The clash last week, one of the first examples of partisan wrangling here since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, came as Capitol Hill was riveted by an anthrax scare. Another foreign aid bill vote is set for Tuesday. The dispute reflects the stakes in the battle over the makeup of the 862-seat federal bench, which has 110 vacancies and includes district courts that hear trials and the influential courts of appeals. There haven't been as many vacancies on the bench since March 1994, according to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

The bench makeup can make a vast difference in an array of individual rights. But with the new focus on terrorism, judges are likely to play an increasingly essential role in deciding how far police can go in conducting warrantless searches, determining whether certain immigrants should be deported and defining the breadth of civil liberties.

Determined to tilt federal courts to the right, the Bush administration has made judicial nominations much more of a priority than the Clinton administration. Early last week, GOP senators voted together to prevent floor consideration of a $ 15.6 billion foreign aid bill. They said they were protesting the slow pace of nomination hearings.

This year, the Senate has approved eight judges, and 52 names are pending, most from midsummer nominations. The pace of committee hearings has not been swift, but it also has not entailed record delays.

"Law enforcement is going to suffer" unless the Senate's pace in deciding judicial nominations picks up, says Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, pointing particularly to courts along the U.S.-Mexico border that are short-staffed. Hatch noted that some federal judges could end up handling key cases related to terrorism.

Neither Hatch, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, nor Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., would say whether the GOP would help move the foreign aid bill when it comes up for another vote Tuesday.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., says the panel is moving as quickly as possible on judges, and passage of the foreign aid bill is critical to the country's anti-terrorism efforts.

The proposal would send $ 5 billion in military and economic aid to U.S. allies in the Middle

REV_00070956

East and set aside hundreds of millions of dollars to detect infectious diseases overseas. "It is absurd to hold these funds hostage when practically every day there is a report of a new case of anthrax," Leahy says.

Democrats have been slow to move on several of Bush's judicial nominations, particularly some conservative favorites.

Among the more controversial nominees are Jeffrey Sutton, a Columbus, Ohio, lawyer who is a strong states-rights advocate; University of Utah professor Paul Cassell, who is known particularly for his legal work against the Miranda rights that police read to suspects; and federal magistrate Terry Wooten, who was once a top aide to Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C.

Thursday, the Judiciary Committee recommended Senate approval of four nominees and held a hearing on five others, including U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi, who has been appointed to a three-state appeals court and is the father of U.S. Rep. Charles "Chip" Pickering, R-Miss.

Lott has been seeking a deal for votes on "a significant number" of nominees in the coming weeks.

Senate Committee Advances 2 Federal Judge Nominations

By Chris Casteel
The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee, meeting despite a shutdown of its hearing room, approved two Oklahomans for federal judgeships Thursday and heard from attorney Stephen P. Friot, who has been nominated for the federal bench in Oklahoma City.

Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, has been pushing the committee to move judicial nominations, including those from his state. He got some response Thursday as the committee reported to the full Senate the nominations of Claire V. Eagan to be a U.S. district judge in Tulsa and James P. Payne to be a U.S. district judge for the Muskogee and Tulsa regions.

Eagan is a U.S. magistrate in the Northern District, based in Tulsa, and Payne is a magistrate in the Eastern District, based in Muskogee.

"These individuals are exceptionally well-qualified and will prove to be great assets to the judicial system in Oklahoma and our country," Nickles, the Senate minority whip, said. "It is good news for Oklahoma that they are moving through the nomination process. I hope and expect they will be confirmed by the full Senate in short order."

Friot's nomination is pending before the committee, as is the nomination of former U.S. Attorney Joe Heaton to be a U.S. district judge in Oklahoma City.

An aide to Nickles said none of the questions asked of Friot by the committee Thursday could be considered hostile or aggressive. Friot has been practicing law since 1972 and is a partner in the Oklahoma City firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum. He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association and an adjunct law professor at the University of Oklahoma.

Camp's Nomination Goes to the Full Senate

Omaha World-Herald
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted unanimously Thursday to recommend the nomination of Nebraskan Laurie Smith Camp to become a U.S. District Court Judge.

Thursday's vote should clear the way for easy confirmation by the full Senate, perhaps as early as next week. Once confirmed, Camp will become the first female federal judge in Nebraska. A longtime aide to Nebraska Attorney General Don Stenberg, she was appointed to the federal bench in June by President Bush.

Although some judicial nominations linger for months in the Senate, Camp had support from both of Nebraska's senators, Republican Chuck Hagel and Democrat Ben Nelson.

Camp will fill the vacancy created when Judge William Cambridge retired. She worked for 11 years as general counsel for the Nebraska Department of Corrections. In 1991, she joined Stenberg's staff. She is a graduate of Stanford University and the University of Nebraska College of Law.

A Bench Full of Holes; Vacancies in the N.J. Federal District Court Could Reach 30 Percent

By Tim O'Brien
New Jersey Law Journal
Friday, October 19, 2001

With U.S. District Judge Alfred Lechner Jr. leaving for private practice this month, New Jersey's district court is down by three judges. That's a vacancy rate of 17.7 percent, based on a full complement of 17 judges, and it could climb to almost 30 percent in the next three months.

Judge Nicholas Politan will be eligible to retire in mid-December, and two other district judges, Garrett Brown and William Bassler, are widely believed to be the leading candidates to take the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals seat that became available in June 2000 when Morton Greenberg took senior status. Two sources familiar with the process say Brown and Bassler have been interviewed by the White House counsel's office.

If Politan retires, and either Brown or Bassler moves up to the Third Circuit, the district court would be down to 12 judges, leaving five seats vacant. The current judge shortage isn't causing a calendar problem, according to John Bissell, who became chief judge in June when U.S. District Judge Anne Thompson retired. In part that's because the district has seven senior judges, most of whom carry substantial caseloads. Judges Thompson and John Lifland both went on senior status in June.

But the vacancies may not be filled for a long time. The combination of a Republican White House and a Democratic-controlled Senate has slowed confirmation hearings in the Senate Judiciary Committee. That, along with the slowdown of all appointments after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and President George Bush's stated priority of filling circuit vacancies first, will ensure the judicial pipeline will be sluggish at best.

Even when the White House agrees on a name, the FBI's background checks have been placed on a back burner as the agency puts its resources into the terrorist investigation.

New Jersey's nomination process is moving slower than many states due to the absence of a GOP leader with clout. Acting Gov. Donald DiFrancesco, the state's ranking Republican, is a lame duck, having decided not to run. The state's two senators, Robert Torricelli and Jon Corzine, are both Democrats.

Two sources familiar with the judge-picking process say that because of the political climate in the Senate -- Democrats have been itching for some payback for the loss of the presidency in the U.S. Supreme Court and eight years of what they perceive as GOP stall tactics on judicial nominations -- Torricelli and Corzine could get one or even two Democratic nominations.

That possibility is magnified by a mood in the Capitol to minimize partisan battles during the war on terrorism. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., earlier this month reiterated his position that noncontroversial nominations will move. Most of the fights have been over circuit seats, or in states where the two parties couldn't agree on names.

Who's in Contention

Three candidates are considered the strongest to fill the three existing vacancies: Magistrate Judge Stanley Chesler, McCarter & English partner William Greenberg and Essex County Superior Court Judge Jose Linares.

Greenberg, a Democrat, enjoys a good relationship with Torricelli. He was an assistant counsel under Gov. Richard Hughes and served as a commissioner of the State Commission of Investigations from 1982 to 1987. A well-regarded civil litigator, he is a past president of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America-NJ.

He is a big Democratic contributor. According to the Federal Election Commission and the state Commission, Greenberg and his wife have contributed $81,000 since 1998, primarily to the

Democrats.

That includes $47,000 to the Democratic National Committee and $10,000 to the State Democratic Committee. The contributions also include $4,000 to Torricelli, but none to Corzine, as Greenberg backed former Gov. Jim Florio against Corzine in the Senate Democratic primary last year. The Greenbergs gave Florio $4,000, the maximum contribution.

Greenberg, 58, is a retired brigadier general of the National Guard who has just volunteered to be reactivated. He is now serving as a special assistant for homeland security to the adjutant general of New Jersey's National Guard.

On the Republican side, a top candidate is Chesler, 54, who sits in Newark. Chesler, who has been on the bench for 14 years, is a former Bronx County assistant district attorney who later served as deputy chief of the federal Organized Crime Strike Force in Newark.

In the Law Journal's January 2001 survey of the federal bench, Chesler earned the second-highest score -- 8.84 out of a possible 10 -- among the state's eight magistrates. He finished first in four categories and was just .11 behind the highest score.

Another potential GOP nominee is Linares, who went on the bench last December. Linares practiced personal injury law, primarily medical malpractice and product liability cases, before his nomination by Gov. Christine Todd Whitman. He was active with the Essex County Bar Association.

Cuban-born, Linares is also a former president of the New Jersey Hispanic Bar Association. This is seen by some as a plus with the Bush White House, which has been making special efforts to court the Hispanic vote for the 2004 election.

The names of two other federal magistrates are also being floated as potential nominees to move up the district court: Republican Robert Kugler and Democrat John Hughes.

Logjam in Washington

Nationally, there are 30 circuit court and 75 district court vacancies, for a vacancy rate of 12.32 percent.

However, the White House has been much more aggressive in sending to the Senate nominations for the circuit courts where case law is written, as opposed to the district courts.

As of last week, the Senate Judiciary Committee had 22 pending circuit court nominations for confirmation to those 30 vacancies. By contrast, there were only 32 pending nominations before the committee to fill the 75 district slots.

Put another way, the White House has moved on more than 73 percent of the current circuit vacancies, but only 42.7 percent of the current district vacancies. And obviously, there have been no nominations for New Jersey. Even the Third Circuit vacancy created by Greenberg's departure is now 16 months old, in large measure because the Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee never moved on the nomination of U.S. District Judge Stephen Orlofsky to move up to the Third Circuit.

And while the noncontroversial candidates will eventually get a hearing, Democrats are prepared to do battle over nominations, particularly for circuit seats, that they perceive as too ideological or conservative.

Within hours after Vermont's Sen. Jim Jeffords gave the Democrats control of the Senate last May by switching from being a Republican to being an Independent, Torricelli bragged, "This isn't about a single Senate seat ... it's about the federal judiciary."

So, while the committee is moving names and the Senate is confirming -- a circuit court and a district court nominee both received Senate confirmation on Oct. 10 -- nominations for New Jersey's district bench will most probably have to get in a long line.

The fact that Torricelli no longer sits on the Judiciary Committee, where he used to be able to expedite New Jersey candidates because of a good relationship with Utah Republican Orin Hatch, then committee chairman, doesn't help.

Three additional factors could combine to keep New Jersey with five vacancies.

First, there are many judges around the country who have indicated they will retire soon, leading to a bigger backlog in the process. Second, 40 vacancies around the nation have been declared judicial emergencies by the U.S. Judicial Conference, giving those vacancies a higher priority. Third, the caseload nationwide is growing, with 320,200 district cases and 56,600 circuit cases added over the past year, according to court figures.

"Nothing is happening," says one lawyer who has been following the judicial appointments process, while another lawyer agrees, saying, "I haven't the slightest feeling D.C. is moving on district seats, not until they are done with the Third Circuit."

Assistant White House Counsel Rachel Brand, who has been involved in screening names for the New Jersey bench, says only, "We're aware of the issues, and vacancies, and we're working on them."

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge M. Christina Armijo, 50, of Las Vegas, N.M., was introduced to the committee Thursday by Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., who recommended Armijo to President Bush.

"I thought we were very well received," New Mexico's senior senator said by phone Thursday. Domenici said that he and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., got an opportunity to speak on Armijo's behalf. Armijo, accompanied by her mother and brother, also testified before the committee, Domenici said. The committee did not vote on whether to recommend to the full Senate that she be confirmed. No schedule was announced.

Domenici said the committee was told about her 22 years of law experience, including her service on the state appeals court since 1996, and about her family's long history in northern New Mexico. Armijo's grandfather, for instance, was a judge for 35 years, Domenici said.

"As she put it, her family has lived for 12 generations in New Mexico and lawyers and judges are part of the family tradition," Domenici said. "I concluded ... that she will be a fair yet firm judge and urged that her confirmation be done quickly. I am very enthusiastic we will have her within the next couple of weeks."

Domenici also said that he expects the confirmation of former New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Harris Hartz, whom Bush nominated for a post on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit, to go smoothly.

"There's an opportunity for contention on circuit judges, but I don't think that's going to be the case," Domenici said.

He also said he had "no idea why we won't have (William P.) 'Chip' Johnson on soon."

Johnson, a state district judge in Roswell, was nominated along with Armijo by Bush to become a U.S. district judge. Domenici recommended all three judges to Bush for the lifetime appointments.

Domenici said he assumes that it won't be too long before a U.S. district judge's post is created in Las Cruces, where immigration and drug cases overload the docket. Five U.S. district judges from Albuquerque and Santa Fe have been rotating to southern New Mexico to help with the caseload.

Reno Lawyer Hicks Looks for Quick Senate Confirmation as Judge

The Associated Press
Friday, October 19, 2001

Sens. Harry Reid and John Ensign said they are optimistic the Senate will confirm Reno lawyer Larry Hicks as a new federal judge in Nevada within the next two weeks. Hicks went before the

Senate Judiciary Committee Thursday for a confirmation hearing on his appointment as a U.S. district court judge. Both Nevada senators spoke on his behalf.

Hicks worked in the Washoe County District Attorney's Office before he became a partner in one of Nevada's largest law firms - McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks. He's a past president of the state bar association's board of governors.

Senate Panel Approves Two State Judicial Nominees

By Jim Myers
Tulsa World
Friday, October 19, 2001

Two nominees for judicial posts in Oklahoma won Senate Judiciary Committee approval Thursday.

Nominations for U.S. Magistrates Claire V. Eagan of Tulsa and James P. Payne of Muskogee now head for confirmation by the full Senate, a vote that could take place next week. Eagan was nominated for a position in the state's northern district, while Payne will divide his time among Oklahoma's three districts.

Meanwhile, the Senate panel held a hearing for a third Oklahoman, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma City. Friot, 54, is headed for a slot in the western district.

Responding to questions by a panel of senators, Friot vowed to uphold Americans' right to privacy and a woman's right to an abortion as defined by the U.S. Supreme Court. Only the Supreme Court can undo one of its previous rulings, he testified.

Asked about the controversial practice of racial profiling and whether judges could do more to respond to that issue, Friot referred to a body of law he said addressed selective prosecution.

He said in response to a question about whether he would be a strict constructionist that he would not be limited to one narrow approach but instead would look for a guidance from a number of sources.

President Bush nominated the three Oklahomans at the recommendation of the state's two senators, Republicans Don Nickles and Jim Inhofe.

These individuals are exceptionally well-qualified and will prove to be great assets to the judicial system in Oklahoma and our country," Nickles said.

A fourth judicial nominee, Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Heaton of Oklahoma, is awaiting his confirmation hearing.

Senate Panel Oks Four Judges

By Audrey Hudson
The Washington Times
Friday, October 19, 2001

Four district judges were unanimously approved yesterday by the Senate Judiciary Committee after Republicans complained that President Bush's nominees were being treated unfairly by Democrats.

Republicans are insisting that the 44 judges nominated by Mr. Bush before the August recess be voted on before Congress adjourns for the year. To date, eight judges have been confirmed.

"It's a good step in the right direction, but it doesn't make much of a dent," Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, said after the vote.

Minority Leader Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, is blocking a spending bill for foreign operations to force a vote on the pending judges.

Committee negotiations were halted after an anthrax attack on Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle's office Monday exposed staffers and Capitol Police officers; a total of 31 persons.

"We've not been able to discuss the judges for obvious reasons," said Mr. Lott, who predicted that a vote to move forward on the spending bill Tuesday would fail.

The committee unanimously passed without debate Karen K. Caldwell as U.S. district judge for the Eastern District of Kentucky; Laurie Smith Camp as U.S. district judge for the District of Nebraska; Claire V. Eagan as U.S. district judge for the Northern District of Oklahoma, and James H. Payne as U.S. district judge for the Northern, Eastern, and Western Districts of Oklahoma.

"It's a beginning, but let it not be something to pacify us and move on. That won't work," Sen. Larry E. Craig, Idaho Republican, said of yesterday's action.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, committee chairman and Vermont Democrat, said, "I am fully committed to the process of confirming judges and filling vacancies. I will not be pressured to proceed on nominees whose records are not complete to the satisfaction of this committee.

