop, Poll Shows (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum And Marjorie Connelly

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - A summer of bad news from Iraq, high gasoline prices, economic unease and now the devastation of Hurricane Katrina has left President Bush with overall approval ratings for his job performance and handling of Iraq, foreign policy and the economy at or near the lowest levels of his presidency, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News Poll.

For the first time, just half of Americans approve of Mr. Bush's handling of terrorism, which has been his most consistent strength since he scored 90 percent approval ratings in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks. More than 6 in 10 now say that he does not share their priorities for the country, 10 percentage points worse than on the eve of his re-election last fall, while barely half say he has strong qualities of leadership, about the same as said so at the early low-ebb of his presidency in the summer of 2001.

More Americans now distrust the federal government to do the right thing than at any time since the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. And the poll revealed a sharp racial divide. While half of all respondents disapprove of the way Mr. Bush has handled the aftermath of Katrina, nearly three quarters of blacks do. (Mr. Bush won only about 10 percent of the black vote last year.)

The hurricane, alone, does not appear to have taken any significant toll on Mr. Bush's overall job approval rating, which remains stuck virtually where it has been since early summer. But the findings do suggest that the slow federal response to the hurricane has increased public doubts about the Bush administration's effectiveness. Fifty-six percent of Americans said they were now less confident about the government's ability to respond to a terrorist attack or natural disaster.

Taken together, the numbers suggest that a public that has long seen Mr. Bush as a determined leader, whether it agreed with him or not, has growing doubts about his capacity to deal with pressing problems. More than 6 in 10 said they were uneasy about his ability to make the right decisions about the war in Iraq, and half expressed similar unease about his ability to deal with the problems of the storm's victims.

Mr. Bush's support remained strong among Republicans, conservatives, evangelical Christians and those who said they voted for him last fall. Nearly twice as many people - 63 percent - said the country was "pretty seriously" on the wrong track as those who said it was headed in the right direction, equal to the worst level of Mr. Bush's presidency during a spate of bad news last year.

Over all, 41 percent of respondents approved of Mr. Bush's performance in office, while 53 percent disapproved. Those figures are in line with other national polls conducted in the last week, roughly equal to the worst ratings Mr. Bush has ever received, comparable to Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton's worst ratings, but well above the worst ever posted by the president's father, Jimmy Carter and Richard M. Nixon.

The Times/CBS News Poll was conducted Friday through Tuesday with 1,167 adults, including 877 whites and 211 blacks. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points for all respondents and whites, and seven percentage points for blacks. The survey was mostly completed before Mr. Bush said on Tuesday that he accepted responsibility for flaws in the federal response to the hurricane.

Dan Bartlett, Mr. Bush's counselor and chief communications strategist, said the White House was not especially surprised by the poll's findings.

"Obviously, as we have said, with a sharp increase in the cost of gasoline and anxiety about the war, that is obviously reflected in the polls, and then we have a sustained amount of heavy coverage of what has been described as a major failure of government at all levels, it shouldn't surprise people that that would be reflected in the poll numbers on the president, and particularly on terrorism," Mr. Bartlett said.

"The president is going to continue to focus on his responsibilities as not only president but commander in chief, when it comes to making sure we do everything we can to help the people hit by Katrina, as well as continue to conduct the war on terrorism in an aggressive way," he added.

While the poll found that 70 percent said the Federal Emergency Management Agency was too slow in responding to the aftermath of the hurricane, 53 percent said the agency was now doing all it could reasonably be expected to do.

The same did not hold true for the Bush administration itself; 68 percent said it had not yet developed a clear plan for finding housing and jobs for people left homeless by the hurricane. Mr. Bush is to address the nation from New Orleans on Thursday night to elaborate on the government's planned response to the disaster.

Before the storm hit, polls had shown that rising gasoline prices were becoming increasingly worrisome to a majority of Americans, and the hurricane has only worsened that concern. Almost half the public said the economy was deteriorating, the worst that number has been in four years. Fifty-six percent expect the economy to decline as a result of the hurricane, and nearly three-quarters anticipate taxes will rise for the same reason.

The poll also pointed up starkly different attitudes toward Mr. Bush and the government among blacks and whites that were not so much caused by the storm as laid bare by it. While two-thirds of all Americans said Mr. Bush cares at least somewhat about the people left homeless by the hurricane, fewer than one-third of blacks agreed. Two-thirds of blacks said race was a major factor in the government's slow response to the flooding in New Orleans, while an almost identical number of whites said it was not.

Storm victims had to wait for a week for help to arrive, said Allison McKinney, 33, a housewife and former teacher in Fort Bragg, N.C. "I don't think that would happen to any other city, because New Orleans is a poor city." Ms. McKinney, who is black, grew up in New Orleans and was among those who agreed to be interviewed after participating in the poll. "It took Katrina for people to realize that the city had a major impact on the rest of the country. I think it's sad that you would wait for the total devastation of a city to come to that realization."

But Juanita Harrington, 78, a retired Verizon employee and Bush supporter in Larkspur, Colo., said critics of the president "focus everything as if he were a magician and could wave a magic wand and change things."

She added: "The people that were there locally didn't take care of matters there, either. I'm talking about the mayor of New Orleans, I'm talking about the governor, I'm talking about that crazy woman senator from Louisiana - she was an idiot. He may not have succeeded totally, but nobody else did, either."

The poll suggested the cumulative effects of months of bad news from the continuing insurgency in Iraq. Exactly 50 percent of Americans approve of Mr. Bush's handling of terrorism, for example, and while that figure is the single worst ranking since the question was first asked four years ago, it is only slightly worse than it was early this summer. But that is 11 points worse than it was in February, just after the first successful round of elections in Iraq.

The data also suggest that the residual support that has steadily buoyed Mr. Bush in the four years since the Sept. 11 attacks may have reached its limit, for now. Fifty-three percent of Americans still say he has strong qualities of leadership, down 9 percentage points since he was re-elected and essentially equal to his all-time previous low in the summer of 2001, when his presidency seemed becalmed before the attacks.

At the same time, 45 percent of Americans now say Mr. Bush does not have strong leadership qualities, six percentage points more than last fall, and the highest percentage since the Times/CBS poll first asked the question during Mr. Bush's initial campaign in 1999.

Those general impressions now extend across the board in reviews of Mr. Bush's handling of particular issues. Thirty-eight percent of Americans approve of his handling of foreign policy; 35 percent of his handling of the economy; and 36 percent of his handling of the situation in Iraq. All those are at or roughly equal to his all-time lows - and below his all-time highs by double digits.

Some of the pessimism seemed clearly fueled by higher gasoline prices. Nearly two-thirds of those polled said they had cut back on household spending as a result of higher prices, and 8 in 10 said the administration had no plan for keeping prices down, though more than 6 in 10 said the price of gas is something a president can do a lot about.

A majority of the public is willing to pay more in taxes to assist hurricane victims with job training and housing; about 4 in 10 said they would be willing to pay as much as $200 a year more to help out with the storm's aftermath.

Poll: Rebuilding New Orleans High Priority (AJC/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — Americans say rebuilding New Orleans is more important to them than cutting taxes or changing Social Security, a poll found. Cutting taxes and changing Social Security were both priorities of the Bush administration before the storm.

Almost two-thirds, 63 percent, said rebuilding the city devastated by Hurricane Katrina is more important to them than changing Social Security, and almost three-fourths, 73 percent, said rebuilding the flooded city is more important to them than cutting taxes, according to a CBS-New York Times poll released Wednesday.

A large majority of Americans, 73 percent, said they think their taxes will increase as a result of Katrina. More than half of those polled said they were willing to pay more taxes to help with Katrina recovery, job training and housing for victims.

Three-fourths said they are not willing to pay more for gasoline to help with the recovery, however.

The poll found whites and blacks have sharply different views of government efforts to help victims recover from the hurricane. While six in 10 whites say the government is doing all it can to help with the recovery, only a third of blacks felt that way.

Seven in 10 blacks polled said they have little or no confidence that the Bush administration will help hurricane victims find housing and jobs.

Two-thirds of all those polled said they doubt the Bush administration has a clear plan to find homes and jobs for victims.

The poll of 1,167 adults was conducted Sept. 9-11 and had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

What Responsibility? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Following the botched Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba in 1961, John F. Kennedy took full responsibility for the debacle. "I am the responsible officer," the president said. Similarly, in 1983, Ronald Reagan said "I accept responsibility" for the catastrophic terrorist attack on the Marine barracks in Beirut. Now, as if in the grand tradition of presidents affirming that the buck stops where Truman said it did -- the Oval Office -- George Bush has taken responsibility for the shortcomings in the federal effort regarding Hurricane Katrina. If he means what he said, then Katrina washed up a whole new George Bush.

But a little skepticism is in order here. After all, the George Bush we have come to know sorely lacks a rearview mirror. Not only is he disinclined to look back, but when he does so he sees nothing but triumph and astounding successes. Even his debacles -- and the war in Iraq for some reason comes to mind -- get transformed from what they once were to what he would like them to be. We are getting murdered in Baghdad not on account of weapons of mass destruction but to bring democracy to the Middle East. Who would not want to die for that?

For Bush there is only today and tomorrow. Yesterday is someone else's responsibility -- maybe still Clinton's. Even in his White House statement saying "I take responsibility," he also said that "Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability." Funny, I thought the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, did that. It was then that we learned about inadequate communications systems, among other things. It was then that our minds were focused on the incomprehensible and that people -- not to mention governments -- started thinking about the evacuation of whole cities. Bush makes a lousy Boy Scout. Prepared he wasn't.

If Bush were the CEO of a major corporation, his board would fire him. It would want to know what the hell he's been doing for the past four years and what he's done with the untold billions given to the Department of Homeland Security. After seeing how the feds stood by while sick people died in New Orleans hospitals, the board might want to fire itself -- but that is not practical. The board in this case is the American people.

Actually, I find myself feeling a bit sorry for Bush. The man must be perplexed about why he is being held accountable for a natural disaster and not for one wholly of his making. The war in Iraq, after all, is entirely his doing -- everything from its inception to its execution, which have both been inexcusable examples of incompetence. The very basis for the war -- Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction -- turns out to have been nonexistent. And that was followed by a military campaign that was insufficient to meet the challenge. Outside the Bush administration itself, it is virtually impossible to find anyone in Washington who believes enough troops were sent to do the task.

Why should we believe that Bush will take names and boot buttocks about Katrina when he has not done so over Iraq? On the contrary, the principal architects of the inadequate military plan remain in the Pentagon -- Rumsfeld and his crew. Others have gone on to plushy appointments -- the World Bank for Paul Wolfowitz, for instance, or the entire State Department for Condi Rice. Still others have been given the once-hallowed Presidential Medal of Freedom, now as tainted as a pardon from Bill Clinton.

If anyone at the top has been held responsible for an intelligence debacle without precedent, then his name is unknown to me -- or, for that matter, to the president. Only the hapless Michael Brown failed to understand Bush. If he had hung on to his FEMA job, in another month or two Bush would surely have honored him on the White House lawn. ("Brownie, you did a heck of a job.")

Anyone in Congress who thinks this administration is capable of really investigating itself has learned nothing from the past four years. Bush will not acknowledge mistakes because, probably, he doesn't think he makes them. For him, good intentions are everything. But people died in the wake of Katrina because Washington could not get helicopters or trucks to hospitals. Bush says he is willing to take responsibility for that. Maybe so. But it's not responsibility that matters, it's accountability -- a kick instead of a medal. From what we know about Bush, it is history -- not the president -- that will have to deliver that.

Hopeful Words: On Taking Responsibility (NYT)

When President Bush addresses the country from New Orleans tonight, he will have the opportunity to build on the good beginning he made earlier this week, when he took responsibility for the federal government's failures in responding to Hurricane Katrina. In an administration that has hated to acknowledge that it ever does anything wrong, it was refreshing to hear Mr. Bush freely admit that Katrina demonstrated that there is a question about whether the nation is really prepared to respond to a terrorist attack or another natural disaster. It is only by squarely acknowledging past failure that the country will be able to do better in the future.

The wording of the president's statement on Tuesday was important, and at least a bit worrisome. Mr. Bush accepted responsibility "to the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right," which may suggest that he thinks the jury is still out on what the federal government's role should have been. Obviously, it will take time to completely analyze all of the federal system failures, and no one imagines that the city and state were perfectly prepared for the disaster. But we certainly hope that the president was not taking responsibility for a government that he doesn't really think was responsible.

Localities have plenty of duties that are uniquely their own, and if a building catches on fire or a sewer pipe breaks, no one blames the president if the response isn't adequate. But no one community, or even any one state, can protect against hurricanes or vast flooding, any more than a city or state can protect itself against international terrorism.

It would be wonderful if the president would take the opportunity tonight to endorse an independent inquiry into the Katrina disaster, similar to the 9/11 commission's work. It would also be heartening if Mr. Bush announced that from now on, the federal government, which pays the bill for flood control projects, would make sure that the most important priorities were taken care of first - even if it required the kind of commission used to arbitrate Pentagon base closings to make sure that Congressional pork didn't trump necessity. It would be amazing if Mr. Bush really showed his sense of responsibility for this disaster by apologizing for stuffing the Federal Emergency Management Agency with inexperienced political appointees.

None of these possibilities are very likely - particularly the last one. But it's critical that the president at least acknowledge, clearly, that the federal government is where the responsibility for disaster management rests. Real accountability begins by stressing that the buck stops in Washington.

Hurricane Bush (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

President Bush addresses the nation on Hurricane Katrina tonight, and after keeping too quiet for too long there's a lot for him to say. We hope he tells Americans that such a demonstrable failure at all levels of government is a rare opportunity to change that government, not another excuse to expand it willy-nilly.

Two weeks after the hurricane, we have a clearer picture of both the storm damage and the bureaucratic mistakes. The former is happily lower in human terms than the 10,000 deaths predicted by New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, as of Tuesday much lower at 423 (659 throughout the region). The Gulf Coast has begun to rebuild, and even many residents of the Big Easy are returning to clean up the mess.

The political trauma that has followed Katrina is almost entirely a result of the slow, haphazard government response in the first days after the storm hit. Mayor Nagin had an evacuation plan sitting in a drawer but never got the buses in place to implement it. He then blamed everyone else. Louisiana Governor Kathleen Blanco froze amid the crisis and failed to deploy the National Guard properly to protect those stranded at the Convention Center and Superdome. She is still blaming everyone else.

FEMA was overwhelmed by the magnitude of the storm, and former director Michael Brown showed he was clueless about events that he could see merely by turning on his TV set. Notably, he is the only public official so far to lose his job, just as Mr. Bush is the only elected official who has so far accepted any public "responsibility." Alas, tonight the President isn't likely to assail the Department of Homeland Security that he helped to create, but he at least ought to admit that federal and state disaster duties and communication need to be better sorted out. He could also praise the Pentagon's relief success.

Only in Washington, however, could so much government failure be used to justify expanding the size and scope of government. Some emergency money is essential. But Congress has already appropriated some $62 billion, with essentially zero accountability, to be spent by such models of compassion as the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Another $100 billion may soon follow. Ted Kennedy has proposed that Congress create another Tennessee Valley Authority for the Gulf region. Give them one more week to panic, and Republicans on Capitol Hill will be demanding another Great Society.

Mr. Bush has a chance tonight to turn all of this around. Instead of channeling more cash through the same failed bureaucracies, he should declare the entire Gulf Coast region an enterprise zone, with low tax rates for new investments and waivers for any regulatory obstacles to rebuilding. He can also learn from California's 1994 earthquake experience -- which former Governor Pete Wilson described on this page on Tuesday -- and demand emergency powers to waive rules and allow bonus payments for contractors that finish projects ahead of time.

Above all, he can reframe the entire debate on how to help the poor of New Orleans. The people who couldn't flee the storm were not ignored by "small government conservatism," as if that actually still exists outside of Hong Kong. The city's poor have been smothered by decades of corrupt, paternal government -- local, state and federal.

While Chicago and other cities leveled their public housing projects, the Big Easy has continued to run nasty places like the Lafitte homes. The city's crime rate is 10 times the national average, even as New York and other big cities have seen their rates fall. Its public schools are as bad as any, and its city government more corrupt than most. The last thing the poor need is to be returned to such tender, loving care.

This would include killing the idea, floated by the White House, of buying 300,000 mobile homes for the displaced. Governor Blanco wants to build communities of thousands of trailers for a year or more near Baton Rouge and Shreveport. Such shelter makes sense in some parts of the Gulf Coast where there literally is no housing stock left. But it is an act of insanity -- defined as repeating the same mistake over and over -- to recreate trailer-park versions of Lafitte on military bases, isolating the poor once again and returning them to dependence on the government. Far better to give them vouchers to find housing of their own, especially where there is unused rental space.

The same goes for the city's 77,000 displaced public school students. Their parents should be given vouchers for the equivalent of their tuition, with the option of using it at any school where they can find an opening, public or private. Charter schools should be allowed to expand immediately, and the Bush Administration could seek an emergency federal waiver of state charter laws to let them accept New Orleans kids now swamping other public schools.

There are other good ideas, but the key point is for Mr. Bush and Republicans to get back on the political and intellectual offensive. With media help, Democrats and the left have used Katrina to portray a systemic collapse of "conservative" government. It was certainly a collapse of government, but more accurately of bureaucracy and the welfare state. If Mr. Bush uses his bully pulpit to explain this, Americans will understand and follow.

Three Louisville Women Charged In Katrina Relief Scam (LCJ)

By Alex Davis, The Courier-Journal

Louisville Courier Journal, September 15, 2005

Three Louisville women have been charged with felony fraud, accused of trying to cheat the American Red Cross in Jeffersonville, Ind., out of hundreds of dollars in Hurricane Katrina aid.

Red Cross officials said yesterday that they believe that the case is part of a pattern of deceit in Clark County, Ind., that may include at least seven other individuals and families.

Some people who received Red Cross debit cards in Jeffersonville over the last two weeks have used them to shop at Victoria's Secret, Circuit City and other stores that are "not typical" destinations for disaster victims, said Phyllis Wilkins, executive director of the agency's Clark County chapter.

"It's broken my heart to see that happen," she said of the suspected fraud. "It's definitely affected our staff and our caseworkers."

Wilkins said the three women came to her office Tuesday but did not receive money. According to a Jeffersonville Police Department report, the women said they were from Louisiana and asked for clothes and money. They later admitted that the stories weren't true, the report states.

Latoyia Taylor, 19, of the 400 block of South 12th Street, was charged with felony fraud. Charges of fraud and false informing were filed against Norma Jean Calloway-Tillman, 34, of the 1700 block of Bolin Avenue, and Denise Huguley, 24, of the 900 block of Cedar Street. All three were taken to the Clark County Jail.

In Louisville, police have arrested one person in a similar case involving a Red Cross debit card worth $360. Derick Clayton, 25, of the 3400 block of Bardstown Road, was charged Tuesday with fraudulent use of a credit card, a felony.

Officer Dwight Mitchell of Louisville Metro Police said he was not aware of other fraud cases linked to the hurricane.

But Jan Walther, spokeswoman for the Louisville Area chapter of the Red Cross, said one other suspect is being pursued. She said many more people have walked away from Red Cross relief sites after they failed to produce valid identification.

National fraud statistics for the Red Cross hurricane relief effort were not available yesterday.

But Tara Lynch, a spokeswoman at the agency's Washington headquarters, said there could be an increase in fraud because of the sheer magnitude of the disaster. She said the problem is taken "very, very seriously."

The value of Red Cross debit cards is typically linked to the size of a family, and it ranges from about $300 to $1,500. Acceptable purchases include food and clothing, Wilkins said, and, in some cases, toys for children or meals at a restaurant.

Wilkins said her staff became suspicious after receiving tips that some card users were actually local residents with few or no links to areas damaged by Katrina.

In one such case, she said, a pregnant woman was staying with her boyfriend at a hotel in Sellersburg while four of her children were living at a hotel in Louisville. She said the woman's debit card was cut off after a tip from a relative.

Records compiled by the Red Cross in Jeffersonville show that one debit card was used Saturday to buy $1,065 worth of items at Best Buy. Another $177 in purchases were made Friday at Victoria's Secret, and a third card was used for $233 in meals over a four-day period at Ernesto's Mexican Grill, Hooters and other restaurants in Southern Indiana.

Wilkins said most of the suspects told aid workers they had lost all forms of identification and needed help. She said the chapter takes a digital photo of applicants without identification and tries to verify their addresses.

But she said that the Clark County chapter doesn't have access to a national database of disaster victims maintained by the Red Cross and that the agency's policy is to "always err on the side of compassion" when in doubt.

Several measures are now being taken to combat thefts in Clark County.

Police began stationing a uniformed officer at the chapter's disaster resource center yesterday, and Capt. Bruce Wilkerson of the Jeffersonville Police Department said names of applicants were being entered into a national crime database run by the FBI.

Wilkins said she's working with regional and national Red Cross officials and law-enforcement agencies on criminal charges for other suspects who haven't been arrested. She said her chapter also is sharing names and other information with the Louisville chapter, which has its own staff and operates separately.

Walther said the Louisville chapter has access to the national Red Cross database and that the agency will seek restitution for thefts.

She said the number of suspicious hurricane claims -- two as of yesterday -- was low compared with the more than 2,300 people receiving aid.

Senators Seek Post-Katrina "Marshall Plan" (REU-Y2)

By Joanne Kenen

Reuters, September 15, 2005

Senate Republican leaders on Wednesday urged President George W. Bush to establish a "Marshall Plan" for the recovery after Hurricane Katrina, similar to the massive post-World War II effort to rebuild western Europe.

In a letter to Bush, Majority Leader Bill Frist and the rest of the Senate Republican leadership called for a "Marshall Plan" to establish a "coordinated and comprehensive plan to help the Gulf Coast region."

They did not spell out precisely what such a plan would entail, but lawmakers are beginning to consider ways of assembling a public-private partnership to redevelop the shattered region in the coming years.

Senators from both parties will visit the Gulf Coast on Friday for a first-hand inspection of the devastation.

The Republican-controlled Senate also rejected a proposal by Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York and other Democrats to set up an independent panel modeled on the 9/11 Commission to investigate the bungled evacuation and emergency response to Katrina.

Separately, bipartisan group of senators proposed an emergency package of health care benefits for storm victims. The bill would ease eligibility requirements for the Medicaid health care program for the poor and help those with private insurance maintain their coverage.

The Senate may take up the bill, which also provides an additional 13 weeks of unemployment benefits for storm victims, on Thursday.

INVESTIGATING STORM RESPONSE

Republicans have proposed a joint House-Senate special panel but Democrats are demanding an independent investigation.

Despite the bickering over how to investigate the disaster, Frist and Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada announced they would lead a 14-member delegation to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama on Friday. Both Louisiana's senators, one Democrat and one Republican, would take part.

In addition to the "Marshall plan" letter, lawmakers from both parties have put forth various proposals for oversight of the tens of billions of dollars of federal funds pouring into the emergency efforts.

Senate Democrats have proposed creation of a redevelopment agency modeled on the Tennessee Valley Authority, an independent government corporation created during the 1930s to manage a huge flood control and electrical generation program.

Republican Sens. Pete Domenici of New Mexico and Jeff Sessions of Alabama urged Bush to name a central coordinator to oversee storm recovery by federal agencies, an effort that they said would take years and cost huge amounts of money.

"My concern is that without a primary coordinator, we face the likely prospect of dozens of well-meaning federal agencies chaotically tripping over each other as the recovery process moves forward," Domenici said.

Illinois Democratic Sen. Barack Obama and Oklahoma Republican Sen. Tom Coburn -- representing opposite ends of the political spectrum -- called on Congress to establish a "chief financial officer" to oversee the $62 billion in relief funds the Federal Emergency Management Agency is doling out.

"This is to assure the American people that there's not going to be any shenanigans," Coburn said.

Meanwhile, the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee held its first open hearing on the government's response to the devastating storm with testimony from former New Orleans mayor Marc Morial, who now heads the National Urban League.

Morial suggested the government set up a compensation fund for Katrina victims, similar to the one established after the September 11, 2001 attacks. He also said Gulf coast residents must have a role in all aspects of rebuilding.

The House of Representatives Government Reform Committee plans to hold its first hearing into the Katrina response on Thursday, and the full House hopes to pass a bill giving short-term tax breaks to storm victims and help the recovery effort.

Congress Won't Sacrifice Pork In Federal Spending For Katrina (UNIONL)

By Robert D. Novak

Manchester Union Leader, September 15, 2005

Sen. Tom Coburn, playing his familiar role of skunk at the Sunday school picnic, is arguing that massive federal spending in the wake of Hurricane Katrina must entail some sacrifice. By that he meant the pork so dear to his colleagues. That has evoked an icy response, not only from Congress but from the White House as well.

Coburn, a freshman Republican from Oklahoma, telephoned Joshua Bolten, director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), to ask support for $15.3 billion in offsets based on the administration's own proposed terminations and spending reductions. Bolten politely informed the senator that the administration's hands were full dealing with Katrina's aftermath.

Coburn told me he did not blame Bolten but his superiors. The superior he meant was George W. Bush. On the Senate floor last week as the emergency Katrina bill was passed, Coburn declared: "I am disappointed in our President for not bringing forward with this bill recommended spending cuts that would easily be achieved in the discretionary budget of this country to pay for the disaster assistance." Citing calls for "sacrifice" by Americans, he declared that "it is no sacrifice on the part of Congress to steal $51.2 billion from our grandchildren."

When Bolten appeared before House Republicans the evening of Sept. 7, members of the conservative Republican Study Committee went to the microphone with complaints similar to Coburn's. Bolten responded, much as he had to Coburn, that this was not the time to try offsets when a 24-hour turnaround on the aid bill was necessary.

However, Coburn's problem is less Bolten or even Bush and more his Senate colleagues. While the House at least has tried to stay within the administration's bounds, the Senate threatens to run wild with new earmarks and additional spending. Senators are tapping money from the Defense budget on grounds all such funds will be restored.

Bolten promises to revisit offsets, and he can count on Coburn pressing him to keep that promise. Coburn's performance confirms dread of him as a senator by establishment Republicans, both in Oklahoma and the nation's capital. A plain-spoken obstetrician from Muskogee, Okla., Dr. Coburn won no popularity contests with a principled assault on pork during his House tenure (1995-2000) that was ended by self-imposed term limits. He entered the Senate determined to keep a low profile, but that is difficult considering the Washington spending carnival under Republican rule.

When Congress was called back before Labor Day to pass a $10 billion first installment, Coburn on Sept. 1 declared Congress should "make budget sacrifices of its own if we expect the American people to do the same." On Sept. 6, Sen. John McCain, a longtime anti-pork crusader, joined Coburn's effort. On Sept. 8, as the big aid bill reached the Senate floor, Coburn said, "members of Congress should, at least temporarily, deny themselves a few of the comforts of political office." But there has been no word of support from Republican leaders or the administration.

The $15.3 billion in OMB proposed cuts is just the beginning of the Coburn "sacrifices." He would cut into $27 billion of spending earmarked by individual senators and House members in this year alone. As chairman of the Senate subcommittee on federal financial management, he has found $41.5 billion in government overpayments because of poor accounting practices, $1.2 billion in an "over-priced" renovation of United Nations headquarters, $18 billion in General Services Administration (GSA) middle-man fees and $46 million in cost overruns at the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC).

Coburn's call for "sacrifice" means something entirely different on the left end of the ideological spectrum. In the House, one liberal Democrat after another has taken the floor to demand higher taxes in upper income brackets. A few successful Americans, not the elected politicians, would be doing the sacrificing.

Tom Coburn contends any government worker could find room to cut back spending in his own department before the federal leviathan demands more funds from any individual taxpayers. Ultimately, it is up to the government to sacrifice. As Coburn asserts, "It is inexcusable for the White House and Congress to not even make the effort to find any offsets."

New Architecture As Gulf Prepares To Rebuild, Tensions Mount Over Control (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes, Ann Carrns And Jeff D. Opdyke

With as much as $200 billion beginning to gush out of Washington for the Hurricane Katrina disaster zone, the fight already has begun over who will control the spending and make critical decisions about the future of New Orleans and the Gulf Coast.

The battle is shaping up around three key questions: Will state, local or federal officials have the final say about the shape of redevelopment? Will existing government bodies spend the reconstruction bonanza, or will some new agency be created for the job? And finally, will New Orleans be rebuilt as it was, or will some low-lying areas -- often poor, working class or predominantly African-American -- be sacrificed to improve flood protection?

In Washington, officials from both parties are concluding the reconstruction job is so immense that it demands an entirely new government entity, perhaps similar to the Depression-era Tennessee Valley Authority. Top presidential adviser Karl Rove and other administration officials have begun soliciting names for the new organization's czar. Former General Electric Co. chief Jack Welch has been mentioned as a possible candidate, as have former Secretary of State Colin Powell and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, though those two have detractors within the White House.

But the prospect of a big federal role is arousing suspicion and anger along the Gulf Coast, an area with long memories of a painful post-Civil War reconstruction and powerful suspicions of intrusions on states' rights and local autonomy. "I don't want anyone outside of New Orleans telling us how to plan this city," said New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin during a City Council meeting in Baton Rouge, 80 miles from the group's normal chambers.

Hovering over the battle is a central, perhaps intractable problem. Long before Katrina arrived, New Orleans was a broken city, burdened by poverty, crime, racial divisions, a lethargic economy, substandard schools and public services, and a clearly inadequate flood-control system. Nearly every faction fighting for influence agrees that restoring the prehurricane status quo to New Orleans is untenable.

"We must rebuild our communities better than ever before," said Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco in an address to the State Legislature last night. "Any good architect will tell you that you don't restore a structure without correcting its flaws."

Yet many of the lowest-lying areas most vulnerable to flooding were home to thousands of poor and mostly African-American residents. Some environmentalists and flood-control experts argue that those areas would best be used as marshy buffers against future floods. But that would mean preventing some of New Orleans's poorest residents from ever returning to their neighborhoods.

"New Orleans of the last 40 to 50 years was a mansion built atop matches," says Oliver Thomas, the city council president. "The foundation does not work."

Before Katrina, nearly 15% of the people in the New Orleans metropolitan area lived below the poverty line, as did more than 25% of the children, according to the Census Bureau. Only seven other U.S. cities have higher child-poverty rates. Among the nation's 70 biggest cities, New Orleans' median household income ranked 64th.

Katrina, Mr. Thomas says, highlighted "the hurricanes of poverty and illiteracy...that are here every day."

The city's current flood-control system was designed to handle up to a Category 3 hurricane. Katrina, with winds of up to 145 miles an hour, was a Category 4. Officials with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which builds most levees and other flood-control systems, say that from a scientific and engineering standpoint, a levee system can be built to safeguard the city from even the most powerful hurricanes.

A 2002 preliminary study by the Army Corps' New Orleans district of whether the hurricane-protection system around New Orleans should be upgraded outlined several options. They included fortifying and raising levees -- some to as much as nearly 30 feet from the current 13 feet to 18 feet -- and adding locks to certain canals that some experts believe may have played a part in the flooding of the city. Al Naomi, a long-time engineer with the corps' New Orleans district, estimated the cost of one of the proposals would be $2.5 billion to $3 billion.

But with the city now virtually empty, some influential local business leaders and environmentalists say it might be better to let nature win in some areas. That would almost certainly mean sacrificing some poorer neighborhoods as part of a new flood-control system.

Sherwood Gagliano, president of Coastal Environments Inc. and one of Louisiana's foremost experts on coastal restoration issues, says some low-lying areas of New Orleans shouldn't be heavily populated again. "You don't want to put a lot of people back in those holes," says Dr. Gagliano. Some sections of the city are several feet below sea level.

One idea, he says, would be to transform some of the low-lying residential areas in the city into water "retention areas" of about 5,000 acres each that would gather water during heavy rainfalls or major storms, providing relief to the city's pumps.

Transforming poor, black neighborhoods into retaining ponds wouldn't be easy politically, Dr. Gagliano acknowledges. "We want to come up with a plan that will allow people to be in the region and stay linked to their heritage, but we want their families to be safe," he says.

The possibility that a rebuilt New Orleans will be less black is a sensitive issue in a city that is more than 75% African-American. Mayor Nagin seemed aware of that this week when he said he planned to appoint a blue-ribbon reconstruction commission whose members would be picked according to race -- but not in proportion to the city. He said the 16-member panel would include eight whites and eight African-Americans. The mayor also told the City Council this week that he rejected "the thoughts and ideas" that some, including at least one member of his administration, have voiced publicly about using the storm as a chance to reshape the city's demographics and have fewer poor people.

On Monday night, nearly 30 black business leaders from New Orleans and Baton Rouge met at a church in the capital city to discuss ways to make sure that all New Orleans citizens are included in conversations about how to rebuild the city.

"What makes this city so great is the gumbo mix of people," says Alden J. McDonald Jr., chief executive of Liberty Bank & Trust Co., one of the nation's largest black-controlled banks, and chairman of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce. "Everyone has to be at the table."

In Washington, Congress is moving ahead on plans to set up a large new federal reconstruction authority. As models, lawmakers point to the TVA, created in 1933 to develop a woefully backward area of exhausted farmland and timberland, and the Appalachian Regional Commission, created during Lyndon Johnson's administration at the behest of governors of the impoverished region. Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, a New Hampshire Republican, proposed a powerful new government body, based within the White House but with its headquarters on the Gulf Coast, that would be led by an "individual with strong leadership skills" for three years.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, a Republican from hard-hit Mississippi, is weighing an alliance with liberal Sen. Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts, who last week proposed a Gulf Coast Regional Redevelopment Authority with at least $150 billion to invest in rebuilding the region's infrastructure. Mr. Kennedy sees a permanent entity, but the government's dominance would give way to public-private partnerships after a couple of years, says his spokeswoman, Stephanie Cutter.

One source of tension: President Bush's closest ally in the region is Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour, the former head of the national Republican Party. Gov. Barbour "is going to have a big say in this," an administration official says. Neither he nor Sen. Cochran is likely to allow Mississippi to be shortchanged while New Orleans, a city where Democrats dominate, receives much of the federal largesse.

Other flashpoints are the first wave of aid contracts, which some local officials complain were awarded to out-of-state companies without consulting them. "The federal government is not including us or communicating with us," says New Orleans

Councilwoman Renee Gill Pratt. "We were a city long before the U.S. was a country, and we don't need someone from Minnesota coming down here to tell us where to put our city."

Mr. Bush, who will address the nation tonight, so far is agreeing. On his trip to the Gulf Coast on Monday, Mr. Bush was emphatic that the federal government will defer to the locals in rebuilding. "I think the best policy is one in which the federal government doesn't come down and say, here's what your city will look like," he said in New Orleans.

Historically, federally funded flood-control projects are proposed and funded through a painfully slow system, often taking years or decades of study and planning. Congressional authorization for a major expansion of the New Orleans levees occurred in 1965, the year that Hurricane Betsy swamped the city. But funding for some major components of the work wasn't actually appropriated until 20 years later.

Local levee districts have a big say. The Army Corps of Engineers takes the lead in designing and building major levee projects, then turns them over to the local districts for maintenance.

The Orleans Levee District is particularly powerful. Six members of its eight-seat board are appointed by the governor, and historically the posts have been used to reward political supporters.

The board also operates the chronically money-losing New Orleans Lakefront Airport on the shore of Lake Pontchartrain, two marinas, including the South Shore Harbor Marina with 400 boat slips, and it leases property for a casino on the lake. The district employs more than 200 people, including its own police and fire departments.

Three months before Hurricane Katrina flooded New Orleans, the board gathered on the shores of Lake Pontchartrain to celebrate the dedication of a Mardi Gras Fountain, featuring electronically timed spurts and multicolored lights. The fountain and an adjoining plaza were built at a cost of more than $2 million, partly using tax revenue that the board collects for levee maintenance, according to financial statements filed with the state of Louisiana.

James Huey, a local businessman who serves as the board's president, couldn't be reached yesterday. One former board member who supported the restoration, retired Marine Maj. Gen. James Livingston, who resigned and moved to South Carolina more than a year ago, said he wasn't aware of the fountain project's final cost but the restoration was consistent with the district's responsibility to maintain its waterfront property, which is heavily used for recreation by the community. "It was something that needed to be fixed," he said. "It was a gesture to be a good neighbor. In retrospect, I don't have any issue with that decision being made."

One of Mayor Nagin's biggest concerns is that money to rebuild New Orleans is likely to flow through the state and levee boards. There has long been tension between the city and state. Mr. Nagin points to the tens of millions of dollars Louisiana received from Harrah's Entertainment Inc. when the Las Vegas gambling concern won the right to build a casino in downtown New Orleans in the 1990s. That money, he said, "built state buildings in Baton Rouge," instead of being pumped back into New Orleans. Moreover, while New Orleans contributes between one-quarter and one-third of the state's revenue, "the state uses that New Orleans money elsewhere."

The Gulf Coast faced similar tensions after a massive 1927 flood along the Mississippi River devastated about 25,000 square miles -- about a quarter of the area Katrina ravaged -- and left 350,000 homeless. According to historian John Barry's popular book "Rising Tide," a key to the recovery was President Calvin Coolidge's quick dispatch of his secretary of commerce, Herbert Hoover.

Mr. Hoover was given sweeping authority to coordinate all local, state, federal and private endeavors. His success helped elect him president in 1928.

Hoover relied heavily on the private sector to get the job done. "I suppose I could have called in the whole of the Army," he said later, according to Richard Norton Smith's biography, "An Uncommon Man." "But what was the use? All I had to do was to call in Main Street itself."

Contracts For Recovery Work Raise Controversy (USAT)

By Kevin McCoy

USA Today, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005561

Two of the first companies that got emergency no-bid federal contracts for Hurricane Katrina recovery work have faced questions over past business practices, court and government records show.

A division of Fluor, a California firm awarded a housing contract worth up to $100 million, has paid millions of dollars to settle federal government lawsuits — including one that accused it of overbilling for 1989 hurricane cleanup work.

The Shaw Group, a Louisiana firm that won housing and engineering contracts worth up to $200 million, has disclosed that it is being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The firm is also a defendant in federal securities class-action cases.

The contracts were awarded by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and Federal Emergency Management Agency as part of a relief effort expected to top $100 billion. The awards, which so far include contracts to such national giants as Bechtel as well as smaller Louisiana and Mississippi firms, eventually are expected to constitute the largest rebuilding effort in U.S. history.

It is routine for government agencies to award non-competitive contracts for emergency work as part of an effort to speed recovery work. Federal Homeland Security officials announced this week that 30 investigators and auditors would go to the Gulf Coast to ensure that the emergency contracts are carried out properly.

At least one government watchdog group critical of the Hurricane Katrina contract-award process says the federal oversight effort should include tougher screening before emergency contracts are awarded, as well as afterward.

"This is an area where the federal government falls flat on its face," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, the watchdog group.

Federal court records show Fluor agreed to pay $3.2 million in 1997 to settle allegations that its FD Services division padded repair bills for cleaning up U.S. Navy bases in South Carolina after the 1989 strike of Hurricane Hugo. Fluor also agreed to pay $8.5 million in 2001 to settle allegations that it billed the government for work done for other clients, court records show.

Fluor spokeswoman Lisa Boyette said the company has "been working successfully for FEMA for eight years now on disaster work across the country." She referred questions about the most recent contract award to FEMA officials.

In an e-mail response, FEMA spokesman Michael Widomski said the agency checks whether firms being considered for emergency work have been barred from getting contracts. But he said FEMA had been unaware of the Hurricane Hugo settlement and other cases.

In its annual report filed in July, the Shaw Group disclosed that it was the subject of what the company termed an "informal inquiry" by the SEC. The firm said it was cooperating with investigators, who had not told the firm the reason for the inquiry or its scope. The SEC declined to comment.

Separately, federal securities class-action cases accuse the Shaw Group and its executives of defrauding investors with misleading statements about the company's finances and management.

The firm did not respond to phone messages seeking comment. But in its annual report, the firm said it believed all of its financial statements satisfied generally accepted accounting principles, "and that none of our press releases or public filings contained misrepresentations or omissions."

Moreover, in a Sept. 8 news release announcing its Hurricane Katrina award, the firm said it was also doing emergency contract work for the Army Corps of Engineers, U.S. Navy and other agencies.

Army Corps officials weigh companies' past performance in deciding new contracts, said spokeswoman Carol Sanders. Current investigations might also be noted, Sanders said. She could not say whether the agency had known about the SEC inquiry.

FEMA spokesman Widomski said his agency had been unaware of both the SEC matter and the securities class-action lawsuits involving the Shaw Group.

Brian complained that federal contract officers have little contact with prosecutors or agencies that might be investigating firms under consideration for awards.

"Right now, there isn't a place for the federal government to get a history of a company's business background," she said. "There should be one place where they can look."

Labor Fights To Preserve Davis-Bacon (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0005562

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Among the litany of regulations in line to be eased or suspended during the daunting rebuilding process on the Gulf Coast are several that have greatly alarmed labor unions, whose furious lobbying efforts are hitting a brick wall of conservative might.

Union officials are concerned that President Bush's Sept. 8 suspension of the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires federal contractors to pay construction workers a prevailing wage, was only the beginning. Further hurting the union cause is GOP lawmakers' support for broad bureaucratic relaxation in the Labor Department, a push rooted in the long-standing bad blood between unions and Republican think tanks.

"I think this is a mean-spirited attack on the labor movement. The right wing has never been able to touch us in the legislative arena on Davis-Bacon. They saw an opportunity and took it," said Don Kaniewski, political director for the Laborers' International Union of North America (LIUNA).

The presidents of LIUNA, the carpenters union and the engineers union wrote to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) yesterday decrying the Davis-Bacon suspension. LIUNA and the carpenters belong to the new labor federation Change to Win, formed by unions seceded from the AFL-CIO, while the engineers remain AFL-CIO members.

Despite the scrutiny heaped upon organized labor for its internal division, the AFL-CIO echoed LIUNA's concerns, singling out Grover Norquist's Americans for Tax Reform (ATR) as an instrumental force for undoing worker-rights laws.

"People in the think-tank world have a long history of opposing protection for unions," said AFL-CIO Legislative Director Bill Samuel, resulting in a GOP "leadership that is pretty determinedly anti-labor. We haven't gotten a single phone call from Republicans on the Hill asking what should we do for this crisis."

The AFL-CIO sent legislative recommendations to Sen. Michael Enzi (R-Wyo.), chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, for use as he spearheads the drafting of a broad Katrina bill that will include employee-benefits provisions. But when asked whether Davis-Bacon's wage floors would be taken into account, Enzi said no and that he had no position on the act.

Bush waived Davis-Bacon for storm-affected areas in Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana as well as the two southernmost counties of Florida, one day after receiving a letter from Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and 34 other House Republicans urging him to do so. While hundreds of thousands of Gulf homes were destroyed, local reports estimated that Katrina leveled about 350 houses in South Florida.

Norquist, for his part, was far from cowed by the possibility of political counterattack by the AFL-CIO or Change to Win.

"Oh, gee, maybe they'll try to oppose the president the next time he runs for office," Norquist cracked. He added that the temporary Davis-Bacon suspension "certainly strengthens the case" for an eventual full repeal. "It will make it obvious to people what the dead-weight costs of Davis-Bacon will be."

On the heels of Davis-Bacon will come a likely easing of the Service Contract Act, mandating a prevailing wage for service workers on federal contracts. The purpose of abandoning wage floors, both labor and conservative sources agreed, is to increase efficiency and help companies rebuilding the Gulf Coast to save money. Where that money will go is another story.

Samuel wondered whether Congress should institute an oversight mechanism to ensure construction savings are passed from the private companies retained by the government and into federal coffers. "These no-bid contracts, are they somehow mandating lower profits?" he asked. Firms awarded lucrative reconstruction jobs include several with ties to the White House, and most have already reaped the benefits through rising stock prices.

The impact of labor deregulation will be felt politically as well as financially. One building-trades lobbyist, who asked to remain anonymous because his group's internal division means it can take no stance on the issue, pointed out that prevailing wages in the Gulf are so much lower than the national average that the suspension will barely move profits.

"Politically, it was a mistake. Practically, it will have no impact. It was a fight the administration didn't need to take on at this time," the lobbyist said.

However, he noted, the conservative voting record of construction union members as compared with the rest of the labor community means congressional Republicans could see swing votes slip away for the 2006 election. "Now the leaders of the building trades will be reporting to their members, 'you can't trust Republicans, because every time they have a chance they are going to weaken Davis-Bacon,'" he said.

Ryan Ellis, ATR's labor lobbyist, conceded that historically low paychecks for Gulf workers will result in less potential savings from Davis-Bacon elimination. He reinforced the widespread conservative contention that unions hoard workers' wages for use on dues payments and political giving to Democrats.

"Some of the money [from a prevailing wage] would go to workers, but a lot of it would be siphoned off by unions through dues money because they are no longer forced to hold taxpayers hostage through union contracts. The union guys would rather have taxpayer dollars go into their pockets," Ellis said. Despite the difference between Davis-Bacon's prevailing wage and the standard union wage, he said, they are "de facto" identical.

The Labor Department is examining still more areas in which existing rules can be suspended for Katrina relief to accelerate. Official word from Secretary Elaine Chao of new 401(k) hardship loans for Gulf workers and waiver relaxation at state work-force investment boards, in addition to other moves, could come as quickly as today.

"We are looking at [more] ways to release red tape to deliver needed resources to workers who have been affected," said Labor Department spokesman David James.

Lessons From Galveston (USAT)

By Alcestis "Cooky" Oberg

USA Today, September 15, 2005

When the flood waters recede, New Orleans will certainly be rebuilt, if for no better reason than its strategic location: on the Mississippi River near the Gulf of Mexico. Many of our nation's vital industries and transportation resources are centralized there.

Some want to rebuild the city exactly where and how it was before Hurricane Katrina, with stronger, higher levees. Simply turn back the clock. And that's crazy.

We have a historic opportunity to rebuild New Orleans better, safer — to change its shape, the location of its neighborhoods, even its topography. It's all been done before.

The greatest natural disaster to hit the USA — and the only one comparable to Katrina in the scope of its destruction — was the 1900 storm that devastated Galveston, Texas. Between 6,000 and 12,000 people died and, afterward, 75 looters had to be shot dead before law and order could be restored. Every Galvestonian knew that some places never come back from a storm like that. Indianola, Texas' No. 1 port in the 1800s, was clobbered by two ferocious storms within 11 years that destroyed its buildings and silted its bay. Indianola was abandoned in 1886.

Goodbye isn't an option

But that wasn't going to happen to Galveston. Like New Orleans today, it was too dominant and vital an economic center to just die. Galvestonians burned their dead, cleared the debris and rebuilt with dazzling energy and boldness.

Work started on a mighty concrete seawall — 17 feet high, 16 to 20 feet thick at the base, nearly 10.5 miles long. The seawall had a concave shape, so waves would break upward and back onto themselves. Granite blocks along its base protected against erosion. Because Galveston sat on a sandbar-type barrier island of 5-7 feet elevation, leaders decided to raise the entire grade of the city to 12-15 feet elevation. This meant that every building and every house in a 500-block area was raised on jackscrews and filled in underneath with sand.

The project took eight years and was financed by bonds underwritten by Galveston itself, along with tax relief from the state. When another monster hurricane came, in 1915, the city was ready: Only eight people died, and damage was relatively limited. The 1900 storm was a historic opportunity to change Galveston's vulnerability to hurricanes forever with an engineering project so vast, it was breathtaking.

Such an opportunity now exists for New Orleans. Certainly, officials could change its bowl-like topography and raise the grade of its new neighborhoods much higher, as Galveston did. New Orleans might forbid rebuilding some neighborhoods at all and give them back to the marshes and swamps they came from. A new transportation system could carry residents to higher, safer suburbs farther away, reducing the population allowed to live in the city. Perhaps Baton Rouge and New Orleans could merge into one metropolitan entity, offering both pleasure to tourists and safety to residents.

The human calculus of rebuilding is less certain. Some businesses and people will just never come back. They'll put down roots wherever they are now — Texas, Georgia, Arkansas — and be lost to New Orleans forever. That happened to Galveston, too, which never completely came back to its former glory as a dominant port or as the "Wall Street of the Southwest." Some of that had to do with the 1900 storm; some didn't. Much of 20th century commerce went to Houston, partly for its huge, less vulnerable port miles inland, partly because new industries — oil and gas refineries, international banks, medical and space centers — needed to build massive facilities and sprawling neighborhoods on the vast prairies of the mainland, not on a small, vulnerable island.

Nonetheless, Galveston thrived and adapted after the 1900 storm. The city recaptured its tourist industry with new seawall-protected hotels, and its cotton-shipping business remained robust for decades. It even became a tame prototype of Las Vegas from Prohibition to 1957, with glittery nightclubs where discreet and illegal drinking, gambling and prostitution flourished until they were shut down.

Some of New Orleans' future direction can be detected in Galveston's patterns; some can't. The things we all love about New Orleans — the French Quarter, the Garden District, the magnificent downtown hotels, the great music, culture and food — will undoubtedly come back better than ever. Other commerce is less predictable. The existing energy and transportation assets might stay near New Orleans in the short term but might disperse and relocate in future decades. We don't know what 21st century industries and opportunities might come along, too, or whether New Orleans can offer them the resources they need.

What can't be predicted

We can't be hubristic about rebuilding New Orleans. While some hurricane challenges, such as storm surge and wind damage, can be met with costly, mega-engineering projects and extremely stiff building codes, others cannot.

The gut punch to Galveston was thrown by Hurricane Carla in 1961. Though the seawall held firm to protect against storm surges, unpredictable tornadoes spun out of the storm, hopped right over the seawall and devastated some neighborhoods — all broadcast by the new technology of television to horrified Americans. Carla's punch was more psychological than physical. Although only seven people died and damages totaled $15 million, Galveston lost its sense of safety and invulnerability. It went into a decades-long economic slump from which it has only recently emerged.

New Orleans has had its Big One, the hideous twin to Galveston's 1900 storm in scope and destruction. But before we rebuild it, we should ask whether rebuilding for another Katrina is enough. Perhaps there's a Carla or something worse lurking that we should prepare for, too.

Chertoff Delayed Federal Response, Memo Shows (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay, Alison Young And Shannon McCaffrey

Knight Ridder, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - The federal official with the power to mobilize a massive federal response to Hurricane Katrina was Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, not the former FEMA chief who was relieved of his duties and resigned earlier this week, federal documents reviewed by Knight Ridder show.

Even before the storm struck the Gulf Coast, Chertoff could have ordered federal agencies into action without any request from state or local officials. Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown had only limited authority to do so until about 36 hours after the storm hit, when Chertoff designated him as the "principal federal official" in charge of the storm.

As thousands of hurricane victims went without food, water and shelter in the days after Katrina's early morning Aug. 29 landfall, critics assailed Brown for being responsible for delays that might have cost hundreds of lives.

But Chertoff - not Brown - was in charge of managing the national response to a catastrophic disaster, according to the National Response Plan, the federal government's blueprint for how agencies will handle major natural disasters or terrorist incidents. An order issued by President Bush in 2003 also assigned that responsibility to the homeland security director.

But according to a memo obtained by Knight Ridder, Chertoff didn't shift that power to Brown until late afternoon or evening on Aug. 30, about 36 hours after Katrina hit Louisiana and Mississippi. That same memo suggests that Chertoff may have been confused about his lead role in disaster response and that of his department.

"As you know, the President has established the `White House Task Force on Hurricane Katrina Response.' He will meet with us tomorrow to launch this effort. The Department of Homeland Security, along with other Departments, will be part of the task force and will assist the Administration with its response to Hurricane Katrina," Chertoff said in the memo to the secretaries of defense, health and human services and other key federal agencies.

On the day that Chertoff wrote the memo, Bush was in San Diego presiding over a ceremony marking the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II.

Chertoff's Aug. 30 memo for the first time declared Katrina an "Incident of National Significance," a key designation that triggers swift federal coordination. The following afternoon, Bush met with his Cabinet, then appeared before TV cameras in the White House Rose Garden to announce the government's planned action.

That same day, Aug. 31, the Department of Defense, whose troops and equipment are crucial in such large disasters, activated its Task Force Katrina. But active-duty troops didn't begin to arrive in large numbers along the Gulf Coast until Saturday.

White House and homeland security officials wouldn't explain why Chertoff waited some 36 hours to declare Katrina an incident of national significance and why he didn't immediately begin to direct the federal response from the moment on Aug. 27 when the National Hurricane Center predicted that Katrina would strike the Gulf Coast with catastrophic force in 48 hours. Nor would they explain why Bush felt the need to appoint a separate task force.

Chertoff's hesitation and Bush's creation of a task force both appear to contradict the National Response Plan and previous presidential directives that specify what the secretary of homeland security is assigned to do without further presidential orders. The goal of the National Response Plan is to provide a streamlined framework for swiftly delivering federal assistance when a disaster - caused by terrorists or Mother Nature - is too big for local officials to handle.

Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, referred most inquiries about the memo and Chertoff's actions to the Department of Homeland Security.

"There will be an after-action report" on the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, Perino said. She added that "Chertoff had the authority to invoke the Incident of National Significance, and he did it on Tuesday."

Perino said the creation of the White House task force didn't add another bureaucratic layer or delay the response to the devastating hurricane. "Absolutely not," she said. "I think it helped move things along." When asked whether the delay in issuing the Incident of National Significance was to allow Bush time to return to Washington, Perino replied: "Not that I'm aware of."

Russ Knocke, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, didn't dispute that the National Response Plan put Chertoff in charge in federal response to a catastrophe. But he disputed that the bureaucracy got in the way of launching the federal response.

"There was a tremendous sense of urgency," Knocke said. "We were mobilizing the greatest response to a disaster in the nation's history."

Knocke noted that members of the Coast Guard were already in New Orleans performing rescues and FEMA personnel and supplies had been deployed to the region.

The Department of Homeland Security has refused repeated requests to provide details about Chertoff's schedule and said it couldn't say specifically when the department requested assistance from the military. Knocke said a military liaison was working with FEMA, but said he didn't know his or her name or rank. FEMA officials said they wouldn't provide information about the liaison.

Knocke said members of almost every federal agency had already been meeting as part of the department's Interagency Incident Management Group, which convened for the first time on the Friday before the hurricane struck. So it would be a mistake, he said, to interpret the memo as meaning that Tuesday, Aug. 30 was the first time that members of the federal government coordinated.

The Chertoff memo indicates that the response to Katrina wasn't left to disaster professionals, but was run out of the White House, said George Haddow, a former deputy chief of staff at FEMA during the Clinton administration and the co-author of an emergency management textbook.

"It shows that the president is running the disaster, the White House is running it as opposed to Brown or Chertoff," Haddow said. Brown "is a convenient fall guy. He's not the problem really. The problem is a system that was marginalized."

A former FEMA director under President Reagan expressed shock by the inaction that Chertoff's memo suggested. It showed that Chertoff "does not have a full appreciation for what the country is faced with - nor does anyone who waits that long," said Gen. Julius Becton Jr., who was FEMA director from 1985-1989.

"Anytime you have a delay in taking action, there's a potential for losing lives," Becton told Knight Ridder. "I have no idea how many lives we're talking about. ... I don't understand why, except that they were inefficient."

Chertoff's Aug. 30 memo came on the heels of a memo from Brown, written several hours after Katrina made landfall, showing that the FEMA director was waiting for Chertoff's permission to get help from others within the massive department. In that memo, first obtained by the Associated Press last week, Brown requested Chertoff's "assistance to make available DHS employees willing to deploy as soon as possible." It asked for another 1,000 homeland security workers within two days and 2,000 within a week.

The four-paragraph memo ended with Brown thanking Chertoff "for your consideration in helping us meet our responsibilities in this near catastrophic event."

According to the National Response Plan, which was unveiled in January by Chertoff's predecessor, Tom Ridge, the secretary of homeland security is supposed to declare an Incident of National Significance when a catastrophic event occurs.

"Standard procedures regarding requests for assistance may be expedited or, under extreme circumstances, suspended in the immediate aftermath of an event of catastrophic magnitude," according to the plan, which evolved from earlier plans and lessons learned after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "Notification and full coordination with the States will occur, but the coordination process must not delay or impede the rapid deployment and use of critical resources."

Should Chertoff have declared Katrina an Incident of National Significance sooner - even before the storm struck? Did his delay slow the quick delivery of the massive federal response that was needed? Would it have made a difference?

"You raise good questions," said Frank J. Cilluffo, the director of George Washington University's Homeland Security Planning Institute. It's too early to tell, he said, whether unfamiliarity with or glitches in the new National Response Plan were factors in the poor early response to Katrina.

"Clearly this is the first test. It certainly did not pass with flying colors," Cilluffo said of the National Response Plan.

Mike Byrne, a former senior homeland security official under Ridge who worked on the plan, said he doesn't think the new National Response Plan caused the confusion that plagued the early response to Katrina.

Something else went wrong, he suspects. The new National Response Plan isn't all that different from the previous plan, called the Federal Response Plan.

"Our history of responding to major disasters has been one where we've done it well," Byrne said. "We need to figure out why this one didn't go as well as the others did. It's shocking to me."

Ex-FEMA Chief Tells Of Frustration And Chaos (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick And Scott Shane

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Hours after Hurricane Katrina passed New Orleans on Aug. 29, as the scale of the catastrophe became clear, Michael D. Brown recalls, he placed frantic calls to his boss, Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, and to the office of the White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr.

Mr. Brown, then director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said he told the officials in Washington that the Louisiana governor, Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, and her staff were proving incapable of organizing a coherent state effort and that his field officers in the city were reporting an "out of control" situation.

"I am having a horrible time," Mr. Brown said he told Mr. Chertoff and a White House official - either Mr. Card or his deputy, Joe Hagin - in a status report that evening. "I can't get a unified command established."

By the time of that call, he added, "I was beginning to realize things were going to hell in a handbasket" in Louisiana. A day later, Mr. Brown said, he asked the White House to take over the response effort.

DOJ_NMG_0005567

He said he felt the subsequent appointment of Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honoré of the Army as the Pentagon's commander of active-duty forces began to turn the situation around.

In his first extensive interview since resigning as FEMA director on Monday under intense criticism, Mr. Brown declined to blame President Bush or the White House for his removal or for the flawed response.

"I truly believed the White House was not at fault here," he said.

He focused much of his criticism on Governor Blanco, contrasting what he described as her confused response with far more agile mobilizations in Mississippi and Alabama, as well as in Florida during last year's hurricanes.

But Mr. Brown's account, in which he described making "a blur of calls" all week to Mr. Chertoff, Mr. Card and Mr. Hagin, suggested that Mr. Bush, or at least his top aides, were informed early and repeatedly by the top federal official at the scene that state and local authorities were overwhelmed and that the overall response was going badly.

A senior administration official said Wednesday night that White House officials recalled the conversations with Mr. Brown but did not believe they had the urgency or desperation he described in the interview.

"There's a general recollection of him saying, 'They're going to need more help,' " said the official, who insisted on anonymity because of the delicacy of internal White House discussions.

Mr. Brown's version of events raises questions about whether the White House and Mr. Chertoff acted aggressively enough in the response. New Orleans convulsed in looting and violence after the hurricane, and troops did not arrive in force to restore order until five days later.

The account also suggests that responsibility for the failure may go well beyond Mr. Brown, who has been widely pilloried as an inexperienced manager who previously oversaw horse show judges.

Mr. Brown was removed by Mr. Chertoff last week from directing the relief effort. A 50-year-old lawyer and Republican activist who joined FEMA as general counsel in 2001, Mr. Brown said he had been hobbled by limitations on the power of the agency to command resources.

With only 2,600 employees nationwide, he said, FEMA must rely on state workers, the National Guard, private contractors and other federal agencies to supply manpower and equipment.

He said his biggest mistake was in waiting until the end of the day on Aug. 30 to ask the White House explicitly to take over the response from FEMA and state officials.

Of his resignation, Mr. Brown said: "I said I was leaving because I don't want to be a distraction. I want to focus on what happened here and the issues that this raises."

Governor Blanco said Wednesday that she took responsibility for failures and missteps in the immediate response to the hurricane and pledged a united effort to rebuild areas ravaged by the storm, adding, "at the state level, we must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again." A spokesman for Ms. Blanco denied Mr. Brown's description of disarray in Louisiana's emergency response operation. "That is just totally inaccurate," said Bob Mann, the governor's communications director. "Everything that Mr. Brown needed in terms of resources or information from the state, he had those available to him."

In Washington, Mr. Chertoff's spokesman, Russ Knocke, said there had been no delay in the federal response. "We pushed absolutely everything we could," Mr. Knocke said, "every employee, every asset, every effort, to save and sustain lives."

As Mr. Brown recounted it, the weekend before New Orleans's levees burst, FEMA sent an emergency response team of 10 or 20 people to Louisiana to review evacuation plans with local officials.

By Saturday afternoon, many residents were leaving. But as the hurricane approached early on Sunday, Mr. Brown said he grew so frustrated with the failure of local authorities to make the evacuation mandatory that he asked Mr. Bush for help.

"Would you please call the mayor and tell him to ask people to evacuate?" Mr. Brown said he asked Mr. Bush in a phone call.

"Mike, you want me to call the mayor?" the president responded in surprise, Mr. Brown said. Moments later, apparently on his own, the mayor, C. Ray Nagin, held a news conference to announce a mandatory evacuation, but it was too late, Mr. Brown said. Plans said it would take at least 72 hours to get everyone out.

When he arrived in Baton Rouge on Sunday evening, Mr. Brown said, he was concerned about the lack of coordinated response from Governor Blanco and Maj. Gen. Bennett C. Landreneau, the adjutant general of the Louisiana National Guard.

"What do you need? Help me help you," Mr. Brown said he asked them. "The response was like, 'Let us find out,' and then I never received specific requests for specific things that needed doing."

The most responsive person he could find, Mr. Brown said, was Governor Blanco's husband, Raymond. "He would try to go find stuff out for me," Mr. Brown said.

Governor Blanco's communications director, Mr. Mann, said that she was frustrated that Mr. Brown and others at FEMA wanted itemized requests before acting. "It was like walking into an emergency room bleeding profusely and being expected to instruct the doctors how to treat you," he said.

On Monday night, Mr. Brown said, he reported his growing worries to Mr. Chertoff and the White House. He said he did not ask for federal active-duty troops to be deployed because he assumed his superiors in Washington were doing all they could. Instead, he said, he repeated a dozen times, "I cannot get a unified command established."

The next morning, Mr. Brown said, he and Governor Blanco decided to take a helicopter into New Orleans to see the mayor and assess the situation. But before the helicopter took off, his field coordinating officer, or F.C.O., called from the city on a satellite phone. "It is getting out of control down here; the levee has broken," the staff member told him, he said.

The crowd in the Superdome, the city's shelter of last resort, was already larger than expected. But Mr. Brown said he was relieved to see that the mayor had a detailed list of priorities, starting with help to evacuate the Superdome.

Mr. Brown passed the list on to the state emergency operations center in Baton Rouge, but when he returned that evening he was surprised to find that nothing had been done.

"I am just screaming at my F.C.O., 'Where are the helicopters?' " he recalled. " 'Where is the National Guard? Where is all the stuff that the mayor wanted?' "

FEMA, he said, had no helicopters and only a few communications trucks. The agency typically depends on state resources, a system he said worked well in the other Gulf Coast states and in Florida last year.

Meanwhile, "unbeknownst to me," Mr. Brown said, at some point on Monday or Tuesday the hotels started directing their remaining guests to the convention center - something neither FEMA nor local officials had planned.

At the same time, the Superdome was degenerating into "gunfire and anarchy," and on Tuesday the FEMA staff and medical team in New Orleans called to say they were leaving for their own safety.

That night, Mr. Brown said, he called Mr. Chertoff and the White House again in desperation. "Guys, this is bigger than what we can handle," he told them, he said. "This is bigger than what FEMA can do. I am asking for help."

"Maybe I should have screamed 12 hours earlier," Mr. Brown said in the interview. "But that is hindsight. We were still trying to make things work."

By Wednesday morning, Mr. Brown said, he learned that General Honoré was on his way. While the general did not have responsibility for the entire relief effort and the Guard, his commanding manner helped mobilize the state's efforts.

"Honoré shows up and he and I have a phone conversation," Mr. Brown said. "He gets the message, and, boom, it starts happening."

Mr. Brown said that in one much-publicized gaffe - his repeated statement on live television on Thursday night, Sept. 1, that he had just learned that day of thousands of people at New Orleans's convention center without food or water - "I just absolutely misspoke." In fact, he said, he learned about the evacuees there from the first media reports more than 24 hours earlier, but the reports conflicted with information from local authorities and he had no staff on the site until Thursday.

There were also conflicts with the Congressional delegations that wanted resources for their offices and districts, FEMA officials said. Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi said he "resisted aggressively" a decision by Mr. Brown to dispatch a Navy medical ship to Louisiana instead of his home state.

Mr. Brown acknowledged that he had been criticized for not ordering a complete evacuation or calling in federal troops sooner. But he said the storm made it hard to communicate and assess the situation.

"Until you have been there," he said, "you don't realize it is the middle of a hurricane."

Governor, Mayor Acknowledge Mistakes (USAT)

By From staff and wire reports

USA Today, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco admitted “failures at every level of government" in the response to Hurricane Katrina on Wednesday. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin also conceded missteps.

Meanwhile, businesses began to open their doors in New Orleans after the reopening of the city airport and ports.

“Right now we're going forward," said Bruce Hicks, spokesman for Starwood Hotels. Starwood owns the Sheraton, one of the first of several big downtown hotels to reopen. “The city must have this and other hotels to house the thousands of people who come in here to rebuild."

In an evening address to a special meeting of the state Legislature in Baton Rouge, Blanco said she shouldered blame for her state's situation.

“The buck stops here, and as your governor, I take full responsibility,” said Blanco, a first-term Democrat.

“We all know that there were failures at every level of government: state, federal and local. At the state level, we must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again,” she said.

Nagin also struck a more conciliatory note.

“We could have all done things better,” Nagin said.

Blame has been rampant over the sluggish evacuation of New Orleans as the storm bore down and the failure to rescue everyone caught in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. President Bush, who will address the nation this evening about Katrina, has said he accepts responsibility for federal failures.

In New Orleans, pumps working around the clock had reduced floodwaters that covered 80% of the city to about half of the city.

Traffic, very limited last week, has increased as more business owners return to inspect their property.

About 168,000 customers were still without power. Electricity cannot be restored until areas are drained. “It's all about power,” said Bubby Valentino, 58, who owns three hotels in the French Quarter that needed only a few repairs.

“If we can get power back and get air circulating in these rooms, we're OK,” Valentino said.

The number of Gulf Coast deaths from Katrina rose to 708, including 474 in Louisiana.

In Washington, a Senate committee held a hearing on the disaster and response. Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, the chairwoman, said expensive changes in the government's emergency-preparedness system made after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks had failed their first major test during Katrina.

Given the billions of dollars spent in the past four years, she said, “We would have expected a sharp, crisp response to this terrible tragedy."

“Instead,” she said, “we witnessed what appeared to be a sluggish initial response."

Blanco Takes Blame For State Response (WT/AP)

By Melinda DeSlatte, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. -- Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco yesterday took responsibility for failures and missteps in the immediate response to Hurricane Katrina and pledged a united effort to rebuild areas ravaged by the storm.

"We all know that there were failures at every level of government: state, federal and local. At the state level, we must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again. The buck stops here, and as your governor, I take full responsibility," Mrs. Blanco told lawmakers in a special meeting of the Louisiana Legislature.

Mrs. Blanco's statement came a day after President Bush said he would "take responsibility" for federal failures in dealing with Katrina. The Democratic governor, who has criticized the response of federal officials to the storm and subsequent flood that deluged New Orleans, yesterday told legislators that Mr. Bush is "a friend and partner" in Louisiana's recovery effort.

In New Orleans yesterday, test results released showed that floodwaters still pose a health risk because of dangerous levels of sewage-related bacteria and toxic chemicals, potentially delaying the mayor's plan to reopen parts of the city by Monday.

The Army Corps of Engineers estimates that up to 50 percent of the floodwaters that had covered 80 percent of the city had been removed and said New Orleans would be almost completely drained by Oct. 8.

Pumps are removing more than 8 billion gallons a day, and Mayor C. Ray Nagin was deliberating time frames for reopening parts of the city that are dry, including the French Quarter and Central Business District.

Addressing Louisiana lawmakers yesterday, Mrs. Blanco said she would appoint an outside financial adviser to oversee the expenditure of billions of dollars in federal money that Congress has allocated to help the recovery from the disaster.

"I assure the Congress and every American taxpayer that every nickel will be properly spent," Mrs. Blanco said.

Meanwhile, in Washington, Senate Republicans scuttled an attempt by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, to establish an independent, bipartisan panel patterned after the September 11 commission to investigate what went wrong with federal, state and local governments' response to the hurricane.

Separately, a Senate committee opened a hearing on the disaster, with the panel's Republican chairman saying that changes instituted after September 11 in the government's emergency preparedness failed their first major test during Katrina.

With billions of dollars to boost disaster preparedness at all levels of government, "we would have expected a sharp, crisp response to this terrible tragedy," said Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican. "Instead, we witnessed what appeared to be a sluggish initial response."

The official death toll from Hurricane Katrina rose to 708 yesterday after Louisiana confirmed 51 more deaths. In addition to Louisiana's 474 deaths, 218 deaths have been recorded in Mississippi, two in Alabama and 14 in Florida, according to officials in the different states.

At least two of the Katrina evacuees scattered across the country have committed suicide, and 55 others have died, authorities said yesterday.

Most of the post-Katrina dead were elderly or already sick, with heart conditions, cancer or other terminal illnesses, authorities said. Many had been living in hospitals, hospices and nursing homes. Several suffered heart attacks.

On Tuesday, Mrs. Blanco had lashed out at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), saying she was "outraged" at the slow pace of recovering bodies of those who perished in the storm. Yesterday, FEMA responded by saying that Louisiana officials asked to take over the effort last week.

"The collection of bodies is not normally a FEMA responsibility," FEMA spokesman David Passey said.

According to documents released by the state yesterday, Kenyon International Emergency Services was hired Tuesday to recover, document and handle the bodies of the victims of Hurricane Katrina. The contract will cost almost $119,000 a day for two months.

"It's going to take months, maybe years," said Dr. Louis Cataldi, the coroner for Baton Rouge Parish. "This is not going away."

Louisiana transportation officials estimated yesterday that about 1.2 million people were evacuated from the metropolitan New Orleans area in the two days leading up to Katrina's Aug. 29 landfall and that many of those people are still scattered in other states.

Despite speculation that some would prefer to settle in their new towns, Mr. Nagin expected most would return and rebuild.

"I know New Orleanians," he said. "Once the beignets start cooking up again and the gumbo is in the pots and red beans and rice are served on Monday -- in New Orleans, and not where they are -- they're going to be back."

A day after Mr. Nagin said the city is essentially broke, New Orleans' already beleaguered school system announced that it would also need federal assistance to keep paying its teachers.

Dan Packer, chief executive of Entergy New Orleans, said the company had restored power to 75 percent of the 1.1 million customers who were out at the height of the storm, mostly in Mississippi and areas of Louisiana north and west of New Orleans.

President Bush will arrive in Louisiana today to deliver a prime-time televised speech to the nation.

Hearings To Shape FEMA's Future (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Congress opened hearings yesterday to figure out what went wrong in the immediate response to Hurricane Katrina and resolve the question of what is to become of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

FEMA has become synonymous with the government's bungled response to the hurricane, with a number of politicians saying part of the problem is that the agency is no longer cabinet-level but rather a small cog in the mammoth Department of Homeland Security.

Prominent Democrats, such as Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York, have proposed bills that would make FEMA an independent agency -- a move enthusiastically endorsed by several state emergency managers, who are effectively FEMA's "clients." To them, FEMA's mission to help states prepare for "all hazards" -- from tornadoes to terrorism -- got lost as the department's policies and funding programs became increasingly terrorism-centric.

But yesterday's hearings showed that such a move has far from unanimous backing in the Senate. Susan Collins, a Maine Republican and chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, said she would explore the idea but cautioned her colleagues against making any hasty moves. "My inclination is that FEMA should be part of the Department of Homeland Security," she said.

Ms. Collins was one of the main architects of the legislation that subsumed FEMA, along with 21 other agencies, into a new Department of Homeland Security in 2003. The creation of the department, the biggest shake-up of the government since the creation of the Pentagon after World War II, came in response to the 2001 terrorist attacks and was supposed to have solved many of the same problems that surfaced after Katrina.

Ms. Collins noted that Katrina was the first major test that the government's new bureaucracy has faced since 9/11, and "this structure failed to meet our expectations."

That said, some security experts say that moving FEMA might help how the country deals with natural disasters, but could undermine Homeland Security's efforts to respond to acts of catastrophic terrorism. A relationship between Homeland Security and an independent FEMA could also be complicated: Who will be in charge of running response efforts during disasters? Will there be two separate plans and chains of command for terrorist-related events and nonterrorism-related events? There could be a significant duplication of efforts and confusion that further undermine the country's emergency-response system.

"Making FEMA a separate agency reporting directly to the president won't in and of itself solve anything," says Clark Kent Ervin, the former inspector general for Homeland Security. "The danger is that people will assume that such an organizational change will fix the problem, when an independent FEMA will be caught just as flat-footed when disaster next strikes if it still has leaders who fail to plan and prepare for utterly foreseeable catastrophes."

Another option on the table is to transform FEMA into a super-emergency preparedness and response division inside Homeland Security. Although Congress actually created such a division in the department, the preparedness part of the job was stripped away and put in a completely separate entity elsewhere in the department. It reports directly to the Homeland Security secretary and has become the main distributor of grants to first responders, a job that was once central to FEMA.

The idea would be to reintegrate these preparedness and planning functions along with control over grant money back into a single department that is effectively run by FEMA. Putting planning, preparedness and response all back under one roof is considered by emergency officials as essential to maximizing a federal disaster response, whether or not FEMA is an independent agency.

"FEMA's in a fix at this point, and there are no quick answers for rebuilding its strength," says University of Maryland Visiting Professor R. Scott Fosler, who played a major role in overhauling FEMA in the 1990s after its poor performance in the wake of Hurricane Andrew in 1992.

Whatever the decision, many emergency managers are arguing for a better balance between how the country prepares for terrorism and natural disasters. "Many people regard Hurricane Katrina as an event. It's not. It's part of a continuum. There will be another like it for sure." Iain Barclay Logan, of the International Red Cross, told Ms. Collins's committee.

Lawmakers said they did not ask officials from FEMA or the Homeland Security Department to appear at the hearing out of fear that would disrupt recovery efforts. Instead, a slew of former city and state officials who have faced major disasters in their communities -- from former California Gov. Pete Wilson to former New Orleans Mayor Marc H. Morial -- offered their advice on how to best help stricken communities get back on their feet.

The hearing marked Congress's first step in investigating major gaps in the country's readiness and response systems that Katrina exposed. It comes as Republicans and Democrats continue to debate whether to appoint an unusual House-Senate panel to investigate the matter, or to create an independent commission much like the one that examined government missteps before and after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

At FEMA, Disasters And Politics Go Hand In Hand (NYT)

By Alan B. Krueger

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

AS we are all aware," James Lee Witt told Congress in April 1996, when he was director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, "disasters are very political events."

There is much truth to Mr. Witt's statement. Research on the spending patterns of the emergency management agency shows that, to a significant degree, the agency is influenced by political concerns that are distinct from the suffering and destruction wrought by natural disasters, under both Democratic and Republican administrations.

Although declaring a disaster should be clear-cut and above politics, the legislation that governs FEMA gives the president much discretion to decide whether an event is a disaster that qualifies for assistance. Upon receiving a request by a state's governor, the president may declare a "major disaster" if a natural catastrophe "causes damage of sufficient severity and magnitude to warrant major disaster assistance."

While no one would doubt that a disaster of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina deserves the full commitment of the federal government, the language in the FEMA law is vague enough to count two feet of snow in Ohio as a major disaster, as was the case last December.

Indeed, the law specifically prohibits the use of an "arithmetic formula or sliding scale" to deny assistance. So, disaster requests are not evaluated based on standard quantitative evidence; instead, declarations involve subjective judgment.

Not surprisingly, in this vacuum presidents have displayed a tendency to declare more disasters in years when they face re-election. Mary W. Downton of the National Center for Atmospheric Research and Roger A. Pielke Jr. of the University of Colorado, Boulder, for example, looked at the flood-related disasters that were declared from 1965 to 1997 in an article published in "Natural Hazards Review" in 2001. Even after accounting for the amount of precipitation and flood damage each year, they found that the average number of flood-related disasters declared by the president was 46 percent higher in election years than in other years.

The tendency to declare more disasters during election years is not limited to floods. President Bill Clinton set a record by declaring 73 major disasters in 35 states and the District of Columbia in 1996, the year he was up for re-election.

When George W. Bush faced re-election in 2004, he declared 61 major disasters in 36 states - 10 more than in 2003 and tied for the second highest number of major disaster declarations ever, according to data provided by FEMA.

The increase from 2003 to 2004 was particularly sharp in the 12 battleground states in which the election was decided by 5 percent or less; these states had 17 major disasters declared in 2004 but only 8 in 2003, and, therefore, accounted for 90 percent of the increase.

In perhaps the most thorough econometric analysis of the politics of FEMA disaster funds to date, Thomas A. Garrett of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis and Russell S. Sobel of West Virginia University concluded in a study published in "Economic Inquiry" in 2003 that Congressional as well as presidential politics play a role in allocating payments. Specifically, they examined factors related to the number of disasters declared in each state from 1991 to 1999, and the dollar amount of assistance provided.

Of course, a state may be particularly unlucky in any given year and be struck by an unusually large number of destructive storms. To account for this effect, they controlled statistically for the value of private insurance property claims from disasters in a state each year and the amount of Red Cross assistance provided. States that incur greater insurance losses and receive more aid from the Red Cross in a particular year are undoubtedly in greater need of emergency assistance.

It is reassuring to note that FEMA payments are substantially greater when the Red Cross provides more aid or private insurance losses are greater, suggesting that more generous FEMA payments do reach states that suffer more severe damage from disasters.

Nonetheless, Mr. Garrett and Professor Sobel conclude that Congressional and presidential politics play an important role in allocating FEMA assistance. Most important, they find that the amount of disaster relief provided per incident increases with the number of representatives a state has on one of the FEMA oversight committees in the House of Representatives. Having an additional representative on either of the two main House oversight committees is associated with an extra $36.5 million of assistance from FEMA, they found.

This figure may seem to overstate the role of politics because representatives from states prone to be hit by disasters probably seek out seats on FEMA oversight committees. But recall that the analysis simultaneously adjusts for the amount of Red Cross assistance and private insurance losses from disasters each year. So, having Congressional representation on an oversight committee appears to matter even when compared with disasters in other states that cause roughly the same amount of damage and suffering.

Interestingly, representation on a Senate oversight committee does not have a detectable effect on FEMA payments, perhaps because disasters are often local events that more intensely affect House members' constituents.

All told, Mr. Garrett calculates that a third of FEMA payments are directly attributable to representation on one of the nine FEMA Congressional oversight committees, independent of the disaster's severity.

When Congress turns to evaluating the Hurricane Katrina disaster, it should also consider sharpening FEMA's mission. One helpful step would be to define more precisely the requirements necessary for the president to declare a disaster. For example, disaster payments could be restricted to events that cause damage exceeding a specified threshold or significant loss of life. Long before Hurricane Katrina, it should have been apparent that FEMA needed to focus more on alleviating and preventing suffering from major catastrophes and less on delivering pork to voters at election time.

Sick And Abandoned (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

It was the stuff of nightmares. Poisonous water moccasins were swimming in the filthy water of the flooded first floor, and snipers, rats and even a 12-foot alligator were roaming the treacherous area just outside the hospital's doors.

"To me, it was like being in hell," said Carl Warner, the chief engineer for Methodist Hospital in the hard-hit eastern part of New Orleans. "There were bodies floating in the water outside the building, and our staffers had to swim through that water to get fuel for the generator."

The patients and staff at Methodist could have been evacuated before Hurricane Katrina hit. But instead they were condemned to several days of fear and agony by bad decision-making in Louisiana and the chaotic ineptitude of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Some of the patients died.

Incredibly, when the out-of-state corporate owners of the hospital responded to the flooding by sending emergency relief supplies, they were confiscated at the airport by FEMA and sent elsewhere.

The time to evacuate the hospital was when it became clear that New Orleans was in the path of a Category 4 or 5 hurricane. "We had about 137 patients," said Dr. Jeffrey Coco, the hospital's chief of staff, "and we had a company called Lifeguard that was going to take them out."

But apparently there was a reluctance to evacuate without some sort of governmental guidance. When the mayor of New Orleans, Ray Nagin, issued a mandatory evacuation order, hospitals were exempted. Dr. Fred Cerise, secretary of Louisiana's Department of Health and Hospitals, said Methodist officials could have decided on their own to evacuate, but that never happened.

Some of the patients were extremely ill, requiring ventilators or dialysis treatment or major surgery. When the hurricane hit, part of the roof blew off, windows were blown out, the atrium was badly damaged and the hospital was drenched with rain. On Monday night the power went out, and on Tuesday, after the levees broke, the first floor became hopelessly flooded.

By midweek you had a bizarre situation in which hundreds of people (patients, doctors, nurses, administrative staffers, relatives and people seeking emergency shelter) were stranded, cut off from the rest of the world, in a badly damaged hospital in a major American city.

Staffers with flashlights worked heroically in a sodden, stench-filled environment in which temperatures reached 110 degrees. Elevators did not work, and some patients weighing more than 400 pounds had to be carried up dark, reeking staircases. When ventilators shut down with the loss of power, volunteers worked in shifts to do the difficult hand-pumping necessary to keep patients alive.

Nevertheless, according to Dr. Albert Barrocas, the chief medical officer, the decline in the well-being of the patients was both palpable and widespread. "All of them were deteriorating in the sense of becoming weak," he said. "You could see in their faces the fact that they were scared."

By Tuesday evening four patients had died, and a dozen were dead by the time the hospital was finally evacuated Friday. Doctors believe half of the deaths were caused by the dreadful conditions in the hospital.

Everybody's suffering would have been eased if the emergency relief effort mounted by the hospital's owner, Universal Health Services in King of Prussia, Pa., had not been interfered with by FEMA. Company officials sent desperately needed water, food, diesel fuel to power the hospital's generators and helicopters to ferry in the supplies and evacuate the most vulnerable individuals.

Bruce Gilbert, Universal's general counsel, told me yesterday, "Those supplies were in fact taken from us by FEMA, and we were unable to get them to the hospital. We then determined that it would be better to send our supplies, food and water to Lafayette [130 miles from New Orleans] and have our helicopters fly them from Lafayette to the hospital."

Significant relief began to reach the hospital on Thursday, and by Friday evening everyone had been removed from the ruined premises. They had endured the agonies of the damned, and for all practical purposes had been abandoned by government at all levels.

When you consider that the Methodist Hospital experience was just one small part of the New Orleans catastrophe, you get a sense of the size of the societal failure that we allowed to happen.

Welcome to the United States in 2005.

Separate Inquiry Fails To Gain Support (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Josh White

The Senate voted along party lines yesterday to reject creation of an independent panel to investigate the government's fumbling response to Hurricane Katrina.

The proposal, from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), would have established a panel similar to the one that examined the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. The partisan wrangling came amid rising calls from members of both parties to change how the nation manages major disasters.

Senior Republicans proposed such critical fixes as streamlining how the president can order the U.S. military to enforce law and order, and funding compatible radio systems for use in emergencies.

The need for new radios was a major finding of the Sept. 11 commission, whose former members met yesterday and decried that, more than four years after the terrorist attacks, the federal government's command systems, plans and laws remain uncoordinated and unready for a catastrophe such as Katrina.

"There are distinct similarities between Katrina and 9/11, between what was known beforehand and how the government responded to pending dangers," said Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (Hawaii), echoing fellow Democrats' calls for an outside inquiry. "In the four years since 9/11, we should have done a better job in preparing to protect Americans."

"It is Congress's responsibility," countered Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio). "By golly, we're going to get into the bowels of the Department of Homeland Security and make sure the next time around, it will be able to get the job done."

The House and Senate GOP leadership plan to form a joint congressional investigative committee with a Republican majority. A House vote is scheduled for today. Democrats oppose the move.

The stalemate over the makeup of the panel muted the first hearing in Congress into the Katrina response led by the Senate Committee for Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs. Chairman Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) promised "to lay bare the painful evidence of human errors that have added to the damage."

Witnesses included former California governor Pete Wilson, in office for the 1992 Los Angeles riots and 1994 Northridge earthquake, and Patricia A. Owens, who was mayor of Grand Forks, N.D., during the 1997 flood there. They emphasized the need for recovery efforts and called for a single federal "czar" to take charge.

Collins and Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) will call for building unified radio systems for responders in an upcoming emergency hurricane spending bill, atop $62.3 billion Congress has already spent, Collins spokeswoman Jen Burita said.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) wrote Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld last night urging a legal review of the use of active-duty troops in domestic emergencies and announced his intent to rename a key martial law statute called the Insurrection Act.

Warner said renaming the law -- used by presidents to fight the Civil War and to integrate schools in Arkansas and Alabama -- would ease political barriers to the presidential exercise of such authority. White House aides cited such concerns in deciding not to federalize state National Guard units to do police work after the storm hit.

"The President should not have to worry about misperceptions by the public based upon outdated wording that does not accurately describe what the armed forces may be doing in a particular emergency," Warner wrote.

Military officials resist federalizing troops because of concerns that the action could appear as an occupying force within U.S. borders. Soldiers, Marines and sailors who were sent to help in the wake of Hurricane Katrina were prevented from taking over police functions.

The National Guard -- under control of the governors -- can do police work such as stopping looters and keeping the peace.

Not having a centralized command structure for all federal authorities and the military at the outset caused significant confusion, military commanders said. A lack of communications -- something the military might have been able to supply if called up -- exacerbated problems.

At their meeting yesterday, former members of the Sept. 11 commission offered blistering criticism and issued a report finding that the government has made little or no progress in enacting reforms.

The panel, now operating as the nonprofit 9/11 Public Discourse Project, focused on congressional failure to provide a dedicated spectrum of radio frequencies for use by emergency responders. Such frequencies could have saved lives in New Orleans by allowing police, firefighters and troops to communicate more directly, the commission said.

"It is the same thing we saw on 9/11," said Thomas H. Kean, the former Republican New Jersey governor who chaired the commission, adding: "If Congress does not act, people will die."

Parties Remain Deadlocked On Katrina Investigation (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn And Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Republicans and Democrats remained in a partisan deadlock yesterday as they prepared for a floor vote to determine how to investigate the bungled response to Hurricane Katrina.

Republican leaders have pressed for a GOP-controlled bicameral committee to review the government's handling of the disaster, while Democrats favor an independent panel similar to the Sept. 11 commission.

Republican House leaders plan to bring their proposal to the floor today, despite Democratic opposition, and pass it in a largely party-line vote.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) is confident that his Republican colleagues will back the measure.

"I think we're fine," Blunt said yesterday in response to a question about whether his office would whip the bill. "We've talked to our members. Our members are fine."

The proposal would set up a 20-member committee consisting of 11 Republicans and nine Democrats on the House side, according to a draft of the resolution. The minority will be extended the ability to call for extra witnesses at hearings. A budget of $500,000 will be provided through the House Administration Committee.

Democrats plan to offer a motion to recommit, a common parliamentary maneuver that would come up shortly before the vote on the Republicans' joint committee and would attempt to create an independent commission. That motion is expected to fail along party lines.

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said he anticipated that the "overwhelming majority" of Democrats would back an independent commission, which will be called for in the motion to recommit.

He hinted that some Democrats may also vote for the Republicans' joint committee.

"That's not a partisan issue. That's a judgment issue," he said.

In the upper chamber, Republicans defeated by a vote of 44-54 an amendment offered by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) that would have created a 10-member independent commission evenly divided between Democrats and Republicans. No Senate Republicans voted for the amendment. And Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) rejected an offer from Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to create a joint committee because the proposal did not provide equal representation and subpoena power for Democrats.

Frist has already named Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), the chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, to lead the Senate investigation. House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is not expected to name a chairman or members of the investigative committee until the House has passed the bill.

He told reporters yesterday that he wanted to get members on the ground in the hurricane-ravaged states as soon as possible to start the congressional investigation.

Both parties face potential political fallout from the bitter standoff. Democrats could face charges of partisanship for failing to go along with the Republicans' joint panel, a type of committee that has been used dozens of times in recent decades to investigate different administrations, including the Iran-Contra scandal, Republicans argue.

Democrats counter that the circumstances were different during the 1980s because Democrats controlled Congress and were investigating a Republican administration. They also charge that congressional Republicans have shown little enthusiasm for any kind of oversight of the Bush administration and that any investigation controlled by Republicans would amount to a whitewash.

As Republicans go forward with plans for a joint committee, Democrats could be faced with an awkward decision to drop their protest and participate in the committee or remain on the sidelines.

Hoyer noted that Democrats had not yet decided whether they would boycott the committee further down the road.

Dropping the protest at some point remained a possibility, said one Democratic strategist.

"You can fight something and then go grudgingly along. That is an option in order to have some voice in the process," the strategist said. Still, Democrats held the high ground in calling for an independent commission rather than a committee controlled by a party sympathetic to the administration, the strategist added.

Asked if Democrats could be persuaded to support the Republicans' plan if given some concessions, Hoyer said he felt there could be some "wiggle room" but "we want to ensure that there is at least one independent commission with subpoena power."

Some Democratic aides drew parallels between the current standoff over Katrina and an earlier impasse over the structure of the House ethics committee, noting that Democrats had boycotted that committee, forcing Republicans to reverse certain rule changes.

Aside from the current dustup over the botched response to Katrina, the political fallout from the storm is beginning to emerge across the country.

The National Republican Congressional Committee put out a press release late last week criticizing Democratic Rep. Jim Matheson (Utah) for voting against the emergency spending bill to fund the Katrina cleanup, only to have The Salt Lake Tribune publish a long article about how the allegations were untrue. Matheson voted against one of the rules leading up to the spending bill.

In fact, the only members to vote against the first emergency spending bill were Republicans. Eleven House conservatives voted against the bill for various reasons, but primarily in protest of a lack of oversight for the funds.

In addition, President Bush has suffered career-low approval ratings in the wake of a slow federal response to the disaster. Michael Brown, the former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, resigned earlier this week.

A large majority of Americans favor an independent oversight committee in the mold of the Sept. 11 commission, according to an ABC News/Washington Post poll from over the weekend.

Clinton's Attempt To Form Katrina Panel Rejected (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Senate Republicans yesterday scuttled an attempt by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton to establish a panel patterned after the September 11 commission to investigate what went wrong with federal, state and local governments' response to Hurricane Katrina.

The New York Democrat's bid to establish the panel -- which also would have made recommendations on how to improve the government's disaster-response apparatus -- failed to win the two-thirds majority needed to overcome procedural hurdles. Mrs. Clinton's proposal received 44 votes, all from Democrats and independent Sen. James M. Jeffords of Vermont. Fifty-four Republicans all voted no.

"Just as with 9/11, we did not get to the point where we believed we understood what happened until an independent investigation was conducted," Mrs. Clinton said.

The Senate vote likely won't be the last word on whether to create an independent commission or, as an alternative, a special congressional committee to investigate the Katrina response. A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll taken last Thursday through Sunday found that 70 percent of those surveyed supported an independent panel to investigate the government's response to Katrina.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, has rebuffed a bid by congressional Republican leaders to create a committee patterned after the 1987 Iran-Contra panel, which would have a Republican majority -- reflecting their dominance of Congress.

Mr. Reid instead has vowed that any bid by Republican leaders to establish a special bipartisan committee involving lawmakers from both the House and Senate will go forward only if Democrats have equal representation.

Separately, Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Susan Collins, Maine Republican, said yesterday that post-September 11 changes to improve the government response to disasters failed their first major test in Hurricane Katrina's aftermath.

Despite billions of dollars to boost disaster preparedness at all levels of government, the response to Katrina was beset by confusion, communication failures and lack of coordination, Miss Collins said as she opened hearings into the disaster.

"At this point, we would have expected a sharp, crisp response to this terrible tragedy," she said. "Instead, we witnessed what appeared to be a sluggish initial response."

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the committee, said the response to Katrina "has shaken the public's confidence in the ability of government at all levels to protect them in a crisis."

Lawmakers said they did not ask officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency or the Homeland Security Department to appear at the hearing out of fear of disrupting the ongoing recovery process in the battered Gulf Coast. Instead, numerous former city and state officials testified about their experiences in facing major disasters in their communities.

Calling Katrina a "national tragedy," former New Orleans Mayor Marc H. Morial put the primary responsibility for disaster response on the federal government.

Finding Relief -- Slowly (WP)

By Keith L. Alexander And Nell Henderson

DOJ_NMG_0005578

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 14 -- First they had to ride out a howling storm. Then find shelter. Then food and water. Now, the thousands of families driven from their homes by Hurricane Katrina face the daunting challenge of applying for financial assistance under a dizzying mix of government programs.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that the storm wiped out about as many as 400,000 jobs in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, prompting a surge in new claims for unemployment insurance benefits.

Many of the affected workers and their families are also newly eligible for food stamps, Medicaid, housing assistance, subsidized school lunches, emergency cash assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other programs. But many have never received such benefits and will have to navigate through multiple government agencies to find out if they qualify and how to apply.

"The baffling problem is that each of these programs is its own bureaucracy," said Sheila R. Zedlewski, director of Income and Benefits Policy at the Urban Institute. Many poor people who are eligible for these benefits "don't apply because the process is so cumbersome and the system is so difficult to understand."

And that's in normal times -- without a hurricane that has closed many government offices and downed telephone lines in hard-hit areas.

Shelleand Terry, 48, said she and her daughter Erica, 25, had both tried for two weeks to apply for unemployment insurance benefits but were frustrated by long lines and busy signals. They got through by telephone Sunday but were told they still had to drive about an hour from Napoleonville, La., to the Baton Rouge office to activate their benefits in person.

"We are spending all our money on gas, and we still haven't received any benefits," Shelleand Terry said. "This is so frustrating and hard."

Efforts are being made to streamline the process for Katrina survivors. The Red Cross and AFL-CIO have set up emergency centers where evacuees can use computers and telephones and receive guidance on how to apply for various programs. And because many families lost financial records in the storm, several state social-service agencies are asking claimants for documents "if possible" to prove they are eligible for programs.

Due to their evacuee status, people who fled their home states because of Katrina can apply for all federal benefits without having to produce the usual records proving eligibility, according to the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

Progress is occurring gradually. Take jobless claims, for example. Last week, the U.S. Labor Department estimated that only 10,000 hurricane survivors had filed new claims for unemployment insurance benefits. By today, more than 200,000 new claims had been filed by residents of Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi, according to the labor agencies in those states.

In Louisiana and Mississippi, state employees are seeking out workers in their homes and in shelters to help them fill out jobless claims by hand.

"We've gone to virtually every shelter in the state," said Ed Pratt, press secretary for the Louisiana Department of Labor.

In Louisiana, union members are "knocking on the doors of residents to reach out to workers about how to register" for the range of available benefits, AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney said in an interview Tuesday.

Adding to the complications, tens of thousands of evacuees are scattered across the country, living with relatives, in church shelters or in facilities such as the Houston Astrodome and the D.C. Armory.

Texas Workforce Commission employees are taking claims from Louisiana evacuees living at the Astrodome. And more than 60,000 displaced Louisiana residents have filed from out of state by telephone or online, Pratt said.

Meanwhile, other unemployed gulf state workers will have to be persistent to file a claim. B.J. Fink, 26, of New Orleans, said he and his girlfriend first tried to apply for unemployment benefits three days after the hurricane hit. They waited in line for more than three hours. When the two finally made it inside to see a counselor, the overworked office computer crashed. They returned today to try to complete their applications. "They got lost in the process, I guess," he said.

Many displaced residents will find that their benefits don't buy as much in the higher-cost communities where they've settled, from California to the Washington area.

"It's hard to imagine how they are going to make ends meet in the cities where they have landed," said Jared Bernstein, a senior economist with the Economic Policy Institute, a think tank that focuses on labor issues.

Wherever evacuees have arrived, their unemployment benefit will be based on their previous earnings in the state they've left behind. The amounts are determined by the states according to different income-based formulas and carry maximum amounts; the national average for this cap is $377.18 per week.

Mississippi's maximum unemployment benefit, at $210 per week, is the lowest in the country, according to Department of Labor figures. Alabama's maximum, at $220 per week, is the second lowest. Louisiana's limit, at $258 a week, is the sixth lowest.

Meanwhile, a family of two adults and two children normally needs $715 a week to cover the basic cost of living in Baton Rouge, according to EPI. But many evacuees have moved to areas with much higher living costs. A family of four needs $756 per week to cover living expenses in Houston; that same family needs $1,182 a week to live in the Washington area, according to EPI. The national median cost of living is $769 per week.

Some of the evacuees are going to find jobs in their new communities, many of which will pay higher wages, reflecting the steeper cost of living, Bernstein said. "The people you need to worry about are those who are unemployed in the city where they've landed, trying to get by in a northern city on unemployment benefits from a southern state."

Other benefits are available. FEMA, for example, is offering a lump sum of $2,000 per household in cash assistance. Food-stamp benefits vary slightly by state, due to differences in eligibility rules; the average monthly benefit per person last year was $85.85 in Alabama, $89.03 in Louisiana, and $79.81 in Mississippi.

Other health, housing and welfare programs are funded by the federal government but administered by the states, with benefits reflecting diverse eligibility and participation rules.

The first Louisiana claimants should start receiving their unemployment benefits late this week or early next week, Pratt said.

While the hurricane victims grow frustrated with the application process, the extra efforts being made on their behalf are stirring resentment among some state residents who lost their jobs before the storm. Nataisha Phifer, 34, of north Baton Rouge, hasn't worked since June, when she lost her job as a saleswoman at Dillard's department store. Phifer says that now she has to stand in longer lines and compete for jobs with those who have been displaced by the hurricane.

"I'm very compassionate, and I understand what they're going through," Phifer said. "But it's frustrating. It seems we've been pushed to the back of the line behind them."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Still Republican

"Thank you for writing an article that contains an astute and accurate framing of the issue that resulted in resignations by some individuals associated with the [National Black Republican Association]," writes Frances Rice, chairman of the NBRA, albeit she wants to clarify several points made in this week's Inside the Beltway column.

She states that through "a majority vote of the executive committee, NBRA press releases were prepared and distributed to the media in support of President Bush, as the head of the Republican Party, regarding the Supreme Court nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. and Hurricane Katrina."

That said, Ms. Rice reveals: "Several members of the NBRA inactive board of directors, who had been permitted to participate in the open meetings of the executive committee, and two members of the executive committee stated that the National Black Republican Association should not support the Republican Party."

Recognizing "a division" over the main purpose of the NBRA, she says that with the approval of the executive committee she sent a letter to each member of the executive committee requesting they sign and return a statement supporting the NBRA's bylaws.

"The dissension over the purpose of the NBRA led to five of the seven members of the inactive board of directors resigning, and one of the five members of the executive committee," she confirms.

Ms. Rice adds that "several black Republicans from across the country" have indicated interest in the NBRA leadership vacancies, including Rev. Wayne Perryman of Washington state, author of Unfounded Loyalty.

Finally, she assures us that the NBRA will continue its obviously unwavering support of the Republican Party.

Throwing $ at Katrina

The $60-plus billion "down payment" Congress doled out thus far in response to Hurricane Katrina "is already twice the annual budget for the Department of Homeland Security."

So reveals Rep. Jim Kolbe, Arizona Republican, who -- given the staggering dollar figures -- has introduced the "Special Inspector General for Hurricane Katrina Recovery Act of 2005," seeking to appoint an independent inspector general to oversee continued funding efforts.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling, Texas Republican, agrees that Capitol Hill "must do everything necessary" to help Katrina's victims, but stresses "Congress must also use its head."

Which means, he says, that "Congress cannot continue to fund projects like the $800,000 outhouse, $1.2 million for panda research or the $1 million rain forest in Iowa."

Sam's "Top 10"

Not happy with your job? Be advised that the best places to work in the federal government are, in order, the Office of Management and Budget, the National Science Foundation and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

Some 150,000 executive branch employees surveyed by the Office of Personnel Management, in conjunction with the Partnership for Public Service and American University, say the remainder of the 10 best places to hang your bureaucratic hat: the Government Accountability Office, Securities and Exchange Commission, NASA, General Services Administration, Environmental Protection Agency, Department of Energy and the State Department.

Sea of regimes

Just returning from leading a delegation to terrorism-torn Iraq is Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican, who kept a diary of the trip. One entry catching our eye notes that a fellow congressman asked Iraqi Defense Minister Sadoun al-Duleimi what neighboring nation represented the greatest challenge to peace within Iraq?

To which the minister replied, "All of them." He then added, "Kuwait is OK."

"It was an illuminating moment," the diary reads. "I will never forget that this new Iraq is, with one exception, floating in a sea of authoritarian regimes with long histories of association with terror among their people and their governments."

Kissing cousin

King Harald V of Norway is to arrive in Washington for this weekend's dedication of a bronze statue of Crown Princess Martha on the Norwegian Embassy grounds.

The princess died in 1954, three years before her crown prince husband -- and cousin -- became Norway's King Olav V.

9/11 Panelists Fault Storm Response (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Members of the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks said the federal government's poor response to Hurricane Katrina underscored its failure to adopt urgent recommendations the commission made more than a year ago to enhance emergency preparedness.

Thomas Kean, the former governor of New Jersey who was chairman of the 9/11 panel, said many of the steps should have been taken immediately after the 2001 attacks. He also said quick implementation of certain commission recommendations issued more than a year ago "could have saved peoples' lives" in New Orleans.

The commissioners' assessment comes as the Bush administration struggles to contain political damage from its often disjointed response to the hurricane. Although the commission officially was disbanded last summer, its members have continued to press for implementation of their recommendations. In recent months, through public hearings and examination of records, they have made the first formal assessments of how far federal, state and local authorities have come in carrying out their proposals.

Last July, the bipartisan, 10-member commission issued a final report of its investigation into the attacks and their aftermath. It contained numerous recommendations on topics such as emergency preparedness and U.S. foreign policy. Earlier this summer, the former commissioners held hearings to assess compliance with their recommendations. Their "report card," issued yesterday on emergency readiness, is the first of several they are expected to issue in coming weeks on the different categories of their proposals.

The commissioners in a written report gave failing grades to the response on 11 of 14 recommendations related to emergency preparedness. They noted, for example, that little progress has been made in awarding additional radio frequencies to fire, police and other emergency responders. Proposals to do this have been stalled in Congress by opposition from television broadcasters, who want to delay relinquishing frequencies until 2009.

They faulted both the federal and local governments for failing to establish a system for clear-cut command and coordination in the event of disasters. And they singled out the Department of Homeland Security for failing to meet statutory deadlines that passed months ago to issue reports on the vulnerability of "national critical infrastructure" and on transportation security.

A DHS spokeswoman said the department just last week gave a classified report on transportation security to Congress, and noted that it is continuing to work on the report on infrastructure, "taking the time to do it properly."

The commissioners, who despite deep political differences had been unanimous in their recommendations, were split over current calls to form an independent commission similar to their own to investigate the Katrina response. In a party-line vote the Senate rejected a Democratic proposal to form such an independent commission. Republicans favor an inquiry by a special House-Senate investigative committee.

While several Democrats on the commission, including former Rep. Tim Roemer, said such an inquiry would help establish what needs to be done, John Lehman, a Republican former secretary of the Navy, said the media already had done a thorough job of investigating and exposing what went wrong.

Commission Criticizes Storm Response (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - The members of the 9/11 commission criticized the Bush administration and Congress on Wednesday for "minimal progress" in enacting many of the panel's year-old recommendations to bolster domestic security agencies and their ability to respond to terrorist attacks and natural disasters like Hurricane Katrina.

In a unanimous privately financed report, the 10 former commissioners found that there had been little or no action by the White House and Congress to enact many of its recommendation on domestic security.At a news conference here to release the report, the commissioners expressed astonishment at what they described as the federal government's disastrous performance in responding to Hurricane Katrina, saying it suggested that Washington was also ill prepared to deal with another catastrophic terrorist strike.

The report was issued under the auspices of an education group that the five Republicans and five Democrats on the commission created as the panel was going out of business last year.

John F. Lehman, a Republican on the panel who was a Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, said he feared that the "unconscionable" failures of the rescue effort along the Gulf Coast would embolden terrorist groups to attack again on American soil, making quick adoption of the commission's year-old recommendations all the more important.

Katrina's Lesson: US 'Not Safe' Enough (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - Some Americans perished needlessly in hurricane Katrina because the US government has not adopted several reforms urged by the Sept. 11 commission.

That is the view of former commission chairman Thomas Kean and vice-chairman Lee Hamilton. The two now lead the 9/11 Public Discourse Project, a successor to the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks.

"A number of our recommendations were in the area of emergency preparedness. Many of those recommendations have not been implemented. We believe had they been implemented that the tragedy might have been less severe in terms of human lives," Mr. Kean said at a Monitor breakfast. "Do we have to wait for another national emergency to get some of these things done?"

Hurricane Katrina has altered Mr. Hamilton's assessment of overall security. "We often said during ... the 9/11 hearings that we were safer but not safe," he said. "What struck me after Katrina was that we were not as safe as I thought we were."

Two reforms are vital in the post-Katrina world, they argue. One is to make clear who is in charge at the federal level during emergencies. The other, they say, is to require every state to adopt a detailed command-and-control plan for disasters - and link it to receiving funding from the US Department of Homeland Security.

"It was obvious that nobody knew who was in charge when Katrina struck. We had the same problem on 9/11," Kean said. "If you don't have a unified command structure with somebody in charge and somebody following through ... it is going to cost lives."

The two also urged Congress to adopt the Sept. 11 panel's plea for homeland-security funds to be allocated on the basis of priority rather than dispensing security money to all states regardless of risk, as is the current practice. "You can't really put the money in the best places until you have identified your priorities," Kean said. The Department of Homeland Security, he noted, missed the deadline for filing a report to Congress ranking the nation's most vulnerable areas.

Hamilton, who spent 34 years in Congress, recognizes the challenges the government faces in moving more quickly on the reforms. "All of these things sound simple, but they really require very, very hard choices by policymakers," he said.

Hamilton warned that "we could easily have a disaster much, much worse than Katrina." The greatest risks to the nation, he says, are a nuclear weapon exploding in a populated area and a biological attack on the food supply. "In setting priorities, you have to prepare for the worst cases," Hamilton said. Given the other threats the United States faces, "I think we have overdone it, personally," by spending an estimated $20 billion to protect passengers and crew on commercial airlines. "We are not preparing for other kinds of threats that would be far more devastating."

As City Dries, Residents Plan Return (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 14 -- Tens of thousands of New Orleans residents could begin returning to their homes as early as Monday as city and federal authorities have set out an accelerated plan to repopulate the city, reversing earlier estimates that the metropolis could be closed for months.

The plan would reopen a portion of New Orleans that was home to about 170,000 people, or one-third of the city's population, federal officials said, and be rolled out over the next two weeks.

The reentry plan would unfold by Zip code, depending on which section gets power and water utilities online, and how quickly hospital and emergency services can be restored. It involves portions of New Orleans that largely were unflooded: downtown, the French Quarter, Uptown and Algiers.

"The timing of the plan is subject to getting security and health issues in order," said William Lehman, the Federal Emergency Management Agency spokesman for Orleans Parish.

Other portions of the city could remain uninhabited for months, authorities said, as tens of thousands of homes must be drained and many rebuilt.

The legal and political disputes over how authorities responded to Hurricane Katrina also promise to persist, as controversy flared over nursing homes and hospitals that did not evacuate, and over the recovery of the dead.

Louisiana state authorities said Wednesday that they are investigating the Lafon Nursing Home of the Holy Family in New Orleans, where a number of deaths have been reported. They may investigate as many as 18 nursing homes, authorities said.

The state has charged the owners of St. Rita's nursing home in St. Bernard Parish with 34 counts of negligent homicide stemming from patient deaths in flooding from Katrina. State Attorney General Charles C. Foti Jr. said that the owners of the nursing home, Salvador and Mable Mangano, had a legal obligation to evacuate the home.

The couple's attorney, James Cobb, said that his clients did not evacuate their 60 patients because they believed that their nursing home was safe -- it had never flooded in 20 years -- because St. Bernard Parish officials never ordered a mandatory evacuation and because the Manganos believed that transporting their patients en masse by bus could kill them.

Cobb cited numerous reports of elderly people dying during the evacuation before Katrina. "What do you do? You know if you evacuate, 10, 12 or 14 -- pick a number -- might die on the way out," he said in a cell phone interview.

He described the efforts the Manganos and their children made to rescue patients after the nursing home flooded, getting them onto mattresses to float out through broken windows, and then into boats. "They saved 52 lives," Cobb said. "And their reward . . . is an arrest warrant."

The owners of a New Orleans hospital where 44 bodies were found said they were those of critically ill patients who died in stifling heat after power was cut to the flooded building. Tenet Healthcare Corp. said no one still alive was left behind at Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans.

The death toll for Louisiana reached 474 as the recovery of bodies continued. In response to criticism from Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) that the federal effort to bring bodies to the morgues was going too slowly and showed disrespect for the dead, the official in charge of hurricane recovery described a process in which a chaplain accompanied each search team and recited a prayer whenever a body was discovered.

"This is a sensitive process," Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen said at a news conference. "We are mindful of the dignity needed to be afforded each individual."

Less than half the city is now underwater, down from 80 percent at the peak of the flooding. Of the 144 pumps in Orleans Parish, 80 have begun working, Lehman said, up from 20 just days ago. About 50 percent of the phone lines are working, he said.

"We are out of nuclear crisis mode and are into day-to-day crisis mode," Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Tuesday night. He said his decision on reentry, which is expected to be announced Thursday, will depend on air and water quality in the city. According to the Environmental Protection Agency, "every effort should be made to limit contact with flood water due to potentially elevated levels of contamination associated with raw sewage and other hazardous substances." But Nagin said that test results have generally been better than expected.

In the suburbs outside of the heavily hit areas of Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, residents have begun to come back, waiting either for electricity or the grocery store.

In New Orleans, even those streets in areas least affected by the storm are badly in need of cleanup. Stoplights do not work. Outside restaurants, the stench from two weeks' worth of rotten food is sometimes overpowering. Broken glass litters sidewalks and gutters. In places, fallen brick walls block roadways.

Yet amid the debris, restoration crews and armed troops on the streets Wednesday, some residents were looking forward again -- almost optimistically.

About midmorning, restaurateur Alex Patout was sitting outside his famed French Quarter establishment, sipping champagne.

"Thank God the heart and soul of what New Orleans is all about is basically damage-free," he said. "All we need is electricity -- we want to be one of the first restaurants to open."

He was planning his first menus, but he acknowledges that he is facing a daunting challenge. Of his staff of 40, many of whom lived in east New Orleans, he has located only one.

As he sees it, New Orleans has been split into two very different halves, one flooded, the other dry. Though the dry portion may be better off in some ways, the businesses there depend on the less-fortunate parts for employees.

"That is going to be the biggest nut for this city," he said. "Where is the human infrastructure that makes it run?"

Some Evacuees Relish Chance To Start Anew (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

DOJ_NMG_0005584

As Donald Henry clung to the side of his New Orleans house and watched as his brother and niece were plucked from his side and drowned by Hurricane Katrina, he had no way of knowing that his own life was about to change dramatically -- for the better.

A few blocks away, Cash Smith floated his two children on laundry hampers and plunged into chest-high waters. It was a journey that would begin in heartbreak but end in tears of joy, as Cash and his family found themselves delivered from a neighborhood under sea level into a new life a mile high, in Denver.

For Henry, Smith and a third evacuee, Vylandrus Dupree, who is now being housed at a resort in Arkansas, the unimaginable disaster has led to an unimaginable gift. Through a series of chance encounters and random decisions made by relief workers, these young African American men find themselves in parts of the country they had never seen before, and each believes there is no going back.

Their stories illustrate the game of chance that the resettlement effort is for so many victims of Katrina. Evacuees enter the relief roulette wheel with little idea whether they will emerge in a dreary shelter or in the cool air of the Ozark Mountains.

"It was just a blessing for me," said Henry, 28, who stepped off a rescue plane and found himself in Michigan for the first time in his life. "I am going to make Michigan my home. I know I ain't going back to New Orleans."

These men know better than most that their stories are exceptional, that thousands of other survivors, including some of their own family members, are still in crowded shelters with few options. Each remains keenly aware of all he has lost. Henry's voice chokes as he describes his drowned family. Dupree's house in Orleans Parish is "totaled." But while Katrina destroyed nearly everything each man owned, it also gave each the kind of options and opportunities that just did not exist for a poor black man in New Orleans: Strangers in strange places are behaving like family.

"I am going to start all over here in Denver," Smith said, speaking from a Marriott TownePlace Suites that has given his family free lodging for two months. Volunteers are helping to set him up with a job.

Dupree, 20, has enrolled at the University of Arkansas, where his tuition, books and supplies are free for the first semester. A clergyman has helped him find work.

"Everyone's friendly, and everyone's willing to help," he marveled. "I am going to try to stay in Arkansas forever."'A New Beginning'

Donald Henry remembers the last thing his brother Clifford told him before they leaped into Katrina's raging floodwaters in the lower Ninth Ward of New Orleans: "If I don't make it, make sure my kids do."

The two brothers and Clifford's girlfriend tethered three children with straps and stepped outside. A neighbor refused to let them in, so the group hung to the side of their own house.

Clifford was the first to go under, after he lost his grip on his brother's ankle. When Henry turned his attention back to the children, pulling on the strap that held them, he found his niece, Serena, had drowned, he said in an interview.

Around them, houses were unfolding like paper, he recalled. A second child had his life jacket ripped off, and went under. Henry, Clifford's girlfriend and the last child finally clambered onto a roof, and then to a higher one. Henry broke into an attic for shelter.

When the rescue boats came, the survivors slept on a bridge the first night. People were being taken to the Superdome, but Henry wanted none of that because he had heard rumors of crowding and rioting there. He wandered around for days, finally getting to the New Orleans Convention Center, from where he was airlifted to the airport.

When he got on an airplane, no one told him where it was headed. After they closed the doors, the word came down: Chicago.

But when the plane pulled into the Windy City, the group ran into a bureaucratic problem. The airplane took off again. When the doors opened, Henry and hundreds of other evacuees emerged to find themselves in Michigan, where Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm (D) had offered to house 1,500 evacuees. Henry was taken to a National Guard facility at Fort Custer near Battle Creek.

"They just got on a plane only knowing they were going to be taken somewhere for shelter, and they ended up happening to come to Battle Creek," said Capt. Aaron Jenkins, a spokesman for the Michigan National Guard. "That's what happened to a lot of people."

When Henry got off the bus at the base, people were holding signs saying "Welcome" and "I love you."

Henry said he was glad to have been given a way out of New Orleans. He talked about the violence and drugs that had surrounded him there, the "harassment by police" and "false promises" by politicians.

"The Lord was telling me it was time for a change," he said. "I am going to take this opportunity to change my life and start a new beginning.'"What Do I Have to Lose?'

Chad Ladov and two of his friends in Denver had watched the unfolding disaster in New Orleans as had millions of other Americans. One of the friends, Andrew Hudson, worked at Denver-based Frontier Airlines, and asked his company whether it could fly New Orleans evacuees to Denver free. When the company agreed, the trio immediately left for Houston, where thousands of evacuees were being housed at the Astrodome.

The friends arrived on the Friday after the hurricane. Ladov, who used to work at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, had contacts among emergency workers on the ground. He had announcements broadcast over the public address system asking whether there were people who wanted to go to Denver.

The three friends canvassed the Astrodome, putting up signs and posters about their Denver proposal. That's when they came by Cash Smith.

"Hey, dude, do you want to come to Denver?" Smith recalled them asking.

Smith, his wife and their two small children had initially sought shelter at the Superdome in New Orleans, after fleeing their flooded neighborhood. Smith and the children had gotten to Houston, but his wife had not been able to find space on the same bus and was scheduled to arrive later.

"I have no money," Smith replied.

The group told him the airline ride to Denver was free. They promised him help in finding a job and getting on his feet.

"Why not give it a try?" Ladov said.

Smith decided to take a chance. After all, he was surrounded by strangers in the stadium; why not trust these three?

"I have lost everything else," he said he thought to himself. "What do I have to lose?"

Two-thirds of the 18 people Ladov and his friends brought back to Denver had never been on an airplane before. They peppered the Denver friends with questions: "What's Denver look like? What's the racial makeup? What's the cost of living? What kind of food do you have there?"

Henry's wife joined him in Denver a few days later, and the couple had an emotional reunion at the airport.

Jim White, manager of community affairs for the Colorado branch of Volunteers of America, said area hotels had offered 30 rooms free for two months. The group is actively working to help people find permanent housing, and set them up with jobs and supplies.

"My life has really changed," said Smith, who said he plans to stay in Denver. "All I came here with was the clothes on my back. Now I have more than I had then.'"It's a Big Opportunity'

Vylandrus Dupree fled New Orleans the day before the hurricane struck. Dupree, who was getting ready for his sophomore year at a community college, was told to head west. Along with a friend, he drove to Texas, expecting to wait out the storm and then return home in a day or two.

They slept in the car the first night and, when they returned to Louisiana, state troopers directed them north. They hit the road again, and eventually pulled into a Red Cross shelter in Springdale, Ark., 700 miles away.

As more evacuees came in, Red Cross officials decided to move a group that included Dupree 20 miles away to the Mount Sequoyah Conference and Retreat Center in Fayetteville, a scenic 30-acre facility overlooking the Ozark Mountains of northwest Arkansas.

"The United Methodist Church has a policy of open minds, open hearts and open doors," said the Rev. Jack Wilson, a board member of the center and an official at the church, which has run the center for 83 years as a teaching facility and a place for spiritual reflection.

Brian Swain, a volunteer coordinator, said work has begun in earnest to find evacuees more permanent homes, jobs, food stamps and Social Security checks. Twenty children were enrolled last week in Fayetteville public schools, and school buses are coming by the center to pick up the kids.

"We asked people: 'What is your goal? Relocate to northwest Arkansas, or move back or move elsewhere?' " Swain said. "Ninety-five percent said they wanted to relocate to northwest Arkansas."

Volunteers helped Dupree enroll at the University of Arkansas. "It's a big opportunity," he said. "I would have been a fool not to take it."

Dupree said a clergyman he had met at the Red Cross facility had helped him find a job at a Walgreens drugstore.

There was no question of going back to New Orleans, Dupree said. "It's beautiful up here."

Neighborhoods Likely To Be Razed In Cleanup (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Environmental Protection Agency officials and environmental specialists said yesterday that the cleanup of flood-soaked New Orleans will require razing neighborhoods, comprehensive disinfection, and extensive removal of soil and sediment infused with chemicals and bacteria.

"The whole city of New Orleans has the potential for being a giant Superfund [toxic dump] site," said Robert D. Bullard, director of the Environmental Justice Resource Center at Clark Atlanta University in Georgia.

EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson said tests continue to show high, unsafe levels of sewage and lead in New Orleans' water and evidence of other chemicals, such as chromium, copper, iron and sodium.

He characterized Hurricane Katrina as the "largest natural disaster the EPA and the nation have ever faced."

"Until we have a better handle on the magnitude of the problems, it is impossible to speculate on how long it will take" to resolve the environmental threats, said Mr. Johnson, who cited concern about the contaminated floodwaters' effect on the Mississippi River, Lake Pontchartrain and the Gulf of Mexico.

Several people familiar with the subject predicted that once the floodwaters are flushed out, possibly by next month, there will be extensive debate about the safety of certain neighborhoods, schoolyards and parks because of the presence of chemicals and bacteria.

"They are now part of the ecosystem, part of the water, part of the soil. Those chemicals will be absorbed on any surface, organic and inorganic," said Mirat Gurol, professor of environmental engineering at San Diego State University.

Ms. Gurol said many of the organisms will survive in spores and cysts, becoming dangerous again once they get in contact with water or humidity. She also expressed concerns about health risks from long-term exposure to chemicals and to heavy metals, such as lead, which do not decay in the soil.

The EPA also has found carcinogenic polychlorinated biphenyls, or PCBs, in New Orleans' floodwaters.

Von Roebuck, spokesman for the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, declined to speculate about the health risks.

"The key is what kind of pollutants are in that water, and until we find that out, we can't predict," he said. The EPA tests are "preliminary," and much more analysis is needed, he said.

Some people in the hurricane zone died after they waded in the contaminated floodwaters and developed bacterial infections that penetrated open sores. In shelters, there were outbreaks of norovirus, a condition caused by consuming feces-contaminated food or water or coming into contact with an infected person. Norovirus is not usually life-threatening.

The levels of sewage found in New Orleans' floodwaters were 10 to 20 times greater than levels the EPA considers safe.

Daniel W. McCarthy, president and chief executive officer of Black & Veatch Water in Kansas City, Mo. -- which has contracts with Federal Emergency Management Agency to install and repair water systems in the flood-ravaged area -- said he thinks it's "more than likely drinking-water systems have been contaminated, even if they are still in service."

Boiling water "will kill live organisms, but not chemicals," Ms. Gurol said. "Long-term exposure to chemicals is a risk factor."

Mr. McCarthy agreed, saying it's necessary to flush and sanitize all lines.

Roy K. Dokka, a Louisiana State University geologist, expects that thousands of New Orleans residents "will be traumatized" when they are told their houses will have to be torn down.

Big Easy May Be Ready For New Year's (USAT)

By Gene Sloan

USA Today, September 15, 2005

New Year's in New Orleans?

Don't count it out, says Stephen Perry, president of the New Orleans Metropolitan Convention & Visitors Bureau.

Though it could be years before some residential areas bounce back from Hurricane Katrina, Perry and other leaders say tourist areas will be ready for visitors far, far sooner.

"When you see estimates of New Orleans not getting power back or water flowing for six or eight months, that is not the part of the city where tourists go," Perry says. He notes that power was restored to the city's big hotels Monday and should be up across the downtown within two weeks. Potable water could return across the French Quarter and other neighborhoods within days.

Half a dozen hotels, including the Sheraton, Hyatt, Hilton and W, already have reopened, and an additional 35 to 40 will be open by the end of next week, Perry says. For now, they house relief workers, government officials and journalists. But the city's power brokers hope to have them ready for tourists by New Year's. Already there are plans for a scaled-down version of Mardi Gras in February.

Perry says getting tourism going quickly is crucial to the city's survival. Tourism is the biggest employer, accounting for 81,000 jobs and nearly $5 billion a year.

Reviving tourism, moreover, is realistic, say industry leaders. Tourist areas such as the French Quarter are on high ground and were spared serious flooding.

Mark Sanders, general manager of Marriott's 15 hotels, says Marriott should have most or all of its properties open by October. Like other chains, the company is setting aside 25% of its rooms to house displaced employees and their families. (There are plans to bring many back next week.) Hilton also plans to have most of its 17 hotels open soon, spokeswoman Kathy Shepard says.

Restaurateurs also are racing to get eateries up.

"We're in pretty good shape," says Ralph Brennan, a top restaurateur. He hopes to have two of his places, Bacco's and Red Fish Grill, open within weeks to serve relief workers.

One hurdle is housing tourism service workers. Mayor Ray Nagin announced Tuesday that residents of less-damaged areas such as Uptown and Algiers could move back as early as Monday. And the city plans to shuttle evacuees in from Baton Rouge and elsewhere.

Speculators Rush In As Water Recedes (LAT)

By David Streitfeld

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. -- Brandy Farris is house hunting in New Orleans.

The real estate agent has $10 million in the bank, wired by an investor who has instructed her to scoop up houses -- any houses. "Flooding no problem," Farris advises in her newspaper ads.

Her backer is a Miami businessman who specializes in buying storm-ravaged property at a deep discount, something that has paid dividends in hurricane-prone Florida. But he may have a harder time finding bargains this time around.

In some ways, Hurricane Katrina seems to have taken a vibrant real estate market and made it hotter. Large sections of the city are under water, but that's only increasing the demand for dry houses. And in flooded areas, speculators are trying to buy properties on the cheap, hoping that the redevelopment of New Orleans will start a boom.

This land rush has long-term implications in a city where many of the poorest residents were flooded out. It raises the question of what sort of housing -- if any -- will be available to those without a six-figure salary. If New Orleans ends up a high-priced enclave, without a mix of cultures, races and incomes, something vital may be lost.

"There's a public interest question here," said Ann Oliveri, a senior vice president with the Urban Land Institute, a Washington think-tank. "You don't have to abdicate the city to whoever shows up."

For now, though, it's a seller's market, at least for habitable homes.

Two months ago, Steve Young bought a two-bedroom condo in New Orleans' Garden District as an investment for $145,000. Last month, he was transferred by Shell Oil to Houston. Last week, he put the condo on the market.

In a posting on the Internet classified site Craig's List, Young asked $220,000. He got a dozen serious expressions of interest -- enough so he's no longer actively pursuing a buyer.

"I'm pretty positive the market's going to move up from here," he said.

So, to their surprise, are many others.

"I thought this storm was the end of the city," said Arthur Sterbcow, president of New Orleans-based Latter & Blum, one of the biggest real estate brokerages on the Gulf Coast.

"If anyone had told me two weeks ago that I'd be getting the calls and e-mails I'm getting, I would have thought he was ready for the psychiatric ward."

Messages from those wanting to buy houses -- whether intact or flooded -- and commercial properties are outrunning those who want to sell by a factor of 20, said Sterbcow, who has set up temporary quarters in his firm's Baton Rouge office.

"We're pressing everyone into service just to answer the phones," he added.

These eager would-be buyers may be drawing their inspiration from lower Manhattan immediately after 9/11, which proved a bonanza for those smart enough to buy condos there.

Of course, in southern Louisiana, everything is hypothetical for the moment. The storm destroyed many property records and displaced buyers, sellers, agents and title companies, so no deals are actually being done. Insurance companies haven't started to settle claims yet, much less determine how, or whether, they will insure New Orleans in the future. The city isn't even drained yet.

But people are thinking ahead, influenced by a single factor: the belief that hundreds of billions of dollars in government aid is going to create a boomtown. The people administering that aid will need somewhere to live, as will those doing the rebuilding. So will employees of companies lured back to the area, and the service people that attend to them.

All this will lead to what Sterbcow delicately calls a "reorientation" of the city.

"Everyone I talked to has said, `Let's start with a clean sheet of paper, fix it and get it right,' " he said. "Some of the homes here were only held together by the termites."

What the owners of the city's estimated 150,000 flooded houses will get out of "reorientation" is unclear, especially if they were in poor repair and uninsured.

Some black New Orleans residents say dourly they know what's coming. Melvin Gilbert, a sixty-something maintenance crew chief, stood outside an elegant hotel in the French Quarter this week and recalled how that neighborhood had gentrified.

He remembered a half century ago when the French Quarter had a substantial number if black residents.

"Then the Caucasians started offering them $10,000 for their homes," he said. "Well, they only bought the places for $2,000, so they took it and ran."

The whites restored the homes, which rose quickly in value. Gilbert said he expects the same dynamic when the floodwaters recede in the heavily black neighborhoods east of downtown.

The process of tracking down owners of deluged houses is greatly slowed by the absence of records. It's not going to be easy to find these people, said Farris, the Baton Rouge real estate agent.

What would she pay for a ruined house?

Farris demurred, saying it was too early to tell, but probably only the value of the land, if that. While the French Quarter may be back to life within months, outlying districts like North Bywater and the Lower 9th Ward will take years, if they ever do. Investors might hope this is the equivalent of buying land on the distant outskirts of a boomtown, but it's not a guarantee.

For one thing, there are already proposals to convert certain flooded areas -- including some water-logged neighborhoods -- into parks. Under the U.S. Supreme Court's recent ruling broadening the definition of eminent domain, speculators could be forced to sell their properties to the government.

That would be a great outcome for many homeowners in the parishes south and east of New Orleans that bore the brunt of the storm.

Six months ago, Todd La Valla, a real estate agent, bought a four-unit apartment building for $59,000 in the community of Buras, an unincorporated hamlet in Plaquemines Parish 55 miles southeast of New Orleans.

The tenants evacuated in the storm, or at least La Valla hopes they did. He's sure the building itself is gone too, like just about everything else in the area. La Valla had no insurance, which means his $10,000 investment is probably a complete loss.

Yet where there's disaster, there's opportunity.

"I've had calls from investors in Los Angeles, Las Vegas, New York, looking to buy property," La Valla said. "This is going to be hard for the poor, the elderly, those that didn't have insurance. But it's going to be great for some people."

Germans Help Clean Up After Katrina (WT)

By Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- The 90 men and women sent by the German government to drain flood water from the city are among thousands of specialists now arriving to begin the cleanup process.

"If you can help and you have the opportunity to help, you should," said Jan Goerich, 29, from Speyer, Germany. "We are here to help, that is all."

The team of Germans, volunteers with Technisches Hilfswerk, a German disaster-relief organization, arrived Friday at Belle Chasse Naval Air Base with 15 pumps that can move almost 6 million gallons of water a day.

The German specialists are split into eight groups across the flooded city to pump water from such places as parking garages, sewage stations and neighborhoods.

"Our job is to get the pumping stations up and running," said Andsreas Garrecht, 35. "We have no plans to leave. We are here until it's done."

The German team is just one of many on hand to clean up and to protect those doing the work.

The special-response teams of the D.C.-based Immigration Customs Enforcement patrol outside the Superdome, which was a major evacuation center for tens of thousands, while crews inside clear broken bottles, water-soaked plaster, rotting trash and other messes.

"They are doing a real good job of getting the place back to normal," said Officer Fred Stacey, 45, of Reston, Va. "It's almost mind-numbing here, but we're just here to help. You get over it."

In the Hyatt Regency Hotel and the mall attached to the Superdome, a cleaning crew from Chicago-based United Service Companies has been working all week to remove garbage and sanitize the area.

"Right now, inside is marvelous compared to how it was," said employee Bobby Lisanty, 69. "How it was is not to be believed by man nor beast."

Mr. Lisanty and his 26-member team will systematically clean the hotel over the coming days. The team will move to other projects when the work is finished.

In St. Bernard Parish, where the worst flooding occurred, the 3650th Maintenance Company of the Colorado National Guard spent the afternoon clearing an intersection.

"You wouldn't believe what we've found back here," said Sgt. Daniel Rinker, 47, of Westminster, Colo. "There's a lot of alcohol. People just came back here and had a party."

The National Guardsmen, whose only protection during cleanup yesterday was rubber gloves, swept the trash into a pile, then picked it up by hand and placed it in a large bin.

As the flood water recedes, mud dried and cracked in the hot sun has caked the streets and sidewalks. Cars, baby strollers, blankets and other items are scattered where the flooding left them.

Danny Prinz, 40, was allowed to return to his New Orleans Parish business, Dwyer Motors, yesterday to collect three tool carts and an industrial-strength power washer.

"It's going to be a long time before this place is back to normal," he said.

More Deaths Confirmed In Homes For The Aged (NYT)

By David Rohde And Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

A day after Louisiana officials charged the owners of a nursing home in the deaths of 34 patients there, the owners of two other nursing homes confirmed yesterday that an additional 13 patients died in their homes in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. State officials also said they were investigating the deaths of 14 patients at yet another nursing home in New Orleans.

The new reports suggest that at least 61 patients died in four New Orleans-area nursing homes after their operators ignored a mandatory evacuation order a day before Hurricane Katrina hit. The owners of 15 other nursing homes contacted by The New York Times said they had successfully evacuated hundreds of patients from their homes.

A total of 53 nursing homes were evacuated in the New Orleans area, but it is unclear how many of them were evacuated before the storm.

Some nursing homes spent as much as $50,000 to move their patients to safety, including using private helicopters, owners and administrators said. Other nursing home owners chose to keep their patients in the city and wait out the storm.

The attorney general, Charles C. Foti Jr., was investigating reports that 14 people died at the Lafon Nursing Facility of Holy Family in New Orleans, said his chief spokeswoman, Kris Wartelle.

"We're trying to make sure the criminal justice system still works in this case," Ms. Wartelle said. "It is such a horrendously horrible thing, and it's so important to these families."

Peggy Hoffmann, executive director of the nonprofit Bethany Home, said 9 of her home's 49 patients died after she chose not to move them despite the mayor's mandatory evacuation order. Ms. Hoffman said she had been unable to find 10 patients who were evacuated to the New Orleans airport and flown to an unknown city.

"I haven't been able to sleep at night," Ms. Hoffmann said. "We haven't been able to track down 10 of my people who went through my airport."

She said she thought it would be better for her fragile patients to remain in the home, which sits on high ground, than to endure the stress of an evacuation. In past hurricane evacuations in New Orleans, nursing home patients have died on buses caught in traffic jams for up to 12 hours.

Andrew Sandler, the administrator of a second nonprofit nursing home, Maison Hospitaliere, where four patients died, cited the same reason and added that the evacuation order was not made until the day before the hurricane struck.

"Usually there is more warning," Mr. Sandler said. "This one came very quickly."

Neither home flooded, and both had emergency generators that provided limited electricity. Both owners said that day after day of high temperatures inside the homes might have contributed to the deaths, but they were not sure.

Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa asked the Department of Justice, the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services and the Government Accountability Office yesterday to begin full investigations of the deaths in nursing homes.

"The utter disrespect for the life and dignity of the frail and elderly is nearly incomprehensible," wrote Mr. Grassley, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

In other developments yesterday, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who has been a vocal critic of the federal response to the hurricane and subsequent flooding, said blame should be shared by all levels of government - and included herself.

"We all know that there were failures at all level of government: state, federal and local," Ms. Blanco said in a speech before a joint session of the Louisiana Legislature. "At the state level, we must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again. The buck stops here. And as your governor, I take full responsibility."

She said she had demanded that FEMA give priority to Louisiana residents in rebuilding jobs and to "pay them in a timely fashion."

The federal government, Ms. Blanco said, should also "cover 100 percent of what Louisiana will spend on this disaster - just as was done after 9/11."

The governor also said she had issued an executive order directing state agencies to limit spending, and called for federal aid to rebuild houses, bring residents back to the state, offer tax breaks and loans to businesses, and extend unemployment benefits. She said she had hired a former FEMA director, James Lee Witt, to help work with FEMA to cut through bureaucracy.

DOJ_NMG_0005591

Standing outside the chambers, Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans said he had missed all but the end of the governor's speech but called it "encouraging."

But, Mr. Nagin said, he is "nervous about how the implementation is going to take place."

On Tuesday, the state attorney general's office charged the owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home in Violet, just east of New Orleans, with multiple counts of negligent homicide in the deaths of 34 residents. The attorney general said the couple, Mable B. Mangano, 62, and Salvatore A. Mangano Sr., 65, had not acted on several warnings to move the residents as the hurricane approached.

In an interview on Wednesday, the couple's lawyer, James A. Cobb, said his clients were innocent, calling the charges "absurd" and "mean spirited."

"These folks have lost everything," Mr. Cobb said. "They've lost their entire life's work."

He said that the home was above flood stage level and that most of the families decided to keep their relatives at St. Rita's.

Tony Mendoza, a nursing home owner who used a private helicopter to evacuate patients before the hurricane's arrival, criticized nursing home owners who chose to remain in the city. Mr. Mendoza said he chose to evacuate his two commercial homes on Friday, two full days before Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans.

"It was a given," Mr. Mendoza said. "Every hour that went by since Friday you knew you had to go."

Kevan Cullins's 100-year-old grandmother was evacuated from Lafon a few days after the flooding, only to die, dehydrated and weak, a few days later in a hospital. Mr. Cullins said that when his family called Lafon before the storm, staff members said they had a generator and the staff was going to stay with the patients, Mr. Cullins said. If it flooded, he said, they planned to move to the second floor.

Mr. Cullins said the home had made the wrong decision in failing to evacuate.

"But at the same time," he said, "there's a lot of people in that nursing home that may not have made it anyway, they're just that frail. It's a Catch-22. A lot of the people were like my grandmother, 100 years old, and they didn't have too much more to go, but they didn't deserve to die like that."

Lafon and Bethany had been cited by inspectors for mistreatment and quality-of-care deficiencies from April 2004 to June 2005. But Lafon, with 8 deficiencies, had less than the state average of 10 per home, while Bethany had 23. For both homes, all of the deficiencies were rated 2 on a scale of 1 to 4, with 1 indicating the lowest level of harm or potential harm to residents.

Lauren Shaham, a spokeswoman for the American Association of Homes and Services for the Aging, based in Washington, said her group, which represents about 5,300 nonprofit nursing homes, assisted-living facilities and elderly-housing sites, including about 90 in the region affected by Hurricane Katrina, had not had complaints that nursing homes were not evacuated.

St. Rita's was not a member of the association.

"I think the St. Rita's thing, at least from what we're hearing, is really an anomaly, far from the norm," Ms. Shaham said.

'It Was As If All Of Us Were Already Pronounced Dead' (WP)

By Wil Haygood And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS For five eternal-seeming days, as many as 20,000 people, most of them black, waited to be rescued, not just from the floodwaters of Hurricane Katrina but from the nightmarish place where they had sought refuge.

During that time, the moon that hovered over the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center seemed closer than anyone who could provide those inside the center with any help.

On the fourth day, after TV had been filled with live reports from the center describing sexual assaults, robberies and gunfire, single mothers desperately seeking help for their children and fathers doing their best to protect them, the federal official charged with leading the hurricane response, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, responded to an interviewer's question by saying it was the first he had heard that people "don't have food and water in there."

"It was as if all of us were already pronounced dead," said Tony Cash, 25, who endured three nights of hunger, violence and darkness at the convention center. "As if somebody already had the body bags. Wasn't nobody coming to get us."

No one has been able to say how many people died inside the convention center; police, military and center officials estimate the number is about 10. Nor has there been any attempt to document the number of assaults, robberies and rapes that eyewitnesses said occurred from the time the first people broke into the convention center seeking shelter on the afternoon of Monday, Aug. 29, and when units of the Arkansas National Guard moved into the center on Friday, Sept. 2.

But even without those numbers, what happened in the convention center stands as a harsh indictment of government's failure to help its citizens when they needed it most. That futility was symbolized by the presence in the convention center for three of the most chaotic days of at least 250 armed troops from the Louisiana National Guard. They were camped out in a huge exhibition hall separated from the crowd by a wall, and used their trucks as a barricade when they were afraid the crowd would break in.

The troops were never deployed to restore order and eventually withdrew, despite the pleas of the convention center's management. Louisiana Guard commanders said their units' mission was not to secure the facility, and soldiers on the scene feared inciting further bloodshed if they had intervened. "We didn't want another Kent State," said Army Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore, commander of the active-duty military forces responding to Katrina. "They weren't trained for crowd control."

In more than 70 interviews, with both military and law enforcement officials -- who were themselves sometimes inside the center -- and with many of the survivors who suffered over the course of several nights, a chilling portrait emerges of anarchy and violence, exacerbated by young men from rival housing projects -- Magnolia, St. Bernard, Iberville, Calliope.

"Everywhere I went, I saw people with guns in their hands," said Troy Harris, 18. "They were putting guns to people's heads."

Recounting their pleas for milk for their babies, for food, for protection, many survivors described the same sense of bewilderment and anger -- broadcast, surreally, on live television. "This is America," one woman shouted into the TV cameras. What she meant was, this is not supposed to happen here.Too Late to Leave

It was Saturday, Aug. 27, when New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin pleaded with city residents to leave. Katrina would be on land in less than two days. A day earlier, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco had declared a state of emergency, prompting heightened preparation by the Louisiana National Guard.

But by this point, the appeals from Blanco and Nagin were aimed at one group in particular -- the poor. Those with resources had already bolted.

Many simply had no way of leaving on their own. Many who had survived hurricanes figured this wouldn't get them, either. "They tend to look at evacuation orders as scare tactics," said Troy Jarreau, a New Orleans schoolteacher who has taught many children from impoverished households.

But by Monday, after Katrina hit New Orleans and the levees had broken, a different reality was clear. "Get out! Get out now!" was the message on WYLD ("Wild for Jesus"), a popular black radio station. It was repeated on Q93-FM, heavy with rhythm and blues and rap music.

This time, those who stayed behind found themselves wading, or swimming, using every ounce of energy to get themselves to the Louisiana Superdome, which had served as a refuge in previous hurricanes. But the indoor stadium had begun filling as early as Sunday, and by the next day, officials had started turning people away. It was becoming overcrowded, and the floodwaters had begun to encircle it.

The convention center, a sprawling complex of meeting halls nearly a mile long near the Mississippi River, was never intended as a shelter, said Capt. M.A. Pfeiffer, an operations officer with the New Orleans Police Department. "It was supposed to be a bus stop where they dropped people off for transportation. The problem was, the transportation never came."

As rising water engulfed the Superdome on Monday, trucks and vans that were rescuing people from the I-10 overpass and other locations began dropping them off on the dry road in front of the center. It was the only option, police said. Quickly, the crowd grew to 1,000 people.

Katrina had ripped a hole in the center's roof, dumping pools of rainwater into Hall C in the middle of the huge complex. The center lost electricity and water pressure, but otherwise damage was not severe.

Monitoring the damage were about 40 essential convention workers -- carpenters, electricians and unarmed security guards -- supervised by the center's president, Jimmie Fore, who had arrived there Sunday determined to ride out the storm. Joining them were about 300 other employees and their families seeking shelter.

As a crowd gathered outside and it became dark, Fore said he sensed trouble, so he went down to the sidewalk and made an appeal. He warned those arriving that the center had no food, water, electricity, medical care or other provisions to serve as a shelter. They ignored him. "They just kept coming," he said.

Security guards had locked the building, but later that night, people began yanking on the doors and eventually opened one. "Once one got in, they let all the others in," said Fore, explaining that the doors had "panic hardware" and could not be locked on the inside.

At the Superdome, officials had devised a security plan to check for weapons. No such plan was put into place for the convention center, even as the numbers of people seeking shelter swelled and swelled.Descent Into Danger

Leon Doby, 26, had gotten daughters Leah, 1, and Khaylin, 3, out of their home, put them in a crate, tied the crate with rope to his waist, then began swimming. He hustled his way, finally, onto a motorboat. It sped off to the Superdome, all aboard exhausted.

At the Superdome, they were rebuffed, and pointed in the direction of the convention center, 10 blocks away.

By the time Doby -- with the crate and the two daughters -- arrived Tuesday, he found himself gazing into thousands of bewildered faces. Gripping his daughters, he walked fast -- exactly where he was going, he did not know -- but he passed an elderly lady who seemed to be listing in a wheelchair.

"I went down the hall," he said. "By the time I was back, she was already gone."

Doby would spend four days at the center. All he had for himself and two girls during that time was a sandwich and two bottles of water that a stranger had given him.

Linda Cash, 26, arrived with her two children, Clarence, 6, and Cyrin, 2. "Soon as I got there," Cash recalled, "I saw fighting. I saw people throwing chairs. People pulling guns out, right in front of little children."

Near where Cash had hunkered down Monday night, she noticed a little boy having difficulty breathing. She figured he was having an asthma attack or an anxiety attack. She and others nearby spotted a too-seldom-seen police officer. The officer came over, his gun drawn. Cash said she pointed to the young boy. "The officer checked the boy," Cash remembered, "then turned to us and said there was nothing he could do."

The officer vanished. The boy was dead -- a death confirmed by three others interviewed for this article.

Another officer soon appeared, and Cash and the others figured he would remove the dead child. "But that officer told us he had come over to our area to check on some gunshots he heard near us," she said. The body stayed there.

By Tuesday, the center's population had exploded to nearly 20,000. "The lights never came on, for some reason, all the way," Cash said.

And among those thousands were gangsters, though maybe not members of gangs. Community activists for years had been warning the city's leadership about the folly of mixing youths from one housing project with youths from another.

"You declare martial law," said Jazz Washington, a community activist, "and to these gangsters that just means, 'We can kill you and keep on moving.' "

A gang broke into the locked alcohol storage areas and suddenly had 50 cases of hard liquor and 200 cases of beer. And before long, there were scenes of gangsters, drunk, groping after young girls -- and those scenes not far from the ones of women in corners, balled up, praying all frozen with a Hobson's choice: the gangsters, or the floodwaters.

"They took so much, they couldn't drink it all," said George Lancie, manager of the center's food-service company, who had been at Fore's side.

In the chaos, the youths hotwired anything that would move, including electric utility carts and forklifts. Tony Cash saw the forklifts being driven about in zigzags. "They were nearly running over people," he said. "I'm telling you, it was crazy."

Fore was at a loss as to how to quell the danger. He said he tried desperately to call local and state emergency authorities. But he never got through. And he looked and looked for the arrival of local police.

"You might see them drive by," he said. "Is that providing security?"

New Orleans police officials said they could not safeguard the center after Katrina left them short of officers, vehicles and a dependable communication system. And when their armory flooded, they were short of ammunition. Dozens of officers tried patrolling outside around the convention center, but, according to Lt. Melvin Howard, the crowds and darkness made it difficult and dangerous to work inside.

Police could not use flashlights without giving away their position and becoming possible targets, Howard said. Nor could they open fire, if confronted, without the risk of killing innocent people.

Troy Harris, 18, who had survived a gunshot to the stomach on the hard streets of New Orleans, thought he could handle himself anywhere in the city. The darkened convention center gravely tested his moxie. "They were robbing people in there. At gunpoint," he said. "Somebody robbed me of a hundred dollars."

Even police officers were afraid, Harris said. "I saw police officers in the bathroom taking off their uniforms!" he said. "I'm telling you, they were taking off their uniforms and throwing their badges down!"

Doby saw prostrate bodies near the bathroom -- dead or unconscious, he didn't know. He told his little girls it was okay to soil themselves. His hungry girls in his arms, Doby was furious.

At daybreak, many would flee outside, where TV cameras gave them desperate moments to make appeals. But for the most part they had nowhere else to go. It was as if they were marooned in some faraway locale, on some faraway island -- instead of New Orleans.

Rumors were treated as fact -- both inside the convention center and out. A later report that there were 200 bodies in the convention center and the Superdome brought a coroner's unit rushing from St. Gabriel and Baton Rouge, La.

One night, said Steve Rochon, a deranged man started yelling, "Here comes the water!" -- intimating the Mississippi was about to flood the center. A panic ensued, and mothers grabbed children.

The deaf didn't know what was happening. The old in the wheelchairs couldn't move. But the stampede was on anyway. A mother screamed that someone was stepping on her baby.

"People just started panicking," recalled Rochon, himself forced to move animatedly on a prosthetic leg. "People were getting run over each other."

At one point, a police car drove up. Perhaps good news. Perhaps ships were steaming up the Mississippi over there right now.

A police officer tossed out a few bottles and drove off. It ignited a free for all. Doby himself looked on in horror as a man -- arguing over the water -- struck another man with a two-by-four. "That man, he was split" in the head, said Doby. "He was leaking. He just dropped, face first."

Back inside, Doby was stilled by yet another confrontation. Three women were arguing, over what everyone seemed to be arguing about: lack of food, water, space. One of the women -- a snap-of-the-finger quick -- plunged a pair of scissors into the shoulder of the woman she had been arguing with.

Everywhere, a new woe. A group of people desperate for food broke into the kitchen. When they tried to cook something, a fire erupted.Desperate to Flee

By Wednesday night, Fore and eight colleagues had locked themselves in an office. A gang had threatened to break through, rattling the door. A security guard informed Fore the situation appeared to be getting worse in the center.

Fore and his aides had parked their cars over in Hall J, and Fore decided they had to make a break. Thursday afternoon, they moved stealthily to their cars. When they reached them, they slipped inside and fled.

Wednesday, some buses arrived, but of the thousands in the convention center only a tiny number could board. They had been standing outside, where the buses rolled to a stop.

Then there was a miracle: Seven more buses rolled up. The race was on to get to them. Linda Cash, slow off the draw, grabbed her children anyway. And started racing. "Then the buses pulled off," she said. "And no one was on them. That's when I knew I really had to find a way out of there."

On Thursday, Cash left, taking her children and stealing a car that eventually got her to Baton Rouge. That same day, the New Orleans police made a dramatic entrance. Sgt. Hans Ganthier and 12 other New Orleans SWAT team members entered the center, M-4 commando rifles at the ready. Prayers had been answered -- only it was a rescue mission of a different purpose.

A Jefferson Parish police deputy had appealed to SWAT team Capt. Jeff Winn for help in bringing out his wife and a female relative from the center. "He knew they were there and was hearing nightmarish stories," said Ganthier, who declined to identify the officer for security reasons.

Winn approved the mission.

When the SWAT team entered at 11 a.m., the Jefferson Parish officer called out his wife's name. She heard him, and along with the relative rushed to his side. The SWAT team put the women in the middle of the team, then backed out the door.

Once it became clear that the SWAT team had come with the single goal of rescuing two white women, anger exploded.

"Racists!" one man cried out.

"Some people were upset we weren't rescuing them," said Ganthier. "It's hard to leave people behind like that, but we were aiding an officer."'A Mob, Crazy Mentality'

By Tuesday night, a contingent of at least 250 Louisiana National Guard troops was hunkered down in Hall A, off Julia Street at the northern end of the building.

The armed troops, from at least two engineering battalions -- the 769th and 527th -- had been assigned to set up a base at the center to prepare for debris removal and road clearing, as well as rescue and security. But they had enough food and water only for themselves and had no immediate orders to provide assistance or security for the thousands of evacuees in their midst, according to interviews with a dozen enlisted soldiers and officers.

Instead, as the danger level grew, they felt they must first protect themselves.

"There was way too many of them and way too few of us," said Master Sgt. Chad Anderson, 37. "Since we couldn't help them, it was best to avoid them. They had a mob, crazy mentality."

Whenever the soldiers left the center on missions, they drove west on Julia Street and away from the throngs of people begging for food and water along Convention Center Boulevard. "When they saw the soldiers, they'd think, 'That's food,' " said Sgt. Karla Spillers, 26. "We didn't have any for them. We had to feed our own people."

Spillers said she felt pain at the knowledge that teenage girls were wandering around the center, alone, knowing they were possible prey.

"There were prisoners, mobsters, gangs" in there, she said.

Almost as soon as they arrived, Guard commanders became concerned enough about the safety of their troops that they ordered more weapons and ammunition. On Wednesday night, there was kicking and banging on the doors to Hall A, where the guardsmen were. "They were trying to break the doors and get us," said Anderson. "They knew we were there."

"About 9 that night, we started barricading the doors," said Staff Sgt. Bryan Lowery, a supply sergeant with the 527th battalion.

Guardsmen parked at least three dump trucks next to the doors to block them, and Lowery began dispensing weapons and ammunition.

"It scared me," Spillers recalled. "Everyone went to get their weapons from the backs of the trucks."

That night, Guard commanders figured the convention center was untenable as a staging base. And they, too, left the center despite what Fore said were his pleas to stay.

"We were told they couldn't help us unless the order came down from the top, from a lot of people," Fore said. "The only time they partnered with us was when there were gunshots in the area where they were actually staying. They protected themselves."

Maj. Keith Waddell, commander of the 769th Engineer Battalion, said his unit was never asked to quell the violence at the convention center. "The idea of helping with the convention center never came up," he said. "We were just preparing ourselves for the next mission."

Waddell said he believes that, if so ordered, the Louisiana Guard forces present would have been adequate to get the center under control.

"I feel confident we could have controlled it, with the numbers we had," Waddell said.

But senior commanders indicated they had ruled out that possibility. Col. Stephen C. Dabadie, chief of staff of the Louisiana National Guard, said the engineer units were "not designed to secure the convention center."The Troops Arrive

Early Thursday, the Guard troops packed up and rolled out amid angry calls from the crowd inside. Twenty-four hours elapsed before more troops arrived -- including a contingent of the Arkansas National Guard, imposing enough so that no one tried to bother them.

Many of the guardsmen had recently returned from Iraq, and they arrived wearing helmets and full body armor, and shouldering rifles. To their surprise, they encountered virtually no violence -- only a crowd of hot, frustrated, angry people desperate for food and water. "A lot of them said we should have been there earlier," said Spec. Keithean Heath of the Arkansas Guard's 39th Infantry Brigade.

Military commanders had worried the crowd would rush medevac helicopters. Instead, soldiers faced little interference as they moved to help frail and elderly people in wheelchairs in urgent need of care, women cradling tiny infants and others about to give birth. The soldiers set up food lines to hand out bottled water and packaged military meals, and people lined up to receive them.

On Saturday, soldiers again lined up people and searched them before loading them onto buses. They counted as many as 16,000 people who got on the buses, an eerily quiet process.

Leon Doby, the daddy who swam his two young daughters to safety -- before they all arrived at the convention center -- had already left. He headed out as he had arrived, his two little girls -- his everything -- in the crook of his arms.

A genuine miracle: A man on the road picked them up and drove them all the way to Dallas.

"That was hell," Doby said of the New Orleans convention center. "They sent us to the grave."Tending to the Dead

Three days after the evacuation, Staff Sgt. Juan Almonte, a medic with the 82nd Airborne Division, slipped past a caution sign and through a ripped metal door, bracing himself for the task ahead -- to "bag" the bodies still inside the convention center.

Inside the food-service area near Hall A, sitting slumped in a black wheelchair, was a woman of about 60 in a hospital gown. A man in a shirt and jogging pants lay curled up on the concrete floor next to her, his hand over his face.

To Almonte's right down a wide hallway, a large man -- the medic guessed he was at least 6-foot-4 and 300 pounds -- lay with his arms over his head and knees bent. Another woman in hospital scrubs lay a few feet from him, next to aluminum cans and trays with stained but elegant white dinner menus.

Around the bodies were pools of dried blood. Looking closer, he noted swelling and abrasions on the corpses. He stared at what he found next. On the gray, soiled floor several feet from the dead lay a pair of shiny brass knuckles.

"My perception was that they were beaten to death," he said last week. "Absolutely, they were killed."

Almonte and his fellow medics had to struggle to straighten the corpses to fit them in double bags -- the large man took up one by himself. The next day, about 20 boxes of body bags appeared in front of Almonte's tent, and he told his men to prepare for more recoveries. But no order ever came. Civilian authorities, he was told, would handle "packaging and retrieval."

Health Officials Urge Flu Shots For All Katrina Evacuees (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Federal health officials are pressing forward with plans to ensure flu vaccinations for hurricane evacuees in shelters as well as all people in nursing homes, populations they say are particularly at risk for catching the illness while living in tight quarters.

Julie L. Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said Wednesday that elderly evacuees, as well as those of all ages at shelters, will be among the first to receive flu shots this fall.

Manufacturer Sanofi-Pasteur is making 200,000 of the first flu shots available to those evacuees. Sanofi-Pasteur is the vaccine division of France-based Sanofi-Aventis.

Federal stocks of all vaccines are being made available to children who are evacuees, Dr. Gerberding said.

Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said a proposed rule would require all nursing homes to offer vaccinations against the flu and bacterial pneumonia.

The goal is to get 90% of people in nursing homes vaccinated, Dr. McClellan said. Nursing home residents can opt out, and a few may not be eligible for the shots for other health reasons, he said.

About two million people live in the nation's 18,000 nursing homes, Medicare officials said.

Because of questions about the vaccine supply, federal officials want high-risk groups -- including people aged 65 and older, and children between 6 months and 23 months -- to get their flu shots and are asking doctors to hold off on giving the shots to healthy adults until Oct. 24 at the earliest.

CDC: Outlook For Flu Vaccine This Year Good (USAT)

By Liz Szabo, Usa Today

USA Today, September 15, 2005

Federal health officials said Wednesday that flu shots this year should go first to the most vulnerable patients — including Hurricane Katrina survivors living in shelters — but should be available to everyone by late October.

Although the vaccine supply should be ample this year, with 71 million to 97 million doses, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention expects some shots to be delayed.

The flu vaccine supply has become a major public health concern. The USA lost nearly half its expected supplies last year after the Food and Drug Administration banned distribution of flu shots from vaccine maker Chiron Corp., whose license was suspended by British regulators because of contamination problems at its plant in England.

The nation's expected flu supply was cut from 100 million doses to 61 million last fall, which caused widespread shortages and long lines at flu clinics.

Chiron announced last month that the Food and Drug Administration has found its British facility "generally acceptable." Although the company expects to produce 18 million to 26 million doses for this flu season, it won't start shipping until the end of September or early October, spokeswoman Alison Marquiss says.

The CDC is not asking doctors to ration the FluMist nasal spray, which uses a live virus instead of the inactivated virus used in flu shots. The sprays can be used by healthy people ages 5 to 49, except for pregnant women.

Julie Gerberding, director of the CDC, urged doctors to delay until Oct. 24 giving flu shots to people at lower risk. That should give high-risk patients the chance to be inoculated first, she said during a briefing at the National Press Club in Washington. In addition to hurricane survivors, who are more likely to get sick if they have been living in close contact with many other people, doctors should give priority to health workers, people over 65, people with chronic diseases, children ages 6 months to 23 months and people who live with or care for babies under 6 months.

This schedule is designed to allow enough time to protect people who have the most to lose from flu infections, Gerberding says. But it is also meant to allow organizations to schedule vaccine clinics. Health officials say the flu season typically peaks from late December to March.

Managing vaccine supplies is a challenge every year, says Tracy Lieu, an associate professor at Harvard Medical School and member of the CDC's Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices. Last year's warnings about shortages led millions of healthy adults to skip vaccination, and 4.5 million doses went unsold.

"Physicians and nurses feel we send mixed messages — and we do," Lieu says. "We say, 'Everyone come get your flu shot,' then, 'Wait, there are no flu shots.' "

Ten percent to 20% of Americans get the flu every year, Henry Bernstein, a member of the American Academy of Pediatrics' committee on infectious disease, said at the conference. It kills 36,000 Americans a year and sends 200,000 to the hospital.

Evacuee Students Happy To Be At Madison (DMN)

By Tawnell D. Hobbs, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 15, 2005

One thing is obvious at Madison High School in South Dallas. Students who evacuated here because of Hurricane Katrina appreciate Texas.

U.S. Department of Education Assistant Secretary Tom Luce, Texas Education Commissioner Shirley Neeley, Dallas Superintendent Michael Hinojosa and Dallas trustee Ron Price toured the school on Wednesday and were thanked profusely by some students.

"I appreciate what you did for us, letting us into your schools," 16-year-old James Smith told the group as he sat in class.

Madison has taken in about 115 students, more than any other public school in Dallas. In all, Dallas schools have enrolled nearly 1,500 students since Sept. 1, when the district began tracking new students from hurricane-ravaged areas.

Mr. Luce, a native of Dallas, said the visit to his home state was necessary to determine the needs of educating student evacuees. He said other government officials would also visit other cities.

"Part of my job is to try to develop national policy in a real big hurry," Mr. Luce told students at Madison. "It's our job to make sure that you all have the educational opportunity that every American deserves. We're going to get you some help."

Tyne Thompson, a 17-year-old senior, praised the state of Texas for willingly accepting students from Louisiana.

"They loved us enough to provide us with what we need," she said. "My mom said, 'Texas has a big heart.' "

Mr. Luce plans to meet with area school superintendents later today.

Hurricane Puts Strain On S.A. Schools (SAEN)

By Jenny LaCoste-Caputo

San Antonio Express-News (TX), September 15, 2005

San Antonio school leaders concerned about the ramifications of taking in nearly 1,400 new students escaping the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina will have the chance to voice their worries and ask for help today.

Ray Simon, deputy secretary for the U.S. Education Department, will visit San Antonio today to meet with superintendents and visit schools. School leaders will meet with Simon and Texas Education Commissioner Shirley Neeley at the Region 20 Education Service Center.

Simon plans to tour Hull Elementary in Northside School District and South San Antonio High School West Campus in South San Antonio School District.

"San Antonio has really stepped up to the plate and is doing the right thing for these students," said Chad Colby, a spokesman for the U.S. Education Department.

As of early this week, at least 1,399 Hurricane Katrina evacuees had enrolled in local school districts. The majority of the students are enrolling in the districts serving the city's four shelters — Northside, North East, Edgewood and South San Antonio. Other districts are seeing a spike in enrollment as families move out of shelters and into the community or bunk with friends or relatives in San Antonio.

Judson School District had 140 hurricane evacuee students, or "Katrina kids" as several districts have dubbed them, as of Tuesday. Alamo Heights has enrolled 34, and San Antonio has 81.

San Antonio school leaders were lauded for getting students enrolled as soon as possible. But as the numbers swell, the realities are setting in.

"We know firsthand that a very small population can skew test results and give a school a bad academic rating," said Richard Middleton, superintendent of North East School District. "We're hoping for a little bit of common sense from the state and federal governments."

Both Texas and the federal government have strict accountability laws that rank schools based on test performance. Low-performing schools are subject to sanctions. If no exceptions are made, the storm victims' test scores will count toward the school ranking given the Texas school they now attend.

The rankings also take into account attendance and dropout rates. Those rates could take a hit as children move on to another district or back to their home state.

Last week, the National Education Association, the country's largest teachers union, asked Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to waive the accountability portion of the federal No Child Left Behind law for schools directly affected by the hurricane in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, as well as Texas and other states receiving large numbers of students.

Commissioner Neeley has sent a letter to the Education Department, asking, among other things, for flexibility under No Child Left Behind.

So far, at least, the new students will be counted in the state's accountability system, according to the Texas Education Agency.

Diana Bowman, director of the National Center for Homeless Education, said expecting these children to perform up to standard after the trauma they've experienced could be unrealistic.

"There have been studies that show every time a child transfers from one school to another, they lose about four to six months of continuity in education," Bowman said. "And the more time they're out of school, more is lost."

Educators also are concerned about graduation requirements for high school seniors.

Texas law requires high school students to pass exit tests before earning a diploma. There are no waivers.

"We are aware of the (complication), and we are looking into it," said DeEtta Culbertson, a TEA spokeswoman.

It might take legislative action to address the potential problem, she said.

Another possible option is for high school seniors from Louisiana who now attend Texas schools to take Louisiana tests and earn a Louisiana diploma, Culbertson said.

"We're looking at the graduation requirements for the three states (Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi) to cover all of the evacuees, not just the Louisiana kids," she said

Middleton said he hopes a solution is found soon.

"Is it fair for these kids to be thrown into a different system, in a situation they didn't create, and held to different requirements?" he said.

The influx of students likely will cost San Antonio-area schools tens of millions of dollars over the next school year. Neeley has estimated the state's bill could be at least $450 million.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency will reimburse school districts for transportation costs, portable buildings, school computers and mental health counselors, but not other, and potentially more expensive costs, such as hiring new teachers and support staff.

Spellings is working with Congress to develop a plan for financial aid for the states.

"We're tracking every expenditure and it's going to be a lot of money," said Northside Superintendent John Folks.

Louisiana Elections Put Off (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Louisiana officials yesterday postponed local elections scheduled for Oct. 15, citing a lack of equipment and manpower.

"Right now, because of Hurricane Katrina and its resulting aftermath, we don't have the machines, personnel, or electorate in place to properly conduct a fair election in these affected areas," said Al Ater, Louisiana's secretary of state. "We will reschedule these elections at the appropriate time."

The cancellation affects judicial candidates, a school board race and one council seat in the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson, special propositions for tax increases for security patrols in two neighborhoods, and a "beautification, security and overall betterment" tax increase in eastern New Orleans.

According to Louisiana law, an office holder remains at his or her post until a successor is sworn into office.

Mandatory evacuation after the storm also leaves the state short on voters, prompting the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to begin organizing New Orleans evacuees in shelters across the country to ensure they can vote in the Orleans Parish mayoral race in February and a congressional race in 2006.

Ellen Davis, spokeswoman for the Louisiana Republican Party, said getting elections back on track and ensuring legal residents can cast votes will be a "logistical nightmare."

"Our country has never seen anything like this, we have entire counties that are without a population," Mrs. Davis said.

Democratic Rep. William J. Jefferson of New Orleans, the only black member of Louisiana's congressional delegation, faces re-election next year.

With Louisiana voters scattered among 300 shelters in 24 states, black leaders fear a permanent exodus reminiscent of the 1927 Mississippi River flood, when hundreds of black residents fled the region.

President Bush carried Louisiana with 57 percent of the vote in 2004. Statewide, white voters outnumber black voters, nearly 1.8 million versus 780,000, and Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-1. In New Orleans, there are about 63,000 white voters -- more than half of whom are Democrats -- and 143,000 black voters.

New Orleans Democrats showed their strength in the 2002 runoff election between Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, Louisiana Democrat, and Republican Elections Commissioner Suzanne Terrell. Voter turnout statewide was low, but 40,000 New Orleans voters gave Mrs. Landrieu her margin of victory.

Marc Morial, former New Orleans mayor and president of the National Urban League, yesterday asked the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee to create a Katrina victim's Bill of Rights for the evacuees, that would among other assistance ensure future voting rights.

"We must continue to have voting rights in the state, not to politicize this, but they must have a voice in the rebuilding effort in the community from which they have been displaced," Mr. Morial said.

Lloyd's Estimates Its Katrina Costs At $2.55 Billion (WSJ)

By Charles Fleming

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Lloyd's of London estimated that claims related to Hurricane Katrina and the devastation of New Orleans could cost it a net $2.55 billion (€2.08 billion), its second-biggest loss ever, reinforcing expectations that insurers world-wide will push prices up next year to recover some of their huge losses.

Lloyd's estimate of its losses makes Katrina the second-most-expensive single disaster ever in nominal terms for the Lloyd's insurance market, whose members paid out about $3.5 billion for the World Trade Center terrorist attacks in New York in 2001. It also tops all other insurance groups' estimates of their individual exposure to Katrina claims so far. Lloyd's functions as a marketplace for syndicates that underwrite insurance policies.

Lloyd's warned that conclusive data on how much the insurance market would have to pay out on Katrina wouldn't be available for some time. But it said in a statement yesterday that, based on current information, it didn't believe the disaster would push out of business any of the 62 syndicates that operate through Lloyd's. It also said it didn't believe any Lloyd's syndicates would make a material claim on Lloyd's £1.1 billion (€1.6 billion) bailout fund for its members, known as the Central Fund.

Katrina could cost the global insurance industry up to $60 billion, according to some industry estimates. Large European insurers often find themselves on the line for hefty chunks of insurance claims incurred by distant hurricanes such as Katrina, because they provide reinsurance cover to the direct insurers who sell home, automobile, industrial or life policies in the disaster zones.

The estimated $2.55 billion that Lloyd's syndicates could end up paying is split evenly between claims by individual policy holders who bought coverage directly on the Lloyd's market and claims from U.S. insurance companies that reinsured their risks through Lloyd's, spokesman Nick Gammage said. Lloyd's also sells reinsurance coverage to the reinsurance groups themselves, giving it three potential levels of exposure. Mr. Gammage said a detailed breakdown of Lloyd's exposure wasn't yet available.

Other European reinsurers, notably Swiss Reinsurance Co. of Zurich and Munich Re AG of Munich, have also said in recent days that they could face hefty bills for Katrina-related damage. Swiss Re has estimated its maximum loss could be $1.2 billion, and Munich Re, which initially estimated its losses at about $500 million, has said it could raise its estimate as further information comes in.

A number of Bermuda-based reinsurance groups, which are smaller than the large European companies but tend to be more focused on natural-catastrophe insurance, are also likely to face big losses.

Insurance brokers say the size of the reinsurers' exposure means it is almost inevitable that reinsurers will try to claw back losses by raising the prices they charge the direct insurers. "In the light of these numbers, there'll be upward pressure on prices in many areas, especially property catastrophe coverage, energy and large [industrial] risks," said Geoffrey Bromley, chairman of reinsurance brokerage firm Guy Carpenter & Co.'s non-U.S. activities.

Insurers May Face Flood Lawsuits In Mississippi (WSJ)

By Theo Francis

DOJ_NMG_0005601

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood is considering suing insurers to force them to pay flood damage from Hurricane Katrina that could total billions of dollars, seeking to override decades-old exclusions in standard homeowners' policies, two people familiar with the matter said.

The attorney general's examination of legal moves comes as tens of thousands of Mississippi homeowners are grappling with the cost of rebuilding homes that in many cases were badly damaged by the huge storm surge that accompanied the category-four hurricane's strong winds. Mr. Hood and a spokesman for his office couldn't be reached for comment late yesterday.

Standard homeowners' policies cover wind damage, not flooding. Yet fewer than one in five Mississippi homes and businesses in areas most at risk of flooding hold policies from the National Flood Insurance Program, according to federal figures. While some government grants are available to uninsured flood victims, such homeowners typically rebuild with low-interest federal loans.

Any legal action by Mr. Hood, which could be announced this week, would be expected to meet resistance from the insurance sector. Insurers cannot afford to pay flood damage from Katrina because they "have never collected a cent of premium for flood insurance," said Robert Hartwig, chief economist for Insurance Information Institute, a New York trade group. He said insurers would argue that "the flood exclusion in homeowners' policies is well-established in all states...That is why there exists a national flood-insurance program" and many people "have been paying flood premiums [to the government] for decades."

As of last week, estimates of the cost to private-sector insurers had grown to as high as $60 billion. As big a bite as that is, U.S. property-casualty insurers have more than $400 billion in capital. In recent days, a growing chorus of consumer activists and government officials have called on insurers to give Gulf Coast policyholders the benefit of the doubt in any instances where homes suffered both wind and flood damage.

Indeed, plaintiffs' lawyers in Mississippi are forming a network to work free of charge for homeowners seeking payments for flood damage from their insurers, in a potential second legal front against the insurance industry, a person close to the effort said. Lawyers include Richard Scruggs, a class-action attorney who made his name suing the tobacco and asbestos industries, the person said.

One person familiar with Mr. Hood's possible suit said it might argue that insurers are on the hook because Katrina's storm surge and waves were wind-driven events, and thus should be covered as wind damage. Options include seeking a court order to prevent insurers from denying claims based on the flood exclusion.

Some isolated legal efforts to get around the flood exclusion have succeeded over the years, which has prompted insurers to stiffen the policy language or persuade lawmakers to plug legal loopholes. Mr. Hartwig, whose trade group has been anticipating legal action, said, "I haven't read every policy written in the state of Mississippi, and policy terms and conditions will vary. But the definition of a flood" is fairly uniform, including "storm surge and water that rises for any reason off any body of water, whether or not the cause of the rise of the water is associated with wind."

N.C. Locals Take It In Stride As Ophelia Batters Coast (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 15, 2005

ATLANTIC BEACH, N.C. — Terry Slaughter swayed in the mounting wind on Wednesday, watching a crew struggle with a utility pole snapped by one of Hurricane Ophelia's first blasts.

He has lived here for 40 of his 47 years, endured hurricanes from Bertha to Isabel, and had no plans to leave for a storm whose winds don't top 100 mph, much less match the ferocity of Katrina.

Asked what he has done to prepare for Ophelia, he took a deep drag from a cigarette and said, “You're looking at it.”

Up and down Bogue Banks, a slender, sandy barrier island, residents were mindful of the destruction Katrina wrought on the Gulf Coast but not worried about a repeat here.

At 11 p.m. Wednesday, Ophelia was about 20 miles south-southeast of Cape Lookout, N.C., according to the National Hurricane Center. It had maximum sustained winds of 85 mph, making it a Category 1 hurricane on the five-stage scale. Katrina was a Category 4 storm with 145 mph winds when it came ashore Aug. 29.

DOJ_NMG_0005602

North Carolina Gov. Mike Easley warned people not to be complacent. Tourists were told to leave the popular beaches of the Outer Banks. Residents of some low-lying areas were evacuated.

"Let me be clear: Ophelia is a dangerous storm," Easley said.

Power flickered off as the wind lashed coastal towns, leaving 120,000 homes and businesses in the dark.

Still dealing with Hurricane Katrina, the Federal Emergency Management Agency said it had stockpiled food, water and ice at locations in states surrounding North Carolina. It had 250 workers in place.

The governor said that he had spoken to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and that National Guard teams were prepared to evacuate sick, frail and elderly residents.

FEMA said it was doing nothing different than normal.

"You can bet we are ready though," said FEMA spokeswoman Nicol Andrews.

Ophelia was to make landfall today. But this storm is big, spreading hurricane-force winds 50 miles from its center, so it will affect a broad swath of North Carolina, said Eric Blake, a meteorologist with the National Hurricane Center.

Ophelia's pace of 7 mph means some areas could receive hour after hour of pounding rain. Some spots in eastern North Carolina could be doused with 15 inches.

That's what concerned Sam Ramos. The hospital corpsman, who works at Camp Lejeune Marine Corps Base, stopped at K & V 1 Stop Shop on Emerald Isle to finish off his hurricane preparations. Ramos, 35, already had stocked up on food and filled his bathtub with fresh water.

"The only thing I'm worried about is the rain," said Ramos. "There's going to be some flooding."

Up Highway 58, in the town of Salter Path, emergency crews hunkered down at the firehouse. Gusts of wind keened as they were sliced by power lines, and rain smacked against windshields.

Emergency medical technician Megan Kinnaman, 24, ticked off hurricanes she has weathered on North Carolina's coast: Isabel, Fran, Dennis, Bertha, Floyd. "This is just the usual for us," she said. "Most of us will spend the night here. We'll cook, and eat and wait it out."

They've already urged the elderly and ill to leave, she said. When winds top 45 mph, it's unsafe for even the rescue workers to venture out.

"People think they can just punch 911 and everybody'll come running," said Crystal Mizelle, 24, another EMT. "We have to be concerned for our own safety."

The two say they never thought about evacuating. "You live here, you deal with hurricanes," Kinnaman said.

Slaughter, who builds houses, noted that most people hadn't boarded up windows.

"I guess plywood got too high," he said with a laugh.

Heavy Rain Hits N.C. Coast As Ophelia Picks Up Strength (LAT/AP)

By From Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

CAROLINA BEACH, N.C. -- Hurricane Ophelia lashed the North Carolina coast with high winds and heavy rains Wednesday, beginning an anticipated two-day assault that threatened serious flooding and an 11-foot storm surge.

"If you have not heeded the warning before, let me be clear right now: Ophelia is a dangerous storm," Gov. Mike Easley said from Raleigh, appealing especially to those in flood-prone areas to evacuate.

Ophelia was moving so slowly -- just 7 mph Wednesday night -- that authorities expected the storm's passage through North Carolina to take 48 hours from the start of rainfall on the southeastern coast Tuesday afternoon to the storm's anticipated exit into the Atlantic late Thursday.

The storm had sustained winds of 85 mph, the National Hurricane Center said. Hurricane warnings covered the entire North Carolina coast from the South Carolina line to Virginia, where a tropical storm warning covered the mouth of Chesapeake Bay.

More than 12 inches of rain had fallen on Oak Island at the mouth of the Cape Fear River, said meteorologist Jeff Orrock with the National Weather Service in Raleigh.

More than 120,000 homes and business were without power in eastern North Carolina, electric utilities said.

On Ocean Isle Beach, south of Carolina Beach, a 50-foot section of beachfront road was washed out by heavy surf and the only bridge to the island was closed.

Jetnella Gibbs and her family made their way to a shelter at a Craven County high school after the rain started Tuesday.

"We noticed the street was starting to fill up, and I said, 'It's time to go,'" she said. "I know if this little bit here has flooded the street, what will it do when it really pours?"

The storm's eye was expected to brush the coast between midnight and 2 a.m., but it might not come ashore as it hugs and parallels the barrier islands of the Outer Banks through Thursday, officials said.

At 11 p.m., Ophelia's center was about 20 miles south-southeast of Cape Lookout and moving northeast at about 7 mph toward Cape Hatteras, about 85 miles away.

Water pushed out of Bogue Sound washed into garages and ground floors while ocean surf chewed away the end of a hotel's pier on Bogue Banks, a barrier island.

Following the criticism of its response to Hurricane Katrina, the Federal Emergency Management Agency had 250 workers on the ground -- a larger-than-usual contingent given Ophelia's size. FEMA also put a military officer, Coast Guard Rear Adm. Brian Peterman, in place to command any federal response the storm might require.

The storm's slow, meandering path to the coast gave FEMA more time to get staff on the ground than is usually the case with North Carolina hurricanes, said Shelley Boone, the agency's team leader for Ophelia.

President Bush issued an emergency declaration for 37 counties in eastern North Carolina, authorizing the Department of Homeland Security and FEMA to coordinate disaster relief efforts.

Easley said he had spoken to Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and that National Guard teams were prepared to evacuate sick, frail and elderly residents.

Craven County expected a 6- to 8-foot storm surge in the Harlowe area near the Neuse River -- an area that flooded during Isabel two years ago, said Stanley Kite, the county emergency management coordinator.

The Beaufort County town of Washington ordered an evacuation of a 20-block area that flooded during Hurricane Fran in 1996. A storm surge of up to 9 feet was forecast along the Pamlico River and water wasn't expected to recede until Thursday morning, county manager Paul Spruill said.

Officials on the Outer Banks warned Ophelia could bring 10 hours of hurricane-force wind to exposed Hatteras Island. The southernmost villages of Hatteras, Frisco and Buxton were expected to get the worst of the winds and the flooding.

"It's an island -- the water will come over, it'll go out -- and we'll do it all over again," said lifelong Buxton resident Tiffany Bigham, 27.

"You grow up knowing it's a part of life," she said.

Ophelia is the 15th named storm and seventh named hurricane of this year's busy Atlantic season, which ends Nov. 30.

Ophelia Batters The North Carolina Coast (NYT)

By John DeSantis

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

SURF CITY, N.C., Sept. 14 - After stalling at sea for a week, Hurricane Ophelia battered the coast of North Carolina on Wednesday, spawning blinding rains that flooded beach communities and left thousands farther inland without power.

The storm, rated Category 1 by the National Weather Service with sustained winds of 85 miles an hour, is expected to scrape the shoreline from Cape Fear to the Outer Banks through Thursday, where a northeasterly track may take it out to sea.

Officials said that voluntary evacuations went smoothly and that by 3 p.m. Wednesday, 519 people had taken refuge in shelters.

Residents and officials alike said the cataclysmic effects of Hurricane Katrina on New Orleans and the Gulf Coast had made little difference in how they responded to the storm.

"We felt we were as prepared as we could be," said Mayor Spence Broadhurst of Wilmington. "Katrina didn't play any role in the process. We have a very clear plan."

DOJ_NMG_0005604

Still, Mr. Broadhurst added, "I wouldn't be human if the effects of that storm did not have an effect on my thought process."

State officials agreed.

"Unfortunately, we have a history with hurricanes," said Lt. Everett Clendenin, a spokesman for the North Carolina Department of Crime Control and Public Safety. "We have a fairly standard operating process."

But Stephen Barnett, executive director of the American Red Cross's Cape Fear chapter, said he thought Hurricane Katrina had some bearing on the decisions people had made.

"I think just the fact that there were so many individuals who had not adequately prepared in New Orleans, I think they took extra precautions," Mr. Barnett said of residents here. "I think they planned better and took the storm more seriously. People both increased supplies and got out sooner."

The Associated Press reported that President Bush issued an emergency declaration for 37 counties in eastern North Carolina, authorizing the Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Emergency Management Agency to coordinate disaster relief efforts.

By 3 p.m. on Wednesday, 519 people had taken refuge in eight shelters in the coastal counties of Brunswick, New Hanover and Pender.

At least two trees fell on houses in Wilmington, a quaint city sandwiched between the Atlantic Intracoastal Waterway and the Cape Fear River, near North Carolina's southeastern tip. A giant old live oak was seen toppled to its side on Market Street, a major thoroughfare.

Oceanside communities like Topsail Island, Carolina Beach and Wrightsville Beach took hard hits and were expected to experience heavy beach erosion. Carolina Beach reported flooding as high as one foot in some neighborhoods.

Streets were flooded in sections of Surf City, north of Wilmington. Sheets of rain pushed sideways across its small boardwalk area. The white-sand beach could not be seen for the heavy surf.

About 15 miles inland from Topsail Island, where strong winds howled and waves battered the beach, David Paul stood outside the hot dog restaurant that has carried his family's name for three generations, watching a stand of sycamore trees bend on the other side of a deserted highway.

"It was tedious before it ever got here," Mr. Paul said. "We've been watching this storm all week."

At the Sloop Point Volunteer Fire Department station near Surf City, firefighters awaited the storm's arrival Wednesday night, ending a week of mild tension and anticipation as the hurricane stalled and wobbled its way south of the state line.

"It's kind of like a kid at Christmas, just wanting to know what you're going to get," said Assistant Chief Scott Bradshaw. "But once the storm is here that Christmas-like feeling is definitely over. Then you're happy to see it go away."

Officials Rush To Prepare Coastal N.C. For Ophelia (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

FRISCO, N.C., Sept. 14 -- As slow-moving Hurricane Ophelia hugged the North Carolina coast in a torrential embrace Wednesday, federal, state and local officials were taking no chances of a repeat of the sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina.

Here on Hatteras Island, which was expected to bear the worst of the storm, emergency officials stockpiled enough water and military rations to last 3,000 people for three days. The National Guard was standing by with all-terrain vehicles and four-wheel-drive ambulances. The National Forest Service had 10 chain-saw teams ready to remove fallen trees.

Gov. Mike Easley (D) urged residents of low-lying coastal areas to evacuate. "We're asking them and begging them to please do that because it's going to be hard to get them out later," he said. "The storm surge is going to be higher than projected" Tuesday.

But despite a "mandatory" evacuation order -- which state officials acknowledged was not really mandatory at all -- many residents stayed behind on Hatteras and neighboring islands along the Outer Banks. They parked dozens of cars, pickup trucks and a fire engine on the lawn of the Cape Hatteras Baptist Church in Frisco, not because it is the holiest ground in town, but because it is the highest.

They piled sandbags, stowed boats, bought groceries. And while emergency officials took no chances, some locals did.

"Gosh, that was great. Best way to stretch out your back," said Jim Bagwell, 52, after a 10-minute swim in the pounding, six-foot ocean surf at the Frisco Fishing Pier, just hours before the eye of the hurricane was forecast to come through. In last year's Hurricane Alex, the 200-foot pier itself was carried away.

Cars pulled in and out of the parking lot as residents came to gawk at the high waves and exchange gossip. Bagwell's Labrador retriever, Gator, started to run after him into the surf, then thought better of it.

"They're bringing in truckloads of water. It's paranoia from Katrina," said Murray Clark, 77, a retired trawler captain. "All of us locals are sitting and giggling."

The Federal Emergency Management Agency placed emergency operations centers on 24-hour alert and readied 50 rescue aircraft, spokeswoman Nicol Andrews said.

The agency staged three response teams and stockpiled medical supplies in Raleigh, N.C., and held three more in reserve in Virginia and Maryland in case the storm moved north, a FEMA official said. More than 100 medical personnel were in Raleigh.

While North Carolina had stored enough ice to last two days for 10,000 people, federal authorities staged more food, water and ice in Emporia, Va.; Palmetto and Thomasville, Ga.; Columbia, S.C.; Cumberland, Md.; and Edison, N.J.

North Carolina also activated 200 National Guard members and placed 200 more on standby, a FEMA official said.

"It's not paranoia to be prepared -- it's simple prudence," said FEMA's acting Director R. David Paulison.

The hardy, or foolhardy, ways of North Carolina residents inured to hurricanes clearly frustrated state and local officials. They said that on the Outer Banks, unlike the Ninth Ward of New Orleans, the overwhelming majority of residents have vehicles and can leave if they want to.

"The feedback I'm getting is that a large number of vacationers have evacuated," said Dorothy Toolan, spokeswoman for the Department of Emergency Services in Dare County, which includes Hatteras. "When it comes to the locals, everybody just decides what they're personal level of comfort is."