"It is painfully clear to me that in this time of national challenge, the message must be sent that the United States Senate should be working as a unified team to respond to the violent attacks against our country," Mr. Leahy said. "We should be avoiding petty partisanship. This is hardly the time for divisive bickering."

His plea did not prevent Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, from calling Republicans

"phonies" for saying Mr. Bush's nominees were being treated unfairly by Democrats.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, told the committee he will bring a measure to the floor forcing a vote on the nominees.

The committee also held hearings on the nominations of Charles W. Pickering Sr. for the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals; M. Christina Armijo for U.S. District Court for the District of New Mexico; Karon O. Bowdre to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Alabama; Stephen P. Friot for U.S. District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma, and Larry R. Hicks for U.S. District Court for the District of Nevada.

Op/Eds

Moment of Decision for Law Enforcement

By Donald Lambro
The Washington Times
Monday, October 22, 2001

With America's homeland enduring the deadliest terrorist attacks in our history, every law enforcement weapon and tool at our disposal needs to be fully operational and running at peak performance.

Yet, incredibly, there is a gaping hole in the government's judicial defenses - the heart of the nation's law enforcement army - because of persistent and deliberate delays by the Senate Judiciary Committee to fill dozens of vacancies in our court system.

The courts are being inundated with law enforcement requests and cases. There are not enough judges to handle them all quickly. The dire result: dangerous backlogs and delays that prevent the swift and sure delivery of decisions needed to protect all of us from the threats that now loom over our country. Right now, there are at least 108 vacancies in our federal courts, including 30 posts that have been vacant for so long that federal judicial officials have classified them as "judicial emergencies."

With our law-enforcement agencies needing rapid-fire responses from the courts for a broad range of court-approved surveillance actions and other legal requests in their war on the murderous terrorists in our midst, this is no time for our court system to be operating at half-speed.

"We need federal judges monitoring and helping to support the anti-terrorism efforts and law-enforcement requests from the various agencies of government," Senate Republican Leader Trent Lott of Mississippi told me.

"The Senate is at its lowest confirmation rate of federal judges in recent history, and we need to pick up the pace immediately," he said.

The man most responsible for this state of affairs is Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, a deeply partisan Vermont Democrat who Republicans say has been working overtime to hold up or at least slow down President Bush's judicial nominations.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the committee's ranking Republican, has been complaining about the lack of action by Mr. Leahy ever since Democrats took control of the Senate last July, when hearings on Mr. Bush's nominees virtually ground to a halt. At present, there are 52 judicial nominees who are trapped in Leahy limbo, 46 of whom have had no hearings.

Many of them have been fully approved by the American Bar Association, but not by Mr. Leahy and the Democratic members on his committee.

At the heart of the judicial dispute, as always, is ideology. After eight years of liberal appointments to the courts under the Clinton administration, Mr. Leahy and friends recoil at the prospect of eight years of more conservative judges who aren't as likely to let criminals go free on legal technicalities.

Hatch, Lott and other Republican senators have been complaining for months about the delays in the confirmation process, but without success. But then, in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the complaints began pouring out of the White House, the Justice Department and elsewhere in law enforcement and in intelligence circles.

That's when the backroom political struggle broke into open warfare on the Senate floor.

Declaring that they were ready "to play hardball" to get action on the judgeship nominees, Republicans blocked action last week on the foreign aid bill and said that it and other bills would not move until Mr. Leahy lifted his judicial blockade. Notably, Republican leaders said that the White House was fully behind their move.

But the battle really exploded into all-out warfare when Mr. Hatch told his colleagues at last Tuesday's closed Republican policy luncheon that Mr. Leahy had told him that any senator who voted to block the aid bill "would not get the federal judges from their state confirmed."

Enraged, Republican senators, including many who work with Mr. Leahy on the committee, rose at the meeting to excoriate the Vermonter, attacking him as a "vindictive partisan" bent on blocking President George W. Bush "anyway he can," according to my sources.

Mr. Leahy denied that he threatened retribution against Republican senators, but that is not the way Mr. Hatch tells it. "If anything, he Mr. Leahy was threatening. I've heard payback talk," Mr. Hatch said.

are moving at roughly the same pace under the Democrats as they did under Republican rule. In fact, Republicans moved 88 percent of Mr. Clinton's nominees in his first year in office, compared with a snail-paced 13 percent approval rate thus far in Mr. Bush's first year.

But finger pointing and comparisons to past senatorial records is irrelevant in the dangerous life-and-death struggle in which our country is now engaged.

This is a time when the United States needs all of its law enforcement resources fully staffed and working together against an elusive and deadly enemy that threatens our way of life.

It is certainly not a time for petty, left-leaning judicial politics, nor the usual time-consuming procedures. Mr. Leahy and Mr. Daschle need to get with the program and approve these nominees as soon as possible.

Take Action on Judicial Nominees

St. Petersburg Times
Saturday, October 20, 2001

When Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., was the ranking minority member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, he accused the committee chairman, Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, of stalling then-President Clinton's judicial nominations for political and ideological reasons.

Leahy was certainly justified in his criticism. With dozens of judgeships vacant, Hatch held up confirmation hearings for nominees he thought were too liberal and used his position as chairman to cut deals to get his own people federal judgeships. Now with Leahy sitting in the chairman's seat, Hatch and other Republicans are accusing the Democrats of stalling President Bush's nominations to the federal bench. What goes around comes around, as they say. Hatch, along with the other Republicans on the committee, sent a letter to Leahy earlier this month complaining about the slow pace of confirmation hearings and threatening to delay passage of a foreign-aid bill until the logjam is broken. So far, only eight of 60 Bush nominees have been confirmed and only 14 hearings have been held.

Meanwhile, the federal judiciary is being severely handicapped by this foot-dragging. It has 109 vacancies, about 13 percent of the bench, and a case backlog that has been building for more than a decade. With Congress insisting on federalizing more crimes every year, and the endless burden of federal drug cases, the federal judiciary couldn't keep its docket current even if it were at full strength.

There is no question that the vacancies need to be filled, and it is Leahy's duty to move the process along. Any nominees who are clearly outside the mainstream of current legal thought should be rejected. The Democrats are in the majority and can block Bush's worst choices. But it's time to pick up the pace. Confirmation hearings should be scheduled and votes should be taken. Both parties are hypocrites on this issue. Both are guilty of using obstructionist tactics to stall or defeat judicial nominees who are viewed as either too liberal or too conservative.

At some point, for the sake of the country, the partisan warfare over judicial nominations has to end. Vote them up, or vote them down. But it's time to start voting.

Justice Delayed

Omaha World-Herald
Friday, October 19, 2001

They're at it again. Senators are foot-dragging on approving federal judicial nominees. The last time we complained editorially about such procrastination, it was Republicans stalling Bill Clinton's choices. Now it seems to be mostly Democrats stiff-arming George W. Bush's. No matter. Whichever party is wielding the gavel, such lassitude ill-serves the public.

There are 110 openings on the federal bench, of which 39 have sat vacant so long that the judiciary has officially classified them as "judicial emergencies." President Bush has put forward 60 nominations - enough to fill just more than half of the vacancies. Of his 60, the Senate has approved:

Eight.

Senate Republicans, frustrated at the pace, have begun protesting by logjamming other legislation. One such measure is the foreign-aid bill that would free billions of dollars that directly or indirectly relate to pressing the fight against terrorism. Stalling a bill so crucial perhaps is a dubious tactic, but it is an attention-getter.

The federal judiciary has been short-handed for years because of such tactics, harming the quality and pace of the administration of justice. Democrats should loosen their hold on the Senate Judiciary Committee, just as in recent years it would have been the right thing for the Republicans to have done. (They didn't.)

We are not suggesting rubber-stamping nominees. Where legitimate objections arise, they should be taken seriously. But delaying appointments over predictable differences in ideology is a petty tactic, one that should have been discarded years ago. Let's get moving.

Fighting Over Judges

Minneapolis-St. Paul Star Tribune
Friday, October 19, 2001

For a moment, Sept. 11 seemed to change the way Washington works. It kindled a bipartisan fervor in the pettiest of political hearts, spurring even fierce foes to sing and legislate in unison. The magic couldn't last forever, of course, and it hasn't. This week the Senate is up to its old tricks, squabbling over judicial appointments. Not even Capitol Hill's anthrax panic has calmed this schoolyard scrap. Insisting that Democrats are dawdling on filling vacant judgeships, Senate

Republicans are holding up a crucial foreign-aid bill. They say they won't allow a vote on it until Democrats promise to approve a throng of President Bush's judicial nominees.

Coming from the folks who spent eight years blocking Bill Clinton's judicial appointments, this procrastination charge is a little amusing. It's also baffling, for there's no proof that Democrats have been stalling. Republicans controlled the Senate during the first four months of the Bush administration and held not a single judicial-confirmation hearing. Democrats took over only in June and have approved eight nominees in the months since. They're preparing to examine and approve more soon.

But as new chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., notes, the Senate Judiciary Committee hasn't exactly been sloughing off under Democratic leadership. In the weeks before the August recess it expedited confirmations for numerous judges and several high executive-branch nominees. Less than a week after the break's end came the terrible havoc of Sept. 11 - and the flood of emergency lawmaking it unleashed.

So if the confirmation process is backed up, it's hard to see how Democrats can be blamed. Whatever problem exists is more likely due to the confluence of a power shift and a tragedy. But even if Democrats had adopted the GOP's old obstructionist tactics, the current Republican filibuster wouldn't be justified at all. Its unbecoming purpose is to bully the Judiciary Committee into rubber-stamping judicial candidates before taking time to assess them. That's a deal the Democrats ought to refuse.

If the Republicans' demand is unreasonable, their tactic is outrageous. The foreign-aid measure they're blocking may be the most important bit of legislation on Capitol Hill right now. Indeed, it's not too much to say that its passage is the Senate's patriotic duty.

This is the bill, after all, that can show a shaken world that Americans are givers - that they're eager to help their struggling neighbors overseas. As the United States drops bombs on Kabul, it's essential to prove that point.

Why should Republicans want to contradict it? Holding up the $15.5 billion foreign-aid bill will do nothing to get judges onto the bench. All it will do is slow the flow of humanitarian relief and military support to U.S. allies in the war against terrorism. Surely Republicans aren't really against helping refugees, fighting disease and strengthening democracies around the world. Since they're not, they ought to loosen their grip on the foreign-aid bill. It promises to buy health and life for faraway friends - and perhaps a glimmering of good will for the United States.

Leahy Doctrine Ensures Judicial Gridlock

The Washington Times
Monday, October 22, 2001

The war over the nation's judiciary is a familiar battleground, but one whose recent skirmishes are failing to generate the usual noise and headlines. Maybe it's because of the unexpected camouflage of the war on terrorism that Senate Democrats are now unleashing a kind of ferocity and vindictiveness which just doesn't seem to count as "politics-as-usual" anymore.

Call it the Leahy doctrine. Jealously guarding the political logjam that is keeping nearly all of President Bush's nominations from the federal bench, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy seems to be following a strategy to prevent any appeals court nominee committed to the legal doctrine of judicial restraint from even having a hearing, let alone a floor vote. The deadlock over the D.C. Court of Appeals offers a case in point. Now down to eight active judges, the circuit requires 10 active judges to carry its workload. Following Judge Stephen Williams' decision to retire from active service, Chief Judge Douglas H. Ginsberg informed Mr. Leahy and Sen. Charles E. Schumer in August that, without the confirmation of two new judges by Sept. 30, "the court will likely find it necessary to delay until next term September 2002-June 2003 hearing cases that would otherwise be argued and decided this winter and spring." Mr. Bush has already named two conservative nominees with sterling credentials to the D.C. circuit, Miguel Estrada and John Roberts. So, what has Mr. Leahy done about these two excellent nominees for those two urgent vacancies? Zip.

Senate Republicans are now taking action. With "the full backing" of the White House - as this newspaper's Donald Lambro reported, quoting a Senate Republican leadership official - they have devised a tough strategy to force Senate Democrats to break up the Leahy logjam. Republicans hope that, by blocking action on the foreign aid bill and other legislation, they can make Senate Democrats move on the 52 judges Mr. Bush has nominated, 44 of whom were named before the August recess, including Messrs. Estrada and Roberts.

To date, only eight of the president's nominees have been confirmed. This works out to a measly 15 percent confirmation rate for the president - not too good compared with his predecessors' success rates of 93 percent and up. No wonder the White House supports playing "hardball" against Mr. Leahy's nasty stall strategy. As the Republican leadership official explained, the White House is "concerned that the holdup of these nominees threatens the war on terrorism, because these judicial vacancies need to be filled as soon as possible to act on law-enforcement requests."

So, the Senate war relates back to the terrorism war, after all. Even so, and despite 108 vacancies in the federal judiciary (with 39 of them classified as "judicial emergencies"), all Mr. Leahy and his staff seem to do about it is keep the logjam in place. According to Sen. Orrin Hatch, Mr. Leahy has been "pretty irritated, and not in the mood to be helpful. If anything," he added, "he was threatening. I've heard payback talk."

Frankly, this sounds more like "The Sopranos" than the U.S. Senate. Mr. Hatch went on to say that Mr. Leahy told him that any Republican voting against the foreign aid bill "would not get the federal judges from their state confirmed." While Mr. Leahy has denied Mr. Hatch's charge - one senator's word against another - he hasn't gone so far as to deny a corroborating charge leveled by two Colorado Republicans, Sens. Wayne Allard and Ben Nighthorse Campbell. They told Roll Call that, in response to their recent request to expedite hearings for three nominees from their state, Mr. Leahy asked about their votes on the foreign aid bill. "If I go ahead and vote for cloture, you'd move my judges to the top?" Mr. Allard recalled asking Mr. Leahy. "He said, 'Yep.' " His staff actually suggested Mr. Leahy's comments were meant as a joke.

Ha ha. But who gets the last laugh? On Thursday, four district judges were unanimously approved by the committee, so maybe the Republicans' tactics are working. But there is much more to do. Scores of able judges are still waiting to don their robes. The spiteful partisanship of Mr. Leahy shouldn't stand in their way.

PLEASE WRITE YOUR SENATOR AND ASK THEM TO OPPOSE THE NOMINATION OF LAURA CAMP!

Laurie Smith Camp, who is currently Nebraska's Chief Deputy Attorney General in charge of criminal matters, has been nominated for a seat on the federal bench.

Because she has been nominated for a district court position -- i.e. trial level -- she is unlikely to encounter opposition.

However, several aspects of her professional record cause concern, and we wanted to share two, in particular, with you.

During her testimony against a bill that would have banned executions of mentally retarded people in Nebraska, Camp first asserted that no such law was necessary, as the current law assured fairness in capital cases. When pressed, Camp admitted that the current law did not prohibit the execution of the mentally retarded, but she repeated the assertion of the fairness of Nebraska law and then went so far as to claim that banning such executions would be an affront to the retarded: "I believe LB 1266 [the bill that would ban the executions] is an insult to retarded people.

They have the ability to tell right from wrong. That's not a matter of IQ. Some people have high IQs - but low moral IQs. There are a lot of people on death row with very high IQs."

This statement, and her position on this issue overall, suggests that she is far out of the mainstream and supports a position opposed by the vast majority of Americans, including those who support the death penalty in general.

In addition, she supported a bill that would require, rather than permit, juveniles accused of violent crimes to be tried and sentenced as adults.

Attorney general Don Stenberg, who had, along with Omaha Mayor Daub, endorsed the bill as an "anti-crime" measure, asserted that it would help law enforcement officials deal with "the violent juveniles of today."

As we said, opposition to a district court nominee is not common. In this case, however, we feel that it is important that the Senators who will vote on whether to give Camp a lifetime appointment to a federal court must be fully informed about her background and views and must carefully consider these issues when voting. We are asking you to call, email or write your Senator asking them to vote against Laurie Smith Camp's confirmation. If you need any information on how to reach your senator, please email ksderby@afj.org.

GOP Wants Judge Picks Confirmed; Democrats Accused of Dragging Their Feet

Neil Lewis
The New York Times
Sunday, October 21, 2001

Senate Republicans are engaged in a full-scale campaign to press Democrats to confirm President Bush's judicial nominees quickly, with some asserting that a failure to do so could harm the war on terrorism.