As Ophelia strengthened from a Category 1 to a Category 2 hurricane with sustained winds of 85 mph, it pushed water out of Pamlico Sound into the Neuse and Pamlico rivers, flooding such coastal communities as Engelhard and Washington, N.C.

While high waves crashed into the ocean side of Hatteras, the water level on the bay side was so low that a half-mile of sand was exposed in places that usually are covered, even at low tide. But when the hurricane's 50-mile-wide eye passes through, everybody here knew, all that water would surge back into Pamlico Sound and smash into the island.

"We know there will be flooding. The barrier islands will be getting hammered one way [as the hurricane comes in] and then another way coming out," Easley said.

"We didn't know whether to call for a voluntary evacuation or a mandatory, so we called for a voluntary," Mayor Betty Medlin of Kure Beach, south of Wilmington, told Reuters. "The way it's getting here today, we probably should have had a mandatory."

"It's just sitting there, which makes the wind beat us and be on us longer," Medlin said.

Residents staying put noted, however, that Ophelia was the seventh hurricane and 15th named storm of 2005 alone, and that it did not pack anything like the punch of Katrina, which was a Category 4 hurricane, or Isabel, which began as a Category 5 hurricane and came ashore as a Category 2, walloping the Outer Banks two years ago.

"If it was going to be as bad as Katrina, I would have left," said Cathy Davidson, 44, who was stocking her house in Frisco with macaroni and cheese, propane gas and bottled water.

"More locals have left than I thought would leave. I guess they're gun-shy after Katrina," said Bagwell, toweling off after his swim. "You can't live on an island and not realize that if she wants to, Mother Nature can reach out and really touch you."

Katrina Lays Bare Superfund Woes (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

The receding floodwaters in New Orleans and other parts of the Gulf Coast are exposing hazardous chemicals and other dangerous waste. But they're also revealing the accomplishments - and the limits - of government programs designed to clean up such pollution.

Among the concerns: That natural disasters such as earthquakes and hurricanes haven't been adequately considered in fashioning safe and secure remedies; that areas tainted by toxic waste, such as rivers in the East and old mines in the West, are becoming larger and more complex; that many newly closed military bases will require considerable cleanup before they're ready for private or local government use; and that federal funding is falling behind the need.

The main program here is a bureaucratic mouthful: the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act (CERCLA), commonly known as Superfund.

Passed in the wake of the Love Canal episode in upstate New York 25 years ago, the law created a tax on the chemical and petroleum industries. Operating under the "polluter pays" principle, individually liable companies or property owners could be held financially responsible for cleaning up hazardous waste sites as well. The Environmental Protection Agency created a "National Priorities List" of the most serious uncontrolled or abandoned hazardous waste sites, a list that has grown to about 1,600 nationwide.

Several Superfund sites in the New Orleans area were inundated by hurricane Katrina and the flooding that followed. The most worrisome is the Agriculture Street Landfill, located about halfway between the French Quarter and Lake Pontchartrain. For nearly a century, municipal garbage and industrial wastes accumulated there. It was loaded with lead, arsenic, dioxin and carcinogenic hydrocarbons and later sprayed with the now-banned pesticide DDT. Underground fires gave it the nickname "Dante's Inferno."

The 95-acre site eventually was "remediated" under Superfund - fenced off and covered with a mat barrier and two feet of clean soil. As was the case with Love Canal, local residents continued to complain of health problems.

Today, the EPA and other agencies are investigating whether several feet of rushing floodwaters from the storm and from the collapsed Industrial Canal Levee very close to the former landfill spread the hazardous wastes from that downtown site across a much wider area. Other Superfund sites near New Orleans in Slidell, La., and Madisonville, La., also sustained flooding and there is concern two sites in neighboring Mississippi counties also have water damage.

"The potential for contaminants to rise and migrate through the flood waters to other areas is real," Solid Waste & Recycling magazine reported this week. "It's likely that the multimillion-dollar site restoration conducted a few years ago has been compromised, perhaps even rendered worthless."

Congress and the Bush administration are sure to address hazardous waste cleanup as part of the massive federal response to Katrina.

But they're also faced with renewed scrutiny of the whole Superfund program. The industry tax fund ran out of money when Congress refused to renew it in 1995. Assigning blame among multiple polluters and subsequent property owners has been difficult.

The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, recently warned that companies are using bankruptcies to avoid legal responsibility. The recent round of base closings complicates things as toxic waste sites on military property get transferred to state and local governments. And some of the most challenging hazardous waste problems - the Hudson and Passaic Rivers in the East, the hard-rock mines around Butte, Mont. - are proving to be far more difficult to deal with than landfills and shuttered factories.

"Both of those kinds of sites tend to be physically huge and very challenging," says Katherine Probst of Resources for the Future, a Washington think tank. "Not only are they very expensive, it's not exactly clear what to do."

"They're very expensive, and they're very complex," says Ms. Probst, who is an expert on Superfund and other hazardous waste management programs. "It's not like capping a landfill."

Last year, several members of Congress asked the EPA's inspector general about the adequacy of funding for hazardous waste cleanup under Superfund.

In her 104-page report, EPA inspector general Nikki Tinsley wrote: "In summary, during FY 2003, limited funding prevented EPA from beginning construction at all sites or providing additional funds needed to address sites in a manner believed necessary by regional officials...."

Whether due to increasingly difficult challenges in hazardous waste cleanups or a lack of political will, the number of Superfund cleanups has slowed in recent years. Meanwhile, analyses of EPA's National Priorities List show that 1 in 4

Americans, including some 10 million children, live within four miles of a Superfund site. As has become the case along the Gulf Coast, many of those people live in low-income, largely African-American communities.

In recent years, the budget for Superfund has stayed essentially flat at about $1.5 billion a year. With inflation and new sites needing cleanup, critics say, that means a slight but steady decrease.

"The program is not getting the funding it needs," says Alex Fidis, an attorney specializing in Superfund for the US Public Interest Research Group in Washington. "The problems are still there and if anything are getting worse."

The experience with Katrina tells some observers that dealing with hazardous waste sites may need a different approach - especially in areas vulnerable to forces of nature. "There needs to be a greater emphasis on cleanups that are really cleanups and not just covering it up," says Ed Hopkins, director of environmental quality programs for the Sierra Club in Washington. "But of course that involves money."

E.P.A. Struggles To Determine Extent Of Hazards In Sludge (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer And Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - The magnitude and geographic sweep of the pollution left by Hurricane Katrina is so enormous that the Environmental Protection Agency is struggling to determine what the worst hazards are, where they are and what can be done about them, the agency's administrator said Wednesday.

The difficulties could cast doubt on plans of the New Orleans mayor and other city officials to reopen drier neighborhoods within days.

Late Wednesday, a day after raising the possibility of letting some residents return to their neighborhoods, Mayor C. Ray Nagin urged residents to stay out of the city because the water was undrinkable and remaining floodwaters posed what the health director called "significant health risks."

Dr. Kevin Stephens, director of the New Orleans Health Department, said in a written statement that while officials analyzed the environmental risks, citizens "should stay out of Orleans Parish until the exact nature of the conditions is known." A news release published Wednesday on the city Web site added that "a disease-laden sludge could remain on streets and buildings, which may further compromise public health."

Scientists who have studied other floods say that receding waters leave mud, sometimes contaminated with toxic chemicals, on streets and mold on walls. When dry, each can become airborne.

At a Congressional briefing and at a separate news conference, the E.P.A. administrator, Stephen L. Johnson, described for the first time the wide variety of problems the agency was confronting, including the difficulty of determining the extent and toxicity of the sludge left by the floodwaters. Mr. Johnson said the agency was using aircraft to test for air pollution and taking daily samples of floodwaters and the sludge. The sampling is concentrated in residential areas.

The agency has not completed or released details about specific strategies and the scientific protocols it is using as it tries to analyze the hazards posed by what Mr. Johnson called "the largest national disaster that we at E.P.A., or we believe, that the nation has faced."

Mr. Johnson said early tests did not look for hazardous petrochemical byproducts like benzene because the presence of oil and gasoline was obvious.

In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks in New York, the E.P.A. came under criticism by prominent members of New York's Congressional delegation for declaring the air near ground zero safe based largely on testing for asbestos. Later, the agency's inspector general criticized agency officials as making this declaration without sufficient scientific evidence.

In the past two days, Mayor Nagin and Mr. Johnson offered differing accounts of the federal agency's role in certifying the city's neighborhoods as fit for human occupancy.

Mr. Nagin said Tuesday that he was awaiting an E.P.A. report on air and water quality in four unflooded neighborhoods. On Wednesday, Col. Terry J. Ebbert, the head of homeland security for New Orleans, restated the remark. But public affairs officers at both the environmental agency and the Louisiana State Department of Environmental Quality said they knew of no such report.

Mr. Johnson made it clear that the E.P.A. would not take final responsibility on whether to reopen the city but would collaborate with state and local agencies. A spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security in Washington said, "Ultimately, local officials have the authority to reopen their city."

A Senate staff member who attended Mr. Johnson's meeting with the lawmakers, and would not speak for attribution because she is not authorized to speak publicly, said Mr. Johnson told the members that the level of lead found in the floodwaters was 56 times the amount considered safe in drinking water. He also said the level of bacteria found was 19 times the acceptable level.

Floods' Pollutants Within The Norm (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 14 -- Early tests on the floodwater that covered most of this city do not suggest it will leave a permanent toxic residue or render residential areas uninhabitable for more than a short time, officials of both state and federal environmental agencies said yesterday.

The pollution consists primarily of fecal matter and slightly elevated concentrations of metals such as lead and chromium that were in the city's soil before Hurricane Katrina. There are also trace amounts of many petroleum-based chemicals and some pesticides.

Despite descriptions of the floodwater as a "toxic soup" and a "witch's brew" of contaminants, the preliminary tests reveal it contains little that is different from what has been seen after past floods in other cities and here.

The exception is a residential area in the suburb of Meraux southeast of the city, where 672,000 gallons of oil leaked from a refinery storage tank. Areas around six smaller oil spills may also require special cleanup, the officials said.

"The early results do not indicate specific toxic pollutants at any levels of concern," said Chris M. Piehler, a senior environmental scientist at the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality. Asked if residue from floodwaters posed hazards that would keep residents from moving back, he answered: "No. The limiting factor is going to be what structures are going to be salvageable and which ones are not."

Piehler's observations were similar to those of Jerry Fenner, the leader of the environmental health team sent by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

"So far, all the test results show there shouldn't be any long-term problems of health and habitability," he said, adding that the chemical and oil spills "are a special issue and will require abatement."

The generally optimistic view of the experts here contrasted somewhat with the impression given yesterday by Stephen L. Johnson, administrator of the federal Environmental Protection Agency, at a telephone news conference from Washington. Johnson stressed the uncertainty over toxic hazards that remain in flooded parts of the city.

"What we are focused on is assessing what the problems are. It really is impossible to speculate on what it's going to take and how long it's going to take" to clean up environmental problems, he said.

The EPA is taking daily samples of floodwater both in the city and in the outfalls to Lake Pontchartrain. It is also sampling air and wet and dry mud at dozens of locations. Tests from Sept. 3, 4 and 6 showed levels of hexavalent chromium, lead and arsenic exceeding agency standards for drinking water.

"These compounds would pose a risk to children only if a child were to drink a liter of flood water a day. Long-term exposure [a year or longer] to arsenic would be required before health effects would be a concern," said a statement on the EPA Web site.

The city's drinking water comes from the Mississippi River and not from Lake Pontchartrain, where the floodwater is being pumped.

The most obvious pollutant in the floodwater is fecal bacteria. The city's sewage-treatment plant is not operating, and the standing water is mingling with the sewage in the underground system. Tests from Sept. 3 to 5 found that some sites had bacteria levels above the EPA's measurement scale. From Sept. 7 to Sept. 10, however, the amount of bacteria was falling.

Fecal bacteria have a limited life span in the open water and will not cause lasting contamination. On land, the bacteria dies once the residue dries out.

"The stuff will desiccate and you can clean it up. You fertilize your lawn? It's the same thing," Fenner said.

While the environmental findings so far have not been surprising, many potentially hazardous areas remain to be assessed. They include five Superfund sites in New Orleans. EPA inspectors have visited four, but one remains underwater. "One of the things we need to do is make sure that these sites have not been compromised," Johnson said.

The agency and local officials are also evaluating numerable small spills and hazards, including more than 5,000 "orphan containers" found floating in the water. These include everything from gas cylinders to a drum containing medical waste, he said.

A U.S. Coast Guard spokeswoman said there have been seven oil spills of more than 100,000 gallons since the storm. The biggest is at the Meraux Refinery, operated by Murphy Oil Corp. in St. Bernard Parish, southeast of the city.

During a sampling trip there two days ago, the EPA's Paul Doherty said the company estimated that about 9,600 of the 16,000 barrels of oil that leaked were recoverable and most of the rest had evaporated.

In a housing development nearby, workers in yellow safety suits scooped up samples of fine-grained mud that smelled partly of sulfurous decay and partly of petroleum.

The houses were severely damaged. At several, the flood floated cars that came to rest with their rear ends on the roof and the front ends on the lawn. Even without the spill, the neighborhood seemed unlikely to be habitable anytime soon.

Exposed To A Flood Of Filth, Homes Must Be Bulldozed (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, September 15, 2005

BATON ROUGE — The putrid floodwaters left by Hurricane Katrina are so bad that Louisiana's top environmental official warned Wednesday that many houses will have to be bulldozed because of contamination.

"It's going to be a while before areas that were flooded will see people moving back," said Mike McDaniel, secretary of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality. He said residents of those areas will be allowed to return to their homes briefly to retrieve personal items but will be told about the health risks and given protective gear.

McDaniel said many houses in flooded parts of the New Orleans area "will have to be disposed of."

The Environmental Protection Agency also released new test results that show the floodwaters around New Orleans contain levels of toxic chemicals and bacteria that exceed federal standards for drinking water.

The water contains high levels of arsenic and hexavalent chromium, a chemical in paints and dyes that can cause lung cancer when inhaled. The agency said the chromium and arsenic would pose a "risk to children only if a child were to drink a liter of floodwater a day." The EPA also detected high levels of lead and bacteria in the waters.

"This is the largest natural disaster that we at the EPA … have faced," EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson said.

The agency warned the public and emergency responders to avoid direct contact with standing water and to wash carefully with soap and water if they are exposed. Other tests have found some pollutants in the air, but not enough to raise health concerns.

Louisiana's McDaniel said he remains concerned about "large quantities of hazardous materials" at industrial facilities, such as rail cars containing toxic materials. "We haven't been into some of the industrial areas … where we might find hot spots," he said.

McDaniel also said the potential for seafood contamination in the waters off Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama is a "major concern." A National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration ship started taking samples of water, fish, shrimp and sediment to check for contaminants and pathogens.

EPA teams have done preliminary inspections at four hazardous waste sites in the area on the federal Superfund list of the nation's most serious pollution spots. No thorough testing has been done yet to determine whether contaminants escaped. A fifth Superfund site in New Orleans is still underwater.

The range of toxic chemicals that may have been released is extensive, said Lynn Goldman, an environmental health sciences professor at Johns Hopkins University. "We're talking about metals, persistent chemicals, solvents, materials that have numerous potential health impacts over the long term," said Goldman, an assistant EPA administrator in the Clinton administration.

Other environmental specialists warn of a potential crisis.

"We are dealing with an area that has been dubbed by many 'chemical alley' or 'cancer alley,' " said Sylvia Lowrance, who was the EPA's chief of enforcement for 24 years until 2003. Cleaning up from dozens of industrial facilities and hundreds of thousands of homes, autos and businesses will probably be "the most daunting" environmental restoration project ever, Lowrance said.

Thomas Dunne, EPA's acting assistant administrator for solid waste and emergency response, said it's too early to know how much hazardous material has been released. "This is going to evolve over weeks," he said.

Erik Olson of the Natural Resources Defense Council said: "We worry that most of the city of New Orleans could end up being a toxic waste site. There isn't a concerted effort to contain pollution at some of these industrial waste sites, and the monitoring … seems far too limited."

Retail Sales Declined 2.1% In August (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Consumer spending showed some signs of cooling during the weeks leading up to Hurricane Katrina, and the storm could further damp consumption in the weeks ahead if gasoline prices don't retreat. In addition, Katrina affected industrial production in August.

Retail sales in August fell 2.1% from the month before to $350 billion on a seasonally adjusted basis, following a 1.8% increase in July. It was the largest monthly sales decline since demand tumbled 2.9% in November 2001. Much of the volatility related to the automobile sector, which saw sales rocket in July, boosted by Big Three discounting, but then slump in August.

The Commerce Department said it couldn't quantify the effect of Katrina on retail sales for the month. However, it noted that the region struck by the hurricane accounts for a little more than 1% of total sales nationally.

Excluding autos, all other retail sales climbed 1% in August. About half of that increase was from surging gasoline prices, which drove up receipts at gasoline stations. Excluding gasoline and autos -- which some economists said gave a clearer read of underlying spending patterns -- sales rose 0.5% for the month. They were 7% higher than year-earlier levels, roughly in line with the pace established for much of the year.

The gains outside the topsy-turvy auto and gasoline sectors suggested that consumer spending had "good momentum" ahead of the hurricane, said Jim O'Sullivan, U.S. economist at UBS AG. However, he and other economists said sales could take a hit in September with high gasoline prices further crimping household purchasing power.

"It's quite possible that these are the first signs that higher energy prices are [reducing] discretionary consumer spending," said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at MFR Inc. Consumer spending last month was flat at restaurants, bars and clothing stores. Sales climbed at furniture stores, building-material and garden stores and health and personal-care stores.

Another government report showed that Hurricane Katrina slowed industrial output last month. Industrial production edged up a weaker-than-expected 0.1% in August, according to the Federal Reserve, which estimated that Katrina reduced output by 0.3 percentage point.

"Hurricane Katrina severely curtailed output in the Gulf Coast region at the end of August," the Fed said. "Hurricane-related production declines were most evident in oil and gas extraction, industrial chemicals manufacturing, and petroleum refining."

Manufacturing output increased 0.3% in August, which economists described as a mixed performance. Much of the gain was tied to cars. Excluding motor vehicles and parts, manufacturing output was unchanged from July, the Fed reported. In September, hurricane-related disruptions are expected to slow manufacturing output, but activity should "snap back" in subsequent months, said Mr. O'Sullivan of UBS.

Industrial-capacity utilization was unchanged at 79.8%. Throughout the summer, capacity utilization has remained at its highest level since December 2000, but the Fed noted that it is still 1.2 percentage points below its 1972-2004 average.

Another report suggested the housing sector is holding up in the wake of the hurricane. The Mortgage Bankers Association said its index that tracks mortgage applications for the purchase of homes rose 2.9% to 513.4 -- the highest level of activity since the week ended July 1, when it hit 520.8. Applications for refinancing declined.

Gasoline Demand Fell In Last Weeks Of Driving Season (WSJ)

By Thaddeus Herrick

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Americans used considerably less gasoline in the final weeks of the summer driving season than a year earlier as Hurricane Katrina limited fuel supplies and distribution and drove up prices.

Data released by the U.S. Department of Energy's Energy Information Administration could indicate that U.S. drivers are responding to soaring gasoline prices by conserving fuel, though the supply disruptions and gasoline lines that followed could also be a factor. In a report issued this week, Credit Suisse First Boston said recent drops in gasoline demand are part of a longer-term decline that will play out over the next several years as the high cost of energy eats into disposable income.

Gasoline demand for the week ended Sept. 9, which includes the Labor Day weekend, dropped 4.3% to 8.64 million barrels a day from 9.03 million barrels the previous week, the Energy Information Administration said. For the four weeks ended Sept. 9, gasoline demand averaged 9.1 million barrels a day, a decline of 1.1% from the same period last year.

The decline comes just two weeks after Katrina brought the country to the brink of an energy crisis. Next week, the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries meets in Vienna to consider increasing oil output by 500,000 barrels a day. But among OPEC members, only Saudi Arabia has significant spare production capacity and many U.S. refineries can't process its heavy, high-sulfur crude.

Yesterday, benchmark light, sweet crude-oil futures for October settled up 3.1%, or $1.98, at $65.09 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange as U.S. crude supplies fell more than expected last week on damage to oil production by Hurricane Katrina. For the week ended Sept. 9, commercial crude-oil stockpiles fell 6.6 million barrels to 308.4 million barrels.

In Washington, 16 members of the House of Representatives introduced legislation aimed at increasing fuel-economy standards for vehicles sold in the U.S. Similar proposals haven't fared well in the past. Meanwhile, Senate Democrats say they want to discuss giving the president and the Federal Trade Commission additional authority to investigate what they say is gasoline-price gouging.

Katrina pounded the Gulf Coast, wreaking havoc on production platforms, pipelines and refineries and sending the price of gasoline past $3 a gallon for a while. The average U.S. price of a gallon of regular unleaded now stands at about $2.96, according to the Energy Information Administration, down 11.4 cents from last week but about $1.11 above prices a year ago.

"Consumers should not expect prices to decline quickly, since the disruption to supply is still occurring," the agency said, though the administration said increased imports should help ease the cost of fuel.

Yesterday, the Minerals Management Service said 56% of crude production from the Gulf of Mexico, home to a quarter of U.S. oil and natural-gas output, is still shut down, as is 35% of natural-gas production. About 5% of the nation's refining capacity remains shut down and could remain so for months.

Separately, the Department of Energy said it sold 11 million barrels of oil to energy companies out of the nation's emergency stockpile, known as the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. The figures indicate that many refiners feel adequately supplied with crude, since the government had originally offered as much as 30 million barrels.

Demand For Gasoline Falls For A 2nd Week (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Demand for gasoline fell nationwide for a second consecutive week, the government reported yesterday, indicating that record retail prices may have forced some consumers to cut back on their driving over the week of Labor Day.

The weaker demand may also be explained by disruptions in the nation's energy supply system, which is still recovering from Hurricane Katrina.

Americans used an estimated 8.63 million barrels of gasoline a day in the week that ended Sept. 9, down 4.3 percent from the week before and 6.5 percent less than the comparable week in 2004, according to the Energy Information Administration. Demand fell 4 percent for the week that ended Sept. 2.

But those estimates do not measure every drop of fuel that drivers put in their tanks, because the agency can track gasoline only until it is delivered to large regional terminals, where it is then trucked to wholesalers and retailers, said Larry Alverson, an analyst at the agency.

When fuel is flowing through the system normally, the agency's figures are fairly good at measuring final demand because wholesalers and retailers usually buy enough fuel to meet consumer demand. But in tight times, when they cannot get enough gasoline from the terminals, wholesalers and retailers will draw down their inventories to fill demand. That consumption is not counted in the agency's data.

So, are consumers cutting back or not?

"Some people are saying these high prices haven't affected demand much, and others say of course it has," Mr. Alverson said. "You take your pick."

There is some anecdotal evidence that fewer consumers drove over the Labor Day holiday and that more people are taking mass transit when possible, but there is little hard data.

"The unofficial surveys and conversations we have had with people who deliver gasoline to stations and who sell that gasoline to consumers say that their sales are off 10 percent in the last 10 days," said Ben Brockwell, director of pricing and data services at the Oil Price Information Service.

Retail gasoline prices topped $3 a gallon on Labor Day weekend after the hurricane shut down much of the Gulf Coast's oil production, refineries and pipelines. More than 5 percent of American refining capacity is still out of service.

The Energy Department said yesterday that it was selling 11 million barrels of oil from the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve to BP, Astra Oil and Marathon. The government had said it would sell up to 30 million barrels of oil, which is refined into gasoline and other fuels.

Nationally, a gallon of regular unleaded gasoline sold for an average of $2.935 this morning, according to a survey Mr. Brockwell's firm runs for AAA, the auto club. That is down from $2.956 the day before and up from $2.44 a month ago.

Demand may have started falling even before the hurricane hit. The American Petroleum Institute said yesterday that gasoline demand fell 0.4 percent as prices rose 32 percent in August from the same month a year ago. So far this year, Americans' average daily gasoline consumption of 9.13 million barrels a day is about 0.3 percent higher than a year ago, according to the E.I.A.

On the futures market, gasoline for October delivery rose 4.57 cents yesterday, to $1.937 a gallon, on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Crude oil gained $1.98, to $65.09 a barrel.

Gasoline inventories rose by 1 percent, to 192 million barrels, last week. The week after the hurricane, inventories fell 2 percent, to 190.1 million barrels, the Energy Information Administration reported.

Numbers Show Economic Lag Before Storm (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 (AP) - Hurricane Katrina is eating into the economy, leading to concern that consumers will lose confidence and curtail spending.

The government reported Wednesday that retail sales fell 2.1 percent in August, even before the storm hit, as high gasoline prices jolted consumers.

Also, industrial output was nearly flat, reflecting widespread shutdowns of oil platforms, refineries and chemical plants along the battered Gulf Coast.

Analysts said they still believed that Katrina would amount to only a temporary blow to the economy and that strong growth would follow as rebuilding begins.

The decline in retail sales was twice the size economists had forecast.

DOJ_NMG_0005613

The weakness came from a 12 percent drop in auto sales. Demand slackened after two strong months when American automakers allowed consumers to buy at the discount prices given to the automakers' employees.

Excluding autos, retail sales rose by 1 percent, with half of that coming from a huge rise in gasoline prices. Analysts said the retail sales data was evidence that gasoline above $3 a gallon was having an impact on consumer demand in other areas like clothing.

Sales at department stores rose a sluggish 0.3 percent. Demand at clothing stores was flat in August after a 0.9 percent decline in July.

The biggest increase in spending in August occurred at service stations. The 4.4 percent increase reflected pump prices that have soared past $3 a gallon in many places.

Without the jump in spending at gas stations, retail sales would have fallen by 2.8 percent last month as demand faltered in many sectors, the government estimated.

Ian Shepherdson, chief economist at High Frequency Economics, a consulting firm in Valhalla, N.Y., said he did not expect a quick rebound in retail sales. Mr. Shepherdson said he believed high energy costs would continue to depress consumer spending for several more months.

Industrial output posted a 0.1 percent gain in August. It would have been 0.4 percent, the Federal Reserve reported, if not for the shutdown of much energy and chemical production along the Gulf Coast at the end of August.

Economists predicted the hurricane fallout would continue as the energy industry struggles to regain its footing.

"The industrial production numbers in the next two months will look pretty awful as the full impact of the hurricane-related shutdowns shows up in the data," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, a Lexington, Mass., consulting firm.

Stock Losses Accelerate (WSJ)

By David Gaffen

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Major stock indexes wilted Wednesday as crude oil jumped nearly $2 a barrel and traders fretted over tepid economic reports. A profit warning from Walt Disney sank the Dow industrials in the last hour of trading.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 52.54 points to 10544.90, hurt by Disney's 2.8% drop, which led decliners on the average. The Nasdaq Composite Index fell 22.42 points, or 1.03%, to 2149.33, just off the day's low. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 4.15 to 1226.51.

In the final hour of trading, Disney reported that it expected a $250 million to $300 million quarterly loss in its film division, and warned that it may write down a $101 million investment in Delta Air Lines airplane leases. Delta filed for bankruptcy-court protection1 after the market closed.

A combination of concerns about slowing economic growth and rising inflation are seeping into the market, market participants said. Retail sales fell 2.1% in August, the Commerce Department reported Wednesday, though much of that decline was due to a 12% stumble in auto and auto-parts sales. Investors remain worried about high energy costs and climbing labor costs, which the Labor Department said last week are rising 4.2% on a year-over-year basis.

The concerns about inflation were evident in other markets. Gold closed up $3.70 a troy ounce to $449.80 on the Comex division of the New York Mercantile Exchange, its highest close since Dec. 7, 2004. Prices of long-dated Treasurys finished sharply lower, pushing the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury to 4.16% and the 30-year Treasury yield to 4.45%.

Joachim Fels, economist at Morgan Stanley, wrote in a note that "recent economic data, combined with the rise in energy prices this summer and the likely policy reactions in Washington to Hurricane Katrina," affirmed his view that the "global macro environment will turn stagflationary soon." If that does happen, energy prices will be partially to blame, Mr. Fels said.

Wednesday, oil prices broke a streak of three down sessions on the Nymex. Light, sweet crude scheduled for October delivery settled up $1.98 at $65.09 a barrel. Gasoline futures for the same month settled at $1.9374 a gallon, up 4.5 cents, or 2.4%. In the past 12 months, gasoline futures have soared 59.6%.

The jump in petroleum futures came after the Energy Department reported gasoline inventories last week rose 1.9 million gallons, while crude-oil stocks fell by a steeper-than-expected 6.6 million barrels. Forecasters expected a drop of 2.8 million gallons of gasoline and only a mild decline in crude inventories.

The reaction among energy traders to the drawdown in crude-oil inventories could partially reflect the expectation that demand for oil products of all types will rebound in due course. Phil Flynn, senior energy market analyst at Alaron Trading in Chicago, said the drawdown, as well as recent news of various facilities coming back, has energy traders in a bullish mood. "The market is speculating that demand is going to bounce back, and that we've seen the worst," he said.

The cloud of economic concerns, poor retail sales and rising energy prices polluted the equity market, where the Dow industrials stayed in positive territory through part of the afternoon even as overall market breadth was worsening. Decliners outpaced advancers more than two-to-one on the Nasdaq Stock Market and by a ratio of 5-to-3 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Ultimately, the Dow average slipped into the red as investors gave back part of the post-Katrina rally that sustained the market for two weeks. Between Aug. 30 and the beginning of this week, the S&P 500 had risen 3.3%, while the Dow industrials gained a surprising 2.6%.

Wednesday's malaise meant the market mostly glossed over the strong earnings report out of Lehman Brothers Holdings, which kicked off earnings season by reporting a 74% jump in third-quarter net9, handily surpassing Wall Street's forecasts. The stock rose 0.4%, giving up most of its gains in the late part of the session. The report, however, bodes well for forthcoming financial-services earnings releases, including Bear Stearns tomorrow, and Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley next week.

Baidu.com, the Chinese Internet-search portal, tumbled 28% after Piper Jaffray and Goldman Sachs initiated coverage with "underperform" ratings, saying the stock price's rich valuation was unsustainable.

In major market action:

Stocks declined10. On the Big Board, where 1.49 billion shares traded, 1,211 stocks rose and 2,083 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.71 billion shares traded, 984 stocks advanced and 2,017 declined.

Bonds fell11. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 8/32, or $2.50 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.162%. The 30-year bond was down 18/32 to yield 4.450%. Yields move inversely to prices.

Georgia Chief Justice Attempts To Cut Red Tape For Evacuee Lawyers (LAW)

By Meredith Hobbs, Fulton County Daily Report

Law.com, September 15, 2005

Georgia's top judge is trying to make things easier for hurricane-displaced lawyers who want to start a practice in Georgia.

Chief Justice Leah Ward Sears of the Georgia Supreme Court has asked her counterparts in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to change their rules so that lawyers from those states could get a State Bar of Georgia license in as little as eight weeks.

Right now, those lawyers can practice in Georgia temporarily but must pass the state's bar exam to set up shop permanently -- a process that would take at least nine months. The next bar exam is not offered until February, and results do not arrive until late May.

The problem is that Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama do not allow reciprocity with other states. For states that do, lawyers licensed in one state can join another state's bar without having to take its bar exam.

Currently 33 states, including Georgia, allow this kind of reciprocity, said Hulett H. "Bucky" Askew, the director of the Georgia Office of Bar Admissions.

If the top judges in those states agree, then lawyers from the Gulf Coast states would need only to pass a certification of fitness to practice in Georgia, a process that ordinarily takes eight to 12 weeks, said Askew, who added that his office would try to speed things up for displaced lawyers.

Askew said his office has received a lot of phone calls from Louisiana lawyers looking for reciprocity, "but as soon as they hear we're not reciprocal, they hang up."

"The problem that these lawyers will have is their lack of access to documentation," he said. Out-of-state lawyers must provide educational transcripts, employment histories and other information to be licensed by the Georgia Bar.

"I had two lawyers from New Orleans who walked in here who had lost everything. They had no client files and no documentation," Askew said. "Assume you went to Tulane Law School and practiced in New Orleans for 15 years. You would have no access to [bar] disciplinary records or transcripts, so we're going to have some issues around them being able to document what they need to document."

Luckily for lawyers hit by Katrina, Texas accepts lawyers in good standing from any other state, under a rule called comity.

But Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama lawyers wishing to set up practices in other states face serious obstacles, since the three Gulf Coast states are not reciprocity states.

Georgia has allowed reciprocity for lawyers from other states since 2003. Under the rule, lawyers who meet certain conditions can get a Georgia Bar license without taking the state's bar exam.

Gulf Coast lawyers are already able to practice in Georgia on a temporary basis, thanks to a multi-jurisdictional practice rule passed by the state's Supreme Court in 2004.

The rule's intent is to allow out-of-state lawyers to work on existing client matters from a Georgia office, said Clifton A. Brashier, director of the State Bar.

"Our rules accommodate a temporary situation in which a lawyer licensed in another state is in Georgia on a client matter relating back to the home state," he said.

That means a Louisiana lawyer could run a Louisiana practice from Georgia temporarily, without running afoul of Georgia's unauthorized-practice-of-law statute, he said. But lawyers wishing to find a job with a Georgia firm would need to join the State Bar.

Although the multi-jurisdictional practice rule allows only for temporary practice in Georgia, it specifies no time limit, Brashier said. Rather, it depends on the circumstances in each case. "If one's office in New Orleans is underwater," he said, "that would be a pretty understandable circumstance."

Askew, the bar admissions chief, was not sure when the supreme courts of the three Gulf Coast states will reply to the Sears' request, or whether they will change their rules to allow for reciprocity.

Just getting the letter to the hard-hit courts was a challenge, he said. "We faxed, e-mailed and Fed-Exed this letter today, not knowing how in the world their system would cope." He said the Alabama court has received the letter, but he has not yet heard from those in Louisiana and Mississippi.

"How high a priority [the rule change] will be for them, I don't know. They've got huge problems there," he said.

Senate Bill Rejects Bush Cuts For Many Commerce Programs (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- With a year-end budget battle looming, the Senate pushed toward passage today of a $52 billion spending bill that rejects many of President Bush's cuts from industrial technology and science programs within the Commerce Department.

The measure, at the same time, is a magnet for Katrina-relief amendments, and Senate leaders last night accepted a $3.5 billion proposal authorizing emergency housing vouchers for hundreds of thousands of families displaced by the storm. But a second amendment to extend Medicaid coverage to evacuees was withdrawn after the Senate Finance Committee unveiled a bipartisan $5 billion to $7 billion plan to expedite unemployment and health-care coverage for families.

As the costs of the storm grow, the Commerce Department budget bill is also a reminder of the differences that have already surfaced between Republicans and President Bush this summer over domestic spending for the coming year.

Funding for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration would grow to almost $4.48 billion, a $550 million increase above current spending, and $894 million more than Mr. Bush's request for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. The National Institute of Standards and Technology, a second unit within Commerce, is promised $844.5 million, nearly 60% more than the White House's request, and including $140 million for the Advanced Technology Program, which provides "seed financing" for the development of generic technologies.

The White House has strongly objected to the Senate funding the ATP. But Republicans remain badly split, and an amendment backing Mr. Bush was easily tabled, 68-29.

To date, the House and Senate have sidestepped confrontation with the president by quietly borrowing from defense and foreign-aid accounts to fill gaps in Mr. Bush's domestic budget. But as the Oct. 1 deadline approaches, some reckoning will soon be required.

By the administration's calculations, the $52 billion Senate bill, which would fund the Justice Department and science agencies, as well as Commerce, is about $1.4 billion more than the president's requests. That appears at least $679 million higher than the House spending levels for the same accounts, and as a rule senators have been more aggressive in adding money to the president's budget for energy and water programs, education and medical research.

With only two of the annual spending bills completed, there is an estimated $7 billion gap between the House and Senate over the remaining measures. Republican lawmakers must reconcile these differences and then try to reach some agreement with the president.

With the new fiscal year less than three weeks away, some stopgap measure will be needed again to keep agencies funded for the first few months. The House Appropriations Committee leadership is considering a very restrictive funding formula to give itself more leverage in talks with the Senate. But this strategy could backfire if it leaves agencies such as the Army Corps of Engineers at a disadvantage, just when they are trying to cope with Katrina relief.

The Senate Finance panel's hurricane-relief bill was negotiated by Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) and Montana Sen. Max Baucus, the panel's ranking Democrat, who are both pressing for quick action this week.

Washington would relieve Louisiana, Mississippi and disaster-struck Alabama counties of the state share of Medicaid costs through Dec. 31, 2006. And to help families who have relocated outside their home states, the bill creates a five-month Disaster Relief Medicaid program for Katrina survivors below the poverty level and as much as 200% of the poverty level for pregnant women and children.

Relief is also promised for elderly Medicare patients, who would not be required to pay copayments and deductibles to receive hospital services, if they were displaced by the storm. And any individual in Alabama, Louisiana or Mississippi whose unemployment benefits expire would get a 13-week extension.

4th Union Quits A.F.L.-C.I.O. In A Dispute Over Organizing (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Deepening the split in organized labor, Unite Here, a union that represents apparel, hotel, casino and restaurant workers, announced yesterday that it was quitting the A.F.L.-C.I.O., becoming the fourth union to do so this summer.

Bruce Raynor, president of Unite Here, said his union's board had voted unanimously to quit because the A.F.L.-C.I.O. had not done enough to spur union organizing to reverse the decline of the labor movement.

"We believe that American workers are facing a historical crisis," Mr. Raynor said in a telephone news conference from St. Paul, where his union's board was meeting. "There are 28 million Americans that went to work this morning who made less than the poverty level."

This summer, three other major unions quit the labor federation: the Service Employees International Union, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and the United Food and Commercial Workers. The four departing unions represented about 4.5 million workers out of the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s membership of 13 million.

The leaders of Unite Here, which represents 450,000 workers, said the dissident unions would focus on large-scale organizing drives to try to unionize thousands of workers at the same time.

Immigrants will be a particular focus, they said, because the breakaway unions cover industries with millions of immigrant workers, like restaurants, nursing homes, supermarkets, hotels and janitorial companies.

On Sept. 27, the four breakaway unions will hold a founding convention in St. Louis to create a union federation, tentatively called the Change to Win Coalition. The dissident leaders say the new group will be more aggressive about organizing workers than the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s unions.

Two unions still in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. - the laborers' union and the United Farm Workers - say they will join the new group. The carpenters' union, which quit the main labor federation in 2001, also plans to join.

"We believe it's our responsibility to do everything we can to work with all interested unions to grow the labor movement," said John W. Wilhelm, president of the hospitality division of Unite Here. "The labor movement is the only institution in 21st-century America that can reverse the decline in living standards for most Americans."

Unite Here is an amalgam of several famous unions. Unite was formed in 1995 when the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers merged with the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union. Unite Here was formed last year when Unite merged with the Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union.

The A.F.L.-C.I.O. criticized yesterday's move.

"Unite Here's leadership made the wrong decision for their members and for America's working people because now more than ever, working people need to be united," said Lane Windham, a spokeswoman for the federation. "Everybody supports organizing, everybody supports politics, and we're stronger when we're united."

Unite Here contributes $4 million a year to the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s $120 million budget. Together, the departing unions contributed about $30 million a year.

Officials of Unite Here say their union emerged largely victorious in recent hotel strikes in Los Angeles and Washington, and in a casino strike in Atlantic City.

Delta, Northwest File Chapter 11 (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams And Dan Reed

USA Today, September 15, 2005

In a historic move, Delta and Northwest airlines — saddled by high jet-fuel and labor costs and huge debts — filed for bankruptcy protection Wednesday.

The twin filings in U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York put four of the seven largest U.S. airlines — Delta, Northwest, United and US Airways — in Chapter 11 at once, an unprecedented level of misery for the industry.

About 51% of the flying capacity of the USA's top 12 airlines is now operating under bankruptcy protection. Both carriers will continue flying in reorganization and plan no immediate changes to their schedules, cities served, fares or frequent-flier plans. But their operations will shrink. While further job losses are expected, neither would predict the number who will be laid off.

Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein said in an interview that “everyone at Delta is going to have to make sacrifices.” He said none of Delta's senior officers will receive performance bonuses or retention bonuses in 2005. He also said pay cuts for the workforce will be announced in coming weeks. Delta has asked its pilots union for a new round of contract concessions.

Northwest CEO Doug Steenland said the airline “must significantly lower its costs to compete” with both fast-growing, low-cost carriers and its traditional rivals that have used Chapter 11 to reduce their costs. Northwest's recent efforts to restructure its costs were thwarted by soaring jet-fuel costs after Hurricane Katrina crippled gulf oil production. The airline's jet-fuel bill this year will be about $3.3 billion, he said, up from $2.2 billion last year and $1.6 billion in 2003.

Delta has $2.05 billion in bankruptcy financing: a $1.7 billion debtor-in-possession loan arranged by GE Commercial Finance and Morgan Stanley, and a $350 million loan from American Express. Only $1.4 billion of the $1.7 billion loan will be immediately available. Northwest has debts totaling more than $8 billion and pension plans that are underfunded by $3.8 billion. About 4,500 mechanics and related workers are in their fourth week of a strike against the airline. Steenland said the Chapter 11 filing was not triggered by the strike.

Northwest said it has $1.5 billion in cash, down from $2.1 billion on June 30. But Steenland said its ability to take on more debt in Chapter 11 is minimal because nearly all of its assets are pledged as collateral on existing loans.

Bankruptcy For 2: Storm Broke The Camel's Back (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Late last month, Northwest's chief executive, Douglas M. Steenland, still thought his airline had a chance to avoid seeking bankruptcy protection.

No matter that the mechanics' union was on strike, the price of jet fuel had risen by 50 percent, and, yes, low-fare airlines were brutal competitors. But then Hurricane Katrina struck, wiping out not only homes, lives and businesses on the Gulf Coast, but Northwest's chances of staying solvent.

Yesterday, Northwest, the nation's fifth-largest airline, filed for bankruptcy protection, and Delta Air Lines, the country's third-largest carrier, took the step at the same time - though that was not planned, their chief executives said. A result is that now, half the seats on flights in the United States are offered by airlines operating under court protection.

Delta's bankruptcy filing, in United States Bankruptcy Court in New York, where Northwest also filed, was long expected.

Northwest's was not. And the story of Northwest's decision to file shows how a highly attentive financial community can miss an important sign: in this case, the effects of a sudden jump in the cost of jet fuel in finally pushing an airline over the edge.

Word that Northwest was considering Chapter 11 bankruptcy shocked Wall Street on Tuesday, sending the company's shares plummeting by over 50 percent. But skepticism remained that it would actually follow through. Unlike Delta, which had begun talking to bankers and financiers weeks ago to arrange bankruptcy financing, Northwest had left no telltale footprints in the corridors of the financial community.

As late as yesterday morning, veteran industry analysts like Jaime Baker of J. P. Morgan were saying that the airline still had time to wrest $1.4 billion in wage and benefit cuts from its unions, which Northwest had said could forestall bankruptcy, especially if coupled with pension changes under consideration by Congress.

Many experts thought the airline would wait until closer to Oct. 17, when changes in federal bankruptcy law take effect and limit the amount of time in which management may draft restructuring plans.

What they missed was the impact of Katrina, Mr. Steenland said yesterday. After the storm hit the Gulf Coast, shutting down refineries and causing a spike in the price of jet fuel, Mr. Steenland said his airline was faced with the equivalent of paying $100 a barrel for oil, including the cost of refining it into jet fuel.

That outlay - more than double what the airline paid for oil a year ago - had a "staggering impact" on the airline, and made a bankruptcy filing inevitable, Mr. Steenland said.

Still, all the members of Northwest's board, which includes three representatives from its labor unions, were not yet convinced. So Mr. Steenland and his team of executives, lawyers and restructuring experts, whose backgrounds included experience with bankruptcies at US Airways, Continental and Eastern Airlines, laid the numbers out in precise detail.

"We are a very analytical and empirical decision-making company here," he said yesterday, during a conference call with reporters.

Northwest faced a fuel bill of $3.3 billion this year, $1.1 billion more than it spent in 2004, even though it had plans to cut back some flights, like its service between New York and Tokyo. The airline also had a $65 million pension payment due today that it could not miss unless it was under bankruptcy protection. Other "sizable" payments also lay ahead, Mr. Steenland said.

If it did not file for bankruptcy protection, Northwest risked heavy losses, on top of the $3.6 billion it has lost since 2001 and the $300 million to $400 million it expects to lose this quarter.

And Northwest's $1.5 billion in cash could evaporate, money it would need as bankruptcy financing.

Faced with that, the board members, including the labor representatives, recognized the peril and voted unanimously to seek court protection, Mr. Steenland said.

If the bankruptcy filing shocked Wall Street, it should not have, Mr. Steenland said. Over the last few weeks, the airline had grimly laid out that likelihood in a series of regulatory filings, the most recent on Tuesday, when the airline said it had skipped $23 million in debt payments.

And Mr. Steenland, in interviews as recently as Monday, repeatedly emphasized that the airline's chance to restructure was fast disappearing.

"Northwest ran out of time," Philip A. Baggaley, an airline industry analyst with Standard & Poor's Ratings Services, said yesterday. Bankruptcy "was unavoidable, and it was the wisest course," he added.

Yesterday, Mr. Steenland pointed out another issue: heated competition from low-fare carriers, whose growing presence has made it difficult for major airlines to raise fares enough to cover their costs.

With the surging price of oil, Mr. Steenland said, Northwest raised fares 40 times, usually by $5 to $10 on selected routes. But those increases resulted in only a 3 percent to 5 percent gain in revenue, well short of what the airline needed to cover the price of fuel.

Gerald Grinstein, the chief executive at Delta, agreed with his Northwest counterpart yesterday. Mr. Grinstein said Delta was already contemplating bankruptcy because of the rise in energy costs that occurred even before the storm.

"If it needed emphasis, underline and exclamation point, Katrina did that," Mr. Grinstein said.

Delta executives declined to say how long the airline would remain under bankruptcy protection, but it could take years if the nearly three-year bankruptcy at United is any guide.

Problems are also looming with its pension plan. If Delta's pension plan defaults, it would set a record, surpassing even the size of United's pension plan collapse earlier this year, according to estimates issued yesterday by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation.

Already, the agency's finances have been severely shaken by a series of large corporate bankruptcies and pension failures.

The guarantor estimated that Delta's pension plan had promised benefits worth $17.5 billion, but had assets of only $6.9 billion, for a $10.6 billion shortfall. The most recent estimate of United's shortfall, by contrast, was $10.1 billion.

James C. Whitehurst, Delta's chief operating officer, said yesterday that the airline had gotten a jump on its restructuring with a transformation plan introduced last year, under which Delta is striving to cut $5 billion in costs and 7,000 jobs by next year.

"We want to get through this as fast as possible but deliberately enough to build a plan to allow us to survive and thrive," Mr. Whitehurst said.

Indeed, Mr. Grinstein, who had urgently tried to keep his airline from a court filing, expressed optimism that Delta, which has lost nearly $10 billion since 2001, can become a successful player again.

"Delta's financial problems are severe, but not insurmountable," Mr. Grinstein said yesterday.

The chief executive of the industry's most successful carrier, Southwest, said yesterday that there was more involved in operating profitably than cutting jobs, pay and benefits.

Southwest's chief, Gary C. Kelly, said airlines could not grow and become profitable by making workers pay the price.

"If you don't treat your people right, you pay the price," said Mr. Kelly, whose unionized airline pays some of the highest wages in the industry, even though its overall costs are among the lowest.

Mr. Kelly, whose low-fare airline has a higher market capitalization than all its major rivals combined, likewise had little sympathy for the pain that fuel prices had inflicted on Northwest and Delta.

Neither company has contracts protecting them from the rise in prices, while Southwest locked in the price of 85 percent of the fuel it plans to purchase this year.

"This industry is dependent on energy," he said. "Energy prices are volatile. The industry did not take adequate steps to protect itself from volatility and now that risk has come home to roost."

Delta, Northwest See Bankruptcy As Key To Revival (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Susan Carey

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Two more bankruptcy filings by big airlines -- Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines -- underscored how old-line carriers increasingly see court protection as the preferred route to revival amid the industry's biggest crisis in decades.

Yesterday's filings by the nation's third- and fourth-largest airlines, both of which came in U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York's Southern District, mean that four of the nation's seven biggest carriers as measured by passenger traffic now are operating under Chapter 11 protection. Including UAL Corp.'s United Airlines and US Airways Group Inc., more than half the capacity of the nation's top 12 airlines now belongs to companies in bankruptcy.

All four are legacy carriers -- those airlines born before the era of industry deregulation that have been unable to shed costs such as pensions amid competition from low-cost startups. Bankruptcy gives them at least the chance to leave financial baggage -- labor costs, pension obligations, aircraft orders -- at the courthouse door and emerge months later as leaner companies better able to absorb high oil prices, competition and other turbulence.

Many legacy carriers "have already used the bankruptcy process to achieve changes in their cost structures," Northwest Chief Executive Doug Steenland said yesterday. That has helped them compete, he said, with "newer, low-cost carriers which have much lower labor and operating costs than legacy carriers."

Airlines have faced a brutal environment in recent years with high labor costs, soaring oil prices and competition. With two more in bankruptcy -- and not having to pay many of their bills -- pressure could rise on other old-line carriers such as Continental Airlines, which sought cost cuts earlier this year, and AMR Corp.'s American.

A bankruptcy filing is no guarantee of success. More than 100 airlines have filed for bankruptcy in the last quarter-century. Several, including US Airways and Continental, have done so more than once.

Delta's filing came despite a year-long push by executives to avoid bankruptcy by transforming the airline into a carrier that could go head to head with Southwest Airlines and the upstart new carriers such as JetBlue Airways that have spread bargain-basement fares across the country. Though it has tallied nearly $10 billion in losses since the start of 2001, Atlanta-based Delta has cut operating costs by more than $4 billion a year -- about 28% of its operating expenses in 2002.

Yesterday, executives expressed the hope that their efforts will leave Delta poised to emerge from court protection stronger than at least some of its major-airline rivals. It expects to face fewer court battles with workers and creditors, now owed more than $28 billion, to bring costs further in line.

Delta has a "well-planned, well-executed" restructuring plan that will continue to serve the company even in bankruptcy, said Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein in an interview. "Everyone is going to have to work harder, for less money," he said. "But we're convinced we can produce an outstanding airline here."

For its part, Northwest entered bankruptcy facing several immediate problems. Its filing was preceded by defaults on some payments due in the past few days. A $65 million pension payment is due today. Like Delta, Northwest has been cutting costs, but so far has eliminated just $1.7 billion a year in nonlabor expenses. The company also has been dealing with a strike by its mechanics since August.

In a conference call late yesterday, Mr. Steenland said Northwest will become a somewhat smaller airline and return some planes to lessors while in Chapter 11. He said it will continue to press for pension relief "so we'll be in a position to preserve" the benefits earned to date by its workers and "hopefully" avoid pension terminations.

As the two companies enter bankruptcy, two other rivals are preparing to come out. US Airways is close to emerging from bankruptcy in significantly changed form, after a merger with low-cost carrier America West Holdings Corp. The airline's reorganization plan was approved by creditors yesterday. Today it seeks judicial confirmation, which would set the stage for its emergence.

United, meanwhile, expects to exit bankruptcy around Feb. 1 after 38 months of protection from creditors. However, its recovery plan assumes an oil price of $50 a barrel, about 20% below the current level.

Both of yesterday's filings came after the close of major stock markets, but both were expected. Delta shares were off 7 cents at 71 cents, in 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Northwest shares, after losing 53% of their value on Tuesday, recovered somewhat yesterday, trading up 19% to close at $1.87 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

In its filing, Delta said it planned to use the bankruptcy process to reconfigure its fleet and network, retiring four of the 11 aircraft types it currently flies and using smaller regional jets on routes where larger aircraft aren't profitable. Such a restructuring typically involves shrinking capacity, though Delta didn't say by how much.

It also warned of more job and pay cuts, and could announce as early as next week pay cuts of up to 15% for its largely nonunion workers and executives, said people familiar with the situation. Delta has eliminated about 17,500 jobs, or 20% of its workforce, since mid-2001, according to securities filings.

On Monday, Delta presented its pilots union with a wage and benefits proposal calling for up to about $325 million in concessions, according to people familiar with the matter. In January, Delta imposed a 10% wage cut and trimmed benefits for its nonunion workers. That followed an agreement in November with its Air Line Pilots Association unit for $1 billion in annual wage and benefits givebacks.

The airline said it has received a commitment for $1.7 billion in debtor-in-possession financing from creditors led by General Electric Co.'s commercial finance unit and investment bank Morgan Stanley. Terms of the deal call for about $980 million going to pay off a previous loan from GE and American Express Co. American Express also agreed in principle to provide Delta with $350 million in additional financing, giving the airline a total of $2.05 billion in financing to sustain it during bankruptcy.

Nearly 20 Delta subsidiaries were included in its bankruptcy filing, including Song, a low-fare airline. For Northwest, the first bankruptcy filing in the company's 79-year history covered it and 12 of its subsidiaries.

In its initial court filing, Northwest listed assets of $14.35 billion and debts of $17.92 billion. Its largest shareholder is FMR Corp., followed by Wellington Management Co. LLP and State Street Bank & Trust Co. Major unsecured creditors, after the banks that are trustees for notes and preferred stock, include alliance partner KLM Royal Dutch Airlines, which is owed more than $64 million, regional commuter affiliates Pinnacle Airlines, owed $28 million, and Mesaba Aviation, owed $23 million.

The company had talked to Citigroup Inc. about arranging a $1.6 billion DIP loan, but Mr. Steenland said Northwest decided against it because it believes it has sufficient cash and most of its assets already are pledged. The airline engaged Bruce R. Zirinsky of Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft LLP as its lead bankruptcy counsel.

Until this week, many industry observers expected Northwest to wait until next month before deciding to file for bankruptcy, partly because it would have more time to wrest concessions from its unions. But rising fuel costs, the ongoing mechanics' strike and flagging prospects for legislative relief on its underfunded pension plans apparently led the carrier to conclude that significant cost savings weren't readily obtainable. Northwest has the oldest fleet among the major U.S. airlines, meaning its burns more fuel than its peers, a situation made worse by the fact that its fuel needs aren't hedged.

Northwest is seeking $1.4 billion in annual labor savings from its employees and is hoping that Congress passes legislation that would allow it to spread out the time to catch up on its $3.8 billion in pension underfunding to 14 years from the current three to five years. Mr. Steenland said the carrier will continue to seek legislation while in court protection. But he said it must make a transition out of its defined-benefit pension arrangements, which are slated to require $3.3 billion in contributions from 2006 through 2008.

While in bankruptcy, both United and US Airways have terminated their defined-benefit plans and turned the liabilities over to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., a federal insurer.

Since the mechanics' strike, Northwest has stayed aloft by using 1,200 temporary replacement technicians. This week it said it started the process of offering some of them permanent employment. But the airline won't say how many offers it has made or how many of the 1,200 it might like to keep.

In Chapter 11, the carrier will be able to use the threat of annulling contracts and imposing new terms to get its unions to agree to cuts. Three of Northwest's largest unions said they weren't surprised by the filing and will work to protect member interests.

Even before the virtually simultaneous bankruptcy filings by Delta and Northwest, some investors speculated that the two carriers could wind up merging with the help of a private-equity firm. Their route networks have little overlap, and Delta's dominance on trans-Atlantic flights would complement Northwest's strength in Asia. Delta and Northwest officials declined to comment.

Delta And Northwest Enter Chapter 11 (FT)

By Doug Cameron And Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 15, 2005

The US airline industry on Wednesday faced its biggest shake-out in a decade after Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines, the third- and fourth-largest carriers by revenue respectively, both filed for bankruptcy.

The bankruptcies after four years of heavy losses and at least 120,000 job losses across the sector are likely to accelerate an industry-wide restructuring around a low-cost model but could raise political pressure on the indebted federal agency that insures workers' pensions.

Four US airlines are now in Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, following earlier moves by United and US Airways a recognition, analysts said, of the traditional carriers' inability to restore profitability and shed legacy costs in a unionised industry.

Even so, observers doubted that Wednesday's bankruptcy filings would eliminate the overcapacity that has seen airlines lose pricing power as too many seats chase too few passengers.

Analysts at Merrill Lynch estimate there are 100-200 too many aircraft in the domestic network. Delta has a fleet of 869 aircraft while Northwest operates more than 400.

"The airline industry has changed permanently," said Doug Steenland, Northwest's president and chief executive officer. "Northwest must significantly lower its costs to compete with other carriers."

The carrier employs 40,000 staff. Mr Steenland said one trigger for the filing was that, after Hurricane Katrina, Northwest had been paying close to $100 a barrel for jet fuel more than twice the amount it paid at the start of the year.

Northwest and Delta's decision to go into Chapter 11 was likely to have been hastened by an October 17 deadline when bankruptcy legislation comes into force that will give management far less room to manoeuvre than under the present regime.

Delta's filing in New York comes a year after the Atlanta-based carrier launched a restructuring aimed at reducing annual costs by $5bn by 2006. The carrier, advised by the Blackstone Group, has secured $1.7bn in debtor-in-possession finance from GE Commercial Finance and Morgan Stanley, and agreement in principle for a further $350m from American Express.

The airline hopes to use bankruptcy protection to secure additional savings from its 52,000 employees and has made a proposal to its pilots union.

Northwest, advised by the Seabury Group, is not using such funding and will instead rely on its cash balance of $1.4bn as of September 14 to see it through the process. It is seeking more concessions from its three union-represented employee groups, with analysts estimating that these need to be raised to an annual $1.4bn to restore profitability.

Delta has higher pension obligations than Northwest and its strategic position is viewed by analysts as weaker, prompting speculation that the two carriers could seek to exit bankruptcy together through a merger. Delta is the most exposed of the majors to low-cost competitors, and analysts remain concerned about its ability to generate viable revenues even on a lowered cost base. The airline said it would rationalise its fleet and network, increasing its focus on more profitable international services. "Delta's financial problems are severe, but by no means insurmountable," said Gerald Grinstein, chief executive.

Delta, Northwest Airlines File For Bankruptcy (LAT)

By James F. Peltz

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

The nation's airline crisis took a stunning turn for the worse today when Delta Air Lines Inc. and Northwest Airlines Corp. both filed for bankruptcy in the face of massive losses, meaning that four of the seven largest U.S. carriers are now flying in Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

Delta and Northwest, the third- and fourth-largest airlines respectively by passenger traffic, joined United Airlines and its parent UAL Corp., along with US Airways Group Inc., in seeking protection from its creditors in Bankruptcy Court.

Rarely have four of the largest players in a major business found themselves in bankruptcy simultaneously. It's a dubious feat that some analysts said marks the onset of a climax to the industry shakeout that many have predicted since the airlines were deregulated in 1978.

The filings by Delta and Northwest weren't expected to have an immediate effect on travelers.

Under Chapter 11, a company continues operating while it works out a reorganization plan to repay creditors. Delta and Northwest said they would maintain their current flight schedule and frequent flier plans. United and US Airways have done the same.

"Delta is open for business as usual and will continue normal operations," Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said in a statement, adding that passengers' travel plans and frequent flier miles "are secure."

At Los Angeles International Airport, Delta ranks as the fourth-largest carrier, with 7.6% of passenger traffic during fiscal 2004, according to airport statistics.

Northwest ranks as the seventh-largest carrier at LAX, accounting for 3.6% of the airport's passenger traffic.

The Delta and Northwest filings underlined the financial debacle occurring in an industry that has lost $30 billion since 2000 and is on track to lose an additional $5 billion to $10 billion this year.

There are still too many airplane seats chasing too few passengers, many analysts contend, and most carriers' ability to stay in business using bankruptcy reorganization has kept that trend going. But with so many big airlines in bankruptcy at once, a shakeout could truly be coming, they said.

"It's imperative that the traditional airlines regroup and become stronger," said Hugo Burge, president of Cheapflights.com, a travel website. "The airlines can't go on as they are, and something needs to give."

Over the past few years the airlines have been pummeled by a list of problems, including the post-Sept. 11 drop in air travel, the growth of discount airlines that pushed fares lower, bloated cost structures, enormous debt loads, excess capacity and soaring jet fuel prices.

The price of fuel — an airline's second-biggest expense after labor — surged above $2.30 a gallon after Hurricane Katrina disrupted the Gulf Coast's refining operations, and it helped push Delta and Northwest into bankruptcy. Before the storm, fuel cost less than $1.90 a gallon.

Northwest said it expects to pay about $3.3 billion for fuel this year, compared to $2.2 billion in 2004.

Northwest's effort to reorganize its operations outside Bankruptcy Court "have been overtaken by skyrocketing fuel costs," said airline President Doug Steenland in a statement.

Northwest's woes deepened last month when 4,400 members of the Aircraft Mechanics Fraternal Assn. went on strike over the wage and benefit cuts proposed by the airline. The carrier has managed to operate more than 95% of its flights by bringing in replacement workers to replace the striking employees.

Delta, once a prosperous carrier admired for customer service laced with Southern hospitality, has lost $10 billion since 2000 and is saddled with more than $20 billion in debts and pension obligations.

The airline came perilously close to bankruptcy a year ago, but avoided it by reaching concessions with its pilots union, suppliers and creditors.

The airlines' trade group, the Air Transport Assn., sought relief from the U.S. government today by asking that the 4.3-cent-a-gallon federal tax on jet fuel be suspended for a year.

That would trim about $600 million from the industry's fuel bill, which is expected to jump $9.2 billion from 2004, the ATA said.

"We remain at the mercy of oil markets and the federal government," ATA President James May told a Senate aviation subcommittee.

The high fuel prices also threaten the few airlines that have remained profitable, such as JetBlue Airways Corp. The New York-based carrier, whose West Coast hub is Long Beach, is in danger of posting its first quarterly loss since the airline went public in 2002, JetBlue Chief Executive David Neeleman told Bloomberg News on Tuesday.

The industry's hardship also has enveloped smaller, struggling carriers. Aloha Airgroup Inc., the parent of Aloha Airlines, and ATA Holdings Corp., which runs ATA Airlines, also are operating in Chapter 11.

Although consumers might not be immediately affected by today's Chapter 11 filings, they could see gradual changes in the breadth and frequency of Delta and Northwest service to certain cities.

Northwest, Delta File For Bankruptcy Protection (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo

Delta Air Lines and Northwest, the nation's third- and fourth-largest carriers, filed for bankruptcy protection yesterday as skyrocketing fuel costs accelerated the carriers' financial decline.

With the filings, an unprecedented four of the nation's seven largest carriers will be operating under bankruptcy protection, marking a low point for an industry that many analysts said had shown signs of turning a corner this year -- if not for the run-up in jet fuel prices.

Analysts expect Dulles-based Independence Air's parent, Flyi Inc., to soon join the pack of bankrupt carriers. Two carriers in bankruptcy protection, UAL Corp.'s United and US Airways Group Inc., have indicated plans to emerge in the coming months. AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Continental Airlines Inc. and Southwest Airlines Inc., the other three major carriers, posted profits last quarter.

Despite the wave of bankruptcy filings, airline travelers should see little change. Frequent-flier miles are expected to be preserved because airlines cannot afford to anger their most loyal customers. Fares are likely to remain low because of intense competition from low-fare carriers. Federal officials have stepped up airline inspections, and safety does not appear to have been compromised by the industry's problems.

Airline workers, whose wages and benefits have been cut aggressively, are likely to face further hardship. The airlines are likely to further trim their workforces to become smaller, more efficient businesses. Older carriers, such as Delta Air Lines Inc. and Northwest Airlines Corp., are saddled with hefty obligations to pension funds that could be turned over to the federal government under bankruptcy protection, diminishing workers' retirement benefits.

The airlines beat next month's launch of a new bankruptcy law, which makes it more difficult for executives to collect retention pay. The new law also requires carriers to emerge from bankruptcy within 18 months.

Some industry observers think the bankruptcy filings could prompt consolidation. US Airways, whose creditors approved its bankruptcy-reorganization plan yesterday, is merging with America West Holdings Corp. in an effort to become a leaner, low-cost carrier.

"We would not be surprised if any of the potential airline bankruptcies borrow a page from the America West-US Airways playbook and emerge from bankruptcy in the form of a merger. That would be one way of achieving airline consolidation -- an objective that has eluded that industry for years," said Michael J. Linenberg of Merrill Lynch & Co.

Unlike the days when airlines filed for bankruptcy protection and were then liquidated, creditors are less likely to demand their assets -- namely, aircraft -- for fear that a huge number of planes on the market would drive down prices. Instead, bankruptcy protection leaves more room for airlines to negotiate with creditors. In many cases, the carriers are looking to reconfigure their fleets for greater efficiency -- a change that some consultants say is more difficult to do outside of bankruptcy reorganization.

"It's more difficult than ever to liquidate an airline," said Darryl Jenkins, visiting professor at Embry-Riddle Aeronautical University. "You have so many lenders of last resort who want to keep aircraft prices high."

Northwest said its decision to file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection was unrelated to its striking mechanics, who walked off the job several weeks ago to protest the company's effort to cut pay and reduce their ranks. The company blamed its fuel costs, which have risen to $3.3 billion annually, for preventing it from reducing its expenses enough outside of bankruptcy protection.

"We had developed a plan to restructure Northwest outside of Chapter 11 and have been implementing that plan," Northwest chief executive Douglas M. Steenland said. "Unfortunately, in addition to an uncompetitive cost structure, our efforts have been overtaken by skyrocketing fuel costs. . . . By filing for Chapter 11 now, we ensure that we have the means to complete the transformation of Northwest quickly and effectively."

The carrier expects to become 5 to 6 percent smaller by the fourth quarter, with layoffs expected, Steenland said.

Delta's filing was a "necessary and responsible step to preserve Delta's value" chief executive Gerald Grinstein said in a written statement. The company said it had secured $1.7 billion in debtor-in-possession financing to continue normal operations under bankruptcy protection.

Delta said yesterday that it would continue to pay wages, health care coverage, vacation and sick leave for its 52,000 employees but that further reductions in jobs, pay and benefits are likely.

Delta also said that it does not plan to make contributions to its pension plans that are due soon. "Missing contributions does not mean that our qualified plans stop paying monthly retirement benefits or that we have initiated the process to terminate the plans," Grinstein said, who added that he would push for pension-reform legislation. A statement from the company said "there can be no guarantees -- even with pension reform -- about the future of Delta's qualified defined benefit pension plans."

Delta does not have as many unionized workers as other carriers, but it is $21.6 billion in debt and posted a $1.5 billion loss for the first six months of the year. The airline operates a wide range of aircraft, which analysts say could be narrowed to provide more efficiency.

Northwest said that it is required to contribute $3.3 billion to its defined-benefit plans from 2006 to 2008 and that it would continue its move toward defined-contribution plans.

Because of their bankruptcy protection filings, Delta and Northwest will be removed from the Dow Jones Transportation Average index at the close of business Friday, Dow Jones said. They will be replaced by Overseas Shipholding Group Inc. and JetBlue Airways Corp.

Several aviation consultants and academics said Northwest and Delta bankruptcies represent the latest chapter in the industry's long and painful transformation. Nearly all of the older carriers have flirted with bankruptcy protection, and each has had to cut billions of dollars in labor and operating costs.

"Right now, you are kind of reaching the climax of a different environment," said Michael E. Levine, a former airline executive and now a research scholar at New York University. "All have to transform themselves."

Airlines File For Chapter 11 Haven (WT)

By William Glanz

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Delta Air Lines Inc. and Northwest Airlines Corp. yesterday filed for bankruptcy in an unprecedented day for the struggling airline industry.

Delta, the nation's third-largest airline, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection from creditors after the stock market closed yesterday, saying record-high fuel prices have undermined efforts to cut costs.

Northwest, the fourth-largest airline, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection about 30 minutes later, citing high labor costs.

Both airlines threatened for months that they would seek bankruptcy protection, but the back-to-back filings emphasized the difficulty the traditional carriers are having competing with younger competitors like Southwest Airlines and JetBlue Airways.

Both Delta, based in Atlanta, and Northwest, based in Eagan, Minn., promised their operations won't be disrupted.

The filings mean four major airlines are in bankruptcy. UAL's United Airlines filed in 2002 and US Airways Group Inc., based in Crystal City, filed one year ago. But US Airways could win court approval today for its reorganization plan and proposed purchase by America West Airlines and emerge by the end of the month.

"The fact that [Delta and Northwest] filed back to back is dramatic, but the fact that you have half of the industry's capacity in bankruptcy says something," said John Heimlich, chief economist for the Air Transport Association, an industry group representing the nation's largest airlines.

At least one more airline could fail. Flyi Inc., which operates low-cost carrier Independence Air out of Washington Dulles International Airport, is widely expected to file for bankruptcy.

"I see consolidation or contraction for the big six airlines as well as the low-cost carriers," Mr. Heimlich said.

Delta listed its total debt at $28.3 billion and assets at $21.6 billion, according to the filing in U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York. Song, Delta's low-cost carrier, was included in the bankruptcy filing.

Delta's bankruptcy is the ninth-largest in U.S. history. WorldCom Inc., which filed in 2002, was the largest with $103.91 billion in debt.

"Delta's financial problems are severe, but by no means insurmountable," Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said.

Northwest listed debts of $17.9 billion and assets of $14.4 billion and also filed in U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York.

Northwest filed yesterday to avoid a $65 million pension payment that would have come due today.

Delta filed yesterday to preserve its cash and said it won't make an upcoming payment to a defined benefit plan.

"Missing contributions does not mean that our [pension] plans stop paying monthly retirement benefits or that we have initiated the process to terminate the plans," Mr. Grinstein said.

DOJ_NMG_0005626

Northwest said its bankruptcy filing is unrelated to the strike by its 4,400 mechanics.

Both airlines said they have money to fund operations through bankruptcy.

Delta said it has obtained a commitment for $1.7 billion in financing from General Electric Commercial Finance and Morgan Stanley. Separately, American Express has promised an additional $350 million in secured financing.

Northwest has $1.5 billion in cash. It will save money by shedding some planes in its fleet and eliminating some routes to "operate a somewhat smaller airline," Chief Executive Douglas Steenland said.

It is not clear how many Northwest workers will be cast off, but the airline hopes to avoid jettisoning pensions like US Airways has done, he said.

Northwest tried for months to cut labor costs and wants to renegotiate union contracts to save $1.4 billion annually. Bankruptcy will allow Northwest to lower its labor costs and compete with low-cost carriers, Mr. Steenland said.

Northwest this week began hiring replacement mechanics.

Delta won $1 billion in concessions last year from its pilots.

Mr. Steenland said Northwest had a plan to restructure without filing for bankruptcy, but soaring fuel costs forced the company into court.

Northwest expects its fuel bill for 2005 will reach $3.3 billion, compared with $2.2 billion in 2004 and $1.6 billion in 2003.

Mr. Grinstein said Delta will reduce its fleet of 869 planes and rely on smaller planes that use less fuel. Delta has lost almost $10 billion since early 2001.

During the six-month period that ended June 30, Delta's fuel costs increased 56 percent, or $695 million, compared with the same period in 2004.

The airline industry yesterday asked Congress for a one-year reprieve from federal jet fuel taxes. Suspension of the 4.3-cents-a-gallon federal tax would save the industry $600 million.

Difficult Times Battered Airlines (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams And Dan Reed

USA Today, September 15, 2005

The slide into bankruptcy protection of two of the USA's largest airlines is more a result of the carriers' bad assumptions and slowness to act than the recent rise in fuel prices or the devastating terror attacks four years ago.

The Delta and Northwest bankruptcies, filed Wednesday in New York, are different in key respects from that of No. 2 United and No. 7 US Airways. Both United and US Airways were directly affected by the 9/11 attacks. Two of United's planes were hijacked that day, and Washington Reagan National Airport, where US Airways has a major operation, was shut down for weeks.

Neither Delta nor Northwest was similarly affected by the attacks, and four years have passed. Industry experts say that in the case of Delta, and to some extent Northwest, these filings are more a reflection of how traditional, hub-and-spoke airlines failed to adapt in the face of aggressive low-cost carriers, falling fares and rising oil prices.

They counted too heavily on the hope that business conditions would improve and return them to profits — that oil prices would fall, airfares would rise, weaker competitors would fail and low-cost carriers would make mistakes.

Instead, low-cost carriers grew, competitors United and US Airways methodically slashed their costs in bankruptcy, and oil prices hit record levels. When Hurricane Katrina shut down New Orleans and sent fuel prices even higher, the cash bleed was too much to withstand.

“Delta probably should have filed a year and a half ago,” said Washington, D.C.-based airline consultant Jon Ash.

Ash said Delta mistakenly counted on the expected failures of rivals US Airways and Independence Air, reducing the competitive pressure on Delta in the busy Northeast. US Airways has visited Chapter 11 twice, but now it's being acquired by America West. A judge may release it from Chapter 11 at a hearing today.

Washington-based Independence Air, while at risk of a near-term bankruptcy-protection filing or even liquidation, continues to fly at very low fares.

Other analysts agree with Ash.

DOJ_NMG_0005627

"Katrina and oil prices are simply the straw that broke the camel's back," said San Francisco-based consultant Michael Roach, co-founder of America West. "Delta was going to file anyway. And Northwest was playing chicken with its unions. It seems to me they didn't do nearly enough and waited much too long. They thought they could just ride it out. But the rise in oil prices upset everyone's plans."

Delta narrowly averted a bankruptcy filing a year ago, and its action Wednesday had been widely anticipated. But the fact that Northwest is also in Chapter 11 is a remarkable turnabout.

Two years ago, the Eagan, Minn.-based carrier was modestly profitable and seemed ready to emerge from the post-9/11 industry mess as one of the strongest among the big traditional U.S. carriers. But its inability to rein it its costs negated the $1.7 billion in annual operating cost cuts since 9/11.

Delta came very close to filing late last year but stepped back when it was able to extract $1 billion a year in contract concessions from its pilots union and raise another $1 billion in loans from business partners General Electric and American Express. Meanwhile, Delta has spent the last year and a half cutting an array of costs, closing its unprofitable Dallas/Fort Worth hub, restructuring its main Atlanta hub, restructuring debt and cutting jobs.

Last year, Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein told employees he would do everything in his power to restructure the company outside of bankruptcy. The company unveiled a comprehensive "transformation plan" last fall. But the plan wasn't enough to overcome $70-a-barrel oil or the relentless expansion of low-cost, low-fare discounters such as Southwest, AirTran, JetBlue and Independence Air. AirTran, one of the fastest growing, operates most of its flights from Atlanta's Hartsfield-Jackson, Delta's home airport.

Delta officials said Wednesday night that they have a clear vision of where they want Delta to go. Now, only about 20% of its revenue derives from its international system. Chief Operating Officer Jim Whitehurst said Delta should boost that to about 33%.

Delta, including its Song subsidiary, and Northwest will continue to fly in Chapter 11. Over time, travelers are sure to see major changes in fares, cities served, frequency of service, types of aircraft used and onboard service. During their reorganizations, both United and US Airways have shrunk their total flying capacity by about 15%.

Delta said it plans to simplify and streamline its fleet by removing four aircraft types, leaving seven. Delta also plans to deploy smaller aircraft on many of its routes to better fit demand. Grinstein and Whitehurst said they plan to soon announce expansion of service to Europe and Latin America and expansion of Delta's domestic and international flights from New York's Kennedy airport.

What's likely to shrink is service elsewhere within the USA. Delta operates other domestic hubs in Cincinnati and Salt Lake City.

Some of the strongest shock waves may be felt in Washington, D.C., where Congress and federal officials have taken a carrot-and-stick approach to the airline industry in recent years.

Rep. Tom Price, R-Ga., Wednesday night called Delta "the latest casualty" in the competitive airline industry. "Today's announcement is merely a symptom of a greater problem and must serve as a wakeup call to all of us," he said.

But former Continental Airlines CEO Gordon Bethune said Congress bears some of the blame for the industry's sorry state: "To hear all these congressmen harrumphing on TV that this is horrible. Why, these are the same turkeys who just proposed a new security tax on top of all the other taxes they've loaded on the airlines."

Congress has provided massive financial relief to the industry since 9/11, when United and American lost four jetliners and travel nationwide came to a stop.

But Congress has also adopted new taxes, chiefly for post-9/11 security. Although the Department of Justice recently let stand the pending takeover of US Airways by America West, it has blocked most proposed airline mergers in recent years on antitrust grounds. In 2001, just months before the attacks, Justice's antitrust unit denied United's proposal to acquire US Airways, saying the deal would hurt competition and consumers in lucrative Northeast markets.

Ash and other industry experts suspect airline officials already are quietly exploring possible marriages involving United, Delta, Northwest and others.

Grinstein Wednesday said it's too soon to consider whether Delta might be a merger candidate. But he added, "I do think consolidation is ahead for our industry."

Even as Delta's and Northwest's boards were deciding Wednesday whether to proceed to the courthouse, the Senate Commerce Committee in Washington was hearing testimony on the industry's woes.

"No business model at any airline can survive with sustained jet-fuel prices of $90 to $100 a barrel," said James May, CEO of the Air Transport Association, the airlines' trade group, during the hearing. The ATA is requesting that the industry get a one-year holiday from the federal fuel tax to ease the effects of unprecedented fuel costs.

The industry has also been asking Congress to spread out required payments to their costly employee pension plans. Without relief, Delta and Northwest may ask the bankruptcy court to allow them to terminate the plans. That would transfer financial responsibility to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., the federal insurer. The transfer would cost Delta and Northwest pensioners millions in benefits and worsen the PBGC's already huge deficit.

Grinstein said no decision has been made about the pension plans. If Delta terminates its pension plans in bankruptcy court, it will represent the single-biggest corporate pension default ever, eclipsing the recent pension default by United.

PBGC said that Delta's pension plans would be underfunded by $10.6 billion if they are terminated. The agency would insure $8.4 billion of that sum.

Consultant Mark Gerchick, the DOT's highest-ranking aviation policy official under President Clinton, thinks the double filings will force Congress and regulators to revisit industry policies.

"People have to fly," said Gerchick, a Washington consultant. "We are going to have to create a new environment for airlines. This is likely to send a jolt through the Department of Transportation and the Department of Justice in their thinking about consolidation in the industry."

Bankruptcy Filing Launches Delta Fight With Workers (LAW)

By Andy Peters, Fulton County Daily Report

Law.com, September 15, 2005

Now that Delta Air Lines Inc. has filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, the carrier will have a legal fight on its hands from employees and retirees seeking to protect their benefits, legal experts said.

Delta, the third-largest U.S. airline, filed late Wednesday for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy code, No. 1-05-bk-17923. (U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York, filed Sept. 14, 2005).

The filing comes after repeated warnings from Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein that higher fuel costs and lower demand have crippled the airline. Delta also has faced stiff competition from carriers such as AirTran Airways that have lower labor and operating costs.

Delta's case was assigned to Judge Prudence C. Beatty.

Delta has been in talks with Stamford, Conn.-based GE Commercial Finance to provide the airline with $2 billion in debtor-in-possession financing, which would allow the airline to continue operating after a bankruptcy filing. Details of the loan had not been released early Wednesday, but industry analysts said they expect Delta to pledge virtually all of its remaining unencumbered assets, such as aircraft, as collateral for the loan.

Bankruptcy protection will allow Delta to change the terms of its agreements with other creditors. The airline is expected to sell many assets and slash costs, the latter by renegotiating pilot salaries and perhaps cutting back its workforce.

Delta also could cut or even abandon its pension plan and health care benefits for retirees and employees. Such a move likely would lead to a legal fight from employee groups.

"The employees and retirees clearly want to protect whatever rights they have," said Darryl S. Laddin, chairman of the bankruptcy and creditors' rights practice group at Arnall Golden Gregory. "They're going to want to have legal counsel to protect their interests."

While holders of common stock are likely to see their investments become worthless, rank-and-file Delta employees and retirees are also vulnerable to losses, said Dean Booth, an attorney with Schreeder, Wheeler & Flint who represents retired Delta pilots.

"Delta going bankrupt is bad for Atlanta, and the people who will be impacted the worst are the retired people," Booth said.

Indeed, both United Airlines and US Airways gained judges' approval during bankruptcy proceedings to transfer responsibility for their pensions to the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. (United filed for bankruptcy in December 2002; US Airways has filed twice in the past three years.)

When that happens, a retiree is guaranteed a minimum payment from his pension, but it is far less than what the employee would have received had the pension plan remained under the company's administration, said C. David Butler, an attorney at Shapiro Fussell and a former U.S. trustee for bankruptcy courts in Georgia, Florida and the Caribbean.

"Who's going to be taking the haircuts? It's going to be the pensioners," said Butler, who was a founding director of the Southeastern Bankruptcy Law Institute.

Delta met with Pension Benefit Guaranty representatives last week, although no decisions were made, The Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday.

"They'll have to shrink their operations and vigorously sell whatever they can," Butler said, adding that he expects the airline to sell planes, flight routes, airport gates and spare parts. The airline also will be looking to convert bondholders' debt into equity, as a way to produce cash, Butler said.

"They need to sell a lot of stuff to get down to the shrink-wrapped size they need to be to make a return to stockholders," Butler said.

Butler and Laddin both said that an outright liquidation of Delta is highly unlikely.

Talks already have begun between Delta and its pilots on wage concessions. On Monday, Delta submitted a new contract proposal to its pilots, asking for pay cuts. The Air Line Pilots Association, which represents Delta's pilots, isn't scheduled to meet and consider Delta's proposal until next week.

INDUSTRY MISERY

Delta has lost about $10 billion since January 2001, the Associated Press reported Wednesday, citing JP Morgan airline analyst Jamie Baker.

Delta joins a large fleet of U.S. airlines already operating under or threatening to enter bankruptcy protection, including United Airlines, US Airways and ATA Airlines of Indianapolis.

Northwest Airlines Corp. also filed for bankruptcy protection Wednesday.

Bankruptcy hasn't kept any of these airlines from flying, however, and Delta will be no different.

"The public will not notice a difference," said John A. Christy, an attorney with Schreeder, Wheeler & Flint who represents retired Delta pilots.

Bankruptcy is the best option for the air carrier at this stage, because "it will allow Delta the flexibility they need on several fronts and give them some breathing room," said Arnall Golden's Laddin.

"If anything, there is an incentive to file for Chapter 11, as opposed to a disincentive," he said.

Frequent-flyer miles also will be kept intact, as a way to reassure customers that Delta won't be disappearing, Christy said.

"They won't kill the frequent-flyer program," Christy said. "That would be like slitting their own throats."

What will emerge after bankruptcy is a much leaner Delta, one that a bankruptcy judge will have determined should be able to meet its financial obligations in the future.

"The word 'shrink' is on everybody's lips," Shapiro Fussell's Butler said.

MORE LEGAL WORK

Delta's bankruptcy could mean additional legal work for some Atlanta firms, although the airline's primary bankruptcy counsel is Davis Polk & Wardwell of New York. Delta spreads its legal work around in Atlanta. Some of Delta's firms include Alston & Bird; King & Spalding; McKenna Long & Aldridge; Troutman Sanders; Kilpatrick Stockton; Ford & Harrison; and Smith, Gambrell & Russell.

The roiling of the airline industry has taken a toll on employee retention in the ranks of Delta's senior executives, including Delta's in-house legal counsel. In July, both Delta's general counsel and assistant general counsel, Gregory L. Riggs and Walter A. Brill, respectively, retired. Riggs joined Alston & Bird as senior counsel but was retained by Delta as a temporary consultant.

Scott Kruse, a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, was named Delta's interim general counsel. Kruse is a former general counsel for the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. State lawmakers have tried to get involved in helping Delta. The General Assembly this March voted to approve a temporary cap on taxes Delta pays on fuel and to eliminate sales tax on food and beverages served in-flight.

Earlier this month, a state senator proposed a temporary freeze on all state taxes for Delta.

A joint meeting of the House and Senate transportation committees has been scheduled for Sept. 22 to explore ways to help Delta.

Weiner Concedes Race For Mayor To Avert Runoff (NYT)

By Patrick D. Healy

Representative Anthony D. Weiner conceded the 2005 Democratic mayoral nomination yesterday to Fernando Ferrer, the top vote-getter in the race, in hopes of averting a potentially destructive runoff election and strengthening Mr. Ferrer's hand as he begins the final eight-week campaign against Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg.

Mr. Weiner's decision, made after a long night of strategizing with aides and his mentor, Senator Charles E. Schumer, came as a surprise to New York Democrats, not least Mr. Ferrer, who was said to be ecstatic. Mr. Ferrer lost a bruising mayoral runoff to Mark Green in 2001, and faced an uncertain bout against the scrappy Mr. Weiner; yesterday, he embraced a nomination that had eluded him in two previous runs for mayor.

In a surprising development, however, city elections officials announced that they were required under state law to hold a runoff despite Mr. Weiner's withdrawal - at a cost to taxpayers of at least $10 million to pay for sending 6,030 voting machines to 1,409 polling stations and running the special election on Sept. 27. Mr. Ferrer will also stand to collect more than $421,000 in public campaign funds if a runoff is held.

Campaign lawyers for Mr. Ferrer and Mr. Weiner began looking for loopholes yesterday to avert a runoff, which is required when no mayoral primary candidate wins 40 percent of the vote. According to unofficial results, Mr. Ferrer won 39.949 percent of the vote, about 250 shy of 40 percent, in an election that drew just 15 percent of registered Democrats. Some 8,000 absentee ballots remain to be counted, but it is unclear if those votes will help or hurt him.

Mr. Weiner said he would not participate in a runoff even if one were held, calling it "a waste," and Mr. Ferrer's camp said they hoped to have the problem solved quickly so he could turn his sights on Mr. Bloomberg, beginning with a unity rally with Mr. Weiner and dozens of other Democrats on the steps of City Hall this afternoon.

"I am proud to support Freddy Ferrer," Mr. Weiner said at a news conference in front of his childhood home in Brooklyn. "He has the record, he has the brains, he has the commitment, he has the understanding to not only run circles around Republican Mike Bloomberg, but to lift up our city."

Mr. Ferrer spent yesterday speaking by phone to donors, his advertising team and consultants as they strategized to end 12 years of Republican rule this November with the election of the first Hispanic mayor in city history. Aides also began preparing to roll out new endorsements soon, including one from Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Though Mr. Bloomberg began what amounted to the first day of his general election drive with an overt campaign event, he ended it by trying to revert to a Rose Garden strategy, portraying himself as too busy governing to pay much mind to politics.

Asked in a session with reporters if he had a response to the complaints Mr. Ferrer and Mr. Weiner had lodged against him - that he was too close to the Republican president; that he had not done enough to help the poor or working class - the mayor initially answered with a flat "no."

"Seriously, you can call the campaign for those," Mr. Bloomberg went on, before giving in only so slightly: "I think the public knows what's going on in this city. Just take a look at the numbers: the schools are getting better, crime is coming down, we're building housing, a record housing plan."

Apparently referring to the campaign itself, he said, "What I've got to do is not get involved in that. I'm going to focus on telling the story and explaining to people what we've done and how were going to continue it."

Mr. Bloomberg also moved to counter Democratic attempts to link him to President Bush, announcing the formation of "Democrats For Bloomberg." The event was attended by stalwarts of the national Democratic donor base - the film executives

Harvey Weinstein and Jane L. Rosenthal and the investment banker Alan Patricof - as well as prominent former New York City Democratic officials, like Hugh L. Carey, the former governor, and Claire Shulman, the former Queens borough president.

Even among Democrats supporting Mr. Ferrer, beating Mr. Bloomberg is seen as an awesome and perhaps impossible challenge, given his money and approval ratings of about 60 percent. Even one of Mr. Ferrer's most prominent supporters, who is also a New York officeholder, offered a grim prediction yesterday that the mayor would beat Mr. Ferrer, 53 percent to 47 percent, if Mr. Ferrer did not invigorate his Democratic campaign. This ally's advice: Show more of the creative, imaginative, and aggressive style that Mr. Ferrer exhibited as Bronx borough chief from 1987 to 2001.

The political calculus appeared even more complicated for Mr. Weiner, whose popularity surged during the last two weeks of the campaign to the point where he captured 29 percent of the vote on Tuesday.

According to several of his aides and advisers, Mr. Weiner's decision to withdraw came down to political and personal factors: A hard-fought runoff could damage the eventual nominee and effectively hand the election to Mr. Bloomberg; Mr. Weiner could leave the race on a high note as a uniter of the Democratic Party; the first week of the runoff would be consumed by fights over ballots, and make it hard to raise money; Mr. Weiner, at 41, could run again in 2009 or well after; and Mr. Ferrer would have a far broader support in a runoff from ethnic, labor and political groups.

Late Tuesday night Mr. Weiner spoke with Senator Schumer and tossed around the various options, according to people who were familiar with the conversation. Senator Schumer did not lean on him to bow out, but did say that the runoff would be a no-win proposition for Mr. Weiner, according to one person familiar with the conversation.

Other advisers took the same lose-lose view of a runoff, although a few thought he should go for it, aides said. They worried that if Mr. Weiner won, it would alienate Mr. Ferrer's base of black and Hispanic voters, driving them to Mr. Bloomberg, and if Mr. Weiner lost, he would be damaged politically in the long run. By staying out, Mr. Weiner is seen as helping the party while Mr. Ferrer takes all the risks in the general election.

Another factor was the animosity that Mr. Weiner would have had to deal with. A third Democratic candidate for mayor, Gifford Miller, volunteered support to Mr. Ferrer yesterday morning even before Mr. Weiner dropped out. Mr. Miller and Mr. Weiner tangled often during the campaign, sometimes with an edge in their voices, as two white candidates seeking to appeal to the same blocs of white and middle-class voters.

Another potential foe Mr. Weiner now avoids is the Rev. Al Sharpton, a Ferrer supporter who was preparing to step up criticism of Mr. Weiner today. While the two men get along in private, Mr. Sharpton had wanted to stop Mr. Weiner's momentum so he did not become a greater threat to two Sharpton allies: Mr. Ferrer and William C. Thompson Jr., the city comptroller, who plans to run for mayor in 2009 if Mr. Ferrer loses this election.

"Dropping out was a smart move, the move of a statesmen, and it gives Anthony a lot of goodwill," said Mr. Sharpton, who had been lambasting the congressman for voting in 2002 to authorize the war in Iraq.

Other rumors were swatted down by Weiner aides yesterday - that Mrs. Clinton had urged him to drop out; that Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a Ferrer supporter, had called (Mr. Weiner and Mr. Spitzer are far from close); and that Representative Charles B. Rangel, a senior Democrat, had offered a plum committee seat to Mr. Weiner in exchange for dropping out. (Mr. Rangel had backed the fourth candidate in the race, C. Virginia Fields.)

Mr. Weiner explained his decision yesterday by saying that, his competitive spirit aside, Democrats needed to unite quickly if they were to overcome the unlimited campaign spending of "billionaire Republican Mike Bloomberg."

"It was a difficult decision - it's in my DNA to keep fighting," said Mr. Weiner, standing on the bottom step of his childhood home in Park Slope, where he was known as a sports fanatic. "But I believe it is the right thing to do."

Mr. Weiner also played down his policy and philosophical differences with Mr. Ferrer, which were sharp but politely discussed during the campaign.

Mr. Weiner cast himself as being in the vanguard for the middle class and as a native son of predominantly white neighborhoods outside Manhattan. Mr. Ferrer is more traditionally liberal and is putting together a coalition dominated by black and Hispanic voters.

Asked if he still wanted to be mayor someday and might run in 2009, Mr. Weiner showed that his trademark quips were not dulled even though he had had only three hours' sleep.

"I will not be running in 2009 because Fernando Ferrer will be up for re-election that year," he said.

New York's Democrats Take Aim At Bloomberg (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK - In the end, just shy turned out to be just enough.

Despite the fact that New York City's Democrats failed to decisively pick a candidate in this week's primary, the Democratic favorite, former Bronx borough president Fernando "Freddie" Ferrer is expected to be the party's standard bearer after all to take on billionaire Republican Mayor Michael Bloomberg in November's general election.

The mild-mannered Mr. Ferrer failed to win the 40 percent needed to avoid a runoff.

But runner-up Anthony Weiner, a Brooklyn-born congressman - who staged a surprise come-from-behind with an upstart, wisecracking assault on the Democratic status quo - conceded Wednesday in a bow to party unity.

That will end the prospects of a potentially divisive runoff as well as a week of Democratic paralysis, while the estimated 20,000 absentee ballots were counted. Now, Mr. Ferrer can immediately take on the increasingly popular Democrat-turned-Republican Mayor Bloomberg.

That is very good news for the Democrats, who despite their 5-to-1 edge over Republicans in voter registration, haven't controlled City Hall for more than a decade, in part because of past divisive and expensive internecine contests.

"Runoffs can be 'tsouris' - that spells trouble in Yiddish. This saves them from a punch-in-the-nose runoff," says pollster Mickey Carroll of the Quinnipiac Polling Institute. "[Now these guys won't be] at each other's throats ... while Bloomberg can watch from the sidelines."

In September 2001, with ground zero still filling the air with acrid smoke, Ferrer lost a bitter, racially tainted runoff to Public Advocate Mark Green. That's credited in part with helping Bloomberg win, because many angry blacks and Hispanics refused to support Green - the Democratic standard-bearer.

That lesson was not lost on this year's batch of Democratic primary wannabes. In general, they were polite and well-mannered during debates, determined not to give the Bloomberg camp any extra ammunition.

Some analysts contend that Mr. Weiner's expected decision to concede is a testament to the Democrats' determination to take back City Hall.

But Ferrer still faces a daunting, uphill battle against Bloomberg, whose popularity has been steadily increasing.

A recent poll shows that two-thirds of New Yorkers approve of the job he's been doing.

And Bloomberg's campaign, which started an upbeat multimillion-dollar advertising blitz in the spring, shows no sign of giving up its relentless pace and spending.

"They haven't given any Democrats any oxygen at all," says Doug Muzzio, professor of public affairs at Baruch College of the City University of New York. "It's total war: it's like Grant in the Civil War - you attack them at all points and at all times."

Add to that the fact that the once highly unpopular billionaire - once chided as rich and out of touch, particularly with working people in the outer boroughs - is in the midst of a second honeymoon, says Mr. Carroll.

And the challenge for Ferrer is formidable.

That was evident in Democratic turnout in Tuesday's primary. It was a sparse 15 percent - the second-lowest in recent memory - a testament to how many "Bloomberg Democrats" just stayed home.

"The guy has a record you can run on and win on, he's got opponents who've not shown they can take him on yet, and he's got $5 billion," says Professor Muzzio. "Excuse me, I wanna be Mike Bloomberg."

But no one is writing Ferrer off completely yet. "It's a Democratic town, remember that," says Carroll. "Things happen."

Ferrer To Take On Bloomberg In NYC (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 14 -- Fernando Ferrer, the former Bronx borough president, stood alone as the Democratic challenger to Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg after Rep. Anthony D. Weiner surprised supporters by conceding the primary.

After Tuesday's primary, Ferrer had finished a whisker short of the 40 percent needed to avoid a runoff election with Weiner, and supporters of both candidates beat hard on the war drums election night.

But Weiner, a skinny, fast-talking quipster whose campaign roared down the stretch, awoke Wednesday morning and decided that there was little percentage in continuing. A count of 25,000 absentee ballots might well hand victory to Ferrer. And the ritual bloodletting to which city Democrats are prone all but guaranteed that the victor would limp onto the field against Bloomberg.

"Our differences are relatively small in comparison to our differences with Republican Mike Bloomberg," Weiner said at a hastily convened news conference in front of his old family home in Brooklyn's Park Slope neighborhood. "We need to be unified against a man who demonstrated that he will spend any amount of money to win."

That man, Bloomberg, is a billionaire media mogul who spent $70 million on his 2001 campaign (slightly less than most candidates spend running for president) and he has served notice he is ready to toss many more bales of cash into the fire this time around. Political strategists say the prospects for Ferrer, who could become the city's first mayor of Puerto Rican descent, are not terribly encouraging.

Bloomberg, who can project a CEO's disdain for the symbols and ceremonies of politics, has rebounded from low poll numbers of 2002 and now rides well ahead of Ferrer. The city's economy is no longer reeling as it was in 2001. And Bloomberg, if rarely loved, is regarded by many residents as an able manager.

"Bloomberg made a lot of amateur mistakes early on and his personality is not great and sometimes he can't help himself," said Douglas Muzzio, a political scientist at Baruch College in New York City. "But he's a smart guy and he's matured."

Befitting a man who spent his formative years in the Wall Street pit, Bloomberg plays a mean game of political hardball. His strategy is to hone in on his opponents' every weakness, and reinforce the point with a daily barrage of television commercials. On Wednesday, the mayor staged a sort of plutocrats' pep rally, unveiling a Democrats for Bloomberg list that included financiers Steven Rattner and Felix Rohatyn, and film producer Harvey Weinstein.

Ferrer, meanwhile, began raising money and sharpening attacks on Bloomberg as a Bush-supporting Republican who is out of touch with New Yorkers (Bloomberg is, in fact, a lifelong Democrat who switched party affiliations to capture the Republican nomination in 2001. The mayor is pro-choice and anti-death penalty, though he has donated tens of thousands of dollars to Republican candidates).

As for Weiner, he caught a few bouquets. Few Democrats looked forward to a replay of the ethnic and racial tensions that erupted during the party's last runoff -- four years ago, when Ferrer lost to consumer advocate Mark Green, who like Weiner is white and Jewish. Nothing so prompts admiration as a politician who manages to seamlessly marry selflessness and self-interest, and the chatter Wednesday was that Weiner is a formidable contender for the 2009 nomination.

"He was edgier than the other candidates and he had a sense of humor," Muzzio said. "And Weiner proved that he could think outside the box, right down the last move."

Schwarzenegger All But Declares Reelection Bid (LAT)

By Robert Salladay

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

CLOVIS, Calif. — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger all but declared today that he would run for a second term next year, saying, "Let me tell you, I am not in this for the short run."

Speaking at a special election campaign event in this Central Valley town near Fresno, Schwarzenegger was asked by an audience member if Californians would get "a chance to vote for you again."

The governor then revealed what his campaign staff had been hinting for several days: "I'm going to make an official announcement on Friday, this Friday. I believe very strongly in follow-through. Follow-through is the most important thing. If you start something, you've got to finish it."

The Republican governor, who came to office in 2003 after winning a historic recall election that ousted Democrat Gray Davis, is scheduled to attend a campaign rally in San Diego on Friday to sell three initiatives he is supporting on the Nov. 8 special election.

An announcement for a 2006 reelection campaign is designed to add a boost to Schwarzenegger's initiative cause and send a signal to financial donors and supporters that he intends to be around for another term.

The announcement would also come on the eve of the state GOP convention in Orange County on Saturday. Schwarzenegger, whose popularity ratings have been slumping since January, is scheduled to give a luncheon speech to the party faithful there.

So far, two Democrats have said they plan to run for governor: state Treasurer Phil Angelides and Controller Steve Westly.

Schwarzenegger Hints At Second Run For Governor (REU-Y2)

By Adam Tanner

Reuters, September 15, 2005

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signaled on Wednesday that he would seek a second term as governor in what would already be his fifth major campaign since seeking the office in 2003.

The former Hollywood actor kicked off a series of campaign events this week ahead of a special election he has called for November on teacher pay, redistricting and the state budget. In an appearance before an invited audience in Clovis, California, he said he would announce on Friday whether he will seek a second term for governor starting in 2006.

"I'm not in this for the short term," he told the crowd, strongly suggesting he would run again. "I believe strongly in follow-up."

Speaking to often enthusiastic crowds in controlled campaign settings is a role the star of the "Terminator" star clearly relishes, and perhaps his greatest talent in politics.

"Anyone who has watched the governor's political career knows that he is a superlative campaigner," said Tim Hudson, director of the Center for California Studies at California State University, Sacramento. "He both energizes and is energized by going out on the campaign trail."

The Republican governor has signaled his primary focus on the referendum campaign in the coming months by taking some of his top aides -- including his finance director, chief of staff and communications director -- off the state payroll and putting them full time on his electioneering effort.

The upcoming 2005 campaign could also revive the former Mr. Olympia's fading popularity, which is reflected in his lowest poll numbers ever this year, ahead of the reelection effort.

"Of course, I'm bloodied, yes. But unbowed," Schwarzenegger said on Monday. "I made a promise to California that I will fix a broken system. And I will do everything I can, and it makes no difference how many attacks they have on me, because remember one thing: that this, what we are doing here, is much bigger than me."

As in past campaigns, Schwarzenegger is likely to follow a script in which some audiences are screened and details such as lighting and settings are carefully planned. Political reporters likely to ask the toughest questions are rarely granted interviews.

Even though he is still a relative newcomer to politics, Schwarzenegger knows the drill well.

After coming to power in an unprecedented 2003 recall election, Schwarzenegger campaigned for ballot measures in the spring and the fall of 2004. Then this year he called a special election despite complaints that the issues he raised could have waited until 2006.

Schwarzenegger's Friday announcement would come ahead of the weekend Republican state convention in which he is seeking to rally the party faithful who have sometimes expressed reservations about his positions on social issues.

Jackson Action (WSJ)

By Charlie Ross

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

JACKSON, Miss. -- Legislative battles over tort reform are being waged in statehouses across the country. Congress, too, is fighting out the issue in the form of proposed legislation to cap medical malpractice damage awards and to reform asbestosis litigation. Always hotly debated in such contests is whether tort reform accomplishes its purported goals. Does it make the legal system more predictable and more credible? Does it positively affect insurance costs and availability? Does it reduce litigation expenditures? More broadly, does it improve the economic well-being of the citizens?

In 2004, a long hard battle in the Mississippi Legislature over a comprehensive Tort Reform Bill came to a close, during which the same questions arose. Opponents claimed that the bill was unnecessary, and that, even if it passed, it would not make a difference. Still, we were able to get it through. In many respects, the bill is considered model legislation. Among other provisions, it included venue reform (so trial lawyers cannot shop around for favorable courts) and caps on subjective noneconomic damages (such as pain and suffering). Now, a year has passed since the legislation took effect, and the Mississippi experience is instructive. Tort reform works.

Prior to the legislation, Mississippi was known as the "jackpot justice capital of America." The American Tort Reform Association had labeled certain jurisdictions "judicial hellholes." A survey of more than 1,200 senior in-house counsels for the U.S. Chamber Commerce ranked Mississippi 50th in virtually every category of judicial system nationwide. Insurance companies were fleeing the state. Others were refusing to write new policies. The medical field was particularly strained: Liability insurance was in many cases unaffordable, and in some cases unavailable.

One year later, the story is very different. Mass Mutual Insurance Group, St. Paul Travelers, World Insurance Co. and Equitable Life Insurance Co. are returning to Mississippi. State Farm Insurance eased its growth restrictions for homeowners' insurance and lowered its rates on property insurance.

The Medical Assurance Company of Mississippi, which writes 60% of the medical malpractice coverage for doctors in the state, had raised its rates 20% the year prior to the tort reform legislation. After its passage, MACM did not raise its rates at all. "Those people who said tort reform would not work and actively fought any civil justice reform," Mississippi Insurance Commissioner George Dale said. "I think this indicates they were wrong." MACM also recently announced an end to its moratorium on new business; it also just declared it will cut its rates for 2006.

Insurance was becoming less available and less affordable prior to the passage of the tort reform legislation. Now, the opposite is true. Some plaintiff lawyers and some consumer groups still contend that tort reform doesn't work -- but it does not take a rocket scientist to understand that when liability exposure is made predictable and governed by reasonable rules, risk can be better assessed, and insurance companies are more likely to offer coverage.

Gov. Haley Barbour attributes the successful recruitment of new business to Mississippi to the lower cost of doing business in the state. Texatron has invested $35 million and Kingsford Charcoal $20 million; we have coaxed back Winchester Ammunition and its $3.5 million payroll, as well FedEx Ground, as part of a $1.8 billion expansion.

Our reform package also virtually eliminated the mass-tort industry in Mississippi. This change came about not only because the legislation provided that venues for lawsuits must be established independently for each plaintiff, but also because Mississippi Supreme Court decisions reinstated the traditional rules of joinder of plaintiffs. These two changes went hand in hand, since the process of passing tort reform (which lasted four years) raised public awareness of the problem, which in turn affected judicial elections. This has provided for a more balanced judiciary.

As a result of these procedural changes, pending mass-tort cases are being split up. The cases of out-of-state plaintiffs are being dismissed, and the cases of in-state plaintiffs are being transferred to the proper venues for trial. Lawsuits in Mississippi are returning to what they are supposed to be -- and used to be -- about: one plaintiff, or a very small group of plaintiffs, suing a defendant, or a very small group of defendants, for a single cause of action. Common sense has made a comeback.

Not surprisingly, the demise of mass-tort litigation has resulted in a decrease in litigation costs. The CEO of one Mississippi company recently told me that his company's legal bills were reduced by $70,000 a month as a result of the reform. Litigation expense does not produce value for most members of our society. It is merely a transaction cost in the transfer of wealth to compensate injured persons. To be justified, the transfer process must be fair.

Mississippi's mass-tort system was anything but fair, and in many cases it resulted in patently unjustified awards. And people had lost confidence in getting a fair hearing at the trial court level. There was no confidence that the appellate courts would correct abuses. In essence, there was total unpredictability. The sky was the limit on damages. There was even a perception that fundamentals of the rule of law were being threatened.

Since the passage of tort reform and the changes implemented by judicial decisions, both perception and reality have changed. We have begun to restore credibility to state courts in the mind of the public and business, and have thus restored trust to government in Mississippi in general.

Since only a year has passed, the long-term consequences of tort reform cannot be known. There are thousands of cases in the system still governed by the old rules. There is enough information, however, to state unequivocally that tort reform has made the Mississippi legal environment more fair, more predictable and less expensive. For now, that is more than enough.

Mr. Ross is a Mississippi state senator and chairman of the Senate Judiciary A Committee.

North Korea Sets New Demand For Ending Arms Program: Money To Buy A Civilian Reactor (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 14 - North Korea demanded on Wednesday that the United States and other nations give it money to build a new light-water nuclear reactor before it will end its nuclear weapons program, a condition that appeared to undermine prospects for a breakthrough in the talks here.

The demand, made during the second day of six-nation nuclear talks, suggested that North Korea was coming up with fresh obstacles to signing a broadly worded commitment to denuclearize, the main goal of the negotiations.

"I must say it was a meeting in which we did not make a lot of progress," said Christopher Hill, the top American negotiator. "Neither the United States nor any other participant is prepared to fund a light-water reactor."

A light-water reactor would cost $2 billion to $3 billion and take about a decade to build, Mr. Hill said. While such reactors are less likely than North Korea's existing nuclear facilities to produce the raw materials for nuclear bombs, the United States has argued that they still pose proliferation risks.

"There are not too many other ways I know how to say 'no,' " he said after the United States had a one-on-one session with the North Koreans on Wednesday afternoon.

The Beijing talks resumed Tuesday after a five-week recess. China, Japan, Russia and South Korea are participating, as well as North Korea and the United States. The last round stretched over 13 days but failed to produce even a communiqué outlining objectives for future negotiations.

North Korea has said it is prepared to end its nuclear program in principle. But the conditions it sets for doing so have included, at various times, security guarantees, food and economic aid, diplomatic concessions and the withdrawal of American forces from South Korea.

The main stumbling block now is North Korea's insistence that it has the right to retain a civilian nuclear program even if it gives up its nuclear weapons.

The issue has divided the participants in the talks, with China, Russia and South Korea accepting North Korea's demand, while the United States and Japan have argued that the country cannot be trusted with any kind of nuclear technology, whether nominally peaceful or military.

American negotiators recently signaled a softening of that line, saying they would be willing to leave aside the issue of civilian uses of nuclear technology for now to clear the way for a general agreement on ending the North's weapons effort.

Speaking in New York on Tuesday, President Bush indicated some flexibility, saying, "It's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program, but there ought to be guidelines in which they be allowed to have that civilian nuclear program."

But Mr. Bush was referring to Iran, another budding nuclear weapons state, and his aides later denied that he intended to change the American position in the Beijing talks.

But United States officials drew a sharp line at building new reactors for North Korea.

The North Korean demand for a light-water reactor echoes the main benefit it received in a 1994 agreement, now defunct. At that time, an American-led consortium agreed to replace North Korea's graphite-moderated reactors, which produce plutonium, with two light-water reactors.

But construction was suspended in 2002 when the United States accused the North of violating the earlier accord by pursuing a separate, underground effort to enrich uranium for nuclear bombs. North Korea has since claimed to have reactivated its plutonium facilities and produced bomb fuel through that method.

Mr. Hill said North Korea should scrap its demand for new nuclear plants and accept a South Korean proposal to build power plants on its border with North Korea. Seoul has said it could provide enough kilowatts to match the output of all of the North's existing power plants combined.

China, the host, has circulated a draft agreement in which North Korea would commit to denuclearize in exchange for economic and energy aid as well as diplomatic and security benefits.

It has pushed the parties to agree to a draft text by this weekend, when both China and South Korea celebrate holidays, but it was unclear how long the talks would continue.

U.S. Again Rejects North Korea's Demands For A Nuclear Reactor (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

BEIJING -- North Korea insisted, in direct talks with American negotiators, that it would only give up its atomic-weapons programs if Washington and other participants in multilateral disarmament talks agreed to build the country a nuclear reactor to produce electricity, a demand the U.S. has already rejected.

The top U.S. envoy to the negotiations here, Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, said that a so-called light-water reactor of the sort North Korea wants "is simply not on the table." Mr. Hill said discussions with the North yesterday "did not make a lot of progress."

Pyongyang raised the issue of receiving a power reactor as compensation for abandoning its nuclear-weapons programs during two weeks of talks this summer that broke off without an agreement. It was rebuffed at the time, but has since made the demand central to the negotiations, dimming hopes for a breakthrough.

The North Korean delegation didn't have any public comment yesterday.

Mr. Hill said that neither the U.S. nor any other party to the talks, which also include delegations from China, Japan, Russia and South Korea, was "prepared to fund a light-water reactor." Mr. Hill said that the impoverished country needs to "get out of the nuclear business" and start "integrating itself into the world economy."

North Korea's push for a reactor is a replay of demands made during negotiations in the early 1990s. Those talks ended with a 1994 pact, the Agreed Framework, under which Pyongyang would first freeze and then dismantle nuclear-weapons programs. In return, a U.S.-led consortium was to build two light-water reactors in the North.

Construction started, but the agreement unraveled in late 2002 when the U.S. confronted North Korea with what the Americans say is evidence that Pyongyang cheated on the deal by starting a covert program to enrich uranium for weapons. Pyongyang has since expelled international inspectors and declared its possession of atomic bombs.

The administration of George W. Bush has harshly criticized the 1994 accord and vowed not to repeat what it calls the mistakes of the Clinton administration. Even if the White House were to have a change of heart, any such deal would be an extremely tough sell for the conservative U.S. Congress.

Mr. Hill encouraged the North to look favorably on the steps that the U.S. and others have said they are willing to take in exchange for Pyongyang's dismantling its nuclear programs. The package includes energy and economic assistance and security guarantees.

N. Korea Holds To Its Demands At Nuclear Talks (WP)

By Edward Cody

BEIJING, Sept. 14 -- Just-resumed negotiations on North Korean nuclear disarmament swiftly bogged down Wednesday in the same standoff that led to their suspension five weeks ago, undermining any hopes that the talks could move forward more easily after the recess.

In a bilateral meeting with U.S. diplomats, North Korea drove home its insistence on a light-water nuclear reactor for producing electricity as part of any bargain on dismantling its nuclear weapons program, according to the chief U.S. negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill. While briefing reporters afterward, Hill said he responded clearly that the United States would not agree.

"It's very clear they wanted to make this light-water reactor day," he said. "I hope they don't want to make it light-water reactor week. I don't know how many ways I can say no."

North Korean demands for a light-water reactor to produce electricity were the main sticking point when the fourth round of disarmament talks broke up here Aug. 7. "In certain respects, we have picked up where we left off," Hill said.

The Bush administration has refused to consider such a reactor for North Korea, saying the Pyongyang government cannot be trusted because in the 1990s it converted a research reactor into a source of weapons-grade plutonium for nuclear weapons. South Korea has proposed supplying electricity to North Korea as part of the nuclear disarmament agreement, which Hill suggested was a more practical way to meet North Korea's energy needs if that is the issue.

France Warns Iran Of U.N. Referral (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK -- French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin yesterday threatened to refer Iran's nuclear program to the U.N. Security Council, saying, "The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction ... calls for a determined response on our part."

"In the nuclear sphere, we have all put our trust in the International Atomic Energy Agency," Mr. de Villepin, whose government is one of three negotiating with Tehran on behalf of the IAEA, told the 15-nation Security Council.

"There are rights to uphold, in particular the peaceful use of nuclear energy. But there are also duties to enforce, for the security of all: If a state fails in its obligations under the Non-Proliferation Treaty, it is legitimate, once dialogue has been exhausted, to refer it to the Security Council."

At only the third U.N. Security Council meeting attended by the national leaders of the 15 council members, terrorism also was a focus. The leaders unanimously passed two resolutions -- one aimed at outlawing the incitement of terrorism and the other at preventing conflict, especially in Africa.

For months, France had resisted U.S. pressure to send a dispute over Iran's nuclear program to the United Nations for possible sanctions.

Mr. de Villepin's remarks yesterday came after a failed attempt by France, Britain and Germany to negotiate an end to the nuclear standoff.

A vote by the Vienna, Austria-based IAEA could come as early as Monday.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei called yesterday for Iran to be given a final chance to address IAEA concerns.

"Everything points in the direction of a need for more time. So it would be in everybody's favor to give it some three or four weeks," a senior diplomat close to the IAEA told Reuters news agency on the condition of anonymity.

The 35-member IAEA board of governors is said to be divided on whether to refer Iran to the Security Council.

The United States was an early advocate to refer Iran to the council, where members can urge Tehran to meet its obligations or face sanctions.

President Bush did not mention Iran by name during either of his two speeches today.

In his first U.N. appearance yesterday, new Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad did not address the nuclear dispute directly.

He denounced the "production and use of weapons of mass destruction, intimidations, resort to the threat or use of force and imposition of destructive wars on peoples."

Mr. Ahmadinejad will address the General Assembly again on Saturday, where he could outline a proposal to avert the standoff with the IAEA.

About 2,000 Iranian exiles who oppose Mr. Ahmadinejad held a demonstration across the street from the United Nations in which they denounced the president as a "terrorist."

As a signatory to the Non-Proliferation Treaty, Tehran agrees to only peaceful uses of atomic energy and must submit to IAEA monitoring of all facilities.

India Balks At Confronting Iran, Straining Its Friendship With U.S. (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

DOJ_NMG_0005639

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 14 - A few months after the United States and India elevated their relationship to a new level with a broad accord, a fresh irritant has disrupted the friendship - the Bush administration's insistence that a reluctant India join in the confrontation over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

India, with a longstanding friendship with Tehran, is demurring.

"The Indians are emerging from their nonaligned status and becoming a global power, and they have to begin to think about their responsibilities," said a senior administration official. "They have to make a basic choice."

The choice being posed to India is to enlist in, or rebuff, the European-led effort to get a majority on the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency to vote next week to refer the matter of Iran's nuclear activities to the United Nations Security Council for possible consideration of sanctions.

Indian officials say they agree that Iran should not be allowed to get nuclear weapons and that it has failed to disclose elements of its program to international inspections. But they say that bringing the issue to the Security Council will backfire, especially by provoking Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

"You have to allow a certain learning process to take place in Tehran rather than banging them on the head," said an Indian official, who asked not to be quoted by name because of the delicate nature of the discussions.

Mr. Ahmadinejad briefly addressed the United Nations General Assembly on Wednesday, speaking in generalities by warning against "pre-emptive measures" by unnamed states, a comment that some listeners took to be a reference either to the Iraq war or the possibility of Security Council action against the Tehran government.

Past attempts by the United States and leading European nations to move the issue to the Security Council have been rebuffed by several members of the International Atomic Energy Agency's governing board. A new attempt is to be made next week, but it is not clear that it will succeed.

Bush administration officials say that with India's support, there is a chance of mustering a majority vote. But Indian officials say they prefer not to seek a majority vote but rather to get some sort of consensus among board members demanding that Iran go back to suspending its nuclear activities or negotiating to give up its programs.

"Whether we get a consensus depends on what kind of resolution we have," said the Indian official, noting that by tradition the atomic energy agency does not take any action except by consensus.

In some ways, the tensions between India and the United States are reminiscent of the cold war, when Washington expected India to stand up to the Soviet Union and was regularly disappointed. While India professed a nonaligned status, some in Washington saw it as a satellite of Moscow.

Now India is in the middle between the West and Iran, with which it has tried to foster a close relationship, and is discussing construction of a natural gas pipeline.

Iran has warned that moving the issue of its conduct to the Security Council would be a provocation, and it has waged a successful campaign to get at least a third, and perhaps more, of the votes on the I.A.E.A.'s board to side with it.

Normally, blocking a "consensus" at the board is enough to block any action at all. But American officials say that with India's help, they can obtain a majority vote - if not next week, then within a few months - to refer Iran to the Security Council.

A separate theme of the American-Indian tensions is energy. The centerpiece of the accord President Bush and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh signed last July effectively exempted India from decades of international rules under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. Under the agreement, which represented an extraordinary change of policy, the United States agreed to share peaceful nuclear energy technology with India even though it possesses nuclear weapons.

In effect, Bush administration officials say, India must now choose who is the best partner to meet its surging energy needs - Iran with its natural gas resources or the West with its ability to help in developing Indian civilian nuclear power.

Administration officials have warned India that if it fails to cooperate on Iran, the civilian nuclear energy agreement negotiated last summer could be rejected by Congress.

Dealers Smuggle Weapons Into Gaza From Egypt (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

RAFAH, Gaza Strip, Sept. 14 (AP) - Palestinian gunrunners smuggled hundreds of assault rifles and pistols across the Egyptian frontier into Gaza, dealers and border officials said Wednesday. The influx confirmed Israeli fears about giving up border control and could further destabilize Gaza.

Black market prices for weapons dropped sharply, with the price of AK-47 assault rifles nearly cut in half, to $1,300, and even steeper reductions for handguns.

The Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, has tried to impose order since the Israeli troop withdrawal from Gaza on Monday, but militant groups scoffed at a new demand by the Palestinian Authority that they must disband after parliamentary elections in January, saying they would not surrender their weapons.

Israel voiced concern about chaos along the Egypt-Gaza border in the three days since its pullout, sending messages to the United States, Egypt and the Palestinians. "We will not put up with this," Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said.

Egypt had assured Israel that it would prevent weapons smuggling once its troops took over from Israel along the Gaza frontier, and Cairo and the Palestinian Authority pledged to seal the border by Wednesday evening. Thousands had crossed unhindered since Monday.

Around 8 p.m. Wednesday, about two hours after the deadline for closing the border, an Egyptian officer bellowed into a bullhorn for Palestinians to stop entering Egypt and prepare to return to Gaza.

The frontier was still porous later, however, with the Egyptian police pushing back Palestinians scaling the wall on the Gaza side and trying to sneak through the barbed-wire fence on the Egyptian side. Up to 750 Egyptian border guards were expected Thursday, the police said.

Palestinian security forces in Gaza appeared to be doing little to stop infiltrators. At midday, Hamas militants blew a hole in the Gaza wall, making it even easier for people to enter the 18-foot-wide buffer zone leading to Egypt's fence.

One arms dealer, interviewed in a car outside the Rafah cemetery, said hundreds of AK-47's had been smuggled from Egypt since Monday. He said he sold his guns to militants but declined to say how many pieces his runners brought back.

Another dealer said competitors reported having $1 million worth of loot confiscated, including grenade launchers.

Palestinians Rush Over Egypt Border (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

RAFAH, Gaza Strip -- Scores of Palestinians crossed from the Gaza Strip into Egypt yesterday evening before Egyptian security forces moved to close the border in an attempt to restore order three days after Israel left the territory.

The frontier was still porous hours after the clampdown, however, with about a dozen Egyptian police pushing back Palestinians scaling the concrete wall on the Gaza side and trying to sneak through the barbed-wire fence on the Egyptian side. Hundreds of Egyptian border guards were expected this morning to enforce the closure in earnest.

Palestinian security forces in Gaza apparently were doing little to stop infiltrators, and earlier yesterday, Hamas militants -- unhindered by Palestinian police -- blew a hole in the Gaza barrier, making it even easier for people to reach the Egyptian fence.

Elsewhere in Gaza, a militant disrupted a celebratory rally at an abandoned Jewish settlement, grabbing a microphone from a rap singer. He was led away by police firing into the air. No one was injured.

Imposing security in unruly Gaza is seen as the key test of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' government. Earlier yesterday, one of his top aides announced what he said was a new plan of action -- including a demand that armed groups disband immediately after parliamentary elections in January.

Hamas reiterated that it would not disarm, and Palestinian officials cautioned that they will not risk civil war, despite intense international pressure to confront militants.

Mr. Abbas' security forces largely have displayed weakness since the Israeli withdrawal. By contrast, Hamas brought tens of thousands into Gaza City's main square late Tuesday -- the first day Palestinians controlled Gaza -- for the biggest rally here by the Islamic militant group.

Mr. Abbas stayed away from an official celebration that he had scheduled for yesterday near the ruins of the Neve Dekalim settlement. An aide said he was concerned about gunmen.

The rally had been billed as a show of Palestinian unity, but most factions stayed away. Hamas scheduled another rally for tomorrow.

At the border yesterday, Egyptian police arrived about an hour after the 6 p.m. deadline. A senior officer bellowed into a bullhorn, telling Palestinians to stop entering Egypt and prepare to return to Gaza.

"I don't care about the closure; we can get in and out anytime we want," Palestinian university student Khaled al-Massari said after crossing from Gaza after the deadline.

Egypt also said yesterday that its border guards found an arms-smuggling tunnel under the Gaza border in the al-Duhniya area, 2½ miles south of the Rafah crossing point.

The tunnel, found Tuesday evening, contained 38 firearms and three rocket-propelled grenades, a security official said. It extended to the Palestinian side of the frontier, and Palestinian security forces seized the weapons yesterday, the official said.

In Gaza, Mr. Rayes Struggles To Replant Bulldozed Olive Trees (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

GAZA CITY, Gaza -- In the predawn darkness, Mohammad Rayes arrived at the edge of a Palestinian neighborhood called Zeitoun to celebrate with family and friends the recovery of his 37-acre farm from Israeli occupation. With the rising sun an hour later, the challenge ahead of him sank in.

At the front of his property, Mr. Rayes stared at a heap of twisted metal bars and crumbled concrete blocks -- the remnants of his farmhouse and chicken coop. At the far end, he saw a 10-foot wall of sand left behind by Israel's military. And all of Mr. Rayes's 2,500 citrus and olive trees had been bulldozed, then buried under the sand.

For the 66-year-old farmer, it was almost too much to take in. "I have to start all over again," he said.

The Israeli army's departure from the Gaza Strip this week after 38 years of occupation marks a new era for Palestinians. Once divided into tightly controlled cantons separated by 21 Jewish communities, Gaza's 1.3 million residents can now go where they want, when they want. Under Israeli occupation, their lives had been severely restricted, particularly in the past five years. So for many, this is freedom only dreamed about until now.

Still, there are major concerns. With the Israelis gone, Gaza teeters on the brink of lawlessness as armed groups fight each other and the official Palestinian quasi-government, the Palestinian Authority. The Palestinian Authority remains weak and plagued by corruption, while the Israelis have kept control of Gaza's borders. That leaves Palestinian Gazans with little control over a key element of their economic well-being: who and what can enter and leave Gaza. Some Palestinians say they fear Gaza could turn into a large prison.

Mr. Rayes and his three sons, two of whom live abroad, have spent the past few months cooking up big plans for post-Israel life in Gaza. Mr. Rayes wants to get his farm running again. His sons want to build a factory on part of the land.

For now, those are distant dreams. When Israel's army took over Mr. Rayes's farm a year ago, it wiped out his income and forced him to live off savings. Even before the farmhouse was bulldozed, he spent most nights at the home he maintains in Gaza City, and he still has that.

Just hours after he got his farm back, Mr. Rayes was faced with securing it from Palestinian looters and squatters. "I'm afraid people will think my land is part of the settlement," Mr. Rayes said, pointing toward the once heavily fortified Jewish settlement of Netzarim, recently emptied of residents. Moments later, a young Palestinian tried to cart off a downed electricity cable at the edge of his land. Mr. Rayes and several hired hands shooed the boy away.

Born into a wealthy family, Mr. Rayes has lived his whole life under foreign occupation -- first the British, then Egyptians and finally Israelis. He made the best of it. In the 1970s and 1980s, he worked with Israeli agricultural experts to turn the family farm into a thriving business. He earned more than $150,000 some years. He shared the income with several brothers and sisters who still own part of the farm. A fluent Hebrew speaker, Mr. Rayes recalls that time fondly, ticking off the names of Israelis he says were friends. "Gaza was a better place back then," he says.

In the 1990s, tensions with nearby Jewish settlements mounted, eventually spilling over into violence in 2000. Palestinian militants began using Mr. Rayes's farm as an occasional venue to launch mortar and gun attacks. Mr. Rayes says he asked them to stop, but they ignored him. With each attack, Israel destroyed a bigger stretch of Mr. Rayes's farm. Events of the last year finally made the place uninhabitable and Mr. Rayes stopped going there.

Now, Mr. Rayes says he doesn't have enough money to rehabilitate and replant his farm. He figures he will need at least $300,000. Though international donors, including the World Bank, plan to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into Gaza over the next year, Mr. Rayes says officials at the Palestinian Authority's Ministry of Agriculture told him during a recent visit that he may not qualify for aid.

In a region where corruption has flourished over the past decade, Mr. Rayes fears some officials may seek kickbacks in return for releasing aid funds. "There is simply no plan in place, nothing," he says.

Palestinian officials say they have a plan but that it's incomplete. They blame Israel for that. Because the pullout was unilateral, they weren't given much of a chance to get ready. This week, President Mahmoud Abbas, in a speech, detailed some investment plans but not in the kind of detail people are looking for. They want to know how they are to be compensated for lost property.

Even more unnerving, Mr. Rayes says, is talk that his land may be devoured by a new seaport the Palestinian government hopes to build along the coast. Already, Mr. Rayes says officials have told him that he will need permission from the government to replant. He has heard that his land may be expropriated, and that his compensation will be a patch of land in a far less fertile area. Or, perhaps, he will get money, which he says he doesn't want.

Such speculation is also complicating his sons' dream of building a factory. Mr. Rayes's middle son, Fayya, is a senior engineer with Procter & Gamble in the Middle East and has helped put together an initial plan to build as a family venture a detergent and toilet-paper factory that could cost more than $500,000 and employ hundreds of Gazans. Yet even if the Rayes family retains its land and builds the plant, there are other things to worry about.

"We don't know if Israel will open the border so we can export," says Mr. Rayes's youngest son, Hamam, sitting in a canvas tent he and his father put up hours after Israel left Gaza. Sipping a cup of coffee, he added, "Gaza is poor and if we can't export, the factory doesn't really make sense."

For both father and son, perhaps the greatest fear is Gaza's rampant lawlessness -- from gunbattles between militants to the absence of simple traffic regulations. With Israel now gone, Mr. Rayes says he hopes Mr. Abbas will start to exert control over the battling factions and members of his own government who work more for personal gain than for the public's benefit.

Mr. Rayes says he rejects the militant view of the Palestinian faction Hamas, which wants to conquer all of Israel. But he says Hamas has grown so strong that it may be impossible for the Palestinian government security forces to block its attacks on Israel. That could prompt reprisals and, he says, even the return of Israel's military to Gaza.

But for now, Mr. Rayes says his sole task is to hire a Palestinian bulldozer that can unearth his buried olive and citrus trees and then level his land. On Monday and Tuesday, he began that process by torching the dry weeds and underbrush that have grown up over the past year. Once the trees are unearthed and removed, he says, he plans to approach the government again in hopes of getting a grant to rebuild the irrigation network and buy new trees.

Back at the tent with his son, he looked over his land as the sun set. "More than anything, what we need now is a period of calm," he said. "But only God knows if we'll get that."

Bad Start In Gaza (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Only days after the final withdrawal of Israeli forces, the Gaza Strip is on the verge of anarchy. Despite promises to impose law and order, the Palestinian Authority has allowed mobs of looters and armed extremists to rampage through former Jewish settlements, where they have burned or bulldozed synagogues left standing by Israel. Many of the valuable greenhouses that, with the generous help of international donors, were saved for use by the Palestinians have been stripped of equipment as police stood by and watched. Despite a formal agreement with Israel to maintain security, Egypt has allowed thousands of Palestinians to illegally cross its border, including rifle-brandishing militants. If it is not quickly checked, the disorder will destroy Palestinian hopes that the Gaza transfer will become a step toward statehood.

This week's events further undermine the claim of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas that he can impose democratic rule of law in Gaza without directly confronting armed extremist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Mr. Abbas keeps declaring that only Palestinian security forces will be allowed weapons and that "no one is above the law." But he also keeps shrinking from confronting the gunmen who have been parading through former Jewish settlements or punching holes in the border fence between Gaza and Egypt. "We are not going to tolerate chaos after today," Mr. Abbas declared on Tuesday. Yesterday, as the chaos continued, he instead canceled his appearance at a rally organized by his own administration.

Mr. Abbas's problem is in part one of weakness; it's not certain that the security forces loyal to him could impose order by force in Gaza even if he ordered them to. Egypt's failure is far harder to excuse. The government of Hosni Mubarak formally committed itself to send Egyptian troops to replace the Israeli army on the border between Gaza and Egypt and to maintain security. No agreement has yet been reached on opening a crossing, mainly because of Israel's legitimate security concerns. But Egyptian troops this week have allowed thousands of Palestinians to pass back and forth, urged on by Hamas fighters who have blown holes in the fence. Egypt announced that it would put a stop to the traffic by yesterday evening. According to news reports, the crossings continued.

The Gaza withdrawal should have been a step toward an Israeli-Palestinian settlement; instead, it could become a leap away from it. The big winner so far is Hamas, which rejects Israel's existence. In Israel, continuing disorder will give a boost to hard-line challengers to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the architect of the Gaza evacuation. As it is, Mr. Sharon probably will reiterate in an address to the United Nations today that Israel will consider no more territorial withdrawals or other concessions to the Palestinians until militant groups are dismantled. Unless Palestinian and Egyptian leaders take immediate steps to fulfill their commitments in Gaza, they will bear the responsibility for a new stalemate -- or worse -- in the Middle East.

U.S. And European Reluctance To Cut Farm Subsidies Weighs On Trade Talks (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - With three months left before a crucial deadline in global talks to reduce trade barriers, top negotiators for the United States and the European Union were still far apart on Wednesday on reducing the elaborate protections for their own farmers.

"We've both got our homework to do," Rob Portman, the United States trade representative, said after meetings here with Peter Mandelson, the European Union's trade minister.

American and European officials are trying to breathe new life into the so-called Doha Round of trade talks, which are supposed to lead to an agreement on a basic framework at meetings in December in Hong Kong.

But the global negotiations, aimed at reducing trade barriers in goods as well as services, have been bogged down in large part because of the reluctance by the United States and the European Union to reduce tariffs on imported crops and subsidies for domestic farmers.

That reluctance has spurred a rebellion of sorts by many large developing countries, like Brazil and India, which are demanding more access for their own farm products in exchange for lowering barriers to manufactured goods and services.

President Bush, addressing the United Nations on Wednesday, urged countries to push ahead and promised to end all American subsidies and tariffs if other nations did so as well.

"Today, I broaden the challenge by making this pledge," Mr. Bush said. "The United States is ready to eliminate tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same."

But both American and European leaders are reluctant to give up their farm protections.

European leaders have agreed to eliminate all export subsidies for farm products, but they still have high tariff barriers and pay tens of billions of dollars a year in farm subsidies.

The United States has lower tariffs on most farm imports, but it retains high barriers for products like sugar and orange juice and it pays out billions of dollars in subsidies to producers of cotton, corn, beef and other commodities.

On Wednesday, Mr. Portman and Mr. Mandelson put the best spin possible on their meetings but offered no evidence that they had bridged the gap between them.

Mr. Portman said the talks had been "very frank and constructive," adding that "we understand our responsibilities as the two great trading partners in the global economy."

Both he and Mr. Mandelson expressed support for an approach floated in July by the Group of 20, a collection of large developing nations, which would divide countries into five groups and let the less-developed nations reduce their barriers more slowly.

Mr. Mandelson said the United States and Europe needed to offer "joint leadership" and said "it is essential that we build a common and coordinated platform."

But European officials have made it clear they do not want to reduce their internal subsidies more than the amount prescribed by the European Union's Common Agriculture Policy.

That policy calls for reductions of up to 70 percent below the level that Europe is allowed under its current obligations to the World Trade Organization.

American officials insist that Europe make deeper cuts. But the Bush administration is under heavy pressure from Congress to preserve up to $19 billion a year in farm subsidies. The 2002 farm bill passed by Congress, which Mr. Bush supported, greatly increased support payments for farmers and is set to expire at the end of 2007.

Administration officials have yet to signal which farm subsidies they would promise to reduce, and farm state legislators are already bracing to defend their local producers.

Both Mr. Portman and Mr. Mandelson said the benefits of freer trade would far outweigh the losses, and Mr. Portman argued that individual European countries should focus on the broader export opportunities in manufactured goods and lucrative services rather than on their fears about parochial interests.

But Claude E. Barfield, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research group in Washington, said the chances of a comprehensive trade agreement by December were "dim."

"It just seems that people are so far apart, and that they are apart in so many areas," Mr. Barfield said. "Here we are and it's already mid-September. You have to have the agreements pretty much in place a month before Hong Kong."

Pascal Lamy, director general of the World Trade Organization, warned last Friday that time was running out.

"The problems are numerous and time is fading," Mr. Lamy told reporters in Berne, Switzerland. "There are a mountain of subjects to address and I hope that it can be climbed."

Tough Decision In German Vote, Onetime Outsider Offers Big Changes (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker And Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

BERLIN -- When Angela Merkel first entered politics in the early 1990s, she was the token East German woman in a cabinet dominated by men from the West. Chancellor Helmut Kohl made her his minister of women's affairs. He nicknamed her "my girl."

A few years later, amid a campaign-funding scandal, she helped end his career.

It was time, Ms. Merkel wrote in a 1999 newspaper article, to leave "the old warhorse" behind. She suggested the man who had reunified Germany and led its conservative Christian Democrats for a quarter of a century should step aside. Within weeks Ms. Merkel, a former physicist, had become head of the party.

In a general election this Sunday, Ms. Merkel is favored to become leader of the world's third-largest economy. Her Christian Democratic Union, which maintains a narrowing lead in the polls, has promised to end Germany's economic malaise by shaking up longstanding labor, tax and social policies.

For German voters, Ms. Merkel's economic platform is their clearest chance yet to scale back bloated welfare programs. Ms. Merkel's election could also shift the balance of European politics, drawing Germany closer to the flexible markets of countries like Britain and isolating its longtime ally, France.

One of the biggest question marks in Germany's future is Ms. Merkel herself. Some observers have likened the 51-year-old politician to Margaret Thatcher, the British prime minister whose policies revived that country's economy in the 1980s. But though Ms. Merkel has at times proved shrewd and ruthless in advancing her career, her ability to drive profound political change is untested. She has been uncomfortable and distant on the campaign trail, and even Germans in her own party oppose many of her economic proposals.

Still, Ms. Merkel's life story suggests that it would be unwise to count her out. An outsider whose rapid political rise defied convention, she is unencumbered by the traditions of German politics and business. She was raised by a Lutheran minister behind the Iron Curtain. The communist East German regime spied on her, but her individualistic ideals found small outlets in poetry and hitchhiking. When the Berlin Wall fell, she was a political novice. Yet she fought her way to the top of a party dominated by a close-knit network of older men from predominantly Catholic parts of the former West Germany.

On the economic front, Ms. Merkel is promising to cut some welfare benefits and weaken job guarantees. (See related article.5) Germany has higher taxes on labor than most other countries, limiting the ability of business to create new jobs. Partly as a result, the unemployment rate has risen to 11.4%. "The labor market is a market in name only," Ms. Merkel said during a interview conducted in German at her office in Berlin. "Germany has to get used to the idea again that it can only redistribute what it produces."

Fueled by hopes that Ms. Merkel can lower labor costs, Germany's DAX stock market index has risen 20% since May, when current Chancellor Gerhard Schröder called for early elections. The country's affluent middle class is solidly behind Ms. Merkel, and this week Germany's leading business group announced it would back her.

Ms. Merkel's party and its smaller allies are polling several points ahead of Mr. Schröder's incumbent center-left coalition. But if conservatives fall short of a majority, they will have to govern with support from Mr. Schröder's Social Democrats. Such a "grand coalition" of Germany's two major parties would likely force Ms. Merkel to make major compromises on her economic plans.

Even if Ms. Merkel wins an outright majority, she may find it difficult to push through her reform agenda. Resistance to overturning Germany's generous welfare programs runs deep, and ambitious regional governors have the power to form alliances that can block the central government. Also, unlike nearly every German leader who has preceded her, Ms. Merkel lacks a strong regional power base.

"It will be difficult for her," predicts Dagmar Schipanski, a university professor and Christian Democratic Union colleague. "She has a limited circle of trusted friends."

Ms. Merkel was born in 1954 in Hamburg, West Germany, at the height of the Cold War. Her father, a Lutheran minister, later moved the family to a small town 50 miles north of Berlin in what was then East Germany. The atheist regime frowned on the church, and often discriminated against ministers' children, blocking their education and careers.

Never a dissident or activist, Ms. Merkel nonetheless had a tense relationship with the state. As a teenager, she was once nearly expelled from school for reciting a "bourgeois" poem. On trips to Poland, she made friends with Solidarity supporters. The East German state security service, or Stasi, kept a file on Ms. Merkel stamped PID, for "political-ideological deviation."

She rebelled in other ways. In 1984, Ms. Merkel made an illegal hitchhiking trip through the Soviet Union with two female friends. In an account confirmed by her spokeswoman, for three weeks the companions avoided hotels and railway stations where they might be asked to show their papers. They were finally caught in Georgia, when the off-duty policeman with whom they had hitched a ride was stopped for speeding.

At the local police headquarters, Ms. Merkel escaped by appealing to the Georgians' national pride, waxing lyrical about the region's beauty. "Right away we were asked: Had we seen the capital, Tbilisi? We absolutely had to see that!" Ms. Merkel is quoted as saying in a biography by journalist Wolfgang Stock. The police let them go.

Ms. Merkel, who excelled at math and science, eventually obtained a post at the Academy of Sciences in East Berlin. It was the communist state's top scientific institution, but Ms. Merkel was relegated to a converted workers barracks tucked behind overgrown shrubbery. Her work in quantum chemistry was considered marginal because it had no industrial relevance.

Fellow physicist Michael Schindhelm recalls that doing worthwhile research was difficult. Because neither he nor Ms. Merkel was a member of the communist party, they weren't permitted to travel to the West or even read most Western science publications. The laboratory's computers and equipment were obsolete. "We tried to focus on research you could do with a pencil and paper," Mr. Schindhelm says.

The experience helped sharpen Ms. Merkel's political views. Mr. Schindhelm says he and Ms. Merkel both became convinced that the overbearing East German state had caused a decay of society by undermining individual responsibility. "In a different form, we're experiencing something similar now in unified Germany," he says.

The night the Berlin Wall fell in 1989, Ms. Merkel was returning home from a weekly sauna. Carrying a damp towel, she crossed into the West with thousands of other East Germans and quickly realized that the regime was doomed. Three weeks later, she left her job and joined a new political party dedicated to reunifying Germany and developing a free-market economy.

Ms. Merkel made herself indispensable in the tiny party. She got the computers out of their boxes and put them to use. She became a party spokeswoman, and she began to develop ideas on economic policy. In a 1990 newspaper article, she argued that East Germany should rebuild by limiting the state's economic role to fostering competition and fighting monopolies.

West Germany's economic boom of the 1950s and 1960s had been built on similar ideas, first advanced by economists at Freiburg University. The Freiburg school held that a "social market economy" could create prosperity for all, not just the rich.

Today, Ms. Merkel believes Germany has gone too far in insulating its citizens against the risks of the marketplace. Since the mid-1960s, Germany's state spending on the unemployed and pensioners has grown faster than gross domestic product or tax revenues, leading to ever-larger debts, she says. "That violates the sustainability of the social market economy," she says.

Ms. Merkel's initial foray into politics proved lucky. Her small party polled less than 1% in March 1990 East German elections, but Ms. Merkel's job as press spokeswoman had won her notice. The ruling Christian Democratic Union, then led by Mr. Kohl, was short on women and eastern Germans. In late 1990 Mr. Kohl recruited her to join his cabinet.

Over the next eight years, Ms. Merkel held second-tier ministerial posts. Gradually, her party's hold on power began to weaken as the German economy strained to extend generous social benefits to the industrially moribund East. After 16 years in office, voters ejected Mr. Kohl and the CDU in 1998.

As the CDU reorganized the following year, Ms. Merkel seized on a defining political moment. A German arms dealer living in Canada revealed he had made an undeclared one-million-mark donation to the party's coffers, worth about $540,000 at the time. Mr. Kohl, still the party's honorary chairman, admitted he had systematically accepted illegal political gifts.

A few days later, Ms. Merkel called the conservative newspaper Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung and offered to write an article on the funding affair. Five minutes later the faxed text arrived at the paper's offices, according to Mr. Stock's biography. It was a devastating assault on her mentor. "The party has to learn how to find its own feet" without its longtime leader, she wrote.

Ms. Merkel's stand proved hugely popular with the CDU's rank and file. Within a few months, they had elected her party chairwoman.

Prof. Schipanski, her CDU colleague, remembers Ms. Merkel calculating her moves with scientific logic. "She said very clearly that she would take this position [on Kohl] but she would do it alone. She wouldn't rely on the men," she says.

As head of her party, Ms. Merkel believed she was poised to run for chancellor as new elections approached in 2002. She updated her dowdy hairstyle and purchased a new wardrobe. She made the rounds of TV programs, speaking about the challenges facing Germany's next chancellor.

Behind the scenes her rapid political ascent had hit a wall. A then-secret coalition within the CDU decided to block her candidacy and instead back Edmund Stoiber, leader of the CDU's smaller Bavarian sister party, the Christian Social Union. One by one, some of Germany's most influential political figures came to Ms. Merkel and asked her to stand aside.

"Some of us believe we helped her," says Friedbert Pflüger, a CDU politician who was part of the coalition that backed Mr. Stoiber. "At the time it would have been too early and many people would not have supported her. A woman from the East, Protestant, very young -- this needed time."

When it became clear she lacked support in her own party, Ms. Merkel turned up early one morning at Mr. Stoiber's home near Munich. She agreed that he would be the candidate, and said that she would back him. "What was impressive was that she didn't for an hour give the impression of being a loser," says Mr. Pflüger.

After Mr. Stoiber lost at the polls, Ms. Merkel's show of loyalty helped assure her the leading role among Germany's conservatives.

If she wins on Sunday, Ms. Merkel has plans to raise Germany's sales tax by two percentage points to 18% in order to cut employers' and workers' contributions to unemployment insurance. She believes this will reduce labor costs and create new jobs for Germany's 4.7 million unemployed.

Ms. Merkel also hired a controversial academic, Paul Kirchhof, as her economic adviser. Mr. Kirchhof, who could be Germany's next finance minister, is an advocate of a flat 25% income tax and says he wants to abolish all subsidies and exemptions in Germany's tax code.

Such changes are likely to face substantial resistance in Germany. The CDU, which polls showed had a comfortable 23-percentage-point edge in June, has seen its lead narrow to around 9 points yesterday. Polls of German television viewers found Ms. Merkel came off badly in a recent debate against Mr. Schröder.

At a recent rally in the eastern German city of Erfurt, Ms. Merkel's supporters did their best to make her seem more appealing. Party activists waved placards bearing her nickname, "Angie," while a public-address system blared out the song of the same name by the Rolling Stones. Ms. Merkel lectured the crowd with a stump speech on Germany's rising public-sector debt.

In the East, where unemployment is 18%, her pitch doesn't go down well. Cutting benefits will mean more hardship in a region where many depend on government assistance. And Ms. Merkel is seen as an outsider even here. Wolfgang Riese, a tax consultant drinking beer from a plastic cup on the edge of the rally, said he'll vote for the former East German communist party, which still gets around a third of the vote in the region. "She tries to represent all of Germany, but Easterners think she represents them too little, while Westerners think she's from out East," says Mr. Riese.

Say It Slowly -- 'Zukunftsangst' (WSJ)

By Gabor Steingart

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

BERLIN -- Germany is haunted. My countrymen see ghosts everywhere as they go to the polls this Sunday.

When neo-Nazis are elected to a regional parliament, many fear a resurgence of Hitler. When a left-wing splinter party gains strength, scores believe they see the ghost of communism. Because Angela Merkel, leader of the opposition Christian Democratic Union, has proposed a larger dose of reform policy than Gerhard Schröder, the current chancellor, millions see her as the reincarnation of Maggie Thatcher. No wonder pollsters have found a level of fear in this election campaign that is greater than anything we've ever experienced since the war. A balance of terror has emerged: Fear of unemployment competes with fear of an overly radical fight against it. Empty state coffers cause the same horror as the budget cuts designed to overcome them. Some call for a serious increase in genetic research, which leads others reflexively to cringe.

Everyone is terrified of everyone. As if of its own accord, the word "fear" attaches itself to the word "future" -- Zukunftsangst permeates the German mind. Fear of reform, fear of stagnation, fear of a failure of democracy and now -- as the frantic climax of this collective neurosis -- the fear of a further growth of fear.

The result is political exhaustion on all sides. On Sunday, Europe's largest industrialized country will most likely elect the weakest of all postwar governments -- assuming the result even allows a government to be formed. If the Social Democrat Mr. Schröder wins, he will not be able to do much with his victory. During the campaign he moved far away from his own convictions in order to collect the disheartened and insecure. His party is once again humming old working-class songs and its traditionalist members couldn't be happier.

But the politician Schröder now lives to the left of reality. He's never been so distant from his spiritual neighbor Tony Blair. Even if he wanted to move back again after a successful election, his party would not allow him to return to reality. His line of retreat is cut off. If he wins, he'll be in government, but not in power.

If Ms. Merkel wins, she won't have much to celebrate either. The 140-square-meter office of the head of government stands in stark contrast to the small amount of power she would actually have. At least at the beginning she'd be a chancellor of limited possibilities. Three things would prevent the kind of powerful governance of which she recently spoke in Parliament.

One is the outcome of the election itself: Her majority against the post-communists, environmentalists and Social Democrats will be razor thin -- if she can win at all. That is not what a mandate for radical reform looks like. The more clearly she informs Germans of her intentions, the more they back away from her in horror. The absolute majority projected in surveys melted away with breathtaking speed. Germans' fear was greater than her powers of persuasion.

Second: There are rumblings in her own party. For the powerful provincial princes, this was a unsatisfying campaign. No one in the conservative ranks had expected that the chancellor, who had decided upon early elections because of a lack of loyalty in his own ranks, would be able to revitalize himself. His deathbed resurrection is blamed on Ms. Merkel. She was courageous; she was honest; she was even precise. In short, she did everything wrong. She ran a campaign counter to rational party tactics. She announced a tax increase, called for privatizing nursing care insurance and told subsidy recipients, night workers, commuters and home builders that they could no longer expect government handouts. The fear increased, the support shrank. The men in her party's second and third tiers will never forgive her for that. These gentlemen are panting for revenge, and they'll have plenty of opportunity to pay her back.

Through the Bundesrat, the upper house of parliament that represents the states, the princes possess a de facto veto. Eleven of 16 heads of state governments come from the conservative party. The German defect, that paralyzing arrangement of checks and balances built into the system after 1945, is very convenient for them. They take part in discussions, share in decision-making -- and block progress. Ms. Merkel's hardline enemies are just waiting to topple her. Most probably, however, the more moderate among her rivals will prevail. They have taken it upon themselves to wear her out in office.

Of course, Ms. Merkel also has supporters, especially among the party base. She has to spoil these people with presentable achievements, which leads us to the third reason for her lack of political power -- the most serious, although she's not responsible for it. Germany's decline is farther along than the public realizes. No rapid successes can be expected -- especially not from a woman with no mandate for a new start. Her government will be of the lowest common denominator. The ghosts will be sitting at the government table. Fear will soon possess cabinet status.

Ms. Merkel knows everything one has to know about the state of the nation. She knows the data, and in her years in opposition she took a thorough look at the economy. Much of it reminds her of the decline of East Germany, which she experienced as a scientist in Berlin. She recognizes this refusal to acknowledge, the looking away, the wavering in the face of danger.

A glance at the state's finances shows how dramatic the situation is: Of 190 billion euros in tax revenues, 80 billion is passed on to the cash-strapped state pension system, 30 billion goes to the unemployed, and another 40 billion belongs to the banks, just to service debt. The rest is not even enough to pay the bureaucracy and to build roads. Ever-new credits are constantly needed so that Germany at least has the appearance of a prosperous country.

Relief is not in sight because the birth-rate has fallen by half since the early 1960s and so the work force will also soon fall by half. Two retirees will then be financed by one worker, which would be too much for everyone -- the workers and the state. If nothing changes, the government will need 80% of the state budget in 2050 just to prop up pensions.

The task of building up the German east is another factor. The region once dominated by the Soviets devours a fortune, and has cost 1.4 trillion euros so far. For 15 years, the western part of Germany has been transferring 4% of its GDP to the East. Because the West has not grown by 4% for decades -- at best by half of that -- the transfer payments are depleting reserves. Former Ford manager and Social Democrat Klaus von Dohnanyi speaks of a "permanent loss of blood from our economy."

Ms. Merkel knows the forces at work here. They are pulling the country, as well as its chancellor, down -- down to the place where the wellspring of eternal fear flows. No nation likes to lose a piece of its power and prosperity each day. German assertiveness is thus Ms. Merkel's natural coalition partner. She must ally herself with it, promote it and let it grow into a mighty political force.

Willpower is society's most underestimated productive force in history. Historians don't like it because they cannot measure it or ask it any questions. But states do not consist only of armed forces, banks and steel mills, and more or less diligent civil servants. Every country is propelled by a mixture of ambition and pride, which can bring forth both the reprehensible and the great. Angela Merkel has a chance if she succeeds in mobilizing this force of will behind her policies, and thus puts an end to the haunting. Before she takes on the details of pension and tax reforms, there is something more important to do: It's time to call in "Die Geisterjäger" -- the Ghostbusters.

Father's Ideals Forged Life In East For German Candidate (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

TEMPLIN, Germany - Half a century ago, the Rev. Horst Kasner made an extraordinary decision: He packed up his young family and moved from democratically governed Hamburg, West Germany, to this small town in the Brandenburg countryside, then the heart of Communist East Germany.

"We were young and idealistic back then," Mr. Kasner said recently, perched high above the pews in the choir loft of a Protestant church he rebuilt from the ruins when the Berlin Wall fell in 1989.

It seemed a laconic explanation of how Angela Merkel, his daughter, who could make history on Sept. 18 by becoming Germany's first chancellor from the East, grew up and lived under Communism until the wall was torn down.

A slim, tall man looking younger than his 79 years, Mr. Kasner offered insight into the workings of the Communist system in which he struggled to tell the truth and fended off the secret police.

Mrs. Merkel, who was just 3 months old when the family moved east, has said little about the effect of living under Communism.

Only in recent interviews has she revealed that her parents instilled in her the need to excel at everything to survive an environment suspicious of her father's Christian teachings.

Her father, who remains a pastor here in Templin, 50 miles north of Berlin, was certain in 1954, when the Protestant church asked him to move to East Germany from Hamburg. "We were needed over there," he said.

That was before the wall went up in 1961, and "you could still travel between both parts of the country," he said.

The company that Mr. Kasner contacted to move his family was nevertheless astonished.

The manager "said there were two kinds of people that went over to the East - Communists and real idiots." Mr. Kasner said.

Asked what category the manager reserved for him, he said: "The manager said he would have to find a third category. You see, I was young. It was my mission to go there."

The initial reaction of the East German authorities, he said, was: "It is so good of you to have gone over. Many have gone to the West." But, Mr. Kasner said the secret services always watched him.

He said that although he never openly challenged the authorities he used his weekly seminars and his Weissenseer Circle, an elite group of left-wing intellectuals tolerated by the government, to discuss difficult issues. Then in 1968, he was asked to become an informer for the Stasi, the state security secret police. "I had been discussing Andrei Sakharov's letter at the seminar," he said.

The letter by Mr. Sakharov, a Soviet dissident, was a trenchant account of how nuclear weapons and the arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union could destroy humanity. To avoid this, Mr. Sakharov called for a rapprochement between the capitalist and socialist systems.

"I do not know who informed on me," Mr. Kasner said. "Anyway, the Stasi called me in. They told me it was a criminal act to discuss such things."

"They proposed I work for them to avoid pressing charges. I told them anyone could hear Sakharov's letter on the radio. You could not build a wall to keep such things out. I refused to cooperate."

Mr. Kasner suffered no penalties. But his wife, Herlind, who had taught Latin and English in Hamburg, and his daughter ran into difficulty.

"My wife was not allowed to teach," he said.

At school in Templin, Mrs. Merkel excelled at languages. She had wanted to train to become a teacher and translator, but was not allowed to because of her father's profession.

Instead, she studied physics at Leipzig University. Mrs. Merkel's fellow members of the Christian Democratic Party who know her well say her experience as a young woman led her to embrace the market economy and the United States.

While Mr. Kasner does not like to talk about his daughter, it is clear that he does not support her beliefs. When the wall fell, he would have preferred to have two separate Germanys. "I wanted a democratic East Germany," he said. "But the people wanted the Deutsche mark. The revolution is now over."

Mrs. Merkel, now 51, could hardly wait to seize the moment to embrace unification. "As far as I have been shaped by politics, I have been shaped by German reunification," she said during her television duel with Chancellor Gerhard Schröder. "I am proud to be a politician for all of Germany with East German roots."

In the buttoned-down town of her youth, residents interviewed seemed to take less pride in Mrs. Merkel than in her father.

"We are proud of Pastor Kasner because he rebuilt the church," said Birgit Dornbusch, 37, an unemployed mother. "I don't know what Merkel has achieved."

A New 'German Path' (WSJ)

By Wolfgang Schauble

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

How can our country's interests be best protected under the conditions of globalization, of ever more rapid and far-reaching world-wide changes, bringing a wealth of new opportunities, but also dangerous risks? This question currently demands that all European countries take fundamental positions. In Germany, because of the elections, it goes to the heart of future government policy.

The analysis of the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and its sister party, the Christian Social Union (CSU), is clear: To preserve peace, freedom and security in Europe, the success of the European unification process and a functioning trans-Atlantic partnership are of paramount importance. There are no realistic and responsible alternatives -- neither going it alone as a nation, nor special relationships, nor politics in exclusive groups can lead in the long run to anything close to a justifiable level of stability.

Our guideline must thus be the strengthening of partnerships in our foreign and security policies and to avoid everything that could weaken trust. This way we'll aim to correct the wrong maneuvers of Gerhard Schröder's government, which have contributed greatly to the fact that Europe and the trans-Atlantic relationship are today experiencing their deepest crisis. The policy Mr. Schröder calls the "German path" was meant to suggest that reliability in foreign policy could be replaced by the demonstration of a kind of new national self-confidence. The disastrous consequence is a severe loss of trust among smaller and newer EU members, especially among Germany's eastern neighbors. The attempt to put Washington in its place, so to speak, by cultivating a Paris-Berlin-Moscow axis and missing no chance to ride the waves of anti-American sentiment has worsened Europe's division. Mr. Schröder ignored the fact that our new EU partners, in particular, will not allow themselves to be forced to choose between European and Atlantic solidarity. There is also a contradiction in his policies: on the one hand rightly demanding legitimacy for international action through multilateralism; on the other, however, acting unilaterally himself and taking positions on significant issues in a premature fashion that thwarts any joint decision-making process. Just take the question of lifting the weapons embargo on China. That Mr. Schröder is loudly proclaiming in his campaign that "German foreign policy is decided in Berlin and nowhere else" is emblematic of his foreign policy concept, fixated solely on domestic effect.

A federal government led by the CDU/CSU would put an end to such separate national paths and false axes. Germany will pursue policies that see European integration and the Atlantic partnership not as artificial opposites, but as two sides of the same coin. It will restore trans-Atlantic relations to a foundation of fundamental trust, not out of submissiveness toward Washington, but because we are linked by a common set of values, as well as by the most heavily interconnected economic market in the world, and because we are equally affected by the threats of transnational terrorism, weapons of mass destruction that could fall into the wrong hands, failing states, world-wide poverty and underdevelopment, and because we can best overcome these challenges if we develop common Euro-Atlantic positions. The coordinated action against Iran's nuclear program should serve as an example.

Because European and Atlantic security cannot be separated, we want to strengthen NATO as the primary instrument of our security and defense policy. And we will act to increase the EU's capabilities and options, in order to strengthen the European pillar of the Atlantic security partnership. At the same time, we have a great interest in good relations with Russia, but not over the heads of our eastern neighbors and not by keeping silent about the problematic developments regarding the rule of law in Russia. Characterizing President Vladimir Putin, as Mr. Schröder did, as a "flawless democrat" harms the credibility of European policy toward Russia more than it helps it.

At the same time, it is important to free ourselves of old ways of thinking in the goals of our Russia policy as well as in the development of our relationships with other regions of the world; constellations oriented toward confrontation or competing poles will be unable to stand up to the actual challenges of the future. We Europeans must take Asia seriously in terms of its political and economic importance, and we must develop a long-term strategy of partnership with China, India and others without speculating upon rivalries and power shifts in regard to American efforts. Our future will depend in great part on the extent to which we succeed in using strategic partnerships to find effective policies to assist regions of the world currently mired in hopelessness. This defines a common responsibility for the poor and for the preservation of our natural resources, which will help fighting global dangers. For security, development and human rights go hand-in-hand, and together they will determine the long-term stability of our continent.

The wealth of tasks that we must master in order to protect our interests in a globalized world demand from us Europeans, above all, close cohesion and efforts to combat signs of economic sclerosis and restore dynamism, innovation and optimism. To remain relevant in tomorrow's world, we must strengthen the European integration process. We must use the current crisis in the EU as a chance to restore credibility to European politics and win back the support of the people. Europe needs to concentrate on the essentials, the effort to find the right balance both within and without. This requires a clear division of responsibilities among the EU, the member states, and the regions, and a certain rollback in the thicket of excessive European regulation, so that growth and dynamism are not suffocated by bureaucracy. And it is also necessary to take care that the borders of the EU are not stretched too far and that we do not ask too much of the people of Europe -- that the standard for future expansions is its absorption capacity; concretely, that our security goal of a positive development and permanent western linkage of Turkey should be achieved through a privileged partnership with the EU and not through full membership. In all this, close German-French cooperation will particularly important.

If we succeed in strengthening Europe's cohesion, achieving common Euro-Atlantic positions, and binding Russia, China and others into a system of cooperative international responsibility, then we will also face down the greatest challenge for our future: to credibly convince the non-Western world that the West does not stand against them.

Protestants Say Anger And Alienation Are Fueling Riots In Belfast (NYT)

By Brian Lavery

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BELFAST, Northern Ireland, Sept. 14 - Every morning this week, the broken glass and burned-out cars have quickly disappeared from the streets here after the previous night's rioting by Protestant mobs.

By late afternoon, the buildup to those riots begins again, as protests stall traffic. And Belfast seems shaken by the realization that deep-seated anger among Protestants has dashed hopes of a reconciliation with Roman Catholics anytime soon.

The police have blamed Protestant paramilitaries for organizing the recent violence, which has injured more than 80 police officers and two children who were hit in the head by bricks thrown through the windows of a car and a school bus.

Britain's Northern Ireland secretary, Peter Hain, said Wednesday that the government no longer recognized the cease-fire of a Protestant terrorist organization, the Ulster Volunteer Force, which has also been accused of killing four members of a rival Protestant gang this summer.

The violence was largely unexpected, since the Irish Republican Army, the larger Catholic enemy of the Protestant paramilitary groups, in July announced an end to its 36-year armed campaign to drive Britain out of Northern Ireland, prompting Prime Minister Tony Blair to declare a new era of peace.

But many people said the clashes were the result of a more significant rift between the British government and Protestants, who are in the majority here. Britain wants to restart the local legislature set up by the 1998 peace accord to share power between Catholic and Protestant parties, but the rioting shows how resistant Protestants are to the idea.

On Wednesday, the police dispersed a roadblock in a gritty residential area. Davy Reid, a 28-year-old protester, said he was responding to a ban on a parade by the Orange Order, a Protestant organization, through a Catholic neighborhood last weekend. He listed other grievances, including the closing of a hospital maternity ward and the lack of a shopping mall nearby. Those services were available in Catholic areas, he said. "The government hasn't been listening," he said.

Nelson McCausland, a Belfast politician and a member of the Democratic Unionists, a hard-line Protestant party, said: "There is a fundamental anger and alienation. That sense of being marginalized and disempowered runs very deep."

No prominent unionists, who are largely Protestant and want the province to remain part of Britain, condemned the violence. After members of the Orange Order attacked police officers, Robert Saulter, the group's grand master, said, "Ordinary, decent and reasonable men have been goaded into behaving out of character by the authorities."

Mitchell B. Reiss, the American special envoy for Northern Ireland, criticized Protestants' failure to speak out against the rioting. "All of us are pretty disappointed with the abdication of responsibility by many unionist political leaders," he said.

Protestants held a privileged position in Northern Ireland for centuries, with access to better jobs and housing. That status has gradually eroded since the 1960's, when a civil rights movement began putting Catholics on an equal footing, and Protestants continue to feel slighted.

Protestants are also infuriated that Britain has rewarded the I.R.A. - by dismantling British military bases and releasing an imprisoned bomber - before the terrorist group fulfills its promise to disarm.

"We've given a lot over the last few years," said Reggie Spencer, manager of a community center. "I personally feel that we've given enough," he said, adding that the concessions to the I.R.A. had convinced most Protestants that violence was politically effective.

For IRA Critics, No Peace In Belfast (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BELFAST, Sept. 14 -- The family of Robert McCartney, a Catholic whose death at the hands of Irish Republican Army members in January caused international outrage and brought White House condemnation, said Wednesday it was being subjected to a campaign of violence and intimidation for speaking out forcefully against the IRA.

Paula McCartney, Robert's sister, said her two teenage sons were beaten recently by family members of a high-ranking IRA officer who they believe was involved in McCartney's killing. On Monday night, one of Robert McCartney's closest friends, Jeff Commander, was beaten with metal rods by a gang of men the McCartney family also contends are IRA members linked to the killing.

On Tuesday night, at least 50 people, mostly women, demonstrated outside the home of Bridgeen Hagans, McCartney's fiancee, vowing to return every night until she moves out of the neighborhood.

"They want to intimidate us, they want us to keep quiet," said Paula McCartney, whose small home in the Short Strand, a close-knit Catholic community in East Belfast, is decorated with photos of well-wishers including U.S. Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

She said Commander's attackers used the recent riots in Belfast's Protestant communities as an opportunity to take revenge on McCartney's family while police and public attention were focused elsewhere.

Mitchell B. Reiss, President Bush's special envoy to Northern Ireland, described the situation as "disgraceful."

"We deplore the recent violence and intimidation against the McCartney family, Bridgeen and their friends," Reiss said Wednesday in a statement to The Washington Post. "It is unacceptable and should stop immediately."

DOJ_NMG_0005653

McCartney, a supporter of Sinn Fein, the IRA's political wing, was killed Jan. 30 in a pub brawl after an argument got out of hand. He was dragged outside and beaten by at least a dozen men, one of whom stabbed him in the heart.

In a remarkable departure from the code of silence enforced by the IRA among its Catholic supporters, McCartney's family publicly and repeatedly said that he was killed by IRA members and demanded justice. They said the IRA intimidated witnesses to keep them from coming forward and sent in professionals to clean up the murder scene and destroy evidence.

The family's campaign -- which included a visit with Bush at the White House -- badly embarrassed Sinn Fein and damaged its reputation as it fought an increasing perception that the IRA was tainted by thugs and criminals who lacked their forefathers' political ideals. Trying to stem the political damage, Sinn Fein's leader, Gerry Adams, invited the family to address a party meeting, where they issued impassioned demands for justice.

The IRA took the unusual step of publicly denouncing the McCartney killing and offered to shoot those responsible in the kind of rough justice it has long used to police Catholic communities. The McCartney family rejected that offer. Two men have been charged in connection with McCartney's murder, and the IRA announced it had expelled three members over the killing. In July, the IRA announced it was laying down its weapons for good.

Sinn Fein issued a statement Wednesday denying any link to the beating of Commander, whose bloodied head was featured in several front-page newspaper photos in Belfast on Wednesday. "Sinn Fein is totally opposed to intimidation of any type no matter where it comes from or who it is aimed at," said the statement issued by a party official, Gerry Kelly.

But in the Short Strand, an IRA stronghold where about 3,000 people live in modest two-story brick buildings, McCartney's family said IRA intimidation was still a way of life.

Even as the IRA has disarmed and lost much of its former clout, individual IRA members still "act as if they can do anything they want," said Jim Arnold, Paula McCartney's husband. "It's an absolute disgrace," said Arnold, a house painter. "They are dinosaurs. They live on the back of the IRA, but the IRA are finished, and they cannot grasp it. They won't move on."

Arnold said the people who took part in the McCartney killing are well known in the Short Strand. And he said that despite the IRA's claims that the men were expelled, they are still deeply involved with the paramilitary group. "This district is sickened by these people still parading around who were involved in Robert's murder," he said.

Arnold said these men joined a crowd of Catholics who gathered at the entrance to the Short Strand on Monday evening, standing guard against any rioting Protestants who might try to come in and cause trouble. He said they were also among the men who ambushed Commander later in the evening, opening a large gash on his head.

"They're trying to tell our family: Shut up or this is going to happen again," Arnold said. "The McCartney family opened a lot of eyes in Belfast."

Arnold and Paula McCartney, as well as Bridgeen Hagans, are making plans to move out of the neighborhood. "I can't live in a community where it is perfectly acceptable to murder an innocent man and still walk around freely," Paula McCartney said.

Deal For Ukraine Company Renews Charges Of Abuse (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

KIEV, Ukraine, Sept. 14 - In the last weeks of Leonid D. Kuchma's scandal-tarred presidency, an American company reached an agreement with his government to take control of a state-owned chemical factory in eastern Ukraine under terms that have been criticized as secretive and suspiciously generous.

On Sept. 2, dozens of men dressed in camouflage and body armor stormed and seized the headquarters of the factory, the Severodonetsk Azot Association. They were accompanied by officials of a new government, carrying an order signed by a minister under Mr. Kuchma's successor, Viktor A. Yushchenko.

The order was based on a court case filed by a fictitious company, on behalf of a politician who stood to gain from the seizure, according to a senior government official.

"It was a very serious abuse of the system," said the chairwoman of the country's State Property Fund, Valentyna P. Semeniuk.

DOJ_NMG_0005654

The accumulated weight of scandal and internal rifts has destroyed the political coalition that Mr. Yushchenko formed to challenge Mr. Kuchma's government and create a newly democratic, corruption-free government. It has also raised questions about the true success of what came to be known as the Orange Revolution, as members of Mr. Yushchenko's team volley accusations of abuse of power, bribery and other forms of corruption.

"Corruption exists in different countries, but in civilized countries there is prompt action against it," said Oleksandr O. Zinchenko, Mr. Yushchenko's chief of staff, who resigned, coincidentally, on the same day that the company was seized. Three days later he went public with accusations of corruption among Mr. Yushchenko's senior aides, three of whom he named, and the president did nothing about it.

Mr. Zinchenko's resignation provoked a political firestorm here that shows little sign of subsiding.

Last week Mr. Yushchenko dismissed his prime minister and the rest of her government, as well as the head of the customs service. He also suspended or accepted the resignation of several members of his staff who are at the center of Mr. Zinchenko's accusations.

Even so he has defended his aides, much as Mr. Kuchma called accusations against his own aides politically motivated. "There is an anecdote," Mr. Yushchenko said Monday. "It does not really matter whether a man has a daughter or does not have a daughter. It is enough to say in public that his daughter does not behave herself well."

That has not stopped him, however, from accusing the departed prime minister, Yulia V. Tymoshenko, of corruption herself. After first striking a conciliatory note after her dismissal, Mr. Yushchenko accused her of siphoning $1.6 billion from the budget "in favor of private undertakings," coercing judges and improperly intervening in a dispute over an alloy plant, Nikopol Ferroalloys.

"It is very unpleasant for me to think what Yulia Vladimirovna could have received if Nikopol Ferroalloy would have been transferred into the hands of business groups," he said in another interview, on Tuesday, referring to Ms. Tymoshenko.

Mr. Yushchenko appointed a new prime minister, Yury I. Yekhanurov, and has since rallied political parties, including some that he opposed only a year ago, to form a sort of unity cabinet. He also created a commission to investigate corruption in his inner circle, but gave it only 10 days - until next week - to say whether the charges warrant further investigation. He has already suggested publicly that they will not.

The allegations, however, may prove difficult to sweep aside. Reports of bribery and corruption have swirled around Mr. Yushchenko's circle from the time of his inauguration in January. His son came under scrutiny this summer for receiving gifts and favors.

"Corruption is in the air," Ms. Tymoshenko, who was one of the most impassioned and popular leaders of last year's protests, said in an interview, citing complaints of businessmen forced to pay bribes to members of Mr. Yushchenko's administration. "This is the air we had to breathe."

A senior Western diplomat said he gave credence to reports that Mr. Yushchenko's aides had solicited payment for access to the president, for appointments to government positions, to influence court cases and to win control over state enterprises. He said a government official had told him of personally being asked for a bribe by one of Mr. Yushchenko's senior aides, whom he would not name.

"I think he is vulnerable, because of his loyalty, to the bad behavior of those around him," the diplomat said of Mr. Yushchenko, speaking on condition of anonymity because of diplomatic protocol.

Even an informal adviser to Mr. Yushchenko, Oleksandr Y. Pakhavyov, said corruption was endemic in Ukraine, and the shadowy intersection of business and state made it unrealistic to expect a swift change.

He cited an effort by Ms. Tymoshenko to crack down on the smuggling of meat through customs. The contraband, he said, accounted for nearly a fifth of all meat purchased in Ukraine. After Ms. Tymoshenko's government tightened controls, prices soared, sparking one of the economic crises that have eroded Mr. Yushchenko's popularity.

Viktor M. Pinchuk, one of the country's wealthiest men and the son-in-law of Mr. Kuchma, said it was not government policy but commercial interest - Ms. Tymoshenko's - that was driving the legal challenge to Nikopol Ferroalloy Plant. He acquired a controlling share in 2003 in a tender since criticized as rigged.

He said Ms. Tymoshenko had intervened on behalf of a minority shareholder who had close ties to her. Ms. Tymoshenko denied that, saying she was acting to seize the shares owed the state.

The dispute over Severodonetsk Azot, Ukraine's third largest chemical plant, boiled over even as Mr. Yushchenko's coalition imploded.

Worldwide Chemical, a subsidiary of New York-based IBE Trade, agreed to invest $180 million in a new company with Mr. Kuchma's government in exchange for 60 percent of its shares.

James William Grant, Worldwide Chemical's vice president, said that within months the new investors, including Americans and Russians, had increased production, raised salaries and paid off the debts that had forced the former state enterprise into bankruptcy.

But a lawsuit filed in March in a district court in Kiev - not in Lugansk, where the factory is located - challenged that deal, and the court agreed. Neither the state nor the new company had the chance to mount a defense, according to Ms. Semeniuk of the property fund.

The government's role in the dispute is far from clear. In letters to American congressmen who voiced concerns, Ms. Semeniuk and Mr. Yushchenko promised that the matter would be resolved in court.

Yet, despite Mr. Yushchenko's pledges, the minister of industrial policy, Valery N. Shandra, signed an order late last month returning control of the plant to what was left of the state enterprise, and one of his deputies was there when the plant was seized. Mr. Shandra, who was dismissed with the rest of the government, could not be reached for comment but his deputy, Viktor N. Baranchuk, said the ministry had to carry out the court's order, even though it was on appeal. "We are being made scapegoats," he said.

The men in camouflage - Mr. Grant said it was never clear who they were or whether they were armed - occupied the plant's headquarters for four days, as workers and company executives protested outside. On Sept. 6, Mr. Yushchenko intervened, even as he held frantic negotiations to salvage his government, ordering that the factory be returned to Worldwide Chemical until the matter was resolved in court.

Referring to this case, as well to Nikopol and others, Mr. Yushchenko said intrigues in his circle reflected a "a very complicated metastasis in the society and in the authorities."

Mr. Grant, a former congressman from Florida, said the company remained concerned about the fate of its investment in what had promised to be a new Ukraine.

"We expected better," he said.

Remember Daniel Ortega? He's Back. (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

EL JICARAL, NICARAGUA - Little seems to have changed in this small rural village in the past two decades: women are down by the river doing their washing, cattle are roaming among the cacti, cowboys are drinking beer at the canteen, and Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega is in the town square, holding forth on the evils of capitalism and the United States.

"The US no longer rules Latin America!" Mr. Ortega thunders into the dark night. "The Yankees no longer rule Nicaragua!" The small crowd of farmers hoist their black and red Sandinista flags high and chant: "Daniel, Daniel!"

Fifteen years after unexpectedly being voted out of power, and with two unsuccessful runs for the presidency since, the iconic head of the Marxist Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) is back on the campaign trail. Ortega, a name many US officials had hoped to consign to the history books, has a fighting chance of returning to power.

Just staying in the running has looked doubtful for Ortega at times. His credibility has taken a beating since he signed a self-serving pact in 1999 with political rival and former President Arnoldo Aleman, now serving a 20-year sentence for embezzlement; his grown-up stepdaughter accused him in 1998 of abusing and raping her for years; and his former comrade-in-arms Herty Lewites is now running against him, mounting the first serious challenge to his leadership from within the Sandinista ranks.

But despite it all, Ortega says he is confident the November 2006 elections will put him back in the presidential palace. Even his critics say divisions within the ruling party, coupled with Ortega's grip on the electoral machine, make his resurrection possible. "Conditions are ripe for triumph," says Ortega in a late-night interview in Managua. "We will win, and we will wield great power here."

Washington, which backed the contra rebels in a civil war against Ortega's government of the 1980s until he lost the 1990 election, is none too pleased with the prospect. After toppling the Somoza family dictatorship in 1979, Ortega's Soviet-backed Sandinistas sparked widespread US intervention in Central America to counter what Washington saw as a communist threat in the region.

Roger Noriega, the Bush administration's outgoing top envoy to Latin America (who has called Ortega a "hoodlum"), told the Managua newspaper La Prensa last month that if the Sandinistas returned to power, Nicaragua would "sink like a stone and reach depths such as those of Cuba."

Ortega's democratic credentials "are very doubtful," sniffed US Ambassador Paul Trivelli, taking up his new post in the country this week.

"The triumph of the Sandinistas will raise the morale of Latin America," says Ortega, tapping into the Bush administration's worst fears of a growing left-leaning, populist, anti-American movement on the continent, led by Cuba's Fidel Castro and Venezuela's Hugo Chávez. "Other countries will say - 'look, that small country got away with it - so can we!' We will spread the revolution." There is an alternative, he whispers, his voice hoarse from weeks of rallies, "to succumbing to the American Empire."

US interference could backfire

Carlos Fernando Chamorro, a former editor of the Sandinista newspaper Barricada, says too much US interference in the lead up to the election could actually help Ortega. The problem with Washington, he argues, is that they are stuck in the past. "The new right running Latin America policy are all leftovers from the '80s, who still behave like we are in the middle of the cold war," he says. "Every time Washington attacks Ortega, his supporters close ranks."

Otto Reich, a chief architect of President Ronald Reagan's policy against the Sandinistas and today a private consultant, shoots back: "Ortega is a communist, or whatever he calls himself," says Mr. Reich, in a phone interview from Washington. "If he wins, there will be no foreign investment and no US aid." Washington might see the world through '80s glasses, he concedes, but Ortega "...is stuck in the '60s and is acting like a Bolshevik."

Talking to Ortega, or hearing him on the campaign trail, is indeed more history lesson than interview, more nostalgia for the past than concrete plans for the future.

"[President] Bush is the Reagan of these times," Ortega tells a crowd gathered in the scorching sun of Santa Rosa del Pinon, a village in the mountains north of Leon - and immediately segues into tales of days gone by. "Yankee Reagan forbade peace," he rails. "He wanted to bring death and destruction to the region."

Adults cheer, children step forth to receive free FSLN bandannas, and old rebel anthems blare from the loudspeakers. Ortega's wife, revolutionary poet Rosario Murillo, thrusts her thin arms into the air, her bejeweled fingers clenched together in a tight fist.

Everywhere Ortega goes, people circle around him, hugging, kissing - and handing him handwritten notes. Most begin in the same way: "Please, Commandante ..." A young girl in El Jicaral has no school books. An old lady in Masaya needs arthritis medicine. A mother of five in Santa Rosa del Pinon wants shoes for her children - and a new house.

The notes get passed along to a burly man with a gold watch and thick mustache named Chico Lopez, or to Julio Paladino. Mr. Lopez is Ortega's financial officer in charge of "disbursements," Mr. Paladino, a handsome man with a big black bag, is the Sandinista leader's doctor, in charge of prescriptions. Some requests are handled on the spot - 300 cordoba ($17) for clothes here, 200 ($11) for medicine there. Larger requests - for scholarships, say, or operations - are dealt with later, back at headquarters in Managua.

Nicaragua remains one of the poorest countries in an impoverished region. The money disbursed, says Lopez, is all from donations. "We are the only ones who consistently help the people," says Paladino as he checks someone's distended stomach behind the stage. "This is what Daniel is about and that is why he is loved."

And yet for all these pronouncements, and US anxiety, analysts here say Ortega's political future is far from assured.

A poll done this month by B&A, a regional company based in Costa Rica, shows Ortega, with 20 percent of the vote, lagging behind both Eduardo Montealgre, a right-center candidate with 23 percent of the vote, and Mr. Lewites, with 35 percent.

Lewites, the former mayor of Managua, was expelled from the Sandinista Party when he announced his intention to run for president. Ortega canceled his challenger's permits to hold political rallies, forbade him to use Sandinista Party symbols, and accused him of corruption. New regional mood of 'lite left'

Central America, unlike South America, is actually moving away from left-wing anti-Americanism, says Victor Borge, director of B&A. Upcoming elections in El Salvador, Costa Rica, and Honduras are all expected to be won by moderates, he says. "If Ortega manages to come to power in 2006," he adds, "...it would indeed symbolically be a big deal and might motivate other leftists. But that does not seem in tune with the mood in the region."

Lewites calls the new mood "lite left," and it is one he subscribes to. Lewites says he does not share Ortega's singleminded obsession with the US - but neither is he running to Washington for validation. "I think we should maintain good relations with the US. We need each other," he says. "I will be respectful, but firm."

If elections are fairly run, says Lewites, he is confident of victory. But will they be fair? "Of course not," he responds. Thanks to his pact with [former president] Aleman, Ortega all but controls the parliament, the supreme court, and the electoral commission, he adds.

Ortega, too, says is worried about cheating in the elections - but a different kind. "Elections in Nicaragua are not normal elections - they are a confrontation between the US and the Sandinista front," he says, concluding the interview and heading into a midnight meeting. "The US will do anything to decimate us," he says. "But we are here." Ortega's Political Path

1961: Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) founded.

1979: President Anastasio Somoza Debayle overthrown.

1980: FSLN government led by Daniel Ortega nationalizes lands held by the Somoza family.

1982: US-sponsored attacks by Honduras-based contra rebels begin; state of emergency declared.

1984: Mr. Ortega elected president in elections boycotted by opposition.

1987-88: FLSN signs cease-fire pact. Later, holds talks with contra rebels.

1996: Ortega loses presidential bid.

2001: Liberal party candidate Enrique Bolaños beats Ortega for president.

2002: Opposition Sandinista Party re-elects Ortega as its leader despite his three consecutive defeats since 1990.

2005, September: After pressure from neighboring countries, the US, and the Organization of American States (OAS) to avert a political crisis in Nicaragua, Ortega tells Sandinista lawmakers to drop efforts to have President Bolaños impeached.

Revolutionary China, Complacent America (WSJ)

By Charlene Barshefsky And Edward Gresser

Are Americans missing a revolution? Across the Pacific, China's emergence is reshaping not only trade, but also world finances, global manufacturing and the entire East Asian economy. This should naturally give rise to searching debate. But the debate we are actually having is limited to a series of complaints about currency rates, intellectual property piracy and Chinese investment intentions in the U.S. It is more a to-do list than an assessment of structural global change and what it means for America. Some of the complaints are valid. But to focus on complaints alone -- even serious ones -- is to risk mistaking the foothills for the Himalayas behind.

China is opening to the world, merging its low costs and vast manpower reserves with the financial and technological strengths of its wealthier neighbors. In the process, it is rapidly creating an informal "Asian Union" -- a deeply integrated Asian economy with a GDP equal to America's, a population six times as large, the technological and financial strengths of an advanced economy and the cost advantages of a developing one. This powerful competitive challenge cannot be met by protectionist legislation, penalty tariffs or bans on Chinese investment. Instead, America needs a strategic response that rethinks our own consumption and debt-led growth, addresses our competitive weaknesses and reshapes our approach to Asian trade and global financial institutions.

No country leads the world by divine right. China itself provides a sobering lesson. According to the economic historian Angus Maddison, the emperors of the Qing dynasty ruled almost a third of the world's population and oversaw a third of world GDP. They looked back on a history of innovation, spanning the inventions of paper money, explosives, the printed book and the professional civil service. They considered their status natural and eternal. When Europe's diplomats and merchants began to arrive in the 1790s, the emperors thought them insignificant. It was a devastating mistake. Employing superior technology and military tactics, Europe came to rule Asia in just a few decades. China's leaders were discredited and its vassal states fell away. The ensuing period of demoralization and upheaval lasted almost two centuries.

America faces no such grim future: What we do face, however, is a substantial challenge. We have been the leading economy for a century. But other countries of similar size and potential can catch up -- if they try, and we remain content with past glories. China's economy has tripled in size since 1980 and continues to grow at 9% per year: it could equal ours by 2020. China is also climbing the tech ladder, investing in ports, coastal-road systems, telecom networks, research centers and universities. It draws $50 billion a year in foreign direct investment, and topped $60 billion in 2004. It is already getting results, first shifting from exports of light, labor-intensive manufactured goods to heavy industry and technology, and now to a new role as financier and outward investor. This is happening because China is getting some big things right; its neighbors are contributing to and benefiting from its success; and we are not keeping up. Consider three trends.

Asia is pooling its strengths. Despite America's outsourcing debate, investment in China is predominantly an Asian phenomenon. Three-quarters of China's $60 billion in FDI last year came from Hong Kong, Taiwan, Japan, Korea and Southeast Asia. In 2003, China's Commerce Ministry calculated that Asian investment puts up about 20,000 "manufacturing facilities" a year. These facilities mesh China's low costs and skilled workers with the technology and capital of its wealthier neighbors, strengthening all of Asia. China now intends to extend these relationships through formal preferential trade agreements with Asean, India, Pakistan, Australia and perhaps Japan. America's response to date is limited to a free trade agreement with Singapore and perhaps a later accord with Thailand. Our role in the Pacific risks erosion.

Asia's human capital is improving. The Chinese government builds about 200 new research centers a year. Since the '80s, Chinese college enrollment has quadrupled to 20 million. And students are taking the hard subjects. The Computer Systems Policy Project notes that Chinese universities now produce 200,000 engineers a year. Japanese schools produce 100,000, and smaller economies like Taiwan, Korea, Hong Kong and Singapore are much the same. America, meanwhile, has fewer native-born technology graduates than we did 20 years ago. Only 60,000 new American engineers graduate each spring. Concurrently, new visa restrictions have impaired our ability to compensate by discouraging skilled workers, scientists and aspiring students to emigrate to the U.S. Since Sept. 11, our pool of foreign graduate-study applicants has shrunk by 30%.

Asia is saving money. Chinese families save as much as 40% of GDP. Savings rates in Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong and Japan are also exceptionally high. Meanwhile, we are borrowing. Our savings have fallen to between 1% and 2% of GDP since 2001, a level last seen in 1934. Our economic growth rests on a consumption and shopping boom, financed by China, Korea and Japan, which has pushed up current account deficits and overseas liabilities. Public opinion polls show Americans anxious despite two years of strong growth -- and rightly so.

Asia has weaknesses too, of course. Great-power relationships among China, Russia, Japan and India are uneasy. Asia's population is aging faster than ours. China in particular faces weak finances, environmental stress, severe income inequality, widespread poverty and an uncertain rule of law. And the U.S. maintains many strengths, from a robust political system to superior universities, from sophisticated environmental and intellectual property policies to special advantages in medicine and the life sciences. But if we do not recognize our weaknesses, our strengths may not be enough. * * *

How should we respond? The U.S. must develop an integrated policy to address this emerging challenge in all its aspects. Perhaps we can identify four priorities. • First, we must reduce the risk of global trade and financial imbalances. America saves and exports too little and consumes too much on credit; Asia saves too much and overinvests in real estate and export industries. This pattern poses risks for both sides. Because our current-account deficit is above 6% of GDP and we are dependent on foreign capital to finance growth, we risk financial shock and face rising long-term liabilities. Asia, for its part, is building up stocks of dollars whose value is likely to fall and relies on the mood of U.S. consumers for growth. Since responsibility for the imbalances is shared, we must together reduce them. This necessitates further currency appreciation in China, deficit reduction and personal savings incentives in the U.S., and sustained liberalization in Japan and Korea.

• Second, America needs to raise its game at home to remain the world's technological leader. To this end, our tax policy needs sharpened focus on encouraging innovation. Public investment must be reshaped to improve high-tech and traditional infrastructure. Both the government and the private sector should increase investment in research, particularly in the physical and information sciences. Federal spending on basic science (excluding life sciences) has been stagnant in real terms for three decades, and since the '70s has dropped by 37% relative to GDP. The government must also contribute to a renewal of human talent by rethinking visa policy. Waiting periods for foreign students applying to graduate schools should be cut and work-visa constraints for scientists and engineers should be eased. America also needs to create a larger network of elementary and secondary schools focused on science and technology.

• Third, America's central place in the Pacific economy must be maintained. The FTA with Singapore and the partially negotiated one with Thailand are a start, but scale matters. Regardless of the outcome of the WTO's Doha Round, ambitious agreements should be negotiated with the major Asean countries, South Korea and Japan. In addition, strengthened economic ties with India should further ensure a robust U.S. economic presence in Asia.

• Finally, American needs to restructure its economic relationship with China, and China needs to reshape its own engagement with the world. For the U.S., episodic attention to the specific issues highlighted by Congressional debates is not enough. Complaints about specific Chinese trade policies should be met through bilateral negotiations, the WTO and U.S. trade laws. Together with this must come a broad and intensified engagement with China and Asia more generally, predicated on China's own growth, its central role in Asian integration and Asia's larger role in the world economy. This requires not only rethinking American policy, but fundamental reform of global economic institutions, in particular the G-8, the IMF and APEC. As the world's second-largest economy, third-largest exporter, largest destination for FDI and second-largest holder of foreign currency reserves, China should be a G-8 member, not an occasionally invited guest. Korea has an economy easily comparable to Canada or Italy, and should also be a member. The IMF quota allocation is similarly undersized. China's share of contribution to IMF resources is 3%, a rate equal to Canada's and not far above Belgium's. This is far below the level of responsibility China should accept in the global financial system. APEC, too, needs a new mission, one that reignites its early vision of "free and open" trade in the Pacific and addresses four major long-term issues of common concern: energy, climate change, aging and Pacific finance.

Before all this, however, comes a first step. That is recognition by the administration, Congress, businesses and the public that we face a powerful competitive challenge, one that cannot be attributed to undervalued currencies or unfair trade. The plain fact is that our competition has gotten tougher, and we need to match it. Two hundred years ago the Chinese emperors failed. America must act now to succeed.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Sept. 11 Commission Rejects Atta Claim (AP-Y2)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 15, 2005

Former members of the Sept. 11 commission on Wednesday dismissed assertions that a Pentagon intelligence unit identified lead hijacker Mohamed Atta as an member of al-Qaida long before the 2001 attacks.

The ex-commissioners also criticized the government for not putting in place changes recommended last year in homeland security and emergency response. They pointed most notably to the failure to improve communication systems, which they said might have saved lives after Hurricane Katrina.

Rep. Curt Weldon (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., had accused the commission of ignoring intelligence about Atta while it investigated the attacks. The commission's former chairman, Thomas Kean, said there was no evidence anyone in the government knew about Atta before Sept. 11, 2001.

Two military officers, Army Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer and Navy Capt. Scott Phillpott, claimed a classified military intelligence unit, known as "Able Danger," identified Atta before the attacks. Shaffer has said three other hijackers were identified, too.

Kean said the recollections of the intelligence officers cannot be verified by any document.

"Bluntly, it just didn't happen and that's the conclusion of all 10 of us," said a former commissioner, ex-Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash.

Pentagon officials said this month that they could find no documents to back up the claims.

According to Weldon, members of "Able Danger" identified Atta and three other hijackers in 1999 as potential members of a terrorist cell in New York City. Weldon said Pentagon lawyers rejected the unit's recommendation that the information be turned over to the FBI in 2000.

Weldon's spokesman, John Tomaszewski, said no commissioners have met with anyone from Able Danger "yet they choose to speak with some form of certainty without firsthand knowledge."

Separately, the former commissioners criticized Congress for not updating communications rules to help police, fire, and rescue personnel in a crisis such as Katrina.

"It is a scandal in our minds," Kean said.

The commissioners also faulted state, local, and federal authorities responding to Katrina for not having a clear chain of command, leading to some of the same confusion that plagued the Sept. 11 rescue effort.

Judge Says Somali Man's Statements Will Be Admissible (AP)

Associated Press

AP, September 15, 2005

COLUMBUS, Ohio - The government can use at trial statements made by a Somali man accused of plotting to bomb a shopping mall, a judge ruled.

Nuradin Abdi's attorneys had sought to bar statements he made to authorities in which he admitted to falsifying immigration documents and planning to blow up an undetermined Columbus-area mall.

But U.S. District Judge Algenon L. Marbley said Tuesday that the statements were admissible because Abdi made them in the presence of his lawyer.

Marbley said Abdi's arrest in November 2003 was illegal because government agents appeared to act only so they could interrogate him. Statements he made after his arrest would have been void had he not repeated them later when his lawyer was at his side, the judge ruled.

Abdi's attorney, Mahir T. Sherif, says the value of the information "is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice," against his client, whose trial is scheduled for Sept. 26.

Abdi, 33, has pleaded innocent to charges of conspiring to aid terrorists and lying to gain political asylum in the United States as a refugee.

Prosecutors accuse him of obtaining travel documents in 1999 by telling officials he planned to visit Germany and Saudi Arabia when he actually went to a military-style training camp for terrorists in Ethiopia.

Federal agents arrested Abdi on Nov. 28, 2003, after convicted al-Qaida operative Iyman Faris told them Abdi suggested the mall plot.

RP To Hand Over 3 Officials Linked To Spy Case (MANSUNST)

Manila Sun Star, September 15, 2005

MANILA -- The Philippine Government is willing to turn over three public officials tagged by the US Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) in connection with the espionage case filed against former police official Michael Ray Aquino in the US, Justice Secretary Raul Gonzalez Sr. said.

Gonzalez met with US legal attaché to the Philippines Jeff Cole, who furnished him confidential notes on the arrest of Aquino in Queens, New York and his friend, FBI analyst Leandro Aragoncillo, a Filipino-American, in New Jersey.

They were arrested for espionage and conspiracy in stealing 101 secret documents relating to the Philippines.

In a press briefing, Gonzalez said among those who are allegedly involved in Aquino's espionage activities include a former official and two incumbent officials.

"These things will be revealed when they (US) open the evidence during the indictment proceedings on Sept. 21. The documents, including the CDs, are still sealed. These officials who are believed to be involved are coded," he said.

Once the names of the three Philippine officials are revealed and it is proven that they are Aquino's cohorts, they will be named as co-conspirators for violation of US laws.

"The Philippine Government will only be dragged into this once the warrants for their (three Philippine officials) arrest are issued by the US court. Then we will be asked for their extradition," he said.

The Philippine Government has extended legal assistance to Aquino, although the allegation of his involvement in espionage activities in the US was highly sensitive and serious against the Philippine Government.

"The Philippine consulate in New York has immediately hired a lawyer for Aquino. We always give lawyers to any Filipino accused of crimes in the US and other countries," Gonzalez said, noting that the Philippines is bound by the extradition treaty and the mutual legal assistance treaty with the US Government.

Under US rules, espionage is a non-bailable offense punishable by 10 years' imprisonment and a fine of not less than $250,000.

Earlier reports said the espionage activities of Aquino in the US are part of the current destabilization move against the Arroyo government.

Aquino was a close aide of Senator Panfilo Lacson, who served as Philippine National Police director under the Estrada administration before he ran for public office.

However, Lacson said Aquino cannot be charged with espionage because he is not a foreign agent.

Based on the information he gleaned from the Internet, Section 783 of the US Code states that a person can be charged of crime of espionage only if he is proven a foreign agent.

Lacson said the definition of a foreign agent under Section 951 of the same US code is an individual who agrees to operating within the US, subject to the direction and control of a foreign government.

One of the so-called classified information passed to him were the contents of the "Hello Garci" tapes, anomalies and corruption in the government and the recent impeachment proceedings in the House.

Lacson said he and "many others" received information passed by Aquino, but he downplayed the value of the reports, describing them as "shallow information."

"I am not sure which of the information that I and others received were considered classified, because to my recollection, the bits of information I got from him were largely news that everyone has read and heard in our local media," Lacson said in a statement.

He said the information may have been US Embassy reports to Washington on the current political situation in the Philippines.

Lacson said the FBI does not have the kind of information and this was gleaned from newspaper clippings that were compiled by the Philippine embassy here and sent to the US.

"But come to think of it, we have far more sensitive information which we can read at Philippine Center for Investigative Journalism (PCIJ) and Newsbreak Magazine than the classified information the US is pertaining to that Michael Ray Aquino has passed on," Lacson explained.

The senator said he has called his friends abroad to help Aquino pay the attorney's fees because legal services in the US are steep.

Meanwhile, NBI Director Reynaldo Wycoco said that if Lacson is intent on dragging his name in Aquino's case, he should probably go to any of the Philippine consulates in the US and explain himself.

DOJ To Turn Over RP Officials In Spy Case (PHILSTAR)

Philippine Star, September 15, 2005

Justice Secretary Raul Gonzalez is ready to turn over to US authorities a former and two incumbent government officials believed to be involved in the alleged espionage activities of cashiered police Senior Superintendent Michael Ray Aquino.

Speaking to reporters, Gonzalez said the three would be charged with acting as Aquino's cohorts in a conspiracy to violate US laws, once they have been identified.

"These things will be revealed when (the US) opens the evidence during the indictment proceedings on Sept. 21," he said. "The documents, including the CDs, are still sealed. They will be opened on September 21. These officials who are believed to be involved are coded."

The CDs are thought to contain copies of the evidence supposedly obtained by the suspects from computers at an office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

Gonzalez said that, based on highly confidential documents from Legal Attaché Jeff Cole, Aquino's cohorts include a former and two incumbent officials.

"The Philippine government will only be dragged into this once the warrants for their (the three Philippine officials') arrest are issued by the US Court," he said.

"Then we will be asked for their extradition. The former official number one is classified as High Level, number two is a current public official, while number three is a second High Level public official."

The Philippines is bound by an extradition treaty and the Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty (MLAT) with the US, he added.

National Bureau of Investigation Director Reynaldo Wycoco said yesterday the government would accede to any request from the United States to extradite three unnamed Filipino politicians reportedly involved in Aquino's activities.

"It is a treaty (extradition) we have with the US so we have to honor and abide by it although there is a process we have to go through," he said.

"I think that (extradition request) will follow if and when there would be an indictment, if and when a warrant would be issued by an American judge and if as a consequence there would be a request for the extradition" of the three unnamed officials.

Speaking to reporters at Malacañang, Wycoco said Sen. Panfilo Lacson should "go to any US territory or Philippine consulate in the US to clarify matters if he feels alluded to in the FBI complaint."

Aquino was an aide of Lacson while he was Philippine National Police chief under former President Joseph Estrada.

The NBI is not concerned about the political implications of Aquino's case as its main concern is "purely informational," he added.

On the other hand, lawyer Ricardo Diaz, NBI Interpol Division chief, said the FBI might reveal the names of the three men arrested on Sept. 22 or 23.

"The unsealing of the documents is scheduled on either September 22 or 23," he quoted an FBI official as saying. "By that time, the cat would already be out of the bag, meaning the names would be available by that time.

"Once the documents have been unsealed the names of the three officials based in the Philippines would already be made available to the public as well as the contents of the tampered documents."

Diaz said they have no idea what documents FBI intelligence analyst Leandro Aragoncillo allegedly printed or downloaded between May and Aug. 15, except that it consisted of 101 classified documents related to the Philippines.

"To determine if a document is top secret is part of their sovereignty," he said.

Gonzalez had already made an official request to Cole for copies of the documents, he added.

An FBI agent met yesterday with Wycoco and Diaz, but after the meeting, Wycoco begged off from being interviewed.

Meanwhile, Gonzalez said the government has extended legal assistance to Aquino.

"We are extending legal assistance to Michael Ray Aquino because he is a Filipino," he said.

"The Filipino consulate in New York has immediately hired a lawyer for Aquino. We always give lawyers to any Filipinos accused of crimes in the US and other countries."

Aquino's wife seeks help On the other hand, Lacson said yesterday Aquino's wife, Fatima, has asked him to extend legal assistance to her husband, since the family cannot afford to pay for the services of a top-caliber lawyer.

"She told me, 'Sir, you might have a friend who can help us,' because they have no money to pay a lawyer," he said in Filipino.

"I started seeking the help of some friends. But US lawyers really charge a lot, you have to pay for each telephone call to them. He is really in a difficult situation.

"So it's important that (he) gets a lawyer of his choice, not provided by the US government. He would be comfortable in explaining that, under US law, he is not guilty."

Lacson said Aquino's case might not fall under Section 783, Title 50 on War and National Defense, chapter 23 (Internal Security) and subchapter one (Control of Subversive Activities) of the US Code, with which he is being charged.

Meanwhile, Lacson said he would ask a lawyer the extent of the US government's jurisdiction over a Filipino who is in the Philippines.

Aquino is not considered a foreign agent, he added.

Material related to the controversial "Hello, Garci" tapes was reportedly among the information passed on to Lacson by Aquino, but the opposition senator said the material was not sensitive, since it had already appeared in Philippine newspapers and other media outfits.

"Help my brother" A sister of Aquino asked the government yesterday to help her brother be released from jail in the US, where he is facing charges of espionage.

"My brother is still a Filipino," Dr. Jasmin Aquino said in Filipino at a press conference in Pasig City yesterday afternoon.

"He did not do anything wrong, he was just a victim. He loves the country so he was forced to leave for his peace of mind."

She said she saw her brother in September last year when she went to the US.

Holding back tears, Jasmin said her brother, a former top police official when Lacson was PNP chief, was forced to do odd jobs in the US to make a living.

Her family has yet to talk to Lacson and other groups to help in their brother's legal problems, Jasmin said.

Filipino consul can't see Aquino In New York, Consul General Cecil Rebong told visiting Filipino journalists that it was not normal for US authorities to take so long in notifying a foreign government of the arrest of one of its citizens, as in the case of Aquino.

Rebong said she received from the US Attorney's office a "notification of arrest" informing the consulate that "We (US authorities) arrested and detained Michael Ray Aquino, who we understand to be a national of your country, on September 10, 2005."

"It's just a short notification," she said. "There are no other specifics, not even the place where Aquino is being held."

The document was signed by Assistant US Attorney Karl Buch, she added.

However, Rebong said she had learned from Felix Vinluan, Aquino's immigration lawyer, that the former police officer was detained in a New Jersey jail.

Aquino hired Vinluan in March when he was arrested by immigration agents for overstaying after his tourist visa lapsed, she added.

Rebong said Vinluan appeared in a New Jersey court Monday when Aquino and Aragoncillo were presented before a judge, but Vinluan did not represent Aquino. The two were provided with public defenders by the court, she added.

"We are satisfied with the information we got from Attorney Vinluan that Aquino's rights have been respected," she said.

She and her staff, along with the staff of the United Nations mission, are busy with the short visit in New York of President Arroyo, Rebong said.

It is standard procedure for diplomats to visit detained nationals to check not only on their rights, but on their condition as well.

Rebong is the Philippine diplomat who was recently at the center of a scandal after she reportedly rented an apartment for $10,000 a month at the expensive Trump Tower, just across the UN headquarters, courtesy of Filipino taxpayers.

On the other hand, Press Secretary Ignacio Bunye told reporters at the Philippine Mission in New York that Mrs. Arroyo would not be distracted by the case against Aquino.

"Let me just put it this way. The Michael Ray Aquino case is something between him and the US," he said.

"It is alleged that he broke some of the laws of the US, and he will have to answer for that, and as a Filipino citizen, the Philippine government is committed to provide him with all the legal assistance that is necessary and appropriate under the circumstances."

Bunye said Aquino's case did not overshadow the arrival of Mrs. Arroyo who is attending the UN General Assembly to preside over the Security Council, which is being chaired by the Philippines this month. –Jose Rodel Clapano, Christina Mendez, Cecille Suerte Felipe, Evelyn Macairan, Paolo Romero, Jess Diaz and Pia Lee-Brago in New York

FBI To Reveal RP Officials In Aquino Link (ABSCBN)

ABS-CBN Interactive, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005667

The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) will reveal next week the names of former and current Philippine government officials who allegedly received classified US government documents sent by Michael Ray Aquino, the National Bureau of Investigation (NBI) said Thursday.

Lawyer Ricardo Diaz, chief of the NBI-International Police division, told ANC that the FBI is set to identify the Philippine officials linked in the espionage charges against Aquino and intelligence analyst Leandro Aragoncillo after September 21.

Aquino faces a US district court on that date to determine if he will remain in detention and attend trial or be turned over to immigration authorities.

Diaz said two of the officials identified by the FBI are on active government service. He said the FBI will unseal the documents on the case on September 21 and 22.

Diaz said the names in the FBI files pertain to former and current government officials who received classified information stolen by Aragoncillo while working as an intelligence analyst at the US Army's Fort Monmouth facility in New Jersey.

Aragoncillo forwarded the information to Aquino, who passed them to contacts in the Philippines.

Diaz said the documents downloaded by Aragoncillo were about the current political situation in the Philippines, among other matters concerning the country. "I would venture to say that it was about the political situation."

He, however, said it could also be about concerns other than the political situation.

Asked if the documents could provide clues to the alleged wiretapped conversation involving President Arroyo and former Commission on Elections commissioner Virgilio Garcillano, Diaz said he had no idea.

"[US authorities] have all the right to secure information," Diaz said. "They classify information being a sovereign country. When they add their analysis [on these information] they (information) become classified."

No mention of Lacson

Diaz said the NBI has not identified Sen. Panfilo Lacson as one of the three officials who allegedly received information from Aquino.

"Who knows? [Lacson] might not be the one alluded to or identified [as one of the officials who received information]," Diaz said. The NBI has not even named Lacson in its statements to the media, he added.

Lacson on Wednesday admitted receiving information from Aquino.

Lacson said he and "many others" received information passed by Aquino. He, however, played down the value of the reports, describing them as "shallow information." The senator is a former national police chief under whom Aquino served.

Diaz said the government will cooperate with US officials to pin down the Philippine officials receiving classified information regardless of their political leanings.

"When they invoke the Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty and the Extradition Treaty, we have to comply," he said.

Pimentel got Aquino info too

Also on Thursday, opposition Sen. Aquilino Pimentel revealed that he exchanged electronic mails (e-mails) with Aquino two of weeks ago.

Aquino initiated the exchange of emails, Pimentel said.

In the second e-mail, Pimentel said Aquino asked him for the address of Garcillano in the US. Garcillano, according to the reports, has been sighted in New Jersey after fleeing to Singapore, then London, in July.

According to Pimentel, he was unable to tell Aquino about Garcillano's complete address. The senator told Aquino that he knew only the address of the former poll official's relative in the state.

In their brief exchanges, Aquino supposedly decried the harrassment he went through as well as the difficulties experienced in obtaining officials documents from the Philippine government to legitimize his US residency.

Aquino fled the country secretly in 2001, months after former President Joseph Estrada was ousted from Malacañan.

Although implicated in the rubout of suspected Kuratong Baleleng bank robbery gang members and the murder of public relations executive Salvador "Bubby" Dacer and his driver Emmanuel Corbito, no warrant of arrest has been issued against Aquino.

On May 18, 1995, Lacson, Aquino and 32 other police officers were charged for the murder of 11 members of the Kuratong Baleleng gang in Commonwealth Avenue, Quezon City. Their case was thrown out by Quezon City Regional Trial Court Judge Maria Theresa Yadao in 2003.

In November 2000, at the height of street protests triggered by allegations that Estrada received "jueteng" payola, Aquino and police Superintendent Cesar Mancao were implicated by Superintendent Glenn Dumlao in the abduction and murder Dacer and Corbito.

PATRIOT ACT:

Ashcroft Defends Patriot Act (SBT)

By CAROL DRAEGER, Tribune Staff Writer

South Bend Tribune, September 14, 2005

BENTON HARBOR -- Former Attorney General John Ashcroft is well aware his name is nearly synonymous with the 2001 Patriot Act that gave the FBI and Justice Department broad powers.

As its chief enforcer and defender, Ashcroft has been a target of librarians and civil rights activists who say the Patriot Act brings Big Brother into the private lives of ordinary citizens by allowing investigators to detain terrorism suspects.

"I'm probably a poster boy for the ACLU (American Civil Liberties Union)," Ashcroft told members of the Economic Club of SW Michigan Tuesday at the Mendel Center for the Arts and Technology at Lake Michigan College.

"They've built their membership against me," he added.

But he told the audience of mostly like-minded Republicans why the act is necessary in a post-9/11 country.

The act's measures give federal investigators more tools to prevent future terrorist attacks, such as "bringing down the wall" of silence that prevented the CIA, FBI and local enforcement agencies from sharing information that could've stopped the planners of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Measures like "roving wiretaps," he said, sound alarmist, but they extend to terrorists what law officers have used to fight drug dealers for years.

"We needed the authority to extend that to terrorists," he said.

Another provision that angered librarians at the time about the federal government being allowed to inquire about reading materials of patrons was also highlighted by a bookstore owner in the audience.

She told Ashcroft she has no safeguards against her records being seized.

Ashcroft said during the first two years of the Patriot Act, no library records were seized to hunt for terrorists.

He added that the act provides for congressional oversight, during which every six months members review activities conducted under the act.

"I don't think there have been abuses of the Patriot Act," he said, adding that "libraries should not be a safe haven for terrorists."

He pointed out that before the act was approved, the federal government had reviewed library materials used by the Unabomber suspect while piecing together evidence against him.

The events of 9/11 changed the United States and it required a new set of tools to prevent future terrorist attacks, he said.

Prior to the Patriot Act, Ashcroft said the FBI and the Justice Department was good at putting together pieces of a puzzle to determine what happened and why to prosecute criminals.

But when perpetrators blow themselves up in the commission of a terrorist strike, Ashcroft said there is no one to prosecute, so the government needs to focus on prevention measures to stop terrorists before the strike.

On Sept. 11, 2001, Ashcroft said he was heading to Milwaukee for a meeting with schoolchildren when he heard about the attacks at the World Trade Center. After his plane landed in Milwaukee, dozens of SWAT team members ushered him back on a plane bound for Washington to meet with the president and his advisers.

One of President Bush's strongest attributes, Ashcroft said, is his clarity of mission.

"I'll never forget what the president said as he leaned in my direction: 'Don't ever let this happen again,'" Ashcroft said.

Later in his speech, Ashcroft touched upon Bush's directness in fighting terrorism again, when he said, "The president could've said, "Do your best to not let this happen again,' but he didn't."

Ashcroft said the tools necessary to make Americans safe were written into the Patriot Act to preserve liberty and freedom.

"I believe America is safer today," he said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Waives Rules On Fence (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday exercised his legal authority to bypass regulatory obstacles that had long delayed completion of a 14-mile border "enforcement zone" near San Diego.

"Completing the border infrastructure system will strengthen our efforts to reduce illegal entry to the United States. Congress provided us the authority to ensure this project is completed, and I intend to use it," Mr. Chertoff said.

The order came under the Homeland Security Act of 2002 and the Real ID Act of 2005, both of which mandated construction of necessary infrastructure in the region to reduce illegal entry and improve border security -- but that has been delayed since 1996 by litigation and environmental challenges.

U.S. Border Patrol chief David V. Aguilar, during a press briefing, called the project "the next important step in border security," saying it would allow an enforcement zone in San Diego that would free up manpower and resources for other areas.

"This is not about building a fence but managing our borders more effectively. That's a good thing, not only for San Diego and California, but also Mexico," Mr. Aguilar said, noting that elevated levels of illegal immigration had increased crime on both sides of the border. "This is about border security, about the responsibility we have to protect our nation."

He said primary and secondary fences, parallel roadways to give Border Patrol agents immediate access to the boundary and speed response efforts, stadium lighting to deter border crossers, and sensors and surveillance cameras to monitor incursions would create "a certainty of arrest in that zone."

"This is not so much about apprehension, but about deterrence. It will give us accessibility and mobility on the border," he said.

Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and author of the Real ID Act, said that although U.S. Customs and Border Patrol (CBP) deserved credit for improving security in the area, "completion of this congressionally mandated border fence continues to be stymied by litigation and obstructionism."

"This intolerable situation forced Congress earlier this year to pass the Real ID Act, which gave Secretary Chertoff the authority he announced today he will be exercising," he said.

Mr. Sensenbrenner, who is chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, said the project would improve the security of the American public, especially those in the San Diego area; allow CBP to use its resources in a more effective manner; and clean up the environmental destruction that has resulted from illegal border crossings.

Mr. Chertoff noted that construction within the middle nine miles of the project area has begun, and that an extension of the roadway system, barriers and lighting would expand the project to areas west and east of the current enforcement zone.

He said the initial construction efforts resulted in a decline in border crossings and reduced what he called the "negative environmental impacts" to the region caused by illegal migration, such as trails of garbage, destruction of vegetation and trampling of sensitive lands.

Mr. Chertoff said that by completing both phases of the project, damage to the surrounding environment will be sharply reduced.

"The Department of Homeland Security is not compromising its commitment to responsible environmental stewardship in the area," he said. "We will act in an environmentally responsible manner consistent with the security needs of the nation."

Top CIA Official To Quit Sooner Over Goss Dispute (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

A senior official in the CIA's espionage branch will leave earlier than announced because of a dispute with CIA Director Porter J. Goss on reforms within the agency's spying branch, Bush administration officials said yesterday.

Robert Richer, the associate deputy director of operations, the No. 2 official in the CIA's clandestine service, had planned to retire from the agency effective November, according to a recent announcement to agency employees by Mr. Goss.

However, Mr. Richer now will enter the agency's retirement transition program within two weeks, said officials, who declined to be named.

A CIA spokesman refused to comment.

Mr. Richer told associates earlier this week that he decided to enter the transition program earlier because of concerns about the CIA leadership.

He has said that he disagreed with and did not have confidence in Mr. Goss and his key aides.

The move speeds up the end of Mr. Richer's involvement with CIA operations matters.

His scheduled departure highlights an ongoing and largely secret political struggle inside the CIA over efforts by Mr. Goss to reform the agency in the aftermath of intelligence failures related to September 11 and Iraq's weapons programs.

A senior intelligence official said Mr. Richer was forced out because of "insubordination."

A second official said the departure was due to a personality clash between Mr. Richer and Mr. Goss related to reforms at the Directorate of Operations. Both officials declined to elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0005670

Some leaders within the directorate have been opposing efforts by Mr. Goss to improve CIA spying. One issue in the recent past was a dispute over the selection of station chiefs, which mainly is done by the deputy director of operations, as the chief of the agency clandestine service is known.

The espionage branch was considered the elite element of the agency and is made up of about 7,000 case officers trained for spying overseas. Almost all other CIA employees are involved in analysis or technical work.

Mr. Goss and four close aides have been working behind the scenes to try to improve the agency's spying operations and have encountered resistance from officials who oppose some of the changes.

In particular, Mr. Goss is pressing hard for agency spies to do better in Iraq.

"The biggest problem for CIA can be summed up in two words: No spies," said one official.

The agency, in the two years since a presidential commission called for reforming human spying efforts, still has not succeeded in penetrating the major targets of U.S. intelligence with human spies, the official said.

Those targets include the terrorist group al Qaeda and the governments of China, North Korea and Iran.

According to intelligence officials who support reforming the CIA, a network of current and former operations officials has been working to oppose the reform efforts of Mr. Goss and his aides, whom they regard as political appointees and not professional spies. Mr. Goss is a former CIA case officer.

Ricin Case 'Still Being Looked At' (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, September 15, 2005

"I'm a fleet owner of a tanker company. I have access to castor pulp. If my demand is dismissed, I'm capable of making ricin."

It has been nearly 18 months since this message was sent with a vile of ricin to the Department of Transportation (DoT). A similar letter was mailed to the White House, and traces of the deadly substance were found on a mail-opening machine in Majority Leader Bill Frist's (R-Tenn.) Dirksen office mailroom.

Despite the fact that no one has been implicated yet in these crimes, experts believe that the person responsible for the ricin attack will be found.

"If you look at the Unabomber case, it took 18 years to solve," said Clinton Van Zandt, president of Van Zandt Associates Inc., an international threat- and risk-assessment group, and a 25-year-veteran special agent with the FBI. "I think any case can be solved. … All it's going to do is take someone who knows the individual to come forward."

Van Zandt, who has not worked on the ricin investigation but whose specialties include criminal profiling, said the individual who sent the ricin letters would be easier to catch than the individuals who sent the anthrax through the mail in 2001.

He explained that the individual who mailed the anthrax-laced letter probably did so for quasi-altruistic purposes, perhaps to warn the public of the danger of biological agents. The ricin sender did not strike him as that kind of intellectual.

"I don't see this person as a rocket scientist," he said. "This makes the case more solvable."

Lee Browning, a researcher and president of Browning Seed Inc., a Texas-based seed company, said, "It can be traced back down through the isotopes. I assure you [the government] can trace it down. … They can even tell what country it came from."

Browning, who spoke to the FBI about the ricin attack in Washington, said he suspects that the FBI knows where the letters came from and who sent them because of extensive research on the DNA of castor beans, from which ricin is derived.

Ricin is a deadly poison that can be inhaled, injected or ingested. A dose the size of the head of a pin could kill an adult.

Debbie Wireman, a spokeswoman for the Washington bureau of the FBI, said there are currently no updates on the case but "it is still being looked at."

The FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and the DoT are offering a $120,000 reward for information leading to the arrest of the individual who mailed the poisoned letters.

Initially, reports pointed to a member of the trucking industry based on the content of the letters, signed "Fallen Angel," that threatened to manufacture more of the deadly poison if certain trucking regulations weren't dropped. The DoT letter was found at a sorting center serving a South Carolina airport. The second letter, postmarked from Chattanooga, was bound for the White House. Neither letter has been linked to the small amount of ricin found in Frist's office Rick Todd, president of the South Carolina Trucking Association, said FBI inquiries have ceased and the government no longer seems interested.

"We did post a message for a good eights months with information who to call with information," Todd said, but he added that the message since had taken it down.

Since the attacks, funding has increased for projects that genetically engineer castor beans without ricin. The process "blocks the expression of the ricin gene to make [the plant] safe to grow and process," said Thomas McKeon, a research chemist for Agricultural Research.

McKeon added that many household items are derived from castor beans, including cosmetics and lithium grease, used to lubricate car engines.

King Tapped For Homeland (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, September 15, 2005

The House Republican Steering Committee selected Rep. Peter King (R) to be the next chairman of the Homeland Security Committee Wednesday evening, handing the gavel to a media-savvy New Yorker at a time when the panel's turf is under heavy scrutiny.

The Steering choice is still subject to ratification by the full Republican Conference, but it is highly doubtful that the larger GOP group wouldn't approve the choice.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) announced the choice after an hours-long Steering Committee gathering, during which GOP Reps. Don Young (Alaska), Curt Weldon (Pa.), John Linder (Ga.), Dan Lungren (Calif.) all made pitches for the gavel.

"After hours of deliberation and many good candidates … we came to a decision," Hastert said Wednesday night.

In accepting the post, King thanked the Steering Committee profusely and promised to do his best to defend the country from terrorism and deal with the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in the same resolute way the country recovered after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"I want to pledge that as someone who came from New York … I will show that same commitment to rebuilding the Gulf states," King said.

Republican aides said that the choice of the New Yorker just days after the fourth anniversary of 9/11 would be important symbolically. The fact that King is a moderate with good relationships across the aisle is also considered helpful, given the nature of the post.

GOP leaders also believe the Homeland job is likely to be more high-profile than it has been in the past, and King has always aggressively courted the media.

The contest for the Homeland post has been under way since June, when then-Chairman Christopher Cox (R-Calif.) was named by President Bush to serve as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The race was relatively quiet through the summer, as Cox was not confirmed by the Senate to his new post until July. Soon after, Congress left for the August recess.

But in the last weeks before Steering met to make its choice, the race became more heated. King was the target of an opposition research campaign, as unidentified operatives on K Street and on the Hill circulated evidence designed to back up allegations of past disloyalty to the party and support for the Irish Republican Army.

After King, Weldon was the most energetic campaigner, though Republican leaders have expressed frustration in the past with the Pennsylvanian's tendency to freelance and to pick controversial fights with the intelligence community.

Young, meanwhile, was hurt by his already having chaired two consecutive full committees. Young was also a vehement opponent of the Homeland panel's creation in the first place.

Linder emphasized his experience and, more importantly, his long political service to the party as a fundraiser and past chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Lungren, meanwhile, was something of a late mover in the contest, drawing on his previous experience as California's attorney general.

Republican Of New York To Lead House Panel (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Representative Peter J. King, a moderate Republican from New York known for his independent streak, was selected by House leaders to lead a committee seeking to determine how federal funds are distributed to help communities prepare for terrorist attacks and natural disasters, Congressional officials announced yesterday.

Mr. King's appointment as chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security provides New York a potentially more prominent voice in a critical area at a time when the state's heavily Democratic delegation in the House finds itself largely sidelined by conservatives from other parts of the country. His appointment is expected to be ratified by House Republicans.

For years, Mr. King, who represents parts of Nassau and Suffolk Counties, has called for an overhaul of the way the government distributes antiterrorism aid, saying more funds should flow to New York City and other localities considered at high risk of terrorist attack. But his calls have met with resistance from lawmakers from other regions who insist on money for their districts, regardless of potential threats or vulnerabilities, in a process that has been derided as pork-barrel politics.

Mr. King's ascension places him at the center of several major issues confronting Congress, including questions about what went wrong with the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina and whether the country was prepared for another catastrophic storm or terrorist attack.

Mr. King said in an interview last night that the destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina was a reminder that the country "must do more" to brace itself for catastrophic events.

Of his appointment, he said, "It's a great opportunity - and an even greater challenge."

The appointment marks a political turnaround for Mr. King, whose attacks on the House's conservative leadership had made him something of an outcast within his party. He criticized everything from its efforts to impeach former President Bill Clinton to its policies toward the heavily Democratic Northeast.

But in recent years, he has seemed to make an effort to return to the fold by, among other things, supporting a House-sponsored energy bill that included a controversial plan to grant product liability immunity to producers of MTBE, a gasoline additive that has polluted groundwater around the country.

Mr. King also refused to join Democratic and Republican lawmakers who criticized the federal government's response to Hurricane Katrina, instead placing blame elsewhere.

He said recently that missteps by state and local authorities might have hampered the federal government's ability to mobilize. He also said the state and local governments' response should be investigated as closely as the federal response.

Mr. King succeeds Christopher Cox, a former congressman from California who was chosen by President Bush to be chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. King's chief rival for the job had been Representative Don Young, Alaska's sole congressman, who as chairman of the Transportation Committee has been criticized for directing pork-barrel projects to his state.

Mr. King spent weeks trying to shore up support among his colleagues through letters and private meetings. He also received crucial backing from Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, who may be the only New York Republican who has clout with the House leadership, partly because of his role as head of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

King Wins Homeland Gavel (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, September 15, 2005

House Republicans last night tapped Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.) as the new chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee after an intense three-month campaign.

“After hours of deliberations and long discussions ... we selected Peter King,” Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) told reporters after the selection.

He also described the past few weeks in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina as “a huge emotional roller coaster” and said he was glad such a committed, passionate person had been chosen for the post.

King still must be confirmed by the full GOP conference. That vote is planned for today.

King thanked Hastert and said he is absolutely committed to the war on terrorism but will also show the same commitment to build up the Gulf area.

He replaces former Rep. Christopher Cox (R-Calif.), who took over as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission early last month.

King, a New Yorker who was deeply affected by the Sept. 11 attacks, made an emotional appeal for the gavel in his letter to the 30-member Republican Steering Committee, which selects committee chairmen. He said his life was completely altered by the tragic events.

King was chosen over several other candidates, including Reps. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), John Linder (R-Ga.), Dan Lungren (R-Calif.), Don Young (R-Alaska) and Mac Thornberry (R-Texas).

Lungren impressed many members of the Steering Committee by making a strong appeal for the gavel yesterday, according to GOP aides, but King prevailed during the secret-ballot vote.

King emerged as the front-runner late in August when GOP leaders coalesced around his candidacy and privately backed him, according to Republican aides. Hastert has five votes on the Steering Committee, Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) has two and everyone else on the committee has one.

During his presentation to the Steering Committee, King said, Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas) asked him a tough question about immigration. King, whose parents are from Ireland, supported the free flow of immigrants to this country in the past, but more recently, he has backed measures aimed at curbing the smuggling of illegal migrants.

"I told Lamar Smith my position changed after 9-11," King said after giving his presentation.

For Weldon, the vice chairman of the committee, who waged an aggressive campaign based on his two decades of experience on homeland-security issues, the defeat is a stinging blow. The Steering Committee has passed him over for two other chairmanships in the past, including the homeland-security panel when it was first created. He also lost a bid in 2002 for the Armed Services Committee gavel and complained that DeLay had lied when he promised him the job.

But Weldon, who also serves as vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, may still have a chance to become that panel's chairman. In early August, he told The Hill that Hastert had told him privately that he would support him to become Armed Services chairman.

Many Republicans believed Weldon was never a serious contender because he had angered too many Republicans and was considered unpredictable. Weldon had rankled fellow Republicans by publishing a book in June that harshly criticizes the intelligence community and the CIA. He also has alleged that analysts working for the Pentagon program called "Able Danger" had identified some of the hijackers in 1999 and that Pentagon lawyers did not share the information with the FBI.

Even though Young was the most senior of the candidates vying for the chairmanship, he had several strikes against him in his bid for the Homeland Security post.

Young already has held the gavel of two powerful committees; he is the chairman of Transportation and Infrastructure and previously served in the top spot on the Resources panel. Young also vigorously opposed the creation of the Homeland Security panel in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, which may have become the biggest hurdle to his bid to chair it.

In many ways, King is not the traditional choice for the gavel.

Not long ago, the sometimes-jovial, sometimes-brash Irish Catholic was known as a wild card, bucking his own party on numerous occasions, most notably by voting against President Bill Clinton's impeachment and supporting Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) presidential bid in 2000.

In fact, King's rank-and-file Republican opponents circulated a compilation of quotes just days before the Steering Committee decision to point out some of the negative remarks King, a moderate, has made over the years about Southern members of the Republican Party.

King does not have a leadership political action committee and readily admits that he has not helped fill his party's or his GOP colleagues' coffers over the years. But he has pledged that once selected as chairman he will make fundraising a top priority and will be in a better position to do so.

King is also quick to point out that recently he has been one of the staunchest supporters of the Bush administration, taking pains earlier this year to hit the airwaves to defend embattled White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove.

When House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) found himself mired in a series of scandals late last year, King was one of the first to rush to his defense. He also considers himself a loyal supporter of Hastert.

"King is seen as generally a team player and a solid candidate," one GOP leadership aide said.

"When you look at his temperament in the past, you can say he was brash and difficult, but [we] have really seen him come into his own and it positions him nicely to be considered for the chair" a former leadership aide added.

Feds' Search Moves Trouble 9th Circuit (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

Law.com, September 15, 2005

Judge Betty Fletcher gave the federal government what it wanted Wednesday. But she didn't feel too good about it. And her colleague, Judge Raymond Fisher, wasn't really happy, either.

Fletcher, a senior judge on the 9th U.S. Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals, authored two opinions Wednesday, and sat on the panel that offered a third, per curiam opinion. They said that border agents searching for contraband may disembowel gas tanks, drill holes in truck beds and disassemble car doors without reasonable cause for suspicion.

Fletcher made her feelings known in a concurrence to her own opinion in U.S.A. v. Chaudhry, 05 C.D.O.S. 8344, that, she wrote, is intended "to express my distaste for the government's game-playing."

The game-playing involved the government's goal of getting an appeals court to agree that border agents could take apart an automobile without apparent suspicion.

But in all three cases, there were clear reasons for suspicion that the government chose not to enter into evidence -- from drug-sniffing dogs to visibly nervous drivers.

"But the government wanted confirmation that no suspicion is required for extensive, intrusive searches at the border," Fletcher wrote. "This would have an ancillary benefit for the government -- it would not have to prove the reliability of its drug-sniffing dogs."

The question of whether the government may conduct such extensive searches without suspicion, she added, "is an entirely fictional construct. Suspicion existed in each case, and in my view, review of cases at the appellate level is a waste of judicial resources. The only possible purposes are the government's desire to push the envelope to its limits: to find out how much destruction it can do without any suspicion, and to avoid proving it uses reliable dogs."

In a separate -- but much shorter -- concurrence, Fisher agreed.

Northern District of California Federal Defender Barry Portman said Fletcher seemed constrained by the longstanding trend of U.S. Supreme decisions expanding the freedom of border guards to conduct random searches.

"We're looking to see, when the crowbar comes out to the cab, what is the allowable destruction of the vehicle," he said. Without room to rule against the government, he said, Fletcher did everything possible to criticize the litigation strategy.

"She's never been one to tiptoe around things she thinks are off," he said.

But, Portman added, the easy solution for a judge who felt forced to make a distasteful ruling would be to issue an unpublished opinion.

And Rory Little, a professor at Hastings College of the Law and a former federal prosecutor, said he was puzzled by the fact that Fletcher would author an opinion in a case that she called "essentially a request for an advisory opinion."

"It's a little bit of judges crying, in a sense, after they've inflicted their own wound," he said.

But, Little continued, he understands why judges might be annoyed by the government's strategy of eliminating certain facts from a case to get a favorable appeals court ruling. "I don't like the strategy either, personally, but if I was an appellate lawyer, I'd use it," he said. "It is a way, in a sense, for a party to overreach. You can win on your facts, but you want more."

The strategy is common in instances when a litigant is hopeful they can get a favorable ruling on a controversial issue.

"It's not game playing. It's a litigation technique that is often used by appellate lawyers when they want to develop law that is favorable to them," Little added.

But in the criminal justice system, Portman said, it's a technique whose benefits are limited to prosecutors.

"That's an advantage that the government has that defense counsel never does," he said. "Because the government represents positions, while defense lawyers represent a person."

Wiretap Mosques, Romney Suggests (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Governor Mitt Romney raised the prospect of wiretapping mosques and conducting surveillance of foreign students in Massachusetts, as he issued a broad call yesterday for the federal government to devote far more money and attention to domestic intelligence gathering.

In remarks that caused alarm among civil libertarians and advocates for immigrants rights, Romney said in a speech to the Heritage Foundation that the United States needs to radically rethink how it guards itself against terrorism.

"How many individuals are coming to our state and going to those institutions who have come from terrorist-sponsored states?" he said, referring to foreign students who attend universities in Massachusetts. "Do we know where they are? Are we tracking them?"

"How about people who are in settings -- mosques, for instance -- that may be teaching doctrines of hate and terror," Romney continued. "Are we monitoring that? Are we wiretapping? Are we following what's going on?"

As he ponders a potential run for president in 2008, Romney has positioned himself as a homeland security expert: He sits on a federal homeland security advisory council, is active on the issue with the National Governors Association, and repeatedly speaks about the lessons the country has learned from the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 and, more recently, from Hurricane Katrina.

Romney, who referred to himself yesterday as "red-state folk," has also struck more conservative postures on social issues that may alienate voters in Massachusetts but endear him to the Republican electorate nationwide; his tough talk on antiterrorism measures could also earn him support among conservatives.

His latest message is that the United States needs to shift its focus from response to prevention: Instead of spending billions on training and equipment to react to an attack, he argues, the country ought to work on stopping one.

"It is virtually impossible to have a homeland security system based upon the principles only of protecting key assets and response," he told an audience of about 100. "The key to a multilayered strategy begins with effective prevention, and, for me, prevention begins with intelligence and counterterror activity."

But that activity is deeply troubling to civil rights groups. Ali Noorani, executive director of the Massachusetts Immigrants and Refugee Advocacy Coalition, called the methods Romney suggested misguided and ineffective. Tracking people based on their ethnicity, he said, will only sow resentment among immigrant communities and prevent their cooperation with authorities.

"Blanket eavesdropping and blanket profiling only erodes the safety and security of our country," Noorani said. "People who really know what national security is and what intelligence is realize that we need to build trust between law enforcement and immigrant communities."

Elyes Yaich, president of the Islamic Society of Northeastern University, said that foreign students, especially those from Islamic countries, already face unfair scrutiny coming to the United States and that subjecting them to specialized monitoring would further invade their right to privacy.

"It's something that shouldn't happen," Yaich said. "If they're going to do surveillance, why not do it for synagogues and churches, too?"

Nancy Murray, director of education for the American Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts, said international students are already forced to submit personal data to a federal database designed to let the government closely track them. Keeping closer tabs would only cause a greater chilling effect on scholars coming here from other countries.

"Now they're beginning to think, 'Well, why don't we just go somewhere else?' " Murray said. "We are really going to fall behind. It's very shortsighted."

Asked to respond to that criticism, Romney spokeswoman Julie Teer said last night that the governor has a "realistic view" of what it takes to fight terrorism.

"The governor believes we can strike a balance between what is necessary to protect our homeland while respecting individual freedom and liberty," Teer said.

Romney said he believes that both state and federal governments have a role in intelligence-gathering. It is the FBI's job to do wiretapping and surveillance, he said, but Massachusetts has a responsibility to collect any useful information it can.

Central to that is a facility opened last year at the State Police headquarters in Framingham designed to be the clearinghouse for a variety of intelligence gathered in the state. At the facility, which state officials call "the fusion center," analysts armed with tips and information from residents, police, water-meter readers, and others, will pore through the data, look for patterns, and contact Washington about anything noteworthy.

Romney wants to see every state have such a system, which allows it to easily send intelligence to Washington and easily get intelligence back.

"It's the state's responsibility to figure out how to gather that information and fuse it together . . . to determine where the real threats exist," Romney said.

The ACLU has been critical of the fusion center. The group has asked whether collecting loads of data, much of which is sure to prove useless, is the most effective way to prevent a terrorist attack.

"It just seems like we're getting more and more driven by the need to fight the war on terrorism in a very counterproductive way," Murray said.

Romney stressed in his address at the Heritage Foundation that the country's antiterrorism and military operations have to be "nimble, agile, and fast-moving." He said the distribution of antiterrorism money after 9/11 was haphazard and ineffective.

Cities and towns in Massachusetts and nationwide seized the opportunity to buy new fire trucks and unnecessary equipment, he said. "It was everybody grabbing money as fast as we could."

If the response to Hurricane Katrina was any indication, the extra funds did not appear to have helped, he said.

Romney was one of the first high-profile Republicans to criticize the federal government's response to the hurricane, calling it "an embarrassment." But in the two weeks since, he has reserved most of his criticism for state and local governments, in particular Louisiana's Democratic governor, Kathleen Blanco.

Yesterday, Romney did not criticize Blanco by name, though he did so implicitly a few times. At one point, he said that one clear failure in the response to Katrina was a lack of "fast-moving decision-making and clear authority." He said there would be no such leadership vacuum if a disaster hit Massachusetts.

"In my state, it's me," he said. "The governor's in charge. I got it."

Answering a question yesterday about the National Guard, Romney said he believes there is no need for a military draft, calling it "totally unnecessary."

The Heritage audience was highly receptive to Romney yesterday, giving him a rousing welcome and lengthy applause as he concluded his remarks. The foundation promotes study of issues important to conservatives.

'Crescent' Not Embraced (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

DOJ_NMG_0005676

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

It is unbuilt, but already under fire. The proposed memorial to United Flight 93 has a chorus of critics, irked by a single design element that ultimately might be reconfigured.

The "Crescent of Embrace," a double arc of maple trees that will turn red in the fall, has drawn the ire of some, who say it will resemble the red crescent -- a symbol of Islam dear to the hearts of the September 11 hijackers on the flight that crashed into a Pennsylvania field.

The Rev. Ron McRae, pastor of the Bible Anabaptist Church near Pittsburgh and founder of the Street Preachers Fellowship, called the design "a memorial to terrorists." He vows to file a lawsuit and stage a public protest.

The families of the 40 passengers and crew disagree, but the Los Angeles-based architect said yesterday that he would work to satisfy critics.

"This is an unfortunate distraction from the mission of the memorial," said Hamilton Peterson, who lost his father and stepmother on the flight and is president of the District-based Families of Flight 93.

"We've vetted this design and thought it through. In reality, the red crescent is a symbol of a benevolent humanitarian mission founded in World War I. Now, wackos with idle time and energy are trying to divert our goal," Mr. Peterson said.

But designer Paul Murdoch said he is "somewhat optimistic" that the spirit of the design could be maintained.

"It's a disappointment there is a misinterpretation and a simplistic distortion of this, but if that is a public concern, than that is something we will look to resolve in a way that keeps the essential qualities," Mr. Murdoch, 48, told the Associated Press.

Mr. McRae's isolated comments garnered considerable coverage in the Pennsylvania press and resonated on Web sites such as Free Republic, Power Line and Constitutional Conservative.

Columnists weighed in this week. Michelle Malkin called the crescent design a "monumental surrender" and "boneheaded," while Mark Steyn observed that Flight 93 had been "re-hijacked," and in the thrall of "the cultural elite."

In a letter sent Tuesday to the National Park Service, Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, called on the agency to reject the design as "a flash point for controversy and criticism."

"The crescent in the design does not imply or depict religious iconography. The crescent follows the actual ridge line of the crash site and is intended to honor the heroes of Flight 93 and comfort their families," said Joanna Hanley, superintendent of the memorial site, which will be managed by the National Park Service.

The design for the 2,000-acre memorial also includes a chapel and a wall dedicated to Flight 93.

Insurgent Bombings Kill More Than 170 In Baghdad (USAT)

By Rick Jervis And Mona Mahmoud

USA Today, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD — Insurgents launched a wave of attacks throughout the Iraqi capital Wednesday and today. More than 150 people were killed Wednesday in one of the deadliest days in Baghdad since major combat ended in May 2003.

At least 16 Iraqi policemen and five civilians were killed today when a suicide bomber drove his car into a convoy of police vehicles in Baghdad's southern Dora district, police Lt. Thair Mahmoud said. The wounded included 13 policemen.

About a dozen explosions ripped through Baghdad neighborhoods Wednesday, including an early-morning suicide car blast in a predominantly Shiite neighborhood that killed about 112, according to the Interior Ministry.

More than 540 people were wounded in the attacks Wednesday. Four suicide car bombs targeted American convoys, but the U.S. military did not report any deaths.

In a Web posting, al-Qaeda in Iraq linked the attacks to an offensive by Iraqi and U.S. forces in Tal Afar, near the Syrian border. The offensive began Saturday and evicted most insurgents from the city. The U.S. military estimated 200 militants were killed. No Americans were killed.

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, al-Qaeda's leader in Iraq, purportedly declared “all-out war” on Shiite Muslims, Iraqi troops and the country's government in an audio recording released on the Internet.

The U.S. military said there were four direct attacks on Americans on Wednesday and 10 soldiers were wounded. The office of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari denounced the attacks and called an emergency meeting of members of the Defense and Interior ministries and U.S. military officials to determine the government's response. The deadliest attack Wednesday came about 6:45 a.m. as day laborers gathered in Kazimiyah's Oruba Square, hoping to get picked up for work. A man in a car drove up and began shouting that he was looking for helpers, said Lt. Muhammed al-Nuami, an Interior Ministry official. When the workers crowded around, the driver detonated, al-Nuami said.

Shiites have often been the target of attacks by predominantly Sunni insurgents, but Sunnis have also been attacked. On Wednesday, 17 men were executed in a predominantly Sunni village north of Baghdad. The victims were rounded up by gunmen wearing Iraqi military uniforms, marched 50 yards out of town and shot, al-Nuami said.

Insurgent Attacks Target Scores Of Poor Shiites (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- At their uncle Hamid Ghatti Fares' behest, the Rashid brothers left the desperation and unemployment of Nasiriya down south to look for construction jobs in the Iraqi capital.

And under their uncle's care, the two bothers, Hossein, 33, and Tahseen, 27, were returned to their home in the south Wednesday, their mangled bodies laid side by side in simple wooden coffins strapped atop a Korean-made minibus.

"What can I say? How can I describe this feeling?" said Fares, a 57-year-old Baghdad cigarette vendor, whimpering as he boarded the vehicle and prepared to deliver his nephews' remains to their father -- his brother -- in Nasiriya. "It will be a long ride."

The brothers were killed when a massive car bomb exploded in a crowd of day laborers in the largely Shiite Muslim district of Kadhimiya on Wednesday, one of the deadliest days of insurgent attacks in the capital since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

By nightfall, at least 141 Iraqis had been killed and 228 injured in the bombings and ambushes in Baghdad, most of the victims members of Iraq's Shiite majority. Between 6:50 a.m. and 2:10 p.m. local time, 10 car bombs were set off in the capital.

Another 17 people were shot execution-style in a massacre in a Shiite enclave near Taji, north of the capital.

The barrage of explosions plunged the capital once again into fear and despair. Gunfire and sirens rang out as black smoke rose into the sky. Police and soldiers choked traffic with checkpoints. In eastern Baghdad, automatic weapons fire continued into the night.

The violence appeared to be retaliation for a recent joint U.S.-Iraqi offensive against rebels in the northern city of Tall Afar that Iraqi officials said killed at least 150 insurgents. The attacks also seemed designed to stoke tension between the country's Shiite majority and Sunni minority, which along with Sunni Arab fighters from abroad is spearheading the insurgency.

The group of Jordanian-born Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, an insurgent leader, claimed responsibility for the day's assaults in an Internet posting.

"Al-Qaida Organization in Iraq ... has declared war against Shiites in all of Iraq," the audio recording said. "As for the government, servants of the crusaders headed by (Prime Minister) Ibrahim Jafari, they have declared a war on Sunnis in Tall Afar. You have begun and started the attacks, and you won't see mercy from us."

A senior U.S. military official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the attacks were evidence of insurgents' weakness against Iraq's nascent security forces. "(The insurgents) failed to stand up to the assault up north, so they slink away and kill civilians in Baghdad," he said. "It is astonishing that they can try to claim some victory from pure murder."

John Arquila, a counter-insurgency specialist at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif., offered a similar assessment.

"The insurgent networks in Iraq have repeatedly demonstrated their ability to mount substantial operations on short notice, particularly when the targets are `soft' (i.e., innocent civilians). ... It takes the insurgents much longer to mount operations against coalition forces, when they choose to do anything more than plant bombs or run suicide attacks."

Five of Wednesday's car bombs targeted U.S. patrols, injuring at least two Americans. In one foiled attack, a man of Syrian origin rammed a car bomb into an American tank, but it failed to explode and he was captured, a U.S. military officer said. Three bombs targeted Iraqi security officials, killing three soldiers and police officers.

But ordinary Iraqi civilians, almost all Shiites, bore the brunt of the attacks. One car bomb in the mostly Shiite Shuala district targeted a group of people waiting for a bus. At least four were killed, according to the Interior Ministry.

In Taji, according to one witness, a group of at least 50 men in Iraqi army uniforms pulled 17 members of the mostly Shiite Tamimi tribe out of their homes, lined them up against a wall and executed them before firing off flares and escaping into the dense palm groves along the Tigris River.

"The people who were killed have nothing to do with the Americans, the government or security forces," Mohammad Baqer Tamimi, a Taji produce wholesaler, said in a telephone interview. "Some sold vegetables, some sold ice and some were taxi drivers."

The car bomb in Kadhimiya, though, was the day's deadliest incident, killing 112 people, the Interior Ministry said.

Some witnesses said the suicide bomber posed as a potential employer; dozens of poor, mostly Shiite young men crowded around the vehicle in hopes of landing a job.

Hours after the explosion, women walking by the scene covered their eyes and gasped, overwhelmed by the smell of burnt flesh. Slick pools of blood covered the pavement. Farm tractors hauled away piles of charred debris.

The lobby of nearby Kadhimiya hospital had been turned into an overflow emergency room. Stacks of saline bags and bandages lay atop the receptionist's counter. Flies swarmed the bloodied, half-conscious patients lying on hospital beds.

Many of the victims said they were unemployed bricklayers, painters and construction workers from Iraq's south. The young men told similar stories of paying $7 or so for a taxi ride up to Baghdad and staying in $1-a-night flophouses for the chance to earn up to $10 a day working on building projects in the capital.

"What is the reason for killing those innocent people? They work to eat. If they don't work they will not eat for the day," said Hashim Naji, a 23-year-old employee of a shoe factory, recovering from wounds he sustained in the Kadhimiya attack. "They are not officials. They don't represent a threat to anyone."

Insurgents Kill 160 In Baghdad (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, September 15, 2005

In some of the deadliest terror attacks since the 2003 invasion, up to a dozen insurgent bombings and shootings saw around 160 people killed in Baghdad on Wednesday and wounded over 500 others.

The attacks came as Iraqi leaders claimed to have finalised a constitution, and as the Iraqi branch of al-Qaeda swore to avenge a recent US-Iraqi offensive on the north-eastern town of Tal Afar. The one-day death toll was possibly the highest in the capital since March 2003, and one of the attacks – a suicide car bomb in the predominantly Shia north Baghdad neighbourhood of Kadhemiya that killed over 112 people – was the second deadliest single blast.

According to the Iraqi interior ministry, a suicide bomber pulled up to a crowd of day labourers waiting for work by a public square, called them over to his pick-up with offers of employment, then detonated the vehicle with 220kg of explosive.

Witnesses said that no US or Iraqi military or police targets were in the vicinity, suggesting that the attacker had aimed to cause as much civilian carnage as possible.

The blast comes two weeks after a stampede at a Shia religious commemoration sparked by fears of a suicide bomber killed over 1,000 people in the same area.

Elsewhere in the city, a car bomber blew himself up near a queue of people lined up to fill gas canisters, killing 11, while other bombs targeted Iraqi and US patrols and the offices of a Shia party. In addition, unknown gunmen pulled 17 Shia men from a single tribe from their homes in the town of Taji north of Baghdad and killed them, in one of a series of apparent sectarian massacres that have become increasingly common in the last six months.

The attacks came as a statement appeared on a website used by the al-Qaeda in Iraq organisation of militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi vowing revenge for a recent US-Iraqi offensive. “We would like to congratulate the Muslim nation and inform it the battle to avenge the Sunnis of Tal Afar has begun,” it said, although it did not directly take credit for Wednesday’s bombs. An audio tape purportedly released by the organisation also declared all-out war on Shia.

US patrols also came under attack. A Humvee military vehicle was burnt out by a roadside bomb, but the US military said it suffered no casualties. Minutes later another bomb nearby wounded two Iraqi policemen in a convoy.

On Sunday, the US and Iraqi militaries had wrapped up a sweep through the town, of Tal Afar, a reported transit route for Islamist volunteers moving in from Syria, in which they claimed to have killed over 150 insurgents and detained at least 500 suspects.

The insurgents have timed similar waves of explosions for politically sensitive moments, and this surge in the bloodshed comes as Shia and Kurdish leaders try to win Sunni Arab support for Iraq’s permanent constitution. The run-up to the October 15 vote on the constitution has worsened tensions between Iraq’s main communities, Shia, Sunni Arabs and Kurds.

Attacks In Iraq Inflame Worries About Civil War (WSJ)

By Farnaz Fassihi

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Attacks resulting in one of Iraq's deadliest days in more than two years intensified concerns about escalating sectarian violence and its potential to evolve into open civil war.

Insurgents yesterday attacked crowds of Shiite Muslim civilians, Iraqi police and American convoys in 12 separate assaults around the capital, killing more than 150 people and wounding nearly 600. The attacks coincided with an announcement by Shiite Arabs and ethnic Kurds -- who make up the majority of the transitional government -- that the nation's draft constitution was finalized, without amendments to appease Sunni Muslim Arabs' demands.

Al Qaeda's arm in Iraq claimed responsibility for the attacks in a statement published on a Web site, calling them retaliation against a U.S.-Iraqi military operation under way in Tal Afar, a town near the border with Syria. And in a purported audiotape of the group's leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, he called for all-out war against Shiites, Iraqi troops and the country's government.

The string of attacks in Baghdad followed the apparent execution of 17 men -- believed to be Shiites -- by a group of men dressed in Iraqi military uniforms who staged an early-morning raid on a neighborhood in Taji, 10 miles north of Baghdad. The dead were handcuffed, blindfolded and shot in the head, Iraqi officials said.

The scale and scope of the attacks, with Sunni Arab militants targeting and killing groups of Shiites, shows the increasingly sectarian nature of the conflict, and is reviving doubts about whether the newly trained Iraqi forces can properly secure it.

Many analysts believe the buffer keeping Iraq's Sunni and Shiites from a full-fledge civil war has been the Shiite religious and political leaders' restraint from accusing the Sunnis outright and calling for Shiites to retaliate. But no one is sure how much longer the Shiite community will be willing to heed their advice. There have been numerous tit-for-tat killings of a sectarian nature among ordinary Iraqis, with almost daily reports of civilian corpses -- both Shiite and Sunni -- found murdered.

"It is very clear that they want to start a civil war between Sunni and Shiite," said Mohammad Bahr Ul-Ulom, a prominent Shiite cleric and politician, reached by phone in Baghdad last night. "They want the Shiites to say, 'Let's go after them,' but so far our leaders are calling for calm."

The worst attack yesterday occurred in the Shiite neighborhood of Kathemiya, where day laborers gathered at dawn looking for work. A truck approached the crowd and detonated once the driver had lured the men toward it. U.S. military convoys also came under fire yesterday in three separate car-bomb attacks around Baghdad, wounding two American soldiers. Iraqi police were attacked with gunfire and a car bomb, leaving several police officers dead.

The violence yesterday came after several months of relative calm in the capital, where according to the U.S. military car bombs and attacks against coalition forces had dropped significantly since May. But both Iraqi and American officials said they expect a spike in violence in the weeks preceding the constitutional referendum scheduled for Oct. 15.

For months now, Iraq's various sectarian and ethnic groups have been torn about the nature of their new constitution and the political path ahead for Iraq. The Kurds and Shiite Arabs pushed for a federal system whereby regional governments could function with semiautonomy from the central government. Sunni Arabs oppose federalism and rejected the constitution, complaining that the political process aimed at unifying Iraq had instead divided it even further.

Since the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime in April 2003, Iraq's deteriorating security has fallen into a vicious cycle: relative calm followed by spikes of spectacular violence timed around political milestones, such as the hand over of sovereignty, elections, drafting of the constitution and now the referendum.

Multiple Attacks Kill Nearly 150 In Iraqi Capital (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Thursday, Sept. 15 - Insurgents staged at least a dozen suicide bombings that ripped through Baghdad in rapid succession on Wednesday, killing almost 150 people and wounding more than 500 in a coordinated assault that left much of the capital paralyzed.

Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia claimed responsibility for the assault, which inflicted the biggest death toll in Baghdad since the American-led invasion of Iraq toppled Saddam Hussein more than two years ago.

The violence appeared to be retaliation for the weeklong siege of the insurgent stronghold of Tal Afar and included a bombing in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad that used a new tactic: luring scores of day laborers to a minivan with promises of work, and then blowing it up. At least 112 died in that blast alone, the second highest death toll from any single terrorist bombing in Iraq since the invasion.

The attacks coincided with the opening of the United Nations General Assembly in New York, attended by top Iraqi leaders and President Bush, who pressed for a resolution calling on all nations to take action against the incitement of terrorism.

Wednesday's attacks demonstrated again how easily insurgents could still stage well-coordinated attacks, despite a series of highly publicized military offensives like the recent one in Tal Afar, a northern city that has been an insurgent base.

The explosions struck Shiite civilians, Iraqi security forces and American troops, the favored targets of Iraq's Sunni Arab insurgency. The worst attack singled out workers in a Shiite neighborhood, Kadhimiya, with an explosion that tore through a crowded intersection, leaving the facades of nearby shops shattered and puddles of blood on the streets.

"I saw a huge fireball in the air, and I felt the heat and flame on my face," said Kadhum Nasir Malih, 28, a laborer who lives in a hotel near the site of the blast. "I went outside the hotel, and I was amazed to see the number of bodies. Some were still, and some were groaning with agony, charred and covered with blood, with smoke rising from them."

On Thursday morning at 8. a.m., a suicide car bomb detonated next to a police convoy in southern Baghdad, killing 16 people and wounding another 21, an official at the Interior Ministry said. Most of the dead and the wounded were police officers and the rest were civilians, the official said. Also in the capital on Thursday morning, gunmen shot and killed three Shiite pilgrims as they traveled toward the holy city of Karbala.

Senior military officials interviewed Wednesday said intelligence indicated that the bombs and planning for the Baghdad attacks came from insurgents in the Euphrates River valley in western Iraq, where Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian leader of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, has his base of operations.

"We believe these attacks were spawned in the west, then the bombs migrated from the Euphrates River valley," said a senior United States Central Command officer, who spoke anonymously because of the secret source of the intelligence. "The heart of Zarqawi's network is not in Baghdad, we're quite confident of that," the officer continued in a telephone interview. "In a corridor from Syria to Baghdad is where he's nested right now."

Hours after the first attack, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia issued a statement calling the strikes revenge for the American and Iraqi assault on Tal Afar. It said the bombings signified that "the battle to avenge the Sunni people of Tal Afar has started." The American military has said it killed more than 150 insurgents in Tal Afar over the past two weeks.

Bombings and other attacks soon followed the Kadhimiya blast, at a rate of several per hour. Police cars careered through the city struggling to restore order, and hospitals overflowed with the wounded.

Police officers transporting their own casualties to hospitals fired wildly and pointed rocket-propelled grenade launchers at drivers to force them out of the way. At Yarmouk Hospital, the floors were splashed with blood, and medics rushed through the halls carrying burned and bloodied victims. One man lay on the ground, his chest cavity held together by a few stitches. A girl was brought inside, her fingers blown off. A man lay in a bed, screaming after being told his leg was amputated.

"There were bodies everywhere, I was lucky to have survived," said Saadi Hussein Ali, a 55 year-old laborer whose arm was broken in the Kadhimiya bombing, as he lay exhausted on a hospital cot. "It was only workers - why would they want to kill us? We are poor."

At least 10 American soldiers were wounded in attacks that the military said struck at least three military convoys. No deaths were reported. In Taji, north of Baghdad, gunmen dressed in Iraqi uniforms abducted 17 men and shot them, the Interior Ministry said.

Later Wednesday, an audiotape released over the Internet that was said to be from Mr. Zarqawi, the Jordanian terrorist, declared a "full-scale war on Shiites around Iraq, without mercy" to avenge Tal Afar and what the speaker asserted was a "war against the Sunnis" undertaken by the Iraqi government and conducted under the guise of attacking terrorists. The authenticity of the tape could not be verified.

Speaking in the United States, Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari also said the attacks appeared to be revenge for the military sweep of Tal Afar. In recent days, several terrorist groups had vowed to avenge allies killed in Tal Afar, and one warning issued by Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia had pledged specifically to attack Shiites. Kurdish and Shiite troops made up almost all of the Iraqi troops in Tal Afar. The National Assembly and Iraqi government, led by Mr. Jaafari, who had given approval for the Tal Afar offensive, are both dominated by Shiites.

Iraqi and American officials have also been anticipating a rise in violence in reaction to Iraq's new constitution, which has provoked angry opposition from many Sunni leaders and demonstrations in several cities since it was presented in the National Assembly last month. The attacks on Wednesday came as the acting speaker of the National Assembly announced that an amended version of the constitution was complete.

On Wednesday night, Mr. Jaafari's cabinet convened an emergency session to plan a response to the bombings. In a statement it said the attacks revealed the insurgents' "desperation and cowardice in the face of the setbacks they have suffered in Tal Afar and elsewhere at the hands of Iraq's security forces." Referring to the Tal Afar siege, the statement added that "the fact that the terrorists are claiming to be responding specifically to Operation Restoring Rights shows the serious blow that operation has dealt them."

Several of Iraq's leading political parties issued statements condemning the bombings and offering condolences to the victims. But there were indications that the continuing violence could soon be a potent issue in Iraq's next round of parliamentary elections in December. The Iraqi National Accord, led by Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister, released a statement condemning the bombings and "holding the government responsible for the deteriorating security situation."

With the offensive in Tal Afar and stepped up airstrikes and ground attacks in Anbar Province, senior American commanders say they are pursuing militants, including Mr. Zarqawi, who have been driven out of cities in central and north-central Iraq, including Baghdad.

"The insurgency is much more pushed to the west in Iraq this year than it was in the previous years," Gen. John P. Abizaid, the leader of the military's Central Command, said in an interview on Tuesday. "I actually regard that as a sign that the insurgency is having a hard time getting established elsewhere."

But on Wednesday, the senior Central Command officer said the new attacks showed that Mr. Zarqawi retained the ability to launch coordinated strikes in central Iraq. "Just when you think you have your foot on his throat, he can come back," said the officer. "He marshals his resources in order to have days like today to get himself in the news."

Insurgents Kill 160 In Baghdad (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Naseer Nouri

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 14 -- Insurgents struck the Iraqi capital Wednesday with at least a dozen attacks that targeted Shiite Muslim civilians, Iraqi security forces and American troops, killing more than 160 people in the deadliest day of violence in Baghdad since the U.S. invasion more than two years ago.

U.S. military officials said the day-long wave of suicide bombings, rocket attacks and shootings across the city bore the hallmarks of al Qaeda in Iraq, the radical Sunni Muslim insurgent organization led by Abu Musab Zarqawi, a Jordanian.

The group did not immediately assert direct responsibility for the attacks, but an Internet statement issued in its name welcomed the start of "revenge battles throughout the land of Mesopotamia."

The statement linked the attacks to a U.S. and Iraqi offensive underway against insurgents in the northwestern city of Tall Afar. A subsequent audio recording attributed to Zarqawi, which was posted on the Internet, accused the Shiite-led Iraqi government of having declared war on Sunnis in that city. As a result, al Qaeda in Iraq "has decided to launch a comprehensive war on the Shiites all over Iraq, wherever and whenever they are found. This is revenge. . . . Take care, because we are not going to have mercy on you," the recording said, according to a translation by the Washington-based SITE Institute, a group that monitors radical Web sites.

The attacks appeared calculated to undermine public faith in the ability of the fledgling government to protect its people, by showing that insurgents could strike in Baghdad despite the U.S. and Iraqi military efforts to stop them. Some of Wednesday's attacks were carried out in ways that maximized death tolls.

In northwest Baghdad, a driver in the heavily Shiite neighborhood of Kadhimiyah pulled up alongside a gathering point for day laborers and offered the men jobs, witnesses said. He waited until a crowd of workers had clustered around his four-door car, then detonated explosives packed inside, said Salim Hussein, 20, who witnessed the attack.

The blast killed at least 112 people and wounded hundreds of others.

As burned, blackened victims filled the district hospital, a Shiite cleric patrolled the scene of the bombing in an ambulance, calling over the vehicle's loudspeaker for donations of blood. Men looking for loved ones ran fingers down pages and pages of names of bombing victims posted outside the hospital.

"Why haven't they killed Saddam?" wailed a Shiite woman in black abaya as she walked away from the hospital. "Cut his head off."

Within an hour of that attack, a driver smashed his car into two other vehicles at an intersection, then blew up the vehicle when a crowd gathered, police said. At least 15 people died, police Lt. Mustafa Majid said.

"I saw people's bodies flying in the air and thrown for yards," minibus-taxi driver Amer Salman said.

More attacks were mounted throughout the day, signaled by rattling booms, black smoke and U.S. military helicopters shuttling across the sky. Traffic on main roads shut down as police closed key routes. Rumors spread that more car bombers were roaming the city and that men wearing suicide belts were infiltrating hospitals.

The other attacks included two car bombings that killed a total of 26 people, one that targeted an Iraqi army convoy and killed three soldiers, and two that hit U.S. military convoys, U.S. and Iraqi officials said. A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Steve Boylan, said that he knew of three U.S. soldiers wounded in the day's attacks and that none had been reported killed.

Separately, attackers opened fire on a car carrying Iraqi police officers, killing one, and then detonated a car bomb when other officers responded, killing four more people, police said. A separate rocket attack killed two Iraqi civilians.

In Taji, a town just north of Baghdad, men wearing the uniforms of Iraqi security forces dragged 17 men out of their homes, then handcuffed, blindfolded and shot them, news agencies reported.

A U.S. military convoy came under intense attack in the late afternoon, first with a roadside bomb and then, half an hour later, with a car bomb, police said. A reporter watched as U.S. forces traded gunfire with hidden assailants at the scene.

One of the final bombings of the day hit outside the Green Zone, the concrete- and razor-wire barricaded base of U.S. officials and the Iraqi government. There was no immediate official word on casualties.

The estimated death toll of more than 160 made Wednesday the deadliest day of insurgent violence in Baghdad since the United States and its allies invaded Iraq in March 2003. The deadliest day of insurgent violence nationwide was March 2, 2004, when at least 181 people were killed in mortar and bomb attacks on Shiite shrines in Karbala and Baghdad.

Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari, who was visiting Dearborn, Mich., as part of a U.S. tour, condemned the attacks and declared that his government's "rational, political struggle" would prevail over "criminal acts," the Associated Press reported. "I share with the people their sorrow and grief. They are martyrs," Jafari said.

Survivors condemned the insurgents but blamed their government as well. "We voted for Jafari so he can help us get rid of terrorism. He cannot," Hussein Lami, a laborer, said at the site of the first bombing. "He must admit now that he cannot do it" and resign.

"Every day I am losing one of my friends or my relatives," Lami said.

Wednesday's carnage tested the ability of U.S. and Iraqi forces to maintain security shortly before two events that insurgents are widely expected to target: a Shiite pilgrimage this week that is expected to draw millions to the holy city of Karbala, and an Oct. 15 national referendum on Iraq's draft constitution. While voter registration among Sunnis has soared ahead of the vote, Zarqawi has declared that anyone who goes near a polling place is a legitimate target.

Growing political violence in much of the country also threatens what U.S. officials have said is their goal of bringing the insurgency to a level that is manageable by Iraqi forces ahead of any U.S. withdrawal.

At Least 160 Killed In Series Of Bombings (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD -- A spasm of bombs claimed by al Qaeda killed at least 160 persons yesterday, marking a declaration of "all-out war" against Iraq's Shi'ite Muslims by terror leader Abu Musab Zarqawi.

The onslaught of more than a dozen highly coordinated explosions terrorized Baghdad for more than nine hours and left 570 wounded on the capital's bloodiest day since the end of major combat.

The attacks coincided with the Internet posting of an audiotape in which a man identified as Zarqawi declared "all-out war" on Shi'ites, Iraqi troops and the government.

The first attack -- at 6:30 a.m. -- was the deadliest when a suicide car bomb tore through a crowd of day laborers in the predominantly Shi'ite Muslim neighborhood of Kazimiyah.

The bomber set off the explosive after calling the laborers to his small van and enticing them with promises of work, a witness said.

At least 112 persons were killed and more than 200 were wounded, Iraqi Health Ministry officials said.

The attacks came as U.S. and Iraqi forces pressed their offensive against insurgents in the northern city of Tal Afar and along the Euphrates River valley, striking hard at what officials have said were militants sneaking across the border from Syria.

Al Qaeda in Iraq said in a separate Web posting that it launched the attacks, some less than 10 minutes apart, in response to the Tal Afar offensive, which began Saturday and evicted most insurgents from the city.

"To the nation of Islam, we give you the good news that the battles of revenge for the Sunni people of Tal Afar began yesterday," said the statement. It was not clear why the statement referred to "yesterday."

The audiotape was posted later yesterday. The speaker, introduced as Zarqawi, a Jordanian, said his militant forces would attack any Iraqi they think has cooperated with the Tal Afar offensive.

"If proven that any of [Iraq's] national guards, police or army are agents of the crusaders, they will be killed and his house will demolished or burned -- after evacuating all women and children -- as a punishment," the speaker said.

As the hours ticked by, at least 12 car or roadside bombs shattered what had been a few days of relative calm in Baghdad. Two mortar attacks were reported, and a multitude of gunbattles broke out between U.S. and Iraqi forces and insurgents.

Also yesterday, terrorists killed 17 men -- including Iraqi drivers and construction workers for the U.S. military -- in a Sunni village north of Baghdad before dawn. That raised the death toll in and around the capital yesterday to 169. A senior Health Ministry official said 570 persons were wounded in all.

At least six attacks targeted U.S. forces, Iraqi authorities said. The U.S. military said there were four direct attacks on Americans, with 10 soldiers wounded. No U.S. deaths were reported.

Iraqi Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, in the United States for the annual U.N. General Assembly meeting, expressed "his personal sorrow for the victims of the attacks," his office said.

In Dearborn, Mich., a Detroit suburb with a large Iraqi population, Mr. al-Jaafari vowed to fight back.

"Those criminals will not run away from our justice system. Our cities, our villages will not welcome them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0005683

Yesterday's blasts coincided with Iraqi lawmakers' announcing the country's draft constitution was in its final form and would be sent to the United Nations for printing and distribution ahead of an Oct. 15 referendum.

Sunni Arabs, who form the core of the insurgency, have vowed to defeat the charter.

The carnage was thought to have produced the second-worst one-day death toll since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

On March 2, 2004, coordinated blasts from suicide bombers, mortars and planted explosives hit Shi'ite shrines in Karbala and Baghdad, killing at least 181 and wounding 573.

Yesterday's bombing was the second tragedy in the Kazimiyah district in two weeks. On Aug. 31, about 950 people were killed during a bridge stampede as tens of thousands of Shi'ite pilgrims headed to a nearby shrine.

Iraqi Insurgents Are A Moving Target (CSM)

By Jill Carroll And Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD AND CAIRO - In the north and west of Iraq Wednesday, troops were wrapping up operations designed to restore government control to insurgent dominated towns, in an effort to deny foreign and local insurgents the "rat-lines" to move men and equipment into Baghdad and other cities to carry out major attacks.

Meanwhile in Baghdad, at least a dozen explosions thundered across the city, with the deadliest a suicide attack that killed at least 114 laborers waiting for jobs in a Shiite neighborhood. In total, at least 152 were killed - the single largest one-day death toll attributed to insurgent attacks in Baghdad.

The contrast between what are being described as largely successful operations against insurgent hotbeds in Tal Afar, Qaim, and Haditha - towns with historic trading links to Syria that the US military says are way-stations for foreign fighters - and ongoing violence across the country, demonstrates the fluidity of Iraq's insurgency against thinly spread US and Iraqi forces.

In particular, the assault on the ethnic-Turkmen town of Tal Afar - where 8,500 US and Iraqi troops, largely drawn from the ethnic Kurdish peshmerga militia, took over the city this week - was aimed at limiting the mobility of Sunni insurgents. "It is a pathway from Syria that pretty historically was a trading route and smuggling route into Iraq," said US military spokesman Lt. Col. Steve Boylan.

An estimated 200 militants were killed and hundreds captured. But as forces moved on the city, the US military said many insurgents simply fled, using a network of tunnels they'd created in advance of the assault. That pattern has become increasingly common since the April assault on Fallujah, where hundreds of insurgents died in the most sustained combat of the war.

Instead of standing up to superior US firepower - particularly air support that drops 500-pound bombs on insurgent positions - insurgents now generally avoid major engagements. Instead of holding their ground, insurgents are counting on US forces to eventually withdraw and on the Iraqi forces left behind not being able to prevent their return.

So far, that approach has worked. This was at least the third major assault on Tal Afar in the past 18 months. As in previous engagements in western Iraqi towns along the Euphrates like Hit, Haditha, and Qaim, the insurgents reasserted themselves when US forces were shifted elsewhere.

Colonel Boylan says that while much of the US effort is focused on shutting off infiltration into Iraq, completely sealing Iraq off isn't likely. "To say it's shutdown is difficult. It's almost impossible to physically shut it down."

That's because of the topography of the desert and expanses of arid plains in along the 270-mile border with Syria, Boylan noted.

"The border is absolutely something you can't seal. I wandered back and forth across those borders in the region for a long, long time where there's supposed to be border guards and desert police, but you just don't see them," says Col. Pat Lang (ret.), a former head of Middle East intelligence analysis for the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency.

Colonel Lang says that when the US masses troops, as in Tal Afar, it's always going to win, but that it doesn't have enough troops to deny insurgents sanctuary elsewhere, essentially shifting the problem around.

"The insurgents are increasingly creating redoubt areas, the kinds of places we can't go without stripping people from elsewhere and entering in large numbers," says Lang. "Therefore the insurgents own it 95 percent of the time. The object of the drill for the guerrillas is not to fight [US forces] head-to-head, but to wait until they have an advantage."

That's what happened in much of the Western portion of the Sunni-dominated Anbar province this year. In a major operation there last March, US Marines swept through Hit and other cities, and encountered little resistance as insurgents melted away. At the time, Marine commanders fretted about what would happen when they rotated out at the end of the month, and were replaced by other Marine units with about 1,000 fewer troops.

Officers and enlisted men at the time said they worried that their replacements would be in greater danger because of their smaller size. Roads wouldn't be patrolled as often to keep them clear of concealed bombs. At least 40 US troops have been killed in Western Anbar since the start of August.

And in Tal Afar, a city of 200,000 people, there are other concerns. The city's mostly Turkomen population views the Kurds as their ancestral enemies, so ethnic tension could be ratcheted up after using mostly Kurdish militias to attack the city.

Walid Sharika, a Turkman member of the national assembly and on a government committee focusing in Tal Afar, says that while he's glad the assault took place, ethnic divisions there have been widened.

"This should have happened four or five months ago because Tal Afar is one of the most important terrorism bases in all the world. I believe for a lot of problems in Iraq the source is Tal Afar," he says.

Even so, "more than half the city is destroyed and there are a lot of refugees living in a camp and we lost children and elderly," says Sharika.

Tal Afar Turning Point? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Only weeks ago -- until Katrina stole the headlines -- Washington was deep in the grip of yet another of its "quagmire" panics about Iraq. We don't want to make the opposite mistake of over-optimism. But the recent Iraqi victory in the battle of Tal Afar could be a turning point in the war against the terrorists who slaughtered more than 150 innocents (mostly poor Shiite laborers) in multiple bombings yesterday.

In recent days Iraqi forces -- yes, Iraqi forces -- have led the largest urban assault there since the liberation of Fallujah last November. Meanwhile, Iraq and the United States are finally ratcheting up the pressure on Syria, with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad saying "all options" -- including military force -- "are on the table" when it comes to stopping terrorist infiltration from that country. Without Syria's help, the insurgency would be seriously weakened.

There are good reasons to believe the current operation in Tal Afar -- a largely Turkoman city near the Syrian border -- will be a model of things to come. Previous attempts to clean the terrorists out of Tal Afar and other cities in northern and western Iraq have too often seen the insurgents melt away only to return when the U.S. spearhead withdrew. This time Iraqis are leading the fight and, most important, many will stay so the people of Tal Afar can begin to believe they can live free of terrorist intimidation.

As of last night, a force of about 5,000 Iraqis and 3,800 Americans had killed at least 157 terrorists, detained 440 suspects, and discovered 34 weapons caches, all while suffering minimal casualties. "The terrorists are losing their morale. They couldn't resist as they did in Fallujah," Iraqi President Jalal Talabani told us yesterday in an interview in New York, where he is attending the United Nations General Assembly.

The Tal Afar operation calls into question the contention of war critics like Senator Joe Biden that there are only a handful of Iraqi troops capable of meaningful operations. In fact, U.S. commanders classify about 40 battalions -- roughly 750 soldiers in each -- as "fully independent" or able to fight "in the lead."

A U.S. officer with detailed knowledge offered us this assessment: "The Tal Afar operation has been a sweeping success for the Iraqi Security Forces in many ways. There is an Iraqi Army Brigade headquarters with four infantry battalions, a Special Police Commando Brigade headquarters with two battalions, and an Army Transportation battalion in the fight up there. The Police Commandos and one of the Army battalions were flown there by the Iraqi Air Force's own C-130 fleet executing their first combat support missions." Eight Iraqi soldiers and one American have died in the offensive.

Similar Iraqi-led clean-and-garrison operations might well be performed in other problematic cities like Ramadi. This is a classic form of anti-insurgency warfare that has the potential to narrow the range of operations for the terrorists. President Talabani told us that about 50,000-60,000 Iraqi troops can be considered "well trained," and the number is growing. They will eventually replace Americans, though we hope not before more Tal Afar operations can be undertaken.

Whether those Iraqi troops are competently led and deployed will depend on a political process that includes a constitutional referendum and another parliamentary election before the year is out. But the victory in Tal Afar is the best sign of anti-insurgent progress since the Marine sweep through Fallujah.

A Family, Torn Apart, Pulls Together (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Sept. 14 -- The hunt for one of the missing young men of the Rahim family ended at a refrigerator truck in a hospital back lot.

"He's gone! He's gone!" an aunt of 19-year-old Saif Kadhum Rahim cried, striking herself in the face with her open palms at the sight of her nephew. His bare, charred legs protruded from under a white shroud in the back of the truck.

"My brother! My brother!" said one of Saif's eight younger siblings, tilting his head back and grasping his hair. With barely a pause, the men of the family moved in around the stunned boy and transferred Saif's body from steel truck to wooden coffin, then loaded the coffin into a van that would take Saif on what would be his next-to-last ride.

Bedlam was bubbling up in Iraq's capital all day Wednesday, bursting through the thin surface of what passes for routine. Families rushed to find loved ones and ambulances sped to aid survivors, even as new bombings sent more waves of frantic searchers into the chaos. Towers of black smoke rose into the sky as police turned away cars from hospitals, fearing secondary attacks that might target medical centers treating the bombing victims.

Members of Shiite cleric Moqtada Sadr's militia and Iraqi police officers sped back and forth in pickup trucks on the city's highways and through the poor neighborhoods of the Shiite majority. They waved pistols and AK-47 assault rifles at nothing. "Explosions! Explosions!" a Shiite militiaman shouted, pounding the metal roof of a car to get it to turn back from the site of one blast.

In their van, the men of the Rahim family drove across the city, rushing to take the body of Saif home, to search for his 17-year-old cousin Haider, who was lost and presumed dead, and to tend to a 24-year-old cousin who lay wounded in a hospital.

All three were victims of a suicide bombing in Baghdad's Kadhimiyah district, the first of at least 10 bombings and other attacks during the day. They were with several other relatives -- some sitting in Saif's minibus taxi, some stepping away for tea at a sidewalk booth -- when a suicide attacker blew up a four-door Volkswagen packed with explosives.

At least 112 people were killed, most of them the Shiite neighborhood's day laborers, who were gathered at a traffic circle to wait for work. Survivors said the bomber lured the men closer with offers of jobs before detonating his payload. Hussein Ali, another cousin in the extensive Rahim family, said the workers, nearly impoverished, were targeted simply "because they were Shiite."

Al Qaeda in Iraq, the insurgent group led by Jordanian-born Abu Musab Zarqawi, issued a statement praising the attacks. The group, dominated by foreign Sunni Muslim extremists like Zarqawi, draws much of its support from Iraqi Sunnis resentful of the new political dominance of the country's Shiite majority.

The Sunni insurgents bear "hatred against us," Ali said. "This is a war against the Shiites."

A year ago this month, insurgents shot and killed Saif's 50-year-old father on a street in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad, his family said. One of Saif's uncles died the same way four months ago, they said.

From his father, Saif inherited the minibus taxi and responsibility for his mother, six sisters and two younger brothers, the family said. The family on Wednesday passed around a photo of Saif standing by the black minibus, twisting a bare foot out of his sandal, an uncertain breadwinner.

Saif earned about $7 a day driving laborers to and from work sites. On Wednesday, one of his cousins, alerted by a phone call from the family that there had been a bombing at the traffic circle where Saif worked, sped to the scene. He said he found Saif dead, still inside his minibus. He carried the body to the hospital, where it was stored in the refrigerator truck.

After Saif's body had been retrieved and driven home, the men of the family gathered silently, fingering worry beads under framed photos of family members killed in the insurgency. Posters depicting the revered founder of Shiite Islam, cradling children or waving a sword, hung under broken chandeliers on thinly painted concrete walls.

The men waited for others to finish searching the morgues for the body of Haider, the missing cousin, so that the family could drive him and Saif together to the Shiite holy city of Najaf for burial. In accordance with Islamic tradition, Saif would be buried the same day he was killed, his body headed to burial less than six hours after he last walked out his front door.

"In another country, if everything turned upside down, everyone would talk about" Saif's death, Ali, 27, said as he waited. "Here, so many died, and no one cares."

One of Saif's uncles, Falih Kehait, called over an 8-year-old boy and kissed him lightly. The boy had hopped off the minibus just before it exploded.

In another room, away from the men, Saif's six sisters wailed. Kneeling and supported by other women, the sisters tore at their hair, cried with open mouths and pulled down their black clothing to slap their flesh until it burned red. Little girls, one in a Mickey Mouse abaya and others in pajamas, watched wide-eyed against the walls of the back room.

Asked who would take care of Rahim's eight brothers and sisters now, Ali said, "God will keep them."

In a doorway, a neighbor, Fatima Yassim, spoke softly: "What you are seeing now is so little compared to the tragedy that has happened."

"But what shall we do?" she asked, her hands on the shoulders of a girl with a bow in her brown hair. "Shall we prevent our daughters from going to school? We are afraid even to send our sons to work."

The insurgents "want our people to kill each other," she concluded. "But we are Muslims. We are one religion. We love [the Sunnis] so much."

DOJ_NMG_0005686

In the front room, the men wavered between returning Saif's body to the morgue so they could resume the hunt for Haider and taking Saif alone to Najaf for burial. Kehait, the uncle, finally decided he and three others would make the journey to Najaf and trust militiamen and the police to protect the Shiite families who would be streaming toward the holy city.

"Only us four," he ordered. "If we are attacked, only we will be killed."

A girl of 6 or 7 years, a relative of Saif's, watched silently as the men wrapped his coffin in a rose velour blanket and tied it to the roof of a car. Her chin trembled uncontrollably.

No women, a man of the family ordered. Even as he spoke, new wailing signaled Saif's mother emerging from the privacy of mourning in her home. Held up by other women, the twice-bereaved woman collapsed, throwing the dirt of the street in her face.

Men lashing down the coffin stopped, buried their faces in their hands and wept, shoulders shaking.

No women, an uncle insisted again, turning back the sisters as the minibus started up. The women poured from the house. The uncle relented slightly, and Saif's mother pushed herself inside for the ride to Najaf.

CBS Asks Why U.S. Imprisons Its Iraqi Hire (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

For 25-year-old CBS cameraman Abdul Amir Younes Hussein, being shot and wounded by American forces in Iraq was just the beginning.

On April 5, Mr. Hussein, a freelancer employed by the network in the northern city of Mosul, went to the scene of a car bombing to film the aftermath. He was standing near an armed insurgent when U.S. forces opened fire, killing the militant and wounding him lightly. The military released a statement that expressed regret about the incident and said it was under investigation.

Three days later, the military released a second statement saying that Mr. Hussein had been "detained for alleged insurgent activity" and there was probable cause to believe he posed "an imperative threat to coalition forces."

That statement has sparked a bitter legal and political dispute with Viacom Inc.'s CBS, which has lobbied senior military and civilian officials to try to win the cameraman's release. Mr. Hussein, who has been unable to see his family or his lawyer since being detained, faces a hearing today in Baghdad that will determine whether he will be released.

CBS News, which insists that its cameraman is innocent, says it has spent tens of thousands of dollars gathering evidence in Iraq that could be presented at review board hearings for Mr. Hussein and hiring a Washington law firm to press his case with the Pentagon, Congress and the State Department. But so far, those efforts have proved fruitless, and the network is publicly discussing aspects of the case for the first time.

"The cameraman has now been detained for more than five months, and no one concerned has been informed of the evidence against him," the network said in a statement yesterday. "We continue to request that information and hope it will be provided and his status be decided, one way or another, in a fair and timely manner."

The military defends its handling of the case and says Mr. Hussein remains under suspicion. The journalist has been detained "based on information that he was affiliated with anti-Iraqi and anti-coalition forces and engaged in anti-coalition activity," Lt. Col. Guy Rudisill, a military spokesman, said in a statement. He said the activity included "recruiting and inciting Iraqi nationals to violence against coalition forces and participating in attacks against coalition forces."

Mr. Hussein's story illustrates the difficulty of reporting in Iraq. The Committee to Protect Journalists, a nonprofit organization, describes the country "as the most dangerous place in the world to work as a journalist," noting that 23 journalists were killed there last year and an additional 15 have died so far this year. Because the dangers to Westerners are so great, foreign media outlets frequently rely on Iraqis hired locally to supplement their staff reporting. The Iraqis travel around the country far more than the Westerners and are routinely targeted by insurgents or involved in accidental shootings by Americans. On June 30, for instance, Knight Ridder reporter Yasser Salihee was killed on his day off by a U.S. Army sniper.

Western media organizations increasingly complain that their Iraqi hires are routinely detained by the U.S. military without charges. In addition to Mr. Hussein, at least four Iraqi journalists -- including two cameramen for the Reuters news agency -- remain in American custody. In an interview yesterday with Reuters, Iraqi Justice Minister Abdul Hussein Shandal criticized such detentions and said journalists should be able to film attacks and interview insurgents without fear of being arrested.

CBS describes Mr. Hussein as a timid young man who was so afraid of coming into contact with insurgents that he was warned at least once that he would be fired unless he went into the field more often. The network says it found Mr. Hussein through its local correspondent in Tikrit, an employee who had been on its payroll for two years. It says Mr. Hussein was a graduate of Mosul University where he belonged to a student group that organized a reception for Mosul's new governor that was funded with American money and attended by several U.S. military officers. Mr. Hussein, who is unmarried, lived with his family in a predominantly Kurdish neighborhood where they are some of the only Arabs.

The military's reversal of its initial description of Mr. Hussein's shooting was the first of several occasions it changed course in its handling of the journalist, according to both the military and CBS News. After its public statement describing Mr. Hussein as a security threat, the military told CBS News that it would allow network employees to meet with him and recover the camera and videotape seized from him after the shooting, the network says. CBS immediately dispatched London-based producer Randall Joyce, who arrived at an American base in Mosul on April 15.

During their meetings with the CBS News producer, however, military officials refused to say where Mr. Hussein was being held or who was interrogating him, the network says. They told Mr. Joyce that he couldn't meet with Mr. Hussein on security grounds, and couldn't recover the camera or duplicate the videotape because they were evidence, the network says. When he asked for an update on Mr. Hussein's health, the military declined, citing a domestic U.S. law barring the government from releasing health information on American citizens, according to the network.

Afterward, the military moved Mr. Hussein to Abu Ghraib prison but said it would allow CBS to submit evidence to a military panel that would decide during a July hearing whether to keep Mr. Hussein in custody or release him, according to CBS News. The network gathered evidence -- including affidavits from a relative that works as an Iraqi police officer and from other Iraqi journalists in Mosul -- asserting that Mr. Hussein was at his university at the time of the attack, didn't arrive at the scene of the April 5 bombing until almost 30 minutes after the explosion, and had no known ties to the insurgents. It sent its findings to the military, but the hearing was canceled and the military told the network that it was instead submitting Mr. Hussein's case to the Iraqi legal system for prosecution.

In his statement, Lt. Col. Rudisill said the hearing wasn't held because the panel's attorney "found there was sufficient admissible evidence to successfully prosecute Mr. Hussein for unlawful possession of explosives and aiding and abetting armed attacks against coalition forces."

The Iraqis declined to prosecute, but instead of releasing Mr. Hussein the military took him back into its own custody, where he has remained.

In a letter to CBS News reviewed by The Wall Street Journal, Pentagon General Counsel William J. Haynes said the Iraqis' decision not to prosecute didn't necessarily mean Mr. Hussein would be freed. He noted that the military panel used both classified and unclassified information, while the Iraqi legal system based its decision solely on the unclassified information that could be presented in open court. "Such a determination [by the Iraqis] does not preclude the possibility that sufficient evidence exists ... to conclude that Mr. Hussein should continue to be detained for imperative reasons of security," he wrote.

According to a Coalition Provisional Authority decree still legally binding in Iraq, captives like Mr. Hussein must have their detentions formally reviewed by the Combined Review and Release Board within six months. Since Mr. Hussein was arrested in early April, the review by the panel -- which includes three American military officers and a total of six representatives of the Iraqi ministries of Justice, Interior and Human Rights -- must be held by early October.

In Mr. Hussein's case, the questions about innocence or involvement in insurgent activity are supposed to be answered today during the scheduled meeting of the panel, which will take place behind closed doors in Baghdad without the presence of Mr. Hussein, his Iraqi attorney, or representatives of CBS News. Depending on the panel's determination, he will either be released or consigned to potentially indefinite captivity. CBS News says it plans to pay Mr. Hussein's salary to his family as long as he remains in custody.

Detention Of Iraqi Employees Angers Western News Media (NYT)

By Robert F. Worth

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BAGHDAD, Iraq, Sept. 14 - On April 5, Abdul Ameer Younis Hussein, an Iraqi cameraman for CBS News, was struck in the thigh by an American sniper's bullet while filming the aftermath of a suicide bombing in Mosul. As he recovered in a military hospital, the Americans arrested him. They later said the film in his camera suggested he was working for insurgents.

More than five months later, Mr. Hussein is still in an American military prison. The Iraqi criminal authorities have reviewed his case and declined to prosecute him. Colleagues who were with him that day have produced affidavits supporting his innocence. The American military has not released any evidence against him, despite repeated requests for information by CBS producers, lawyers and even the network's president, Andrew Heyward.

Mr. Hussein's case exemplifies a quandary faced by Western news organizations here. Their own reporters are mostly confined to fortified compounds and military bases. As a result, they are forced to rely on Iraqis, who work in increasingly dangerous settings, where the line between observer and participant is not always clear.

Western bureau chiefs concede that they cannot be certain the people they hire do not have links with insurgents, though they do their best to weed out such people.

One thing is clear: dozens of Iraqis who carry out assignments for the news organizations have been detained while on the job, and sometimes released weeks or months later with no explanation. American forces have mistakenly killed a dozen others, including a soundman working for Reuters who was shot dead by a sniper on Aug. 28.

Some of those cases raise a broader question: how close can Iraqi reporters get to insurgents without being considered the enemy? American commanders often suggest that reporters who are tipped off about an attack are automatically implicated, but Iraqis often take a different view.

"Maybe some are working with insurgents, but many others just get a call from someone saying, 'There will be clashes,' " said Ibrahim Saraji, the director of the Iraqi Journalists' Rights Defense Organization, formed last year after the fatal shooting of two Arab journalists in Iraq. "It doesn't mean they are an insurgent."

Pentagon lawyers have told CBS that Mr. Hussein is being held on classified evidence, according to letters sent to the network that were provided to The New York Times. The military has released statements saying that Mr. Hussein tested positive for explosive residue, and citing accusations that he "had knowledge of future terrorist attacks." It is not clear who made the accusations, or whether the residue may have resulted from his proximity to the scene.

Mr. Hussein's friends and relatives - who have not been able to visit him in prison - say the military has not interviewed them or searched his home, standard procedure with people suspected of having ties to insurgents. CBS executives say the network has investigated the incident and has no reason to believe that its cameraman was working with insurgents.

Clearly, it is often difficult for American soldiers to tell a reporter from a combatant in Iraq's chaos, with no uniforms or clear battle lines. The fact that insurgents routinely film and distribute scenes of their attacks makes it even harder. The military cannot afford to give journalists special treatment under those circumstances, said Lt. Col. Steven A. Boylan, a military spokesman in Baghdad.

But Western bureau chiefs say the military often seems to arrest their Iraqi employees merely for getting too close to the action - in effect, for doing their jobs too well. When journalists are killed, the bureau chiefs say, the military often does little more than a cursory investigation.

"They seem to have moved to the view that everyone in a conflict area with a camera is a potential terrorist," said Alastair Macdonald, the Reuters bureau chief in Baghdad. "The burden of proof is on them to prove that they're not."

A number of Reuters Iraqi employees have been detained by the American military, including three who said after being released that they were abused by American interrogators while being detained in Falluja last year. Ali al-Mashadani, a Reuters cameraman, was detained in Ramadi on Aug. 8 and remains in American custody. Mr. Macdonald said he had seen no evidence against Mr. Mashadani or clear accusations, and had no reason to believe he had any insurgent connections.

Iraqi employees with many other companies, including CNN, Associated Press Television News and Agence France-Presse have been detained for long periods in the past year. But some companies declined to comment about the detentions, saying they feared that doing so might harm their relations with the military.

Iraqi reporters often point out that they routinely receive death threats from insurgents, who have killed more reporters than the United States military by far. But they also say the military's suspicion is making it almost impossible for them to work in some areas.

"The American military has intelligence sources, but they don't seem to understand that we have sources too," said Maher Hassan al-Thanoon, 36, who has carried out assignments for Reuters in Mosul for 18 months. "They may just be people who live in insurgent neighborhoods. It doesn't mean they support what the insurgents are doing."

Western bureau chiefs also say that after being detained by American forces, their Iraqi employees often disappear into a void, where nothing can be learned about the case against them and their legal status is unclear. Mr. Hussein, for instance, was initially scheduled for a hearing with the Combined Review and Release Board, a nine-member panel formed to review detention cases. It is made up of three American military officials and six Iraqi government officials from the Justice, Human Rights and Interior Ministries.

But before the board could hold a hearing his case was transferred to the authority of the Iraqi central criminal court. He remained in American custody, though. The Iraqi criminal authorities reviewed the case, though they had not been provided with the classified part of it, and declined to prosecute it.

Jurisdiction over Mr. Hussein was then transferred back to the combined board, which is scheduled to hear his case on Thursday.

His status seemed uncertain in other ways, too. When CBS officials first asked about his health after he was shot and detained, military officials declined to answer, citing American laws on medical privacy.

DOJ_NMG_0005689

On Wednesday, Iraq's justice minister, Abdul Hussein Shandal, criticized the detentions of Iraqi journalists in an interview with Reuters, saying he wanted to change a United Nations resolution that gives American troops immunity from Iraqi law. He said journalists were not free to report on all sides of the conflict.

He also dismissed American claims that his ministry had an equal say in detentions, suggesting that the American military controlled the Combined Review and Release Board.

Military officials in Iraq contend that some Iraqi cameramen and photographers show up at attacks so promptly that they must have had advance notice. Colonel Boylan said he knew of two Iraqi journalists in detention whose film footage indicated that they had filmed several attacks on one day, from the start.

Mr. Macdonald and other Western bureau chiefs say they have seen no evidence of such cases. They also say the frequent repetition of that accusation is irresponsible because it makes soldiers more likely to be aggressive with Iraqi journalists at attack scenes.

Afghan Ballots Carry Mullahs, Jihadis, Women (CSM)

By Scott Baldauf

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

TORKHAM, AFGHANISTAN - A mullah, a feminist, a jihadi, and a communist: It sounds like the start of an Afghan joke, but instead, it is the makings of Afghanistan's first-ever elected parliament.

These are some of the 5,700 candidates running for seats in parliament and provincial assemblies around Afghanistan. Their diversity is both an endorsement of democracy, and a challenge to its very existence.

When Afghans line up to vote on Sunday, choosing 249 men and women from these thousands, they will be selecting from candidates who hold conflicting views over concepts as fundamental as the very definition of democracy itself.

"This is a project of decades and generations, not months and years," says Kit Spence, a senior analyst at the National Democratic Institute in Washington. "The good thing is that people are buying in to the concept in a strong way."

Kabul and most towns are papered over with campaign posters, a sign that the Afghans are taking this election seriously. It is the presence of so many faces - of men and women - that serves as a striking reminder of how much has changed since the days of the Taliban, when depictions of the human face were forbidden.

Yet this campaign has also seen spates of violence, reminders that Afghanistan is still emerging from 23 years of occupation and civil war. Six candidates and four election workers have been killed thus far, and scores continue to receive death threats. In Uruzgan Province, Taliban fighters killed seven people for carrying voting cards, according to Gov. Jan Mohammad Khan.

Safiya Sadiqi, an energetic liberal candidate from the conservative province of Nangrahar, was attacked with Kalashnikovs, grenades, and rockets last week. None of her campaign workers were hurt, but some villagers were injured. She now travels less openly and with government gunmen.

Yet her moderate Islamic, antiwarlord message remains as strident as before.

"Those people who rob you, who kill your children, if they give you food, will you give him your vote?" she says to a small group in the town of Torkham, mocking a nearby rally of a warlord where some 5,000 people have gathered with the promise of free food. "If you elect him ... the winner will be the one who killed your rights."

Perhaps her bravest words, and the ones that stick in the craw of many ethnic Pashtuns here, are when Mrs. Sadiqi - an official from the Ministry of Rural Development - talks of the cruelty of many Afghan traditions toward women.

She describes seeing a pregnant woman being driven to the hospital. According to tradition, the male relatives sat in front, and the pregnant woman was forced to sit, obviously under great pain, in the trunk. "I asked the men, how can they do this? This is not right. Show me where in the Koran it says you should do this."

The crowd of around 300 men clap politely. Sadiqi's case may seem hopeless, but she is probably one of the strongest female candidates in her province, and is seen as a likely winner of one of the four seats here that are reserved for women.

But if she wins, so will many others with completely different visions.

Some, like former Taliban deputy interior minister Mullah Khaksar, want to bring back sharia, where major decisions are made according to Islamic scripture, as interpreted by religious scholars.

Some, like Kabir Ranjbar - a former advisor to pro-Soviet President Najibullah - want to bring a more equitable distribution of resources to the poor, borrowing pages from the former Soviet Union.

Some say that Afghanistan must be ruled by technocrats, while others, like mujahideen leaders Younus Qanooni and Abdulrab Rasul Sayaaf, say it must be ruled by those who fought the jihad, no matter their educational achievement.

Many, perhaps the majority, pose as opponents of President Hamid Karzai, and some demand the removal of US troops as a sign that Afghanistan can now run itself.

With such ideological diversity, parliament is likely to be much better at staking out positions than in getting anything done.

"Today, power is still held by warlords," says Mr. Ranjbar, the head of the Union of Lawyers of Afghanistan, and a parliamentary candidate from Kabul. "In the new parliament, most of the time will be spent getting your own people into the cabinet, and this fighting will take Afghanistan backward."

Meanwhile, high up in the Paghman valley above Kabul, a very different man with a very different vision for Afghanistan is speaking in a mosque full of some 3,000 men. Surrounded by gunmen, Abdulrab Rasul Sayaaf strokes his long white beard and speaks of a glorious future for Afghanistan, led by "men of good Islamic character" who have fought nearly 23 years to get rid of men like Ranjbar.

"Those who fought for the freedom of this country are worthy to take part in its government," says Sayaaf, after a long discourse on Islamic government. "If the mujahideen are not able to act in a political way, those people who looted Afghanistan before ... will play the same roles."

Almost everyone agrees that the first few months, if not years, of Afghanistan's experiment with democracy will be messy. The fact that so many political factions remain armed makes it possible for political disputes to turn deadly.

Sadiqi has survived one such attack, but says she will press on. "I trust in my vision," she says. "The day before yesterday, they attacked us, but we are here today."

Election Gives Group That Battled Taliban Chance At A Comeback (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BAZARAK, Afghanistan -- The green-domed mausoleum housing the tomb of Afghanistan's legendary guerrilla leader Ahmed Shah Massoud sits atop a windblown cliff with a breathtaking view of the lush Panjshir Valley. This was Massoud's northern redoubt over two decades of fighting against a succession of enemies, beginning with invading troops from the Soviet Union and ending with the extremist Taliban militia.

But the vista seemed lost on the hundreds of grim-faced men who trudged up the peak on a recent morning to pay their respects on the fourth anniversary of Massoud's assassination by two al Qaeda suicide bombers posing as journalists -- a strike that came just two days before the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States.

"If Massoud were still alive, we would not be living like this," proclaimed an enormous black banner carried by the crowd, as a handful of parliamentary candidates looked on solemnly.

"We feel so sad and alone," said Nader Khan, 22, wiping away tears. Khan is a former mujaheddin, or holy warrior, in Massoud's militia who is now unemployed. "Massoud loved the mujaheddin. Today, nobody cares for us."

As leading members of a coalition of northern ethnic militias that joined forces with the United States to topple the Taliban rulers after the Sept. 11 attacks, Massoud's Panjshiri successors were a dominant force in Afghanistan's first post-Taliban government. But over the last year and a half, the ethnic Tajiks of the Panjshir Valley have watched with dismay as President Hamid Karzai, a member of Afghanistan's majority Pashtun ethnic group, has replaced some of their most prominent leaders with Pashtuns and welcomed former Taliban officials back into the country as part of a reconciliation program.

Now, many Panjshiris see Afghanistan's parliamentary elections, to be held Sunday, as their chance at a comeback.

As in the rest of Afghanistan, campaign posters with pictures of the contenders have been affixed to every conceivable surface of the Panjshir Valley -- shop doors, tree branches, even the rusting Soviet tanks that still litter the area. But here, where Massoud's image has become synonymous with the past Tajik glory, many of the advertisements also feature portraits of "the Lion of the Panjshir," as Massoud is widely known. His pictures are as large as, if not larger, than those of the candidates themselves. One candidate, Saleh Registani, is handing out an entire brochure of moody photographs of himself with Massoud during the years of the Soviet war.

Speaking in the tidy, modest living room of his house about a mile from Massoud's tomb, Registani, 42, complained that "right now the role of non-Pashtuns is too weak. We want the government to be a broad-based government for all Afghans." Most of the policies he proposes involve amending the constitution to transfer authority from the presidency to the provinces, a move that would considerably enhance the power of Afghanistan's ethnic minorities.

Registani may get his way. Yonus Qanooni, a polished former deputy to Massoud and the runner-up in presidential elections last October, is leading a coalition of 14 parties fielding approximately 500 candidates from provinces across the country for Sunday's vote -- the first legislative elections in Afghanistan since the 1960s. Many candidates who are not officially part of the bloc say they also support Qanooni.

Their bid presents a double-edged challenge for Karzai, who has enjoyed relative freedom to maneuver since he won the presidency with 55 percent of the vote: If Qanooni and his allies win a majority of seats, the president will likely face a highly combative parliament. If Qanooni's bloc fails to make a strong showing, Karzai may have to contend with the wrath of a sizable swath of voters convinced that the election was stolen.

Although international observers signed off on the results of last year's presidential election, Qanooni and many of his supporters still maintain that he was the true victor.

"I only accepted the results for the sake of national stability," Qanooni said in a recent interview.

Foreign election officials have privately expressed concern that Qanooni's recent complaints about the vote-counting procedures planned for the legislative elections are an attempt to lay the groundwork for claiming fraud again if he is unhappy with the results.

Interviews with registered voters from several villages in Panjshir suggest that Qanooni would find a receptive audience for his concerns.

"This is their last chance," Del Agha, 30, a wiry, sandy-haired veteran of Massoud's militia, warned darkly. "If they steal our votes again, it will be time for us mujaheddin to do something."

He spoke from his guard hut at a munitions depot next to a rushing river at the foot of a narrow valley. Around him were stacks upon stacks of forest green ammunition boxes, alongside several dozen shipping containers packed with small arms.

The arms and ammunition should have been sent to the capital, Kabul, months ago under a U.N.-run program to demobilize armed groups in Afghanistan. However, while the militia's leaders have handed over about 150 heavy weapon pieces to the government -- including tanks and Scud missiles -- they have so far proved reluctant to relinquish their ammunition stocks, according to U.N. officials.

Agha said he understood his superiors' reluctance to comply. A fighter since the age of 17, Agha said he remained haunted by memories of war: the back-breaking weight of the rockets he used to carry across freezing mountain passes, the eyes of a wounded enemy fighter his comrades urged him to shoot at point-blank range, the terror he felt as his truck plummeted down a steep ravine one night, and the pain of multiple surgeries in India to repair his spine.

The thought of handing control of the weapons amassed during those years to the central government fills him with bitterness.

"Most of those officials were off having fun in European capitals while my brothers were dying," he said.

The Panjshiris' resentment is compounded by their impression that they have received less foreign aid than southern and eastern provinces that were former strongholds of the Taliban.

Western observers acknowledge that there is some truth to these complaints. For instance, while the United States spent $190 million to build a road connecting Kabul to the southern city of Kandahar in 2004, work on a $26 million U.S.-funded project to pave the narrow main road through the Panjshir Valley did not start until last month. Officials said the delay was caused by a plan, since scrapped, to use the project to train Afghan officials and companies in road-building.

Also, because former fighters in the Panjshir were slow to disarm, they did not receive the financial compensation and job training called for in the program as quickly as counterparts in other provinces.

But analysts also say that the Panjshiris' sense of grievance is overstated.

Last month, for example, the U.S. military agreed to contribute an additional $4 million to the Panjshir road project. And this year, the government declared the valley a province, granting it separate representation in the new parliament even though its population and land area are far smaller than those of many existing provinces.

Also, while Karzai has sidelined top Panjshiri leaders such as the former defense minister and vice president, Mohammed Fahim, and the former head of national intelligence, Muhammad Arif Sarwari, many other Panjshiris remain in prominent positions -- including Foreign Minister Abdullah, army chief Bismillah Khan and the new head of intelligence, Amralluah Saleh.

"In fact, I think you'll find that the top positions are way oversubscribed by Panjshiris given their percentage in the population," said a foreign diplomat who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Still, the diplomat said, whatever the outcome of the elections, the government will have a strong interest in placating Panjshir's residents for some time to come. "In a place where there are tens of thousands of tons of weapons, it's not a good idea to have people alienated from the government," he said.

New Generation Of Afghan Voters Is Finding Its Voice (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 11 - Late in the afternoon here the streets are full of young men, pouring out of private classes that teach English and computer skills or that offer the chance to catch up on years of missed schooling during two decades of war. With books under their arms, the young men jump on their bicycles or head home on foot across the dusty roads and parks.

"We don't want anything special; the only thing we want is the atmosphere and facilities to be educated," Abdul Rahim, 18, said after emerging from an English class. Another student, Abdul Hadi, 28, said, "We do hope that finally we will have a capable Parliament and they can make facilities for studying."

The young people of Afghanistan stand out in this already industrious nation as particularly motivated and politically aware and are seen by some here as an important constituency in the coming parliamentary elections, on Sunday.

Half of the population is estimated to be under 30, said Amena Afzali, who heads the new Ministry of Youth and Sports.

"They have initiative and a readiness to learn - that is obvious," she said. "We want the desires of young people to be listened to."

An estimated 70 to 80 candidates under age 30 are running for the Wolesi Jirga, the lower house of Parliament, where the minimum age is 25; about 150 are under 35. That is relatively few of the 5,800 candidates, yet it is raising hopes that a new generation of leaders will start to emerge in this war-ravaged country.

"I don't like the long beards," said Khaleda, 27, a teacher and mother of four who uses only one name, alluding to religious conservatives. "We want young people, enlightened people, and a new generation."

Candidates are picking up the message. "A lot of our members are the new generation," said Jamil Karzai, 30, a second cousin of President Hamid Karzai and leader of the National Youth Solidarity Party of Afghanistan. His party is fielding 25 candidates in parliamentary and provincial council elections, but he says he would be happy to win four seats in the lower house.

"This Parliament will be mixed up like a vegetable soup," he said. "We will have tribal leaders, warlords, drug lords, but also democratic new faces and policies."

"What I have heard from the people - and I have visited a lot of provinces in the past six months and daily meet about 100 people - they want new faces. They say: 'What has been tried is tried. We tried these guys and they failed.' "

At a rally of young supporters, Muhammad Yunus Qanooni, 46, who finished second in the presidential race and is now hoping to win a large bloc in Parliament, called on his audience to vote for people who could speak for them. "If you choose those representatives who support the new generation, you will not suffer from poor education," he said.

Like most of their elders, younger adults want security, good educational systems and a good health system, in that order, Mr. Karzai said. Despite his relationship to the president, he criticized the government, saying it had in some cases appointed corrupt and incompetent governors and police chiefs and allowed the parliamentary candidacies of many figures whom human rights organizations accused of abuses.

Issues like letting young people decide their own futures, and even select a spouse, will have to wait, he said. "First you have to prepare people to listen to you about this, then later introduce it. It needs years."

A dozen young people interviewed in Kabul overwhelmingly said their priority was improving education, in particular school and university facilities and teaching standards, followed by creating jobs. They also cited the same concerns as their parents: government corruption, security and the pace of reconstruction.

"There are people who cannot feed themselves; there are no factories, no jobs," said Qais, 17, an assistant in one of Kabul's new perfumer shops, who said he planned to vote even though the minimum voting age is 18.

About half of those interviewed said they would vote as their fathers advised, while the others said they would make their own decisions.

"I will decide as I want," said one student, Hedayat, 19, who missed five years of schooling but wants to study law. "Maybe my father does not have the complete information about young people. I will vote for someone who can understand."

"It is because of the views of our fathers' generation that this country is like this. They did not want peace. They were fighting each other. There are a lot of things that we want, that they don't even know about."

He added: "The young generation wants to be equal with the youth of other countries. We have people who are engineers in Afghanistan but they don't even know how to use computers. We want to be the same as other countries."

Female Candidate Sees Election As 'A New Beginning' (WT)

By Carmen Gentile

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Jamilah Mujahid, who hopes to win one of 68 seats set aside for women in Afghanistan's parliament, view's Sunday's election as a turning point for her war-ravaged nation.

Among Mrs. Mujahid's priorities if elected would be education for women, especially those who are behind the learning curve because they grew up under the Taliban regime, which prohibited girls from going to school.

"The Taliban and others are still against women in positions of power because they know that once we get power, we will pursue equal rights for all women," said Mrs. Mujahid, who is favored to win a seat in Wardak province.

Some female candidates have reported being harassed and intimidated on the campaign circuit, particularly in rural Afghanistan, where restrictions on women are deep-seated and enforced by Taliban supporters and tribal warlords.

A longtime radio and TV personality here, Mrs. Mujahid called Sunday's scheduled parliamentary and provincial elections "a new beginning for Afghanistan."

Afghanistan has set aside more than one-quarter of its 249 parliamentary seats exclusively for women.

According to electoral law governing the vote, the top female vote-getters in each of Afghanistan's provinces will be awarded seats in the Wolesi Jirga, or House of People.

"Even though the law guarantees women a position in the parliament, they are still going to receive support at the pollsþ" said Najiba Sediqi, a program director at a radio station airing shows geared toward Afghan women.

Although the Taliban regime is no longer in power, it remains a viable force in Afghanistan, continuing to clash with coalition and Afghan forces.

So far this year more than 1,000 have been killed in these battles, the most for any year since U.S. forces arrived after the September 11, 2001, attacks.

Women's rights activist Hassina Sherjan agrees with Mrs. Mujahid saying the key to leveling the playing field among men and women is education.

"Many of [the female candidates] seem motivated to create a better society for womenþ at least I hope they are," said Mrs. Sherjan, whose Kabul-based Aid Afghanistan organization has spent the past 10 years trying to provide supplemental education for women and girls.

"We're trying to avoid the segregation of women" from the workplace and in other sectors of society, said Mrs. Sherjan, who sees the presence of women in parliament as a step in that direction.

De Afghani Khazi Ghag Radio, which means "the voice of Afghan women," broadcasts 12 shows six days a week dealing with issues such as abusive spouses, and airs call-in shows and songs featuring Afghan and regional female vocalists -- even the Britney Spears tunes.

"The bottom line is we are trying to promote women's self-esteem after years of oppressionþ" Mrs. Sherjan said.

Women Embrace New Freedom In Bamiyan (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, September 15, 2005

BAMIYAN, Afghanistan — The five men traveled three hours across rugged Afghan terrain to take their troubles to the provincial governor. Their problem: A local warlord was blocking a crucial irrigation project; no bribe, no water.

After listening patiently to their story, the governor agreed to send police to the remote district to deal with the local commander and his armed thugs. “I will solve the problem,” the governor said. “We'll have to do it by force.”

The extortionist warlord is all too typical in Afghanistan. The decisive governor, who declined to name the offender to avoid further trouble, is anything but. Habiba Sarabi is the first woman to run a province in Afghan history.

Perhaps more than anywhere else in Afghanistan, women in Bamiyan province are leaping into the political space created by the U.S.-led overthrow of the Islamic fundamentalist Taliban militia four years ago. They are more likely to run for office and to vote than other Afghan women.

Sixteen women will be on ballots in Bamiyan province Sunday, when voters choose candidates for the provincial council and the lower house of the Afghan National Assembly, known as the Wolesi Jirga. Elsewhere, some provinces couldn't field enough female candidates to fill the seats reserved for them.

In Bamiyan, 48% of registered voters are women, who are a majority in some districts. Nationwide, women are less than 42% of voters.

The enthusiasm with which Bamiyan women embrace politics reflects the relatively moderate brand of Islam that predominates in the remote province, best known for the 1,500-year-old giant Buddha statues the Taliban destroyed in March 2001. Bamiyan men are more likely to tolerate female candidates and voters than the men in Afghanistan's fundamentalist-dominated southern and eastern provinces.

Sarabi was appointed six months ago by Afghan President Hamid Karzai. She has emerged as a role model for Bamiyan's aspiring female politicians.

“She gave great hope to women. They know they can run a province,” says Marzia Mohammadi, a female Wolesi Jirga candidate and former kindergarten principal.

Khadija Bahari, 26, is out campaigning in a Toyota van that has a red heart labeled “Love” dangling from the mirror.

“This country has operated at a very low level,” says Bahari, who is the former head of a human rights group. She aims to start fixing things if the voters give her the go-ahead Sunday.

Under Afghan law, women are guaranteed 68 of the 249 Wolesi Jirga seats being contested nationwide and 124 of the 420 seats on the country's 34 provincial councils. In Bamiyan, one of four Wolesi Jirga seats and three of nine provincial council seats must go to women. Bahari reckons she's one of seven women running for the one legislative seat reserved for a woman.

In some places, the appearance of women on the ballot is causing a stir. In the western city of Herat and the northern province Badakhshan, three young female candidates are attracting ardent admirers, according to the Daily Outlook Afghanistan, an English-language newspaper. Smitten storekeeper Mohammad Karim plastered posters of candidate Qaida Afif, 28, on the wall of his shop in Herat. “We are determined to vote for the most beautiful,” he told the newspaper.

Other Afghan men are less than thrilled to see women running for public office. In many places, tribal and religious customs restrict women to the home and require them to wear head-to-toe coverings called burqas when they go out.

After Bahari gave a campaign speech at a Bamiyan mosque, the mullah denounced her as un-Islamic. “The fundamentalists don't like me,” she says.

Mohammadi says she was confronted in a remote Bamiyan village: “A man argued with me that women should stay at home. He was telling me women must not go to parliament because there are so many men there. … It was difficult to make him understand.”

Things are worse for female candidates and election workers elsewhere in Afghanistan. According to a report last month by the New York-based activist group Human Rights Watch, a total of five provincial seats reserved for women in the Taliban strongholds of Zabul, Uruzgan and Nangarhar will remain empty, probably because women are too frightened to run. Elsewhere, women who want to run for office face intimidation, the report said. “Violence against women, forced marriage and early marriage are endemic problems,” it said.

The group cited statistics from UNICEF that show that one in six Afghan women die in childbirth and 87% of those deaths are preventable. The illiteracy rate for Afghan women over 15 is 86%. In Afghanistan's seven conservative southern provinces, less than 10% of girls go to school.

The appearance of female candidates is raising hope that issues such as women's health and education finally might get on the national agenda. “No one cares about women's health in Afghanistan,” says nurse Zainab Rezai, 40. “The husband must allow (his pregnant) wife to go to the hospital every month. They are now treated like a prisoner in their homes.”

Sarabi cites another simple advantage of putting women in high office: It gives ordinary women a place to go to air grievances and make suggestions. For many Afghan women, the idea of visiting a male politician in his office is unthinkable.

Sarabi's office sits in a one-story yellow building overlooking the bluffs that once held the Bamiyan Buddhas. Bamiyan is a poor, isolated place. The 130-mile drive to Kabul over unpaved roads is a bone-jarring 81/2-hour journey. The people here are predominantly Hazaras, a long-oppressed ethnic minority group. They are probable descendants of Genghis Khan's Mongol armies, which swept through in the 12th century. The Persian-speaking Hazaras are moderate Shiite Muslims in this majority Sunni country.

The Pashto-speaking Sunni Taliban hated them. When the Taliban overran the province in the late 1990s, they slaughtered hundreds of Hazaras. Nurse Rezai remembers how she had to slide into bed and pretend to be a patient whenever Taliban members came to inspect the hospital where she worked. With women banned from work and girls from school, “I thought women in Afghanistan had lost everything,” she says.

Now she is delighted to have so many female candidates to choose from. “They will work for women's rights,” she says. And she is overjoyed to have Sarabi running the province. “She is the pride of all Afghans, not just women,” Rezai says.

A decade ago, Sarabi was a pharmacist living comfortably in Kabul. Her political days as a Kabul University student leader organizing demonstrations against the Soviet occupation in the early 1980s seemed far behind her. She was a mother of three when the Taliban took over Afghanistan. Sarabi fled with her children to Peshawar, Pakistan. Her husband stayed behind to care for his aging father and their property.

In Peshawar, Sarabi found a job training teachers to work in squalid Afghan refugee camps. Eventually, she founded an aid group that ran clandestine girls schools inside Taliban-occupied Afghanistan. Four or five times, she sneaked into the country.

When the Taliban fell in late 2001, she came home. President Karzai named her minister for women's affairs in 2002. He sent her to Bamiyan as governor six months ago. She is Hazara, though she is from Ghazni province, southeast of here.

Sarabi's job is overwhelming. Bamiyan needs so much — roads, schools, clinics, clean water — and has no money to pay for it. She is reduced to begging for cash from the central government and from aid agencies whose “bureaucracy is worse than our bureaucracy.” She also must contend with “dozens” of provincial warlords such as the one holding up the irrigation project.

She says another warlord is blocking a health clinic a day's drive from Bamiyan town. When the election is over, Sarabi plans to dispatch the police to deal with him. Still, she describes her management style as motherly: listening patiently, seeking consensus, cracking heads only when she has to. It's made her popular. “We don't want a boss,” says driver Mohammed Hassan, 29. “We want someone to serve the people. She is doing a good job.”

“About the only complaint I've heard about her,” election officer Gezim Kiseri says, “is that she's put on a little weight since she took office.”

Afghans Helped Bin Laden Flee Country, Official Says (LAT/REU)

By From Reuters

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

KABUL, Afghanistan — Osama bin Laden was given safe passage to Pakistan in 2001 by Afghan commanders paid by Al Qaeda and sympathetic to the terrorist network's cause, a senior Afghan official said Wednesday.

Lutfullah Mashal, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, said commanders had helped the Al Qaeda leader escape from the Tora Bora mountains near the Pakistani border as U.S. warplanes and Afghan forces attacked his hide-out in late 2001.

"The help was provided because of monetary aid availed by Al Qaeda and also partly because of ideological issues," Mashal said.

"Osama, along with other Al Qaeda people, managed to go to Parachinar at the time, and then Pakistani forces battled the Al Qaeda runaways, killing around 70 of them," he said, referring to an area in Pakistan's Kurram tribal region.

He said commanders loyal to Maulvi Yunus Khalis had helped Bin Laden escape. The whereabouts of Khalis, a top mujahedin leader in the war against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, are unknown.

Mashal told private Pakistani television channel Geo on Tuesday that U.S. forces had made a mistake in entrusting the capture of Bin Laden to Afghan commanders.

Mashal said that he was present in the Tora Bora mountains during the December 2001 operation and that although U.S. forces were not there in uniform, Green Berets were present in plainclothes.

While 800 to 900 Arabs fled Tora Bora for Pakistan's Khyber tribal region, he said, senior Al Qaeda leaders trekked to Parachinar with the help of some Sulemankheil tribal elders.

Mashal said Bin Laden later recrossed the border to Khowst, where the leader of the Taliban there gave him refuge. He then returned to Pakistan, this time heading for Miranshah, the main town in another tribal area, North Waziristan.

U.S. officials have said Bin Laden, who has evaded a U.S.-led manhunt since the Sept. 11, attacks, is probably still hiding in the rugged mountains between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Merrill Lynch Changes How It Forecasts Earnings Stock Options To Be Included (USAT/REU)

By Jonathan Stempel, Reuters

USA Today, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK — Merrill Lynch on Wednesday said it will require all U.S. equity research analysts to include options and other stock-based compensation in their earnings forecasts for U.S. companies.

The changes by the largest U.S. full-service brokerage, which covers more than 1,000 U.S. companies in 50 industries, are intended to reflect a controversial new accounting rule. That rule requires public companies in fiscal years beginning after June 15 to treat stock options as routine business expenses, such as salaries.

“Merrill is anticipating there may be very large changes in earnings per share for many companies,” says April Klein, an associate professor in accounting at New York University's Stern School of Business. “Not only do I expect other Wall Street brokerages to follow, but I expect them at least for a while to be restating some companies' old financial results.”

Many technology companies, including Cisco Systems, opposed the new rule, fearing it might increase operating costs and reduce profits.

But the Financial Accounting Standards Board and Securities and Exchange Commission backed the change, and companies such as Wal-Mart began implementing it before the deadline. Meanwhile, some companies, including Microsoft, have stopped granting stock options.

Merrill will require its analysts to incorporate options and other stock-based compensation into their earnings forecasts for quarters ending after Sept. 30.

“This is a move in the right direction,” says Charles Mulford, an accounting professor at the Georgia Institute of Technology in Atlanta.

DOJ_NMG_0005696

About 90% of the 250 largest U.S. companies now offer stock options, down from 99% in 2003, says compensation consultant Frederic W. Cook & Co.

"It is important to show compensation included in income statements so that investors can make apples-to-apples comparisons of companies' earnings," says Steve Tighe, Merrill's head of Americas equity research.

Marsh Ex-Executives Are Expected To Be Indicted On Fraud Charges (WSJ)

By Ian Mcdonald

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

As many as eight former Marsh Inc. executives are expected to be indicted on criminal-fraud charges Thursday, according to two people close to the situation.

As reported last month in The Wall Street Journal, a grand jury impaneled in Manhattan has been weighing criminal charges against the former executives. The probe is an outgrowth of a fraud investigation last year by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that resulted in a $850 million settlement by Marsh & McLennan Cos. of bid-rigging charges early this year. Marsh Inc. is the New York company's insurance-brokerage unit.

In settling, Marsh apologized to clients for the "shameful" conduct of some employees who "unlawfully deceived their customers."

Mr. Spitzer is expected to unseal indictments charging the former Marsh employees with scheming to defraud, according to the two people, barring any last-minute guilty-pleas hammered out with prosecutors. A spokesman for Mr. Spitzer declined to comment.

In the civil suit settled by Marsh, state authorities alleged that some Marsh brokers cheated institutional clients by rigging bids for large insurance contracts and steering business to insurers who paid Marsh large commission payments. All told, more than 15 insurance managers and executives have pleaded guilty to criminal charges stemming from the probe, including other former Marsh brokers and former employees of large insurers American International Group Inc.; Zurich American Insurance Co., a unit of Zurich Financial Services AG; and ACE Ltd.

Mr. Spitzer built his case against former Marsh executives by gathering evidence from some of those who pleaded guilty and pledged to cooperate in the investigation.

In recent weeks, Mr. Spitzer's office instructed attorneys for the eight individuals that their clients should be available to surrender to authorities in New York with 24 hours notice from Sept. 7 to Sept. 21. A spokesman for the company declined to comment.

The individuals will likely surrender themselves at Manhattan police precincts early Thursday and then be arraigned. Prosecutors threatened organized-crime charges in recent weeks, but it isn't clear whether any of the former Marsh executives will face those charges.

At least two of the former Marsh executives facing potential criminal charges aren't negotiating with authorities, according to three people close to the matter. William Gilman, a former top Marsh insurance broker profiled in a Page One story5 in The Wall Street Journal last year, has long been a focus of Mr. Spitzer's probe. Mr. Spitzer's suit against Marsh alleged the bid-rigging scheme was "strictly enforced by Marsh through William Gilman." Mr. Gilman's attorney didn't return a call for comment.

The second is former Marsh executive Joseph Peiser. "I have not seen the charges, but Joe Peiser was a loyal Marsh employee who did not do anything wrong," said his attorney, Jerry Bernstein of Blank Rome LLP.

Ex-NYSE Regulator Testifies To SEC Call On Email Policies (WSJ/DJN)

By Siobhan Hughes, Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

The Securities and Exchange Commission asked the New York Stock Exchange in 2001 to drop enforcement cases against a dozen Wall Street firms whose email retention and storage policies were deficient, according to a former NYSE regulator.

Annette Nazareth, then-director of the SEC's market regulation and now an SEC commissioner, called the NYSE in the spring of 2001 and asked that the exchange's regulatory arm stop reporting email-retention violations to the NYSE's enforcement division and withdraw referrals that had already been made, according to testimony by Salvatore Pallante, former NYSE executive vice president for member-firm regulation.

At the time, the SEC was in discussions with Wall Street over changes to its email rules, which the industry had criticized as being too broad. Because of those discussions, Ms. Nazareth believed it would be "unreasonable" to bring enforcement actions, according to Mr. Pallante's testimony.

Mr. Pallante testified on behalf of Raymond James Financial Services Inc., which is fighting civil fraud charges filed by the SEC last year. The SEC sued Raymond James for failing to supervise a broker who allegedly bilked investors out of millions of dollars and also accused the firm of failing to fully preserve email records. The testimony was available through the SEC's public records office.

SEC Chief Administrative Law Judge Brenda Murray is set to make a decision in the matter by today. Raymond James is using Mr. Pallante's testimony to bolster its case, arguing that the SEC had planned to change its own rules.

Lori Richards, director of the SEC's office of compliance, inspections and examinations, told Mr. Pallante that she agreed with Ms. Nazareth's approach, Mr. Pallante said. As a result, he said, the NYSE dropped cases it had developed against about 12 member firms. In an interview, Ed Kwalwasser, the NYSE's vice president of regulation in 2001, confirmed Mr. Pallante's account.

Mr. Pallante didn't return a phone call, and NYSE spokesman Brendan Intindola declined to comment. A call to Ms. Richards's office was referred to the SEC press office. Both Ms. Nazareth and SEC spokesman John Heine declined to comment.

The SEC hasn't contested Mr. Pallante's account. In a brief responding to his testimony, the SEC said the commission didn't engage in misconduct, adding SEC staff opinions aren't the same as the views of the five-member commission. The SEC also argued that its rule is clear.

The SEC requires brokerage firms to keep email messages for three years, with the two most recent years' worth in an easily accessible place. Wall Street has long complained about the regulation, saying it is too broad, strains the limits of storage technology, and could apply even to personal emails, such as messages between brokers or analysts making dinner plans.

The email requirement was first spelled out in a February 1997 SEC release. By 2000, the SEC was in closed-door discussions with Wall Street firms about narrowing the regulation. The discussions were still going on by 2001 when Ms. Nazareth made her phone call, according to Mr. Pallante's testimony.

Some securities lawyers defended Ms. Nazareth's approach, saying the SEC was trying to respond to complaints about the 1997 mandate at a time when it seemed Wall Street was negotiating in good faith.

On the other hand, investor advocates question why the SEC would have considered accommodating the wishes of the brokerage industry in the first place.

"Who in their right mind decides we're going to lighten up on record-retention policies for the new, emerging, primary way people communicate in the market?" said Barbara Roper, director of investor protection for the Consumer Federation of America. "What genius came up with that idea?"

Credit Derivatives And Their Risks Are On The Table (WSJ)

By Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

The New York Federal Reserve Bank is gathering the big Wall Street players today. The topic: rising concerns about risk in what is known as the credit-derivatives markets.

The talks come amid frustration about the failure of the structure of the market to keep pace with the explosive growth in the trading of these complex securities.

"People have the best intentions, but there are resource issues," says Donna Parisi, head of the derivatives practice at the law firm of Shearman & Sterling. Credit derivatives, which allow investors to take positions on the risk of default of both companies and countries, have been one of the most rapidly growing financial products on Wall Street.

Infrastructure issues that have bedeviled the market involve processing and settling trades, or what some experts such as Thomas Russo, vice chairman of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., refer to as the "plumbing of the market." Such descriptions sound boring and technical. But the credit-derivatives arena has become increasingly important in terms of managing investment risk, which means regulators are eager to ensure that these complex and often opaque markets operate smoothly.

Thus far, their proddings have largely gone unheeded, leading to the unusual summit at the New York Fed.

The love-hate relationship between Wall Street firms and their hedge-fund clients has grown more acrimonious when it comes to credit derivatives. Hedge funds claim that Wall Street firms are reluctant to move to more efficient electronic trading and processing systems, because such a move would crimp the Street's margins. The dealers in turn say that hedge funds have been reluctant to invest sufficient funds in their back offices, and that it is the hedge funds, not Wall Street firms, that are the problem.

In any case, the result is stacks of paper at both hedge funds and at Wall Street firms. And the paper load is growing, as the labor-intensive review of documents and agreements confirming trades falls increasingly behind the growing volume of new trades.

"The burden gets bigger and bigger," says Robert Pickel, head of the International Swaps & Derivatives Association. ISDA provides master agreements for trades in the credit-derivatives market, but there is often a lot of debate about basic definitions of the trades, especially on what constitutes a default. The agreements "are only a partially completed canvas," adds Mr. Pickel.

The spotty record of confirmations can become a risk-management issue in times of turbulence. Such conditions occurred in May, when the gap between safer Treasurys and less-safe corporate bonds widened sharply. The trading turmoil that month has prompted several reviews of the market, with regulators trying to get a stronger handle on how best to ensure smoothness in the credit-derivatives market.

Valuations are another issue of contention. Since credit derivatives can be illiquid, hedge funds can garner a wide range of estimates on what a given position might be worth. Indeed, two different areas within a single investment bank have been known to give widely differing quotes on a given credit derivative, hedge-fund managers say. Who gets to say what a position is worth in times of volatility is an even more troubling issue, especially since it is such a critical element in assessing hedge-fund performance and the risk exposure of firms dealing with the hedge fund.

The Fed is also tackling the related, highly arcane issue of assignment. Hedge funds sometimes move out of trades -- "assign" them -- without telling the bank that sold them the credit-derivative contract. This practice makes it harder for other market participants to know whether their positions are properly hedged.

While the purpose of the meeting is simply "to discuss how best to address a range of important issues," according to the letter sent to 14 industry participants and a variety of international regulators, there is always the implicit threat of regulatory action.

"When things get relegated to the support areas, they sometimes often do not get the attention they deserve," says Mr. Russo, who was part of a private-sector group led by former New York Fed Chief Gerald Corrigan that looked at such risk issues. "Meetings such as those sponsored by the New York Fed are sometimes necessary to shine a light on a problem, mobilize people and bring about positive action."

Greenspan Issues Another Warning On Fannie, Freddie (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon And Dawn Kopecki

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, in his strongest warning yet, said in a recent letter that Wall Street investment firms eventually could be incapable of hedging all the financial risk posed by mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, if Congress doesn't impose meaningful limits on them.

"As Fannie and Freddie increase in size relative to the counterparties for their hedging transactions, the ability of these [companies] to quickly correct the inevitable misjudgments inherent in their complex hedging strategies becomes more difficult," Mr. Greenspan wrote in the letter1, dated Sept. 2, to Sen. Robert Bennett (R., Utah), and reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

Mr. Greenspan's letter concludes: "In the case of [Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac], excessive caution in reducing their portfolios could prove to be destabilizing to our financial system as a whole and in the end could seriously diminish the availability of home mortgage funds."

Legislation to impose a range of new controls over the congressionally chartered companies, known as government-sponsored enterprises, or GSEs, has been stalled in the House, in part over Mr. Greenspan's concerns that it doesn't go far enough in curbing the growth of the companies' mortgage portfolios.

Many conservatives, who see Fannie and Freddie as a form of government intrusion, also worry that another provision of the bill would strengthen the companies' already substantial political clout on Capitol Hill, by substantially raising the amount of money they dedicate to affordable-housing programs around the country.

The two companies borrow money to buy home mortgages. They either hold the mortgages in their own portfolios or sell them to other investors. Because they can borrow almost as cheaply as the federal government itself, critics worry that there are no effective curbs on their potential growth, and particularly the growth of their portfolios. That is a potential concern because their portfolios of mortgages make the companies extremely vulnerable to interest-rate swings.

The companies try to hedge that risk through complicated strategies involving derivative investments such as interest-rate swaps. But Mr. Greenspan and some others worry that as the companies and their portfolios grow, they could overwhelm the ability of Wall Street banks to act as the counterparties. Already, market participants have reported occasional shocks when sudden zigzags in interest rates have brought the companies -- along with other mortgage-market players -- into the swaps market suddenly.

Freddie Mac said Mr. Greenspan's comments were consistent with prior statements he has made. The company also sought to play down concerns about systemic risk posed by its portfolio investments. "Our portfolio is very conservatively managed and tightly regulated," said Freddie spokesman David Palombi, pointing to the elaborate tests that federal officials run to measure its safety. He also suggested that the markets themselves would prevent untoward growth of the companies, and warned that "arbitrarily limiting our retained portfolio would decrease over time the availability of the long-term, fixed-rate, prepayable mortgage."

Fannie declined to comment. Both companies have warned investors that the legislation could materially hurt their profits and affect their ability to promote affordable housing.

While holdings of mortgages and related securities by Fannie and Freddie have soared during the past 15 years, so far this year their combined holdings have declined. At the end of July, the combined total came to about $1.449 trillion, down 7% from the end of 2004. That is partly because Fannie has been shrinking its holdings to meet stiffer capital requirements imposed by the company's regulator in the wake of an accounting scandal.

But critics worry that if the current wave of scrutiny passes without strong new legislative curbs, the companies will be free to start growing again. That concern led Mr. Greenspan to warn earlier this year that passing the House bill would be worse than doing nothing.

Yesterday, the chief proponents of the House legislation sought to improve chances for their bill by amending it to steer more of the companies' profits into affordable housing in the stricken Gulf Coast region. One of the leaders of the effort is Rep. Richard Baker, a Louisiana Republican who represents the Baton Rouge area.

Another proponent, House Financial Services Chairman Michael Oxley (R., Ohio), said the bill is expected to come to a floor vote next week. Still, it isn't clear that the changes will be enough to overcome objections to the House measure among conservative critics.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Gets Tough On Pedophile Offenders (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2005

Sex offenders who abuse children would be subject to stringent monitoring requirements and face new mandatory penalties under legislation the House passed Wednesday, 371-52. The bill would create a national website on pedophile sex offenders and stipulate that sex felons face up to 20-year sentences for not complying with registration requirements.

“We track library books better than we do sexual predators,” said Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla. Rep. Bobby Scott, D-Va., criticized the bill because released offenders who face harassment or job discrimination “may just go underground and not bother to register again.” The House approved an amendment to expand federal hate-crime laws to include some crimes involving sexual orientation, gender and disability. The vote was 223-199. The House had failed to pass similar legislation in the past. Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay rights group, said it was an “incredibly historic vote” that could give momentum to similar action in the Senate.

Ex-panel members reject Atta allegation

Former members of the 9/11 Commission dismissed assertions that a Pentagon intelligence unit identified lead hijacker Mohamed Atta as a member of al-Qaeda long before the 2001 attacks. Army Lt. Col. Anthony Shaffer and Navy Capt. Scott Phillpott have said a classified military intelligence unit known as “Able Danger” identified Atta before the attacks. Shaffer has said three other hijackers were also identified.

The commission's former chairman, Thomas Kean, said the recollections of the intelligence officers couldn't be verified by any document. Slade Gorton, a former commissioner, said, “It just didn't happen, and that's the conclusion of all 10 of us.”

Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., has accused the commission of ignoring the intelligence about Atta. Weldon spokesman John Tomaszewski said no commissioner has met with anyone from Able Danger, “yet they choose to speak with some form of certainty without firsthand knowledge.”

Uranium waste to be moved from river

The Energy Department cleared the way for nearly 12 million tons of radioactive waste in Utah to be moved from the banks of the Colorado River, which provides drinking water for more than 25 million people across the West. The 94-foot-tall pile of uranium tailings — radioactive material left over from uranium mining — will be moved by rail from Moab, Utah, to Crescent Junction, more than 30 miles from the river.

Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman signed the decision, which was announced earlier this year. Federal studies in the 1990s found that an underground plume of pollutants — 1 mile wide and 40 feet deep — reaches from the site to the river.

House Favors Expanding Hate Crime Law To Protect Gays (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Sex offenders who prey on children would be subject to stringent monitoring requirements and face new mandatory penalties under a bill, passed by the House, that was expanded to include protections for gay men and lesbians under federal hate crime law.

The House voted 371 to 52 yesterday in favor of the Children's Safety Act, which, among its many provisions, creates a national Web site for child sex offenders and stipulates that sex felons face up to 20 years in prison for failing to comply with registration requirements.

Unexpectedly, the House voted 223 to 199 in favor of an amendment by Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) that expands current hate crime law to include some crimes involving sexual orientation, gender and disability. Under current law, the federal government assists local and state authorities prosecuting limited types of crimes based on the victim's race, religion or ethnic background.

The House has been the chief obstacle in numerous previous attempts to expand hate crimes law, and Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay rights group, said it was an "incredibly historic vote" that could give momentum to similar action in the Senate.

The sex offender bill, which also requires felony offenders to register for life and authorizes the death penalty for sex crimes resulting in the killing of a child, responds to what House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), said was a "national crisis" in child sex offenses. He said that of about 550,000 convicted sex offenders in the nation, the whereabouts of 100,000 are unknown.

Sensenbrenner said the legislation would get favorable treatment in the Senate. The White House expressed support, saying that even though sex crimes against children have declined significantly in recent years, more needs to be done. It noted that the legislation codified the online National Sex Offender Public Registry that the Justice Department launched earlier this year.

The legislation brings together parts of numerous proposals to protect children from sex offenders.

House GOP Derails Democratic Inquiries (NSDY/AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- House Republicans derailed Democratic attempts on Wednesday to force the Bush administration to surrender documents on prewar intelligence and the disclosure of the identity of a CIA operative.

Democrats have introduced several "resolutions of inquiry" to compel President Bush and members of his Cabinet to release all information relating to communications with British officials before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq and the Valerie Plame case.

The White House has taken heat since the disclosure this year of the "Downing Street memos," British documents that suggest the Bush administration had made up its mind by 2002 to invade Iraq. Administration officials also have been interviewed by a special prosecutor in his quest to determine who leaked Plame's covert identity to reporters.

Largely along party lines, the House International Relations Committee unfavorably reported two of the resolutions on Iraq and one resolution on the Plame matter. Earlier, the House Judiciary Committee "unfavorably" reported a similar Plame resolution.

Under House rules, the committees had to act on the resolutions within 14 legislative days of the resolutions' introduction. If not, sponsors could have forced the measures before the full House for a vote.

But the votes Wednesday against the measures all but prevented them from ever being taken up by the House.

Other Democratic-sponsored resolutions on both matters are in different committees. Those resolutions will be considered in the next few weeks; the outcome is expected to be the same.

Republican leaders want to avoid the spectacle of either issue being debated on the House floor amid some fear that the measures could succeed if enough Republicans side with minority Democrats.

House Republicans Block Bid For CIA Leak Data (REU)

Reuters, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - Two U.S. congressional committees on Wednesday rejected Democrat-backed resolutions that would have compelled the Bush administration to turn over records relating to the outing of CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee and International Relations Committee, who opposed the resolution, said Congress should await the outcome of a federal investigation by special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald.

Democrats countered that Republicans were trying to protect President George W. Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove. "We know that this is a political decision because there is potential embarrassment to the administration," said Massachusetts Democratic Rep. William Delahunt.

The resolutions, rejected in committee votes along party lines, sought to force the departments of Justice and State to turn over all documents related to Plame.

Lawyers close to the Plame investigation say there are signs that the 20-month-long inquiry could be wrapped up within weeks. The outcome could have major political implications for Bush, whose approval ratings are already the lowest of his presidency.

Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, said the leak was meant to discredit him for criticizing Bush's Iraq policy in 2003 after a CIA-funded trip to investigate whether Niger helped supply nuclear materials to Baghdad.

A reporter for Time magazine said the first person to tell him about Plame was Rove. Rove's attorney says Rove did nothing wrong and has been repeatedly assured he is not a target of Fitzgerald's investigation.

Democrats have urged Bush to fire Rove or revoke his access to classified information. It is against the law in some cases to knowingly reveal the identity of an undercover CIA officer.

Editorial: Fence Off Internet Porn (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2005

The Internet has transformed the pornography business. In little more than a decade, online "adult entertainment" has become a booming multibillion dollar industry, enabled by the World Wide Web's easy, impersonal accessibility.

Avoiding or blocking the X-rated onslaught can be nearly impossible. Internet content moves with no respect for borders and at such slippery speed that tracking it is like trying to grab hold of mercury. Innocuous-looking e-mail titled, say, "Here's the offer you requested" can link to pornography generated in the Ukraine. Much of what's out there makes the "adult content" of the past look quaint.

For those who want porn, that may be fine. But for others, it can be deeply offensive. And for children, it can be damaging.

A blanket ban is not a useful option because foreign sites are beyond the reach of U.S. law, which is why one fresh approach deserves encouragement.

It's a proposal for a virtual red-light district in the form of a new Internet domain. Instead of .com or one of the other familiar Web address suffixes, porn would have .xxx. People would know what they're getting. Parents could more easily filter it out.

The idea is no cure-all. For one, it would be voluntary. Critics point out, correctly, that pornographers could still keep their .com addresses, and many probably would. Nor would it stop those deceptive e-mails. But that's not the point.

Its value is as an experiment, particularly for protecting children. Why not?

Parents need all the help they can get in protecting their kids' experience online. They have a variety of constantly improving filters and other tools. Internet service providers, vying for customers, have made it a priority to give parents levels of screening and ways to report offensive e-mail. An .xxx address is one more kind of filter.

Nobody can predict for sure just how it would affect the industry, but there's some cause to believe the impact would be helpful. Purveyors signing up for .xxx would be required to pledge responsible business practices, including no pushing to minors. Financial institutions, now leery of them, might provide an incentive for better behavior.

The adult entertainment industry has already been sensitive to pressure to protect children. It has taken steps — under pressure from Congress, which wants to tax adult entertainment sites — to voluntarily avoid pushing content to children.

But the .xxx idea is running into opposition. Some critics say it would encourage online porn. Hello? Do they have computers?

Other opponents fear that the new domain would legitimize porn. Their protests — including more than 6,000 letters, many part of a campaign by the conservative Family Research Council — forced a delay in implementing .xxx. The regulatory board, the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers, is to meet today on the issue.

The board shouldn't bow to the pressure. Internet porn is big business driven by big demand. It can't be eradicated. But trying to improve the protections for parents is a good idea — including a .xxx domain experiment.

Op-ed: .xxx Would Legitimize Porn (USAT)

By Patrick Trueman

USA Today, September 15, 2005

It was Churchill who observed, "There is nothing so exhilarating as to be shot at, without result!" And this must be the sentiment of pornographers. For years there has been near unanimous condemnation of the notion that they should be rewarded with even more space on the Internet. Yet, the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN), the Internet's governing agency, is moving ahead on this seductive idea.

Most who advocate for a .xxx domain for porn sites say children would be the chief beneficiaries because filtering pornography would become a simple matter — just block .xxx sites. That assumes that pornographers would give up their .com sites, the cash cow of the porn industry, and move to .xxx.

Pornographers may be sleazy, but that hasn't affected their sound business sense. They have been making millions on the .com domain since long before Michael Dell sold his first computer over the Internet, and they would keep all their current .com locations.

Nor would they be evicted. Indeed, any law attempting to force all pornographers to relocate to .xxx would likely be challenged in court. Although it is a myth that all pornography is protected by the First Amendment, the U.S. Supreme Court has said that it is "presumptively protected" unless and until it is ruled obscenity or child porn in a court.

ICANN does not pretend that the .xxx domain would clean up the .com domain, and the agency has no enforcement powers to make this happen. Pornographers would simply expand to .xxx, thus perhaps doubling the number of porn sites and doubling their menace to society. Thus the argument that .xxx would benefit children is without any basis in fact.

Furthermore, creating a designated domain for pornography would simply have the effect of legitimizing much material that is likely illegal. Selling hard-core pornography on the Internet is a violation of federal obscenity law no matter where it is located. A relatively small number of U.S. pornographers own the vast majority of Web sites selling illegal material. That is why the Family Research Council supports the efforts of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to establish an obscenity prosecution task force to prosecute violators of the obscenity law — rather than making them masters of a new domain.

Texas Executes Woman Who Killed Three Family Members (NYT)

By Steve Barnes

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Frances Newton, convicted of murdering her husband and their two children in 1987, was executed last night in Huntsville, Tex.

The Supreme Court declined to review Ms. Newton's case earlier, and Gov. Rick Perry declined to intervene.

The Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles unanimously refused on Monday to recommend that Mr. Perry, a Republican, commute her sentence to life in prison.

Ms. Newton, 40, was the third woman put to death in Texas since capital punishment resumed in 1982.

Commissioner Seeks FBI Probe (CINE)

By Janice Morse, Enquirer staff writer

The Cincinnati Enquirer, September 15, 2005

HAMILTON - Butler County Commissioner Chuck Furmon on Wednesday asked the FBI in Cincinnati to investigate a multimillion-dollar equipment lease that included the county's name without the commissioners' approval.

FBI spokesman Michael Brooks confirmed that Furmon contacted the office. "We'll look into the information that he provided and see if an investigation should be opened," Brooks said, declining further comment.

Dynus Technologies, a company formerly known as CBS Technologies, is a party to the disputed contract involving the lease of at least $5.3 million in telecommunications equipment used to transmit data via fiber-optic lines.

The lease was signed before Dynus and Butler County commissioners finalized a contract in which Dynus is supposed to sign up customers for the county's fiber-optic loop. Furmon is urging his fellow commissioners to terminate that contract in the wake of the lease-agreement controversy. He says commissioners found out about the county's name being included on the lease only "by happenstance," after an invoice for a $99,000 lease payment showed up unexpectedly at the County Auditor's Office on Aug. 31.

"We do not understand Commissioner Furmon's motivations in calling for an FBI investigation," said Dynus spokesman Tom Rowe. "Based upon what we've looked into thus far, we haven't seen anything that would appear to warrant that type of action or an FBI investigation."

Rowe said Dynus executives have talked with other county officials to try to clear up the concerns numerous times during the past two weeks, but Furmon has excluded himself from the meetings.

Furmon said he no longer trusts the company after he learned that a Dynus executive had used the county's name in the equipment lease without the knowledge of the commissioners.

DOJ_NMG_0005703

But Rowe says: "At the time that all these agreements and the documents were executed, everyone thought they had authority to execute those agreements."

Rowe said Dynus intends to continue working with the other county officials.

"This is a muddy situation with a lot of issues," Rowe said. "As a company, we are feverishly working to resolve all of those to everyone's satisfaction, including Butler County, because frankly I don't think anyone benefits with the situation escalating beyond what it already has."

Furmon says he's looking out for county taxpayers' interests.

" It's like someone using your credit card without permission. It seems to be pretty clear-cut to me. This company has taken out a loan for millions of dollars and we didn't authorize it," he said.

Furmon said he did feel somewhat reassured that the County Prosecutor's Office issued a written opinion stating that County Auditor Kay Rogers lacked legal authority to designate anyone as an "agent" of the county and that a lease signed by Jim Smith, a Dynus executive, could not be enforceable, although Rogers had signed some documents that appeared to grant Smith certain privileges.

Mass. GOP Official Resigns After Charges (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BOSTON, Mass. -- The vice chairman of the state Republican Party resigned after a federal sting led to money-laundering charges accusing him of offering to "cleanse" drug proceeds for a legal client.

Lawrence Novak, an attorney, was arrested at his home Tuesday after investigators said he allegedly offered to launder drug profits for Scott Holyoke. Novak resigned his party position on Tuesday after his release on bond.

Holyoke is awaiting trial on federal drug trafficking charges and agreed to be a cooperating witness against Novak for the FBI.

Novak allegedly offered to have Holyoke sign false affidavits in an attempt to gain a reduced sentence for Holyoke. Holyoke told Novak that he had more than $100,000 in cash in a safe deposit box, repeatedly telling Novak that the money was drug proceeds, according to an affidavit filed by Lauren Youngquist, an Internal Revenue Service agent.

Novak allegedly told Holyoke that he would take about $60,000 of the money as a legal fee and offered to "clean" or "cleanse" the remainder of the cash, the affidavit said. According to the arrest affidavit, after Novak made the offer to launder Holyoke's drug proceeds, the IRS and FBI introduced an undercover IRS special agent who posed as Holyoke's aunt.

Novak, 54, was taken into custody after allegedly depositing money in a Brockton bank, federal authorities said.

"I think that it's an unfortunate incident. It's something that's happened in his private life, and the party has responded appropriately," O'Brien said Wednesday.

The party's chairman, Darrell Crate, said in a statement the charges are strictly related to Novak's private business dealings and "have absolutely no connection to the Republican Party."

Novak also served at the party's treasurer in the late 1990s. Neither he nor his attorney would comment on the charges.

Novak is due back in court on Oct. 3. He faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted.

State Republican Party's Embattled Vice Chairman Resigns (BOS)

By Raphael Lewis, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, September 15, 2005

The Massachusetts Republican Party has accepted the resignation of its vice chairman, Lawrence P. Novak, after his arrest Tuesday in a money-laundering case, in which he is accused of trying to obtain his fee from a jailed client through illicit drug profits.

Party chairman Darrell W. Crate issued a statement yesterday saying Novak had offered to step down late Tuesday, hours after his arrest. Crate sought to distance himself and the Republican Party from the former vice chairman, who was elected by the party's rank-and-file committee over the objections of Crate and Governor Mitt Romney."I have never endorsed Mr. Novak's service in the party," Crate said in the statement. "The charges against him are strictly related to his private business dealings and have absolutely no connection to the Republican Party. The Massachusetts Republican Party abides by the highest ethical standards, and we will continue to maintain those standards as we continue our work to elect Republicans in Massachusetts."

The state GOP and Romney will probably return Novak's donations from recent years, Republican Party executive director Tim O'Brien said. Novak donated $750 last year to the state Republican Party's federal campaign account and $125 to Romney during his 2002 campaign for governor.

Romney press secretary Julie Teer released a statement on the governor's behalf: "Mr. Novak's resignation was the appropriate action for him to take for the good of the Massachusetts Republican Party. Governor Romney believes his continued service would have been a distraction to the state committee's work, which is always carried out with the highest ethical standards."

Novak, a 54-year-old lawyer running for Brockton City Council on an anticrime platform, was secretly recorded arranging to hide $107,000 for his client, an alleged drug dealer, according to an affidavit. The client, Scott Holyoke, repeatedly informed Novak that the money was obtained through the illegal sales of methamphetamines, federal authorities allege.

Bay State Democratic Party chairman Philip W. Johnston said the Republican Party's state committee should have known that electing Novak as vice chairman would create the potential for public relations trouble.

Lawmakers Say Tough Ethics Proposal In Works (TENN)

By TRENT SEIBERT, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, September 15, 2005

Ethics legislation began to take shape yesterday as a panel of legislators unveiled proposals to prevent some of the problems revealed by the FBI's Operation Tennessee Waltz sting.

But to some, the movement toward tougher laws for lawmakers is creeping along.

At yesterday's meeting of the 12-member panel — its third — the discussion revolved not around ethics, but largely around how lawmakers can efficiently use the state's electronic filing system for disclosures of their campaign contributions.

"I guess I'm frustrated, I'll tell you that," said Sen. Ron Ramsey, R-Blountville, a member of the committee and the Senate's majority leader. "I just hope at the next committee meeting we come out with some proposed legislation."

It was only in the last few minutes of the hours-long meeting that its leaders said they had plans for tougher ethics legislation. They put off discussion of those proposals until Oct. 10.

Some of those ideas include:

· Limiting cash contributions to campaigns.
· Requiring those who make campaign donations to list their employers.
· Requiring lobbyists to disclose how much they spend to wine and dine lawmakers.
· Auditing lobbyists and campaign funds.
· Providing subpoena power to the Registry of Election Finance.
· Creating a state ethics commission to investigate complaints against lawmakers.

The roles of campaign donations and lobbyists in the political process in Tennessee have been under much public scrutiny this year after the arrests of five sitting and former lawmakers in the Tennessee Waltz bribery sting.

House Majority Leader Kim McMillan, D-Clarksville, and also a member of the committee, said she hoped to see a bill crafted in early October, sponsored by members of both parties.

"This is not a partisan issue. This is an institutional issue," McMillan said.

McMillan also said she hopes to soon have a final report from Gov. Phil Bredesen's citizen ethics panel, which is drafting its own ideas on how to tighten ethics laws.

McMillan said she hopes to have a final agreement on legislation soon after that.

Sen. Roy Herron, D-Dresden, who pushed for the creation of this joint committee, said he was not concerned that the process to create new ethics laws was a slow one. Because the laws probably would not go into effect until next year, he said, as long as something is in place by then, everything should work out.

"Doing this right is what's most important," Herron said.

FBI Raids Denver Lawyer's Office (RMN)

By John Accola, Rocky Mountain News

Rocky Mountain News, September 15, 2005

Federal agents raided the downtown offices of a Denver law firm Tuesday, seizing computers and records for evidence in an undisclosed FBI probe.

Witnesses said as many as 20 agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation searched the 11th-floor offices of Futro & Associates PC at 1401 17th St.

Advertisement

The small law firm is headed by Denver attorney Peter Futro, who until last May was chairman of U.S. MedSys Corp., a one-time Denver company that is now the subject of a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0005705

Through a privately held company he controls, Futro, 62, had an 83 percent stake in U.S. MedSys as recently as a year ago, when the over-the-counter stock went on a trading high, reaching nearly $7 a share before falling back to its more typical 40 cents to 80 cents range.

At its high point, the company had a short-lived market capitalization of $170 million. U.S. MedSys is described as a network marketing and distributing organization that provides technology and support services to the health care industry, according to Yahoo! Finance.

The stock spike has never been fully explained but appears to be related to investor speculation that MedSys, despite zero revenues, had a distribution lock on a state-of-the-art ultrasound imaging machine.

Futro, who specializes in corporate governance and securities law, wouldn't comment Wednesday on either of his roles at MedSys Corp. or Futro & Associates.

"It's a confidential client-related matter," he said of the FBI search that lasted most of Tuesday.

The law firm's swank offices at the Alamo Plaza building are listed as the former headquarters of MedSys, which relocated to New Jersey following the resignations of Futro, Chief Executive Thomas King and two other board directors, George Anagnost and Kenton Sieckman.

Also during May, it was reported that Futro's privately held Rangeley Corp. sold its majority MedSys stake to Montague Investments Inc., although Futro and the law firm retained nearly 800,000 shares.

MedSys' filings with the SEC didn't say why they resigned. It was several months earlier, in February, that the company disclosed it was the subject of a formal SEC investigation of unknown scope.

On Wednesday, Jacob Futro - a former MedSys executive and Peter Futro's son - spoke briefly with a Rocky Mountain News reporter before a security guard was summoned to escort the reporter out.

"There's a lot going on," said the junior Futro. "I wish we could talk about it."

Teamster President Claims Company Illegally Taped Talks (BRA)

By PENNY BROWN ROBERTS, Advocate staff writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, September 15, 2005

A longtime Baton Rouge Teamsters president claims the FBI illegally recorded his contract negotiations with Formosa Plastics Corp.

In new court documents filed in federal court last month, Teamsters Local 5 President Byron Keith Partin contends the FBI convinced Formosa Human Resources Manager Tim LeBlanc to record as many as eight conversations in 2001.

Partin's lawyer -- Lewis Unglesby -- argues in two separate motions that secretly recording labor contract negotiations is a violation of the National Labor Relations Act. The motions seek to have the tapes thrown out and the case dismissed.

"To allow these tapes will overturn years of carefully considered National Labor Relations Board law, and will make any labor negotiation subject to FBI oversight overnight at the secret request of either party," Unglesby writes. "While it is very doubtful the FBI knew of -- nor considered -- this law as it wired up Tim LeBlanc, Formosa surely knew."

Partin, 43, of Ethel was charged in a bill of information in November with blackmail -- a misdemeanor that carries a maximum sentence of one year and a fine of $100,000.

Federal authorities say Partin threatened to report the company for illegally discharging ethylene dicloride into the Mississippi River if it didn't pay the wages of eight union members for hours of work they missed during the negotiations.

At the time, Formosa and its workers were engaged in talks on a new three-year labor contract for 230 hourly employees.

Union workers went on strike for five days in June 2001 in a dispute about wages, overtime policies and benefits.

Unglesby also argues that Partin's attempts to get committee members paid during contract negotiations was "perfectly legal."

Partin never reported the alleged discharge, the lawyer notes, and Formosa never paid the committee members.

Unglesby also argues that Formosa used the tapes and subsequent investigation to decertify the union. Teamsters represented Formosa workers for nearly four decades, but employees voted to decertify the union in April 2004.

In their reply to Unglesby's motion to dismiss the case, prosecutors argue that Partin's threats to report the company in exchange for payment to negotiators were "unlawful."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Chad Ennis writes that Partin threatened to "reveal 'the whole story' about Formosa's release of ethylene dichloride into the Mississippi River" if the company didn't pay the eight negotiators.

"This," Ennis writes, "is a clear act of coercion under the standard definition."

Neither LeBlanc nor Plant Manager Kelly Serio returned calls to their offices Wednesday.

Fort Lauderdale Residents Face Federal Real Estate Fraud Charges (FLSUNSEN)

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 15, 2005

Federal authorities arrested two Fort Lauderdale residents Tuesday on more than a dozen charges involving real estate and bankruptcy fraud, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Edward Garnett, 62, and Shirley Akey, 69, lied on loan applications about income, assets, and tax information, a U.S. Attorney's Office news release says.

According to the release, the two racked up $1.4 million in loans, which Akey laundered through different bank accounts. Garnett also hid money and assets from a bankruptcy proceeding.

Both were arrested on one count of conspiracy, three counts of loan application fraud, two counts of mail fraud, three counts of wire fraud and three counts of money laundering. Garnett was charged with an additional count of loan application fraud, two additional counts of mail fraud and three counts of bankruptcy fraud.

Penalties for the charges could total more than 100 years in prison and $6 million in fines.

Charges Stun Family, Friends (DEN)

Detroit News, September 15, 2005

ANN ARBOR -- On Monday, three 17-year-old Pioneer High School students were worrying about keeping up their grades and where to go to college next fall.

Today, they're spending their third day in the county jail, facing a lengthy prison sentence if convicted in the Aug. 22 robbery of an Ann Arbor bank.

On Wednesday, the mothers of two of the students put their arms around each other as they watched grainy black and white closed-circuit video of their sons' brief arraignment on three felony charges. All three are charged as adults.

One is the son of an auto executive and went to Minnesota this summer to visit a music school and who plays lacrosse.

Another runs the 100-yard dash and works part time at a local restaurant, while the third does volunteer work -- including handing out apples at University of Michigan football games.

About 50 classmates packed the jail waiting room, some of them crying while they watched the proceedings.

Prosecutors contend that in the waning days of a quiet Ann Arbor summer, two of the students, Charles Spencer Heath and Brian Keith Jackson, robbed the Bank One branch on West Stadium and made off with about $19,000 -- after they had demanded $50,000 and access to the vault while brandishing a toy gun.

They apparently spent some of the money on clothes and music equipment and the alleged motive, lawyers say, was simply to get money. None of the three has any prior criminal record, and none has been in any serious disciplinary trouble at school.

The third student, Brian Christopher White, the son of a former teacher and a Big Three auto executive, told police he allowed his friends to use his car, but didn't know they planned to rob the bank, according to a written statement he gave police. He is charged with conspiracy and bank robbery -- even though police say he didn't enter the bank Aug. 22.

White's lawyer, Daniel Geherin, offered a letter of character from Ann Arbor school board President Karen D. Cross.

"I think it's safe to say people's jaws dropped when they heard about the charges," Geherin said. "No one expected this. I think the alleged motive is pretty straightforward: to get money."

But the magistrate was not impressed.

Citing the three as a threat to the community and the seriousness of the charges, she set bond at $100,000 cash for each of them. Their parents might be required to put up their homes as collateral.

The three students will have a chance to get a reduced bond Wednesday, when they face a preliminary examination in Ann Arbor District Court. All three likely will remain in the Washtenaw County Jail until then.

Jackson's lawyer, Michael J. Vincent, said his client was scared.

"He's petrified. He's as scared as any 17-year-old sitting in the Washtenaw County Jail would be."

Heath's lawyer, Joseph Simon, noted his client had been doing much better in school this year and was getting "all A's currently."

Heath has lived in Ann Arbor for all but two years, when his parents went to the Dominican Republic to do missionary work for their church, Simon said.

Heath did a number of volunteer activities at the Free Methodist Church in Ypsilanti. One activity of his youth group is to pass out apples at U-M football games.

Simon added that if the allegations are true: "What a shame. What a waste for these kids."

Parents of the three declined to comment.

Two of the students were arrested in class Monday without incident, while the third was arrested later.

Police arrested but later released a fourth Ann Arbor man. He has not been charged in connection with the robbery.

DOJ_NMG_0005707

The three said little during their court appearances. When Jackson approached the microphone in the jail, he was asked to state his name.

"Hi, I'm Brian Jackson," he said.

None of the three showed any reaction when they received the stiff bond. A bail bondsman took notes and quietly talked to each of the three families about what might be necessary to get their children out of jail.

Some students wearing Pioneer High T-shirts or hats shook their heads when the magistrate refused to set a lower bond.

"People can't believe it. I can't believe they did it. If they did do it, well they're going to have to face the music," said Owen Fly, 16, a junior at Pioneer High School, the state's largest high school with 3,000 students.

All three teenagers are considered adults under Michigan law and face up to life in prison if convicted on the armed robbery, bank robbery and conspiracy charges. Under Michigan's sentencing guidelines, a conviction on a first offense is generally not a probationary offense and calls for prison time, typically at least four or five years, lawyers for the three said.

The three also could get their driver's licenses suspended after allegedly using a car to commit a felony.

The armed robbery charge carries a mandatory minimum two-year sentence.

The FBI also investigated the case, but it's unlikely the U.S. Attorney's Office will seek to charge the three federally. That would require getting permission of the Justice Department in Washington -- a cumbersome process -- because they are younger than 18.

Jefferson Begins To Fight Charges (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, September 15, 2005

Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), under investigation by the FBI, went on the defensive Wednesday in the wake of a damaging ABC News report that the Congressman allegedly used National Guard resources to gather personal belongings from his New Orleans home amid the Hurricane Katrina rescue operation.

Jefferson is apparently gearing up for a tough legal fight. He recently retained defense attorney Robert Trout of the Washington, D.C., law firm Trout Cacheris, in addition to his New Orleans-based attorney, Michael Fawer. Trout is a former federal prosecutor. Jefferson also recently set up a legal defense fund.

Jefferson, according to sources, spoke to his colleagues at the Congressional Black Caucus meeting Wednesday. During the session, the Louisiana Democrat defended his tour of his damaged district on Sept. 2 and insisted that the ABC story that aired Tuesday night distorted the facts and misrepresented his actions.

In an interview, Melanie Rouffell, a Jefferson spokeswoman, reiterated her boss's belief that the story was unfair, noting that National Guard officials refused to let the Congressman tour the devastated area without the presence of armed guards.

She said that Jefferson was only doing his job by trying to assess the damage in his district and that he was concerned about his neighbors, whom he knew had not evacuated their homes.

"There is no story," Rouffell said. "There's no misuse of anything. If he had been able to tour the city on his own, he would have done so. And he would have preferred to."

But even as some of Jefferson's colleagues defended their friend, some Democrats wonder about the broader implications that the FBI investigation could have for their party. The Congressman had his homes in New Orleans and Washington, D.C., searched last month as part of an ongoing FBI investigation.

Authorities are investigating whether Jefferson illegally pocketed hundreds of thousands of dollars from a start-up technology firm during an FBI-authorized sting, according to published reports.

"People appreciate the seriousness of the allegations," said one CBC member, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "I don't think anyone has drawn any conclusions or is attempting to prejudge the matter."

Others, however, made it clear that they were prepared to stick by Jefferson.

"I'm going to be fully supportive of him all the way through to the ultimate disposition and beyond," said Rep. Mel Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the CBC.

Watt praised his colleague's character and called him "an outstanding legislator and a wonderful friend."

But the CBC chairman acknowledged that in the end, the disposition of the Caucus is not politically important.

"Mr. Jefferson doesn't need my support," he said. "He is an elected representative answerable to his constituents. He's not answerable to the Congressional Black Caucus."

According to the ABC News report, Jefferson emerged from his house after about an hour with three suitcases, a laptop and a box about the size of a refrigerator.

DOJ_NMG_0005708

Rouffell said that information was inaccurate and that Jefferson took two suitcases, his daughter's laptop and a box that contained another suitcase, which was to be shipped to his daughter.

"The story gives the impression that he asked the National Guard to go with him to retrieve his personal items," she said. "That was not the purpose of it."

The ABC News report and the ongoing investigation of Jefferson may have broader implications for Democrats, as they seek to capitalize on ethical improprieties by Congressional Republicans.

Democrats have sought to highlight the ethical troubles of Republicans such as House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (Texas) and House Administration Chairman Bob Ney (Ohio) as proof of a broader culture of corruption within the GOP-run Congress.

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said he "doesn't know much about" the August searches of Jefferson's home, office and vehicle, aside from the fact that an investigation is ongoing.

But the Maryland Democrat said that "if somebody has acted unethically or committed criminal offenses, we need to hold them accountable."

"Let's see what the facts are," Hoyer said later. "But if the facts are such that there is an ethical violation or there is a criminal violation, then I think it is appropriate for the ethics committee and for perhaps the Congress to act, period, whether it is a Democrat or a Republican."

Hoyer added that the Jefferson case "raises the public's concern about the ethics and legality with which the Congress is operating, and we ought to look into that."

The National Republican Congressional Committee circulated the ABC News story to reporters Wednesday morning under the headline "In Case You Missed It."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

New Justice Unit To Probe Old Bias Cases (AP-Y2)

By Sam Hananel, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 15, 2005

A new Justice Department office would investigate and prosecute "cold case" murders from the civil rights era, under a measure approved by the Senate on Wednesday.

The Unsolved Crimes Section would target pre-1970 homicides motivated by racial hatred that remain unsolved, often because of lax state and federal prosecution at the time they occurred.

The bill was inspired by efforts to reopen the case of Emmett Till, a 14-year old black boy who was murdered in 1955 after being accused of whistling at a white woman in Mississippi, said Sen. Jim Talent (news, bio, voting record), R-Mo., who sponsored the legislation with Sen. Christopher Dodd (news, bio, voting record), D-Conn.

"We want the murderers and their accomplices who are still living to know there's an entire section of the Department of Justice that is going after them," Talent said in a statement. "We need to unearth the truth and do justice because there cannot be healing without the truth."

The Senate voted by unanimous consent to add the measure to the massive Commerce, Justice and Science appropriations bill, expected to pass the Senate this week.

A House-passed version of the bill does not include the civil rights measure, but lawmakers will try to include it in legislation that emerges from a conference committee.

Talent and Dodd introduced the bill in June, shortly after a Mississippi court sentenced 80-year-old former Klansman Edgar Ray Killen to 60 years in jail for the slayings of three civil rights workers in 1964.

Killen was the latest in a string of elderly suspects tried and convicted for decades-old crimes committed at a time when justice was out of reach for many American blacks.

The new office has been compared to Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, which focuses on finding and deporting former Nazis living in the United States.

The bill authorizes up to $5 million a year for the unit to investigate and try cases, working together with state and local law enforcement officials. If a crime other than murder is discovered, it would be referred to the criminal section of the Justice Department's civil rights division.

Federal Judge Rules Against Pledge (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005709

A federal judge in Sacramento ruled Wednesday that teacher-led recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools violates the Constitution's protection of religious freedom because the pledge refers to “one Nation under God.”

The ruling, by U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton, revives a legal challenge to the 51-year-old version of the Pledge. The U.S. Supreme Court rejected that challenge last year. The case may be headed that way again. Derek Gaubatz, lawyer for students who want to keep the Pledge, says the decision will be appealed to the Supreme Court “if necessary … as quickly as possible.”

In June 2004, five of the Supreme Court's nine justices found that Sacramento atheist Michael Newdow did not have custody of his school-age daughter and thus could not challenge school district policy that allowed teachers to lead students in a voluntary recitation of the Pledge.

The decision enabled the high court to dodge a battle over whether the phrase “under God” carries a religious meaning that is unacceptable under the Constitution's First Amendment, which forbids government endorsement of religion. The court also avoided deciding whether reciting the Pledge in schools is a coerced religious practice.

Newdow refiled the case in January and added as plaintiffs two sets of anonymous atheist parents who also have children in Sacramento-area schools. On Wednesday, Karlton ruled that the new plaintiffs were qualified to sue although Newdow isn't.

Because the Supreme Court had rejected Newdow's challenge on procedural grounds and not on its merits, Karlton wrote, he was required to reinstate an earlier federal appeals court ruling in the case that had struck down the recitation of the pledge.

In 2003, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals found teacher-led recitation of the Pledge to be “coercive” because it “places students in the untenable position of choosing between participating in an exercise with religious content or protesting.”

That ruling, Karlton wrote, is “binding precedent” on him as a “judge of a subordinate court.”

Newdow, a physician and a lawyer, said he was “very pleased” by Karlton's ruling. “The Pledge is wrong, and the (school district) government is wrong here,” Newdow said.

Gaubatz said Karlton's ruling showed that he was afraid to address the heart of the matter. “Basically, he punted and let the 9th Circuit do his dirty work,” said Gaubatz, litigation director for the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, a research and legal advocacy group in Washington, D.C.

The phrase “under God” was added to the Pledge of Allegiance by Congress in 1954 after a campaign by the Knights of Columbus, a Catholic men's group. The Supreme Court has never ruled on the constitutionality of reciting the pledge in public schools and has a mixed record in other cases involving the public invocation of the deity. For instance, it has struck down prayer at school graduations but has upheld chaplain-led prayers offered at the opening of Congress.

Pledge Of Allegiance In Public Schools Ruled Unconstitutional (LAT)

By Maura Dolan

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal judge in Sacramento ruled today that requiring schoolchildren to recite the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance is unconstitutional, reviving a legal battle by an atheist who lost his first round in the U.S. Supreme Court.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence K. Karlton said he was bound by a U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals decision in the earlier lawsuit that the reference to God violated the constitution's requirement of separation of church and state.

Michael A. Newdow, the atheist who brought that case, eventually lost when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that he did not have legal standing to sue on behalf of his grade-school daughter because he did not have primary custody of her.

Karlton, however, said Newdow's current lawsuit may go forward because parents with full custody of their children are involved in the lawsuit. Today's ruling is expected to be appealed. He said he would issue a restraining order blocking the recitation of the pledge in four Sacramento-area school districts named in the lawsuit.

A spokesman for the Elk Grove, Calif., Unified School District, one of the school districts sued, said the judge had not yet issued an order prohibiting the recitation of the pledge in the classroom.

Asked about a possible appeal, Jim Elliott, director of communications, said, "We continue to support the Pledge of Allegiance as a patriotic exercise."

Newdow could not be reached for comment.

Any order enforcing Karlton's decision would not extend beyond the Elk Grove Unified, Rio Linda and Elverta Joint Elementary school districts in Sacramento County, where the plaintiffs' children attend.

Today's ruling comes as Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. is in his third day of his confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee. He would succeed the late William H. Rehnquist as chief justice.

DOJ_NMG_0005710

The Becket Fund, a religious rights group that is a party to the case, said it would immediately appeal the case to the San Francisco-based U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. If the court does not change its precedent, the group would go to the Supreme Court.

"It's a way to get this issue to the Supreme Court for a final decision to be made," said fund attorney Jared Leland.

The decisions by Karlton and the 9th Circuit conflict with an August opinion by the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. That court upheld a Virginia law requiring public schools to lead daily Pledge of Allegiance recitation, which is similar to the requirement in California.

Karlton, appointed to the Sacramento bench in 1979 by President Jimmy Carter, wrote that the case concerned "the ongoing struggle as to the role of religion in the civil life of this nation," and added that his opinion "will satisfy no one involved in that debate."

Judge Rules Pledge Of Allegiance In Calif. Schools Unconstitutional (WP)

By John Pomfret

LOS ANGELES, Sept. 14 -- A federal judge ruled Wednesday that the law requiring the recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools is unconstitutional and said he was ready to issue an injunction to three California school districts to halt the daily reciting of the pledge.

Terming the case "a cause celebre in the ongoing struggle as to the role of religion in the civil life of this nation," U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton ruled that the pledge's reference to "one nation under God" violates children's right to be "free from a coercive requirement to affirm God."

Michael A. Newdow, the atheist resident of Sacramento whose previous case against the pledge's words "under God" was rejected last year by the Supreme Court on procedural grounds, said he will ask the judge to issue a restraining order halting the pledge at the Elk Grove Unified, Rio Linda and Elverta Joint Elementary school districts in Sacramento County. A lawyer for the districts told the Associated Press he was not prepared to comment on the case.