With more than 100 vacancies on the federal bench -- about 12 percent of the total judgeships -- Republicans argue that Democrats have slowed the confirmation process to avoid approving Bush's choices, many of whom are staunch conservatives.

In a late-night debate on anti-terrorism legislation in the Senate this month, the Republicans took an unusual break from the business at hand to make speeches saying that the Democrats were delaying action on Bush's judicial nominees.

Over the next several days, the Republicans pressed the Democrats to move quickly on the Bush nominees. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said, "Anyone who is interested in helping the president in the war on terrorism should support the president's judicial nominees."

Asked to explain, Hatch argued that a federal bench that was less than full strength could not process warrants and subpoenas aimed at terrorists as quickly as it should. He acknowledged, however, that there was no evidence of a slowdown in the consideration of such matters.

This is all infuriating to the Democrats, who spent the last years of the Clinton administration arguing that Republicans were slowing consideration of the nominees of a Democratic administration. Sen.
Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democrat whip, said there were so many vacancies because so many nominees of former President Bill Clinton had not been confirmed.

Each side has produced a wealth of statistics to demonstrate its own fine behavior on this issue and the other's perfidy.

Democrats have produced charts to show that, on the average, a Clinton nominee for a judgeship had to wait more than 330 days to get a hearing after being nominated. David Carle, a spokesman for Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said the average for Bush's nominees had been less than 100 days.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., a member of the committee, said in rebuttal that only eight, or 13.3 percent, of Bush's 60 nominees had been acted upon by the Senate. In the first year of the three previous administrations, almost all of the judicial nominees who were submitted to the Senate before the August recess were approved, Kyl said.

The numbers from both sides are usually fashioned from time periods that are not precisely comparable. The problem with the Democratic numbers generally is that they deal with the far longer period of Clinton's presidency, and the problem with the Republican numbers is that they generally deal with a short period in which first control of the Senate shifted, then Congress has been tied up with anti-terrorism bills.

GOP Slows Foreign Aid Bill to Speed Judicial Choices

By Joan Biskupic
USA Today
Monday, October 22, 2001

Senate Republicans have tried to speed up consideration of President Bush's judicial nominees by blocking action on a key foreign aid bill and by casting the need for more judges as critical in the fight against terrorism.

The clash last week, one of the first examples of partisan wrangling here since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, came as Capitol Hill was riveted by an anthrax scare. Another foreign aid bill vote is set for Tuesday. The dispute reflects the stakes in the battle over the makeup of the 862-seat federal bench, which has 110 vacancies and includes district courts that hear trials and the influential courts of appeals. There haven't been as many vacancies on the bench since March 1994, according to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

The bench makeup can make a vast difference in an array of individual rights. But with the new focus on terrorism, judges are likely to play an increasingly essential role in deciding how far police can go in conducting warrantless searches, determining whether certain immigrants should be deported and defining the breadth of civil liberties.

Determined to tilt federal courts to the right, the Bush administration has made judicial nominations much more of a priority than the Clinton administration. Early last week, GOP senators voted together to prevent floor consideration of a $ 15.6 billion foreign aid bill. They said they were protesting the slow pace of nomination hearings.

This year, the Senate has approved eight judges, and 52 names are pending, most from midsummer nominations. The pace of committee hearings has not been swift, but it also has not entailed record delays.

"Law enforcement is going to suffer" unless the Senate's pace in deciding judicial nominations picks up, says Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, pointing particularly to courts along the U.S.-Mexico border that are short-staffed. Hatch noted that some federal judges could end up handling key cases related to terrorism.

Neither Hatch, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, nor Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., would say whether the GOP would help move the foreign aid bill when it comes up for another vote Tuesday.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., says the panel is moving as quickly as possible on judges, and passage of the foreign aid bill is critical to the country's anti-terrorism efforts.

The proposal would send $ 5 billion in military and economic aid to U.S. allies in the Middle East and set aside hundreds of millions of dollars to detect infectious diseases overseas. "It is absurd to hold these funds hostage when practically every day there is a report of a new case of anthrax," Leahy says.

Democrats have been slow to move on several of Bush's judicial nominations, particularly some conservative favorites.

Among the more controversial nominees are Jeffrey Sutton, a Columbus, Ohio, lawyer who is a strong states-rights advocate; University of Utah professor Paul Cassell, who is known particularly for his legal work against the Miranda rights that police read to suspects; and federal magistrate Terry Wooten, who was once a top aide to Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C.

Thursday, the Judiciary Committee recommended Senate approval of four nominees and held a hearing on five others, including U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi, who has been appointed to a three-state appeals court and is the father of U.S. Rep. Charles "Chip" Pickering, R-Miss.

Lott has been seeking a deal for votes on "a significant number" of nominees in the coming weeks.

Senate Committee Advances 2 Federal Judge Nominations

By Chris Casteel
The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee, meeting despite a shutdown of its hearing room, approved two Oklahomans for federal judgeships Thursday and heard from attorney Stephen P. Friot, who has been nominated for the federal bench in Oklahoma City.

Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, has been pushing the committee to move judicial nominations, including those from his state. He got some response Thursday as the committee reported to the full Senate the nominations of Claire V. Eagan to be a U.S. district judge in Tulsa and James P. Payne to be a U.S. district judge for the Muskogee and Tulsa regions.

Eagan is a U.S. magistrate in the Northern District, based in Tulsa, and Payne is a magistrate in the Eastern District, based in Muskogee.

"These individuals are exceptionally well-qualified and will prove to be great assets to the judicial system in Oklahoma and our country," Nickles, the Senate minority whip, said. "It is good news for Oklahoma that they are moving through the nomination process. I hope and expect they will be confirmed by the full Senate in short order."

Friot's nomination is pending before the committee, as is the nomination of former U.S. Attorney Joe Heaton to be a U.S. district judge in Oklahoma City.

An aide to Nickles said none of the questions asked of Friot by the committee Thursday could be considered hostile or aggressive. Friot has been practicing law since 1972 and is a partner in the Oklahoma City firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum. He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association and an adjunct law professor at the University of Oklahoma.

Camp's Nomination Goes to the Full Senate

Omaha World-Herald
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted unanimously Thursday to recommend the nomination of Nebraskan Laurie Smith Camp to become a U.S. District Court Judge.

Thursday's vote should clear the way for easy confirmation by the full Senate, perhaps as early as next week. Once confirmed, Camp will become the first female federal judge in Nebraska. A longtime aide to Nebraska Attorney General Don Stenberg, she was appointed to the federal bench in June by President Bush.

Although some judicial nominations linger for months in the Senate, Camp had support from both of Nebraska's senators, Republican Chuck Hagel and Democrat Ben Nelson.

Camp will fill the vacancy created when Judge William Cambridge retired. She worked for 11 years as general counsel for the Nebraska Department of Corrections. In 1991, she joined Stenberg's staff. She is a graduate of Stanford University and the University of Nebraska College of Law.

A Bench Full of Holes; Vacancies in the N.J. Federal District Court Could Reach 30 Percent

By Tim O'Brien
New Jersey Law Journal
Friday, October 19, 2001

With U.S. District Judge Alfred Lechner Jr. leaving for private practice this month, New Jersey's district court is down by three judges. That's a vacancy rate of 17.7 percent, based on a full complement of 17 judges, and it could climb to almost 30 percent in the next three months.

Judge Nicholas Politan will be eligible to retire in mid-December, and two other district judges, Garrett Brown and William Bassler, are widely believed to be the leading candidates to take the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals seat that became available in June 2000 when Morton Greenberg took senior status. Two sources familiar with the process say Brown and Bassler have been interviewed by the White House counsel's office.

If Politan retires, and either Brown or Bassler moves up to the Third Circuit, the district court would be down to 12 judges, leaving five seats vacant. The current judge shortage isn't causing a calendar problem, according to John Bissell, who became chief judge in June when U.S. District Judge Anne Thompson retired. In part that's because the district has seven senior judges, most of whom carry substantial caseloads. Judges Thompson and John Lifland both went on senior status in June.

But the vacancies may not be filled for a long time. The combination of a Republican White House and a Democratic-controlled Senate has slowed confirmation hearings in the Senate Judiciary Committee. That, along with the slowdown of all appointments after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and President George Bush's stated priority of filling circuit vacancies first, will ensure the judicial pipeline will be sluggish at best.

Even when the White House agrees on a name, the FBI's background checks have been placed on a back burner as the agency puts its resources into the terrorist investigation.

New Jersey's nomination process is moving slower than many states due to the absence of a GOP leader with clout. Acting Gov. Donald DiFrancesco, the state's ranking Republican, is a lame duck, having decided not to run. The state's two senators, Robert Torricelli and Jon Corzine, are both Democrats.

Two sources familiar with the judge-picking process say that because of the political climate in the Senate -- Democrats have been itching for some payback for the loss of the presidency in the U.S. Supreme Court and eight years of what they perceive as GOP stall tactics on judicial nominations -- Torricelli and Corzine could get one or even two Democratic nominations.

That possibility is magnified by a mood in the Capitol to minimize partisan battles during the war on terrorism. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., earlier this month reiterated his position that noncontroversial nominations will move. Most of the fights have been over circuit seats, or in states where the two parties couldn't agree on names.

Who's in Contention

Three candidates are considered the strongest to fill the three existing vacancies: Magistrate Judge Stanley Chesler, McCarter & English partner William Greenberg and Essex County Superior Court Judge Jose Linares.

Greenberg, a Democrat, enjoys a good relationship with Torricelli. He was an assistant counsel under Gov. Richard Hughes and served as a commissioner of the State Commission of Investigations from 1982 to 1987. A well-regarded civil litigator, he is a past president of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America-NJ.

He is a big Democratic contributor. According to the Federal Election Commission and the state Commission, Greenberg and his wife have contributed $81,000 since 1998, primarily to the

Democrats.

That includes $47,000 to the Democratic National Committee and $10,000 to the State Democratic Committee. The contributions also include $4,000 to Torricelli, but none to Corzine, as Greenberg backed former Gov. Jim Florio against Corzine in the Senate Democratic primary last year. The Greenbergs gave Florio $4,000, the maximum contribution.

Greenberg, 58, is a retired brigadier general of the National Guard who has just volunteered to be reactivated. He is now serving as a special assistant for homeland security to the adjutant general of New Jersey's National Guard.

On the Republican side, a top candidate is Chesler, 54, who sits in Newark. Chesler, who has been on the bench for 14 years, is a former Bronx County assistant district attorney who later served as deputy chief of the federal Organized Crime Strike Force in Newark.

In the Law Journal's January 2001 survey of the federal bench, Chesler earned the second-highest score -- 8.84 out of a possible 10 -- among the state's eight magistrates. He finished first in four categories and was just .11 behind the highest score.

Another potential GOP nominee is Linares, who went on the bench last December. Linares practiced personal injury law, primarily medical malpractice and product liability cases, before his nomination by Gov. Christine Todd Whitman. He was active with the Essex County Bar Association.

Cuban-born, Linares is also a former president of the New Jersey Hispanic Bar Association. This is seen by some as a plus with the Bush White House, which has been making special efforts to court the Hispanic vote for the 2004 election.

The names of two other federal magistrates are also being floated as potential nominees to move up the district court: Republican Robert Kugler and Democrat John Hughes.

Logjam in Washington

Nationally, there are 30 circuit court and 75 district court vacancies, for a vacancy rate of 12.32 percent.

However, the White House has been much more aggressive in sending to the Senate nominations for the circuit courts where case law is written, as opposed to the district courts.

As of last week, the Senate Judiciary Committee had 22 pending circuit court nominations for confirmation to those 30 vacancies. By contrast, there were only 32 pending nominations before the committee to fill the 75 district slots.

Put another way, the White House has moved on more than 73 percent of the current circuit vacancies, but only 42.7 percent of the current district vacancies. And obviously, there have been no nominations for New Jersey. Even the Third Circuit vacancy created by Greenberg's departure is now 16 months old, in large measure because the Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee never moved on the nomination of U.S. District Judge Stephen Orlofsky to move up to the Third Circuit.

And while the noncontroversial candidates will eventually get a hearing, Democrats are prepared to do battle over nominations, particularly for circuit seats, that they perceive as too ideological or conservative.

Within hours after Vermont's Sen. Jim Jeffords gave the Democrats control of the Senate last May by switching from being a Republican to being an Independent, Torricelli bragged, "This isn't about a single Senate seat ... it's about the federal judiciary."

So, while the committee is moving names and the Senate is confirming -- a circuit court and a district court nominee both received Senate confirmation on Oct. 10 -- nominations for New Jersey's district bench will most probably have to get in a long line.

The fact that Torricelli no longer sits on the Judiciary Committee, where he used to be able to expedite New Jersey candidates because of a good relationship with Utah Republican Orin Hatch, then committee chairman, doesn't help.

Three additional factors could combine to keep New Jersey with five vacancies.

First, there are many judges around the country who have indicated they will retire soon, leading to a bigger backlog in the process. Second, 40 vacancies around the nation have been declared judicial emergencies by the U.S. Judicial Conference, giving those vacancies a higher priority. Third, the caseload nationwide is growing, with 320,200 district cases and 56,600 circuit cases added over the past year, according to court figures.

"Nothing is happening," says one lawyer who has been following the judicial appointments process, while another lawyer agrees, saying, "I haven't the slightest feeling D.C. is moving on district seats, not until they are done with the Third Circuit."

Assistant White House Counsel Rachel Brand, who has been involved in screening names for the New Jersey bench, says only, "We're aware of the issues, and vacancies, and we're working on them."

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge M. Christina Armijo, 50, of Las Vegas, N.M., was introduced to the committee Thursday by Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., who recommended Armijo to President Bush.

"I thought we were very well received," New Mexico's senior senator said by phone Thursday. Domenici said that he and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., got an opportunity to speak on Armijo's behalf. Armijo, accompanied by her mother and brother, also testified before the committee, Domenici said. The committee did not vote on whether to recommend to the full Senate that she be confirmed. No schedule was announced.

Domenici said the committee was told about her 22 years of law experience, including her service on the state appeals court since 1996, and about her family's long history in northern New Mexico. Armijo's grandfather, for instance, was a judge for 35 years, Domenici said.

"As she put it, her family has lived for 12 generations in New Mexico and lawyers and judges are part of the family tradition," Domenici said. "I concluded ... that she will be a fair yet firm judge and urged that her confirmation be done quickly. I am very enthusiastic we will have her within the next couple of weeks."

Domenici also said that he expects the confirmation of former New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Harris Hartz, whom Bush nominated for a post on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit, to go smoothly.

"There's an opportunity for contention on circuit judges, but I don't think that's going to be the case," Domenici said.

He also said he had "no idea why we won't have (William P.) 'Chip' Johnson on soon."

Johnson, a state district judge in Roswell, was nominated along with Armijo by Bush to become a U.S. district judge. Domenici recommended all three judges to Bush for the lifetime appointments.

Domenici said he assumes that it won't be too long before a U.S. district judge's post is created in Las Cruces, where immigration and drug cases overload the docket. Five U.S. district judges from Albuquerque and Santa Fe have been rotating to southern New Mexico to help with the caseload.

Reno Lawyer Hicks Looks for Quick Senate Confirmation as Judge

The Associated Press
Friday, October 19, 2001

Sens. Harry Reid and John Ensign said they are optimistic the Senate will confirm Reno lawyer Larry Hicks as a new federal judge in Nevada within the next two weeks. Hicks went before the

Senate Judiciary Committee Thursday for a confirmation hearing on his appointment as a U.S. district court judge. Both Nevada senators spoke on his behalf.

Hicks worked in the Washoe County District Attorney's Office before he became a partner in one of Nevada's largest law firms - McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks. He's a past president of the state bar association's board of governors.

Senate Panel Approves Two State Judicial Nominees

By Jim Myers
Tulsa World
Friday, October 19, 2001

Two nominees for judicial posts in Oklahoma won Senate Judiciary Committee approval Thursday.

Nominations for U.S. Magistrates Claire V. Eagan of Tulsa and James P. Payne of Muskogee now head for confirmation by the full Senate, a vote that could take place next week. Eagan was nominated for a position in the state's northern district, while Payne will divide his time among Oklahoma's three districts.

Meanwhile, the Senate panel held a hearing for a third Oklahoman, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma City. Friot, 54, is headed for a slot in the western district.

Responding to questions by a panel of senators, Friot vowed to uphold Americans' right to privacy and a woman's right to an abortion as defined by the U.S. Supreme Court. Only the Supreme Court can undo one of its previous rulings, he testified.