Newdow, speaking from his cell phone in El Paso, Tex., said he was pleased by the verdict but expects a tough legal fight ahead. "It'll be emotional when it's ruled that all Americans should be treated equally," he said. "This is a start towards that, but we still have a ways to go." He said he wants the Pledge of Allegiance restored to its original text, approved by Congress in 1942, with no mention of God.

Jared Leland, a lawyer for the Washington-based Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, which fought the case, said he had expected the verdict but that his group, which represented students and parents of students in the case, will appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit. In the case, Leland also represented the Knights of Columbus, which started using the revised pledge in 1951 as the Cold War heated up. The Knights lobbied Congress and the Eisenhower administration to officially change the pledge in 1954.

"The pendulum is swinging in the wrong direction in our country," Leland said. "Mike Newdow is on a train whose destination is designed to hide and undermine the role of religion in public life. We want to restore religion to the public square."

In his ruling, which he acknowledged will "satisfy no one involved" in the debate about the role of religion in public life, Karlton said he was bound by precedent from the appeals court, which in 2002 ruled in favor of Newdow that the pledge is unconstitutional when recited in public schools.

Last year, the Supreme Court dismissed the case, saying that Newdow lacked standing because he did not have custody of his elementary school daughter, on whose behalf he sued.

Newdow then filed a similar suit on behalf of three unnamed parents and their children. Karlton, ruling in Sacramento, said those families have the right to sue and, arguing that he was bowing to the 9th Circuit court's initial ruling on the pledge, ruled in their favor.

Wednesday's ruling increases the chance that the case could return to the Supreme Court because the 9th Circuit's ruling on Newdow's suit clashes with an opinion, issued in August, by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit in Richmond. That court upheld a Virginia law requiring public schools to lead daily Pledge of Allegiance recitation, saying the pledge is a patriotic exercise, not a religious affirmation similar to a prayer.

Judge Rules Reciting Pledge In Schools Is Unconstitutional (NYT)

By Dean E. Murphy

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005711

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 14 - A federal judge in Sacramento ruled Wednesday that reciting the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools was an unconstitutional endorsement of religion, once again igniting a firestorm over the appropriateness of the pledge's reference to "under God."

The judge, Lawrence K. Karlton of Federal District Court, said that the decision would "satisfy no one involved" in the debate over "the role of religion in the civil life of this nation," but that he was bound by a ruling in 2002 by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco.

In that ruling, the Ninth Circuit concluded the recitation of the pledge, even if noncompulsory, "impermissibly coerces a religious act" and "places students in the untenable position of choosing between participating in an exercise with religious content or protesting."

The ruling Wednesday was denounced by conservative religious groups that urged its appeal. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, issued a similar plea.

Judge Karlton's decision came in a lawsuit brought by Michael Newdow, an atheist whose daughter attends a public school in Elk Grove, a suburb of Sacramento, and two families with children in two other school districts in the Sacramento area.

Mr. Newdow lost a similar case last year when the United States Supreme Court ruled that he had no legal standing to bring the lawsuit because he did not have custody of his daughter. The justices left open the question of the pledge's constitutionality, prompting Mr. Newdow to try again with the additional plaintiffs.

Judge Karlton said that Mr. Newdow still lacked standing, but ruled that the two families, who were not identified in the lawsuit, were entitled to sue. Mr. Newdow said that he was disappointed but not surprised by the determination on his standing, but that the decision on the pledge's constitutionality would apply to all students in the three school districts.

"It will still affect my child as much as anyone else's," he said in a telephone interview from El Paso, where he was working at a hospital.

A spokesman for the Elk Grove Unified School District said teachers were notified Wednesday that they should continue leading students in the pledge because the judge's ruling did not include an injunction stopping the practice. Judge Karlton indicated that he would issue an injunction if one was requested, but Mr. Newdow said that he had not decided whether to seek one.

"I will probably do that, but I have clients now I have to talk to first," said Mr. Newdow, who is the lawyer in the case in addition to being a doctor. "Unfortunately, I haven't had a chance to read this thing yet."

At a news conference attended by officials from the three districts, Steven M. Ladd, the Elk Grove superintendent, said that no decision on an appeal had been made but that he would not be surprised if the schools challenged the ruling "so as to resolve this matter once and for all."

The Elk Grove district defended itself against the previous lawsuit by Mr. Newdow. "Our board has long supported the Pledge of Allegiance as an appropriate patriotic exercise for willing students," Mr. Ladd said. "We are disappointed that our district, as well as two other school districts listed in this complaint, need to continue to devote time, energy, and resources to defend this case. These are resources we could otherwise use on our mission of teaching and learning."

A lawyer for the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, a religious rights group that has joined the school districts in defending the case, said there was no doubt the ruling would be appealed.

The group's lawyer, Jared N. Leland, said he would not be surprised if the issue ended up before the Supreme Court, particularly since the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit last month upheld a law in Virginia that requires the recitation of the pledge in public schools. That court found that the pledge was "a patriotic activity" not a religious one.

In the Supreme Court's ruling dismissing Mr. Newdow's previous lawsuit, the three dissenting justices indicated they would have upheld the constitutionality of "under God" had the case gone forward. The phrase was added to the pledge in 1954.

Federal Judge: Pledge Of Allegiance In Public Schools Is Unconstitutional (LAW/AP)

By David Kravets, The Associated Press

Law.com, September 15, 2005

A federal judge declared the reciting of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools unconstitutional Wednesday in a case brought by the same atheist whose previous battle against the words "under God" was rejected by the U.S. Supreme Court on procedural grounds.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton ruled that the pledge's reference to one nation "under God" violates schoolchildren's right to be "free from a coercive requirement to affirm God."

Karlton said he was bound by precedent of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which in 2002 ruled in favor of Sacramento atheist Michael Newdow that the pledge is unconstitutional when recited in public schools.

DOJ_NMG_0005712

The Supreme Court dismissed the case last year, saying Newdow lacked standing because he did not have custody of his elementary school daughter he sued on behalf of.

Newdow, an attorney and a medical doctor, filed an identical case on behalf of three unnamed parents and their children. Karlton said those families have the right to sue.

Karlton, ruling in Sacramento, Calif., said he would sign a restraining order preventing the recitation of the pledge at the Elk Grove Unified, Rio Linda and Elverta Joint Elementary school districts in Sacramento County, where the plaintiffs' children attend.

The order would not extend beyond those districts unless it is affirmed by a higher court, in which case it would apply to nine western states.

The decision sets up another showdown over the pledge in schools, at a time when the makeup of the Supreme Court is in flux.

Wednesday's ruling comes as Supreme Court nominee John Roberts faces day three of his confirmation hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee. He would succeed the late William H. Rehnquist as chief justice.

In July, Sandra Day O'Connor announced her plans to retire when a successor is confirmed.

The Becket Fund, a religious rights group that is a party to the case, said it would immediately appeal the case to the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. If the court does not change its precedent, the group would go to the Supreme Court.

"It's a way to get this issue to the Supreme Court for a final decision to be made," said fund attorney Jared Leland.

The decisions by Karlton and the 9th Circuit conflict with an August opinion by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va. That court upheld a Virginia law requiring public schools lead daily Pledge of Allegiance recitation, which is similar to the requirement in California.

A three-judge panel of that circuit ruled that the pledge is a patriotic exercise, not a religious affirmation similar to a prayer.

"Undoubtedly, the pledge contains a religious phrase, and it is demeaning to persons of any faith to assert that the words 'under God' contain no religious significance," Judge Karen Williams wrote for the 4th Circuit. "The inclusion of those two words, however, does not alter the nature of the pledge as a patriotic activity."

Newdow, reached at his home, was not immediately prepared to comment.

Karlton, appointed to the Sacramento bench in 1979 by President Carter, wrote that the case concerned "the ongoing struggle as to the role of religion in the civil life of this nation" and added that his opinion "will satisfy no one involved in that debate."

Karlton dismissed claims that the 1954 Congressional legislation inserting the words "under God" was unconstitutional. If his ruling stands, he reasoned that the schoolchildren and their parents in the case would not be harmed by the phrase because they would no longer have to recite it at school.

Terence Cassidy, a lawyer representing the school districts, said he was reviewing the opinion and was not immediately prepared to comment.

Pledge Unconstitutional At Public Schools, Judge Says (Update2) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 15, 2005

Sept. 14 (Bloomberg) -- A federal judge in California said the recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools is unconstitutional, in a ruling that will rekindle a debate over the use of the phrase ``under God."

Judge Lawrence Karlton in Sacramento, California, today said that a school district's policy requiring the pledge with the phrase ``under God'' is unconstitutional. The case was brought by Michael Newdow, an atheist who had previously sued to challenge the use of the phrase.

The U.S. Supreme Court last year vacated a decision that said a California school district violated the Constitution's separation of church and state clause by requiring teachers to lead the pledge. The justices didn't decide whether the pledge was constitutional, instead ruling that Newdow lacked the right to bring the challenge. Newdow overcame the hurdle by including students who live in the district in today's case.

Karlton said he followed a previous ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals based in San Francisco. Newdow's claims ``are resolved because the 9th Circuit has held that the school policy mandating the pledge is unconstitutional," Karlton wrote.

Derek Gaubatz, director of litigation for the Washington- based Becket Fund for Religious Liberty, said his group would appeal today's decision. Gaubatz said he represents 10 students and their parents in the Sacramento case.

Immediate Appeal

DOJ_NMG_0005713

``We object to the ruling that the pledge violates any part of the establishment clause," Gaubatz said. ``We will immediately appeal" the ruling to a federal appeals court, ``and if necessary to the Supreme Court to get that ruling reversed to secure the constitutionality of the pledge once and for all."

Newdow, a Sacramento lawyer, didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

Today's ruling doesn't require the four Sacramento-area public school districts Newdow sued to change their practice of reciting the pledge. Karlton said he'd issue a restraining order ``upon a properly supported motion."

Karlton's ruling is likely to take on more prominence as the U.S. Senate considers the confirmation of U.S. Supreme Court Justice nominee John Roberts. The ruling was released during a hearing today in Washington.

``This is an example, in my opinion, of where judges do not protect us from having the government impose religion on us, but declare war on all things religious," Senator Lindsey Graham, a Republican from South Carolina, said during Roberts' hearing.

The school districts are the Elk Grove Unified School District, Sacramento City Unified School District, Elverta Joint Elementary School District and the Rio Linda School District.

The case is Newdow v. Congress of the United States of America, No. S-05-17, in U.S. District Court in Sacramento.

Judge Rules Against Pledge In Schools (WT)

By Julia Duin

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

A California federal judge yesterday ruled it is unconstitutional to require children to recite the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton's ruling came in a revised lawsuit brought by Michael Newdow, an atheist whose first bid to remove the words "under God" from the pledge was rejected last year by the Supreme Court.

"The pledge is an unconstitutional violation of the children's right to be free from a coercive requirement to affirm God," Judge Karlton wrote in yesterday's decision.

Three Sacramento-area school districts were named in the retooled suit, which features a new set of plaintiffs, including the atheist parents of a seventh-grader and the divorced atheist parent of a third-grader and a kindergartner.

Judge Karlton, 70, was appointed to the court in 1979 by President Carter. The judge cited a 2003 decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals "that the school districts' policies violate the establishment clause" as the reason for his decision.

A jubilant Mr. Newdow hailed the news.

"I'm excited," he said in an interview. "It's good now that the judge has agreed with me and that the Constitution was upheld. We'll see how long that lasts."

The judge also told Mr. Newdow he would sign a restraining order preventing the recitation of the pledge at the Elk Grove Unified, Rio Linda Union and Elverta Joint Elementary school districts, where the plaintiffs' children attend.

Mr. Newdow promised he'd file a restraining order soon.

House and Senate Republicans criticized Judge Karlton's ruling.

"The Pledge of Allegiance is a vital, ennobling part of our national identity, and the American people resoundingly support its value in the education of our children," said House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas. "The ruling is wrong, period, and I look forward to its reversal."

"This is yet another example of an irresponsible decision by a liberal activist judge unable to separate personal politics from public service," said Sen. John Thune, South Dakota Republican. "As we work to fill two vacancies in the highest court of the land, today's news only serves to underscore the importance of appointing judicial nominees who refuse to allow their personal views to shape decisions."

During oral arguments for the case in July, Judge Karlton threw out several parts of Mr. Newdow's revised lawsuit, saying the plaintiff's argument that the entire pledge is unconstitutional would not make it past a higher court. Rather, the judge said, the case should focus on whether saying the pledge in public schools is an unacceptable endorsement of religion.

Derek Gaubatz, director of litigation for the Becket Fund, a religious liberties group opposing Mr. Newdow, described the judge as an "old-time liberal."

"He telegraphed to everyone how he wanted to rule," Mr. Gaubatz said. "He wanted to strike the pledge down, but he wanted to rely on the prior 9th Circuit decision so they could do his dirty work."

DOJ_NMG_0005714

He said the Becket Fund will appeal the case to the 9th Circuit, which sided with Mr. Newdow in 2003. The Supreme Court struck down that ruling in June 2004, but did not rule on the merits of the case. Instead, the high court said Mr. Newdow, the divorced, noncustodial father of a fourth-grader in the Elk Grove district, did not have legal standing as a plaintiff.

Lee Strang, an assistant law professor at Ave Maria School of Law in Ann Arbor, Mich., said the public should not be surprised that the issue has resurfaced.

"The Supreme Court has been all over the map on this issue," he said. "Their establishment clause case law has been such a muddle because you have these shifting coalitions of justices who come together to arrive at sometimes unprincipled results."

Judge Karlton was "pushing the limits" of his job description, Mr. Strang said, "but judges have been known to guide litigants in subtle and not-so-subtle ways."

"I think the judge made the right call," said Rob Boston of Americans United for Separation of Church and State. "The whole question of patriotism and the religious content of the pledge hasn't been explored like it should be. A student should be able to express patriotism and love of country without making a religious affirmation at the same time."

Massachusetts Rejects Bill To Eliminate Gay Marriage (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BOSTON, Sept. 14 - In a sign that the legalization of same-sex marriage has changed the political landscape in Massachusetts, the legislature soundly defeated a proposed constitutional amendment on Wednesday to ban gay marriage and create civil unions, an amendment that lawmakers gave preliminary approval to in a raucous constitutional convention last year.

Wednesday's 157-to-39 vote by a joint session of the House and Senate partly reflected the fact that some legislators now consider same-sex marriage more politically acceptable, after a largely conflict-free year in which some 6,600 same-sex couples got married and lawmakers who supported it got re-elected.

The vote also reflected some lawmakers' reluctance to pass a bill that could either withdraw rights from already married couples or create a class of married gay men and lesbians and a class of those unable to marry.

Indeed, Senator Brian P. Lees, a Republican who is the minority leader and who co-sponsored the amendment, which received preliminary approval from the legislature in March 2004 in a 105-to-92 vote, said he voted against it Wednesday.

"Today, gay marriage is the law of the land," Mr. Lees said, noting that same-sex marriage became legal in May 2004. Voting for the amendment, he said, would mean "taking action against our friends and neighbors who today are currently enjoying the benefits of marriage."

Saying he had heard from over 7,000 constituents, most against the amendment, Mr. Lees added, "Gay marriage has begun and life has not changed for the citizens of the commonwealth, with the exception of those who can now marry who could not before."

Wednesday's vote also reflected a change in the strategy of opponents of same-sex marriage.

Last year some legislators who opposed both same-sex marriage and civil unions voted for the amendment because they considered it their best chance at preserving marriage for heterosexuals.

This year, after it appeared that the amendment would fail, many opponents of same-sex marriage started a citizens' petition for a stricter amendment that would ban same-sex marriage without creating civil unions.

The earliest that amendment, endorsed by Gov. Mitt Romney, could become law is 2008. Supporters must get 65,000 signatures, the votes of 50 lawmakers in two consecutive legislative sessions and the approval of voters in a referendum. Both sides expect a difficult fight.

Representative Philip Travis, a Democrat and opponent of same-sex marriage, argued Wednesday for the stricter amendment.

"The union of two women and two men can never consummate a marriage," Mr. Travis said. "It's physically impossible. We can't get around that."

In contrast to last year's long sessions packed with activists, Wednesday's session lasted two hours and drew smaller, calmer crowds.

Juan Carlos Huertas was one of a few dozen opponents of same-sex marriage singing Christian hymns at the statehouse. Mr. Huertas said that the idea that marriage is between a man and a woman is "written in the Scripture."

Nearby were about 200 supporters of same-sex marriage, some with T-shirts or buttons that said "I Do."

For weeks, same-sex couples and supporters met with legislators to present their case. Elaine Lamy, 49, and Chris Hannibal, 50, of Quincy, who married last year, met with Representative Bruce J. Ayers and Senator Michael W. Morrissey, who was also lobbied by the women's heterosexual neighbors. On Wednesday, the women saw the two legislators, both Democrats who had supported the amendment, vote against it.

Senator James E. Timilty, a Democrat who last year supported the amendment, also changed his mind.

"When I looked in the eyes of the children living with these couples," Mr. Timilty said, "I decided that I don't feel at this time that same-sex marriage has hurt the commonwealth in any way. In fact I would say that in my view it has had a good effect for the children in these families."

Massachusetts Lawmakers Reject Bid To Stop Same-Sex Marriages (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BOSTON, Sept. 14 -- Amid a pep-rally atmosphere, Massachusetts legislators on Wednesday overwhelmingly rejected an attempt to halt same-sex marriages here -- showing how quickly gay nuptials have moved from being a court-ordered imposition to a powerful political cause.

By a vote of 157 to 39, members of the House and the Senate meeting together voted down a proposed constitutional amendment that would have eliminated the same-sex marriages legalized two years ago and replaced them with "civil unions" for gay couples.

Instead, the vote leaves same-sex marriage as the status quo in Massachusetts, and it now seems likely to remain so until at least 2008.

But, in a broader sense, the vote also illuminated how widely Massachusetts has diverged from much of the nation, where several dozen states have passed laws limiting marriage to heterosexual couples. California's lawmakers have passed legislation legalizing same-sex marriage. It is now sitting on the desk of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R), who has said he will veto it.

Politicians here credit the weddings themselves with shifting the political momentum, saying their growing ordinariness has defused some of the opposition.

"The difference is that we have marriage," said state Sen. Jarrett T. Barrios (D) after the vote, while other supporters screamed and cheered nearby in a rally under a mural of the Boston Tea Party. "We've got a world that hasn't changed."

The issue of same-sex marriage has been on the front burner of politics here since November 2003, when the state's Supreme Court ruled in favor of seven same-sex couples who had pressed for the right to wed.

The court found that "the right to marry means little if it does not include the right to marry the person of one's choice" -- making Massachusetts the first state to offer gay couples more than civil unions.

Weeks of emotional debate followed, as some state legislators sought to nullify the court's ruling. Finally, plans were made to amend the state constitution to permit civil unions but ban marriage. But such amendments require votes in two successive sessions of the state legislature.

The proposal passed in March 2004 but still required another vote; it was the measure turned down on Wednesday.

In the meantime, the weddings began. Since the first one on May 17, 2004, more than 6,100 gay couples have wed, accounting for about 17 percent of all the state's weddings during that period.

Each one made the idea of same-sex marriage more acceptable, observers say.

The differences were noticed by politicians, who say they started getting more letters in favor of the marriages, and by public-opinion pollsters, who noted in March that 56 percent of state residents believed same-sex marriages should be allowed.

"It's one of those areas of politics where people have become accustomed to something that was once radical," said Julian E. Zelizer, a history professor at Boston University. "It's just normative at this point."

By the time Wednesday rolled around, support for the civil-unions measure had collapsed. Forces in favor of same-sex marriage were feeling too confident to compromise, while opponents had united behind another constitutional amendment that would eliminate same-sex unions of any kind.

Gov. Mitt Romney (R), who is contemplating a presidential bid in 2008, favors a complete ban on any legalization of same-sex unions. In an interview this week, he said he has concerns about whether children brought up by a same-sex couple could develop normally.

"The ideal setting for raising a child is where there is a male and female," Romney said.

Even though the amendment under consideration was known to be dead beforehand, its killing took on a party atmosphere.

First, there were speeches, from legislators who compared Massachusetts's place in the national debate to the radical role the state's Minutemen played in the Revolutionary War.

DOJ_NMG_0005716

"We are as out of step today as we were on the village green in Lexington and Concord," said state Sen. Edward M. Augustus Jr. (D). "Massachusetts has always been the conscience of the nation."

Gay 'Marriage' Amendment Rejected (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Massachusetts lawmakers yesterday rejected a marriage constitutional amendment, guaranteeing that same-sex "marriage" will continue in that state for at least three more years.

The amendment would have created civil unions for same-sex couples while disallowing same-sex "marriage."

It was approved last year, 105-92, and lawmakers had to pass it a second time to place it on the 2006 ballot. However, yesterday's 157-39 rejection showed how little support the amendment had after a year.

Many lawmakers said they rejected the measure because they no longer wanted to undo the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court's 2004 ruling legalizing same-sex "marriage."

"Gay marriage has begun, and life has not changed for the citizens of the commonwealth, with the exception of those who can now marry," said state Sen. Brian Lees, a Republican co-sponsor of the amendment. "This amendment, which was an appropriate measure or compromise a year ago, is no longer, I feel, a compromise today."

Conservatives shunned the amendment because it created civil unions, which they oppose as ersatz same-sex "marriage."

"The union of two women and two men can never consummate a marriage. It's physically impossible," said Rep. Phil Travis, a Democrat. "The other 49 states are right, and we are wrong."

Homosexual-rights advocates and traditional-values groups all lobbied for the defeat of the amendment, which had been introduced by Senate President Robert E. Travaglini and Mr. Lees.

With yesterday's defeat, the battle shifts to a petition drive for a marriage constitutional amendment aimed at the 2008 ballot.

The amendment, sponsored by VoteOnMarriage.org and supported by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, would outlaw same-sex "marriage" in Massachusetts upon passage.

However, the amendment would not be retroactive and same-sex "marriages" already conducted by 2008 would not be affected. An estimated 6,100 same-sex "marriages" have been conducted in Massachusetts since May 2004.

The petition drive starts later this month. Supporters have until the Nov. 23 to meet their goal of around 120,000 certified signatures.

The amendment initiative must then be approved twice by 25 percent of lawmakers -- or 50 members -- before it can go to voters.

Traditional values groups think they can find 50 votes in each of the Democrat-led legislative chambers. However, House Speaker Salvatore F. DiMasi supports same-sex "marriage" rights, and Mr. Travaglini is also viewed as friendly to homosexual rights.

The amendment initiative says, "When recognizing marriages entered into after the adoption of this amendment by the people, the Commonwealth and its political subdivisions shall define marriage only as the union of one man and one woman."

ANTITRUST:

Industry-supported Study Concludes There Is Competition (INMAN)

By Jessica Swesey, Inman News

Inman News, September 14, 2005

A new study funded by the National Association of Realtors concludes that competition for customers among real estate brokerage firms in local housing markets across the nation is strong.

The study, compiled by researchers at Pennsylvania State University, looks at 12 local real estate markets and draws data from multiple listing services, interviews and secondary sources.

"The central finding is the intense competition in local real estate markets," Professor Steve Sawyer of Penn State's School of Information Sciences & Technology writes.

The report is timely in the continuing battle between the U.S. Justice Department and organized real estate. Competition in the real estate industry has come under fire after the DOJ filed an antitrust lawsuit last week against the National Association of Realtors over its policies for online listings. The DOJ charges that the powerful trade group's policies restrain competition by obstructing real estate brokers who use Web-based systems to offer consumers lower costs.

NAR says its policy for Web property listings is "fair, pro-consumer, pro-competitive and accommodates innovation."

The DOJ and the Federal Trade Commission will hold a public forum to discuss competition in the real estate industry on Oct. 25, in Washington, D.C. The forum will focus on the real estate transaction, the multiple listing service, and private and state actions that affect competition among brokers.

The Penn State study, while focusing on a small sample of real estate markets, concludes that inter-firm competition is fierce within local housing markets.

In 10 of the 12 markets examined in the Penn State study, market share held by top firms was found to be shrinking.

Meanwhile, franchised firms had a larger percentage of market share than other locally owned firms in seven of the 12 markets and in four of the six largest markets studied.

The study also noted that there is steady to substantial growth in each of the 12 markets, and that smaller markets are seeing the least growth.

"This high level of competition in real estate is striking given that the combined volume dollar growth across the many local real estate markets would suggest that competition might be lessened," Sawyer wrote.

As home sales and housing prices have soared in markets nationwide over the last few years, so have the number of Realtors. The National Association of Realtors now has about 1.1 million members, a record high for the trade group.

Markets included in the Penn State study were St. Louis, Mo.; Tampa, Fla.; Columbus, Ohio; Madison, Wis.; Lima, Ohio; Baltimore, Md.; Culpepper, Va.; Cumberland, Md.; Charlotte, N.C.; Easton, Md.; Hagerstown, Md.; and Wilmington, N.C.

The study suggests that increased consumer access to real estate information is redefining how consumers engage real estate services and may be contributing to growth of real estate markets even as it drives competition.

Increased access to housing information on the Web may be "a critical factor in the current surge in house prices," the study suggests. "Buyers and sellers are better informed, and this is reflected in their confidence in the housing market."

In collecting data for the 12 markets cited in the study, researchers interviewed five people from the local real estate markets, including one from St. Louis, one from Madison, Wis., one from Tampa, Fla., and two from Lima, Ohio.

Interviewees noted that competition among agents – even those affiliated with the same brokerage company – for a listing is fierce, researchers said. Increased access to real estate information has armed consumers with more knowledge and raised their expectations for the services provided by real estate agents.

"The ability for consumers to access real estate information about their markets is raising the stakes for real estate agents and brokers," the study noted.

The Penn State researchers also found no numerical evidence of discount brokerage or for-sale-by-owner sales increasing even in the fastest growing of the 12 local markets studied. The discount brokerages involved in the areas accounted for less than one percent of the total market share.

The author noted that few patterns of competitive activity are common to all local real estate markets. Smaller markets are more concentrated than larger markets, and there are market share position changes among the top firms in each market.

In St. Louis, one firm has a dominant share of the local real estate market, the study found. However, the researchers said they learned through interviews that the unidentified firm competes in most of the micro-markets that make up St. Louis, and in each of the micro-markets there are one or two other firms with substantial percentages of market share.

Meanwhile, in Tampa, four brokerage firms affiliated with a single national franchise compete with each other and other locally owned firms and their year-to-year market shares vary, the study found.

In Madison, brokerage companies affiliated with national franchises have a smaller share of the total market than other locally owned companies, researchers said.

House Democrats Target High Gas Prices (KRT)

By Maria Recio

Knight Ridder, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - (KRT) - House Democratic leaders unveiled a plan Wednesday to combat what they said was price gouging at the pump, as some Republican lawmakers worried about the lackluster Bush administration response to high gasoline prices.

"Many of America's families are experiencing a middle-class squeeze, and the price at the pump is becoming oppressive," said House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif, adding that prices were high even before Hurricane Katrina knocked out 20 percent of the nation's supply lines.

"Something must be done about this," Pelosi told reporters after House Democrats signed off on the plan at their weekly meeting. "There must be a federal law to investigate and prosecute price gouging, and to receive damages from those in violation of the law" that would be directed to the federal home heating oil assistance program.

The nationwide average price of regular gasoline was $2.93 per gallon Wednesday, according to the AAA, down from the Sept. 5 high of $3.05, but still 49 cents higher than a month ago and $1.10 a gallon more expensive than a year ago. The average price in Texas was $2.83 per gallon Wednesday.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Robert Menendez of New Jersey faulted the Bush administration for not having "sensitivity" on the issue. "Maybe it's because we have two oilmen in the White House," Menendez said.

President Bush is a former Texas oilman and Vice President Dick Cheney ran the oil services giant Halliburton Co. Bush has said he will not tolerate gouging and White House spokesman Scott McClellan said last week that gasoline prices were too high and the administration's sales from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve would ease supplies - and prices.

"We view this as a temporary disruption," McClellan said.

Republicans have largely focused on the need to re-open supply lines and using federal oil reserves to push prices down. But Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., spoke out sharply Wednesday about the consequences of gasoline prices at a hearing of the Senate Commerce Committee's Aviation Subcommittee.

"Now, you can give me a lecture about free enterprise, supply and demand and all that other stuff," Lott told an official from the Energy Information Administration. "That ain't good enough."

"We'd better realize that there's a problem," Lott said. "It's hurting farmers, small businessmen and women, families with children. And we at least need to empathize. At least say `this is bad, we know it's bad.' And make it look like we care and we're doing something about it. I think the energy department needs to be a little bit more aggressive in jawboning the industry as a whole."

Pelosi's plan would give the Federal Trade Commission added authority to prosecute oil companies. Republicans and Democrats in the Senate and House have asked the agency to aggressively investigate pricing, but FTC officials told Congress in hearings last week that they can only pursue collusive activity - which had not uncovered any gouging in previous investigations.

American Petroleum Institute spokesman Ray Connolly said he had not seen the Democratic package but that Red Cavaney, president of the oil industry trade association had testified before Congress last week that "API and its members condemn price gouging."

The debate in Washington has amused economists like Bernard Weinstein, director of the Center for Economic Development at the University of North Texas.

"Price gouging is a political term," he said. "I don't think economic textbooks list price gouging." He sees the run-up in prices as a reflection of the market's expectation of prices based on tighter supplies. "The price has gone up for a reason," said Byron Schlomach, chief economist at the Texas Public Policy Foundation, an Austin-based conservative think tank. "I would argue it's immoral for people not to be able to price freely." He added that he recognized that "it's not a popular view."

Menendez, meanwhile, introduced legislation separate from the Democratic leadership plan to reduce the 18.4 cents federal gasoline tax by 10 cents and pay for the lost revenue with a windfall profits tax on oil that is over $40 a barrel.

The Pelosi plan would require so-called "transparency" of pricing by making the oil companies disclose how they determine price at all levels. It would also apply antitrust laws to OPEC countries to force information about pricing policies.

Gillette Is Betting That Men Want An Even Closer Shave (NYT)

By Claudia H. Deutsch

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

LET regulators worry whether Gillette's proposed merger with Procter & Gamble poses antitrust problems. Let investors worry about how that merger will affect the fused companies' stocks. The people at Gillette have a far more immediate challenge: persuading men that they need to buy yet another new shaving system.

Yesterday, Gillette unveiled Fusion (manual) and Fusion Power (battery operated), a wet-shaving system with a lot more bells and whistles than the company's Mach3Turbo and M3Power, currently the top-selling shavers. It also announced a line of shaving creams and gels to go with the new razors.

Gillette Fusion is "the future of shaving," James M. Kilts, Gillette's chairman and chief executive, told analysts and reporters who had gathered in a Manhattan auditorium to hear the latest news. Not to be outdone in hyperbole, Peter K. Hoffman, president of Gillette's blades and razors unit, defined fusion for the crowd - "a nuclear reaction in which nuclei combine to create power" - and intimated that the Fusion system's "breakthrough technology" lives up to the analogy.

Much is at stake. According to Gillette, American men spent about $1.7 billion on blades and razors last year, and another $300 million on shaving creams and gels. Globally, shaving products accounted for more than $10.4 billion in sales.

Gillette will spend a lot to get the word out. It would not divulge marketing plans or even let product samples leave the room - "We don't want to give anything to the competition," Mr. Hoffman said in an interview after the event. But he promised that come early 2006, when the Fusion products hit stores, Gillette will mount a "blockbuster marketing program, absolutely huge, the biggest launch of a Gillette shaving system in history." And, yes, that is true even if adjusted for inflation, Mr. Kilts chimed in.

"Mach3 will remain No. 1 for the first few years, but Fusion will become our flagship brand," Mr. Kilts said.

This is the first time Gillette has introduced a full line of razors and accouterments at once, and marketing experts agree with the decision.

"Hats off to these guys; they're offering metrosexual nirvana," said Gary M. Stibel, principal and founder of the New England Consulting Group, a marketing consulting firm in Westport, Conn. "You get a five-bladed razor any way you want it, with power, without power. You get the gel and grooming products to go with it. Men will credit the whole system for a better shave."

Maybe so - but do men really need a better shave than Mach3 provides? Mr. Hoffman is certain they do. Noting that 60 percent of the men who tested the Fusion razors preferred them to the Mach3, he predicts that Fusion will be a "billion-dollar product" by 2008.

But marketing experts, while applauding Gillette's willingness to eat into Mach3 sales, are not so sure. "It is an incredibly hard decision, to cannibalize your own leading brand, even when you know that someone else will do it to you if you don't," said Nicholas Donatiello Jr., president of Odyssey, a San Francisco market research firm. "But there is still the question of market fatigue - I mean, at this point, how much better do men really think their shaving experience needs to be?"

Gillette's agency - BBDO Worldwide, a unit of the Omnicom Group - has access to plenty of product images and attributes to whet the jaded shaver's appetite. Both Fusion models have five blades instead of Mach3's three, and they are spaced 30 percent closer than are Mach3 blades - changes that the company says provide a more comfortable shave.

The Fusion models have a "Precision Trimmer" blade on the back of the blade cartridge, to be used to trim sideburns or shape facial hair. (According to Gillette, about half of all men have a mustache, goatee or other form of decorative facial hair.)

Fusion Power gets more techie. Its cartridges - which will also fit on the manual version - have a super-thin coating that Gillette says provides for an even closer shave. And while it runs on conventional AAA batteries, it incorporates an electronic chip to regulate voltage and otherwise ensure that the "shaving experience" is consistent as the battery drains. It even turns itself off if it sits idle for eight minutes.

Gillette has already filed 70 patents on the Fusion razors, and it expects to be able to command prices about 30 percent higher than for the Mach3. The manual razor and two cartridges will sell for about $9.99, with a 4-pack of refill cartridges going for about $11.99. Fusion Power, with one cartridge and a battery - Duracell, of course, since Gillette owns that brand - will retail for about $11.99, with refill 4-packs going for $13 or $14.

The elephant in the room, though, is the merger with Procter, which, barring regulatory holdups, should be completed this fall. Procter is already doing pre-emptive divestitures to ward off the antitrust cops - for example, it is selling its SpinBrush electric toothbrush business to Church & Dwight to avoid becoming too dominant in that area when it joins forces with Gillette's formidable Oral-B line.

Fortunately for Mr. Hoffman and his team, Procter is not in the shaving business, so Gillette's new-product plans do not pose any potential conflicts. "Fusion will be the first blockbuster for the merged P.& G.-Gillette entity," predicted William P. Pecoriello, a household products analyst at Morgan Stanley.

Mr. Kilts certainly agrees. Fusion is being introduced in North America first, and the merger should be well under way when Gillette rolls out the product internationally.

Procter has a better global distribution system than does Gillette, and "our combined sales forces will have the kind of scale to really get meaningful distribution in those markets," Mr. Kilts said in an interview. Moreover, he added, "Procter is one of the best media buyers in the world."

The merger could still cause problems, though. "A big product launch is hard under any circumstances, but particularly so if the staff is distracted by a merger," Mr. Donatiello warned.

Mr. Kilts shrugs that off. "You'll see," he said. "We'll write the Harvard case history on how to do an integration while launching a product."

Church & Dwight To Buy SpinBrush From P&G (NYT/REU)

By Reuters

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

CHICAGO (Reuters) - Church & Dwight Co. Inc. (CHD.N) on Wednesday said it has agreed to buy the SpinBrush toothbrush business from Procter & Gamble Co. (PG.N), a sale P&G hopes will help lead to antitrust approval of its multibillion dollar acquisition of Gillette Co. (G.N).

P&G had agreed to divest the business, which had $110 million in sales in the fiscal year that ended June 30, as part of its negotiations over the Gillette deal with the European Commission.

SpinBrush competes with some of Gillette's Oral-B toothbrushes.

Church & Dwight would pay an initial $75 million in cash at the closing of the deal, which would unite the battery-powered toothbrush with its Arm & Hammer and Mentadent toothpaste brands. An additional inventory settlement would be paid following the transfer of the business and Church & Dwight would also pay up to another $30 million based on near-term performance, Church & Dwight said.

The price would be sharply lower than the $475 million P&G paid for SpinBrush between 2000 and 2002. But while battery powered toothbrushes were a hot item in the oral care industry for a while, sales have waned in the category lately.

``The deal came cheap, but (the) category and SpinBrush have both lagged recently," William Schmitz, analyst at Deutsche Bank Equity Research, said in a research note.

He added that power toothbrush sales overall declined 10 percent in sales outlets tracked by market research firms last year and SpinBrush market share was down to 15.3 percent in the second quarter of this year from a high of 37.4 percent in the first quarter of 2003.

The deal is expected to close in the fourth quarter, subject to review by the Federal Trade Commission and European Commission.

P&G said it still expects its Gillette acquisition to close in the fall.

Church & Dwight shares were down 37 cents at $38.21 on Wednesday afternoon on the New York Stock Exchange, while P&G shares were down 50 cents at $55.04.

Lazard Ltd. (LAZ.N) advised Church & Dwight on the deal and Merrill Lynch advised P&G.

File-Sharing Firms Are Urged To Protect Music-Industry Rights (WSJ)

By Sarah Mcbride, Staff Reporter Of The Wall Street Journal

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

The Recording Industry Association of America has sent cease-and-desist letters to several file-sharing companies, including BearShare, LimeWire and WinMX, asking that they stop activities that allow users to download copyrighted music.

The letters ask the companies to "immediately cease and desist from enabling and inducing the infringement of RIAA member sound recordings," according to a copy of the letter reviewed by The Wall Street Journal.

The letters are an attempt by the music industry to build on the favorable ruling it received from the U.S. Supreme Court in June in the so-called Grokster case, involving a file-sharing company that was accused by the industry of facilitating copyright violations. In that ruling, the court found that copyright holders could sue file-sharing companies for encouraging people to violate copyrights. Now, the industry is taking the first step toward enforcing the ruling against other file-sharing companies.

"Companies similar to Grokster have been given ample opportunity to do the right thing," said the RIAA, which confirmed sending the letters to seven file-sharing companies.

The RIAA has long said it supports legal uses of file sharing. It wants file-sharing firms to alter their software -- for example, by creating filters to strip out copyrighted material or creating mechanisms to pay copyright holders. In recent months, it has been working with several file-sharing firms, including iMesh and Mashboxx, to create services that wouldn't violate copyrights.

The file-sharing companies that received cease-and-desist letters can shut down, fight the RIAA in court, or make changes that mollify the RIAA.

Despite the Grokster decision, a court case based on other file-sharing programs wouldn't necessarily be open and shut, says Ralph Oman, the former U.S. Register of Copyrights and a Washington, D.C.-based intellectual-property lawyer at the law firm Dechert LLP. The Supreme Court found that Grokster and co-defendant Morpheus were actively pursuing former users of the original Napster, a free file-sharing service found to be illegal, and remanded the case to trial court for further consideration. (A new Napster service offers paid, legal downloads.) It might be harder to prove that for the newer services.

Mr. Oman said file-sharing companies would have to prove they had "some credible rationale other than the promotion of illegal file sharing."

LimeWire confirmed receiving the letter, but declined to comment on any action it would take. BearShare and WinMX didn't respond to requests for comment. As of last night, these companies were still offering unchanged file-sharing software programs for download.

A Specialist On Mergers Joins Morgan As A Senior Adviser (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005721

J. P. Morgan Chase said yesterday that Robert I. Lipp, a longtime financial services executive who has played a role in some of the biggest bank and insurance mergers in recent decades, is joining the bank as a senior adviser.

In his new role, Mr. Lipp, 67, will work closely with J. P. Morgan's chairman, William B. Harrison Jr., and its president, James Dimon, in strategic planning as the bank continues to integrate operations after last year's merger between J. P. Morgan Chase and Bank One.

While Morgan has been hampered from deal making by its low-valued stock, Mr. Dimon alluded in remarks this summer to analysts that the bank could be on the hunt for acquisitions as early as next year.

"One of my duties is going to be thinking about growth, especially in the context of strategic planning," said Mr. Lipp, who will remain on Morgan's board. "I look forward to knowing the organization better so that I can contribute to strategic discussions."

Mr. Lipp has a long personal and professional history with both Mr. Harrison and Mr. Dimon. He spent 23 years at Chemical Bank, where he worked with Mr. Harrison before leaving in the mid-1980's to join Sanford I. Weill at Commercial Credit, which is based in Baltimore. There, he worked alongside Mr. Dimon in turning the sleepy consumer finance company into the nation's largest financial services giant, Citigroup, through a series of acquisitions.

After stepping down as head of global consumer banking at Citigroup in 2001, Mr. Lipp became chief executive of the Travelers Property Casualty Corporation, which Citigroup spun off for $3.89 billion in 2002. Two years later, Travelers Property Casualty merged with St. Paul in a deal valued at $16 billion.

Earlier this week, Mr. Lipp stepped down as chairman of St. Paul Travelers, four months ahead of schedule. He will remain on St. Paul Travelers' board.

Mr. Lipp, who will report to work next week, said he was looking forward to working closely again with Mr. Harrison and Mr. Dimon. "It's going to be fun working with people who are friends and that you have respect for," Mr. Lipp said.

Mr. Lipp said he would also assist in leadership development programs at the bank.

EU Fines Thread Makers EU43.5 Mln For Fixing Prices (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg News, September 15, 2005

Sept. 14 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators fined manufacturers of industrial thread including Coats Ltd., the world's biggest, 43.5 million euros ($53 million) for operating a price-fixing cartel.

The makers of thread used in products such as clothes, shoes, furniture and car seats held meetings starting in the 1990s to agree on prices, exchange information and allocate customers, the Brussels-based European Commission said today. The fine ends a probe that began with raids in the U.K. and Germany in 2001.

``Cartel behavior is illegal, unjustified and unjustifiable, and will be punished severely no matter how large or small the companies involved," Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in a statement. ``I will not allow consumers to be denied the benefits of the single market by companies carving up markets between themselves."

Under EU law, the commission, the EU's antitrust regulator, can fine companies accused of operating a cartel as much as 10 percent of their annual sales. It typically opts for about 2-3 percent of sales. The largest EU cartel fine was 462 million euros levied against Hoffmann-La Roche AG in 2001 for fixing the price of vitamins.

Coats, based in Uxbridge on the outskirts of London and owned by Guinness Peat Group Plc since March 2003, received the largest fine of 15 million euros, followed by Amann & Soehne GmbH with 13 million euros.

Three Cartels

The commission said it found a total of three cartels in the industrial thread market. The first was in Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg and the Nordic countries from January 1990 until September 2001. Another was in the U.K. from October 1990 until September 1996. The third was in the thread market for automotive customers in the EU, as well as Iceland, Liechtenstein and Norway, from May 1998 until May 2000.

Other companies fined for the thread cartels include Guetermann AG, 4 million euros, Barbour Thread Ltd., 2.1 million euros, Belgian Sewing Thread NV, 979,000 euros, Bieze Stork BV, 514,000 euros, and Zwicky & Co. AG, 174,000 euros.

In the automotive thread cartel, the companies fined were Cousin/Amann, 4.9 million euros, Coats, 650,000 euros, Oxley Threads Ltd. and Barbour 715,000 euros.

S.Korea's FTC Slaps Fines On Fixed-Line Telecom Firms (ASIAP)

Asia Pulse, September 15, 2005

SEOUL, Sept 15 Asia Pulse - South Korea's antitrust regulator decided Thursday to slap fines on four local fixed-line telecommunication service providers for illegal cartel activities.

The nine-person committee of the Fair Trade Commission (FTC) ruled to levy a combined 25.74 billion won (US$25.1 million) in fines against the country's four fixed-line companies - KT Corp. (KSE:030200), Hanarotelecom Inc., Onse Telecom Co. and Dacom Corp..

KT, the country's largest fixed-line telephone and broadband Internet operator, has been ordered to pay 23.87 billion won in fines for rigging the prices of both its long distance domestic services and international telephone services.

Dacom, the nation's second-largest long-distance telephone company, was slapped with a total 1.6 billion won in fines, with Onse being ordered to pay 2.1 billion won for its involvement in illegally fixing long distance and international telephone services.

Hanarotelecom was fined 60 million won for irregularities in its domestic long distance line operations.

The anti-trust authority also ordered the four companies, along with Dreamline Co. and Thrunet Co., to correct irregular activities related to their ultra-high-speed broadband operations.

The FTC's decision-making body said that it took the actions because the companies colluded in setting rates on both domestic and international telephone services and rigged fees they charged to businesses using their Internet lines.

Officials at the regulatory authority said they are planning to conclude a similar investigation into mobile telecommunication operators by the end of the year.

Industry sources said that the companies cited may contest the charges and take the matter to court.

S.Korea Fines KT, 3 Others $25 Mln For Price Fixing (REU)

Reuters, September 15, 2005

SEOUL, Sept 15 (Reuters) - South Korea's antitrust watchdog fined the country's top fixed-line operator, KT Corp., and three other firms 25.74 billion won ($25.10 million) for price fixing, the Fair Trade Commission (FTC) said on Thursday.

"The penalties are for price fixing in long-distance calls and international calls," a spokesman at the commission said by telephone.

The commission fined KT 23.87 billion won and Dacom Corp. 1.6 billion won. Hanarotelecom inc. and Onse Telecom were fined 60 million won and 210 million won, respectively.

The commission also found evidences of collusion in the high-speed Internet service charges, but only issued orders to improve business practices without imposing fines, the spokesman said.

The punishment comes as local operators struggle with stalled growth and cut-throat competition. In a separate case in May, the FTC slapped a record $120 million fine on KT, hanarotelecom and Dacom over collusion in local calls and network connection charges.

Competition in the fixed-line market has intensified because the broadband market is close to being saturated and growth in voice traffic has slowed as subscribers migrate to mobile phone services.

Shares in KT fell 0.94 percent to 42,000 won by 0050 GMT, versus a 0.14 percent fall in the broader market .

Dacom shares dropped 2.31 percent to 12,700 won and hanarotelecom shed 3.04 percent to 2,710 won. ($1=1025.4 Won)

ECB Chief Warns Against Attempts To Remove Fazio (FT)

By Ralph Atkins In Frankfurt And Tony Barber In Rome

Financial Times, September 15, 2005

Jean-Claude Trichet, the European Central Bank president, made clear on Wednesday he would oppose unwarranted political attempts to remove Antonio Fazio, the Bank of Italy governor engulfed in controversy over his handling of bank takeover bids.

Using national legislation to eject a central bank governor would set “a catastrophic precedent for the independence of all central banks”, Mr Trichet told the European parliament's monetary affairs committee.

He was speaking as Domenico Siniscalco, Italy's finance minister, put more pressure on Mr Fazio by saying Italy risked isolation in international financial markets unless its central bank and regulatory systems were profoundly reformed.

Mr Siniscalco and several other government ministers are demanding Mr Fazio's resignation for alleged improper conduct in two takeover battles for Italian banks. Critics accuse Mr Fazio of favouring domestic bidders over foreign ones. The central banker denies wrongdoing and has benefited from divisions in Italy's centre-right government over how, or even whether, to remove him.

Mr Siniscalco urged Italy's parliament to pass a government bill that would impose a seven-year term of office on future governors of the Bank of Italy. Under another reform, which was not in the original bill approved on September 2 by the Italian cabinet, Mr Siniscalco proposed transferring supervision of banking competition to Italy's antitrust authority from the central bank.

"We have waited nine months for a self-reform by the central bank, and there has been no trace of it," he said.

The proposed reforms would apply only to Mr Fazio's successors, and there is much uncertainty about when they might take effect, given Mr Fazio's refusal to resign and the risk that parliament might not pass the bill before it is dissolved early next year ahead of national elections.

Mr Trichet suggested that, even if Italy's parliament passed the reforms, Mr Fazio would not immediately leave office. He referred to an opinion issued by the ECB in May 2004, which recommended a five-year "transitional regime" for an incumbent national central bank governor.

Mr Trichet said the ECB would give "urgent consideration" to the Italian government's proposals, including the fixed term of office. He suggested the ECB was likely to support their thrust.

Mr Trichet is treading a delicate path in the Fazio affair, affirming the principle of central bank independence from political pressure but stressing the ECB's support for eurozone financial integration and the equal treatment of banks of different nationalities.

The Italian government's proposals form part of a broader overhaul of financial market regulation that was drawn up after the multi-billion euro fraud at the Parmalat food group, discovered in December 2003.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Mirant Plans To Request Plant's Reopening (WP)

By Jerry Markon, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Mirant Corp. plans to propose that its Alexandria power plant, which provides electricity to homes in the District and Maryland, be allowed to reopen on a limited basis. The plant was closed last month because of environmental problems.

Under a tentative plan Mirant outlined last week in documents filed with federal regulators, the Potomac River plant would operate at a level "significantly reduced from full capacity" that does not violate national air quality standards. At the same time, Mirant would continue studying long-term fixes such as burning cleaner coal or raising the height of the plant's smokestacks to disperse pollutants.

The plan must pass muster with the Virginia Department of Environmental Quality (DEQ), which has ordered Mirant to take immediate steps to reduce pollution. DEQ spokesman Bill Hayden said the department has not seen a proposal from Mirant but "will take a look at what they do propose. The main thing we're looking for is, if they are continuing to operate, it must be in a way that does not violate air quality standards."

Federal regulators, meanwhile, are also evaluating a petition, filed by the D.C. Public Service Commission, that asks them to order the plant to reopen. Mirant revealed that it will probably propose the partial reopening in documents the company filed last week with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

Amid the blitz of regulatory activity, it remains unclear when the plant might reopen, even temporarily. And Mirant acknowledges that a full-scale resumption of operations could be more than a year away. Although the plant is in Alexandria, it does not serve Virginia.

Mirant decided Aug. 24 to shut down the plant in response to the order from Virginia officials to cut potentially harmful pollution from the coal-fired facility. The directive by the Department of Environmental Quality came after it reviewed the results of an analysis that showed some pollutants found in the plant's vicinity are at times considerably higher than what national standards allow.

Neighbors of Mirant have complained for years about what they believe to be high levels of contaminants emanating from the plant.

But the 56-year-old plant supplies enough electricity to serve about 400,000 homes in the District and Maryland, and officials with Pepco and the D.C. Public Service Commission have described it as a vital link in the Washington power grid.

Without the plant's generating capacity, if other transmission circuits failed there could be a blackout "in much of the District of Columbia" affecting all electric customers in Georgetown, Foggy Bottom and major portions of downtown Washington, Pepco wrote in a filing last week with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission.

"Numerous federal facilities will lose power, including those crucial to the security, safety and welfare of the whole country, such as the FBI, the Justice Department, the State Department," wrote Pepco, which distributes electric power in the region.

Officials at Pepco and the D.C. Public Service Commission acknowledged last week that the plant's shutdown has not yet affected the power supplied to residents. "So far, we've gotten by because we haven't had the kind of conditions that could lead to sudden blackouts, like equipment failures, and we've had relatively mild weather," said D.C. public service Commissioner Richard E. Morgan.

"But it still could happen," he added.

Pepco said it does not plan on letting things get to that point. The company announced that it plans to work with the D.C. commission to accelerate construction of new transmission facilities that would ensure reliable electric power even without the Mirant plant.

"Given Mirant's recent decisions, we believe action is necessary to satisfy Pepco's obligation to provide reliable service to our customers," said Dennis Wraase, president and chief executive officer of Pepco Holdings Inc. The transmission construction project is expected to take about 18 months.

For now, Pepco said it supports the D.C. Public Service Commission petition asking federal regulators to order the plant to reopen. Brian Lee, a spokesman for the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, declined to say when the commission will make a decision.

Mirant, for its part, remains determined to reopen the plant. "We're confident that we're going to find a solution that will allow us to get our plant back into service and restore the level of electric reliability that we've come to expect," Mirant spokesman Steve Arabia said.

The report that precipitated the shutdown looked at worst-case scenarios involving pollution, weather and operational capacity. Researchers found that under certain conditions, the levels of sulfur dioxide, nitrogen dioxide and particles in the vicinity of the Mirant plant are higher than national ambient air quality standards allow.

As a result, state officials directed Mirant to take immediate steps to reduce pollution from the plant. Mirant decided to shut the plant down until it could find a way to meet air quality standards.

Atlanta-based Mirant, which filed for bankruptcy in 2003, operates four plants in the Washington area, including three in Maryland: in Montgomery, Prince George's and Charles counties.

Neighbors of the Alexandria plant, on the banks of the Potomac in the northern end of the city, have complained for years about what they believed to be high levels of mercury, contaminants in the air and water, and of a sooty substance that they say covers surfaces around their homes and gardens.

Poul Hertel, a neighbor who has helped lead the fight against the plant, said he is skeptical about Mirant's plan to reopen on a limited basis. He said the problem of polluted downwash from the plant's smokestacks could actually worsen.

"Downwash is not proportional to how much they are producing, it's more proportional to the speed and velocity of the emissions," Hertel said. "Just because they are operating at lowered capacity doesn't mean the issue is by any way, shape or form resolved."

In the end, Hertel said, he believes the plant probably will have to close. "Everything suggests that this plant is just not suitable or compatible with its surroundings," he said. "The health effects are too significant to ignore or negotiate away."

Straight Shooter To Some, Loose Cannon To Others (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

The fans of U.S. District Judge Royce Lamberth praise his straight-talking ways, his defense of the wronged, and his stinging rebukes of lawyers and officials who try to fudge the facts.

So many decades after he left his beloved Texas and cowboy roots for a legal career in government service, fellow judges and former colleagues say, old Royce still gets riled up when he smells a bunch of bull.

When Lamberth theorized in a July ruling that the Interior Department's failure, over many decades, to account for potentially billions of dollars owed to Native Americans could only be explained by outright evil, apathy, cowardice or -- more likely -- crushing bureaucratic incompetence, the Justice Department decided to go after the judge.

In one of the rarest legal moves Justice has ever taken, the government asked that a higher court remove Lamberth from a case he has overseen for the past nine years.

In the escalating and unparalleled war between the judge and Interior, Justice lawyers said privately they saw no other option. They argued to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that Lamberth has gone overboard in a string of verbal harangues in recent years, accused agency officials of racism and lost the appearance of impartiality in the case. Already, he has found two secretaries of Interior in contempt of court and ordered sanctions against numerous government lawyers for improper conduct in the case.

When they stand before a different bench tomorrow, government lawyers are expected to try to shift the discussion from the acknowledged failure of Interior to properly account for money held in trust and due 50,000 Indians, to the often assaulting words and actions of a powerful Reagan appointee who has made no secret of his disgust. Only three times before has this appeals court disqualified a trial judge from a case.

Lamberth and Justice Department officials declined to comment for this article. But their most recent writings in the case of Cobell v. Norton capture the tenor of what the appellate court's chief judge called the "peculiar dialogue going on" in Courtroom 21.

"On numerous occasions over the last nine years, the Court has wanted to simply wash its hands of Interior and its iniquities once and for all," Lamberth wrote. The plaintiffs have urged him to appoint a receiver to take over, he wrote, "but doing so . . . would constitute an announcement that negligence and incompetence in government are beyond judicial remedy."

In their Aug. 15 request for a new judge, Justice lawyers said that besides using intemperate language, Lamberth has ignored appellate rulings and accused the government of "falsification, spite and obstinate litigiousness" with "no legal or factual basis."

Lamberth has many defenders, from conservative Supreme Court justices to left-wing civil liberties lawyers, and is repeatedly ranked by lawyers as among the most skilled judges on the court.

Many of his fans applaud his stamina and even his outrage, but a few say privately that they think Lamberth has been pushed too far in the Interior case and has made himself a target with his sharp tongue. Said one fellow judge who requested anonymity: "He's been driven beyond the limit of his patience by these people. In his heart, he may know he's no longer dispassionate."

Since a Blackfeet tribe leader named Eloise Cobell filed this lawsuit in 1996, several independent investigations found much evidence for Lamberth's concerns. Although, the government initially said its existing Indian trust fund records were in good shape, Lamberth hired a hacker who found they could easily be accessed and altered from outside. Other reviews found that the Interior Departmenthad never kept complete records, used unknown amounts of money to help balance the federal budget, and let the oil and gas industry use Indian lands at bargain rates. They also concluded that the Clinton and Bush administrations have repeatedly sidestepped initiating the required accounting because of the likely cost.

Colleagues say Lamberth's strong prose is motivated by his government service and belief that it is a high calling. "He believes every person -- whether it's the president of the United States or an administrative clerk -- has a duty to serve the American people and do their duty as required under the law," said Mark Nagle, who worked under Lamberth when he ran the civil division of the U.S. attorney's office.

"I remember him calling up some senior-level presidential appointees and telling them: 'We can't defend this one. And we're not going to,' " Nagle said.

Lamberth's directness continued when he joined the bench. In presiding over several controversial cases involving the Clinton administration, Lamberth repeatedly accused government officials of trying to dupe the court.

In the November trial of Murder Inc. gang members, Lamberth spotted one defendant mouthing words to an ex-girlfriend as she reluctantly testified. Lamberth excused the jury, then let loose. "You sit down and shut up," the judge growled. "If you want to be bound and gagged for the rest of this trial, you just keep it up."

Lamberth has never spared the government in Cobell , and government lawyers say they cringe at his sometimes mocking tone. "You know any banker would be in jail for handling funds like this, don't you?" he told one Interior witness.

U.S. District Judge Stanley Sporkin, now retired, who was removed from a criminal case by the appeals court after not following sentencing guidelines, said Lamberth's motives are undoubtedly pure in Cobell , and the appeals court needs to acknowledge this litigation is "no tea party."

"Here you have a judge who is terribly frustrated," Sporkin said. "Every time he tells the government to get something done, they don't. It seems to me you have a bunch of crybabies that aren't willing to do what has to be done."

Report: FBI Turnover Hampers Cooperation (AP-Y2)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

AP2, September 15, 2005

The FBI has experienced excessive turnover among senior officials, hampering cooperation with state and local authorities since the Sept. 11 attacks, a new report released Wednesday said.

The senior agents who run the 56 FBI field offices average just 15 months in their jobs before moving on to new assignments or leaving the bureau altogether, according to a report by the congressionally chartered National Academy of Public Administration. At FBI headquarters in Washington, the average posting for high-ranking officials is 13 months, the report said.

The short tenures of Special Agents in Charge of the field offices, or SACs in FBI parlance, make "it difficult for them to perform one of their most important functions, developing effective relationships with state and local officials," said former Attorney General Richard Thornburgh, chairman of the panel that produced the report. It was released at a House Appropriations subcommittee hearing on changes at the FBI following the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

Thornburgh told lawmakers at the hearing that he was "astonished to see the short tenures of SACs."

No senior executive in Washington and only four SACs have been in their jobs longer than FBI Director Robert Mueller, who started work 10 days before the attacks.

Floyd Clarke, another panel member, spent five years as FBI deputy director, Thornburgh said. Since Clarke's retirement in 1994, there have been nine deputy directors, Thornburgh said.

Mueller, testifying at the same hearing, acknowledged the difficulty in keeping experienced agents. "There have been tremendous problems with retaining persons particularly since Sept. 11 because there's not a corporation in the country that doesn't want a security officer," Mueller said.

The FBI is expected shortly to hire a chief personnel officer to address problems raised in the report and other studies by the Government Accountability Office, the Congressional Research Service and the Justice Department inspector general, he said.

The reports are the latest in a series of examinations of the FBI that say the bureau has made enormous strides in changing its primary mission from solving crimes to thwarting terrorism, but still needs to improve its intelligence gathering and analysis, as well as upgrade its technology.

Thornburgh ascribed some turnover to the dramatic change in the FBI's duties. "It is traumatic," he said, especially for agents who made careers pursuing mobsters, drug dealers and bank robbers.

The FBI has had several costly setbacks in its attempt to overhaul its computer systems, a top priority for Mueller after Sept. 11. Mueller scrapped a paperless case management system at a loss of $105 million to taxpayers after he was told it was obsolete.

Its replacement, dubbed Sentinel, will be rolled out in four phases, beginning by the end of 2006, he said.

The Thornburgh panel report, however, found some field offices and FBI training facilities in Quantico still have limited access to the Internet.

The FBI purchased 10,000 licenses from a software company for computer-based training, "but access to appropriate computers is so limited that only 200 employees, on average, are in a position to use the licenses at any one time," Thornburgh said.

FBI chief information officer Zalmai Azmi said the numbers were wrong, but did not elaborate.

Court Says FBI Whistleblower May Sue The Agency For Retaliation (AP)

By MARY CLARE JALONICK, Associated Press

AP, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - A federal appeals court has ruled that Jane Turner, an FBI whistleblower who accused the agency of discrimination and retaliation, may seek monetary damages and a jury trial.

Turner accused male FBI agents of mishandling several cases of sexual abuse in Indian country and alleged her superiors transferred her from Minot, N.D., to Minneapolis in retaliation for complaints about sexual discrimination.

The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in a ruling Aug. 30, said Turner had sufficient evidence to justify at trial over whether the transfer was in retaliation for her complaints. But the judges dismissed Turner's claims that she worked in a hostile environment and was a victim of discrimination because of her gender.

An FBI spokeswoman said the agency would not comment on the case because the litigation is ongoing.

"I am very pleased that after all these years, we have vindication on retaliation happening in the FBI," Turner said Wednesday.

Turner has a separate case against the agency alleging wrongful termination under the Whistleblower Act. She said the agency started termination proceedings against her after she triggered an internal investigation into the agency's removal of souvenir debris from the site of the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in New York.

Turner noticed a Tiffany globe paperweight on a secretary's desk in the Minneapolis FBI office in August 2002. After learning it came from the World Trade Center, she brought the globe to the attention of the inspector general.

She resigned in October 2003 before the termination proceedings could be completed.

Pot Author Challenges Drug Convictions (FINDLAW/AP)

By David Kravets, Associated Press Writer

Find Law, September 15, 2005

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Attorneys for a man who has written books on how to grow marijuana and avoid getting caught asked a federal appeals court Tuesday to overturn his drug convictions.

Ed Rosenthal, the self-described "Guru of Ganja," was convicted two years ago of growing and distributing hundreds of marijuana plants. He says he was authorized to do so by the city of Oakland under a 1996 California medical marijuana law.

After U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer refused to allow a jury to hear that defense, Rosenthal was convicted of being a major drug supplier.

Breyer sentenced him to one day in prison on grounds that Rosenthal reasonably believed he was immune from prosecution because he was acting on behalf of Oakland city officials. The government and Rosenthal both appealed.

The government maintained Rosenthal, now 60, should have gotten at least 24 months. Amber Rosen, an assistant United States attorney, told a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that Breyer abused his discretion by issuing a sentence that fell outside sentencing guidelines.

While the case was on appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that the federal government can prosecute medical marijuana growers and users despite California's medical marijuana law.

The justices also ruled in an unrelated case while Rosenthal's prosecution was pending appeal that federal judges do not have to follow congressional sentencing guidelines. That decision was also retroactive.

Dennis Riordan, one of Rosenthal's appellate attorneys, told the court that Rosenthal's conviction should be overturned.

"I was told by the city attorney's office that I was immune from prosecution. If I can't rely on government officials, who can you rely on?" Rosenthal said in an interview after the hearing.

He once wrote the "Ask Ed" column for High Times magazine and has written books with titles including "The Big Book of Buds" and "Ask Ed: Marijuana Law. Don't Get Busted."

Prospect Of Drugs 'black List' Hangs Over Venezuela (FT)

By Andy Webb-vidal In Caracas

Financial Times, September 15, 2005

From the jetty at San Juan de las Galdonas, a fishing village on the eastern coast of Venezuela, Pedro Salcedo casts his eye across the Caribbean. The sea is calm. A fine day for sailing.

Fishing, however, is just an occasional pastime for Mr Salcedo. He makes better money transporting drugs to far-flung islands in the Caribbean, for a couple of thousand dollars a journey.

''Trinidad, Grenada, and nowadays we go as far as Puerto Rico,'' he says. The US lies almost 900km away, two days on a small launch.

Mr Salcedo, and others like him, used to avoid soldiers from Venezuela's National Guard, the body charged with combating drugs-trafficking in the country, through which up to one-third of the cocaine smuggled from Colombia passes. But increasingly often, US officials say, the fishermen are in competition with the National Guard, rogue elements of which also take part in drug-running.

This may be one reason why the US, the world's largest consumer of cocaine, could remove Venezuela from its annual list of countries ''certified'' as adequately collaborating in the war on drugs. The State Department is expected to announce its list today, and some US officials say Venezuela will be ''decertified'', incurring sanctions.

Controversy over drugs was recently added to the list of factors that have become a fresh source of diplomatic tension between Caracas and Washington. Last month Hugo Chávez, Venezuela's president, suspended a co-operation agreement with the US Drugs Enforcement Administration, alleging that its officials were ''spying''.

Days later it emerged that the US had revoked the visas of several National Guard officers for alleged complicity in drugs cases. But Venezuelan officials claim they are delivering ever improving results in the war on drugs, and that a decision to decertify Venezuela would be ''political''.

On Tuesday, Jesse Chacón, the interior minister, said the authorities had seized 18.7 tonnes of cocaine in the first eight months of the year, almost as much as the 19.6 tonnes seized in 2004.

John Walsh, a senior analyst at the Washington Office on Latin America, a liberal think-tank, agrees that it will be hard for a decertification decision to not be seen as political. ''It's difficult in this context to imagine that if there is a decertification it won't be read as more political than substantive,'' he says. ''If the US isn't careful once again they are going to give Chávez some material to work with.''

Mr Chávez frequently criticises Washington's policies as ''imperialist'', and charges that it is ''hypocritical'' of the world's top drugs- consuming country to certify other countries.

This week, Venezuela offered an alternative arrangement to allow the DEA to continue operating under a more limited framework. A US embassy official said the draft agreement was being ''studied''.

Analysts have questioned the effectiveness of a drugs ''black list''. The decertification of the government of President Ernesto Samper in Colombia in the mid-1990s arguably had little lasting impact. And in Venezuela, sanctions that could amount to as little $500,000 (€400,000, £245,000) would be of little concern to Mr Chávez, whose government is dizzy on an unprecedented oil bonanza.

Sullivan County Grand Jury Hands Up 100 Indictments (UNIONL)

By STEPHEN SEITZ, Union Leader Correspondent

Manchester Union Leader, September 15, 2005

NEWPORT — In the end, "Operation Summer Sizzle" yielded more than 100 indictments against 41 people.

The drug raids took place on Aug. 31, involving 15 state and local law enforcement agencies, as well as the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. The indictments were handed up on Monday by the Sullivan County grand jury. The raids took place mostly in Newport and Claremont, although arrests were made in Charlestown and Sunapee as well.

Newport resident Sherry West, 38, faces 10 to 40 years and up to $600,000 in possible fines if convicted on charges of selling methadone and crack cocaine within 1,000 feet of a school. Robin Langlois, 38, of Claremont, was charged with selling heroin within 1,000 feet of a school; due to a prior conviction of selling cocaine, her penalty could reach 30 years and a $400,000 fine if convicted. Claremont resident Del Lord, 46, was charged with two counts each of selling the prescription drug Percocet and marijuana within 1,000 feet of a school. That could bring 12 to 30 years on each count and total fines of $400,000.

Charges against the others range from possession to conspiracy to sell, as well as sales of various drugs. Penalties in these cases range from one year in prison to 15 for each count, depending on the severity of the offense; fines top out at $100,000, again depending on the charge.

Four charges were dropped by the Sullivan County Attorney's office.

Texas Mafia Member Is Given 60 Years (SAEN)

San Antonio Express-News, September 15, 2005

A federal judge on Wednesday sentenced a Texas Mexican Mafia member to 60 years in prison for his role in a violent drug-dealing conspiracy.

Johnny "Gira" Garcia-Esparza, 45, was the last of four Mexican Mafia members awaiting punishment on charges stemming from their April conviction on drug-related charges.

U.S. District Judge Orlando Garcia sentenced Garcia-Esparza to 55 years on the conspiracy and drug charges, plus five years on the gun charges.

Between 1999 and 2004, as many as 28 gang members were accused of delivering more than 150 kilos of cocaine and more than 30 kilos of heroin. Law officers seized more than 80 firearms in the course of making the arrests in August 2004, prompting the U.S. attorney's office to say the conspirators operated like a terrorist organization.

Out of the 28 who were rounded up, only four defendants went to trial last April and all were convicted of charges that included drug-trafficking conspiracy, money-laundering conspiracy, selling drugs and using guns in the commission of drug crimes.

Teen Convicted In Bomb Case (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson Clarion-Ledger, September 15, 2005

A Brandon teenager who made a bomb powerful enough to blow up half of a car was convicted Tuesday of federal charges.

U.S. District Judge William Barbour Jr. set James Vaughn Rankin, 19, sentencing for Dec. 1. He faces a maximum 30 years in prison.

Rankin was convicted of possession of an unregistered firearm, transfer of an unregistered firearm and the manufacture of an unregistered firearm.

U.S. Assistant Attorney David Fulcher said Rankin intended for the bomb to kill. "He said on the videotape it will destroy half of a car," Fulcher said.

Rankin's landlord, Willis Freeman, said by telephone late Tuesday: "I would have bet my right arm that he wouldn't have done something like that, but he did. I never had a problem with him.

"I hope they take the good in him and try to rehabilitate him," Freeman said.

During the two-day trial, jurors watched a videotape of Rankin selling the bomb to an undercover agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Rankin's attorney, Federal Assistant Public Defender Kathy Nester, argued her client may have possessed the bomb, but the government didn't prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he intended to harm anyone.

Nester said ATF agent Connie Wilson testified on cross-examination that she didn't mention anything about wanting the bomb to kill an ex-husband until after Rankin had placed the device in her car. Also, Nester said the government didn't prove her client transported across state lines gunpowder used in making the bomb.

"They haven't proved it (gunpowder) wasn't made in his bedroom," Nester said.

Rankin was arrested Nov. 9. Wilson said she posed as someone wanting to harm an ex-husband in Texas after a confidential informant told her Rankin could make a bomb. The informant set up a meeting for her with Rankin.

After Rankin was charged in federal court, his probation in a car-theft case was revoked and he was sentenced to five years in a state prison.

Feds Target Firearms (FPTJ)

By Kelly Townsend, The Times-Journal

Fort Payne (AL) Times-Journal, September 13, 2005

DeKalb County was one of five counties in Alabama that had indictments handed down Sept. 2 in federal court for various federal firearm violations.

The others were Cullman, Madison, Shelby and Jefferson counties.

U.S. Attorney Alice Martin would not release the names of those indicted.

“The names of theses individuals are being withheld pending service of outstanding warrants,” Martin said. “We cannot release any of this information, including how many were indicted in each county, until all the warrants have been served.”

DeKalb County Drug Task Force Agent Darrell Collins said he couldn’t recall the number of gun cases worked in the past couple of months. But he did say that normally, three-fourths of the methamphetamine cases they do work involve some type of firearm.

“That is why we work with the ATF on a daily basis, in an effort to enforce the reduction of illegal gun use,” Collins said.

Martin, along with James M. Cavanaugh, Special Agent in Charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said a grand jury returned indictments against 12 people in unrelated cases.

According to Martin, the indictments include seven violations for felons in possession of firearms, a violation for possession a sawed-off shotgun, possession of a firearm by an illegal alien, and three violations for possessing a firearm during and in relation to a drug trafficking or violent offense.

Plan To Blow Up Rudolph Truck Upsets Some (AP)

By JAY REEVES, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 15, 2005

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — The government wants to blow up the truck Eric Rudolph was driving when he bombed an Alabama abortion clinic, a plan that has upset some of Rudolph's victims.

Authorities said they want to use the pickup truck in a training drill to prevent it from ending up in the hands of Rudolph's admirers.

"It was done partly out of concern that it would show up on eBay," said Assistant U.S. Attorney James Ingram, referring to the Internet auction site. "Somebody would plunk down some money for it."

But nurse Emily Lyons, who was badly wounded in the clinic bombing, believes the truck should go to Rudolph's victims, who are unlikely to get any other compensation, according to her husband, Jeff Lyons.

In 2003, a state court judge awarded the couple $115 million in a lawsuit against Rudolph, who was declared indigent in federal court and has not paid anything. Trucks similar to Rudolph's 1989 Nissan have a retail value of about $1,700, according to Kelley Blue Book, a pricing guide for used vehicles.

"We had the judgment before they did the seizure," Jeff Lyons said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0005730

Shortly after the clinic bombing, a witness recorded the truck's license plate number and reported it to police, who used the information to identify Rudolph as a suspect in the explosion. He was later tied to the 1996 Olympic park bombing and two other bombings in Atlanta in 1997.

Rudolph was captured in May 2003, pleaded guilty in four bombings, and is now in federal prison serving four life terms.

Last month, a federal judge in Birmingham approved the government's request to permanently seize the truck, which had been held as evidence for Rudolph's trial.

The truck likely will be loaded with explosives and detonated by the FBI or the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, said Jim Cavanaugh, the ATF's regional director. Both agencies routinely blow up vehicles in classes to teach officers about explosives and bomb reconstruction.

Donald Spitz, an abortion opponent who has corresponded with Rudolph and posted some of his writings on the Internet, said he doubted anyone in his movement would want to buy the truck, "but there are people out there who would do it."

Marshals Rescind Ban On Releasing Mug Shots (DEN)

By David Shepardson, The Detroit News

Detroit News, September 15, 2005

DETROIT -- The U.S. Marshals Service has reversed a ban on releasing mug shots in response to a pair of federal lawsuits.

In an Aug. 10 memorandum made public Friday, the service's Office of General Counsel told officials in Michigan, Kentucky, Ohio and Tennessee -- the states covered by the U.S. Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals -- that they must release the photographs.

The memo rescinded an Aug. 19, 2004, order that said officials would no longer release the mug shots, citing a March U.S. Supreme Court decision.

In that unanimous decision, the court said the government wasn't required to release four photographs of former White House lawyer Vincent Foster's dead body, saying it would violate the family's privacy.

Two newspapers filed separate lawsuits this spring seeking to overturn an August 2004 decision by the U.S. Marshal Service to stop releasing the booking photos of prisoners to news media outlets and others under the Freedom of Information Act.

The Justice Department reversed itself and agreed to release the mugshots.

In the other 46 states, the U.S. Marshals Service typically only releases mug shots for "fugitive apprehension purposes." Under a 1996 ruling by the U.S. Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, the department has been required to release mug shots. That upheld a ruling by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor in Detroit ordering the release of the photographs in a 1993 lawsuit.

IMMIGRATION:

13 Bosnian Serbs Arrested For Immigration Fraud,7 Others Detained (AP)

By BETH DeFALCO, The Associated Press

AP, September 14, 2005

PHOENIX - Thirteen Bosnian Serbs living here were indicted on charges of lying to American authorities about their service in the Serbian Army and seven others were being detained for similar reasons, federal authorities said Wednesday.

According to an indictment filed in U.S. District Court in Phoenix, the 13 who were indicted on immigration fraud charges are accused of lying on their immigration applications by omitting that they served in Serbia's Army of the Republic of Srpska.

All immigrants applying for refugee status and legal residency are required to declare prior military service.

"We will not allow the United States to become a sanctuary for those using fraud and deception to qualify for refugee status," said Roberto G. Medina, special agent in charge of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Phoenix.

The seven being detained would have been charged criminally for failing to declare their past military service except that the statute of limitations had run out, said Russell Ahr, an ICE spokesman in Phoenix.

The 13 arrested on Monday were: Nenad Dragic, Milenko Gujic, Mitra Gujic, Rajko Hercegovac, Risto Hercegovac, Rajko Ninkovic, Radenko Spiric, Vitomir Spiric, Savo Tojcic, Nikola Stankovic, Cvijan Vidakovic, Momcilo Krstic and Mladen Blagojevic. All were citizens of the former Yugoslavia, now Bosnia-Herzegovina, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix.

The seven being held on immigration charges were not immediately identified by federal authorities.

This week's apprehensions left many in Phoenix's Bosnian Serbian community confounded as to why their friends and family members were taken away after living in this country peacefully for so many years. Some wondered if they would be next.

DOJ_NMG_0005731

Goran Spiric's father and brother were both apprehended. His brother, Vitomir Spiric, was among those charged criminally. He said his 63-year-old father, who came to Arizona seven years ago, was a civil firefighter but never served in the Serbian Army.

Goran Spiric, who said he came to America 11 years ago from a concentration camp where he was kept by Bosnian Muslims, wondered if he would also be apprehended.

"Every single morning I go to work, I carefully watch on both sides and wonder if the FBI or someone is watching me," Spiric said.

Some in the Bosnian Serb community said they believe the connection among those arrested and detained is that many lived in Srebrenica, the site of a massacre in July 1995 - months before the end of the Bosnian war and after the Bosnian Serb troops took control over the town in the east of the Balkan republic.

The victorious Bosnian Serb troops allegedly executed some 8,000 Muslim boys and men who were captured in the onslaught on the town. The remains of the victims were buried in mass graves around Srebrenica.

Several top Bosnian Serb military and political officials already are serving sentences for war crimes over Srebrenica.

Federal authorities in Phoenix would not disclose why immigration paperwork for those Bosnians Serbs arrested and detained this week was targeted for review or how officials knew they served in the Serbian Army.

"Information was provided to ICE and our agents relating to service in the Serb Army. With enough investigation work, we determined that the statements made on refugee applications turned out to be false," Ahr said.

Federal authorities also declined to say whether any of the 20 Bosnian Serbs were suspected of war crimes or were material witnesses. None of those arrested or detained have been charged with a war crime, according to war tribunal indictments.

Last year, four Bosnian Serbs living in Phoenix were also arrested and charged with lying on immigration paperwork. They are Radenko Ubiparipovic, Dragon Ubiparipovic, Goran Bencun and Zdravko Bozic.

Bozic was sentenced on March 30 to a year in prison. After serving his sentenced, he'll be turned over to ICE for deportation, federal prosecutors said.

The other three cases are still pending.

According to court documents, all four - Bozic, Radenko Ubiparipovic, Dragon Ubiparipovic and Bencun - were said to have been assigned to the Drina Corp in the Batunac Brigade in 1995.

Earlier rulings by the U.N. tribunal have established that the Bosnian Serb Drina Corps led the attack on Srebrenica.

There are no indications from authorities that the 13 arrested or seven detained this week have any connection to the four arrested last year.

Alexander Stojsic, a spokesman for St. Nicholas Orthodox Church in Phoenix, where many Bosnian Serbs attend, said church members had already begun to raise money for a legal defense fund. He also said the Serbian consulate planned to meet with the community members this week.

Judge Is Asked To Dismiss War Crime Case (BOS)

The Boston Globe, September 15, 2005

Charges against a Peabody construction worker accused of hiding his role in a Bosnian Muslim massacre should be thrown out because Marko Boskic was forced under threat of death to participate in the Srebrenica killings, his lawyer said yesterday.

The lawyer, Max D. Stern, told a US district court judge yesterday that Boskic was not deceptive on immigration forms when he entered the United States in 2000 and that he was never motivated by the fact that the victims were Muslim.

Judge Douglas P. Woodlock promised to issue a ruling on the motion soon.

Boskic faces a five-count indictment of fraudulently entering the US as a refugee, as well as concealing his past in a Bosnian Serb Army unit accused of killing some 7,000 Muslim men and boys.

Lawmakers, Rove Talk Immigration (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Two House Republicans met with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove yesterday to discuss immigration reform one week after the House chairman with jurisdiction over that issue predicted that Hurricane Katrina could delay it until next year.

Reps. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) met with Rove at the White House to discuss immigration reform, Flake said yesterday. Neither member had returned from the afternoon meeting by press time.

The meeting comes as congressional leaders reshuffle their fall agenda after a glut of emergency legislation responding to the damage caused by Katrina. It also comes days after House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) told the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel: "I think immigration is off until next year."

Immigration reform is a particularly difficult issue for congressional Republicans because it divides supporters of the business community from those social conservatives whose goal is to shut down the borders and prohibit employers from hiring illegal immigrants.

The business community, on the other hand, argues that the estimated 10 million to 12 million illegal immigrants employed in this country fill jobs U.S. citizens would not otherwise take. This broad coalition, which includes large corporate interests such as the Chamber of Commerce as well as regional businesses such as seasonal crab farmers in Maryland, also argues that the relocation costs would be too high.

While the political climate favors a strong border-security measure, the business lobby could be essential in creating the political momentum to pass a broader bill through the Senate.

Kolbe and Flake have introduced a bill, along with Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.), to register illegal immigrants currently employed in the United States as part of a national database for prospective employers. Their legislation does not require those immigrants to return to their countries of origin before gaining temporary residency.

Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.), meanwhile, have offered companion legislation in the Senate, while Sens. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) have offered competing legislation that would require immigrants to return to their countries of origin to register as guest workers.

Both bills have provisions that would expand border security and increase fines for employers caught violating the law.

GOP House leaders made immigration reform a priority early in the 109th Congress. Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) tapped Republican Policy Committee Chairman John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) to coordinate the divergent member views on this issue in anticipation of a floor vote this year.

Shadegg was to hold the fourth of his Unity Dinners to discuss the subject last night. The Arizona Republican has used these Unity Dinners, which were established by former Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas), to find consensus on fractious issues within the conference.

In the wake of Katrina, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) has maintained his commitment to passing an immigration and border-security package that could be either one bill or multiple pieces of legislation. DeLay has recently hinted that he would like to pass a border-security bill first and then address the issue of illegal immigrants employed in this country. He is working with Sensenbrenner, whose Judiciary Committee has jurisdiction over the legislation.

Flake said he believes the practical details of enforcement, such as locating illegal workers, will eventually require lawmakers to address instead the question of registering these employees before passing a separate enforcement bill.

"If you want enforcement, you've got to have a law you can enforce," Flake said.

The Judiciary Committee already had a full schedule of legislation on its plate heading into the fall, including the child-safety bill that passed yesterday, an update of the Voting Rights Act that may spark a fight about redistricting and a House-Senate conference negotiation about reauthorizing the USA Patriot Act.

Sensenbrenner made his remarks about postponement in response to a question about the fall legislative agenda.

After the damage wrought by Katrina, the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group strongly opposed to illegal immigration, released a report illustrating how immigration loopholes could lead to another massive terrorist attack.

Meanwhile, the Department of Homeland Security last week relaxed document requirements for employers hiring workers who have been displaced by the hurricane. The department will not fine any businesses that hire any of these workers within 45 days of last Tuesday, which could create a major immigration loophole.

Washington lobbying firm Quinn-Gillespie has organized a large coalition of business lobbies, including the Chamber, to work with the White House to pass a broader immigration bill, which would allow for more flexibility for employers to retain those workers already in this country.

Kilgore Urges Penalties For Employers Of Illegals (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Republican gubernatorial candidate Jerry W. Kilgore said yesterday if elected he will go after businesses that knowingly hire illegal aliens.

"They are supposed to check for legal status," Mr. Kilgore told The Washington Times. "If they are knowingly violating the law they shouldn't be getting state contracts and they should not be getting state credits and benefits."

DOJ_NMG_0005733

His comments come one day after he debated his Democratic challenger Timothy M. Kaine over a host of topics, including the establishment of a day laborer center in Herndon that will provide services for legal immigrants and illegal aliens.

The debate was sponsored by the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce, whose members include local business leaders. Last night, a chamber spokesman had no comment on Mr. Kilgore's proposal, saying it would be up to individual businesses to weigh in.

Mr. Kilgore has said officials in Northern Virginia are giving incentives to illegals by allowing such centers. One way to address the problem would be to revoke any tax credits or benefits companies receive from the state if they knowingly hire illegal aliens, he said.

Mr. Kaine said at the debate that his opponent was "mean-spirited" and that the members of the Herndon Town Council should have the right to deal with "tough public safety challenges."

"They are elected by local people and I'm not going to grandstand over their right to make the best decision for themselves, using their own money," Mr. Kaine said Tuesday. "The problem is a federal government that turns its back, that lets employers violate the law and then expects local governments to try to pick up the pieces.

"Jerry, there is a mean-spiritedness in your attack," he added.

Yesterday, Mr. Kilgore responded to Mr. Kaine's remarks: "I don't know how it is mean-spirited to ask someone to follow the law."

Mr. Kilgore also said if elected he would sign an agreement with the U.S. Department of Homeland Security to train 50 state troopers and give them special authority to detain illegal aliens.

The executive director of the Virginia Association of Chiefs of Police said Mr. Kilgore's stance is not realistic.

"We believe you need to be here legally, but in the real world we don't have the resources to address that," said Dana Schrad, executive director of the association that represents police chiefs in the state.

"If you take a position we're going to launch enforcement activities to rid Virginia of all illegal immigrants, it backfires on law enforcement because we don't have the resources to do that," she said.

She said that authorities worry about detaining gang members and violent criminals before they worry about detaining illegal aliens who violated immigration law.

Miss Schrad also said day laborer centers are a better alternative to large groups of men standing around and potentially causing trouble for local businesses, which is one of the reasons Herndon leaders gave when they approved the center.

Mark Bergman, a spokesman for the Democratic Party of Virginia, said Mr. Kaine is correct in stating that the federal government is failing to do its job and agreed that Herndon shouldn't be second-guessed on its decision to allow the center.

"These are local issues and we shouldn't be in the position to bully people," he said. "We shouldn't be in the business of coming in and intervening in local issues."

Mr. Bergman also said that Democrats agree with Mr. Kilgore that illegal behavior should not be rewarded with state contracts.

Conservative lawmakers supporting Mr. Kilgore yesterday criticized Mr. Kaine for the comments he made at the debate.

Delegates David B. Albo and L. Scott Lingamfelter, both Republicans, said Mr. Kaine's comments put him out of touch with Virginia voters and equate to encouraging illegal activity.

"He is turning a blind eye toward the problem," said Mr. Lingamfelter of Prince William County. "Tim is completely out of step with the voting public on this issue."

However, statewide polls show that concern over illegal aliens ranks low in voting priorities.

Independent candidate H. Russell Potts Jr., a Republican state senator from Winchester, has previously criticized Mr. Kilgore's position on the day laborer center as "bigoted."

Mr. Kilgore and the two lawmakers said that illegal aliens is an issue that is "constantly" brought up by voters.

Mr. Lingamfelter and Mr. Albo said they agree with Mr. Kaine that the federal government must take action on illegal aliens. The lawmakers also agree with Mr. Kilgore that all benefits should be yanked from companies that hire illegal workers.

TAX:

Defendant Maintains Anti-income Tax Stance (LVS)

By David Kihara, LAS VEGAS SUN

Las Vegas Sun, September 14, 2005

The defendant in a tax evasion trial that began on Tuesday said he is innocent of the charges against him because there is essentially no law that requires people to pay income tax.

In a rambling opening statement that brought at least seven objections from a Justice Department lawyer and just as many admonitions from U.S. District Judge Kent Dawson, Irwin Schiff also tried to discount his alleged influence, saying that doctors, lawyers and others wouldn't stop paying income taxes just because he told them to.

"In my view, there is no law requiring people to pay income tax," said Schiff, who is representing himself in the criminal case against him.

The trial is expected to last five weeks.

Schiff and fellow defendants Cynthia Neun and Lawrence Cohen are facing multiple criminal charges in U.S. District Court, including aiding and assisting others in filing false income tax returns, attempting to evade paying taxes and failing to file false returns, according to a March indictment.

The indictment charges that Schiff filed "zero return" tax forms, in which he would enter zeros in every line for expenses and income. Schiff, Neun and Cohen allegedly filed or helped file for people almost 5,000 "zero return" tax forms.

People would then make claims for a full refund of all federal taxes withheld or paid, the indictment stated.

During his opening statement, Schiff denied that he was involved in breaking any laws because he was unaware that any laws existed requiring people to pay income tax.

Unlike "universal laws" such as robbery, stealing or rape -- which someone from Taiwan would intrinsically understand -- taxes in the United States are different because someone would need to know they have an obligation to pay taxes, he said.

He also said that he never attempted to hide what he was doing, and that he is a high profile lecturer who had a local radio show and authored numerous books, including "The Great Income Tax Hoax" and "The Federal Mafia: How the Government Imposes and Unlawfully Collects Income Tax."

"The government knew what I was doing -- I didn't make it a secret," he said.

The Justice Department, however, said Schiff and the other defendants were involved in what amounted to a scam.

Jeffrey Neiman, attorney with the Justice Department's Tax Division, said the defendants would advertise the "zero return" tax returns as a way to not pay taxes and would sell people a $38 book explaining how to do it.

Neiman also conceded that the Internal Revenue Service also did not catch some of the "zero returns," and that Schiff held them up as proof that his method worked.

However, after clients or followers of the practice would get into trouble with the authorities, Schiff and others would continue to offer help by selling more merchandise from Schiff's business, Freedom Books, Neiman said.

Schiff could sell anything from $2 bumper stickers to $415 video and cassette seminars that offered ways for the people to get out of further tax troubles, he said.

From 1997 to 2002, Freedom Books generated gross business receipts of $3,726,000, the indictment stated.

"He encouraged thousands to file the zero returns," Neiman said.

The first witness called, Antoinette Mitchell, a former employee of Freedom Books, testified that she filed "zero return" taxes for about three years after hearing Schiff on a paid radio broadcast on AM 1230.

She eventually volunteered for Schiff because she wanted to be "close to what was going on, basically for the cause," she said.

Schiff paid her $10 an hour in cash, and she said she never received a W-2 or 1099 tax form.

The IRS eventually penalized her, she said, and she is facing a $17,000 lien on her home.

Neiman also accused Neun, Schiff's former girlfriend, of not reporting income she received from working at Freedom Books because she would have lost about $600 a month in Social Security benefits.

Nuen's attorney, Michael Cristalli, told jurors that the essence of his case is whether Neun believed whether Schiff's "teachings" were legitimate.

"Cindy sincerely does not believe that the government has legal authority to collect personal income tax," he said.

Cristalli framed Schiff's tax beliefs in almost religious terms and described some who followed Schiff, such as Neun, as willing to give up many things to practice his ideas.

"Her belief system ruined her" financially, emotionally and even hurt family relationships, he said.

"She sacrificed her life for this belief," he said, adding that Neun didn't seem like someone who was profiting from her belief system because she had so little.

Chad Bowers, attorney for Lawrence Cohen, also stated that his client believed in the "zero return" tax idea, that it was an expression of his beliefs.

However, Bowers also also tried to put a little distance between Cohen and Schiff and Nuen, saying that Cohen is not alleged to have shared in any of the profit from the Freedom Books venture.

"This plan was designed to overwhelm the IRS and make money," Bowers said. "That isn't going to be presented for Larry Cohen. Larry genuinely believes this."

'ZERO RETURN': Income Tax Foe's Trial Begins (LVRJ)

By CARRI GEER THEVENOT, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, September 14, 2005

Income-tax opponent Irwin Schiff delivered his opening statement to jurors Tuesday and promised to unravel "the greatest hoax ever perpetrated upon the American people."

"So fasten your seat belts," said Schiff, who is representing himself. "I hope you enjoy the ride."

Prosecutors began presenting evidence Tuesday against Schiff and two of his followers, Cynthia Neun and Lawrence Cohen, who are accused of conspiring to defraud the federal government.

"Nobody likes to pay taxes, but that's not what this case is about," Justice Department attorney Jeffrey Neiman told the jury.

Schiff, the 77-year-old owner of Freedom Books in Las Vegas, has made a career of teaching his customers how to avoid paying federal income tax.

He claims no law requires Americans to pay the tax, and he has written several books advocating his position.

Neiman said the main issue in the criminal case is: "What were the defendants aware of, and what were they told?"

The prosecutor said evidence will prove that the defendants knew the law and chose to violate it.

Neiman said Schiff's book, "The Federal Mafia: How the Government Illegally Imposes and Unlawfully Collects Income Taxes," provides details of his scheme, which involves instructing his customers to file a "zero return."

"As the name would suggest, the zero return has all zeroes," the prosecutor said.

A court order has prevented Schiff from selling "The Federal Mafia" since 2003.

Neiman said Schiff advised his customers to list zero income on their tax returns, regardless of whether they had received income.

Schiff also advised his customers to write down the amount of taxes withheld from their paychecks, then seek a refund for that amount, the prosecutor said.

"At first, when the IRS began receiving these, some slipped through the cracks, and some refunds were paid," Neiman said.

The prosecutor said Schiff used those refunds to support his position.

Another part of Schiff's scheme, Neiman said, involved advising employees to write "exempt" on their W-4 forms in an attempt to prevent their employers from withholding taxes.

"What the defendants didn't tell you was: Trouble was on its way," the prosecutor said.

When trouble came, Neiman said, the customers turned to Freedom Books for help. The help came in the form of more products "that the defendants knew would just ensure more trouble," he said.

The prosecutor said Schiff has sold millions of dollars worth of products, which ranged from a $2 bumper sticker to a $415 video and cassette seminar.

In a 2002 Review-Journal interview, Schiff said he had paid no income tax since 1973.

Schiff was indicted in 2004 and is accused of evading the payment of $1.3 million in taxes, penalties and interest between 1979 and 1985.

Neiman said some of Schiff's followers also have faced prosecution. Many have had to file for bankruptcy, and all have faced fines, the prosecutor said.

One woman, Toni Mitchell, testified for the government Tuesday under a grant of immunity.

Mitchell, a banquet food server at the Monte Carlo, said she followed Schiff's advice and filed zero returns for 1996, 1997 and 2000.

Mitchell said she began volunteering at Freedom Books in 2000 and later became a part-time employee.

Neiman said both Neun, Schiff's girlfriend, and Cohen, Schiff's top sales person, worked at Freedom Books and earned "decent hourly wages," which they received in cash.

"No paper trail, no documents, no W-2s," the prosecutor said.

All three defendants are accused of aiding and assisting in the preparation of false returns for helping customers file zero returns.

Neiman said Neun chose not to file a tax return for herself, because she knew it would jeopardize the $600 a month she received in Social Security benefits.

She is accused of failure to file tax returns, Social Security fraud and theft of government property.

Schiff began his opening statement Tuesday by telling jurors, "I hope you'll be patient with me while I'm fumbling along trying to be a lawyer."

His often-rambling statement was frequently interrupted by objections from Neiman, and U.S. District Judge Kent Dawson repeatedly instructed Schiff on how to deliver a proper opening statement.

Schiff told jurors the government must prove "that not only was the information false, but I didn't believe it."

"It's what I know, and I know I don't have to pay income taxes," the defendant said.

If authorities can point out a law that requires the payment of income taxes, Schiff said, "I'll plead guilty right now, and I'll save the court the expense of a trial."

"In 30 years of research, I never found a law that says I have to pay income tax," Schiff said.

He also said anybody who has followed his advice knows that he has spent time in prison.

Lawyers representing both Neun and Cohen said their clients acted in good faith.

Defense attorney Chad Bowers said Cohen's "only intent was to follow the law as he understands it."

Attorney Michael Cristalli, who represents Neun, said jurors must decide whether she believed Schiff's teachings were legitimate.

"If you believe that she believes it, you will not be able to convict her," Cristalli said.

The attorney said Neun did not profit from her beliefs. He said she received financial support from Schiff but never received payment for her work at Freedom Books.

Las Vegas Tax Rebel Goes On Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

Find Law, September 14, 2005

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-An author went on trial Tuewho claims that paying federal income taxes is voluntary sday on federal charges including tax evasion and aiding in the filing of fraudulent tax returns.

Irwin Schiff, author of "The Federal Mafia: How the Government Illegally Imposes and Unlawfully Collects Income Taxes," and two co-defendants are accused of causing hundreds of people to file false returns and promoting tax-evasion schemes through Schiff's business, Freedom Books.

Schiff, representing himself, said during opening statements that no law requires Americans to pay taxes and the federal court has no jurisdiction over the matter.

Schiff is accused of failing to report income on federal tax returns from 1987 to 2002, and of evading payment of $1.3 million in taxes, penalties and interest between 1979 and 1985. If convicted, he faces a maximum sentence of 43 years in prison and $3.25 million in fines.

Attorneys for co-defendants Cynthia Neun and Lawrence Cohen, who worked for Schiff, said their clients believed their conduct was legal.

Neun's lawyer, Michael Cristalli, said Neun followed Schiff's tax advice partly because of his powerful personality but also because she did not believe she was violating the law.

Cohen's lawyer, Chad Bowers, said there was no evidence his client intended to break the law.

If convicted, Neun could receive a 51-year sentence and $3.4 million in fines. Cohen faces a maximum 27 years and $1.5 million in fines.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

'Advise And Consent,' Anyone? (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Efforts to get an answer out of John G. Roberts were going nowhere at yesterday's Senate Judiciary Committee meeting, so Sen. Charles E. Schumer went Hollywood.

"Your failure to answer questions is confounding me," the New York Democrat fumed at the nominee for chief justice. "It's as if I asked you: 'What kind of movies do you like? Tell me two or three good movies.' And you say, 'I like movies with good acting.' Then I ask you if you like 'Casablanca,' and you respond by saying, 'Lots of people like "Casablanca." ' You tell me, 'It's widely settled that "Casablanca" is one of the great movies.' "

As the laughter at his expense subsided, the judge's smile shifted toward a smirk. Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) moved to call a recess, but Roberts asked if he could reply to Schumer.

" 'Dr. Zhivago' and 'North by Northwest,' " the nominee deadpanned. The crowd scored it another point for Roberts. Jane Roberts gave her husband a kiss. Schumer went outside to the cameras, where he observed, a bit wistfully, that Roberts "is a very, very smart man."

DOJ_NMG_0005737

In yesterday's second day of questioning Roberts, the confirmation hearing had lost much of what little suspense it had in the first place. The only speculation in the halls outside the hearing was how many, if any, Democrats on the committee would vote for Roberts en route to his all-but-certain confirmation.

On Tuesday, Jane Roberts was so confident about her husband's fate that she was seen dozing on camera as her husband answered questions. By yesterday, there was not much left in the way of either questions or answers. Roberts avoided any query on a topic that might come before the high court -- which is to say most any question senators wished to ask. The result: Democrats and Republicans alike used the bulk of their time for speechmaking.

The conservatives blew kisses to Roberts.

"I've never seen anyone do a better job," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah). "You have made a very, very strong presentation here.

Lindsey Graham (S.C.) called Roberts "the most qualified justice in my lifetime" and added: "Obviously, he's read every case ever written and memorized it."

Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.) dashed to the microphones during a break and shoved aside John Marshall, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Felix Frankfurter. Roberts, Cornyn said, is probably "the most qualified nominee who has ever been put up for a Supreme Court vacancy."

Awash in flattery, Roberts grew more brash in declining to answer the Democrats' questions.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (Calif.) observed that on Tuesday morning, "you were very full and forward-speaking. And then after lunch, it was as if you shut down and became very cautious. So my first question: Did anybody caution you between the morning and the afternoon sessions?"

"No, Senator," Roberts protested.

Feinstein knew she was just going through the motions. "I have another question I could ask, but you won't answer it," she said.

"Give it a try, Dianne," Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) encouraged. "Go ahead."

Feinstein, tentative, asked about "the right of a woman to decide whether to continue her pregnancy."

"Well, Senator, as I've explained, that is an area that's --" "Yes," Feinstein said, finishing his sentence, "apt to come before you."

With Republicans not inclined to grill Roberts and Democrats unable to pin him down, senators on both sides decided to do the talking themselves. In Hatch's 15 minutes of questioning, the senator spoke for 12 and left the nominee with three. When Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) took his turn, he used 15 of the 20 minutes and gave Roberts five. Sen. Joseph R. Biden (D-Del.) warned Roberts to give "short answers" and held the floor for 12 of his 20 minutes. Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who spoke 3,500 words, left Roberts time for 1,500.

It was, as Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) put it, "a lot of senator talk." Explained Kyl: "I think this is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. It is the only time that you'll have the opportunity to be directly lobbied in the political context in an appropriate way."

Brownback used his question time to digress into a discussion about an elevator operator in the Capitol who has Down syndrome. "He frequently gives me a hug in the elevator," Brownback said. "I know he hugs Senator Hatch often, too, who kindly gives him ties -- some of which I question the taste of, Orrin."

Hatch, wearing a loud blue-and-gold-striped tie, interjected: "It doesn't have to get personal."

Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) used his time to deliver an antiabortion speech. After this long message, Coburn asked, "Would you agree that the opposite of being dead is being alive?" After another monologue on his abortion views, Coburn said he wasn't even intending to ask a question about it. "That was for your information," he said.

Then Coburn went moved on to assert that he used his "medical skills of observation of body language" to ascertain whether Roberts was telling the truth. "And I will tell you that I am very pleased, both in my observational capabilities as a physician to know that your answers have been honest and forthright as I watch the rest of your body respond to the stress that you're under."

The body language was quite different on the Democratic side, where Biden gave Roberts the full Al Gore: While Roberts spoke, Biden shook his head, put his face in his hand, pouted and glared disgustedly. "We are rolling the dice with you, Judge," Biden said. "It's kind of interesting, this Kabuki dance we have in these hearings here, as if the public doesn't have a right to know what you think about fundamental issues facing them."

Biden kept talking. Graham rolled his eyes. Roberts explained that a fuller answer would be "inconsistent with the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court." The Kabuki continued.

Spinning In The Ring (WP)

By Marcia Davis

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

It's midmorning on the second day of questioning John G. Roberts Jr., President Bush's nominee for Supreme Court chief justice.

Things are going pretty much like the day before: Democrats are pressing Roberts on voting rights and issues of privacy (translation: Roe v. Wade), and Roberts is looking a little bit like a young Muhammad Ali dancing his way around the hearing room. He's drawn his judicial line about what he is going to say and what he isn't. Steam is rising from Democratic collars, and their Republican colleagues have all but grabbed Roberts's arm and thrown it up in victory. Yesterday, they'd almost stopped asking questions, opting instead for congratulatory speeches.

Don't be fooled, though. There are many rounds to go.

Any evidence you need is right outside the doors of Hearing Room 216 in the Hart office building. When Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) calls a 15-minute break, what was constrained tension inside the room explodes into the corridors.

This is spin city, where both sides jockey to get their word out to an American public preoccupied with Hurricane Katrina, the war in Iraq and gas prices that require second mortgages.

A bank of cameras lines one wall, and look, there's Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) in front of a row of mikes. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) is just behind him as Coburn voices his frustration with the Democrats, who he says just aren't giving Roberts a fair shot.

"We want judges who are well qualified. Ginsburg was confirmed with 96 votes. . . . I would hate to see a double standard," Coburn is saying.

A few feet away, Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way, the liberal organization that helped defeat the nomination of Robert Bork 18 years ago, is surrounded by reporters, too.

He's got a one-liner that he's working about Roberts, who in his introductory remarks on Monday likened the role of a judge to that of an umpire.

"He's spent his time talking about baseball, now he's playing dodgeball," Neas says, venting his frustration about the nominee. "I think the American people have a right to know the judicial philosophy of Judge Roberts."

Roberts, he says, is being disingenuous, too clever by half, giving answers about privacy, then quickly qualifying them so that they are only, well -- dodges.

Then a reporter listening to Neas is interrupted by a tug on the sleeve.

It's Greg Mueller, president of Creative Response Concepts, who's flacking for conservative groups the Federalist Society and the Judicial Confirmation Network.

"Hey," he says, with a nod in the opposite direction, with what will have to pass for a come-hither look. Mueller's operation has been working the hearing room and hallway like that all week. There are some viewpoints he wants to make sure don't get overlooked in this crowd.

Abigail Thernstrom, the conservative vice chair of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, is really annoyed at Ted Kennedy's persistent questions on voting rights.

No sooner than Thernstrom is done, Bethanie Swendsen, media coordinator for the Family Research Council, is introducing Tony Perkins. Perkins, president of the conservative group that would like to see Roe v. Wade overturned, says he's pleased with what he's been hearing from Roberts. He likes his philosophy and how he approaches the hearings.

"We're here making sure we're getting what we were promised," he says.

And what's that?

"A judge who practices judicial restraint. Roberts understands the limited role of the court."

"With all the media, these are high-stakes games," Mueller says. "And a little presidential politics are going on here."

"Hey, if Ralph Neas is having a mini-press conference, then we have to make sure that folks get to hear the other side," he says.

Julie Bernstein, communications director for the Alliance for Justice, is working just as hard, getting interviews for her boss, Nan Aron, who along with Neas and Wade Henderson of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, are well known activists working to oppose the nominations of conservative judges.

"Since seating is so restrictive, we try and connect reporters to leaders in the civil rights and women's rights communities so they can share their reactions with press," says Bernstein, who doesn't have a seat in the hearings. She has to watch it on television, then get on scene during the breaks.

Her boss is doing more than working the hall. Aron is meeting with senators and liberal groups that have come to lobby their representatives against Roberts.

Aron didn't get home until almost midnight Tuesday, she says, and was up yesterday by 4 a.m., getting ready for another day of the message wars.

Even the seating in the hearing room seems to be divided into camps, with Aron, Neas and allies such as Kim Gandy, of the National Organization for Women, and Debra Ness, of the National Partnership for Women & Families, on one side of the room. Thernstrom and others are seated across the aisle.

"What we do now will establish how they handle future nominations," Aron said of the Bush administration. "This is the time to send the White House a message. That helps frame [the debate for] filing the O'Connor seat."

Ding! That's the bell for the next round.

Roberts Parries Queries On Roe And End Of Life (NYT)

By Adam Liptak And Robin Toner

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Judge John G. Roberts Jr. faced increasingly contentious questions from Democrats on Wednesday as he outlined his views on an array of legal issues, but repeatedly declined to address some of the most ideologically charged matters, including whether the Constitution establishes a right to abortion and a right to die.

"I'm not standing for election," Judge Roberts said in one testy exchange on end-of-life issues on the third day of his confirmation hearings for chief justice of the United States. [Excerpts, Page A28.]

His refusal to elaborate on his statement that there is a constitutionally protected right to privacy drew criticism from Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, one of several Democrats on the Judiciary Committee who challenged him with growing frustration on Wednesday.

"Without any knowledge of your understanding of the law, because you will not share it with us," Mr. Biden said, "we are rolling the dice with you, Judge."

But Judge Roberts, by the end of a second long day of careful, unflappable testimony, appeared in comfortable position for a confirmation vote next Thursday in the Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee and, many Republicans predicted, a strong vote the following week in the full Senate, where Republicans have a 10-vote majority.

"If people can't vote for you," Senator Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, told Judge Roberts, "then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee."

Leading Democrats on the committee refused to discuss how they would vote, saying Judge Roberts's views were still largely unknown.

"The American people are entitled to answers," said Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts.

Judge Roberts did respond to questions on capital punishment, affirmative action, the limits of Congressional power and other legal issues during 10 hours of testimony before the committee's 18 senators.

He said, for instance, that he agreed with an aspect of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's decision in a recent case that allowed public colleges and universities to take race into account in admissions decisions. The decision took note of the practical consequences for minority applicants.

"You do need to look at the real-world impact in this area," Judge Roberts said.

He also discussed a Supreme Court death penalty case in which he filed a brief as a government lawyer in 1992. The brief said that newly discovered evidence of a death row inmate's innocence should not be considered by the courts if it is raised too late.

"Does the Constitution permit the execution of an innocent person?" asked Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont.

"I would think not," Judge Roberts said, adding later that the 1992 case did not involve DNA evidence that could provide categorical proof of innocence.

Also, while acknowledging that as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration he opposed a provision that made it easier to prove voting rights violations, Judge Roberts defended his position on the Voting Rights Act.

"It wasn't a dispute about the goal," he said. "It wasn't a dispute about the objective." He said that he now believed that the broader approach ultimately adopted by Congress was constitutional.

While most of the questions ran along party lines - friendly from the Republicans, decidedly less so from the Democrats - senators from both parties expressed frustration with and even hostility toward the current court. That left Judge Roberts in the uncomfortable position of trying to protect the reputation and prerogatives of the institution he hopes to join while appearing attentive to the concerns of those who will decide whether he can.

Over and over, Judge Roberts was questioned by senators in both parties about Roe v. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision recognizing a constitutional right to abortion. As on Tuesday, he refused to discuss his views on whether the case should be overruled. Under questioning from Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, he did say that no one in the Bush administration had asked him for his views on the case.

Judge Roberts listened carefully to questions touching on any area related to abortion and hesitated to answer many of them. He was noticeably suspicious, for instance, when Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, asked him, "Would you agree that the opposite of being dead is being alive?"

Judge Roberts paused and said, hesitantly and to laughter, "Yes," adding, "I don't mean to be overly cautious in answering it."

The line of questioning did indeed end at abortion, and Judge Roberts declined to answer direct questions concerning it.

Judge Roberts also declined to answer questions about his personal views on issues like assisted suicide.

"I'm trying to see your feelings as a man," Ms. Feinstein said. "I'm not asking you for a legal view."

But Judge Roberts resisted, saying that a judge's personal views and values should play no role in his judicial decisions.

He also declined to comment on Bush v. Gore, the 2000 decision that resolved the presidential election that year.

He was less reluctant to talk about his judicial philosophy, so long as the discussion remained relatively abstract. He distanced himself, for instance, from the most conservative members of the current Supreme Court, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, who have said they view themselves as bound by the original meaning of the Constitution.

"I depart from some views of original intent," Judge Roberts said, without naming names. "I think you need to look at the words they use," referring to the framers of the Constitution, "and if the words adopt a broader principle, it applies more broadly."

He added, "I think the framers, when they used broad language like 'liberty,' like 'due process,' like 'unreasonable' with respect to searches and seizures, they were crafting a document that they intended to apply in a meaningful way down the ages."

He similarly distanced himself from members of the court, including Justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Stephen G. Breyer, who have endorsed the citation of decisions from foreign courts in some cases. But Judge Roberts drew the line when Mr. Coburn suggested that Supreme Court justices who cite foreign judicial precedents in their decisions should be subject to impeachment.

Judge Roberts said he agreed that the citation of foreign law was "not a good approach." But, he added, "I wouldn't accuse judges or justices who disagree with that, though, of violating their oath."

In a somewhat similar vein, Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, asked Judge Roberts whether the Constitution authorizes Congress to limit the Supreme Court's jurisdiction to hear certain sorts of cases. Judge Roberts discussed the legal arguments on both sides of the question but suggested that he viewed any such efforts as unwise. "The primary check on the courts," he said, "has always been judicial self-restraint."

But Judge Roberts also said he was reluctant to pick too many fights with Congress, at least for now.

Mr. Coburn asked him, for instance, whether there was room for improvement in the clarity of the legislation Congress passes.

"Sitting where I am," Judge Roberts said, "I'm not terribly inclined to be critical of the Congress and wouldn't be, in any event."

Supporters of abortion rights remained wary of Judge Roberts. Planned Parenthood Federation of America formally announced its opposition to his nomination on Wednesday, saying Judge Roberts's record and testimony "leave grave doubt about whether he will protect, not take away, a woman's right to choose."

Most Democrats of the Judiciary Committee seem inclined to oppose the Roberts nomination, but it is still unclear how Democrats as a whole will vote. Republicans are all but challenging them not to vote for a jurist who is unquestionably qualified.

Ed Gillespie, the former Republican Party chairman who is overseeing the nomination on behalf of the White House, said, "If you apply the historical standard - is he intellectually qualified, is he ethically qualified, is he fair and even-handed, the standard that allowed Justice Scalia to get close to 100 votes and Justice Ginsburg to get close to 100 votes, then clearly Judge Roberts deserves to get close to 100 votes."

But some Democrats argue that times have changed, that the nation and the courts are far more ideologically divided than they were during those earlier nominations and that they have a right to know where Judge Roberts stands on some of the most divisive issues.

"There's so much water under the dam since then," Mrs. Feinstein said.

"The nation is divided, it's polarized, we're at war," she said, adding, "Executive authority is very much on people's minds."

Moreover, the prospect of another nomination - and how conservative he or she might be - is an unpredictable variable in any political calculation, many strategists said.

DOJ_NMG_0005741

Judge Roberts gave expansive answers, seeming most at ease when he was given the opportunity to explain the state of the law in complex areas like eminent domain and antitrust. He did not give much detail about his own views on these topics, but his discussion of the leading cases and governing principles was informal, confident and lucid.

After declining to answer any questions on Tuesday about charges that he had acted improperly in participating in a case earlier this year, he gave some basic information about it on Wednesday. The case concerned the military commissions the Bush administration intends to use to try several of those being held as enemy combatants at the naval base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. Judge Roberts joined a decision ruling for the administration in July.

Experts on legal ethics have been divided about whether Judge Roberts should have recused himself given that he was then under consideration for the Supreme Court. On Wednesday, Judge Roberts said that the decision was drafted before there was a Supreme Court vacancy and completed before he was first interviewed by President Bush.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, said that Judge Roberts's refusal to answer many questions had rendered the hearings absurd. Mr. Schumer suggested that Judge Roberts would not even name his favorite movies.

Judge Roberts named two: "Doctor Zhivago" and "North by Northwest."

Nominee Is Standing On Precedent, And Setting His Own, With Hearing Responses (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Time and again, as he has danced his way around questions on issues like the right to privacy and the right to die, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. has looked to the past, saying he is simply following the precedent of Supreme Court nominees who have come before him and will become his colleagues if he is confirmed.

But with a second vacancy on the court, Judge Roberts is also setting his own precedent for whomever comes next.

As President Bush's nominee to be the nation's 17th chief justice, Judge Roberts has carved out what Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, on Wednesday called "the Roberts standard," drawing the line against talking about cases that, in the judge's view, are likely to come before the Supreme Court.

"I think what he's trying to do," Mr. Graham said, "is to bootstrap himself to past justice's hearings, follow their lead, and trying to tell the next nominee: 'Where you can, speak.' "

But the nominee is not talking nearly enough to satisfy Democrats, and how he is interpreting his standard has become a major flashpoint in the hearings. On Wednesday, Democrats grew increasingly agitated over what they regarded as his repeated refusal to answer their questions. A coalition of civil rights and liberal advocacy groups, meanwhile, was making plans to run an Internet advertisement on Thursday spotlighting what they regarded as stonewalling by Judge Roberts.

In one particularly contentious exchange on Wednesday afternoon, Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, pressed Judge Roberts - who acknowledged a day earlier that the Constitution included a right to privacy - on the case of Lawrence v. Texas, in which the court found that the right to privacy provided a framework for protection of gay rights.

Mr. Schumer reminded Judge Roberts that Justice Clarence Thomas, who voted in the minority on the Lawrence case, had spoken at his own confirmation hearings of a general right to privacy. The two men went round and round on the issue, with Judge Roberts repeatedly declining to talk about Lawrence.

"Would you say there's a general right to privacy?" Mr. Schumer finally asked.

"I don't know what 'general' means," Judge Roberts replied.

Yet at times, the judge has surprised senators, as he did on Wednesday, when Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, asked if he agreed with an opinion in which Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said the court should give great weight to the "real world impact" of affirmative action in universities.

"Well, Senator," Judge Roberts replied, "I think I can answer the specific questions you asked, because, as you phrased the question - Do you agree with her that it's important to look at the real-world significance and impact? - and I can certainly say that I do think that that is the appropriate approach; without commenting on the outcome or the judgment in a particular case."

Judge Roberts has argued that he has been more forthcoming than some of his predecessors - an obvious reference to Justice Antonin Scalia, who declined even to answer questions about Marbury v. Madison, the fundamental 1803 decision that established the authority of the Supreme Court to strike down laws as unconstitutional.

Michael Gerhardt, a law professor at the University of North Carolina, said that Judge Roberts had indeed been more expansive than Justice Scalia, but not by much.

"I think there has been a spectrum," Professor Gerhardt said, "with Justice Scalia clearly being the least forthcoming of all modern nominees, post-1982 nominees, and I think Justices Breyer and Ginsburg have been among the most forthcoming nominees," referring to Justices Stephen G. Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsburg. He said Judge Roberts "is closest to what I would call the Scalia end of the spectrum."

DOJ_NMG_0005742

That delights Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, a conservative advocacy group. The next nominee can "follow his footsteps," Mr. Perkins said, adding, "If I were another nominee, I would carefully study his responses, the way he has handled questions."

Democrats and Republicans have kept tallies of the number of questions that Judge Roberts has answered. Republicans said he had declined to answer 57 of 477 questions, while Justice Ginsburg had declined to answer 59 of 275.

But Democrats say it is the substance, not the numbers, that is important. Justice Ginsburg's standard was to answer questions if she had either written about cases or taken a public position on them, though Democrats say in some cases she went beyond that. Judge Roberts has little trouble adhering to that standard because, having served on the United States Court of Appeals for just two years, he has a limited record.

Mr. Schumer said that was all the more reason for Judge Roberts to be forthcoming.

"I think he's answered fewer questions than most nominees, and his burden was greater than most nominees, because most nominees have a more extensive record," Mr. Schumer said, adding, "Just when they're needed to talk more, they talk less."

Roberts Heads Toward Likely Confirmation (BSUN)

By Gwyneth K. Shaw

The Baltimore Sun, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Pressed by senators on issues ranging from private property rights to the right to die, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. said Wednesday that he would not allow his personal views to creep into his work on the Supreme Court.

President Bush's nominee for chief justice declined, for the second day in a row, to lay out his views on issues that might come before the court. His reticence prompted annoyance from Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee, who complained that the 50-year-old appellate judge was talking a lot but saying little.

"Without any knowledge of your understanding of the law -- because you will not share it with us -- we are rolling the dice with you, Judge," said Democratic Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware.

Republicans defended Roberts' right to demur, saying previous nominees have done so.

Sen. Orrin G. Hatch told Roberts he was the best nominee he had seen in decades and that he looked forward to watching him in the chief justice's seat when the court begins its new term Oct. 3.

"We've seen some really sterling, brilliant, wonderful people before this committee. But I've never seen anybody who has done a better job of explaining himself than you have," said the Utah Republican. "If people can't vote for you, then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee."

A final, short round of questioning is set for Thursday morning, followed by testimony from more than two dozen outside witnesses, including former colleagues and conservative and liberal partisans.

Republicans hold a 10-8 advantage on the committee, which is expected to approve Roberts' nomination next week. Barring a major surprise, the Senate will confirm him as the nation's 17th chief justice this month.

Wednesday, senators returned to Roberts' interpretation of the right to privacy, with both sides looking for hints about how he might vote in abortion cases. The conversations wound up being mostly one-sided.

Biden asked about the ability of citizens to make decisions about ending their lives and encouraged Roberts to answer on a personal level. Roberts replied that judges should not bring their personal views into their decisions.

"I'm not going to consider issues like that in the context as a father or a husband, or anything else," Roberts said. "I think obviously putting aside any of those considerations, these issues are the most difficult we face as people and they are profoundly affected by views of individuality and moral views and deeply personal views."

Democratic Sen. Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont asked Roberts about the rights of death- row inmates to appeal their cases, pointing to the exoneration of a string of wrongfully convicted prisoners.

"Does the Constitution permit the execution of an innocent person?" Leahy asked.

"I would think not," Roberts replied. "But the question is never 'Do you allow the execution of an innocent person?' The question is 'Do you allow particular claimants to raise different claims, four or five or six times, to say at the last minute that somebody who just died was actually the person who committed the murder and let's have a new trial? Or do you take into account the proceedings that have already gone on?'"

Sen. Sam Brownback, a Kansas Republican, asked about one of the Supreme Court's most contentious recent decisions, in which the city of New London, Conn., was allowed to take private property and give it to another private entity for economic development.

Roberts said Congress and state legislatures have the power to pass laws barring such transactions. He would not say whether he thought the case was wrongly decided but did say the primary check on judges is their self-restraint.

"They're given life tenure, as you mentioned, precisely because they're not shaping policy. They're not supposed to be responsive; they're supposed to just interpret the law," Roberts said.

Democrats View Roberts As Evasive (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings And Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- White House hopes for Judge John Roberts to be confirmed as chief justice by a wide margin in the Senate grew dimmer yesterday, as Democrats complained that the nominee gave narrowly crafted responses or declined to answer questions about civil rights, privacy and other issues.

With Republicans holding a 10-vote Senate advantage, Judge Roberts is likely to be confirmed. But Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee have stepped up their accusations that he is being evasive, and will use that claim to lobby their colleagues to withhold their votes. Democrats argue that Judge Roberts's thin public record -- two years on the federal appeals court here, after two decades of private practice and service in Republican administrations -- is inadequate to gauge his approach to major legal issues.

No senator has announced plans to vote against Judge Roberts, and he has carefully avoided giving them any new substantive grounds for doing so during two full days of questioning. But some Democrats have stepped close to opposition. A confirmation vote, based on what legislators now know, would be like "rolling the dice with you, judge," Sen. Joseph Biden (D., Del.) told the nominee at one point yesterday, the second full day he faced questions by the panel.

Judge Roberts defended his decision not to answer all questions -- and insisted that he has been more forthcoming than some previous nominees who declined to discuss even long-settled landmark cases. But he said that speaking on issues he believed might return to the high court would be inappropriate, and suggested that some senators had crossed this line.

"This is not a process under which senators get to say, 'I want you to rule this way, this way and this way, and if you tell me you'll rule this way, this way and this way, I'll vote for you,' " he told Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.), perhaps the most aggressive questioner.

As a concession to Democrats, Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) agreed, over White House objections, to allow questioning to continue into this morning.

The Bush administration wants to pull in a substantial number of Democrats when the full Senate votes -- likely in two weeks -- on Judge Roberts, hoping that will give the president room to nominate a more openly conservative judge to fill the seat of retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

The political intensity heightened yesterday when a federal court in Sacramento, Calif., ruled that local authorities couldn't require teacher-led recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in public schools. The issue has outraged social conservatives, and was mentioned by several Republican senators during yesterday's hearing as evidence of improper judicial activism they hope Judge Roberts will halt. In his decision, the Sacramento judge wrote that the Supreme Court had given lower courts confusing guidance on religion cases.

Judge Roberts declined to comment on the case directly, but agreed that the Supreme Court should provide more clarity.

White House officials have hoped that Judge Roberts' résumé and gracious manner could persuade at least one or two Democrats on the panel, say people familiar with their strategy. But one of their prime targets, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D. Calif.), yesterday expressed frustration. In order to make a judgment on his nomination, "I do expect to know a little bit more about how you think," she said.

Despite Democratic complaints, Judge Roberts did give a few more glimpses of his views. After Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.) excoriated the high court's June decision that local governments enjoyed wide discretion in exercising their eminent-domain powers, Judge Roberts explained that the court had -- as lawmakers have demanded in other contexts -- deferred to the judgment of elected officials.

"The court was not saying you have...to exercise this power. What the court was saying is, there is this power, and then it's up to the legislature to determine whether it wants that to be available," Judge Roberts said. He didn't say whether he agreed with the ruling, but in response to Sen. Herb Kohl (D., Wis.) said it had "surprised" him.

Sen. Tom Coburn (R., Okla.) suggested that justices who cite foreign authority in interpreting constitutional provisions might deserve impeachment. Judge Roberts replied that while he disapproved of looking to foreign sources, "I wouldn't accuse judges or justices who disagree" of "violating their oath. I'd accuse them of getting it wrong on that point, and I'd hope to sit down with them and debate it and reason about it."

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.) asked Judge Roberts his views on government restrictions on media coverage. The judge said he had limited experience with First Amendment law, but said "there is obviously a balancing of sorts between particular interests when you're dealing with governmental operations, and there's some perfectly valid reasons for excluding media. On the other hand, simply disagreement about whether it's an appropriate issue for the public to see would not strike me as a very compelling governmental interest."

Responding to Sen. Feinstein, Judge Roberts seemed to accept affirmative action, saying he endorsed "efforts to ensure the full participation in all aspects of our society by people, without regard to their race, ethnicity, gender or religious beliefs," which he said was also the policy of the Reagan administration, where he worked on affirmative-action issues. He didn't say whether he specifically considered race-conscious affirmative-action programs constitutional.

Responding to Illinois Democrat Richard Durbin's questions on capital punishment, Judge Roberts acknowledged a "risk" of executing innocent people, because like any "human enterprise" the criminal justice system is flawed. But he also defended the goal -- over the objections of civil libertarians -- of limiting condemned inmates from raising repeated claims of innocence. "Do you allow someone who has raised several claims over the years to suddenly say at the last minute, somebody who just died was the person who committed the murder, and does that mean you start the trial all over again, simply on the basis of that last-minute claim, or do you require more of a showing at that stage?" he told Mr. Leahy at another point. As deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration, Judge Roberts helped persuade the Supreme Court to bar such an appeal. The high court will hear a case on a related issue in its coming term.

Roberts Displays More Moderate Views (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee John Roberts suggested Wednesday that his views on civil rights were more moderate than those he expressed during his days as a Reagan administration lawyer, and he hinted at a concern for gay men and lesbians who might face discrimination.

Roberts, 50, also described several principles that seemed to separate his legal views from those of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the high court's most conservative members. Roberts said he did not subscribe to a limited view of constitutional liberty, and he suggested that constitutional principles should evolve with the times.

That's a distinction from the views of Scalia and Thomas, who view the Constitution as a more rigid document. Their approach leads to a narrow interpretation of the constitutional guarantee of equality for racial minorities and women, provides no right to abortion and offers no particular protection for gay men and lesbians. The comments by Roberts — the federal judge President Bush has chosen to replace the late William Rehnquist as chief justice — were significant because Bush has said he wants court nominees like Scalia and Thomas.

Roberts' testimony Wednesday suggested that he might not be as conservative as Scalia or Thomas, and that his brand of conservatism could be more in line with that of Rehnquist, for whom Roberts once was a law clerk.

Whatever light Roberts shed on his legal views Wednesday, it wasn't enough for several Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee. For the second day, they were irked that Roberts refused to answer several questions on issues that he said might come before the high court.

“We are rolling the dice with you, judge,” Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., told Roberts after Biden failed to draw out the nominee's views on when someone can remove life support to an ailing relative. Even so, Roberts offered some insight into his philosophy:

·In response to questions from Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., Roberts said he could not address whether Congress could bar discrimination against gays and lesbians in employment because the question might come before the court. However, Roberts said, “Personally, I believe that everybody should be treated with dignity in this area and respect.”

·Roberts suggested to Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., that he did not believe federal voting rights laws should be weakened. In a lengthy give-and-take with Kennedy, Roberts distanced himself from a position he argued during the Reagan administration that would have limited protections in the Voting Rights Act intended to help blacks and Hispanics elect more of their own. Roberts said that if he were called upon to interpret the law or any amendments, “I would, of course, confront that issue as a judge and not as a staff attorney for an administration with a position.”

·He also said that when the Supreme Court upheld the use of affirmative action in college admissions in 2003, it rightly examined “the real-world impact in this area.” Without commenting on the ruling, he implicitly agreed with an approach used by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who cited the importance of fostering diversity on campuses.

·Roberts emphasized the need for competent lawyers to represent defendants who face capital punishment, to minimize the risk of executing the innocent.

·Roberts said dilemmas over the “right to die” and physician-assisted suicide are “the most difficult that we face as individuals.” He said a judge's job, however, is to set aside any personal feelings and look to the law.

DOJ_NMG_0005745

Roberts passed up opportunities to compare himself with current justices, and he declined to answer questions by Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., on how his view of privacy rights differs from Thomas'. Schumer noted that Thomas, like Roberts, had testified as a nominee that he believed in a constitutional right to privacy. As a justice, however, Thomas has not embraced the idea.

"I will be my own man on the Supreme Court, period," Roberts said.

Although the committee's eight Democrats have fired tough questions at Roberts this week, none has declared that they will not vote for him. Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., gave the judge high marks for his performance. "I don't think he's hurt himself," Kohl said.

Several of the panel's 10 Republicans, such as Jon Kyl of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, said they will back Roberts.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., wants a Senate vote on Roberts by the end of the month, so Roberts could join the court by the start of its term Oct. 3.

Roberts Appears Open To New Interpretations (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — Chief justice nominee John G. Roberts Jr. carefully avoided taking sides on many issues Wednesday, but he went out of his way at his Senate confirmation hearing to put some distance between himself and justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas — the Supreme Court's two staunchest conservatives.

And the issue was a basic one, with possibly great import for the future: How should a high court justice interpret the Constitution?

Scalia and Thomas proudly call themselves "originalists." They say the Constitution should be interpreted strictly, based on its literal words and its original history.

Like other conservatives, they shun the notion of a "living Constitution." They say their approach is faithful to the Constitution as it was written in 1787 and amended since then. Scalia says, only half-joking, that he believes in a "dead Constitution."

This look to the past leaves no room to consider such contemporary concepts as a right to die or equal rights for gays.

Roberts pointedly said Wednesday that he disagreed with this narrow originalist approach and would apply the Constitution in light of today's concerns and understandings.

"I depart from some views of original intent," he told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Words such as liberty or equality should not be given a "cramped or narrow construction," based on "just the conditions at the time" when the Constitution was written, he said.

"The framers chose broad terms, [with] a broad applicability, and they state a broad principle," he told Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the committee's chairman.

He noted that the preamble to the Constitution says the document was designed "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

"It applies to modern times," he said. The Founding Fathers intended the Constitution "to apply to changing conditions. And I think that in that sense, it is alive … and applies down through the ages," Roberts said.

It is certainly not clear how Roberts would decide controversies such as abortion rights, gay rights or the right to die. He repeatedly refused to state his view or comment on most past rulings on those disputes.

But his comments hint that he is at least open to a future decision saying the Constitution protects a right to die, or gives gays protection from discrimination.

Roberts also endorsed the 1965 decision in Griswold vs. Connecticut, which first spoke of a right to privacy in the Constitution. The ruling struck down an archaic state law that prohibited the use of contraceptives, but it has remained controversial because the right to privacy formed the basis for the Roe vs. Wade ruling in 1973, which established a woman's right to abortion.

Roberts said much during the two days of questioning that should reassure conservatives. He emphasized that the court has a "limited role" in deciding social controversies, and he insists judges should not "make law."

He also said the Constitution should be read in light of the "nation's history, traditions and practices."

And several conservative lawyers said Wednesday that they were not troubled by his comments about interpreting the Constitution.

"What I think Roberts was saying was that the framers were smart enough to take into account changes in circumstances," said Leonard Leo, executive vice president of the Federalist Society. "I don't read all that much into what he said."

DOJ_NMG_0005746

Leo added, "It's right to say he believes privacy is protected, and the language of the Constitution is broad enough to capture modern problems. But he would not take these broad principles and rewrite the Constitution."

Whether to focus on the past or the present often divides the Supreme Court.

Scalia has scoffed at the notion of a right to die and insisted the justices have no business even discussing such claims.

But most of his colleagues have taken a more flexible view of the nation's founding charter. When faced with the question of whether to maintain the death penalty for mentally retarded defendants, the majority barred such executions in 2002, saying this was "cruel and unusual punishment" in light of "evolving standards of decency" in America.

Scalia and Thomas dissented, along with the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist. They said such executions would not have troubled the authors of the Constitution, and therefore, they should not be deemed unconstitutional today.

Two years ago, in a victory for gay rights, the court struck down a Texas law that made sex between gays a crime. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, speaking for the majority, said the law violated the constitutional right to liberty in light of contemporary American values. Rehnquist, Scalia and Thomas dissented.

Scalia said he feared this evolving notion of liberty meant the high court would soon rule that gays had a constitutional right to marry, a prospect that has divided the nation.

The debate largely concerns a few words in the 14th Amendment, adopted in 1868, after the Civil War. It says states may not "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny [them] the equal protection of the laws."

Roberts said these words, read literally, might mean only that the government may not arrest and hold someone without giving them due process of law. He said he believed the protection for liberty went well beyond that interpretation and included protections for fundamental rights.

For example, Roberts cited the court's decision in 1925 that struck down a state law that required children to enroll in public schools. The justices said parents had the "personal liberty" to send their children to the school of their choice, including a private or parochial school.

As was the case when the committee began questioning Roberts on Tuesday, Democrats spent much of Wednesday's hearing trying to pin him down on issues such as abortion and civil rights. As he did Tuesday, he dodged most of their inquiries.

At one point, he refused even to answer whether a mentally competent dying person had a right to end his life. The Supreme Court answered that question in 1990. In the case of Nancy Cruzan, the justices agreed that all people have a right to refuse unwanted medical treatment.

The harder issue, in Cruzan's case as well as the recent one involving Terri Schiavo, arises when patients cannot speak for themselves.

Roberts refused to tip his hand. "There are cases involving disputes between people asserting their rights to terminate life, to remove feeding tubes, either on their own behalf or on behalf of others," he said.

"Those are issues that will come before the court, and I will confront those issues in light of the court's precedents with an open mind."

A Conservative, Yes, But Not A Scalia (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

After two days of often intense questioning of John G. Roberts Jr. by the Senate Judiciary Committee, a new image of President Bush's nominee for chief justice of the United States is coming into focus.

Still blurry at the edges, thanks to Roberts's refusal to declare how he would rule on abortion rights and other specific issues, it is nevertheless a picture of a conservative different in important respects from the two members of the Supreme Court whom Bush has said he most admires, Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

Scalia has said that courts should avoid basing their interpretations of laws on the history behind them; Roberts said there is a role for legislative history. Thomas has embraced an approach to constitutional interpretation that relies heavily on his view of the original intent of the framers; Roberts said that is not always possible.

Concretely, Roberts said he believes the Constitution creates a right to privacy. Such a right was recognized by the Supreme Court in modern cases protecting the use of contraception, abortion and consensual homosexual conduct, but which Scalia and Thomas have sharply criticized.

Asked by Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) if he considered himself "in the mold" of Scalia and Thomas, Roberts replied, "I will be my own man on the Supreme Court."

While the differences may seem like nuances, they are likely to play an important role at the court, especially because Roberts has been named to fill the chief justice's chair.

DOJ_NMG_0005747

As an eclectic legal thinker who can easily play at the same intellectual level as Scalia and Thomas, yet without employing the sharp rhetoric that Scalia especially is known to aim at colleagues, Roberts could exert a strong pull on the other justices -- particularly Anthony M. Kennedy, who, after Sandra Day O'Connor retires, probably will be left as the court's sole center-right swing voter.

Randy E. Barnett, a professor of law at Boston University and a leading thinker in conservative academic circles, likened Roberts to justices such as Felix Frankfurter and Robert H. Jackson, moderate conservatives appointed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt who "deferred to Congress, the executive and to legal precedent -- in some unspecified mix."

Roberts was perhaps most unlike Scalia and Thomas in his acknowledgment that the Constitution creates a right to privacy, even if such a right is not specifically spelled out.

Among the few cases he was willing to discuss specifically were a 1965 ruling, Griswold v. Connecticut , and a 1972 ruling, Eisenstadt v. Baird , which guaranteed a right to contraception use by married couples and singles.

Roberts said he agreed with the results of Griswold and Eisenstadt , noting that, in his view, privacy is part of the "liberty" that the 14th Amendment says cannot be taken away without due process of law.

Griswold and Eisenstadt formed part of the chain of precedents that led to Roe v. Wade in 1973.

In a 2003 case, Lawrence v. Texas , the court invoked this right to strike down all state laws banning consensual sex between same-sex couples.

Scalia has practically made a career out of attacking the court's past cases in which it has read specific "substantive" rights into the 14th Amendment's liberty clause. For him, and for many other conservatives, "substantive due process" is a contradiction in terms that gives judicial activists license to convert their own views into constitutional law.

Dissenting in Lawrence , he wrote disparagingly of Griswold and the "so-called right to privacy"; Thomas, agreeing with a dissenting justice in Griswold , said he could find no such right in the Constitution.

There is, however, a limit to the daylight between Scalia and Thomas, on the one hand, and Roberts on the other.

Roberts stopped well short of endorsing Roe -- or calling for its overruling -- in the hearings.

Social conservatives who support his nomination said they were generally comfortable with his testimony, which some said privately was what he had to say to help get confirmed. At the same time, it is also possible that Roberts will change his views once he is on the court.

As Schumer pointed out yesterday, Thomas gave a similar answer to Roberts on the right to privacy at his 1991 confirmation hearing, but struck a different note it in Lawrence .

Still, there was other evidence that Roberts, while he might or might not reach the same results as Scalia and Thomas, would approach cases in a different way.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) asked Roberts: "To what extent do you share Justice Scalia's view on unreliability of legislative history?"

Roberts replied that, though the interpretation of a law or the Constitution has to begin with the text, "I have quoted and looked to legislative history in the past to help determine the meaning of ambiguous terms, and I would expect to follow that same approach on the Supreme Court."

Whereas Scalia and Thomas often look to strict rules of statutory or constitutional interpretation to keep judges from taking over the legislative or executive function, Roberts repeatedly emphasized the restraining influence of what he called "the judicial process."

Harking back to concepts he learned at Harvard Law School, Roberts depicted judges deliberating within a kind of insulated environment in which the only materials they take into account are existing law, legal briefs, the case record and the views of other judges.

"It's basically an emphasis on legal craftsmanship," Barnett said. "You take a smidgen of history, a dollop of text, a spoonful of precedent and ladle it all over a very sensitive treatment of the facts and that yields a very high-quality product."

Roberts Says He's Been More Expansive Than Confirmed Justices (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman And Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Law.com, September 15, 2005

John Roberts Jr. moved into the second day of questioning before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday, with Democrats still complaining that the likely future chief justice remains too much of a cipher, and with GOP committee members stressing that Roberts has answered more questions than any other nominee.

"I do think I've been more expansive than most nominees, and those justices were confirmed," Roberts told Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz.

DOJ_NMG_0005748

The committee will wrap up questioning of Roberts on Thursday morning, then proceed directly to six panels of witnesses, who will speak for and against the nominee.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said late Wednesday that he would conclude the Roberts hearings on Thursday and set a committee vote on the nominee for Sept. 22.

As in his testimony on the previous day, Roberts was probed about his views on the Voting Rights Act, privacy and the judiciary's proper role in interpreting congressional statutes.

And as in Tuesday's performance, Roberts was loath to do more than outline in the broadest terms his view of how he would adjudicate certain issues, prompting a frustrated Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., to complain: "It's as if we ask you what movies you like, and you say, 'I like movies with good acting.' And if I ask you if you like 'Casablanca' and you tell me, 'Lots of people like 'Casablanca.'"

"'Doctor Zhivago' and 'North by Northwest,'" Roberts shot back.

It was a rare moment of humor in an all-day hearing during which Democrats appeared increasingly outgunned by an unperturbable witness. One chief counsel for a committee Republican noted the reams of paperwork being passed between staff and the panel's 18 members and remarked, "Roberts has just got all this stuff in his head."

Indeed, by the end of the day, the most interesting question was not whether Roberts would win confirmation, but whether he would secure any Democratic votes in the process.

Earlier in the day, in some of the week's most heated testimony, Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., bored into Roberts in an effort to elicit his views on whether a state legislature should have the right to pass laws restricting the right of a dying person's next of kin to remove a feeding tube, evoking the Terri Schiavo case.

"You are one of the best witnesses to come before this committee, and I've been here some 30 years," said Biden, who had been chided by Specter the day before for repeatedly interrupting Roberts' testimony. "You've convinced folks on Sen. [Sam] Brownback's side that you are just right for them, and on Sen. [Edward] Kennedy's that you are just right for them," he added, referring to one of the committee's most conservative members and one of its most liberal.

"Can any law trump a fundamental right to die?" Biden asked the nominee.

Roberts replied that his personal views would not enter into his decision-making on the issue and that he would decide a question like that "based on my understanding of the law."

"That's what I want to know about," retorted Biden. "We're rolling the dice with you, Judge."

Roberts, however, who has yet to show any flashes of anger, and only the rarest moments of irritation, refused to give a direct answer. "Senator, that's asking me for an opinion in the abstract that will come before the Court," he replied.

After Biden noted that executive and legislative branch candidates must lay out their views on various issues, while judicial candidates can keep theirs to themselves, Roberts launched into a vigorous defense of judicial independence.

It was no accident that federal judges don't stand for election, Roberts said, adding that to make pledges in a confirmation hearing would violate their role as open-minded and fair arbiters of legal disputes. "It is contrary to the role of the judge in our society that this judge should go on the bench because this is his or her position," said Roberts. "That's inconsistent with the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court."

So far, the three days of hearings have been marked by Roberts' disarming manner, which allows him to repeatedly turn down senators' requests for answers yet maintain what appears to be a large reservoir of good will among the entire committee.

While Roberts insisted he had been "more expansive" than other nominees, he largely stuck to his views on cases, such as 1803's Marbury v. Madison, that are unlikely to be reconsidered by the Court. But then again, in 1986, then-nominee Antonin Scalia would not even comment on Marbury.

But the 50-year-old federal appeals court judge did surrender a few pieces of information on Wednesday, in particular his views on the high court's proclivity to produce decisions with several concurring opinions.

Specter said he was troubled by the Court's decisions in June 2004 over the detainees at Guantánamo Bay, calling the opinions "a patchwork of confusion." In response, Roberts seemed to almost startle the committee by implying that too many separate opinions were not a good thing.

"The Supreme Court speaks only as a court," he said. "Individually, the justices have no authority... . [A]n important function of the Supreme Court is to provide guidance. As a lower court judge, I appreciate clear guidance from the Supreme Court."

And Roberts offered other comments Wednesday that could signal a different approach from Scalia and other conservative legal thinkers. "I depart from some views of the original intent" movement, Roberts said.

Originalists, he suggested, believe the Constitution should be interpreted in light of "just the conditions at that time, just the particular problem" at the time of the Constitution's drafting. "I think you need to look at the words they used, and if the words adopt a broader principle, it applies more broadly," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0005749

When principles like liberty are involved, Roberts said, "that doesn't get a narrow construction." A broad view of the liberty concept could have implications for Roberts' views on privacy, abortion, and the right to die.

Looking More Moderate Than His Early Writings (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — Chief justice nominee John G. Roberts Jr. offered a fuller accounting of his views on voting rights and affirmative action Wednesday in carefully guarded testimony that provided the barest hints that he did not hew to the most conservative positions on the two sensitive issues.

Under relentless and occasionally sharp interrogation before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Roberts also emphasized a modest approach to judicial action and a deference to Congress.

Panel members pressed him for his views on a series of controversial cases and social issues, searching for clues about how he would affect the Supreme Court's ideological balance.

Although his comments leaned toward a more moderate position than the views expressed in some of his writings as a Justice Department lawyer in the Reagan administration, they were so sparse and cautiously phrased that they sparked protests from Democrats about his refusal to be more forthcoming.

Roberts declined to discuss his views on whether the Constitution allowed terminally ill people to end their lives — even though the Supreme Court ruled that it did more than a decade ago.

And he declined to say whether he agreed with a high court ruling that limited the rights of death row inmates to appeal their convictions based on newly discovered evidence that might prove them innocent.

In the absence of answers, many panel members resorted to a kind of lobbying effort, seeking to impress upon Roberts their views of the law — opinions he might consider if, as expected, he wins Senate confirmation to lead the court.

"I hope, sitting in the marble palace, you'll remember that I have great pride in the success of the False Claims Act," Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) told Roberts. He made his remarks after trying, mostly unsuccessfully, to learn more about what Roberts thought about a federal whistle-blower law Grassley sponsored that allows private individuals to sue in cases of government fraud.

A day after Democrats grilled Roberts over whether he would overturn high court rulings guaranteeing abortion rights — to no avail — antiabortion Republicans seized an opportunity to make their case, admittedly with little, if any, expectation of a response.

"I would just ask you, Judge Roberts, to consider — and probably you can't answer here today — whether individuals with disabilities have the same constitutional rights that you and I share while they're in the womb," Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) said.

"I appreciate your thoughts on the subject very much," Roberts said. But he declined to answer, saying: "Those precise questions could come before the courts."

Despite Roberts' reticence on several fronts, a somewhat more complete portrait of the 50-year-old federal appeals court judge and former Reagan administration lawyer emerged. At times, his newly expressed views seemed at odds with those contained in the thousands of pages of memos and musings he wrote as a government lawyer two decades ago.

Pressed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Roberts said he saw nothing "constitutionally suspect" in a provision of the Voting Rights Act that he had raised questions about in the early 1980s. The provision makes it possible for minorities to win voting rights cases without proving intentional discrimination by election officials.

His position on the rights law — a portion of which is set to expire in 2007 — is a central concern to Democrats wary that as chief justice, he would promote rigidly conservative views on civil rights.

Roberts expressed support for portions of a 2003 opinion by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor upholding the rights of state universities to consider race in making admission decisions. Roberts said it was proper for the court to take note of the positive effect of racial and ethnic diversity in the military when it upheld an admissions policy at the University of Michigan Law School.

"You do need to look at the real-world impact in this area," Roberts said.

Roberts gave what Republican members of the panel interpreted as signals that he would be more deferential to the power of Congress to enact laws without being second-guessed by an activist judiciary.

He said it would be appropriate for state and local lawmakers to pass legislation to lessen the effect of a Supreme Court ruling in June that took an expansive view of the right of the government to seize private property.

As Roberts concluded his second day of taking questions from senators, he appeared on track to win confirmation from the GOP-controlled committee. The panel is expected to conclude its questioning of Roberts today.

Several of the Republican committee members expressed effusive support for the nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0005750

"If people can' t vote for you, then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee," Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) said.

The Judiciary Committee chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), told reporters that Roberts had "answered more questions than most."

"Nominees answer about as many questions as they think they have to to be confirmed," Specter said.

But it remained uncertain how Democrats — either on the committee or in the full Senate — would vote on Roberts.

Several Democrats on the panel made it clear they were not persuaded that Roberts could set aside his political views and rule impartially on the court.

At the same time, they acknowledged privately that it was hard to quarrel with his credentials.

Republicans on the committee have pointed out that they set aside partisan differences in 1993 to vote overwhelmingly in favor of President Clinton's high court nominee — Ruth Bader Ginsburg, a former legal counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union. They argue that the opposition should return the courtesy and confirm the choice President Bush has made.

But Democrats say the country is more deeply divided now than it was then, and that the stakes are higher.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said that in the last 10 years, nearly 200 cases had been decided by a single vote, "which suggests that on major questions the court is also very divided."

Feinstein said that she supported Roberts' confirmation to the federal appeals court in Washington in 2003. "But there's more [at stake] in this vote," she said.

Other Democrats indicated they also would have problems supporting Roberts.

"We are rolling the dice with you, judge," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said after Roberts declined to say whether he believed terminally ill people had a right to discontinue life-preserving treatment.

Roberts responded that he should not have to answer such questions, and that it would be dangerous if the process of selecting judges turned on promises that nominees made to elected officials.

"Judges don't stand for election. I'm not standing for election," he said.

But Biden said the judge was missing the point.

"No one's asking for a promise," he said.

Roberts Vows To Seek Consensus (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, September 15, 2005

U.S. Chief Justice nominee John Roberts said on Wednesday that if confirmed by the Senate he would seek consensus on the often bitterly divided Supreme Court that has spawned frustration with a series of 5-4 rulings.

Roberts, President George W. Bush's nominee to replace the late Chief Justice William Rehnquist, made the pledge as Democrats complained he had dodged many questions in two days of his confirmation hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"When you add it all up you are being less forthcoming ... with this committee than just about any other person who has come before us," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), a New York Democrat.

Roberts, a conservative federal appeals court judge, calmly countered the complaint as he appeared headed toward confirmation by the Republican-led Senate before the court begins its new term on October 3.

"I wanted to be able to share as much as I can with the committee," he said.

The hearing, which began on Monday, recessed on Wednesday night, and was to resume early Thursday for a possible final day.

Besides his vow to seek consensus on the high court, Roberts has promised to address each case with an open mind and a strict interpretation of the Constitution and to safeguard the rights of all Americans.

But he refused to discuss a number of specific matters -- from voting rights to gender bias -- saying such issues may come before him on the court. He has said like earlier nominees, he did not want to prejudge them.

For example, Roberts declined to say if he favors reversing the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion, but said the Constitution affords Americans the right to privacy, the key legal underpinning of the landmark ruling.

Sen. Joseph Biden (news, bio, voting record), a Delaware Democrat, complained that Roberts' answers were so vague that both Republicans and Democrats thought he agreed with them.

"Without any knowledge of your understanding of the law, because you will not share it with us, we are rolling the dice with you, judge," Biden said.

Chairman Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, said the Senate knows a lot about Roberts, 50, who was one of the nation's top lawyers and served in the Reagan and first Bush administrations.

DOJ_NMG_0005751

Specter asked Roberts what he would do to address what many lawmakers and state and local officials across the country claim is a tendency by the nine-member high court to produce often conflicting 5-4 decisions in recent years.

"I do think the chief justice has a particular obligation to try to achieve consensus consistent with everyone's individual oath to uphold the Constitution, and that would certainly be a priority for me if I were confirmed," Roberts said.

The court has been closely divided on issues including church-state separation and the death penalty. It has at times issued rulings that appeared to be at odds and based on narrow distinctions that failed to give broad legal principles.

"An important function of the Supreme Court is to provide guidance," said Roberts. "As a lower court judge, I appreciate clear guidance from the Supreme Court."

As he was testifying, a California atheist who last year lost a Supreme Court fight to remove the phrase "under God" from the Pledge of Allegiance won an initial round as he revived the case in the courts.

While not commenting because the case could again be before the high court, Roberts said: "I think everyone would agree that the religion jurisprudence under the First Amendment, the establishment clause and the free exercise clause, could be clearer."

Though Democrats have challenged Roberts' commitment to civil rights and women's rights, based largely on memos he wrote as a young lawyer in the Reagan administration, Republicans control the Senate, holding 55 of 100 seats. A simple majority is needed to confirm him.

Roberts said his memos reflected the policies of a conservative administration that approached such issues differently from liberal critics.

"I would resist the suggestion that I'm racially insensitive," Roberts said. "I know why the phrase, 'Equal Justice Under Law' is carved in marble above the Supreme Court entrance."

Roberts Frustrates Committee Democrats (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jo Becker

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Democratic senators angrily accused John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday of hiding his views on end-of-life questions, privacy and other contentious issues, but the nominee to be the nation's 17th chief justice refused to be drawn out, and his Republican supporters said his confirmation is virtually assured.

Democrats' frustration boiled over several times during the eight hours of questioning, as Roberts repeatedly declined to discuss his personal or judicial views on matters that he said could come before the court someday. Senators implored him to speak from the heart, but Roberts told them time and again that he would be guided by "the rule of law."

"We are rolling the dice with you, Judge," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) said. "It's kind of interesting, this Kabuki dance we have in these hearings here, as if the public doesn't have a right to know what you think about fundamental issues facing them."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) accused Roberts of treating the hearing room as a "cone of silence." "It seems strange, I think, to the American people that you can't talk about decided cases -- past cases, not future cases -- when you've been nominated to the most important job in the federal judiciary," the senator said.

Roberts asked for extra time to defend himself. "I think I have been more forthcoming than any of the other nominees," said Roberts, who had reviewed the confirmation hearing testimony of all the sitting Supreme Court justices in preparation for his hearing. "It is not a process under which senators get to say: 'I want you to rule this way, this way and this way. And if you tell me you'll rule this way, this way and this way, I'll vote for you.' Judges are not politicians. They cannot promise to do certain things in exchange for votes."

But Republican Arlen Specter (Pa.), the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, also expressed irritation when Roberts refused to answer questions about several Supreme Court decisions striking down laws passed by Congress to help the disabled and victims of domestic violence. "Why not?" Specter asked sharply. "Judge Roberts, I'm not talking about an issue. I'm talking about the essence of jurisprudence."

But several Republicans defended Roberts's circumscribed answers for a second straight day and began congratulating him as though he were already on the court. As a sign of their confidence, Republican senators ended their questions late yesterday but agreed to let Democrats have another round today, and then conclude the day with testimony from outside witnesses. The committee plans to vote on the nomination Sept. 22. The full Senate will vote by the month's end, leaders said.

If Democrats will not support Roberts, said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), they will not endorse any GOP nominee. "They all admit that he is qualified," Hatch said in an interview. "So if they vote against him, it just means they are playing partisan politics and they'll look like hell."

Liberal activists privately said they would consider it a moral victory if all eight committee Democrats oppose Roberts, noting that the 10 Republicans are widely expected to back him. With Republicans holding 55 of the Senate's 100 seats -- and Democrats ruling out a filibuster -- his confirmation is highly likely, activists on both sides said.

In frequently emotional terms, Democrats pressed Roberts to discuss the government's proper role in determining when and how doctors and families can allow a terminally ill or severely incapacitated person to die. "Just talk to me as a father," Biden said. "Just tell me, just philosophically, what do you think?"

Roberts replied, "I'm not going to consider issues like that in the context as a father or a husband or anything else." He could not tell the panel how the law would guide him, he said, because "those are issues that come before the court."

Later, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) tried again. "I'm trying to see your feelings as a man," she said, adding that she had to make wrenching end-of-life decisions about her father and her husband. Roberts told her, "it is difficult to put yourself in that position."

"All I'm saying is, you wouldn't want the government telling you what to do," Feinstein said. Roberts replied: "Well, I'm happy to say that as a general matter." But when asked if there "should be a basic right of privacy" involved, he said: "Well, that's getting into a legal question."

Roberts testified that he believes it would be "very appropriate" for Congress and state legislatures to consider legislation to effectively modify a recent Supreme Court ruling that expanded the right of local governments to force the sale of private property in the name of economic development. "What the court was saying is 'There is this power' and then it's up to the legislature to determine whether it wants that to be available," Roberts said. "You can protect" people's rights, he added.

Roberts was pressed about a death-penalty position he took during his 1989-1993 tenure as deputy U.S. solicitor general. Roberts had argued that death row inmates have no constitutional right to ask federal courts to consider a new claim of innocence. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) asked if he still holds that view.

Roberts replied, "The question is: Do you allow someone who has raised several claims over the years to suddenly say at the last minute that somebody who just died was the person who committed the murder?"

Throughout two days of questions and answers, Roberts has offered few details about his life. But the Indiana native, who attended a private high school and graduated at the top of his class as a Harvard undergraduate and law student, grew animated when Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) asked whether he understood there were real people behind the legal precedents, "families behind footnotes." "What would the powerless, the disenfranchised, minorities and others see in your life experience that would lead them to believe that they would have a fighting chance in your court?" Durbin asked.

Roberts said his life has been comfortable but "isolated in no sense." Critics, he said, should consider the clients he represented: death row inmates and corporations, welfare recipients and environmental groups.

On the issue of abortion, Roberts declined to answer a Republican's question whether a fetus is a person or property. On Tuesday, Roberts said there is a constitutional right to privacy, but yesterday he refused to say whether he agrees with Justice Clarence Thomas, who has written that there is no "general right to privacy." Such a right is considered the legal underpinning of a right to abortion.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) returned to civil rights, disputing Roberts's contention that memos he wrote as a young administration lawyer did not necessarily reflect his own views but rather reflected those of the administration he served.

Questioned by Republicans, Roberts agreed that the Supreme Court should clarify its rulings on public expressions of religious faith. "I think everyone would agree that the religion jurisprudence under the First Amendment, the establishment clause and the free-exercise clause, could be clearer," he said. And as chief justice, he said, he would work to unite a court that has been sharply divided on many major issues.

For Roberts, Path To High Court Splits Candor, Caution (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - As one of the most respected advocates practicing before the US Supreme Court, John Roberts held that a good lawyer should be able to argue either side of a case.

Now he's using a variation of that same strategy and all the skills he honed under intense High Court questioning to try to win Senate confirmation as the 17th chief justice of the United States.

His plan: reveal just enough information about his approach to judging to convince the senators of his integrity and constitutional expertise - but not enough to permit someone to forecast how he might vote once on the high court.

Roberts isn't just fighting for himself. If he is successful in holding that line he will help set the stage for the president's next high court nominee - the pick that will replace centrist Justice Sandra Day O'Connor and potentially swing the court to the right.

DOJ_NMG_0005753

So far, Roberts has fended off, dodged, and sidestepped his way through a gauntlet of Senate Judiciary Committee questions involving the abortion precedent Roe v. Wade, efforts to strike down congressional enactments under the commerce clause, and the president's power to wage war independent of congressional guidance.

The bottom line: Senators - and the American public - are learning precious little about which way Roberts is likely rule as the nation's most powerful judge.

To Roberts, refusing to reveal how he might rule is important because in his view it upholds the special role of unelected, life-tenure judges in a representative democracy.

"It's based on the concern that the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court depend upon justices who will decide issues there with an open mind based on the judicial decisional process, not based on prior commitments they made during the nomination hearing," Roberts told the committee.

"All the justices have adhered to that approach," he says. "And if I'm to join their number, I need to be able to look them in the eye in the conference room and say I kept the same faith with the independence and integrity of this court."

That's the view of a judge and prospective chief justice.

But the issue looks a bit different from a seat in the US Senate, particularly on the Democratic side of the aisle, with constituents worried about threats to the abortion precedent and broad court rulings upholding civil rights.

While discussing constitutional precedents, Roberts frequently highlights both sides of the issue, leaving senators to guess which side of the argument he personally favors.

"He is doing a delicate dance trying to please everyone," says Nan Aron, president of the Alliance for Justice, which opposes the Roberts nomination. "At the end of the day people are going to walk out of this hearing room being uncomfortable."

Ms. Aron, a well-known watchdog of the judicial selection process, says Clinton high court nominees Justices Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer were both more forthcoming than Roberts during their confirmation hearings. While many liberals are worried about Roberts's lack of candor, some conservatives seem pleased, even reassured by his cautious approach.

"We are not concerned," says Andrea Sheldon Lafferty, executive director of the Traditional Values Coalition. "We are looking for a jurist who will faithfully interpret the Constitution. We are not asking for someone who is pro-life."

Ms. Lafferty adds, "We believe he will be an honest jurist."

Roberts was repeatedly asked about his vigorous defense of White House power while serving as a lawyer in the Reagan administration. And more recently, he was a member of a three-judge appeals court panel that upheld the Bush administration's position on military tribunals for Al Qaeda suspects.

In reply, Roberts told the senator that one of the former Supreme Court justices he most admires is Robert Jackson. Justice Jackson was an advocate for White House power as President Franklin D. Roosevelt's attorney general before his nomination to the high court.

But in 1952, Justice Jackson voted to rein in presidential authority in invalidating President Truman's attempt to take over steel mills during the Korean conflict.

"Although he had strong views as attorney general, he recognized when he became a member of the Supreme Court that his job had changed," Roberts says.

The drawback of being such a gifted advocate is that it is sometimes difficult for observers to know when he is merely acting as an effective lawyer fighting to win a case and when he is speaking from the heart.

But there are moments during the hearing that point to the "real" John Roberts, and perhaps even the judge he is striving to become.

One of those moments came when he recalled one of his judicial mentors, Judge Henry Friendly who served on the federal appeals court in New York City.

"With Judge Friendly, it was just a total devotion to the rule of law and the confidence that if you just worked hard enough at it, you'd come up with the right answers," Roberts says.

"He liked the fact that the editorialists of the day couldn't decide whether he was a liberal or a conservative."

What the editorial writers failed to understand, Roberts says, is "he wasn't adhering to a political ideology, he was adhering to the rule of law."

Nominee Sails Through Second Day Of Questions (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Chief-justice nominee John Roberts sailed through a second day of inquiries from the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday, leaving some lawmakers and analysts to wonder whether President Bush's pick to fill a second Supreme Court vacancy will be able to measure up.

The full Senate could take up the nomination as early as the end of next week, according to Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn).

"Can't rule it out. Things are going well in committee," Ueland said in an e-mail.

Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and ranking Democrat Patrick Leahy (Vt.) indicated the committee will have its executive session, to vote on Roberts, next Thursday.

Republicans have given up their right to a third round of questioning, but Democrats will go ahead. Kennedy is scheduled for this morning.

As he had Monday, the 50-year-old Roberts fielded and at times sidestepped questions with poise and humor, even as Democratic Senate heavyweights Joseph Biden (Del.) and Edward Kennedy (Mass.) pressed him repeatedly on civil rights and whether people have a right to determine when they die.

Some wondered if Roberts's composure and ability to establish his own framework for which questions to answer and which to avoid will set an artificially high bar for the next nominee.

"The next candidate's going to have a real job," said Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.), who watched the proceedings briefly.

Jeff Peck, a former Judiciary Committee general counsel and staff director under Biden and a partner at the Washington lobbying firm Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland and Stewart, agreed, saying, "On style points and on substance points, the next nominee's going to be in for a tough road."

Democrats again expressed exasperation at Roberts's refusal to detail how he would rule in specific cases or to reveal his personal views on many issues.

Without such answers, Biden charged, "We are rolling the dice with you, judge."

Late in the day, Roberts repeated his refrain to Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) that "judges are not politicians" and thus not in a position to make promises in exchange for votes.

With testimony from others still to come today, Roberts appears to be all but assured of committee approval and confirmation. No Republican senator has announced opposition to Roberts, and many Democrats have said they are reserving judgment.

Roberts, a judge only since 2003, has a short record as a jurist and has characterized his writings as a lawyer in Republican administrations as those of an aide responsible for backing the administration's policy. GOP supporters said potential Democratic opponents had little substantive ground on which to attack him.

"What's the biggest crime he's been accused of?" asked Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a member of the Judiciary Committee. "Working for Ronald Reagan."

Rather than criticizing Roberts for what he has said, liberal opponents have been left to attack him for playing "dodge ball," as People For the American Way did on its website yesterday.

"He really didn't tell us anything," said Ralph G. Neas, president of the group. Rather than predicting Roberts's defeat, Neas, known for his aggressive opposition to conservative nominees to the high court, has said only that he expects close votes in committee and on the floor.

The two sides are gearing up for Bush's nomination of an associate justice to replace Sandra Day O'Connor, who is retiring and has been a swing vote on the closely divided court.

"Who knows what the president will do with the O'Connor seat, but clearly that is one where the balance of the court on so many critical issues will be in play," Peck said.

Former Republican National Committee Chairman Ed Gillespie, assigned by the White House to help guide Roberts through the process, predicted that the largely civil tone of the Roberts confirmation hearings would extend to Bush's next choice.

"What you've seen here is going to play out again in the next round," Gillespie said in a hallway outside the hearing room.

But Specter, a centrist who has been praised by more conservative colleagues for his conduct of the hearings, was more circumspect when asked whether the second nominee would get the same treatment from the panel.

"If you tell me who the next nominee is, I'll give you an answer," Specter said.

For some observers, the central question remaining about the Roberts nomination is how many Democrats will vote against him.

Democrats Dissect Memos From 1980s (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

As Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee try to cast doubt on whether John G. Roberts Jr. deserves to become chief justice of the United States, the main club they are wielding are his own words -- as glimpsed in memos he wrote, as a young but well-positioned legal adviser inside the Reagan revolution, on the most polarizing civil rights issues of a generation ago.

For two days, the Democrats have read excerpts -- and at times even handed the nominee copies of his own work -- on voting rights, sex discrimination, affirmative action, racial bias, and the possibility of stripping the Supreme Court of jurisdiction over certain kinds of rights cases.

To try to blunt the impact of this document assault, Roberts has employed a two-pronged strategy: He has asserted that his words and legal reasoning were merely those of a staff lawyer. And he has largely refused to embrace or disavow the views his memos espouse.

In response, as Roberts's confirmation hearings went through a third day, Democrats and their allies among liberal advocacy groups loudly contended that the memos provide a more revealing window onto the nominee's true beliefs than his testimony suggests. "He was an advocate," the Senate's most enduring liberal, Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), said in an interview. "You can't read through those memoranda and not understand that he had a very strong commitment" to conservative values.

The centrality of Roberts's decades-old words to the minority party's strategy makes clear why Democrats worked intensely -- and with limited success -- this summer to pry loose all the nominee's records from his tenure in two Republican administrations. Roberts worked as a special assistant to then-Attorney General William French Smith in 1981 and 1982, then spent four years in the White House counsel's office. He returned to the government in 1989, as deputy solicitor general under President George H.W. Bush.

Lacking papers from his solicitor general's years -- the current Bush administration has refused to release them -- and with a thin record of rulings from Roberts's two years as a federal appellate judge, Democrats are drawing their ammunition from the early Reagan era.

Those were tempestuous years on civil rights, as the conservatives who had entered the government tried to curtail use of the courts to remedy discrimination. "They were flipping the script with respect to whose interests they were going to protect," said Theodore M. Shaw, president of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, which is opposing Roberts. "He was in the thick of it."

During the past two days, some of the most extensive questioning of Roberts's memos stems from his work on voting rights. In 1982, following a Supreme Court ruling two years earlier, Congress altered the Voting Rights Act to make clear that the law prohibited voting practices that had the effect of denying any groups the ability to elect candidates of their choice, regardless of whether the practices were specifically intended to have that effect. During Roberts's time in the attorney general's office, the Reagan administration opposed that change, preferring a more restrictive standard that outlawed intentional voting discrimination.

On Tuesday, Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) attempted to press Roberts on memos he had written on the topic. "Senator, you keep referring to what I supported and what I wanted to do," Roberts replied. "I was a 26-year-old staff lawyer. It was my first job as a lawyer after my clerkships. I was not shaping administration policy."

Yesterday, Kennedy returned to the theme of voting rights, challenging Roberts about the last paragraph of a four-page memo in which Roberts had written that the broader "effects" standard "is not only constitutionally suspect, but also contrary to the most fundamental tenets of the legislative process on which the laws of this country are based." Kennedy asked whether Roberts believes that today.

After a lengthy series of questions, Roberts replied, "And I have no basis for viewing it as constitutionally suspect and I don't." He declined, however, to indicate his views on an extension of the voting rights law.

In a similar vein, the committee's ranking Democrat, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (Vt.), questioned Roberts about a 1983 memo concerning the proper role of the Supreme Court, in which he had suggested that the court was overburdened and should consider fewer appeals of death penalty cases.

Leahy asked: "Are you saying that judges are just too busy to pay attention to death cases?" Roberts replied that he was not.

Yesterday afternoon, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.) cited a memo co-written by Roberts that had criticized the solicitor general's office for not filing a brief on behalf of Texas in a 1982 case in which the Supreme Court ruled that the state could not forbid illegal immigrants from attending public elementary schools.

Roberts replied that he had been "making the point that the position was inconsistent with the attorney general's litigation policy approach." When Durbin asked what he thought of that case today, Roberts said he had not looked at it in 23 years.

At one point, Sen. Herb Kohl (D-Wis.) asked in exasperation: "You have . . . suggested on numerous occasions that the things that you represented in writing or in an opinion back in the '80s and into the '90s . . . were in many cases the opinions of people for whom you worked, not necessarily your own. I assume, therefore, there are those opinions that you're prepared to disavow?"

Roberts replied: "My view in preparing all the memoranda that people have been talking about was as a staff lawyer. I was promoting the views of the people for whom I worked, and in some instances those are consistent with personal views, and in other instances they may not be.

"In most instances, no one cared terribly much what my personal views were. They were to advance the views of the administration for which I worked."

Roberts Backs Eminent Domain Limits (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr. told senators yesterday that laws restricting the government's power of eminent domain are legitimate, despite a landmark Supreme Court decision earlier this year that broadly expanded that authority.

"The court was not saying, 'You have to have this power, you have to exercise this power,' " Judge Roberts told the Senate Judiciary Committee. "That leaves the ball in the court of the legislature."

Judge Roberts, nominated to be the next chief justice of the Supreme Court, finished a second day of testimony yesterday with a few flare-ups, but no major upsets.

The hearings have been so devoid of fireworks that Senate staffers are having a hard time keeping the limited public seating area filled. There also have not been the major protests that normally accompany Supreme Court confirmation hearings.

Judge Roberts is slated to sit before the committee for a final round of questions this morning at the request of Democrats on the panel.

Yesterday, several Democrats commended the nominee for his performance thus far, but none has indicated that he or she will vote to confirm him. The committee vote is scheduled for next Thursday, and many observers speculate that his nomination will be sent to the full Senate on a straight party-line vote.

"You are one of the best witnesses that, I think, has come before this committee," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., a Delaware Democrat who has been one of the most combative questioners of Judge Roberts.

"If people can't vote for you, then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican.

One of the most closely watched Democrats is Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat who voted in favor of Judge Roberts for his position on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. She said she will vote against Judge Roberts for the Supreme Court, however, if she determines that he would overturn Roe v. Wade, the court decision that established federal abortion rights.

She told Judge Roberts that he'd spoken "eloquently" about Roe.

"I learned a lot from listening to you," she said. "You discussed the right to privacy. You were very full and forward-speaking."

Then Mrs. Feinstein inquired whether the White House also had applied an abortion litmus test when it selected Judge Roberts for nomination.

"Has anyone -- when you were being interviewed for this position -- ever asked your opinion on Roe?" she asked, to which he responded in the negative.

"OK. That's good to know," she added.

As on the previous day, Judge Roberts repeatedly declined -- to the great irritation of several senators -- to answer questions about particular cases or issues that might come before the Supreme Court.

"Without any knowledge of your understanding of the law -- because you will not share it with us -- we are rolling the dice with you, judge," said Mr. Biden, after failing to prod Judge Roberts into discussing "right to die" issues.

"Senator, that's asking me for an opinion in the abstract on a question that'll come before the court," Judge Roberts told Mr. Biden. "And when that question does come before the court, the litigants before me are entitled to have a justice deciding their case with an open mind based on the arguments presented, based on the precedence presented."

In a different exchange, Judge Roberts said his confirmation is not a "bargaining process."

"Judges are not politicians," he said. "They cannot promise to do certain things in exchange for votes."

The matter of the eminent domain case, however, proved safer waters for Judge Roberts.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, had asked Judge Roberts about the court decision in Kelo v. City of New London, in which the Supreme Court ruled 5-4 that the government could take private property from one owner and give it to another.

DOJ_NMG_0005757

Previously, eminent domain was restricted to cases in which the property was acquired for public use. Under the new parameters, eminent domain could be invoked if it is merely thought that the new owner could generate more tax revenue.

The ruling triggered a national outcry from both liberals and conservatives. Judge Roberts said yesterday that he was "surprised" by the ruling.

"In, you know, the first year in law school we all read the decision in Calder against Bull, which has the famous statement that the government may not take the property of A and give it to B," he said.

Judiciary Panel Peppers Nominee With Pet Issues (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

With federal Judge John G. Roberts Jr.'s confirmation appearing more likely, members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have resorted to using the hearings to lobby the nominee about their own favorite issues.

Senators have pressed their views on the prospective chief justice about televising Supreme Court proceedings, the right to die and abortion, among other issues.

"Are you against cameras in the courtroom like [Chief] Justice [William H.] Rehnquist was?" Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican and longtime advocate of televising Supreme Court proceedings, asked bluntly.

Judge Roberts -- sensing the prickly territory -- made a lighthearted reference to former Sen. Fred Thompson, the Tennessee Republican and television star who has been ushering him through the confirmation process.

"Well, you know, my new best friend, Senator Thompson, assures me that television cameras are nothing to be afraid of," he responded, before adding that he does not have a "set view" on the matter, but would listen to colleagues if confirmed.

After establishing that the opposite of being alive is being dead, Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, went on to impress upon Judge Roberts his own view of abortion.

"I won't press you on this issue," Mr. Coburn said. "But for the listeners of this hearing, if in fact life is the presence of a heartbeat and brain wave, it's important for everybody in the country to know that at 16 days post-conception, a heartbeat is present. At 41 days, right now we can assure ourselves, that brain activity and brain waves are present."

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, took issue with the "denigrating comments" Supreme Court justices make about Congress. In particular, he was galled by one decision that ruled a law of Congress unconstitutional for its "method of reasoning."

"Do we have your commitment that you won't characterize your method of reasoning as superior to ours?" Mr. Specter asked in a tone that wasn't terribly inquisitive.

"I don't think it's appropriate," Judge Roberts responded.

For good measure, Mr. Specter added: "I take umbrage at what the court has said, and so do my colleagues. There isn't a method of reasoning which changes when you move across the green from the Senate columns to the Supreme Court columns."

But not all such exchanges were so friendly.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, took the opportunity to lecture Judge Roberts about his own views of whether Congress has any say in whether feeding tubes are removed to allow a patient to die.

"My family faced -- I'm sure many people in this audience's families faced a difficult decision -- of deciding when to no longer continue the application of artificial apparatus to keep your father or mother or husband or wife or son or daughter alive," he explained. "It's of great moment to the American public."

Judge Roberts, as he had many times before, said it would be improper for him to discuss a matter pending before the Supreme Court.

Nominee Sees 'Room' For Bigger Caseload (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Judge John G. Roberts Jr. yesterday revealed one way his management of the Supreme Court could differ starkly from his predecessor and mentor William H. Rehnquist: The number of cases the court takes on is likely to increase.

Under Chief Justice Rehnquist, who began his tenure in 1986, the average high court caseload dropped from about 150 to 80 cases a year -- a trend Judge Roberts appeared intent on reversing during exchanges yesterday.

"I do think there's room for the court to take more cases," Judge Roberts told Sen. Herb Kohl, Wisconsin Democrat, although he couched the remark by first saying, "It may be a view I'll have to be educated on further if I am confirmed and I'm not stating it as a solid view."

DOJ_NMG_0005758

In an earlier exchange with Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, Judge Roberts noted that the justices "handled twice as many cases 20 years ago than they do today, and I think the capability to address more issues is there on the court."

While legal scholars agree more cases would significantly alter how the high court does business, there are varied theories of why the caseload decreased so dramatically during the Rehnquist years.

Through much of its history, the Supreme Court was required by Congress to hear certain cases appealed from lower courts. Congress abolished this "mandatory jurisdiction" law in 1988, effectively doing away with about 20 cases a year.

The caseload has since been set by the justices, who pick -- or "grant certiorari" to -- the cases they wish to hear from about 6,000 petitions filed with the Supreme Court annually by individuals seeking review of their cases at the highest level.

During the shift toward conservatism under Chief Justice Rehnquist, liberal lawyers grew more reluctant to petition the Supreme Court "because of the potential for an adverse ruling," says Richard C. Reuben of the University of Missouri School of Law.

"While they may have lost at the court of appeals, they figured that was just one circuit," Mr. Reuben said.

Stephen Wermiel of American University's Washington College of Law agreed, but added the phenomena was only "one of several factors" behind the shrunken caseload.

With Supreme Court and lower federal court appointments filled by the Reagan and first Bush administrations, a conservative Supreme Court "would feel that there were fewer cases that they needed to review because the federal appeals courts were more in line with the Supreme Court's thinking," Mr. Wermiel said.

Another reason was simply that Chief Justice Rehnquist "was a very efficient administrator," said Mr. Reuben. "The quality of the workmanship in Supreme Court opinions, I think improved as a general manner. The opinions were less rushed, they were crafted better."

Judge Roberts' remarks on the issue yesterday were unexpected because they strayed from a memo he wrote as a White House lawyer in 1983 to then Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, strongly urging the high court to reduce its caseload -- specifically by hearing fewer death penalty cases.

Now Right Demanding Dem Memos (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Conservative strategists are drafting a letter to Democratic members of the Senate Judiciary Committee demanding the release of hundreds of internal memos detailing contacts between the lawmakers and liberal interest groups opposing John Roberts's nomination to the Supreme Court.

By planning to press Democrats on the sensitive subject, conservatives seem to be pulling a page from the Democrats' own political playbook. In the weeks leading up to the confirmation hearings, Senate Democrats have repeatedly called on the White House to give them memos Roberts penned while he was deputy solicitor general in President George H.W. Bush's administration.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the ranking member on the Judiciary Committee, raised the issue again yesterday by releasing a letter dated Sept. 9 from William Moschella, the assistant attorney general. In the letter, Moschella declined to disclose legal memos from Roberts's tenure in the Office of the Solicitor General.

"It is regrettable that the Bush administration persists in keeping this information from the Senate," Leahy said. "These documents, from the period of Judge Roberts's most substantive work experience in the executive branch, would help illuminate his views and earlier decisions on a wide range of key issues that are of vital importance to the American people and to the Senate."

In their letter, conservatives quote Leahy's argument that the Senate should have access to the withheld documents. In the letter, they assert that the public is equally entitled to know what is motivating and directing Senate Democratic scrutiny of Roberts, according to a verbal summary given to The Hill.

"Given your demand that the Justice Department hand over John Roberts's work documents during his time as deputy solicitor general, you should have no reservations about approving the release of the full complement of documents that make up all of the Memogate papers," conservatives wrote in a draft of the letter, which will be circulated for signatures starting today. About 30 conservative leaders or more are expected to sign it.

A spokeswoman for the Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee declined to comment without first seeing a copy of the letter.

Specifically, conservatives want access to what they estimate may be as many as 4,000 Democratic memos that are in Senate Sergeant at Arms William Pickle's possession. Last year, Pickle seized Senate Judiciary Committee computers during an investigation. Democrats on the committee called for the probe after internal memos written by aides to Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) were made available to the press without Kennedy's or Durbin's consent.

The publicized memos detailed contacts between leading liberal members on the committee and groups that lobbied them on President Bush's judicial nominees.

In their letter to Democrats, conservatives plan to argue that the memos are not protected by attorney-client privilege, giving them a stronger claim to the documents, they assert, than the Democrats have to the solicitor general's documents. Roberts's defenders have argued that a solicitor general's relationship to a president is akin to an attorney-client relationship and deserves special privilege.

Mark Levin, president of the Landmark Legal Foundation, a conservative public-interest-litigation firm, said that he was familiar with the letter and plans to circulate it.

"I fully support it," he said. "I've always thought that the Congress and the Senate Judiciary Committee in particular gets away with a hypocritical standard. They demand that the executive branch produce everything, and yet on the other hand they refuse to make anything public."

Kay Daly, president of Coalition for a Fair Judiciary, a conservative group defending Roberts, said she was aware of the letter.

"There are some 4,000 memos locked away in the sergeant at arms' office that the public has a right to know about," she said.

Daly said that the since the taxpayers' fund the salaries of lawmakers and their aides they have a right to know about their work.

Conservatives said their case is bolstered by a memo sent by the Senate archivist to all Judiciary Committee staff members instructing them to preserve all documents and e-mails related to Roberts's confirmation proceedings, including correspondence with outside groups. Conservatives cite the archivist's message to support their claim that the internal memos held by the sergeant at arms should be made part of the public domain.

Jeff Lord, who served as associate political director in the Reagan administration from 1985 to 1988 and is working with Progress for America, a pro-Roberts advocacy group, has called for the Democratic memos to be made public during recent trips to Washington state and North Dakota. He traveled to those states to promote a new book he has written about the contentious 2002 Senate confirmation battle over Judge Brooks Smith's appointment to the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Lord called the memos "some of the most revealing things I've ever seen while in government," adding that the evidence of coordination between Democratic senators and third-party groups in the memos made public was "eye-opening."

One of the publicized memos, by a former aide to Kennedy and dated April 2002, reported that Elaine Jones of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund had asked Democrats to postpone the nomination of Judge Julia Gibbons to the 6th Circuit court until a key case on affirmative action had been decided. Conservatives consider it one of the most damning of the publicized batch.

The memo was downloaded from the Judiciary Committee server and made public in 2003.

In Roberts Hearing, Specter Assails Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Senator Arlen Specter's testy interrogation of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. on the Supreme Court's treatment of Congress may well have left viewers scratching their heads on Wednesday morning, with cryptic references to the "congruence and proportionality test" and to unfamiliar case names like "Lane and Hibbs."

But the line of questioning that Mr. Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is Judiciary Committee chairman, chose to pursue offered a window on the increasingly troubled relationship between the court and Congress, as well as on one of the most consequential developments of the Rehnquist court's later years.

In a series of decisions, many written by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist himself, the court declared unconstitutional acts of Congress that had been passed by broad bipartisan majorities.

Laws permitting public employees to sue state employers for discrimination on the basis of disability and age, and also giving women access to federal court to sue rapists for damages, ran up against the court's new definition of the limits on Congress's power and the justices' insistence that they alone have the final word in interpreting the Constitution.

"I take umbrage at what the court has said, and so do my colleagues," Senator Specter told Judge Roberts.

From 1995 to 2003, the Supreme Court overturned all or parts of 33 federal statutes, 10 of them on the ground that Congress had exceeded its authority either to regulate interstate commerce or to enforce the constitutional guarantees of due process and equal protection. Until then, the modern court gave Congress wide berth to define its own role under both of the Constitution's relevant provisions, the Commerce Clause and the 14th Amendment.

DOJ_NMG_0005760

Senator Specter took particular exception to the court's conclusion in several of the cases that Congress had not compiled an adequate record showing the existence of the problems the statutes sought to solve.

He said that leading up to the passage of the Violence Against Women Act, for example, "there were reports on gender bias from the task forces in 21 states, and eight separate reports issued by Congress and its committees over a long period."

In United States v. Morrison, the court's decision in 2000 that overturned the private-lawsuit portion of the statute, Chief Justice Rehnquist said that "Congress's findings were weakened by the fact that they rely so heavily on a method of reasoning that we have already rejected," namely that various instances of violence against women could be added together to demonstrate an impact on the nation's economy sufficient to bring the subject within Congress's authority over interstate commerce.

Turning to Judge Roberts, nominated to succeed the late chief justice, Senator Specter said, "Do we have your commitment that you won't characterize your 'method of reasoning' as superior to ours?" The nominee demurred and, in fact, was so cautiously nonresponsive as to leave the senator to continue with what amounted to a monologue.

"There isn't a method of reasoning which changes when you move across the green from the Senate columns to the Supreme Court columns," Mr. Specter said. "And we do our homework, evidenced by what has gone on in this hearing. And we don't like being treated as schoolchildren, requiring, as Justice Scalia says, a taskmaster." Then he demanded, "Will you do better on this subject, Judge Roberts?"

"Well, I don't think the court should be taskmaster of Congress," Judge Roberts replied. "I think the Constitution is the court's taskmaster, and it's Congress's taskmaster as well. And we each have responsibilities under the Constitution."

Senator Specter's reference was to a dissenting opinion by Justice Antonin Scalia in a decision last year, Tennessee v. Lane, which permitted states to be sued under the Americans With Disabilities Act for failing to provide accessible courtrooms. On the surface, at least, the decision conflicted with a 2001 ruling, Board of Trustees v. Garrett, which gave states immunity from lawsuits by their employees under the same law.

Justice Scalia, who had joined the majority in the 2001 case, said the conflicting results showed the "judicial arbitrariness" of the court's approach. "It casts this court in the role of Congress's taskmaster," he said.

Justice Scalia objected to the requirement the court has placed on Congress to show that its legislative approaches are "congruent" with, and "proportionate" to, the problem it is seeking to address.

Mr. Specter asked Judge Roberts: "Isn't this 'congruence and proportionality' test, which comes out of thin air, a classic example of judicial activism? Isn't that the very essence of what is in the eye of the beholder, where the court takes carte blanche to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional?"

Judge Roberts started to reply that in its two most recent cases in this series, the Lane case from Tennessee and another case, Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs, the court had shifted gears and rejected constitutional challenges to the laws in question. The Hibbs case, from 2003, allowed suits against states under the Family and Medical Leave Act.

But no sooner had Judge Roberts started to explain "Lane and Hibbs," than Senator Specter cut him off: "But Judge Roberts, they uphold it at the pleasure of the court. Congress can't figure that out. There's no way we can tell what's congruent and proportional in the eyes of the court."

Mr. Specter asked Judge Roberts if he agreed with Justice Scalia's critique of the "congruence and proportionality test." The nominee declined to say, noting that another such case is on the docket for the coming term.

That case, United States v. Georgia, scheduled for argument on Nov. 9, raises the question of whether prisoners can sue states under the disabilities act, as Congress intended.

Senator Specter was not satisfied, but it was clear that he knew the dialogue was over. Before turning to a less freighted subject - how the nominee would, as chief justice, lead the other justices, all of whom are his elders - he made one last try.

"Judge Roberts, I'm not talking about an issue," he said. "I'm talking about the essence of jurisprudence. I'm talking about the essence of a man-, woman-made test in the Supreme Court which has no grounding in the Constitution, no grounding in the Federalist Papers, no grounding in the history of the country. It comes out of thin air."

Group Pushes Specter To Back Roberts (HILL)

By Peter Savodnik

The Hill, September 15, 2005

The anti-abortion-rights group Concerned Women for America (CWA) is applying pressure on Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) to back Supreme Court Chief Justice nominee John Roberts.

“When it comes time for the committee to vote, Chairman Specter’s promise of fairness should lead him to the inescapable conclusion that it couldn’t possibly be fair not to vote for this exceptionally qualified nominee,” said the CWA chief counsel, Jan LaRue.

DOJ_NMG_0005761

She acknowledged that "I've been very tough on Senator Specter … but fairness requires me to applaud him for running a full and fair hearing, as he promised to do."

The CWA statement appears to dispel some concerns voiced by Republicans on Capitol Hill that Roberts had alienated some conservatives with his statements on abortion and judicial precedent.

Brownback Outlines Terms For Next Pick (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 15, 2005

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) said Wednesday that he would like the next Supreme Court nominee to have a detailed track record opposing the Roe v. Wade decision, as opposed to the relatively limited record on abortion issues held by Judge John Roberts.

While Brownback expects to support Roberts as President Bush's pick for chief justice of the United States, he warned that he and many in the conservative movement would like the nominee to replace retiring Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor to have a clearer record of opposing abortion rights than Roberts.

"I'd like to see it take place," Brownback said in between his first and second round of questioning of Roberts at the Judiciary Committee's confirmation hearings.

While Democrats and liberal activists have grown increasingly weary of Roberts' refusal to answer detailed questions about Roe and the right to privacy, Brownback voiced frustration of his own at the nominee's unwillingness to go much further in response to GOP questions on the matter.

"Democrats should be happy," Brownback said, only half-jokingly.

Brownback's veiled criticism of Roberts' record on the divisive issue of abortion could resonate for months, as the Kansan is considering running for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008 as the conservative anti-abortion candidate.

In the short run, it could make the selection of the next nominee to the high court even more difficult for Bush, as some Democrats appear to have withheld their sharpest political fire on Roberts and instead are concentrating on the nominee who succeeds the swing-voting O'Connor.

Brownback said Bush owes it to the millions of conservative voters who heard him say he would pick nominees similar to Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas — two favorites of anti-abortion activists.

"It really is what the election was about, and Bush ran on it and Kerry did not," Brownback said of Sen. John Kerry's (D-Mass.) presidential campaign.

To date, the Bush White House has done little if any consultation with Senators on the second Supreme Court choice. Aides to Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said they are unaware of any substantive conversations Specter has had on the topic with White House officials.

And there has been no indication from the White House when the next pick will be announced.

Edward Gillespie, the former Republican National Committee chairman who is serving as an unpaid White House adviser for the Roberts nomination process, said that the views of Brownback and many other Senators will be heard in the selection process, noting that more than 70 Senators were consulted before Roberts' nomination was announced.

"In the consultation process, I'm sure those views will be heard," he said of Brownback.

Gillespie, who is not involved in the selection process for the second pick, said he expects the president to live up to his pledge to pick justices "in the mold of Scalia and Thomas."

"I have no doubt the president will do what he said he would in two presidential elections," he said.

Roberts has been an active lawyer since the early 1980s, first in the Reagan and Bush administrations and then in private practice before taking a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit. However, his writings on Roe v. Wade have been limited, leaving his liberal opponents with just a couple of pieces of evidence to presume that he would be an anti-abortion justice.

In particular, they have pointed to his tenure in the Solicitor General's office, when he signed a 1991 brief in a pivotal Pennsylvania abortion case saying that Roe v. Wade was wrongly decided.

In addition, in a memo from his early days in the Reagan administration, he referred to a "so-called" right to privacy.

Under questioning from Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and others, Roberts seems to have left some wiggle room concerning how he would rule on such cases. Most conservatives remain pleased with Roberts, but many still fear his appointment could turn out as badly for conservatives as President George H.W. Bush's appointment of Justice David Souter, who eventually voted to uphold Roe v. Wade when the Pennsylvania abortion case, Planned Parenthood v. Casey, was decided in 1992.

DOJ_NMG_0005762

In his questioning Wednesday morning, Brownback sought to elicit a bit more on his views on the matter, asking the nominee: “Could you state your view as to whether the unborn child is a person or is a piece of property?”

Roberts declined to answer the question, saying that the issue may come before him on the court and he didn’t want to give any hints as to how he’d rule.

Manuel Miranda, a former Senate GOP leadership aide, sent conservative activists an e-mail Wednesday warning that the second pick should come from a crop of candidates who have either ruled on the issue on state courts or written on the matter. He noted that William Rehnquist won confirmation as chief justice in 1986 even though he was one of two justices to rule against Roe in 1973.

“When the President promised he would appoint judges like Scalia and Thomas, it was not their views on the Clean Sewers Act that he was trying to signal to us — it was code for Roe. He knew it, we knew it,” wrote Miranda, who resigned his Senate post 20 months ago during an internal chamber investigation about whether he had improperly accessed Judiciary Committee memos.

Miranda now runs Third Branch, a group devoted to confirming conservative jurists to the federal bench.

Brownback said that he has not spoken to White House officials about the next Supreme Court selection, but indicated that he’s made plain that he wants someone with a clearer record on Roe.

“I have communicated that, but I have not talked directly to [White House] individuals,” he said.

As he closed his second round of questioning with Roberts on Wednesday evening, Brownback told the nominee that there was much pressure on him. “A lot of hopes and prayers are riding on you,” he told Roberts.

“May God bless you,” Brownback added.

How Conservative Is Judge Roberts? (NYT)

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

It's not surprising that the Senate hearings for Judge John Roberts Jr. are turning out to be about how conservative he would be as the next chief justice of the United States. But there is a twist. It is the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee who want to make sure that he would be conservative in the true sense: respectful of tradition, and not seeking to impose radical new rules. The key question is whether he would stand by established legal precedents on issues like abortion, civil rights, the environment and the power of Congress, or would seek to push the law in a drastically different direction.

Judge Roberts's record, on the bench and off, puts him well to the right end of the ideological spectrum. As a Reagan administration lawyer, he argued for a very narrow interpretation of the Voting Rights Act. As an appeals court judge, he wrote an opinion in an Endangered Species Act case that suggests he may have a very cramped view of Congress's power. The documents about his past legal work that have become public contain some troubling passages, notably his assertion that abortion rights are based on a "so-called 'right to privacy.' "

Responding to questions, he has talked at length about his commitment to civil rights, privacy and Congressional authority. He told Russell Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat, that "the gains under the Voting Rights Act have been very beneficial in promoting the right to vote, which is preservative of all other rights." He emphasized that the Reagan administration had favored extending the act, whatever its differences with voting rights groups over the details. He told Joseph Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat, that he believes the Constitution prohibits discrimination against women, and he endorsed the test the court now uses in such cases.

He told Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican, that Roe v. Wade is "settled as a precedent of the court" and "entitled to respect" under the legal principle that a court's past rulings should be given deference. He also said he recognizes the existence of a constitutional right to privacy and agrees with the principle of the 1965 case striking down the laws against selling birth control devices, that "marital privacy extends to contraception and availability of that."

These are good things to hear, but there's reason for concern. He did not say he agrees with Roe, for instance, only that it is entitled to deference. That is a truism: all of the court's decisions are entitled to such deference, but some are reversed anyway. Judge Roberts waved away questions about troubling statements in his older legal memos, saying he was just a staff lawyer in his 20's when he wrote them. But he and the White House have refused to release more recent memos, from his time in the solicitor general's office, which might give a better picture of his views as a mature lawyer.

Senate Democrats have two goals. Before Mr. Roberts, now 50, becomes chief justice for life, they want to try to determine that he does not hold far-right views on important issues. It is a determination that many senators seem not to have made yet. Senator Biden, for one, complained about the "Kabuki dance" of the hearings and worried out loud, saying, "We are rolling the dice with you, judge."

No less important, Senate Democrats are putting down markers for the next judicial battle. President Bush will soon nominate a replacement for Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who has been an important swing vote on the court. Democrats have been calling for Justice O'Connor to be replaced with another centrist Republican. By subjecting Judge Roberts to tough questioning, they are sending a message that if President Bush chooses a far-right nominee, he can expect a major fight.

Judge Roberts Speaks (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

In his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee over the past two days, Judge John G. Roberts Jr. shed important light on his views and likely approach if confirmed as the Supreme Court's chief justice. To the apparent frustration of some Democrats on the committee, he declined, as nominees traditionally do, to give his specific opinion of the merits of matters that could come before the court. But he spoke with surprising clarity on several issues and displayed an agile legal mind and an appealing ability to disagree constructively, both characteristics of a good chief justice. While Americans still lack a road map to how he will handle the many important matters the court will face, Judge Roberts is less of a sphinx than he was at the time of his nomination.

The nominee affirmed that he regards stare decisis -- the doctrine of generally allowing even erroneous past decisions to stand -- as a critical foundation of the American legal system. While he rightly pointed out that precedents sometimes need to be overruled, his position distinguishes him from more radical conservatives such as Justice Clarence Thomas, who regards the doctrine as having limited value in constitutional cases. Those who might disagree with Judge Roberts's views have some assurance that he will not seek to rewrite large swaths of modern American law.

Judge Roberts made clear that he believes the Constitution contains a right to privacy, and he expressed his agreement with high- court decisions striking down bans on contraception. While he declined to address the merits of Roe v. Wade , he did indicate that it is a decision to which stare decisis considerations properly apply. Importantly, he said several times that the subsequent decision in Planned Parenthood v. C asey -- which reaffirmed Roe' s core principle -- was independently entitled to be treated as a precedent. That implies that there would be a heavy burden for the court in upsetting abortion rights now. Judge Roberts was careful not to say what he would do, but his comments suggest that he appreciates the difficulty of eliminating a right the court has solemnly declared, and redeclared, in the past.

He was less clear concerning the balance of power between the federal government and the states, a subject on which his writings have been ambiguous and in some respects troubling. Still, he expressed a healthy regard for the foundations of federal power and an appreciation of the need for the courts to defer to congressional expertise. There is no reason to assume Judge Roberts will be more radical on federalism questions than either the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist or retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

Concerning his memos as a young lawyer in the Reagan Justice Department, Judge Roberts's answers varied considerably. He generally did not back off the substance of his memos on civil rights issues, but, rather, he stressed that the positions in question were those of the administration -- leaving ambiguous his own stance now. He did, however, retreat somewhat from his embrace of legislation to limit the jurisdiction of the courts. He also treated the court's jurisprudence on religion and public life with far greater respect than he did as a young man. His clear statement that only law, not religious faith, will govern his decisions was welcome.

The cumulative impression is of a cautious, incremental conservative, unlikely to unmask himself as a liberal once on the bench but unlikely as well to try to impose his own political agenda.

Roberts Comes Off As No Conservative In Scalia-Thomas Mold (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, September 15, 2005

It's about as certain as anything that John Roberts will be the next chief justice of the United States, but it's anything but certain where he'll come out ideologically.

That should be encouraging to moderates and liberals and discouraging to conservatives, who expected President Bush to appoint a justice in the mold of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, whose views are seldom in doubt.

Liberal interest groups and Democratic Senators ought to be using the standard Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) applied to Roberts: If he's not an "extremist" conservative and "out of the mainstream," he ought to be confirmed.

If that's the test, Roberts surely passed it, judging by his early performance before the Senate Judiciary Committee. But the interest groups and, apparently, the main body of committee Democrats, still seem set to oppose him.

If a majority of Senate Democrats follow their lead, assuming no damning evidence surfaces before a confirmation vote, it will brand the party as ideologically driven and out of the mainstream itself.

DOJ_NMG_0005764

Polls show that Roberts has made a highly favorable impression with the public. And both his history and performance more than fulfill the traditional requirements of a Supreme Court justice: intelligence, fair-mindedness, a judicial temperament and the respect of his professional colleagues.

Roberts specifically declared that he would not bring an "overarching philosophy" to the court and would "look at cases from the ground up rather than the top down."

He said he is a "modest judge" who will interpret law and not make it, who values precedent, who respects the views of his colleagues and who will not allow his personal opinions to sway his judgments.

Roberts may be a conservative, but he's not a rigid, big-C conservative ideologue. And, assuming he's being honest, he's not going to be the activist hoped for by the right and feared by the left.

Roberts' memos from the Reagan era do suggest a smart-alecky conservative possibly on his way to big-C status, as in his reference to a "so-called right of privacy" in the Constitution.

But Roberts is now 20-plus years older, and he went out of his way to inform the committee that he admires the late Justice Robert H. Jackson, once Franklin D. Roosevelt's attorney general, who changed his mind as he changed his job.

It's also a good sign of Roberts' maturity and open-mindedness that he told students at Wake Forest Law School in February that he's found being a federal appeals court judge far harder than he had anticipated.

"I kind of thought that in most of the cases, it would be pretty obvious ... that this person should lose, this person should win and you'd spend most of your time writing opinions," he said.

"I've found that I have to spend more time than I thought just getting to the first step — what the right answer should be," he said. "It's not at all unusual to have one view when you finish reading the briefs, a different view when you sit down with your clerks, another after oral arguments and you're back to a different view after the conference [with other judges].

"Then as you go through the writing process, you come up with either the original view, a third view or the second view." Can anyone imagine Justices Thomas or Scalia not knowing from the get-go how he'll rule?

When asked by a student several months before he was nominated who his favorite justices were, he did not name Scalia and Thomas — Bush's favorites — but rather Jackson, Felix Frankfurter, John Marshall Harlan, William Brennan and his mentor, William Rehnquist.

And it's just conceivable that Roberts might end up a justice ideologically more in the mold of Anthony Kennedy, a swing conservative, than even Rehnquist.

Kennedy wrote the court's plurality opinion in the 1992 Planned Parenthood v. Casey case, upholding Roe v. Wade, and sided with liberals in striking down state laws discriminating against gays.

Kennedy also voted with conservatives on some states' rights and capital punishment cases and on Bush v. Gore after the 2000 election. Roberts disagrees with Kennedy's frequent crediting of foreign precedents, but he seems to share Kennedy's open-mindedness.

Roberts rigorously refused to forecast his views on possibly pending cases, but he did indicate strongly that he's no automatic vote to overturn Roe, as right-wingers expect from a Bush appointee.

In answer to searching questions from Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), Roberts demonstrated strong respect for the doctrine of stare decisis — that is, following precedent. Specter said that Roe had been revisited by the court in 38 cases since 1972 without being reversed.

Roberts concurred that breaking precedent constitutes "a jolt to the legal system" and that "it's not enough that you might think the precedent is flawed to justify revisiting it."

He certainly cited theoretical grounds for revisiting precedents — such as unworkability or erosion of the precedent — but right-wingers are expecting a reversal on the mere grounds that the case was "wrongly decided" to begin with.

Roberts also departed from the right-wing line by saying that "the right to privacy is protected under the Constitution in various ways" and that "the court — in a series of decisions going back 80 years — has recognized that personal privacy is a component of the liberty protected by the due process clause."

A right of privacy was a key basis for the Roe decision, and big-C conservatives routinely say it's nowhere to be found in the Constitution, much as Roberts did back in 1981.

In response to Roberts' first-day testimony, a coalition of liberal groups, Independentcourt.org, put out a press release accusing him of moving "from dodging to dishonest."

Judiciary Committee Democrats issued a joint statement saying that Roberts "didn't answer questions." Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) practically shouted, "You've told us nothing," because Roberts wouldn't disclose his personal feelings about life and death.

But, assuming he's not dissembling, Roberts has in fact told Congress a lot: that he's fully qualified to be chief justice, that he'll look at cases fairly and without prejudgment and that he's no ideologue.

DOJ_NMG_0005765

Democrats have no way to block him, since the “Gang of 14” agreement takes the filibuster out of play. They have a decision: Let him through and concentrate on Bush’s next appointee, or oppose him and brand themselves as mere agents of their interest groups.

Dean Of The Democrats (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

No, not Howard. The Dean whom Democrats have tapped to represent them at John Roberts's confirmation hearings this week is John W. Dean III, White House Counsel to President Nixon and one of the architects of the Watergate coverup.

This isn't the first time Mr. Dean will be appearing in the Caucus Room of the Senate's Russell office building. In 1973, he sat at the witness table during the Watergate hearings and testified about a "cancer on the Presidency." This was shortly before he spent two years in jail for obstruction of justice.

This paragon of the law is now a columnist for FindLaw.com, where he has been writing articles opposing Mr. Roberts's confirmation. Specifically, he wants the White House to release Mr. Roberts's documents from his time in the Solicitor General's office -- presumably the reason he's turned up on the Democrats' witness list. (He has a conflict on Thursday and will appear if the hearings are extended to Friday, says a spokeswoman for Senator Pat Leahy, the Committee's ranking Democrat.)

In other words, the Democrats are using a man who will go down in history for facilitating a Presidential coverup to make the case for open government. Meanwhile, they ignore six Solicitors General from several administrations, Democrat and Republican, who have said publicly that the Roberts documents are covered by attorney-client privilege and should be kept confidential. So: a bipartisan group of law-abiding SGs vs. a convicted felon and Watergate enabler? You make the call.

Bush, Annan Tout The Role Of The U.N. (LAT)

By Maggie Farley And Warren Vieth

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS — In a rare show of unity after a bruising week for the U.N., President Bush joined U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Wednesday in saying that no country can stand alone against the 21st century challenges of terrorism, disease and natural disasters.

Both leaders also chided the world body's member nations for blocking key reforms aimed at making the United Nations more able to tackle those challenges, even though many diplomats felt the U.S. was one of the countries responsible.

But Bush also surprised delegates by reversing U.S. stances on trade and development that had nearly scuttled weeks of negotiation on the reforms.

"To spread a vision of hope, the United States is determined to help nations that are struggling with poverty," Bush said. "We are committed to the Millennium Development Goals."

Those goals include cutting poverty and hunger in half, ensuring universal education and stemming the spread of AIDS by 2015.

"In this young century, the far corners of the world are linked more closely than ever before, and no nation can remain isolated and indifferent to the struggles of others," Bush said in a keynote speech at the opening of the three-day World Summit.

In an address that was at once global and aimed at home, Bush noted that the United States was in the unusual position of receiving aid from abroad after Hurricane Katrina, and thanked the 115 nations that had offered money and help.

"The world is more compassionate and hopeful when we act together," Bush said. "This truth was the inspiration for the United Nations."

Although Washington had endorsed the eight Millennium Development Goals at the 2000 summit and again in the so-called Monterrey Consensus statement, U.S. negotiators feared that targets related to the goals would require the U.S. to increase foreign aid.

The goals were restored at the last minute in a U.S.-crafted compromise that saved the talks from collapse.

Nonetheless, delegates and U.N. officials had not expected Bush to publicly endorse the goals in front of more than 150 world leaders.

"That was a big deal," said Mark Malloch Brown, Annan's chief of staff and the former head of the U.N. Development Program. "They are not standing in the way of it, and that is real progress."

Some diplomats saw Bush's emphasis on development as an attempt to defuse the sentiment here that the United States was one of the spoilers of the summit document, which now falls far short of Annan's original ambitions.

Or, quipped one diplomat, perhaps Hurricane Katrina made him suddenly aware of the dire effects of poverty.

Reversing another U.S. negotiating stance, Bush also called for the removal of trade barriers and farm subsidies that prevent poor nations from selling their goods.

DOJ_NMG_0005766

"The United States is ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same," he said.

Bush and Annan expressed their disappointment that a summit accord passed grudgingly by the General Assembly on Tuesday did not go further.

The stripped-down document omits key proposals on nuclear disarmament and trade and defers details on human rights, terrorism and U.N. reform.

World leaders are expected to adopt it Friday, the last day of the summit.

Bush aimed his strongest criticism at the failure to establish criteria for membership in a new human rights council to replace the U.N. Human Rights Commission, which has included among its members alleged violators such as Libya and Sudan.

"When this great institution's member states choose notorious abusers of human rights to sit on the U.N. Human Rights Commission, they discredit a noble effort and undermine the credibility of the whole organization," Bush said. "If member nations want the United Nations to be respected and effective, they should begin by making sure it is worthy of respect."

Annan expressed greater concern about the failure to include in the final document any reference to nuclear disarmament and nonproliferation, calling it "our biggest tragedy and our biggest failure." The Bush administration opposed language that called for nuclear powers to reduce their weapons stockpiles.

In what appeared to be a jab at the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Annan cautioned, "Even the strongest among us cannot succeed alone…. We cannot succeed without the leadership of the strong and the engagement of all."

Compared with previous Bush speeches in which he demanded that the U.N. confront Iraq or stand aside, Wednesday's address seemed almost conciliatory.

"He found the themes that resonate with the international community," said Jean-Marie Guehenno, the head of peacekeeping at the U.N. "The emphasis on poverty and development was certainly noticed and welcomed."

But what Bush didn't mention — Afghanistan, Sudan and the Middle East — also resonated. The president did not focus on the U.S. use of power, or the U.N. role in rebuilding new governments and societies that have been disrupted by conflict.

After his address, Bush met with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. In brief remarks to reporters, he praised Sharon's courage in removing Israeli settlers from the Gaza Strip.

The president then participated in a meeting of the U.N. Security Council, which adopted a resolution banning the incitement of terrorism and calling for action to share intelligence, restrict cross-border movement and freeze financing for terrorist organizations.

Human rights groups fear the wide-ranging resolution could be used to censor inflammatory media and deport political opponents cast as extremists.

Separately, Bush signed a new international accord to deter nuclear terrorism and participated in the launch of the U.N. Democracy Fund, designed to help developing nations build democratic institutions.

Bush Challenges World To Drop Trade Barriers (REU-Y2)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, September 15, 2005

U.S. President George W. Bush told a U.N summit on Wednesday he was willing to drop all trade barriers if other countries did the same, issuing a challenge that could invigorate critical talks on world trade.

Trade experts saw little chance of the pledge becoming a reality but some said the attention Bush gave to trade in his speech could spur interest in the World Trade Organization talks on trade and development, known as the Doha Round.

"The United States is ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same," Bush told other leaders.

"The elimination of trade barriers could lift hundreds of millions of people out of poverty over the next 15 years."

Bush said the stakes were high for a successful conclusion to the Doha talks, which aim to lower trade barriers for everything from farm goods to services and foster economic growth in the poorest countries. He devoted a full three paragraphs to Doha in a 25-minute speech.

With a deal needed by the end of next year, the Doha Round is entering a crucial stage. Negotiators need to make substantial progress at a WTO ministerial meeting in Hong Kong this December to keep the round alive.

The talks have suffered from a lack of high-level interest, which makes Bush's comments significant even though they mean little on a practical level, said Greg Mastel, trade adviser at the law firm Miller and Chevalier in Washington, DC.

"It's an offer that will never be taken up," Mastel said. "Other countries are not likely to drop their trade barriers any time soon."

DOJ_NMG_0005767

He noted such a move would not be politically feasible in the United States, where protectionist policies are popular for industries such as steel but even more so agricultural goods.

Disagreements over how much to cut farm subsidies and tariffs are the biggest obstacles to a new world trade deal. However, the negotiations are also bogged down on issues linked to trade in services and industrial goods.

"I strongly endorse the spirit of (Bush's) remarks and I think that it's important that somebody like the president should give this amount of attention to the round," European Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson told reporters after meetings in Washington on farm trade.

The United States and the European Union both generously subsidize their farmers, but are striving to reach agreement in coming months on how far to cut their subsidies and tariffs.

How much other countries, such as Brazil and India, are willing to scale back their own protection for farmers will also be an important element of final WTO deal.

"It's rhetorical but it's important as a political signal that the president is willing to push the envelope on trade further than the conventional wisdom of the Congress," said Jeffrey Schott, senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics, a Washington think-tank.

As an example of the difficulty of the politics of trade liberalization in Congress, Schott pointed to the tough fight it took Bush to secure passage of the Central America Free Trade Agreement.

Mastel said talk had been circulating that the Bush administration might be ready to offer a proposal to phase out all industrial tariffs eventually, also an ambitious goal but perhaps more feasible than the one Bush spoke of at the U.N.

At U.N., Bush Links War On Terrorism To Anti-Poverty Efforts (WP)

By Peter Baker And Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 14 -- President Bush, reaching out to an audience he has antagonized in the past, told the assembled leaders of the world Wednesday that the United States shared "a moral duty" to combat not only terrorism but also the poverty, oppression and hopelessness that give rise to it.

Addressing the United Nations, Bush linked his campaign against terrorism to the anti-poverty agenda advanced by other nations, although he shied away from adopting some of the specific commitments sought by allies. He later took the U.S. seat at the Security Council for the first time in his presidency to emphasize his solidarity with other countries in the struggle against terrorism.

"We must help raise up the failing states and stagnant societies that provide fertile ground for the terrorists," Bush said at the gathering of more than 150 presidents and prime ministers on hand to mark the 60th anniversary of the world body. "We must defend and extend a vision of human dignity and opportunity and prosperity, a vision far stronger than the dark appeal of resentment and murder. To spread the vision of hope, the United States is determined to help nations that are struggling with poverty."

Arguing that trade can lift hundreds of millions of people out of poverty, Bush pushed for a new global trade agreement and for the first time vowed to drop all U.S. tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to foreign goods if other countries do the same. He also urged other nations to join U.S. efforts to fight AIDS and malaria, and he launched a new international partnership to address the spread of avian flu.

Paying special notice to perennial conflicts that leave much of the world destitute, Bush said the United States would train 40,000 African peacekeeping troops over five years "to preserve justice and order in Africa." And he marked the inception of a new U.N. democracy fund to promote greater liberty around the world.

"The lesson is clear," Bush said. "There can be no safety in looking away or seeking the quiet life by ignoring the hardship and oppression of others. Either hope will spread or violence will spread, and we must take the side of hope."

On the sideline of the U.N. events here, Bush also met for 35 minutes with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to congratulate him on the withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and to challenge the Palestinians to reciprocate. "I know it was hard, but I admire your courage," Bush told Sharon in front of reporters. The president added: "Now is the time for Palestinians to come together and establish a government that will be peaceful with Israel."

Bush's two-day visit here focused his attention back on world affairs at a time of domestic crisis along the Gulf Coast. Many of his counterparts expressed their sympathy following the death and devastation caused by Hurricane Katrina; more than 115 countries have offered assistance. Comparing Katrina to the tsunami that killed hundreds of thousands in South Asia last year, Bush said the outpouring of compassion this month showed that the world is better "when we act together."

DOJ_NMG_0005768

The rhetorical nod to international harmony contrasted with past visits by Bush to the United Nations that were marked by bitter disagreement over the war in Iraq. Since his reelection last year, Bush has worked to heal those wounds and has adopted a more multilateral approach to sensitive issues such as Iran's nuclear program.

His approach Wednesday generated a far warmer reaction among U.N. officials and foreign delegates than previous appearances, when he lectured countries about their responsibility to fight terrorism and stand up to North Korea and Iraq. Diplomats praised Bush's embrace of targets known as the Millennium Development Goals to dramatically scale back poverty, child mortality and disease, although he did not endorse proposals to spend 0.7 percent of national income on international aid, four times more than current U.S. spending.

"It was a different tone," said Chile's ambassador, Heraldo Muñoz. "Before, it was all about terrorism. Although this speech had an unavoidable component on terrorism, it went well beyond. He expressed . . . renewed trust in the United Nations, and I feel many leaders welcomed that."

At the same time, Bush was trailed around U.N. headquarters by his ambassador, John R. Bolton, a longtime U.N. critic who was sent here with a temporary recess appointment after Senate Democrats blocked his confirmation. Bolton has clashed with diplomats here over efforts to make the United Nations more efficient and accountable.

When Bush was greeted by Secretary General Kofi Annan on Tuesday, U.N. closed-circuit television showed the president joking about the tension over Bolton, who once suggested it would make no difference if 10 floors of the U.N. building disappeared. "How is he behaving?" Bush asked. "Has the place blown up?"

A 35-page declaration on poverty and U.N. reform completed this week did little to overhaul the organization in the way Washington wants, but Bush publicly credited Annan for trying. "We have made a solid start," he said in a toast. "More work remains."

U.N. officials sought to counter the impression that weeks of hard negotiations had yielded a scaled-back document that would have little impact. The declaration, to be endorsed by world leaders attending a summit on Friday, includes the first unqualified U.N. condemnation of terrorism "by whomever, wherever and for whatever purpose." It also constitutes the first public commitment by the full U.N. membership to take responsibility for protecting people from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity. The declaration does not legally obligate governments to intervene in places such as the Darfur region of Sudan, but it will increase political pressure on countries to do so.

As it has during many of Bush's visits here, terrorism dominated the agenda, coming on a day when more than 160 people were killed and hundreds more injured by a wave of bombings and rocket attacks in Baghdad. Many of the leaders sitting with Bush at the Security Council, including Russian President Vladimir Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao, did not support the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

But they agreed with Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair to adopt the resolution calling on nations to crack down on the incitement of terrorism.

"The terrorists must know that wherever they go they cannot escape justice," Bush said, adding, "We must send a clear message to the rulers of outlaw regimes that sponsor terror and pursue weapons of mass murder: You will not be allowed to threaten the peace and stability of the world."

This Year, Bush Takes A Different Tone With The U.N. (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 14 -- Three years ago, making the case for confronting Iraq, President Bush said the United Nations would sink into irrelevancy if it failed to act at a "difficult and defining moment." But, addressing the U.N. General Assembly on Wednesday, the president struck a strikingly different tone, praising the "vital work and great ideals of this institution" and its efforts to take the "first steps" toward managerial and structural reforms.

A year ago, in the same venue, Bush denounced terrorists as people who believed "the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the American Bill of Rights and every charter of liberty ever written are lies, to be burned and destroyed and forgotten." Bush condemned terrorism in this year's speech as well, but with a twist -- he explicitly linked defeating terrorism to changing "the conditions that allow terrorists to flourish."

"We must help raise up the failing states and stagnant societies that provide fertile ground for the terrorists," Bush said.

Bush then ticked off a series of U.N.-sponsored initiatives to help promote human dignity and prosperity, saying the United States has a "moral duty" to join in the effort. In effect, Bush used the speech to marry the United Nations' goals of defeating poverty and disease with his vision of fighting terrorism by promoting democracy.

Since the start of his second term, Bush has tried hard to reach out to a world that has been dismayed with the foreign-policy choices and actions of his first term. He has traveled four times this year to Europe, the heart of anti-Bush attitudes, though polling by the German Marshall Fund has indicated that the charm offensive thus far has failed to resonate with many Europeans.

The United Nations refused to back a war against Iraq, but apparently it did not become irrelevant either. Bush's speech Wednesday lacked the confrontational tone of his previous addresses here, and he reached out for common goals and objectives. Bush even lingered to participate for the first time in a session of the U.N. Security Council and then joined other world leaders for a meal.

"May the U.N. embody the high ideals of its founding in the years to come," Bush said in a toast.

Interestingly, Bush did not mention the looming confrontation with Iran over its nuclear programs, even though the United States is leading the drive to bring the matter to the Security Council as quickly as possible. Instead, French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin -- who as foreign minister in 2003 had clashed heatedly with U.S. officials over the invasion of Iraq -- played the heavy in his own speech. He warned Iran that it faces referral to the Security Council if it fails to meet its obligations under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Unlike last year's address -- when Bush was trying to woo his conservative base during a presidential campaign -- the president did not mention trafficking in humans or the conflict in Sudan, two issues of importance to evangelical voters.

Skipping a chance to be confrontational, Bush also referred only obliquely to the Iraq oil-for-food scandal that has tarnished the world body -- and he skipped lightly over the fact that the General Assembly on Tuesday agreed to a watered-down document intended to guide the reforms that U.S. officials say are necessary for the United Nations.

Bush was also significantly less defensive about conditions in Iraq, nearly three years after the invasion. Two years ago, he all but demanded that the world join in helping rebuild that shattered nation. Yesterday, he simply said: "No civilized nation has an interest in seeing a new terrorist state emerge in that country."

Bush used his speech to explain why, in his view, democracy thwarts the growth of terrorism. "Democratic nations uphold the rule of law, impose limits on the power of the state, treat women and minorities as full citizens," he said. "Democratic nations protect private property, free speech and religious expression."

Writing in the current issue of Foreign Affairs, F. Gregory Gause III said that a review of academic literature and statistics finds little evidence that democracy stops terrorism. Gause, a political science professor at the University of Vermont, noted that the State Department's records show that, between 2000 and 2003, India, the world's most populous democracy, had 203 terrorist attacks while, China, the world's most populous authoritarian state, had none. One study cited by Gause found that "most terrorist incidents occur in democracies and that generally both the victims and the perpetrators are citizens of democracies."

Bush Thanks World Leaders And Takes Conciliatory Tone (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 14 - President Bush, facing an array of world leaders who are deeply divided on how to define terrorism or act against nuclear proliferation and poverty, struck a conciliatory tone at the United Nations on Wednesday, describing himself as the grateful leader of a superpower that in recent days has received emergency aid from nations around the world.

His speech, at the opening of a United Nations session that drew more than 150 presidents, prime ministers and monarchs, came hours after the General Assembly greatly watered down what had once been ambitious plans for institutional change and for commitments to fight terrorism and nuclear arms.

But Mr. Bush only alluded to the leaders' differences, and his tone was far more muted than three years ago, when he urged the United Nations to confront Saddam Hussein.

On Wednesday, from the same podium, he balanced his discussion of the need to chase down terrorists with his endorsement of a set of antipoverty objectives called the millennium development goals. Only weeks ago, the administration had proposed eliminating all reference to the specific goals from the United Nations' agenda this week, but the administration subsequently backed off. Rather than declare, as he had in the past, that countries had to choose to be "with us or against us" in battling terrorists, Mr. Bush cast himself as the leader of one of many nations fighting the same plague.

"No nation can remain isolated and indifferent to the struggles of others," he said in a hall that remained, by tradition, largely silent. "When a country or a region is filled with despair and resentment and vulnerable to violent and aggressive ideologies, the threat passes easily across oceans and borders and could threaten the security of any peaceful country."

Mr. Bush began his speech by thanking 115 countries and a dozen international organizations for offering aid to victims of Hurricane Katrina, putting him in the unaccustomed position of being the recipient of help from abroad - including from countries like Iraq. "I offer the thanks of my nation," he said.

Secretary General Kofi Annan seemed to allude to American vulnerability in a speech earlier in the day, noting, "Whether our challenge is peacemaking, nation-building, democratization or responding to natural or man-made disasters, we have seen that even the strongest among us cannot succeed alone."

That seemed to set the tone for Mr. Bush, who arrived politically injured. His approval levels among Americans are at record lows, with the aftermath from Hurricane Katrina raising questions about the administration's abilities to respond to a major disaster, and with Iraq facing violence on a scale few predicted three years ago. But even with close to 150 people killed in Iraq just hours before he spoke, Mr. Bush stuck to his message of optimism about democratic revolution in the Middle East.

"It's an exciting opportunity for all of us in this chamber," he told the leaders, many of whom opposed his decision three years ago to go to war and have steered clear of Iraq since.

Nonetheless, American officials traveling with Mr. Bush said that they wondered how successful the White House would be in allocating more reconstruction aid for Iraq now that the hurricane damage will soak up so many American resources. "It seems clear," said one senior official traveling with Mr. Bush, "that the days of American largess for Iraq are coming to a close."

At his toughest on Wednesday, Mr. Bush seemed to scold the United Nations for failing to enact change on the scale discussed for more than a year. "The United Nations must be strong and efficient, free of corruption, and accountable to the people it serves," he said, adding that it "must stand for integrity, and live by the high standards it sets for others."

He described the effort to improve the operations of the organization as in its infancy, adding: "The process of reform begins with members taking our responsibilities seriously. When this great institution's member states choose notorious abusers of human rights to sit on the U.N. Human Rights Commission, they discredit a noble effort, and undermine the credibility of the whole organization," apparently a reference to Sudan, Zimbabwe, Cuba and Libya.

"If member countries want the United Nations to be respected - respected and effective - they should begin by making sure it is worthy of respect," Mr. Bush concluded.

He pressed for a Security Council resolution committing countries to prosecute - and extradite - anyone seeking fissile materials or the technology for nuclear devices.

On Tuesday, Mr. Annan said the exclusion of language in goals on countering nuclear proliferation was a "disgrace" that compounded a similar failure at a spring United Nations conference on the future of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

But Mr. Bush did not repeat his previous calls to bar any new country from producing enriched uranium or plutonium - a plan the administration has done little to promote over the past year and a half.

In his references to the goals for poverty reduction, he cited not only the millennium development goals but also another initiative that grew out of a summit meeting in Monterrey, Mexico. There, poor nations agreed to fight corruption and improve governance, and rich nations committed to "make concrete efforts" toward giving 0.7 percent of their national income in aid. Mr. Bush did not address the aid issue, but advocates said they hoped his endorsement of Monterrey would make it harder for the United States to continue to oppose such aid targets.

Jeffrey D. Sachs, the economist who led the millennium project, said in an interview that Mr. Bush's support "was as explicit and plain as could be." As to Mr. Bush's mention of the millennium goals, he said, "As far as I know, the president has never uttered that phrase before."

The Security Council also passed a resolution calling on countries to ban incitement to terrorism and prevent subversion of educational, cultural and religious institutions by terrorists and their supporters. The measure was offered by Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain in a move paralleling his government's response to bombings in London in July.

The seats around the horseshoe panel were filled by the leaders attending the United Nations summit meeting, and among those raising hands in approval were Presidents Bush, Vladimir V. Putin of Russia, Hu Jintao of China, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva of Brazil, and Gloria Macapagal Arroyo of the Philippines.

"We must unite not just in condemning the acts of terrorism, which we all do, but in fighting the poisonous propaganda that the root cause of this lies with us, not them," Mr. Blair said. Citing the bombings Wednesday in Baghdad, he called it "obscene" for terrorists to claim to be acting in response to Western aggression against Muslims. "Their victims are largely Muslim," he said.

Rights groups in Britain have protested the government's crackdown since the bombings, and the New York-based Human Rights Watch criticized Wednesday's resolution for failing to define incitement.

"The resolution's sponsors have made it easy for abusive governments to invoke the resolution to target peaceful political opponents, impose censorship and close mosques, churches and schools," said Kenneth Roth, the group's executive director.

Bush Calls On U.N. To Fight Poverty, Terror (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2005

President Bush urged the members of the United Nations on Wednesday to unite in the war on terrorism and to push for the spread of democracy and prosperity in Iraq and the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0005771

"We have a solemn obligation to defend our citizens against terrorism, to attack terrorist networks and deprive them of any safe haven," Bush told the World Summit in New York. "No nation can remain isolated and indifferent to the struggles of others."

With Bush casting the U.S. vote, the U.N. Security Council unanimously passed a resolution that condemns the incitement of terrorism and calls for all nations to take "appropriate action" to fight such incitements. "Appropriate action" was not defined.

Declaring that poverty breeds despair and terrorism, Bush challenged world leaders to abolish trade tariffs and subsidies to promote prosperity and opportunity in poor nations, a move that would be worth billions of dollars.

"There can be no safety in looking away or seeking the quiet life by ignoring the hardship and oppression of others," Bush said. "Either hope will spread, or violence will."

Court lifts curbs on Aruban suspects in Holloway case

A court ruled Wednesday that three suspects in the disappearance of an American teenager in Aruba can remain free without conditions, overturning an earlier decision that restricted their travel.

The appeals court ruled there was a "lack of sufficient grounds and serious suspicions" to keep the restrictions on Joran van der Sloot and brothers Deepak and Satish Kalpoe, the Aruban prosecutor's office said. They remain suspects in the May 30 disappearance of Alabama teenager Natalee Holloway, the prosecutor's office said.

Bombmaking instructions at issue in Belfast trial

Arabic instructions on how to detonate a bomb hidden in a baby's milk bottle could be used to destroy an aircraft in midair, a U.S. explosives expert testified in the trial of an Algerian man accused of links to the al-Qaeda network.

Abbas Boutrab, 32, is charged in Belfast, Northern Ireland, with possessing 25 computer disks filled with instructions on how to build compact bombs and other weapons and how to smuggle them aboard passenger aircraft.

Donald Sachtleben, an FBI explosives expert, testified that he built and successfully detonated three bombs based on the instructions found in Boutrab's home. Boutrab says he downloaded the material from the Internet out of curiosity.

In U.N. Talk, Bush Urges Nations To Fight Poverty, Open Up Trade (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK -- President Bush urged world leaders to band together to combat poverty, terrorism and disease, while eliminating barriers to trade.

Mr. Bush's remarks before the United Nations General Assembly came three years after he used the same setting to lay the ground for the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. He began his speech yesterday noting the "awesome power of nature" that was Hurricane Katrina, and thanking the more than 115 countries that offered the U.S. aid "in this hour of need."

Amid declining approval ratings, Mr. Bush plans to interrupt several days of diplomacy to give a nationwide address on Katrina this evening from Louisiana, before returning for a meeting tomorrow with Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Mr. Bush traveled here with several aims. The U.S. hopes to build support from China, Russia and other nations to bring Iran's nuclear program before the Security Council, and to keep up pressure on North Korea through the six-party talks under way in Beijing. Mr. Bush and his aides also have used the gathering to push for other goals, such as health programs and trade.

President Bush repeated a pledge that he would move to eliminate all tariffs and agricultural subsidies within the current global round of trade talks if other countries agreed to do the same. He also stepped up calls for Asian countries to increase their vigilance against the spread of avian flu, which he warned could become "the first pandemic of the 21st century."

The Security Council afterward approved a British-sponsored resolution urging countries to adopt laws prohibiting "incitements to terrorism," a move that some civil-rights groups say could offer countries legal cover to crack down on dissent. U.N. members resisted pressure from Washington to agree to a definition of terrorism.

The Bush administration came under some criticism for declining to endorse a widespread push to enlarge the permanent core group of countries within the Security Council, from five member nations to as many as nine. The U.S. had backed the idea of Japan joining the five veto-wielding countries, but didn't support including Brazil, Germany and India.

Efforts to enlarge the Security Council were part of a broad push to overhaul the U.N., which devolved this week into a package of relatively small changes. Developing countries blocked a move to give more power to the secretary-general's office, while others eliminated a section on nonproliferation and disarmament.

There was also dismay over Bush administration attempts to drop any mention of specific targets for aid to developing countries. The U.S. is the largest aid giver in dollar terms but among the lowest among rich countries as a percentage of its overall economy.

DOJ_NMG_0005772

In his speech, Mr. Bush surprised developing countries by unequivocally committing to U.N. goals to end global poverty by 2015, which could mean a trebling of U.S. aid.

Bush Hits U.N. Corruption (WT)

By Bill Sammon

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK -- President Bush yesterday implored the United Nations to rid itself of corruption and scolded the global body for squandering the world's respect and making a mockery of human rights.

"When this great institution's member states choose notorious abusers of human rights to sit on the U.N. Human Rights Commission, they discredit a noble effort and undermine the credibility of the whole organization," Mr. Bush told the U.N. General Assembly.

In past years, Libya and Sudan have served on the commission.

"If member countries want the United Nations to be respected and effective, they should begin by making sure it is worthy of respect," he said.

Although Mr. Bush did not mention the multibillion-dollar oil-for-food debacle that has rocked the United Nations, he called on the world body to move past scandal.

"The United Nations must be strong and efficient, free of corruption and accountable to the people it serves," he said. "The United Nations must stand for integrity and live by the high standards it sets for others."

The president also used yesterday's speech to thank U.N. member nations for donating money to Hurricane Katrina relief efforts.

"To every nation, every province and every community across the world that is standing with the American people in this hour of need, I offer the thanks of my nation," he said. "The world is more compassionate and hopeful when we act together."

Mr. Bush also called on the United Nations to do more in the U.S.-led fight against AIDS and malaria in Africa. He said foreign aid and debt forgiveness will not eliminate global poverty without the economic catalyst of free trade.

"The United States is ready to eliminate all tariffs and subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same," he pledged. "This is key to overcoming poverty in the world's poorest nations."

Mr. Bush also pushed for various international initiatives to fight terrorism, stop the spread of nuclear weapons and curb the proliferation of chemical and biological weapons.

"We must send a clear message to the rulers of outlaw regimes that sponsor terror and pursue weapons of mass murder: You will not be allowed to threaten the peace and stability of the world," he said.

Although the United Nations did not support the U.S.-led Operation Iraqi Freedom in 2003, Mr. Bush yesterday praised the world body for supporting the fledgling democracy that has resulted from that war.

"The whole world has a vital interest in the success of a free Iraq, and no civilized nation has an interest in seeing a new terrorist state emerge in that country," he said. "The United Nations and its member states must continue to stand by the Iraqi people as they complete the journey to a fully constitutional government."

After his morning speech at U.N. headquarters, Mr. Bush spent the afternoon meeting with a variety of world leaders, including Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, British Prime Minister Tony Blair and U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

The Foreign Aid Gap (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

Did the spirit of Bono somehow possess the body of President Bush on Wednesday? How else to explain the president's speech before the United Nations? He sounded more like a crusading anti-poverty rocker — or, worse on the bleeding-heart scale, a European president — than the man whose ambassador to the U.N. has been working behind the scenes to sabotage the world's most important anti-poverty initiative.

"To spread a vision of hope, the United States is determined to help nations that are struggling with poverty," Bush told more than 160 world leaders at the U.N. summit, which runs through Friday. "We are committed to the Millennium Development Goals…. We have a moral obligation to help others — and a moral duty to make sure our actions are effective."

But not, apparently, a moral obligation to live up to our commitments, or even tell the truth about them.

The Millennium Development Goals were approved by the U.N. in 2000. They constitute a revolutionary document, setting out objectives such as halving extreme poverty, reducing disease and child mortality and boosting education in the world's poorest nations by 2015. To make them a reality, U.N. members, including the United States, agreed in 2002 at a summit in Monterrey, Mexico, that wealthy nations would "make concrete efforts" to contribute 0.7% of their national income toward foreign aid by 2015.

DOJ_NMG_0005773

At this week's summit, world leaders were supposed to adopt a set of reforms that would have improved the U.N.'s management and strengthened its ability to fight poverty and promote human rights. But John R. Bolton, appointed as ambassador to the U.N. by Bush after the Senate failed to confirm him, threw negotiators into disarray last month by introducing hundreds of last-minute amendments. Among them was the deletion of nearly all references to the millennium goals and the 0.7% target. Under pressure, Bolton relented and allowed the language to remain.

The Bush administration has made it abundantly clear that it has no intention of trying to reach the 0.7% goal. The United States has the second-worst record of the 22 donor nations whose contributions as a percentage of national income are tracked by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, giving just 0.16% in 2004 (only Italy is stingier). The European Union's 15 richest members, despite Italy's poor showing, agreed this year to contribute 0.51% of national income by 2010 and 0.7% by 2015.

Administration officials have said the 0.7% figure is arbitrary, that it represents a goal rather than a concrete commitment, that quality of aid is more important than quantity and that, at any rate, the United States has increased foreign aid dramatically. Wrong or misleading on all counts but the last.

Whether the 0.7% number is arbitrary is irrelevant; what matters is whether it's adequate. By that measure, if anything, it's too timid. The U.N. Millennium Project estimates that even if all the commitments are met, it may fall short of the amount needed to meet the Millennium Development Goals. Though the Monterrey statement wasn't very concrete, such vagueness is typical of international agreements; if heads of state don't intend to follow them, they shouldn't approve them. And the administration's statements on quality would be more convincing if its record in that area weren't so abysmal.

In its Human Development Report released last week, the U.N. identified several problems that make foreign aid less effective than it should be. Sometimes donors make aid contingent on onerous conditions; often they fail to coordinate similar projects, leading to repetition and waste. The United States is a prime offender in nearly every area. Particularly egregious is the practice of "tied aid" — the requirement that aid money be spent on goods and services from the donating country. U.S. aid money is commonly spent on expensive American contractors rather than given directly to poor nations, where it would do far more good.

The administration's best defense is that it has increased foreign aid, albeit from a paltry 0.1% of national income in 2000 to 0.16% last year. President Bush also deserves credit for making foreign aid a priority in a country where African poverty seldom shows up on the political radar screen. Yet this has the effect of making the administration's truculence on the Millennium Development Goals all the more frustrating.

The administration has not met its commitments, and the president has failed to live up to his own inspirational rhetoric. Until it has and he does, speeches like the one Bush delivered on Wednesday will continue to be seen as cynical political ploys.

Hopeful Words: On Helping The Poor (NYT)

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Let's face it: most Americans wouldn't know a Millennium Development Goal, a Monterrey Consensus or a Doha round if all three jumped out and hit them in the head. But those phrases have life-or-death importance to more than two billion people around the world who survive on barely anything. And yesterday at the United Nations, President Bush used them in front of the world.

To understand this good news, here's a quick primer.

The Millennium Development Goals make up an ambitious agenda adopted by the United Nations in 2000. Chief among them is the goal of cutting global poverty in half by 2015. They also call for tackling problems like hunger, disease and women's inequality. The goals include vague wording about how poor nations need to adopt good governance, and how rich nations need to give them money.

As this week's U.N. summit meeting approached, Mr. Bush's flame-throwing U.N. envoy, John Bolton, struck all mention of the Millennium Development Goals from the text of the agreement the world leaders are supposed to sign. After saner heads prevailed, some of that language was restored, although the agreement remains weak. Yesterday, Mr. Bush said it clearly: "We are committed to the Millennium Development Goals." Full stop.

That's important because America, the richest country on earth, is most able to help poor countries reach these goals.

That brings us to the Monterrey Consensus, named for the city in Mexico. (Diplomats like to name things after the city where they decided to do something.) In 2002, many members of the group meeting in New York this week trooped down to Monterrey to figure out how they were going to pay for the Millennium Development Goals. The text they signed said, "We urge developed countries that have not done so to make concrete efforts toward the target of 0.7 percent of gross national product as O.D.A. [official development assistance] to developing countries." Since then, Britain, France and Germany have all announced how they plan to do that by 2015. The United States, which was rated the world's second-stingiest rich country (behind Italy) by a

U.N. report this month, gives just 0.18 percent of its G.N.P. to poorer countries. And since Monterrey, Bush administration officials have taken pains to tell everyone that the United States didn't commit to the 0.7 percent goal. But it's right there in Paragraph 42 of the Monterrey Consensus. Yesterday, Mr. Bush said, "I call on all the world's nations to implement the Monterrey Consensus." Including, we hope, America.

We end today's lesson with the Doha round, the trade negotiations begun in (you got it) Doha, Qatar, in 2002. That was just after Sept. 11, 2001, when America and Europe, trying to woo poor countries to join the war against terrorism, finally agreed to start negotiating an end to farm subsidies. Those subsidies hurt farmers in poor countries because they keep the price of products artificially low, giving poor countries little chance on the world market. Since then, no one has cut anything, and the negotiations have degenerated into the usual bickering between Europe and America. Meanwhile, the poor keep starving.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush declared: "The United States is ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same. This is key to overcoming poverty in the world's poorest nations."

These were exactly the right words, and we applaud them. Now, let's get to it. The world is waiting.

Bush Switches U.N. Tone, But Will It Help Iraq In Time? (USAT)

USA Today, September 15, 2005

Three years ago, in the most undiplomatic of terms, President Bush challenged the United Nations to be relevant by standing up to Saddam Hussein and enforcing its many resolutions against him. A discomfited U.N. Security Council took the challenge. It sent in weapons inspectors. But the United States, impatient to get on with the war, invaded before they finished, cementing Bush's image in much of the world as a go-it-alone cowboy. That no weapons of mass destruction were found further damaged U.S. credibility.

Fast forward to Wednesday for a study in contrasts.

In this year's U.N. address, Bush's world view seemed transformed. He was far more solicitous as he argued that preventing Iraq from becoming a terrorist state is in the world's vital interest. He appealed to other countries to take up the "exciting opportunity for all of us" to build a democracy in Iraq. And he spent much time talking about how countries work best together and just what democracy entails beyond elections.

Bush is right. There's no question a democratic Iraq is in the world's best interest, and other countries could be an enormous help. But persuading them now is unlikely. That much was plain from the skeptical faces of many of the more than 160 world leaders gathered for the U.N. session. Their unspoken message was this: We told you invading Iraq was a bad idea. You ignored us and rushed to war. Now clean up your own mess.

Wednesday's spasm of violence in Baghdad — a dozen bombings that killed at least 160 and wounded 570 — underscored just what a mess the Iraq war has become. And just how little the world has been inclined to pitch in and help. That's in contrast to the Persian Gulf War in 1991, when the first President Bush used diplomacy to form a genuine coalition and get others to pay for most of the war that reversed Saddam's invasion of Kuwait.

In part, George W. Bush is following the path of many second-term presidents who show a better understanding of the way the world works after a steep foreign-policy learning curve. In the short run, the legacy of the administration'sin-your-face approach during Bush's first term is that the United States faces an increasingly lonely task trying to extricate itself from Iraq during his second.

Over time, however, Bush's new attitude toward international cooperation might help turn global opinion around.

After Katrina, Republicans Back A Sea Of Conservative Ideas (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Congressional Republicans, backed by the White House, say they are using relief measures for the hurricane-ravaged Gulf coast to achieve a broad range of conservative economic and social policies, both in the storm zone and beyond.

Some new measures are already taking shape. In the past week, the Bush administration has suspended some union-friendly rules that require federal contractors pay prevailing wages, moved to ease tariffs on Canadian lumber, and allowed more foreign sugar imports to calm rising sugar prices. Just yesterday, it waived some affirmative-action rules for employers with federal contracts in the Gulf region.

Now, Republicans are working on legislation that would limit victims' right to sue, offer vouchers for displaced school children, lift some environment restrictions on new refineries and create tax-advantaged enterprise zones to maximize private-sector participation in recovery and reconstruction. Yesterday, the House overwhelmingly passed a bill that would offer sweeping protection against lawsuits to any person or organization that helps Katrina victims without compensation.

DOJ_NMG_0005775

"The desire to bring conservative, free-market ideas to the Gulf Coast is white hot," says Rep. Mike Pence, the Indiana Republican who leads the Republican Study Group, an influential caucus of conservative House members. "We want to turn the Gulf Coast into a magnet for free enterprise. The last thing we want is a federal city where New Orleans once was."

Many of the ideas under consideration have been pushed by the 40-member study group, which is circulating a list of "free-market solutions," including proposals to eliminate regulatory barriers to awarding federal funds to religious groups housing hurricane victims, waiving the estate tax for deaths in the storm-affected states; and making the entire region a "flat-tax free-enterprise zone."

Members of the group met in a closed session Tuesday night at the conservative Heritage Foundation headquarters here to map strategy. Edwin Meese, the former Reagan administration attorney general, has been actively involved.

Rep. Todd Tiahrt (R., Kan.) said that the plans under development "are all part of a philosophy of lowering costs for doing business." He said southern Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama offer a "microcosm" where new ideas can be applied to speed the rebuilding.

The proposals to cut taxes and waive regulations come after Congress quickly approved $62.8 billion in federal spending for the Gulf Coast, and is expected to approve further spending that will push the price tag above $100 billion.

Some of the proposals are attracting fire from Democrats. "They're going back to the playbook on issues like tort reform, school vouchers and freeing business from environmental rules to achieve ideological objectives they haven't been able to get in the normal legislative process," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D., Ill.)

In response, Democrats are pressing for other proposals that suit their ideology. Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois has suggested creating a national emergency airlift program so that U.S. airlines can help evacuate Americans from areas before a natural disaster strike. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Louisiana Democrat Sen. Mary Landrieu unveiled a plan that would, among other things, preserve victims' Medicaid health coverage, provide $2,500 education grants to displaced students and give victims a 180-day extension on outstanding loan payments.

Trial lawyers were quick to attack the bill the House passed yesterday on a voice vote to limit lawsuits against volunteers saying it prevents airlines, hospitals, stadiums, and bus companies from being held accountable for misconduct or negligence. In a statement, the Association of Trial Lawyers of America said, "If a nursing home resident evacuated from New Orleans to a nursing home in a neighboring state dies of untreated, infected pressure sores, the out-of-state home would be protected."

The bill's chief sponsor, Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, said in a statement that the legislation removes the "threat of legal fear that stands between many willing and able Good Samaritans and the victims of Hurricane Katrina." The bill does permit lawsuits for injuries that were caused "by willful, wanton, reckless, or criminal conduct."

Some conservatives expressed concern about the growing reach of the reconstruction effort. "Everyone is attaching their own agenda to this," said William A. Niskanen, a former Reagan White House economic adviser now at the libertarian Cato Institute. "It's being seen as a test of the conservative agenda, from enterprise zones to school vouchers and the repeal of labor laws, and these ideas deserve careful thought," he said. "But [the massive spending] could also create expectations that we can do this every time a disaster hits."

Some of the proposals are unlikely to win quick passage. But congressional tax-writing committees hope to approve legislation within days to offer $5 billion in tax relief and other aid to residents of areas hit by the storm. The legislation would, among other things, let victims withdraw money from retirement accounts without penalty, give tax incentives to those who house evacuees and give companies incentives to hire displaced workers.

Republicans, meanwhile, say they will also press for a new round of energy concessions, including incentives to rebuild and expand offshore drilling and clear the way for new refineries that were dropped from a 500-page energy bill that passed last month.

House Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton of Texas and Senate Environment and Public Works Chairman James Inhofe are working on bills that would encourage refineries to build new plants and expand existing ones by rolling back environmental rules and making it easier for refineries to navigate regulatory channels in Washington.

Republicans hope Hurricane Katrina prods Congress to approve a second energy bill this fall that includes several provisions that were dropped from the first bill. The National Petrochemical & Refineries Association would like lawmakers to reduce the depreciation period from 10 years to five years in order to stimulate investment. Some refineries are talking about reviving an effort to get liability protection for producing the fuel additive methyl tertiary butyl ether, or MTBE. Both were dropped from the earlier energy bill at the insistence of Democrats.

Bush Plans Speech; Death Toll Rises (LAT)

By Lianne Hart And Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005776

BATON ROUGE, La. — As the death toll from Hurricane Katrina climbed to 710 on Wednesday, White House aides said President Bush's address to the nation tonight would call for reconstructing the Gulf Coast using conservative blueprints and private-sector initiatives.

In preparing for his speech to be delivered from New Orleans, the president consulted widely with Republican leaders and conservative thinkers.

With damage estimates as high as $200 billion, massive federal spending appears inevitable. Late Wednesday, the Senate passed a $3.5-billion measure that would provide emergency housing vouchers to more than 350,000 families. That is in addition to nearly $60 billion in emergency aid already authorized.

A day after Bush accepted blame for breakdowns in federal disaster efforts, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco took "full responsibility" for her own mistakes. Blanco did not specify those errors in her televised speech from the statehouse in Baton Rouge. City and federal officials have questioned preparations made by state officials before Katrina struck.

"We must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again," Blanco said.

Earlier in the day, officials said that Blanco and Coast Guard Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen had repaired splintering relations over management of the body retrieval effort in New Orleans, where corpses have floated for days in floodwaters and accumulated in houses and evacuated buildings.

Louisiana officials said they had taken over a lapsed federal contract with a Houston mortuary firm. The arrangement would allow the private company's crews to continue collecting the bodies of flood victims scattered across southern Louisiana.

Blanco had lashed out at the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Tuesday, arguing that its failure to come to terms with Kenyon International Emergency Services Inc. had threatened the operation. Allen, the agency's new point man in the flood-swept Gulf Coast region, at first responded that the state, not FEMA, had full authority for the recovery of bodies.

The conflict centered on who would pay for Kenyon's contract. State officials insisted that FEMA had hired Kenyon and needed to guarantee that Louisiana would be compensated for future costs. FEMA replied that the decision was the state's to make.

After the two officials spoke by phone late Tuesday, Blanco and Allen said Wednesday that they were satisfied with the results. Neither of them provided details, but during her address, Blanco pointedly said that she had asked the federal government to cover all of the state's massive disaster expenses, "just as was done after 9/11."

State officials said that Kenyon had been rehired by Louisiana and that its team of 115 mortuary specialists would stay on through November at a cost of nearly $119,000 a day. State officials would not say if FEMA had agreed to defray any of those expenses.

"To date," Allen said during a news briefing in Baton Rouge, "we've had a well-running organization."

As he defended the pace of the body recovery operation, Allen acknowledged it had started off slowly because "access was made difficult by weather and lack of communication."

Dr. Louis Cataldie, Louisiana's medical incident commander for the disaster, agreed that "things are getting better." He added that "as long as there's one body in the water, we need to be doing a better job."

Officials expect that hundreds — if not thousands — more corpses are lying beneath the floodwaters still covering about 40% of the city.

Wednesday, the official death toll from the hurricane stood at 474 in Louisiana, 218 in Mississippi, 14 in Florida, and two each in Alabama and Georgia.

"This is going to be long, arduous process," Cataldie said. "And it's going to be even longer and more arduous to do the identifications. That's going to take months, maybe years."

The discovery of 34 bodies left in St. Rita's Nursing Home and scores more in several New Orleans hospitals has provoked a widening state inquiry. Louisiana Atty. Gen. Charles C. Foti Jr. filed involuntary manslaughter charges against a couple who owns the St. Bernard Parish nursing home for allegedly failing to evacuate patients..

Foti also said he would look into the circumstances surrounding 45 bodies found inside Memorial Medical Center and an unknown number of corpses left at Charity Hospital. CNN reported that as many as 50 bodies were still at Charity on Wednesday, waiting processing by mortuary teams.

Officials from both hospitals have said that many of the bodies left behind were critically ill patients who died during chaotic evacuations after the facilities were isolated by high water. Both hospitals evacuated hundreds of other patients by boat and by helicopter.

Harry Anderson, a spokesman for Dallas-based Tenet Healthcare Corp., which operated Memorial, said Wednesday that between 10 and 12 of the patients who died were "very sick or frail." Ten more were patients who had died at the hospital before the storm struck.

DOJ_NMG_0005777

The remaining corpses, Anderson said, were those of patients from a long-term care facility operated by another firm, LifeCare Holdings Inc., on the hospital's seventh floor. LifeCare officials did not return several calls. But Anderson said many of those patients relied on electric respirators and could not be saved despite efforts by nurses to manually ventilate their breathing.

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin said on CNN's "Larry King Live" on Wednesday that he hoped to allow as many as 180,000 New Orleans residents to return to their homes "in a week or two" in city neighborhoods that were not devastated by Katrina's floods. More than 80% of the city's 500,000 residents fled before the hurricane struck, and about 50,000 were evacuated in Katrina's immediate aftermath.

A federal emergency bill passed Wednesday night in the Senate would provide emergency housing vouchers averaging $600 a month for as many as six months for more than 350,000 displaced Gulf Coast families.

The measure offered by Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) was attached on a voice vote to an unrelated spending bill. The Senate is slated to pass the overall bill today, but a final version needs to be worked out with the House, which passed its own version in June.

Congress also moved Wednesday to reinforce the health and welfare safety net for Katrina's evacuees, promising speedy action on a new bill that would significantly expand Medicaid, unemployment and welfare benefits. The proposal has the support of Senate leaders and could go to the floor as early as today. It would cost an estimated $5 billion to $7 billion through 2006.

While a Senate panel launched the first formal inquiry into the government's much-criticized response to the hurricane, the Senate Republican majority defeated a bid by Democrats to establish an independent commission to investigate the disaster effort.

In a strict party-line vote, Republicans blocked a bid by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) to establish the independent panel. After the vote, Clinton said she called for the independent probe because "it is simply not appropriate for government to investigate itself."

At the White House, officials readied for Bush' national address from New Orleans. Aides billed the speech as Bush's chance to recover from lost political momentum and wed conservative ideals to the pressing need to redesign the broken city. The televised speech, to be delivered at 6 p.m. PDT, is expected to last about 30 minutes.

"The president wants people to think big," White House spokesman Scott McClellan said. "Most importantly, he believes that it should be driven locally, in terms of the vision and the planning, with the full support of the federal government."

Advisors also want the speech to hew to conservative notions of small government and ample business opportunities. Aides have broached ideas with Republican leaders in Congress and analysts at conservative think tanks.

Ideas they discussed include a strong role for the private sector and charitable organizations along with a package of housing and education vouchers and tax breaks to encourage business activity in the region.

"Bush has a very well defined vision of what government should do and how it should do it," said Michael Franc, a vice president of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative research organization consulted by the White House. "This is a moment to teach or explain to the American people how his values apply to this catastrophic situation."

Bush's Vow: To Rebuild Better (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — President Bush will tell the nation tonight that he's committed to rebuilding New Orleans and the Gulf Coast, while eliminating the poverty and joblessness that were exposed in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

Dan Bartlett, Bush's counselor, said the president will reflect on “the horrific suffering” in the region and “outline the beginnings of a vision of the future.”

In a prime-time speech from New Orleans, Bush also will pledge more federal help providing housing, health care and education to evacuees. “We want to see a region that is better and stronger than before,” said Bush spokesman Scott McClellan.

Two Bush advisers with direct knowledge of the speech said the president is considering the appointment of a high-profile “czar” to oversee recovery efforts. But one said the White House is checking whether that would be allowed under federal law. The aides insisted on anonymity to avoid pre-empting Bush's remarks at 9:02 p.m. ET. The speech is expected to be about 30 minutes long and will be aired by the major networks.

Twelve Senate Republicans wrote to Bush Wednesday asking him to create a White House office to coordinate reconstruction.

The speech is part of a White House plan to show the president's concern and commitment to the devastated region after criticism about initial slow responses by Bush and federal agencies.

Bush's statement Tuesday that he takes responsibility for those problems was part of the plan. On Friday, he will speak at a service for storm victims at Washington's National Cathedral.

DOJ_NMG_0005778

A USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll released this week found that six in 10 African-Americans said the fact that most victims were poor and black was a factor in delays in the federal response.

"The president is very cognizant of both the realities and the perceptions," Bartlett said. The fact that so many "African-American people think there was a sense of discrimination or negligence is very troubling." But, he said, "Those feelings aren't instantly created and won't be instantly healed."

Bush To Request More Aid Funding (Washington Post)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jim Vandehei

Washington Post, September 15, 2005

President Bush will call tonight for an unprecedented federal commitment to rebuild New Orleans and other areas obliterated by Hurricane Katrina, putting the United States on pace to spend more in the next year on the storm's aftermath than it has over three years on the Iraq war, according to White House and congressional officials.

With the federal tab for Katrina already nearly quadruple the cost of the country's previous most expensive natural disaster cleanup, Bush plans to offer federal assistance to help flood victims find jobs, get housing and health care, and attend school, according to White House aides.

In a speech from the flood zone, Bush will commit the federal government to what many predict will become the largest reconstruction effort ever on U.S. soil.

The president will call on Washington to resist spending money unwisely, but some in his own party are already starting to recoil at a price tag expected to exceed $200 billion -- about the cost of the Iraq war and reconstruction efforts. As emergency expenditures soar -- with new commitments as high as $2 billion a day -- some budget analysts and conservative groups are warning that the Katrina spending has combined with earlier fiscal decisions in ways that will wreak havoc on the government's finances for years to come.

Bush and Republican congressional leaders, by contrast, are calculating that the U.S. economy can safely absorb a sharp spike in spending and budget deficits, and that the only way to regain public confidence after the stumbling early response to the disaster is to spend whatever it takes to rebuild the region and help Katrina's victims get back on their feet.

"I think absolutely it's going to convert the political landscape in Washington," Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) said of Katrina's impact. "We do have a social safety net in this country. Those aren't just words. Government has a role to play in people's lives."

Hours before Bush speaks, the Louisiana congressional delegation will present its tab for reconstruction and rebuilding efforts, which could put pressure on Bush to spend money in areas not currently on his agenda. In addition, aides said yesterday that nearly 2.5 million have registered with the Federal Emergency Management Agency for help and that Education Department officials estimate the number of displaced students to be approaching 400,000. Officials from several departments raced yesterday to complete proposals that Bush can talk about in his speech and in the days to follow.

The Education Department, for instance, is readying plans to waive No Child Left Behind requirements for some states; to provide cash assistance to school districts absorbing students; and to finance new schoolbooks, demolition and reconstruction of school buildings, and temporary trailers and new teachers for schools bursting with Katrina evacuees, Republican aides said.

The way in which the administration plans to spend money -- and not just the amount -- is raising caution flags. In a letter he plans to send to Bush today, Rep. Mike Turner (R-Ohio) said the president should scrap the administration's plan to deploy as many as 300,000 mobile homes to temporarily house people. Turner said the victims would be better served by market-rate and subsidized housing already in place in other regions of the country. A dozen Republicans also lobbied Bush to appoint a disaster czar to oversee the reconstruction and relief efforts in the South, an idea the president has, thus far, resisted.

Administration officials concede that the hurricane and its aftermath could push the budget deficit back above $400 billion next year, or about 3 percent of the country's gross domestic product, just as the tide of federal red ink that rolled over Washington during Bush's first term had begun to recede.

Since Katrina struck, Congress has already spent $62.3 billion, dwarfing the inflation-adjusted $17.8 billion that Congress spent on hurricanes Andrew, Iniki and Omar, which struck in 1992, and the $15.2 billion emergency appropriation for the Northridge, Calif., earthquake of 1994. The entire Persian Gulf War of 1991 cost less than $83 billion in today's dollars.

The libertarian Cato Institute warned yesterday of a looming "budget disaster." In meetings with GOP congressional leaders and White House aides, some Republican lawmakers have expressed alarm about the growing price tag and concern that vast sums could be wasted without proper oversight.

White House officials have told Congress that the $51.8 billion approved late last week will fund the disaster relief effort only through the first week of October, and senior congressional appropriations aides have told the White House that they need to see the next request by next week. Republicans say the next bill could exceed $50 billion.

The scale of the disaster has not even come into focus, largely because many agencies have not been allowed into the disaster zone to assess the damage, according to congressional appropriations aides, who are trying to examine the costs to the government, agency by agency.

Nearly 1,000 drinking-water and sewer systems -- 391 in Mississippi, 606 in Louisiana and one in Alabama -- remain shut down. Repairing and rebuilding such systems could cost between $3 billion and $10 billion, much of it on the tab of the Environmental Protection Agency.

Before Katrina struck, the federal highway emergency relief fund already faced a $120 million backlog of road repairs. With so many crumbled bridges and washed-out highways after the storm, the fund's deficit will now be in the billions, appropriations aides said.

The Air Force will seek as much as $4 billion to repair damaged Gulf-state facilities, a House Appropriations Committee aide said. An additional $2 billion to $4 billion will be needed to finance the mobilization of the National Guard, the evacuation of military personnel and military-family support programs. Damage to national parks, forests and wildlife refuges is estimated to approach $300 million.

Once the administration makes its request, congressional officials expect a cascade of demands from lawmakers. Farm-state members have signaled that they will seek substantial relief for midwestern grain farmers, whose shipments of grain down the Mississippi River were disrupted by Katrina. Even before the storm, parched farms in Illinois, Missouri and parts of Iowa had prompted farm-state lawmakers to seek relief.

Lawmakers from the Northeast have said they will push for $800 million or more in assistance to offset the soaring price of home heating oil. And state governments from Washington and South Dakota to West Virginia and South Carolina are expected to seek federal dollars to offset the cost of housing Katrina survivors.

The White House has declared 41 states and the District of Columbia either major disaster areas or in states of emergency, allowing federal aid to flow to any state that takes in an evacuee.

Against calls to trim spending elsewhere to accommodate the emergency, House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) did little to close those floodgates when he suggested this week that the Republican-controlled Congress had already trimmed all the fat from federal spending. "My answer to those that want to offset the spending is 'Sure, bring me the offsets,' " he said. "I will be glad to do it, but no one is able to come up with any yet."

Against this tide, conservative think tanks are taking up DeLay's challenge. But their suggested spending cuts may only underscore Congress's flagging resolve.

To reach $62 billion in savings, Cato Institute analysts Chris Edwards and Stephen Slivinski have proposed cutting NASA in half, slashing energy research and subsidies just as Congress is gearing up to increase them in the face of soaring gasoline prices, cutting the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' budget by $4.6 billion after its levees failed to protect New Orleans, and eliminating $4.2 billion in homeland security grants while lawmakers are debating the nation's lack of preparedness.

Help Is On The Way, But It's Unclear Where (USAT)

By Mimi Hall, Kevin Johnson And Mike Linn

USA Today, September 15, 2005

More than 100 tractor-trailers packed with water, ice and other critical hurricane-relief supplies have been sitting at an Air Force base in Montgomery, Ala., for nearly a week while the federal government pays $600 a day for each truck.

The idle trucks, called up by the Federal Emergency Management Agency to deliver supplies, are just the latest example of the waste, bureaucratic errors and miscommunication that continue to foul Hurricane Katrina relief efforts.

“When somebody gets paid 600 bucks to sit and not burn fuel, that's a pretty good profit margin,” said Alabama Food Services President Buck Hamilton, who is being paid by FEMA for about six truckloads of ice.

His shipments waited at similar truck staging areas in Mississippi. “Would you like to get paid $600 a day to sit and do nothing?” he said. “It's hard to criticize.”

Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., doesn't think so. He said Wednesday that Congress should create a special inspector general for hurricane relief, similar to the position overseeing spending on Iraq reconstruction. “It is imperative that those most in need receive assistance and that no resources are wasted,” Pence said.

FEMA spokesman Butch Kinerney said the agency needs to have plenty of trucks at the ready. Many of those that have been waiting at Maxwell-Gunter Air Force Base are now headed for Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina to “pre-position” for Hurricane Ophelia. “We stage vehicles and equipment and supplies all over the country really any time a disaster is pending,” he said.

Other FEMA problems:

DOJ_NMG_0005780

·A convoy of 100 trucks full of supplies spent a week traveling to Meridian, Miss., and Selma, Ala., before being sent to Memphis last Saturday night.

The city's emergency chief, Claude Talford, was roused around midnight to find out that the trucks were lining up on one of his city's main streets. He didn't know they were coming, and neither did state officials. “They just showed up on our doorstep,” he said.

·In St. Louis, officials were asked by FEMA last week to prepare for up to 2,500 evacuees. After a small city was constructed in an airport hangar, FEMA called and said no evacuees were coming. The city has spent “hundreds of thousands of dollars,” said Gary Christmann, chief of the city's emergency management department. “We considered that this was an outstanding drill.”

·In Oregon, FEMA requests for assistance changed virtually daily. Holly Armstrong, spokeswoman for Gov. Ted Kulongoski, said FEMA called on Sept. 2 to request shelter in the Portland area for 1,000 evacuees. Officials scrambled, and Nike offered to donate clothes.

Two days later, FEMA said to hold off. On Sept. 7, FEMA said 500 evacuees would show up Sept. 10. Then FEMA told the state no one was coming.

The governor is now reviewing his own state's readiness. Among the considerations, Armstrong said: “How much do you really want to count on FEMA?”

Katrina Erodes Support In U.S. For Iraq War (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Hurricane Katrina has accelerated the erosion in public support for the Iraq war as President Bush's core of supporters dwindles and economic pessimism turns Americans' attention inward.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll1 shows that cutting spending on Iraq is Americans' top choice for financing the recovery from Katrina. Shaken by high gas prices and bracing for further jolts, Americans have turned negative about Mr. Bush across the board -- on handling the economy, foreign policy, and even the war on terrorism.

The president's overall approval has fallen to a record-low for Mr. Bush of 40%, reflecting a shrunken core of base supporters. That promises to have repercussions for his domestic agenda on issues like Social Security, taxes and immigration, and leaves Mr. Bush with a steeper challenge on his most significant second-term priority: using American power and resources to transform Iraq and the broader Middle East.

A plurality of Americans has favored reducing troop levels in Iraq for most of the year. Now, 55% favor bringing soldiers home, while just 36% back Mr. Bush's position that current levels should be maintained to help secure peace and stability.

"His standing to prosecute that case has been made more difficult," says Republican pollster Bill McInturff, who helps conduct the Journal/NBC Poll. Adds Democratic counterpart Peter Hart: It's "going to be very hard to just move straight forward" on Iraq.

To be sure, the survey contains some bright spots for Mr. Bush. Federal appeals court Judge John Roberts, his nominee to succeed the late William Rehnquist as chief justice of the Supreme Court, has drawn respectable support and little intense opposition. Some 38% say they support Judge Roberts for that post, while just 20% oppose him and 41% don't know enough to say.

And while Senate Democrats press Judge Roberts in Judiciary Committee hearings to state his views on key issues, 57% of Americans say the nominee shouldn't be required to spell them out since those issues may come before the court. Democrats enjoy firmer support in public opinion for their demand for more documents about Judge Roberts's previous government service; 41% say the White House should make additional documents public, outpacing the 31% who say Democrats already have enough information.

Yet the poll's findings about Americans' priorities show the work facing Mr. Bush, who is scheduled to deliver a nationally televised address tonight on the recovery from Katrina. Some 60% say rebuilding the Gulf Coast should be a higher national priority than establishing democracy in Iraq; 5% say Iraq, while 34% say the two are equally important.

The White House says the administration can handle both at once, but by 51%-37% Americans say the Iraq war wasn't worth its human and financial costs.

The proportion of Republicans disapproving of Mr. Bush's job performance has doubled to 15% from 7% in January, with pronounced defections among moderates within Mr. Bush's party.

Katrina has contributed to that decline in support. By a 58%-38% margin, Americans say they are dissatisfied with the Bush administration's response to the catastrophe. Reflecting the absence of the traditional rally behind the commander in chief during national emergencies, just 48% approve of the president's handling of the matter; 80% approved of how he handled the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, while 64% backed the actions of his father, President George H.W. Bush, following Hurricane Andrew in 1992. The survey of 1,013 adults, conducted Sept. 9-12, has a margin for error of 3.1 percentage points.

In particular, Katrina appears to have shaken public regard on two attributes that sustained Mr. Bush through earlier political challenges. The public now splits evenly, 41%-41%, on assessments of Mr. Bush's ability to handle a crisis; at the outset of his second term in January, he received positive marks for crisis-management ability by a 56%-28% margin. A bare 43%-40% plurality rates him positively for having "strong leadership qualities," down from 52%-30% in January.

The crisis along the Gulf Coast may have also damaged the long-term effort by Mr. Bush's strategists to expand Republican support among members of minority groups. Fully 70% of African-Americans say the Bush administration would have reacted to Katrina with greater urgency had the affected areas been mostly white suburbs rather than mostly black inner-city neighborhoods. Nearly seven in 10 whites reject that assertion.

Hispanics are divided evenly on the question. But the president's overall rating among Hispanics, who were split on his job performance in January, is now negative by a two-to-one margin.

Mr. Bush's signature domestic priority, overhauling the Social Security system with private investment accounts, was already in political trouble before the hurricane. Assessments of the administration's handling of Social Security -- 28% say they are satisfied while 60% aren't -- are more negative than assessments of how it handled the response to Katrina.

Beyond Social Security, the domestic political landscape has been buffeted in a way that complicates challenges facing the White House and Republicans in the 2006 midterm elections. Following the gas-price spikes immediately after the hurricane, six in 10 Americans now expect pump prices to continue rising.

In fact, the public now ranks gas prices as the country's top economic issue. Just 6% assign top importance to federal taxes, the issue that Mr. Bush and Republicans planned to elevate next year through a yet-unspecified overhaul of the tax system.

Of particular concern to lawmakers facing voters next year, Americans have turned pessimistic on the outlook for the economy. Some 49% expect the economy to get worse over the next 12 months, triple the 16% who expect it to improve. In January, those numbers were essentially reversed.

At the same time, Katrina may have left the public feeling slightly more nervous about security at home. Fully 75% of Americans now say the U.S. isn't adequately prepared for a nuclear, biological or chemical attack, up from 66% who expressed that concern in 2002.

The net effect may be increased pressure on members of the Republican majority to strike an independent course on a range of issues, resisting appeals for party discipline that have been effective for most of Mr. Bush's presidency. Those pressures will be greatest in the Northeast and Midwest, where Mr. Bush's approval rating stands at 32% and 36%, respectively.

"All these [results] suggest unstable days ahead in the Republican caucus," says Mr. McInturff, whose firm advises many Republican lawmakers.

Support For Bush Continues To Drop, Poll Shows (NYT)

By Todd S. Purdum And Marjorie Connelly

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - A summer of bad news from Iraq, high gasoline prices, economic unease and now the devastation of Hurricane Katrina has left President Bush with overall approval ratings for his job performance and handling of Iraq, foreign policy and the economy at or near the lowest levels of his presidency, according to the latest New York Times/CBS News Poll.

For the first time, just half of Americans approve of Mr. Bush's handling of terrorism, which has been his most consistent strength since he scored 90 percent approval ratings in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks. More than 6 in 10 now say that he does not share their priorities for the country, 10 percentage points worse than on the eve of his re-election last fall, while barely half say he has strong qualities of leadership, about the same as said so at the early low-ebb of his presidency in the summer of 2001.

More Americans now distrust the federal government to do the right thing than at any time since the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. And the poll revealed a sharp racial divide. While half of all respondents disapprove of the way Mr. Bush has handled the aftermath of Katrina, nearly three quarters of blacks do. (Mr. Bush won only about 10 percent of the black vote last year.)

The hurricane, alone, does not appear to have taken any significant toll on Mr. Bush's overall job approval rating, which remains stuck virtually where it has been since early summer. But the findings do suggest that the slow federal response to the hurricane has increased public doubts about the Bush administration's effectiveness. Fifty-six percent of Americans said they were now less confident about the government's ability to respond to a terrorist attack or natural disaster.

Taken together, the numbers suggest that a public that has long seen Mr. Bush as a determined leader, whether it agreed with him or not, has growing doubts about his capacity to deal with pressing problems. More than 6 in 10 said they were uneasy about his ability to make the right decisions about the war in Iraq, and half expressed similar unease about his ability to deal with the problems of the storm's victims.

Mr. Bush's support remained strong among Republicans, conservatives, evangelical Christians and those who said they voted for him last fall. Nearly twice as many people - 63 percent - said the country was "pretty seriously" on the wrong track as those who said it was headed in the right direction, equal to the worst level of Mr. Bush's presidency during a spate of bad news last year.

Over all, 41 percent of respondents approved of Mr. Bush's performance in office, while 53 percent disapproved. Those figures are in line with other national polls conducted in the last week, roughly equal to the worst ratings Mr. Bush has ever received, comparable to Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton's worst ratings, but well above the worst ever posted by the president's father, Jimmy Carter and Richard M. Nixon.

The Times/CBS News Poll was conducted Friday through Tuesday with 1,167 adults, including 877 whites and 211 blacks. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points for all respondents and whites, and seven percentage points for blacks. The survey was mostly completed before Mr. Bush said on Tuesday that he accepted responsibility for flaws in the federal response to the hurricane.

Dan Bartlett, Mr. Bush's counselor and chief communications strategist, said the White House was not especially surprised by the poll's findings.

"Obviously, as we have said, with a sharp increase in the cost of gasoline and anxiety about the war, that is obviously reflected in the polls, and then we have a sustained amount of heavy coverage of what has been described as a major failure of government at all levels, it shouldn't surprise people that that would be reflected in the poll numbers on the president, and particularly on terrorism," Mr. Bartlett said.

"The president is going to continue to focus on his responsibilities as not only president but commander in chief, when it comes to making sure we do everything we can to help the people hit by Katrina, as well as continue to conduct the war on terrorism in an aggressive way," he added.

While the poll found that 70 percent said the Federal Emergency Management Agency was too slow in responding to the aftermath of the hurricane, 53 percent said the agency was now doing all it could reasonably be expected to do.

The same did not hold true for the Bush administration itself; 68 percent said it had not yet developed a clear plan for finding housing and jobs for people left homeless by the hurricane. Mr. Bush is to address the nation from New Orleans on Thursday night to elaborate on the government's planned response to the disaster.

Before the storm hit, polls had shown that rising gasoline prices were becoming increasingly worrisome to a majority of Americans, and the hurricane has only worsened that concern. Almost half the public said the economy was deteriorating, the worst that number has been in four years. Fifty-six percent expect the economy to decline as a result of the hurricane, and nearly three-quarters anticipate taxes will rise for the same reason.

The poll also pointed up starkly different attitudes toward Mr. Bush and the government among blacks and whites that were not so much caused by the storm as laid bare by it. While two-thirds of all Americans said Mr. Bush cares at least somewhat about the people left homeless by the hurricane, fewer than one-third of blacks agreed. Two-thirds of blacks said race was a major factor in the government's slow response to the flooding in New Orleans, while an almost identical number of whites said it was not.

Storm victims had to wait for a week for help to arrive, said Allison McKinney, 33, a housewife and former teacher in Fort Bragg, N.C. "I don't think that would happen to any other city, because New Orleans is a poor city." Ms. McKinney, who is black, grew up in New Orleans and was among those who agreed to be interviewed after participating in the poll. "It took Katrina for people to realize that the city had a major impact on the rest of the country. I think it's sad that you would wait for the total devastation of a city to come to that realization."

But Juanita Harrington, 78, a retired Verizon employee and Bush supporter in Larkspur, Colo., said critics of the president "focus everything as if he were a magician and could wave a magic wand and change things."

She added: "The people that were there locally didn't take care of matters there, either. I'm talking about the mayor of New Orleans, I'm talking about the governor, I'm talking about that crazy woman senator from Louisiana - she was an idiot. He may not have succeeded totally, but nobody else did, either."

The poll suggested the cumulative effects of months of bad news from the continuing insurgency in Iraq. Exactly 50 percent of Americans approve of Mr. Bush's handling of terrorism, for example, and while that figure is the single worst ranking since the question was first asked four years ago, it is only slightly worse than it was early this summer. But that is 11 points worse than it was in February, just after the first successful round of elections in Iraq.

The data also suggest that the residual support that has steadily buoyed Mr. Bush in the four years since the Sept. 11 attacks may have reached its limit, for now. Fifty-three percent of Americans still say he has strong qualities of leadership, down 9 percentage points since he was re-elected and essentially equal to his all-time previous low in the summer of 2001, when his presidency seemed becalmed before the attacks.

At the same time, 45 percent of Americans now say Mr. Bush does not have strong leadership qualities, six percentage points more than last fall, and the highest percentage since the Times/CBS poll first asked the question during Mr. Bush's initial campaign in 1999.

Those general impressions now extend across the board in reviews of Mr. Bush's handling of particular issues. Thirty-eight percent of Americans approve of his handling of foreign policy; 35 percent of his handling of the economy; and 36 percent of his handling of the situation in Iraq. All those are at or roughly equal to his all-time lows - and below his all-time highs by double digits.

Some of the pessimism seemed clearly fueled by higher gasoline prices. Nearly two-thirds of those polled said they had cut back on household spending as a result of higher prices, and 8 in 10 said the administration had no plan for keeping prices down, though more than 6 in 10 said the price of gas is something a president can do a lot about.

A majority of the public is willing to pay more in taxes to assist hurricane victims with job training and housing; about 4 in 10 said they would be willing to pay as much as $200 a year more to help out with the storm's aftermath.

Poll: Rebuilding New Orleans High Priority (AJC/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON — Americans say rebuilding New Orleans is more important to them than cutting taxes or changing Social Security, a poll found. Cutting taxes and changing Social Security were both priorities of the Bush administration before the storm.

Almost two-thirds, 63 percent, said rebuilding the city devastated by Hurricane Katrina is more important to them than changing Social Security, and almost three-fourths, 73 percent, said rebuilding the flooded city is more important to them than cutting taxes, according to a CBS-New York Times poll released Wednesday.

A large majority of Americans, 73 percent, said they think their taxes will increase as a result of Katrina. More than half of those polled said they were willing to pay more taxes to help with Katrina recovery, job training and housing for victims.

Three-fourths said they are not willing to pay more for gasoline to help with the recovery, however.

The poll found whites and blacks have sharply different views of government efforts to help victims recover from the hurricane. While six in 10 whites say the government is doing all it can to help with the recovery, only a third of blacks felt that way.

Seven in 10 blacks polled said they have little or no confidence that the Bush administration will help hurricane victims find housing and jobs.

Two-thirds of all those polled said they doubt the Bush administration has a clear plan to find homes and jobs for victims.

The poll of 1,167 adults was conducted Sept. 9-11 and had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

What Responsibility? (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Following the botched Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba in 1961, John F. Kennedy took full responsibility for the debacle. "I am the responsible officer," the president said. Similarly, in 1983, Ronald Reagan said "I accept responsibility" for the catastrophic terrorist attack on the Marine barracks in Beirut. Now, as if in the grand tradition of presidents affirming that the buck stops where Truman said it did -- the Oval Office -- George Bush has taken responsibility for the shortcomings in the federal effort regarding Hurricane Katrina. If he means what he said, then Katrina washed up a whole new George Bush.

But a little skepticism is in order here. After all, the George Bush we have come to know sorely lacks a rearview mirror. Not only is he disinclined to look back, but when he does so he sees nothing but triumph and astounding successes. Even his debacles -- and the war in Iraq for some reason comes to mind -- get transformed from what they once were to what he would like them to be. We are getting murdered in Baghdad not on account of weapons of mass destruction but to bring democracy to the Middle East. Who would not want to die for that?

For Bush there is only today and tomorrow. Yesterday is someone else's responsibility -- maybe still Clinton's. Even in his White House statement saying "I take responsibility," he also said that "Katrina exposed serious problems in our response capability." Funny, I thought the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, did that. It was then that we learned about inadequate communications systems, among other things. It was then that our minds were focused on the incomprehensible and that people -- not to mention governments -- started thinking about the evacuation of whole cities. Bush makes a lousy Boy Scout. Prepared he wasn't.

If Bush were the CEO of a major corporation, his board would fire him. It would want to know what the hell he's been doing for the past four years and what he's done with the untold billions given to the Department of Homeland Security. After seeing how the feds stood by while sick people died in New Orleans hospitals, the board might want to fire itself -- but that is not practical. The board in this case is the American people.

Actually, I find myself feeling a bit sorry for Bush. The man must be perplexed about why he is being held accountable for a natural disaster and not for one wholly of his making. The war in Iraq, after all, is entirely his doing -- everything from its inception to its execution, which have both been inexcusable examples of incompetence. The very basis for the war -- Iraq's alleged weapons of mass destruction -- turns out to have been nonexistent. And that was followed by a military campaign that was insufficient to meet the challenge. Outside the Bush administration itself, it is virtually impossible to find anyone in Washington who believes enough troops were sent to do the task.

Why should we believe that Bush will take names and boot buttocks about Katrina when he has not done so over Iraq? On the contrary, the principal architects of the inadequate military plan remain in the Pentagon -- Rumsfeld and his crew. Others have gone on to plushy appointments -- the World Bank for Paul Wolfowitz, for instance, or the entire State Department for Condi Rice. Still others have been given the once-hallowed Presidential Medal of Freedom, now as tainted as a pardon from Bill Clinton.

If anyone at the top has been held responsible for an intelligence debacle without precedent, then his name is unknown to me -- or, for that matter, to the president. Only the hapless Michael Brown failed to understand Bush. If he had hung on to his FEMA job, in another month or two Bush would surely have honored him on the White House lawn. ("Brownie, you did a heck of a job.")

Anyone in Congress who thinks this administration is capable of really investigating itself has learned nothing from the past four years. Bush will not acknowledge mistakes because, probably, he doesn't think he makes them. For him, good intentions are everything. But people died in the wake of Katrina because Washington could not get helicopters or trucks to hospitals. Bush says he is willing to take responsibility for that. Maybe so. But it's not responsibility that matters, it's accountability -- a kick instead of a medal. From what we know about Bush, it is history -- not the president -- that will have to deliver that.

Hopeful Words: On Taking Responsibility (NYT)

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

When President Bush addresses the country from New Orleans tonight, he will have the opportunity to build on the good beginning he made earlier this week, when he took responsibility for the federal government's failures in responding to Hurricane Katrina. In an administration that has hated to acknowledge that it ever does anything wrong, it was refreshing to hear Mr. Bush freely admit that Katrina demonstrated that there is a question about whether the nation is really prepared to respond to a terrorist attack or another natural disaster. It is only by squarely acknowledging past failure that the country will be able to do better in the future.

The wording of the president's statement on Tuesday was important, and at least a bit worrisome. Mr. Bush accepted responsibility "to the extent that the federal government didn't fully do its job right," which may suggest that he thinks the jury is still out on what the federal government's role should have been. Obviously, it will take time to completely analyze all of the federal system failures, and no one imagines that the city and state were perfectly prepared for the disaster. But we certainly hope that the president was not taking responsibility for a government that he doesn't really think was responsible.

Localities have plenty of duties that are uniquely their own, and if a building catches on fire or a sewer pipe breaks, no one blames the president if the response isn't adequate. But no one community, or even any one state, can protect against hurricanes or vast flooding, any more than a city or state can protect itself against international terrorism.

It would be wonderful if the president would take the opportunity tonight to endorse an independent inquiry into the Katrina disaster, similar to the 9/11 commission's work. It would also be heartening if Mr. Bush announced that from now on, the federal government, which pays the bill for flood control projects, would make sure that the most important priorities were taken care of first - even if it required the kind of commission used to arbitrate Pentagon base closings to make sure that Congressional pork didn't trump necessity. It would be amazing if Mr. Bush really showed his sense of responsibility for this disaster by apologizing for stuffing the Federal Emergency Management Agency with inexperienced political appointees.

None of these possibilities are very likely - particularly the last one. But it's critical that the president at least acknowledge, clearly, that the federal government is where the responsibility for disaster management rests. Real accountability begins by stressing that the buck stops in Washington.

Hurricane Bush (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

President Bush addresses the nation on Hurricane Katrina tonight, and after keeping too quiet for too long there's a lot for him to say. We hope he tells Americans that such a demonstrable failure at all levels of government is a rare opportunity to change that government, not another excuse to expand it willy-nilly.

Two weeks after the hurricane, we have a clearer picture of both the storm damage and the bureaucratic mistakes. The former is happily lower in human terms than the 10,000 deaths predicted by New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, as of Tuesday much lower at 423 (659 throughout the region). The Gulf Coast has begun to rebuild, and even many residents of the Big Easy are returning to clean up the mess.

The political trauma that has followed Katrina is almost entirely a result of the slow, haphazard government response in the first days after the storm hit. Mayor Nagin had an evacuation plan sitting in a drawer but never got the buses in place to implement it. He then blamed everyone else. Louisiana Governor Kathleen Blanco froze amid the crisis and failed to deploy the National Guard properly to protect those stranded at the Convention Center and Superdome. She is still blaming everyone else.

FEMA was overwhelmed by the magnitude of the storm, and former director Michael Brown showed he was clueless about events that he could see merely by turning on his TV set. Notably, he is the only public official so far to lose his job, just as Mr. Bush is the only elected official who has so far accepted any public "responsibility." Alas, tonight the President isn't likely to assail the Department of Homeland Security that he helped to create, but he at least ought to admit that federal and state disaster duties and communication need to be better sorted out. He could also praise the Pentagon's relief success.

Only in Washington, however, could so much government failure be used to justify expanding the size and scope of government. Some emergency money is essential. But Congress has already appropriated some $62 billion, with essentially zero accountability, to be spent by such models of compassion as the Department of Housing and Urban Development. Another $100 billion may soon follow. Ted Kennedy has proposed that Congress create another Tennessee Valley Authority for the Gulf region. Give them one more week to panic, and Republicans on Capitol Hill will be demanding another Great Society.

Mr. Bush has a chance tonight to turn all of this around. Instead of channeling more cash through the same failed bureaucracies, he should declare the entire Gulf Coast region an enterprise zone, with low tax rates for new investments and waivers for any regulatory obstacles to rebuilding. He can also learn from California's 1994 earthquake experience -- which former Governor Pete Wilson described on this page on Tuesday -- and demand emergency powers to waive rules and allow bonus payments for contractors that finish projects ahead of time.

Above all, he can reframe the entire debate on how to help the poor of New Orleans. The people who couldn't flee the storm were not ignored by "small government conservatism," as if that actually still exists outside of Hong Kong. The city's poor have been smothered by decades of corrupt, paternal government -- local, state and federal.

While Chicago and other cities leveled their public housing projects, the Big Easy has continued to run nasty places like the Lafitte homes. The city's crime rate is 10 times the national average, even as New York and other big cities have seen their rates fall. Its public schools are as bad as any, and its city government more corrupt than most. The last thing the poor need is to be returned to such tender, loving care.

This would include killing the idea, floated by the White House, of buying 300,000 mobile homes for the displaced. Governor Blanco wants to build communities of thousands of trailers for a year or more near Baton Rouge and Shreveport. Such shelter makes sense in some parts of the Gulf Coast where there literally is no housing stock left. But it is an act of insanity -- defined as repeating the same mistake over and over -- to recreate trailer-park versions of Lafitte on military bases, isolating the poor once again and returning them to dependence on the government. Far better to give them vouchers to find housing of their own, especially where there is unused rental space.

The same goes for the city's 77,000 displaced public school students. Their parents should be given vouchers for the equivalent of their tuition, with the option of using it at any school where they can find an opening, public or private. Charter schools should be allowed to expand immediately, and the Bush Administration could seek an emergency federal waiver of state charter laws to let them accept New Orleans kids now swamping other public schools.

There are other good ideas, but the key point is for Mr. Bush and Republicans to get back on the political and intellectual offensive. With media help, Democrats and the left have used Katrina to portray a systemic collapse of "conservative" government. It was certainly a collapse of government, but more accurately of bureaucracy and the welfare state. If Mr. Bush uses his bully pulpit to explain this, Americans will understand and follow.

Three Louisville Women Charged In Katrina Relief Scam (LCJ)

By Alex Davis, The Courier-Journal

Louisville Courier Journal, September 15, 2005

Three Louisville women have been charged with felony fraud, accused of trying to cheat the American Red Cross in Jeffersonville, Ind., out of hundreds of dollars in Hurricane Katrina aid.

Red Cross officials said yesterday that they believe that the case is part of a pattern of deceit in Clark County, Ind., that may include at least seven other individuals and families.

Some people who received Red Cross debit cards in Jeffersonville over the last two weeks have used them to shop at Victoria's Secret, Circuit City and other stores that are "not typical" destinations for disaster victims, said Phyllis Wilkins, executive director of the agency's Clark County chapter.

"It's broken my heart to see that happen," she said of the suspected fraud. "It's definitely affected our staff and our caseworkers."

Wilkins said the three women came to her office Tuesday but did not receive money. According to a Jeffersonville Police Department report, the women said they were from Louisiana and asked for clothes and money. They later admitted that the stories weren't true, the report states.

Latoyia Taylor, 19, of the 400 block of South 12th Street, was charged with felony fraud. Charges of fraud and false informing were filed against Norma Jean Calloway-Tillman, 34, of the 1700 block of Bolin Avenue, and Denise Huguley, 24, of the 900 block of Cedar Street. All three were taken to the Clark County Jail.

In Louisville, police have arrested one person in a similar case involving a Red Cross debit card worth $360. Derick Clayton, 25, of the 3400 block of Bardstown Road, was charged Tuesday with fraudulent use of a credit card, a felony.

Officer Dwight Mitchell of Louisville Metro Police said he was not aware of other fraud cases linked to the hurricane.

But Jan Walther, spokeswoman for the Louisville Area chapter of the Red Cross, said one other suspect is being pursued. She said many more people have walked away from Red Cross relief sites after they failed to produce valid identification.

National fraud statistics for the Red Cross hurricane relief effort were not available yesterday.

But Tara Lynch, a spokeswoman at the agency's Washington headquarters, said there could be an increase in fraud because of the sheer magnitude of the disaster. She said the problem is taken "very, very seriously."

The value of Red Cross debit cards is typically linked to the size of a family, and it ranges from about $300 to $1,500. Acceptable purchases include food and clothing, Wilkins said, and, in some cases, toys for children or meals at a restaurant.

Wilkins said her staff became suspicious after receiving tips that some card users were actually local residents with few or no links to areas damaged by Katrina.

In one such case, she said, a pregnant woman was staying with her boyfriend at a hotel in Sellersburg while four of her children were living at a hotel in Louisville. She said the woman's debit card was cut off after a tip from a relative.

Records compiled by the Red Cross in Jeffersonville show that one debit card was used Saturday to buy $1,065 worth of items at Best Buy. Another $177 in purchases were made Friday at Victoria's Secret, and a third card was used for $233 in meals over a four-day period at Ernesto's Mexican Grill, Hooters and other restaurants in Southern Indiana.

Wilkins said most of the suspects told aid workers they had lost all forms of identification and needed help. She said the chapter takes a digital photo of applicants without identification and tries to verify their addresses.

But she said that the Clark County chapter doesn't have access to a national database of disaster victims maintained by the Red Cross and that the agency's policy is to "always err on the side of compassion" when in doubt.

Several measures are now being taken to combat thefts in Clark County.

Police began stationing a uniformed officer at the chapter's disaster resource center yesterday, and Capt. Bruce Wilkerson of the Jeffersonville Police Department said names of applicants were being entered into a national crime database run by the FBI.

Wilkins said she's working with regional and national Red Cross officials and law-enforcement agencies on criminal charges for other suspects who haven't been arrested. She said her chapter also is sharing names and other information with the Louisville chapter, which has its own staff and operates separately.

Walther said the Louisville chapter has access to the national Red Cross database and that the agency will seek restitution for thefts.

She said the number of suspicious hurricane claims -- two as of yesterday -- was low compared with the more than 2,300 people receiving aid.

Senators Seek Post-Katrina "Marshall Plan" (REU-Y2)

DOJ_NMG_0005787

By Joanne Kenen

Reuters, September 15, 2005

Senate Republican leaders on Wednesday urged President George W. Bush to establish a "Marshall Plan" for the recovery after Hurricane Katrina, similar to the massive post-World War II effort to rebuild western Europe.

In a letter to Bush, Majority Leader Bill Frist and the rest of the Senate Republican leadership called for a "Marshall Plan" to establish a "coordinated and comprehensive plan to help the Gulf Coast region."

They did not spell out precisely what such a plan would entail, but lawmakers are beginning to consider ways of assembling a public-private partnership to redevelop the shattered region in the coming years.

Senators from both parties will visit the Gulf Coast on Friday for a first-hand inspection of the devastation.

The Republican-controlled Senate also rejected a proposal by Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York and other Democrats to set up an independent panel modeled on the 9/11 Commission to investigate the bungled evacuation and emergency response to Katrina.

Separately, bipartisan group of senators proposed an emergency package of health care benefits for storm victims. The bill would ease eligibility requirements for the Medicaid health care program for the poor and help those with private insurance maintain their coverage.

The Senate may take up the bill, which also provides an additional 13 weeks of unemployment benefits for storm victims, on Thursday.

INVESTIGATING STORM RESPONSE

Republicans have proposed a joint House-Senate special panel but Democrats are demanding an independent investigation.

Despite the bickering over how to investigate the disaster, Frist and Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada announced they would lead a 14-member delegation to Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama on Friday. Both Louisiana's senators, one Democrat and one Republican, would take part.

In addition to the "Marshall plan" letter, lawmakers from both parties have put forth various proposals for oversight of the tens of billions of dollars of federal funds pouring into the emergency efforts.

Senate Democrats have proposed creation of a redevelopment agency modeled on the Tennessee Valley Authority, an independent government corporation created during the 1930s to manage a huge flood control and electrical generation program.

Republican Sens. Pete Domenici of New Mexico and Jeff Sessions of Alabama urged Bush to name a central coordinator to oversee storm recovery by federal agencies, an effort that they said would take years and cost huge amounts of money.

"My concern is that without a primary coordinator, we face the likely prospect of dozens of well-meaning federal agencies chaotically tripping over each other as the recovery process moves forward," Domenici said.

Illinois Democratic Sen. Barack Obama and Oklahoma Republican Sen. Tom Coburn -- representing opposite ends of the political spectrum -- called on Congress to establish a "chief financial officer" to oversee the $62 billion in relief funds the Federal Emergency Management Agency is doling out.

"This is to assure the American people that there's not going to be any shenanigans," Coburn said.

Meanwhile, the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee held its first open hearing on the government's response to the devastating storm with testimony from former New Orleans mayor Marc Morial, who now heads the National Urban League.

Morial suggested the government set up a compensation fund for Katrina victims, similar to the one established after the September 11, 2001 attacks. He also said Gulf coast residents must have a role in all aspects of rebuilding.

The House of Representatives Government Reform Committee plans to hold its first hearing into the Katrina response on Thursday, and the full House hopes to pass a bill giving short-term tax breaks to storm victims and help the recovery effort.

Congress Won't Sacrifice Pork In Federal Spending For Katrina (UNIONL)

By Robert D. Novak

Manchester Union Leader, September 15, 2005

Sen. Tom Coburn, playing his familiar role of skunk at the Sunday school picnic, is arguing that massive federal spending in the wake of Hurricane Katrina must entail some sacrifice. By that he meant the pork so dear to his colleagues. That has evoked an icy response, not only from Congress but from the White House as well.

Coburn, a freshman Republican from Oklahoma, telephoned Joshua Bolten, director of the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), to ask support for $15.3 billion in offsets based on the administration's own proposed terminations and spending reductions. Bolten politely informed the senator that the administration's hands were full dealing with Katrina's aftermath.

Coburn told me he did not blame Bolten but his superiors. The superior he meant was George W. Bush. On the Senate floor last week as the emergency Katrina bill was passed, Coburn declared: "I am disappointed in our President for not bringing forward with this bill recommended spending cuts that would easily be achieved in the discretionary budget of this country to pay for the disaster assistance." Citing calls for "sacrifice" by Americans, he declared that "it is no sacrifice on the part of Congress to steal $51.2 billion from our grandchildren."

When Bolten appeared before House Republicans the evening of Sept. 7, members of the conservative Republican Study Committee went to the microphone with complaints similar to Coburn's. Bolten responded, much as he had to Coburn, that this was not the time to try offsets when a 24-hour turnaround on the aid bill was necessary.

However, Coburn's problem is less Bolten or even Bush and more his Senate colleagues. While the House at least has tried to stay within the administration's bounds, the Senate threatens to run wild with new earmarks and additional spending. Senators are tapping money from the Defense budget on grounds all such funds will be restored.

Bolten promises to revisit offsets, and he can count on Coburn pressing him to keep that promise. Coburn's performance confirms dread of him as a senator by establishment Republicans, both in Oklahoma and the nation's capital. A plain-spoken obstetrician from Muskogee, Okla., Dr. Coburn won no popularity contests with a principled assault on pork during his House tenure (1995-2000) that was ended by self-imposed term limits. He entered the Senate determined to keep a low profile, but that is difficult considering the Washington spending carnival under Republican rule.

When Congress was called back before Labor Day to pass a $10 billion first installment, Coburn on Sept. 1 declared Congress should "make budget sacrifices of its own if we expect the American people to do the same." On Sept. 6, Sen. John McCain, a longtime anti-pork crusader, joined Coburn's effort. On Sept. 8, as the big aid bill reached the Senate floor, Coburn said, "members of Congress should, at least temporarily, deny themselves a few of the comforts of political office." But there has been no word of support from Republican leaders or the administration.

The $15.3 billion in OMB proposed cuts is just the beginning of the Coburn "sacrifices." He would cut into $27 billion of spending earmarked by individual senators and House members in this year alone. As chairman of the Senate subcommittee on federal financial management, he has found $41.5 billion in government overpayments because of poor accounting practices, $1.2 billion in an "over-priced" renovation of United Nations headquarters, $18 billion in General Services Administration (GSA) middle-man fees and $46 million in cost overruns at the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC).

Coburn's call for "sacrifice" means something entirely different on the left end of the ideological spectrum. In the House, one liberal Democrat after another has taken the floor to demand higher taxes in upper income brackets. A few successful Americans, not the elected politicians, would be doing the sacrificing.

Tom Coburn contends any government worker could find room to cut back spending in his own department before the federal leviathan demands more funds from any individual taxpayers. Ultimately, it is up to the government to sacrifice. As Coburn asserts, "It is inexcusable for the White House and Congress to not even make the effort to find any offsets."

New Architecture As Gulf Prepares To Rebuild, Tensions Mount Over Control (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes, Ann Carrns And Jeff D. Opdyke

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

With as much as $200 billion beginning to gush out of Washington for the Hurricane Katrina disaster zone, the fight already has begun over who will control the spending and make critical decisions about the future of New Orleans and the Gulf Coast.

The battle is shaping up around three key questions: Will state, local or federal officials have the final say about the shape of redevelopment? Will existing government bodies spend the reconstruction bonanza, or will some new agency be created for the job? And finally, will New Orleans be rebuilt as it was, or will some low-lying areas -- often poor, working class or predominantly African-American -- be sacrificed to improve flood protection?

In Washington, officials from both parties are concluding the reconstruction job is so immense that it demands an entirely new government entity, perhaps similar to the Depression-era Tennessee Valley Authority. Top presidential adviser Karl Rove and other administration officials have begun soliciting names for the new organization's czar. Former General Electric Co. chief Jack Welch has been mentioned as a possible candidate, as have former Secretary of State Colin Powell and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, though those two have detractors within the White House.

But the prospect of a big federal role is arousing suspicion and anger along the Gulf Coast, an area with long memories of a painful post-Civil War reconstruction and powerful suspicions of intrusions on states' rights and local autonomy. "I don't want anyone outside of New Orleans telling us how to plan this city," said New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin during a City Council meeting in Baton Rouge, 80 miles from the group's normal chambers.

Hovering over the battle is a central, perhaps intractable problem. Long before Katrina arrived, New Orleans was a broken city, burdened by poverty, crime, racial divisions, a lethargic economy, substandard schools and public services, and a clearly inadequate flood-control system. Nearly every faction fighting for influence agrees that restoring the prehurricane status quo to New Orleans is untenable.

"We must rebuild our communities better than ever before," said Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco in an address to the State Legislature last night. "Any good architect will tell you that you don't restore a structure without correcting its flaws."

Yet many of the lowest-lying areas most vulnerable to flooding were home to thousands of poor and mostly African-American residents. Some environmentalists and flood-control experts argue that those areas would best be used as marshy buffers against future floods. But that would mean preventing some of New Orleans's poorest residents from ever returning to their neighborhoods.

"New Orleans of the last 40 to 50 years was a mansion built atop matches," says Oliver Thomas, the city council president. "The foundation does not work."

Before Katrina, nearly 15% of the people in the New Orleans metropolitan area lived below the poverty line, as did more than 25% of the children, according to the Census Bureau. Only seven other U.S. cities have higher child-poverty rates. Among the nation's 70 biggest cities, New Orleans' median household income ranked 64th.

Katrina, Mr. Thomas says, highlighted "the hurricanes of poverty and illiteracy...that are here every day."

The city's current flood-control system was designed to handle up to a Category 3 hurricane. Katrina, with winds of up to 145 miles an hour, was a Category 4. Officials with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which builds most levees and other flood-control systems, say that from a scientific and engineering standpoint, a levee system can be built to safeguard the city from even the most powerful hurricanes.

A 2002 preliminary study by the Army Corps' New Orleans district of whether the hurricane-protection system around New Orleans should be upgraded outlined several options. They included fortifying and raising levees -- some to as much as nearly 30 feet from the current 13 feet to 18 feet -- and adding locks to certain canals that some experts believe may have played a part in the flooding of the city. Al Naomi, a long-time engineer with the corps' New Orleans district, estimated the cost of one of the proposals would be $2.5 billion to $3 billion.

But with the city now virtually empty, some influential local business leaders and environmentalists say it might be better to let nature win in some areas. That would almost certainly mean sacrificing some poorer neighborhoods as part of a new flood-control system.

Sherwood Gagliano, president of Coastal Environments Inc. and one of Louisiana's foremost experts on coastal restoration issues, says some low-lying areas of New Orleans shouldn't be heavily populated again. "You don't want to put a lot of people back in those holes," says Dr. Gagliano. Some sections of the city are several feet below sea level.

One idea, he says, would be to transform some of the low-lying residential areas in the city into water "retention areas" of about 5,000 acres each that would gather water during heavy rainfalls or major storms, providing relief to the city's pumps.

Transforming poor, black neighborhoods into retaining ponds wouldn't be easy politically, Dr. Gagliano acknowledges. "We want to come up with a plan that will allow people to be in the region and stay linked to their heritage, but we want their families to be safe," he says.

The possibility that a rebuilt New Orleans will be less black is a sensitive issue in a city that is more than 75% African-American. Mayor Nagin seemed aware of that this week when he said he planned to appoint a blue-ribbon reconstruction commission whose members would be picked according to race -- but not in proportion to the city. He said the 16-member panel would include eight whites and eight African-Americans. The mayor also told the City Council this week that he rejected "the thoughts and ideas" that some, including at least one member of his administration, have voiced publicly about using the storm as a chance to reshape the city's demographics and have fewer poor people.

On Monday night, nearly 30 black business leaders from New Orleans and Baton Rouge met at a church in the capital city to discuss ways to make sure that all New Orleans citizens are included in conversations about how to rebuild the city.

"What makes this city so great is the gumbo mix of people," says Alden J. McDonald Jr., chief executive of Liberty Bank & Trust Co., one of the nation's largest black-controlled banks, and chairman of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce. "Everyone has to be at the table."

In Washington, Congress is moving ahead on plans to set up a large new federal reconstruction authority. As models, lawmakers point to the TVA, created in 1933 to develop a woefully backward area of exhausted farmland and timberland, and the Appalachian Regional Commission, created during Lyndon Johnson's administration at the behest of governors of the impoverished region. Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, a New Hampshire Republican, proposed a powerful new government body, based within the White House but with its headquarters on the Gulf Coast, that would be led by an "individual with strong leadership skills" for three years.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, a Republican from hard-hit Mississippi, is weighing an alliance with liberal Sen. Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts, who last week proposed a Gulf Coast Regional Redevelopment Authority with at least $150 billion to invest in rebuilding the region's infrastructure. Mr. Kennedy sees a permanent entity, but the government's dominance would give way to public-private partnerships after a couple of years, says his spokeswoman, Stephanie Cutter.

One source of tension: President Bush's closest ally in the region is Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour, the former head of the national Republican Party. Gov. Barbour "is going to have a big say in this," an administration official says. Neither he nor Sen. Cochran is likely to allow Mississippi to be shortchanged while New Orleans, a city where Democrats dominate, receives much of the federal largesse.

Other flashpoints are the first wave of aid contracts, which some local officials complain were awarded to out-of-state companies without consulting them. "The federal government is not including us or communicating with us," says New Orleans Councilwoman Renee Gill Pratt. "We were a city long before the U.S. was a country, and we don't need someone from Minnesota coming down here to tell us where to put our city."

Mr. Bush, who will address the nation tonight, so far is agreeing. On his trip to the Gulf Coast on Monday, Mr. Bush was emphatic that the federal government will defer to the locals in rebuilding. "I think the best policy is one in which the federal government doesn't come down and say, here's what your city will look like," he said in New Orleans.

Historically, federally funded flood-control projects are proposed and funded through a painfully slow system, often taking years or decades of study and planning. Congressional authorization for a major expansion of the New Orleans levees occurred in 1965, the year that Hurricane Betsy swamped the city. But funding for some major components of the work wasn't actually appropriated until 20 years later.

Local levee districts have a big say. The Army Corps of Engineers takes the lead in designing and building major levee projects, then turns them over to the local districts for maintenance.

The Orleans Levee District is particularly powerful. Six members of its eight-seat board are appointed by the governor, and historically the posts have been used to reward political supporters.

The board also operates the chronically money-losing New Orleans Lakefront Airport on the shore of Lake Pontchartrain, two marinas, including the South Shore Harbor Marina with 400 boat slips, and it leases property for a casino on the lake. The district employs more than 200 people, including its own police and fire departments.

Three months before Hurricane Katrina flooded New Orleans, the board gathered on the shores of Lake Pontchartrain to celebrate the dedication of a Mardi Gras Fountain, featuring electronically timed spurts and multicolored lights. The fountain and an adjoining plaza were built at a cost of more than $2 million, partly using tax revenue that the board collects for levee maintenance, according to financial statements filed with the state of Louisiana.

James Huey, a local businessman who serves as the board's president, couldn't be reached yesterday. One former board member who supported the restoration, retired Marine Maj. Gen. James Livingston, who resigned and moved to South Carolina more than a year ago, said he wasn't aware of the fountain project's final cost but the restoration was consistent with the district's responsibility to maintain its waterfront property, which is heavily used for recreation by the community. "It was something that needed to be fixed," he said. "It was a gesture to be a good neighbor. In retrospect, I don't have any issue with that decision being made."

One of Mayor Nagin's biggest concerns is that money to rebuild New Orleans is likely to flow through the state and levee boards. There has long been tension between the city and state. Mr. Nagin points to the tens of millions of dollars Louisiana received from Harrah's Entertainment Inc. when the Las Vegas gambling concern won the right to build a casino in downtown New Orleans in the 1990s. That money, he said, "built state buildings in Baton Rouge," instead of being pumped back into New Orleans. Moreover, while New Orleans contributes between one-quarter and one-third of the state's revenue, "the state uses that New Orleans money elsewhere."

The Gulf Coast faced similar tensions after a massive 1927 flood along the Mississippi River devastated about 25,000 square miles -- about a quarter of the area Katrina ravaged -- and left 350,000 homeless. According to historian John Barry's popular book "Rising Tide," a key to the recovery was President Calvin Coolidge's quick dispatch of his secretary of commerce, Herbert Hoover.

Mr. Hoover was given sweeping authority to coordinate all local, state, federal and private endeavors. His success helped elect him president in 1928.

Hoover relied heavily on the private sector to get the job done. "I suppose I could have called in the whole of the Army," he said later, according to Richard Norton Smith's biography, "An Uncommon Man." "But what was the use? All I had to do was to call in Main Street itself."

Contracts For Recovery Work Raise Controversy (USAT)

By Kevin McCoy

USA Today, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005791

Two of the first companies that got emergency no-bid federal contracts for Hurricane Katrina recovery work have faced questions over past business practices, court and government records show.

A division of Fluor, a California firm awarded a housing contract worth up to $100 million, has paid millions of dollars to settle federal government lawsuits — including one that accused it of overbilling for 1989 hurricane cleanup work.

The Shaw Group, a Louisiana firm that won housing and engineering contracts worth up to $200 million, has disclosed that it is being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The firm is also a defendant in federal securities class-action cases.

The contracts were awarded by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and Federal Emergency Management Agency as part of a relief effort expected to top $100 billion. The awards, which so far include contracts to such national giants as Bechtel as well as smaller Louisiana and Mississippi firms, eventually are expected to constitute the largest rebuilding effort in U.S. history.

It is routine for government agencies to award non-competitive contracts for emergency work as part of an effort to speed recovery work. Federal Homeland Security officials announced this week that 30 investigators and auditors would go to the Gulf Coast to ensure that the emergency contracts are carried out properly.

At least one government watchdog group critical of the Hurricane Katrina contract-award process says the federal oversight effort should include tougher screening before emergency contracts are awarded, as well as afterward.

"This is an area where the federal government falls flat on its face," said Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, the watchdog group.

Federal court records show Fluor agreed to pay $3.2 million in 1997 to settle allegations that its FD Services division padded repair bills for cleaning up U.S. Navy bases in South Carolina after the 1989 strike of Hurricane Hugo. Fluor also agreed to pay $8.5 million in 2001 to settle allegations that it billed the government for work done for other clients, court records show.

Fluor spokeswoman Lisa Boyette said the company has "been working successfully for FEMA for eight years now on disaster work across the country." She referred questions about the most recent contract award to FEMA officials.

In an e-mail response, FEMA spokesman Michael Widomski said the agency checks whether firms being considered for emergency work have been barred from getting contracts. But he said FEMA had been unaware of the Hurricane Hugo settlement and other cases.

In its annual report filed in July, the Shaw Group disclosed that it was the subject of what the company termed an "informal inquiry" by the SEC. The firm said it was cooperating with investigators, who had not told the firm the reason for the inquiry or its scope. The SEC declined to comment.

Separately, federal securities class-action cases accuse the Shaw Group and its executives of defrauding investors with misleading statements about the company's finances and management.

The firm did not respond to phone messages seeking comment. But in its annual report, the firm said it believed all of its financial statements satisfied generally accepted accounting principles, "and that none of our press releases or public filings contained misrepresentations or omissions."

Moreover, in a Sept. 8 news release announcing its Hurricane Katrina award, the firm said it was also doing emergency contract work for the Army Corps of Engineers, U.S. Navy and other agencies.

Army Corps officials weigh companies' past performance in deciding new contracts, said spokeswoman Carol Sanders. Current investigations might also be noted, Sanders said. She could not say whether the agency had known about the SEC inquiry.

FEMA spokesman Widomski said his agency had been unaware of both the SEC matter and the securities class-action lawsuits involving the Shaw Group.

Brian complained that federal contract officers have little contact with prosecutors or agencies that might be investigating firms under consideration for awards.

"Right now, there isn't a place for the federal government to get a history of a company's business background," she said. "There should be one place where they can look."

Labor Fights To Preserve Davis-Bacon (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Among the litany of regulations in line to be eased or suspended during the daunting rebuilding process on the Gulf Coast are several that have greatly alarmed labor unions, whose furious lobbying efforts are hitting a brick wall of conservative might.

Union officials are concerned that President Bush's Sept. 8 suspension of the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires federal contractors to pay construction workers a prevailing wage, was only the beginning. Further hurting the union cause is GOP lawmakers' support for broad bureaucratic relaxation in the Labor Department, a push rooted in the long-standing bad blood between unions and Republican think tanks.

"I think this is a mean-spirited attack on the labor movement. The right wing has never been able to touch us in the legislative arena on Davis-Bacon. They saw an opportunity and took it," said Don Kaniewski, political director for the Laborers' International Union of North America (LIUNA).

The presidents of LIUNA, the carpenters union and the engineers union wrote to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) yesterday decrying the Davis-Bacon suspension. LIUNA and the carpenters belong to the new labor federation Change to Win, formed by unions seceded from the AFL-CIO, while the engineers remain AFL-CIO members.

Despite the scrutiny heaped upon organized labor for its internal division, the AFL-CIO echoed LIUNA's concerns, singling out Grover Norquist's Americans for Tax Reform (ATR) as an instrumental force for undoing worker-rights laws.

"People in the think-tank world have a long history of opposing protection for unions," said AFL-CIO Legislative Director Bill Samuel, resulting in a GOP "leadership that is pretty determinedly anti-labor. We haven't gotten a single phone call from Republicans on the Hill asking what should we do for this crisis."

The AFL-CIO sent legislative recommendations to Sen. Michael Enzi (R-Wyo.), chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, for use as he spearheads the drafting of a broad Katrina bill that will include employee-benefits provisions. But when asked whether Davis-Bacon's wage floors would be taken into account, Enzi said no and that he had no position on the act.

Bush waived Davis-Bacon for storm-affected areas in Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana as well as the two southernmost counties of Florida, one day after receiving a letter from Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) and 34 other House Republicans urging him to do so. While hundreds of thousands of Gulf homes were destroyed, local reports estimated that Katrina leveled about 350 houses in South Florida.

Norquist, for his part, was far from cowed by the possibility of political counterattack by the AFL-CIO or Change to Win.

"Oh, gee, maybe they'll try to oppose the president the next time he runs for office," Norquist cracked. He added that the temporary Davis-Bacon suspension "certainly strengthens the case" for an eventual full repeal. "It will make it obvious to people what the dead-weight costs of Davis-Bacon will be."

On the heels of Davis-Bacon will come a likely easing of the Service Contract Act, mandating a prevailing wage for service workers on federal contracts. The purpose of abandoning wage floors, both labor and conservative sources agreed, is to increase efficiency and help companies rebuilding the Gulf Coast to save money. Where that money will go is another story.

Samuel wondered whether Congress should institute an oversight mechanism to ensure construction savings are passed from the private companies retained by the government and into federal coffers. "These no-bid contracts, are they somehow mandating lower profits?" he asked. Firms awarded lucrative reconstruction jobs include several with ties to the White House, and most have already reaped the benefits through rising stock prices.

The impact of labor deregulation will be felt politically as well as financially. One building-trades lobbyist, who asked to remain anonymous because his group's internal division means it can take no stance on the issue, pointed out that prevailing wages in the Gulf are so much lower than the national average that the suspension will barely move profits.

"Politically, it was a mistake. Practically, it will have no impact. It was a fight the administration didn't need to take on at this time," the lobbyist said.

However, he noted, the conservative voting record of construction union members as compared with the rest of the labor community means congressional Republicans could see swing votes slip away for the 2006 election. "Now the leaders of the building trades will be reporting to their members, 'you can't trust Republicans, because every time they have a chance they are going to weaken Davis-Bacon,'" he said.

Ryan Ellis, ATR's labor lobbyist, conceded that historically low paychecks for Gulf workers will result in less potential savings from Davis-Bacon elimination. He reinforced the widespread conservative contention that unions hoard workers' wages for use on dues payments and political giving to Democrats.

"Some of the money [from a prevailing wage] would go to workers, but a lot of it would be siphoned off by unions through dues money because they are no longer forced to hold taxpayers hostage through union contracts. The union guys would rather have taxpayer dollars go into their pockets," Ellis said. Despite the difference between Davis-Bacon's prevailing wage and the standard union wage, he said, they are "de facto" identical.

The Labor Department is examining still more areas in which existing rules can be suspended for Katrina relief to accelerate. Official word from Secretary Elaine Chao of new 401(k) hardship loans for Gulf workers and waiver relaxation at state work-force investment boards, in addition to other moves, could come as quickly as today.

DOJ_NMG_0005793

"We are looking at [more] ways to release red tape to deliver needed resources to workers who have been affected," said Labor Department spokesman David James.

Lessons From Galveston (USAT)

By Alcestis "Cooky" Oberg

USA Today, September 15, 2005

When the flood waters recede, New Orleans will certainly be rebuilt, if for no better reason than its strategic location: on the Mississippi River near the Gulf of Mexico. Many of our nation's vital industries and transportation resources are centralized there.

Some want to rebuild the city exactly where and how it was before Hurricane Katrina, with stronger, higher levees. Simply turn back the clock. And that's crazy.

We have a historic opportunity to rebuild New Orleans better, safer — to change its shape, the location of its neighborhoods, even its topography. It's all been done before.

The greatest natural disaster to hit the USA — and the only one comparable to Katrina in the scope of its destruction — was the 1900 storm that devastated Galveston, Texas. Between 6,000 and 12,000 people died and, afterward, 75 looters had to be shot dead before law and order could be restored. Every Galvestonian knew that some places never come back from a storm like that. Indianola, Texas' No. 1 port in the 1800s, was clobbered by two ferocious storms within 11 years that destroyed its buildings and silted its bay. Indianola was abandoned in 1886.

Goodbye isn't an option

But that wasn't going to happen to Galveston. Like New Orleans today, it was too dominant and vital an economic center to just die. Galvestonians burned their dead, cleared the debris and rebuilt with dazzling energy and boldness.

Work started on a mighty concrete seawall — 17 feet high, 16 to 20 feet thick at the base, nearly 10.5 miles long. The seawall had a concave shape, so waves would break upward and back onto themselves. Granite blocks along its base protected against erosion. Because Galveston sat on a sandbar-type barrier island of 5-7 feet elevation, leaders decided to raise the entire grade of the city to 12-15 feet elevation. This meant that every building and every house in a 500-block area was raised on jackscrews and filled in underneath with sand.

The project took eight years and was financed by bonds underwritten by Galveston itself, along with tax relief from the state. When another monster hurricane came, in 1915, the city was ready: Only eight people died, and damage was relatively limited. The 1900 storm was a historic opportunity to change Galveston's vulnerability to hurricanes forever with an engineering project so vast, it was breathtaking.

Such an opportunity now exists for New Orleans. Certainly, officials could change its bowl-like topography and raise the grade of its new neighborhoods much higher, as Galveston did. New Orleans might forbid rebuilding some neighborhoods at all and give them back to the marshes and swamps they came from. A new transportation system could carry residents to higher, safer suburbs farther away, reducing the population allowed to live in the city. Perhaps Baton Rouge and New Orleans could merge into one metropolitan entity, offering both pleasure to tourists and safety to residents.

The human calculus of rebuilding is less certain. Some businesses and people will just never come back. They'll put down roots wherever they are now — Texas, Georgia, Arkansas — and be lost to New Orleans forever. That happened to Galveston, too, which never completely came back to its former glory as a dominant port or as the "Wall Street of the Southwest." Some of that had to do with the 1900 storm; some didn't. Much of 20th century commerce went to Houston, partly for its huge, less vulnerable port miles inland, partly because new industries — oil and gas refineries, international banks, medical and space centers — needed to build massive facilities and sprawling neighborhoods on the vast prairies of the mainland, not on a small, vulnerable island.

Nonetheless, Galveston thrived and adapted after the 1900 storm. The city recaptured its tourist industry with new seawall-protected hotels, and its cotton-shipping business remained robust for decades. It even became a tame prototype of Las Vegas from Prohibition to 1957, with glittery nightclubs where discreet and illegal drinking, gambling and prostitution flourished until they were shut down.

Some of New Orleans' future direction can be detected in Galveston's patterns; some can't. The things we all love about New Orleans — the French Quarter, the Garden District, the magnificent downtown hotels, the great music, culture and food — will undoubtedly come back better than ever. Other commerce is less predictable. The existing energy and transportation assets might stay near New Orleans in the short term but might disperse and relocate in future decades. We don't know what 21st century industries and opportunities might come along, too, or whether New Orleans can offer them the resources they need.

What can't be predicted

We can't be hubristic about rebuilding New Orleans. While some hurricane challenges, such as storm surge and wind damage, can be met with costly, mega-engineering projects and extremely stiff building codes, others cannot.

DOJ_NMG_0005794

The gut punch to Galveston was thrown by Hurricane Carla in 1961. Though the seawall held firm to protect against storm surges, unpredictable tornadoes spun out of the storm, hopped right over the seawall and devastated some neighborhoods — all broadcast by the new technology of television to horrified Americans. Carla's punch was more psychological than physical. Although only seven people died and damages totaled $15 million, Galveston lost its sense of safety and invulnerability. It went into a decades-long economic slump from which it has only recently emerged.

New Orleans has had its Big One, the hideous twin to Galveston's 1900 storm in scope and destruction. But before we rebuild it, we should ask whether rebuilding for another Katrina is enough. Perhaps there's a Carla or something worse lurking that we should prepare for, too.

Chertoff Delayed Federal Response, Memo Shows (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay, Alison Young And Shannon McCaffrey

Knight Ridder, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - The federal official with the power to mobilize a massive federal response to Hurricane Katrina was Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, not the former FEMA chief who was relieved of his duties and resigned earlier this week, federal documents reviewed by Knight Ridder show.

Even before the storm struck the Gulf Coast, Chertoff could have ordered federal agencies into action without any request from state or local officials. Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown had only limited authority to do so until about 36 hours after the storm hit, when Chertoff designated him as the "principal federal official" in charge of the storm.

As thousands of hurricane victims went without food, water and shelter in the days after Katrina's early morning Aug. 29 landfall, critics assailed Brown for being responsible for delays that might have cost hundreds of lives.

But Chertoff - not Brown - was in charge of managing the national response to a catastrophic disaster, according to the National Response Plan, the federal government's blueprint for how agencies will handle major natural disasters or terrorist incidents. An order issued by President Bush in 2003 also assigned that responsibility to the homeland security director.

But according to a memo obtained by Knight Ridder, Chertoff didn't shift that power to Brown until late afternoon or evening on Aug. 30, about 36 hours after Katrina hit Louisiana and Mississippi. That same memo suggests that Chertoff may have been confused about his lead role in disaster response and that of his department.

"As you know, the President has established the `White House Task Force on Hurricane Katrina Response.' He will meet with us tomorrow to launch this effort. The Department of Homeland Security, along with other Departments, will be part of the task force and will assist the Administration with its response to Hurricane Katrina," Chertoff said in the memo to the secretaries of defense, health and human services and other key federal agencies.

On the day that Chertoff wrote the memo, Bush was in San Diego presiding over a ceremony marking the 60th anniversary of the end of World War II.

Chertoff's Aug. 30 memo for the first time declared Katrina an "Incident of National Significance," a key designation that triggers swift federal coordination. The following afternoon, Bush met with his Cabinet, then appeared before TV cameras in the White House Rose Garden to announce the government's planned action.

That same day, Aug. 31, the Department of Defense, whose troops and equipment are crucial in such large disasters, activated its Task Force Katrina. But active-duty troops didn't begin to arrive in large numbers along the Gulf Coast until Saturday.

White House and homeland security officials wouldn't explain why Chertoff waited some 36 hours to declare Katrina an incident of national significance and why he didn't immediately begin to direct the federal response from the moment on Aug. 27 when the National Hurricane Center predicted that Katrina would strike the Gulf Coast with catastrophic force in 48 hours. Nor would they explain why Bush felt the need to appoint a separate task force.

Chertoff's hesitation and Bush's creation of a task force both appear to contradict the National Response Plan and previous presidential directives that specify what the secretary of homeland security is assigned to do without further presidential orders. The goal of the National Response Plan is to provide a streamlined framework for swiftly delivering federal assistance when a disaster - caused by terrorists or Mother Nature - is too big for local officials to handle.

Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman, referred most inquiries about the memo and Chertoff's actions to the Department of Homeland Security.

"There will be an after-action report" on the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, Perino said. She added that "Chertoff had the authority to invoke the Incident of National Significance, and he did it on Tuesday."

DOJ_NMG_0005795

Perino said the creation of the White House task force didn't add another bureaucratic layer or delay the response to the devastating hurricane. "Absolutely not," she said. "I think it helped move things along." When asked whether the delay in issuing the Incident of National Significance was to allow Bush time to return to Washington, Perino replied: "Not that I'm aware of."

Russ Knocke, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security, didn't dispute that the National Response Plan put Chertoff in charge in federal response to a catastrophe. But he disputed that the bureaucracy got in the way of launching the federal response.

"There was a tremendous sense of urgency," Knocke said. "We were mobilizing the greatest response to a disaster in the nation's history."

Knocke noted that members of the Coast Guard were already in New Orleans performing rescues and FEMA personnel and supplies had been deployed to the region.

The Department of Homeland Security has refused repeated requests to provide details about Chertoff's schedule and said it couldn't say specifically when the department requested assistance from the military. Knocke said a military liaison was working with FEMA, but said he didn't know his or her name or rank. FEMA officials said they wouldn't provide information about the liaison.

Knocke said members of almost every federal agency had already been meeting as part of the department's Interagency Incident Management Group, which convened for the first time on the Friday before the hurricane struck. So it would be a mistake, he said, to interpret the memo as meaning that Tuesday, Aug. 30 was the first time that members of the federal government coordinated.

The Chertoff memo indicates that the response to Katrina wasn't left to disaster professionals, but was run out of the White House, said George Haddow, a former deputy chief of staff at FEMA during the Clinton administration and the co-author of an emergency management textbook.

"It shows that the president is running the disaster, the White House is running it as opposed to Brown or Chertoff," Haddow said. Brown "is a convenient fall guy. He's not the problem really. The problem is a system that was marginalized."

A former FEMA director under President Reagan expressed shock by the inaction that Chertoff's memo suggested. It showed that Chertoff "does not have a full appreciation for what the country is faced with - nor does anyone who waits that long," said Gen. Julius Becton Jr., who was FEMA director from 1985-1989.

"Anytime you have a delay in taking action, there's a potential for losing lives," Becton told Knight Ridder. "I have no idea how many lives we're talking about. ... I don't understand why, except that they were inefficient."

Chertoff's Aug. 30 memo came on the heels of a memo from Brown, written several hours after Katrina made landfall, showing that the FEMA director was waiting for Chertoff's permission to get help from others within the massive department. In that memo, first obtained by the Associated Press last week, Brown requested Chertoff's "assistance to make available DHS employees willing to deploy as soon as possible." It asked for another 1,000 homeland security workers within two days and 2,000 within a week.

The four-paragraph memo ended with Brown thanking Chertoff "for your consideration in helping us meet our responsibilities in this near catastrophic event."

According to the National Response Plan, which was unveiled in January by Chertoff's predecessor, Tom Ridge, the secretary of homeland security is supposed to declare an Incident of National Significance when a catastrophic event occurs.

"Standard procedures regarding requests for assistance may be expedited or, under extreme circumstances, suspended in the immediate aftermath of an event of catastrophic magnitude," according to the plan, which evolved from earlier plans and lessons learned after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "Notification and full coordination with the States will occur, but the coordination process must not delay or impede the rapid deployment and use of critical resources."

Should Chertoff have declared Katrina an Incident of National Significance sooner - even before the storm struck? Did his delay slow the quick delivery of the massive federal response that was needed? Would it have made a difference?

"You raise good questions," said Frank J. Cilluffo, the director of George Washington University's Homeland Security Planning Institute. It's too early to tell, he said, whether unfamiliarity with or glitches in the new National Response Plan were factors in the poor early response to Katrina.

"Clearly this is the first test. It certainly did not pass with flying colors," Cilluffo said of the National Response Plan.

Mike Byrne, a former senior homeland security official under Ridge who worked on the plan, said he doesn't think the new National Response Plan caused the confusion that plagued the early response to Katrina.

Something else went wrong, he suspects. The new National Response Plan isn't all that different from the previous plan, called the Federal Response Plan.

"Our history of responding to major disasters has been one where we've done it well," Byrne said. "We need to figure out why this one didn't go as well as the others did. It's shocking to me."

Ex-FEMA Chief Tells Of Frustration And Chaos (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick And Scott Shane

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - Hours after Hurricane Katrina passed New Orleans on Aug. 29, as the scale of the catastrophe became clear, Michael D. Brown recalls, he placed frantic calls to his boss, Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, and to the office of the White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr.

Mr. Brown, then director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said he told the officials in Washington that the Louisiana governor, Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, and her staff were proving incapable of organizing a coherent state effort and that his field officers in the city were reporting an "out of control" situation.

"I am having a horrible time," Mr. Brown said he told Mr. Chertoff and a White House official - either Mr. Card or his deputy, Joe Hagin - in a status report that evening. "I can't get a unified command established."

By the time of that call, he added, "I was beginning to realize things were going to hell in a handbasket" in Louisiana. A day later, Mr. Brown said, he asked the White House to take over the response effort.

He said he felt the subsequent appointment of Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honoré of the Army as the Pentagon's commander of active-duty forces began to turn the situation around.

In his first extensive interview since resigning as FEMA director on Monday under intense criticism, Mr. Brown declined to blame President Bush or the White House for his removal or for the flawed response.

"I truly believed the White House was not at fault here," he said.

He focused much of his criticism on Governor Blanco, contrasting what he described as her confused response with far more agile mobilizations in Mississippi and Alabama, as well as in Florida during last year's hurricanes.

But Mr. Brown's account, in which he described making "a blur of calls" all week to Mr. Chertoff, Mr. Card and Mr. Hagin, suggested that Mr. Bush, or at least his top aides, were informed early and repeatedly by the top federal official at the scene that state and local authorities were overwhelmed and that the overall response was going badly.

A senior administration official said Wednesday night that White House officials recalled the conversations with Mr. Brown but did not believe they had the urgency or desperation he described in the interview.

"There's a general recollection of him saying, 'They're going to need more help,' " said the official, who insisted on anonymity because of the delicacy of internal White House discussions.

Mr. Brown's version of events raises questions about whether the White House and Mr. Chertoff acted aggressively enough in the response. New Orleans convulsed in looting and violence after the hurricane, and troops did not arrive in force to restore order until five days later.

The account also suggests that responsibility for the failure may go well beyond Mr. Brown, who has been widely pilloried as an inexperienced manager who previously oversaw horse show judges.

Mr. Brown was removed by Mr. Chertoff last week from directing the relief effort. A 50-year-old lawyer and Republican activist who joined FEMA as general counsel in 2001, Mr. Brown said he had been hobbled by limitations on the power of the agency to command resources.

With only 2,600 employees nationwide, he said, FEMA must rely on state workers, the National Guard, private contractors and other federal agencies to supply manpower and equipment.

He said his biggest mistake was in waiting until the end of the day on Aug. 30 to ask the White House explicitly to take over the response from FEMA and state officials.

Of his resignation, Mr. Brown said: "I said I was leaving because I don't want to be a distraction. I want to focus on what happened here and the issues that this raises."

Governor Blanco said Wednesday that she took responsibility for failures and missteps in the immediate response to the hurricane and pledged a united effort to rebuild areas ravaged by the storm, adding, "at the state level, we must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again." A spokesman for Ms. Blanco denied Mr. Brown's description of disarray in Louisiana's emergency response operation. "That is just totally inaccurate," said Bob Mann, the governor's communications director. "Everything that Mr. Brown needed in terms of resources or information from the state, he had those available to him."

In Washington, Mr. Chertoff's spokesman, Russ Knocke, said there had been no delay in the federal response. "We pushed absolutely everything we could," Mr. Knocke said, "every employee, every asset, every effort, to save and sustain lives."

As Mr. Brown recounted it, the weekend before New Orleans's levees burst, FEMA sent an emergency response team of 10 or 20 people to Louisiana to review evacuation plans with local officials.

DOJ_NMG_0005797

By Saturday afternoon, many residents were leaving. But as the hurricane approached early on Sunday, Mr. Brown said he grew so frustrated with the failure of local authorities to make the evacuation mandatory that he asked Mr. Bush for help.

"Would you please call the mayor and tell him to ask people to evacuate?" Mr. Brown said he asked Mr. Bush in a phone call.

"Mike, you want me to call the mayor?" the president responded in surprise, Mr. Brown said. Moments later, apparently on his own, the mayor, C. Ray Nagin, held a news conference to announce a mandatory evacuation, but it was too late, Mr. Brown said. Plans said it would take at least 72 hours to get everyone out.

When he arrived in Baton Rouge on Sunday evening, Mr. Brown said, he was concerned about the lack of coordinated response from Governor Blanco and Maj. Gen. Bennett C. Landreneau, the adjutant general of the Louisiana National Guard.

"What do you need? Help me help you," Mr. Brown said he asked them. "The response was like, 'Let us find out,' and then I never received specific requests for specific things that needed doing."

The most responsive person he could find, Mr. Brown said, was Governor Blanco's husband, Raymond. "He would try to go find stuff out for me," Mr. Brown said.

Governor Blanco's communications director, Mr. Mann, said that she was frustrated that Mr. Brown and others at FEMA wanted itemized requests before acting. "It was like walking into an emergency room bleeding profusely and being expected to instruct the doctors how to treat you," he said.

On Monday night, Mr. Brown said, he reported his growing worries to Mr. Chertoff and the White House. He said he did not ask for federal active-duty troops to be deployed because he assumed his superiors in Washington were doing all they could. Instead, he said, he repeated a dozen times, "I cannot get a unified command established."

The next morning, Mr. Brown said, he and Governor Blanco decided to take a helicopter into New Orleans to see the mayor and assess the situation. But before the helicopter took off, his field coordinating officer, or F.C.O., called from the city on a satellite phone. "It is getting out of control down here; the levee has broken," the staff member told him, he said.

The crowd in the Superdome, the city's shelter of last resort, was already larger than expected. But Mr. Brown said he was relieved to see that the mayor had a detailed list of priorities, starting with help to evacuate the Superdome.

Mr. Brown passed the list on to the state emergency operations center in Baton Rouge, but when he returned that evening he was surprised to find that nothing had been done.

"I am just screaming at my F.C.O., 'Where are the helicopters?' " he recalled. " 'Where is the National Guard? Where is all the stuff that the mayor wanted?' "

FEMA, he said, had no helicopters and only a few communications trucks. The agency typically depends on state resources, a system he said worked well in the other Gulf Coast states and in Florida last year.

Meanwhile, "unbeknownst to me," Mr. Brown said, at some point on Monday or Tuesday the hotels started directing their remaining guests to the convention center - something neither FEMA nor local officials had planned.

At the same time, the Superdome was degenerating into "gunfire and anarchy," and on Tuesday the FEMA staff and medical team in New Orleans called to say they were leaving for their own safety.

That night, Mr. Brown said, he called Mr. Chertoff and the White House again in desperation. "Guys, this is bigger than what we can handle," he told them, he said. "This is bigger than what FEMA can do. I am asking for help."

"Maybe I should have screamed 12 hours earlier," Mr. Brown said in the interview. "But that is hindsight. We were still trying to make things work."

By Wednesday morning, Mr. Brown said, he learned that General Honoré was on his way. While the general did not have responsibility for the entire relief effort and the Guard, his commanding manner helped mobilize the state's efforts.

"Honoré shows up and he and I have a phone conversation," Mr. Brown said. "He gets the message, and, boom, it starts happening."

Mr. Brown said that in one much-publicized gaffe - his repeated statement on live television on Thursday night, Sept. 1, that he had just learned that day of thousands of people at New Orleans's convention center without food or water - "I just absolutely misspoke." In fact, he said, he learned about the evacuees there from the first media reports more than 24 hours earlier, but the reports conflicted with information from local authorities and he had no staff on the site until Thursday.

There were also conflicts with the Congressional delegations that wanted resources for their offices and districts, FEMA officials said. Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi said he "resisted aggressively" a decision by Mr. Brown to dispatch a Navy medical ship to Louisiana instead of his home state.

Mr. Brown acknowledged that he had been criticized for not ordering a complete evacuation or calling in federal troops sooner. But he said the storm made it hard to communicate and assess the situation.

"Until you have been there," he said, "you don't realize it is the middle of a hurricane."

Governor, Mayor Acknowledge Mistakes (USAT)

By From staff and wire reports

USA Today, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS — Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco admitted “failures at every level of government" in the response to Hurricane Katrina on Wednesday. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin also conceded missteps.

Meanwhile, businesses began to open their doors in New Orleans after the reopening of the city airport and ports.

“Right now we're going forward," said Bruce Hicks, spokesman for Starwood Hotels. Starwood owns the Sheraton, one of the first of several big downtown hotels to reopen. “The city must have this and other hotels to house the thousands of people who come in here to rebuild."

In an evening address to a special meeting of the state Legislature in Baton Rouge, Blanco said she shouldered blame for her state's situation.

“The buck stops here, and as your governor, I take full responsibility,” said Blanco, a first-term Democrat.

“We all know that there were failures at every level of government: state, federal and local. At the state level, we must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again,” she said.

Nagin also struck a more conciliatory note.

“We could have all done things better,” Nagin said.

Blame has been rampant over the sluggish evacuation of New Orleans as the storm bore down and the failure to rescue everyone caught in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. President Bush, who will address the nation this evening about Katrina, has said he accepts responsibility for federal failures.

In New Orleans, pumps working around the clock had reduced floodwaters that covered 80% of the city to about half of the city.

Traffic, very limited last week, has increased as more business owners return to inspect their property.

About 168,000 customers were still without power. Electricity cannot be restored until areas are drained. “It's all about power,” said Bubby Valentino, 58, who owns three hotels in the French Quarter that needed only a few repairs.

“If we can get power back and get air circulating in these rooms, we're OK,” Valentino said.

The number of Gulf Coast deaths from Katrina rose to 708, including 474 in Louisiana.

In Washington, a Senate committee held a hearing on the disaster and response. Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, the chairwoman, said expensive changes in the government's emergency-preparedness system made after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks had failed their first major test during Katrina.

Given the billions of dollars spent in the past four years, she said, “We would have expected a sharp, crisp response to this terrible tragedy."

“Instead,” she said, “we witnessed what appeared to be a sluggish initial response."

Blanco Takes Blame For State Response (WT/AP)

By Melinda DeSlatte, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. -- Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco yesterday took responsibility for failures and missteps in the immediate response to Hurricane Katrina and pledged a united effort to rebuild areas ravaged by the storm.

"We all know that there were failures at every level of government: state, federal and local. At the state level, we must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again. The buck stops here, and as your governor, I take full responsibility," Mrs. Blanco told lawmakers in a special meeting of the Louisiana Legislature.

Mrs. Blanco's statement came a day after President Bush said he would "take responsibility" for federal failures in dealing with Katrina. The Democratic governor, who has criticized the response of federal officials to the storm and subsequent flood that deluged New Orleans, yesterday told legislators that Mr. Bush is "a friend and partner" in Louisiana's recovery effort.

In New Orleans yesterday, test results released showed that floodwaters still pose a health risk because of dangerous levels of sewage-related bacteria and toxic chemicals, potentially delaying the mayor's plan to reopen parts of the city by Monday.

The Army Corps of Engineers estimates that up to 50 percent of the floodwaters that had covered 80 percent of the city had been removed and said New Orleans would be almost completely drained by Oct. 8.

Pumps are removing more than 8 billion gallons a day, and Mayor C. Ray Nagin was deliberating time frames for reopening parts of the city that are dry, including the French Quarter and Central Business District.

DOJ_NMG_0005799

Addressing Louisiana lawmakers yesterday, Mrs. Blanco said she would appoint an outside financial adviser to oversee the expenditure of billions of dollars in federal money that Congress has allocated to help the recovery from the disaster.

"I assure the Congress and every American taxpayer that every nickel will be properly spent," Mrs. Blanco said.

Meanwhile, in Washington, Senate Republicans scuttled an attempt by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, to establish an independent, bipartisan panel patterned after the September 11 commission to investigate what went wrong with federal, state and local governments' response to the hurricane.

Separately, a Senate committee opened a hearing on the disaster, with the panel's Republican chairman saying that changes instituted after September 11 in the government's emergency preparedness failed their first major test during Katrina.

With billions of dollars to boost disaster preparedness at all levels of government, "we would have expected a sharp, crisp response to this terrible tragedy," said Sen. Susan Collins, Maine Republican. "Instead, we witnessed what appeared to be a sluggish initial response."

The official death toll from Hurricane Katrina rose to 708 yesterday after Louisiana confirmed 51 more deaths. In addition to Louisiana's 474 deaths, 218 deaths have been recorded in Mississippi, two in Alabama and 14 in Florida, according to officials in the different states.

At least two of the Katrina evacuees scattered across the country have committed suicide, and 55 others have died, authorities said yesterday.

Most of the post-Katrina dead were elderly or already sick, with heart conditions, cancer or other terminal illnesses, authorities said. Many had been living in hospitals, hospices and nursing homes. Several suffered heart attacks.

On Tuesday, Mrs. Blanco had lashed out at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), saying she was "outraged" at the slow pace of recovering bodies of those who perished in the storm. Yesterday, FEMA responded by saying that Louisiana officials asked to take over the effort last week.

"The collection of bodies is not normally a FEMA responsibility," FEMA spokesman David Passey said.

According to documents released by the state yesterday, Kenyon International Emergency Services was hired Tuesday to recover, document and handle the bodies of the victims of Hurricane Katrina. The contract will cost almost $119,000 a day for two months.

"It's going to take months, maybe years," said Dr. Louis Cataldi, the coroner for Baton Rouge Parish. "This is not going away."

Louisiana transportation officials estimated yesterday that about 1.2 million people were evacuated from the metropolitan New Orleans area in the two days leading up to Katrina's Aug. 29 landfall and that many of those people are still scattered in other states.

Despite speculation that some would prefer to settle in their new towns, Mr. Nagin expected most would return and rebuild.

"I know New Orleanians," he said. "Once the beignets start cooking up again and the gumbo is in the pots and red beans and rice are served on Monday -- in New Orleans, and not where they are -- they're going to be back."

A day after Mr. Nagin said the city is essentially broke, New Orleans' already beleaguered school system announced that it would also need federal assistance to keep paying its teachers.

Dan Packer, chief executive of Entergy New Orleans, said the company had restored power to 75 percent of the 1.1 million customers who were out at the height of the storm, mostly in Mississippi and areas of Louisiana north and west of New Orleans.

President Bush will arrive in Louisiana today to deliver a prime-time televised speech to the nation.

Hearings To Shape FEMA's Future (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Congress opened hearings yesterday to figure out what went wrong in the immediate response to Hurricane Katrina and resolve the question of what is to become of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

FEMA has become synonymous with the government's bungled response to the hurricane, with a number of politicians saying part of the problem is that the agency is no longer cabinet-level but rather a small cog in the mammoth Department of Homeland Security.

Prominent Democrats, such as Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York, have proposed bills that would make FEMA an independent agency -- a move enthusiastically endorsed by several state emergency managers, who are effectively FEMA's "clients." To them, FEMA's mission to help states prepare for "all hazards" -- from tornadoes to terrorism -- got lost as the department's policies and funding programs became increasingly terrorism-centric.

But yesterday's hearings showed that such a move has far from unanimous backing in the Senate. Susan Collins, a Maine Republican and chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, said she would explore the idea but cautioned her colleagues against making any hasty moves. "My inclination is that FEMA should be part of the Department of Homeland Security," she said.

Ms. Collins was one of the main architects of the legislation that subsumed FEMA, along with 21 other agencies, into a new Department of Homeland Security in 2003. The creation of the department, the biggest shake-up of the government since the creation of the Pentagon after World War II, came in response to the 2001 terrorist attacks and was supposed to have solved many of the same problems that surfaced after Katrina.

Ms. Collins noted that Katrina was the first major test that the government's new bureaucracy has faced since 9/11, and "this structure failed to meet our expectations."

That said, some security experts say that moving FEMA might help how the country deals with natural disasters, but could undermine Homeland Security's efforts to respond to acts of catastrophic terrorism. A relationship between Homeland Security and an independent FEMA could also be complicated: Who will be in charge of running response efforts during disasters? Will there be two separate plans and chains of command for terrorist-related events and nonterrorism-related events? There could be a significant duplication of efforts and confusion that further undermine the country's emergency-response system.

"Making FEMA a separate agency reporting directly to the president won't in and of itself solve anything," says Clark Kent Ervin, the former inspector general for Homeland Security. "The danger is that people will assume that such an organizational change will fix the problem, when an independent FEMA will be caught just as flat-footed when disaster next strikes if it still has leaders who fail to plan and prepare for utterly foreseeable catastrophes."

Another option on the table is to transform FEMA into a super-emergency preparedness and response division inside Homeland Security. Although Congress actually created such a division in the department, the preparedness part of the job was stripped away and put in a completely separate entity elsewhere in the department. It reports directly to the Homeland Security secretary and has become the main distributor of grants to first responders, a job that was once central to FEMA.

The idea would be to reintegrate these preparedness and planning functions along with control over grant money back into a single department that is effectively run by FEMA. Putting planning, preparedness and response all back under one roof is considered by emergency officials as essential to maximizing a federal disaster response, whether or not FEMA is an independent agency.

"FEMA's in a fix at this point, and there are no quick answers for rebuilding its strength," says University of Maryland Visiting Professor R. Scott Fosler, who played a major role in overhauling FEMA in the 1990s after its poor performance in the wake of Hurricane Andrew in 1992.

Whatever the decision, many emergency managers are arguing for a better balance between how the country prepares for terrorism and natural disasters. "Many people regard Hurricane Katrina as an event. It's not. It's part of a continuum. There will be another like it for sure." Iain Barclay Logan, of the International Red Cross, told Ms. Collins's committee.

Lawmakers said they did not ask officials from FEMA or the Homeland Security Department to appear at the hearing out of fear that would disrupt recovery efforts. Instead, a slew of former city and state officials who have faced major disasters in their communities -- from former California Gov. Pete Wilson to former New Orleans Mayor Marc H. Morial -- offered their advice on how to best help stricken communities get back on their feet.

The hearing marked Congress's first step in investigating major gaps in the country's readiness and response systems that Katrina exposed. It comes as Republicans and Democrats continue to debate whether to appoint an unusual House-Senate panel to investigate the matter, or to create an independent commission much like the one that examined government missteps before and after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

At FEMA, Disasters And Politics Go Hand In Hand (NYT)

By Alan B. Krueger

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

AS we are all aware," James Lee Witt told Congress in April 1996, when he was director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, "disasters are very political events."

There is much truth to Mr. Witt's statement. Research on the spending patterns of the emergency management agency shows that, to a significant degree, the agency is influenced by political concerns that are distinct from the suffering and destruction wrought by natural disasters, under both Democratic and Republican administrations.

Although declaring a disaster should be clear-cut and above politics, the legislation that governs FEMA gives the president much discretion to decide whether an event is a disaster that qualifies for assistance. Upon receiving a request by a state's governor, the president may declare a "major disaster" if a natural catastrophe "causes damage of sufficient severity and magnitude to warrant major disaster assistance."

While no one would doubt that a disaster of the magnitude of Hurricane Katrina deserves the full commitment of the federal government, the language in the FEMA law is vague enough to count two feet of snow in Ohio as a major disaster, as was the case last December.

Indeed, the law specifically prohibits the use of an "arithmetic formula or sliding scale" to deny assistance. So, disaster requests are not evaluated based on standard quantitative evidence; instead, declarations involve subjective judgment.

Not surprisingly, in this vacuum presidents have displayed a tendency to declare more disasters in years when they face re-election. Mary W. Downton of the National Center for Atmospheric Research and Roger A. Pielke Jr. of the University of Colorado, Boulder, for example, looked at the flood-related disasters that were declared from 1965 to 1997 in an article published in "Natural Hazards Review" in 2001. Even after accounting for the amount of precipitation and flood damage each year, they found that the average number of flood-related disasters declared by the president was 46 percent higher in election years than in other years.

The tendency to declare more disasters during election years is not limited to floods. President Bill Clinton set a record by declaring 73 major disasters in 35 states and the District of Columbia in 1996, the year he was up for re-election.

When George W. Bush faced re-election in 2004, he declared 61 major disasters in 36 states - 10 more than in 2003 and tied for the second highest number of major disaster declarations ever, according to data provided by FEMA.

The increase from 2003 to 2004 was particularly sharp in the 12 battleground states in which the election was decided by 5 percent or less; these states had 17 major disasters declared in 2004 but only 8 in 2003, and, therefore, accounted for 90 percent of the increase.

In perhaps the most thorough econometric analysis of the politics of FEMA disaster funds to date, Thomas A. Garrett of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis and Russell S. Sobel of West Virginia University concluded in a study published in "Economic Inquiry" in 2003 that Congressional as well as presidential politics play a role in allocating payments. Specifically, they examined factors related to the number of disasters declared in each state from 1991 to 1999, and the dollar amount of assistance provided.

Of course, a state may be particularly unlucky in any given year and be struck by an unusually large number of destructive storms. To account for this effect, they controlled statistically for the value of private insurance property claims from disasters in a state each year and the amount of Red Cross assistance provided. States that incur greater insurance losses and receive more aid from the Red Cross in a particular year are undoubtedly in greater need of emergency assistance.

It is reassuring to note that FEMA payments are substantially greater when the Red Cross provides more aid or private insurance losses are greater, suggesting that more generous FEMA payments do reach states that suffer more severe damage from disasters.

Nonetheless, Mr. Garrett and Professor Sobel conclude that Congressional and presidential politics play an important role in allocating FEMA assistance. Most important, they find that the amount of disaster relief provided per incident increases with the number of representatives a state has on one of the FEMA oversight committees in the House of Representatives. Having an additional representative on either of the two main House oversight committees is associated with an extra $36.5 million of assistance from FEMA, they found.

This figure may seem to overstate the role of politics because representatives from states prone to be hit by disasters probably seek out seats on FEMA oversight committees. But recall that the analysis simultaneously adjusts for the amount of Red Cross assistance and private insurance losses from disasters each year. So, having Congressional representation on an oversight committee appears to matter even when compared with disasters in other states that cause roughly the same amount of damage and suffering.

Interestingly, representation on a Senate oversight committee does not have a detectable effect on FEMA payments, perhaps because disasters are often local events that more intensely affect House members' constituents.

All told, Mr. Garrett calculates that a third of FEMA payments are directly attributable to representation on one of the nine FEMA Congressional oversight committees, independent of the disaster's severity.

When Congress turns to evaluating the Hurricane Katrina disaster, it should also consider sharpening FEMA's mission. One helpful step would be to define more precisely the requirements necessary for the president to declare a disaster. For example, disaster payments could be restricted to events that cause damage exceeding a specified threshold or significant loss of life. Long before Hurricane Katrina, it should have been apparent that FEMA needed to focus more on alleviating and preventing suffering from major catastrophes and less on delivering pork to voters at election time.

Sick And Abandoned (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005802

It was the stuff of nightmares. Poisonous water moccasins were swimming in the filthy water of the flooded first floor, and snipers, rats and even a 12-foot alligator were roaming the treacherous area just outside the hospital's doors.

"To me, it was like being in hell," said Carl Warner, the chief engineer for Methodist Hospital in the hard-hit eastern part of New Orleans. "There were bodies floating in the water outside the building, and our staffers had to swim through that water to get fuel for the generator."

The patients and staff at Methodist could have been evacuated before Hurricane Katrina hit. But instead they were condemned to several days of fear and agony by bad decision-making in Louisiana and the chaotic ineptitude of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Some of the patients died.

Incredibly, when the out-of-state corporate owners of the hospital responded to the flooding by sending emergency relief supplies, they were confiscated at the airport by FEMA and sent elsewhere.

The time to evacuate the hospital was when it became clear that New Orleans was in the path of a Category 4 or 5 hurricane. "We had about 137 patients," said Dr. Jeffrey Coco, the hospital's chief of staff, "and we had a company called Lifeguard that was going to take them out."

But apparently there was a reluctance to evacuate without some sort of governmental guidance. When the mayor of New Orleans, Ray Nagin, issued a mandatory evacuation order, hospitals were exempted. Dr. Fred Cerise, secretary of Louisiana's Department of Health and Hospitals, said Methodist officials could have decided on their own to evacuate, but that never happened.

Some of the patients were extremely ill, requiring ventilators or dialysis treatment or major surgery. When the hurricane hit, part of the roof blew off, windows were blown out, the atrium was badly damaged and the hospital was drenched with rain. On Monday night the power went out, and on Tuesday, after the levees broke, the first floor became hopelessly flooded.

By midweek you had a bizarre situation in which hundreds of people (patients, doctors, nurses, administrative staffers, relatives and people seeking emergency shelter) were stranded, cut off from the rest of the world, in a badly damaged hospital in a major American city.

Staffers with flashlights worked heroically in a sodden, stench-filled environment in which temperatures reached 110 degrees. Elevators did not work, and some patients weighing more than 400 pounds had to be carried up dark, reeking staircases. When ventilators shut down with the loss of power, volunteers worked in shifts to do the difficult hand-pumping necessary to keep patients alive.

Nevertheless, according to Dr. Albert Barrocas, the chief medical officer, the decline in the well-being of the patients was both palpable and widespread. "All of them were deteriorating in the sense of becoming weak," he said. "You could see in their faces the fact that they were scared."

By Tuesday evening four patients had died, and a dozen were dead by the time the hospital was finally evacuated Friday. Doctors believe half of the deaths were caused by the dreadful conditions in the hospital.

Everybody's suffering would have been eased if the emergency relief effort mounted by the hospital's owner, Universal Health Services in King of Prussia, Pa., had not been interfered with by FEMA. Company officials sent desperately needed water, food, diesel fuel to power the hospital's generators and helicopters to ferry in the supplies and evacuate the most vulnerable individuals.

Bruce Gilbert, Universal's general counsel, told me yesterday, "Those supplies were in fact taken from us by FEMA, and we were unable to get them to the hospital. We then determined that it would be better to send our supplies, food and water to Lafayette [130 miles from New Orleans] and have our helicopters fly them from Lafayette to the hospital."

Significant relief began to reach the hospital on Thursday, and by Friday evening everyone had been removed from the ruined premises. They had endured the agonies of the damned, and for all practical purposes had been abandoned by government at all levels.

When you consider that the Methodist Hospital experience was just one small part of the New Orleans catastrophe, you get a sense of the size of the societal failure that we allowed to happen.

Welcome to the United States in 2005.

Separate Inquiry Fails To Gain Support (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu And Josh White

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

The Senate voted along party lines yesterday to reject creation of an independent panel to investigate the government's fumbling response to Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0005803

The proposal, from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), would have established a panel similar to the one that examined the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. The partisan wrangling came amid rising calls from members of both parties to change how the nation manages major disasters.

Senior Republicans proposed such critical fixes as streamlining how the president can order the U.S. military to enforce law and order, and funding compatible radio systems for use in emergencies.

The need for new radios was a major finding of the Sept. 11 commission, whose former members met yesterday and decried that, more than four years after the terrorist attacks, the federal government's command systems, plans and laws remain uncoordinated and unready for a catastrophe such as Katrina.

"There are distinct similarities between Katrina and 9/11, between what was known beforehand and how the government responded to pending dangers," said Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (Hawaii), echoing fellow Democrats' calls for an outside inquiry. "In the four years since 9/11, we should have done a better job in preparing to protect Americans."

"It is Congress's responsibility," countered Sen. George V. Voinovich (R-Ohio). "By golly, we're going to get into the bowels of the Department of Homeland Security and make sure the next time around, it will be able to get the job done."

The House and Senate GOP leadership plan to form a joint congressional investigative committee with a Republican majority. A House vote is scheduled for today. Democrats oppose the move.

The stalemate over the makeup of the panel muted the first hearing in Congress into the Katrina response led by the Senate Committee for Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs. Chairman Susan M. Collins (R-Maine) promised "to lay bare the painful evidence of human errors that have added to the damage."

Witnesses included former California governor Pete Wilson, in office for the 1992 Los Angeles riots and 1994 Northridge earthquake, and Patricia A. Owens, who was mayor of Grand Forks, N.D., during the 1997 flood there. They emphasized the need for recovery efforts and called for a single federal "czar" to take charge.

Collins and Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) will call for building unified radio systems for responders in an upcoming emergency hurricane spending bill, atop $62.3 billion Congress has already spent, Collins spokeswoman Jen Burita said.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.) wrote Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld last night urging a legal review of the use of active-duty troops in domestic emergencies and announced his intent to rename a key martial law statute called the Insurrection Act.

Warner said renaming the law -- used by presidents to fight the Civil War and to integrate schools in Arkansas and Alabama -- would ease political barriers to the presidential exercise of such authority. White House aides cited such concerns in deciding not to federalize state National Guard units to do police work after the storm hit.

"The President should not have to worry about misperceptions by the public based upon outdated wording that does not accurately describe what the armed forces may be doing in a particular emergency," Warner wrote.

Military officials resist federalizing troops because of concerns that the action could appear as an occupying force within U.S. borders. Soldiers, Marines and sailors who were sent to help in the wake of Hurricane Katrina were prevented from taking over police functions.

The National Guard -- under control of the governors -- can do police work such as stopping looters and keeping the peace.

Not having a centralized command structure for all federal authorities and the military at the outset caused significant confusion, military commanders said. A lack of communications -- something the military might have been able to supply if called up -- exacerbated problems.

At their meeting yesterday, former members of the Sept. 11 commission offered blistering criticism and issued a report finding that the government has made little or no progress in enacting reforms.

The panel, now operating as the nonprofit 9/11 Public Discourse Project, focused on congressional failure to provide a dedicated spectrum of radio frequencies for use by emergency responders. Such frequencies could have saved lives in New Orleans by allowing police, firefighters and troops to communicate more directly, the commission said.

"It is the same thing we saw on 9/11," said Thomas H. Kean, the former Republican New Jersey governor who chaired the commission, adding: "If Congress does not act, people will die."

Parties Remain Deadlocked On Katrina Investigation (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn And Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, September 15, 2005

Republicans and Democrats remained in a partisan deadlock yesterday as they prepared for a floor vote to determine how to investigate the bungled response to Hurricane Katrina.

DOJ_NMG_0005804

Republican leaders have pressed for a GOP-controlled bicameral committee to review the government's handling of the disaster, while Democrats favor an independent panel similar to the Sept. 11 commission.

Republican House leaders plan to bring their proposal to the floor today, despite Democratic opposition, and pass it in a largely party-line vote.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) is confident that his Republican colleagues will back the measure.

"I think we're fine," Blunt said yesterday in response to a question about whether his office would whip the bill. "We've talked to our members. Our members are fine."

The proposal would set up a 20-member committee consisting of 11 Republicans and nine Democrats on the House side, according to a draft of the resolution. The minority will be extended the ability to call for extra witnesses at hearings. A budget of $500,000 will be provided through the House Administration Committee.

Democrats plan to offer a motion to recommit, a common parliamentary maneuver that would come up shortly before the vote on the Republicans' joint committee and would attempt to create an independent commission. That motion is expected to fail along party lines.

House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said he anticipated that the "overwhelming majority" of Democrats would back an independent commission, which will be called for in the motion to recommit.

He hinted that some Democrats may also vote for the Republicans' joint committee.

"That's not a partisan issue. That's a judgment issue," he said.

In the upper chamber, Republicans defeated by a vote of 44-54 an amendment offered by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) that would have created a 10-member independent commission evenly divided between Democrats and Republicans. No Senate Republicans voted for the amendment. And Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) rejected an offer from Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to create a joint committee because the proposal did not provide equal representation and subpoena power for Democrats.

Frist has already named Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), the chairwoman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, to lead the Senate investigation. House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is not expected to name a chairman or members of the investigative committee until the House has passed the bill.

He told reporters yesterday that he wanted to get members on the ground in the hurricane-ravaged states as soon as possible to start the congressional investigation.

Both parties face potential political fallout from the bitter standoff. Democrats could face charges of partisanship for failing to go along with the Republicans' joint panel, a type of committee that has been used dozens of times in recent decades to investigate different administrations, including the Iran-Contra scandal, Republicans argue.

Democrats counter that the circumstances were different during the 1980s because Democrats controlled Congress and were investigating a Republican administration. They also charge that congressional Republicans have shown little enthusiasm for any kind of oversight of the Bush administration and that any investigation controlled by Republicans would amount to a whitewash.

As Republicans go forward with plans for a joint committee, Democrats could be faced with an awkward decision to drop their protest and participate in the committee or remain on the sidelines.

Hoyer noted that Democrats had not yet decided whether they would boycott the committee further down the road.

Dropping the protest at some point remained a possibility, said one Democratic strategist.

"You can fight something and then go grudgingly along. That is an option in order to have some voice in the process," the strategist said. Still, Democrats held the high ground in calling for an independent commission rather than a committee controlled by a party sympathetic to the administration, the strategist added.

Asked if Democrats could be persuaded to support the Republicans' plan if given some concessions, Hoyer said he felt there could be some "wiggle room" but "we want to ensure that there is at least one independent commission with subpoena power."

Some Democratic aides drew parallels between the current standoff over Katrina and an earlier impasse over the structure of the House ethics committee, noting that Democrats had boycotted that committee, forcing Republicans to reverse certain rule changes.

Aside from the current dustup over the botched response to Katrina, the political fallout from the storm is beginning to emerge across the country.

The National Republican Congressional Committee put out a press release late last week criticizing Democratic Rep. Jim Matheson (Utah) for voting against the emergency spending bill to fund the Katrina cleanup, only to have The Salt Lake Tribune publish a long article about how the allegations were untrue. Matheson voted against one of the rules leading up to the spending bill.

DOJ_NMG_0005805

In fact, the only members to vote against the first emergency spending bill were Republicans. Eleven House conservatives voted against the bill for various reasons, but primarily in protest of a lack of oversight for the funds.

In addition, President Bush has suffered career-low approval ratings in the wake of a slow federal response to the disaster. Michael Brown, the former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, resigned earlier this week.

A large majority of Americans favor an independent oversight committee in the mold of the Sept. 11 commission, according to an ABC News/Washington Post poll from over the weekend.

Clinton's Attempt To Form Katrina Panel Rejected (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Senate Republicans yesterday scuttled an attempt by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton to establish a panel patterned after the September 11 commission to investigate what went wrong with federal, state and local governments' response to Hurricane Katrina.

The New York Democrat's bid to establish the panel -- which also would have made recommendations on how to improve the government's disaster-response apparatus -- failed to win the two-thirds majority needed to overcome procedural hurdles. Mrs. Clinton's proposal received 44 votes, all from Democrats and independent Sen. James M. Jeffords of Vermont. Fifty-four Republicans all voted no.

"Just as with 9/11, we did not get to the point where we believed we understood what happened until an independent investigation was conducted," Mrs. Clinton said.

The Senate vote likely won't be the last word on whether to create an independent commission or, as an alternative, a special congressional committee to investigate the Katrina response. A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll taken last Thursday through Sunday found that 70 percent of those surveyed supported an independent panel to investigate the government's response to Katrina.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, has rebuffed a bid by congressional Republican leaders to create a committee patterned after the 1987 Iran-Contra panel, which would have a Republican majority -- reflecting their dominance of Congress.

Mr. Reid instead has vowed that any bid by Republican leaders to establish a special bipartisan committee involving lawmakers from both the House and Senate will go forward only if Democrats have equal representation.

Separately, Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Susan Collins, Maine Republican, said yesterday that post-September 11 changes to improve the government response to disasters failed their first major test in Hurricane Katrina's aftermath.

Despite billions of dollars to boost disaster preparedness at all levels of government, the response to Katrina was beset by confusion, communication failures and lack of coordination, Miss Collins said as she opened hearings into the disaster.

"At this point, we would have expected a sharp, crisp response to this terrible tragedy," she said. "Instead, we witnessed what appeared to be a sluggish initial response."

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the top Democrat on the committee, said the response to Katrina "has shaken the public's confidence in the ability of government at all levels to protect them in a crisis."

Lawmakers said they did not ask officials from the Federal Emergency Management Agency or the Homeland Security Department to appear at the hearing out of fear of disrupting the ongoing recovery process in the battered Gulf Coast. Instead, numerous former city and state officials testified about their experiences in facing major disasters in their communities.

Calling Katrina a "national tragedy," former New Orleans Mayor Marc H. Morial put the primary responsibility for disaster response on the federal government.

Finding Relief -- Slowly (WP)

By Keith L. Alexander And Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La., Sept. 14 -- First they had to ride out a howling storm. Then find shelter. Then food and water. Now, the thousands of families driven from their homes by Hurricane Katrina face the daunting challenge of applying for financial assistance under a dizzying mix of government programs.

The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that the storm wiped out about as many as 400,000 jobs in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, prompting a surge in new claims for unemployment insurance benefits.

Many of the affected workers and their families are also newly eligible for food stamps, Medicaid, housing assistance, subsidized school lunches, emergency cash assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other programs.

But many have never received such benefits and will have to navigate through multiple government agencies to find out if they qualify and how to apply.

"The baffling problem is that each of these programs is its own bureaucracy," said Sheila R. Zedlewski, director of Income and Benefits Policy at the Urban Institute. Many poor people who are eligible for these benefits "don't apply because the process is so cumbersome and the system is so difficult to understand."

And that's in normal times -- without a hurricane that has closed many government offices and downed telephone lines in hard-hit areas.

Shelleand Terry, 48, said she and her daughter Erica, 25, had both tried for two weeks to apply for unemployment insurance benefits but were frustrated by long lines and busy signals. They got through by telephone Sunday but were told they still had to drive about an hour from Napoleonville, La., to the Baton Rouge office to activate their benefits in person.

"We are spending all our money on gas, and we still haven't received any benefits," Shelleand Terry said. "This is so frustrating and hard."

Efforts are being made to streamline the process for Katrina survivors. The Red Cross and AFL-CIO have set up emergency centers where evacuees can use computers and telephones and receive guidance on how to apply for various programs. And because many families lost financial records in the storm, several state social-service agencies are asking claimants for documents "if possible" to prove they are eligible for programs.

Due to their evacuee status, people who fled their home states because of Katrina can apply for all federal benefits without having to produce the usual records proving eligibility, according to the federal Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

Progress is occurring gradually. Take jobless claims, for example. Last week, the U.S. Labor Department estimated that only 10,000 hurricane survivors had filed new claims for unemployment insurance benefits. By today, more than 200,000 new claims had been filed by residents of Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi, according to the labor agencies in those states.

In Louisiana and Mississippi, state employees are seeking out workers in their homes and in shelters to help them fill out jobless claims by hand.

"We've gone to virtually every shelter in the state," said Ed Pratt, press secretary for the Louisiana Department of Labor.

In Louisiana, union members are "knocking on the doors of residents to reach out to workers about how to register" for the range of available benefits, AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney said in an interview Tuesday.

Adding to the complications, tens of thousands of evacuees are scattered across the country, living with relatives, in church shelters or in facilities such as the Houston Astrodome and the D.C. Armory.

Texas Workforce Commission employees are taking claims from Louisiana evacuees living at the Astrodome. And more than 60,000 displaced Louisiana residents have filed from out of state by telephone or online, Pratt said.

Meanwhile, other unemployed gulf state workers will have to be persistent to file a claim. B.J. Fink, 26, of New Orleans, said he and his girlfriend first tried to apply for unemployment benefits three days after the hurricane hit. They waited in line for more than three hours. When the two finally made it inside to see a counselor, the overworked office computer crashed. They returned today to try to complete their applications. "They got lost in the process, I guess," he said.

Many displaced residents will find that their benefits don't buy as much in the higher-cost communities where they've settled, from California to the Washington area.

"It's hard to imagine how they are going to make ends meet in the cities where they have landed," said Jared Bernstein, a senior economist with the Economic Policy Institute, a think tank that focuses on labor issues.

Wherever evacuees have arrived, their unemployment benefit will be based on their previous earnings in the state they've left behind. The amounts are determined by the states according to different income-based formulas and carry maximum amounts; the national average for this cap is $377.18 per week.

Mississippi's maximum unemployment benefit, at $210 per week, is the lowest in the country, according to Department of Labor figures. Alabama's maximum, at $220 per week, is the second lowest. Louisiana's limit, at $258 a week, is the sixth lowest.

Meanwhile, a family of two adults and two children normally needs $715 a week to cover the basic cost of living in Baton Rouge, according to EPI. But many evacuees have moved to areas with much higher living costs. A family of four needs $756 per week to cover living expenses in Houston; that same family needs $1,182 a week to live in the Washington area, according to EPI. The national median cost of living is $769 per week.

Some of the evacuees are going to find jobs in their new communities, many of which will pay higher wages, reflecting the steeper cost of living, Bernstein said. "The people you need to worry about are those who are unemployed in the city where they've landed, trying to get by in a northern city on unemployment benefits from a southern state."

Other benefits are available. FEMA, for example, is offering a lump sum of $2,000 per household in cash assistance. Food-stamp benefits vary slightly by state, due to differences in eligibility rules; the average monthly benefit per person last year was $85.85 in Alabama, $89.03 in Louisiana, and $79.81 in Mississippi.

Other health, housing and welfare programs are funded by the federal government but administered by the states, with benefits reflecting diverse eligibility and participation rules.

The first Louisiana claimants should start receiving their unemployment benefits late this week or early next week, Pratt said.

While the hurricane victims grow frustrated with the application process, the extra efforts being made on their behalf are stirring resentment among some state residents who lost their jobs before the storm. Nataisha Phifer, 34, of north Baton Rouge, hasn't worked since June, when she lost her job as a saleswoman at Dillard's department store. Phifer says that now she has to stand in longer lines and compete for jobs with those who have been displaced by the hurricane.

"I'm very compassionate, and I understand what they're going through," Phifer said. "But it's frustrating. It seems we've been pushed to the back of the line behind them."

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Still Republican

"Thank you for writing an article that contains an astute and accurate framing of the issue that resulted in resignations by some individuals associated with the [National Black Republican Association]," writes Frances Rice, chairman of the NBRA, albeit she wants to clarify several points made in this week's Inside the Beltway column.

She states that through "a majority vote of the executive committee, NBRA press releases were prepared and distributed to the media in support of President Bush, as the head of the Republican Party, regarding the Supreme Court nomination of Judge John G. Roberts Jr. and Hurricane Katrina."

That said, Ms. Rice reveals: "Several members of the NBRA inactive board of directors, who had been permitted to participate in the open meetings of the executive committee, and two members of the executive committee stated that the National Black Republican Association should not support the Republican Party."

Recognizing "a division" over the main purpose of the NBRA, she says that with the approval of the executive committee she sent a letter to each member of the executive committee requesting they sign and return a statement supporting the NBRA's bylaws.

"The dissension over the purpose of the NBRA led to five of the seven members of the inactive board of directors resigning, and one of the five members of the executive committee," she confirms.

Ms. Rice adds that "several black Republicans from across the country" have indicated interest in the NBRA leadership vacancies, including Rev. Wayne Perryman of Washington state, author of Unfounded Loyalty.

Finally, she assures us that the NBRA will continue its obviously unwavering support of the Republican Party.

Throwing $ at Katrina

The $60-plus billion "down payment" Congress doled out thus far in response to Hurricane Katrina "is already twice the annual budget for the Department of Homeland Security."

So reveals Rep. Jim Kolbe, Arizona Republican, who -- given the staggering dollar figures -- has introduced the "Special Inspector General for Hurricane Katrina Recovery Act of 2005," seeking to appoint an independent inspector general to oversee continued funding efforts.

Rep. Jeb Hensarling, Texas Republican, agrees that Capitol Hill "must do everything necessary" to help Katrina's victims, but stresses "Congress must also use its head."

Which means, he says, that "Congress cannot continue to fund projects like the $800,000 outhouse, $1.2 million for panda research or the $1 million rain forest in Iowa."

Sam's "Top 10"

Not happy with your job? Be advised that the best places to work in the federal government are, in order, the Office of Management and Budget, the National Science Foundation and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

Some 150,000 executive branch employees surveyed by the Office of Personnel Management, in conjunction with the Partnership for Public Service and American University, say the remainder of the 10 best places to hang your bureaucratic hat: the Government Accountability Office, Securities and Exchange Commission, NASA, General Services Administration, Environmental Protection Agency, Department of Energy and the State Department.

Sea of regimes

Just returning from leading a delegation to terrorism-torn Iraq is Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican, who kept a diary of the trip. One entry catching our eye notes that a fellow congressman asked Iraqi Defense Minister Sadoun al-Duleimi what neighboring nation represented the greatest challenge to peace within Iraq?

DOJ_NMG_0005808

To which the minister replied, "All of them." He then added, "Kuwait is OK."

"It was an illuminating moment," the diary reads. "I will never forget that this new Iraq is, with one exception, floating in a sea of authoritarian regimes with long histories of association with terror among their people and their governments."

Kissing cousin

King Harald V of Norway is to arrive in Washington for this weekend's dedication of a bronze statue of Crown Princess Martha on the Norwegian Embassy grounds.

The princess died in 1954, three years before her crown prince husband -- and cousin -- became Norway's King Olav V.

9/11 Panelists Fault Storm Response (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Members of the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks said the federal government's poor response to Hurricane Katrina underscored its failure to adopt urgent recommendations the commission made more than a year ago to enhance emergency preparedness.

Thomas Kean, the former governor of New Jersey who was chairman of the 9/11 panel, said many of the steps should have been taken immediately after the 2001 attacks. He also said quick implementation of certain commission recommendations issued more than a year ago "could have saved peoples' lives" in New Orleans.

The commissioners' assessment comes as the Bush administration struggles to contain political damage from its often disjointed response to the hurricane. Although the commission officially was disbanded last summer, its members have continued to press for implementation of their recommendations. In recent months, through public hearings and examination of records, they have made the first formal assessments of how far federal, state and local authorities have come in carrying out their proposals.

Last July, the bipartisan, 10-member commission issued a final report of its investigation into the attacks and their aftermath. It contained numerous recommendations on topics such as emergency preparedness and U.S. foreign policy. Earlier this summer, the former commissioners held hearings to assess compliance with their recommendations. Their "report card," issued yesterday on emergency readiness, is the first of several they are expected to issue in coming weeks on the different categories of their proposals.

The commissioners in a written report gave failing grades to the response on 11 of 14 recommendations related to emergency preparedness. They noted, for example, that little progress has been made in awarding additional radio frequencies to fire, police and other emergency responders. Proposals to do this have been stalled in Congress by opposition from television broadcasters, who want to delay relinquishing frequencies until 2009.