Asked about the controversial practice of racial profiling and whether judges could do more to respond to that issue, Friot referred to a body of law he said addressed selective prosecution.

He said in response to a question about whether he would be a strict constructionist that he would not be limited to one narrow approach but instead would look for a guidance from a number of sources.

President Bush nominated the three Oklahomans at the recommendation of the state's two senators, Republicans Don Nickles and Jim Inhofe.

These individuals are exceptionally well-qualified and will prove to be great assets to the judicial system in Oklahoma and our country," Nickles said.

A fourth judicial nominee, Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Heaton of Oklahoma, is awaiting his confirmation hearing.

Senate Panel Oks Four Judges

By Audrey Hudson
The Washington Times
Friday, October 19, 2001

Four district judges were unanimously approved yesterday by the Senate Judiciary Committee after Republicans complained that President Bush's nominees were being treated unfairly by Democrats.

Republicans are insisting that the 44 judges nominated by Mr. Bush before the August recess be voted on before Congress adjourns for the year. To date, eight judges have been confirmed.

"It's a good step in the right direction, but it doesn't make much of a dent," Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, said after the vote.

Minority Leader Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, is blocking a spending bill for foreign operations to force a vote on the pending judges.

Committee negotiations were halted after an anthrax attack on Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle's office Monday exposed staffers and Capitol Police officers; a total of 31 persons.

"We've not been able to discuss the judges for obvious reasons," said Mr. Lott, who predicted that a vote to move forward on the spending bill Tuesday would fail.

The committee unanimously passed without debate Karen K. Caldwell as U.S. district judge for the Eastern District of Kentucky; Laurie Smith Camp as U.S. district judge for the District of Nebraska; Claire V. Eagan as U.S. district judge for the Northern District of Oklahoma, and James H. Payne as U.S. district judge for the Northern, Eastern, and Western Districts of Oklahoma.

"It's a beginning, but let it not be something to pacify us and move on. That won't work," Sen. Larry E. Craig, Idaho Republican, said of yesterday's action.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, committee chairman and Vermont Democrat, said, "I am fully committed to the process of confirming judges and filling vacancies. I will not be pressured to proceed on nominees whose records are not complete to the satisfaction of this committee.

"It is painfully clear to me that in this time of national challenge, the message must be sent that the United States Senate should be working as a unified team to respond to the violent attacks against our country," Mr. Leahy said. "We should be avoiding petty partisanship. This is hardly the time

His plea did not prevent Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, from calling Republicans

"phonies" for saying Mr. Bush's nominees were being treated unfairly by Democrats.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, told the committee he will bring a measure to the floor forcing a vote on the nominees.

The committee also held hearings on the nominations of Charles W. Pickering Sr. for the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals; M. Christina Armijo for U.S. District Court for the District of New Mexico; Karon O. Bowdre to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Alabama; Stephen P. Friot for U.S. District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma, and Larry R. Hicks for U.S. District Court for the District of Nevada.

Op/Eds

Moment of Decision for Law Enforcement

By Donald Lambro
The Washington Times
Monday, October 22, 2001

With America's homeland enduring the deadliest terrorist attacks in our history, every law enforcement weapon and tool at our disposal needs to be fully operational and running at peak performance.

Yet, incredibly, there is a gaping hole in the government's judicial defenses - the heart of the nation's law enforcement army - because of persistent and deliberate delays by the Senate Judiciary Committee to fill dozens of vacancies in our court system.

The courts are being inundated with law enforcement requests and cases. There are not enough judges to handle them all quickly. The dire result: dangerous backlogs and delays that prevent the swift and sure delivery of decisions needed to protect all of us from the threats that now loom over our country. Right now, there are at least 108 vacancies in our federal courts, including 30 posts that have been vacant for so long that federal judicial officials have classified them as "judicial emergencies."

With our law-enforcement agencies needing rapid-fire responses from the courts for a broad range of court-approved surveillance actions and other legal requests in their war on the murderous terrorists in our midst, this is no time for our court system to be operating at half-speed.

"We need federal judges monitoring and helping to support the anti-terrorism efforts and law-enforcement requests from the various agencies of government," Senate Republican Leader Trent Lott of Mississippi told me.

"The Senate is at its lowest confirmation rate of federal judges in recent history, and we need to pick up the pace immediately," he said.

The man most responsible for this state of affairs is Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, a deeply partisan Vermont Democrat who Republicans say has been working overtime to hold up or at least slow down President Bush's judicial nominations.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the committee's ranking Republican, has been complaining about the lack of action by Mr. Leahy ever since Democrats took control of the Senate last July, when hearings on Mr. Bush's nominees virtually ground to a halt. At present, there are 52 judicial nominees who are trapped in Leahy limbo, 46 of whom have had no hearings.

Many of them have been fully approved by the American Bar Association, but not by Mr. Leahy and the Democratic members on his committee.

At the heart of the judicial dispute, as always, is ideology. After eight years of liberal appointments to the courts under the Clinton administration, Mr. Leahy and friends recoil at the prospect of eight years of more conservative judges who aren't as likely to let criminals go free on legal technicalities.

Hatch, Lott and other Republican senators have been complaining for months about the delays in the confirmation process, but without success. But then, in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the complaints began pouring out of the White House, the Justice Department and elsewhere in law enforcement and in intelligence circles.

That's when the backroom political struggle broke into open warfare on the Senate floor.

Declaring that they were ready "to play hardball" to get action on the judgeship nominees, Republicans blocked action last week on the foreign aid bill and said that it and other bills would not move until Mr. Leahy lifted his judicial blockade. Notably, Republican leaders said that the White House was fully behind their move.

But the battle really exploded into all-out warfare when Mr. Hatch told his colleagues at last Tuesday's closed Republican policy luncheon that Mr. Leahy had told him that any senator who voted to block the aid bill "would not get the federal judges from their state confirmed."

Enraged, Republican senators, including many who work with Mr. Leahy on the committee, rose at the meeting to excoriate the Vermonter, attacking him as a "vindictive partisan" bent on blocking President George W. Bush "anyway he can," according to my sources.

Mr. Leahy denied that he threatened retribution against Republican senators, but that is not the way Mr. Hatch tells it. "If anything, he Mr. Leahy was threatening. I've heard payback talk," Mr. Hatch said.

are moving at roughly the same pace under the Democrats as they did under Republican rule. In fact, Republicans moved 88 percent of Mr. Clinton's nominees in his first year in office, compared with a snail-paced 13 percent approval rate thus far in Mr. Bush's first year.

But finger pointing and comparisons to past senatorial records is irrelevant in the dangerous life-and-death struggle in which our country is now engaged.

This is a time when the United States needs all of its law enforcement resources fully staffed and working together against an elusive and deadly enemy that threatens our way of life.

It is certainly not a time for petty, left-leaning judicial politics, nor the usual time-consuming procedures. Mr. Leahy and Mr. Daschle need to get with the program and approve these nominees as soon as possible.

Take Action on Judicial Nominees

St. Petersburg Times
Saturday, October 20, 2001

When Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., was the ranking minority member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, he accused the committee chairman, Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, of stalling then-President Clinton's judicial nominations for political and ideological reasons.

Leahy was certainly justified in his criticism. With dozens of judgeships vacant, Hatch held up confirmation hearings for nominees he thought were too liberal and used his position as chairman to cut deals to get his own people federal judgeships. Now with Leahy sitting in the chairman's seat, Hatch and other Republicans are accusing the Democrats of stalling President Bush's nominations to the federal bench. What goes around comes around, as they say. Hatch, along with the other Republicans on the committee, sent a letter to Leahy earlier this month complaining about the slow pace of confirmation hearings and threatening to delay passage of a foreign-aid bill until the logjam is broken. So far, only eight of 60 Bush nominees have been confirmed and only 14 hearings have been held.

Meanwhile, the federal judiciary is being severely handicapped by this foot-dragging. It has 109 vacancies, about 13 percent of the bench, and a case backlog that has been building for more than a decade. With Congress insisting on federalizing more crimes every year, and the endless burden of federal drug cases, the federal judiciary couldn't keep its docket current even if it were at full strength.

There is no question that the vacancies need to be filled, and it is Leahy's duty to move the process along. Any nominees who are clearly outside the mainstream of current legal thought should be rejected. The Democrats are in the majority and can block Bush's worst choices. But it's time to pick up the pace. Confirmation hearings should be scheduled and votes should be taken. Both parties are hypocrites on this issue. Both are guilty of using obstructionist tactics to stall or defeat judicial nominees who are viewed as either too liberal or too conservative.

At some point, for the sake of the country, the partisan warfare over judicial nominations has to end. Vote them up, or vote them down. But it's time to start voting.

Justice Delayed

Omaha World-Herald
Friday, October 19, 2001

They're at it again. Senators are foot-dragging on approving federal judicial nominees. The last time we complained editorially about such procrastination, it was Republicans stalling Bill Clinton's choices. Now it seems to be mostly Democrats stiff-arming George W. Bush's. No matter. Whichever party is wielding the gavel, such lassitude ill-serves the public.

There are 110 openings on the federal bench, of which 39 have sat vacant so long that the judiciary has officially classified them as "judicial emergencies." President Bush has put forward 60 nominations - enough to fill just more than half of the vacancies. Of his 60, the Senate has approved:

Eight.

Senate Republicans, frustrated at the pace, have begun protesting by logjamming other legislation. One such measure is the foreign-aid bill that would free billions of dollars that directly or indirectly relate to pressing the fight against terrorism. Stalling a bill so crucial perhaps is a dubious tactic, but it is an attention-getter.

The federal judiciary has been short-handed for years because of such tactics, harming the quality and pace of the administration of justice. Democrats should loosen their hold on the Senate Judiciary Committee, just as in recent years it would have been the right thing for the Republicans to have done. (They didn't.)

We are not suggesting rubber-stamping nominees. Where legitimate objections arise, they should be taken seriously. But delaying appointments over predictable differences in ideology is a petty tactic, one that should have been discarded years ago. Let's get moving.

Fighting Over Judges

Minneapolis-St. Paul Star Tribune
Friday, October 19, 2001

For a moment, Sept. 11 seemed to change the way Washington works. It kindled a bipartisan fervor in the pettiest of political hearts, spurring even fierce foes to sing and legislate in unison. The magic couldn't last forever, of course, and it hasn't. This week the Senate is up to its old tricks, squabbling over judicial appointments. Not even Capitol Hill's anthrax panic has calmed this schoolyard scrap. Insisting that Democrats are dawdling on filling vacant judgeships, Senate

Republicans are holding up a crucial foreign-aid bill. They say they won't allow a vote on it until Democrats promise to approve a throng of President Bush's judicial nominees.

Coming from the folks who spent eight years blocking Bill Clinton's judicial appointments, this procrastination charge is a little amusing. It's also baffling, for there's no proof that Democrats have been stalling. Republicans controlled the Senate during the first four months of the Bush administration and held not a single judicial-confirmation hearing. Democrats took over only in June and have approved eight nominees in the months since. They're preparing to examine and approve more soon.

But as new chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., notes, the Senate Judiciary Committee hasn't exactly been sloughing off under Democratic leadership. In the weeks before the August recess it expedited confirmations for numerous judges and several high executive-branch nominees. Less than a week after the break's end came the terrible havoc of Sept. 11 - and the flood of emergency lawmaking it unleashed.

So if the confirmation process is backed up, it's hard to see how Democrats can be blamed. Whatever problem exists is more likely due to the confluence of a power shift and a tragedy. But even if Democrats had adopted the GOP's old obstructionist tactics, the current Republican filibuster wouldn't be justified at all. Its unbecoming purpose is to bully the Judiciary Committee into rubber-stamping judicial candidates before taking time to assess them. That's a deal the Democrats ought to refuse.

If the Republicans' demand is unreasonable, their tactic is outrageous. The foreign-aid measure they're blocking may be the most important bit of legislation on Capitol Hill right now. Indeed, it's not too much to say that its passage is the Senate's patriotic duty.

This is the bill, after all, that can show a shaken world that Americans are givers - that they're eager to help their struggling neighbors overseas. As the United States drops bombs on Kabul, it's essential to prove that point.

Why should Republicans want to contradict it? Holding up the $15.5 billion foreign-aid bill will do nothing to get judges onto the bench. All it will do is slow the flow of humanitarian relief and military support to U.S. allies in the war against terrorism. Surely Republicans aren't really against helping refugees, fighting disease and strengthening democracies around the world. Since they're not, they ought to loosen their grip on the foreign-aid bill. It promises to buy health and life for faraway friends - and perhaps a glimmering of good will for the United States.

Leahy Doctrine Ensures Judicial Gridlock

The Washington Times
Monday, October 22, 2001

The war over the nation's judiciary is a familiar battleground, but one whose recent skirmishes are failing to generate the usual noise and headlines. Maybe it's because of the unexpected camouflage of the war on terrorism that Senate Democrats are now unleashing a kind of ferocity and vindictiveness which just doesn't seem to count as "politics-as-usual" anymore.

Call it the Leahy doctrine. Jealously guarding the political logjam that is keeping nearly all of President Bush's nominations from the federal bench, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy seems to be following a strategy to prevent any appeals court nominee committed to the legal doctrine of judicial restraint from even having a hearing, let alone a floor vote. The deadlock over the D.C. Court of Appeals offers a case in point. Now down to eight active judges, the circuit requires 10 active judges to carry its workload. Following Judge Stephen Williams' decision to retire from active service, Chief Judge Douglas H. Ginsberg informed Mr. Leahy and Sen. Charles E. Schumer in August that, without the confirmation of two new judges by Sept. 30, "the court will likely find it necessary to delay until next term September 2002-June 2003 hearing cases that would otherwise be argued and decided this winter and spring." Mr. Bush has already named two conservative nominees with sterling credentials to the D.C. circuit, Miguel Estrada and John Roberts. So, what has Mr. Leahy done about these two excellent nominees for those two urgent vacancies? Zip.

Senate Republicans are now taking action. With "the full backing" of the White House - as this newspaper's Donald Lambro reported, quoting a Senate Republican leadership official - they have devised a tough strategy to force Senate Democrats to break up the Leahy logjam. Republicans hope that, by blocking action on the foreign aid bill and other legislation, they can make Senate Democrats move on the 52 judges Mr. Bush has nominated, 44 of whom were named before the August recess, including Messrs. Estrada and Roberts.

To date, only eight of the president's nominees have been confirmed. This works out to a measly 15 percent confirmation rate for the president - not too good compared with his predecessors' success rates of 93 percent and up. No wonder the White House supports playing "hardball" against Mr. Leahy's nasty stall strategy. As the Republican leadership official explained, the White House is "concerned that the holdup of these nominees threatens the war on terrorism, because these judicial vacancies need to be filled as soon as possible to act on law-enforcement requests."

So, the Senate war relates back to the terrorism war, after all. Even so, and despite 108 vacancies in the federal judiciary (with 39 of them classified as "judicial emergencies"), all Mr. Leahy and his staff seem to do about it is keep the logjam in place. According to Sen. Orrin Hatch, Mr. Leahy has been "pretty irritated, and not in the mood to be helpful. If anything," he added, "he was threatening. I've heard payback talk."

Frankly, this sounds more like "The Sopranos" than the U.S. Senate. Mr. Hatch went on to say that Mr. Leahy told him that any Republican voting against the foreign aid bill "would not get the federal judges from their state confirmed." While Mr. Leahy has denied Mr. Hatch's charge - one senator's word against another - he hasn't gone so far as to deny a corroborating charge leveled by two Colorado Republicans, Sens. Wayne Allard and Ben Nighthorse Campbell. They told Roll Call that, in response to their recent request to expedite hearings for three nominees from their state, Mr. Leahy asked about their votes on the foreign aid bill. "If I go ahead and vote for cloture, you'd move my judges to the top?" Mr. Allard recalled asking Mr. Leahy. "He said, 'Yep.' " His staff actually suggested Mr. Leahy's comments were meant as a joke.

Ha ha. But who gets the last laugh? On Thursday, four district judges were unanimously approved by the committee, so maybe the Republicans' tactics are working. But there is much more to do. Scores of able judges are still waiting to don their robes. The spiteful partisanship of Mr. Leahy shouldn't stand in their way.

PLEASE WRITE YOUR SENATOR AND ASK THEM TO OPPOSE THE NOMINATION OF LAURA CAMP!