They faulted both the federal and local governments for failing to establish a system for clear-cut command and coordination in the event of disasters. And they singled out the Department of Homeland Security for failing to meet statutory deadlines that passed months ago to issue reports on the vulnerability of "national critical infrastructure" and on transportation security.

A DHS spokeswoman said the department just last week gave a classified report on transportation security to Congress, and noted that it is continuing to work on the report on infrastructure, "taking the time to do it properly."

The commissioners, who despite deep political differences had been unanimous in their recommendations, were split over current calls to form an independent commission similar to their own to investigate the Katrina response. In a party-line vote the Senate rejected a Democratic proposal to form such an independent commission. Republicans favor an inquiry by a special House-Senate investigative committee.

While several Democrats on the commission, including former Rep. Tim Roemer, said such an inquiry would help establish what needs to be done, John Lehman, a Republican former secretary of the Navy, said the media already had done a thorough job of investigating and exposing what went wrong.

Commission Criticizes Storm Response (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - The members of the 9/11 commission criticized the Bush administration and Congress on Wednesday for "minimal progress" in enacting many of the panel's year-old recommendations to bolster domestic security agencies and their ability to respond to terrorist attacks and natural disasters like Hurricane Katrina.

In a unanimous privately financed report, the 10 former commissioners found that there had been little or no action by the White House and Congress to enact many of its recommendation on domestic security.At a news conference here to release the report, the commissioners expressed astonishment at what they described as the federal government's disastrous performance in responding to Hurricane Katrina, saying it suggested that Washington was also ill prepared to deal with another catastrophic terrorist strike.

The report was issued under the auspices of an education group that the five Republicans and five Democrats on the commission created as the panel was going out of business last year.

John F. Lehman, a Republican on the panel who was a Navy secretary in the Reagan administration, said he feared that the "unconscionable" failures of the rescue effort along the Gulf Coast would embolden terrorist groups to attack again on American soil, making quick adoption of the commission's year-old recommendations all the more important.

Katrina's Lesson: US 'Not Safe' Enough (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON - Some Americans perished needlessly in hurricane Katrina because the US government has not adopted several reforms urged by the Sept. 11 commission.

That is the view of former commission chairman Thomas Kean and vice-chairman Lee Hamilton. The two now lead the 9/11 Public Discourse Project, a successor to the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks.

"A number of our recommendations were in the area of emergency preparedness. Many of those recommendations have not been implemented. We believe had they been implemented that the tragedy might have been less severe in terms of human lives," Mr. Kean said at a Monitor breakfast. "Do we have to wait for another national emergency to get some of these things done?"

Hurricane Katrina has altered Mr. Hamilton's assessment of overall security. "We often said during ... the 9/11 hearings that we were safer but not safe," he said. "What struck me after Katrina was that we were not as safe as I thought we were."

Two reforms are vital in the post-Katrina world, they argue. One is to make clear who is in charge at the federal level during emergencies. The other, they say, is to require every state to adopt a detailed command-and-control plan for disasters - and link it to receiving funding from the US Department of Homeland Security.

"It was obvious that nobody knew who was in charge when Katrina struck. We had the same problem on 9/11," Kean said. "If you don't have a unified command structure with somebody in charge and somebody following through ... it is going to cost lives."

The two also urged Congress to adopt the Sept. 11 panel's plea for homeland-security funds to be allocated on the basis of priority rather than dispensing security money to all states regardless of risk, as is the current practice. "You can't really put the money in the best places until you have identified your priorities," Kean said. The Department of Homeland Security, he noted, missed the deadline for filing a report to Congress ranking the nation's most vulnerable areas.

Hamilton, who spent 34 years in Congress, recognizes the challenges the government faces in moving more quickly on the reforms. "All of these things sound simple, but they really require very, very hard choices by policymakers," he said.

Hamilton warned that "we could easily have a disaster much, much worse than Katrina." The greatest risks to the nation, he says, are a nuclear weapon exploding in a populated area and a biological attack on the food supply. "In setting priorities, you have to prepare for the worst cases," Hamilton said. Given the other threats the United States faces, "I think we have overdone it, personally," by spending an estimated $20 billion to protect passengers and crew on commercial airlines. "We are not preparing for other kinds of threats that would be far more devastating."

As City Dries, Residents Plan Return (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 14 -- Tens of thousands of New Orleans residents could begin returning to their homes as early as Monday as city and federal authorities have set out an accelerated plan to repopulate the city, reversing earlier estimates that the metropolis could be closed for months.

The plan would reopen a portion of New Orleans that was home to about 170,000 people, or one-third of the city's population, federal officials said, and be rolled out over the next two weeks.

The reentry plan would unfold by Zip code, depending on which section gets power and water utilities online, and how quickly hospital and emergency services can be restored. It involves portions of New Orleans that largely were unflooded: downtown, the French Quarter, Uptown and Algiers.

"The timing of the plan is subject to getting security and health issues in order," said William Lehman, the Federal Emergency Management Agency spokesman for Orleans Parish.

Other portions of the city could remain uninhabited for months, authorities said, as tens of thousands of homes must be drained and many rebuilt.

The legal and political disputes over how authorities responded to Hurricane Katrina also promise to persist, as controversy flared over nursing homes and hospitals that did not evacuate, and over the recovery of the dead.

Louisiana state authorities said Wednesday that they are investigating the Lafon Nursing Home of the Holy Family in New Orleans, where a number of deaths have been reported. They may investigate as many as 18 nursing homes, authorities said.

The state has charged the owners of St. Rita's nursing home in St. Bernard Parish with 34 counts of negligent homicide stemming from patient deaths in flooding from Katrina. State Attorney General Charles C. Foti Jr. said that the owners of the nursing home, Salvador and Mable Mangano, had a legal obligation to evacuate the home.

The couple's attorney, James Cobb, said that his clients did not evacuate their 60 patients because they believed that their nursing home was safe -- it had never flooded in 20 years -- because St. Bernard Parish officials never ordered a mandatory evacuation and because the Manganos believed that transporting their patients en masse by bus could kill them.

Cobb cited numerous reports of elderly people dying during the evacuation before Katrina. "What do you do? You know if you evacuate, 10, 12 or 14 -- pick a number -- might die on the way out," he said in a cell phone interview.

He described the efforts the Manganos and their children made to rescue patients after the nursing home flooded, getting them onto mattresses to float out through broken windows, and then into boats. "They saved 52 lives," Cobb said. "And their reward . . . is an arrest warrant."

The owners of a New Orleans hospital where 44 bodies were found said they were those of critically ill patients who died in stifling heat after power was cut to the flooded building. Tenet Healthcare Corp. said no one still alive was left behind at Memorial Medical Center in New Orleans.

The death toll for Louisiana reached 474 as the recovery of bodies continued. In response to criticism from Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) that the federal effort to bring bodies to the morgues was going too slowly and showed disrespect for the dead, the official in charge of hurricane recovery described a process in which a chaplain accompanied each search team and recited a prayer whenever a body was discovered.

"This is a sensitive process," Vice Adm. Thad W. Allen said at a news conference. "We are mindful of the dignity needed to be afforded each individual."

Less than half the city is now underwater, down from 80 percent at the peak of the flooding. Of the 144 pumps in Orleans Parish, 80 have begun working, Lehman said, up from 20 just days ago. About 50 percent of the phone lines are working, he said.

"We are out of nuclear crisis mode and are into day-to-day crisis mode," Mayor C. Ray Nagin said Tuesday night. He said his decision on reentry, which is expected to be announced Thursday, will depend on air and water quality in the city. According to the Environmental Protection Agency, "every effort should be made to limit contact with flood water due to potentially elevated levels of contamination associated with raw sewage and other hazardous substances." But Nagin said that test results have generally been better than expected.

In the suburbs outside of the heavily hit areas of Orleans, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes, residents have begun to come back, waiting either for electricity or the grocery store.

In New Orleans, even those streets in areas least affected by the storm are badly in need of cleanup. Stoplights do not work. Outside restaurants, the stench from two weeks' worth of rotten food is sometimes overpowering. Broken glass litters sidewalks and gutters. In places, fallen brick walls block roadways.

Yet amid the debris, restoration crews and armed troops on the streets Wednesday, some residents were looking forward again -- almost optimistically.

About midmorning, restaurateur Alex Patout was sitting outside his famed French Quarter establishment, sipping champagne.

"Thank God the heart and soul of what New Orleans is all about is basically damage-free," he said. "All we need is electricity -- we want to be one of the first restaurants to open."

He was planning his first menus, but he acknowledges that he is facing a daunting challenge. Of his staff of 40, many of whom lived in east New Orleans, he has located only one.

As he sees it, New Orleans has been split into two very different halves, one flooded, the other dry. Though the dry portion may be better off in some ways, the businesses there depend on the less-fortunate parts for employees.

"That is going to be the biggest nut for this city," he said. "Where is the human infrastructure that makes it run?"

Some Evacuees Relish Chance To Start Anew (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

As Donald Henry clung to the side of his New Orleans house and watched as his brother and niece were plucked from his side and drowned by Hurricane Katrina, he had no way of knowing that his own life was about to change dramatically -- for the better.

A few blocks away, Cash Smith floated his two children on laundry hampers and plunged into chest-high waters. It was a journey that would begin in heartbreak but end in tears of joy, as Cash and his family found themselves delivered from a neighborhood under sea level into a new life a mile high, in Denver.

For Henry, Smith and a third evacuee, Vylandrus Dupree, who is now being housed at a resort in Arkansas, the unimaginable disaster has led to an unimaginable gift. Through a series of chance encounters and random decisions made by relief workers, these young African American men find themselves in parts of the country they had never seen before, and each believes there is no going back.

Their stories illustrate the game of chance that the resettlement effort is for so many victims of Katrina. Evacuees enter the relief roulette wheel with little idea whether they will emerge in a dreary shelter or in the cool air of the Ozark Mountains.

"It was just a blessing for me," said Henry, 28, who stepped off a rescue plane and found himself in Michigan for the first time in his life. "I am going to make Michigan my home. I know I ain't going back to New Orleans."

These men know better than most that their stories are exceptional, that thousands of other survivors, including some of their own family members, are still in crowded shelters with few options. Each remains keenly aware of all he has lost. Henry's voice chokes as he describes his drowned family. Dupree's house in Orleans Parish is "totaled." But while Katrina destroyed nearly everything each man owned, it also gave each the kind of options and opportunities that just did not exist for a poor black man in New Orleans: Strangers in strange places are behaving like family.

"I am going to start all over here in Denver," Smith said, speaking from a Marriott TownePlace Suites that has given his family free lodging for two months. Volunteers are helping to set him up with a job.

Dupree, 20, has enrolled at the University of Arkansas, where his tuition, books and supplies are free for the first semester. A clergyman has helped him find work.

"Everyone's friendly, and everyone's willing to help," he marveled. "I am going to try to stay in Arkansas forever."'A New Beginning'

Donald Henry remembers the last thing his brother Clifford told him before they leaped into Katrina's raging floodwaters in the lower Ninth Ward of New Orleans: "If I don't make it, make sure my kids do."

The two brothers and Clifford's girlfriend tethered three children with straps and stepped outside. A neighbor refused to let them in, so the group hung to the side of their own house.

Clifford was the first to go under, after he lost his grip on his brother's ankle. When Henry turned his attention back to the children, pulling on the strap that held them, he found his niece, Serena, had drowned, he said in an interview.

Around them, houses were unfolding like paper, he recalled. A second child had his life jacket ripped off, and went under. Henry, Clifford's girlfriend and the last child finally clambered onto a roof, and then to a higher one. Henry broke into an attic for shelter.

When the rescue boats came, the survivors slept on a bridge the first night. People were being taken to the Superdome, but Henry wanted none of that because he had heard rumors of crowding and rioting there. He wandered around for days, finally getting to the New Orleans Convention Center, from where he was airlifted to the airport.

When he got on an airplane, no one told him where it was headed. After they closed the doors, the word came down: Chicago.

But when the plane pulled into the Windy City, the group ran into a bureaucratic problem. The airplane took off again. When the doors opened, Henry and hundreds of other evacuees emerged to find themselves in Michigan, where Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm (D) had offered to house 1,500 evacuees. Henry was taken to a National Guard facility at Fort Custer near Battle Creek.

"They just got on a plane only knowing they were going to be taken somewhere for shelter, and they ended up happening to come to Battle Creek," said Capt. Aaron Jenkins, a spokesman for the Michigan National Guard. "That's what happened to a lot of people."

When Henry got off the bus at the base, people were holding signs saying "Welcome" and "I love you."

Henry said he was glad to have been given a way out of New Orleans. He talked about the violence and drugs that had surrounded him there, the "harassment by police" and "false promises" by politicians.

"The Lord was telling me it was time for a change," he said. "I am going to take this opportunity to change my life and start a new beginning."'What Do I Have to Lose?'

DOJ_NMG_0005812

Chad Ladov and two of his friends in Denver had watched the unfolding disaster in New Orleans as had millions of other Americans. One of the friends, Andrew Hudson, worked at Denver-based Frontier Airlines, and asked his company whether it could fly New Orleans evacuees to Denver free. When the company agreed, the trio immediately left for Houston, where thousands of evacuees were being housed at the Astrodome.

The friends arrived on the Friday after the hurricane. Ladov, who used to work at the Federal Emergency Management Agency, had contacts among emergency workers on the ground. He had announcements broadcast over the public address system asking whether there were people who wanted to go to Denver.

The three friends canvassed the Astrodome, putting up signs and posters about their Denver proposal. That's when they came by Cash Smith.

"Hey, dude, do you want to come to Denver?" Smith recalled them asking.

Smith, his wife and their two small children had initially sought shelter at the Superdome in New Orleans, after fleeing their flooded neighborhood. Smith and the children had gotten to Houston, but his wife had not been able to find space on the same bus and was scheduled to arrive later.

"I have no money," Smith replied.

The group told him the airline ride to Denver was free. They promised him help in finding a job and getting on his feet.

"Why not give it a try?" Ladov said.

Smith decided to take a chance. After all, he was surrounded by strangers in the stadium; why not trust these three?

"I have lost everything else," he said he thought to himself. "What do I have to lose?"

Two-thirds of the 18 people Ladov and his friends brought back to Denver had never been on an airplane before. They peppered the Denver friends with questions: "What's Denver look like? What's the racial makeup? What's the cost of living? What kind of food do you have there?"

Henry's wife joined him in Denver a few days later, and the couple had an emotional reunion at the airport.

Jim White, manager of community affairs for the Colorado branch of Volunteers of America, said area hotels had offered 30 rooms free for two months. The group is actively working to help people find permanent housing, and set them up with jobs and supplies.

"My life has really changed," said Smith, who said he plans to stay in Denver. "All I came here with was the clothes on my back. Now I have more than I had then."'It's a Big Opportunity'

Vylandrus Dupree fled New Orleans the day before the hurricane struck. Dupree, who was getting ready for his sophomore year at a community college, was told to head west. Along with a friend, he drove to Texas, expecting to wait out the storm and then return home in a day or two.

They slept in the car the first night and, when they returned to Louisiana, state troopers directed them north. They hit the road again, and eventually pulled into a Red Cross shelter in Springdale, Ark., 700 miles away.

As more evacuees came in, Red Cross officials decided to move a group that included Dupree 20 miles away to the Mount Sequoyah Conference and Retreat Center in Fayetteville, a scenic 30-acre facility overlooking the Ozark Mountains of northwest Arkansas.

"The United Methodist Church has a policy of open minds, open hearts and open doors," said the Rev. Jack Wilson, a board member of the center and an official at the church, which has run the center for 83 years as a teaching facility and a place for spiritual reflection.

Brian Swain, a volunteer coordinator, said work has begun in earnest to find evacuees more permanent homes, jobs, food stamps and Social Security checks. Twenty children were enrolled last week in Fayetteville public schools, and school buses are coming by the center to pick up the kids.

"We asked people: 'What is your goal? Relocate to northwest Arkansas, or move back or move elsewhere?' " Swain said. "Ninety-five percent said they wanted to relocate to northwest Arkansas."

Volunteers helped Dupree enroll at the University of Arkansas. "It's a big opportunity," he said. "I would have been a fool not to take it."

Dupree said a clergyman he had met at the Red Cross facility had helped him find a job at a Walgreens drugstore.

There was no question of going back to New Orleans, Dupree said. "It's beautiful up here."

Neighborhoods Likely To Be Razed In Cleanup (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

DOJ_NMG_0005813

Environmental Protection Agency officials and environmental specialists said yesterday that the cleanup of flood-soaked New Orleans will require razing neighborhoods, comprehensive disinfection, and extensive removal of soil and sediment infused with chemicals and bacteria.

"The whole city of New Orleans has the potential for being a giant Superfund [toxic dump] site," said Robert D. Bullard, director of the Environmental Justice Resource Center at Clark Atlanta University in Georgia.

EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson said tests continue to show high, unsafe levels of sewage and lead in New Orleans' water and evidence of other chemicals, such as chromium, copper, iron and sodium.

He characterized Hurricane Katrina as the "largest natural disaster the EPA and the nation have ever faced."

"Until we have a better handle on the magnitude of the problems, it is impossible to speculate on how long it will take" to resolve the environmental threats, said Mr. Johnson, who cited concern about the contaminated floodwaters' effect on the Mississippi River, Lake Pontchartrain and the Gulf of Mexico.

Several people familiar with the subject predicted that once the floodwaters are flushed out, possibly by next month, there will be extensive debate about the safety of certain neighborhoods, schoolyards and parks because of the presence of chemicals and bacteria.

"They are now part of the ecosystem, part of the water, part of the soil. Those chemicals will be absorbed on any surface, organic and inorganic," said Mirat Gurol, professor of environmental engineering at San Diego State University.

Ms. Gurol said many of the organisms will survive in spores and cysts, becoming dangerous again once they get in contact with water or humidity. She also expressed concerns about health risks from long-term exposure to chemicals and to heavy metals, such as lead, which do not decay in the soil.

The EPA also has found carcinogenic polychlorinated biphenyls, or PCBs, in New Orleans' floodwaters.

Von Roebuck, spokesman for the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, declined to speculate about the health risks.

"The key is what kind of pollutants are in that water, and until we find that out, we can't predict," he said. The EPA tests are "preliminary," and much more analysis is needed, he said.

Some people in the hurricane zone died after they waded in the contaminated floodwaters and developed bacterial infections that penetrated open sores. In shelters, there were outbreaks of norovirus, a condition caused by consuming feces-contaminated food or water or coming into contact with an infected person. Norovirus is not usually life-threatening.

The levels of sewage found in New Orleans' floodwaters were 10 to 20 times greater than levels the EPA considers safe.

Daniel W. McCarthy, president and chief executive officer of Black & Veatch Water in Kansas City, Mo. -- which has contracts with Federal Emergency Management Agency to install and repair water systems in the flood-ravaged area -- said he thinks it's "more than likely drinking-water systems have been contaminated, even if they are still in service."

Boiling water "will kill live organisms, but not chemicals," Ms. Gurol said. "Long-term exposure to chemicals is a risk factor."

Mr. McCarthy agreed, saying it's necessary to flush and sanitize all lines.

Roy K. Dokka, a Louisiana State University geologist, expects that thousands of New Orleans residents "will be traumatized" when they are told their houses will have to be torn down.

Big Easy May Be Ready For New Year's (USAT)

By Gene Sloan

USA Today, September 15, 2005

New Year's in New Orleans?

Don't count it out, says Stephen Perry, president of the New Orleans Metropolitan Convention & Visitors Bureau.

Though it could be years before some residential areas bounce back from Hurricane Katrina, Perry and other leaders say tourist areas will be ready for visitors far, far sooner.

“When you see estimates of New Orleans not getting power back or water flowing for six or eight months, that is not the part of the city where tourists go,” Perry says. He notes that power was restored to the city's big hotels Monday and should be up across the downtown within two weeks. Potable water could return across the French Quarter and other neighborhoods within days.

Half a dozen hotels, including the Sheraton, Hyatt, Hilton and W, already have reopened, and an additional 35 to 40 will be open by the end of next week, Perry says. For now, they house relief workers, government officials and journalists. But the city's power brokers hope to have them ready for tourists by New Year's. Already there are plans for a scaled-down version of Mardi Gras in February.

Perry says getting tourism going quickly is crucial to the city's survival. Tourism is the biggest employer, accounting for 81,000 jobs and nearly $5 billion a year.

Reviving tourism, moreover, is realistic, say industry leaders. Tourist areas such as the French Quarter are on high ground and were spared serious flooding.

Mark Sanders, general manager of Marriott's 15 hotels, says Marriott should have most or all of its properties open by October. Like other chains, the company is setting aside 25% of its rooms to house displaced employees and their families. (There are plans to bring many back next week.) Hilton also plans to have most of its 17 hotels open soon, spokeswoman Kathy Shepard says.

Restaurateurs also are racing to get eateries up.

“We're in pretty good shape,” says Ralph Brennan, a top restaurateur. He hopes to have two of his places, Bacco's and Red Fish Grill, open within weeks to serve relief workers.

One hurdle is housing tourism service workers. Mayor Ray Nagin announced Tuesday that residents of less-damaged areas such as Uptown and Algiers could move back as early as Monday. And the city plans to shuttle evacuees in from Baton Rouge and elsewhere.

Speculators Rush In As Water Recedes (LAT)

By David Streitfeld

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

BATON ROUGE, La. -- Brandy Farris is house hunting in New Orleans.

The real estate agent has $10 million in the bank, wired by an investor who has instructed her to scoop up houses -- any houses. "Flooding no problem," Farris advises in her newspaper ads.

Her backer is a Miami businessman who specializes in buying storm-ravaged property at a deep discount, something that has paid dividends in hurricane-prone Florida. But he may have a harder time finding bargains this time around.

In some ways, Hurricane Katrina seems to have taken a vibrant real estate market and made it hotter. Large sections of the city are under water, but that's only increasing the demand for dry houses. And in flooded areas, speculators are trying to buy properties on the cheap, hoping that the redevelopment of New Orleans will start a boom.

This land rush has long-term implications in a city where many of the poorest residents were flooded out. It raises the question of what sort of housing -- if any -- will be available to those without a six-figure salary. If New Orleans ends up a high-priced enclave, without a mix of cultures, races and incomes, something vital may be lost.

"There's a public interest question here," said Ann Oliveri, a senior vice president with the Urban Land Institute, a Washington think-tank. "You don't have to abdicate the city to whoever shows up."

For now, though, it's a seller's market, at least for habitable homes.

Two months ago, Steve Young bought a two-bedroom condo in New Orleans' Garden District as an investment for $145,000. Last month, he was transferred by Shell Oil to Houston. Last week, he put the condo on the market.

In a posting on the Internet classified site Craig's List, Young asked $220,000. He got a dozen serious expressions of interest -- enough so he's no longer actively pursuing a buyer.

"I'm pretty positive the market's going to move up from here," he said.

So, to their surprise, are many others.

"I thought this storm was the end of the city," said Arthur Sterbcow, president of New Orleans-based Latter & Blum, one of the biggest real estate brokerages on the Gulf Coast.

"If anyone had told me two weeks ago that I'd be getting the calls and e-mails I'm getting, I would have thought he was ready for the psychiatric ward."

Messages from those wanting to buy houses -- whether intact or flooded -- and commercial properties are outrunning those who want to sell by a factor of 20, said Sterbcow, who has set up temporary quarters in his firm's Baton Rouge office.

"We're pressing everyone into service just to answer the phones," he added.

These eager would-be buyers may be drawing their inspiration from lower Manhattan immediately after 9/11, which proved a bonanza for those smart enough to buy condos there.

Of course, in southern Louisiana, everything is hypothetical for the moment. The storm destroyed many property records and displaced buyers, sellers, agents and title companies, so no deals are actually being done. Insurance companies haven't started to settle claims yet, much less determine how, or whether, they will insure New Orleans in the future. The city isn't even drained yet.

But people are thinking ahead, influenced by a single factor: the belief that hundreds of billions of dollars in government aid is going to create a boomtown. The people administering that aid will need somewhere to live, as will those doing the rebuilding. So will employees of companies lured back to the area, and the service people that attend to them.

All this will lead to what Sterbcow delicately calls a "reorientation" of the city.

DOJ_NMG_0005815

"Everyone I talked to has said, `Let's start with a clean sheet of paper, fix it and get it right,' " he said. "Some of the homes here were only held together by the termites."

What the owners of the city's estimated 150,000 flooded houses will get out of "reorientation" is unclear, especially if they were in poor repair and uninsured.

Some black New Orleans residents say dourly they know what's coming. Melvin Gilbert, a sixty-something maintenance crew chief, stood outside an elegant hotel in the French Quarter this week and recalled how that neighborhood had gentrified.

He remembered a half century ago when the French Quarter had a substantial number if black residents.

"Then the Caucasians started offering them $10,000 for their homes," he said. "Well, they only bought the places for $2,000, so they took it and ran."

The whites restored the homes, which rose quickly in value. Gilbert said he expects the same dynamic when the floodwaters recede in the heavily black neighborhoods east of downtown.

The process of tracking down owners of deluged houses is greatly slowed by the absence of records. It's not going to be easy to find these people, said Farris, the Baton Rouge real estate agent.

What would she pay for a ruined house?

Farris demurred, saying it was too early to tell, but probably only the value of the land, if that. While the French Quarter may be back to life within months, outlying districts like North Bywater and the Lower 9th Ward will take years, if they ever do. Investors might hope this is the equivalent of buying land on the distant outskirts of a boomtown, but it's not a guarantee.

For one thing, there are already proposals to convert certain flooded areas -- including some water-logged neighborhoods -- into parks. Under the U.S. Supreme Court's recent ruling broadening the definition of eminent domain, speculators could be forced to sell their properties to the government.

That would be a great outcome for many homeowners in the parishes south and east of New Orleans that bore the brunt of the storm.

Six months ago, Todd La Valla, a real estate agent, bought a four-unit apartment building for $59,000 in the community of Buras, an unincorporated hamlet in Plaquemines Parish 55 miles southeast of New Orleans.

The tenants evacuated in the storm, or at least La Valla hopes they did. He's sure the building itself is gone too, like just about everything else in the area. La Valla had no insurance, which means his $10,000 investment is probably a complete loss.

Yet where there's disaster, there's opportunity.

"I've had calls from investors in Los Angeles, Las Vegas, New York, looking to buy property," La Valla said. "This is going to be hard for the poor, the elderly, those that didn't have insurance. But it's going to be great for some people."

Germans Help Clean Up After Katrina (WT)

By Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS -- The 90 men and women sent by the German government to drain flood water from the city are among thousands of specialists now arriving to begin the cleanup process.

"If you can help and you have the opportunity to help, you should," said Jan Goerich, 29, from Speyer, Germany. "We are here to help, that is all."

The team of Germans, volunteers with Technisches Hilfswerk, a German disaster-relief organization, arrived Friday at Belle Chasse Naval Air Base with 15 pumps that can move almost 6 million gallons of water a day.

The German specialists are split into eight groups across the flooded city to pump water from such places as parking garages, sewage stations and neighborhoods.

"Our job is to get the pumping stations up and running," said Andsreas Garrecht, 35. "We have no plans to leave. We are here until it's done."

The German team is just one of many on hand to clean up and to protect those doing the work.

The special-response teams of the D.C.-based Immigration Customs Enforcement patrol outside the Superdome, which was a major evacuation center for tens of thousands, while crews inside clear broken bottles, water-soaked plaster, rotting trash and other messes.

"They are doing a real good job of getting the place back to normal," said Officer Fred Stacey, 45, of Reston, Va. "It's almost mind-numbing here, but we're just here to help. You get over it."

In the Hyatt Regency Hotel and the mall attached to the Superdome, a cleaning crew from Chicago-based United Service Companies has been working all week to remove garbage and sanitize the area.

"Right now, inside is marvelous compared to how it was," said employee Bobby Lisanty, 69. "How it was is not to be believed by man nor beast."

DOJ_NMG_0005816

Mr. Lisanty and his 26-member team will systematically clean the hotel over the coming days. The team will move to other projects when the work is finished.

In St. Bernard Parish, where the worst flooding occurred, the 3650th Maintenance Company of the Colorado National Guard spent the afternoon clearing an intersection.

"You wouldn't believe what we've found back here," said Sgt. Daniel Rinker, 47, of Westminster, Colo. "There's a lot of alcohol. People just came back here and had a party."

The National Guardsmen, whose only protection during cleanup yesterday was rubber gloves, swept the trash into a pile, then picked it up by hand and placed it in a large bin.

As the flood water recedes, mud dried and cracked in the hot sun has caked the streets and sidewalks. Cars, baby strollers, blankets and other items are scattered where the flooding left them.

Danny Prinz, 40, was allowed to return to his New Orleans Parish business, Dwyer Motors, yesterday to collect three tool carts and an industrial-strength power washer.

"It's going to be a long time before this place is back to normal," he said.

More Deaths Confirmed In Homes For The Aged (NYT)

By David Rohde And Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

A day after Louisiana officials charged the owners of a nursing home in the deaths of 34 patients there, the owners of two other nursing homes confirmed yesterday that an additional 13 patients died in their homes in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. State officials also said they were investigating the deaths of 14 patients at yet another nursing home in New Orleans.

The new reports suggest that at least 61 patients died in four New Orleans-area nursing homes after their operators ignored a mandatory evacuation order a day before Hurricane Katrina hit. The owners of 15 other nursing homes contacted by The New York Times said they had successfully evacuated hundreds of patients from their homes.

A total of 53 nursing homes were evacuated in the New Orleans area, but it is unclear how many of them were evacuated before the storm.

Some nursing homes spent as much as $50,000 to move their patients to safety, including using private helicopters, owners and administrators said. Other nursing home owners chose to keep their patients in the city and wait out the storm.

The attorney general, Charles C. Foti Jr., was investigating reports that 14 people died at the Lafon Nursing Facility of Holy Family in New Orleans, said his chief spokeswoman, Kris Wartelle.

"We're trying to make sure the criminal justice system still works in this case," Ms. Wartelle said. "It is such a horrendously horrible thing, and it's so important to these families."

Peggy Hoffmann, executive director of the nonprofit Bethany Home, said 9 of her home's 49 patients died after she chose not to move them despite the mayor's mandatory evacuation order. Ms. Hoffman said she had been unable to find 10 patients who were evacuated to the New Orleans airport and flown to an unknown city.

"I haven't been able to sleep at night," Ms. Hoffmann said. "We haven't been able to track down 10 of my people who went through my airport."

She said she thought it would be better for her fragile patients to remain in the home, which sits on high ground, than to endure the stress of an evacuation. In past hurricane evacuations in New Orleans, nursing home patients have died on buses caught in traffic jams for up to 12 hours.

Andrew Sandler, the administrator of a second nonprofit nursing home, Maison Hospitaliere, where four patients died, cited the same reason and added that the evacuation order was not made until the day before the hurricane struck.

"Usually there is more warning," Mr. Sandler said. "This one came very quickly."

Neither home flooded, and both had emergency generators that provided limited electricity. Both owners said that day after day of high temperatures inside the homes might have contributed to the deaths, but they were not sure.

Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa asked the Department of Justice, the inspector general of the Department of Health and Human Services and the Government Accountability Office yesterday to begin full investigations of the deaths in nursing homes.

"The utter disrespect for the life and dignity of the frail and elderly is nearly incomprehensible," wrote Mr. Grassley, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

In other developments yesterday, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, who has been a vocal critic of the federal response to the hurricane and subsequent flooding, said blame should be shared by all levels of government - and included herself.

DOJ_NMG_0005817

"We all know that there were failures at all level of government: state, federal and local," Ms. Blanco said in a speech before a joint session of the Louisiana Legislature. "At the state level, we must take a careful look at what went wrong and make sure it never happens again. The buck stops here. And as your governor, I take full responsibility."

She said she had demanded that FEMA give priority to Louisiana residents in rebuilding jobs and to "pay them in a timely fashion."

The federal government, Ms. Blanco said, should also "cover 100 percent of what Louisiana will spend on this disaster - just as was done after 9/11."

The governor also said she had issued an executive order directing state agencies to limit spending, and called for federal aid to rebuild houses, bring residents back to the state, offer tax breaks and loans to businesses, and extend unemployment benefits. She said she had hired a former FEMA director, James Lee Witt, to help work with FEMA to cut through bureaucracy.

Standing outside the chambers, Mayor C. Ray Nagin of New Orleans said he had missed all but the end of the governor's speech but called it "encouraging."

But, Mr. Nagin said, he is "nervous about how the implementation is going to take place."

On Tuesday, the state attorney general's office charged the owners of St. Rita's Nursing Home in Violet, just east of New Orleans, with multiple counts of negligent homicide in the deaths of 34 residents. The attorney general said the couple, Mable B. Mangano, 62, and Salvatore A. Mangano Sr., 65, had not acted on several warnings to move the residents as the hurricane approached.

In an interview on Wednesday, the couple's lawyer, James A. Cobb, said his clients were innocent, calling the charges "absurd" and "mean spirited."

"These folks have lost everything," Mr. Cobb said. "They've lost their entire life's work."

He said that the home was above flood stage level and that most of the families decided to keep their relatives at St. Rita's.

Tony Mendoza, a nursing home owner who used a private helicopter to evacuate patients before the hurricane's arrival, criticized nursing home owners who chose to remain in the city. Mr. Mendoza said he chose to evacuate his two commercial homes on Friday, two full days before Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans.

"It was a given," Mr. Mendoza said. "Every hour that went by since Friday you knew you had to go."

Kevan Cullins's 100-year-old grandmother was evacuated from Lafon a few days after the flooding, only to die, dehydrated and weak, a few days later in a hospital. Mr. Cullins said that when his family called Lafon before the storm, staff members said they had a generator and the staff was going to stay with the patients, Mr. Cullins said. If it flooded, he said, they planned to move to the second floor.

Mr. Cullins said the home had made the wrong decision in failing to evacuate.

"But at the same time," he said, "there's a lot of people in that nursing home that may not have made it anyway, they're just that frail. It's a Catch-22. A lot of the people were like my grandmother, 100 years old, and they didn't have too much more to go, but they didn't deserve to die like that."

Lafon and Bethany had been cited by inspectors for mistreatment and quality-of-care deficiencies from April 2004 to June 2005. But Lafon, with 8 deficiencies, had less than the state average of 10 per home, while Bethany had 23. For both homes, all of the deficiencies were rated 2 on a scale of 1 to 4, with 1 indicating the lowest level of harm or potential harm to residents.

Lauren Shaham, a spokeswoman for the American Association of Homes and Services for the Aging, based in Washington, said her group, which represents about 5,300 nonprofit nursing homes, assisted-living facilities and elderly-housing sites, including about 90 in the region affected by Hurricane Katrina, had not had complaints that nursing homes were not evacuated.

St. Rita's was not a member of the association.

"I think the St. Rita's thing, at least from what we're hearing, is really an anomaly, far from the norm," Ms. Shaham said.

'It Was As If All Of Us Were Already Pronounced Dead' (WP)

By Wil Haygood And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS For five eternal-seeming days, as many as 20,000 people, most of them black, waited to be rescued, not just from the floodwaters of Hurricane Katrina but from the nightmarish place where they had sought refuge.

During that time, the moon that hovered over the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center seemed closer than anyone who could provide those inside the center with any help.

On the fourth day, after TV had been filled with live reports from the center describing sexual assaults, robberies and gunfire, single mothers desperately seeking help for their children and fathers doing their best to protect them, the federal official charged with leading the hurricane response, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, responded to an interviewer's question by saying it was the first he had heard that people "don't have food and water in there."

"It was as if all of us were already pronounced dead," said Tony Cash, 25, who endured three nights of hunger, violence and darkness at the convention center. "As if somebody already had the body bags. Wasn't nobody coming to get us."

No one has been able to say how many people died inside the convention center; police, military and center officials estimate the number is about 10. Nor has there been any attempt to document the number of assaults, robberies and rapes that eyewitnesses said occurred from the time the first people broke into the convention center seeking shelter on the afternoon of Monday, Aug. 29, and when units of the Arkansas National Guard moved into the center on Friday, Sept. 2.

But even without those numbers, what happened in the convention center stands as a harsh indictment of government's failure to help its citizens when they needed it most. That futility was symbolized by the presence in the convention center for three of the most chaotic days of at least 250 armed troops from the Louisiana National Guard. They were camped out in a huge exhibition hall separated from the crowd by a wall, and used their trucks as a barricade when they were afraid the crowd would break in.

The troops were never deployed to restore order and eventually withdrew, despite the pleas of the convention center's management. Louisiana Guard commanders said their units' mission was not to secure the facility, and soldiers on the scene feared inciting further bloodshed if they had intervened. "We didn't want another Kent State," said Army Lt. Gen. Russel L. Honore, commander of the active-duty military forces responding to Katrina. "They weren't trained for crowd control."

In more than 70 interviews, with both military and law enforcement officials -- who were themselves sometimes inside the center -- and with many of the survivors who suffered over the course of several nights, a chilling portrait emerges of anarchy and violence, exacerbated by young men from rival housing projects -- Magnolia, St. Bernard, Iberville, Calliope.

"Everywhere I went, I saw people with guns in their hands," said Troy Harris, 18. "They were putting guns to people's heads."

Recounting their pleas for milk for their babies, for food, for protection, many survivors described the same sense of bewilderment and anger -- broadcast, surreally, on live television. "This is America," one woman shouted into the TV cameras. What she meant was, this is not supposed to happen here.Too Late to Leave

It was Saturday, Aug. 27, when New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin pleaded with city residents to leave. Katrina would be on land in less than two days. A day earlier, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco had declared a state of emergency, prompting heightened preparation by the Louisiana National Guard.

But by this point, the appeals from Blanco and Nagin were aimed at one group in particular -- the poor. Those with resources had already bolted.

Many simply had no way of leaving on their own. Many who had survived hurricanes figured this wouldn't get them, either. "They tend to look at evacuation orders as scare tactics," said Troy Jarreau, a New Orleans schoolteacher who has taught many children from impoverished households.

But by Monday, after Katrina hit New Orleans and the levees had broken, a different reality was clear. "Get out! Get out now!" was the message on WYLD ("Wild for Jesus"), a popular black radio station. It was repeated on Q93-FM, heavy with rhythm and blues and rap music.

This time, those who stayed behind found themselves wading, or swimming, using every ounce of energy to get themselves to the Louisiana Superdome, which had served as a refuge in previous hurricanes. But the indoor stadium had begun filling as early as Sunday, and by the next day, officials had started turning people away. It was becoming overcrowded, and the floodwaters had begun to encircle it.

The convention center, a sprawling complex of meeting halls nearly a mile long near the Mississippi River, was never intended as a shelter, said Capt. M.A. Pfeiffer, an operations officer with the New Orleans Police Department. "It was supposed to be a bus stop where they dropped people off for transportation. The problem was, the transportation never came."

As rising water engulfed the Superdome on Monday, trucks and vans that were rescuing people from the I-10 overpass and other locations began dropping them off on the dry road in front of the center. It was the only option, police said. Quickly, the crowd grew to 1,000 people.

Katrina had ripped a hole in the center's roof, dumping pools of rainwater into Hall C in the middle of the huge complex. The center lost electricity and water pressure, but otherwise damage was not severe.

Monitoring the damage were about 40 essential convention workers -- carpenters, electricians and unarmed security guards -- supervised by the center's president, Jimmie Fore, who had arrived there Sunday determined to ride out the storm. Joining them were about 300 other employees and their families seeking shelter.

DOJ_NMG_0005819

As a crowd gathered outside and it became dark, Fore said he sensed trouble, so he went down to the sidewalk and made an appeal. He warned those arriving that the center had no food, water, electricity, medical care or other provisions to serve as a shelter. They ignored him. "They just kept coming," he said.

Security guards had locked the building, but later that night, people began yanking on the doors and eventually opened one. "Once one got in, they let all the others in," said Fore, explaining that the doors had "panic hardware" and could not be locked on the inside.

At the Superdome, officials had devised a security plan to check for weapons. No such plan was put into place for the convention center, even as the numbers of people seeking shelter swelled and swelled.Descent Into Danger

Leon Doby, 26, had gotten daughters Leah, 1, and Khaylin, 3, out of their home, put them in a crate, tied the crate with rope to his waist, then began swimming. He hustled his way, finally, onto a motorboat. It sped off to the Superdome, all aboard exhausted.

At the Superdome, they were rebuffed, and pointed in the direction of the convention center, 10 blocks away.

By the time Doby -- with the crate and the two daughters -- arrived Tuesday, he found himself gazing into thousands of bewildered faces. Gripping his daughters, he walked fast -- exactly where he was going, he did not know -- but he passed an elderly lady who seemed to be listing in a wheelchair.

"I went down the hall," he said. "By the time I was back, she was already gone."

Doby would spend four days at the center. All he had for himself and two girls during that time was a sandwich and two bottles of water that a stranger had given him.

Linda Cash, 26, arrived with her two children, Clarence, 6, and Cyrin, 2. "Soon as I got there," Cash recalled, "I saw fighting. I saw people throwing chairs. People pulling guns out, right in front of little children."

Near where Cash had hunkered down Monday night, she noticed a little boy having difficulty breathing. She figured he was having an asthma attack or an anxiety attack. She and others nearby spotted a too-seldom-seen police officer. The officer came over, his gun drawn. Cash said she pointed to the young boy. "The officer checked the boy," Cash remembered, "then turned to us and said there was nothing he could do."

The officer vanished. The boy was dead -- a death confirmed by three others interviewed for this article.

Another officer soon appeared, and Cash and the others figured he would remove the dead child. "But that officer told us he had come over to our area to check on some gunshots he heard near us," she said. The body stayed there.

By Tuesday, the center's population had exploded to nearly 20,000. "The lights never came on, for some reason, all the way," Cash said.

And among those thousands were gangsters, though maybe not members of gangs. Community activists for years had been warning the city's leadership about the folly of mixing youths from one housing project with youths from another.

"You declare martial law," said Jazz Washington, a community activist, "and to these gangsters that just means, 'We can kill you and keep on moving.' "

A gang broke into the locked alcohol storage areas and suddenly had 50 cases of hard liquor and 200 cases of beer. And before long, there were scenes of gangsters, drunk, groping after young girls -- and those scenes not far from the ones of women in corners, balled up, praying all frozen with a Hobson's choice: the gangsters, or the floodwaters.

"They took so much, they couldn't drink it all," said George Lancie, manager of the center's food-service company, who had been at Fore's side.

In the chaos, the youths hotwired anything that would move, including electric utility carts and forklifts. Tony Cash saw the forklifts being driven about in zigzags. "They were nearly running over people," he said. "I'm telling you, it was crazy."

Fore was at a loss as to how to quell the danger. He said he tried desperately to call local and state emergency authorities. But he never got through. And he looked and looked for the arrival of local police.

"You might see them drive by," he said. "Is that providing security?"

New Orleans police officials said they could not safeguard the center after Katrina left them short of officers, vehicles and a dependable communication system. And when their armory flooded, they were short of ammunition. Dozens of officers tried patrolling outside around the convention center, but, according to Lt. Melvin Howard, the crowds and darkness made it difficult and dangerous to work inside.

Police could not use flashlights without giving away their position and becoming possible targets, Howard said. Nor could they open fire, if confronted, without the risk of killing innocent people.

Troy Harris, 18, who had survived a gunshot to the stomach on the hard streets of New Orleans, thought he could handle himself anywhere in the city. The darkened convention center gravely tested his moxie. "They were robbing people in there. At gunpoint," he said. "Somebody robbed me of a hundred dollars."

DOJ_NMG_0005820

Even police officers were afraid, Harris said. "I saw police officers in the bathroom taking off their uniforms!" he said. "I'm telling you, they were taking off their uniforms and throwing their badges down!"

Doby saw prostrate bodies near the bathroom -- dead or unconscious, he didn't know. He told his little girls it was okay to soil themselves. His hungry girls in his arms, Doby was furious.

At daybreak, many would flee outside, where TV cameras gave them desperate moments to make appeals. But for the most part they had nowhere else to go. It was as if they were marooned in some faraway locale, on some faraway island -- instead of New Orleans.

Rumors were treated as fact -- both inside the convention center and out. A later report that there were 200 bodies in the convention center and the Superdome brought a coroner's unit rushing from St. Gabriel and Baton Rouge, La.

One night, said Steve Rochon, a deranged man started yelling, "Here comes the water!" -- intimating the Mississippi was about to flood the center. A panic ensued, and mothers grabbed children.

The deaf didn't know what was happening. The old in the wheelchairs couldn't move. But the stampede was on anyway. A mother screamed that someone was stepping on her baby.

"People just started panicking," recalled Rochon, himself forced to move animatedly on a prosthetic leg. "People were getting run over each other."

At one point, a police car drove up. Perhaps good news. Perhaps ships were steaming up the Mississippi over there right now.

A police officer tossed out a few bottles and drove off. It ignited a free for all. Doby himself looked on in horror as a man -- arguing over the water -- struck another man with a two-by-four. "That man, he was split" in the head, said Doby. "He was leaking. He just dropped, face first."

Back inside, Doby was stilled by yet another confrontation. Three women were arguing, over what everyone seemed to be arguing about: lack of food, water, space. One of the women -- a snap-of-the-finger quick -- plunged a pair of scissors into the shoulder of the woman she had been arguing with.

Everywhere, a new woe. A group of people desperate for food broke into the kitchen. When they tried to cook something, a fire erupted.Desperate to Flee

By Wednesday night, Fore and eight colleagues had locked themselves in an office. A gang had threatened to break through, rattling the door. A security guard informed Fore the situation appeared to be getting worse in the center.

Fore and his aides had parked their cars over in Hall J, and Fore decided they had to make a break. Thursday afternoon, they moved stealthily to their cars. When they reached them, they slipped inside and fled.

Wednesday, some buses arrived, but of the thousands in the convention center only a tiny number could board. They had been standing outside, where the buses rolled to a stop.

Then there was a miracle: Seven more buses rolled up. The race was on to get to them. Linda Cash, slow off the draw, grabbed her children anyway. And started racing. "Then the buses pulled off," she said. "And no one was on them. That's when I knew I really had to find a way out of there."

On Thursday, Cash left, taking her children and stealing a car that eventually got her to Baton Rouge. That same day, the New Orleans police made a dramatic entrance. Sgt. Hans Ganthier and 12 other New Orleans SWAT team members entered the center, M-4 commando rifles at the ready. Prayers had been answered -- only it was a rescue mission of a different purpose.

A Jefferson Parish police deputy had appealed to SWAT team Capt. Jeff Winn for help in bringing out his wife and a female relative from the center. "He knew they were there and was hearing nightmarish stories," said Ganthier, who declined to identify the officer for security reasons.

Winn approved the mission.

When the SWAT team entered at 11 a.m., the Jefferson Parish officer called out his wife's name. She heard him, and along with the relative rushed to his side. The SWAT team put the women in the middle of the team, then backed out the door.

Once it became clear that the SWAT team had come with the single goal of rescuing two white women, anger exploded.

"Racists!" one man cried out.

"Some people were upset we weren't rescuing them," said Ganthier. "It's hard to leave people behind like that, but we were aiding an officer."'A Mob, Crazy Mentality'

By Tuesday night, a contingent of at least 250 Louisiana National Guard troops was hunkered down in Hall A, off Julia Street at the northern end of the building.

The armed troops, from at least two engineering battalions -- the 769th and 527th -- had been assigned to set up a base at the center to prepare for debris removal and road clearing, as well as rescue and security. But they had enough food and water only for themselves and had no immediate orders to provide assistance or security for the thousands of evacuees in their midst, according to interviews with a dozen enlisted soldiers and officers.

DOJ_NMG_0005821

Instead, as the danger level grew, they felt they must first protect themselves.

"There was way too many of them and way too few of us," said Master Sgt. Chad Anderson, 37. "Since we couldn't help them, it was best to avoid them. They had a mob, crazy mentality."

Whenever the soldiers left the center on missions, they drove west on Julia Street and away from the throngs of people begging for food and water along Convention Center Boulevard. "When they saw the soldiers, they'd think, 'That's food,' " said Sgt. Karla Spillers, 26. "We didn't have any for them. We had to feed our own people."

Spillers said she felt pain at the knowledge that teenage girls were wandering around the center, alone, knowing they were possible prey.

"There were prisoners, mobsters, gangs" in there, she said.

Almost as soon as they arrived, Guard commanders became concerned enough about the safety of their troops that they ordered more weapons and ammunition. On Wednesday night, there was kicking and banging on the doors to Hall A, where the guardsmen were. "They were trying to break the doors and get us," said Anderson. "They knew we were there."

"About 9 that night, we started barricading the doors," said Staff Sgt. Bryan Lowery, a supply sergeant with the 527th battalion.

Guardsmen parked at least three dump trucks next to the doors to block them, and Lowery began dispensing weapons and ammunition.

"It scared me," Spillers recalled. "Everyone went to get their weapons from the backs of the trucks."

That night, Guard commanders figured the convention center was untenable as a staging base. And they, too, left the center despite what Fore said were his pleas to stay.

"We were told they couldn't help us unless the order came down from the top, from a lot of people," Fore said. "The only time they partnered with us was when there were gunshots in the area where they were actually staying. They protected themselves."

Maj. Keith Waddell, commander of the 769th Engineer Battalion, said his unit was never asked to quell the violence at the convention center. "The idea of helping with the convention center never came up," he said. "We were just preparing ourselves for the next mission."

Waddell said he believes that, if so ordered, the Louisiana Guard forces present would have been adequate to get the center under control.

"I feel confident we could have controlled it, with the numbers we had," Waddell said.

But senior commanders indicated they had ruled out that possibility. Col. Stephen C. Dabadie, chief of staff of the Louisiana National Guard, said the engineer units were "not designed to secure the convention center."The Troops Arrive

Early Thursday, the Guard troops packed up and rolled out amid angry calls from the crowd inside. Twenty-four hours elapsed before more troops arrived -- including a contingent of the Arkansas National Guard, imposing enough so that no one tried to bother them.

Many of the guardsmen had recently returned from Iraq, and they arrived wearing helmets and full body armor, and shouldering rifles. To their surprise, they encountered virtually no violence -- only a crowd of hot, frustrated, angry people desperate for food and water. "A lot of them said we should have been there earlier," said Spec. Keithean Heath of the Arkansas Guard's 39th Infantry Brigade.

Military commanders had worried the crowd would rush medevac helicopters. Instead, soldiers faced little interference as they moved to help frail and elderly people in wheelchairs in urgent need of care, women cradling tiny infants and others about to give birth. The soldiers set up food lines to hand out bottled water and packaged military meals, and people lined up to receive them.

On Saturday, soldiers again lined up people and searched them before loading them onto buses. They counted as many as 16,000 people who got on the buses, an eerily quiet process.

Leon Doby, the daddy who swam his two young daughters to safety -- before they all arrived at the convention center -- had already left. He headed out as he had arrived, his two little girls -- his everything -- in the crook of his arms.

A genuine miracle: A man on the road picked them up and drove them all the way to Dallas.

"That was hell," Doby said of the New Orleans convention center. "They sent us to the grave."Tending to the Dead

Three days after the evacuation, Staff Sgt. Juan Almonte, a medic with the 82nd Airborne Division, slipped past a caution sign and through a ripped metal door, bracing himself for the task ahead -- to "bag" the bodies still inside the convention center.

Inside the food-service area near Hall A, sitting slumped in a black wheelchair, was a woman of about 60 in a hospital gown. A man in a shirt and jogging pants lay curled up on the concrete floor next to her, his hand over his face.

To Almonte's right down a wide hallway, a large man -- the medic guessed he was at least 6-foot-4 and 300 pounds -- lay with his arms over his head and knees bent. Another woman in hospital scrubs lay a few feet from him, next to aluminum cans and trays with stained but elegant white dinner menus.

Around the bodies were pools of dried blood. Looking closer, he noted swelling and abrasions on the corpses. He stared at what he found next. On the gray, soiled floor several feet from the dead lay a pair of shiny brass knuckles.

"My perception was that they were beaten to death," he said last week. "Absolutely, they were killed."

Almonte and his fellow medics had to struggle to straighten the corpses to fit them in double bags -- the large man took up one by himself. The next day, about 20 boxes of body bags appeared in front of Almonte's tent, and he told his men to prepare for more recoveries. But no order ever came. Civilian authorities, he was told, would handle "packaging and retrieval."

Health Officials Urge Flu Shots For All Katrina Evacuees (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- Federal health officials are pressing forward with plans to ensure flu vaccinations for hurricane evacuees in shelters as well as all people in nursing homes, populations they say are particularly at risk for catching the illness while living in tight quarters.

Julie L. Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said Wednesday that elderly evacuees, as well as those of all ages at shelters, will be among the first to receive flu shots this fall.

Manufacturer Sanofi-Pasteur is making 200,000 of the first flu shots available to those evacuees. Sanofi-Pasteur is the vaccine division of France-based Sanofi-Aventis.

Federal stocks of all vaccines are being made available to children who are evacuees, Dr. Gerberding said.

Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said a proposed rule would require all nursing homes to offer vaccinations against the flu and bacterial pneumonia.

The goal is to get 90% of people in nursing homes vaccinated, Dr. McClellan said. Nursing home residents can opt out, and a few may not be eligible for the shots for other health reasons, he said.

About two million people live in the nation's 18,000 nursing homes, Medicare officials said.

Because of questions about the vaccine supply, federal officials want high-risk groups -- including people aged 65 and older, and children between 6 months and 23 months -- to get their flu shots and are asking doctors to hold off on giving the shots to healthy adults until Oct. 24 at the earliest.

CDC: Outlook For Flu Vaccine This Year Good (USAT)

By Liz Szabo, Usa Today

USA Today, September 15, 2005

Federal health officials said Wednesday that flu shots this year should go first to the most vulnerable patients — including Hurricane Katrina survivors living in shelters — but should be available to everyone by late October.

Although the vaccine supply should be ample this year, with 71 million to 97 million doses, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention expects some shots to be delayed.

The flu vaccine supply has become a major public health concern. The USA lost nearly half its expected supplies last year after the Food and Drug Administration banned distribution of flu shots from vaccine maker Chiron Corp., whose license was suspended by British regulators because of contamination problems at its plant in England.

The nation's expected flu supply was cut from 100 million doses to 61 million last fall, which caused widespread shortages and long lines at flu clinics.

Chiron announced last month that the Food and Drug Administration has found its British facility "generally acceptable." Although the company expects to produce 18 million to 26 million doses for this flu season, it won't start shipping until the end of September or early October, spokeswoman Alison Marquiss says.

The CDC is not asking doctors to ration the FluMist nasal spray, which uses a live virus instead of the inactivated virus used in flu shots. The sprays can be used by healthy people ages 5 to 49, except for pregnant women.

Julie Gerberding, director of the CDC, urged doctors to delay until Oct. 24 giving flu shots to people at lower risk. That should give high-risk patients the chance to be inoculated first, she said during a briefing at the National Press Club in Washington. In addition to hurricane survivors, who are more likely to get sick if they have been living in close contact with many other people, doctors should give priority to health workers, people over 65, people with chronic diseases, children ages 6 months to 23 months and people who live with or care for babies under 6 months.

This schedule is designed to allow enough time to protect people who have the most to lose from flu infections, Gerberding says. But it is also meant to allow organizations to schedule vaccine clinics. Health officials say the flu season typically peaks from late December to March.

Managing vaccine supplies is a challenge every year, says Tracy Lieu, an associate professor at Harvard Medical School and member of the CDC's Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices. Last year's warnings about shortages led millions of healthy adults to skip vaccination, and 4.5 million doses went unsold.

"Physicians and nurses feel we send mixed messages — and we do," Lieu says. "We say, 'Everyone come get your flu shot,' then, 'Wait, there are no flu shots.' "

Ten percent to 20% of Americans get the flu every year, Henry Bernstein, a member of the American Academy of Pediatrics' committee on infectious disease, said at the conference. It kills 36,000 Americans a year and sends 200,000 to the hospital.

Evacuee Students Happy To Be At Madison (DMN)

By Tawnell D. Hobbs, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, September 15, 2005

One thing is obvious at Madison High School in South Dallas. Students who evacuated here because of Hurricane Katrina appreciate Texas.

U.S. Department of Education Assistant Secretary Tom Luce, Texas Education Commissioner Shirley Neeley, Dallas Superintendent Michael Hinojosa and Dallas trustee Ron Price toured the school on Wednesday and were thanked profusely by some students.

"I appreciate what you did for us, letting us into your schools," 16-year-old James Smith told the group as he sat in class.

Madison has taken in about 115 students, more than any other public school in Dallas. In all, Dallas schools have enrolled nearly 1,500 students since Sept. 1, when the district began tracking new students from hurricane-ravaged areas.

Mr. Luce, a native of Dallas, said the visit to his home state was necessary to determine the needs of educating student evacuees. He said other government officials would also visit other cities.

"Part of my job is to try to develop national policy in a real big hurry," Mr. Luce told students at Madison. "It's our job to make sure that you all have the educational opportunity that every American deserves. We're going to get you some help."

Tyne Thompson, a 17-year-old senior, praised the state of Texas for willingly accepting students from Louisiana.

"They loved us enough to provide us with what we need," she said. "My mom said, 'Texas has a big heart.' "

Mr. Luce plans to meet with area school superintendents later today.

Hurricane Puts Strain On S.A. Schools (SAEN)

By Jenny LaCoste-Caputo

San Antonio Express-News (TX), September 15, 2005

San Antonio school leaders concerned about the ramifications of taking in nearly 1,400 new students escaping the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina will have the chance to voice their worries and ask for help today.

Ray Simon, deputy secretary for the U.S. Education Department, will visit San Antonio today to meet with superintendents and visit schools. School leaders will meet with Simon and Texas Education Commissioner Shirley Neeley at the Region 20 Education Service Center.

Simon plans to tour Hull Elementary in Northside School District and South San Antonio High School West Campus in South San Antonio School District.

"San Antonio has really stepped up to the plate and is doing the right thing for these students," said Chad Colby, a spokesman for the U.S. Education Department.

As of early this week, at least 1,399 Hurricane Katrina evacuees had enrolled in local school districts. The majority of the students are enrolling in the districts serving the city's four shelters — Northside, North East, Edgewood and South San Antonio. Other districts are seeing a spike in enrollment as families move out of shelters and into the community or bunk with friends or relatives in San Antonio.

Judson School District had 140 hurricane evacuee students, or "Katrina kids" as several districts have dubbed them, as of Tuesday. Alamo Heights has enrolled 34, and San Antonio has 81.

San Antonio school leaders were lauded for getting students enrolled as soon as possible. But as the numbers swell, the realities are setting in.

DOJ_NMG_0005824

"We know firsthand that a very small population can skew test results and give a school a bad academic rating," said Richard Middleton, superintendent of North East School District. "We're hoping for a little bit of common sense from the state and federal governments."

Both Texas and the federal government have strict accountability laws that rank schools based on test performance. Low-performing schools are subject to sanctions. If no exceptions are made, the storm victims' test scores will count toward the school ranking given the Texas school they now attend.

The rankings also take into account attendance and dropout rates. Those rates could take a hit as children move on to another district or back to their home state.

Last week, the National Education Association, the country's largest teachers union, asked Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to waive the accountability portion of the federal No Child Left Behind law for schools directly affected by the hurricane in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama, as well as Texas and other states receiving large numbers of students.

Commissioner Neeley has sent a letter to the Education Department, asking, among other things, for flexibility under No Child Left Behind.

So far, at least, the new students will be counted in the state's accountability system, according to the Texas Education Agency.

Diana Bowman, director of the National Center for Homeless Education, said expecting these children to perform up to standard after the trauma they've experienced could be unrealistic.

"There have been studies that show every time a child transfers from one school to another, they lose about four to six months of continuity in education," Bowman said. "And the more time they're out of school, more is lost."

Educators also are concerned about graduation requirements for high school seniors.

Texas law requires high school students to pass exit tests before earning a diploma. There are no waivers.

"We are aware of the (complication), and we are looking into it," said DeEtta Culbertson, a TEA spokeswoman.

It might take legislative action to address the potential problem, she said.

Another possible option is for high school seniors from Louisiana who now attend Texas schools to take Louisiana tests and earn a Louisiana diploma, Culbertson said.

"We're looking at the graduation requirements for the three states (Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi) to cover all of the evacuees, not just the Louisiana kids," she said

Middleton said he hopes a solution is found soon.

"Is it fair for these kids to be thrown into a different system, in a situation they didn't create, and held to different requirements?" he said.

The influx of students likely will cost San Antonio-area schools tens of millions of dollars over the next school year. Neeley has estimated the state's bill could be at least $450 million.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency will reimburse school districts for transportation costs, portable buildings, school computers and mental health counselors, but not other, and potentially more expensive costs, such as hiring new teachers and support staff.

Spellings is working with Congress to develop a plan for financial aid for the states.

"We're tracking every expenditure and it's going to be a lot of money," said Northside Superintendent John Folks.

Louisiana Elections Put Off (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Louisiana officials yesterday postponed local elections scheduled for Oct. 15, citing a lack of equipment and manpower.

"Right now, because of Hurricane Katrina and its resulting aftermath, we don't have the machines, personnel, or electorate in place to properly conduct a fair election in these affected areas," said Al Ater, Louisiana's secretary of state. "We will reschedule these elections at the appropriate time."

The cancellation affects judicial candidates, a school board race and one council seat in the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson, special propositions for tax increases for security patrols in two neighborhoods, and a "beautification, security and overall betterment" tax increase in eastern New Orleans.

According to Louisiana law, an office holder remains at his or her post until a successor is sworn into office.

Mandatory evacuation after the storm also leaves the state short on voters, prompting the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to begin organizing New Orleans evacuees in shelters across the country to ensure they can vote in the Orleans Parish mayoral race in February and a congressional race in 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0005825

Ellen Davis, spokeswoman for the Louisiana Republican Party, said getting elections back on track and ensuring legal residents can cast votes will be a "logistical nightmare."

"Our country has never seen anything like this, we have entire counties that are without a population," Mrs. Davis said.

Democratic Rep. William J. Jefferson of New Orleans, the only black member of Louisiana's congressional delegation, faces re-election next year.

With Louisiana voters scattered among 300 shelters in 24 states, black leaders fear a permanent exodus reminiscent of the 1927 Mississippi River flood, when hundreds of black residents fled the region.

President Bush carried Louisiana with 57 percent of the vote in 2004. Statewide, white voters outnumber black voters, nearly 1.8 million versus 780,000, and Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-1. In New Orleans, there are about 63,000 white voters -- more than half of whom are Democrats -- and 143,000 black voters.

New Orleans Democrats showed their strength in the 2002 runoff election between Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, Louisiana Democrat, and Republican Elections Commissioner Suzanne Terrell. Voter turnout statewide was low, but 40,000 New Orleans voters gave Mrs. Landrieu her margin of victory.

Marc Morial, former New Orleans mayor and president of the National Urban League, yesterday asked the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee to create a Katrina victim's Bill of Rights for the evacuees, that would among other assistance ensure future voting rights.

"We must continue to have voting rights in the state, not to politicize this, but they must have a voice in the rebuilding effort in the community from which they have been displaced," Mr. Morial said.

Lloyd's Estimates Its Katrina Costs At $2.55 Billion (WSJ)

By Charles Fleming

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Lloyd's of London estimated that claims related to Hurricane Katrina and the devastation of New Orleans could cost it a net $2.55 billion (€2.08 billion), its second-biggest loss ever, reinforcing expectations that insurers world-wide will push prices up next year to recover some of their huge losses.

Lloyd's estimate of its losses makes Katrina the second-most-expensive single disaster ever in nominal terms for the Lloyd's insurance market, whose members paid out about $3.5 billion for the World Trade Center terrorist attacks in New York in 2001. It also tops all other insurance groups' estimates of their individual exposure to Katrina claims so far. Lloyd's functions as a marketplace for syndicates that underwrite insurance policies.

Lloyd's warned that conclusive data on how much the insurance market would have to pay out on Katrina wouldn't be available for some time. But it said in a statement yesterday that, based on current information, it didn't believe the disaster would push out of business any of the 62 syndicates that operate through Lloyd's. It also said it didn't believe any Lloyd's syndicates would make a material claim on Lloyd's £1.1 billion (€1.6 billion) bailout fund for its members, known as the Central Fund.

Katrina could cost the global insurance industry up to $60 billion, according to some industry estimates. Large European insurers often find themselves on the line for hefty chunks of insurance claims incurred by distant hurricanes such as Katrina, because they provide reinsurance cover to the direct insurers who sell home, automobile, industrial or life policies in the disaster zones.

The estimated $2.55 billion that Lloyd's syndicates could end up paying is split evenly between claims by individual policy holders who bought coverage directly on the Lloyd's market and claims from U.S. insurance companies that reinsured their risks through Lloyd's, spokesman Nick Gammage said. Lloyd's also sells reinsurance coverage to the reinsurance groups themselves, giving it three potential levels of exposure. Mr. Gammage said a detailed breakdown of Lloyd's exposure wasn't yet available.

Other European reinsurers, notably Swiss Reinsurance Co. of Zurich and Munich Re AG of Munich, have also said in recent days that they could face hefty bills for Katrina-related damage. Swiss Re has estimated its maximum loss could be $1.2 billion, and Munich Re, which initially estimated its losses at about $500 million, has said it could raise its estimate as further information comes in.

A number of Bermuda-based reinsurance groups, which are smaller than the large European companies but tend to be more focused on natural-catastrophe insurance, are also likely to face big losses.

Insurance brokers say the size of the reinsurers' exposure means it is almost inevitable that reinsurers will try to claw back losses by raising the prices they charge the direct insurers. "In the light of these numbers, there'll be upward pressure on prices in many areas, especially property catastrophe coverage, energy and large [industrial] risks," said Geoffrey Bromley, chairman of reinsurance brokerage firm Guy Carpenter & Co.'s non-U.S. activities.

Insurers May Face Flood Lawsuits In Mississippi (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0005826

By Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood is considering suing insurers to force them to pay flood damage from Hurricane Katrina that could total billions of dollars, seeking to override decades-old exclusions in standard homeowners' policies, two people familiar with the matter said.

The attorney general's examination of legal moves comes as tens of thousands of Mississippi homeowners are grappling with the cost of rebuilding homes that in many cases were badly damaged by the huge storm surge that accompanied the category-four hurricane's strong winds. Mr. Hood and a spokesman for his office couldn't be reached for comment late yesterday.

Standard homeowners' policies cover wind damage, not flooding. Yet fewer than one in five Mississippi homes and businesses in areas most at risk of flooding hold policies from the National Flood Insurance Program, according to federal figures. While some government grants are available to uninsured flood victims, such homeowners typically rebuild with low-interest federal loans.

Any legal action by Mr. Hood, which could be announced this week, would be expected to meet resistance from the insurance sector. Insurers cannot afford to pay flood damage from Katrina because they "have never collected a cent of premium for flood insurance," said Robert Hartwig, chief economist for Insurance Information Institute, a New York trade group. He said insurers would argue that "the flood exclusion in homeowners' policies is well-established in all states...That is why there exists a national flood-insurance program" and many people "have been paying flood premiums [to the government] for decades."

As of last week, estimates of the cost to private-sector insurers had grown to as high as $60 billion. As big a bite as that is, U.S. property-casualty insurers have more than $400 billion in capital. In recent days, a growing chorus of consumer activists and government officials have called on insurers to give Gulf Coast policyholders the benefit of the doubt in any instances where homes suffered both wind and flood damage.

Indeed, plaintiffs' lawyers in Mississippi are forming a network to work free of charge for homeowners seeking payments for flood damage from their insurers, in a potential second legal front against the insurance industry, a person close to the effort said. Lawyers include Richard Scruggs, a class-action attorney who made his name suing the tobacco and asbestos industries, the person said.

One person familiar with Mr. Hood's possible suit said it might argue that insurers are on the hook because Katrina's storm surge and waves were wind-driven events, and thus should be covered as wind damage. Options include seeking a court order to prevent insurers from denying claims based on the flood exclusion.

Some isolated legal efforts to get around the flood exclusion have succeeded over the years, which has prompted insurers to stiffen the policy language or persuade lawmakers to plug legal loopholes. Mr. Hartwig, whose trade group has been anticipating legal action, said, "I haven't read every policy written in the state of Mississippi, and policy terms and conditions will vary. But the definition of a flood" is fairly uniform, including "storm surge and water that rises for any reason off any body of water, whether or not the cause of the rise of the water is associated with wind."

N.C. Locals Take It In Stride As Ophelia Batters Coast (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, September 15, 2005

ATLANTIC BEACH, N.C. — Terry Slaughter swayed in the mounting wind on Wednesday, watching a crew struggle with a utility pole snapped by one of Hurricane Ophelia's first blasts.

He has lived here for 40 of his 47 years, endured hurricanes from Bertha to Isabel, and had no plans to leave for a storm whose winds don't top 100 mph, much less match the ferocity of Katrina.

Asked what he has done to prepare for Ophelia, he took a deep drag from a cigarette and said, “You're looking at it.”

Up and down Bogue Banks, a slender, sandy barrier island, residents were mindful of the destruction Katrina wrought on the Gulf Coast but not worried about a repeat here.

At 11 p.m. Wednesday, Ophelia was about 20 miles south-southeast of Cape Lookout, N.C., according to the National Hurricane Center. It had maximum sustained winds of 85 mph, making it a Category 1 hurricane on the five-stage scale. Katrina was a Category 4 storm with 145 mph winds when it came ashore Aug. 29.

North Carolina Gov. Mike Easley warned people not to be complacent. Tourists were told to leave the popular beaches of the Outer Banks. Residents of some low-lying areas were evacuated.

“Let me be clear: Ophelia is a dangerous storm,” Easley said.

Power flickered off as the wind lashed coastal towns, leaving 120,000 homes and businesses in the dark.

Still dealing with Hurricane Katrina, the Federal Emergency Management Agency said it had stockpiled food, water and ice at locations in states surrounding North Carolina. It had 250 workers in place.

DOJ_NMG_0005827

The governor said that he had spoken to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and that National Guard teams were prepared to evacuate sick, frail and elderly residents.

FEMA said it was doing nothing different than normal.

“You can bet we are ready though,” said FEMA spokeswoman Nicol Andrews.

Ophelia was to make landfall today. But this storm is big, spreading hurricane-force winds 50 miles from its center, so it will affect a broad swath of North Carolina, said Eric Blake, a meteorologist with the National Hurricane Center.

Ophelia's pace of 7 mph means some areas could receive hour after hour of pounding rain. Some spots in eastern North Carolina could be doused with 15 inches.

That's what concerned Sam Ramos. The hospital corpsman, who works at Camp Lejeune Marine Corps Base, stopped at K & V 1 Stop Shop on Emerald Isle to finish off his hurricane preparations. Ramos, 35, already had stocked up on food and filled his bathtub with fresh water.

“The only thing I'm worried about is the rain,” said Ramos. “There's going to be some flooding.”

Up Highway 58, in the town of Salter Path, emergency crews hunkered down at the firehouse. Gusts of wind keened as they were sliced by power lines, and rain smacked against windshields.

Emergency medical technician Megan Kinnaman, 24, ticked off hurricanes she has weathered on North Carolina's coast: Isabel, Fran, Dennis, Bertha, Floyd. “This is just the usual for us,” she said. “Most of us will spend the night here. We'll cook, and eat and wait it out.”

They've already urged the elderly and ill to leave, she said. When winds top 45 mph, it's unsafe for even the rescue workers to venture out.

“People think they can just punch 911 and everybody'll come running,” said Crystal Mizelle, 24, another EMT. “We have to be concerned for our own safety.”

The two say they never thought about evacuating. “You live here, you deal with hurricanes,” Kinnaman said.

Slaughter, who builds houses, noted that most people hadn't boarded up windows.

“I guess plywood got too high,” he said with a laugh.

Heavy Rain Hits N.C. Coast As Ophelia Picks Up Strength (LAT/AP)

By From Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

CAROLINA BEACH, N.C. -- Hurricane Ophelia lashed the North Carolina coast with high winds and heavy rains Wednesday, beginning an anticipated two-day assault that threatened serious flooding and an 11-foot storm surge.

"If you have not heeded the warning before, let me be clear right now: Ophelia is a dangerous storm," Gov. Mike Easley said from Raleigh, appealing especially to those in flood-prone areas to evacuate.

Ophelia was moving so slowly -- just 7 mph Wednesday night -- that authorities expected the storm's passage through North Carolina to take 48 hours from the start of rainfall on the southeastern coast Tuesday afternoon to the storm's anticipated exit into the Atlantic late Thursday.

The storm had sustained winds of 85 mph, the National Hurricane Center said. Hurricane warnings covered the entire North Carolina coast from the South Carolina line to Virginia, where a tropical storm warning covered the mouth of Chesapeake Bay.

More than 12 inches of rain had fallen on Oak Island at the mouth of the Cape Fear River, said meteorologist Jeff Orrock with the National Weather Service in Raleigh.

More than 120,000 homes and business were without power in eastern North Carolina, electric utilities said.

On Ocean Isle Beach, south of Carolina Beach, a 50-foot section of beachfront road was washed out by heavy surf and the only bridge to the island was closed.

Jetnella Gibbs and her family made their way to a shelter at a Craven County high school after the rain started Tuesday.

"We noticed the street was starting to fill up, and I said, 'It's time to go,'" she said. "I know if this little bit here has flooded the street, what will it do when it really pours?"

The storm's eye was expected to brush the coast between midnight and 2 a.m., but it might not come ashore as it hugs and parallels the barrier islands of the Outer Banks through Thursday, officials said.

At 11 p.m., Ophelia's center was about 20 miles south-southeast of Cape Lookout and moving northeast at about 7 mph toward Cape Hatteras, about 85 miles away.

Water pushed out of Bogue Sound washed into garages and ground floors while ocean surf chewed away the end of a hotel's pier on Bogue Banks, a barrier island.

DOJ_NMG_0005828

Following the criticism of its response to Hurricane Katrina, the Federal Emergency Management Agency had 250 workers on the ground -- a larger-than-usual contingent given Ophelia's size. FEMA also put a military officer, Coast Guard Rear Adm. Brian Peterman, in place to command any federal response the storm might require.

The storm's slow, meandering path to the coast gave FEMA more time to get staff on the ground than is usually the case with North Carolina hurricanes, said Shelley Boone, the agency's team leader for Ophelia.

President Bush issued an emergency declaration for 37 counties in eastern North Carolina, authorizing the Department of Homeland Security and FEMA to coordinate disaster relief efforts.

Easley said he had spoken to Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and that National Guard teams were prepared to evacuate sick, frail and elderly residents.

Craven County expected a 6- to 8-foot storm surge in the Harlowe area near the Neuse River -- an area that flooded during Isabel two years ago, said Stanley Kite, the county emergency management coordinator.

The Beaufort County town of Washington ordered an evacuation of a 20-block area that flooded during Hurricane Fran in 1996. A storm surge of up to 9 feet was forecast along the Pamlico River and water wasn't expected to recede until Thursday morning, county manager Paul Spruill said.

Officials on the Outer Banks warned Ophelia could bring 10 hours of hurricane-force wind to exposed Hatteras Island. The southernmost villages of Hatteras, Frisco and Buxton were expected to get the worst of the winds and the flooding.

"It's an island -- the water will come over, it'll go out -- and we'll do it all over again," said lifelong Buxton resident Tiffany Bigham, 27.

"You grow up knowing it's a part of life," she said.

Ophelia is the 15th named storm and seventh named hurricane of this year's busy Atlantic season, which ends Nov. 30.

Ophelia Batters The North Carolina Coast (NYT)

By John DeSantis

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

SURF CITY, N.C., Sept. 14 - After stalling at sea for a week, Hurricane Ophelia battered the coast of North Carolina on Wednesday, spawning blinding rains that flooded beach communities and left thousands farther inland without power.

The storm, rated Category 1 by the National Weather Service with sustained winds of 85 miles an hour, is expected to scrape the shoreline from Cape Fear to the Outer Banks through Thursday, where a northeasterly track may take it out to sea.

Officials said that voluntary evacuations went smoothly and that by 3 p.m. Wednesday, 519 people had taken refuge in shelters.

Residents and officials alike said the cataclysmic effects of Hurricane Katrina on New Orleans and the Gulf Coast had made little difference in how they responded to the storm.

"We felt we were as prepared as we could be," said Mayor Spence Broadhurst of Wilmington. "Katrina didn't play any role in the process. We have a very clear plan."

Still, Mr. Broadhurst added, "I wouldn't be human if the effects of that storm did not have an effect on my thought process."

State officials agreed.

"Unfortunately, we have a history with hurricanes," said Lt. Everett Clendenin, a spokesman for the North Carolina Department of Crime Control and Public Safety. "We have a fairly standard operating process."

But Stephen Barnett, executive director of the American Red Cross's Cape Fear chapter, said he thought Hurricane Katrina had some bearing on the decisions people had made.

"I think just the fact that there were so many individuals who had not adequately prepared in New Orleans, I think they took extra precautions," Mr. Barnett said of residents here. "I think they planned better and took the storm more seriously. People both increased supplies and got out sooner."

The Associated Press reported that President Bush issued an emergency declaration for 37 counties in eastern North Carolina, authorizing the Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Emergency Management Agency to coordinate disaster relief efforts.

By 3 p.m. on Wednesday, 519 people had taken refuge in eight shelters in the coastal counties of Brunswick, New Hanover and Pender.

At least two trees fell on houses in Wilmington, a quaint city sandwiched between the Atlantic Intracoastal Waterway and the Cape Fear River, near North Carolina's southeastern tip. A giant old live oak was seen toppled to its side on Market Street, a major thoroughfare.

Oceanside communities like Topsail Island, Carolina Beach and Wrightsville Beach took hard hits and were expected to experience heavy beach erosion. Carolina Beach reported flooding as high as one foot in some neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0005829

Streets were flooded in sections of Surf City, north of Wilmington. Sheets of rain pushed sideways across its small boardwalk area. The white-sand beach could not be seen for the heavy surf.

About 15 miles inland from Topsail Island, where strong winds howled and waves battered the beach, David Paul stood outside the hot dog restaurant that has carried his family's name for three generations, watching a stand of sycamore trees bend on the other side of a deserted highway.

"It was tedious before it ever got here," Mr. Paul said. "We've been watching this storm all week."

At the Sloop Point Volunteer Fire Department station near Surf City, firefighters awaited the storm's arrival Wednesday night, ending a week of mild tension and anticipation as the hurricane stalled and wobbled its way south of the state line.

"It's kind of like a kid at Christmas, just wanting to know what you're going to get," said Assistant Chief Scott Bradshaw. "But once the storm is here that Christmas-like feeling is definitely over. Then you're happy to see it go away."

Officials Rush To Prepare Coastal N.C. For Ophelia (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

FRISCO, N.C., Sept. 14 -- As slow-moving Hurricane Ophelia hugged the North Carolina coast in a torrential embrace Wednesday, federal, state and local officials were taking no chances of a repeat of the sluggish response to Hurricane Katrina.

Here on Hatteras Island, which was expected to bear the worst of the storm, emergency officials stockpiled enough water and military rations to last 3,000 people for three days. The National Guard was standing by with all-terrain vehicles and four-wheel-drive ambulances. The National Forest Service had 10 chain-saw teams ready to remove fallen trees.

Gov. Mike Easley (D) urged residents of low-lying coastal areas to evacuate. "We're asking them and begging them to please do that because it's going to be hard to get them out later," he said. "The storm surge is going to be higher than projected" Tuesday.

But despite a "mandatory" evacuation order -- which state officials acknowledged was not really mandatory at all -- many residents stayed behind on Hatteras and neighboring islands along the Outer Banks. They parked dozens of cars, pickup trucks and a fire engine on the lawn of the Cape Hatteras Baptist Church in Frisco, not because it is the holiest ground in town, but because it is the highest.

They piled sandbags, stowed boats, bought groceries. And while emergency officials took no chances, some locals did.

"Gosh, that was great. Best way to stretch out your back," said Jim Bagwell, 52, after a 10-minute swim in the pounding, six-foot ocean surf at the Frisco Fishing Pier, just hours before the eye of the hurricane was forecast to come through. In last year's Hurricane Alex, the 200-foot pier itself was carried away.

Cars pulled in and out of the parking lot as residents came to gawk at the high waves and exchange gossip. Bagwell's Labrador retriever, Gator, started to run after him into the surf, then thought better of it.

"They're bringing in truckloads of water. It's paranoia from Katrina," said Murray Clark, 77, a retired trawler captain. "All of us locals are sitting and giggling."

The Federal Emergency Management Agency placed emergency operations centers on 24-hour alert and readied 50 rescue aircraft, spokeswoman Nicol Andrews said.

The agency staged three response teams and stockpiled medical supplies in Raleigh, N.C., and held three more in reserve in Virginia and Maryland in case the storm moved north, a FEMA official said. More than 100 medical personnel were in Raleigh.

While North Carolina had stored enough ice to last two days for 10,000 people, federal authorities staged more food, water and ice in Emporia, Va.; Palmetto and Thomasville, Ga.; Columbia, S.C.; Cumberland, Md.; and Edison, N.J.

North Carolina also activated 200 National Guard members and placed 200 more on standby, a FEMA official said.

"It's not paranoia to be prepared -- it's simple prudence," said FEMA's acting Director R. David Paulison.

The hardy, or foolhardy, ways of North Carolina residents inured to hurricanes clearly frustrated state and local officials. They said that on the Outer Banks, unlike the Ninth Ward of New Orleans, the overwhelming majority of residents have vehicles and can leave if they want to.

"The feedback I'm getting is that a large number of vacationers have evacuated," said Dorothy Toolan, spokeswoman for the Department of Emergency Services in Dare County, which includes Hatteras. "When it comes to the locals, everybody just decides what they're personal level of comfort is."

As Ophelia strengthened from a Category 1 to a Category 2 hurricane with sustained winds of 85 mph, it pushed water out of Pamlico Sound into the Neuse and Pamlico rivers, flooding such coastal communities as Engelhard and Washington, N.C.

While high waves crashed into the ocean side of Hatteras, the water level on the bay side was so low that a half-mile of sand was exposed in places that usually are covered, even at low tide. But when the hurricane's 50-mile-wide eye passes through, everybody here knew, all that water would surge back into Pamlico Sound and smash into the island.

"We know there will be flooding. The barrier islands will be getting hammered one way [as the hurricane comes in] and then another way coming out," Easley said.

"We didn't know whether to call for a voluntary evacuation or a mandatory, so we called for a voluntary," Mayor Betty Medlin of Kure Beach, south of Wilmington, told Reuters. "The way it's getting here today, we probably should have had a mandatory."

"It's just sitting there, which makes the wind beat us and be on us longer," Medlin said.

Residents staying put noted, however, that Ophelia was the seventh hurricane and 15th named storm of 2005 alone, and that it did not pack anything like the punch of Katrina, which was a Category 4 hurricane, or Isabel, which began as a Category 5 hurricane and came ashore as a Category 2, walloping the Outer Banks two years ago.

"If it was going to be as bad as Katrina, I would have left," said Cathy Davidson, 44, who was stocking her house in Frisco with macaroni and cheese, propane gas and bottled water.

"More locals have left than I thought would leave. I guess they're gun-shy after Katrina," said Bagwell, toweling off after his swim. "You can't live on an island and not realize that if she wants to, Mother Nature can reach out and really touch you."

Katrina Lays Bare Superfund Woes (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

The receding floodwaters in New Orleans and other parts of the Gulf Coast are exposing hazardous chemicals and other dangerous waste. But they're also revealing the accomplishments - and the limits - of government programs designed to clean up such pollution.

Among the concerns: That natural disasters such as earthquakes and hurricanes haven't been adequately considered in fashioning safe and secure remedies; that areas tainted by toxic waste, such as rivers in the East and old mines in the West, are becoming larger and more complex; that many newly closed military bases will require considerable cleanup before they're ready for private or local government use; and that federal funding is falling behind the need.

The main program here is a bureaucratic mouthful: the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act (CERCLA), commonly known as Superfund.

Passed in the wake of the Love Canal episode in upstate New York 25 years ago, the law created a tax on the chemical and petroleum industries. Operating under the "polluter pays" principle, individually liable companies or property owners could be held financially responsible for cleaning up hazardous waste sites as well. The Environmental Protection Agency created a "National Priorities List" of the most serious uncontrolled or abandoned hazardous waste sites, a list that has grown to about 1,600 nationwide.

Several Superfund sites in the New Orleans area were inundated by hurricane Katrina and the flooding that followed. The most worrisome is the Agriculture Street Landfill, located about halfway between the French Quarter and Lake Pontchartrain. For nearly a century, municipal garbage and industrial wastes accumulated there. It was loaded with lead, arsenic, dioxin and carcinogenic hydrocarbons and later sprayed with the now-banned pesticide DDT. Underground fires gave it the nickname "Dante's Inferno."

The 95-acre site eventually was "remediated" under Superfund - fenced off and covered with a mat barrier and two feet of clean soil. As was the case with Love Canal, local residents continued to complain of health problems.

Today, the EPA and other agencies are investigating whether several feet of rushing floodwaters from the storm and from the collapsed Industrial Canal Levee very close to the former landfill spread the hazardous wastes from that downtown site across a much wider area. Other Superfund sites near New Orleans in Slidell, La., and Madisonville, La., also sustained flooding and there is concern two sites in neighboring Mississippi counties also have water damage.

"The potential for contaminants to rise and migrate through the flood waters to other areas is real," Solid Waste & Recycling magazine reported this week. "It's likely that the multimillion-dollar site restoration conducted a few years ago has been compromised, perhaps even rendered worthless."

Congress and the Bush administration are sure to address hazardous waste cleanup as part of the massive federal response to Katrina.

But they're also faced with renewed scrutiny of the whole Superfund program. The industry tax fund ran out of money when Congress refused to renew it in 1995. Assigning blame among multiple polluters and subsequent property owners has been difficult.

The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, recently warned that companies are using bankruptcies to avoid legal responsibility. The recent round of base closings complicates things as toxic waste sites on military property get transferred to state and local governments. And some of the most challenging hazardous waste problems - the

Hudson and Passaic Rivers in the East, the hard-rock mines around Butte, Mont. - are proving to be far more difficult to deal with than landfills and shuttered factories.

"Both of those kinds of sites tend to be physically huge and very challenging," says Katherine Probst of Resources for the Future, a Washington think tank. "Not only are they very expensive, it's not exactly clear what to do."

"They're very expensive, and they're very complex," says Ms. Probst, who is an expert on Superfund and other hazardous waste management programs. "It's not like capping a landfill."

Last year, several members of Congress asked the EPA's inspector general about the adequacy of funding for hazardous waste cleanup under Superfund.

In her 104-page report, EPA inspector general Nikki Tinsley wrote: "In summary, during FY 2003, limited funding prevented EPA from beginning construction at all sites or providing additional funds needed to address sites in a manner believed necessary by regional officials...."

Whether due to increasingly difficult challenges in hazardous waste cleanups or a lack of political will, the number of Superfund cleanups has slowed in recent years. Meanwhile, analyses of EPA's National Priorities List show that 1 in 4 Americans, including some 10 million children, live within four miles of a Superfund site. As has become the case along the Gulf Coast, many of those people live in low-income, largely African-American communities.

In recent years, the budget for Superfund has stayed essentially flat at about $1.5 billion a year. With inflation and new sites needing cleanup, critics say, that means a slight but steady decrease.

"The program is not getting the funding it needs," says Alex Fidis, an attorney specializing in Superfund for the US Public Interest Research Group in Washington. "The problems are still there and if anything are getting worse."

The experience with Katrina tells some observers that dealing with hazardous waste sites may need a different approach - especially in areas vulnerable to forces of nature. "There needs to be a greater emphasis on cleanups that are really cleanups and not just covering it up," says Ed Hopkins, director of environmental quality programs for the Sierra Club in Washington. "But of course that involves money."

E.P.A. Struggles To Determine Extent Of Hazards In Sludge (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer And Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - The magnitude and geographic sweep of the pollution left by Hurricane Katrina is so enormous that the Environmental Protection Agency is struggling to determine what the worst hazards are, where they are and what can be done about them, the agency's administrator said Wednesday.

The difficulties could cast doubt on plans of the New Orleans mayor and other city officials to reopen drier neighborhoods within days.

Late Wednesday, a day after raising the possibility of letting some residents return to their neighborhoods, Mayor C. Ray Nagin urged residents to stay out of the city because the water was undrinkable and remaining floodwaters posed what the health director called "significant health risks."

Dr. Kevin Stephens, director of the New Orleans Health Department, said in a written statement that while officials analyzed the environmental risks, citizens "should stay out of Orleans Parish until the exact nature of the conditions is known." A news release published Wednesday on the city Web site added that "a disease-laden sludge could remain on streets and buildings, which may further compromise public health."

Scientists who have studied other floods say that receding waters leave mud, sometimes contaminated with toxic chemicals, on streets and mold on walls. When dry, each can become airborne.

At a Congressional briefing and at a separate news conference, the E.P.A. administrator, Stephen L. Johnson, described for the first time the wide variety of problems the agency was confronting, including the difficulty of determining the extent and toxicity of the sludge left by the floodwaters. Mr. Johnson said the agency was using aircraft to test for air pollution and taking daily samples of floodwaters and the sludge. The sampling is concentrated in residential areas.

The agency has not completed or released details about specific strategies and the scientific protocols it is using as it tries to analyze the hazards posed by what Mr. Johnson called "the largest national disaster that we at E.P.A., or we believe, that the nation has faced."

Mr. Johnson said early tests did not look for hazardous petrochemical byproducts like benzene because the presence of oil and gasoline was obvious.

In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks in New York, the E.P.A. came under criticism by prominent members of New York's Congressional delegation for declaring the air near ground zero safe based largely on testing for asbestos. Later, the agency's inspector general criticized agency officials as making this declaration without sufficient scientific evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0005832

In the past two days, Mayor Nagin and Mr. Johnson offered differing accounts of the federal agency's role in certifying the city's neighborhoods as fit for human occupancy.

Mr. Nagin said Tuesday that he was awaiting an E.P.A. report on air and water quality in four unflooded neighborhoods. On Wednesday, Col. Terry J. Ebbert, the head of homeland security for New Orleans, restated the remark. But public affairs officers at both the environmental agency and the Louisiana State Department of Environmental Quality said they knew of no such report.

Mr. Johnson made it clear that the E.P.A. would not take final responsibility on whether to reopen the city but would collaborate with state and local agencies. A spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security in Washington said, "Ultimately, local officials have the authority to reopen their city."

A Senate staff member who attended Mr. Johnson's meeting with the lawmakers, and would not speak for attribution because she is not authorized to speak publicly, said Mr. Johnson told the members that the level of lead found in the floodwaters was 56 times the amount considered safe in drinking water. He also said the level of bacteria found was 19 times the acceptable level.

Floods' Pollutants Within The Norm (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

NEW ORLEANS, Sept. 14 -- Early tests on the floodwater that covered most of this city do not suggest it will leave a permanent toxic residue or render residential areas uninhabitable for more than a short time, officials of both state and federal environmental agencies said yesterday.

The pollution consists primarily of fecal matter and slightly elevated concentrations of metals such as lead and chromium that were in the city's soil before Hurricane Katrina. There are also trace amounts of many petroleum-based chemicals and some pesticides.

Despite descriptions of the floodwater as a "toxic soup" and a "witch's brew" of contaminants, the preliminary tests reveal it contains little that is different from what has been seen after past floods in other cities and here.

The exception is a residential area in the suburb of Meraux southeast of the city, where 672,000 gallons of oil leaked from a refinery storage tank. Areas around six smaller oil spills may also require special cleanup, the officials said.

"The early results do not indicate specific toxic pollutants at any levels of concern," said Chris M. Piehler, a senior environmental scientist at the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality. Asked if residue from floodwaters posed hazards that would keep residents from moving back, he answered: "No. The limiting factor is going to be what structures are going to be salvageable and which ones are not."

Piehler's observations were similar to those of Jerry Fenner, the leader of the environmental health team sent by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

"So far, all the test results show there shouldn't be any long-term problems of health and habitability," he said, adding that the chemical and oil spills "are a special issue and will require abatement."

The generally optimistic view of the experts here contrasted somewhat with the impression given yesterday by Stephen L. Johnson, administrator of the federal Environmental Protection Agency, at a telephone news conference from Washington. Johnson stressed the uncertainty over toxic hazards that remain in flooded parts of the city.

"What we are focused on is assessing what the problems are. It really is impossible to speculate on what it's going to take and how long it's going to take" to clean up environmental problems, he said.

The EPA is taking daily samples of floodwater both in the city and in the outfalls to Lake Pontchartrain. It is also sampling air and wet and dry mud at dozens of locations. Tests from Sept. 3, 4 and 6 showed levels of hexavalent chromium, lead and arsenic exceeding agency standards for drinking water.

"These compounds would pose a risk to children only if a child were to drink a liter of flood water a day. Long-term exposure [a year or longer] to arsenic would be required before health effects would be a concern," said a statement on the EPA Web site.

The city's drinking water comes from the Mississippi River and not from Lake Pontchartrain, where the floodwater is being pumped.

The most obvious pollutant in the floodwater is fecal bacteria. The city's sewage-treatment plant is not operating, and the standing water is mingling with the sewage in the underground system. Tests from Sept. 3 to 5 found that some sites had bacteria levels above the EPA's measurement scale. From Sept. 7 to Sept. 10, however, the amount of bacteria was falling.

Fecal bacteria have a limited life span in the open water and will not cause lasting contamination. On land, the bacteria dies once the residue dries out.

"The stuff will desiccate and you can clean it up. You fertilize your lawn? It's the same thing," Fenner said.

While the environmental findings so far have not been surprising, many potentially hazardous areas remain to be assessed. They include five Superfund sites in New Orleans. EPA inspectors have visited four, but one remains underwater. "One of the things we need to do is make sure that these sites have not been compromised," Johnson said.

The agency and local officials are also evaluating numerable small spills and hazards, including more than 5,000 "orphan containers" found floating in the water. These include everything from gas cylinders to a drum containing medical waste, he said.

A U.S. Coast Guard spokeswoman said there have been seven oil spills of more than 100,000 gallons since the storm. The biggest is at the Meraux Refinery, operated by Murphy Oil Corp. in St. Bernard Parish, southeast of the city.

During a sampling trip there two days ago, the EPA's Paul Doherty said the company estimated that about 9,600 of the 16,000 barrels of oil that leaked were recoverable and most of the rest had evaporated.

In a housing development nearby, workers in yellow safety suits scooped up samples of fine-grained mud that smelled partly of sulfurous decay and partly of petroleum.

The houses were severely damaged. At several, the flood floated cars that came to rest with their rear ends on the roof and the front ends on the lawn. Even without the spill, the neighborhood seemed unlikely to be habitable anytime soon.

Exposed To A Flood Of Filth, Homes Must Be Bulldozed (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Tom Kenworthy

USA Today, September 15, 2005

BATON ROUGE — The putrid floodwaters left by Hurricane Katrina are so bad that Louisiana's top environmental official warned Wednesday that many houses will have to be bulldozed because of contamination.

“It's going to be a while before areas that were flooded will see people moving back,” said Mike McDaniel, secretary of the Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality. He said residents of those areas will be allowed to return to their homes briefly to retrieve personal items but will be told about the health risks and given protective gear.

McDaniel said many houses in flooded parts of the New Orleans area “will have to be disposed of.”

The Environmental Protection Agency also released new test results that show the floodwaters around New Orleans contain levels of toxic chemicals and bacteria that exceed federal standards for drinking water.

The water contains high levels of arsenic and hexavalent chromium, a chemical in paints and dyes that can cause lung cancer when inhaled. The agency said the chromium and arsenic would pose a “risk to children only if a child were to drink a liter of floodwater a day.” The EPA also detected high levels of lead and bacteria in the waters.

“This is the largest natural disaster that we at the EPA … have faced,” EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson said.

The agency warned the public and emergency responders to avoid direct contact with standing water and to wash carefully with soap and water if they are exposed. Other tests have found some pollutants in the air, but not enough to raise health concerns.

Louisiana's McDaniel said he remains concerned about “large quantities of hazardous materials” at industrial facilities, such as rail cars containing toxic materials. “We haven't been into some of the industrial areas … where we might find hot spots,” he said.

McDaniel also said the potential for seafood contamination in the waters off Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama is a “major concern.” A National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration ship started taking samples of water, fish, shrimp and sediment to check for contaminants and pathogens.

EPA teams have done preliminary inspections at four hazardous waste sites in the area on the federal Superfund list of the nation's most serious pollution spots. No thorough testing has been done yet to determine whether contaminants escaped. A fifth Superfund site in New Orleans is still underwater.

The range of toxic chemicals that may have been released is extensive, said Lynn Goldman, an environmental health sciences professor at Johns Hopkins University. “We're talking about metals, persistent chemicals, solvents, materials that have numerous potential health impacts over the long term,” said Goldman, an assistant EPA administrator in the Clinton administration.

Other environmental specialists warn of a potential crisis.

“We are dealing with an area that has been dubbed by many ‘chemical alley' or ‘cancer alley,' ” said Sylvia Lowrance, who was the EPA's chief of enforcement for 24 years until 2003. Cleaning up from dozens of industrial facilities and hundreds of thousands of homes, autos and businesses will probably be “the most daunting” environmental restoration project ever, Lowrance said.

Thomas Dunne, EPA's acting assistant administrator for solid waste and emergency response, said it's too early to know how much hazardous material has been released. “This is going to evolve over weeks,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0005834

Erik Olson of the Natural Resources Defense Council said: “We worry that most of the city of New Orleans could end up being a toxic waste site. There isn't a concerted effort to contain pollution at some of these industrial waste sites, and the monitoring … seems far too limited.”

Retail Sales Declined 2.1% In August (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Consumer spending showed some signs of cooling during the weeks leading up to Hurricane Katrina, and the storm could further damp consumption in the weeks ahead if gasoline prices don't retreat. In addition, Katrina affected industrial production in August.

Retail sales in August fell 2.1% from the month before to $350 billion on a seasonally adjusted basis, following a 1.8% increase in July. It was the largest monthly sales decline since demand tumbled 2.9% in November 2001. Much of the volatility related to the automobile sector, which saw sales rocket in July, boosted by Big Three discounting, but then slump in August.

The Commerce Department said it couldn't quantify the effect of Katrina on retail sales for the month. However, it noted that the region struck by the hurricane accounts for a little more than 1% of total sales nationally.

Excluding autos, all other retail sales climbed 1% in August. About half of that increase was from surging gasoline prices, which drove up receipts at gasoline stations. Excluding gasoline and autos -- which some economists said gave a clearer read of underlying spending patterns -- sales rose 0.5% for the month. They were 7% higher than year-earlier levels, roughly in line with the pace established for much of the year.

The gains outside the topsy-turvy auto and gasoline sectors suggested that consumer spending had "good momentum" ahead of the hurricane, said Jim O'Sullivan, U.S. economist at UBS AG. However, he and other economists said sales could take a hit in September with high gasoline prices further crimping household purchasing power.

"It's quite possible that these are the first signs that higher energy prices are [reducing] discretionary consumer spending," said Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at MFR Inc. Consumer spending last month was flat at restaurants, bars and clothing stores. Sales climbed at furniture stores, building-material and garden stores and health and personal-care stores.

Another government report showed that Hurricane Katrina slowed industrial output last month. Industrial production edged up a weaker-than-expected 0.1% in August, according to the Federal Reserve, which estimated that Katrina reduced output by 0.3 percentage point.

"Hurricane Katrina severely curtailed output in the Gulf Coast region at the end of August," the Fed said. "Hurricane-related production declines were most evident in oil and gas extraction, industrial chemicals manufacturing, and petroleum refining."

Manufacturing output increased 0.3% in August, which economists described as a mixed performance. Much of the gain was tied to cars. Excluding motor vehicles and parts, manufacturing output was unchanged from July, the Fed reported. In September, hurricane-related disruptions are expected to slow manufacturing output, but activity should "snap back" in subsequent months, said Mr. O'Sullivan of UBS.

Industrial-capacity utilization was unchanged at 79.8%. Throughout the summer, capacity utilization has remained at its highest level since December 2000, but the Fed noted that it is still 1.2 percentage points below its 1972-2004 average.

Another report suggested the housing sector is holding up in the wake of the hurricane. The Mortgage Bankers Association said its index that tracks mortgage applications for the purchase of homes rose 2.9% to 513.4 -- the highest level of activity since the week ended July 1, when it hit 520.8. Applications for refinancing declined.

Gasoline Demand Fell In Last Weeks Of Driving Season (WSJ)

By Thaddeus Herrick

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Americans used considerably less gasoline in the final weeks of the summer driving season than a year earlier as Hurricane Katrina limited fuel supplies and distribution and drove up prices.

Data released by the U.S. Department of Energy's Energy Information Administration could indicate that U.S. drivers are responding to soaring gasoline prices by conserving fuel, though the supply disruptions and gasoline lines that followed could also be a factor. In a report issued this week, Credit Suisse First Boston said recent drops in gasoline demand are part of a longer-term decline that will play out over the next several years as the high cost of energy eats into disposable income.

Gasoline demand for the week ended Sept. 9, which includes the Labor Day weekend, dropped 4.3% to 8.64 million barrels a day from 9.03 million barrels the previous week, the Energy Information Administration said. For the four weeks ended Sept. 9, gasoline demand averaged 9.1 million barrels a day, a decline of 1.1% from the same period last year.

DOJ_NMG_0005835

The decline comes just two weeks after Katrina brought the country to the brink of an energy crisis. Next week, the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries meets in Vienna to consider increasing oil output by 500,000 barrels a day. But among OPEC members, only Saudi Arabia has significant spare production capacity and many U.S. refineries can't process its heavy, high-sulfur crude.

Yesterday, benchmark light, sweet crude-oil futures for October settled up 3.1%, or $1.98, at $65.09 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange as U.S. crude supplies fell more than expected last week on damage to oil production by Hurricane Katrina. For the week ended Sept. 9, commercial crude-oil stockpiles fell 6.6 million barrels to 308.4 million barrels.

In Washington, 16 members of the House of Representatives introduced legislation aimed at increasing fuel-economy standards for vehicles sold in the U.S. Similar proposals haven't fared well in the past. Meanwhile, Senate Democrats say they want to discuss giving the president and the Federal Trade Commission additional authority to investigate what they say is gasoline-price gouging.

Katrina pounded the Gulf Coast, wreaking havoc on production platforms, pipelines and refineries and sending the price of gasoline past $3 a gallon for a while. The average U.S. price of a gallon of regular unleaded now stands at about $2.96, according to the Energy Information Administration, down 11.4 cents from last week but about $1.11 above prices a year ago.

"Consumers should not expect prices to decline quickly, since the disruption to supply is still occurring," the agency said, though the administration said increased imports should help ease the cost of fuel.

Yesterday, the Minerals Management Service said 56% of crude production from the Gulf of Mexico, home to a quarter of U.S. oil and natural-gas output, is still shut down, as is 35% of natural-gas production. About 5% of the nation's refining capacity remains shut down and could remain so for months.

Separately, the Department of Energy said it sold 11 million barrels of oil to energy companies out of the nation's emergency stockpile, known as the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. The figures indicate that many refiners feel adequately supplied with crude, since the government had originally offered as much as 30 million barrels.

Demand For Gasoline Falls For A 2nd Week (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Demand for gasoline fell nationwide for a second consecutive week, the government reported yesterday, indicating that record retail prices may have forced some consumers to cut back on their driving over the week of Labor Day.

The weaker demand may also be explained by disruptions in the nation's energy supply system, which is still recovering from Hurricane Katrina.

Americans used an estimated 8.63 million barrels of gasoline a day in the week that ended Sept. 9, down 4.3 percent from the week before and 6.5 percent less than the comparable week in 2004, according to the Energy Information Administration. Demand fell 4 percent for the week that ended Sept. 2.

But those estimates do not measure every drop of fuel that drivers put in their tanks, because the agency can track gasoline only until it is delivered to large regional terminals, where it is then trucked to wholesalers and retailers, said Larry Alverson, an analyst at the agency.

When fuel is flowing through the system normally, the agency's figures are fairly good at measuring final demand because wholesalers and retailers usually buy enough fuel to meet consumer demand. But in tight times, when they cannot get enough gasoline from the terminals, wholesalers and retailers will draw down their inventories to fill demand. That consumption is not counted in the agency's data.

So, are consumers cutting back or not?

"Some people are saying these high prices haven't affected demand much, and others say of course it has," Mr. Alverson said. "You take your pick."

There is some anecdotal evidence that fewer consumers drove over the Labor Day holiday and that more people are taking mass transit when possible, but there is little hard data.

"The unofficial surveys and conversations we have had with people who deliver gasoline to stations and who sell that gasoline to consumers say that their sales are off 10 percent in the last 10 days," said Ben Brockwell, director of pricing and data services at the Oil Price Information Service.

Retail gasoline prices topped $3 a gallon on Labor Day weekend after the hurricane shut down much of the Gulf Coast's oil production, refineries and pipelines. More than 5 percent of American refining capacity is still out of service.

The Energy Department said yesterday that it was selling 11 million barrels of oil from the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve to BP, Astra Oil and Marathon. The government had said it would sell up to 30 million barrels of oil, which is refined into gasoline and other fuels.

Nationally, a gallon of regular unleaded gasoline sold for an average of $2.935 this morning, according to a survey Mr. Brockwell's firm runs for AAA, the auto club. That is down from $2.956 the day before and up from $2.44 a month ago.

Demand may have started falling even before the hurricane hit. The American Petroleum Institute said yesterday that gasoline demand fell 0.4 percent as prices rose 32 percent in August from the same month a year ago. So far this year, Americans' average daily gasoline consumption of 9.13 million barrels a day is about 0.3 percent higher than a year ago, according to the E.I.A.

On the futures market, gasoline for October delivery rose 4.57 cents yesterday, to $1.937 a gallon, on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Crude oil gained $1.98, to $65.09 a barrel.

Gasoline inventories rose by 1 percent, to 192 million barrels, last week. The week after the hurricane, inventories fell 2 percent, to 190.1 million barrels, the Energy Information Administration reported.

Numbers Show Economic Lag Before Storm (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 (AP) - Hurricane Katrina is eating into the economy, leading to concern that consumers will lose confidence and curtail spending.

The government reported Wednesday that retail sales fell 2.1 percent in August, even before the storm hit, as high gasoline prices jolted consumers.

Also, industrial output was nearly flat, reflecting widespread shutdowns of oil platforms, refineries and chemical plants along the battered Gulf Coast.

Analysts said they still believed that Katrina would amount to only a temporary blow to the economy and that strong growth would follow as rebuilding begins.

The decline in retail sales was twice the size economists had forecast.

The weakness came from a 12 percent drop in auto sales. Demand slackened after two strong months when American automakers allowed consumers to buy at the discount prices given to the automakers' employees.

Excluding autos, retail sales rose by 1 percent, with half of that coming from a huge rise in gasoline prices. Analysts said the retail sales data was evidence that gasoline above $3 a gallon was having an impact on consumer demand in other areas like clothing.

Sales at department stores rose a sluggish 0.3 percent. Demand at clothing stores was flat in August after a 0.9 percent decline in July.

The biggest increase in spending in August occurred at service stations. The 4.4 percent increase reflected pump prices that have soared past $3 a gallon in many places.

Without the jump in spending at gas stations, retail sales would have fallen by 2.8 percent last month as demand faltered in many sectors, the government estimated.

Ian Shepherdson, chief economist at High Frequency Economics, a consulting firm in Valhalla, N.Y., said he did not expect a quick rebound in retail sales. Mr. Shepherdson said he believed high energy costs would continue to depress consumer spending for several more months.

Industrial output posted a 0.1 percent gain in August. It would have been 0.4 percent, the Federal Reserve reported, if not for the shutdown of much energy and chemical production along the Gulf Coast at the end of August.

Economists predicted the hurricane fallout would continue as the energy industry struggles to regain its footing.

"The industrial production numbers in the next two months will look pretty awful as the full impact of the hurricane-related shutdowns shows up in the data," said Nariman Behravesh, chief economist at Global Insight, a Lexington, Mass., consulting firm.

Stock Losses Accelerate (WSJ)

By David Gaffen

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Major stock indexes wilted Wednesday as crude oil jumped nearly $2 a barrel and traders fretted over tepid economic reports. A profit warning from Walt Disney sank the Dow industrials in the last hour of trading.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 52.54 points to 10544.90, hurt by Disney's 2.8% drop, which led decliners on the average. The Nasdaq Composite Index fell 22.42 points, or 1.03%, to 2149.33, just off the day's low. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 4.15 to 1226.51.

DOJ_NMG_0005837

In the final hour of trading, Disney reported that it expected a $250 million to $300 million quarterly loss in its film division, and warned that it may write down a $101 million investment in Delta Air Lines airplane leases. Delta filed for bankruptcy-court protection1 after the market closed.

A combination of concerns about slowing economic growth and rising inflation are seeping into the market, market participants said. Retail sales fell 2.1% in August, the Commerce Department reported Wednesday, though much of that decline was due to a 12% stumble in auto and auto-parts sales. Investors remain worried about high energy costs and climbing labor costs, which the Labor Department said last week are rising 4.2% on a year-over-year basis.

The concerns about inflation were evident in other markets. Gold closed up $3.70 a troy ounce to $449.80 on the Comex division of the New York Mercantile Exchange, its highest close since Dec. 7, 2004. Prices of long-dated Treasurys finished sharply lower, pushing the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury to 4.16% and the 30-year Treasury yield to 4.45%.

Joachim Fels, economist at Morgan Stanley, wrote in a note that "recent economic data, combined with the rise in energy prices this summer and the likely policy reactions in Washington to Hurricane Katrina," affirmed his view that the "global macro environment will turn stagflationary soon." If that does happen, energy prices will be partially to blame, Mr. Fels said.

Wednesday, oil prices broke a streak of three down sessions on the Nymex. Light, sweet crude scheduled for October delivery settled up $1.98 at $65.09 a barrel. Gasoline futures for the same month settled at $1.9374 a gallon, up 4.5 cents, or 2.4%. In the past 12 months, gasoline futures have soared 59.6%.

The jump in petroleum futures came after the Energy Department reported gasoline inventories last week rose 1.9 million gallons, while crude-oil stocks fell by a steeper-than-expected 6.6 million barrels. Forecasters expected a drop of 2.8 million gallons of gasoline and only a mild decline in crude inventories.

The reaction among energy traders to the drawdown in crude-oil inventories could partially reflect the expectation that demand for oil products of all types will rebound in due course. Phil Flynn, senior energy market analyst at Alaron Trading in Chicago, said the drawdown, as well as recent news of various facilities coming back, has energy traders in a bullish mood. "The market is speculating that demand is going to bounce back, and that we've seen the worst," he said.

The cloud of economic concerns, poor retail sales and rising energy prices polluted the equity market, where the Dow industrials stayed in positive territory through part of the afternoon even as overall market breadth was worsening. Decliners outpaced advancers more than two-to-one on the Nasdaq Stock Market and by a ratio of 5-to-3 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Ultimately, the Dow average slipped into the red as investors gave back part of the post-Katrina rally that sustained the market for two weeks. Between Aug. 30 and the beginning of this week, the S&P 500 had risen 3.3%, while the Dow industrials gained a surprising 2.6%.

Wednesday's malaise meant the market mostly glossed over the strong earnings report out of Lehman Brothers Holdings, which kicked off earnings season by reporting a 74% jump in third-quarter net9, handily surpassing Wall Street's forecasts. The stock rose 0.4%, giving up most of its gains in the late part of the session. The report, however, bodes well for forthcoming financial-services earnings releases, including Bear Stearns tomorrow, and Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley next week.

Baidu.com, the Chinese Internet-search portal, tumbled 28% after Piper Jaffray and Goldman Sachs initiated coverage with "underperform" ratings, saying the stock price's rich valuation was unsustainable.

In major market action:

Stocks declined10. On the Big Board, where 1.49 billion shares traded, 1,211 stocks rose and 2,083 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.71 billion shares traded, 984 stocks advanced and 2,017 declined.

Bonds fell11. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 8/32, or $2.50 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.162%. The 30-year bond was down 18/32 to yield 4.450%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar weakened.12 It was at 110.30 yen, off from 110.64 yen late Tuesday, while the euro rose to $1.2282 from $1.2270.

Georgia Chief Justice Attempts To Cut Red Tape For Evacuee Lawyers (LAW)

By Meredith Hobbs, Fulton County Daily Report

Law.com, September 15, 2005

Georgia's top judge is trying to make things easier for hurricane-displaced lawyers who want to start a practice in Georgia.

Chief Justice Leah Ward Sears of the Georgia Supreme Court has asked her counterparts in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to change their rules so that lawyers from those states could get a State Bar of Georgia license in as little as eight weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0005838

Right now, those lawyers can practice in Georgia temporarily but must pass the state's bar exam to set up shop permanently -- a process that would take at least nine months. The next bar exam is not offered until February, and results do not arrive until late May.

The problem is that Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama do not allow reciprocity with other states. For states that do, lawyers licensed in one state can join another state's bar without having to take its bar exam.

Currently 33 states, including Georgia, allow this kind of reciprocity, said Hulett H. "Bucky" Askew, the director of the Georgia Office of Bar Admissions.

If the top judges in those states agree, then lawyers from the Gulf Coast states would need only to pass a certification of fitness to practice in Georgia, a process that ordinarily takes eight to 12 weeks, said Askew, who added that his office would try to speed things up for displaced lawyers.

Askew said his office has received a lot of phone calls from Louisiana lawyers looking for reciprocity, "but as soon as they hear we're not reciprocal, they hang up."

"The problem that these lawyers will have is their lack of access to documentation," he said. Out-of-state lawyers must provide educational transcripts, employment histories and other information to be licensed by the Georgia Bar.

"I had two lawyers from New Orleans who walked in here who had lost everything. They had no client files and no documentation," Askew said. "Assume you went to Tulane Law School and practiced in New Orleans for 15 years. You would have no access to [bar] disciplinary records or transcripts, so we're going to have some issues around them being able to document what they need to document."

Luckily for lawyers hit by Katrina, Texas accepts lawyers in good standing from any other state, under a rule called comity.

But Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama lawyers wishing to set up practices in other states face serious obstacles, since the three Gulf Coast states are not reciprocity states.

Georgia has allowed reciprocity for lawyers from other states since 2003. Under the rule, lawyers who meet certain conditions can get a Georgia Bar license without taking the state's bar exam.

Gulf Coast lawyers are already able to practice in Georgia on a temporary basis, thanks to a multi-jurisdictional practice rule passed by the state's Supreme Court in 2004.

The rule's intent is to allow out-of-state lawyers to work on existing client matters from a Georgia office, said Clifton A. Brashier, director of the State Bar.

"Our rules accommodate a temporary situation in which a lawyer licensed in another state is in Georgia on a client matter relating back to the home state," he said.

That means a Louisiana lawyer could run a Louisiana practice from Georgia temporarily, without running afoul of Georgia's unauthorized-practice-of-law statute, he said. But lawyers wishing to find a job with a Georgia firm would need to join the State Bar.

Although the multi-jurisdictional practice rule allows only for temporary practice in Georgia, it specifies no time limit, Brashier said. Rather, it depends on the circumstances in each case. "If one's office in New Orleans is underwater," he said, "that would be a pretty understandable circumstance."

Askew, the bar admissions chief, was not sure when the supreme courts of the three Gulf Coast states will reply to the Sears' request, or whether they will change their rules to allow for reciprocity.

Just getting the letter to the hard-hit courts was a challenge, he said. "We faxed, e-mailed and Fed-Exed this letter today, not knowing how in the world their system would cope." He said the Alabama court has received the letter, but he has not yet heard from those in Louisiana and Mississippi.

"How high a priority [the rule change] will be for them, I don't know. They've got huge problems there," he said.

Senate Bill Rejects Bush Cuts For Many Commerce Programs (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON -- With a year-end budget battle looming, the Senate pushed toward passage today of a $52 billion spending bill that rejects many of President Bush's cuts from industrial technology and science programs within the Commerce Department.

The measure, at the same time, is a magnet for Katrina-relief amendments, and Senate leaders last night accepted a $3.5 billion proposal authorizing emergency housing vouchers for hundreds of thousands of families displaced by the storm. But a second amendment to extend Medicaid coverage to evacuees was withdrawn after the Senate Finance Committee unveiled a bipartisan $5 billion to $7 billion plan to expedite unemployment and health-care coverage for families.

As the costs of the storm grow, the Commerce Department budget bill is also a reminder of the differences that have already surfaced between Republicans and President Bush this summer over domestic spending for the coming year.

Funding for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration would grow to almost $4.48 billion, a $550 million increase above current spending, and $894 million more than Mr. Bush's request for the new fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. The National Institute of Standards and Technology, a second unit within Commerce, is promised $844.5 million, nearly 60% more than the White House's request, and including $140 million for the Advanced Technology Program, which provides "seed financing" for the development of generic technologies.

The White House has strongly objected to the Senate funding the ATP. But Republicans remain badly split, and an amendment backing Mr. Bush was easily tabled, 68-29.

To date, the House and Senate have sidestepped confrontation with the president by quietly borrowing from defense and foreign-aid accounts to fill gaps in Mr. Bush's domestic budget. But as the Oct. 1 deadline approaches, some reckoning will soon be required.

By the administration's calculations, the $52 billion Senate bill, which would fund the Justice Department and science agencies, as well as Commerce, is about $1.4 billion more than the president's requests. That appears at least $679 million higher than the House spending levels for the same accounts, and as a rule senators have been more aggressive in adding money to the president's budget for energy and water programs, education and medical research.

With only two of the annual spending bills completed, there is an estimated $7 billion gap between the House and Senate over the remaining measures. Republican lawmakers must reconcile these differences and then try to reach some agreement with the president.

With the new fiscal year less than three weeks away, some stopgap measure will be needed again to keep agencies funded for the first few months. The House Appropriations Committee leadership is considering a very restrictive funding formula to give itself more leverage in talks with the Senate. But this strategy could backfire if it leaves agencies such as the Army Corps of Engineers at a disadvantage, just when they are trying to cope with Katrina relief.

The Senate Finance panel's hurricane-relief bill was negotiated by Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) and Montana Sen. Max Baucus, the panel's ranking Democrat, who are both pressing for quick action this week.

Washington would relieve Louisiana, Mississippi and disaster-struck Alabama counties of the state share of Medicaid costs through Dec. 31, 2006. And to help families who have relocated outside their home states, the bill creates a five-month Disaster Relief Medicaid program for Katrina survivors below the poverty level and as much as 200% of the poverty level for pregnant women and children.

Relief is also promised for elderly Medicare patients, who would not be required to pay copayments and deductibles to receive hospital services, if they were displaced by the storm. And any individual in Alabama, Louisiana or Mississippi whose unemployment benefits expire would get a 13-week extension.

4th Union Quits A.F.L.-C.I.O. In A Dispute Over Organizing (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Deepening the split in organized labor, Unite Here, a union that represents apparel, hotel, casino and restaurant workers, announced yesterday that it was quitting the A.F.L.-C.I.O., becoming the fourth union to do so this summer.

Bruce Raynor, president of Unite Here, said his union's board had voted unanimously to quit because the A.F.L.-C.I.O. had not done enough to spur union organizing to reverse the decline of the labor movement.

"We believe that American workers are facing a historical crisis," Mr. Raynor said in a telephone news conference from St. Paul, where his union's board was meeting. "There are 28 million Americans that went to work this morning who made less than the poverty level."

This summer, three other major unions quit the labor federation: the Service Employees International Union, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and the United Food and Commercial Workers. The four departing unions represented about 4.5 million workers out of the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s membership of 13 million.

The leaders of Unite Here, which represents 450,000 workers, said the dissident unions would focus on large-scale organizing drives to try to unionize thousands of workers at the same time.

Immigrants will be a particular focus, they said, because the breakaway unions cover industries with millions of immigrant workers, like restaurants, nursing homes, supermarkets, hotels and janitorial companies.

DOJ_NMG_0005840

On Sept. 27, the four breakaway unions will hold a founding convention in St. Louis to create a union federation, tentatively called the Change to Win Coalition. The dissident leaders say the new group will be more aggressive about organizing workers than the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s unions.

Two unions still in the A.F.L.-C.I.O. - the laborers' union and the United Farm Workers - say they will join the new group. The carpenters' union, which quit the main labor federation in 2001, also plans to join.

"We believe it's our responsibility to do everything we can to work with all interested unions to grow the labor movement," said John W. Wilhelm, president of the hospitality division of Unite Here. "The labor movement is the only institution in 21st-century America that can reverse the decline in living standards for most Americans."

Unite Here is an amalgam of several famous unions. Unite was formed in 1995 when the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers merged with the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union. Unite Here was formed last year when Unite merged with the Hotel Employees and Restaurant Employees International Union.

The A.F.L.-C.I.O. criticized yesterday's move.

"Unite Here's leadership made the wrong decision for their members and for America's working people because now more than ever, working people need to be united," said Lane Windham, a spokeswoman for the federation. "Everybody supports organizing, everybody supports politics, and we're stronger when we're united."

Unite Here contributes $4 million a year to the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s $120 million budget. Together, the departing unions contributed about $30 million a year.

Officials of Unite Here say their union emerged largely victorious in recent hotel strikes in Los Angeles and Washington, and in a casino strike in Atlantic City.

Delta, Northwest File Chapter 11 (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams And Dan Reed

USA Today, September 15, 2005

In a historic move, Delta and Northwest airlines — saddled by high jet-fuel and labor costs and huge debts — filed for bankruptcy protection Wednesday.

The twin filings in U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York put four of the seven largest U.S. airlines — Delta, Northwest, United and US Airways — in Chapter 11 at once, an unprecedented level of misery for the industry.

About 51% of the flying capacity of the USA's top 12 airlines is now operating under bankruptcy protection. Both carriers will continue flying in reorganization and plan no immediate changes to their schedules, cities served, fares or frequent-flier plans. But their operations will shrink. While further job losses are expected, neither would predict the number who will be laid off.

Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein said in an interview that “everyone at Delta is going to have to make sacrifices.” He said none of Delta's senior officers will receive performance bonuses or retention bonuses in 2005. He also said pay cuts for the workforce will be announced in coming weeks. Delta has asked its pilots union for a new round of contract concessions.

Northwest CEO Doug Steenland said the airline “must significantly lower its costs to compete” with both fast-growing, low-cost carriers and its traditional rivals that have used Chapter 11 to reduce their costs. Northwest's recent efforts to restructure its costs were thwarted by soaring jet-fuel costs after Hurricane Katrina crippled gulf oil production. The airline's jet-fuel bill this year will be about $3.3 billion, he said, up from $2.2 billion last year and $1.6 billion in 2003.

Delta has $2.05 billion in bankruptcy financing: a $1.7 billion debtor-in-possession loan arranged by GE Commercial Finance and Morgan Stanley, and a $350 million loan from American Express. Only $1.4 billion of the $1.7 billion loan will be immediately available. Northwest has debts totaling more than $8 billion and pension plans that are underfunded by $3.8 billion. About 4,500 mechanics and related workers are in their fourth week of a strike against the airline. Steenland said the Chapter 11 filing was not triggered by the strike.

Northwest said it has $1.5 billion in cash, down from $2.1 billion on June 30. But Steenland said its ability to take on more debt in Chapter 11 is minimal because nearly all of its assets are pledged as collateral on existing loans.

Bankruptcy For 2: Storm Broke The Camel's Back (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Late last month, Northwest's chief executive, Douglas M. Steenland, still thought his airline had a chance to avoid seeking bankruptcy protection.

No matter that the mechanics' union was on strike, the price of jet fuel had risen by 50 percent, and, yes, low-fare airlines were brutal competitors. But then Hurricane Katrina struck, wiping out not only homes, lives and businesses on the Gulf Coast, but Northwest's chances of staying solvent.

DOJ_NMG_0005841

Yesterday, Northwest, the nation's fifth-largest airline, filed for bankruptcy protection, and Delta Air Lines, the country's third-largest carrier, took the step at the same time - though that was not planned, their chief executives said. A result is that now, half the seats on flights in the United States are offered by airlines operating under court protection.

Delta's bankruptcy filing, in United States Bankruptcy Court in New York, where Northwest also filed, was long expected.

Northwest's was not. And the story of Northwest's decision to file shows how a highly attentive financial community can miss an important sign: in this case, the effects of a sudden jump in the cost of jet fuel in finally pushing an airline over the edge.

Word that Northwest was considering Chapter 11 bankruptcy shocked Wall Street on Tuesday, sending the company's shares plummeting by over 50 percent. But skepticism remained that it would actually follow through. Unlike Delta, which had begun talking to bankers and financiers weeks ago to arrange bankruptcy financing, Northwest had left no telltale footprints in the corridors of the financial community.

As late as yesterday morning, veteran industry analysts like Jaime Baker of J. P. Morgan were saying that the airline still had time to wrest $1.4 billion in wage and benefit cuts from its unions, which Northwest had said could forestall bankruptcy, especially if coupled with pension changes under consideration by Congress.

Many experts thought the airline would wait until closer to Oct. 17, when changes in federal bankruptcy law take effect and limit the amount of time in which management may draft restructuring plans.

What they missed was the impact of Katrina, Mr. Steenland said yesterday. After the storm hit the Gulf Coast, shutting down refineries and causing a spike in the price of jet fuel, Mr. Steenland said his airline was faced with the equivalent of paying $100 a barrel for oil, including the cost of refining it into jet fuel.

That outlay - more than double what the airline paid for oil a year ago - had a "staggering impact" on the airline, and made a bankruptcy filing inevitable, Mr. Steenland said.

Still, all the members of Northwest's board, which includes three representatives from its labor unions, were not yet convinced. So Mr. Steenland and his team of executives, lawyers and restructuring experts, whose backgrounds included experience with bankruptcies at US Airways, Continental and Eastern Airlines, laid the numbers out in precise detail.

"We are a very analytical and empirical decision-making company here," he said yesterday, during a conference call with reporters.

Northwest faced a fuel bill of $3.3 billion this year, $1.1 billion more than it spent in 2004, even though it had plans to cut back some flights, like its service between New York and Tokyo. The airline also had a $65 million pension payment due today that it could not miss unless it was under bankruptcy protection. Other "sizable" payments also lay ahead, Mr. Steenland said.

If it did not file for bankruptcy protection, Northwest risked heavy losses, on top of the $3.6 billion it has lost since 2001 and the $300 million to $400 million it expects to lose this quarter.

And Northwest's $1.5 billion in cash could evaporate, money it would need as bankruptcy financing.

Faced with that, the board members, including the labor representatives, recognized the peril and voted unanimously to seek court protection, Mr. Steenland said.

If the bankruptcy filing shocked Wall Street, it should not have, Mr. Steenland said. Over the last few weeks, the airline had grimly laid out that likelihood in a series of regulatory filings, the most recent on Tuesday, when the airline said it had skipped $23 million in debt payments.

And Mr. Steenland, in interviews as recently as Monday, repeatedly emphasized that the airline's chance to restructure was fast disappearing.

"Northwest ran out of time," Philip A. Baggaley, an airline industry analyst with Standard & Poor's Ratings Services, said yesterday. Bankruptcy "was unavoidable, and it was the wisest course," he added.

Yesterday, Mr. Steenland pointed out another issue: heated competition from low-fare carriers, whose growing presence has made it difficult for major airlines to raise fares enough to cover their costs.

With the surging price of oil, Mr. Steenland said, Northwest raised fares 40 times, usually by $5 to $10 on selected routes. But those increases resulted in only a 3 percent to 5 percent gain in revenue, well short of what the airline needed to cover the price of fuel.

Gerald Grinstein, the chief executive at Delta, agreed with his Northwest counterpart yesterday. Mr. Grinstein said Delta was already contemplating bankruptcy because of the rise in energy costs that occurred even before the storm.

"If it needed emphasis, underline and exclamation point, Katrina did that," Mr. Grinstein said.

Delta executives declined to say how long the airline would remain under bankruptcy protection, but it could take years if the nearly three-year bankruptcy at United is any guide.

Problems are also looming with its pension plan. If Delta's pension plan defaults, it would set a record, surpassing even the size of United's pension plan collapse earlier this year, according to estimates issued yesterday by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation.

DOJ_NMG_0005842

Already, the agency's finances have been severely shaken by a series of large corporate bankruptcies and pension failures.

The guarantor estimated that Delta's pension plan had promised benefits worth $17.5 billion, but had assets of only $6.9 billion, for a $10.6 billion shortfall. The most recent estimate of United's shortfall, by contrast, was $10.1 billion.

James C. Whitehurst, Delta's chief operating officer, said yesterday that the airline had gotten a jump on its restructuring with a transformation plan introduced last year, under which Delta is striving to cut $5 billion in costs and 7,000 jobs by next year.

"We want to get through this as fast as possible but deliberately enough to build a plan to allow us to survive and thrive," Mr. Whitehurst said.

Indeed, Mr. Grinstein, who had urgently tried to keep his airline from a court filing, expressed optimism that Delta, which has lost nearly $10 billion since 2001, can become a successful player again.

"Delta's financial problems are severe, but not insurmountable," Mr. Grinstein said yesterday.

The chief executive of the industry's most successful carrier, Southwest, said yesterday that there was more involved in operating profitably than cutting jobs, pay and benefits.

Southwest's chief, Gary C. Kelly, said airlines could not grow and become profitable by making workers pay the price.

"If you don't treat your people right, you pay the price," said Mr. Kelly, whose unionized airline pays some of the highest wages in the industry, even though its overall costs are among the lowest.

Mr. Kelly, whose low-fare airline has a higher market capitalization than all its major rivals combined, likewise had little sympathy for the pain that fuel prices had inflicted on Northwest and Delta.

Neither company has contracts protecting them from the rise in prices, while Southwest locked in the price of 85 percent of the fuel it plans to purchase this year.

"This industry is dependent on energy," he said. "Energy prices are volatile. The industry did not take adequate steps to protect itself from volatility and now that risk has come home to roost."

Delta, Northwest See Bankruptcy As Key To Revival (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Susan Carey

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Two more bankruptcy filings by big airlines -- Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines -- underscored how old-line carriers increasingly see court protection as the preferred route to revival amid the industry's biggest crisis in decades.

Yesterday's filings by the nation's third- and fourth-largest airlines, both of which came in U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York's Southern District, mean that four of the nation's seven biggest carriers as measured by passenger traffic now are operating under Chapter 11 protection. Including UAL Corp.'s United Airlines and US Airways Group Inc., more than half the capacity of the nation's top 12 airlines now belongs to companies in bankruptcy.

All four are legacy carriers -- those airlines born before the era of industry deregulation that have been unable to shed costs such as pensions amid competition from low-cost startups. Bankruptcy gives them at least the chance to leave financial baggage -- labor costs, pension obligations, aircraft orders -- at the courthouse door and emerge months later as leaner companies better able to absorb high oil prices, competition and other turbulence.

Many legacy carriers "have already used the bankruptcy process to achieve changes in their cost structures," Northwest Chief Executive Doug Steenland said yesterday. That has helped them compete, he said, with "newer, low-cost carriers which have much lower labor and operating costs than legacy carriers."

Airlines have faced a brutal environment in recent years with high labor costs, soaring oil prices and competition. With two more in bankruptcy -- and not having to pay many of their bills -- pressure could rise on other old-line carriers such as Continental Airlines, which sought cost cuts earlier this year, and AMR Corp.'s American.

A bankruptcy filing is no guarantee of success. More than 100 airlines have filed for bankruptcy in the last quarter-century. Several, including US Airways and Continental, have done so more than once.

Delta's filing came despite a year-long push by executives to avoid bankruptcy by transforming the airline into a carrier that could go head to head with Southwest Airlines and the upstart new carriers such as JetBlue Airways that have spread bargain-basement fares across the country. Though it has tallied nearly $10 billion in losses since the start of 2001, Atlanta-based Delta has cut operating costs by more than $4 billion a year -- about 28% of its operating expenses in 2002.

Yesterday, executives expressed the hope that their efforts will leave Delta poised to emerge from court protection stronger than at least some of its major-airline rivals. It expects to face fewer court battles with workers and creditors, now owed more than $28 billion, to bring costs further in line.

Delta has a "well-planned, well-executed" restructuring plan that will continue to serve the company even in bankruptcy, said Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein in an interview. "Everyone is going to have to work harder, for less money," he said. "But we're convinced we can produce an outstanding airline here."

For its part, Northwest entered bankruptcy facing several immediate problems. Its filing was preceded by defaults on some payments due in the past few days. A $65 million pension payment is due today. Like Delta, Northwest has been cutting costs, but so far has eliminated just $1.7 billion a year in nonlabor expenses. The company also has been dealing with a strike by its mechanics since August.

In a conference call late yesterday, Mr. Steenland said Northwest will become a somewhat smaller airline and return some planes to lessors while in Chapter 11. He said it will continue to press for pension relief "so we'll be in a position to preserve" the benefits earned to date by its workers and "hopefully" avoid pension terminations.

As the two companies enter bankruptcy, two other rivals are preparing to come out. US Airways is close to emerging from bankruptcy in significantly changed form, after a merger with low-cost carrier America West Holdings Corp. The airline's reorganization plan was approved by creditors yesterday. Today it seeks judicial confirmation, which would set the stage for its emergence.

United, meanwhile, expects to exit bankruptcy around Feb. 1 after 38 months of protection from creditors. However, its recovery plan assumes an oil price of $50 a barrel, about 20% below the current level.

Both of yesterday's filings came after the close of major stock markets, but both were expected. Delta shares were off 7 cents at 71 cents, in 4 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Northwest shares, after losing 53% of their value on Tuesday, recovered somewhat yesterday, trading up 19% to close at $1.87 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

In its filing, Delta said it planned to use the bankruptcy process to reconfigure its fleet and network, retiring four of the 11 aircraft types it currently flies and using smaller regional jets on routes where larger aircraft aren't profitable. Such a restructuring typically involves shrinking capacity, though Delta didn't say by how much.

It also warned of more job and pay cuts, and could announce as early as next week pay cuts of up to 15% for its largely nonunion workers and executives, said people familiar with the situation. Delta has eliminated about 17,500 jobs, or 20% of its workforce, since mid-2001, according to securities filings.

On Monday, Delta presented its pilots union with a wage and benefits proposal calling for up to about $325 million in concessions, according to people familiar with the matter. In January, Delta imposed a 10% wage cut and trimmed benefits for its nonunion workers. That followed an agreement in November with its Air Line Pilots Association unit for $1 billion in annual wage and benefits givebacks.

The airline said it has received a commitment for $1.7 billion in debtor-in-possession financing from creditors led by General Electric Co.'s commercial finance unit and investment bank Morgan Stanley. Terms of the deal call for about $980 million going to pay off a previous loan from GE and American Express Co. American Express also agreed in principle to provide Delta with $350 million in additional financing, giving the airline a total of $2.05 billion in financing to sustain it during bankruptcy.

Nearly 20 Delta subsidiaries were included in its bankruptcy filing, including Song, a low-fare airline. For Northwest, the first bankruptcy filing in the company's 79-year history covered it and 12 of its subsidiaries.

In its initial court filing, Northwest listed assets of $14.35 billion and debts of $17.92 billion. Its largest shareholder is FMR Corp., followed by Wellington Management Co. LLP and State Street Bank & Trust Co. Major unsecured creditors, after the banks that are trustees for notes and preferred stock, include alliance partner KLM Royal Dutch Airlines, which is owed more than $64 million, regional commuter affiliates Pinnacle Airlines, owed $28 million, and Mesaba Aviation, owed $23 million.

The company had talked to Citigroup Inc. about arranging a $1.6 billion DIP loan, but Mr. Steenland said Northwest decided against it because it believes it has sufficient cash and most of its assets already are pledged. The airline engaged Bruce R. Zirinsky of Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft LLP as its lead bankruptcy counsel.

Until this week, many industry observers expected Northwest to wait until next month before deciding to file for bankruptcy, partly because it would have more time to wrest concessions from its unions. But rising fuel costs, the ongoing mechanics' strike and flagging prospects for legislative relief on its underfunded pension plans apparently led the carrier to conclude that significant cost savings weren't readily obtainable. Northwest has the oldest fleet among the major U.S. airlines, meaning its burns more fuel than its peers, a situation made worse by the fact that its fuel needs aren't hedged.

Northwest is seeking $1.4 billion in annual labor savings from its employees and is hoping that Congress passes legislation that would allow it to spread out the time to catch up on its $3.8 billion in pension underfunding to 14 years from the current three to five years. Mr. Steenland said the carrier will continue to seek legislation while in court protection. But he said it must make a transition out of its defined-benefit pension arrangements, which are slated to require $3.3 billion in contributions from 2006 through 2008.

While in bankruptcy, both United and US Airways have terminated their defined-benefit plans and turned the liabilities over to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., a federal insurer.

Since the mechanics' strike, Northwest has stayed aloft by using 1,200 temporary replacement technicians. This week it said it started the process of offering some of them permanent employment. But the airline won't say how many offers it has made or how many of the 1,200 it might like to keep.

In Chapter 11, the carrier will be able to use the threat of annulling contracts and imposing new terms to get its unions to agree to cuts. Three of Northwest's largest unions said they weren't surprised by the filing and will work to protect member interests.

Even before the virtually simultaneous bankruptcy filings by Delta and Northwest, some investors speculated that the two carriers could wind up merging with the help of a private-equity firm. Their route networks have little overlap, and Delta's dominance on trans-Atlantic flights would complement Northwest's strength in Asia. Delta and Northwest officials declined to comment.

Delta And Northwest Enter Chapter 11 (FT)

By Doug Cameron And Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, September 15, 2005

The US airline industry on Wednesday faced its biggest shake-out in a decade after Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines, the third- and fourth-largest carriers by revenue respectively, both filed for bankruptcy.

The bankruptcies after four years of heavy losses and at least 120,000 job losses across the sector are likely to accelerate an industry-wide restructuring around a low-cost model but could raise political pressure on the indebted federal agency that insures workers' pensions.

Four US airlines are now in Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, following earlier moves by United and US Airways a recognition, analysts said, of the traditional carriers' inability to restore profitability and shed legacy costs in a unionised industry.

Even so, observers doubted that Wednesday's bankruptcy filings would eliminate the overcapacity that has seen airlines lose pricing power as too many seats chase too few passengers.

Analysts at Merrill Lynch estimate there are 100-200 too many aircraft in the domestic network. Delta has a fleet of 869 aircraft while Northwest operates more than 400.

“The airline industry has changed permanently,” said Doug Steenland, Northwest's president and chief executive officer. “Northwest must significantly lower its costs to compete with other carriers.”

The carrier employs 40,000 staff. Mr Steenland said one trigger for the filing was that, after Hurricane Katrina, Northwest had been paying close to $100 a barrel for jet fuel more than twice the amount it paid at the start of the year.

Northwest and Delta's decision to go into Chapter 11 was likely to have been hastened by an October 17 deadline when bankruptcy legislation comes into force that will give management far less room to manoeuvre than under the present regime.

Delta's filing in New York comes a year after the Atlanta-based carrier launched a restructuring aimed at reducing annual costs by $5bn by 2006. The carrier, advised by the Blackstone Group, has secured $1.7bn in debtor-in-possession finance from GE Commercial Finance and Morgan Stanley, and agreement in principle for a further $350m from American Express.

The airline hopes to use bankruptcy protection to secure additional savings from its 52,000 employees and has made a proposal to its pilots union.

Northwest, advised by the Seabury Group, is not using such funding and will instead rely on its cash balance of $1.4bn as of September 14 to see it through the process. It is seeking more concessions from its three union-represented employee groups, with analysts estimating that these need to be raised to an annual $1.4bn to restore profitability.

Delta has higher pension obligations than Northwest and its strategic position is viewed by analysts as weaker, prompting speculation that the two carriers could seek to exit bankruptcy together through a merger. Delta is the most exposed of the majors to low-cost competitors, and analysts remain concerned about its ability to generate viable revenues even on a lowered cost base. The airline said it would rationalise its fleet and network, increasing its focus on more profitable international services. “Delta's financial problems are severe, but by no means insurmountable,” said Gerald Grinstein, chief executive.

Delta, Northwest Airlines File For Bankruptcy (LAT)

By James F. Peltz

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

The nation's airline crisis took a stunning turn for the worse today when Delta Air Lines Inc. and Northwest Airlines Corp. both filed for bankruptcy in the face of massive losses, meaning that four of the seven largest U.S. carriers are now flying in Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

DOJ_NMG_0005845

Delta and Northwest, the third- and fourth-largest airlines respectively by passenger traffic, joined United Airlines and its parent UAL Corp., along with US Airways Group Inc., in seeking protection from its creditors in Bankruptcy Court.

Rarely have four of the largest players in a major business found themselves in bankruptcy simultaneously. It's a dubious feat that some analysts said marks the onset of a climax to the industry shakeout that many have predicted since the airlines were deregulated in 1978.

The filings by Delta and Northwest weren't expected to have an immediate effect on travelers.

Under Chapter 11, a company continues operating while it works out a reorganization plan to repay creditors. Delta and Northwest said they would maintain their current flight schedule and frequent flier plans. United and US Airways have done the same.

"Delta is open for business as usual and will continue normal operations," Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said in a statement, adding that passengers' travel plans and frequent flier miles "are secure."

At Los Angeles International Airport, Delta ranks as the fourth-largest carrier, with 7.6% of passenger traffic during fiscal 2004, according to airport statistics.

Northwest ranks as the seventh-largest carrier at LAX, accounting for 3.6% of the airport's passenger traffic.

The Delta and Northwest filings underlined the financial debacle occurring in an industry that has lost $30 billion since 2000 and is on track to lose an additional $5 billion to $10 billion this year.

There are still too many airplane seats chasing too few passengers, many analysts contend, and most carriers' ability to stay in business using bankruptcy reorganization has kept that trend going. But with so many big airlines in bankruptcy at once, a shakeout could truly be coming, they said.

"It's imperative that the traditional airlines regroup and become stronger," said Hugo Burge, president of Cheapflights.com, a travel website. "The airlines can't go on as they are, and something needs to give."

Over the past few years the airlines have been pummeled by a list of problems, including the post-Sept. 11 drop in air travel, the growth of discount airlines that pushed fares lower, bloated cost structures, enormous debt loads, excess capacity and soaring jet fuel prices.

The price of fuel — an airline's second-biggest expense after labor — surged above $2.30 a gallon after Hurricane Katrina disrupted the Gulf Coast's refining operations, and it helped push Delta and Northwest into bankruptcy. Before the storm, fuel cost less than $1.90 a gallon.

Northwest said it expects to pay about $3.3 billion for fuel this year, compared to $2.2 billion in 2004.

Northwest's effort to reorganize its operations outside Bankruptcy Court "have been overtaken by skyrocketing fuel costs," said airline President Doug Steenland in a statement.

Northwest's woes deepened last month when 4,400 members of the Aircraft Mechanics Fraternal Assn. went on strike over the wage and benefit cuts proposed by the airline. The carrier has managed to operate more than 95% of its flights by bringing in replacement workers to replace the striking employees.

Delta, once a prosperous carrier admired for customer service laced with Southern hospitality, has lost $10 billion since 2000 and is saddled with more than $20 billion in debts and pension obligations.

The airline came perilously close to bankruptcy a year ago, but avoided it by reaching concessions with its pilots union, suppliers and creditors.

The airlines' trade group, the Air Transport Assn., sought relief from the U.S. government today by asking that the 4.3-cent-a-gallon federal tax on jet fuel be suspended for a year.

That would trim about $600 million from the industry's fuel bill, which is expected to jump $9.2 billion from 2004, the ATA said.

"We remain at the mercy of oil markets and the federal government," ATA President James May told a Senate aviation subcommittee.

The high fuel prices also threaten the few airlines that have remained profitable, such as JetBlue Airways Corp. The New York-based carrier, whose West Coast hub is Long Beach, is in danger of posting its first quarterly loss since the airline went public in 2002, JetBlue Chief Executive David Neeleman told Bloomberg News on Tuesday.

The industry's hardship also has enveloped smaller, struggling carriers. Aloha Airgroup Inc., the parent of Aloha Airlines, and ATA Holdings Corp., which runs ATA Airlines, also are operating in Chapter 11.

Although consumers might not be immediately affected by today's Chapter 11 filings, they could see gradual changes in the breadth and frequency of Delta and Northwest service to certain cities.

Northwest, Delta File For Bankruptcy Protection (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo

DOJ_NMG_0005846

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Delta Air Lines and Northwest, the nation's third- and fourth-largest carriers, filed for bankruptcy protection yesterday as skyrocketing fuel costs accelerated the carriers' financial decline.

With the filings, an unprecedented four of the nation's seven largest carriers will be operating under bankruptcy protection, marking a low point for an industry that many analysts said had shown signs of turning a corner this year -- if not for the run-up in jet fuel prices.

Analysts expect Dulles-based Independence Air's parent, Flyi Inc., to soon join the pack of bankrupt carriers. Two carriers in bankruptcy protection, UAL Corp.'s United and US Airways Group Inc., have indicated plans to emerge in the coming months. AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Continental Airlines Inc. and Southwest Airlines Inc., the other three major carriers, posted profits last quarter.

Despite the wave of bankruptcy filings, airline travelers should see little change. Frequent-flier miles are expected to be preserved because airlines cannot afford to anger their most loyal customers. Fares are likely to remain low because of intense competition from low-fare carriers. Federal officials have stepped up airline inspections, and safety does not appear to have been compromised by the industry's problems.

Airline workers, whose wages and benefits have been cut aggressively, are likely to face further hardship. The airlines are likely to further trim their workforces to become smaller, more efficient businesses. Older carriers, such as Delta Air Lines Inc. and Northwest Airlines Corp., are saddled with hefty obligations to pension funds that could be turned over to the federal government under bankruptcy protection, diminishing workers' retirement benefits.

The airlines beat next month's launch of a new bankruptcy law, which makes it more difficult for executives to collect retention pay. The new law also requires carriers to emerge from bankruptcy within 18 months.

Some industry observers think the bankruptcy filings could prompt consolidation. US Airways, whose creditors approved its bankruptcy-reorganization plan yesterday, is merging with America West Holdings Corp. in an effort to become a leaner, low-cost carrier.

"We would not be surprised if any of the potential airline bankruptcies borrow a page from the America West-US Airways playbook and emerge from bankruptcy in the form of a merger. That would be one way of achieving airline consolidation -- an objective that has eluded that industry for years," said Michael J. Linenberg of Merrill Lynch & Co.

Unlike the days when airlines filed for bankruptcy protection and were then liquidated, creditors are less likely to demand their assets -- namely, aircraft -- for fear that a huge number of planes on the market would drive down prices. Instead, bankruptcy protection leaves more room for airlines to negotiate with creditors. In many cases, the carriers are looking to reconfigure their fleets for greater efficiency -- a change that some consultants say is more difficult to do outside of bankruptcy reorganization.

"It's more difficult than ever to liquidate an airline," said Darryl Jenkins, visiting professor at Embry-Riddle Aeronautical University. "You have so many lenders of last resort who want to keep aircraft prices high."

Northwest said its decision to file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection was unrelated to its striking mechanics, who walked off the job several weeks ago to protest the company's effort to cut pay and reduce their ranks. The company blamed its fuel costs, which have risen to $3.3 billion annually, for preventing it from reducing its expenses enough outside of bankruptcy protection.

"We had developed a plan to restructure Northwest outside of Chapter 11 and have been implementing that plan," Northwest chief executive Douglas M. Steenland said. "Unfortunately, in addition to an uncompetitive cost structure, our efforts have been overtaken by skyrocketing fuel costs. . . . By filing for Chapter 11 now, we ensure that we have the means to complete the transformation of Northwest quickly and effectively."

The carrier expects to become 5 to 6 percent smaller by the fourth quarter, with layoffs expected, Steenland said.

Delta's filing was a "necessary and responsible step to preserve Delta's value" chief executive Gerald Grinstein said in a written statement. The company said it had secured $1.7 billion in debtor-in-possession financing to continue normal operations under bankruptcy protection.

Delta said yesterday that it would continue to pay wages, health care coverage, vacation and sick leave for its 52,000 employees but that further reductions in jobs, pay and benefits are likely.

Delta also said that it does not plan to make contributions to its pension plans that are due soon. "Missing contributions does not mean that our qualified plans stop paying monthly retirement benefits or that we have initiated the process to terminate the plans," Grinstein said, who added that he would push for pension-reform legislation. A statement from the company said "there can be no guarantees -- even with pension reform -- about the future of Delta's qualified defined benefit pension plans."

DOJ_NMG_0005847

Delta does not have as many unionized workers as other carriers, but it is $21.6 billion in debt and posted a $1.5 billion loss for the first six months of the year. The airline operates a wide range of aircraft, which analysts say could be narrowed to provide more efficiency.

Northwest said that it is required to contribute $3.3 billion to its defined-benefit plans from 2006 to 2008 and that it would continue its move toward defined-contribution plans.

Because of their bankruptcy protection filings, Delta and Northwest will be removed from the Dow Jones Transportation Average index at the close of business Friday, Dow Jones said. They will be replaced by Overseas Shipholding Group Inc. and JetBlue Airways Corp.

Several aviation consultants and academics said Northwest and Delta bankruptcies represent the latest chapter in the industry's long and painful transformation. Nearly all of the older carriers have flirted with bankruptcy protection, and each has had to cut billions of dollars in labor and operating costs.

"Right now, you are kind of reaching the climax of a different environment," said Michael E. Levine, a former airline executive and now a research scholar at New York University. "All have to transform themselves."

Airlines File For Chapter 11 Haven (WT)

By William Glanz

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

Delta Air Lines Inc. and Northwest Airlines Corp. yesterday filed for bankruptcy in an unprecedented day for the struggling airline industry.

Delta, the nation's third-largest airline, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection from creditors after the stock market closed yesterday, saying record-high fuel prices have undermined efforts to cut costs.

Northwest, the fourth-largest airline, filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection about 30 minutes later, citing high labor costs.

Both airlines threatened for months that they would seek bankruptcy protection, but the back-to-back filings emphasized the difficulty the traditional carriers are having competing with younger competitors like Southwest Airlines and JetBlue Airways.

Both Delta, based in Atlanta, and Northwest, based in Eagan, Minn., promised their operations won't be disrupted.

The filings mean four major airlines are in bankruptcy. UAL's United Airlines filed in 2002 and US Airways Group Inc., based in Crystal City, filed one year ago. But US Airways could win court approval today for its reorganization plan and proposed purchase by America West Airlines and emerge by the end of the month.

"The fact that [Delta and Northwest] filed back to back is dramatic, but the fact that you have half of the industry's capacity in bankruptcy says something," said John Heimlich, chief economist for the Air Transport Association, an industry group representing the nation's largest airlines.

At least one more airline could fail. Flyi Inc., which operates low-cost carrier Independence Air out of Washington Dulles International Airport, is widely expected to file for bankruptcy.

"I see consolidation or contraction for the big six airlines as well as the low-cost carriers," Mr. Heimlich said.

Delta listed its total debt at $28.3 billion and assets at $21.6 billion, according to the filing in U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York. Song, Delta's low-cost carrier, was included in the bankruptcy filing.

Delta's bankruptcy is the ninth-largest in U.S. history. WorldCom Inc., which filed in 2002, was the largest with $103.91 billion in debt.

"Delta's financial problems are severe, but by no means insurmountable," Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said.

Northwest listed debts of $17.9 billion and assets of $14.4 billion and also filed in U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York.

Northwest filed yesterday to avoid a $65 million pension payment that would have come due today.

Delta filed yesterday to preserve its cash and said it won't make an upcoming payment to a defined benefit plan.

"Missing contributions does not mean that our [pension] plans stop paying monthly retirement benefits or that we have initiated the process to terminate the plans," Mr. Grinstein said.

Northwest said its bankruptcy filing is unrelated to the strike by its 4,400 mechanics.

Both airlines said they have money to fund operations through bankruptcy.

Delta said it has obtained a commitment for $1.7 billion in financing from General Electric Commercial Finance and Morgan Stanley. Separately, American Express has promised an additional $350 million in secured financing.

Northwest has $1.5 billion in cash. It will save money by shedding some planes in its fleet and eliminating some routes to "operate a somewhat smaller airline," Chief Executive Douglas Steenland said.

DOJ_NMG_0005848

It is not clear how many Northwest workers will be cast off, but the airline hopes to avoid jettisoning pensions like US Airways has done, he said.

Northwest tried for months to cut labor costs and wants to renegotiate union contracts to save $1.4 billion annually. Bankruptcy will allow Northwest to lower its labor costs and compete with low-cost carriers, Mr. Steenland said.

Northwest this week began hiring replacement mechanics.

Delta won $1 billion in concessions last year from its pilots.

Mr. Steenland said Northwest had a plan to restructure without filing for bankruptcy, but soaring fuel costs forced the company into court.

Northwest expects its fuel bill for 2005 will reach $3.3 billion, compared with $2.2 billion in 2004 and $1.6 billion in 2003.

Mr. Grinstein said Delta will reduce its fleet of 869 planes and rely on smaller planes that use less fuel. Delta has lost almost $10 billion since early 2001.

During the six-month period that ended June 30, Delta's fuel costs increased 56 percent, or $695 million, compared with the same period in 2004.

The airline industry yesterday asked Congress for a one-year reprieve from federal jet fuel taxes. Suspension of the 4.3-cents-a-gallon federal tax would save the industry $600 million.

Difficult Times Battered Airlines (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams And Dan Reed

USA Today, September 15, 2005

The slide into bankruptcy protection of two of the USA's largest airlines is more a result of the carriers' bad assumptions and slowness to act than the recent rise in fuel prices or the devastating terror attacks four years ago.

The Delta and Northwest bankruptcies, filed Wednesday in New York, are different in key respects from that of No. 2 United and No. 7 US Airways. Both United and US Airways were directly affected by the 9/11 attacks. Two of United's planes were hijacked that day, and Washington Reagan National Airport, where US Airways has a major operation, was shut down for weeks.

Neither Delta nor Northwest was similarly affected by the attacks, and four years have passed. Industry experts say that in the case of Delta, and to some extent Northwest, these filings are more a reflection of how traditional, hub-and-spoke airlines failed to adapt in the face of aggressive low-cost carriers, falling fares and rising oil prices.

They counted too heavily on the hope that business conditions would improve and return them to profits — that oil prices would fall, airfares would rise, weaker competitors would fail and low-cost carriers would make mistakes.

Instead, low-cost carriers grew, competitors United and US Airways methodically slashed their costs in bankruptcy, and oil prices hit record levels. When Hurricane Katrina shut down New Orleans and sent fuel prices even higher, the cash bleed was too much to withstand.

“Delta probably should have filed a year and a half ago,” said Washington, D.C.-based airline consultant Jon Ash.

Ash said Delta mistakenly counted on the expected failures of rivals US Airways and Independence Air, reducing the competitive pressure on Delta in the busy Northeast. US Airways has visited Chapter 11 twice, but now it's being acquired by America West. A judge may release it from Chapter 11 at a hearing today.

Washington-based Independence Air, while at risk of a near-term bankruptcy-protection filing or even liquidation, continues to fly at very low fares.

Other analysts agree with Ash.

“Katrina and oil prices are simply the straw that broke the camel's back,” said San Francisco-based consultant Michael Roach, co-founder of America West. “Delta was going to file anyway. And Northwest was playing chicken with its unions. It seems to me they didn't do nearly enough and waited much too long. They thought they could just ride it out. But the rise in oil prices upset everyone's plans.”

Delta narrowly averted a bankruptcy filing a year ago, and its action Wednesday had been widely anticipated. But the fact that Northwest is also in Chapter 11 is a remarkable turnabout.

Two years ago, the Eagan, Minn.-based carrier was modestly profitable and seemed ready to emerge from the post-9/11 industry mess as one of the strongest among the big traditional U.S. carriers. But its inability to rein it its costs negated the $1.7 billion in annual operating cost cuts since 9/11.

Delta came very close to filing late last year but stepped back when it was able to extract $1 billion a year in contract concessions from its pilots union and raise another $1 billion in loans from business partners General Electric and American Express. Meanwhile, Delta has spent the last year and a half cutting an array of costs, closing its unprofitable Dallas/Fort Worth hub, restructuring its main Atlanta hub, restructuring debt and cutting jobs.

Last year, Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein told employees he would do everything in his power to restructure the company outside of bankruptcy. The company unveiled a comprehensive "transformation plan" last fall. But the plan wasn't enough to overcome $70-a-barrel oil or the relentless expansion of low-cost, low-fare discounters such as Southwest, AirTran, JetBlue and Independence Air. AirTran, one of the fastest growing, operates most of its flights from Atlanta's Hartsfield-Jackson, Delta's home airport.

Delta officials said Wednesday night that they have a clear vision of where they want Delta to go. Now, only about 20% of its revenue derives from its international system. Chief Operating Officer Jim Whitehurst said Delta should boost that to about 33%.

Delta, including its Song subsidiary, and Northwest will continue to fly in Chapter 11. Over time, travelers are sure to see major changes in fares, cities served, frequency of service, types of aircraft used and onboard service. During their reorganizations, both United and US Airways have shrunk their total flying capacity by about 15%.

Delta said it plans to simplify and streamline its fleet by removing four aircraft types, leaving seven. Delta also plans to deploy smaller aircraft on many of its routes to better fit demand. Grinstein and Whitehurst said they plan to soon announce expansion of service to Europe and Latin America and expansion of Delta's domestic and international flights from New York's Kennedy airport.

What's likely to shrink is service elsewhere within the USA. Delta operates other domestic hubs in Cincinnati and Salt Lake City.

Some of the strongest shock waves may be felt in Washington, D.C., where Congress and federal officials have taken a carrot-and-stick approach to the airline industry in recent years.

Rep. Tom Price, R-Ga., Wednesday night called Delta "the latest casualty" in the competitive airline industry. "Today's announcement is merely a symptom of a greater problem and must serve as a wakeup call to all of us," he said.

But former Continental Airlines CEO Gordon Bethune said Congress bears some of the blame for the industry's sorry state: "To hear all these congressmen harrumphing on TV that this is horrible. Why, these are the same turkeys who just proposed a new security tax on top of all the other taxes they've loaded on the airlines."

Congress has provided massive financial relief to the industry since 9/11, when United and American lost four jetliners and travel nationwide came to a stop.

But Congress has also adopted new taxes, chiefly for post-9/11 security. Although the Department of Justice recently let stand the pending takeover of US Airways by America West, it has blocked most proposed airline mergers in recent years on antitrust grounds. In 2001, just months before the attacks, Justice's antitrust unit denied United's proposal to acquire US Airways, saying the deal would hurt competition and consumers in lucrative Northeast markets.

Ash and other industry experts suspect airline officials already are quietly exploring possible marriages involving United, Delta, Northwest and others.

Grinstein Wednesday said it's too soon to consider whether Delta might be a merger candidate. But he added, "I do think consolidation is ahead for our industry."

Even as Delta's and Northwest's boards were deciding Wednesday whether to proceed to the courthouse, the Senate Commerce Committee in Washington was hearing testimony on the industry's woes.

"No business model at any airline can survive with sustained jet-fuel prices of $90 to $100 a barrel," said James May, CEO of the Air Transport Association, the airlines' trade group, during the hearing. The ATA is requesting that the industry get a one-year holiday from the federal fuel tax to ease the effects of unprecedented fuel costs.

The industry has also been asking Congress to spread out required payments to their costly employee pension plans. Without relief, Delta and Northwest may ask the bankruptcy court to allow them to terminate the plans. That would transfer financial responsibility to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., the federal insurer. The transfer would cost Delta and Northwest pensioners millions in benefits and worsen the PBGC's already huge deficit.

Grinstein said no decision has been made about the pension plans. If Delta terminates its pension plans in bankruptcy court, it will represent the single-biggest corporate pension default ever, eclipsing the recent pension default by United.

PBGC said that Delta's pension plans would be underfunded by $10.6 billion if they are terminated. The agency would insure $8.4 billion of that sum.

Consultant Mark Gerchick, the DOT's highest-ranking aviation policy official under President Clinton, thinks the double filings will force Congress and regulators to revisit industry policies.

"People have to fly," said Gerchick, a Washington consultant. "We are going to have to create a new environment for airlines. This is likely to send a jolt through the Department of Transportation and the Department of Justice in their thinking about consolidation in the industry."

Bankruptcy Filing Launches Delta Fight With Workers (LAW)

By Andy Peters, Fulton County Daily Report

Law.com, September 15, 2005

Now that Delta Air Lines Inc. has filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, the carrier will have a legal fight on its hands from employees and retirees seeking to protect their benefits, legal experts said.

Delta, the third-largest U.S. airline, filed late Wednesday for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy code, No. 1-05-bk-17923. (U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the Southern District of New York, filed Sept. 14, 2005).

The filing comes after repeated warnings from Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein that higher fuel costs and lower demand have crippled the airline. Delta also has faced stiff competition from carriers such as AirTran Airways that have lower labor and operating costs.

Delta's case was assigned to Judge Prudence C. Beatty.

Delta has been in talks with Stamford, Conn.-based GE Commercial Finance to provide the airline with $2 billion in debtor-in-possession financing, which would allow the airline to continue operating after a bankruptcy filing. Details of the loan had not been released early Wednesday, but industry analysts said they expect Delta to pledge virtually all of its remaining unencumbered assets, such as aircraft, as collateral for the loan.

Bankruptcy protection will allow Delta to change the terms of its agreements with other creditors. The airline is expected to sell many assets and slash costs, the latter by renegotiating pilot salaries and perhaps cutting back its workforce.

Delta also could cut or even abandon its pension plan and health care benefits for retirees and employees. Such a move likely would lead to a legal fight from employee groups.

"The employees and retirees clearly want to protect whatever rights they have," said Darryl S. Laddin, chairman of the bankruptcy and creditors' rights practice group at Arnall Golden Gregory. "They're going to want to have legal counsel to protect their interests."

While holders of common stock are likely to see their investments become worthless, rank-and-file Delta employees and retirees are also vulnerable to losses, said Dean Booth, an attorney with Schreeder, Wheeler & Flint who represents retired Delta pilots.

"Delta going bankrupt is bad for Atlanta, and the people who will be impacted the worst are the retired people," Booth said.

Indeed, both United Airlines and US Airways gained judges' approval during bankruptcy proceedings to transfer responsibility for their pensions to the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. (United filed for bankruptcy in December 2002; US Airways has filed twice in the past three years.)

When that happens, a retiree is guaranteed a minimum payment from his pension, but it is far less than what the employee would have received had the pension plan remained under the company's administration, said C. David Butler, an attorney at Shapiro Fussell and a former U.S. trustee for bankruptcy courts in Georgia, Florida and the Caribbean.

"Who's going to be taking the haircuts? It's going to be the pensioners," said Butler, who was a founding director of the Southeastern Bankruptcy Law Institute.

Delta met with Pension Benefit Guaranty representatives last week, although no decisions were made, The Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday.

"They'll have to shrink their operations and vigorously sell whatever they can," Butler said, adding that he expects the airline to sell planes, flight routes, airport gates and spare parts. The airline also will be looking to convert bondholders' debt into equity, as a way to produce cash, Butler said.

"They need to sell a lot of stuff to get down to the shrink-wrapped size they need to be to make a return to stockholders," Butler said.

Butler and Laddin both said that an outright liquidation of Delta is highly unlikely.

Talks already have begun between Delta and its pilots on wage concessions. On Monday, Delta submitted a new contract proposal to its pilots, asking for pay cuts. The Air Line Pilots Association, which represents Delta's pilots, isn't scheduled to meet and consider Delta's proposal until next week.

INDUSTRY MISERY

Delta has lost about $10 billion since January 2001, the Associated Press reported Wednesday, citing JP Morgan airline analyst Jamie Baker.

Delta joins a large fleet of U.S. airlines already operating under or threatening to enter bankruptcy protection, including United Airlines, US Airways and ATA Airlines of Indianapolis.

Northwest Airlines Corp. also filed for bankruptcy protection Wednesday.

Bankruptcy hasn't kept any of these airlines from flying, however, and Delta will be no different.

DOJ_NMG_0005851

"The public will not notice a difference," said John A. Christy, an attorney with Schreeder, Wheeler & Flint who represents retired Delta pilots.

Bankruptcy is the best option for the air carrier at this stage, because "it will allow Delta the flexibility they need on several fronts and give them some breathing room," said Arnall Golden's Laddin.

"If anything, there is an incentive to file for Chapter 11, as opposed to a disincentive," he said.

Frequent-flyer miles also will be kept intact, as a way to reassure customers that Delta won't be disappearing, Christy said.

"They won't kill the frequent-flyer program," Christy said. "That would be like slitting their own throats."

What will emerge after bankruptcy is a much leaner Delta, one that a bankruptcy judge will have determined should be able to meet its financial obligations in the future.

"The word 'shrink' is on everybody's lips," Shapiro Fussell's Butler said.

MORE LEGAL WORK

Delta's bankruptcy could mean additional legal work for some Atlanta firms, although the airline's primary bankruptcy counsel is Davis Polk & Wardwell of New York. Delta spreads its legal work around in Atlanta. Some of Delta's firms include Alston & Bird; King & Spalding; McKenna Long & Aldridge; Troutman Sanders; Kilpatrick Stockton; Ford & Harrison; and Smith, Gambrell & Russell.

The roiling of the airline industry has taken a toll on employee retention in the ranks of Delta's senior executives, including Delta's in-house legal counsel. In July, both Delta's general counsel and assistant general counsel, Gregory L. Riggs and Walter A. Brill, respectively, retired. Riggs joined Alston & Bird as senior counsel but was retained by Delta as a temporary consultant.

Scott Kruse, a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, was named Delta's interim general counsel. Kruse is a former general counsel for the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. State lawmakers have tried to get involved in helping Delta. The General Assembly this March voted to approve a temporary cap on taxes Delta pays on fuel and to eliminate sales tax on food and beverages served in-flight.

Earlier this month, a state senator proposed a temporary freeze on all state taxes for Delta.

A joint meeting of the House and Senate transportation committees has been scheduled for Sept. 22 to explore ways to help Delta.

Weiner Concedes Race For Mayor To Avert Runoff (NYT)

By Patrick D. Healy

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

Representative Anthony D. Weiner conceded the 2005 Democratic mayoral nomination yesterday to Fernando Ferrer, the top vote-getter in the race, in hopes of averting a potentially destructive runoff election and strengthening Mr. Ferrer's hand as he begins the final eight-week campaign against Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg.

Mr. Weiner's decision, made after a long night of strategizing with aides and his mentor, Senator Charles E. Schumer, came as a surprise to New York Democrats, not least Mr. Ferrer, who was said to be ecstatic. Mr. Ferrer lost a bruising mayoral runoff to Mark Green in 2001, and faced an uncertain bout against the scrappy Mr. Weiner; yesterday, he embraced a nomination that had eluded him in two previous runs for mayor.

In a surprising development, however, city elections officials announced that they were required under state law to hold a runoff despite Mr. Weiner's withdrawal - at a cost to taxpayers of at least $10 million to pay for sending 6,030 voting machines to 1,409 polling stations and running the special election on Sept. 27. Mr. Ferrer will also stand to collect more than $421,000 in public campaign funds if a runoff is held.

Campaign lawyers for Mr. Ferrer and Mr. Weiner began looking for loopholes yesterday to avert a runoff, which is required when no mayoral primary candidate wins 40 percent of the vote. According to unofficial results, Mr. Ferrer won 39.949 percent of the vote, about 250 shy of 40 percent, in an election that drew just 15 percent of registered Democrats. Some 8,000 absentee ballots remain to be counted, but it is unclear if those votes will help or hurt him.

Mr. Weiner said he would not participate in a runoff even if one were held, calling it "a waste," and Mr. Ferrer's camp said they hoped to have the problem solved quickly so he could turn his sights on Mr. Bloomberg, beginning with a unity rally with Mr. Weiner and dozens of other Democrats on the steps of City Hall this afternoon.

"I am proud to support Freddy Ferrer," Mr. Weiner said at a news conference in front of his childhood home in Brooklyn. "He has the record, he has the brains, he has the commitment, he has the understanding to not only run circles around Republican Mike Bloomberg, but to lift up our city."

Mr. Ferrer spent yesterday speaking by phone to donors, his advertising team and consultants as they strategized to end 12 years of Republican rule this November with the election of the first Hispanic mayor in city history. Aides also began preparing to roll out new endorsements soon, including one from Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Though Mr. Bloomberg began what amounted to the first day of his general election drive with an overt campaign event, he ended it by trying to revert to a Rose Garden strategy, portraying himself as too busy governing to pay much mind to politics.

Asked in a session with reporters if he had a response to the complaints Mr. Ferrer and Mr. Weiner had lodged against him - that he was too close to the Republican president; that he had not done enough to help the poor or working class - the mayor initially answered with a flat "no."

"Seriously, you can call the campaign for those," Mr. Bloomberg went on, before giving in only so slightly: "I think the public knows what's going on in this city. Just take a look at the numbers: the schools are getting better, crime is coming down, we're building housing, a record housing plan."

Apparently referring to the campaign itself, he said, "What I've got to do is not get involved in that. I'm going to focus on telling the story and explaining to people what we've done and how were going to continue it."

Mr. Bloomberg also moved to counter Democratic attempts to link him to President Bush, announcing the formation of "Democrats For Bloomberg." The event was attended by stalwarts of the national Democratic donor base - the film executives Harvey Weinstein and Jane L. Rosenthal and the investment banker Alan Patricof - as well as prominent former New York City Democratic officials, like Hugh L. Carey, the former governor, and Claire Shulman, the former Queens borough president.

Even among Democrats supporting Mr. Ferrer, beating Mr. Bloomberg is seen as an awesome and perhaps impossible challenge, given his money and approval ratings of about 60 percent. Even one of Mr. Ferrer's most prominent supporters, who is also a New York officeholder, offered a grim prediction yesterday that the mayor would beat Mr. Ferrer, 53 percent to 47 percent, if Mr. Ferrer did not invigorate his Democratic campaign. This ally's advice: Show more of the creative, imaginative, and aggressive style that Mr. Ferrer exhibited as Bronx borough chief from 1987 to 2001.

The political calculus appeared even more complicated for Mr. Weiner, whose popularity surged during the last two weeks of the campaign to the point where he captured 29 percent of the vote on Tuesday.

According to several of his aides and advisers, Mr. Weiner's decision to withdraw came down to political and personal factors: A hard-fought runoff could damage the eventual nominee and effectively hand the election to Mr. Bloomberg; Mr. Weiner could leave the race on a high note as a uniter of the Democratic Party; the first week of the runoff would be consumed by fights over ballots, and make it hard to raise money; Mr. Weiner, at 41, could run again in 2009 or well after; and Mr. Ferrer would have a far broader support in a runoff from ethnic, labor and political groups.

Late Tuesday night Mr. Weiner spoke with Senator Schumer and tossed around the various options, according to people who were familiar with the conversation. Senator Schumer did not lean on him to bow out, but did say that the runoff would be a no-win proposition for Mr. Weiner, according to one person familiar with the conversation.

Other advisers took the same lose-lose view of a runoff, although a few thought he should go for it, aides said. They worried that if Mr. Weiner won, it would alienate Mr. Ferrer's base of black and Hispanic voters, driving them to Mr. Bloomberg, and if Mr. Weiner lost, he would be damaged politically in the long run. By staying out, Mr. Weiner is seen as helping the party while Mr. Ferrer takes all the risks in the general election.

Another factor was the animosity that Mr. Weiner would have had to deal with. A third Democratic candidate for mayor, Gifford Miller, volunteered support to Mr. Ferrer yesterday morning even before Mr. Weiner dropped out. Mr. Miller and Mr. Weiner tangled often during the campaign, sometimes with an edge in their voices, as two white candidates seeking to appeal to the same blocs of white and middle-class voters.

Another potential foe Mr. Weiner now avoids is the Rev. Al Sharpton, a Ferrer supporter who was preparing to step up criticism of Mr. Weiner today. While the two men get along in private, Mr. Sharpton had wanted to stop Mr. Weiner's momentum so he did not become a greater threat to two Sharpton allies: Mr. Ferrer and William C. Thompson Jr., the city comptroller, who plans to run for mayor in 2009 if Mr. Ferrer loses this election.

"Dropping out was a smart move, the move of a statesmen, and it gives Anthony a lot of goodwill," said Mr. Sharpton, who had been lambasting the congressman for voting in 2002 to authorize the war in Iraq.

Other rumors were swatted down by Weiner aides yesterday - that Mrs. Clinton had urged him to drop out; that Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a Ferrer supporter, had called (Mr. Weiner and Mr. Spitzer are far from close); and that Representative Charles B. Rangel, a senior Democrat, had offered a plum committee seat to Mr. Weiner in exchange for dropping out. (Mr. Rangel had backed the fourth candidate in the race, C. Virginia Fields.)

Mr. Weiner explained his decision yesterday by saying that, his competitive spirit aside, Democrats needed to unite quickly if they were to overcome the unlimited campaign spending of "billionaire Republican Mike Bloomberg."

"It was a difficult decision - it's in my DNA to keep fighting," said Mr. Weiner, standing on the bottom step of his childhood home in Park Slope, where he was known as a sports fanatic. "But I believe it is the right thing to do."

Mr. Weiner also played down his policy and philosophical differences with Mr. Ferrer, which were sharp but politely discussed during the campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0005853

Mr. Weiner cast himself as being in the vanguard for the middle class and as a native son of predominantly white neighborhoods outside Manhattan. Mr. Ferrer is more traditionally liberal and is putting together a coalition dominated by black and Hispanic voters.

Asked if he still wanted to be mayor someday and might run in 2009, Mr. Weiner showed that his trademark quips were not dulled even though he had had only three hours' sleep.

"I will not be running in 2009 because Fernando Ferrer will be up for re-election that year," he said.

New York's Democrats Take Aim At Bloomberg (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK - In the end, just shy turned out to be just enough.

Despite the fact that New York City's Democrats failed to decisively pick a candidate in this week's primary, the Democratic favorite, former Bronx borough president Fernando "Freddie" Ferrer is expected to be the party's standard bearer after all to take on billionaire Republican Mayor Michael Bloomberg in November's general election.

The mild-mannered Mr. Ferrer failed to win the 40 percent needed to avoid a runoff.

But runner-up Anthony Weiner, a Brooklyn-born congressman - who staged a surprise come-from-behind with an upstart, wisecracking assault on the Democratic status quo - conceded Wednesday in a bow to party unity.

That will end the prospects of a potentially divisive runoff as well as a week of Democratic paralysis, while the estimated 20,000 absentee ballots were counted. Now, Mr. Ferrer can immediately take on the increasingly popular Democrat-turned-Republican Mayor Bloomberg.

That is very good news for the Democrats, who despite their 5-to-1 edge over Republicans in voter registration, haven't controlled City Hall for more than a decade, in part because of past divisive and expensive internecine contests.

"Runoffs can be 'tsouris' - that spells trouble in Yiddish. This saves them from a punch-in-the-nose runoff," says pollster Mickey Carroll of the Quinnipiac Polling Institute. "[Now these guys won't be] at each other's throats ... while Bloomberg can watch from the sidelines."

In September 2001, with ground zero still filling the air with acrid smoke, Ferrer lost a bitter, racially tainted runoff to Public Advocate Mark Green. That's credited in part with helping Bloomberg win, because many angry blacks and Hispanics refused to support Green - the Democratic standard-bearer.

That lesson was not lost on this year's batch of Democratic primary wannabes. In general, they were polite and well-mannered during debates, determined not to give the Bloomberg camp any extra ammunition.

Some analysts contend that Mr. Weiner's expected decision to concede is a testament to the Democrats' determination to take back City Hall.

But Ferrer still faces a daunting, uphill battle against Bloomberg, whose popularity has been steadily increasing.

A recent poll shows that two-thirds of New Yorkers approve of the job he's been doing.

And Bloomberg's campaign, which started an upbeat multimillion-dollar advertising blitz in the spring, shows no sign of giving up its relentless pace and spending.

"They haven't given any Democrats any oxygen at all," says Doug Muzzio, professor of public affairs at Baruch College of the City University of New York. "It's total war: it's like Grant in the Civil War - you attack them at all points and at all times."

Add to that the fact that the once highly unpopular billionaire - once chided as rich and out of touch, particularly with working people in the outer boroughs - is in the midst of a second honeymoon, says Mr. Carroll.

And the challenge for Ferrer is formidable.

That was evident in Democratic turnout in Tuesday's primary. It was a sparse 15 percent - the second-lowest in recent memory - a testament to how many "Bloomberg Democrats" just stayed home.

"The guy has a record you can run on and win on, he's got opponents who've not shown they can take him on yet, and he's got $5 billion," says Professor Muzzio. "Excuse me, I wanna be Mike Bloomberg."

But no one is writing Ferrer off completely yet. "It's a Democratic town, remember that," says Carroll. "Things happen."

Ferrer To Take On Bloomberg In NYC (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK, Sept. 14 -- Fernando Ferrer, the former Bronx borough president, stood alone as the Democratic challenger to Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg after Rep. Anthony D. Weiner surprised supporters by conceding the primary.

DOJ_NMG_0005854

After Tuesday's primary, Ferrer had finished a whisker short of the 40 percent needed to avoid a runoff election with Weiner, and supporters of both candidates beat hard on the war drums election night.

But Weiner, a skinny, fast-talking quipster whose campaign roared down the stretch, awoke Wednesday morning and decided that there was little percentage in continuing. A count of 25,000 absentee ballots might well hand victory to Ferrer. And the ritual bloodletting to which city Democrats are prone all but guaranteed that the victor would limp onto the field against Bloomberg.

"Our differences are relatively small in comparison to our differences with Republican Mike Bloomberg," Weiner said at a hastily convened news conference in front of his old family home in Brooklyn's Park Slope neighborhood. "We need to be unified against a man who demonstrated that he will spend any amount of money to win."

That man, Bloomberg, is a billionaire media mogul who spent $70 million on his 2001 campaign (slightly less than most candidates spend running for president) and he has served notice he is ready to toss many more bales of cash into the fire this time around. Political strategists say the prospects for Ferrer, who could become the city's first mayor of Puerto Rican descent, are not terribly encouraging.

Bloomberg, who can project a CEO's disdain for the symbols and ceremonies of politics, has rebounded from low poll numbers of 2002 and now rides well ahead of Ferrer. The city's economy is no longer reeling as it was in 2001. And Bloomberg, if rarely loved, is regarded by many residents as an able manager.

"Bloomberg made a lot of amateur mistakes early on and his personality is not great and sometimes he can't help himself," said Douglas Muzzio, a political scientist at Baruch College in New York City. "But he's a smart guy and he's matured."

Befitting a man who spent his formative years in the Wall Street pit, Bloomberg plays a mean game of political hardball. His strategy is to hone in on his opponents' every weakness, and reinforce the point with a daily barrage of television commercials. On Wednesday, the mayor staged a sort of plutocrats' pep rally, unveiling a Democrats for Bloomberg list that included financiers Steven Rattner and Felix Rohatyn, and film producer Harvey Weinstein.

Ferrer, meanwhile, began raising money and sharpening attacks on Bloomberg as a Bush-supporting Republican who is out of touch with New Yorkers (Bloomberg is, in fact, a lifelong Democrat who switched party affiliations to capture the Republican nomination in 2001. The mayor is pro-choice and anti-death penalty, though he has donated tens of thousands of dollars to Republican candidates).

As for Weiner, he caught a few bouquets. Few Democrats looked forward to a replay of the ethnic and racial tensions that erupted during the party's last runoff -- four years ago, when Ferrer lost to consumer advocate Mark Green, who like Weiner is white and Jewish. Nothing so prompts admiration as a politician who manages to seamlessly marry selflessness and self-interest, and the chatter Wednesday was that Weiner is a formidable contender for the 2009 nomination.

"He was edgier than the other candidates and he had a sense of humor," Muzzio said. "And Weiner proved that he could think outside the box, right down the last move."

Schwarzenegger All But Declares Reelection Bid (LAT)

By Robert Salladay

The Los Angeles Times, September 15, 2005

CLOVIS, Calif. — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger all but declared today that he would run for a second term next year, saying, "Let me tell you, I am not in this for the short run."

Speaking at a special election campaign event in this Central Valley town near Fresno, Schwarzenegger was asked by an audience member if Californians would get "a chance to vote for you again."

The governor then revealed what his campaign staff had been hinting for several days: "I'm going to make an official announcement on Friday, this Friday. I believe very strongly in follow-through. Follow-through is the most important thing. If you start something, you've got to finish it."

The Republican governor, who came to office in 2003 after winning a historic recall election that ousted Democrat Gray Davis, is scheduled to attend a campaign rally in San Diego on Friday to sell three initiatives he is supporting on the Nov. 8 special election.

An announcement for a 2006 reelection campaign is designed to add a boost to Schwarzenegger's initiative cause and send a signal to financial donors and supporters that he intends to be around for another term.

The announcement would also come on the eve of the state GOP convention in Orange County on Saturday. Schwarzenegger, whose popularity ratings have been slumping since January, is scheduled to give a luncheon speech to the party faithful there.

So far, two Democrats have said they plan to run for governor: state Treasurer Phil Angelides and Controller Steve Westly.

Schwarzenegger Hints At Second Run For Governor (REU-Y2)

By Adam Tanner

Reuters, September 15, 2005

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signaled on Wednesday that he would seek a second term as governor in what would already be his fifth major campaign since seeking the office in 2003.

The former Hollywood actor kicked off a series of campaign events this week ahead of a special election he has called for November on teacher pay, redistricting and the state budget. In an appearance before an invited audience in Clovis, California, he said he would announce on Friday whether he will seek a second term for governor starting in 2006.

"I'm not in this for the short term," he told the crowd, strongly suggesting he would run again. "I believe strongly in follow-up."

Speaking to often enthusiastic crowds in controlled campaign settings is a role the star of the "Terminator" star clearly relishes, and perhaps his greatest talent in politics.

"Anyone who has watched the governor's political career knows that he is a superlative campaigner," said Tim Hudson, director of the Center for California Studies at California State University, Sacramento. "He both energizes and is energized by going out on the campaign trail."

The Republican governor has signaled his primary focus on the referendum campaign in the coming months by taking some of his top aides -- including his finance director, chief of staff and communications director -- off the state payroll and putting them full time on his electioneering effort.

The upcoming 2005 campaign could also revive the former Mr. Olympia's fading popularity, which is reflected in his lowest poll numbers ever this year, ahead of the reelection effort.

"Of course, I'm bloodied, yes. But unbowed," Schwarzenegger said on Monday. "I made a promise to California that I will fix a broken system. And I will do everything I can, and it makes no difference how many attacks they have on me, because remember one thing: that this, what we are doing here, is much bigger than me."

As in past campaigns, Schwarzenegger is likely to follow a script in which some audiences are screened and details such as lighting and settings are carefully planned. Political reporters likely to ask the toughest questions are rarely granted interviews.

Even though he is still a relative newcomer to politics, Schwarzenegger knows the drill well.

After coming to power in an unprecedented 2003 recall election, Schwarzenegger campaigned for ballot measures in the spring and the fall of 2004. Then this year he called a special election despite complaints that the issues he raised could have waited until 2006.

Schwarzenegger's Friday announcement would come ahead of the weekend Republican state convention in which he is seeking to rally the party faithful who have sometimes expressed reservations about his positions on social issues.

Jackson Action (WSJ)

By Charlie Ross

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

JACKSON, Miss. -- Legislative battles over tort reform are being waged in statehouses across the country. Congress, too, is fighting out the issue in the form of proposed legislation to cap medical malpractice damage awards and to reform asbestosis litigation. Always hotly debated in such contests is whether tort reform accomplishes its purported goals. Does it make the legal system more predictable and more credible? Does it positively affect insurance costs and availability? Does it reduce litigation expenditures? More broadly, does it improve the economic well-being of the citizens?

In 2004, a long hard battle in the Mississippi Legislature over a comprehensive Tort Reform Bill came to a close, during which the same questions arose. Opponents claimed that the bill was unnecessary, and that, even if it passed, it would not make a difference. Still, we were able to get it through. In many respects, the bill is considered model legislation. Among other provisions, it included venue reform (so trial lawyers cannot shop around for favorable courts) and caps on subjective noneconomic damages (such as pain and suffering). Now, a year has passed since the legislation took effect, and the Mississippi experience is instructive. Tort reform works.

Prior to the legislation, Mississippi was known as the "jackpot justice capital of America." The American Tort Reform Association had labeled certain jurisdictions "judicial hellholes." A survey of more than 1,200 senior in-house counsels for the U.S. Chamber Commerce ranked Mississippi 50th in virtually every category of judicial system nationwide. Insurance companies were fleeing the state. Others were refusing to write new policies. The medical field was particularly strained: Liability insurance was in many cases unaffordable, and in some cases unavailable.

One year later, the story is very different. Mass Mutual Insurance Group, St. Paul Travelers, World Insurance Co. and Equitable Life Insurance Co. are returning to Mississippi. State Farm Insurance eased its growth restrictions for homeowners' insurance and lowered its rates on property insurance.

The Medical Assurance Company of Mississippi, which writes 60% of the medical malpractice coverage for doctors in the state, had raised its rates 20% the year prior to the tort reform legislation. After its passage, MACM did not raise its rates at all. "Those people who said tort reform would not work and actively fought any civil justice reform," Mississippi Insurance Commissioner George Dale said. "I think this indicates they were wrong." MACM also recently announced an end to its moratorium on new business; it also just declared it will cut its rates for 2006.

Insurance was becoming less available and less affordable prior to the passage of the tort reform legislation. Now, the opposite is true. Some plaintiff lawyers and some consumer groups still contend that tort reform doesn't work -- but it does not take a rocket scientist to understand that when liability exposure is made predictable and governed by reasonable rules, risk can be better assessed, and insurance companies are more likely to offer coverage.

Gov. Haley Barbour attributes the successful recruitment of new business to Mississippi to the lower cost of doing business in the state. Texatron has invested $35 million and Kingsford Charcoal $20 million; we have coaxed back Winchester Ammunition and its $3.5 million payroll, as well FedEx Ground, as part of a $1.8 billion expansion.

Our reform package also virtually eliminated the mass-tort industry in Mississippi. This change came about not only because the legislation provided that venues for lawsuits must be established independently for each plaintiff, but also because Mississippi Supreme Court decisions reinstated the traditional rules of joinder of plaintiffs. These two changes went hand in hand, since the process of passing tort reform (which lasted four years) raised public awareness of the problem, which in turn affected judicial elections. This has provided for a more balanced judiciary.

As a result of these procedural changes, pending mass-tort cases are being split up. The cases of out-of-state plaintiffs are being dismissed, and the cases of in-state plaintiffs are being transferred to the proper venues for trial. Lawsuits in Mississippi are returning to what they are supposed to be -- and used to be -- about: one plaintiff, or a very small group of plaintiffs, suing a defendant, or a very small group of defendants, for a single cause of action. Common sense has made a comeback.

Not surprisingly, the demise of mass-tort litigation has resulted in a decrease in litigation costs. The CEO of one Mississippi company recently told me that his company's legal bills were reduced by $70,000 a month as a result of the reform. Litigation expense does not produce value for most members of our society. It is merely a transaction cost in the transfer of wealth to compensate injured persons. To be justified, the transfer process must be fair.

Mississippi's mass-tort system was anything but fair, and in many cases it resulted in patently unjustified awards. And people had lost confidence in getting a fair hearing at the trial court level. There was no confidence that the appellate courts would correct abuses. In essence, there was total unpredictability. The sky was the limit on damages. There was even a perception that fundamentals of the rule of law were being threatened.

Since the passage of tort reform and the changes implemented by judicial decisions, both perception and reality have changed. We have begun to restore credibility to state courts in the mind of the public and business, and have thus restored trust to government in Mississippi in general.

Since only a year has passed, the long-term consequences of tort reform cannot be known. There are thousands of cases in the system still governed by the old rules. There is enough information, however, to state unequivocally that tort reform has made the Mississippi legal environment more fair, more predictable and less expensive. For now, that is more than enough.

North Korea Sets New Demand For Ending Arms Program: Money To Buy A Civilian Reactor (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 14 - North Korea demanded on Wednesday that the United States and other nations give it money to build a new light-water nuclear reactor before it will end its nuclear weapons program, a condition that appeared to undermine prospects for a breakthrough in the talks here.

The demand, made during the second day of six-nation nuclear talks, suggested that North Korea was coming up with fresh obstacles to signing a broadly worded commitment to denuclearize, the main goal of the negotiations.

"I must say it was a meeting in which we did not make a lot of progress," said Christopher Hill, the top American negotiator. "Neither the United States nor any other participant is prepared to fund a light-water reactor."

A light-water reactor would cost $2 billion to $3 billion and take about a decade to build, Mr. Hill said. While such reactors are less likely than North Korea's existing nuclear facilities to produce the raw materials for nuclear bombs, the United States has argued that they still pose proliferation risks.

DOJ_NMG_0005857

"There are not too many other ways I know how to say 'no,' " he said after the United States had a one-on-one session with the North Koreans on Wednesday afternoon.

The Beijing talks resumed Tuesday after a five-week recess. China, Japan, Russia and South Korea are participating, as well as North Korea and the United States. The last round stretched over 13 days but failed to produce even a communiqué outlining objectives for future negotiations.

North Korea has said it is prepared to end its nuclear program in principle. But the conditions it sets for doing so have included, at various times, security guarantees, food and economic aid, diplomatic concessions and the withdrawal of American forces from South Korea.

The main stumbling block now is North Korea's insistence that it has the right to retain a civilian nuclear program even if it gives up its nuclear weapons.

The issue has divided the participants in the talks, with China, Russia and South Korea accepting North Korea's demand, while the United States and Japan have argued that the country cannot be trusted with any kind of nuclear technology, whether nominally peaceful or military.

American negotiators recently signaled a softening of that line, saying they would be willing to leave aside the issue of civilian uses of nuclear technology for now to clear the way for a general agreement on ending the North's weapons effort.

Speaking in New York on Tuesday, President Bush indicated some flexibility, saying, "It's a right of a government to want to have a civilian nuclear program, but there ought to be guidelines in which they be allowed to have that civilian nuclear program."

But Mr. Bush was referring to Iran, another budding nuclear weapons state, and his aides later denied that he intended to change the American position in the Beijing talks.

But United States officials drew a sharp line at building new reactors for North Korea.

The North Korean demand for a light-water reactor echoes the main benefit it received in a 1994 agreement, now defunct. At that time, an American-led consortium agreed to replace North Korea's graphite-moderated reactors, which produce plutonium, with two light-water reactors.

But construction was suspended in 2002 when the United States accused the North of violating the earlier accord by pursuing a separate, underground effort to enrich uranium for nuclear bombs. North Korea has since claimed to have reactivated its plutonium facilities and produced bomb fuel through that method.

Mr. Hill said North Korea should scrap its demand for new nuclear plants and accept a South Korean proposal to build power plants on its border with North Korea. Seoul has said it could provide enough kilowatts to match the output of all of the North's existing power plants combined.

China, the host, has circulated a draft agreement in which North Korea would commit to denuclearize in exchange for economic and energy aid as well as diplomatic and security benefits.

It has pushed the parties to agree to a draft text by this weekend, when both China and South Korea celebrate holidays, but it was unclear how long the talks would continue.

U.S. Again Rejects North Korea's Demands For A Nuclear Reactor (WSJ)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

BEIJING -- North Korea insisted, in direct talks with American negotiators, that it would only give up its atomic-weapons programs if Washington and other participants in multilateral disarmament talks agreed to build the country a nuclear reactor to produce electricity, a demand the U.S. has already rejected.

The top U.S. envoy to the negotiations here, Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, said that a so-called light-water reactor of the sort North Korea wants "is simply not on the table." Mr. Hill said discussions with the North yesterday "did not make a lot of progress."

Pyongyang raised the issue of receiving a power reactor as compensation for abandoning its nuclear-weapons programs during two weeks of talks this summer that broke off without an agreement. It was rebuffed at the time, but has since made the demand central to the negotiations, dimming hopes for a breakthrough.

The North Korean delegation didn't have any public comment yesterday.

Mr. Hill said that neither the U.S. nor any other party to the talks, which also include delegations from China, Japan, Russia and South Korea, was "prepared to fund a light-water reactor." Mr. Hill said that the impoverished country needs to "get out of the nuclear business" and start "integrating itself into the world economy."

DOJ_NMG_0005858

North Korea's push for a reactor is a replay of demands made during negotiations in the early 1990s. Those talks ended with a 1994 pact, the Agreed Framework, under which Pyongyang would first freeze and then dismantle nuclear-weapons programs. In return, a U.S.-led consortium was to build two light-water reactors in the North.

Construction started, but the agreement unraveled in late 2002 when the U.S. confronted North Korea with what the Americans say is evidence that Pyongyang cheated on the deal by starting a covert program to enrich uranium for weapons. Pyongyang has since expelled international inspectors and declared its possession of atomic bombs.

The administration of George W. Bush has harshly criticized the 1994 accord and vowed not to repeat what it calls the mistakes of the Clinton administration. Even if the White House were to have a change of heart, any such deal would be an extremely tough sell for the conservative U.S. Congress.

Mr. Hill encouraged the North to look favorably on the steps that the U.S. and others have said they are willing to take in exchange for Pyongyang's dismantling its nuclear programs. The package includes energy and economic assistance and security guarantees.

N. Korea Holds To Its Demands At Nuclear Talks (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BEIJING, Sept. 14 -- Just-resumed negotiations on North Korean nuclear disarmament swiftly bogged down Wednesday in the same standoff that led to their suspension five weeks ago, undermining any hopes that the talks could move forward more easily after the recess.

In a bilateral meeting with U.S. diplomats, North Korea drove home its insistence on a light-water nuclear reactor for producing electricity as part of any bargain on dismantling its nuclear weapons program, according to the chief U.S. negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill. While briefing reporters afterward, Hill said he responded clearly that the United States would not agree.

"It's very clear they wanted to make this light-water reactor day," he said. "I hope they don't want to make it light-water reactor week. I don't know how many ways I can say no."

North Korean demands for a light-water reactor to produce electricity were the main sticking point when the fourth round of disarmament talks broke up here Aug. 7. "In certain respects, we have picked up where we left off," Hill said.

The Bush administration has refused to consider such a reactor for North Korea, saying the Pyongyang government cannot be trusted because in the 1990s it converted a research reactor into a source of weapons-grade plutonium for nuclear weapons. South Korea has proposed supplying electricity to North Korea as part of the nuclear disarmament agreement, which Hill suggested was a more practical way to meet North Korea's energy needs if that is the issue.

France Warns Iran Of U.N. Referral (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

NEW YORK -- French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin yesterday threatened to refer Iran's nuclear program to the U.N. Security Council, saying, "The proliferation of weapons of mass destruction ... calls for a determined response on our part."

"In the nuclear sphere, we have all put our trust in the International Atomic Energy Agency," Mr. de Villepin, whose government is one of three negotiating with Tehran on behalf of the IAEA, told the 15-nation Security Council.

"There are rights to uphold, in particular the peaceful use of nuclear energy. But there are also duties to enforce, for the security of all: If a state fails in its obligations under the Non-Proliferation Treaty, it is legitimate, once dialogue has been exhausted, to refer it to the Security Council."

At only the third U.N. Security Council meeting attended by the national leaders of the 15 council members, terrorism also was a focus. The leaders unanimously passed two resolutions -- one aimed at outlawing the incitement of terrorism and the other at preventing conflict, especially in Africa.

For months, France had resisted U.S. pressure to send a dispute over Iran's nuclear program to the United Nations for possible sanctions.

Mr. de Villepin's remarks yesterday came after a failed attempt by France, Britain and Germany to negotiate an end to the nuclear standoff.

A vote by the Vienna, Austria-based IAEA could come as early as Monday.

IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei called yesterday for Iran to be given a final chance to address IAEA concerns.

"Everything points in the direction of a need for more time. So it would be in everybody's favor to give it some three or four weeks," a senior diplomat close to the IAEA told Reuters news agency on the condition of anonymity.

DOJ_NMG_0005859

The 35-member IAEA board of governors is said to be divided on whether to refer Iran to the Security Council.

The United States was an early advocate to refer Iran to the council, where members can urge Tehran to meet its obligations or face sanctions.

President Bush did not mention Iran by name during either of his two speeches today.

In his first U.N. appearance yesterday, new Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad did not address the nuclear dispute directly.

He denounced the "production and use of weapons of mass destruction, intimidations, resort to the threat or use of force and imposition of destructive wars on peoples."

Mr. Ahmadinejad will address the General Assembly again on Saturday, where he could outline a proposal to avert the standoff with the IAEA.

About 2,000 Iranian exiles who oppose Mr. Ahmadinejad held a demonstration across the street from the United Nations in which they denounced the president as a "terrorist."

As a signatory to the Non-Proliferation Treaty, Tehran agrees to only peaceful uses of atomic energy and must submit to IAEA monitoring of all facilities.

India Balks At Confronting Iran, Straining Its Friendship With U.S. (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

UNITED NATIONS, Sept. 14 - A few months after the United States and India elevated their relationship to a new level with a broad accord, a fresh irritant has disrupted the friendship - the Bush administration's insistence that a reluctant India join in the confrontation over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

India, with a longstanding friendship with Tehran, is demurring.

"The Indians are emerging from their nonaligned status and becoming a global power, and they have to begin to think about their responsibilities," said a senior administration official. "They have to make a basic choice."

The choice being posed to India is to enlist in, or rebuff, the European-led effort to get a majority on the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency to vote next week to refer the matter of Iran's nuclear activities to the United Nations Security Council for possible consideration of sanctions.

Indian officials say they agree that Iran should not be allowed to get nuclear weapons and that it has failed to disclose elements of its program to international inspections. But they say that bringing the issue to the Security Council will backfire, especially by provoking Iran's new president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

"You have to allow a certain learning process to take place in Tehran rather than banging them on the head," said an Indian official, who asked not to be quoted by name because of the delicate nature of the discussions.

Mr. Ahmadinejad briefly addressed the United Nations General Assembly on Wednesday, speaking in generalities by warning against "pre-emptive measures" by unnamed states, a comment that some listeners took to be a reference either to the Iraq war or the possibility of Security Council action against the Tehran government.

Past attempts by the United States and leading European nations to move the issue to the Security Council have been rebuffed by several members of the International Atomic Energy Agency's governing board. A new attempt is to be made next week, but it is not clear that it will succeed.

Bush administration officials say that with India's support, there is a chance of mustering a majority vote. But Indian officials say they prefer not to seek a majority vote but rather to get some sort of consensus among board members demanding that Iran go back to suspending its nuclear activities or negotiating to give up its programs.

"Whether we get a consensus depends on what kind of resolution we have," said the Indian official, noting that by tradition the atomic energy agency does not take any action except by consensus.

In some ways, the tensions between India and the United States are reminiscent of the cold war, when Washington expected India to stand up to the Soviet Union and was regularly disappointed. While India professed a nonaligned status, some in Washington saw it as a satellite of Moscow.

Now India is in the middle between the West and Iran, with which it has tried to foster a close relationship, and is discussing construction of a natural gas pipeline.

Iran has warned that moving the issue of its conduct to the Security Council would be a provocation, and it has waged a successful campaign to get at least a third, and perhaps more, of the votes on the I.A.E.A.'s board to side with it.

Normally, blocking a "consensus" at the board is enough to block any action at all. But American officials say that with India's help, they can obtain a majority vote - if not next week, then within a few months - to refer Iran to the Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0005860

A separate theme of the American-Indian tensions is energy. The centerpiece of the accord President Bush and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh signed last July effectively exempted India from decades of international rules under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. Under the agreement, which represented an extraordinary change of policy, the United States agreed to share peaceful nuclear energy technology with India even though it possesses nuclear weapons.

In effect, Bush administration officials say, India must now choose who is the best partner to meet its surging energy needs - Iran with its natural gas resources or the West with its ability to help in developing Indian civilian nuclear power.

Administration officials have warned India that if it fails to cooperate on Iran, the civilian nuclear energy agreement negotiated last summer could be rejected by Congress.

Dealers Smuggle Weapons Into Gaza From Egypt (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

RAFAH, Gaza Strip, Sept. 14 (AP) - Palestinian gunrunners smuggled hundreds of assault rifles and pistols across the Egyptian frontier into Gaza, dealers and border officials said Wednesday. The influx confirmed Israeli fears about giving up border control and could further destabilize Gaza.

Black market prices for weapons dropped sharply, with the price of AK-47 assault rifles nearly cut in half, to $1,300, and even steeper reductions for handguns.

The Palestinian leader, Mahmoud Abbas, has tried to impose order since the Israeli troop withdrawal from Gaza on Monday, but militant groups scoffed at a new demand by the Palestinian Authority that they must disband after parliamentary elections in January, saying they would not surrender their weapons.

Israel voiced concern about chaos along the Egypt-Gaza border in the three days since its pullout, sending messages to the United States, Egypt and the Palestinians. "We will not put up with this," Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said.

Egypt had assured Israel that it would prevent weapons smuggling once its troops took over from Israel along the Gaza frontier, and Cairo and the Palestinian Authority pledged to seal the border by Wednesday evening. Thousands had crossed unhindered since Monday.

Around 8 p.m. Wednesday, about two hours after the deadline for closing the border, an Egyptian officer bellowed into a bullhorn for Palestinians to stop entering Egypt and prepare to return to Gaza.

The frontier was still porous later, however, with the Egyptian police pushing back Palestinians scaling the wall on the Gaza side and trying to sneak through the barbed-wire fence on the Egyptian side. Up to 750 Egyptian border guards were expected Thursday, the police said.

Palestinian security forces in Gaza appeared to be doing little to stop infiltrators. At midday, Hamas militants blew a hole in the Gaza wall, making it even easier for people to enter the 18-foot-wide buffer zone leading to Egypt's fence.

One arms dealer, interviewed in a car outside the Rafah cemetery, said hundreds of AK-47's had been smuggled from Egypt since Monday. He said he sold his guns to militants but declined to say how many pieces his runners brought back.

Another dealer said competitors reported having $1 million worth of loot confiscated, including grenade launchers.

Palestinians Rush Over Egypt Border (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press

The Washington Times, September 15, 2005

RAFAH, Gaza Strip -- Scores of Palestinians crossed from the Gaza Strip into Egypt yesterday evening before Egyptian security forces moved to close the border in an attempt to restore order three days after Israel left the territory.

The frontier was still porous hours after the clampdown, however, with about a dozen Egyptian police pushing back Palestinians scaling the concrete wall on the Gaza side and trying to sneak through the barbed-wire fence on the Egyptian side. Hundreds of Egyptian border guards were expected this morning to enforce the closure in earnest.

Palestinian security forces in Gaza apparently were doing little to stop infiltrators, and earlier yesterday, Hamas militants -- unhindered by Palestinian police -- blew a hole in the Gaza barrier, making it even easier for people to reach the Egyptian fence.

Elsewhere in Gaza, a militant disrupted a celebratory rally at an abandoned Jewish settlement, grabbing a microphone from a rap singer. He was led away by police firing into the air. No one was injured.

Imposing security in unruly Gaza is seen as the key test of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' government. Earlier yesterday, one of his top aides announced what he said was a new plan of action -- including a demand that armed groups disband immediately after parliamentary elections in January.

Hamas reiterated that it would not disarm, and Palestinian officials cautioned that they will not risk civil war, despite intense international pressure to confront militants.

DOJ_NMG_0005861

Mr. Abbas' security forces largely have displayed weakness since the Israeli withdrawal. By contrast, Hamas brought tens of thousands into Gaza City's main square late Tuesday -- the first day Palestinians controlled Gaza -- for the biggest rally here by the Islamic militant group.

Mr. Abbas stayed away from an official celebration that he had scheduled for yesterday near the ruins of the Neve Dekalim settlement. An aide said he was concerned about gunmen.

The rally had been billed as a show of Palestinian unity, but most factions stayed away. Hamas scheduled another rally for tomorrow.

At the border yesterday, Egyptian police arrived about an hour after the 6 p.m. deadline. A senior officer bellowed into a bullhorn, telling Palestinians to stop entering Egypt and prepare to return to Gaza.

"I don't care about the closure; we can get in and out anytime we want," Palestinian university student Khaled al-Massari said after crossing from Gaza after the deadline.

Egypt also said yesterday that its border guards found an arms-smuggling tunnel under the Gaza border in the al-Duhniya area, 2½ miles south of the Rafah crossing point.

The tunnel, found Tuesday evening, contained 38 firearms and three rocket-propelled grenades, a security official said. It extended to the Palestinian side of the frontier, and Palestinian security forces seized the weapons yesterday, the official said.

In Gaza, Mr. Rayes Struggles To Replant Bulldozed Olive Trees (WSJ)

By Karby Leggett

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

GAZA CITY, Gaza -- In the predawn darkness, Mohammad Rayes arrived at the edge of a Palestinian neighborhood called Zeitoun to celebrate with family and friends the recovery of his 37-acre farm from Israeli occupation. With the rising sun an hour later, the challenge ahead of him sank in.

At the front of his property, Mr. Rayes stared at a heap of twisted metal bars and crumbled concrete blocks -- the remnants of his farmhouse and chicken coop. At the far end, he saw a 10-foot wall of sand left behind by Israel's military. And all of Mr. Rayes's 2,500 citrus and olive trees had been bulldozed, then buried under the sand.

For the 66-year-old farmer, it was almost too much to take in. "I have to start all over again," he said.

The Israeli army's departure from the Gaza Strip this week after 38 years of occupation marks a new era for Palestinians. Once divided into tightly controlled cantons separated by 21 Jewish communities, Gaza's 1.3 million residents can now go where they want, when they want. Under Israeli occupation, their lives had been severely restricted, particularly in the past five years. So for many, this is freedom only dreamed about until now.

Still, there are major concerns. With the Israelis gone, Gaza teeters on the brink of lawlessness as armed groups fight each other and the official Palestinian quasi-government, the Palestinian Authority. The Palestinian Authority remains weak and plagued by corruption, while the Israelis have kept control of Gaza's borders. That leaves Palestinian Gazans with little control over a key element of their economic well-being: who and what can enter and leave Gaza. Some Palestinians say they fear Gaza could turn into a large prison.

Mr. Rayes and his three sons, two of whom live abroad, have spent the past few months cooking up big plans for post-Israel life in Gaza. Mr. Rayes wants to get his farm running again. His sons want to build a factory on part of the land.

For now, those are distant dreams. When Israel's army took over Mr. Rayes's farm a year ago, it wiped out his income and forced him to live off savings. Even before the farmhouse was bulldozed, he spent most nights at the home he maintains in Gaza City, and he still has that.

Just hours after he got his farm back, Mr. Rayes was faced with securing it from Palestinian looters and squatters. "I'm afraid people will think my land is part of the settlement," Mr. Rayes said, pointing toward the once heavily fortified Jewish settlement of Netzarim, recently emptied of residents. Moments later, a young Palestinian tried to cart off a downed electricity cable at the edge of his land. Mr. Rayes and several hired hands shooed the boy away.

Born into a wealthy family, Mr. Rayes has lived his whole life under foreign occupation -- first the British, then Egyptians and finally Israelis. He made the best of it. In the 1970s and 1980s, he worked with Israeli agricultural experts to turn the family farm into a thriving business. He earned more than $150,000 some years. He shared the income with several brothers and sisters who still own part of the farm. A fluent Hebrew speaker, Mr. Rayes recalls that time fondly, ticking off the names of Israelis he says were friends. "Gaza was a better place back then," he says.

In the 1990s, tensions with nearby Jewish settlements mounted, eventually spilling over into violence in 2000. Palestinian militants began using Mr. Rayes's farm as an occasional venue to launch mortar and gun attacks. Mr. Rayes says he asked them to stop, but they ignored him. With each attack, Israel destroyed a bigger stretch of Mr. Rayes's farm. Events of the last year finally made the place uninhabitable and Mr. Rayes stopped going there.

Now, Mr. Rayes says he doesn't have enough money to rehabilitate and replant his farm. He figures he will need at least $300,000. Though international donors, including the World Bank, plan to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into Gaza over the next year, Mr. Rayes says officials at the Palestinian Authority's Ministry of Agriculture told him during a recent visit that he may not qualify for aid.

In a region where corruption has flourished over the past decade, Mr. Rayes fears some officials may seek kickbacks in return for releasing aid funds. "There is simply no plan in place, nothing," he says.

Palestinian officials say they have a plan but that it's incomplete. They blame Israel for that. Because the pullout was unilateral, they weren't given much of a chance to get ready. This week, President Mahmoud Abbas, in a speech, detailed some investment plans but not in the kind of detail people are looking for. They want to know how they are to be compensated for lost property.

Even more unnerving, Mr. Rayes says, is talk that his land may be devoured by a new seaport the Palestinian government hopes to build along the coast. Already, Mr. Rayes says officials have told him that he will need permission from the government to replant. He has heard that his land may be expropriated, and that his compensation will be a patch of land in a far less fertile area. Or, perhaps, he will get money, which he says he doesn't want.

Such speculation is also complicating his sons' dream of building a factory. Mr. Rayes's middle son, Fayya, is a senior engineer with Procter & Gamble in the Middle East and has helped put together an initial plan to build as a family venture a detergent and toilet-paper factory that could cost more than $500,000 and employ hundreds of Gazans. Yet even if the Rayes family retains its land and builds the plant, there are other things to worry about.

"We don't know if Israel will open the border so we can export," says Mr. Rayes's youngest son, Hamam, sitting in a canvas tent he and his father put up hours after Israel left Gaza. Sipping a cup of coffee, he added, "Gaza is poor and if we can't export, the factory doesn't really make sense."

For both father and son, perhaps the greatest fear is Gaza's rampant lawlessness -- from gunbattles between militants to the absence of simple traffic regulations. With Israel now gone, Mr. Rayes says he hopes Mr. Abbas will start to exert control over the battling factions and members of his own government who work more for personal gain than for the public's benefit.

Mr. Rayes says he rejects the militant view of the Palestinian faction Hamas, which wants to conquer all of Israel. But he says Hamas has grown so strong that it may be impossible for the Palestinian government security forces to block its attacks on Israel. That could prompt reprisals and, he says, even the return of Israel's military to Gaza.

But for now, Mr. Rayes says his sole task is to hire a Palestinian bulldozer that can unearth his buried olive and citrus trees and then level his land. On Monday and Tuesday, he began that process by torching the dry weeds and underbrush that have grown up over the past year. Once the trees are unearthed and removed, he says, he plans to approach the government again in hopes of getting a grant to rebuild the irrigation network and buy new trees.

Back at the tent with his son, he looked over his land as the sun set. "More than anything, what we need now is a period of calm," he said. "But only God knows if we'll get that."

Bad Start In Gaza (WP)

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

Only days after the final withdrawal of Israeli forces, the Gaza Strip is on the verge of anarchy. Despite promises to impose law and order, the Palestinian Authority has allowed mobs of looters and armed extremists to rampage through former Jewish settlements, where they have burned or bulldozed synagogues left standing by Israel. Many of the valuable greenhouses that, with the generous help of international donors, were saved for use by the Palestinians have been stripped of equipment as police stood by and watched. Despite a formal agreement with Israel to maintain security, Egypt has allowed thousands of Palestinians to illegally cross its border, including rifle-brandishing militants. If it is not quickly checked, the disorder will destroy Palestinian hopes that the Gaza transfer will become a step toward statehood.

This week's events further undermine the claim of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas that he can impose democratic rule of law in Gaza without directly confronting armed extremist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Mr. Abbas keeps declaring that only Palestinian security forces will be allowed weapons and that "no one is above the law." But he also keeps shrinking from confronting the gunmen who have been parading through former Jewish settlements or punching holes in the border fence between Gaza and Egypt. "We are not going to tolerate chaos after today," Mr. Abbas declared on Tuesday. Yesterday, as the chaos continued, he instead canceled his appearance at a rally organized by his own administration.

Mr. Abbas's problem is in part one of weakness; it's not certain that the security forces loyal to him could impose order by force in Gaza even if he ordered them to. Egypt's failure is far harder to excuse. The government of Hosni Mubarak formally committed itself to send Egyptian troops to replace the Israeli army on the border between Gaza and Egypt and to maintain security. No agreement has yet been reached on opening a crossing, mainly because of Israel's legitimate security concerns. But

Egyptian troops this week have allowed thousands of Palestinians to pass back and forth, urged on by Hamas fighters who have blown holes in the fence. Egypt announced that it would put a stop to the traffic by yesterday evening. According to news reports, the crossings continued.

The Gaza withdrawal should have been a step toward an Israeli-Palestinian settlement; instead, it could become a leap away from it. The big winner so far is Hamas, which rejects Israel's existence. In Israel, continuing disorder will give a boost to hard-line challengers to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the architect of the Gaza evacuation. As it is, Mr. Sharon probably will reiterate in an address to the United Nations today that Israel will consider no more territorial withdrawals or other concessions to the Palestinians until militant groups are dismantled. Unless Palestinian and Egyptian leaders take immediate steps to fulfill their commitments in Gaza, they will bear the responsibility for a new stalemate -- or worse -- in the Middle East.

U.S. And European Reluctance To Cut Farm Subsidies Weighs On Trade Talks (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14 - With three months left before a crucial deadline in global talks to reduce trade barriers, top negotiators for the United States and the European Union were still far apart on Wednesday on reducing the elaborate protections for their own farmers.

"We've both got our homework to do," Rob Portman, the United States trade representative, said after meetings here with Peter Mandelson, the European Union's trade minister.

American and European officials are trying to breathe new life into the so-called Doha Round of trade talks, which are supposed to lead to an agreement on a basic framework at meetings in December in Hong Kong.

But the global negotiations, aimed at reducing trade barriers in goods as well as services, have been bogged down in large part because of the reluctance by the United States and the European Union to reduce tariffs on imported crops and subsidies for domestic farmers.

That reluctance has spurred a rebellion of sorts by many large developing countries, like Brazil and India, which are demanding more access for their own farm products in exchange for lowering barriers to manufactured goods and services.

President Bush, addressing the United Nations on Wednesday, urged countries to push ahead and promised to end all American subsidies and tariffs if other nations did so as well.

"Today, I broaden the challenge by making this pledge," Mr. Bush said. "The United States is ready to eliminate tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same."

But both American and European leaders are reluctant to give up their farm protections.

European leaders have agreed to eliminate all export subsidies for farm products, but they still have high tariff barriers and pay tens of billions of dollars a year in farm subsidies.

The United States has lower tariffs on most farm imports, but it retains high barriers for products like sugar and orange juice and it pays out billions of dollars in subsidies to producers of cotton, corn, beef and other commodities.

On Wednesday, Mr. Portman and Mr. Mandelson put the best spin possible on their meetings but offered no evidence that they had bridged the gap between them.

Mr. Portman said the talks had been "very frank and constructive," adding that "we understand our responsibilities as the two great trading partners in the global economy."

Both he and Mr. Mandelson expressed support for an approach floated in July by the Group of 20, a collection of large developing nations, which would divide countries into five groups and let the less-developed nations reduce their barriers more slowly.

Mr. Mandelson said the United States and Europe needed to offer "joint leadership" and said "it is essential that we build a common and coordinated platform."

But European officials have made it clear they do not want to reduce their internal subsidies more than the amount prescribed by the European Union's Common Agriculture Policy.

That policy calls for reductions of up to 70 percent below the level that Europe is allowed under its current obligations to the World Trade Organization.

American officials insist that Europe make deeper cuts. But the Bush administration is under heavy pressure from Congress to preserve up to $19 billion a year in farm subsidies. The 2002 farm bill passed by Congress, which Mr. Bush supported, greatly increased support payments for farmers and is set to expire at the end of 2007.

Administration officials have yet to signal which farm subsidies they would promise to reduce, and farm state legislators are already bracing to defend their local producers.

DOJ_NMG_0005864

Both Mr. Portman and Mr. Mandelson said the benefits of freer trade would far outweigh the losses, and Mr. Portman argued that individual European countries should focus on the broader export opportunities in manufactured goods and lucrative services rather than on their fears about parochial interests.

But Claude E. Barfield, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative research group in Washington, said the chances of a comprehensive trade agreement by December were "dim."

"It just seems that people are so far apart, and that they are apart in so many areas," Mr. Barfield said. "Here we are and it's already mid-September. You have to have the agreements pretty much in place a month before Hong Kong."

Pascal Lamy, director general of the World Trade Organization, warned last Friday that time was running out.

"The problems are numerous and time is fading," Mr. Lamy told reporters in Berne, Switzerland. "There are a mountain of subjects to address and I hope that it can be climbed."

Tough Decision In German Vote, Onetime Outsider Offers Big Changes (WSJ)

By Marcus Walker And Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

BERLIN -- When Angela Merkel first entered politics in the early 1990s, she was the token East German woman in a cabinet dominated by men from the West. Chancellor Helmut Kohl made her his minister of women's affairs. He nicknamed her "my girl."

A few years later, amid a campaign-funding scandal, she helped end his career.

It was time, Ms. Merkel wrote in a 1999 newspaper article, to leave "the old warhorse" behind. She suggested the man who had reunified Germany and led its conservative Christian Democrats for a quarter of a century should step aside. Within weeks Ms. Merkel, a former physicist, had become head of the party.

In a general election this Sunday, Ms. Merkel is favored to become leader of the world's third-largest economy. Her Christian Democratic Union, which maintains a narrowing lead in the polls, has promised to end Germany's economic malaise by shaking up longstanding labor, tax and social policies.

For German voters, Ms. Merkel's economic platform is their clearest chance yet to scale back bloated welfare programs. Ms. Merkel's election could also shift the balance of European politics, drawing Germany closer to the flexible markets of countries like Britain and isolating its longtime ally, France.

One of the biggest question marks in Germany's future is Ms. Merkel herself. Some observers have likened the 51-year-old politician to Margaret Thatcher, the British prime minister whose policies revived that country's economy in the 1980s. But though Ms. Merkel has at times proved shrewd and ruthless in advancing her career, her ability to drive profound political change is untested. She has been uncomfortable and distant on the campaign trail, and even Germans in her own party oppose many of her economic proposals.

Still, Ms. Merkel's life story suggests that it would be unwise to count her out. An outsider whose rapid political rise defied convention, she is unencumbered by the traditions of German politics and business. She was raised by a Lutheran minister behind the Iron Curtain. The communist East German regime spied on her, but her individualistic ideals found small outlets in poetry and hitchhiking. When the Berlin Wall fell, she was a political novice. Yet she fought her way to the top of a party dominated by a close-knit network of older men from predominantly Catholic parts of the former West Germany.

On the economic front, Ms. Merkel is promising to cut some welfare benefits and weaken job guarantees. (See related article.5) Germany has higher taxes on labor than most other countries, limiting the ability of business to create new jobs. Partly as a result, the unemployment rate has risen to 11.4%. "The labor market is a market in name only," Ms. Merkel said during a interview conducted in German at her office in Berlin. "Germany has to get used to the idea again that it can only redistribute what it produces."

Fueled by hopes that Ms. Merkel can lower labor costs, Germany's DAX stock market index has risen 20% since May, when current Chancellor Gerhard Schröder called for early elections. The country's affluent middle class is solidly behind Ms. Merkel, and this week Germany's leading business group announced it would back her.

Ms. Merkel's party and its smaller allies are polling several points ahead of Mr. Schröder's incumbent center-left coalition. But if conservatives fall short of a majority, they will have to govern with support from Mr. Schröder's Social Democrats. Such a "grand coalition" of Germany's two major parties would likely force Ms. Merkel to make major compromises on her economic plans.

Even if Ms. Merkel wins an outright majority, she may find it difficult to push through her reform agenda. Resistance to overturning Germany's generous welfare programs runs deep, and ambitious regional governors have the power to form alliances that can block the central government. Also, unlike nearly every German leader who has preceded her, Ms. Merkel lacks a strong regional power base.

"It will be difficult for her," predicts Dagmar Schipanski, a university professor and Christian Democratic Union colleague. "She has a limited circle of trusted friends."

Ms. Merkel was born in 1954 in Hamburg, West Germany, at the height of the Cold War. Her father, a Lutheran minister, later moved the family to a small town 50 miles north of Berlin in what was then East Germany. The atheist regime frowned on the church, and often discriminated against ministers' children, blocking their education and careers.

Never a dissident or activist, Ms. Merkel nonetheless had a tense relationship with the state. As a teenager, she was once nearly expelled from school for reciting a "bourgeois" poem. On trips to Poland, she made friends with Solidarity supporters. The East German state security service, or Stasi, kept a file on Ms. Merkel stamped PID, for "political-ideological deviation."

She rebelled in other ways. In 1984, Ms. Merkel made an illegal hitchhiking trip through the Soviet Union with two female friends. In an account confirmed by her spokeswoman, for three weeks the companions avoided hotels and railway stations where they might be asked to show their papers. They were finally caught in Georgia, when the off-duty policeman with whom they had hitched a ride was stopped for speeding.

At the local police headquarters, Ms. Merkel escaped by appealing to the Georgians' national pride, waxing lyrical about the region's beauty. "Right away we were asked: Had we seen the capital, Tbilisi? We absolutely had to see that!" Ms. Merkel is quoted as saying in a biography by journalist Wolfgang Stock. The police let them go.

Ms. Merkel, who excelled at math and science, eventually obtained a post at the Academy of Sciences in East Berlin. It was the communist state's top scientific institution, but Ms. Merkel was relegated to a converted workers barracks tucked behind overgrown shrubbery. Her work in quantum chemistry was considered marginal because it had no industrial relevance.

Fellow physicist Michael Schindhelm recalls that doing worthwhile research was difficult. Because neither he nor Ms. Merkel was a member of the communist party, they weren't permitted to travel to the West or even read most Western science publications. The laboratory's computers and equipment were obsolete. "We tried to focus on research you could do with a pencil and paper," Mr. Schindhelm says.

The experience helped sharpen Ms. Merkel's political views. Mr. Schindhelm says he and Ms. Merkel both became convinced that the overbearing East German state had caused a decay of society by undermining individual responsibility. "In a different form, we're experiencing something similar now in unified Germany," he says.

The night the Berlin Wall fell in 1989, Ms. Merkel was returning home from a weekly sauna. Carrying a damp towel, she crossed into the West with thousands of other East Germans and quickly realized that the regime was doomed. Three weeks later, she left her job and joined a new political party dedicated to reunifying Germany and developing a free-market economy.

Ms. Merkel made herself indispensable in the tiny party. She got the computers out of their boxes and put them to use. She became a party spokeswoman, and she began to develop ideas on economic policy. In a 1990 newspaper article, she argued that East Germany should rebuild by limiting the state's economic role to fostering competition and fighting monopolies.

West Germany's economic boom of the 1950s and 1960s had been built on similar ideas, first advanced by economists at Freiburg University. The Freiburg school held that a "social market economy" could create prosperity for all, not just the rich.

Today, Ms. Merkel believes Germany has gone too far in insulating its citizens against the risks of the marketplace. Since the mid-1960s, Germany's state spending on the unemployed and pensioners has grown faster than gross domestic product or tax revenues, leading to ever-larger debts, she says. "That violates the sustainability of the social market economy," she says.

Ms. Merkel's initial foray into politics proved lucky. Her small party polled less than 1% in March 1990 East German elections, but Ms. Merkel's job as press spokeswoman had won her notice. The ruling Christian Democratic Union, then led by Mr. Kohl, was short on women and eastern Germans. In late 1990 Mr. Kohl recruited her to join his cabinet.

Over the next eight years, Ms. Merkel held second-tier ministerial posts. Gradually, her party's hold on power began to weaken as the German economy strained to extend generous social benefits to the industrially moribund East. After 16 years in office, voters ejected Mr. Kohl and the CDU in 1998.

As the CDU reorganized the following year, Ms. Merkel seized on a defining political moment. A German arms dealer living in Canada revealed he had made an undeclared one-million-mark donation to the party's coffers, worth about $540,000 at the time. Mr. Kohl, still the party's honorary chairman, admitted he had systematically accepted illegal political gifts.

A few days later, Ms. Merkel called the conservative newspaper Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung and offered to write an article on the funding affair. Five minutes later the faxed text arrived at the paper's offices, according to Mr. Stock's biography. It was a devastating assault on her mentor. "The party has to learn how to find its own feet" without its longtime leader, she wrote.

Ms. Merkel's stand proved hugely popular with the CDU's rank and file. Within a few months, they had elected her party chairwoman.

Prof. Schipanski, her CDU colleague, remembers Ms. Merkel calculating her moves with scientific logic. "She said very clearly that she would take this position [on Kohl] but she would do it alone. She wouldn't rely on the men," she says.

DOJ_NMG_0005866

As head of her party, Ms. Merkel believed she was poised to run for chancellor as new elections approached in 2002. She updated her dowdy hairstyle and purchased a new wardrobe. She made the rounds of TV programs, speaking about the challenges facing Germany's next chancellor.

Behind the scenes her rapid political ascent had hit a wall. A then-secret coalition within the CDU decided to block her candidacy and instead back Edmund Stoiber, leader of the CDU's smaller Bavarian sister party, the Christian Social Union. One by one, some of Germany's most influential political figures came to Ms. Merkel and asked her to stand aside.

"Some of us believe we helped her," says Friedbert Pflüger, a CDU politician who was part of the coalition that backed Mr. Stoiber. "At the time it would have been too early and many people would not have supported her. A woman from the East, Protestant, very young -- this needed time."

When it became clear she lacked support in her own party, Ms. Merkel turned up early one morning at Mr. Stoiber's home near Munich. She agreed that he would be the candidate, and said that she would back him. "What was impressive was that she didn't for an hour give the impression of being a loser," says Mr. Pflüger.

After Mr. Stoiber lost at the polls, Ms. Merkel's show of loyalty helped assure her the leading role among Germany's conservatives.

If she wins on Sunday, Ms. Merkel has plans to raise Germany's sales tax by two percentage points to 18% in order to cut employers' and workers' contributions to unemployment insurance. She believes this will reduce labor costs and create new jobs for Germany's 4.7 million unemployed.

Ms. Merkel also hired a controversial academic, Paul Kirchhof, as her economic adviser. Mr. Kirchhof, who could be Germany's next finance minister, is an advocate of a flat 25% income tax and says he wants to abolish all subsidies and exemptions in Germany's tax code.

Such changes are likely to face substantial resistance in Germany. The CDU, which polls showed had a comfortable 23-percentage-point edge in June, has seen its lead narrow to around 9 points yesterday. Polls of German television viewers found Ms. Merkel came off badly in a recent debate against Mr. Schröder.

At a recent rally in the eastern German city of Erfurt, Ms. Merkel's supporters did their best to make her seem more appealing. Party activists waved placards bearing her nickname, "Angie," while a public-address system blared out the song of the same name by the Rolling Stones. Ms. Merkel lectured the crowd with a stump speech on Germany's rising public-sector debt.

In the East, where unemployment is 18%, her pitch doesn't go down well. Cutting benefits will mean more hardship in a region where many depend on government assistance. And Ms. Merkel is seen as an outsider even here. Wolfgang Riese, a tax consultant drinking beer from a plastic cup on the edge of the rally, said he'll vote for the former East German communist party, which still gets around a third of the vote in the region. "She tries to represent all of Germany, but Easterners think she represents them too little, while Westerners think she's from out East," says Mr. Riese.

Say It Slowly -- 'Zukunftsangst' (WSJ)

By Gabor Steingart

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

BERLIN -- Germany is haunted. My countrymen see ghosts everywhere as they go to the polls this Sunday.

When neo-Nazis are elected to a regional parliament, many fear a resurgence of Hitler. When a left-wing splinter party gains strength, scores believe they see the ghost of communism. Because Angela Merkel, leader of the opposition Christian Democratic Union, has proposed a larger dose of reform policy than Gerhard Schröder, the current chancellor, millions see her as the reincarnation of Maggie Thatcher. No wonder pollsters have found a level of fear in this election campaign that is greater than anything we've ever experienced since the war. A balance of terror has emerged: Fear of unemployment competes with fear of an overly radical fight against it. Empty state coffers cause the same horror as the budget cuts designed to overcome them. Some call for a serious increase in genetic research, which leads others reflexively to cringe.

Everyone is terrified of everyone. As if of its own accord, the word "fear" attaches itself to the word "future" -- Zukunftsangst permeates the German mind. Fear of reform, fear of stagnation, fear of a failure of democracy and now -- as the frantic climax of this collective neurosis -- the fear of a further growth of fear.

The result is political exhaustion on all sides. On Sunday, Europe's largest industrialized country will most likely elect the weakest of all postwar governments -- assuming the result even allows a government to be formed. If the Social Democrat Mr. Schröder wins, he will not be able to do much with his victory. During the campaign he moved far away from his own convictions in order to collect the disheartened and insecure. His party is once again humming old working-class songs and its traditionalist members couldn't be happier.

But the politician Schröder now lives to the left of reality. He's never been so distant from his spiritual neighbor Tony Blair. Even if he wanted to move back again after a successful election, his party would not allow him to return to reality. His line of retreat is cut off. If he wins, he'll be in government, but not in power.

If Ms. Merkel wins, she won't have much to celebrate either. The 140-square-meter office of the head of government stands in stark contrast to the small amount of power she would actually have. At least at the beginning she'd be a chancellor of limited possibilities. Three things would prevent the kind of powerful governance of which she recently spoke in Parliament.

One is the outcome of the election itself: Her majority against the post-communists, environmentalists and Social Democrats will be razor thin -- if she can win at all. That is not what a mandate for radical reform looks like. The more clearly she informs Germans of her intentions, the more they back away from her in horror. The absolute majority projected in surveys melted away with breathtaking speed. Germans' fear was greater than her powers of persuasion.

Second: There are rumblings in her own party. For the powerful provincial princes, this was a unsatisfying campaign. No one in the conservative ranks had expected that the chancellor, who had decided upon early elections because of a lack of loyalty in his own ranks, would be able to revitalize himself. His deathbed resurrection is blamed on Ms. Merkel. She was courageous; she was honest; she was even precise. In short, she did everything wrong. She ran a campaign counter to rational party tactics. She announced a tax increase, called for privatizing nursing care insurance and told subsidy recipients, night workers, commuters and home builders that they could no longer expect government handouts. The fear increased, the support shrank. The men in her party's second and third tiers will never forgive her for that. These gentlemen are panting for revenge, and they'll have plenty of opportunity to pay her back.

Through the Bundesrat, the upper house of parliament that represents the states, the princes possess a de facto veto. Eleven of 16 heads of state governments come from the conservative party. The German defect, that paralyzing arrangement of checks and balances built into the system after 1945, is very convenient for them. They take part in discussions, share in decision-making -- and block progress. Ms. Merkel's hardline enemies are just waiting to topple her. Most probably, however, the more moderate among her rivals will prevail. They have taken it upon themselves to wear her out in office.

Of course, Ms. Merkel also has supporters, especially among the party base. She has to spoil these people with presentable achievements, which leads us to the third reason for her lack of political power -- the most serious, although she's not responsible for it. Germany's decline is farther along than the public realizes. No rapid successes can be expected -- especially not from a woman with no mandate for a new start. Her government will be of the lowest common denominator. The ghosts will be sitting at the government table. Fear will soon possess cabinet status.

Ms. Merkel knows everything one has to know about the state of the nation. She knows the data, and in her years in opposition she took a thorough look at the economy. Much of it reminds her of the decline of East Germany, which she experienced as a scientist in Berlin. She recognizes this refusal to acknowledge, the looking away, the wavering in the face of danger.

A glance at the state's finances shows how dramatic the situation is: Of 190 billion euros in tax revenues, 80 billion is passed on to the cash-strapped state pension system, 30 billion goes to the unemployed, and another 40 billion belongs to the banks, just to service debt. The rest is not even enough to pay the bureaucracy and to build roads. Ever-new credits are constantly needed so that Germany at least has the appearance of a prosperous country.

Relief is not in sight because the birth-rate has fallen by half since the early 1960s and so the work force will also soon fall by half. Two retirees will then be financed by one worker, which would be too much for everyone -- the workers and the state. If nothing changes, the government will need 80% of the state budget in 2050 just to prop up pensions.

The task of building up the German east is another factor. The region once dominated by the Soviets devours a fortune, and has cost 1.4 trillion euros so far. For 15 years, the western part of Germany has been transferring 4% of its GDP to the East. Because the West has not grown by 4% for decades -- at best by half of that -- the transfer payments are depleting reserves. Former Ford manager and Social Democrat Klaus von Dohnanyi speaks of a "permanent loss of blood from our economy."

Ms. Merkel knows the forces at work here. They are pulling the country, as well as its chancellor, down -- down to the place where the wellspring of eternal fear flows. No nation likes to lose a piece of its power and prosperity each day. German assertiveness is thus Ms. Merkel's natural coalition partner. She must ally herself with it, promote it and let it grow into a mighty political force.

Willpower is society's most underestimated productive force in history. Historians don't like it because they cannot measure it or ask it any questions. But states do not consist only of armed forces, banks and steel mills, and more or less diligent civil servants. Every country is propelled by a mixture of ambition and pride, which can bring forth both the reprehensible and the great. Angela Merkel has a chance if she succeeds in mobilizing this force of will behind her policies, and thus puts an end to the haunting. Before she takes on the details of pension and tax reforms, there is something more important to do: It's time to call in "Die Geisterjäger" -- the Ghostbusters.

Father's Ideals Forged Life In East For German Candidate (NYT)

By Judy Dempsey, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

TEMPLIN, Germany - Half a century ago, the Rev. Horst Kasner made an extraordinary decision: He packed up his young family and moved from democratically governed Hamburg, West Germany, to this small town in the Brandenburg countryside, then the heart of Communist East Germany.

"We were young and idealistic back then," Mr. Kasner said recently, perched high above the pews in the choir loft of a Protestant church he rebuilt from the ruins when the Berlin Wall fell in 1989.

It seemed a laconic explanation of how Angela Merkel, his daughter, who could make history on Sept. 18 by becoming Germany's first chancellor from the East, grew up and lived under Communism until the wall was torn down.

A slim, tall man looking younger than his 79 years, Mr. Kasner offered insight into the workings of the Communist system in which he struggled to tell the truth and fended off the secret police.

Mrs. Merkel, who was just 3 months old when the family moved east, has said little about the effect of living under Communism.

Only in recent interviews has she revealed that her parents instilled in her the need to excel at everything to survive an environment suspicious of her father's Christian teachings.

Her father, who remains a pastor here in Templin, 50 miles north of Berlin, was certain in 1954, when the Protestant church asked him to move to East Germany from Hamburg. "We were needed over there," he said.

That was before the wall went up in 1961, and "you could still travel between both parts of the country," he said.

The company that Mr. Kasner contacted to move his family was nevertheless astonished.

The manager "said there were two kinds of people that went over to the East - Communists and real idiots." Mr. Kasner said.

Asked what category the manager reserved for him, he said: "The manager said he would have to find a third category. You see, I was young. It was my mission to go there."

The initial reaction of the East German authorities, he said, was: "It is so good of you to have gone over. Many have gone to the West." But, Mr. Kasner said the secret services always watched him.

He said that although he never openly challenged the authorities he used his weekly seminars and his Weissenseer Circle, an elite group of left-wing intellectuals tolerated by the government, to discuss difficult issues. Then in 1968, he was asked to become an informer for the Stasi, the state security secret police. "I had been discussing Andrei Sakharov's letter at the seminar," he said.

The letter by Mr. Sakharov, a Soviet dissident, was a trenchant account of how nuclear weapons and the arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union could destroy humanity. To avoid this, Mr. Sakharov called for a rapprochement between the capitalist and socialist systems.

"I do not know who informed on me," Mr. Kasner said. "Anyway, the Stasi called me in. They told me it was a criminal act to discuss such things."

"They proposed I work for them to avoid pressing charges. I told them anyone could hear Sakharov's letter on the radio. You could not build a wall to keep such things out. I refused to cooperate."

Mr. Kasner suffered no penalties. But his wife, Herlind, who had taught Latin and English in Hamburg, and his daughter ran into difficulty.

"My wife was not allowed to teach," he said.

At school in Templin, Mrs. Merkel excelled at languages. She had wanted to train to become a teacher and translator, but was not allowed to because of her father's profession.

Instead, she studied physics at Leipzig University. Mrs. Merkel's fellow members of the Christian Democratic Party who know her well say her experience as a young woman led her to embrace the market economy and the United States.

While Mr. Kasner does not like to talk about his daughter, it is clear that he does not support her beliefs. When the wall fell, he would have preferred to have two separate Germanys. "I wanted a democratic East Germany," he said. "But the people wanted the Deutsche mark. The revolution is now over."

Mrs. Merkel, now 51, could hardly wait to seize the moment to embrace unification. "As far as I have been shaped by politics, I have been shaped by German reunification," she said during her television duel with Chancellor Gerhard Schröder. "I am proud to be a politician for all of Germany with East German roots."

DOJ_NMG_0005869

In the buttoned-down town of her youth, residents interviewed seemed to take less pride in Mrs. Merkel than in her father.

"We are proud of Pastor Kasner because he rebuilt the church," said Birgit Dornbusch, 37, an unemployed mother. "I don't know what Merkel has achieved."

A New 'German Path' (WSJ)

By Wolfgang Schauble

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

How can our country's interests be best protected under the conditions of globalization, of ever more rapid and far-reaching world-wide changes, bringing a wealth of new opportunities, but also dangerous risks? This question currently demands that all European countries take fundamental positions. In Germany, because of the elections, it goes to the heart of future government policy.

The analysis of the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and its sister party, the Christian Social Union (CSU), is clear: To preserve peace, freedom and security in Europe, the success of the European unification process and a functioning trans-Atlantic partnership are of paramount importance. There are no realistic and responsible alternatives -- neither going it alone as a nation, nor special relationships, nor politics in exclusive groups can lead in the long run to anything close to a justifiable level of stability.

Our guideline must thus be the strengthening of partnerships in our foreign and security policies and to avoid everything that could weaken trust. This way we'll aim to correct the wrong maneuvers of Gerhard Schröder's government, which have contributed greatly to the fact that Europe and the trans-Atlantic relationship are today experiencing their deepest crisis. The policy Mr. Schröder calls the "German path" was meant to suggest that reliability in foreign policy could be replaced by the demonstration of a kind of new national self-confidence. The disastrous consequence is a severe loss of trust among smaller and newer EU members, especially among Germany's eastern neighbors. The attempt to put Washington in its place, so to speak, by cultivating a Paris-Berlin-Moscow axis and missing no chance to ride the waves of anti-American sentiment has worsened Europe's division. Mr. Schröder ignored the fact that our new EU partners, in particular, will not allow themselves to be forced to choose between European and Atlantic solidarity. There is also a contradiction in his policies: on the one hand rightly demanding legitimacy for international action through multilateralism; on the other, however, acting unilaterally himself and taking positions on significant issues in a premature fashion that thwarts any joint decision-making process. Just take the question of lifting the weapons embargo on China. That Mr. Schröder is loudly proclaiming in his campaign that "German foreign policy is decided in Berlin and nowhere else" is emblematic of his foreign policy concept, fixated solely on domestic effect.

A federal government led by the CDU/CSU would put an end to such separate national paths and false axes. Germany will pursue policies that see European integration and the Atlantic partnership not as artificial opposites, but as two sides of the same coin. It will restore trans-Atlantic relations to a foundation of fundamental trust, not out of submissiveness toward Washington, but because we are linked by a common set of values, as well as by the most heavily interconnected economic market in the world, and because we are equally affected by the threats of transnational terrorism, weapons of mass destruction that could fall into the wrong hands, failing states, world-wide poverty and underdevelopment, and because we can best overcome these challenges if we develop common Euro-Atlantic positions. The coordinated action against Iran's nuclear program should serve as an example.

Because European and Atlantic security cannot be separated, we want to strengthen NATO as the primary instrument of our security and defense policy. And we will act to increase the EU's capabilities and options, in order to strengthen the European pillar of the Atlantic security partnership. At the same time, we have a great interest in good relations with Russia, but not over the heads of our eastern neighbors and not by keeping silent about the problematic developments regarding the rule of law in Russia. Characterizing President Vladimir Putin, as Mr. Schröder did, as a "flawless democrat" harms the credibility of European policy toward Russia more than it helps it.

At the same time, it is important to free ourselves of old ways of thinking in the goals of our Russia policy as well as in the development of our relationships with other regions of the world; constellations oriented toward confrontation or competing poles will be unable to stand up to the actual challenges of the future. We Europeans must take Asia seriously in terms of its political and economic importance, and we must develop a long-term strategy of partnership with China, India and others without speculating upon rivalries and power shifts in regard to American efforts. Our future will depend in great part on the extent to which we succeed in using strategic partnerships to find effective policies to assist regions of the world currently mired in hopelessness. This defines a common responsibility for the poor and for the preservation of our natural resources, which will help fighting global dangers. For security, development and human rights go hand-in-hand, and together they will determine the long-term stability of our continent.

The wealth of tasks that we must master in order to protect our interests in a globalized world demand from us Europeans, above all, close cohesion and efforts to combat signs of economic sclerosis and restore dynamism, innovation and optimism. To remain relevant in tomorrow's world, we must strengthen the European integration process. We must use the current crisis in the EU as a chance to restore credibility to European politics and win back the support of the people. Europe needs to concentrate on the essentials, the effort to find the right balance both within and without. This requires a clear division of responsibilities among the EU, the member states, and the regions, and a certain rollback in the thicket of excessive European regulation, so that growth and dynamism are not suffocated by bureaucracy. And it is also necessary to take care that the borders of the EU are not stretched too far and that we do not ask too much of the people of Europe -- that the standard for future expansions is its absorption capacity; concretely, that our security goal of a positive development and permanent western linkage of Turkey should be achieved through a privileged partnership with the EU and not through full membership. In all this, close German-French cooperation will particularly important.

If we succeed in strengthening Europe's cohesion, achieving common Euro-Atlantic positions, and binding Russia, China and others into a system of cooperative international responsibility, then we will also face down the greatest challenge for our future: to credibly convince the non-Western world that the West does not stand against them.

Protestants Say Anger And Alienation Are Fueling Riots In Belfast (NYT)

By Brian Lavery

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

BELFAST, Northern Ireland, Sept. 14 - Every morning this week, the broken glass and burned-out cars have quickly disappeared from the streets here after the previous night's rioting by Protestant mobs.

By late afternoon, the buildup to those riots begins again, as protests stall traffic. And Belfast seems shaken by the realization that deep-seated anger among Protestants has dashed hopes of a reconciliation with Roman Catholics anytime soon.

The police have blamed Protestant paramilitaries for organizing the recent violence, which has injured more than 80 police officers and two children who were hit in the head by bricks thrown through the windows of a car and a school bus.

Britain's Northern Ireland secretary, Peter Hain, said Wednesday that the government no longer recognized the cease-fire of a Protestant terrorist organization, the Ulster Volunteer Force, which has also been accused of killing four members of a rival Protestant gang this summer.

The violence was largely unexpected, since the Irish Republican Army, the larger Catholic enemy of the Protestant paramilitary groups, in July announced an end to its 36-year armed campaign to drive Britain out of Northern Ireland, prompting Prime Minister Tony Blair to declare a new era of peace.

But many people said the clashes were the result of a more significant rift between the British government and Protestants, who are in the majority here. Britain wants to restart the local legislature set up by the 1998 peace accord to share power between Catholic and Protestant parties, but the rioting shows how resistant Protestants are to the idea.

On Wednesday, the police dispersed a roadblock in a gritty residential area. Davy Reid, a 28-year-old protester, said he was responding to a ban on a parade by the Orange Order, a Protestant organization, through a Catholic neighborhood last weekend. He listed other grievances, including the closing of a hospital maternity ward and the lack of a shopping mall nearby. Those services were available in Catholic areas, he said. "The government hasn't been listening," he said.

Nelson McCausland, a Belfast politician and a member of the Democratic Unionists, a hard-line Protestant party, said: "There is a fundamental anger and alienation. That sense of being marginalized and disempowered runs very deep."

No prominent unionists, who are largely Protestant and want the province to remain part of Britain, condemned the violence. After members of the Orange Order attacked police officers, Robert Saulter, the group's grand master, said, "Ordinary, decent and reasonable men have been goaded into behaving out of character by the authorities."

Mitchell B. Reiss, the American special envoy for Northern Ireland, criticized Protestants' failure to speak out against the rioting. "All of us are pretty disappointed with the abdication of responsibility by many unionist political leaders," he said.

Protestants held a privileged position in Northern Ireland for centuries, with access to better jobs and housing. That status has gradually eroded since the 1960's, when a civil rights movement began putting Catholics on an equal footing, and Protestants continue to feel slighted.

Protestants are also infuriated that Britain has rewarded the I.R.A. - by dismantling British military bases and releasing an imprisoned bomber - before the terrorist group fulfills its promise to disarm.

DOJ_NMG_0005871

"We've given a lot over the last few years," said Reggie Spencer, manager of a community center. "I personally feel that we've given enough," he said, adding that the concessions to the I.R.A. had convinced most Protestants that violence was politically effective.

For IRA Critics, No Peace In Belfast (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, September 15, 2005

BELFAST, Sept. 14 -- The family of Robert McCartney, a Catholic whose death at the hands of Irish Republican Army members in January caused international outrage and brought White House condemnation, said Wednesday it was being subjected to a campaign of violence and intimidation for speaking out forcefully against the IRA.

Paula McCartney, Robert's sister, said her two teenage sons were beaten recently by family members of a high-ranking IRA officer who they believe was involved in McCartney's killing. On Monday night, one of Robert McCartney's closest friends, Jeff Commander, was beaten with metal rods by a gang of men the McCartney family also contends are IRA members linked to the killing.

On Tuesday night, at least 50 people, mostly women, demonstrated outside the home of Bridgeen Hagans, McCartney's fiancee, vowing to return every night until she moves out of the neighborhood.

"They want to intimidate us, they want us to keep quiet," said Paula McCartney, whose small home in the Short Strand, a close-knit Catholic community in East Belfast, is decorated with photos of well-wishers including U.S. Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

She said Commander's attackers used the recent riots in Belfast's Protestant communities as an opportunity to take revenge on McCartney's family while police and public attention were focused elsewhere.

Mitchell B. Reiss, President Bush's special envoy to Northern Ireland, described the situation as "disgraceful."

"We deplore the recent violence and intimidation against the McCartney family, Bridgeen and their friends," Reiss said Wednesday in a statement to The Washington Post. "It is unacceptable and should stop immediately."

McCartney, a supporter of Sinn Fein, the IRA's political wing, was killed Jan. 30 in a pub brawl after an argument got out of hand. He was dragged outside and beaten by at least a dozen men, one of whom stabbed him in the heart.

In a remarkable departure from the code of silence enforced by the IRA among its Catholic supporters, McCartney's family publicly and repeatedly said that he was killed by IRA members and demanded justice. They said the IRA intimidated witnesses to keep them from coming forward and sent in professionals to clean up the murder scene and destroy evidence.

The family's campaign -- which included a visit with Bush at the White House -- badly embarrassed Sinn Fein and damaged its reputation as it fought an increasing perception that the IRA was tainted by thugs and criminals who lacked their forefathers' political ideals. Trying to stem the political damage, Sinn Fein's leader, Gerry Adams, invited the family to address a party meeting, where they issued impassioned demands for justice.

The IRA took the unusual step of publicly denouncing the McCartney killing and offered to shoot those responsible in the kind of rough justice it has long used to police Catholic communities. The McCartney family rejected that offer. Two men have been charged in connection with McCartney's murder, and the IRA announced it had expelled three members over the killing. In July, the IRA announced it was laying down its weapons for good.

Sinn Fein issued a statement Wednesday denying any link to the beating of Commander, whose bloodied head was featured in several front-page newspaper photos in Belfast on Wednesday. "Sinn Fein is totally opposed to intimidation of any type no matter where it comes from or who it is aimed at," said the statement issued by a party official, Gerry Kelly.

But in the Short Strand, an IRA stronghold where about 3,000 people live in modest two-story brick buildings, McCartney's family said IRA intimidation was still a way of life.

Even as the IRA has disarmed and lost much of its former clout, individual IRA members still "act as if they can do anything they want," said Jim Arnold, Paula McCartney's husband. "It's an absolute disgrace," said Arnold, a house painter. "They are dinosaurs. They live on the back of the IRA, but the IRA are finished, and they cannot grasp it. They won't move on."

Arnold said the people who took part in the McCartney killing are well known in the Short Strand. And he said that despite the IRA's claims that the men were expelled, they are still deeply involved with the paramilitary group. "This district is sickened by these people still parading around who were involved in Robert's murder," he said.

Arnold said these men joined a crowd of Catholics who gathered at the entrance to the Short Strand on Monday evening, standing guard against any rioting Protestants who might try to come in and cause trouble. He said they were also among the men who ambushed Commander later in the evening, opening a large gash on his head.

"They're trying to tell our family: Shut up or this is going to happen again," Arnold said. "The McCartney family opened a lot of eyes in Belfast."

DOJ_NMG_0005872

Arnold and Paula McCartney, as well as Bridgeen Hagans, are making plans to move out of the neighborhood. "I can't live in a community where it is perfectly acceptable to murder an innocent man and still walk around freely," Paula McCartney said.

Deal For Ukraine Company Renews Charges Of Abuse (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, September 15, 2005

KIEV, Ukraine, Sept. 14 - In the last weeks of Leonid D. Kuchma's scandal-tarred presidency, an American company reached an agreement with his government to take control of a state-owned chemical factory in eastern Ukraine under terms that have been criticized as secretive and suspiciously generous.

On Sept. 2, dozens of men dressed in camouflage and body armor stormed and seized the headquarters of the factory, the Severodonetsk Azot Association. They were accompanied by officials of a new government, carrying an order signed by a minister under Mr. Kuchma's successor, Viktor A. Yushchenko.

The order was based on a court case filed by a fictitious company, on behalf of a politician who stood to gain from the seizure, according to a senior government official.

"It was a very serious abuse of the system," said the chairwoman of the country's State Property Fund, Valentyna P. Semeniuk.

The accumulated weight of scandal and internal rifts has destroyed the political coalition that Mr. Yushchenko formed to challenge Mr. Kuchma's government and create a newly democratic, corruption-free government. It has also raised questions about the true success of what came to be known as the Orange Revolution, as members of Mr. Yushchenko's team volley accusations of abuse of power, bribery and other forms of corruption.

"Corruption exists in different countries, but in civilized countries there is prompt action against it," said Oleksandr O. Zinchenko, Mr. Yushchenko's chief of staff, who resigned, coincidentally, on the same day that the company was seized. Three days later he went public with accusations of corruption among Mr. Yushchenko's senior aides, three of whom he named, and the president did nothing about it.

Mr. Zinchenko's resignation provoked a political firestorm here that shows little sign of subsiding.

Last week Mr. Yushchenko dismissed his prime minister and the rest of her government, as well as the head of the customs service. He also suspended or accepted the resignation of several members of his staff who are at the center of Mr. Zinchenko's accusations.

Even so he has defended his aides, much as Mr. Kuchma called accusations against his own aides politically motivated. "There is an anecdote," Mr. Yushchenko said Monday. "It does not really matter whether a man has a daughter or does not have a daughter. It is enough to say in public that his daughter does not behave herself well."

That has not stopped him, however, from accusing the departed prime minister, Yulia V. Tymoshenko, of corruption herself. After first striking a conciliatory note after her dismissal, Mr. Yushchenko accused her of siphoning $1.6 billion from the budget "in favor of private undertakings," coercing judges and improperly intervening in a dispute over an alloy plant, Nikopol Ferroalloys.

"It is very unpleasant for me to think what Yulia Vladimirovna could have received if Nikopol Ferroalloy would have been transferred into the hands of business groups," he said in another interview, on Tuesday, referring to Ms. Tymoshenko.

Mr. Yushchenko appointed a new prime minister, Yury I. Yekhanurov, and has since rallied political parties, including some that he opposed only a year ago, to form a sort of unity cabinet. He also created a commission to investigate corruption in his inner circle, but gave it only 10 days - until next week - to say whether the charges warrant further investigation. He has already suggested publicly that they will not.

The allegations, however, may prove difficult to sweep aside. Reports of bribery and corruption have swirled around Mr. Yushchenko's circle from the time of his inauguration in January. His son came under scrutiny this summer for receiving gifts and favors.

"Corruption is in the air," Ms. Tymoshenko, who was one of the most impassioned and popular leaders of last year's protests, said in an interview, citing complaints of businessmen forced to pay bribes to members of Mr. Yushchenko's administration. "This is the air we had to breathe."

A senior Western diplomat said he gave credence to reports that Mr. Yushchenko's aides had solicited payment for access to the president, for appointments to government positions, to influence court cases and to win control over state enterprises. He said a government official had told him of personally being asked for a bribe by one of Mr. Yushchenko's senior aides, whom he would not name.

"I think he is vulnerable, because of his loyalty, to the bad behavior of those around him," the diplomat said of Mr. Yushchenko, speaking on condition of anonymity because of diplomatic protocol.

DOJ_NMG_0005873

Even an informal adviser to Mr. Yushchenko, Oleksandr Y. Pakhavyov, said corruption was endemic in Ukraine, and the shadowy intersection of business and state made it unrealistic to expect a swift change.

He cited an effort by Ms. Tymoshenko to crack down on the smuggling of meat through customs. The contraband, he said, accounted for nearly a fifth of all meat purchased in Ukraine. After Ms. Tymoshenko's government tightened controls, prices soared, sparking one of the economic crises that have eroded Mr. Yushchenko's popularity.

Viktor M. Pinchuk, one of the country's wealthiest men and the son-in-law of Mr. Kuchma, said it was not government policy but commercial interest - Ms. Tymoshenko's - that was driving the legal challenge to Nikopol Ferroalloy Plant. He acquired a controlling share in 2003 in a tender since criticized as rigged.

He said Ms. Tymoshenko had intervened on behalf of a minority shareholder who had close ties to her. Ms. Tymoshenko denied that, saying she was acting to seize the shares owed the state.

The dispute over Severodonetsk Azot, Ukraine's third largest chemical plant, boiled over even as Mr. Yushchenko's coalition imploded.

Worldwide Chemical, a subsidiary of New York-based IBE Trade, agreed to invest $180 million in a new company with Mr. Kuchma's government in exchange for 60 percent of its shares.

James William Grant, Worldwide Chemical's vice president, said that within months the new investors, including Americans and Russians, had increased production, raised salaries and paid off the debts that had forced the former state enterprise into bankruptcy.

But a lawsuit filed in March in a district court in Kiev - not in Lugansk, where the factory is located - challenged that deal, and the court agreed. Neither the state nor the new company had the chance to mount a defense, according to Ms. Semeniuk of the property fund.

The government's role in the dispute is far from clear. In letters to American congressmen who voiced concerns, Ms. Semeniuk and Mr. Yushchenko promised that the matter would be resolved in court.

Yet, despite Mr. Yushchenko's pledges, the minister of industrial policy, Valery N. Shandra, signed an order late last month returning control of the plant to what was left of the state enterprise, and one of his deputies was there when the plant was seized. Mr. Shandra, who was dismissed with the rest of the government, could not be reached for comment but his deputy, Viktor N. Baranchuk, said the ministry had to carry out the court's order, even though it was on appeal. "We are being made scapegoats," he said.

The men in camouflage - Mr. Grant said it was never clear who they were or whether they were armed - occupied the plant's headquarters for four days, as workers and company executives protested outside. On Sept. 6, Mr. Yushchenko intervened, even as he held frantic negotiations to salvage his government, ordering that the factory be returned to Worldwide Chemical until the matter was resolved in court.

Referring to this case, as well to Nikopol and others, Mr. Yushchenko said intrigues in his circle reflected a "a very complicated metastasis in the society and in the authorities."

Mr. Grant, a former congressman from Florida, said the company remained concerned about the fate of its investment in what had promised to be a new Ukraine.

"We expected better," he said.

Remember Daniel Ortega? He's Back. (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, September 15, 2005

EL JICARAL, NICARAGUA - Little seems to have changed in this small rural village in the past two decades: women are down by the river doing their washing, cattle are roaming among the cacti, cowboys are drinking beer at the canteen, and Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega is in the town square, holding forth on the evils of capitalism and the United States.

"The US no longer rules Latin America!" Mr. Ortega thunders into the dark night. "The Yankees no longer rule Nicaragua!" The small crowd of farmers hoist their black and red Sandinista flags high and chant: "Daniel, Daniel!"

Fifteen years after unexpectedly being voted out of power, and with two unsuccessful runs for the presidency since, the iconic head of the Marxist Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) is back on the campaign trail. Ortega, a name many US officials had hoped to consign to the history books, has a fighting chance of returning to power.

Just staying in the running has looked doubtful for Ortega at times. His credibility has taken a beating since he signed a self-serving pact in 1999 with political rival and former President Arnoldo Aleman, now serving a 20-year sentence for embezzlement; his grown-up stepdaughter accused him in 1998 of abusing and raping her for years; and his former comrade-in-arms Herty Lewites is now running against him, mounting the first serious challenge to his leadership from within the Sandinista ranks.

But despite it all, Ortega says he is confident the November 2006 elections will put him back in the presidential palace. Even his critics say divisions within the ruling party, coupled with Ortega's grip on the electoral machine, make his resurrection possible. "Conditions are ripe for triumph," says Ortega in a late-night interview in Managua. "We will win, and we will wield great power here."

Washington, which backed the contra rebels in a civil war against Ortega's government of the 1980s until he lost the 1990 election, is none too pleased with the prospect. After toppling the Somoza family dictatorship in 1979, Ortega's Soviet-backed Sandinistas sparked widespread US intervention in Central America to counter what Washington saw as a communist threat in the region.

Roger Noriega, the Bush administration's outgoing top envoy to Latin America (who has called Ortega a "hoodlum"), told the Managua newspaper La Prensa last month that if the Sandinistas returned to power, Nicaragua would "sink like a stone and reach depths such as those of Cuba."

Ortega's democratic credentials "are very doubtful," sniffed US Ambassador Paul Trivelli, taking up his new post in the country this week.

"The triumph of the Sandinistas will raise the morale of Latin America," says Ortega, tapping into the Bush administration's worst fears of a growing left-leaning, populist, anti-American movement on the continent, led by Cuba's Fidel Castro and Venezuela's Hugo Chávez. "Other countries will say - 'look, that small country got away with it - so can we!' We will spread the revolution." There is an alternative, he whispers, his voice hoarse from weeks of rallies, "to succumbing to the American Empire."

US interference could backfire

Carlos Fernando Chamorro, a former editor of the Sandinista newspaper Barricada, says too much US interference in the lead up to the election could actually help Ortega. The problem with Washington, he argues, is that they are stuck in the past. "The new right running Latin America policy are all leftovers from the '80s, who still behave like we are in the middle of the cold war," he says. "Every time Washington attacks Ortega, his supporters close ranks."

Otto Reich, a chief architect of President Ronald Reagan's policy against the Sandinistas and today a private consultant, shoots back: "Ortega is a communist, or whatever he calls himself," says Mr. Reich, in a phone interview from Washington. "If he wins, there will be no foreign investment and no US aid." Washington might see the world through '80s glasses, he concedes, but Ortega "...is stuck in the '60s and is acting like a Bolshevik."

Talking to Ortega, or hearing him on the campaign trail, is indeed more history lesson than interview, more nostalgia for the past than concrete plans for the future.

"[President] Bush is the Reagan of these times," Ortega tells a crowd gathered in the scorching sun of Santa Rosa del Pinon, a village in the mountains north of Leon - and immediately segues into tales of days gone by. "Yankee Reagan forbade peace," he rails. "He wanted to bring death and destruction to the region."

Adults cheer, children step forth to receive free FSLN bandannas, and old rebel anthems blare from the loudspeakers. Ortega's wife, revolutionary poet Rosario Murillo, thrusts her thin arms into the air, her bejeweled fingers clenched together in a tight fist.

Everywhere Ortega goes, people circle around him, hugging, kissing - and handing him handwritten notes. Most begin in the same way: "Please, Commandante ..." A young girl in El Jicaral has no school books. An old lady in Masaya needs arthritis medicine. A mother of five in Santa Rosa del Pinon wants shoes for her children - and a new house.

The notes get passed along to a burly man with a gold watch and thick mustache named Chico Lopez, or to Julio Paladino. Mr. Lopez is Ortega's financial officer in charge of "disbursements," Mr. Paladino, a handsome man with a big black bag, is the Sandinista leader's doctor, in charge of prescriptions. Some requests are handled on the spot - 300 cordoba ($17) for clothes here, 200 ($11) for medicine there. Larger requests - for scholarships, say, or operations - are dealt with later, back at headquarters in Managua.

Nicaragua remains one of the poorest countries in an impoverished region. The money disbursed, says Lopez, is all from donations. "We are the only ones who consistently help the people," says Paladino as he checks someone's distended stomach behind the stage. "This is what Daniel is about and that is why he is loved."

And yet for all these pronouncements, and US anxiety, analysts here say Ortega's political future is far from assured.

A poll done this month by B&A, a regional company based in Costa Rica, shows Ortega, with 20 percent of the vote, lagging behind both Eduardo Montealgre, a right-center candidate with 23 percent of the vote, and Mr. Lewites, with 35 percent.

Lewites, the former mayor of Managua, was expelled from the Sandinista Party when he announced his intention to run for president. Ortega canceled his challenger's permits to hold political rallies, forbade him to use Sandinista Party symbols, and accused him of corruption.

New regional mood of 'lite left'

Central America, unlike South America, is actually moving away from left-wing anti-Americanism, says Victor Borge, director of B&A. Upcoming elections in El Salvador, Costa Rica, and Honduras are all expected to be won by moderates, he says. "If Ortega manages to come to power in 2006," he adds, "...it would indeed symbolically be a big deal and might motivate other leftists. But that does not seem in tune with the mood in the region."

Lewites calls the new mood "lite left," and it is one he subscribes to. Lewites says he does not share Ortega's singleminded obsession with the US - but neither is he running to Washington for validation. "I think we should maintain good relations with the US. We need each other," he says. "I will be respectful, but firm."

If elections are fairly run, says Lewites, he is confident of victory. But will they be fair? "Of course not," he responds. Thanks to his pact with [former president] Aleman, Ortega all but controls the parliament, the supreme court, and the electoral commission, he adds.

Ortega, too, says is worried about cheating in the elections - but a different kind. "Elections in Nicaragua are not normal elections - they are a confrontation between the US and the Sandinista front," he says, concluding the interview and heading into a midnight meeting. "The US will do anything to decimate us," he says. "But we are here." Ortega's Political Path

1961: Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) founded.

1979: President Anastasio Somoza Debayle overthrown.

1980: FSLN government led by Daniel Ortega nationalizes lands held by the Somoza family.

1982: US-sponsored attacks by Honduras-based contra rebels begin; state of emergency declared.

1984: Mr. Ortega elected president in elections boycotted by opposition.

1987-88: FLSN signs cease-fire pact. Later, holds talks with contra rebels.

1990: US-backed center-right National Opposition Union defeats FSLN in elections; Violeta Chamorro becomes president.

1996: Ortega loses presidential bid.

2001: Liberal party candidate Enrique Bolaños beats Ortega for president.

2002: Opposition Sandinista Party re-elects Ortega as its leader despite his three consecutive defeats since 1990.

2005, September: After pressure from neighboring countries, the US, and the Organization of American States (OAS) to avert a political crisis in Nicaragua, Ortega tells Sandinista lawmakers to drop efforts to have President Bolaños impeached.

Revolutionary China, Complacent America (WSJ)

By Charlene Barshefsky And Edward Gresser

The Wall Street Journal, September 15, 2005

Are Americans missing a revolution? Across the Pacific, China's emergence is reshaping not only trade, but also world finances, global manufacturing and the entire East Asian economy. This should naturally give rise to searching debate. But the debate we are actually having is limited to a series of complaints about currency rates, intellectual property piracy and Chinese investment intentions in the U.S. It is more a to-do list than an assessment of structural global change and what it means for America. Some of the complaints are valid. But to focus on complaints alone -- even serious ones -- is to risk mistaking the foothills for the Himalayas behind.

China is opening to the world, merging its low costs and vast manpower reserves with the financial and technological strengths of its wealthier neighbors. In the process, it is rapidly creating an informal "Asian Union" -- a deeply integrated Asian economy with a GDP equal to America's, a population six times as large, the technological and financial strengths of an advanced economy and the cost advantages of a developing one. This powerful competitive challenge cannot be met by protectionist legislation, penalty tariffs or bans on Chinese investment. Instead, America needs a strategic response that rethinks our own consumption and debt-led growth, addresses our competitive weaknesses and reshapes our approach to Asian trade and global financial institutions.

No country leads the world by divine right. China itself provides a sobering lesson. According to the economic historian Angus Maddison, the emperors of the Qing dynasty ruled almost a third of the world's population and oversaw a third of world GDP. They looked back on a history of innovation, spanning the inventions of paper money, explosives, the printed book and the professional civil service. They considered their status natural and eternal. When Europe's diplomats and merchants began to arrive in the 1790s, the emperors thought them insignificant. It was a devastating mistake. Employing superior technology and military tactics, Europe came to rule Asia in just a few decades. China's leaders were discredited and its vassal states fell away. The ensuing period of demoralization and upheaval lasted almost two centuries.

America faces no such grim future: What we do face, however, is a substantial challenge. We have been the leading economy for a century. But other countries of similar size and potential can catch up -- if they try, and we remain content with past glories. China's economy has tripled in size since 1980 and continues to grow at 9% per year: it could equal ours by 2020. China is also climbing the tech ladder, investing in ports, coastal-road systems, telecom networks, research centers and universities. It draws $50 billion a year in foreign direct investment, and topped $60 billion in 2004. It is already getting results, first shifting from exports of light, labor-intensive manufactured goods to heavy industry and technology, and now to a new role as financier and outward investor. This is happening because China is getting some big things right; its neighbors are contributing to and benefiting from its success; and we are not keeping up. Consider three trends.

Asia is pooling its strengths. Despite America's outsourcing debate, investment in China is predominantly an Asian phenomenon. Three-quarters of China's $60 billion in FDI last year came from Hong Kong, Taiwan, Japan, Korea and Southeast Asia. In 2003, China's Commerce Ministry calculated that Asian investment puts up about 20,000 "manufacturing facilities" a year. These facilities mesh China's low costs and skilled workers with the technology and capital of its wealthier neighbors, strengthening all of Asia. China now intends to extend these relationships through formal preferential trade agreements with Asean, India, Pakistan, Australia and perhaps Japan. America's response to date is limited to a free trade agreement with Singapore and perhaps a later accord with Thailand. Our role in the Pacific risks erosion.

Asia's human capital is improving. The Chinese government builds about 200 new research centers a year. Since the '80s, Chinese college enrollment has quadrupled to 20 million. And students are taking the hard subjects. The Computer Systems Policy Project notes that Chinese universities now produce 200,000 engineers a year. Japanese schools produce 100,000, and smaller economies like Taiwan, Korea, Hong Kong and Singapore are much the same. America, meanwhile, has fewer native-born technology graduates than we did 20 years ago. Only 60,000 new American engineers graduate each spring. Concurrently, new visa restrictions have impaired our ability to compensate by discouraging skilled workers, scientists and aspiring students to emigrate to the U.S. Since Sept. 11, our pool of foreign graduate-study applicants has shrunk by 30%.

Asia is saving money. Chinese families save as much as 40% of GDP. Savings rates in Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong and Japan are also exceptionally high. Meanwhile, we are borrowing. Our savings have fallen to between 1% and 2% of GDP since 2001, a level last seen in 1934. Our economic growth rests on a consumption and shopping boom, financed by China, Korea and Japan, which has pushed up current account deficits and overseas liabilities. Public opinion polls show Americans anxious despite two years of strong growth -- and rightly so.

Asia has weaknesses too, of course. Great-power relationships among China, Russia, Japan and India are uneasy. Asia's population is aging faster than ours. China in particular faces weak finances, environmental stress, severe income inequality, widespread poverty and an uncertain rule of law. And the U.S. maintains many strengths, from a robust political system to superior universities, from sophisticated environmental and intellectual property policies to special advantages in medicine and the life sciences. But if we do not recognize our weaknesses, our strengths may not be enough. * * *

How should we respond? The U.S. must develop an integrated policy to address this emerging challenge in all its aspects. Perhaps we can identify four priorities. · First, we must reduce the risk of global trade and financial imbalances. America saves and exports too little and consumes too much on credit; Asia saves too much and overinvests in real estate and export industries. This pattern poses risks for both sides. Because our current-account deficit is above 6% of GDP and we are dependent on foreign capital to finance growth, we risk financial shock and face rising long-term liabilities. Asia, for its part, is building up stocks of dollars whose value is likely to fall and relies on the mood of U.S. consumers for growth. Since responsibility for the imbalances is shared, we must together reduce them. This necessitates further currency appreciation in China, deficit reduction and personal savings incentives in the U.S., and sustained liberalization in Japan and Korea.

· Second, America needs to raise its game at home to remain the world's technological leader. To this end, our tax policy needs sharpened focus on encouraging innovation. Public investment must be reshaped to improve high-tech and traditional infrastructure. Both the government and the private sector should increase investment in research, particularly in the physical and information sciences. Federal spending on basic science (excluding life sciences) has been stagnant in real terms for three decades, and since the '70s has dropped by 37% relative to GDP. The government must also contribute to a renewal of human talent by rethinking visa policy. Waiting periods for foreign students applying to graduate schools should be cut and work-visa constraints for scientists and engineers should be eased. America also needs to create a larger network of elementary and secondary schools focused on science and technology.

· Third, America's central place in the Pacific economy must be maintained. The FTA with Singapore and the partially negotiated one with Thailand are a start, but scale matters. Regardless of the outcome of the WTO's Doha Round, ambitious agreements should be negotiated with the major Asean countries, South Korea and Japan. In addition, strengthened economic ties with India should further ensure a robust U.S. economic presence in Asia.

· Finally, American needs to restructure its economic relationship with China, and China needs to reshape its own engagement with the world. For the U.S., episodic attention to the specific issues highlighted by Congressional debates is not enough. Complaints about specific Chinese trade policies should be met through bilateral negotiations, the WTO and U.S. trade laws. Together with this must come a broad and intensified engagement with China and Asia more generally, predicated on China's own growth, its central role in Asian integration and Asia's larger role in the world economy. This requires not only rethinking American policy, but fundamental reform of global economic institutions, in particular the G-8, the IMF and APEC. As the world's second-largest economy, third-largest exporter, largest destination for FDI and second-largest holder of foreign currency reserves, China should be a G-8 member, not an occasionally invited guest. Korea has an economy easily comparable to Canada or Italy, and should also be a member. The IMF quota allocation is similarly undersized. China's share of contribution to IMF resources is 3%, a rate equal to Canada's and not far above Belgium's. This is far below the level of responsibility China should accept in the global financial system. APEC, too, needs a new mission, one that reignites its early vision of "free and open" trade in the Pacific and addresses four major long-term issues of common concern: energy, climate change, aging and Pacific finance.

Before all this, however, comes a first step. That is recognition by the administration, Congress, businesses and the public that we face a powerful competitive challenge, one that cannot be attributed to undervalued currencies or unfair trade. The plain fact is that our competition has gotten tougher, and we need to match it. Two hundred years ago the Chinese emperors failed. America must act now to succeed.

Ms. Barshefsky, U.S. Trade Representative from 1997 to 2001, is a lawyer in Washington. Mr. Gresser, director of trade and global markets at the Progressive Policy Institute, was policy advisor at the Office of the USTR from 1998 to 2001.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Massive Anthrax Investigation Yet To Yield Results As Trail Grows Cold. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (9/16, Lengel) reports, "Four years after the deadly 2001 anthrax attacks, one of the most exhaustive investigations in FBI history has yielded no arrests and is showing signs of growing cold as officials have sharply reduced the number of agents on the case. FBI agents and postal inspectors have pursued leads on four continents, conducted more than 8,000 interviews and carried out dozens of searches of houses, laboratories and other locations." The Post adds, "FBI officials said yesterday that investigators are still working diligently to find whoever was responsible" and "said they are getting assistance from forensics experts and scientific researchers from law enforcement agencies, the intelligence community, university laboratories and private corporations."

Weldon Claims Pentagon Employee Was Ordered To Destroy Able Danger Documents. The AP (9/16, de la Cruz) reports US Rep. Curt Weldon on Thursday said that "a Pentagon employee was ordered to destroy documents that identified Mohamed Atta as a terrorist two years before the 2001 attacks." Weldon added that "the employee is prepared to testify next week before the Senate Judiciary Committee and was expected to name the person who ordered him to destroy the large volume of documents," which "Weldon described…as '2.5 terabytes' — as much as one-fourth of all the printed materials in the Library of Congress. A Senate Judiciary Committee aide said the witnesses for Wednesday hearing had not been finalized and could not confirm Weldon's comments."

Moroccan-Born Dane Denies Promoting Terrorism. The AP (9/16, Olsen) reports, "A Moroccan-born Danish citizen arrested on suspicion of promoting terrorism denied the allegations in (a Copenhagen, Denmark) court Thursday." The AP continues, "Said Mansour was arrested Sept. 8 in Copenhagen on suspicion of encouraging terrorism by calling for a Jihad, or holy war, against the West in scores of CDs, computer discs and video tapes found in his home. … In his challenge to a court order allowing police to hold him for four weeks, Mansour told the Eastern High Court that he was not a terrorist and that the material was for his personal use. The court is expected to rule Friday. … 'I have lived in this country for 23 years and I have always lived in peace,' Mansour told the court. 'I can assure you, I am no terrorist and I have nothing to do with terrorism.'" The AP adds, "In three raids on his home since November, police have seized some 3,000 CD-ROMs and roughly 500 computer disks, most containing calls for a jihad. Police also seized 161 CD-ROMs when Mansour was allegedly selling at a Copenhagen flea market in June, and 14 computer disks found in his car during a Danish-German border check in March."

Judge Denies Bail For Egyptian Student Caught With Airline Materials. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (9/16, Conley) reports, "When FBI agents walked into Mahmoud Maawad's spartan apartment…they found a desk, chair, computer and a Koran. They also found an airline pilot's uniform, a chart of Memphis International Airport, and instructional DVDs, including one called 'How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act.' A federal magistrate Thursday ordered Maawad, a 29-year-old University of Memphis student from Egypt, jailed until his trial on charges of wire fraud and fraudulent use of a Social Security number. 'The specific facts and circumstances are scary,' Asst. U.S. Atty. Steve Parker said," adding, "'we don't know either way' if Maawad is a terrorist or connected to any terror groups." The Commercial Appeal adds, "Maawad has been in the country illegally since 1999, and has used a false Social Security number to enroll in schools and open a bank account, Parker said."

Guantanamo Hunger Strike Spreads. The AP (9/16, Jacobs) reports, "A hunger strike at the U.S. prison for terror suspects in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to its largest point since detainees began their latest protest more than a month ago, a military official said Thursday." The AP continues, "After 11 detainees joined the protest overnight, there are now 131 taking part in the hunger strike, said Maj. Jeff Weir, a spokesman for the detention center. … Twenty-one of the striking prisoners were hospitalized in stable condition at the prison medical clinic, including 20 who were being tube-fed, Weir said." The AP adds, "The military considers a hunger strike to be a form of suicide and Weir said that one prisoner was restrained after he resisted having a feeding tube inserted. … 'No facility in the U.S., and hopefully the world, is going to let someone starve to death,' Weir said. 'We're charged with keeping them in good health, and that's what we're doing.'" The AP notes, "Guantanamo officials said this latest hunger strike began Aug. 8 with 76 detainees protesting their confinement. It has since grown to more than a quarter of the approximately 500 detainees. … The military defines someone as being on a hunger strike after they have refused nine consecutive meals. There have been at least two previous hunger strikes, but military officials said they were not able to confirm whether this was the largest."

PATRIOT ACT:

Nebraska US Attorney Says Patriot Act No Threat To Average Citizen. KNEB-AM 960, Scottsbluff, NE (9/16) reports, "U.S. Attorney Mike Heavican told Scottsbluff Kiwanians Thursday the average citizen should not fear the expanded power authorities have under the Patriot Act. Heavican, who spoke on the issue in Sidney Wednesday and will be in Chadron Friday, says the only people who should be concerned about the legislation should be those involved in terrorist activity." KNEB-AM continues, "Heavican says authorities have always had access to library, bank and medical records for cases involving criminal investigations. Heavican says with the Patriot Act, those powers now expand to cases involving international terrorism. Heavican told the group searches into personal records can only be done if probable cause is established and if the judicial system agrees it is justified." KNEB-AM adds, "Heavican says the feds have tried to use their new authority, which includes delayed notice search warrants, sparingly and only under circumstances where somebody's life is in danger, the suspect is a flight risk, or if the investigation would be compromised."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Romney Reiterates Call For Increased Domestic Surveillance Of Terror Suspects. On Fox News' The Big Story With John Gibson (9/15), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney discussed his call for increased surveillance of mosques and international students in the US. Romney said, "I'm sure the FBI infiltrates organizations they're concerned about. If they have probable cause, they're able to do wiretapping. … What we need to do is more of that and have more resources devoted to the FBI in their effort to do intelligence work and counterintelligence work. We don't need different tools. We need to use the tools we have got under the Patriot Act and under our current laws to assure that we really are following groups that are preaching terror…that we have the resources necessary to prevent the bombs from going off, rather than just the resources to clean up afterwards."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/15, Cafferty) reported "the Republican governor, who's considering a run for the White House in 2008, said that, when it comes to homeland security, the U.S. needs to shift its focus from response to prevention. Civil rights groups are aghast at this idea, saying his ideas are misguided and ineffective. The ACLU points out, the government already collects data on foreign students."

FBI Investigating Disappearance Of Plague-Infected Mice. ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 5, 1:55, Woodruff) reported that in New Jersey, FBI "agents have been swarming over a bioterrorism research lab for the past two weeks after three mice infected with bubonic plague went missing. They are less worried about the public health risk than how the mice could have disappeared from a high security lab." ABC (Thomas) added that the bureau is "so concerned, it sent more than a dozen agents, including experts in bioterrorism, to interview and polygraph employees." Public health officials "believe the mice probably died very quickly and pose a low risk. So far, no evidence of foul play has been discovered. Still, the incident raises troubling questions about the security at more than 300 similar labs across the country, many of them without adequate surveillance camera coverage."

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon Touts Success In Destroying Al Qaeda In Iraq As Violence Mounts. In Iraq, four suicide bombers again struck in Baghdad, killing 31 and bringing the two-day death toll to 200, as al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi sought to inflame the ethnic and religious divisions between Sunni and Shiite Arabs. However, the US military is confident its recent operations targeting Al Qaeda in Iraq have been successful despite the recent violence.

The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 6, 2:00, Martin) reported it was "gruesome evidence of Abu Musab Al-Zarqawi's declaration of all-out war against the Shiites who control the government of Iraq. Zarqawi's Website claims the carnage in Baghdad is revenge for an assault by US and Iraqi troops on the town of Tal Afar near the Syrian border, a hub for insurgent operations in northern Iraq, where the US military says it has scored dramatic successes." Col. Robert Brown, commander, 25th Infantry Division: "One of the great pieces of information we got recently is 80% of the al Qaeda network in the north has been devastated." Martin: "Col. Robert Brown says the six top leaders in the city of Mosul have all been killed or captured, including this man, Abu Zaid, who was carrying a letter to Zarqawi complaining about everything from the incompetence of local insurgency leaders to the poor training of the foreign fighters being sent into the country. But US troops have cleared out other cities before, only to withdraw and have the insurgents return, facing little or no opposition from Iraqi security forces."

ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 7, :15, Woodruff) and NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 6, 0:15, Williams) also briefly reported the story. The New York Times/AP (9/16) notes, "The latest violence only deepened the misery in Baghdad, where streets on Thursday were noticeably quieter and, in the southern Dora district, where the latest bombings were concentrated, deserted." US and Iraqi soldiers "using loudspeakers roamed the district, warning residents to stay indoors because five more suicide car bombers were believed to be in the area."

Joint US-Iraqi Forces To Continue Strikes Against Insurgents Along Syrian Border. The New York Times/AP (9/16) reports Lynch said that after the Tal Afar operation, US and Iraqi forces "were fighting to regain control of the Syrian border, near the western insurgent stronghold of Qaim, on the Euphrates River and well to the south of Tal Afar. 'We believe that the terrorists and foreign fighters are entering Iraq across the Syrian border, down the Euphrates River Valley into Baghdad,' General Lynch said."

US Military Says Zarqawi "On The Ropes." The Washington Post (9/16, A27, Knickmeyer) reports, "The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said the surge in bombings represented the kind of occasional spikes in attacks that the military has been expecting. Lynch told reporters, 'Zarqawi is on the ropes.'" Lynch said, "We believe we are experiencing great success against the most crucial element of the insurgency, which is the terrorists and the foreign fighters. The face of that is Zarqawi and al Qaeda in Iraq. … We've got great intelligence which tells us where he's moving to and where he's trying to establish safe havens. As soon as we see him trying to establish a safe haven, we will conduct operations. … We're using all assets under our control in conjunction with the Iraqi security forces to find him and kill him."

Zarqawi Said To Be Drawing Increasing Support From Iraqi Nationals. In contrast to the US military's public comments, the Los Angeles Times (9/16, Miller, Marshall) reports some US officials believe Al Qaeda leader Abu Musab Zarqawi's success is increasingly attracting Iraqi nationals to his cause. The three US officials' "comments reflect the government's latest attempt to come to grips with a multi-layered insurgency that has often confounded U.S. forces and intelligence agencies." They "indicated that the infusion of Iraqis, including, apparently, former members of the Iraqi intelligence service and military, represented a change in the group's makeup rather than a major expansion." The increasing presence of Iraqis "carries ominous implications, both for the Bush administration and the fledgling, popularly elected government it supports in Baghdad."

US Definition Of Victory In Iraq Has Evolved. The Christian Science Monitor (9/16, Sappenfield) reports, "Since the day in May 2003 when President Bush stood beneath a banner proclaiming 'Mission Accomplished,' the course of the conflict in Iraq has been one of optimism followed by revision." Despite earlier expectations that US troops would be able to stabilize Iraq and leave relatively quickly, the "increasingly bracing tone from the White House and Pentagon, however, points to a new calculus. The persistence of the attacks, as well as their undiminished capacity…seems to have confirmed that the insurgency will probably outlast the American occupation." The Monitor notes, "Indeed, the inability of American forces to defeat the insurgency through strikes such as the current offensive in Tal Afar raises doubts about the possibility of any clear victory for the administration. And it could leave the Iraqis with a years-long task that many planners had not anticipated."

Talabani Confident Iraqis Can Avoid Civil War. Daniel Henninger in his column in the Wall Street Journal (9/16) recounts the details of an interview with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani who stresses that most of Iraq is stable and secure. The Kurdish Talabani considers himself, Shiite cleric Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Ahmed Chalabi as leaders working to prevent a civil war. Talabani believes that "while the Sunnis are starting to understand where their best interests lie, they lack a political center just now. The Kurds and Shiites, Mr. Talabani explains, are relatively cohesive as political entities, but the Sunnis are divided into small, often tribal groups: 'Saddam didn't permit any kind of Sunni leadership to emerge.' Right now, he said, the Sunnis need assurance that the government can protect them, as in the current joint U.S.-Iraqi offensive against the insurgents in Tal Afar." Talabani believes the new strategy of leaving Iraqi forces to secure troubled areas will succeed.

UN To Distribute Five Million Copies Of Iraqi Draft Constitution. The New York Times/AP (9/16) notes that "the United Nations planned to print and distribute five million copies of Iraq's draft constitution before the Oct. 15 referendum, a spokesman said Thursday." Spokesman Farhan Haq "said officials hoped the Iraqi Parliament would sign off on the text by Sunday."

Saddam To Face Broader Charges. The Washington Post (9/16, A27, Knickmeyer) in an article on the latest violence in Iraq also notes that one "Western official familiar with arrangements for Saddam Hussein's trial by an Iraqi tribunal, scheduled for Oct. 19, said he expected the former president to be tried in connection with a variety of crimes, including the destruction of thousands of Kurdish villages and the disappearance and killing of their inhabitants in the 1980s. Authorities so far have announced charges in only one, smaller event, the killing of 140 Shiite Muslims after an assassination attempt against Hussein in their town."

Records Detail US Abuse Of Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Serrano) reports, "Army officers in Iraq told their superiors last year that soldiers often lacked the training to handle detainees, did not always understand what constituted abuse and sometimes used techniques against prisoners that they 'remembered from movies,' according to new military records made public Thursday." In 2004, Army IG Lt. Gen. Paul T. Mikolashek "concluded that there were no systemic failures or widespread patterns of detainee abuse," yet "according to documents generated for his report…Mikolashek was told of many incidents in which poor training and inadequate facilities created an atmosphere that fostered abuse." ACLU executive director Anthony Romero "said the new documents suggested Mikolashek brushed aside evidence that there had been abuse and significant training problems."

Female Candidate In Afghan Election Attacked. Afghani election candidate Hawa Alam Nuristani was shot in the hip by attackers who also kidnapped two of her supporters. The New York Times (9/16, Gall) reports Nuristani "was treated by American troops in the region and then evacuated to Bagram Air Base, near Kabul, where she was in stable condition." Local leaders "were gathering to try to secure the release of the kidnapped men, General Baqi said. Early reports indicated that the attackers were not Taliban fighters or other antigovernment insurgents but rival candidates, he said."

Afghans Unfazed By Pre-Election Violence, Threats. The New York Times (9/16, Sengupta) reports, "Nearly four years after the Taliban government was routed from Afghanistan by American-led forces, a newly emboldened insurgency has stepped up a campaign of threats and thuggery on the eve of the country's parliamentary and provincial elections, particularly here in the badlands of the country's south. Elsewhere, the presence of former warlords on the ballot has led to charges of voter intimidation." Yet, "what is just as remarkable is the degree to which so many ordinary Afghans seem unfazed by the threats and violence, and, on occasion, are openly defiant.

Afghans Expected To Create Coalition Government. The Christian Science Monitor (9/16, Baldauf) reports that according to Afghani candidates and foreign observers the problem with the Afghan elections "is the way in which Afghanistan's parliament was created in the country's new constitution. Voters choose candidates as individuals, not as members of a party. This creates an environment where personalities are more important than ideas, coalitions struggle to stick to common agendas, and individual MPs are more easily manipulated by the palace." But, "already there are signs that some candidates are forming three main coalitions. One, led by Northern Alliance politician Younus Qanooni, will act as a sort of permanent opposition to President Karzai, and will attempt to change the system of government to give parliament more power, including a prime minister. A second faction will be a cross section of independents from around Afghanistan, who side with Karzai on most issues. A third faction of liberal and leftist parties will swing back and forth between the opposition and Karzai, supporting the president on common issues, but voting against him on others."

Election Officials Worried About Warlords, Taliban On Ballot. USA Today (9/16, Wiseman) reports, "The presence of warlords and ex-Taliban officials on the ballot when Afghans vote Sunday is raising fears that figures from the past will sabotage efforts to build a stable democracy." Sam Zarifi of Human Rights Watch said, "The Afghan people need a government that is functional and accountable. … The warlords offer neither." But former Taliban administrator Mawlavi Qalumuddin "says it would be dangerous to ban warlords from the democratic process; isolated, they might turn to violence."

WPost Praises US Decision To Foster Democracy In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (9/16, A30) editorializes, "It's easy for Westerners, and even Afghans, to lose sight of how much progress" the Afghan election represents. There has been much criticism in the West of the Afghan political progress, but although "many of these critiques are legitimate, it's worth noting the tenaciousness with which many liberal Westerners have opposed every step by Afghanistan toward freedom. Four years ago…former European Union commissioner Emma Bonino was one of those who condemned the U.S. intervention against the Taliban, which she said would 'all but doom' millions of Afghans 'to death.' Now, incredibly, she leads the E.U.'s observer mission at the elections" and remains pessimistic. The Afghan "political life isn't entirely 'healthy.' But as the world will shortly see, it is immeasurably better off than it was four years ago -- and than it would have been had the United States hesitated to act."

Observers Concerned International Community Will Abandon Afghanistan. Joanna Nathan, a senior analyst in Kabul for the International Crisis Group, and Mark Schneider, the ICG's senior vice president, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (9/16) warn about the danger of allowing warlords and former Taliban who are running for election "and now seeking the mantle of a democratic mandate." Nathan and Schneider state, "It is absolutely imperative that these elections are viewed as the beginnings of democratization, not the end." Past "lessons about the consequences of abandoning Afghanistan should be fresh in everyone's mind. … If Afghanistan is allowed to slip back into being a failed state because the international community turns away after elections, that sense of discontent will be the country's major export."

DOJ:

New Detroit US Attorney Sworn In. The Detroit News (9/16, Shepardson) reports, "If nothing else, the U.S. attorney is a man who can cry. …Stephen J. Murphy III, a former assistant U.S. attorney and General Motors lawyer, repeatedly fought through tears after his formal swearing-in as the top law enforcement officer in eastern Michigan." The News continues, "A Who's Who of Michigan politicians lauded Murphy Thursday and ribbed him about his performance as an assistant U.S. attorney. … Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm and Murphy were among the 'young Turks' who served in the U.S. attorney's office in the 1990s, she noted." The News adds, "In 1992, Granholm recalled seeing Murphy fall asleep at his desk with his finger on the 'Z key.' … Granholm and a colleague responded by sending Murphy a phony memorandum sternly reprimanding him for falling asleep on the job." The News notes, "Unmentioned directly but referenced by several speakers was the continuing fallout from the botched 2003 Detroit terrorism case. … A federal judge threw out the convictions of two Arab immigrants arrested shortly after Sept. 11 after a Justice Department review found evidence of prosecutorial misconduct. … The case and a separate criminal investigation into the conduct of the former lead prosecutor are pending. … Bradford A. Berenson, a former White House counsel's office lawyer, noted that Murphy was taking over 'at a time when the office has been through some serious difficulties.' … Since taking office in March, Murphy has reshuffled the leadership in the office and issued a two-sentence mission statement. Murphy said his office 'is dedicated to doing the right thing.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Eight Former Marsh Brokers & Executives Indicted. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Mcdonald) reports, "Eight former Marsh Inc. insurance brokers and executives were indicted yesterday by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, on criminal-fraud charges including an alleged scheme to defraud and grand larceny." William Gilman, Joseph Peiser, Edward McNenney, Greg Doherty and Thomas Green "were indicted on charges including scheme to defraud in the first degree, and grand larceny in the first, second and third degrees." Kathleen Drake, William McBurnie and Edward Keane "were indicted on the same charges, but the grand-larceny charges are in the second degree."

Interpublic Accounting Problems Include Illegal Acts. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Steinberg, Vranica) reports that Interpublic Group, with a revelation that appeared to take its "long-running accounting problems to a new level," said "an internal investigation has turned up instances of 'misappropriation of assets' and 'falsified books and records' that violated laws, mainly occurring at operations outside the U.S.," although it says "it has fired or is in the process of firing 'culpable' employees." Still, a six-month investigation "confirmed that the company would have to restate its earnings going back to 2000 as a result of several accounting error," whose "impact on our results of operations for all periods will be material," and "past financial statements shouldn't be relied upon."

The New York Times (9/16, Elliot) adds that this is "the first time in those three years that Interpublic has said that not all the errors leading to its plight were necessarily honest ones." Interpublic "has been struggling with financial and operational difficulties for three years, mostly related to weak internal controls." Analysts who follow advertising stocks" had mixed reactions to Interpublic's news," with Credit Suisse First Boston saying in a report, "If management can execute, the risk-reward on IPG is highly favorable and this is a major turnaround story."

Growing Concern Over Hedge Funds, Credit Derivatives. The New York Times (9/16, Atlas) reports, "Yesterday, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York met with representatives of 14 banks, as well as regulators from the United States and overseas, to discuss cleaning up the processing of the contracts in the booming market for credit derivatives." As "the number and influence of hedge funds have ballooned," it has "prompted concerns that if a big bet goes wrong, regulators and banks will again be caught up in a collapse. High on the list of worries is the voracious appetite of hedge funds for arcane credit derivatives."

Long Sentences For White Collar Crime Questioned. The New York Times (9/16, Sorkin) reports, "While recent lengthy sentences for white-collar crimes have been hailed by some as desperately needed deterrents after a deluge of corporate scandals…a number of lawyers, including former prosecutors, are questioning whether such sentences are justified … No lawyer is suggesting that white-collar criminals not serve time. Rather, lawyers and jurists are asking what the appropriate sentence is for white-collar crimes relative to punishments for other crimes in a post-Enron world." Jonathan Simon, a professor of law at the University of California, Berkeley, said "he had doubts about whether an especially long sentence worked as a significantly greater deterrent to potential white-collar criminals than shorter terms."

Shareholder Suit Against ITT Dismissed. The Indianapolis Star (9/16, Wall) reports, "A federal judge in Indianapolis dismissed a shareholder lawsuit against ITT Educational Services Inc. Wednesday, saying the shareholders did not adequately demonstrate securities fraud." The Star continues, "U.S. District Court Judge David F. Hamilton gave the shareholders, who had been seeking class-action status, until Oct. 14 to file an amended complaint." The Star adds, "The lawsuit had accused ITT Educational, a Carmel-based for-profit educator, of inflating enrollment figures, falsifying grades, attendance and placement records, and shredding documents just before visits by government investigators. … But Hamilton found that none of the accusations were precise or strong enough under the Securities Exchange Act and the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, which govern shareholder lawsuits." The Star notes, "The dismissal comes less than three months after the U.S. Justice Department said its investigation of ITT Educational had found no evidence of wrongdoing by the company or its executives. The Justice Department shifted its focus to 'local issues' at individual ITT campuses."

Columnist Questions If Oracle Settlement Helps Shareholders. In his column in the New York Times (9/16), Floyd Norris reports, "Lawrence J. Ellison, the chief executive of Oracle, has settled a shareholder derivative suit, without admitting he did anything wrong, for a $100 million donation in Oracle's name to a charity chosen by Mr. Ellison." Oracle will pay $24 million to the plaintiffs' lawyers, so "the company owned by the shareholders will have that much less cash. Mr. Ellison will donate $100 million to charity." The lead plaintiffs' lawyer, Joseph J. Tabacco Jr., a partner in Berman DeValerio Pease Tabacco Burt & Pucillo, said that "Oracle would benefit because its chief executive would not be distracted by having to defend the suit, something one might think could have been arranged had the suit not been filed in the first place."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Urged House GOP To Block Forced Release Of Plame Documents. Reuters (9/15) reports, "The Justice Department and the special counsel investigating the leak of a CIA operative's identity pressed Congress to block legislation that would compel the administration to turn over documents related to the case, the department said in a letter released on Thursday." Reuters continues, "The Justice Department, in a letter dated September 14, said special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald had advised that producing documents and holding hearings would interfere with his investigation. The letter was sent to the House Intelligence Committee's Republican chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan." Reuters adds, "Congressional Democrats have so far failed in their attempts to pass legislation that would force President George W. Bush and the departments of state, justice and defense to provide Congress with documents relating to CIA operative Valerie Plame. … Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee on Thursday rejected the legislation on a party-line vote. Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee and International Relations Committee rejected similar resolutions on Wednesday. … Republican say Congress should await the outcome of Fitzgerald's investigation. … Democrats countered that Republicans were trying to protect Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove."

Senate Turns Aside Ban On Internet Gambling. Reuters (9/15) reports, "The U.S. Senate on Thursday turned aside an attempt to restrict Internet gambling in a procedural move, but Sen. Jon Kyl vowed he would try again and said he expected the legislation would become law eventually." Reuters continues, "The Arizona Republican tried to attach language restricting Internet gambling to an annual spending bill that must be passed this year, but an unnamed Democrat objected to attaching an unrelated matter to the spending measure under consideration." Reuters adds, "Kyl said his legislation would require banks and credit card companies to block payments to online Internet gambling sites. He said some firms were already voluntarily blocking money transfers. … Sen. Barbara Mikulski, a Maryland Democrat, said that a member of her party had objected to attaching Kyl's language to the spending bill but she was not sure who. Kyl urged the lawmaker to come forward so the concerns could be addressed. … The U.S. Justice Department has said the laws that prohibit interstate gambling apply to the Internet. But Americans have turned to offshore gambling Internet sites as an alternative."

Counterfeiter Convicted Of Chicago Federal Courthouse Bomb Plot. The AP (9/16) reports, "A counterfeiter who sat in prison dreaming of revenge against the judge who sent him there was convicted Thursday of planning to blow up Chicago's federal courthouse. Gale Nettles, 66, was also convicted of making a fresh batch of bogus $20 and $100 bills." The AP notes that after his release from prison, "Nettles went searching for ammonium nitrate," and "the FBI saw to it that he got urea, a substance that looks like ammonium nitrate but which would not have exploded if detonated in the way that Nettles planned. Nettles then went looking for a member of Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida terrorist network. What he found was an undercover FBI agent who was posing as a terrorist. Nettles sold a batch of the urea to the undercover agent, who made many of the recordings that were played for the jury."

The Chicago Tribune (9/16, Higgins) notes, "Nettles' defense attorney, John Theis, argued that the FBI entrapped Nettles by, among other things, having an undercover officer repeatedly offer to sell him the fertilizer. But Assistant U.S. Atty. Brandon Fox disputed that in his closing arguments Wednesday." Fox told jurors, "This was something he was going to do from the beginning. ... He was going to take down this building."

Missing Chicago Mob Figure Again Contacts Attorney By Mail. The AP (9/16, Robinson) reports, "Missing reputed mob figure Joseph 'Joey the Clown' Lombardo has written a new letter to his attorney disputing testimony from an FBI agent, the attorney said Thursday." Rick Halprin "said the letter was postmarked Chicago and dated Aug. 25. He said two Chicago newspaper clippings were in the envelope. … Halprin said the letter takes issue with testimony before the Illinois Gaming Board by John Mallul, the head of one of the FBI's Chicago-based organized crime squads. … Mallul testified that in May 1999, Lombardo and other mob figures and mob associates met with Donald Stephens, the mayor of the tiny suburb near O'Hare International Airport. … Halprin said Lombardo denies it in his letter."

WMAQ-TV Chicago (9/15, Marin) also reports about the letter on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday. WMAQ notes, "Lombardo has said he's willing to take truth serum or a lie detector test alongside the FBI agent to see who is telling the truth." The Chicago Sun Times (9/16, Marin, Toomey) adds, "Rosemont Mayor Donald E. Stephens adamantly denied under oath Thursday that he met with the mob in 1999 to talk about a casino for his town. And, in an ironic twist, a reputed mob boss on the lam is backing him up." The Sun Times goes on to report the details of the Lombardo letter.

Mob Informant Claims FBI, New Jersey Officials Framed Gangster. The New York Sun (9/16, Capeci) reports, "A turncoat Luchese mobster who helped authorities nail two suspects in the deadly Seton Hall arson five years ago has now turned the tables on law enforcement, claiming that a high-level FBI agent, together with New Jersey investigators, have knowingly kept an innocent man incarcerated for 12 years for a murder he didn't commit." Thomas Ricciardi, "whose cooperation has also led to convictions of mobsters and mob associates, alleged that the officials learned they had wrongly convicted the gangster," Martin Taccetta, "just four days after he was found guilty in 1993." Yale Law professor Steven Duke told the Sun, "The evidence clearly establishes an audacious, pervasive conspiracy by many New Jersey law enforcement agencies, including the FBI, that is comparable to the disgraceful conduct of FBI agents who framed innocent men for murder in Boston in the 1960s."

Bonanno Figure Sentenced To 20 Years For Mob Murder. Newsday (9/16, DeStefano) reports, "Anthony Urso, the driver for Bonanno boss Joseph Massino who briefly took over command of the crime family in 2003, was sentenced to 20 years in prison for the killing of a mob associate." Urso "pleaded guilty earlier in the year to taking part in the murder of Anthony Tomasulo. Tomasulo, a Bonanno family associate, was killed in May 1990 after he allegedly failed to pass along some of his illegal gambling proceeds from joker-poker machines to the crime family administration, officials said."

Chicago Lawyer Alleges Contracting Scheme By Blagojevich, Fundraisers. The Chicago Sun Times (9/16, Fusco, McKinney, Fornek) reports, "Gov. Blagojevich and two top fund-raisers schemed to steer lucrative state pension deals to investment firms and consultants who agreed to donate to Blagojevich's campaign, a key figure in a widening corruption probe claims he's been told. The unproved but explosive allegation surfaced Thursday in a federal plea deal by Chicago lawyer Joseph Cari," who "pleaded guilty to attempted extortion for his role in a kickback scheme the feds say was directed by former state teacher pension board member Stuart Levine." The Sun Times notes, "Cheryle Jackson, Blagojevich's communications director, downplayed the credibility of Cari's statements. 'This is speculation based on testimony from an admitted extortionist who was told this by someone twice accused of extortion himself.' Jackson said the feds have not contacted the governor." The Chicago Tribune (9/16, Pearson, O'Connor) notes Cari "said he was told that a 'high-ranking Illinois public official' was behind" the kickback scheme. Blagojevich "was peppered with questions about the plea agreements at an unrelated news conference but said he had no knowledge of them."

Former Landscaping Executive Pleads Guilty To Bribery. The Chicago Tribune (9/16, Higgins) reports former landscaping company executive John Kevin Haas "on Thursday admitted his role in a scheme to pay $137,000 in bribes to a Chicago Park District official to help win $8 million in contracts at Millennium Park and other city properties." Haas "admitted he made arrangements to send former parks official Shirley McMayon to a Wisconsin resort in 2000, bought a computer for her son and helped orchestrate other payoffs. Haas, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors, described bribes to McMayon that included cash, ski vacations and $22,000 to help pay off McMayon's loan on a Dodge Durango. The plea deal calls for Haas to be sentenced to 2 years, 7 months in prison, forfeit $350,000 in wrongly obtained profits and pay restitution of $49,000."

Veteran Connecticut Lawmaker Resigns Amid Corruption Probe. The New York Times (9/16, Stowe) reports veteran Connecticut state Sen. Ernest E. Newton II resigned in Bridgeport "on Thursday morning in a fiery speech on the steps of City Hall." Newton "was the target of a raid on his office in February by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in connection with an inquiry into a job training program here. The head of that program, Warren Keith Godbolt, pleaded guilty on Aug. 2 to charges that included offering a $5,000 bribe to an unnamed public official in exchange for securing a $100,000 state grant." The Times notes Newton "has not been charged. He said on Thursday that he was resigning from his Senate seat for the sake of his family."

Ohio County Seeks FBI Probe Of Tech Firm Loan. The Hamilton Journal News (9/16, Brooks) reports, "The Butler County Commissioners unanimously agreed Thursday to sever an agreement with a fiber optics firm," Dynus Technologies, "and request an FBI investigation into why the firm obtained multi-million-dollar loans in the county's name, allegedly without commissioners' approval." The Journal News notes Cincinnati FBI spokesman Michael Brooks said, "We have received the complaint from the commissioner. We'll make a determination if an investigation should be conducted."

Florida Town Records Subpoenaed In Federal Embezzlement Probe. The Gainesville Sun (9/16, Voyles) reports, "About two years ago," Bronson town councilman Aaron Edmondson "started asking questions about why some new lights on the mayor's property looked so much like the new lights the town had just received. Edmondson's curiosity led to a joint local and state investigation into embezzlement that ended with the mayor, James Blaine 'Jamie' Griffin, going to state prison and the town clerk, June Greenlee, being put on probation. On Thursday an FBI agent served a subpoena on the town for its financial records. … Mayor Beatrice Mongo said she expects the federal government will dig even deeper than state officials dug."

Federal Agents Raid Pennsylvania Technical School. The Philadelphia Daily News (9/16, Caparella) reports that on Thursday "agents from the FBI and the U.S. Department of Education Inspector General's office raided" Philadelphia's Harrison Career Institute "at four of its 15 locations…said FBI spokeswoman Jeri Williams. In the past month, the Department of Education accused the school of alleged fraud in its federal financial-aid program." Harrison's "programs certify students to become licensed practical nurses, dental technicians, home health assistants, among other jobs." The Daily News adds, "The agents took boxes of records and other materials from four floors at the Walnut Street site."

Attorney Testifies Gotti Threats Made Him Change Legal Strategy. The New York Law Journal (9/16, Perrotta) reports, "The former attorney for Frank LoCascio, a co-defendant of John Gotti Sr. in a 1992 murder and racketeering trial, testified Thursday that he tailored his defense strategy to suit Gotti after the now deceased mob boss threatened him. … 'He would take care of me -- and I knew what that meant,' the attorney, Anthony Cardinale, said Thursday during an evidentiary hearing in Brooklyn federal court." The Journal continues, "The alleged threat, he said, came during a break in the trial while Cardinale was cross-examining the prosecution's star witness, Salvatore 'Sammy the Bull' Gravano. … Cardinale had considered asking Gravano if he knew that LoCascio was not involved in one of the central charges of the indictment, the murder of Louis DiBono. But after Gotti spoke with him, Cardinale said, he did not ask for fear of making LoCascio look better at the expense of Gotti. … 'I was afraid, if that's what you're asking, yes,' Cardinale told LoCascio's appellate lawyer, Herald Price Fahringer of Lipsitz, Green, Fahringer, Roll, Salisbury & Cambria." The Journal adds, "Cardinale also said he did not meet with LoCascio alone after Gotti told him not to, and changed the tenor of his overall defense and his closing arguments to emphasize Gotti's innocence. … Under questioning from Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Firestone, however, Cardinale would not say that his actions constituted an ethical breach or ineffective assistance of counsel. … Cardinale, a Boston attorney, was testifying at a hearing that was ordered in January by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The circuit asked Eastern District Judge I. Leo Glasser to determine if LoCascio received ineffective assistance of counsel and deserved a new trial."

Woman On FBI's Most Wanted List Surrenders. The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 12, 1:35, Schieffer) reported, "One of the FBI's most wanted fugitives is in custody today, more than a decade after she stole millions of dollars from a Las Vegas casino." CBS (Hughes) added, "It appears to be a heavy conscience that brought Heather Tallchief back to Las Vegas." Twelve years ago "she was the driver of an armored car making a routine drop off at the Circus, Circus Casino, when she drove off with more than $3 million … She now claims Roberto Solis brainwashed her and planned every detail of the crime himself, from the moment she drove away from the casino."

The New York Times (9/16, Archibold) reports that Heather C. Tallchief, "walked into a federal courthouse…and surrendered." She said she "she was in Europe much of the time, out of reach of the money and working as a hotel maid." Tallchief "was ordered held on charges that included bank larceny, fraud, conspiracy and making false statements to obtain a passport." She claims she was "a victim of… brainwashing" by suspected accomplice, Roberto Solis. "Tallchief said she decided to abandon her flight for the sake of her son, who she fears will ultimately suffer consequences of her crime."

The AP (9/16, Ritter) reports, "Attorney Robert Axelrod, her lawyer, was with Tallchief when she surrendered at U.S. District Court in Las Vegas. He said she was tired of hiding, and wanted her 10-year-old son to have a chance at living a normal life. … Axelrod said Tallchief was an impressionable 21-year-old who blindly followed a persuasive older boyfriend in the Oct. 1, 1993, theft. The boyfriend, Roberto Solis, is now 60 and is still a fugitive on the FBI's Most Wanted list. … Tallchief maintained she was only following Solis' instructions and doesn't know where Solis is now, although they have a son together."

FBI Internet Sex Solicitation Sting Snares Us Weekly Editor. The AP (9/16) reports, "An Us Weekly gossip writer found himself on the wrong side of the police blotter after being charged with trying to seduce an FBI agent posing on the Internet as a 13-year-old girl. Us Weekly suspended Timothy McDarrah, editor of the Hot Stuff column, without pay, a magazine spokesman said Thursday. McDarrah responded in June to a posting on the craigslist.com Web site offering introductions to the 'freshest, youngest' girls in New York, an FBI affidavit said. The gossip writer told an undercover FBI agent…that he would pay $200 for sex with a 13-year-old girl, the affidavit said. After McDarrah failed to show up for a meeting, the agent began sending instant messages in his guise as a 13-year-old girl. … On Wednesday, the agent wrote, McDarrah e-mailed that he was waiting at a building the agent had described as the 13-year-old girl's address. FBI agents went there and arrested McDarrah."

Convicted Massachusetts Voc-Ed Scam Artist Seeks Early Release. The AP (9/16) reports, "A former payroll clerk convicted with three others of swindling thousands of dollars from a city-run vocational school has asked a federal judge (in Springfield, MA) for early release from a halfway house." The AP continues, "Jamie Dwyer, 54, has served two months of a six-month sentence at a halfway house in Hartford, Conn., for her role in a no-show job scheme that bled about $50,000 from the Massachusetts Career Development Institute. … Dwyer was convicted of fraud, conspiracy and lying to FBI agents. U.S. District Judge Michael A. Ponsor sentenced her to the halfway house, to be followed by six months home confinement. … But she said she doesn't need the mandatory group counseling and drug-testing at the facility, The Republican of Springfield reported Friday. … 'The Hartford House's rehabilitative mission causes me to be subjected to restrictions and rules that are unnecessary and demeaning,' Dwyer wrote in an affidavit filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court. … 'I have been gainfully employed throughout my adult life,' Dwyer continued. 'I successfully raised two children. I do not have problems with alcohol or substance abuse, and I have historically respected authority and the rights of others. I do not need counseling regarding those issues.'" The AP adds, "Gerald Phillips, MCDI's former executive director, was sentenced to 21 months in prison. Luisa Cardaropoli was sentenced to 15 months in prison for pocketing thousands of dollars from a no-show job she got through Giuseppe Polimeni, who was sentenced to one year in prison. … The charges against all four sprang from an ongoing investigation into public corruption in Springfield that began about five years ago and has netted several indictments and convictions."

DNA In 450 Criminal Cases Was Tested In Lab Where Examiner Falsified An Entry. The Washington Times (9/16, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The Army has compiled a list of more than 450 criminal cases whose DNA was tested by a laboratory where an examiner has admitted to making a false entry in one case. The list includes defendants from military installations across the country and around the world, from the Air Force Academy to Incirlik Air Base in Turkey. The blood testing dates back to 1995. The exams are being reviewed by the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory in Forest Park, Ga. In a memo, the laboratory is asking staff judge advocates — the military's lawyers — to contact the Army Criminal Investigative Command about any cases involving DNA."

Waiter's Assailant Sentenced In Dupont Circle Killing. The Washington Post (9/16, B2, Cauvin) reports that Kurt Williams, "the lookout as" Adrien Alstad, a waiter, "was robbed and fatally shot" near Dupont Circle, was sentenced to "the maximum 15 years that the sentencing guidelines recommend for voluntary manslaughter." Judge Judith E. Retchin said "the killing was not…a single, 'youthful act' but rather part of 'a series of crimes' … The judge acknowledged that Williams" is mildly retarded, "'had a terrible childhood' and 'suffered all types of abuse,'" but also noted that he, "in the days that followed Alstad's death," committed "another robbery" and, "when he was spotted by police, he ran."

AU Lays Off Chef As Part Of Probe Into President's Spending. The Washington Post (9/16, B9, Strauss, Kinzie) reports, As American University's Board of Trustees' "is close to completing a months-long probe of" University President Benjamin Ladner, they let go his personal chef, Rodney Scruggs, and Nancy Bullard Ladner, social secretary for the president and his wife, "has been transferred." It "was not clear why the board eliminated Scruggs's position now; he had been employed by the university since 1996. University presidents are expected to entertain a great deal as part of their fundraising and other duties, so many rely on caterers or, less commonly, chefs."

Search For VA Student Now Criminal Investigation. The Washington Post (9/16, B1, Smith) reports, "Although there is still no evidence that she has been harmed, the search for missing Virginia Commonwealth University freshman Taylor Marie Behl was upgraded yesterday to a criminal investigation, and an Amber Alert was issued in the case late last night." The decision was "based on three factors: The search involves a juvenile; more than a week has passed without a solid lead in the 17-year-old's disappearance; and an increasing number of tips are coming in because of national media coverage."

Diaz Photographer Gets Prison Time. The Los Angeles Times (9/16) reports that the photographer John Rutter "was sentenced Thursday to prison for trying to extort $3 million for nude pictures of superstar Cameron Diaz he had taken early in her career … Rutter's attorney, Mark Werksman, called the July trial a battle between a 'rich and famous celebrity' and a 'hardworking photographer.' Deputy District Attorney David Walgren downplayed the celebrity aspect of the case in statements to reporters, saying that, had the victim been someone other than Diaz, the case still would have been prosecuted 'in the same courts' and 'in the same manner.'"

Bush Endorses Base Closure Plan. President Bush has endorsed a plan for closing 22 major military bases and reconfiguring 33 others, the Washington Post/AP (9/16, A4, Riechmann) reports. The report "will become final in 45 days unless Congress acts to reject it in full. Communities probably have little hope of a reprieve for their bases, as lawmakers have never rejected such reports." The AP adds, "Bush's submission of the report comes as his administration and Congress are preoccupied with aiding the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast and other priorities. A GOP-led effort in the Senate to derail the base-closing process, which Republican leaders feared could embarrass them, has fizzled."

Gonzales Says US Will Challenge Pledge Ruling. The AP (9/16, Sherman) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday that the Justice Department will fight to overturn a federal court ruling that the Pledge of Allegiance can't be recited in public schools because it contains a reference to God." The AP continues, "Gonzales said the pledge is one of several expressions of national identity and patriotism that mention of God but don't violate the Constitution's ban on state-sponsored religion. … The high court 'has affirmed time and again that such official acknowledgments of our nation's religious heritage, foundation and character are constitutional,' Gonzales said in a statement a day after the ruling by U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton in Sacramento." The AP adds, "Karlton's decision could put the issue on track for another round of Supreme Court arguments. The court sidestepped the issue last year, ruling atheist Michael Newdow had no standing to bring the case on behalf of his daughter because he did not have custody of her. … The Bush administration had opposed Newdow on the same basis that Gonzales set forth Thursday. Newdow also is involved in the latest case, acting as attorney for three parents challenging the pledge because it includes the words 'under God.'" The AP notes, "Gonzales is widely viewed as a leading contender for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Supreme Court because he is close to President Bush. Gonzales' statement of support to keep 'under God' in the pledge could appeal to religious conservatives, who have expressed concerns about him as a potential justice because he has not stated opposition to the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion."

Knight Ridder (9/16, Puzzanghera) reports, "Sandra Banning, the Sacramento, Calif.-area mother of the girl who helped trigger the legal battle over the Pledge of Allegiance that flared anew this week, came to the nation's capital Thursday with a pledge of her own: … To do everything she can to keep the pledge in schools and the phrase 'under God' in the pledge." Knight Ridder continues, "The day after a Sacramento federal judge revived the controversy by ruling that reciting the pledge in public schools is an unconstitutional violation of the separation of church and state, Banning's efforts became intertwined with the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings for Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. … Banning publicly urged his confirmation in hopes that he would rule against the case brought by her 11-year-old daughter's father, Michael Newdow, the atheist and amateur lawyer who has argued before the Supreme Court that the pledge should be kept out of public schools. And to help rally support for the Pledge of Allegiance as the case works its way again toward the high court, she's forming a grass-roots advocacy group, the 'One Nation Under God Foundation,' affiliated with the conservative Traditional Values Coalition. … Banning and other Roberts supporters said they hoped the pledge issue would give an additional boost to his nomination." Knight Ridder notes, "Thursday, the Senate condemned the ruling, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the Justice Department would again 'defend the ability of American school children to pledge allegiance to the flag.'"

Local Television. KUSA-TV Denver (9/15, 10:08 p.m.) reported, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales says the Justice Department will fight to overturn a federal court decision banning the Pledge of Allegiance from public schools. A district judge in California yesterday ruled that teacher-led recitation of the pledge is unconstitutional because it contains a reference to God. The Senate voted today to condemn the judge's ruling. Gonzales argues the pledge is one of several expressions of national identity and patriotism that mention God but don't violate the constitution's ban on state-sponsored religion."

DOJ Settles Boston Voting Rights Suit. The AP (9/16) reports, "The Justice Department said Thursday it has dropped its voting rights lawsuit against Boston after city officials agreed to provide voting materials in Chinese and Vietnamese, and to allow federal observers to monitor polling places." The AP continues, "The agreement comes six weeks after the federal government filed a lawsuit — part of what it said is a national initiative — alleging that Boston's election practices discriminate against Hispanic and Asian American voters who do not speak English. … 'The city of Boston is to be congratulated for agreeing to resolve this matter in a constructive and forward-looking manner,' Bradley J. Schlozman, acting assistant attorney general for the department's civil rights division, said in a news release announcing the agreement." The AP adds, "When the suit was filed, Schlozman alleged that Boston's violations were 'deeply disturbing.' … A city lawyer at the time called the claims 'unsubstantiated.' City officials said they already provide ballots in English and Spanish. … Seth Gitell, a spokesman for Mayor Thomas Menino, said Thursday the agreement does not say the city did anything wrong. 'What the city objected to originally was to signing a consent decree and acknowledging wrongdoing,' he said."

WPost Praises State Rejections Of Anti-Gay Marriage Amendments. An editorial in the Washington Post (9/16, A20) says, "For the second time in as many weeks, a state legislature has bucked the ugly trend of writing discrimination against gays into state law. Last week, the California Assembly voted to allow same-sex marriage. This week, lawmakers in Massachusetts decisively rejected a proposed constitutional amendment to overturn the state's Supreme Judicial Court decision acknowledging gay marriage rights. … The vote shows that as people grow used to gay marriages, which have been taking place in Massachusetts for more than a year, their discomfort -- and the political impetus for banning them -- diminishes." Public opinion "is moving in the right direction, and the reason is not hard to discern: Since the high court's ruling went into effect, a lot of couples have tied the knot in Massachusetts, and, somehow, the sun has continued to rise in the east. Many people are realizing that it costs heterosexual marriage nothing for same-sex marriage also to exist. The longer people have to absorb that lesson, the more support for banning marriages between committed couples is likely to erode."

Microsoft, Time Warner Discussing Online Partnerships. The AP (9/16, Linn) reports, "Microsoft Corp. and Time Warner Inc. have been discussing potential online partnerships that would help the two companies better compete against rivals Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc., two people familiar with the talks said Thursday." The AP continues, "They two said the discussions have been going on for months and that any possible deal is not imminent." The AP adds, "Microsoft and AOL — who just two years ago settled a bitter antitrust lawsuit over Microsoft's tactics in the Internet browser market — are discussing possible collaboration in search technology, online advertising and instant messaging, said the two sources, one of whom is an executive with Time Warner's America Online unit. … The other source, who works closely with Microsoft and has been involved in company discussions on the possible partnership, said the talks have heated up in the last couple weeks but are not advanced." The AP notes, "The AOL executive said one aspect of the talks originally centered on using Microsoft's new MSN search engine on AOL, replacing AOL's current relationship with Google. … More recently, the executive said, the two companies have been talking about the possibility of deeper relationships, such as collaborating in the lucrative market of selling advertising online. … Such a collaboration could allow the two companies to benefit from growing interest in search-based advertising, helping them better compete against search leaders Google and Yahoo. … But, the executive said, 'the discussions are not advanced.'"

Reuters (9/16, Li) reports, "Talks of a Microsoft stake in the AOL division was one of several scenarios under review, a separate source familiar with the matter said. 'There has been discussions about Microsoft investing in Time Warner,' one source said, who also said nothing was imminent." Reutes adds, "A combination would create the single largest Internet audience pool by unique visitors and forge a formidable online competitor in a field currently led by Yahoo Inc. and Google Inc. … AOL and MSN would have a combined unique audience of about 167.8 million, although there would likely be duplicates. This compares to Yahoo's 101.3 million unique visitors and Google's 80.4 million in August, according to Nielsen/NetRatings." Reuters adds, "Broad discussions on how the two companies could work together began two years ago after the companies settled a long-running antitrust suit that America Online, a unit of Time Warner, filed against the software giant, the source said."

Microsoft-AOL Talks Show Concern Over Google. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Angwin, Guth) reports, "Demonstrating its growing concern about Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. has entered talks with Time Warner Inc. about taking a substantial stake in the media giant's America Online unit." The talks "centered on whether AOL would switch to using Microsoft's search engine instead of Google's," but "also included discussions of combining the advertising sales forces of AOL and Microsoft's MSN online service."

USA Today (9/16, Acohido, Petrecca) adds, "No deal is imminent."

The New York Times (9/16, Hansell) adds that the two companies "explored a variety of possible combinations of the MSN Internet portal with the America Online operation of Time Warner, including a merger of the two into a new company that would be jointly owned … Some important issues in the talks remain undecided. For example, both AOL and Microsoft want to control a combined instant messaging system, which each company sees as strategically important technology. Another question is how much traffic Microsoft would direct to the combined venture."

The Washington Post (9/16, D1, Vise) adds, "Time Warner has made it clear that it wants to continue to own a substantial chunk of AOL."

Deal Reflects Shifting Goals For Microsoft & Time Warner. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Angwin, Guth) reports that this indicates "a strategic shift for Time Warner, which had long resisted pleas from some investors to get rid of all or part of its ailing Internet arm," as well as "how Microsoft now sees Google as a major adversary."

The New York Times (9/16, Hansell) adds, "Microsoft is trying to focus its Internet operations on its developing Web search product rather than its Web portal and Internet access business, which it no longer sees as strategically important. Microsoft offered to sell its MSN Internet portal and dial-up subscriber business both to America Online and to Yahoo."

The Washington Post (9/16, D1, Vise) adds, "The talks, reported yesterday by the New York Post, are part of a broader set of discussions between Microsoft and Time Warner that began following an antitrust settlement between the companies two years ago

Agreement Could "Shake Up" Internet Search Landscape. USA Today (9/16, Acohido, Petrecca) reports, "Industry analysts said, if consummated, the deal could shake up the world of Internet search." Kevin Lee, chairman of search marketing firm Did-it.com said "a key driver behind a strategic alliance" could be AOL and MSN's potential to "tap into archived demographic data they already keep on subscribers."

The Washington Post (9/16, D1, Vise) adds, "One source familiar with the talks said he considered a transaction combining AOL and MSN as complicated and a long shot. But he said that if the parties can figure out how to create more value by joining forces, a deal of some kind remains possible."

The New York Times (9/16, Hansell) adds that one stumbling block may be "disentangling Microsoft's contract with NBC" as Time Warner owns the rival CNN network.

ABN Reached Tentative Agreement To Buy Antonveneta. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Kahn, Taylor) reports, "ABN Amro Holding NV's tentative agreement to buy a 30% stake in Banca Antonveneta SpA from Banca Popolare Italiana Scarl after a bitter battle clears the path for the first-ever takeover of a large Italian bank by a foreign lender and could pave the way for more, a prospect that seemed remote just several weeks ago … The sale, which values Antonveneta at €8.2 billion ($10 billion) and was agreed to late Wednesday, still faces legal and regulatory hurdles. It would give control of Antonveneta to ABN just two months after ABN's cash offer for the bank failed," at an expected price of €26.50 a share, "the same price it made in its failed public offer this summer."

Merger Between Delta, Northwest Wouldn't Be Surprising. USA Today (9/16, Adams) reports, "The twin Chapter 11 bankruptcy filings" by Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines, "almost simultaneous and in the same New York courthouse, are leading many industry experts to believe the carriers may be exploring a merger within bankruptcy protection … The minimal route overlap is considered an advantage with federal regulators," who would have to be convinced that "the combination would not significantly reduce competition, or that one or both of the airlines would fail without the merger."

Legislation Would Promote Competition In Broadband Services. The House Energy and Commerce Committee has released draft legislation that would require broadband providers to allow their subscribers to view any legal online content. The Washington Post (9/16, D2, Mohammed) says the policy is "aimed at keeping big Internet companies from restricting access to competitors' Web offerings." The Post calls the measure a "victory for advocates of 'net neutrality' -- the idea that Internet providers have to stand aside and allow customers to access any Web pages as long as the content is legal. The principle is considered crucial to preserving the open nature of the Internet and preventing big broadband providers from squeezing out smaller competitors that offer voice, video or other services."

EU Probe May Lead To Banking Changes. The AP (9/16, White) reports, "A European Union antitrust inquiry into retail banking may lead to changes in the way European banks are regulated, EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said Thursday." The AP continues, "She said an ongoing investigation may be widened to see how regulation affects customer choice. … 'Do public rules that may have a legitimate objective end up making markets more rigid and limit competition and consumer choice?' she asked European regulators at a twice-yearly meeting in London. 'We want government to protect the consumer, but we also need to protect the consumer from the government.'" The AP adds, "The EU launched its investigation earlier this year, saying it wanted to look at areas where it thought competition was not functioning as well as it might. … Kroes said it was hard for consumers to get clear comparative information about products to allow them to make informed choices."

EU Court Reduces Antitrust Fine Against Daimler Chrysler. Bloomberg News (9/16) reports, "A European Union court today annulled most of a 72 million-euro ($88 million) antitrust fine against DaimlerChrysler AG, ruling that the regulator was wrong to say the automaker broke EU law in Germany and Spain." Bloomberg continues, "DaimlerChrysler, the world's fifth-largest carmaker, was fined in 2001 for breaking EU free-trade laws by instructing dealers in Spain, Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium not to sell to bargain hunters from other EU nations between 1985 and 1996. … The European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg cut the fine to 9.8 million euros, saying in a statement today that DaimlerChrysler acted 'unilaterally' in Germany and therefore didn't break EU rules. In Spain, the automaker acted in line with national legislation, the court said. The tribunal upheld the EU's decision about the company's Belgian operations." Bloomberg adds, "The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, has sought to bring down car prices by dissolving the exclusive ties between carmakers and dealerships. Starting in October 2002, the EU rules broke carmakers' lock on sales networks, permitting dealers to expand and sell different brands in the same showroom."

The AP (9/16) reports, "In Spain, the EU court said DaimlerChrysler followed local law by forcing leasers to link each car with a contracted customer. The Commission had argued that this prevented local dealers from stocking up on Mercedes vehicles and created an artificial shortage. But the court said the Spanish law was 'not contrary' to any EU law and overturned the (US$18.47 million) fine."

States Due US Over Invasive Beetles. The AP (9/16, Gormley) reports, "Four states sued the Bush administration Thursday over an invasive, tree-eating beetle that has entered the U.S. as a stowaway on cargo ships." The AP continues, "The Asian long-horned beetle, along with the emerald ash borer and the pine shoot beetle, are the culprits named in the lawsuit by attorneys general from New York, California, Connecticut and Illinois." The AP adds, "The states are seeking a court order to require the Agriculture Department to examine more effective and less environmentally harmful ways to prevent the insects from entering the country, said New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. … State officials say the insects would cause extensive economic and environmental damage if they move from cities like New York and Chicago to working forests." The AP notes, "The pests enter the country in wooden pallets and wood-based packaging. The state officials contend that federal officials use a 'marginally effective' pesticide, which is being phased out under an international treaty as unsafe to humans. … Also, they said the USDA is following a new rule that requires wooden shipping pallets and other wood packaging material carrying imports to be treated with heat or sprayed with methyl bromide, a chemical the state officials say depletes the ozone and could be a cancer risk."

NYTimes Says Utah Site Is Good Place For Nuclear Fuel Rod Storage. The New York Times (9/16) editorializes, "While few people outside Utah were paying close attention last week, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission authorized the licensing of a private storage plant for spent nuclear fuel rods on an Indian reservation some 50 miles southwest of Salt Lake City. Utah's outraged political leaders pledged to use every legal and political trick available to block the project even though, as representatives of a very conservative state, they supposedly abhor bureaucratic or judicial interference with private corporate decisions." The Times adds, "We remain hopeful that Yucca can qualify as a permanent disposal site. But if Yucca fails to pass muster with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the nation will need a centralized surface site to fill the gap until a safe burial location can be found. The Indian reservation in Utah can fill that purpose."

Appeals Court Panel Postpones Lamberth Hearing. A federal appeals court panel has postponed a hearing about whether US District Judge Royce Lamberth has lost the appearance of impartiality in a case involving money the US government may owe Native Americans. The Washington Post (9/16, A29) says the panel "was scheduled to consider another dispute in the case along with the government's unusual July request to remove Lamberth as the presiding judge. … But the three-judge panel issued an order late yesterday saying they will instead refer the issue of Lamberth's perceived fairness to a later panel of judges considering another appeal dispute in the case, Cobell v. Norton . That means that the Justice Department is not likely to hold a hearing on its complaints about the judge until spring, based on the appellate court's already full schedule this year."

Prominent Miami Lawyer To Plead Guilty Today To Drug Trafficking Charges. The

Miami Herald (9/16, Weaver) reports, "In February, federal agents rustled a prominent lawyer out of bed to bust him at his Miami Beach waterfront home. Today, Samuel I. Burstyn is scheduled to plead guilty to scheming with his former clients to obstruct a federal grand jury's investigation into their drug-trafficking operation and himself. … He must forfeit about $200,000 and is expected to lose his law license. U.S. District Judge William J. Zloch has insisted on a 'full confession' from Burstyn at the Fort Lauderdale plea hearing, according to a court document filed Tuesday." The Herald notes Assistant US Attorney Brian McCormick "and fellow prosecutor Michael Dittoe have said Burstyn acted as 'house counsel' for marijuana smugglers Jeffrey Tobin, David Tobin and others."

U.S. Coast Guard Intercepts 2 Tons of Cocaine. The AP (9/16) reports Colombia's anti-narcotics police chief said Thursday that "the U.S. Coast Guard, acting on Colombian intelligence, intercepted a ship towing an unmanned submarine-like vessel that held more than 2 tons of cocaine." Gen. Alberto Gomez said the boat was raided Wednesday off the coast of the Ecuadorean-owned Galapagos Islands. "The underwater capsule, which was attached by a metal cable, was designed so smugglers could tow it below their boat and escape detection if drug agents searched the ship." In another incident, "2.5 tons of cocaine was discovered Wednesday hidden in the oil tanks of a ship docked in the Colombian Pacific port of Buenaventura…Eight suspects were arrested." It's believed the cocaine was heading to Central America, and from there it would have possibly been shipped to the U.S.

'Mob Associate' Doesn't Deliver On Plea Agreement. The Providence (RI) Journal (9/16, Malinowski, Stanton) reports, "Mob associate Alan Blamires was set to plead guilty Thursday to charges that he guarded a large shipment of cocaine that was passing through Rhode Island last winter." But "the plea agreement fell apart when Blamires told Chief U.S. District Court Judge Ernest C. Torres that he was 'fuzzy and blurry' from medication to control his violent tendencies and did not understand the charges against him…'I have pertinent information about Joseph Bevilacqua that I'm trying to get to the prosecutors,' said Blamires." Bevilacqua is a defense attorney and has been the target of a DEA investigation. "DEA agents have spoken to Courtney Calenda, an East Greenwich teenager, who has accused Bevilacqua of sexually assaulting her and supplying her with cocaine."

Missouri Men Enter Pleas In Drug Trafficking Case. The Standard Democrat (9/16) reports two Southeast Missouri men entered guilty pleas on drug charges in federal court. Adrian L. Lewis and Joe Lenzie Turner both pleaded guilty to the distribution of cocaine base. "With his plea, Turner admitted that on May 20, 2005, he distributed a substance containing base to a confidential informant. Specifically, Turner gave the informant 5.4 grams of cocaine base in exchange for $300." U.S. Attorney Catherine L. Hanaway commended the DEA and the Sikeston Police Department for their combined efforts to prosecute the case.

Judge Sentences Meth Convict, Blasts His Actions. The Lynchburg (VA) News and Advance (9/16, Waugh) reports, "Despite several tearful pleas from friends and family, a Lynchburg federal judge blasted a Rustburg man Thursday for his role in the selling of methamphetamines. 'You don't know how many lives were destroyed … Generations of others will be coming through this courtroom because of his actions. You're old and in pain. That's not an excuse,' U.S. District Judge Norman K. Moon said. Moon didn't believe Clayton 'Sonny' Keyes' story that he only started using meth in 2001 because his back pain had become so painful, and that he began selling the drug only to support his addiction. Keyes, 55, pleaded guilty in April 2004 to conspiracy to distribute more than 15 kilograms of methamphetamine and possession of a firearm. He has already served two years in jail since his arrest. On Thursday, Moon gave Keyes nearly 10 additional years in prison, despite calling the prosecutor-recommended sentence 'overly generous.'"

U.S. Accuses 'Prince of Pot' Of Conspiring to Distribute Marijuana. The Missoula (MT) Independent (9/16, McQuillan) reports Marc Emery, aka the "Prince of Pot," is scheduled to have his first extradition hearing on Sept. 16. At the request of the U.S. government, Emery and two of his employees were arrested July 29 by Canadian police on U.S. charges of conspiring to distribute marijuana and marijuana seeds and money laundering. The Independent continues, "though DEA agents paint Emery as a greedy drug trafficker, Emery says he's dedicated the last 15 years to the cause of marijuana legalization and has donated all business proceeds—$4 million—to the movement and its activists, both in Canada and the United States."

The Guardian (9/16, Campbell) reports, "One of the world's leading cannabis legislation campaigners, a magazine publisher known as the 'Prince of Pot', faces an extradition hearing today in Vancouver as American drugs agencies seek to put him on trial in the US. His supporters claim the move is a first step by US authorities to prosecute foreigners who challenge the US laws on cannabis."

U.S. Removes Venezuela From List Of Allies In War On Drugs. The Tallahassee (FL) Democrat/KRT (9/15, Dudley, Bachelet) reports, "President Bush has taken Venezuela off his list of allies in the war on drugs, saying that the government of President Hugo Chavez spurned anti-drug cooperation with U.S. officials and fired its effective law enforcement officers. But the White House waived the cuts in U.S. foreign aid usually attached to the "decertification" so that it can continue to support Venezuelan pro-democracy groups that oppose the leftist Chavez." According to the White House, Venezuela has "failed demonstrably" to reduce the flow through its territories of about 150 tons of cocaine and increasing amounts of heroin. "Only last month, Chavez ordered his government officials to stop cooperating with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), accusing it of espionage and drug trafficking."

The AP (9/15, Gedda) reports, Venezuela's populist president, Hugo Chavez, "had no direct comment Thursday on Bush's action but used the occasion of his presence at the United Nations summit of world leaders to take a verbal swipe at Bush. 'Mr. Bush represents the most crude and savage imperialism that threatens the world,' Chavez said."

Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny As Expiration Date Nears. Knight Ridder (9/16, McCaffrey) reports, "The six puppies looked fine at first. But when Colombian police gave them a closer look they found fresh scars on their bellies that told a different story. … The tiny Labradors and Rottweilers had been surgically converted into drug couriers: cut open with several plastic packets of heroin stitched into their abdomens." Knight Ridder continues, "Even the hardened Colombian police, who discovered the puppies at an abandoned house in a rural area outside of Medellin, had never seen anything like it. Traffickers were apparently going to ship the dogs to the United States saying they were pets. It's almost certain they would have been discarded as soon as their valuable cargo was removed. … 'The better we get at catching them the more creative they get,' said Mark Styron, supervisor of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Heroin Group in Bogota. 'That's always the problem.'" Knight Ridder adds, "Much of the cocaine and heroin that ends up for sale on the street corners of the United States begins in the rich soil of this conflict-ridden South American country. And staying ahead of the smugglers is expensive. Since 2000, the United States has sent $4.5 billion to Colombia to help battle drug trafficking. … That six-year program, known as Plan Colombia, is set to expire at the end of this year. … Although the Bush administration and Congress have signaled a willingness to continue funding at current levels for at least another year, some are questioning whether the money has been effective in stemming the tide of drugs to the United States."

Prosecutors Seen As Out Of Step With Public On Dying Debate. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/16) says that aging and dying are more and more "in the public eye," and among "the demands being raised is better control of pain, which has caught doctors between a desire to alleviate suffering and the US war on drugs." Specific examples here usually "fall in a gray area, involving doctors who may have crossed a legal or ethical line, whether out of compassion or greed. The larger problem is the message that all doctors receive from aggressive efforts to curb opiate abuse, and their resulting reluctance to sufficiently treat severe pain and other suffering." The Times states, "Federal criminal prosecutions have usually involved…charging pain management specialists, who often handle very tough cases, with overprescription or outright sale of controlled drugs." Again, "most such cases are far from clear-cut, except perhaps in the eyes of federal prosecutors." In other words, the government's "drug policy and honesty about the blurred line between compassionate treatment and medical euthanasia" has failed to keep pace with the "debate over what constitutes a 'good death.'"

North Carolina Man Held On Pipe Bomb, Firearms Charges. The Roanoke Rapids (NC) Daily Herald (9/16) reports, "Hamming it up for the camera, Michael Thomas Carpenter was taken into federal custody Tuesday for possessing pipe bombs and a cache of guns in his house outside Garysburg (NC)." The Herald continues, "Led to a blue Ford Expedition by an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the 34-year-old, upon seeing a photographer, exclaimed, 'What a wonderful justice system we have in America.' … He asked the agent escorting him if he would slow down so he could pose for the camera and at one point gave a cheesy grin." The Herald adds, "Asked if he was surprised to be federally charged for having three pipe bombs, Carpenter said, 'No, sir. The feds have to do their jobs so we're going to go with them as calmly and peacefully as we can. God bless America.'" The Herald notes, "Since his arrest on local charges in July, Carpenter was being held in the Northampton County Jail for possession with intent to sell and deliver marijuana, possession of drug paraphernalia and possession of a weapon of mass destruction. … Capt. George Reed of the Northampton County Sheriff's Office said Carpenter was trying to run the jail while he was there, first being held on $525,000 bond for the local charges and then under no bond on a federal detainer. … ATF agents Tuesday took Carpenter to Greenville, where he would appear before a federal magistrate. … ATF charged Carpenter with possession of a destructive device and possession of firearms by a convicted felon. The federal agents said anyone in possession of explosive weapons must have them registered. The three pipe bombs State Bureau of Investigation agents detonated behind Carpenter's house off Taylor Road in July were not registered."

ATF Finds Fake Explosives In Deserted New Orleans Home. The AP (9/15, Foster) reports, "National guardsmen and ATF agents patrolling the dark, deserted streets of New Orleans early Thursday found what appeared to be a bomb inside one of the homes vacated when Hurricane Katrina ripped through the city." The AP continues, "The guardsmen found what looked like six sticks of dynamite and a detonator along with a bag of ammunition and marijuana. They notified the New Orleans Police Department which, in turn, asked the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to respond because their own bomb squad equipment was flooded in the wake of the storm. … 'It had all the characteristics of a real device,' ATF explosives specialist Johnnie Green said of the suspect device." The AP adds, "His agents placed an 'interrupter' device on the one in question to try to detonate it and found out it was a hoax. 'It was a good one,' Green said, 'especially in these conditions,' referring to the blacked-out street. … Charlie Smith, an ATF special response supervisor, said finding the device should serve as a 'wake-up call for every guy going through these houses.' … Earlier in the week, he said they found a house with nine devices, 50 guns and a photo of the owner wearing a German uniform and Hitler-type mustache. 'He evidently was a collector. He had a ton of stuff,' Smith said."

Van Carrying Federal Inmates, US Marshals Struck In Florida. The AP (9/16) reports, "Nine federal inmates and two U.S. Marshals were taken to area hospitals Thursday after their van was forced off Interstate 95 and rolled at least twice — an incident allegedly caused by a hit-and-run driver." The AP continues, "Marshals were taking the inmates southbound on I-95, from the federal courthouse in Fort Lauderdale to a federal detention center in Miami when a vehicle hit a Geo Tracker, said U.S. Marshals Service spokesman Barry Golden." The AP adds, "The Geo spun out of control, hitting the Marshals' van and forcing it off the road. No one inside the van was critically injured, although one inmate was hurt more seriously than the others, Golden said. … Golden said security was never an issue."

IMMIGRATION:

Voinovich Questions ICE Nominee's Qualifications. Senators told Julie Myers, President Bush's pick to head Immigration and Customs Enforcement, that they are still considering a plan to reorganize the agency. The Washington Times (9/16, Waterman) adds that "one Republican expressed doubt that she was qualified for the job." During Myers' confirmation hearing before the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs, Sen. George Voinovich told the nominee, "I'm really concerned about your management experience," adding, "I think that we ought to have a meeting with [Homeland Security Secretary] Mike Chertoff...to ask him...why he thinks you're qualified for the job," because "based on your resume, I don't think you are." Sen. Susan Collins "raised the issue of merging ICE with another agency founded from the breakup of the Customs Service and INS -- Customs and Border Protection (CPB), which polices the nation's ports of entry."

TAX:

KPMG Tax Inquiry Widening To Include Others. The New York Times (9/16, Browning) reports, "Ever since the accounting firm KPMG reached a $456 million settlement of a federal investigation into abusive tax shelters nearly three weeks ago, the question has been who may be next. Federal prosecutors have said that their criminal investigation is widening, and attention is increasingly turning to the role played by banks, financial advisers and law firms that worked with KPMG and other accounting firms to create and sell such shelters … Deutsche Bank in particular has been a target of lawsuits from wealthy investors who sought to shield millions of dollars from taxes and bought shelters that did not pass muster with the Internal Revenue Service," and "a barely noticed lawsuit indicates that Deutsche Bank had a much deeper involvement in creating and helping to sell a questionable tax shelter known as Cobra."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Concludes Testimony Before Senate Judiciary Committee. Chief Justice nominee John Roberts yesterday concluded his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, which also heard from several witnesses for and against the nomination. The panel is scheduled to vote Thursday on Roberts' nomination. The network coverage was limited to about one-and-a-half minutes total. As in this morning's newspaper stories, TV reports focused on Roberts' assurance that he is "not an ideologue." The stories predicted he will win confirmation, and much of the coverage portrays the debate over Roberts as the precursor to an all-out battle over President Bush's next Supreme Court nominee.

ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 6, :35, Woodruff) reported Judge Roberts "seemed determined to paint a fuller picture of himself." The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 11, 0:40, Schieffer) reported Roberts "returned to the theme of his opening statement, assuring the senators he had no political agenda for the Supreme Court." Barring "any last minute surprises, Roberts is headed toward Senate confirmation." NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 7, 0:30, Williams) reported, "Two Democrats on the committee said today they're not sure how they'll vote. One of them, New York's Senator Chuck Schumer, said he wakes up in the middle of the night wrestling with his decision."

The AP (9/16) noted Roberts told "wary Democrats that ideologues don't belong on the Supreme Court. He said his record shows he will rely on the law, not personal views." The AP adds, "Persistent grilling by Democrats on the Judiciary Committee made no apparent inroads in Roberts' support among the Senate's majority Republicans, who plan to vote the week after next to make him the nation's 17th chief justice."

Knight Ridder (9/16, Kuhnhenn) says Roberts' "performance during four days before the Senate Judiciary Committee wowed even many Democrats, who conceded they were torn between admiration for his intellect and his modest judicial demeanor versus his reluctance to reveal more about his views on legal issues." Republican strategists "predicted a near straight party-line vote next week in the Republican-run committee, which includes some of the Senate's most liberal and most conservative members. But even there, some Democrats were struggling with their votes. … In the full Senate, signs emerged of bipartisan support for Roberts, especially from so-called 'red-state Democrats.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Savage, Schmitt) quotes Roberts saying, "I'm not an ideologue," adding that "with that comment, he aptly summarized the case he made for himself during four days of hearings on his nomination as the Supreme Court's chief justice." His "approval is virtually assured." The Washington Post (9/16, A6, Goldstein, Becker) used identical language, saying Roberts' confirmation is "virtually assured." The Post adds, "Some conservatives were alarmed last month over the disclosure that he had helped gay activists win a landmark Supreme Court in 1996." But "Roberts testified yesterday that he would have been equally willing to represent the opposing side, the state of Colorado, if it had asked for his help first." Reuters (9/16, Ferraro, Cowan) also says both Democrats and Republicans are predicting Roberts "will be confirmed to head the Supreme Court."

USA Today (9/16, Biskupic) adds that "with Roberts likely to win Senate confirmation," Bush "soon will pick a successor for Sandra Day O'Connor, a more moderate justice who has been a key vote in preserving, among other things, abortion rights and affirmative action in college admissions. That's why the coming battle over her replacement likely will be more contentious than the one over Roberts."

DOJ_NMG_0005901

The Dallas Morning News (9/16, Jackson, Pusey) reports some "aides said Democrats, without such a filibuster, might seek to keep Judge Roberts' vote under 60 – sending a message to the administration that Democrats could muster the numbers for a filibuster the next time around."

A similar USA Today article (9/16, Kiely) says "the big question surrounding" Roberts is how the vote "will affect President Bush's next Supreme Court pick. … An important factor in the Democrats' strategy: how best to position themselves for the next Supreme Court debate."

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Reynolds, Simon) says that "many Democrats had feared that Bush would nominate a judge in the mold of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, but Roberts took pains during his testimony to distance himself from some of their views." Moreover, "according to Democratic calculations of the balance of liberals and conservatives on the court, Roberts' confirmation to replace the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist would substitute one conservative for another."

The New York Times (9/16, Liptak) reports, "At times, Judge Roberts's limited conception of the judge's role struck Democrats as evidence of a cramped approach to the law from a lawyer more taken with technicalities than with justice." Roberts "declined to second-guess positions he had taken as an advocate arguing that a student who had been sexually abused was not entitled to damages and that a death row inmate could not present new evidence of his innocence if certain deadlines had passed."

Another New York Times piece (9/16, Stolberg), headlined "Frustrated By Roberts, And Unsure How To Vote," says Roberts' "unflappable performance during three days of questioning has clearly put Democrats in a quandary." Some "say a strong vote against his nomination could prod the White House into naming a centrist to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a crucial swing vote. Others say that supporting the Roberts nomination could make Democrats appear reasonable, giving them more credibility to oppose the next nominee."

The Washington Times (9/16, Hurt) says "among those Democrats being closely watched is Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, who has said she will not support a nominee who will undo federal abortion rights. 'I don't really know what I'm going to do with respect to voting for you or against you,' she told Judge Roberts yesterday."

The Legal Times (9/16, Goldman) reports, "After two lengthy days of interrogations, Thursday's session was essentially cleanup time for the Democrats, several of whom besides Schumer still wanted to question the witness. … It was clear, however, as had been true since the first day of questioning, that Roberts was going to remain a disciplined nominee, rarely commenting on any case or issue that might one day appear before the Court. … But as in Wednesday's hearing, in which Roberts did reveal some slivers of his legal thinking, Thursday's session also provided a few glimmers of his views, and not merely a recitation of hornbook legal principles about precedent."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Bravin, Cummings) notes that while Roberts "frustrated some Democrats who said he was avoiding answering their questions, he gave Republicans no assurance that he was sympathetic to their causes." He "demurred, for instance, when Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.) asked 'whether the unborn child is a person or is a piece of property.'" However, "Republicans professed no doubts about…Roberts, who himself offered no objection when Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) praised him as a 'strict constructionist.'"

Charles Krauthammer writes in his Washington Post column (9/16, A31) editorializes, "Roberts denies that he has any ideology, any 'overarching judicial philosophy,' and is nothing more than an ad hoc, bottom-up type of guy. Maybe he is. Maybe he isn't." But "he knows that if he dares to say otherwise, he gets Borked." Krauthammer goes on to predict "two things: (a) Chief Justice Roberts will vote to uphold Roe v. Wade , and (b) his replacing his former boss, Chief Justice William Rehnquist, will move the court only mildly, but most assuredly, to the left -- as measured by the only available yardstick, the percentage of concurrences with the opinions of those conservative touchstones, Scalia and Thomas."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (9/16, Toner, Kirkpatrick) reports "liberal advocates warned Thursday that confirming…Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States would threaten hard-won progress on civil rights and women's rights." On the final day of the hearings, "liberals were arrayed in full force before the Senate Judiciary Committee: civil rights leaders, leading feminists and reproductive rights advocates, all warning about the importance of the court in the lives of average Americans." In "one emblematic moment," Rep. John Lewis, "the Georgia Democrat severely beaten during the civil rights movement, told the committee that he feared a Roberts court would 'no longer hear the people's cries for justice,' and no longer act as 'a sympathetic referee'' because of his philosophy of judicial restraint." The Washington Post (9/16, C1, Davis) also notes the civil rights leaders' comments, adding "the 18 committee members are all white -- 17 men and one woman, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). There have also been only a handful of people of color witnessing the proceedings, be they activists from the right or left, students or simply those who wanted to observe history."

Under the headline "Final Day Of Nomination Hearings: Yawn," the Washington Post (9/16, A6) reports, "As Democrats proceeded through their final round of questioning, the Republicans did not conceal their boredom." Sen. Tom Coburn "yawned. Brownback closed his eyes and rubbed his brow." Sen. Lindsey O. Graham "let out a big yawn and fixed his hair. Five GOP staffers shared a joke, then passed a note to Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah), who read it, looked over at the Democratic side and chuckled."

However, the Washington Times (9/16, Hurt) reports, "Sen. John Cornyn turned the tables on Democrats yesterday, transforming the confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. into one of the nastiest partisan conflicts the Senate Judiciary Committee has seen in recent years. Throughout the four days of hearings, Democrats called for the release of internal legal documents Judge Roberts wrote while working in the Solicitor General's Office. Republicans said those documents fall under attorney-client privilege and cannot be released." The Times adds, "Fed up with the repeated pleas, Mr. Cornyn, Texas Republican, reminded the Democrats on the panel of their stunned outrage when some of their own internal records wound up in public. … He was making reference to 14 internal memos that were downloaded from Democratic computers by two Republican staffers and were published by the Wall Street Journal and The Washington Times. The memos revealed a cozy relationship between Democrats on the Judiciary Committee and outside groups with special interests in the federal judiciary."

DNC Intensifies Attacks On Roberts. The Washington Times (9/16, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The Democratic National Committee yesterday stepped up its attacks on Judge John G. Roberts Jr., with DNC Chairman Howard Dean saying that the Supreme Court nominee was 'the wrong man at the wrong time for our country.'" In an e-mail fundraising solicitation to Democrats, Dean wrote, "The skills John Roberts displays are like those of White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove or House Republican Leader Tom DeLay. Both of those men have sharp political minds — they are among the smartest in Washington. But they use those skills to push a narrow ideology and win at any costs." Dean added, "Roberts has spent a career using the law to protect corporate interests and roll back the rights that protect us all."

Hispanic Chamber Of Commerce Calls For Gonzales' Supreme Court Nomination. WDJT-TV Milwaukee (9/15, 5:05 p.m.) reported, "The Hispanic Chamber of Commerce is holding its national convention in Milwaukee this week. Today the chamber officially endorsed John Roberts as the next chief justice, and called for attorney general Alberto Gonzales to be nominated to the high court."

Bush Pledges Federal Effort To Rebuild Areas Ravaged By Katrina. President Bush addressed the nation last night from New Orleans, pledging a massive and sustained federal effort to rebuild the region devastated by Katrina, and taking responsibility for the failures in the relief effort. The AP (9/16, Pickler) says Bush "promised tonight the government will pay most of the costs of rebuilding the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast in one of the largest reconstruction projects the world has ever seen." The President is quoted saying, "There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again." Knight Ridder (9/16, Hutcheson, Bolstad) adds Bush "went further than he ever had in acknowledging the missteps and accepting responsibility." Said Bush, "Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency. … When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

Bush received generally positive media reviews for his speech. Even the New York Times editorial page (9/16), which is often critical of the President, writes this morning that "once again, as he did after 9/11, Mr. Bush has responded to disaster with disconcerting uncertainty, then risen to the occasion later. Once again, he has delivered a speech that will reassure many Americans." Bush's address is being portrayed as a attempt to put his presidency back on track after what many considered a lackluster performance in the immediate aftermath of the storm. As the Christian Science Monitor (9/16, Feldmann) says this morning, "As New Orleans and the devastated Gulf Coast region look ahead to rebuilding and renewal, so, too, President Bush is digging out from the political damage hurricane Katrina has wreaked on his presidency."

All three networks ran the speech live, and ran previews of if in their regular evening newscasts which included excerpts of Bush's remarks from advance copies. After Bush's message, ABC and NBC offered extensive commentary, while CBS quickly returned to regular programming.

On NBC (9/15), Tim Russert said, "I think the President demonstrated to the country he understands the magnitude of this crisis. But because we are three weeks into the crisis, one speech alone will not solve his political problems. … The remaining three years of his Presidency will be devoted to this, and he also has to deal with the problem of the racial divide and that three out of four Americans believe their government is not prepared to protect them if there is another crisis or disaster. It's a tall order. He began tonight, but it must be sustained, complicated and difficult and overseen on a steady, unrelenting way."

On ABC (9/15) after the President's speech, Ted Koppel said Bush "has just given a speech quite breathtaking in terms of the depth and breadth of its commitment." A bit later, ABC's Dean Reynolds spoke with a group of African-American Katrina evacuees in the Reliant Center in Houston. Pressed for their views of Bush's speech, all found reason for optimism and expressed hope at the thought of returning home to New Orleans. In one representative exchange, Reynolds asked Connie London, "You heard the President say repeatedly that you are not alone, that the country stands beside you. Do you believe him?" Connie London: "Yeah, I believe him, because here in Texas, they have truly been good to us. I mean…" Reynolds: "Did you get a sense of hope that you could return to your home one day in New Orleans?" London: "Yes, I did." After hearing the short "focus group" with the Katrina evacuees, Koppel remarked, "If the national response is reflected by that small group of people in the parking lot of the Astrodome, the President has made some major progress tonight." The New York Times (9/16, Saulny) runs a piece echoing the same sentiments, under the headline "Evacuees Find Comfort And Encouragement In Speech."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, McKinnon) calls the speech "hopeful and sympathetic," adding it was "crafted at least in part to revive his political fortunes," while the Los Angeles Times (9/16, Gerstenzang, Chen) says Bush "offered a broad vision of a nation pulling together in common purpose portraying the effort in grand terms." Los Angeles Times media critic Paul Brownfield (9/16), meanwhile, praises the speech's staging. He writes, "Bush…could have given this speech from the Oval Office, but he came to stake his own version of being there. And he chose the only kind of postcard left on the racks -- the impossibly serene one."

The New York Times (9/16, Bumiller) notes "Bush delivered his speech, carried live by the major television networks, in the middle of the city's darkened French Quarter, where Army troops from the 82nd Airborne Division were on patrol. The Bush White House, well practiced in the art of presidential stagecraft, provided its own generators for the lighting and communications equipment that beamed Mr. Bush's remarks to the nation."

Local officials in areas affected by Katrina also expressed satisfaction with Bush's remarks. On ABC (9/15), Koppel spoke with Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard, who said, "This was a speech I waited for the President to say. It was compassionate. It was specific about relief, it gave hope. This is what we need more than anything right now, is hope. In politics, it's all about tomorrow. It's not about yesterday. The blame game can go on in Congress. It can go on in the media, but here locally we still need this relief that the President stated. I was glad to hear it. Thank you, Mr. President."

On ABC (9/15) Koppel spoke with Louisiana state Sen. Cleo Fields, who was in Baton Rouge. Fields said he thought President Bush "made it very clear tonight that, listen, we made mistakes, but that mistake won't happen again. And I would hope that the President will live up to his commitments, and I have every reason to believe that he will. And let's move forward."

Likewise, Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/15), "I thought there were three things that are really very important. First is the president saying Washington is not going to try to dictate the solutions that the people in Mississippi, in my case, the people down on the gulf coast and in south Mississippi, the damaged areas, they're going to make the decisions about how to rebuild, what they want, what their own community should be about. He did make it very plain the second crucial thing that the federal government understands that it has a major commitment here. It's going to be required to support financially what we do, particularly in areas of public infrastructure. But the last thing and I think crucially by this Gulf Opportunity Zone he recognized that really at the end of the day it's the private sector that's going to rebuild the coast, that's going to provide the jobs that it's going to be crucial to whether we're successful and what I'm committed to and that's building the Mississippi gulf coast bigger and better than ever before."

GOP Sen. Richard Shelby said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/15), "I thought it was a very compelling speech. I thought it was sincere. He passed the buck to no one. He accepted it in the mold of President Truman. He admitted a lot. He admitted that no one was prepared. And that means the federal government, the state and the local governments. He was very, very honest, upfront. I think this is a new beginning. It's also a big commitment on the part of the president, and he's committed to Congress, even perhaps tied us down to doing more than some people wanted to do -- not more than I wanted to do, but more than some."

Not all commentary was positive. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, McKinnon) reports that Democratic congressional leaders "criticized Mr. Bush's plan for being long on comforting words, but short on action." In an analysis piece, USA Today (9/16, Keen) says, "Unlike in the aftermath of 9/11, there are few signs now of a pause in political partisanship, and Bush's plea for unity seems unlikely to end criticism." Sen. John Kerry said after the speech, "No American doubts that New Orleans will rise again, they doubt the competence and commitment of this administration." Democrats "said it's too late for Bush to regain the aura of decisiveness that sustained him in other crises. 'The fundamental positive feelings the American people had for him are gone,' said Joe Lockhart, a former press secretary for President Clinton."

Meanwhile, some commentators said the speech lacked a defining moment to change the public's perception of Bush. Mark Whittaker of Newsweek said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/15) that Bush's speech did not contain a "bullhorn moment," adding, "First of all, I think it's too late. I think the response that probably a lot of people had is, this all sounds very good, but why are we hearing it weeks after the event rather than days? On the responsibility issue, he made it sound like this was just a problem that was so overwhelming that nobody could deal with it. And he never accounted for the days when our reporting, other people's reporting shows that things could have been done; they just weren't. I mean, he talks about how he's -- he made it clear that there was a need for broader federal authority in the use of troops."

Former presidential adviser David Gergen said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/15), "I agree with Mark Whitaker, that this was not a bullhorn moment, if that's what the White House was seeking. But it was a strong, confident speech, and I do think it will give reassurance to the people of the Gulf region, that the government -- the federal government, after its faulty beginning, is at last on their side. And it was particularly -- I think it was welcome not only that the president took personal responsibility, but that he's taking the issues of poverty more seriously."

William Schneider said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/15) that Bush "has one thing going for him as he tries to regain the initiative. He has kept his base. Every leader needs a base. Your base are the people who are with you when you're wrong. This president's base is not abandoning him. Eighty-five percent of Republicans stand behind President Bush. His allies defend him. … President Bush has been there for his conservative base, and they're now there for him."

Before the President's speech, NBC Nightly News (9/15, lead story, 3:15, Gregory) reported, "Tonight's speech is one critics say Mr. Bush should have made sooner." Michael Beschloss, NBC News presidential historian: "He's got the opportunity tonight to make Americans think he's the leader that took them through 9/11. Their sense of that has been often absent in the last couple of weeks." ABC World News Tonight (9/15, lead story, 2:45, Moran) reported, "What the White House aides want this speech to do is help the President do what presidents can do in crisis situation. Rally the country around them. Rise above it all. They acknowledge, he starts from a difficult position on this crisis."

That area is the subject of much analysis in this morning's newspapers. The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Balz), under the headline "A Bid To Repair A Presidency," says "the clear subtext was the rebuilding of a presidency that is now at its lowest point ever." More evidence of that, says the Washington Times (9/16, Lakely), comes from the latest Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll, which shows "Bush's approval has slipped in the polls since the federal government's initial response to Hurricane Katrina." It is now at 41%. However, "his speech last night from the devastated Gulf Coast promised an unprecedented federal spending effort and may mark the beginning of a political turnaround."

The New York Times (9/16, Stevenson) says "it was not the president's most stirring speech, but it conveyed a sense of command far more than his off-key efforts in the days immediately after the storm, when he often seemed more interested in bucking up government officials than in addressing the dire situation confronting hundreds of thousands of displaced and desperate people." But "if the speech helped him clear his first hurdle by projecting the aura of a president at the controls, it probably did not, by itself, get him over a second: his need to erase or at least blur the image of a White House that was unresponsive to the plight of some of the country's most vulnerable citizens and failed to manage the government competently."

Democrats Offered "Pre-Buttal," Said Region Needs "Marshall Plan." The Washington Times (9/16, Dinan, Debose) reports, "Democrats yesterday said the Gulf Coast needs a Marshall Plan to get back on its feet and that President Bush should seek more aid. … Speaking hours before Mr. Bush's televised address last night, Sen. Harry Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the government must be prepared to spend on education, health care and other services to make the region whole again."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/16, Henry) reported Reid and Pelosi "stuck a finger in the collective eye of the president and congressional Republicans up here, questioning the priorities on how they're going to spend the money to rebuild the region, also Senator Reid coming out very hard and writing a strong letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist saying he will not participate in this joint House-Senate investigation of what went wrong. Democrats see a political opportunity and they're playing hardball."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/16, Blitzer) noted Democrats came out with a "pre-rebuttal, if you will. They're coming up with criticism, not even knowing specifically" what Bush "is going to be announcing tonight." CNN (King) added, "They are well aware that this president is at one of the weakest points, if not the weakest point, politically, of his presidency. … So the Democrats are trying to say that now -- don't make this disaster a laboratory for ideological ventures like school vouchers for those displaced children or tax credits instead of direct money to rebuild things. So you're going to have an ideological a fight. There are some Democrats who say we should turn the volume down a little bit, step back and let this play out. The president's in trouble. Let him continue to be in trouble. Let's not push him. But especially the liberal base of the Democratic party, they see the president weak. They think in the past they have made a mistake of not challenging him immediately and loudly. This time they're going to challenge him."

Conservatives Worried About Increased Spending. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Calmes) reports "the open-ended commitment by President Bush and congressional leaders to rebuild New Orleans and the Gulf Coast is stoking anger among conservatives over the Republican government's record of higher spending and debt." While "no Republican in Congress is opposing federal aid that already totals $62 billion and is expected to exceed $200 billion, " the party's "conservative wing, led yesterday by Oklahoma's Tom Coburn in the Senate and Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana in the House, is calling for offsetting 'sacrifices' in federal spending. And they're backed by a growing chorus of conservative activists, columnists and bloggers."

In fact, Pence, Coburn, and Sen. John McCain are proposing that the Medicare drug benefit passed by the last Congress be delayed in order to fund the hurricane relief effort. Pence said on Fox News' Big Story with John Gibson last night (9/15) that he, Coburn, and McCain are calling for cuts in government spending, specifically "pork barrel" spending. Also, he said, they are recommending to "delay the rollout of the new Medicare prescription drug entitlement for one year, saving taxpayers some $40 million that we could spend on Katrina."

Under the headline "GOP Split Over Big Plans For Storm Spending," the New York Times (9/16, Hulse) quotes Coburn saying, "I don't believe that everything that should happen in Louisiana should be paid for by the rest of the country. I believe there are certain responsibilities that are due the people of Louisiana." Meanwhile, Sen. Jim DeMint, "called for restoring 'sanity' to the federal recovery effort." The Washington Times (9/16, Dinan) quotes DeMint saying, "Our government needs to take stock of what America is already doing -- the money that has already been contributed -- and see that we have a better role supporting what America can do on its own."

USA Today (9/16, Benedetto) notes Bush "put no price tag on the overall effort or his proposals to help evacuees find jobs and give them a chance to get free federal land for new homes. So far, the government has spent more than $13.7 billion of the $62.3 billion approved by Congress. The final cost is expected to be much higher." He "proposed three initiatives requiring congressional approval: An 'opportunity zone' in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to give tax incentives to businesses that create jobs and loans and loan guarantees to small businesses. Recovery accounts of up to $5,000 for job training, education and child care for each evacuee seeking a job. A lottery to give low-income citizens of the region free federal land. In return, they would pledge to build homes on the lots."

USA Today (9/16, Drinkard) says the funds already spent by the government include "$7.2 billion for Louisiana, where flooding devastated New Orleans; $4.8 billion for Mississippi and $1.5 billion for Alabama."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/16, A1, VandeHei, Baker) says Bush "committed the nation to a plan that officials and lawmakers believe could top $200 billion, roughly the cost of the Iraq war and reconstruction," and which "promises to reorient government for the balance of the Bush presidency." The Washington Times (9/16, Curl) adds Bush "did not directly address how the federal government would pay for the massive project."

More Commentary On Bush's Speech. The New York Times (9/16) writes in an editorial, "Once again, as he did after 9/11, Mr. Bush has responded to disaster with disconcerting uncertainty, then risen to the occasion later. Once again, he has delivered a speech that will reassure many Americans that he understands the enormity of the event and the demands of leadership to come." The speech, "as good as it was, marks only a moment of clarity," and it must be "followed by deeds that are as principled, disciplined and ambitious as Mr. Bush's speech."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/16) discusses Thursday's speech. The paper says Bush's goal was ultimately "to rescue his presidency, which Katrina's storm surge tattered." The Times argues that Bush's "call for a 'Gulf Opportunity Zone' is intriguing, but he needs to make sure storm relief doesn't become a Trojan horse for every conservative ideologue's favorite pet project. Flat tax, anyone?" Bush's speech, adds the Times, "helped him regain his political footing for now. But whether he rescues his legacy from the putrid waters swirling in the streets of New Orleans will depend on whether the aspirations expressed Thursday night are translated into a truly bright future for the region."

USA Today (9/16) editorializes that last night, "Bush at last seemed to have marshaled an effective response as he addressed the nation from New Orleans." However, "whether it will prove to be effectively managed and responsibly financed, or just good public relations, remains to be seen."

Columnist Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (9/16) reports, "Is there any way Mr. Bush could ensure an honest recovery program? Yes -- he could insulate decisions about reconstruction spending from politics by placing them in the hands of an autonomous agency headed by a political independent, or, if no such person can be found, a Democrat (as a sign of good faith)." Bush "didn't do that last night, and probably won't. There's every reason to believe the reconstruction of the Gulf Coast, like the failed reconstruction of Iraq, will be deeply marred by cronyism and corruption."

Homeland Security Taps Special Auditor Teams To Review Katrina Aid. The Washington Times (9/16, Hudson) reports that "teams of auditors and investigators from the Department of Homeland Security expect to spend three to five years at hurricane recovery field offices in an attempt to prevent fraudulent use of more than $60 billion in relief funds. 'We're going to prevent what is still going to happen, contract procurement irregularities,' said Tamara Faulkner, spokeswoman for the inspector general's office." FEMA "routinely uses inspector general auditors to monitor federal dollars that are sent to disaster zones, such as the hurricanes that hit Florida last year, but the Katrina operation and the potential for fraud is on 'an unprecedented level,' Miss Faulkner said. A team of 30 inspector general employees will hit the ground Monday at field offices in Baton Rouge, La., Montgomery, Ala., and Jackson, Miss., she said. Later next week, three auditors will be sent to Texas. Although Congress gave authority to the department's inspector general, Richard Skinner, to stop contract fraud and a $15 million budget to get started, some lawmakers want to create new watchdogs." Senate Homeland Security Chair Susan Collins "yesterday introduced a bill to expand the jurisdiction of the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction to oversee the recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast region, with an $80 million budget."