Laurie Smith Camp, who is currently Nebraska's Chief Deputy Attorney General in charge of criminal matters, has been nominated for a seat on the federal bench.

Because she has been nominated for a district court position -- i.e. trial level -- she is unlikely to encounter opposition.

However, several aspects of her professional record cause concern, and we wanted to share two, in particular, with you.

During her testimony against a bill that would have banned executions of mentally retarded

people in Nebraska, Camp first asserted that no such law was necessary, as the current law assured fairness in capital cases. When pressed, Camp admitted that the current law did not prohibit the execution of the mentally retarded, but she repeated the assertion of the fairness of Nebraska law and then went so far as to claim that banning such executions would be an affront to the retarded: "I believe LB 1266 [the bill that would ban the executions] is an insult to retarded people.

They have the ability to tell right from wrong. That's not a matter of IQ. Some people have high IQs - but low moral IQs. There are a lot of people on death row with very high IQs."

This statement, and her position on this issue overall, suggests that she is far out of the mainstream and supports a position opposed by the vast majority of Americans, including those who support the death penalty in general.

In addition, she supported a bill that would require, rather than permit, juveniles accused of violent crimes to be tried and sentenced as adults.

Attorney general Don Stenberg, who had, along with Omaha Mayor Daub, endorsed the bill as an "anti-crime" measure, asserted that it would help law enforcement officials deal with "the violent juveniles of today."

As we said, opposition to a district court nominee is not common. In this case, however, we feel that it is important that the Senators who will vote on whether to give Camp a lifetime appointment to a federal court must be fully informed about her background and views and must carefully consider these issues when voting. We are asking you to call, email or write your Senator asking them to vote against Laurie Smith Camp's confirmation. If you need any information on how to reach your senator, please email ksderby@afj.org.

GOP Wants Judge Picks Confirmed; Democrats Accused of Dragging Their Feet

Neil Lewis
The New York Times
Sunday, October 21, 2001

Senate Republicans are engaged in a full-scale campaign to press Democrats to confirm President Bush's judicial nominees quickly, with some asserting that a failure to do so could harm the war on terrorism.

With more than 100 vacancies on the federal bench -- about 12 percent of the total judgeships -- Republicans argue that Democrats have slowed the confirmation process to avoid approving Bush's choices, many of whom are staunch conservatives.

In a late-night debate on anti-terrorism legislation in the Senate this month, the Republicans took an unusual break from the business at hand to make speeches saying that the Democrats were delaying action on Bush's judicial nominees.

Over the next several days, the Republicans pressed the Democrats to move quickly on the Bush nominees. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said, "Anyone who is interested in helping the president in the war on terrorism should support the president's judicial nominees."

Asked to explain, Hatch argued that a federal bench that was less than full strength could not process warrants and subpoenas aimed at terrorists as quickly as it should. He acknowledged, however, that there was no evidence of a slowdown in the consideration of such matters.

This is all infuriating to the Democrats, who spent the last years of the Clinton administration arguing that Republicans were slowing consideration of the nominees of a Democratic administration. Sen.
Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democrat whip, said there were so many vacancies because so many nominees of former President Bill Clinton had not been confirmed.

Each side has produced a wealth of statistics to demonstrate its own fine behavior on this issue and the other's perfidy.

Democrats have produced charts to show that, on the average, a Clinton nominee for a judgeship had to wait more than 330 days to get a hearing after being nominated. David Carle, a spokesman for Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said the average for Bush's nominees had been less than 100 days.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., a member of the committee, said in rebuttal that only eight, or 13.3 percent, of Bush's 60 nominees had been acted upon by the Senate. In the first year of the three previous administrations, almost all of the judicial nominees who were submitted to the Senate before the August recess were approved, Kyl said.

The numbers from both sides are usually fashioned from time periods that are not precisely comparable. The problem with the Democratic numbers generally is that they deal with the far longer period of Clinton's presidency, and the problem with the Republican numbers is that they generally deal with a short period in which first control of the Senate shifted, then Congress has been tied up with anti-terrorism bills.

GOP Slows Foreign Aid Bill to Speed Judicial Choices

By Joan Biskupic
USA Today
Monday, October 22, 2001

Senate Republicans have tried to speed up consideration of President Bush's judicial nominees by blocking action on a key foreign aid bill and by casting the need for more judges as critical in the fight against terrorism.

The clash last week, one of the first examples of partisan wrangling here since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, came as Capitol Hill was riveted by an anthrax scare. Another foreign aid bill vote is set for Tuesday. The dispute reflects the stakes in the battle over the makeup of the 862-seat federal bench, which has 110 vacancies and includes district courts that hear trials and the influential courts of appeals. There haven't been as many vacancies on the bench since March 1994, according to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

The bench makeup can make a vast difference in an array of individual rights. But with the new focus on terrorism, judges are likely to play an increasingly essential role in deciding how far police can go in conducting warrantless searches, determining whether certain immigrants should be deported and defining the breadth of civil liberties.

Determined to tilt federal courts to the right, the Bush administration has made judicial nominations much more of a priority than the Clinton administration. Early last week, GOP senators voted together to prevent floor consideration of a $ 15.6 billion foreign aid bill. They said they were protesting the slow pace of nomination hearings.

This year, the Senate has approved eight judges, and 52 names are pending, most from midsummer nominations. The pace of committee hearings has not been swift, but it also has not entailed record delays.

"Law enforcement is going to suffer" unless the Senate's pace in deciding judicial nominations picks up, says Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, pointing particularly to courts along the U.S.-Mexico border that are short-staffed. Hatch noted that some federal judges could end up handling key cases related to terrorism.

Neither Hatch, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, nor Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., would say whether the GOP would help move the foreign aid bill when it comes up for another vote Tuesday.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., says the panel is moving as quickly as possible on judges, and passage of the foreign aid bill is critical to the country's anti-terrorism efforts.

The proposal would send $ 5 billion in military and economic aid to U.S. allies in the Middle East and set aside hundreds of millions of dollars to detect infectious diseases overseas. "It is absurd to hold these funds hostage when practically every day there is a report of a new case of anthrax," Leahy says.

Democrats have been slow to move on several of Bush's judicial nominations, particularly some conservative favorites.

Among the more controversial nominees are Jeffrey Sutton, a Columbus, Ohio, lawyer who is a strong states-rights advocate; University of Utah professor Paul Cassell, who is known particularly for his legal work against the Miranda rights that police read to suspects; and federal magistrate Terry Wooten, who was once a top aide to Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C.

Thursday, the Judiciary Committee recommended Senate approval of four nominees and held a hearing on five others, including U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi, who has been appointed to a three-state appeals court and is the father of U.S. Rep. Charles "Chip" Pickering, R-Miss.

Lott has been seeking a deal for votes on "a significant number" of nominees in the coming weeks.

Senate Committee Advances 2 Federal Judge Nominations

By Chris Casteel
The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee, meeting despite a shutdown of its hearing room, approved two Oklahomans for federal judgeships Thursday and heard from attorney Stephen P. Friot, who has been nominated for the federal bench in Oklahoma City.

Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, has been pushing the committee to move judicial nominations, including those from his state. He got some response Thursday as the committee reported to the full Senate the nominations of Claire V. Eagan to be a U.S. district judge in Tulsa and James P. Payne to be a U.S. district judge for the Muskogee and Tulsa regions.

Eagan is a U.S. magistrate in the Northern District, based in Tulsa, and Payne is a magistrate in the Eastern District, based in Muskogee.

"These individuals are exceptionally well-qualified and will prove to be great assets to the judicial system in Oklahoma and our country," Nickles, the Senate minority whip, said. "It is good news for Oklahoma that they are moving through the nomination process. I hope and expect they will be confirmed by the full Senate in short order."

Friot's nomination is pending before the committee, as is the nomination of former U.S. Attorney Joe Heaton to be a U.S. district judge in Oklahoma City.

An aide to Nickles said none of the questions asked of Friot by the committee Thursday could be considered hostile or aggressive. Friot has been practicing law since 1972 and is a partner in the Oklahoma City firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum. He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association and an adjunct law professor at the University of Oklahoma.

Camp's Nomination Goes to the Full Senate

Omaha World-Herald
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted unanimously Thursday to recommend the nomination of Nebraskan Laurie Smith Camp to become a U.S. District Court Judge.

Thursday's vote should clear the way for easy confirmation by the full Senate, perhaps as early as next week. Once confirmed, Camp will become the first female federal judge in Nebraska. A longtime aide to Nebraska Attorney General Don Stenberg, she was appointed to the federal bench in June by President Bush.

Although some judicial nominations linger for months in the Senate, Camp had support from both of Nebraska's senators, Republican Chuck Hagel and Democrat Ben Nelson.

Camp will fill the vacancy created when Judge William Cambridge retired. She worked for 11 years as general counsel for the Nebraska Department of Corrections. In 1991, she joined Stenberg's staff. She is a graduate of Stanford University and the University of Nebraska College of Law.

A Bench Full of Holes; Vacancies in the N.J. Federal District Court Could Reach 30 Percent

By Tim O'Brien
New Jersey Law Journal
Friday, October 19, 2001

With U.S. District Judge Alfred Lechner Jr. leaving for private practice this month, New Jersey's district court is down by three judges. That's a vacancy rate of 17.7 percent, based on a full complement of 17 judges, and it could climb to almost 30 percent in the next three months.

Judge Nicholas Politan will be eligible to retire in mid-December, and two other district judges, Garrett Brown and William Bassler, are widely believed to be the leading candidates to take the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals seat that became available in June 2000 when Morton Greenberg took senior status. Two sources familiar with the process say Brown and Bassler have been interviewed by the White House counsel's office.

If Politan retires, and either Brown or Bassler moves up to the Third Circuit, the district court would be down to 12 judges, leaving five seats vacant. The current judge shortage isn't causing a calendar problem, according to John Bissell, who became chief judge in June when U.S. District Judge Anne Thompson retired. In part that's because the district has seven senior judges, most of whom carry substantial caseloads. Judges Thompson and John Lifland both went on senior status in June.

But the vacancies may not be filled for a long time. The combination of a Republican White House and a Democratic-controlled Senate has slowed confirmation hearings in the Senate Judiciary Committee. That, along with the slowdown of all appointments after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and President George Bush's stated priority of filling circuit vacancies first, will ensure the judicial pipeline will be sluggish at best.

Even when the White House agrees on a name, the FBI's background checks have been placed on a back burner as the agency puts its resources into the terrorist investigation.

New Jersey's nomination process is moving slower than many states due to the absence of a GOP leader with clout. Acting Gov. Donald DiFrancesco, the state's ranking Republican, is a lame duck, having decided not to run. The state's two senators, Robert Torricelli and Jon Corzine, are both Democrats.

Two sources familiar with the judge-picking process say that because of the political climate in the Senate -- Democrats have been itching for some payback for the loss of the presidency in the U.S. Supreme Court and eight years of what they perceive as GOP stall tactics on judicial nominations -- Torricelli and Corzine could get one or even two Democratic nominations.

That possibility is magnified by a mood in the Capitol to minimize partisan battles during the war on terrorism. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., earlier this month reiterated his position that noncontroversial nominations will move. Most of the fights have been over circuit seats, or in states where the two parties couldn't agree on names.

Who's in Contention

Three candidates are considered the strongest to fill the three existing vacancies: Magistrate Judge Stanley Chesler, McCarter & English partner William Greenberg and Essex County Superior Court Judge Jose Linares.

Greenberg, a Democrat, enjoys a good relationship with Torricelli. He was an assistant counsel under Gov. Richard Hughes and served as a commissioner of the State Commission of Investigations from 1982 to 1987. A well-regarded civil litigator, he is a past president of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America-NJ.

He is a big Democratic contributor. According to the Federal Election Commission and the state Commission, Greenberg and his wife have contributed $81,000 since 1998, primarily to the

Democrats.

That includes $47,000 to the Democratic National Committee and $10,000 to the State Democratic Committee. The contributions also include $4,000 to Torricelli, but none to Corzine, as Greenberg backed former Gov. Jim Florio against Corzine in the Senate Democratic primary last year. The Greenbergs gave Florio $4,000, the maximum contribution.

Greenberg, 58, is a retired brigadier general of the National Guard who has just volunteered to be reactivated. He is now serving as a special assistant for homeland security to the adjutant general of New Jersey's National Guard.

On the Republican side, a top candidate is Chesler, 54, who sits in Newark. Chesler, who has been on the bench for 14 years, is a former Bronx County assistant district attorney who later served as deputy chief of the federal Organized Crime Strike Force in Newark.

In the Law Journal's January 2001 survey of the federal bench, Chesler earned the second-highest score -- 8.84 out of a possible 10 -- among the state's eight magistrates. He finished first in four categories and was just .11 behind the highest score.

Another potential GOP nominee is Linares, who went on the bench last December. Linares practiced personal injury law, primarily medical malpractice and product liability cases, before his nomination by Gov. Christine Todd Whitman. He was active with the Essex County Bar Association.

Cuban-born, Linares is also a former president of the New Jersey Hispanic Bar Association. This is seen by some as a plus with the Bush White House, which has been making special efforts to court the Hispanic vote for the 2004 election.

The names of two other federal magistrates are also being floated as potential nominees to move up the district court: Republican Robert Kugler and Democrat John Hughes.

Logjam in Washington

Nationally, there are 30 circuit court and 75 district court vacancies, for a vacancy rate of 12.32 percent.

However, the White House has been much more aggressive in sending to the Senate nominations for the circuit courts where case law is written, as opposed to the district courts.

As of last week, the Senate Judiciary Committee had 22 pending circuit court nominations for confirmation to those 30 vacancies. By contrast, there were only 32 pending nominations before the committee to fill the 75 district slots.

Put another way, the White House has moved on more than 73 percent of the current circuit vacancies, but only 42.7 percent of the current district vacancies. And obviously, there have been no nominations for New Jersey. Even the Third Circuit vacancy created by Greenberg's departure is now 16 months old, in large measure because the Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee never moved on the nomination of U.S. District Judge Stephen Orlofsky to move up to the Third Circuit.

And while the noncontroversial candidates will eventually get a hearing, Democrats are prepared to do battle over nominations, particularly for circuit seats, that they perceive as too ideological or conservative.

Within hours after Vermont's Sen. Jim Jeffords gave the Democrats control of the Senate last May by switching from being a Republican to being an Independent, Torricelli bragged, "This isn't about a single Senate seat ... it's about the federal judiciary."

So, while the committee is moving names and the Senate is confirming -- a circuit court and a district court nominee both received Senate confirmation on Oct. 10 -- nominations for New Jersey's district bench will most probably have to get in a long line.

The fact that Torricelli no longer sits on the Judiciary Committee, where he used to be able to expedite New Jersey candidates because of a good relationship with Utah Republican Orin Hatch, then committee chairman, doesn't help.

Three additional factors could combine to keep New Jersey with five vacancies.

First, there are many judges around the country who have indicated they will retire soon, leading to a bigger backlog in the process. Second, 40 vacancies around the nation have been declared judicial emergencies by the U.S. Judicial Conference, giving those vacancies a higher priority. Third, the caseload nationwide is growing, with 320,200 district cases and 56,600 circuit cases added over the past year, according to court figures.

"Nothing is happening," says one lawyer who has been following the judicial appointments process, while another lawyer agrees, saying, "I haven't the slightest feeling D.C. is moving on district seats, not until they are done with the Third Circuit."

Assistant White House Counsel Rachel Brand, who has been involved in screening names for the New Jersey bench, says only, "We're aware of the issues, and vacancies, and we're working on them."

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge M. Christina Armijo, 50, of Las Vegas, N.M., was introduced to the committee Thursday by Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., who recommended Armijo to President Bush.

"I thought we were very well received," New Mexico's senior senator said by phone Thursday. Domenici said that he and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., got an opportunity to speak on Armijo's behalf. Armijo, accompanied by her mother and brother, also testified before the committee, Domenici said. The committee did not vote on whether to recommend to the full Senate that she be confirmed. No schedule was announced.

Domenici said the committee was told about her 22 years of law experience, including her service on the state appeals court since 1996, and about her family's long history in northern New Mexico. Armijo's grandfather, for instance, was a judge for 35 years, Domenici said.

"As she put it, her family has lived for 12 generations in New Mexico and lawyers and judges are part of the family tradition," Domenici said. "I concluded ... that she will be a fair yet firm judge and urged that her confirmation be done quickly. I am very enthusiastic we will have her within the next couple of weeks."