Senate Passes Hurricane Tax Relief Bill. CNN's The Situation Room (9/15, Velshi) reported that the Senate has passed an 18-point plan "for hurricane tax relief. There are some very important provisions in this bill. … One of them is that, if you have debts that are discharged because of the hurricane, the IRS is now going to make sure that you don't have to pay tax on that debt that you now don't have to pay. If you're a victim of the hurricane, you are going to be allowed to withdraw more out of your IRA or 401(k) without the 10 percent penalty that you typically have to pay. There is also going to be greater encouragement through tax deduction for companies that want to donate food and books, because of the shortage of books as a result of schools getting flooded and destroyed. The Senate has passed a bill that is going to encourage donation of books to schools.

There is going to be an increase in the limit, the taxable limit, for donations, cash contributions for hurricane relief."

The AP (9/16, Dalrymple) reports, "Lawmakers on Thursday worked to help solve the practical problems facing those caught in Hurricane Katrina's path who need quick access to cash, housing and medical care." The AP continues, "The House and Senate passed nearly identical bills to let victims tap retirement accounts without penalty and help working poor families and parents retain their tax credits. Senators also voted for rental housing vouchers and aid measures for small business. … The action came ahead of President Bush's prime-time speech from New Orleans about the comprehensive recovery effort he envisions for the battered Gulf Coast." The AP adds, "On Capitol Hill, Republicans and Democrats fought over plans for a special, GOP-majority committee to investigate the government's sluggish response to the emergency. The House endorsed the idea by a mostly partisan 224-188 vote. Democrats warned they would boycott. … Louisiana lawmakers outlined a reconstruction plan, called 'Project Pelican,' for their devastated state. It includes coastal restoration and economic development incentives to brings jobs and people back to New Orleans. … Help was coming from the Treasury Department, which ruled that the hurricane qualified as a hardship. That allows victims and their families tap into retirement plans, including 401(k)s, an effort aimed at people with little savings to recover from the storm."

Conservatives, Liberals Equally Critical Of FEMA Trailer Plan. The Washington Post (9/16, A18, Weisman) reports that the approximately 300,000 FEMA trailers "to be purchased with nearly $5 billion" of federal funds "have become a focal point of criticism of the Bush administration's early rebuilding efforts." Housing experts -- "conservatives and liberals alike" -- worry that FEMA "encampments will quickly become what former House Speaker Newt Gingrich called 'ghettos of despair.' Rental vouchers in a market with plenty of available housing would be cheaper and faster and provide better accommodations, they say." Rep. Jeff Flake said, "Three hundred thousand manufactured homes? People are screaming about that. I tell you, FEMA is a disaster." But "beleaguered FEMA officials yesterday counseled patience. When Katrina struck, they were criticized for moving too slowly, they said. Now, they are being second-guessed for moving too quickly." FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said, "The governors and their local officials are looking at all these issues. They're working with all the evacuees in these communities to ensure they are incorporated into the community, they're given job assistance and the help they need. We have more than 300,000 displaced households, and they have to live somewhere."

USA Today (9/16, Ritter) reports, "Hotels, private homes, churches, cruise ships, gyms and campgrounds will continue to accommodate many of the displaced in coming weeks. An estimated 1 million people fled Katrina. But disaster officials say they're moving to assemble and make livable up to 300,000 trailers and other temporary housing units in Louisiana and Mississippi as fast as they can find sites and arrange utilities, schooling and other necessities with cities and counties."

FEMA Still Has Not Delivered Tents To Mississippi Victims. CNN's The Situation Room (9/15, Feyerick) reported, "D'Iberville, Mississippi is just north of Biloxi. It's a desperate situation there. FEMA has yet to deliver six huge tents that officials were counting on to house more than 1,000 people. The city manager says people who were counting on those tents are living in homes that are still flooded."

Mississippi Residents Displaced By Katrina Feel Neglected By FEMA. NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 3, 2:45, Williams) reported Mississippi "hasn't admittedly received the coverage New Orleans has, even though only 10% of the homes along the coast were undamaged by the storm." NBC (Mott) added, "For more than two weeks, Katrina news coverage has focused on New Orleans. But across the state line, Mississippi is a mess. 52 of its 82 counties have been declared disaster areas, cities like Pass Christian, Bay St. Louis, Waveland, Long Beach, Gulfport, and Biloxi, devastated. Much of Mississippi is gone, and now, many here argue, forgotten." While Federal "rescue and recovery teams have been pouring into Louisiana and FEMA gives updates from Baton Rouge every day, many Mississippians say the agency's hard to find."

Hutchinson Says FEMA Should Remain Part Of DHS. The Springdale (AR) Daily News (9/16, Dailey) reports that Arkansas gubernatorial candidate Asa Hutchinson, "the former undersecretary for Border and Transportation Security in the Department of Homeland Security," said that FEMA should not be separated from DHS. Hutchinson said officials and the public pressures DHS "into concentrating on defending against another terrorist attack to the detriment of planning for the much-more-likely natural disasters, and a better balance between the two is needed, Hutchinson said." He added, "You know there are going to be hurricanes and tornadoes. You don't always have terrorist attacks every year."

Poll Finds Three In Five Americans Say FEMA Should Be Autonomous. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "By two to one, a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows, the public holds an unfavorable view of FEMA after criticism of its Katrina response. But by 61%-20%, respondents echo Democrats like Sen. Clinton who say FEMA should be autonomous, as in her husband's presidency, not part of Homeland Security; majorities of conservatives and Republicans agree." The Journal adds, "Homeland Security chief Chertoff's 17% negative rating exceeds his 13% positive, but 50% don't know him."

Low Opinion Of FEMA Has Not Hurt Overall Confidence In Government. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Despite FEMA's woes, Katrina hasn't shifted confidence in federal government generally. Some 31% say Washington can be trusted to do the right thing at least most of the time, matching a June Gallup survey. After 9/11, confidence in Washington surged."

Pentagon Mortuary Teams Will Deploy To Gulf Coast. The Washington Times (9/16, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has signed off on mortuary teams from the 54th Quartermaster Company at Fort Lee, Va., deploying to the Gulf Coast. The job was supposed to be handled by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. But FEMA informed the Pentagon it must first find a contractor for the gritty work."

FCC To Spend $211 Million To Rebuild Hurricane-Damaged Communications. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said yesterday the government will spend $211 million to help rebuild communications links for people affected by Hurricane Katrina. USA Today (9/16, Davidson) reports that at a special agency meeting in Atlanta to assess the effects of the storm, Martin said, "We need to determine how we can help companies strengthen our communications infrastructure, create more robust and reliable networks, and improve the ability to quickly restore service when disaster does strike." USA adds, "The $211 million will come from the $6 billion-a-year universal service fund, which is financed by a 10.2% surcharge on every customer's long-distance bill."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Schatz, Rhoads) calls the move "welcome news to phone companies in the region. BellSouth estimates it could cost between $400 million and $600 million to replace ruined equipment in the three-state area hit hardest by the hurricane." The Journal adds that Martin "proposed changes that would allow it to take a larger role in coordinating emergency communications and restoring telephone services." Under Martin's proposals, "the FCC would be reorganized to include a new Public Safety/Homeland Security Bureau. The FCC also would assemble an independent panel to examine what happened to the phone networks and communications between first responders and how they might be improved."

The New York Times (9/16, Nelson) says Martin's proposal "would give evacuees cellphones and 300 free minutes and help customers reconnect their phone lines. Money would also be made available to schools, libraries, health organizations and relief agencies like the Red Cross to rebuild their phone and Internet connections."

The Washington Post (9/16, C1, Krim) adds that some "executives, academics and analysts are urging a more ambitious approach: Make New Orleans and the surrounding areas super-connected communities, with advanced services that surpass what is available anywhere in the country, if not the world." With much of the region's communications infrastructure in ruins, "these experts see the perfect opportunity to deploy new systems that otherwise might be too expensive or disruptive to build. The result, they say, could be a bonanza of higher technology at lower prices for businesses and consumers, more robust emergency-responder systems and an ability to provide high-speed Internet access to poorer segments of the population often left off of the information highway."

Mississippi AG Sues To Force Insurers To Pay Flood Claims. Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood has filed suit against five large insurance companies yesterday seeking to force them to pay for flood damage from Hurricane Katrina. This, despite flooding exclusions that are standard in most homeowners' policies. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Francis) reports, "The suit, filed in state court in Jackson, seeks to override the exclusions. It comes as tens of thousands of Gulf Coast property owners struggle with the cost of rebuilding homes damaged by the wall of water that surged with the hurricane Aug. 29." Hood's suit names State Farm, Allstate Corp., Mississippi Farm Bureau Mutual Insurance Cos., United Services Automobile Association and Nationwide Mutual insurance Co.

The New York Times (9/15, Bayot) reports that Hood's suit accuses insurers "of selling confusing policies that fell short of homeowners' reasonable expectations of coverage. Mr. Hood argued that because property owners 'purchased these policies for the primary purpose of insuring against any and all hurricane damage,' insurers should be liable for property damage caused by flooding - a hazard long excluded from traditional homeowner policies." Hood "is seeking a temporary restraining order to prevent companies from denying or reducing coverage based on water exclusions, or from asking property owners to sign documents stating that their loss was caused by water rather than wind."

USA Today (9/15, Chu) says Hood's complaint claims that the insurers' policies "'attempt to exclude coverage for storm-surge damage' caused by the hurricane. This is 'an unfair or deceptive trade practice' under state law, Hood says."

Programs Seek To Retrain Workers Displaced By Katrina. Programs stretching from Louisiana to Texas and Mississippi are retraining thousands of workers displaced in the Gulf Coast. USA Today (9/15, Swartz) reports, "The programs are designed to find jobs for those forced to relocate or whose employers suspended operations, say state officials in Louisiana and Texas. Many of the job seekers are likely to be placed in fields such as construction, health care, energy and cleanup, says Barton Smith, director of the Institute for Regional Forecasting at the University of Houston. … Community and technical colleges in Louisiana this week started a job-training program to match and prepare evacuees with jobs in construction, plumbing, welding and hazardous waste removal."

Displaced Healthcare Workers In Demand Nationwide. In a separate story, USA Today (9/15, Appleby) adds that displaced healthcare workers from New Orleans and the Gulf Coast "are being lured with signing bonuses, relocation assistance and other perks by hospitals, doctor offices and clinics nationwide. … A shortage of medical workers in many parts of the USA almost guarantees that workers who leave the hurricane-battered areas will find work. What's more difficult to know is whether the health care workers who accept new jobs will return."

Writer Says Middle Class Also Hurt By Katrina. Writer Jennifer Moses writes in the Washington Post (9/16, A31), "I keep seeing pictures of the president with his shirt-sleeves rolled up, surveying the damage to New Orleans. But I wonder if he has any idea just who the folks are who have been displaced by Hurricane Katrina. I ask because here in Baton Rouge we keep hearing about the desperately poor, and sometimes criminal, hordes Katrina has washed up on the shores of decent, hardworking, middle-class America: the (mainly black) gangs from the projects who, even during normal times, wreaked havoc on their fellow citizens, not to mention the merely poor -- teen mothers, drug addicts, the chronically unemployed. But the shelter in which I've been volunteering tells a different story. … Indeed, an aura of normality and order pervades even this bizarre community, built of rows and rows of folding canvas cots, donated bed linens and garbage bags filled with other people's castoff clothing, and peopled by the young and old, black and white, American-born and foreign-born: a United Nations of languages, a stew of stories." Moses adds, "What I'm learning in the shelters is that it's not just the poor who have no place to go and no place to fall back on; it's also ordinary working people who in better times might have been counted as part of the middle class, too. Where are my new friends going to go?"

Confirmed Death Toll In Hurricane Zone Climbs Over 700. The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 2, 0:20, Schieffer) reported, "The death toll climbed even higher. 474 are now known dead in Louisiana. The total across the five-state disaster area went past 700, and is expected to go much higher in the days ahead."

New Orleans Mayor Announces Plan For Displaced Residents To Return. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin yesterday announced a plan to gradually permit New Orleans evacuees to return to the city in order to jump start the city's economy and return it to a "normal rhythm of life." Nagin's announcement, rather than a preview of President Bush's primetime speech, was the lead story on CBS, while ABC and NBC both ran it second in their lineup.

The CBS Evening News (9/15, lead story, 2:35, Pitts) reported, "Despite it all, the Mayor of New Orleans was smiling today." Nagin: "The city of New Orleans starting on Monday, starting this weekend, will start to breath again." Pitts: "That includes the French Quarter, where wealthy entrepreneurs held a power lunch today, New Orleans style, red beans and rice included."

ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 2, 2:55, Harris) reported Nagin is "calling it his 'bring New Orleans back' plan. Starting this Saturday, and staggered over a 10 day period, nearly 200,000 people will be allowed home." Nagin is "promising to restore the quote 'normal rhythm of life.' He even says there will be retail stores in the now-infamous convention center. But, in a news conference repeatedly interrupted by helicopters…making it clear that people will be coming clear that people will be coming home to what is essentially a military zone with poisonous water lurking nearby -- and no schools or fully operational hospitals. There are also concerns that criminals will return, concerns Nagin addressed by pointing out that there are soldiers and police here from across the country."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 2, 2:40, Williams) reported, "Here in this city, the Mayor surprised a lot of people when he said that soon, people can start coming back to New Orleans." NBC (Tibbles) added, "Today New Orleans took one big step towards getting back to normal, inviting some residents back. But what are they going to find when they get here? It wasn't an announcement people were expecting so soon." For "many considering that move, this is what they'll find, mile after mile of thick, dried sludge, much of it as toxic as the water."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Cooper, Young, McKay) reports, "Some New Orleans residents returned to their homes and businesses to begin cleaning up the damage left by Hurricane Katrina, and Mayor Ray Nagin said large swaths of the city would be reopened starting tomorrow. Yesterday's announcement by the mayor amounted to an abandonment of efforts to persuade thousands of holdouts still in the battered city to leave. A New Orleans police spokesman said no one hunkered down in a home nearly three weeks after the storm hit would be forced out despite the lack of power and drinkable water in many parts of the city."

USA Today (9/16, Parker, Levin) reports, "Most of the city has electricity. But city water is largely undrinkable, schools remain shut, and thousands of waterlogged homes need to be pulled down and rebuilt. Levees need repairs, and a nighttime curfew will be in effect to hold down crime. Those who return should not expect much, city officials said. 'Just because the electricity is going, it doesn't mean that all the gas stations are open,' mayoral executive assistant Greg Mefert said. 'The residents need to have very realistic expectations of how the city is functioning, and they can't expect complete normality and to go about their normal day.'"

The Washington Post (9/16, A13, Whoriskey) reports, "Authorities warned residents not to drink or bathe in the water in most of the city because contaminated floodwaters are seeping into waterlines through major breaks. The 911 emergency-call system is not fully operational. Even in the least affected areas, thousands of homes are without power, and the lack of traffic lights has led to accidents among some of the emergency vehicles rolling through city streets. Asked whether the reentry plan may be premature, Nagin said, 'I'm getting all kinds of push that I'm moving a little too slow.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Riccardi, Powers) reports, "As many as 180,000 residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina will eventually be allowed to move back into homes and apartments that escaped overwhelming flood and storm damage, the mayor said." But even as he "hailed his city's semi-return, Nagin also acknowledged that dwellings that housed half of the city's 450,000 residents will have to be razed. 'Most of the homes that were flooded that stayed in the water for a number of weeks will most likely be destroyed,' Nagin said."

The New York Times (9/16, Yardley) reports, "The tentative re-entry plan calls for residents to be allowed into the Algiers neighborhood by the weekend. Uptown would be accessible by the middle of next week and the French Quarter on Sept. 26. The city's downtown and the other three areas will be open to business owners over the weekend. All are areas that suffered less damage from the storm. But, city officials said, the schedules may change."

The Washington Times/AP (9/16, Martel) reports, "The re-population of the city would proceed by ZIP code, starting Monday in the Algiers section, a Creole-influenced neighborhood across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter. The city's Uptown section, which includes the Garden District's leafy streets and antebellum mansions, will open in stages next Wednesday and Friday."

New Orleans Could Be Pumped Out Sooner Than Originally Expected. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/15, Cooper) reported, "So is New Orleans ready to reopen? There are positive signs. Flood waters are fast receding. The Army Corps of Engineers says water is dropping by more than a foot a day. Some areas like Algiers and New Orleans west bank have power and running water, which the mayor says is suitable for drinking. Mayor Nagin also says he's speaking with Wal-Mart about opening a store in the convention center so newly returned residents will have somewhere to shop. He also says despite the violence and looting witnessed in Katrina's aftermath, the city is the safest it's been in years."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/15, Feyerick) reported that floodwaters "are draining much faster than expected and the Army Corps of Engineers says except for a few ponds in low lying areas, New Orleans could be pumped out by October 18th. Radio stations have been calling people home zip code by zip code, yet it may not be completely safe. If another storm hits, engineers say there is no guarantee the levees will hold."

Many Evacuees Want To Settle Permanently In Houston, Poll Finds. The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Morin, Rein) reports that "fewer than half of all New Orleans evacuees living in emergency shelters here said they will move back home, while two-thirds of those who want to relocate planned to settle permanently in the Houston area," according to a Post/Harvard School of Public Health/Kaiser Family Foundation survey. The "wide-ranging poll found that these survivors of Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath remain physically and emotionally battered but unbroken." The "overwhelming majority lack insurance to cover their losses. Few have bank checking accounts, savings accounts or credit cards that work. Still, nearly nine in 10 said they were 'hopeful' about the future. And while half said they felt depressed about what lies ahead, just a third said they were afraid."

Texas Convention Centers, Arenas Still Hold 20,000 Evacuees. The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Merida) profiles evacuees at the Dallas Convention Center, which has become "a strange but comforting replacement neighborhood for those whose real 'hoods were drowned by Katrina. Here, the miserable and the hopeful, thrown together by common circumstance, have been trying to sort out their futures." Texas officials "estimate their state has absorbed more than 200,000 Gulf Coast hurricane survivors, the majority of whom have scattered to apartments and hotels, churches and private homes. But approximately 20,000 remain in convention centers and sports arenas, the last resort for those who had nowhere else to turn or haven't yet decided where they belong."

New Orleans Suburb Defends Decision To Turn Back Those Fleeing Katrina. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Riccardi) reports that the "mostly white suburb" of Greta, Louisiana, "became a symbol of callousness for using armed officers to seal one of the last escape routes from New Orleans -- trapping thousands of mostly black evacuees in the flooded city -- the Gretna City Council passed a resolution supporting the police chief's move." In the aftermath of Katrina, Gretna "blocked the bridge over the Mississippi River that connects their city to New Orleans." The small city's mayor said that while Gretna first "commandeered buses and moved more than 5,000 to a food station miles away," Gretna simply did not have the resources to continue. And so, "armed Gretna police, helped by local sheriff's deputies and bridge police, stood guard and turned hundreds of men, women and children back to New Orleans."

Vietnamese-Americans In Gulf Coast Region Familiar With Refugee Status. USA Today (9/16, Phan) writes that "many Vietnamese-Americans have become refugees again" in the wake of Katrina. Starting in the early 1980's, "Vietnamese refugees started settling into enclaves around New Orleans, Biloxi and Mobile, attracted by the familiar humid climate and seeking to earn livings as fishermen and shrimpers."

Concerns About Mental Health Of Evacuees Grow. ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 3, 2:20, Woodruff) reported, "It has been 18 days now since Katrina struck. There is growing concern about the mental health of the evacuees, particularly the children. The relief group Save the Children estimates 400,000 children were forced from their homes. Many lost family members and witnessed horrible devastation. An army of therapists have been sent to schools in shelters and schools, and in Houston, where so many of them ended up, a special project is under way." ABC (Pinto) examined an effort by volunteers to have children and teens use art to express and overcome their feelings.

Katrina Brings No Widespread Illness Outbreaks To Region. USA Today (9/16, Manning) report that Katrina "hasn't brought widespread epidemics to the region, officials with the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention say. 'What we've seen is what we would expect,' says Ali Khan, who is directing the CDC's operation in the New Orleans area. The complaints include accidental injuries and skin or respiratory infections." Still, the "'challenge is a lot bigger than in other disasters,' Khan says. 'We don't have a lot of experience evacuating a large city with this kind of infrastructure damage.' Previous hurricanes, however, taught health officials the value of tetanus vaccination and careful hygiene in shelters."

Ordeal At New Orleans Hospital Recounted. USA Today (9/16, Davis) reports on the "struggle to stay alive there in the dark days after the hurricane" at the Lindy Boggs Medical Center in New Orleans. Today, "the 187-bed hospital is empty; 19 bodies have been removed."

Katrina's Negative Economic Impact Becoming Apparent. Hurricane Katrina's impact on the economy is becoming more apparent, reports the Wall Street Journal (9/16, Hilsenrath). According to the Journal, "Thousands of individuals displaced by the storm have already filed for unemployment benefits and thousands more are expected, according to a Labor Department report. Meanwhile, gauges of manufacturing activity far from the Gulf of Mexico showed softening early this month, and economists and executives expressed concerns about rising energy costs. Largely because of gasoline-price increases before Katrina, the Labor Department's latest consumer-price index rose 0.5% in August, pushing it up 3.6% from a year ago, the largest increase in four years. More than 90% of the prices used to compile the report were gathered before the storm struck, meaning steeper increases are likely to come. … Taken together, the reports underscored the economy's turbulence since the storm hit at the end of last month. Energy-price increases hadn't been feeding broader inflation before the storm, though pressures seemed to be mounting."

The New York Times (9/16, Andrews) says, "The economic data for the period before the storm suggested that consumer spending held up despite rising gas prices, that companies were still hiring and that inflation pressures remained a cause for worry. Many economists expect that trend to resume after a predictable drop in growth as a result of hurricane-related disruptions. On top of that, the Bush administration and Congress are about to rev up the economy with a staggering amount of federal money for relief and reconstruction." The Times adds, "It remains possible that the Federal Reserve will refrain from raising short-term interest rates next Tuesday, which would be the first time in 11 meetings that it held rates steady. The best reason to do that would be to wait for more evidence of the impact from the hurricane and the spike in gasoline prices in the last two weeks."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, lead story, 3:15, Williams) reported, "In another sign of this storm's economic toll, first-time unemployment claims shot up by 71,000 last week, the biggest jump in almost a decade."

The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 4, 0:15, Schieffer) reported, "Hurricane Katrina has thrown thousands of people out of work. The government said today another 68,000 of them joined the line for unemployment benefits last week. That's on top of 16,000 the week before, for a total of 84,000."

Energy Price Increases Fuel Rise In Inflation. The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 10, 0:35, Schieffer) reported, "Gasoline is doing a big number on family budgets. The government says consumer prices shot up half a percent in August. Energy is to blame for most of the increase, and that was before Katrina. So far this year, inflation is running 3.9%. It was 3.3% last year."

Government Credit Cards For Katrina Relief Under Fire. The AP (9/16, Yen) reports, "Lawmakers and watchdog groups worry that allowing federal employees to charge up to $250,000 on their government-issued credit cards for Hurricane Katrina-related expenses will lead to a repeat of past abuses." The AP continues, "Some of the cards in the past were used to pay for prostitutes, gambling activity, even breast implants, government audits have shown. … 'People are concerned this is a risk,' said Greg Kutz, managing director of special investigations at the General Accountability Office, which conducts audits at the request of Congress." The AP adds, "About 250,000 federal employees have government credit cards, which typically have a purchase limit of $2,500. At the request of the Bush administration, Congress increased the credit line to $250,000 as part of a massive Katrina recovery bill approved last week. The aim is to make it easier to speed aid to victims. … Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said the 'outrageous increase' was 'slipped' into the bill. He is seeking to insert language in a Katrina health bill that would reduce the limit in most cases to $50,000." The AP notes, "Responding to initial criticism, the White House issued new guidelines this week saying agencies must designate in writing which of their staff will receive the new spending privileges. Purchases of more than $50,000 must be preapproved by a senior manager. … Critics say the additional oversight is needed because the cards offer special opportunities for abuse."

Rights Group Urges Freeze On Mortgage Foreclosures For Katrina Victims. The AP (9/16, Gordon) reports, "As Hurricane Katrina brought into focus the financial plight of many blacks along the Gulf Coast, a leading U.S. civil rights group urged lenders to freeze mortgage foreclosures and suspend late fees on loans for people affected by the hurricane. … 'There are a few steps that can and should be taken by all financial institutions to ensure that the people of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and the other areas affected by Katrina are not further victimized and do not suffer further losses,' Hilary Shelton of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Speaking to members of a House Financial Services subcommittee, the director of the NAACP's Washington bureau Shelton, said the civil rights group also was concerned about predatory lenders who "must be circling some of the worst-hit areas, salivating at the potential for abuse" of Katrina's victims. … Alabama Congressman Spencer Bachus, the panel's chairman, said federal banking regulators need to help banks in the disaster zones by relaxing some rules." The AP notes, "The storm's devastating impacts on the poorest communities in the Gulf Coast starkly illustrated the differences in how minorities and whites are treated by banks. … Many poor people lost their cash savings, much of it stashed under mattresses and in teapots. Around the country, many low-income minorities shun banks, have never used an ATM machine or applied for a home mortgage. Often, they turn to storefront payday lenders, which charge high interest."

Louisiana Frees About 1,000 Prisoners Due To Flood-Related Overcrowding. USA Today (9/16, Frank) reports Louisiana has released "about 1,000 inmates" in order to "ease crowding caused when two large prisons flooded. All the released inmates had been in a 90-day prison program -- suspended last week -- for parole- and probation-violators who get extensive counseling while incarcerated. None has a record of violent or sexual crimes."

White House Gives NASA "Thumbs Up" For Moon, Mars Shuttle Replacement Plan. The New York Times (9/16, Broad) reports, "The White House has approved NASA's plan to replace the nation's aging" shuttle fleet "with a new generation of vehicles meant to carry human explorers back to the Moon and onward to Mars and beyond, aerospace experts said yesterday. The new rockets and spaceships are a radical departure for the space program, rearranging the components of the space shuttle into a new design expected to be more powerful that the shuttle but also safer. The shuttle has had two fatal accidents in 114 missions." George Washington University Space Policy Institute director John M. Logsdon said the measure amounts to a "thumbs-up for NASA to pursue the shuttle-derived vehicle," and adds, "The question is the schedule, not the basic approach." The Times adds that "other experts, who refused to be identified because the space agency will not formally announce the proposal formally, also spoke about the plan yesterday."

Reynolds Will Urge House GOP To Shelve Social Security Reform. Aides confirmed yesterday that NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds will recommend to the House Republican leadership that the party drop its effort to restructure Social Security at least for this year. The Washington Post (9/16, A5, Weisman) calls Reynolds's move "fresh evidence that Hurricane Katrina is having a dramatic impact on the GOP's agenda. House and Senate leaders had already pushed off consideration of cuts in taxes and entitlement spending until the end of October. President Bush's tax reform panel has delayed release of its recommendations." The Post adds, "Reynolds (R-N.Y.) made his stand in a showdown with House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), according to two witnesses. At a committee luncheon Wednesday, Thomas told panel members he was pushing forward with broad retirement security legislation that would include measures to strengthen private pensions, promote personal savings and add private investment accounts to Social Security. Reynolds then stood to say he would recommend to the leadership that it do no such thing."

Federal Employee Health Insurance Premiums To Rise 6.6%. The Bush Administration announced yesterday that federal employees' health insurance premiums will increase an average of 6.6% next year. The Washington Post (9/16, A29, Lee) reports that while the increase is the lowest in nine years "an official with one federal employee union branded the increase 'outrageous,' noting that average employee contributions to their health premiums will rise faster than the portion paid by the government."

Government Releases Results Of Comprehensive Sex Survey. The New York Times

DOJ_NMG_0005914

(9/16, Lewin) reports, "The National Center for Health Statistics released the government's most comprehensive survey of American sexual practices and reproductive health yesterday, delving for the first time into such sensitive areas as the prevalence of oral sex among teenagers and same-sex activity among adults."

Ophelia Slowly Moves Up North Carolina Cost. USA Today (9/15, Brook) reports that Hurricane Ophelia continued its "soaking crawl" along North Carolina's coast Thursday, whipping rain and surf for house. USA adds, "A weakened Ophelia could smack Massachusetts' Cape Cod this weekend. Tropical storm watches have been issued there. And North Carolina will still feel its winds today." Damage "was significant because the storm stalled off the coast. Rather than a brief lashing, people withstood hours of a relentless 80-mph blast."

The Washington Post (9/15, A3, Cooperman) adds, "Although the Outer Banks islands of Ocracoke and Hatteras were still in danger of heavy winds and surging water, the hurricane's slow and meandering path spared most coastal areas of the severe flooding that had been predicted. By evening, its winds were blowing about 75 mph, just enough to earn Ophelia classification as a hurricane. Authorities blamed one death on the storm, from a rain-slicked traffic accident inland near the state capital of Raleigh."

ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 4, :45, Woodruff) reported, "The unpredictable storm took days to reach the vulnerable islands in the Outer Banks, and now it has decided to stay awhile, just about stalling offshore. Peak winds are 75 miles an hour, and up to 15 inches of rain are expected before Ophelia pulls out to sea tomorrow. There has been some damage, and 80,000 utility customers are without power. Many have decided to ride out the storm at home."

The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Federal and state disaster teams were there to help, but many residents decided to stay put, even though some may now regret it."

Study Says Rising Sea Temperatures Increasing Hurricane Severity. A study published today in the journal Science concludes that rising sea temperatures have been accompanied by a significant increase in the most destructive hurricanes. The Washington Post (9/15, A13, Eilperin) says the study adds "fuel to an international debate over whether global warming contributed to the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina." According to the study by researchers at the School of Earth and Atmospheric Sciences at Georgia Tech and the National Center for Atmospheric Research, "the number of major Category 4 and 5 hurricanes worldwide has nearly doubled over the past 35 years, even though the total number of hurricanes, including weaker ones, has dropped since the 1990s."

Experts Eye Deregulation As Factor In 2003 Blackout. The Department of Energy and its Canadian counterpart held their first public meeting Thursday on the 2003 blackout which darkened cities from New York to Toronto and Detroit. The New York Times (9/16, Wald) reports, 'Engineers, government officials and executives said at the meeting that amid its restructuring the industry needed further changes to reduce the frequency of blackouts as utilities that formerly generated power, transmitted it and delivered it were broken up into separate entities of competing businesses." The Times notes that a binational report issued three months after the incident "did not list deregulation as a cause, instead citing factors like failure to trim trees, train operators and install control systems that could have kept track of the status of all power lines and generators. Much of the investigation leading to that report was managed by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the architect of utility restructuring in the United States. The report called for a separate study - it did not say by whom - on the role of deregulation in the blackout, but that study has never been done."

Rising Natural Gas Prices Expected To Drive Up Electricity Prices. Soaring natural gas bills are threatening to push electricity prices to unprecedented levels. According to a front page story in the Wall Street Journal (9/16, Smith), the price of natural gas had doubled over the last two years even before Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast. Katrina's destruction "has roiled energy markets, sending natural-gas and oil prices to record levels and foreshadowing eventual rate increases for electricity in the Southeast, where utilities must rebuild heavily damaged systems. Now, as the winter heating season approaches for much of the country, consumers face a double threat. Many will see record costs on their bills for the natural gas that fuels their furnaces, stoves and clothes dryers. Consumers -- and businesses -- also will get hit with higher charges for electricity made by power plants that burn pricey natural gas." The Journal adds that "power generators are being quoted natural-gas prices for this fall and winter that also look extremely high -- $11.34 for contracts on the New York Mercantile Exchange for October, $11.97 for November and $12.45 for December deliveries. All surpass prices for September that were less than $10. They translate into raw power prices, not adjusted for inflation, that are high even before adding regular utility costs that would push the retail cost up substantially."

Delta, Northwest Bankruptcies Spark Fears About Pension Security. The Financial Times (9/16, Daniel) reports, "Concern about the impact of the bankruptcies of Delta and Northwest airlines on workers' pensions has led to urgent calls in Washington for immediate pension relief. Harry Reid, Senate minority leader, said: 'Congress has an immediate opportunity to pass legislation enabling both companies to keep pension plans for workers in place.' Johnny Isakson, senator from Georgia, where Delta is based, told the Financial Times on Thursday: 'We want to bring the bill to the floor as early as next week. The airlines stated they wanted to preserve their defined benefit plans and their ability to do that is tied to whether we can get pension reform passed.'" The Times adds, "The sense of urgency comes as the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, the federal agency that insures defined benefit pension plans, said it could assume liabilities of $8.4bn from Delta's pension plan if it was terminated. That would mark its biggest pension termination. Northwest's liabilities were smaller, at $2.8bn, the PBGC said on Thursday.'

Former Airline CEO Urges Revision Of Bankruptcy Laws. Robert Crandall, former chairman and CEO of American Airlines, writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/16), "Delta and Northwest Airlines' bankruptcy filings are the latest consequences of the troubles afflicting the long-established, or 'legacy,' airlines. Inflexible work rules, above-market wage rates, under-funded fixed benefit pension plans, huge debt burdens, outdated business practices and high fuel costs burden the legacy carriers with enormous disadvantages relative to newer carriers who are flying by different rules. … Among the most egregious of these burdens are those imposed by the nation's bankruptcy statutes." Crandall adds, "Revising the bankruptcy laws would certainly cause hardship for the communities and employees most involved with failed airlines. On the other hand, revising the rules would offer expanded opportunities for new competitors and for legacy carriers whose managements, unions and employees are most willing to adapt to new realities. … To build a better airline industry we need bankruptcy laws designed to incentivize success and penalize failure. We need labor laws that better balance the power of unions and management. … Finally, we need administration and Congressional support for legislation to provide the FAA with the resources to build and operate an aviation infrastructure consistent with both U. S. aviation leadership and growing consumer demand."

WSJournal Urges Phasing Out Of PBGC Guarantees. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/16) says, "This week's bankruptcy filings raise the possibility that Delta and Northwest will join United Airlines and US Airways in dumping their pension obligations onto taxpayers. Members of Congress will howl, but it's time for the politicians to admit their own role in co-piloting the airline industry into Chapter 11." The "root of the problem for these 'legacy' carriers is the burden of pension costs. And one tantalizing option is to use bankruptcy to pass them off to the taxpayer via the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. (PBGC). Congress created this government-run insurance system in 1974, promising to 'protect workers' when companies failed. But as always with such government guarantees, Congress only created a future 'moral hazard' that is now coming due. … If the Members really wanted to help, they'd leave the airlines alone and find a way to phase out PBGC guarantees."

Unions Facing Harsh Challenges. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, A6, Maher) reports, "Union leaders expect the bankruptcy filings of Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines to increase pressure on other carriers to seek further cost cutting from their workers. The troubling reality for unions: There seems to be very little they can do to stop the trend. … The latest round of airline woes has come as the labor movement's fissures have widened, raising questions as to whether some of organized labor's problems are self-inflicted. This summer's defections from the AFL-CIO by four major unions -- representing more than one-third of the labor federation's members -- highlight existing tensions among unions and unwillingness to back fellow unions during strikes." The Journal notes, "The harsh challenges confronting unions in the airline industry, while more extreme than those in other corners of the labor movement, illustrate the problems facing all of organized labor as employers press harder to lower labor costs for active and retired workers in the name of being globally competitive. 'Unions are in an environment of shrinking alternatives,' says Marick F. Masters, a professor of business administration at the University of Pittsburgh. 'There are just not many good options left at this time.'"

Iranian President Offers To Share Nuclear Technology With Other Islamic Countries.

USA Today (9/16) reports that after meeting the Turkish prime minister at the United Nations, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "said Thursday that his country is willing to provide other Islamic nations with nuclear technology." Ahmadinejad "repeated promises that Iran will not pursue nuclear weapons, the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency reported. Then he added: 'Iran is ready to transfer nuclear know-how to the Islamic countries due to their need.'"

The Washington Times (9/16, A1, Sands) reports in a front page story "repeated his denials of Iran's intent to make atomic bombs in a get-acquainted meeting with U.S. reporters and editors yesterday morning, saying such suspicions put a heavy burden on his country." But his "offer to share nuclear technology prompted a worried U.S. reaction. State Department spokesman Adam Ereli told a briefing, 'Iran, as its record demonstrates, has a long history of trying to develop weapons of mass destruction, supporting terror.'"

Rice Says US Many Not Have IAEA Votes To Refer Iran To Security Council. The Washington Times (9/16, A1, Sands) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "had been trying to rally support for a vote next week by the United Nations' Vienna, Austria-based nuclear watchdog to refer Iran's nuclear programs to the Security Council -- a first step toward possible sanctions." But Rice "conceded that the United States might not have the votes at what was supposed to be a climactic vote by the board of the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) on Monday."

The Washington Post (9/16, A26, Linzer, Lynch) reports that despite "an intense lobbying effort at the most senior levels, the Bush administration failed to persuade three key countries Thursday to back the United States in pressuring Iran to give up sensitive aspects of its nuclear energy program." Russia, China and India "either publicly or privately turned down U.S. requests to help report Iran's case next week to the U.N. Security Council, which has the authority to impose economic sanctions or an oil embargo." The Administration has "the reluctant support of the European Union for the first time in more than two years, but that will not be enough. Without backing from one of the three others, U.S. officials indicated they were preparing to abandon, for now, a quest to move the matter into the council."

US Report Says Iran Intends Acquisition Of Nuclear Weapons. The Washington Times (9/16, Gertz) reports a US government report says Iran is "concealing many of its nuclear facilities from international controls and the activities show it is seeking nuclear weapons." The computer slide presentation "developed by the Energy Department for the International Atomic Energy Agency also shows that Iran's nuclear program closely resembles Pakistan's nuclear arms programs." The report says, "Iran's past history of concealment and deception and nuclear fuel cycle infrastructure are most consistent with an intent to acquire nuclear weapons."

Iran To Offer "Compromise" On Nuclear Program. Financial Times (9/16, Staff) reports Iran "is to propose international joint ventures in its nuclear programme as a means of providing an 'objective guarantee' that it cannot be diverted to weapons use, senior Iranian officials have told the Financial Times." Iranian President Ahmadi-Nejad "is set to make the new proposal on Saturday before the United Nations General Assembly." It is "not clear whether Iran's suggestion would include the more sensitive sites in the country and European diplomats were sceptical that it would be acceptable to their governments."

The New York Times (9/16) reports President Ahmadinejad said Iran "would present new proposals tomorrow to try to break the impasse over Iran's nuclear programs, but he provided no details." European diplomats "indicated that they might defer their effort to bring Iran to the United Nations Security Council for possible punitive action if sufficient progress was made in talking with Iran's leaders." Asked "repeatedly whether Iran had not discredited itself by its failure to disclose past nuclear activities, Mr. Ahmadinejad said Iran did not have nuclear weapons and 'there is absolutely no proof of a violation on the part of Iran' of its pledge to keep its nuclear program peaceful."

Ahmadinejad Criticizes US Over Iraq, Katrina Response, Foreign Policy. The Washington Post (9/16, A26, Kessler) reports President Ahmadinejad displayed "a dash of defiance at U.S. charges over Iran's nuclear program and a warning that the era of big-power dominance in international relations has ended." Ahmadinejad "blamed the Bush administration's policies for instability in Iraq. A veteran of Iran's war against Iraq, the president described the removal of Saddam Hussein as 'necessary' but said the task should have been left to Iraqis." On the subject of Hurricane Katrina, Ahmadinejad "poke[d] at the Bush administration's response and perhaps draw lessons about solidarity among Americans. He compared the delivery of aid to victims in the Gulf Coast unfavorably with the response to natural disasters in the Islamic republic." Ahmadinejad said, "We thought Americans would act more quickly and help their fellow Americans. We expected more." The Times adds Ahmadinejad's "visit here has been dogged by protesters asserting that, as a student leader, he played a role in the takeover of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and seizure of U.S. hostages during the 1979 Iranian revolution."

Bush To Pressure Putin On Iran, Foreign Energy Investment. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, King, White) reports President George W. Bush "hopes to persuade Russian President Vladimir Putin to toughen his stance on Iran, to further open his country's oil and gas reserves to foreign investment and to take steps to speed Russia's entry into the World Trade Organization, when the two men meet at the White House." Bush Administration officials, "previewing Friday's one-day summit, described relations between Washington and Moscow these days as a mix of cooperation and tension, along with a dollop of indifference on the Russian side." US officials say the "first item on today's agenda, U.S. officials say, will be to urge Mr. Putin to look more favorably on European and U.S. efforts to persuade Iran to give up its alleged nuclear-weapons ambitions." Bush will "also try to get a feel from President Putin on what transpired in his private talks at the U.N. on Wednesday with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the official said."

Putin Said To Be Looking For Way To Retain Power After 2008. In a The Washington Post column (9/16, A31), Martha Lipman says Russian President Vladimir Putin "looks, in fact, like a man interested in reelection. So much so that political commentators are once again guessing about whether he will stay in power beyond 2008, when his second -- and last -- term expires. To be sure, several loyal officials have suggested ways to overcome the constitutional obstacle to a third term. But with the next election still 2 1/2 years away, the Kremlin appears to remain undecided as to how to preserve the political status quo in Russia in 2008. Putin's heightened activity may just be a way of demonstrating that he is fully in charge and that he remains the ultimate decision maker on all important national issues, including the 'challenge of 2008.'"

Bush Trip To Bathroom During Security Council Meeting Creates Stir. The Washington Post (9/16, A29, Kamen) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "President Bush created a bit of a stir Wednesday when he inexplicably walked out in the middle of an important UN Security Council meeting on terrorism, right in the middle of a speech by the leader of Benin. Delegates thought it was another example of American arrogance -- US officials are notorious for leaving meetings in mid-session, especially at the General Assembly. Russia's Vladimir Putin, Britain's Tony Blair and China's Hu Jintao sat patiently through the less-than-riveting address. But it appears that Bush meant no insult, judging from a note he handed to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice shortly before he left. Bush, after waiting while a member of his security detail swept a nearby bathroom, used the facilities and returned to the meeting a few minutes later."

North Korea Won't Drop Demand For Nuclear Reactor In Weapons Talks. The New York Times (9/16, Kahn) reports North Korea "refused to drop a new demand that the outside world build it a nuclear reactor before it dismantles its nuclear weapons, leaving six-nation negotiations here on the verge of collapse." The United States and North Korea have "identified its demand for a light-water nuclear reactor as the main sticking point in the talks, which have continued fitfully over two years and failed to produce even a joint statement of principles." Christopher Hill, the chief American negotiator, "made it clear on Thursday that the gap had widened over three days of talks." That "leaves the Bush administration with an unhappy choice - go on indefinitely with talks that have produced no result, or seek a consensus to impose international penalties on North Korea against the wishes of most countries in the region." One goal "for the United States in these talks, analysts say, is to show enough sincerity and flexibility to convince Asian nations that fault lies with North Korea and that imposing penalties is the only viable option."

The Washington Times (9/16, Sato, Kwanwoo) reports delegates said "talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear-weapons program are deadlocked due to 'major disagreements' between the North and the United States." A spokesman for the North Korean delegation "agreed yesterday that the talks were 'not making progress' due to the dispute over light-water reactors."

The Washington Post (9/16, A26, Cody) reports US and North Korean diplomats "acknowledged an irreconcilable deadlock Thursday in long-stalled nuclear disarmament talks, casting doubt on the future of Chinese-sponsored six-party negotiations." The "stalemate, based on the North Korean demand that it be given a light-water nuclear reactor to produce electricity, brought the current round of discussions to a rancorous standstill after three days. Representatives of the participating countries, which also include South Korea, Japan and Russia, did not indicate they would abandon the negotiations, but none outlined a way to keep talks going."

Diversion Of Food Aid Adds To Mistrust Of North Korean Regime. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Fairclough) reports the "widespread availability of donated food in North Korea's booming markets shows how difficult it is for relief organizations to work with a government that, frustrated aid workers and others say, is often more interested in preserving its power than in protecting its citizens. Reports of diverted aid also are deepening mistrust of the government among other nations -- including those negotiating with Pyongyang over the future of its nuclear capabilities." It is "impossible to know exactly how much aid is diverted -- to markets as well as to the military and other groups favored by the regime -- given tight North Korean restrictions on monitoring. But experts say it could be substantial."

Israeli Court Rules West Bank Security Barrier Must Be Rerouted. The New York Times (9/16, Myre) reports Israel's "highest court ruled Thursday that part of Israel's West Bank separation barrier had imposed major hardships on Palestinian villagers and must be rerouted. It was the second such decision by the court." However, the "nine judges on the High Court of Justice also said in their unanimous ruling that Israel could build the barrier inside the West Bank, provided the government did so for security needs and not political considerations." The judges also "criticized an advisory ruling last year by the International Court of Justice in The Hague that said all sections of the barrier inside the West Bank violated international law and should be torn down. The Israeli court said the international court had failed to consider security needs."

The Washington Times (9/16, Mitnick) reports even as "the 9-0 ruling opened future challenges to the two-year-old network of electronic fence and concrete walls, the judges for the first time confirmed the legality of erecting a separation barrier inside the West Bank to protect Israeli citizens." Israel's "defense ministry now must consider alternatives to the path that separates about 1,200 Palestinians in five small villages from the rest of the West Bank. According to the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, which brought the petition on behalf of the Palestinian villages of Wadi a-Rasha and Ras a-Tira, at least four more legal challenges to the fence's route in other areas are making their way to the Israeli Supreme Court."

Sharon Gets Polite Reception From UN. The New York Times (9/16, Brinkley) reports that for the first time, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon "spoke Thursday to the General Assembly, a body he has long considered a tool of the enemy, and challenged the Palestinians to demonstrate their commitment to peace now that Israel has completed its withdrawal from the Gaza Strip." Sharon said, "The State of Israel proved that it is willing to make painful concessions in order to resolve the conflict with the Palestinians. I call on the Palestinian leadership to show determination and leadership and to eliminate terror, violence and the culture of hatred from our relations." The Times adds the "audience reaction was polite, as is the custom here, but even that might have been more than Mr. Sharon would have expected in the past." Sharon said "numerous world leaders, including some from Islamic nations, have approached him in the halls of the United Nations building, asking to shake his hand and congratulating him on Israel's withdrawal from Gaza."

US Envoy To Taiwan Under Fire. The Washington Times (9/16, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Douglas Paal, the U.S. government representative to Taiwan, is under fire from the State Department for misrepresenting Taiwan's policies to his bosses. A State inspector general report said Mr. Paal's leadership style caused low morale among employees of the American Institute in Taiwan, the official US office in Taiwan. The most serious IG charge, however, is that Mr. Paal falsely reported on Taiwanese issues to senior State Department officials, a cardinal sin for envoys. Officials familiar with the details of the IG report said Mr. Paal refused to allow dissenting views and was guilty of suppressing reports from US officials who disagreed with his pro-China views."

Bush Administration Again Pressing China To Revalue Yuan. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Phillips) reports the Bush Administration is "turning up the heat on Beijing to allow the Chinese yuan to rise against the dollar, reigniting an economic dispute that had appeared settled." Treasury Department officials are "disappointed that China's eight-week-old promise to let the yuan move with market forces has resulted in only a tiny increase in its exchange value. They warn that Beijing is courting a backlash from U.S. lawmakers who say China's undervalued currency is robbing American companies of business and American workers of jobs." Treasury Secretary John Snow has "invited the Chinese finance minister, Jin Renqing, to meet during a gathering in Washington on Sept. 23-24 of senior economic officials from the Group of Seven major industrialized nations. The Chinese have indicated they plan to attend, but haven't yet formally accepted."

EU Trade Commissioner Says Bush "Playing To Gallery" On Free Trade. The Financial Times (9/16, Alden, Beattie, Blitz, Williams) reports EU trade commissioner Peter Mandelson "on Thursday accused President George W. Bush of 'playing to the gallery' by calling for the global elimination of tariffs and subsidies, saying US farmers would oppose such a sweeping measure." Mandelson's comments "came just one day after he and his counterpart Rob Portman, US trade representative, launched the most serious effort yet to agree on an agricultural liberalisation package as part of the Doha Round of global trade talks." In a Wednesday speech at the UN, Bush "said the US was 'ready to eliminate all tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to the free flow of goods and services as other nations do the same.'" Mandelson, in an interview "with BBC radio, said that, while he welcomed such ambition, 'it is easy to make these grandiose commitments. Some will say he is playing to the gallery, and some will say that he is making these sort of lavish promises in the almost certain knowledge that the rest of the world cannot or won't follow suit and therefore he will get a free pass."

US Decertifies Venezuela In War On Drugs. The Financial Times (9/16, Webb-Vidal) reports the US "struck Venezuela off its list of countries deemed to be co-operating in the war on drugs, injecting a new source of tension into deteriorating relations between Washington and Caracas." In a White House statement, President George W. Bush "said Venezuela, as well as Burma, had 'failed demonstrably' to adhere to their international counternarcotics obligations during the past year." Venezuela's "decertification", "as the measure is called, had been expected in the wake of a decision by President Hugo Chávez last month to suspend a co-operation agreement with the US Drug Enforcement Administration. While Mr Chávez has accused the DEA's officials of 'spying,' US officials have alleged elements within the Venezuelan authorities have become complicit with drugs-trafficking groups."

Merkel Shuffles Economic Advisers In Run Up To Election. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Walker) reports that with the German elections looming this weekend, "front-runner Angela Merkel is struggling to retune her message on the economy, which is supposed to be her strongest issue but has been weakening her lead in the polls." Merkel's center-right coalition "is still firmly ahead of rivals but polling just short of an absolute majority in Parliament. Calling on her supporters to give her an outright victory and a mandate for economic change, Ms. Merkel shuffled economic advisers and attempted to refocus attention on Germany's high unemployment and low growth under incumbent Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder." German media have "focused on her tax adviser, Paul Kirchhof, whose belief in flat-rate income taxes Mr. Schroeder has criticized heavily. Under pressure from within her own Christian Democrats party, Ms. Merkel has reduced Mr. Kirchhof's importance by inviting the party's most popular finance expert, Friedrich Merz, into the campaign. Mr. Merz fell out with Ms. Merkel last year."

The New York Times (9/16, Landler) reports "three days before an election that has become unexpectedly suspenseful," Merkel delivered "a blunt message: Chancellor Gerhard Schröder has failed, and his government ought to be thrown out." Merkel's "audience of several hundred cheered often, if not quite passionately." Merkel's "sense of grim purpose may suit the moment. After spending four months with a seemingly unassailable lead in the polls, she finds herself in a dogfight with Mr. Schröder." The campaign has "been bumpy for Mrs. Merkel, with a few missteps by her and more blatant gaffes by some of her allies. But what has made the real difference, political analysts say, has been a nimble performance by Mr. Schröder down the stretch."

The Washington Post (9/16, A22, Whitlock) reports that when he "took office seven years ago, Chancellor Gerhard

Schroeder made a big promise he didn't keep. 'My most important job is the fight against the scourge of unemployment,' he declared in his victory speech after winning the 1998 election. During the campaign, he told Germany's 4 million jobless that he would slash unemployment. Voters should kick him out of office if he failed, he added later." The Post adds Germany's "jobless rate is worse than ever; the number of people out of work hit a post-World War II high this year. German voters haven't forgotten Schroeder's pledge, and polls suggest they are ready to depose him in Sunday's national elections." Merkel "and her allies have been relentless in their reminders."

Bill Clinton Seeks To Generate Action At New York Conference. The Washington Post (9/16, A2, Kessler) reports the UN General Assembly "may have failed this week to come up with a stirring plan to combat the world's ills. But there was former president Bill Clinton -- once said to have harbored an ambition to become secretary general -- assembling his own mini-General Assembly of presidents, prime ministers, kings and other pooh-bahs on Thursday to devise specific plans for addressing poverty, global warming, religious conflict and better governance." The "inaugural meeting of what he has dubbed the Clinton Global Initiative will stretch over three days of seminars and speeches, bringing together 800 movers and shakers who paid $15,000 each for a seat. If the opening session is any guidepost, the meetings resemble the gabfests at Davos, the annual global economic summit held in Switzerland, or the Renaissance Weekends that Clinton attended as president. But Clinton added a catch -- each of the attendees is required to commit to doing something to improve the world." Every attendee is "required to make a commitment in writing. More than 50 commitments have been made, totaling more than $300 million."

Clinton Touts Global Initiative. In a Financial Times op-ed (9/16), former President Bill Clinton says, "This week, the inaugural Clinton Global Initiative (CGI), a three-day programme, is taking place in New York. More than 40 heads of state are joining me and a large number of participants from a broad swath of civil society: non-governmental organisation activists, legislators, policy experts, business leaders, journalists and writers from every continent. This will be a different kind of conference. At this conference, the activists will have access to the presidents and vice versa. And we will do a lot more than talk. International conferences always sound ambitious, but are rarely places where searching questions are answered." That is "exactly what we will try to get at CGI to address four critical challenges: poverty, religious strife, climate change and governance. All difficult – but all solvable."

Fox Expects Smooth Transition After 2006 Elections. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, O'Grady) reports the "past five years have been tough political sledding for Mexican President Vicente Fox, the first non-Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) president in 70 years. But his sixth and final year in the job may yet prove the most challenging." With the July, 2006 presidential elections "looming," Fox "emphasized the country's established 10-year record of fiscal stability and political reform that he predicts will guarantee a smooth transition of power." His "facts are straight. But still, there is the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD) and its candidate, Mexico City mayor and leftist firebrand Andres Manuel López Obrador, to worry about. This hard-charging, demagogic socialist with overt authoritarian instincts conceivably could win. Equally worrying are the stunts he might pull if he loses. He has a record of fomenting street violence when he doesn't get his way."

WSJournal Says UN Summit Accomplished Little. The Wall Street Journal (9/16) says in an editorial the United Nations world summit "seems to have done no real harm: It has not further extended the authority and reach of the U.N., it has not foisted another 'protocol' or 'convention' for the Senate to consider, and it has not established another significant seven-letter acronym -- er, agency -- for U.S. taxpayers to pronounce, and especially to fund." That "may be a negative accomplishment, but it is certainly a real one, especially as Secretary General Kofi Annan had envisioned the summit as an opportunity to expand membership in the Security Council, expand his own powers and require rich countries to pony up additional billions in foreign aid, among other brainstorms. It took new U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton seven weeks of dogged negotiation to make sure none of that happened, and for this he deserves credit." On the other hand, "the diplomatic price the US paid for a no-harm-done outcome was a no-reform result."

US Urged To Support Grass-Roots Institutions To Achieve Goals In Mideast. Waleed Ziad, an economic consultant and a principal in the

DOJ_NMG_0005921

Truman National Security Project, in an op-ed in the New York Times (9/16) questions whether the Egyptian election "or the other recent democratic experiments in Saudi Arabia and elsewhere, really further American aims in the Muslim world?" But "the establishment of the first popularly elected governments in Iraqi and Afghan history has been followed by more suicide bombings and unabated violence. And nobody expects real change, in terms of political freedoms or human rights, any time soon in Saudi Arabia or Egypt." Ziad believes the problem is "the absence not just of democracy but also of grass-roots representative institutions like a free press and independent political, cultural and social-welfare institutions." Ziad advocates the we "foster these organizations -- along with a free press and educational and cultural institutions. At the same time, our corporations should guide local entrepreneurs to promote a free market, the backbone of democracy. If anything is going to come of the neoconservative hope of making Iraq into a beacon of our values, it will be along these lines."

Today's Events In Washington. 37

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages. 39

DOJ_NMG_0005927

TERRORISM NEWS:

Massive Anthrax Investigation Yet To Yield Results As Trail Grows Cold. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (9/16, Lengel) reports, "Four years after the deadly 2001 anthrax attacks, one of the most exhaustive investigations in FBI history has yielded no arrests and is showing signs of growing cold as officials have sharply reduced the number of agents on the case. FBI agents and postal inspectors have pursued leads on four continents, conducted more than 8,000 interviews and carried out dozens of searches of houses, laboratories and other locations." The Post adds, "FBI officials said yesterday that investigators are still working diligently to find whoever was responsible" and "said they are getting assistance from forensics experts and scientific researchers from law enforcement agencies, the intelligence community, university laboratories and private corporations."

Weldon Claims Pentagon Employee Was Ordered To Destroy Able Danger Documents. The AP (9/16, de la Cruz) reports US Rep. Curt Weldon on Thursday said that "a Pentagon employee was ordered to destroy documents that identified Mohamed Atta as a terrorist two years before the 2001 attacks." Weldon added that "the employee is prepared to testify next week before the Senate Judiciary Committee and was expected to name the person who ordered him to destroy the large volume of documents," which "Weldon described…as '2.5 terabytes' — as much as one-fourth of all the printed materials in the Library of Congress. A Senate Judiciary Committee aide said the witnesses for Wednesday hearing had not been finalized and could not confirm Weldon's comments."

Moroccan-Born Dane Denies Promoting Terrorism. The AP (9/16, Olsen) reports, "A Moroccan-born Danish citizen arrested on suspicion of promoting terrorism denied the allegations in (a Copenhagen, Denmark) court Thursday." The AP continues, "Said Mansour was arrested Sept. 8 in Copenhagen on suspicion of encouraging terrorism by calling for a Jihad, or holy war, against the West in scores of CDs, computer discs and video tapes found in his home. … In his challenge to a court order allowing police to hold him for four weeks, Mansour told the Eastern High Court that he was not a terrorist and that the material was for his personal use. The court is expected to rule Friday. … 'I have lived in this country for 23 years and I have always lived in peace,' Mansour told the court. 'I can assure you, I am no terrorist and I have nothing to do with terrorism.'" The AP adds, "In three raids on his home since November, police have seized some 3,000 CD-ROMs and roughly 500 computer disks, most containing calls for a jihad. Police also seized 161 CD-ROMs when Mansour was allegedly selling at a Copenhagen flea market in June, and 14 computer disks found in his car during a Danish-German border check in March."

Judge Denies Bail For Egyptian Student Caught With Airline Materials. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (9/16, Conley) reports, "When FBI agents walked into Mahmoud Maawad's spartan apartment…they found a desk, chair, computer and a Koran. They also found an airline pilot's uniform, a chart of Memphis International Airport, and instructional DVDs, including one called 'How an Airline Captain Should Look and Act.' A federal magistrate Thursday ordered Maawad, a 29-year-old University of Memphis student from Egypt, jailed until his trial on charges of wire fraud and fraudulent use of a Social Security number. 'The specific facts and circumstances are scary,' Asst. U.S. Atty. Steve Parker said," adding, "'we don't know either way' if Maawad is a terrorist or connected to any terror groups." The Commercial Appeal adds, "Maawad has been in the country illegally since 1999, and has used a false Social Security number to enroll in schools and open a bank account, Parker said."

Guantanamo Hunger Strike Spreads. The AP (9/16, Jacobs) reports, "A hunger strike at the U.S. prison for terror suspects in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has grown to its largest point since detainees began their latest protest more than a month ago, a military official said Thursday." The AP continues, "After 11 detainees joined the protest overnight, there are now 131 taking part in the hunger strike, said Maj. Jeff Weir, a spokesman for the detention center. … Twenty-one of the striking prisoners were hospitalized in stable condition at the prison medical clinic, including 20 who were being tube-fed, Weir said." The AP adds, "The military considers a hunger strike to be a form of suicide and Weir said that one prisoner was restrained after he resisted having a feeding tube inserted. … 'No facility in the U.S., and hopefully the world, is going to let someone starve to death,' Weir said. 'We're charged with keeping them in good health, and that's what we're doing.'" The AP notes, "Guantanamo officials said this latest hunger strike began Aug. 8 with 76 detainees protesting their confinement. It has since grown to more than a quarter of the approximately 500 detainees. … The military defines someone as being on a hunger strike after they have refused nine consecutive meals. There have been at least two previous hunger strikes, but military officials said they were not able to confirm whether this was the largest."

PATRIOT ACT:

Nebraska US Attorney Says Patriot Act No Threat To Average Citizen. KNEB-AM 960, Scottsbluff, NE (9/16) reports, "U.S. Attorney Mike Heavican told Scottsbluff Kiwanians Thursday the average citizen should not fear the expanded power authorities have under the Patriot Act. Heavican, who spoke on the issue in Sidney Wednesday and will be in Chadron Friday, says the only people who should be concerned about the legislation should be those involved in terrorist activity." KNEB-AM continues, "Heavican says authorities have always had access to library, bank and medical records for cases involving criminal investigations. Heavican says with the Patriot Act, those powers now expand to cases involving international terrorism. Heavican told the group searches into personal records can only be done if probable cause is established and if the judicial system agrees it is justified." KNEB-AM adds, "Heavican says the feds have tried to use their new authority, which includes delayed notice search warrants, sparingly and only under circumstances where somebody's life is in danger, the suspect is a flight risk, or if the investigation would be compromised."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Romney Reiterates Call For Increased Domestic Surveillance Of Terror Suspects. On Fox News' The Big Story With John Gibson (9/15), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney discussed his call for increased surveillance of mosques and international students in the US. Romney said, "I'm sure the FBI infiltrates organizations they're concerned about. If they have probable cause, they're able to do wiretapping. … What we need to do is more of that and have more resources devoted to the FBI in their effort to do intelligence work and counterintelligence work. We don't need different tools. We need to use the tools we have got under the Patriot Act and under our current laws to assure that we really are following groups that are preaching terror…that we have the resources necessary to prevent the bombs from going off, rather than just the resources to clean up afterwards."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/15, Cafferty) reported "the Republican governor, who's considering a run for the White House in 2008, said that, when it comes to homeland security, the U.S. needs to shift its focus from response to prevention. Civil rights groups are aghast at this idea, saying his ideas are misguided and ineffective. The ACLU points out, the government already collects data on foreign students."

FBI Investigating Disappearance Of Plague-Infected Mice. ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 5, 1:55, Woodruff) reported that in New Jersey, FBI "agents have been swarming over a bioterrorism research lab for the past two weeks after three mice infected with bubonic plague went missing. They are less worried about the public health risk than how the mice could have disappeared from a high security lab." ABC (Thomas) added that the bureau is "so concerned, it sent more than a dozen agents, including experts in bioterrorism, to interview and polygraph employees." Public health officials "believe the mice probably died very quickly and pose a low risk. So far, no evidence of foul play has been discovered. Still, the incident raises troubling questions about the security at more than 300 similar labs across the country, many of them without adequate surveillance camera coverage."

WAR NEWS:

Pentagon Touts Success In Destroying Al Qaeda In Iraq As Violence Mounts. In Iraq, four suicide bombers again struck in Baghdad, killing 31 and bringing the two-day death toll to 200, as al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi sought to inflame the ethnic and religious divisions between Sunni and Shiite Arabs. However, the US military is confident its recent operations targeting Al Qaeda in Iraq have been successful despite the recent violence.

The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 6, 2:00, Martin) reported it was "gruesome evidence of Abu Musab Al-Zarqawi's declaration of all-out war against the Shiites who control the government of Iraq. Zarqawi's Website claims the carnage in Baghdad is revenge for an assault by US and Iraqi troops on the town of Tal Afar near the Syrian border, a hub for insurgent operations in northern Iraq, where the US military says it has scored dramatic successes." Col. Robert Brown, commander, 25th Infantry Division: "One of the great pieces of information we got recently is 80% of the al Qaeda network in the north has been devastated." Martin: "Col. Robert Brown says the six top leaders in the city of Mosul have all been killed or captured, including this man, Abu Zaid, who was carrying a letter to Zarqawi complaining about everything from the incompetence of local insurgency leaders to the poor training of the foreign fighters being sent into the country. But US troops have cleared out other cities before, only to withdraw and have the insurgents return, facing little or no opposition from Iraqi security forces."

ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 7, :15, Woodruff) and NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 6, 0:15, Williams) also briefly reported the story. The New York Times/AP (9/16) notes, "The latest violence only deepened the misery in Baghdad, where streets on Thursday were noticeably quieter and, in the southern Dora district, where the latest bombings were concentrated, deserted." US and Iraqi soldiers "using loudspeakers roamed the district, warning residents to stay indoors because five more suicide car bombers were believed to be in the area."

Joint US-Iraqi Forces To Continue Strikes Against Insurgents Along Syrian Border. The New York Times/AP (9/16) reports Lynch said that after the Tal Afar operation, US and Iraqi forces "were fighting to regain control of the Syrian border, near the western insurgent stronghold of Qaim, on the Euphrates River and well to the south of Tal Afar. 'We believe that the terrorists and foreign fighters are entering Iraq across the Syrian border, down the Euphrates River Valley into Baghdad,' General Lynch said."

US Military Says Zarqawi "On The Ropes." The Washington Post (9/16, A27, Knickmeyer) reports, "The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, said the surge in bombings represented the kind of occasional spikes in attacks that the military has been expecting. Lynch told reporters, 'Zarqawi is on the ropes.'" Lynch said, "We believe we are experiencing great success against the most crucial element of the insurgency, which is the terrorists and the foreign fighters. The face of that is Zarqawi and al Qaeda in Iraq. … We've got great intelligence which tells us where he's moving to and where he's trying to establish safe havens. As soon as we see him trying to establish a safe haven, we will conduct operations. … We're using all assets under our control in conjunction with the Iraqi security forces to find him and kill him."

Zarqawi Said To Be Drawing Increasing Support From Iraqi Nationals. In contrast to the US military's public comments, the Los Angeles Times (9/16, Miller, Marshall) reports some US officials believe Al Qaeda leader Abu Musab Zarqawi's success is increasingly attracting Iraqi nationals to his cause. The three US officials' "comments reflect the government's latest attempt to come to grips with a multi-layered insurgency that has often confounded U.S. forces and intelligence agencies." They "indicated that the infusion of Iraqis, including, apparently, former members of the Iraqi intelligence service and military, represented a change in the group's makeup rather than a major expansion." The increasing presence of Iraqis "carries ominous implications, both for the Bush administration and the fledgling, popularly elected government it supports in Baghdad."

US Definition Of Victory In Iraq Has Evolved. The Christian Science Monitor (9/16, Sappenfield) reports, "Since the day in May 2003 when President Bush stood beneath a banner proclaiming 'Mission Accomplished,' the course of the conflict in Iraq has been one of optimism followed by revision." Despite earlier expectations that US troops would be able to stabilize Iraq and leave relatively quickly, the "increasingly bracing tone from the White House and Pentagon, however, points to a new calculus. The persistence of the attacks, as well as their undiminished capacity…seems to have confirmed that the insurgency will probably outlast the American occupation." The Monitor notes, "Indeed, the inability of American forces to defeat the insurgency through strikes such as the current offensive in Tal Afar raises doubts about the possibility of any clear victory for the administration. And it could leave the Iraqis with a years-long task that many planners had not anticipated."

Talabani Confident Iraqis Can Avoid Civil War. Daniel Henninger in his column in the Wall Street Journal (9/16) recounts the details of an interview with Iraqi President Jalal Talabani who stresses that most of Iraq is stable and secure. The Kurdish Talabani considers himself, Shiite cleric Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Ahmed Chalabi as leaders working to prevent a civil war. Talabani believes that "while the Sunnis are starting to understand where their best interests lie, they lack a political center just now. The Kurds and Shiites, Mr. Talabani explains, are relatively cohesive as political entities, but the Sunnis are divided into small, often tribal groups: 'Saddam didn't permit any kind of Sunni leadership to emerge.' Right now, he said, the Sunnis need assurance that the government can protect them, as in the current joint U.S.-Iraqi offensive against the insurgents in Tal Afar." Talabani believes the new strategy of leaving Iraqi forces to secure troubled areas will succeed.

UN To Distribute Five Million Copies Of Iraqi Draft Constitution. The New York Times/AP (9/16) notes that "the United Nations planned to print and distribute five million copies of Iraq's draft constitution before the Oct. 15 referendum, a spokesman said Thursday." Spokesman Farhan Haq "said officials hoped the Iraqi Parliament would sign off on the text by Sunday."

Saddam To Face Broader Charges. The Washington Post (9/16, A27, Knickmeyer) in an article on the latest violence in Iraq also notes that one "Western official familiar with arrangements for Saddam Hussein's trial by an Iraqi tribunal, scheduled for Oct. 19, said he expected the former president to be tried in connection with a variety of crimes, including the destruction of thousands of Kurdish villages and the disappearance and killing of their inhabitants in the 1980s. Authorities so far have announced charges in only one, smaller event, the killing of 140 Shiite Muslims after an assassination attempt against Hussein in their town."

Records Detail US Abuse Of Detainees. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Serrano) reports, "Army officers in Iraq told their superiors last year that soldiers often lacked the training to handle detainees, did not always understand what constituted abuse and sometimes used techniques against prisoners that they 'remembered from movies,' according to new military records made public Thursday." In 2004, Army IG Lt. Gen. Paul T. Mikolashek "concluded that there were no systemic failures or widespread patterns of detainee abuse," yet "according to documents generated for his report…Mikolashek was told of many incidents in which poor training and inadequate facilities created an atmosphere that fostered abuse." ACLU executive director Anthony Romero "said the new documents suggested Mikolashek brushed aside evidence that there had been abuse and significant training problems."

Female Candidate In Afghan Election Attacked. Afghani election candidate Hawa Alam Nuristani was shot in the hip by attackers who also kidnapped two of her supporters. The New York Times (9/16, Gall) reports Nuristani "was treated by American troops in the region and then evacuated to Bagram Air Base, near Kabul, where she was in stable condition." Local leaders "were gathering to try to secure the release of the kidnapped men, General Baqi said. Early reports indicated that the attackers were not Taliban fighters or other antigovernment insurgents but rival candidates, he said."

Afghans Unfazed By Pre-Election Violence, Threats. The New York Times (9/16, Sengupta) reports, "Nearly four years after the Taliban government was routed from Afghanistan by American-led forces, a newly emboldened insurgency has stepped up a campaign of threats and thuggery on the eve of the country's parliamentary and provincial elections, particularly here in the badlands of the country's south. Elsewhere, the presence of former warlords on the ballot has led to charges of voter intimidation." Yet, "what is just as remarkable is the degree to which so many ordinary Afghans seem unfazed by the threats and violence, and, on occasion, are openly defiant.

Afghans Expected To Create Coalition Government. The Christian Science Monitor (9/16, Baldauf) reports that according to Afghani candidates and foreign observers the problem with the Afghan elections "is the way in which Afghanistan's parliament was created in the country's new constitution. Voters choose candidates as individuals, not as members of a party. This creates an environment where personalities are more important than ideas, coalitions struggle to stick to common agendas, and individual MPs are more easily manipulated by the palace." But, "already there are signs that some candidates are forming three main coalitions. One, led by Northern Alliance politician Younus Qanooni, will act as a sort of permanent opposition to President Karzai, and will attempt to change the system of government to give parliament more power, including a prime minister. A second faction will be a cross section of independents from around Afghanistan, who side with Karzai on most issues. A third faction of liberal and leftist parties will swing back and forth between the opposition and Karzai, supporting the president on common issues, but voting against him on others."

Election Officials Worried About Warlords, Taliban On Ballot. USA Today (9/16, Wiseman) reports, "The presence of warlords and ex-Taliban officials on the ballot when Afghans vote Sunday is raising fears that figures from the past will sabotage efforts to build a stable democracy." Sam Zarifi of Human Rights Watch said, "The Afghan people need a government that is functional and accountable. … The warlords offer neither." But former Taliban administrator Mawlavi Qalumuddin "says it would be dangerous to ban warlords from the democratic process; isolated, they might turn to violence."

WPost Praises US Decision To Foster Democracy In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (9/16, A30) editorializes, "It's easy for Westerners, and even Afghans, to lose sight of how much progress" the Afghan election represents. There has been much criticism in the West of the Afghan political progress, but although "many of these critiques are legitimate, it's worth noting the tenaciousness with which many liberal Westerners have opposed every step by Afghanistan toward freedom. Four years ago…former European Union commissioner Emma Bonino was one of those who condemned the U.S. intervention against the Taliban, which she said would 'all but doom' millions of Afghans 'to death.' Now, incredibly, she leads the E.U.'s observer mission at the elections" and remains pessimistic. The Afghan "political life isn't entirely 'healthy.' But as the world will shortly see, it is immeasurably better off than it was four years ago -- and than it would have been had the United States hesitated to act."

Observers Concerned International Community Will Abandon Afghanistan. Joanna Nathan, a senior analyst in Kabul for the International Crisis Group, and Mark Schneider, the ICG's senior vice president, in an op-ed in the Washington Times (9/16) warn about the danger of allowing warlords and former Taliban who are running for election "and now seeking the mantle of a democratic mandate." Nathan and Schneider state, "It is absolutely imperative that these elections are viewed as the beginnings of democratization, not the end." Past "lessons about the consequences of abandoning Afghanistan should be fresh in everyone's mind. … If Afghanistan is allowed to slip back into being a failed state because the international community turns away after elections, that sense of discontent will be the country's major export."

DOJ:

New Detroit US Attorney Sworn In. The Detroit News (9/16, Shepardson) reports, "If nothing else, the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0005931

attorney is a man who can cry. …Stephen J. Murphy III, a former assistant U.S. attorney and General Motors lawyer, repeatedly fought through tears after his formal swearing-in as the top law enforcement officer in eastern Michigan." The News continues, "A Who's Who of Michigan politicians lauded Murphy Thursday and ribbed him about his performance as an assistant U.S. attorney. … Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm and Murphy were among the 'young Turks' who served in the U.S. attorney's office in the 1990s, she noted." The News adds, "In 1992, Granholm recalled seeing Murphy fall asleep at his desk with his finger on the 'Z key.' … Granholm and a colleague responded by sending Murphy a phony memorandum sternly reprimanding him for falling asleep on the job." The News notes, "Unmentioned directly but referenced by several speakers was the continuing fallout from the botched 2003 Detroit terrorism case. … A federal judge threw out the convictions of two Arab immigrants arrested shortly after Sept. 11 after a Justice Department review found evidence of prosecutorial misconduct. … The case and a separate criminal investigation into the conduct of the former lead prosecutor are pending. … Bradford A. Berenson, a former White House counsel's office lawyer, noted that Murphy was taking over 'at a time when the office has been through some serious difficulties.' … Since taking office in March, Murphy has reshuffled the leadership in the office and issued a two-sentence mission statement. Murphy said his office 'is dedicated to doing the right thing.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Eight Former Marsh Brokers & Executives Indicted. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Mcdonald) reports, "Eight former Marsh Inc. insurance brokers and executives were indicted yesterday by New York state's attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, on criminal-fraud charges including an alleged scheme to defraud and grand larceny." William Gilman, Joseph Peiser, Edward McNenney, Greg Doherty and Thomas Green "were indicted on charges including scheme to defraud in the first degree, and grand larceny in the first, second and third degrees." Kathleen Drake, William McBurnie and Edward Keane "were indicted on the same charges, but the grand-larceny charges are in the second degree."

Interpublic Accounting Problems Include Illegal Acts. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Steinberg, Vranica) reports that Interpublic Group, with a revelation that appeared to take its "long-running accounting problems to a new level," said "an internal investigation has turned up instances of 'misappropriation of assets' and 'falsified books and records' that violated laws, mainly occurring at operations outside the U.S.," although it says "it has fired or is in the process of firing 'culpable' employees." Still, a six-month investigation "confirmed that the company would have to restate its earnings going back to 2000 as a result of several accounting error," whose "impact on our results of operations for all periods will be material," and "past financial statements shouldn't be relied upon."

The New York Times (9/16, Elliot) adds that this is "the first time in those three years that Interpublic has said that not all the errors leading to its plight were necessarily honest ones." Interpublic "has been struggling with financial and operational difficulties for three years, mostly related to weak internal controls." Analysts who follow advertising stocks" had mixed reactions to Interpublic's news," with Credit Suisse First Boston saying in a report, "If management can execute, the risk-reward on IPG is highly favorable and this is a major turnaround story."

Growing Concern Over Hedge Funds, Credit Derivatives. The New York Times (9/16, Atlas) reports, "Yesterday, the Federal Reserve Bank of New York met with representatives of 14 banks, as well as regulators from the United States and overseas, to discuss cleaning up the processing of the contracts in the booming market for credit derivatives." As "the number and influence of hedge funds have ballooned," it has "prompted concerns that if a big bet goes wrong, regulators and banks will again be caught up in a collapse. High on the list of worries is the voracious appetite of hedge funds for arcane credit derivatives."

Long Sentences For White Collar Crime Questioned. The New York Times (9/16, Sorkin) reports, "While recent lengthy sentences for white-collar crimes have been hailed by some as desperately needed deterrents after a deluge of corporate scandals…a number of lawyers, including former prosecutors, are questioning whether such sentences are justified … No lawyer is suggesting that white-collar criminals not serve time. Rather, lawyers and jurists are asking what the appropriate sentence is for white-collar crimes relative to punishments for other crimes in a post-Enron world." Jonathan Simon, a professor of law at the University of California, Berkeley, said "he had doubts about whether an especially long sentence worked as a significantly greater deterrent to potential white-collar criminals than shorter terms."

Shareholder Suit Against ITT Dismissed. The Indianapolis Star (9/16, Wall) reports, "A federal judge in Indianapolis dismissed a shareholder lawsuit against ITT Educational Services Inc. Wednesday, saying the shareholders did not adequately demonstrate securities fraud." The Star continues, "U.S. District Court Judge David F. Hamilton gave the shareholders, who had been seeking class-action status, until Oct. 14 to file an amended complaint." The Star adds, "The lawsuit had accused ITT Educational, a Carmel-based for-profit educator, of inflating enrollment figures, falsifying grades, attendance and placement records, and shredding documents just before visits by government investigators. … But Hamilton found that none of the accusations were precise or strong enough under the Securities Exchange Act and the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, which govern shareholder lawsuits." The Star notes, "The dismissal comes less than three months after the U.S. Justice Department said its investigation of ITT Educational had found no evidence of wrongdoing by the company or its executives. The Justice Department shifted its focus to 'local issues' at individual ITT campuses."

Columnist Questions If Oracle Settlement Helps Shareholders. In his column in the New York Times (9/16), Floyd Norris reports, "Lawrence J. Ellison, the chief executive of Oracle, has settled a shareholder derivative suit, without admitting he did anything wrong, for a $100 million donation in Oracle's name to a charity chosen by Mr. Ellison." Oracle will pay $24 million to the plaintiffs' lawyers, so "the company owned by the shareholders will have that much less cash. Mr. Ellison will donate $100 million to charity." The lead plaintiffs' lawyer, Joseph J. Tabacco Jr., a partner in Berman DeValerio Pease Tabacco Burt & Pucillo, said that "Oracle would benefit because its chief executive would not be distracted by having to defend the suit, something one might think could have been arranged had the suit not been filed in the first place."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Urged House GOP To Block Forced Release Of Plame Documents. Reuters (9/15) reports, "The Justice Department and the special counsel investigating the leak of a CIA operative's identity pressed Congress to block legislation that would compel the administration to turn over documents related to the case, the department said in a letter released on Thursday." Reuters continues, "The Justice Department, in a letter dated September 14, said special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald had advised that producing documents and holding hearings would interfere with his investigation. The letter was sent to the House Intelligence Committee's Republican chairman, Rep. Peter Hoekstra of Michigan." Reuters adds, "Congressional Democrats have so far failed in their attempts to pass legislation that would force President George W. Bush and the departments of state, justice and defense to provide Congress with documents relating to CIA operative Valerie Plame. … Republicans on the House Intelligence Committee on Thursday rejected the legislation on a party-line vote. Republicans on the House Judiciary Committee and International Relations Committee rejected similar resolutions on Wednesday. … Republican say Congress should await the outcome of Fitzgerald's investigation. … Democrats countered that Republicans were trying to protect Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove."

Senate Turns Aside Ban On Internet Gambling. Reuters (9/15) reports, "The U.S. Senate on Thursday turned aside an attempt to restrict Internet gambling in a procedural move, but Sen. Jon Kyl vowed he would try again and said he expected the legislation would become law eventually." Reuters continues, "The Arizona Republican tried to attach language restricting Internet gambling to an annual spending bill that must be passed this year, but an unnamed Democrat objected to attaching an unrelated matter to the spending measure under consideration." Reuters adds, "Kyl said his legislation would require banks and credit card companies to block payments to online Internet gambling sites. He said some firms were already voluntarily blocking money transfers. … Sen. Barbara Mikulski, a Maryland Democrat, said that a member of her party had objected to attaching Kyl's language to the spending bill but she was not sure who. Kyl urged the lawmaker to come forward so the concerns could be addressed. … The U.S. Justice Department has said the laws that prohibit interstate gambling apply to the Internet. But Americans have turned to offshore gambling Internet sites as an alternative."

Counterfeiter Convicted Of Chicago Federal Courthouse Bomb Plot. The AP (9/16) reports, "A counterfeiter who sat in prison dreaming of revenge against the judge who sent him there was convicted Thursday of planning to blow up Chicago's federal courthouse. Gale Nettles, 66, was also convicted of making a fresh batch of bogus $20 and $100 bills." The AP notes that after his release from prison, "Nettles went searching for ammonium nitrate," and "the FBI saw to it that he got urea, a substance that looks like ammonium nitrate but which would not have exploded if detonated in the way that Nettles planned. Nettles then went looking for a member of Osama bin Laden's al-Qaida terrorist network. What he found was an undercover FBI agent who was posing as a terrorist. Nettles sold a batch of the urea to the undercover agent, who made many of the recordings that were played for the jury."

The Chicago Tribune (9/16, Higgins) notes, "Nettles' defense attorney, John Theis, argued that the FBI entrapped Nettles by, among other things, having an undercover officer repeatedly offer to sell him the fertilizer. But Assistant U.S. Atty. Brandon Fox disputed that in his closing arguments Wednesday." Fox told jurors, "This was something he was going to do from the beginning. ... He was going to take down this building."

Missing Chicago Mob Figure Again Contacts Attorney By Mail. The AP (9/16, Robinson) reports, "Missing reputed mob figure Joseph 'Joey the Clown' Lombardo has written a new letter to his attorney disputing testimony from an FBI agent, the attorney said Thursday." Rick Halprin "said the letter was postmarked Chicago and dated Aug. 25. He said two Chicago newspaper clippings were in the envelope. … Halprin said the letter takes issue with testimony before the Illinois Gaming Board by John Mallul, the head of one of the FBI's Chicago-based organized crime squads. … Mallul testified that in May 1999, Lombardo and other mob figures and mob associates met with Donald Stephens, the mayor of the tiny suburb near O'Hare International Airport. … Halprin said Lombardo denies it in his letter."

WMAQ-TV Chicago (9/15, Marin) also reports about the letter on its Web site from a story broadcast Thursday. WMAQ notes, "Lombardo has said he's willing to take truth serum or a lie detector test alongside the FBI agent to see who is telling the truth." The Chicago Sun Times (9/16, Marin, Toomey) adds, "Rosemont Mayor Donald E. Stephens adamantly denied under oath Thursday that he met with the mob in 1999 to talk about a casino for his town. And, in an ironic twist, a reputed mob boss on the lam is backing him up." The Sun Times goes on to report the details of the Lombardo letter.

Mob Informant Claims FBI, New Jersey Officials Framed Gangster. The New York Sun (9/16, Capeci) reports, "A turncoat Luchese mobster who helped authorities nail two suspects in the deadly Seton Hall arson five years ago has now turned the tables on law enforcement, claiming that a high-level FBI agent, together with New Jersey investigators, have knowingly kept an innocent man incarcerated for 12 years for a murder he didn't commit." Thomas Ricciardi, "whose cooperation has also led to convictions of mobsters and mob associates, alleged that the officials learned they had wrongly convicted the gangster," Martin Taccetta, "just four days after he was found guilty in 1993." Yale Law professor Steven Duke told the Sun, "The evidence clearly establishes an audacious, pervasive conspiracy by many New Jersey law enforcement agencies, including the FBI, that is comparable to the disgraceful conduct of FBI agents who framed innocent men for murder in Boston in the 1960s."

Bonanno Figure Sentenced To 20 Years For Mob Murder. Newsday (9/16, DeStefano) reports, "Anthony Urso, the driver for Bonanno boss Joseph Massino who briefly took over command of the crime family in 2003, was sentenced to 20 years in prison for the killing of a mob associate." Urso "pleaded guilty earlier in the year to taking part in the murder of Anthony Tomasulo. Tomasulo, a Bonanno family associate, was killed in May 1990 after he allegedly failed to pass along some of his illegal gambling proceeds from joker-poker machines to the crime family administration, officials said."

Chicago Lawyer Alleges Contracting Scheme By Blagojevich, Fundraisers. The Chicago Sun Times (9/16, Fusco, McKinney, Fornek) reports, "Gov. Blagojevich and two top fund-raisers schemed to steer lucrative state pension deals to investment firms and consultants who agreed to donate to Blagojevich's campaign, a key figure in a widening corruption probe claims he's been told. The unproved but explosive allegation surfaced Thursday in a federal plea deal by Chicago lawyer Joseph Cari," who "pleaded guilty to attempted extortion for his role in a kickback scheme the feds say was directed by former state teacher pension board member Stuart Levine." The Sun Times notes, "Cheryle Jackson, Blagojevich's communications director, downplayed the credibility of Cari's statements. 'This is speculation based on testimony from an admitted extortionist who was told this by someone twice accused of extortion himself.' Jackson said the feds have not contacted the governor." The Chicago Tribune (9/16, Pearson, O'Connor) notes Cari "said he was told that a 'high-ranking Illinois public official' was behind" the kickback scheme. Blagojevich "was peppered with questions about the plea agreements at an unrelated news conference but said he had no knowledge of them."

Former Landscaping Executive Pleads Guilty To Bribery. The Chicago Tribune (9/16, Higgins) reports former landscaping company executive John Kevin Haas "on Thursday admitted his role in a scheme to pay $137,000 in bribes to a Chicago Park District official to help win $8 million in contracts at Millennium Park and other city properties." Haas "admitted he made arrangements to send former parks official Shirley McMayon to a Wisconsin resort in 2000, bought a computer for her son and helped orchestrate other payoffs. Haas, who has agreed to cooperate with prosecutors, described bribes to McMayon that included cash, ski vacations and $22,000 to help pay off McMayon's loan on a Dodge Durango. The plea deal calls for Haas to be sentenced to 2 years, 7 months in prison, forfeit $350,000 in wrongly obtained profits and pay restitution of $49,000."

Veteran Connecticut Lawmaker Resigns Amid Corruption Probe. The New York Times (9/16, Stowe) reports veteran Connecticut state Sen. Ernest E. Newton II resigned in Bridgeport "on Thursday morning in a fiery speech on the steps of City Hall." Newton "was the target of a raid on his office in February by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in connection with an inquiry into a job training program here. The head of that program, Warren Keith Godbolt, pleaded guilty on Aug. 2 to charges that included offering a $5,000 bribe to an unnamed public official in exchange for securing a $100,000 state grant." The Times notes Newton "has not been charged. He said on Thursday that he was resigning from his Senate seat for the sake of his family."

Ohio County Seeks FBI Probe Of Tech Firm Loan. The Hamilton Journal News (9/16, Brooks) reports, "The Butler County Commissioners unanimously agreed Thursday to sever an agreement with a fiber optics firm," Dynus Technologies, "and request an FBI investigation into why the firm obtained multi-million-dollar loans in the county's name, allegedly without commissioners' approval." The Journal News notes Cincinnati FBI spokesman Michael Brooks said, "We have received the complaint from the commissioner. We'll make a determination if an investigation should be conducted."

Florida Town Records Subpoenaed In Federal Embezzlement Probe. The Gainesville Sun (9/16, Voyles) reports, "About two years ago," Bronson town councilman Aaron Edmondson "started asking questions about why some new lights on the mayor's property looked so much like the new lights the town had just received. Edmondson's curiosity led to a joint local and state investigation into embezzlement that ended with the mayor, James Blaine 'Jamie' Griffin, going to state prison and the town clerk, June Greenlee, being put on probation. On Thursday an FBI agent served a subpoena on the town for its financial records. … Mayor Beatrice Mongo said she expects the federal government will dig even deeper than state officials dug."

Federal Agents Raid Pennsylvania Technical School. The Philadelphia Daily News (9/16, Caparella) reports that on Thursday "agents from the FBI and the U.S. Department of Education Inspector General's office raided" Philadelphia's Harrison Career Institute "at four of its 15 locations…said FBI spokeswoman Jeri Williams. In the past month, the Department of Education accused the school of alleged fraud in its federal financial-aid program." Harrison's "programs certify students to become licensed practical nurses, dental technicians, home health assistants, among other jobs." The Daily News adds, "The agents took boxes of records and other materials from four floors at the Walnut Street site."

Attorney Testifies Gotti Threats Made Him Change Legal Strategy. The New York Law Journal (9/16, Perrotta) reports, "The former attorney for Frank LoCascio, a co-defendant of John Gotti Sr. in a 1992 murder and racketeering trial, testified Thursday that he tailored his defense strategy to suit Gotti after the now deceased mob boss threatened him. … 'He would take care of me -- and I knew what that meant,' the attorney, Anthony Cardinale, said Thursday during an evidentiary hearing in Brooklyn federal court." The Journal continues, "The alleged threat, he said, came during a break in the trial while Cardinale was cross-examining the prosecution's star witness, Salvatore 'Sammy the Bull' Gravano. … Cardinale had considered asking Gravano if he knew that LoCascio was not involved in one of the central charges of the indictment, the murder of Louis DiBono. But after Gotti spoke with him, Cardinale said, he did not ask for fear of making LoCascio look better at the expense of Gotti. … 'I was afraid, if that's what you're asking, yes,' Cardinale told LoCascio's appellate lawyer, Herald Price Fahringer of Lipsitz, Green, Fahringer, Roll, Salisbury & Cambria." The Journal adds, "Cardinale also said he did not meet with LoCascio alone after Gotti told him not to, and changed the tenor of his overall defense and his closing arguments to emphasize Gotti's innocence. … Under questioning from Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Firestone, however, Cardinale would not say that his actions constituted an ethical breach or ineffective assistance of counsel. … Cardinale, a Boston attorney, was testifying at a hearing that was ordered in January by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The circuit asked Eastern District Judge I. Leo Glasser to determine if LoCascio received ineffective assistance of counsel and deserved a new trial."

Woman On FBI's Most Wanted List Surrenders. The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 12, 1:35, Schieffer) reported, "One of the FBI's most wanted fugitives is in custody today, more than a decade after she stole millions of dollars from a Las Vegas casino." CBS (Hughes) added, "It appears to be a heavy conscience that brought Heather Tallchief back to Las Vegas." Twelve years ago "she was the driver of an armored car making a routine drop off at the Circus, Circus Casino, when she drove off with more than $3 million … She now claims Roberto Solis brainwashed her and planned every detail of the crime himself, from the moment she drove away from the casino."

The New York Times (9/16, Archibold) reports that Heather C. Tallchief, "walked into a federal courthouse…and surrendered." She said she "she was in Europe much of the time, out of reach of the money and working as a hotel maid." Tallchief "was ordered held on charges that included bank larceny, fraud, conspiracy and making false statements to obtain a passport." She claims she was "a victim of… brainwashing" by suspected accomplice, Roberto Solis. "Tallchief said she decided to abandon her flight for the sake of her son, who she fears will ultimately suffer consequences of her crime."

DOJ_NMG_0005935

The AP (9/16, Ritter) reports, "Attorney Robert Axelrod, her lawyer, was with Tallchief when she surrendered at U.S. District Court in Las Vegas. He said she was tired of hiding, and wanted her 10-year-old son to have a chance at living a normal life. … Axelrod said Tallchief was an impressionable 21-year-old who blindly followed a persuasive older boyfriend in the Oct. 1, 1993, theft. The boyfriend, Roberto Solis, is now 60 and is still a fugitive on the FBI's Most Wanted list. … Tallchief maintained she was only following Solis' instructions and doesn't know where Solis is now, although they have a son together."

FBI Internet Sex Solicitation Sting Snares Us Weekly Editor. The AP (9/16) reports, "An Us Weekly gossip writer found himself on the wrong side of the police blotter after being charged with trying to seduce an FBI agent posing on the Internet as a 13-year-old girl. Us Weekly suspended Timothy McDarrah, editor of the Hot Stuff column, without pay, a magazine spokesman said Thursday. McDarrah responded in June to a posting on the craigslist.com Web site offering introductions to the 'freshest, youngest' girls in New York, an FBI affidavit said. The gossip writer told an undercover FBI agent…that he would pay $200 for sex with a 13-year-old girl, the affidavit said. After McDarrah failed to show up for a meeting, the agent began sending instant messages in his guise as a 13-year-old girl. … On Wednesday, the agent wrote, McDarrah e-mailed that he was waiting at a building the agent had described as the 13-year-old girl's address. FBI agents went there and arrested McDarrah."

Convicted Massachusetts Voc-Ed Scam Artist Seeks Early Release. The AP (9/16) reports, "A former payroll clerk convicted with three others of swindling thousands of dollars from a city-run vocational school has asked a federal judge (in Springfield, MA) for early release from a halfway house." The AP continues, "Jamie Dwyer, 54, has served two months of a six-month sentence at a halfway house in Hartford, Conn., for her role in a no-show job scheme that bled about $50,000 from the Massachusetts Career Development Institute. … Dwyer was convicted of fraud, conspiracy and lying to FBI agents. U.S. District Judge Michael A. Ponsor sentenced her to the halfway house, to be followed by six months home confinement. … But she said she doesn't need the mandatory group counseling and drug-testing at the facility, The Republican of Springfield reported Friday. … 'The Hartford House's rehabilitative mission causes me to be subjected to restrictions and rules that are unnecessary and demeaning,' Dwyer wrote in an affidavit filed Tuesday in U.S. District Court. … 'I have been gainfully employed throughout my adult life,' Dwyer continued. 'I successfully raised two children. I do not have problems with alcohol or substance abuse, and I have historically respected authority and the rights of others. I do not need counseling regarding those issues.'" The AP adds, "Gerald Phillips, MCDI's former executive director, was sentenced to 21 months in prison. Luisa Cardaropoli was sentenced to 15 months in prison for pocketing thousands of dollars from a no-show job she got through Giuseppe Polimeni, who was sentenced to one year in prison. … The charges against all four sprang from an ongoing investigation into public corruption in Springfield that began about five years ago and has netted several indictments and convictions."

DNA In 450 Criminal Cases Was Tested In Lab Where Examiner Falsified An Entry. The Washington Times (9/16, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "The Army has compiled a list of more than 450 criminal cases whose DNA was tested by a laboratory where an examiner has admitted to making a false entry in one case. The list includes defendants from military installations across the country and around the world, from the Air Force Academy to Incirlik Air Base in Turkey. The blood testing dates back to 1995. The exams are being reviewed by the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Laboratory in Forest Park, Ga. In a memo, the laboratory is asking staff judge advocates — the military's lawyers — to contact the Army Criminal Investigative Command about any cases involving DNA."

Waiter's Assailant Sentenced In Dupont Circle Killing. The Washington Post (9/16, B2, Cauvin) reports that Kurt Williams, "the lookout as" Adrien Alstad, a waiter, "was robbed and fatally shot" near Dupont Circle, was sentenced to "the maximum 15 years that the sentencing guidelines recommend for voluntary manslaughter." Judge Judith E. Retchin said "the killing was not…a single, 'youthful act' but rather part of 'a series of crimes' … The judge acknowledged that Williams" is mildly retarded, "'had a terrible childhood' and 'suffered all types of abuse,'" but also noted that he, "in the days that followed Alstad's death," committed "another robbery" and, "when he was spotted by police, he ran."

AU Lays Off Chef As Part Of Probe Into President's Spending. The Washington Post (9/16, B9, Strauss, Kinzie) reports, As American University's Board of Trustees' "is close to completing a months-long probe of" University President Benjamin Ladner, they let go his personal chef, Rodney Scruggs, and Nancy Bullard Ladner, social secretary for the president and his wife, "has been transferred." It "was not clear why the board eliminated Scruggs's position now; he had been employed by the university since 1996. University presidents are expected to entertain a great deal as part of their fundraising and other duties, so many rely on caterers or, less commonly, chefs."

Search For VA Student Now Criminal Investigation. The Washington Post (9/16, B1, Smith) reports, "Although there is still no evidence that she has been harmed, the search for missing Virginia Commonwealth University freshman Taylor Marie Behl was upgraded yesterday to a criminal investigation, and an Amber Alert was issued in the case late last night." The decision was "based on three factors: The search involves a juvenile; more than a week has passed without a solid lead in the 17-year-old's disappearance; and an increasing number of tips are coming in because of national media coverage."

Diaz Photographer Gets Prison Time. The Los Angeles Times (9/16) reports that the photographer John Rutter "was sentenced Thursday to prison for trying to extort $3 million for nude pictures of superstar Cameron Diaz he had taken early in her career … Rutter's attorney, Mark Werksman, called the July trial a battle between a 'rich and famous celebrity' and a 'hardworking photographer.' Deputy District Attorney David Walgren downplayed the celebrity aspect of the case in statements to reporters, saying that, had the victim been someone other than Diaz, the case still would have been prosecuted 'in the same courts' and 'in the same manner.'"

Bush Endorses Base Closure Plan. President Bush has endorsed a plan for closing 22 major military bases and reconfiguring 33 others, the Washington Post/AP (9/16, A4, Riechmann) reports. The report "will become final in 45 days unless Congress acts to reject it in full. Communities probably have little hope of a reprieve for their bases, as lawmakers have never rejected such reports." The AP adds, "Bush's submission of the report comes as his administration and Congress are preoccupied with aiding the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast and other priorities. A GOP-led effort in the Senate to derail the base-closing process, which Republican leaders feared could embarrass them, has fizzled."

Gonzales Says US Will Challenge Pledge Ruling. The AP (9/16, Sherman) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday that the Justice Department will fight to overturn a federal court ruling that the Pledge of Allegiance can't be recited in public schools because it contains a reference to God." The AP continues, "Gonzales said the pledge is one of several expressions of national identity and patriotism that mention of God but don't violate the Constitution's ban on state-sponsored religion. … The high court 'has affirmed time and again that such official acknowledgments of our nation's religious heritage, foundation and character are constitutional,' Gonzales said in a statement a day after the ruling by U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton in Sacramento." The AP adds, "Karlton's decision could put the issue on track for another round of Supreme Court arguments. The court sidestepped the issue last year, ruling atheist Michael Newdow had no standing to bring the case on behalf of his daughter because he did not have custody of her. … The Bush administration had opposed Newdow on the same basis that Gonzales set forth Thursday. Newdow also is involved in the latest case, acting as attorney for three parents challenging the pledge because it includes the words 'under God.'" The AP notes, "Gonzales is widely viewed as a leading contender for retiring Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's seat on the Supreme Court because he is close to President Bush. Gonzales' statement of support to keep 'under God' in the pledge could appeal to religious conservatives, who have expressed concerns about him as a potential justice because he has not stated opposition to the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion."

Knight Ridder (9/16, Puzzanghera) reports, "Sandra Banning, the Sacramento, Calif.-area mother of the girl who helped trigger the legal battle over the Pledge of Allegiance that flared anew this week, came to the nation's capital Thursday with a pledge of her own: … To do everything she can to keep the pledge in schools and the phrase 'under God' in the pledge." Knight Ridder continues, "The day after a Sacramento federal judge revived the controversy by ruling that reciting the pledge in public schools is an unconstitutional violation of the separation of church and state, Banning's efforts became intertwined with the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings for Supreme Court nominee John G. Roberts Jr. … Banning publicly urged his confirmation in hopes that he would rule against the case brought by her 11-year-old daughter's father, Michael Newdow, the atheist and amateur lawyer who has argued before the Supreme Court that the pledge should be kept out of public schools. And to help rally support for the Pledge of Allegiance as the case works its way again toward the high court, she's forming a grass-roots advocacy group, the 'One Nation Under God Foundation,' affiliated with the conservative Traditional Values Coalition. … Banning and other Roberts supporters said they hoped the pledge issue would give an additional boost to his nomination." Knight Ridder notes, "Thursday, the Senate condemned the ruling, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the Justice Department would again 'defend the ability of American school children to pledge allegiance to the flag.'"

Local Television. KUSA-TV Denver (9/15, 10:08 p.m.) reported, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzales says the Justice Department will fight to overturn a federal court decision banning the Pledge of Allegiance from public schools. A district judge in California yesterday ruled that teacher-led recitation of the pledge is unconstitutional because it contains a reference to God. The Senate voted today to condemn the judge's ruling. Gonzales argues the pledge is one of several expressions of national identity and patriotism that mention God but don't violate the constitution's ban on state-sponsored religion."

DOJ Settles Boston Voting Rights Suit. The AP (9/16) reports, "The Justice Department said Thursday it has dropped its voting rights lawsuit against Boston after city officials agreed to provide voting materials in Chinese and Vietnamese, and to allow federal observers to monitor polling places." The AP continues, "The agreement comes six weeks after the federal government filed a lawsuit — part of what it said is a national initiative — alleging that Boston's election practices discriminate against Hispanic and Asian American voters who do not speak English. … 'The city of Boston is to be congratulated for agreeing to resolve this matter in a constructive and forward-looking manner,' Bradley J. Schlozman, acting assistant attorney general for the department's civil rights division, said in a news release announcing the agreement." The AP adds, "When the suit was filed, Schlozman alleged that Boston's violations were 'deeply disturbing.' … A city lawyer at the time called the claims 'unsubstantiated.' City officials said they already provide ballots in English and Spanish. … Seth Gitell, a spokesman for Mayor Thomas Menino, said Thursday the agreement does not say the city did anything wrong. 'What the city objected to originally was to signing a consent decree and acknowledging wrongdoing,' he said."

WPost Praises State Rejections Of Anti-Gay Marriage Amendments. An editorial in the Washington Post (9/16, A20) says, "For the second time in as many weeks, a state legislature has bucked the ugly trend of writing discrimination against gays into state law. Last week, the California Assembly voted to allow same-sex marriage. This week, lawmakers in Massachusetts decisively rejected a proposed constitutional amendment to overturn the state's Supreme Judicial Court decision acknowledging gay marriage rights. … The vote shows that as people grow used to gay marriages, which have been taking place in Massachusetts for more than a year, their discomfort -- and the political impetus for banning them -- diminishes." Public opinion "is moving in the right direction, and the reason is not hard to discern: Since the high court's ruling went into effect, a lot of couples have tied the knot in Massachusetts, and, somehow, the sun has continued to rise in the east. Many people are realizing that it costs heterosexual marriage nothing for same-sex marriage also to exist. The longer people have to absorb that lesson, the more support for banning marriages between committed couples is likely to erode."

Microsoft, Time Warner Discussing Online Partnerships. The AP (9/16, Linn) reports, "Microsoft Corp. and Time Warner Inc. have been discussing potential online partnerships that would help the two companies better compete against rivals Google Inc. and Yahoo Inc., two people familiar with the talks said Thursday." The AP continues, "They two said the discussions have been going on for months and that any possible deal is not imminent." The AP adds, "Microsoft and AOL — who just two years ago settled a bitter antitrust lawsuit over Microsoft's tactics in the Internet browser market — are discussing possible collaboration in search technology, online advertising and instant messaging, said the two sources, one of whom is an executive with Time Warner's America Online unit. … The other source, who works closely with Microsoft and has been involved in company discussions on the possible partnership, said the talks have heated up in the last couple weeks but are not advanced." The AP notes, "The AOL executive said one aspect of the talks originally centered on using Microsoft's new MSN search engine on AOL, replacing AOL's current relationship with Google. … More recently, the executive said, the two companies have been talking about the possibility of deeper relationships, such as collaborating in the lucrative market of selling advertising online. … Such a collaboration could allow the two companies to benefit from growing interest in search-based advertising, helping them better compete against search leaders Google and Yahoo. … But, the executive said, 'the discussions are not advanced.'"

Reuters (9/16, Li) reports, "Talks of a Microsoft stake in the AOL division was one of several scenarios under review, a separate source familiar with the matter said. 'There has been discussions about Microsoft investing in Time Warner,' one source said, who also said nothing was imminent." Reutes adds, "A combination would create the single largest Internet audience pool by unique visitors and forge a formidable online competitor in a field currently led by Yahoo Inc. and Google Inc. … AOL and MSN would have a combined unique audience of about 167.8 million, although there would likely be duplicates. This compares to Yahoo's 101.3 million unique visitors and Google's 80.4 million in August, according to Nielsen/NetRatings." Reuters adds, "Broad discussions on how the two companies could work together began two years ago after the companies settled a long-running antitrust suit that America Online, a unit of Time Warner, filed against the software giant, the source said."

Microsoft-AOL Talks Show Concern Over Google. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Angwin, Guth) reports, "Demonstrating its growing concern about Google Inc., Microsoft Corp. has entered talks with Time Warner Inc. about taking a substantial stake in the media giant's America Online unit." The talks "centered on whether AOL would switch to using Microsoft's search engine instead of Google's," but "also included discussions of combining the advertising sales forces of AOL and Microsoft's MSN online service."

USA Today (9/16, Acohido, Petrecca) adds, "No deal is imminent."

The New York Times (9/16, Hansell) adds that the two companies "explored a variety of possible combinations of the MSN Internet portal with the America Online operation of Time Warner, including a merger of the two into a new company that would be jointly owned … Some important issues in the talks remain undecided. For example, both AOL and Microsoft want to control a combined instant messaging system, which each company sees as strategically important technology. Another question is how much traffic Microsoft would direct to the combined venture."

The Washington Post (9/16, D1, Vise) adds, "Time Warner has made it clear that it wants to continue to own a substantial chunk of AOL."

Deal Reflects Shifting Goals For Microsoft & Time Warner. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Angwin, Guth) reports that this indicates "a strategic shift for Time Warner, which had long resisted pleas from some investors to get rid of all or part of its ailing Internet arm," as well as "how Microsoft now sees Google as a major adversary."

The New York Times (9/16, Hansell) adds, "Microsoft is trying to focus its Internet operations on its developing Web search product rather than its Web portal and Internet access business, which it no longer sees as strategically important. Microsoft offered to sell its MSN Internet portal and dial-up subscriber business both to America Online and to Yahoo."

The Washington Post (9/16, D1, Vise) adds, "The talks, reported yesterday by the New York Post, are part of a broader set of discussions between Microsoft and Time Warner that began following an antitrust settlement between the companies two years ago

Agreement Could "Shake Up" Internet Search Landscape. USA Today (9/16, Acohido, Petrecca) reports, "Industry analysts said, if consummated, the deal could shake up the world of Internet search." Kevin Lee, chairman of search marketing firm Did-it.com said "a key driver behind a strategic alliance" could be AOL and MSN's potential to "tap into archived demographic data they already keep on subscribers."

The Washington Post (9/16, D1, Vise) adds, "One source familiar with the talks said he considered a transaction combining AOL and MSN as complicated and a long shot. But he said that if the parties can figure out how to create more value by joining forces, a deal of some kind remains possible."

The New York Times (9/16, Hansell) adds that one stumbling block may be "disentangling Microsoft's contract with NBC" as Time Warner owns the rival CNN network.

ABN Reached Tentative Agreement To Buy Antonveneta. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Kahn, Taylor) reports, "ABN Amro Holding NV's tentative agreement to buy a 30% stake in Banca Antonveneta SpA from Banca Popolare Italiana Scarl after a bitter battle clears the path for the first-ever takeover of a large Italian bank by a foreign lender and could pave the way for more, a prospect that seemed remote just several weeks ago … The sale, which values Antonveneta at €8.2 billion ($10 billion) and was agreed to late Wednesday, still faces legal and regulatory hurdles. It would give control of Antonveneta to ABN just two months after ABN's cash offer for the bank failed," at an expected price of €26.50 a share, "the same price it made in its failed public offer this summer."

Merger Between Delta, Northwest Wouldn't Be Surprising. USA Today (9/16, Adams) reports, "The twin Chapter 11 bankruptcy filings" by Delta Air Lines and Northwest Airlines, "almost simultaneous and in the same New York courthouse, are leading many industry experts to believe the carriers may be exploring a merger within bankruptcy protection … The minimal route overlap is considered an advantage with federal regulators," who would have to be convinced that "the combination would not significantly reduce competition, or that one or both of the airlines would fail without the merger."

Legislation Would Promote Competition In Broadband Services. The House Energy and Commerce Committee has released draft legislation that would require broadband providers to allow their subscribers to view any legal online content. The Washington Post (9/16, D2, Mohammed) says the policy is "aimed at keeping big Internet companies from restricting access to competitors' Web offerings." The Post calls the measure a "victory for advocates of 'net neutrality' -- the idea that Internet providers have to stand aside and allow customers to access any Web pages as long as the content is legal. The principle is considered crucial to preserving the open nature of the Internet and preventing big broadband providers from squeezing out smaller competitors that offer voice, video or other services."

EU Probe May Lead To Banking Changes. The AP (9/16, White) reports, "A European Union antitrust inquiry into retail banking may lead to changes in the way European banks are regulated, EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said Thursday." The AP continues, "She said an ongoing investigation may be widened to see how regulation affects customer choice. … 'Do public rules that may have a legitimate objective end up making markets more rigid and limit competition and consumer choice?' she asked European regulators at a twice-yearly meeting in London. 'We want government to protect the consumer, but we also need to protect the consumer from the government.'" The AP adds, "The EU launched its investigation earlier this year, saying it wanted to look at areas where it thought competition was not functioning as well as it might. … Kroes said it was hard for consumers to get clear comparative information about products to allow them to make informed choices."

EU Court Reduces Antitrust Fine Against Daimler Chrysler. Bloomberg News (9/16) reports, "A European Union court today annulled most of a 72 million-euro ($88 million) antitrust fine against DaimlerChrysler AG, ruling that the regulator was wrong to say the automaker broke EU law in Germany and Spain." Bloomberg continues, "DaimlerChrysler, the world's fifth-largest carmaker, was fined in 2001 for breaking EU free-trade laws by instructing dealers in Spain, Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium not to sell to bargain hunters from other EU nations between 1985 and 1996. … The European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg cut the fine to 9.8 million euros, saying in a statement today that DaimlerChrysler acted 'unilaterally' in Germany and therefore didn't break EU rules. In Spain, the automaker acted in line with national legislation, the court said. The tribunal upheld the EU's decision about the company's Belgian operations." Bloomberg adds, "The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, has sought to bring down car prices by dissolving the exclusive ties between carmakers and dealerships. Starting in October 2002, the EU rules broke carmakers' lock on sales networks, permitting dealers to expand and sell different brands in the same showroom."

The AP (9/16) reports, "In Spain, the EU court said DaimlerChrysler followed local law by forcing leasers to link each car with a contracted customer. The Commission had argued that this prevented local dealers from stocking up on Mercedes vehicles and created an artificial shortage. But the court said the Spanish law was 'not contrary' to any EU law and overturned the (US$18.47 million) fine."

States Due US Over Invasive Beetles. The AP (9/16, Gormley) reports, "Four states sued the Bush administration Thursday over an invasive, tree-eating beetle that has entered the U.S. as a stowaway on cargo ships." The AP continues, "The Asian long-horned beetle, along with the emerald ash borer and the pine shoot beetle, are the culprits named in the lawsuit by attorneys general from New York, California, Connecticut and Illinois." The AP adds, "The states are seeking a court order to require the Agriculture Department to examine more effective and less environmentally harmful ways to prevent the insects from entering the country, said New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. … State officials say the insects would cause extensive economic and environmental damage if they move from cities like New York and Chicago to working forests." The AP notes, "The pests enter the country in wooden pallets and wood-based packaging. The state officials contend that federal officials use a 'marginally effective' pesticide, which is being phased out under an international treaty as unsafe to humans. … Also, they said the USDA is following a new rule that requires wooden shipping pallets and other wood packaging material carrying imports to be treated with heat or sprayed with methyl bromide, a chemical the state officials say depletes the ozone and could be a cancer risk."

NYTimes Says Utah Site Is Good Place For Nuclear Fuel Rod Storage. The New York Times (9/16) editorializes, "While few people outside Utah were paying close attention last week, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission authorized the licensing of a private storage plant for spent nuclear fuel rods on an Indian reservation some 50 miles southwest of Salt Lake City. Utah's outraged political leaders pledged to use every legal and political trick available to block the project even though, as representatives of a very conservative state, they supposedly abhor bureaucratic or judicial interference with private corporate decisions." The Times adds, "We remain hopeful that Yucca can qualify as a permanent disposal site. But if Yucca fails to pass muster with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the nation will need a centralized surface site to fill the gap until a safe burial location can be found. The Indian reservation in Utah can fill that purpose."

Appeals Court Panel Postpones Lamberth Hearing. A federal appeals court panel has postponed a hearing about whether US District Judge Royce Lamberth has lost the appearance of impartiality in a case involving money the US government may owe Native Americans. The Washington Post (9/16, A29) says the panel "was scheduled to consider another dispute in the case along with the government's unusual July request to remove Lamberth as the presiding judge. … But the three-judge panel issued an order late yesterday saying they will instead refer the issue of Lamberth's perceived fairness to a later panel of judges considering another appeal dispute in the case, Cobell v. Norton . That means that the Justice Department is not likely to hold a hearing on its complaints about the judge until spring, based on the appellate court's already full schedule this year."

Prominent Miami Lawyer To Plead Guilty Today To Drug Trafficking Charges. The Miami Herald (9/16, Weaver) reports, "In February, federal agents rustled a prominent lawyer out of bed to bust him at his Miami Beach waterfront home. Today, Samuel I. Burstyn is scheduled to plead guilty to scheming with his former clients to obstruct a federal grand jury's investigation into their drug-trafficking operation and himself. … He must forfeit about $200,000 and is expected to lose his law license. U.S. District Judge William J. Zloch has insisted on a 'full confession' from Burstyn at the Fort Lauderdale plea hearing, according to a court document filed Tuesday." The Herald notes Assistant US Attorney Brian McCormick "and fellow prosecutor Michael Dittoe have said Burstyn acted as 'house counsel' for marijuana smugglers Jeffrey Tobin, David Tobin and others."

U.S. Coast Guard Intercepts 2 Tons of Cocaine. The AP (9/16) reports Colombia's anti-narcotics police chief said Thursday that "the U.S. Coast Guard, acting on Colombian intelligence, intercepted a ship towing an unmanned submarine-like vessel that held more than 2 tons of cocaine." Gen. Alberto Gomez said the boat was raided Wednesday off the coast of the Ecuadorean-owned Galapagos Islands. "The underwater capsule, which was attached by a metal cable, was designed so smugglers could tow it below their boat and escape detection if drug agents searched the ship." In another incident, "2.5 tons of cocaine was discovered Wednesday hidden in the oil tanks of a ship docked in the Colombian Pacific port of Buenaventura…Eight suspects were arrested." It's believed the cocaine was heading to Central America, and from there it would have possibly been shipped to the U.S.

'Mob Associate' Doesn't Deliver On Plea Agreement. The Providence (RI) Journal (9/16, Malinowski, Stanton) reports, "Mob associate Alan Blamires was set to plead guilty Thursday to charges that he guarded a large shipment of cocaine that was passing through Rhode Island last winter." But "the plea agreement fell apart when Blamires told Chief U.S. District Court Judge Ernest C. Torres that he was 'fuzzy and blurry' from medication to control his violent tendencies and did not understand the charges against him…'I have pertinent information about Joseph Bevilacqua that I'm trying to get to the prosecutors,' said Blamires." Bevilacqua is a defense attorney and has been the target of a DEA investigation. "DEA agents have spoken to Courtney Calenda, an East Greenwich teenager, who has accused Bevilacqua of sexually assaulting her and supplying her with cocaine."

Missouri Men Enter Pleas In Drug Trafficking Case. The Standard Democrat (9/16) reports two Southeast Missouri men entered guilty pleas on drug charges in federal court. Adrian L. Lewis and Joe Lenzie Turner both pleaded guilty to the distribution of cocaine base. "With his plea, Turner admitted that on May 20, 2005, he distributed a substance containing base to a confidential informant. Specifically, Turner gave the informant 5.4 grams of cocaine base in exchange for $300." U.S. Attorney Catherine L. Hanaway commended the DEA and the Sikeston Police Department for their combined efforts to prosecute the case.

Judge Sentences Meth Convict, Blasts His Actions. The Lynchburg (VA) News and Advance (9/16, Waugh) reports, "Despite several tearful pleas from friends and family, a Lynchburg federal judge blasted a Rustburg man Thursday for his role in the selling of methamphetamines. 'You don't know how many lives were destroyed … Generations of others will be coming through this courtroom because of his actions. You're old and in pain. That's not an excuse,' U.S. District Judge Norman K. Moon said. Moon didn't believe Clayton 'Sonny' Keyes' story that he only started using meth in 2001 because his back pain had become so painful, and that he began selling the drug only to support his addiction. Keyes, 55, pleaded guilty in April 2004 to conspiracy to distribute more than 15 kilograms of methamphetamine and possession of a firearm. He has already served two years in jail since his arrest. On Thursday, Moon gave Keyes nearly 10 additional years in prison, despite calling the prosecutor-recommended sentence 'overly generous.'"

U.S. Accuses 'Prince of Pot' Of Conspiring to Distribute Marijuana. The Missoula (MT) Independent (9/16, McQuillan) reports Marc Emery, aka the "Prince of Pot," is scheduled to have his first extradition hearing on Sept. 16. At the request of the U.S. government, Emery and two of his employees were arrested July 29 by Canadian police on U.S. charges of conspiring to distribute marijuana and marijuana seeds and money laundering. The Independent continues, "though DEA agents paint Emery as a greedy drug trafficker, Emery says he's dedicated the last 15 years to the cause of marijuana legalization and has donated all business proceeds—$4 million—to the movement and its activists, both in Canada and the United States."

The Guardian (9/16, Campbell) reports, "One of the world's leading cannabis legislation campaigners, a magazine publisher known as the 'Prince of Pot', faces an extradition hearing today in Vancouver as American drugs agencies seek to put him on trial in the US. His supporters claim the move is a first step by US authorities to prosecute foreigners who challenge the US laws on cannabis."

U.S. Removes Venezuela From List Of Allies In War On Drugs. The Tallahassee (FL) Democrat/KRT (9/15, Dudley, Bachelet) reports, "President Bush has taken Venezuela off his list of allies in the war on drugs, saying that the government of President Hugo Chavez spurned anti-drug cooperation with U.S. officials and fired its effective law enforcement officers. But the White House waived the cuts in U.S. foreign aid usually attached to the "decertification" so that it can continue to support Venezuelan pro-democracy groups that oppose the leftist Chavez." According to the White House, Venezuela has "failed demonstrably" to reduce the flow through its territories of about 150 tons of cocaine and increasing amounts of heroin. "Only last month, Chavez ordered his government officials to stop cooperating with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), accusing it of espionage and drug trafficking."

The AP (9/15, Gedda) reports, Venezuela's populist president, Hugo Chavez, "had no direct comment Thursday on Bush's action but used the occasion of his presence at the United Nations summit of world leaders to take a verbal swipe at Bush. 'Mr. Bush represents the most crude and savage imperialism that threatens the world,' Chavez said."

Plan Colombia Under Scrutiny As Expiration Date Nears. Knight Ridder (9/16, McCaffrey) reports, "The six puppies looked fine at first. But when Colombian police gave them a closer look they found fresh scars on their bellies that told a different story. … The tiny Labradors and Rottweilers had been surgically converted into drug couriers: cut open with several plastic packets of heroin stitched into their abdomens." Knight Ridder continues, "Even the hardened Colombian police, who discovered the puppies at an abandoned house in a rural area outside of Medellin, had never seen anything like it. Traffickers were apparently going to ship the dogs to the United States saying they were pets. It's almost certain they would have been discarded as soon as their valuable cargo was removed. … 'The better we get at catching them the more creative they get,' said Mark Styron, supervisor of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Heroin Group in Bogota. 'That's always the problem.'" Knight Ridder adds, "Much of the cocaine and heroin that ends up for sale on the street corners of the United States begins in the rich soil of this conflict-ridden South American country. And staying ahead of the smugglers is expensive. Since 2000, the United States has sent $4.5 billion to Colombia to help battle drug trafficking. … That six-year program, known as Plan Colombia, is set to expire at the end of this year. … Although the Bush administration and Congress have signaled a willingness to continue funding at current levels for at least another year, some are questioning whether the money has been effective in stemming the tide of drugs to the United States."

Prosecutors Seen As Out Of Step With Public On Dying Debate. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/16) says that aging and dying are more and more "in the public eye," and among "the demands being raised is better control of pain, which has caught doctors between a desire to alleviate suffering and the US war on drugs." Specific examples here usually "fall in a gray area, involving doctors who may have crossed a legal or ethical line, whether out of compassion or greed. The larger problem is the message that all doctors receive from aggressive efforts to curb opiate abuse, and their resulting reluctance to sufficiently treat severe pain and other suffering." The Times states, "Federal criminal prosecutions have usually involved…charging pain management specialists, who often handle very tough cases, with overprescription or outright sale of controlled drugs." Again, "most such cases are far from clear-cut, except perhaps in the eyes of federal prosecutors." In other words, the government's "drug policy and honesty about the blurred line between compassionate treatment and medical euthanasia" has failed to keep pace with the "debate over what constitutes a 'good death.'"

North Carolina Man Held On Pipe Bomb, Firearms Charges. The Roanoke Rapids (NC) Daily Herald (9/16) reports, "Hamming it up for the camera, Michael Thomas Carpenter was taken into federal custody Tuesday for possessing pipe bombs and a cache of guns in his house outside Garysburg (NC)." The Herald continues, "Led to a blue Ford Expedition by an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the 34-year-old, upon seeing a photographer, exclaimed, 'What a wonderful justice system we have in America.' … He asked the agent escorting him if he would slow down so he could pose for the camera and at one point gave a cheesy grin." The Herald adds, "Asked if he was surprised to be federally charged for having three pipe bombs, Carpenter said, 'No, sir. The feds have to do their jobs so we're going to go with them as calmly and peacefully as we can. God bless America.'" The Herald notes, "Since his arrest on local charges in July, Carpenter was being held in the Northampton County Jail for possession with intent to sell and deliver marijuana, possession of drug paraphernalia and possession of a weapon of mass destruction. … Capt. George Reed of the Northampton County Sheriff's Office said Carpenter was trying to run the jail while he was there, first being held on $525,000 bond for the local charges and then under no bond on a federal detainer. … ATF agents Tuesday took Carpenter to Greenville, where he would appear before a federal magistrate. … ATF charged Carpenter with possession of a destructive device and possession of firearms by a convicted felon. The federal agents said anyone in possession of explosive weapons must have them registered. The three pipe bombs State Bureau of Investigation agents detonated behind Carpenter's house off Taylor Road in July were not registered."

ATF Finds Fake Explosives In Deserted New Orleans Home. The AP (9/15, Foster) reports, "National guardsmen and ATF agents patrolling the dark, deserted streets of New Orleans early Thursday found what appeared to be a bomb inside one of the homes vacated when Hurricane Katrina ripped through the city." The AP continues, "The guardsmen found what looked like six sticks of dynamite and a detonator along with a bag of ammunition and marijuana. They notified the New Orleans Police Department which, in turn, asked the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to respond because their own bomb squad equipment was flooded in the wake of the storm. … 'It had all the characteristics of a real device,' ATF explosives specialist Johnnie Green said of the suspect device." The AP adds, "His agents placed an 'interrupter' device on the one in question to try to detonate it and found out it was a hoax. 'It was a good one,' Green said, 'especially in these conditions,' referring to the blacked-out street. … Charlie Smith, an ATF special response supervisor, said finding the device should serve as a 'wake-up call for every guy going through these houses.' … Earlier in the week, he said they found a house with nine devices, 50 guns and a photo of the owner wearing a German uniform and Hitler-type mustache. 'He evidently was a collector. He had a ton of stuff,' Smith said."

Van Carrying Federal Inmates, US Marshals Struck In Florida. The AP (9/16) reports, "Nine federal inmates and two U.S. Marshals were taken to area hospitals Thursday after their van was forced off Interstate 95 and rolled at least twice — an incident allegedly caused by a hit-and-run driver." The AP continues, "Marshals were taking the inmates southbound on I-95, from the federal courthouse in Fort Lauderdale to a federal detention center in Miami when a vehicle hit a Geo Tracker, said U.S. Marshals Service spokesman Barry Golden." The AP adds, "The Geo spun out of control, hitting the Marshals' van and forcing it off the road. No one inside the van was critically injured, although one inmate was hurt more seriously than the others, Golden said. … Golden said security was never an issue."

IMMIGRATION:

Voinovich Questions ICE Nominee's Qualifications. Senators told Julie Myers, President Bush's pick to head Immigration and Customs Enforcement, that they are still considering a plan to reorganize the agency. The Washington Times (9/16, Waterman) adds that "one Republican expressed doubt that she was qualified for the job." During Myers' confirmation hearing before the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Government Affairs, Sen. George Voinovich told the nominee, "I'm really concerned about your management experience," adding, "I think that we ought to have a meeting with [Homeland Security Secretary] Mike Chertoff...to ask him...why he thinks you're qualified for the job," because "based on your resume, I don't think you are." Sen. Susan Collins "raised the issue of merging ICE with another agency founded from the breakup of the Customs Service and INS -- Customs and Border Protection (CPB), which polices the nation's ports of entry."

TAX:

KPMG Tax Inquiry Widening To Include Others. The New York Times (9/16, Browning) reports, "Ever since the accounting firm KPMG reached a $456 million settlement of a federal investigation into abusive tax shelters nearly three weeks ago, the question has been who may be next. Federal prosecutors have said that their criminal investigation is widening, and attention is increasingly turning to the role played by banks, financial advisers and law firms that worked with KPMG and other accounting firms to create and sell such shelters … Deutsche Bank in particular has been a target of lawsuits from wealthy investors who sought to shield millions of dollars from taxes and bought shelters that did not pass muster with the Internal Revenue Service," and "a barely noticed lawsuit indicates that Deutsche Bank had a much deeper involvement in creating and helping to sell a questionable tax shelter known as Cobra."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Roberts Concludes Testimony Before Senate Judiciary Committee. Chief Justice nominee John Roberts yesterday concluded his testimony before the Senate

DOJ_NMG_0005943

Judiciary Committee, which also heard from several witnesses for and against the nomination. The panel is scheduled to vote Thursday on Roberts' nomination. The network coverage was limited to about one-and-a-half minutes total. As in this morning's newspaper stories, TV reports focused on Roberts' assurance that he is "not an ideologue." The stories predicted he will win confirmation, and much of the coverage portrays the debate over Roberts as the precursor to an all-out battle over President Bush's next Supreme Court nominee.

ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 6, :35, Woodruff) reported Judge Roberts "seemed determined to paint a fuller picture of himself." The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 11, 0:40, Schieffer) reported Roberts "returned to the theme of his opening statement, assuring the senators he had no political agenda for the Supreme Court." Barring "any last minute surprises, Roberts is headed toward Senate confirmation." NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 7, 0:30, Williams) reported, "Two Democrats on the committee said today they're not sure how they'll vote. One of them, New York's Senator Chuck Schumer, said he wakes up in the middle of the night wrestling with his decision."

The AP (9/16) noted Roberts told "wary Democrats that ideologues don't belong on the Supreme Court. He said his record shows he will rely on the law, not personal views." The AP adds, "Persistent grilling by Democrats on the Judiciary Committee made no apparent inroads in Roberts' support among the Senate's majority Republicans, who plan to vote the week after next to make him the nation's 17th chief justice."

Knight Ridder (9/16, Kuhnhenn) says Roberts' "performance during four days before the Senate Judiciary Committee wowed even many Democrats, who conceded they were torn between admiration for his intellect and his modest judicial demeanor versus his reluctance to reveal more about his views on legal issues." Republican strategists "predicted a near straight party-line vote next week in the Republican-run committee, which includes some of the Senate's most liberal and most conservative members. But even there, some Democrats were struggling with their votes. … In the full Senate, signs emerged of bipartisan support for Roberts, especially from so-called 'red-state Democrats.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Savage, Schmitt) quotes Roberts saying, "I'm not an ideologue," adding that "with that comment, he aptly summarized the case he made for himself during four days of hearings on his nomination as the Supreme Court's chief justice." His "approval is virtually assured." The Washington Post (9/16, A6, Goldstein, Becker) used identical language, saying Roberts' confirmation is "virtually assured." The Post adds, "Some conservatives were alarmed last month over the disclosure that he had helped gay activists win a landmark Supreme Court in 1996." But "Roberts testified yesterday that he would have been equally willing to represent the opposing side, the state of Colorado, if it had asked for his help first." Reuters (9/16, Ferraro, Cowan) also says both Democrats and Republicans are predicting Roberts "will be confirmed to head the Supreme Court."

USA Today (9/16, Biskupic) adds that "with Roberts likely to win Senate confirmation," Bush "soon will pick a successor for Sandra Day O'Connor, a more moderate justice who has been a key vote in preserving, among other things, abortion rights and affirmative action in college admissions. That's why the coming battle over her replacement likely will be more contentious than the one over Roberts."

The Dallas Morning News (9/16, Jackson, Pusey) reports some "aides said Democrats, without such a filibuster, might seek to keep Judge Roberts' vote under 60 – sending a message to the administration that Democrats could muster the numbers for a filibuster the next time around."

A similar USA Today article (9/16, Kiely) says "the big question surrounding" Roberts is how the vote "will affect President Bush's next Supreme Court pick. … An important factor in the Democrats' strategy: how best to position themselves for the next Supreme Court debate."

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Reynolds, Simon) says that "many Democrats had feared that Bush would nominate a judge in the mold of Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, but Roberts took pains during his testimony to distance himself from some of their views." Moreover, "according to Democratic calculations of the balance of liberals and conservatives on the court, Roberts' confirmation to replace the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist would substitute one conservative for another."

The New York Times (9/16, Liptak) reports, "At times, Judge Roberts's limited conception of the judge's role struck Democrats as evidence of a cramped approach to the law from a lawyer more taken with technicalities than with justice." Roberts "declined to second-guess positions he had taken as an advocate arguing that a student who had been sexually abused was not entitled to damages and that a death row inmate could not present new evidence of his innocence if certain deadlines had passed."

Another New York Times piece (9/16, Stolberg), headlined "Frustrated By Roberts, And Unsure How To Vote," says Roberts' "unflappable performance during three days of questioning has clearly put Democrats in a quandary." Some "say a strong vote against his nomination could prod the White House into naming a centrist to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, a crucial swing vote. Others say that supporting the Roberts nomination could make Democrats appear reasonable, giving them more credibility to oppose the next nominee."

The Washington Times (9/16, Hurt) says "among those Democrats being closely watched is Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California, who has said she will not support a nominee who will undo federal abortion rights. 'I don't really know what I'm going to do with respect to voting for you or against you,' she told Judge Roberts yesterday."

The Legal Times (9/16, Goldman) reports, "After two lengthy days of interrogations, Thursday's session was essentially cleanup time for the Democrats, several of whom besides Schumer still wanted to question the witness. … It was clear, however, as had been true since the first day of questioning, that Roberts was going to remain a disciplined nominee, rarely commenting on any case or issue that might one day appear before the Court. … But as in Wednesday's hearing, in which Roberts did reveal some slivers of his legal thinking, Thursday's session also provided a few glimmers of his views, and not merely a recitation of hornbook legal principles about precedent."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Bravin, Cummings) notes that while Roberts "frustrated some Democrats who said he was avoiding answering their questions, he gave Republicans no assurance that he was sympathetic to their causes." He "demurred, for instance, when Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.) asked 'whether the unborn child is a person or is a piece of property.'" However, "Republicans professed no doubts about…Roberts, who himself offered no objection when Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) praised him as a 'strict constructionist.'"

Charles Krauthammer writes in his Washington Post column (9/16, A31) editorializes, "Roberts denies that he has any ideology, any 'overarching judicial philosophy,' and is nothing more than an ad hoc, bottom-up type of guy. Maybe he is. Maybe he isn't." But "he knows that if he dares to say otherwise, he gets Borked." Krauthammer goes on to predict "two things: (a) Chief Justice Roberts will vote to uphold Roe v. Wade , and (b) his replacing his former boss, Chief Justice William Rehnquist, will move the court only mildly, but most assuredly, to the left -- as measured by the only available yardstick, the percentage of concurrences with the opinions of those conservative touchstones, Scalia and Thomas."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (9/16, Toner, Kirkpatrick) reports "liberal advocates warned Thursday that confirming…Roberts Jr. as chief justice of the United States would threaten hard-won progress on civil rights and women's rights." On the final day of the hearings, "liberals were arrayed in full force before the Senate Judiciary Committee: civil rights leaders, leading feminists and reproductive rights advocates, all warning about the importance of the court in the lives of average Americans." In "one emblematic moment," Rep. John Lewis, "the Georgia Democrat severely beaten during the civil rights movement, told the committee that he feared a Roberts court would 'no longer hear the people's cries for justice,' and no longer act as 'a sympathetic referee'' because of his philosophy of judicial restraint." The Washington Post (9/16, C1, Davis) also notes the civil rights leaders' comments, adding "the 18 committee members are all white -- 17 men and one woman, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). There have also been only a handful of people of color witnessing the proceedings, be they activists from the right or left, students or simply those who wanted to observe history."

Under the headline "Final Day Of Nomination Hearings: Yawn," the Washington Post (9/16, A6) reports, "As Democrats proceeded through their final round of questioning, the Republicans did not conceal their boredom." Sen. Tom Coburn "yawned. Brownback closed his eyes and rubbed his brow." Sen. Lindsey O. Graham "let out a big yawn and fixed his hair. Five GOP staffers shared a joke, then passed a note to Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah), who read it, looked over at the Democratic side and chuckled."

However, the Washington Times (9/16, Hurt) reports, "Sen. John Cornyn turned the tables on Democrats yesterday, transforming the confirmation hearings for Judge John G. Roberts Jr. into one of the nastiest partisan conflicts the Senate Judiciary Committee has seen in recent years. Throughout the four days of hearings, Democrats called for the release of internal legal documents Judge Roberts wrote while working in the Solicitor General's Office. Republicans said those documents fall under attorney-client privilege and cannot be released." The Times adds, "Fed up with the repeated pleas, Mr. Cornyn, Texas Republican, reminded the Democrats on the panel of their stunned outrage when some of their own internal records wound up in public. … He was making reference to 14 internal memos that were downloaded from Democratic computers by two Republican staffers and were published by the Wall Street Journal and The Washington Times. The memos revealed a cozy relationship between Democrats on the Judiciary Committee and outside groups with special interests in the federal judiciary."

DNC Intensifies Attacks On Roberts. The Washington Times (9/16, Pierce) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The Democratic National Committee yesterday stepped up its attacks on Judge John G. Roberts Jr., with DNC Chairman Howard Dean saying that the Supreme Court nominee was 'the wrong man at the wrong time for our country.'" In an e-mail fundraising solicitation to Democrats, Dean wrote, "The skills John Roberts displays are like those of White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove or House Republican Leader Tom DeLay. Both of those men have sharp political minds — they are among the smartest in Washington. But they use those skills to push a narrow ideology and win at any costs." Dean added, "Roberts has spent a career using the law to protect corporate interests and roll back the rights that protect us all."

Hispanic Chamber Of Commerce Calls For Gonzales' Supreme Court Nomination. WDJT-TV Milwaukee (9/15, 5:05 p.m.) reported, "The Hispanic Chamber of Commerce is holding its national convention in Milwaukee this week. Today the chamber officially endorsed John Roberts as the next chief justice, and called for attorney general Alberto Gonzales to be nominated to the high court."

Bush Pledges Federal Effort To Rebuild Areas Ravaged By Katrina. President Bush addressed the nation last night from New Orleans, pledging a massive and sustained federal effort to rebuild the region devastated by Katrina, and taking responsibility for the failures in the relief effort. The AP (9/16, Pickler) says Bush "promised tonight the government will pay most of the costs of rebuilding the hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast in one of the largest reconstruction projects the world has ever seen." The President is quoted saying, "There is no way to imagine America without New Orleans, and this great city will rise again." Knight Ridder (9/16, Hutcheson, Bolstad) adds Bush "went further than he ever had in acknowledging the missteps and accepting responsibility." Said Bush, "Americans have every right to expect a more effective response in a time of emergency. … When the federal government fails to meet such an obligation, I as president am responsible for the problem, and for the solution."

Bush received generally positive media reviews for his speech. Even the New York Times editorial page (9/16), which is often critical of the President, writes this morning that "once again, as he did after 9/11, Mr. Bush has responded to disaster with disconcerting uncertainty, then risen to the occasion later. Once again, he has delivered a speech that will reassure many Americans." Bush's address is being portrayed as a attempt to put his presidency back on track after what many considered a lackluster performance in the immediate aftermath of the storm. As the Christian Science Monitor (9/16, Feldmann) says this morning, "As New Orleans and the devastated Gulf Coast region look ahead to rebuilding and renewal, so, too, President Bush is digging out from the political damage hurricane Katrina has wreaked on his presidency."

All three networks ran the speech live, and ran previews of if in their regular evening newscasts which included excerpts of Bush's remarks from advance copies. After Bush's message, ABC and NBC offered extensive commentary, while CBS quickly returned to regular programming.

On NBC (9/15), Tim Russert said, "I think the President demonstrated to the country he understands the magnitude of this crisis. But because we are three weeks into the crisis, one speech alone will not solve his political problems. … The remaining three years of his Presidency will be devoted to this, and he also has to deal with the problem of the racial divide and that three out of four Americans believe their government is not prepared to protect them if there is another crisis or disaster. It's a tall order. He began tonight, but it must be sustained, complicated and difficult and overseen on a steady, unrelenting way."

On ABC (9/15) after the President's speech, Ted Koppel said Bush "has just given a speech quite breathtaking in terms of the depth and breadth of its commitment." A bit later, ABC's Dean Reynolds spoke with a group of African-American Katrina evacuees in the Reliant Center in Houston. Pressed for their views of Bush's speech, all found reason for optimism and expressed hope at the thought of returning home to New Orleans. In one representative exchange, Reynolds asked Connie London, "You heard the President say repeatedly that you are not alone, that the country stands beside you. Do you believe him?" Connie London: "Yeah, I believe him, because here in Texas, they have truly been good to us. I mean…" Reynolds: "Did you get a sense of hope that you could return to your home one day in New Orleans?" London: "Yes, I did." After hearing the short "focus group" with the Katrina evacuees, Koppel remarked, "If the national response is reflected by that small group of people in the parking lot of the Astrodome, the President has made some major progress tonight." The New York Times (9/16, Saulny) runs a piece echoing the same sentiments, under the headline "Evacuees Find Comfort And Encouragement In Speech."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, McKinnon) calls the speech "hopeful and sympathetic," adding it was "crafted at least in part to revive his political fortunes," while the Los Angeles Times (9/16, Gerstenzang, Chen) says Bush "offered a broad vision of a nation pulling together in common purpose portraying the effort in grand terms." Los Angeles Times media critic Paul Brownfield (9/16), meanwhile, praises the speech's staging. He writes, "Bush…could have given this speech from the Oval Office, but he came to stake his own version of being there. And he chose the only kind of postcard left on the racks -- the impossibly serene one."

The New York Times (9/16, Bumiller) notes "Bush delivered his speech, carried live by the major television networks, in the middle of the city's darkened French Quarter, where Army troops from the 82nd Airborne Division were on patrol. The Bush White House, well practiced in the art of presidential stagecraft, provided its own generators for the lighting and communications equipment that beamed Mr. Bush's remarks to the nation."

Local officials in areas affected by Katrina also expressed satisfaction with Bush's remarks. On ABC (9/15), Koppel spoke with Jefferson Parish President Aaron Broussard, who said, "This was a speech I waited for the President to say. It was compassionate. It was specific about relief, it gave hope. This is what we need more than anything right now, is hope. In politics, it's all about tomorrow. It's not about yesterday. The blame game can go on in Congress. It can go on in the media, but here locally we still need this relief that the President stated. I was glad to hear it. Thank you, Mr. President."

On ABC (9/15) Koppel spoke with Louisiana state Sen. Cleo Fields, who was in Baton Rouge. Fields said he thought President Bush "made it very clear tonight that, listen, we made mistakes, but that mistake won't happen again. And I would hope that the President will live up to his commitments, and I have every reason to believe that he will. And let's move forward."

Likewise, Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/15), "I thought there were three things that are really very important. First is the president saying Washington is not going to try to dictate the solutions that the people in Mississippi, in my case, the people down on the gulf coast and in south Mississippi, the damaged areas, they're going to make the decisions about how to rebuild, what they want, what their own community should be about. He did make it very plain the second crucial thing that the federal government understands that it has a major commitment here. It's going to be required to support financially what we do, particularly in areas of public infrastructure. But the last thing and I think crucially by this Gulf Opportunity Zone he recognized that really at the end of the day it's the private sector that's going to rebuild the coast, that's going to provide the jobs that it's going to be crucial to whether we're successful and what I'm committed to and that's building the Mississippi gulf coast bigger and better than ever before."

GOP Sen. Richard Shelby said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/15), "I thought it was a very compelling speech. I thought it was sincere. He passed the buck to no one. He accepted it in the mold of President Truman. He admitted a lot. He admitted that no one was prepared. And that means the federal government, the state and the local governments. He was very, very honest, upfront. I think this is a new beginning. It's also a big commitment on the part of the president, and he's committed to Congress, even perhaps tied us down to doing more than some people wanted to do -- not more than I wanted to do, but more than some."

Not all commentary was positive. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, McKinnon) reports that Democratic congressional leaders "criticized Mr. Bush's plan for being long on comforting words, but short on action." In an analysis piece, USA Today (9/16, Keen) says, "Unlike in the aftermath of 9/11, there are few signs now of a pause in political partisanship, and Bush's plea for unity seems unlikely to end criticism." Sen. John Kerry said after the speech, "No American doubts that New Orleans will rise again, they doubt the competence and commitment of this administration." Democrats "said it's too late for Bush to regain the aura of decisiveness that sustained him in other crises. 'The fundamental positive feelings the American people had for him are gone,' said Joe Lockhart, a former press secretary for President Clinton."

Meanwhile, some commentators said the speech lacked a defining moment to change the public's perception of Bush. Mark Whittaker of Newsweek said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/15) that Bush's speech did not contain a "bullhorn moment," adding, "First of all, I think it's too late. I think the response that probably a lot of people had is, this all sounds very good, but why are we hearing it weeks after the event rather than days? On the responsibility issue, he made it sound like this was just a problem that was so overwhelming that nobody could deal with it. And he never accounted for the days when our reporting, other people's reporting shows that things could have been done; they just weren't. I mean, he talks about how he's -- he made it clear that there was a need for broader federal authority in the use of troops."

Former presidential adviser David Gergen said on CNN's Larry King Live (9/15), "I agree with Mark Whitaker, that this was not a bullhorn moment, if that's what the White House was seeking. But it was a strong, confident speech, and I do think it will give reassurance to the people of the Gulf region, that the government -- the federal government, after its faulty beginning, is at last on their side. And it was particularly -- I think it was welcome not only that the president took personal responsibility, but that he's taking the issues of poverty more seriously."

William Schneider said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/15) that Bush "has one thing going for him as he tries to regain the initiative. He has kept his base. Every leader needs a base. Your base are the people who are with you when you're wrong. This president's base is not abandoning him. Eighty-five percent of Republicans stand behind President Bush. His allies defend him. … President Bush has been there for his conservative base, and they're now there for him."

Before the President's speech, NBC Nightly News (9/15, lead story, 3:15, Gregory) reported, "Tonight's speech is one critics say Mr. Bush should have made sooner." Michael Beschloss, NBC News presidential historian: "He's got the opportunity tonight to make Americans think he's the leader that took them through 9/11. Their sense of that has been often absent in the last couple of weeks." ABC World News Tonight (9/15, lead story, 2:45, Moran) reported, "What the White House aides want this speech to do is help the President do what presidents can do in crisis situation. Rally the country around them. Rise above it all. They acknowledge, he starts from a difficult position on this crisis."

That area is the subject of much analysis in this morning's newspapers. The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Balz), under the headline "A Bid To Repair A Presidency," says "the clear subtext was the rebuilding of a presidency that is now at its lowest point ever." More evidence of that, says the Washington Times (9/16, Lakely), comes from the latest Fox News/Opinion Dynamics poll, which shows "Bush's approval has slipped in the polls since the federal government's initial response to Hurricane Katrina." It is now at 41%. However, "his speech last night from the devastated Gulf Coast promised an unprecedented federal spending effort and may mark the beginning of a political turnaround."

The New York Times (9/16, Stevenson) says "it was not the president's most stirring speech, but it conveyed a sense of command far more than his off-key efforts in the days immediately after the storm, when he often seemed more interested in bucking up government officials than in addressing the dire situation confronting hundreds of thousands of displaced and desperate people." But "if the speech helped him clear his first hurdle by projecting the aura of a president at the controls, it probably did not, by itself, get him over a second: his need to erase or at least blur the image of a White House that was unresponsive to the plight of some of the country's most vulnerable citizens and failed to manage the government competently."

Democrats Offered "Pre-Buttal," Said Region Needs "Marshall Plan." The Washington Times (9/16, Dinan, Debose) reports, "Democrats yesterday said the Gulf Coast needs a Marshall Plan to get back on its feet and that President Bush should seek more aid. … Speaking hours before Mr. Bush's televised address last night, Sen. Harry Reid and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the government must be prepared to spend on education, health care and other services to make the region whole again."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/16, Henry) reported Reid and Pelosi "stuck a finger in the collective eye of the president and congressional Republicans up here, questioning the priorities on how they're going to spend the money to rebuild the region, also Senator Reid coming out very hard and writing a strong letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist saying he will not participate in this joint House-Senate investigation of what went wrong. Democrats see a political opportunity and they're playing hardball."

CNN's The Situation Room (9/16, Blitzer) noted Democrats came out with a "pre-rebuttal, if you will. They're coming up with criticism, not even knowing specifically" what Bush "is going to be announcing tonight." CNN (King) added, "They are well aware that this president is at one of the weakest points, if not the weakest point, politically, of his presidency. … So the Democrats are trying to say that now -- don't make this disaster a laboratory for ideological ventures like school vouchers for those displaced children or tax credits instead of direct money to rebuild things. So you're going to have an ideological a fight. There are some Democrats who say we should turn the volume down a little bit, step back and let this play out. The president's in trouble. Let him continue to be in trouble. Let's not push him. But especially the liberal base of the Democratic party, they see the president weak. They think in the past they have made a mistake of not challenging him immediately and loudly. This time they're going to challenge him."

Conservatives Worried About Increased Spending. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Calmes) reports "the open-ended commitment by President Bush and congressional leaders to rebuild New Orleans and the Gulf Coast is stoking anger among conservatives over the Republican government's record of higher spending and debt." While "no Republican in Congress is opposing federal aid that already totals $62 billion and is expected to exceed $200 billion, " the party's "conservative wing, led yesterday by Oklahoma's Tom Coburn in the Senate and Rep. Mike Pence of Indiana in the House, is calling for offsetting 'sacrifices' in federal spending. And they're backed by a growing chorus of conservative activists, columnists and bloggers."

In fact, Pence, Coburn, and Sen. John McCain are proposing that the Medicare drug benefit passed by the last Congress be delayed in order to fund the hurricane relief effort. Pence said on Fox News' Big Story with John Gibson last night (9/15) that he, Coburn, and McCain are calling for cuts in government spending, specifically "pork barrel" spending. Also, he said, they are recommending to "delay the rollout of the new Medicare prescription drug entitlement for one year, saving taxpayers some $40 million that we could spend on Katrina."

Under the headline "GOP Split Over Big Plans For Storm Spending," the New York Times (9/16, Hulse) quotes Coburn saying, "I don't believe that everything that should happen in Louisiana should be paid for by the rest of the country. I believe there are certain responsibilities that are due the people of Louisiana." Meanwhile, Sen. Jim DeMint, "called for restoring 'sanity' to the federal recovery effort." The Washington Times (9/16, Dinan) quotes DeMint saying, "Our government needs to take stock of what America is already doing -- the money that has already been contributed -- and see that we have a better role supporting what America can do on its own."

USA Today (9/16, Benedetto) notes Bush "put no price tag on the overall effort or his proposals to help evacuees find jobs and give them a chance to get free federal land for new homes. So far, the government has spent more than $13.7 billion of the $62.3 billion approved by Congress. The final cost is expected to be much higher." He "proposed three initiatives requiring congressional approval: An 'opportunity zone' in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama to give tax incentives to businesses that create jobs and loans and loan guarantees to small businesses. Recovery accounts of up to $5,000 for job training, education and child care for each evacuee seeking a job. A lottery to give low-income citizens of the region free federal land. In return, they would pledge to build homes on the lots."

DOJ_NMG_0005948

USA Today (9/16, Drinkard) says the funds already spent by the government include "$7.2 billion for Louisiana, where flooding devastated New Orleans; $4.8 billion for Mississippi and $1.5 billion for Alabama."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (9/16, A1, VandeHei, Baker) says Bush "committed the nation to a plan that officials and lawmakers believe could top $200 billion, roughly the cost of the Iraq war and reconstruction," and which "promises to reorient government for the balance of the Bush presidency." The Washington Times (9/16, Curl) adds Bush "did not directly address how the federal government would pay for the massive project."

More Commentary On Bush's Speech. The New York Times (9/16) writes in an editorial, "Once again, as he did after 9/11, Mr. Bush has responded to disaster with disconcerting uncertainty, then risen to the occasion later. Once again, he has delivered a speech that will reassure many Americans that he understands the enormity of the event and the demands of leadership to come." The speech, "as good as it was, marks only a moment of clarity," and it must be "followed by deeds that are as principled, disciplined and ambitious as Mr. Bush's speech."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (9/16) discusses Thursday's speech. The paper says Bush's goal was ultimately "to rescue his presidency, which Katrina's storm surge tattered." The Times argues that Bush's "call for a 'Gulf Opportunity Zone' is intriguing, but he needs to make sure storm relief doesn't become a Trojan horse for every conservative ideologue's favorite pet project. Flat tax, anyone?" Bush's speech, adds the Times, "helped him regain his political footing for now. But whether he rescues his legacy from the putrid waters swirling in the streets of New Orleans will depend on whether the aspirations expressed Thursday night are translated into a truly bright future for the region."

USA Today (9/16) editorializes that last night, "Bush at last seemed to have marshaled an effective response as he addressed the nation from New Orleans." However, "whether it will prove to be effectively managed and responsibly financed, or just good public relations, remains to be seen."

Columnist Paul Krugman writes in the New York Times (9/16) reports, "Is there any way Mr. Bush could ensure an honest recovery program? Yes -- he could insulate decisions about reconstruction spending from politics by placing them in the hands of an autonomous agency headed by a political independent, or, if no such person can be found, a Democrat (as a sign of good faith)." Bush "didn't do that last night, and probably won't. There's every reason to believe the reconstruction of the Gulf Coast, like the failed reconstruction of Iraq, will be deeply marred by cronyism and corruption."

Homeland Security Taps Special Auditor Teams To Review Katrina Aid. The Washington Times (9/16, Hudson) reports that "teams of auditors and investigators from the Department of Homeland Security expect to spend three to five years at hurricane recovery field offices in an attempt to prevent fraudulent use of more than $60 billion in relief funds. 'We're going to prevent what is still going to happen, contract procurement irregularities,' said Tamara Faulkner, spokeswoman for the inspector general's office." FEMA "routinely uses inspector general auditors to monitor federal dollars that are sent to disaster zones, such as the hurricanes that hit Florida last year, but the Katrina operation and the potential for fraud is on 'an unprecedented level,' Miss Faulkner said. A team of 30 inspector general employees will hit the ground Monday at field offices in Baton Rouge, La., Montgomery, Ala., and Jackson, Miss., she said. Later next week, three auditors will be sent to Texas. Although Congress gave authority to the department's inspector general, Richard Skinner, to stop contract fraud and a $15 million budget to get started, some lawmakers want to create new watchdogs." Senate Homeland Security Chair Susan Collins "yesterday introduced a bill to expand the jurisdiction of the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction to oversee the recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast region, with an $80 million budget."

Senate Passes Hurricane Tax Relief Bill. CNN's The Situation Room (9/15, Velshi) reported that the Senate has passed an 18-point plan "for hurricane tax relief. There are some very important provisions in this bill. … One of them is that, if you have debts that are discharged because of the hurricane, the IRS is now going to make sure that you don't have to pay tax on that debt that you now don't have to pay. If you're a victim of the hurricane, you are going to be allowed to withdraw more out of your IRA or 401(k) without the 10 percent penalty that you typically have to pay. There is also going to be greater encouragement through tax deduction for companies that want to donate food and books, because of the shortage of books as a result of schools getting flooded and destroyed. The Senate has passed a bill that is going to encourage donation of books to schools. There is going to be an increase in the limit, the taxable limit, for donations, cash contributions for hurricane relief."

The AP (9/16, Dalrymple) reports, "Lawmakers on Thursday worked to help solve the practical problems facing those caught in Hurricane Katrina's path who need quick access to cash, housing and medical care." The AP continues, "The House and Senate passed nearly identical bills to let victims tap retirement accounts without penalty and help working poor families and parents retain their tax credits. Senators also voted for rental housing vouchers and aid measures for small business. … The action came ahead of President Bush's prime-time speech from New Orleans about the comprehensive recovery effort he envisions for the battered Gulf Coast." The AP adds, "On Capitol Hill, Republicans and Democrats fought over plans for a special, GOP-majority committee to investigate the government's sluggish response to the emergency. The House endorsed the idea by a mostly partisan 224-188 vote. Democrats warned they would boycott. … Louisiana lawmakers outlined a reconstruction plan, called 'Project Pelican,' for their devastated state. It includes coastal restoration and economic development incentives to brings jobs and people back to New Orleans. … Help was coming from the Treasury Department, which ruled that the hurricane qualified as a hardship. That allows victims and their families tap into retirement plans, including 401(k)s, an effort aimed at people with little savings to recover from the storm."

Conservatives, Liberals Equally Critical Of FEMA Trailer Plan. The Washington Post (9/16, A18, Weisman) reports that the approximately 300,000 FEMA trailers "to be purchased with nearly $5 billion" of federal funds "have become a focal point of criticism of the Bush administration's early rebuilding efforts." Housing experts -- "conservatives and liberals alike" -- worry that FEMA "encampments will quickly become what former House Speaker Newt Gingrich called 'ghettos of despair.' Rental vouchers in a market with plenty of available housing would be cheaper and faster and provide better accommodations, they say." Rep. Jeff Flake said, "Three hundred thousand manufactured homes? People are screaming about that. I tell you, FEMA is a disaster." But "beleaguered FEMA officials yesterday counseled patience. When Katrina struck, they were criticized for moving too slowly, they said. Now, they are being second-guessed for moving too quickly." FEMA spokesman James McIntyre said, "The governors and their local officials are looking at all these issues. They're working with all the evacuees in these communities to ensure they are incorporated into the community, they're given job assistance and the help they need. We have more than 300,000 displaced households, and they have to live somewhere."

USA Today (9/16, Ritter) reports, "Hotels, private homes, churches, cruise ships, gyms and campgrounds will continue to accommodate many of the displaced in coming weeks. An estimated 1 million people fled Katrina. But disaster officials say they're moving to assemble and make livable up to 300,000 trailers and other temporary housing units in Louisiana and Mississippi as fast as they can find sites and arrange utilities, schooling and other necessities with cities and counties."

FEMA Still Has Not Delivered Tents To Mississippi Victims. CNN's The Situation Room (9/15, Feyerick) reported, "D'Iberville, Mississippi is just north of Biloxi. It's a desperate situation there. FEMA has yet to deliver six huge tents that officials were counting on to house more than 1,000 people. The city manager says people who were counting on those tents are living in homes that are still flooded."

Mississippi Residents Displaced By Katrina Feel Neglected By FEMA. NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 3, 2:45, Williams) reported Mississippi "hasn't admittedly received the coverage New Orleans has, even though only 10% of the homes along the coast were undamaged by the storm." NBC (Mott) added, "For more than two weeks, Katrina news coverage has focused on New Orleans. But across the state line, Mississippi is a mess. 52 of its 82 counties have been declared disaster areas, cities like Pass Christian, Bay St. Louis, Waveland, Long Beach, Gulfport, and Biloxi, devastated. Much of Mississippi is gone, and now, many here argue, forgotten." While Federal "rescue and recovery teams have been pouring into Louisiana and FEMA gives updates from Baton Rouge every day, many Mississippians say the agency's hard to find."

Hutchinson Says FEMA Should Remain Part Of DHS. The Springdale (AR) Daily News (9/16, Dailey) reports that Arkansas gubernatorial candidate Asa Hutchinson, "the former undersecretary for Border and Transportation Security in the Department of Homeland Security," said that FEMA should not be separated from DHS. Hutchinson said officials and the public pressures DHS "into concentrating on defending against another terrorist attack to the detriment of planning for the much-more-likely natural disasters, and a better balance between the two is needed, Hutchinson said." He added, "You know there are going to be hurricanes and tornadoes. You don't always have terrorist attacks every year."

Poll Finds Three In Five Americans Say FEMA Should Be Autonomous. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "By two to one, a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows, the public holds an unfavorable view of FEMA after criticism of its Katrina response. But by 61%-20%, respondents echo Democrats like Sen. Clinton who say FEMA should be autonomous, as in her husband's presidency, not part of Homeland Security; majorities of conservatives and Republicans agree." The Journal adds, "Homeland Security chief Chertoff's 17% negative rating exceeds his 13% positive, but 50% don't know him."

Low Opinion Of FEMA Has Not Hurt Overall Confidence In Government. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Harwood) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Despite FEMA's woes, Katrina hasn't shifted confidence in federal government generally. Some 31% say Washington can be trusted to do the right thing at least most of the time, matching a June Gallup survey. After 9/11, confidence in Washington surged."

Pentagon Mortuary Teams Will Deploy To Gulf Coast. The Washington Times (9/16, Gertz, Scarborough) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has signed off on mortuary teams from the 54th Quartermaster Company at Fort Lee, Va., deploying to the Gulf Coast. The job was supposed to be handled by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. But FEMA informed the Pentagon it must first find a contractor for the gritty work."

FCC To Spend $211 Million To Rebuild Hurricane-Damaged Communications. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said yesterday the government will spend $211 million to help rebuild communications links for people affected by Hurricane Katrina. USA Today (9/16, Davidson) reports that at a special agency meeting in Atlanta to assess the effects of the storm, Martin said, "We need to determine how we can help companies strengthen our communications infrastructure, create more robust and reliable networks, and improve the ability to quickly restore service when disaster does strike." USA adds, "The $211 million will come from the $6 billion-a-year universal service fund, which is financed by a 10.2% surcharge on every customer's long-distance bill."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Schatz, Rhoads) calls the move "welcome news to phone companies in the region. BellSouth estimates it could cost between $400 million and $600 million to replace ruined equipment in the three-state area hit hardest by the hurricane." The Journal adds that Martin "proposed changes that would allow it to take a larger role in coordinating emergency communications and restoring telephone services." Under Martin's proposals, "the FCC would be reorganized to include a new Public Safety/Homeland Security Bureau. The FCC also would assemble an independent panel to examine what happened to the phone networks and communications between first responders and how they might be improved."

The New York Times (9/16, Nelson) says Martin's proposal "would give evacuees cellphones and 300 free minutes and help customers reconnect their phone lines. Money would also be made available to schools, libraries, health organizations and relief agencies like the Red Cross to rebuild their phone and Internet connections."

The Washington Post (9/16, C1, Krim) adds that some "executives, academics and analysts are urging a more ambitious approach: Make New Orleans and the surrounding areas super-connected communities, with advanced services that surpass what is available anywhere in the country, if not the world." With much of the region's communications infrastructure in ruins, "these experts see the perfect opportunity to deploy new systems that otherwise might be too expensive or disruptive to build. The result, they say, could be a bonanza of higher technology at lower prices for businesses and consumers, more robust emergency-responder systems and an ability to provide high-speed Internet access to poorer segments of the population often left off of the information highway."

Mississippi AG Sues To Force Insurers To Pay Flood Claims. Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood has filed suit against five large insurance companies yesterday seeking to force them to pay for flood damage from Hurricane Katrina. This, despite flooding exclusions that are standard in most homeowners' policies. The Wall Street Journal (9/15, Francis) reports, "The suit, filed in state court in Jackson, seeks to override the exclusions. It comes as tens of thousands of Gulf Coast property owners struggle with the cost of rebuilding homes damaged by the wall of water that surged with the hurricane Aug. 29." Hood's suit names State Farm, Allstate Corp., Mississippi Farm Bureau Mutual Insurance Cos., United Services Automobile Association and Nationwide Mutual insurance Co.

The New York Times (9/15, Bayot) reports that Hood's suit accuses insurers "of selling confusing policies that fell short of homeowners' reasonable expectations of coverage. Mr. Hood argued that because property owners 'purchased these policies for the primary purpose of insuring against any and all hurricane damage,' insurers should be liable for property damage caused by flooding - a hazard long excluded from traditional homeowner policies." Hood "is seeking a temporary restraining order to prevent companies from denying or reducing coverage based on water exclusions, or from asking property owners to sign documents stating that their loss was caused by water rather than wind."

USA Today (9/15, Chu) says Hood's complaint claims that the insurers' policies "'attempt to exclude coverage for storm-surge damage' caused by the hurricane. This is 'an unfair or deceptive trade practice' under state law, Hood says."

Programs Seek To Retrain Workers Displaced By Katrina. Programs stretching from Louisiana to Texas and Mississippi are retraining thousands of workers displaced in the Gulf Coast. USA Today (9/15, Swartz) reports, "The programs are designed to find jobs for those forced to relocate or whose employers suspended operations, say state officials in Louisiana and Texas. Many of the job seekers are likely to be placed in fields such as construction, health care, energy and cleanup, says Barton Smith, director of the Institute for Regional Forecasting at the University of Houston. … Community and technical colleges in Louisiana this week started a job-training program to match and prepare evacuees with jobs in construction, plumbing, welding and hazardous waste removal."

Displaced Healthcare Workers In Demand Nationwide. In a separate story, USA Today (9/15, Appleby) adds that displaced healthcare workers from New Orleans and the Gulf Coast "are being lured with signing bonuses, relocation assistance and other perks by hospitals, doctor offices and clinics nationwide. … A shortage of medical workers in many parts of the USA almost guarantees that workers who leave the hurricane-battered areas will find work. What's more difficult to know is whether the health care workers who accept new jobs will return."

Writer Says Middle Class Also Hurt By Katrina. Writer Jennifer Moses writes in the Washington Post (9/16, A31), "I keep seeing pictures of the president with his shirt-sleeves rolled up, surveying the damage to New Orleans. But I wonder if he has any idea just who the folks are who have been displaced by Hurricane Katrina. I ask because here in Baton Rouge we keep hearing about the desperately poor, and sometimes criminal, hordes Katrina has washed up on the shores of decent, hardworking, middle-class America: the (mainly black) gangs from the projects who, even during normal times, wreaked havoc on their fellow citizens, not to mention the merely poor -- teen mothers, drug addicts, the chronically unemployed. But the shelter in which I've been volunteering tells a different story. … Indeed, an aura of normality and order pervades even this bizarre community, built of rows and rows of folding canvas cots, donated bed linens and garbage bags filled with other people's castoff clothing, and peopled by the young and old, black and white, American-born and foreign-born: a United Nations of languages, a stew of stories." Moses adds, "What I'm learning in the shelters is that it's not just the poor who have no place to go and no place to fall back on; it's also ordinary working people who in better times might have been counted as part of the middle class, too. Where are my new friends going to go?"

Confirmed Death Toll In Hurricane Zone Climbs Over 700. The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 2, 0:20, Schieffer) reported, "The death toll climbed even higher. 474 are now known dead in Louisiana. The total across the five-state disaster area went past 700, and is expected to go much higher in the days ahead."

New Orleans Mayor Announces Plan For Displaced Residents To Return. New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin yesterday announced a plan to gradually permit New Orleans evacuees to return to the city in order to jump start the city's economy and return it to a "normal rhythm of life." Nagin's announcement, rather than a preview of President Bush's primetime speech, was the lead story on CBS, while ABC and NBC both ran it second in their lineup.

The CBS Evening News (9/15, lead story, 2:35, Pitts) reported, "Despite it all, the Mayor of New Orleans was smiling today." Nagin: "The city of New Orleans starting on Monday, starting this weekend, will start to breath again." Pitts: "That includes the French Quarter, where wealthy entrepreneurs held a power lunch today, New Orleans style, red beans and rice included."

ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 2, 2:55, Harris) reported Nagin is "calling it his 'bring New Orleans back' plan. Starting this Saturday, and staggered over a 10 day period, nearly 200,000 people will be allowed home." Nagin is "promising to restore the quote 'normal rhythm of life.' He even says there will be retail stores in the now-infamous convention center. But, in a news conference repeatedly interrupted by helicopters…making it clear that people will be coming clear that people will be coming home to what is essentially a military zone with poisonous water lurking nearby -- and no schools or fully operational hospitals. There are also concerns that criminals will return, concerns Nagin addressed by pointing out that there are soldiers and police here from across the country."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 2, 2:40, Williams) reported, "Here in this city, the Mayor surprised a lot of people when he said that soon, people can start coming back to New Orleans." NBC (Tibbles) added, "Today New Orleans took one big step towards getting back to normal, inviting some residents back. But what are they going to find when they get here? It wasn't an announcement people were expecting so soon." For "many considering that move, this is what they'll find, mile after mile of thick, dried sludge, much of it as toxic as the water."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Cooper, Young, McKay) reports, "Some New Orleans residents returned to their homes and businesses to begin cleaning up the damage left by Hurricane Katrina, and Mayor Ray Nagin said large swaths of the city would be reopened starting tomorrow. Yesterday's announcement by the mayor amounted to an abandonment of efforts to persuade thousands of holdouts still in the battered city to leave. A New Orleans police spokesman said no one hunkered down in a home nearly three weeks after the storm hit would be forced out despite the lack of power and drinkable water in many parts of the city."

USA Today (9/16, Parker, Levin) reports, "Most of the city has electricity. But city water is largely undrinkable, schools remain shut, and thousands of waterlogged homes need to be pulled down and rebuilt. Levees need repairs, and a nighttime curfew will be in effect to hold down crime. Those who return should not expect much, city officials said. 'Just because the electricity is going, it doesn't mean that all the gas stations are open,' mayoral executive assistant Greg Mefert said. 'The residents need to have very realistic expectations of how the city is functioning, and they can't expect complete normality and to go about their normal day.'"

The Washington Post (9/16, A13, Whoriskey) reports, "Authorities warned residents not to drink or bathe in the water in most of the city because contaminated floodwaters are seeping into waterlines through major breaks. The 911 emergency-call system is not fully operational. Even in the least affected areas, thousands of homes are without power, and the lack of traffic lights has led to accidents among some of the emergency vehicles rolling through city streets. Asked whether the reentry plan may be premature, Nagin said, 'I'm getting all kinds of push that I'm moving a little too slow.'"

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Riccardi, Powers) reports, "As many as 180,000 residents displaced by Hurricane Katrina will eventually be allowed to move back into homes and apartments that escaped overwhelming flood and storm damage, the mayor said." But even as he "hailed his city's semi-return, Nagin also acknowledged that dwellings that housed half of the city's 450,000 residents will have to be razed. 'Most of the homes that were flooded that stayed in the water for a number of weeks will most likely be destroyed,' Nagin said."

The New York Times (9/16, Yardley) reports, "The tentative re-entry plan calls for residents to be allowed into the Algiers neighborhood by the weekend. Uptown would be accessible by the middle of next week and the French Quarter on Sept. 26. The city's downtown and the other three areas will be open to business owners over the weekend. All are areas that suffered less damage from the storm. But, city officials said, the schedules may change."

The Washington Times/AP (9/16, Martel) reports, "The re-population of the city would proceed by ZIP code, starting Monday in the Algiers section, a Creole-influenced neighborhood across the Mississippi River from the French Quarter. The city's Uptown section, which includes the Garden District's leafy streets and antebellum mansions, will open in stages next Wednesday and Friday."

New Orleans Could Be Pumped Out Sooner Than Originally Expected. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 Degrees (9/15, Cooper) reported, "So is New Orleans ready to reopen? There are positive signs. Flood waters are fast receding. The Army Corps of Engineers says water is dropping by more than a foot a day. Some areas like Algiers and New Orleans west bank have power and running water, which the mayor says is suitable for drinking. Mayor Nagin also says he's speaking with Wal-Mart about opening a store in the convention center so newly returned residents will have somewhere to shop. He also says despite the violence and looting witnessed in Katrina's aftermath, the city is the safest it's been in years."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (9/15, Feyerick) reported that floodwaters "are draining much faster than expected and the Army Corps of Engineers says except for a few ponds in low lying areas, New Orleans could be pumped out by October 18th. Radio stations have been calling people home zip code by zip code, yet it may not be completely safe. If another storm hits, engineers say there is no guarantee the levees will hold."

Many Evacuees Want To Settle Permanently In Houston, Poll Finds. The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Morin, Rein) reports that "fewer than half of all New Orleans evacuees living in emergency shelters here said they will move back home, while two-thirds of those who want to relocate planned to settle permanently in the Houston area," according to a Post/Harvard School of Public Health/Kaiser Family Foundation survey. The "wide-ranging poll found that these survivors of Hurricane Katrina and its aftermath remain physically and emotionally battered but unbroken." The "overwhelming majority lack insurance to cover their losses. Few have bank checking accounts, savings accounts or credit cards that work. Still, nearly nine in 10 said they were 'hopeful' about the future. And while half said they felt depressed about what lies ahead, just a third said they were afraid."

Texas Convention Centers, Arenas Still Hold 20,000 Evacuees. The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Merida) profiles evacuees at the Dallas Convention Center, which has become "a strange but comforting replacement neighborhood for those whose real 'hoods were drowned by Katrina. Here, the miserable and the hopeful, thrown together by common circumstance, have been trying to sort out their futures." Texas officials "estimate their state has absorbed more than 200,000 Gulf Coast hurricane survivors, the majority of whom have scattered to apartments and hotels, churches and private homes. But approximately 20,000 remain in convention centers and sports arenas, the last resort for those who had nowhere else to turn or haven't yet decided where they belong."

New Orleans Suburb Defends Decision To Turn Back Those Fleeing Katrina. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Riccardi) reports that the "mostly white suburb" of Greta, Louisiana, "became a symbol of callousness for using armed officers to seal one of the last escape routes from New Orleans -- trapping thousands of mostly black evacuees in the flooded city -- the Gretna City Council passed a resolution supporting the police chief's move." In the aftermath of Katrina, Gretna "blocked the bridge over the Mississippi River that connects their city to New Orleans." The small city's mayor said that while Gretna first "commandeered buses and moved more than 5,000 to a food station miles away," Gretna simply did not have the resources to continue. And so, "armed Gretna police, helped by local sheriff's deputies and bridge police, stood guard and turned hundreds of men, women and children back to New Orleans."

Vietnamese-Americans In Gulf Coast Region Familiar With Refugee Status. USA Today (9/16, Phan) writes that "many Vietnamese-Americans have become refugees again" in the wake of Katrina. Starting in the early 1980's, "Vietnamese refugees started settling into enclaves around New Orleans, Biloxi and Mobile, attracted by the familiar humid climate and seeking to earn livings as fishermen and shrimpers."

Concerns About Mental Health Of Evacuees Grow. ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 3, 2:20, Woodruff) reported, "It has been 18 days now since Katrina struck. There is growing concern about the mental health of the evacuees, particularly the children. The relief group Save the Children estimates 400,000 children were forced from their homes. Many lost family members and witnessed horrible devastation. An army of therapists have been sent to schools in shelters and schools, and in Houston, where so many of them ended up, a special project is under way." ABC (Pinto) examined an effort by volunteers to have children and teens use art to express and overcome their feelings.

Katrina Brings No Widespread Illness Outbreaks To Region. USA Today (9/16, Manning) report that Katrina "hasn't brought widespread epidemics to the region, officials with the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention say. 'What we've seen is what we would expect,' says Ali Khan, who is directing the CDC's operation in the New Orleans area. The complaints include accidental injuries and skin or respiratory infections." Still, the "'challenge is a lot bigger than in other disasters,' Khan says. 'We don't have a lot of experience evacuating a large city with this kind of infrastructure damage.' Previous hurricanes, however, taught health officials the value of tetanus vaccination and careful hygiene in shelters."

Ordeal At New Orleans Hospital Recounted. USA Today (9/16, Davis) reports on the "struggle to stay alive there in the dark days after the hurricane" at the Lindy Boggs Medical Center in New Orleans. Today, "the 187-bed hospital is empty; 19 bodies have been removed."

Katrina's Negative Economic Impact Becoming Apparent. Hurricane Katrina's impact on the economy is becoming more apparent, reports the Wall Street Journal (9/16, Hilsenrath). According to the Journal, "Thousands of individuals displaced by the storm have already filed for unemployment benefits and thousands more are expected, according to a Labor Department report. Meanwhile, gauges of manufacturing activity far from the Gulf of Mexico showed softening early this month, and economists and executives expressed concerns about rising energy costs. Largely because of gasoline-price increases before Katrina, the Labor Department's latest consumer-price index rose 0.5% in August, pushing it up 3.6% from a year ago, the largest increase in four years. More than 90% of the prices used to compile the report were gathered before the storm struck, meaning steeper increases are likely to come. … Taken together, the reports underscored the economy's turbulence since the storm hit at the end of last month. Energy-price increases hadn't been feeding broader inflation before the storm, though pressures seemed to be mounting."

The New York Times (9/16, Andrews) says, "The economic data for the period before the storm suggested that consumer spending held up despite rising gas prices, that companies were still hiring and that inflation pressures remained a cause for worry. Many economists expect that trend to resume after a predictable drop in growth as a result of hurricane-related disruptions. On top of that, the Bush administration and Congress are about to rev up the economy with a staggering amount of federal money for relief and reconstruction." The Times adds, "It remains possible that the Federal Reserve will refrain from raising short-term interest rates next Tuesday, which would be the first time in 11 meetings that it held rates steady. The best reason to do that would be to wait for more evidence of the impact from the hurricane and the spike in gasoline prices in the last two weeks."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, lead story, 3:15, Williams) reported, "In another sign of this storm's economic toll, first-time unemployment claims shot up by 71,000 last week, the biggest jump in almost a decade."

The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 4, 0:15, Schieffer) reported, "Hurricane Katrina has thrown thousands of people out of work. The government said today another 68,000 of them joined the line for unemployment benefits last week. That's on top of 16,000 the week before, for a total of 84,000."

Energy Price Increases Fuel Rise In Inflation. The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 10, 0:35, Schieffer) reported, "Gasoline is doing a big number on family budgets. The government says consumer prices shot up half a percent in August. Energy is to blame for most of the increase, and that was before Katrina. So far this year, inflation is running 3.9%. It was 3.3% last year."

Government Credit Cards For Katrina Relief Under Fire. The AP (9/16, Yen) reports, "Lawmakers and watchdog groups worry that allowing federal employees to charge up to $250,000 on their government-issued credit cards for Hurricane Katrina-related expenses will lead to a repeat of past abuses." The AP continues, "Some of the cards in the past were used to pay for prostitutes, gambling activity, even breast implants, government audits have shown. … 'People are concerned this is a risk,' said Greg Kutz, managing director of special investigations at the General Accountability Office, which conducts audits at the request of Congress." The AP adds, "About 250,000 federal employees have government credit cards, which typically have a purchase limit of $2,500. At the request of the Bush administration, Congress increased the credit line to $250,000 as part of a massive Katrina recovery bill approved last week. The aim is to make it easier to speed aid to victims. … Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said the 'outrageous increase' was 'slipped' into the bill. He is seeking to insert language in a Katrina health bill that would reduce the limit in most cases to $50,000." The AP notes, "Responding to initial criticism, the White House issued new guidelines this week saying agencies must designate in writing which of their staff will receive the new spending privileges. Purchases of more than $50,000 must be preapproved by a senior manager. … Critics say the additional oversight is needed because the cards offer special opportunities for abuse."

Rights Group Urges Freeze On Mortgage Foreclosures For Katrina Victims. The AP (9/16, Gordon) reports, "As Hurricane Katrina brought into focus the financial plight of many blacks along the Gulf Coast, a leading U.S. civil rights group urged lenders to freeze mortgage foreclosures and suspend late fees on loans for people affected by the hurricane. … 'There are a few steps that can and should be taken by all financial institutions to ensure that the people of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and the other areas affected by Katrina are not further victimized and do not suffer further losses,' Hilary Shelton of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People said Wednesday." The AP continues, "Speaking to members of a House Financial Services subcommittee, the director of the NAACP's Washington bureau Shelton, said the civil rights group also was concerned about predatory lenders who "must be circling some of the worst-hit areas, salivating at the potential for abuse" of Katrina's victims. … Alabama Congressman Spencer Bachus, the panel's chairman, said federal banking regulators need to help banks in the disaster zones by relaxing some rules." The AP notes, "The storm's devastating impacts on the poorest communities in the Gulf Coast starkly illustrated the differences in how minorities and whites are treated by banks. … Many poor people lost their cash savings, much of it stashed under mattresses and in teapots. Around the country, many low-income minorities shun banks, have never used an ATM machine or applied for a home mortgage. Often, they turn to storefront payday lenders, which charge high interest."

Louisiana Frees About 1,000 Prisoners Due To Flood-Related Overcrowding. USA Today (9/16, Frank) reports Louisiana has released "about 1,000 inmates" in order to "ease crowding caused when two large prisons flooded. All the released inmates had been in a 90-day prison program -- suspended last week -- for parole- and probation-violators who get extensive counseling while incarcerated. None has a record of violent or sexual crimes."

White House Gives NASA "Thumbs Up" For Moon, Mars Shuttle Replacement Plan. The New York Times (9/16, Broad) reports, "The White House has approved NASA's plan to replace the nation's aging" shuttle fleet "with a new generation of vehicles meant to carry human explorers back to the Moon and onward to Mars and beyond, aerospace experts said yesterday. The new rockets and spaceships are a radical departure for the space program, rearranging the components of the space shuttle into a new design expected to be more powerful that the shuttle but also safer. The shuttle has had two fatal accidents in 114 missions." George Washington University Space Policy Institute director John M. Logsdon said the measure amounts to a "thumbs-up for NASA to pursue the shuttle-derived vehicle," and adds, "The question is the schedule, not the basic approach." The Times adds that "other experts, who refused to be identified because the space agency will not formally announce the proposal formally, also spoke about the plan yesterday."

Reynolds Will Urge House GOP To Shelve Social Security Reform. Aides confirmed yesterday that NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds will recommend to the House Republican leadership that the party drop its effort to restructure Social Security at least for this year. The Washington Post (9/16, A5, Weisman) calls Reynolds's move "fresh evidence that Hurricane Katrina is having a dramatic impact on the GOP's agenda. House and Senate leaders had already pushed off consideration of cuts in taxes and entitlement spending until the end of October. President Bush's tax reform panel has delayed release of its recommendations." The Post adds, "Reynolds (R-N.Y.) made his stand in a showdown with House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), according to two witnesses. At a committee luncheon Wednesday, Thomas told panel members he was pushing forward with broad retirement security legislation that would include measures to strengthen private pensions, promote personal savings and add private investment accounts to Social Security. Reynolds then stood to say he would recommend to the leadership that it do no such thing."

DOJ_NMG_0005955

Federal Employee Health Insurance Premiums To Rise 6.6%. The Bush Administration announced yesterday that federal employees' health insurance premiums will increase an average of 6.6% next year. The Washington Post (9/16, A29, Lee) reports that while the increase is the lowest in nine years "an official with one federal employee union branded the increase 'outrageous,' noting that average employee contributions to their health premiums will rise faster than the portion paid by the government."

Government Releases Results Of Comprehensive Sex Survey. The New York Times (9/16, Lewin) reports, "The National Center for Health Statistics released the government's most comprehensive survey of American sexual practices and reproductive health yesterday, delving for the first time into such sensitive areas as the prevalence of oral sex among teenagers and same-sex activity among adults."

Ophelia Slowly Moves Up North Carolina Cost. USA Today (9/15, Brook) reports that Hurricane Ophelia continued its "soaking crawl" along North Carolina's coast Thursday, whipping rain and surf for house. USA adds, "A weakened Ophelia could smack Massachusetts' Cape Cod this weekend. Tropical storm watches have been issued there. And North Carolina will still feel its winds today." Damage "was significant because the storm stalled off the coast. Rather than a brief lashing, people withstood hours of a relentless 80-mph blast."

The Washington Post (9/15, A3, Cooperman) adds, "Although the Outer Banks islands of Ocracoke and Hatteras were still in danger of heavy winds and surging water, the hurricane's slow and meandering path spared most coastal areas of the severe flooding that had been predicted. By evening, its winds were blowing about 75 mph, just enough to earn Ophelia classification as a hurricane. Authorities blamed one death on the storm, from a rain-slicked traffic accident inland near the state capital of Raleigh."

ABC World News Tonight (9/15, story 4, :45, Woodruff) reported, "The unpredictable storm took days to reach the vulnerable islands in the Outer Banks, and now it has decided to stay awhile, just about stalling offshore. Peak winds are 75 miles an hour, and up to 15 inches of rain are expected before Ophelia pulls out to sea tomorrow. There has been some damage, and 80,000 utility customers are without power. Many have decided to ride out the storm at home."

The CBS Evening News (9/15, story 5, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Federal and state disaster teams were there to help, but many residents decided to stay put, even though some may now regret it."

Study Says Rising Sea Temperatures Increasing Hurricane Severity. A study published today in the journal Science concludes that rising sea temperatures have been accompanied by a significant increase in the most destructive hurricanes. The Washington Post (9/15, A13, Eilperin) says the study adds "fuel to an international debate over whether global warming contributed to the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina." According to the study by researchers at the School of Earth and Atmospheric Sciences at Georgia Tech and the National Center for Atmospheric Research, "the number of major Category 4 and 5 hurricanes worldwide has nearly doubled over the past 35 years, even though the total number of hurricanes, including weaker ones, has dropped since the 1990s."

Experts Eye Deregulation As Factor In 2003 Blackout. The Department of Energy and its Canadian counterpart held their first public meeting Thursday on the 2003 blackout which darkened cities from New York to Toronto and Detroit. The New York Times (9/16, Wald) reports, 'Engineers, government officials and executives said at the meeting that amid its restructuring the industry needed further changes to reduce the frequency of blackouts as utilities that formerly generated power, transmitted it and delivered it were broken up into separate entities of competing businesses." The Times notes that a binational report issued three months after the incident "did not list deregulation as a cause, instead citing factors like failure to trim trees, train operators and install control systems that could have kept track of the status of all power lines and generators. Much of the investigation leading to that report was managed by the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the architect of utility restructuring in the United States. The report called for a separate study - it did not say by whom - on the role of deregulation in the blackout, but that study has never been done."

Rising Natural Gas Prices Expected To Drive Up Electricity Prices. Soaring natural gas bills are threatening to push electricity prices to unprecedented levels. According to a front page story in the Wall Street Journal (9/16, Smith), the price of natural gas had doubled over the last two years even before Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast. Katrina's destruction "has roiled energy markets, sending natural-gas and oil prices to record levels and foreshadowing eventual rate increases for electricity in the Southeast, where utilities must rebuild heavily damaged systems. Now, as the winter heating season approaches for much of the country, consumers face a double threat. Many will see record costs on their bills for the natural gas that fuels their furnaces, stoves and clothes dryers. Consumers -- and businesses -- also will get hit with higher charges for electricity made by power plants that burn pricey natural gas." The Journal adds that "power generators are being quoted natural-gas prices for this fall and winter that also look extremely high -- $11.34 for contracts on the New York Mercantile Exchange for October, $11.97 for November and $12.45 for December deliveries. All surpass prices for September that were less than $10. They translate into raw power prices, not adjusted for inflation, that are high even before adding regular utility costs that would push the retail cost up substantially."