Domenici also said that he expects the confirmation of former New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Harris Hartz, whom Bush nominated for a post on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit, to go smoothly.

"There's an opportunity for contention on circuit judges, but I don't think that's going to be the case," Domenici said.

He also said he had "no idea why we won't have (William P.) 'Chip' Johnson on soon."

Johnson, a state district judge in Roswell, was nominated along with Armijo by Bush to become a U.S. district judge. Domenici recommended all three judges to Bush for the lifetime appointments.

Domenici said he assumes that it won't be too long before a U.S. district judge's post is created in Las Cruces, where immigration and drug cases overload the docket. Five U.S. district judges from Albuquerque and Santa Fe have been rotating to southern New Mexico to help with the caseload.

Reno Lawyer Hicks Looks for Quick Senate Confirmation as Judge

The Associated Press
Friday, October 19, 2001

Sens. Harry Reid and John Ensign said they are optimistic the Senate will confirm Reno lawyer Larry Hicks as a new federal judge in Nevada within the next two weeks. Hicks went before the

REV_00071031

Senate Judiciary Committee Thursday for a confirmation hearing on his appointment as a U.S. district court judge. Both Nevada senators spoke on his behalf.

Hicks worked in the Washoe County District Attorney's Office before he became a partner in one of Nevada's largest law firms - McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks. He's a past president of the state bar association's board of governors.

Senate Panel Approves Two State Judicial Nominees

By Jim Myers
Tulsa World
Friday, October 19, 2001

Two nominees for judicial posts in Oklahoma won Senate Judiciary Committee approval Thursday.

Nominations for U.S. Magistrates Claire V. Eagan of Tulsa and James P. Payne of Muskogee now head for confirmation by the full Senate, a vote that could take place next week. Eagan was nominated for a position in the state's northern district, while Payne will divide his time among Oklahoma's three districts.

Meanwhile, the Senate panel held a hearing for a third Oklahoman, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma City. Friot, 54, is headed for a slot in the western district.

Responding to questions by a panel of senators, Friot vowed to uphold Americans' right to privacy and a woman's right to an abortion as defined by the U.S. Supreme Court. Only the Supreme Court can undo one of its previous rulings, he testified.

Asked about the controversial practice of racial profiling and whether judges could do more to respond to that issue, Friot referred to a body of law he said addressed selective prosecution.

He said in response to a question about whether he would be a strict constructionist that he would not be limited to one narrow approach but instead would look for a guidance from a number of sources.

President Bush nominated the three Oklahomans at the recommendation of the state's two senators, Republicans Don Nickles and Jim Inhofe.

These individuals are exceptionally well-qualified and will prove to be great assets to the judicial system in Oklahoma and our country," Nickles said.

A fourth judicial nominee, Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Heaton of Oklahoma, is awaiting his confirmation hearing.

Senate Panel Oks Four Judges

By Audrey Hudson
The Washington Times
Friday, October 19, 2001

Four district judges were unanimously approved yesterday by the Senate Judiciary Committee after Republicans complained that President Bush's nominees were being treated unfairly by Democrats.

Republicans are insisting that the 44 judges nominated by Mr. Bush before the August recess be voted on before Congress adjourns for the year. To date, eight judges have been confirmed.

"It's a good step in the right direction, but it doesn't make much of a dent," Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, said after the vote.

Minority Leader Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, is blocking a spending bill for foreign operations to force a vote on the pending judges.

Committee negotiations were halted after an anthrax attack on Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle's office Monday exposed staffers and Capitol Police officers; a total of 31 persons.

"We've not been able to discuss the judges for obvious reasons," said Mr. Lott, who predicted that a vote to move forward on the spending bill Tuesday would fail.

The committee unanimously passed without debate Karen K. Caldwell as U.S. district judge for the Eastern District of Kentucky; Laurie Smith Camp as U.S. district judge for the District of Nebraska; Claire V. Eagan as U.S. district judge for the Northern District of Oklahoma, and James H. Payne as U.S. district judge for the Northern, Eastern, and Western Districts of Oklahoma.

"It's a beginning, but let it not be something to pacify us and move on. That won't work," Sen. Larry E. Craig, Idaho Republican, said of yesterday's action.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, committee chairman and Vermont Democrat, said, "I am fully committed to the process of confirming judges and filling vacancies. I will not be pressured to proceed on nominees whose records are not complete to the satisfaction of this committee.

"It is painfully clear to me that in this time of national challenge, the message must be sent that the United States Senate should be working as a unified team to respond to the violent attacks against our country," Mr. Leahy said. "We should be avoiding petty partisanship. This is hardly the time

His plea did not prevent Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, from calling Republicans

"phonies" for saying Mr. Bush's nominees were being treated unfairly by Democrats.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, told the committee he will bring a measure to the floor forcing a vote on the nominees.

The committee also held hearings on the nominations of Charles W. Pickering Sr. for the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals; M. Christina Armijo for U.S. District Court for the District of New Mexico; Karon O. Bowdre to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Alabama; Stephen P. Friot for U.S. District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma, and Larry R. Hicks for U.S. District Court for the District of Nevada.

Moment of Decision for Law Enforcement

By Donald Lambro
The Washington Times
Monday, October 22, 2001

With America's homeland enduring the deadliest terrorist attacks in our history, every law enforcement weapon and tool at our disposal needs to be fully operational and running at peak performance.

Yet, incredibly, there is a gaping hole in the government's judicial defenses - the heart of the nation's law enforcement army - because of persistent and deliberate delays by the Senate Judiciary Committee to fill dozens of vacancies in our court system.

The courts are being inundated with law enforcement requests and cases. There are not enough judges to handle them all quickly. The dire result: dangerous backlogs and delays that prevent the swift and sure delivery of decisions needed to protect all of us from the threats that now loom over our country. Right now, there are at least 108 vacancies in our federal courts, including 30 posts that have been vacant for so long that federal judicial officials have classified them as "judicial emergencies."

With our law-enforcement agencies needing rapid-fire responses from the courts for a broad range of court-approved surveillance actions and other legal requests in their war on the murderous terrorists in our midst, this is no time for our court system to be operating at half-speed.

"We need federal judges monitoring and helping to support the anti-terrorism efforts and law-enforcement requests from the various agencies of government," Senate Republican Leader Trent Lott of Mississippi told me.

"The Senate is at its lowest confirmation rate of federal judges in recent history, and we need to pick up the pace immediately," he said.

The man most responsible for this state of affairs is Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, a deeply partisan Vermont Democrat who Republicans say has been working overtime to hold up or at least slow down President Bush's judicial nominations.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the committee's ranking Republican, has been complaining about the lack of action by Mr. Leahy ever since Democrats took control of the Senate last July, when hearings on Mr. Bush's nominees virtually ground to a halt. At present, there are 52 judicial nominees who are trapped in Leahy limbo, 46 of whom have had no hearings.

Many of them have been fully approved by the American Bar Association, but not by Mr. Leahy and the Democratic members on his committee.

At the heart of the judicial dispute, as always, is ideology. After eight years of liberal appointments to the courts under the Clinton administration, Mr. Leahy and friends recoil at the prospect of eight years of more conservative judges who aren't as likely to let criminals go free on legal technicalities.

Hatch, Lott and other Republican senators have been complaining for months about the delays in the confirmation process, but without success. But then, in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the complaints began pouring out of the White House, the Justice Department and elsewhere in law enforcement and in intelligence circles.

That's when the backroom political struggle broke into open warfare on the Senate floor.

Declaring that they were ready "to play hardball" to get action on the judgeship nominees, Republicans blocked action last week on the foreign aid bill and said that it and other bills would not move until Mr. Leahy lifted his judicial blockade. Notably, Republican leaders said that the White House was fully behind their move.

But the battle really exploded into all-out warfare when Mr. Hatch told his colleagues at last Tuesday's closed Republican policy luncheon that Mr. Leahy had told him that any senator who voted to block the aid bill "would not get the federal judges from their state confirmed."

Enraged, Republican senators, including many who work with Mr. Leahy on the committee, rose at the meeting to excoriate the Vermonter, attacking him as a "vindictive partisan" bent on blocking President George W. Bush "anyway he can," according to my sources.

Mr. Leahy denied that he threatened retribution against Republican senators, but that is not the way Mr. Hatch tells it. "If anything, he Mr. Leahy was threatening. I've heard payback talk," Mr. Hatch said.

are moving at roughly the same pace under the Democrats as they did under Republican rule. In fact, Republicans moved 88 percent of Mr. Clinton's nominees in his first year in office, compared with a snail-paced 13 percent approval rate thus far in Mr. Bush's first year.

But finger pointing and comparisons to past senatorial records is irrelevant in the dangerous life-and-death struggle in which our country is now engaged.

This is a time when the United States needs all of its law enforcement resources fully staffed and working together against an elusive and deadly enemy that threatens our way of life.

It is certainly not a time for petty, left-leaning judicial politics, nor the usual time-consuming procedures. Mr. Leahy and Mr. Daschle need to get with the program and approve these nominees as soon as possible.

Take Action on Judicial Nominees

St. Petersburg Times
Saturday, October 20, 2001

When Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., was the ranking minority member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, he accused the committee chairman, Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, of stalling then-President Clinton's judicial nominations for political and ideological reasons.

Leahy was certainly justified in his criticism. With dozens of judgeships vacant, Hatch held up confirmation hearings for nominees he thought were too liberal and used his position as chairman to cut deals to get his own people federal judgeships. Now with Leahy sitting in the chairman's seat, Hatch and other Republicans are accusing the Democrats of stalling President Bush's nominations to the federal bench. What goes around comes around, as they say. Hatch, along with the other Republicans on the committee, sent a letter to Leahy earlier this month complaining about the slow pace of confirmation hearings and threatening to delay passage of a foreign-aid bill until the logjam is broken. So far, only eight of 60 Bush nominees have been confirmed and only 14 hearings have been held.

Meanwhile, the federal judiciary is being severely handicapped by this foot-dragging. It has 109 vacancies, about 13 percent of the bench, and a case backlog that has been building for more than a decade. With Congress insisting on federalizing more crimes every year, and the endless burden of federal drug cases, the federal judiciary couldn't keep its docket current even if it were at full strength.

There is no question that the vacancies need to be filled, and it is Leahy's duty to move the process along. Any nominees who are clearly outside the mainstream of current legal thought should be rejected. The Democrats are in the majority and can block Bush's worst choices. But it's time to pick up the pace. Confirmation hearings should be scheduled and votes should be taken. Both parties are hypocrites on this issue. Both are guilty of using obstructionist tactics to stall or defeat judicial nominees who are viewed as either too liberal or too conservative.

At some point, for the sake of the country, the partisan warfare over judicial nominations has to end. Vote them up, or vote them down. But it's time to start voting.

Justice Delayed

Omaha World-Herald
Friday, October 19, 2001

They're at it again. Senators are foot-dragging on approving federal judicial nominees. The last time we complained editorially about such procrastination, it was Republicans stalling Bill Clinton's choices. Now it seems to be mostly Democrats stiff-arming George W. Bush's. No matter. Whichever party is wielding the gavel, such lassitude ill-serves the public.

There are 110 openings on the federal bench, of which 39 have sat vacant so long that the judiciary has officially classified them as "judicial emergencies." President Bush has put forward 60 nominations - enough to fill just more than half of the vacancies. Of his 60, the Senate has approved:

Eight.

Senate Republicans, frustrated at the pace, have begun protesting by logjamming other legislation. One such measure is the foreign-aid bill that would free billions of dollars that directly or indirectly relate to pressing the fight against terrorism. Stalling a bill so crucial perhaps is a dubious tactic, but it is an attention-getter.

The federal judiciary has been short-handed for years because of such tactics, harming the quality and pace of the administration of justice. Democrats should loosen their hold on the Senate Judiciary Committee, just as in recent years it would have been the right thing for the Republicans to have done. (They didn't.)

We are not suggesting rubber-stamping nominees. Where legitimate objections arise, they should be taken seriously. But delaying appointments over predictable differences in ideology is a petty tactic, one that should have been discarded years ago. Let's get moving.

Fighting Over Judges

Minneapolis-St. Paul Star Tribune
Friday, October 19, 2001

For a moment, Sept. 11 seemed to change the way Washington works. It kindled a bipartisan fervor in the pettiest of political hearts, spurring even fierce foes to sing and legislate in unison. The magic couldn't last forever, of course, and it hasn't. This week the Senate is up to its old tricks, squabbling over judicial appointments. Not even Capitol Hill's anthrax panic has calmed this schoolyard scrap. Insisting that Democrats are dawdling on filling vacant judgeships, Senate

Republicans are holding up a crucial foreign-aid bill. They say they won't allow a vote on it until Democrats promise to approve a throng of President Bush's judicial nominees.

Coming from the folks who spent eight years blocking Bill Clinton's judicial appointments, this procrastination charge is a little amusing. It's also baffling, for there's no proof that Democrats have been stalling. Republicans controlled the Senate during the first four months of the Bush administration and held not a single judicial-confirmation hearing. Democrats took over only in June and have approved eight nominees in the months since. They're preparing to examine and approve more soon.

But as new chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., notes, the Senate Judiciary Committee hasn't exactly been sloughing off under Democratic leadership. In the weeks before the August recess it expedited confirmations for numerous judges and several high executive-branch nominees. Less than a week after the break's end came the terrible havoc of Sept. 11 - and the flood of emergency lawmaking it unleashed.

So if the confirmation process is backed up, it's hard to see how Democrats can be blamed. Whatever problem exists is more likely due to the confluence of a power shift and a tragedy. But even if Democrats had adopted the GOP's old obstructionist tactics, the current Republican filibuster wouldn't be justified at all. Its unbecoming purpose is to bully the Judiciary Committee into rubber-stamping judicial candidates before taking time to assess them. That's a deal the Democrats ought to refuse.

If the Republicans' demand is unreasonable, their tactic is outrageous. The foreign-aid measure they're blocking may be the most important bit of legislation on Capitol Hill right now. Indeed, it's not too much to say that its passage is the Senate's patriotic duty.

This is the bill, after all, that can show a shaken world that Americans are givers - that they're eager to help their struggling neighbors overseas. As the United States drops bombs on Kabul, it's essential to prove that point.

Why should Republicans want to contradict it? Holding up the $15.5 billion foreign-aid bill will do nothing to get judges onto the bench. All it will do is slow the flow of humanitarian relief and military support to U.S. allies in the war against terrorism. Surely Republicans aren't really against helping refugees, fighting disease and strengthening democracies around the world. Since they're not, they ought to loosen their grip on the foreign-aid bill. It promises to buy health and life for faraway friends - and perhaps a glimmering of good will for the United States.

Leahy Doctrine Ensures Judicial Gridlock

The Washington Times
Monday, October 22, 2001

The war over the nation's judiciary is a familiar battleground, but one whose recent skirmishes are failing to generate the usual noise and headlines. Maybe it's because of the unexpected camouflage of the war on terrorism that Senate Democrats are now unleashing a kind of ferocity and vindictiveness which just doesn't seem to count as "politics-as-usual" anymore.

Call it the Leahy doctrine. Jealously guarding the political logjam that is keeping nearly all of President Bush's nominations from the federal bench, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy seems to be following a strategy to prevent any appeals court nominee committed to the legal doctrine of judicial restraint from even having a hearing, let alone a floor vote. The deadlock over the D.C. Court of Appeals offers a case in point. Now down to eight active judges, the circuit requires 10 active judges to carry its workload. Following Judge Stephen Williams' decision to retire from active service, Chief Judge Douglas H. Ginsberg informed Mr. Leahy and Sen. Charles E. Schumer in August that, without the confirmation of two new judges by Sept. 30, "the court will likely find it necessary to delay until next term September 2002-June 2003 hearing cases that would otherwise be argued and decided this winter and spring." Mr. Bush has already named two conservative nominees with sterling credentials to the D.C. circuit, Miguel Estrada and John Roberts. So, what has Mr. Leahy done about these two excellent nominees for those two urgent vacancies? Zip.

Senate Republicans are now taking action. With "the full backing" of the White House - as this newspaper's Donald Lambro reported, quoting a Senate Republican leadership official - they have devised a tough strategy to force Senate Democrats to break up the Leahy logjam. Republicans hope that, by blocking action on the foreign aid bill and other legislation, they can make Senate Democrats move on the 52 judges Mr. Bush has nominated, 44 of whom were named before the August recess, including Messrs. Estrada and Roberts.

To date, only eight of the president's nominees have been confirmed. This works out to a measly 15 percent confirmation rate for the president - not too good compared with his predecessors' success rates of 93 percent and up. No wonder the White House supports playing "hardball" against Mr. Leahy's nasty stall strategy. As the Republican leadership official explained, the White House is "concerned that the holdup of these nominees threatens the war on terrorism, because these judicial vacancies need to be filled as soon as possible to act on law-enforcement requests."

So, the Senate war relates back to the terrorism war, after all. Even so, and despite 108 vacancies in the federal judiciary (with 39 of them classified as "judicial emergencies"), all Mr. Leahy and his staff seem to do about it is keep the logjam in place. According to Sen. Orrin Hatch, Mr. Leahy has been "pretty irritated, and not in the mood to be helpful. If anything," he added, "he was threatening. I've heard payback talk."

Frankly, this sounds more like "The Sopranos" than the U.S. Senate. Mr. Hatch went on to say that Mr. Leahy told him that any Republican voting against the foreign aid bill "would not get the federal judges from their state confirmed." While Mr. Leahy has denied Mr. Hatch's charge - one senator's word against another - he hasn't gone so far as to deny a corroborating charge leveled by two Colorado Republicans, Sens. Wayne Allard and Ben Nighthorse Campbell. They told Roll Call that, in response to their recent request to expedite hearings for three nominees from their state, Mr. Leahy asked about their votes on the foreign aid bill. "If I go ahead and vote for cloture, you'd move my judges to the top?" Mr. Allard recalled asking Mr. Leahy. "He said, 'Yep.' " His staff actually suggested Mr. Leahy's comments were meant as a joke.

Ha ha. But who gets the last laugh? On Thursday, four district judges were unanimously approved by the committee, so maybe the Republicans' tactics are working. But there is much more to do. Scores of able judges are still waiting to don their robes. The spiteful partisanship of Mr. Leahy shouldn't stand in their way.

PLEASE WRITE YOUR SENATOR AND ASK THEM TO OPPOSE THE NOMINATION OF LAURA CAMP!

Laurie Smith Camp, who is currently Nebraska's Chief Deputy Attorney General in charge of criminal matters, has been nominated for a seat on the federal bench.

Because she has been nominated for a district court position -- i.e. trial level -- she is unlikely to encounter opposition.

However, several aspects of her professional record cause concern, and we wanted to share two, in particular, with you.

During her testimony against a bill that would have banned executions of mentally retarded

people in Nebraska, Camp first asserted that no such law was necessary, as the current law assured fairness in capital cases. When pressed, Camp admitted that the current law did not prohibit the execution of the mentally retarded, but she repeated the assertion of the fairness of Nebraska law and then went so far as to claim that banning such executions would be an affront to the retarded: "I believe LB 1266 [the bill that would ban the executions] is an insult to retarded people.

They have the ability to tell right from wrong. That's not a matter of IQ. Some people have high IQs - but low moral IQs. There are a lot of people on death row with very high IQs."

This statement, and her position on this issue overall, suggests that she is far out of the mainstream and supports a position opposed by the vast majority of Americans, including those who support the death penalty in general.

In addition, she supported a bill that would require, rather than permit, juveniles accused of violent crimes to be tried and sentenced as adults.

Attorney general Don Stenberg, who had, along with Omaha Mayor Daub, endorsed the bill as an "anti-crime" measure, asserted that it would help law enforcement officials deal with "the violent juveniles of today."

As we said, opposition to a district court nominee is not common. In this case, however, we feel that it is important that the Senators who will vote on whether to give Camp a lifetime appointment to a federal court must be fully informed about her background and views and must carefully consider these issues when voting. We are asking you to call, email or write your Senator asking them to vote against Laurie Smith Camp's confirmation. If you need any information on how to reach your senator, please email ksderby@afj.org.

GOP Wants Judge Picks Confirmed; Democrats Accused of Dragging Their Feet

Neil Lewis
The New York Times
Sunday, October 21, 2001

Senate Republicans are engaged in a full-scale campaign to press Democrats to confirm President Bush's judicial nominees quickly, with some asserting that a failure to do so could harm the war on terrorism.

With more than 100 vacancies on the federal bench -- about 12 percent of the total judgeships -- Republicans argue that Democrats have slowed the confirmation process to avoid approving Bush's choices, many of whom are staunch conservatives.

In a late-night debate on anti-terrorism legislation in the Senate this month, the Republicans took an unusual break from the business at hand to make speeches saying that the Democrats were delaying action on Bush's judicial nominees.

Over the next several days, the Republicans pressed the Democrats to move quickly on the Bush nominees. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said, "Anyone who is interested in helping the president in the war on terrorism should support the president's judicial nominees."

Asked to explain, Hatch argued that a federal bench that was less than full strength could not process warrants and subpoenas aimed at terrorists as quickly as it should. He acknowledged, however, that there was no evidence of a slowdown in the consideration of such matters.

This is all infuriating to the Democrats, who spent the last years of the Clinton administration arguing that Republicans were slowing consideration of the nominees of a Democratic administration. Sen.
Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democrat whip, said there were so many vacancies because so many nominees of former President Bill Clinton had not been confirmed.

Each side has produced a wealth of statistics to demonstrate its own fine behavior on this issue and the other's perfidy.

Democrats have produced charts to show that, on the average, a Clinton nominee for a judgeship had to wait more than 330 days to get a hearing after being nominated. David Carle, a spokesman for Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said the average for Bush's nominees had been less than 100 days.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., a member of the committee, said in rebuttal that only eight, or 13.3 percent, of Bush's 60 nominees had been acted upon by the Senate. In the first year of the three previous administrations, almost all of the judicial nominees who were submitted to the Senate before the August recess were approved, Kyl said.

The numbers from both sides are usually fashioned from time periods that are not precisely comparable. The problem with the Democratic numbers generally is that they deal with the far longer period of Clinton's presidency, and the problem with the Republican numbers is that they generally deal with a short period in which first control of the Senate shifted, then Congress has been tied up with anti-terrorism bills.

GOP Slows Foreign Aid Bill to Speed Judicial Choices

By Joan Biskupic
USA Today
Monday, October 22, 2001

Senate Republicans have tried to speed up consideration of President Bush's judicial nominees by blocking action on a key foreign aid bill and by casting the need for more judges as critical in the fight against terrorism.

The clash last week, one of the first examples of partisan wrangling here since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, came as Capitol Hill was riveted by an anthrax scare. Another foreign aid bill vote is set for Tuesday. The dispute reflects the stakes in the battle over the makeup of the 862-seat federal bench, which has 110 vacancies and includes district courts that hear trials and the influential courts of appeals. There haven't been as many vacancies on the bench since March 1994, according to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

The bench makeup can make a vast difference in an array of individual rights. But with the new focus on terrorism, judges are likely to play an increasingly essential role in deciding how far police can go in conducting warrantless searches, determining whether certain immigrants should be deported and defining the breadth of civil liberties.

Determined to tilt federal courts to the right, the Bush administration has made judicial nominations much more of a priority than the Clinton administration. Early last week, GOP senators voted together to prevent floor consideration of a $ 15.6 billion foreign aid bill. They said they were protesting the slow pace of nomination hearings.

This year, the Senate has approved eight judges, and 52 names are pending, most from midsummer nominations. The pace of committee hearings has not been swift, but it also has not entailed record delays.

"Law enforcement is going to suffer" unless the Senate's pace in deciding judicial nominations picks up, says Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, pointing particularly to courts along the U.S.-Mexico border that are short-staffed. Hatch noted that some federal judges could end up handling key cases related to terrorism.

Neither Hatch, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, nor Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., would say whether the GOP would help move the foreign aid bill when it comes up for another vote Tuesday.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., says the panel is moving as quickly as possible on judges, and passage of the foreign aid bill is critical to the country's anti-terrorism efforts.

The proposal would send $ 5 billion in military and economic aid to U.S. allies in the Middle East and set aside hundreds of millions of dollars to detect infectious diseases overseas. "It is absurd to hold these funds hostage when practically every day there is a report of a new case of anthrax," Leahy says.

Democrats have been slow to move on several of Bush's judicial nominations, particularly some conservative favorites.

Among the more controversial nominees are Jeffrey Sutton, a Columbus, Ohio, lawyer who is a strong states-rights advocate; University of Utah professor Paul Cassell, who is known particularly for his legal work against the Miranda rights that police read to suspects; and federal magistrate Terry Wooten, who was once a top aide to Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C.

Thursday, the Judiciary Committee recommended Senate approval of four nominees and held a hearing on five others, including U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi, who has been appointed to a three-state appeals court and is the father of U.S. Rep. Charles "Chip" Pickering, R-Miss.

Lott has been seeking a deal for votes on "a significant number" of nominees in the coming weeks.

Senate Committee Advances 2 Federal Judge Nominations

By Chris Casteel
The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee, meeting despite a shutdown of its hearing room, approved two Oklahomans for federal judgeships Thursday and heard from attorney Stephen P. Friot, who has been nominated for the federal bench in Oklahoma City.

Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, has been pushing the committee to move judicial nominations, including those from his state. He got some response Thursday as the committee reported to the full Senate the nominations of Claire V. Eagan to be a U.S. district judge in Tulsa and James P. Payne to be a U.S. district judge for the Muskogee and Tulsa regions.

Eagan is a U.S. magistrate in the Northern District, based in Tulsa, and Payne is a magistrate in the Eastern District, based in Muskogee.

"These individuals are exceptionally well-qualified and will prove to be great assets to the judicial system in Oklahoma and our country," Nickles, the Senate minority whip, said. "It is good news for Oklahoma that they are moving through the nomination process. I hope and expect they will be confirmed by the full Senate in short order."

REV_00071026

Friot's nomination is pending before the committee, as is the nomination of former U.S. Attorney Joe Heaton to be a U.S. district judge in Oklahoma City.

An aide to Nickles said none of the questions asked of Friot by the committee Thursday could be considered hostile or aggressive. Friot has been practicing law since 1972 and is a partner in the Oklahoma City firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum. He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association and an adjunct law professor at the University of Oklahoma.

Camp's Nomination Goes to the Full Senate

Omaha World-Herald
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted unanimously Thursday to recommend the nomination of Nebraskan Laurie Smith Camp to become a U.S. District Court Judge.

Thursday's vote should clear the way for easy confirmation by the full Senate, perhaps as early as next week. Once confirmed, Camp will become the first female federal judge in Nebraska. A longtime aide to Nebraska Attorney General Don Stenberg, she was appointed to the federal bench in June by President Bush.

Although some judicial nominations linger for months in the Senate, Camp had support from both of Nebraska's senators, Republican Chuck Hagel and Democrat Ben Nelson.

Camp will fill the vacancy created when Judge William Cambridge retired. She worked for 11 years as general counsel for the Nebraska Department of Corrections. In 1991, she joined Stenberg's staff. She is a graduate of Stanford University and the University of Nebraska College of Law.

A Bench Full of Holes; Vacancies in the N.J. Federal District Court Could Reach 30 Percent

By Tim O'Brien
New Jersey Law Journal
Friday, October 19, 2001

With U.S. District Judge Alfred Lechner Jr. leaving for private practice this month, New Jersey's district court is down by three judges. That's a vacancy rate of 17.7 percent, based on a full complement of 17 judges, and it could climb to almost 30 percent in the next three months.

Judge Nicholas Politan will be eligible to retire in mid-December, and two other district judges, Garrett Brown and William Bassler, are widely believed to be the leading candidates to take the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals seat that became available in June 2000 when Morton Greenberg took senior status. Two sources familiar with the process say Brown and Bassler have been interviewed by the White House counsel's office.

If Politan retires, and either Brown or Bassler moves up to the Third Circuit, the district court would be down to 12 judges, leaving five seats vacant. The current judge shortage isn't causing a calendar problem, according to John Bissell, who became chief judge in June when U.S. District Judge Anne Thompson retired. In part that's because the district has seven senior judges, most of whom carry substantial caseloads. Judges Thompson and John Lifland both went on senior status in June.

But the vacancies may not be filled for a long time. The combination of a Republican White House and a Democratic-controlled Senate has slowed confirmation hearings in the Senate Judiciary Committee. That, along with the slowdown of all appointments after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and President George Bush's stated priority of filling circuit vacancies first, will ensure the judicial pipeline will be sluggish at best.

Even when the White House agrees on a name, the FBI's background checks have been placed on a back burner as the agency puts its resources into the terrorist investigation.

New Jersey's nomination process is moving slower than many states due to the absence of a GOP leader with clout. Acting Gov. Donald DiFrancesco, the state's ranking Republican, is a lame duck, having decided not to run. The state's two senators, Robert Torricelli and Jon Corzine, are both Democrats.

Two sources familiar with the judge-picking process say that because of the political climate in the Senate -- Democrats have been itching for some payback for the loss of the presidency in the U.S. Supreme Court and eight years of what they perceive as GOP stall tactics on judicial nominations -- Torricelli and Corzine could get one or even two Democratic nominations.

That possibility is magnified by a mood in the Capitol to minimize partisan battles during the war on terrorism. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., earlier this month reiterated his position that noncontroversial nominations will move. Most of the fights have been over circuit seats, or in states where the two parties couldn't agree on names.

Who's in Contention

Three candidates are considered the strongest to fill the three existing vacancies: Magistrate Judge Stanley Chesler, McCarter & English partner William Greenberg and Essex County Superior Court Judge Jose Linares.

Greenberg, a Democrat, enjoys a good relationship with Torricelli. He was an assistant counsel under Gov. Richard Hughes and served as a commissioner of the State Commission of Investigations from 1982 to 1987. A well-regarded civil litigator, he is a past president of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America-NJ.

He is a big Democratic contributor. According to the Federal Election Commission and the state Commission, Greenberg and his wife have contributed $81,000 since 1998, primarily to the

Democrats.

That includes $47,000 to the Democratic National Committee and $10,000 to the State Democratic Committee. The contributions also include $4,000 to Torricelli, but none to Corzine, as Greenberg backed former Gov. Jim Florio against Corzine in the Senate Democratic primary last year. The Greenbergs gave Florio $4,000, the maximum contribution.

Greenberg, 58, is a retired brigadier general of the National Guard who has just volunteered to be reactivated. He is now serving as a special assistant for homeland security to the adjutant general of New Jersey's National Guard.

On the Republican side, a top candidate is Chesler, 54, who sits in Newark. Chesler, who has been on the bench for 14 years, is a former Bronx County assistant district attorney who later served as deputy chief of the federal Organized Crime Strike Force in Newark.

In the Law Journal's January 2001 survey of the federal bench, Chesler earned the second-highest score -- 8.84 out of a possible 10 -- among the state's eight magistrates. He finished first in four categories and was just .11 behind the highest score.

Another potential GOP nominee is Linares, who went on the bench last December. Linares practiced personal injury law, primarily medical malpractice and product liability cases, before his nomination by Gov. Christine Todd Whitman. He was active with the Essex County Bar Association.

Cuban-born, Linares is also a former president of the New Jersey Hispanic Bar Association. This is seen by some as a plus with the Bush White House, which has been making special efforts to court the Hispanic vote for the 2004 election.

The names of two other federal magistrates are also being floated as potential nominees to move up the district court: Republican Robert Kugler and Democrat John Hughes.

Logjam in Washington

Nationally, there are 30 circuit court and 75 district court vacancies, for a vacancy rate of 12.32 percent.

However, the White House has been much more aggressive in sending to the Senate nominations for the circuit courts where case law is written, as opposed to the district courts.

As of last week, the Senate Judiciary Committee had 22 pending circuit court nominations for confirmation to those 30 vacancies. By contrast, there were only 32 pending nominations before the committee to fill the 75 district slots.

Put another way, the White House has moved on more than 73 percent of the current circuit vacancies, but only 42.7 percent of the current district vacancies. And obviously, there have been no nominations for New Jersey. Even the Third Circuit vacancy created by Greenberg's departure is now 16 months old, in large measure because the Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee never moved on the nomination of U.S. District Judge Stephen Orlofsky to move up to the Third Circuit.

And while the noncontroversial candidates will eventually get a hearing, Democrats are prepared to do battle over nominations, particularly for circuit seats, that they perceive as too ideological or conservative.

Within hours after Vermont's Sen. Jim Jeffords gave the Democrats control of the Senate last May by switching from being a Republican to being an Independent, Torricelli bragged, "This isn't about a single Senate seat ... it's about the federal judiciary."

So, while the committee is moving names and the Senate is confirming -- a circuit court and a district court nominee both received Senate confirmation on Oct. 10 -- nominations for New Jersey's district bench will most probably have to get in a long line.

The fact that Torricelli no longer sits on the Judiciary Committee, where he used to be able to expedite New Jersey candidates because of a good relationship with Utah Republican Orin Hatch, then committee chairman, doesn't help.

Three additional factors could combine to keep New Jersey with five vacancies.

First, there are many judges around the country who have indicated they will retire soon, leading to a bigger backlog in the process. Second, 40 vacancies around the nation have been declared judicial emergencies by the U.S. Judicial Conference, giving those vacancies a higher priority. Third, the caseload nationwide is growing, with 320,200 district cases and 56,600 circuit cases added over the past year, according to court figures.

"Nothing is happening," says one lawyer who has been following the judicial appointments process, while another lawyer agrees, saying, "I haven't the slightest feeling D.C. is moving on district seats, not until they are done with the Third Circuit."

Assistant White House Counsel Rachel Brand, who has been involved in screening names for the New Jersey bench, says only, "We're aware of the issues, and vacancies, and we're working on them."

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge M. Christina Armijo, 50, of Las Vegas, N.M., was introduced to the committee Thursday by Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., who recommended Armijo to President Bush.

"I thought we were very well received," New Mexico's senior senator said by phone Thursday. Domenici said that he and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., got an opportunity to speak on Armijo's behalf. Armijo, accompanied by her mother and brother, also testified before the committee, Domenici said. The committee did not vote on whether to recommend to the full Senate that she be confirmed. No schedule was announced.

Domenici said the committee was told about her 22 years of law experience, including her service on the state appeals court since 1996, and about her family's long history in northern New Mexico. Armijo's grandfather, for instance, was a judge for 35 years, Domenici said.

"As she put it, her family has lived for 12 generations in New Mexico and lawyers and judges are part of the family tradition," Domenici said. "I concluded ... that she will be a fair yet firm judge and urged that her confirmation be done quickly. I am very enthusiastic we will have her within the next couple of weeks."

Domenici also said that he expects the confirmation of former New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Harris Hartz, whom Bush nominated for a post on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit, to go smoothly.

"There's an opportunity for contention on circuit judges, but I don't think that's going to be the case," Domenici said.

He also said he had "no idea why we won't have (William P.) 'Chip' Johnson on soon."

Johnson, a state district judge in Roswell, was nominated along with Armijo by Bush to become a U.S. district judge. Domenici recommended all three judges to Bush for the lifetime appointments.

Domenici said he assumes that it won't be too long before a U.S. district judge's post is created in Las Cruces, where immigration and drug cases overload the docket. Five U.S. district judges from Albuquerque and Santa Fe have been rotating to southern New Mexico to help with the caseload.

Reno Lawyer Hicks Looks for Quick Senate Confirmation as Judge

The Associated Press
Friday, October 19, 2001

Sens. Harry Reid and John Ensign said they are optimistic the Senate will confirm Reno lawyer Larry Hicks as a new federal judge in Nevada within the next two weeks. Hicks went before the

REV_00071054

Senate Judiciary Committee Thursday for a confirmation hearing on his appointment as a U.S. district court judge. Both Nevada senators spoke on his behalf.

Hicks worked in the Washoe County District Attorney's Office before he became a partner in one of Nevada's largest law firms - McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks. He's a past president of the state bar association's board of governors.

Senate Panel Approves Two State Judicial Nominees

By Jim Myers
Tulsa World
Friday, October 19, 2001

Two nominees for judicial posts in Oklahoma won Senate Judiciary Committee approval Thursday.

Nominations for U.S. Magistrates Claire V. Eagan of Tulsa and James P. Payne of Muskogee now head for confirmation by the full Senate, a vote that could take place next week. Eagan was nominated for a position in the state's northern district, while Payne will divide his time among Oklahoma's three districts.

Meanwhile, the Senate panel held a hearing for a third Oklahoman, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma City. Friot, 54, is headed for a slot in the western district.

Responding to questions by a panel of senators, Friot vowed to uphold Americans' right to privacy and a woman's right to an abortion as defined by the U.S. Supreme Court. Only the Supreme Court can undo one of its previous rulings, he testified.

Asked about the controversial practice of racial profiling and whether judges could do more to respond to that issue, Friot referred to a body of law he said addressed selective prosecution.

He said in response to a question about whether he would be a strict constructionist that he would not be limited to one narrow approach but instead would look for a guidance from a number of sources.

President Bush nominated the three Oklahomans at the recommendation of the state's two senators, Republicans Don Nickles and Jim Inhofe.

These individuals are exceptionally well-qualified and will prove to be great assets to the judicial system in Oklahoma and our country," Nickles said.

A fourth judicial nominee, Assistant U.S. Attorney Joe Heaton of Oklahoma, is awaiting his confirmation hearing.

Senate Panel Oks Four Judges

By Audrey Hudson
The Washington Times
Friday, October 19, 2001

Four district judges were unanimously approved yesterday by the Senate Judiciary Committee after Republicans complained that President Bush's nominees were being treated unfairly by Democrats.

Republicans are insisting that the 44 judges nominated by Mr. Bush before the August recess be voted on before Congress adjourns for the year. To date, eight judges have been confirmed.

"It's a good step in the right direction, but it doesn't make much of a dent," Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, Utah Republican, said after the vote.

Minority Leader Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, is blocking a spending bill for foreign operations to force a vote on the pending judges.

Committee negotiations were halted after an anthrax attack on Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle's office Monday exposed staffers and Capitol Police officers; a total of 31 persons.

"We've not been able to discuss the judges for obvious reasons," said Mr. Lott, who predicted that a vote to move forward on the spending bill Tuesday would fail.

The committee unanimously passed without debate Karen K. Caldwell as U.S. district judge for the Eastern District of Kentucky; Laurie Smith Camp as U.S. district judge for the District of Nebraska; Claire V. Eagan as U.S. district judge for the Northern District of Oklahoma, and James H. Payne as U.S. district judge for the Northern, Eastern, and Western Districts of Oklahoma.

"It's a beginning, but let it not be something to pacify us and move on. That won't work," Sen. Larry E. Craig, Idaho Republican, said of yesterday's action.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, committee chairman and Vermont Democrat, said, "I am fully committed to the process of confirming judges and filling vacancies. I will not be pressured to proceed on nominees whose records are not complete to the satisfaction of this committee.

"It is painfully clear to me that in this time of national challenge, the message must be sent that the United States Senate should be working as a unified team to respond to the violent attacks against our country," Mr. Leahy said. "We should be avoiding petty partisanship. This is hardly the time

His plea did not prevent Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, from calling Republicans

"phonies" for saying Mr. Bush's nominees were being treated unfairly by Democrats.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, told the committee he will bring a measure to the floor forcing a vote on the nominees.

The committee also held hearings on the nominations of Charles W. Pickering Sr. for the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals; M. Christina Armijo for U.S. District Court for the District of New Mexico; Karon O. Bowdre to the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Alabama; Stephen P. Friot for U.S. District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma, and Larry R. Hicks for U.S. District Court for the District of Nevada.

Op/Eds

Moment of Decision for Law Enforcement

By Donald Lambro
The Washington Times
Monday, October 22, 2001

With America's homeland enduring the deadliest terrorist attacks in our history, every law enforcement weapon and tool at our disposal needs to be fully operational and running at peak performance.

Yet, incredibly, there is a gaping hole in the government's judicial defenses - the heart of the nation's law enforcement army - because of persistent and deliberate delays by the Senate Judiciary Committee to fill dozens of vacancies in our court system.

The courts are being inundated with law enforcement requests and cases. There are not enough judges to handle them all quickly. The dire result: dangerous backlogs and delays that prevent the swift and sure delivery of decisions needed to protect all of us from the threats that now loom over our country. Right now, there are at least 108 vacancies in our federal courts, including 30 posts that have been vacant for so long that federal judicial officials have classified them as "judicial emergencies."

With our law-enforcement agencies needing rapid-fire responses from the courts for a broad range of court-approved surveillance actions and other legal requests in their war on the murderous terrorists in our midst, this is no time for our court system to be operating at half-speed.

"We need federal judges monitoring and helping to support the anti-terrorism efforts and law-enforcement requests from the various agencies of government," Senate Republican Leader Trent Lott of Mississippi told me.

"The Senate is at its lowest confirmation rate of federal judges in recent history, and we need to pick up the pace immediately," he said.

The man most responsible for this state of affairs is Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, a deeply partisan Vermont Democrat who Republicans say has been working overtime to hold up or at least slow down President Bush's judicial nominations.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the committee's ranking Republican, has been complaining about the lack of action by Mr. Leahy ever since Democrats took control of the Senate last July, when hearings on Mr. Bush's nominees virtually ground to a halt. At present, there are 52 judicial nominees who are trapped in Leahy limbo, 46 of whom have had no hearings.

Many of them have been fully approved by the American Bar Association, but not by Mr. Leahy and the Democratic members on his committee.

At the heart of the judicial dispute, as always, is ideology. After eight years of liberal appointments to the courts under the Clinton administration, Mr. Leahy and friends recoil at the prospect of eight years of more conservative judges who aren't as likely to let criminals go free on legal technicalities.

Hatch, Lott and other Republican senators have been complaining for months about the delays in the confirmation process, but without success. But then, in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the complaints began pouring out of the White House, the Justice Department and elsewhere in law enforcement and in intelligence circles.

That's when the backroom political struggle broke into open warfare on the Senate floor.

Declaring that they were ready "to play hardball" to get action on the judgeship nominees, Republicans blocked action last week on the foreign aid bill and said that it and other bills would not move until Mr. Leahy lifted his judicial blockade. Notably, Republican leaders said that the White House was fully behind their move.

But the battle really exploded into all-out warfare when Mr. Hatch told his colleagues at last Tuesday's closed Republican policy luncheon that Mr. Leahy had told him that any senator who voted to block the aid bill "would not get the federal judges from their state confirmed."

Enraged, Republican senators, including many who work with Mr. Leahy on the committee, rose at the meeting to excoriate the Vermonter, attacking him as a "vindictive partisan" bent on blocking President George W. Bush "anyway he can," according to my sources.

Mr. Leahy denied that he threatened retribution against Republican senators, but that is not the way Mr. Hatch tells it. "If anything, he Mr. Leahy was threatening. I've heard payback talk," Mr. Hatch said.

are moving at roughly the same pace under the Democrats as they did under Republican rule. In fact, Republicans moved 88 percent of Mr. Clinton's nominees in his first year in office, compared with a snail-paced 13 percent approval rate thus far in Mr. Bush's first year.

But finger pointing and comparisons to past senatorial records is irrelevant in the dangerous life-and-death struggle in which our country is now engaged.

This is a time when the United States needs all of its law enforcement resources fully staffed and working together against an elusive and deadly enemy that threatens our way of life.

It is certainly not a time for petty, left-leaning judicial politics, nor the usual time-consuming procedures. Mr. Leahy and Mr. Daschle need to get with the program and approve these nominees as soon as possible.

Take Action on Judicial Nominees

St. Petersburg Times
Saturday, October 20, 2001

When Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., was the ranking minority member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, he accused the committee chairman, Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, of stalling then-President Clinton's judicial nominations for political and ideological reasons.

Leahy was certainly justified in his criticism. With dozens of judgeships vacant, Hatch held up confirmation hearings for nominees he thought were too liberal and used his position as chairman to cut deals to get his own people federal judgeships. Now with Leahy sitting in the chairman's seat, Hatch and other Republicans are accusing the Democrats of stalling President Bush's nominations to the federal bench. What goes around comes around, as they say. Hatch, along with the other Republicans on the committee, sent a letter to Leahy earlier this month complaining about the slow pace of confirmation hearings and threatening to delay passage of a foreign-aid bill until the logjam is broken. So far, only eight of 60 Bush nominees have been confirmed and only 14 hearings have been held.

Meanwhile, the federal judiciary is being severely handicapped by this foot-dragging. It has 109 vacancies, about 13 percent of the bench, and a case backlog that has been building for more than a decade. With Congress insisting on federalizing more crimes every year, and the endless burden of federal drug cases, the federal judiciary couldn't keep its docket current even if it were at full strength.

There is no question that the vacancies need to be filled, and it is Leahy's duty to move the process along. Any nominees who are clearly outside the mainstream of current legal thought should be rejected. The Democrats are in the majority and can block Bush's worst choices. But it's time to pick up the pace. Confirmation hearings should be scheduled and votes should be taken. Both parties are hypocrites on this issue. Both are guilty of using obstructionist tactics to stall or defeat judicial nominees who are viewed as either too liberal or too conservative.

At some point, for the sake of the country, the partisan warfare over judicial nominations has to end. Vote them up, or vote them down. But it's time to start voting.

Justice Delayed

Omaha World-Herald
Friday, October 19, 2001

They're at it again. Senators are foot-dragging on approving federal judicial nominees. The last time we complained editorially about such procrastination, it was Republicans stalling Bill Clinton's choices. Now it seems to be mostly Democrats stiff-arming George W. Bush's. No matter. Whichever party is wielding the gavel, such lassitude ill-serves the public.

There are 110 openings on the federal bench, of which 39 have sat vacant so long that the judiciary has officially classified them as "judicial emergencies." President Bush has put forward 60 nominations - enough to fill just more than half of the vacancies. Of his 60, the Senate has approved:

Eight.

Senate Republicans, frustrated at the pace, have begun protesting by logjamming other legislation. One such measure is the foreign-aid bill that would free billions of dollars that directly or indirectly relate to pressing the fight against terrorism. Stalling a bill so crucial perhaps is a dubious tactic, but it is an attention-getter.

The federal judiciary has been short-handed for years because of such tactics, harming the quality and pace of the administration of justice. Democrats should loosen their hold on the Senate Judiciary Committee, just as in recent years it would have been the right thing for the Republicans to have done. (They didn't.)

We are not suggesting rubber-stamping nominees. Where legitimate objections arise, they should be taken seriously. But delaying appointments over predictable differences in ideology is a petty tactic, one that should have been discarded years ago. Let's get moving.

Fighting Over Judges

Minneapolis-St. Paul Star Tribune
Friday, October 19, 2001

For a moment, Sept. 11 seemed to change the way Washington works. It kindled a bipartisan fervor in the pettiest of political hearts, spurring even fierce foes to sing and legislate in unison. The magic couldn't last forever, of course, and it hasn't. This week the Senate is up to its old tricks, squabbling over judicial appointments. Not even Capitol Hill's anthrax panic has calmed this schoolyard scrap. Insisting that Democrats are dawdling on filling vacant judgeships, Senate

REV_00071060

Republicans are holding up a crucial foreign-aid bill. They say they won't allow a vote on it until Democrats promise to approve a throng of President Bush's judicial nominees.

Coming from the folks who spent eight years blocking Bill Clinton's judicial appointments, this procrastination charge is a little amusing. It's also baffling, for there's no proof that Democrats have been stalling. Republicans controlled the Senate during the first four months of the Bush administration and held not a single judicial-confirmation hearing. Democrats took over only in June and have approved eight nominees in the months since. They're preparing to examine and approve more soon.

But as new chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., notes, the Senate Judiciary Committee hasn't exactly been sloughing off under Democratic leadership. In the weeks before the August recess it expedited confirmations for numerous judges and several high executive-branch nominees. Less than a week after the break's end came the terrible havoc of Sept. 11 - and the flood of emergency lawmaking it unleashed.

So if the confirmation process is backed up, it's hard to see how Democrats can be blamed. Whatever problem exists is more likely due to the confluence of a power shift and a tragedy. But even if Democrats had adopted the GOP's old obstructionist tactics, the current Republican filibuster wouldn't be justified at all. Its unbecoming purpose is to bully the Judiciary Committee into rubber-stamping judicial candidates before taking time to assess them. That's a deal the Democrats ought to refuse.

If the Republicans' demand is unreasonable, their tactic is outrageous. The foreign-aid measure they're blocking may be the most important bit of legislation on Capitol Hill right now. Indeed, it's not too much to say that its passage is the Senate's patriotic duty.

This is the bill, after all, that can show a shaken world that Americans are givers - that they're eager to help their struggling neighbors overseas. As the United States drops bombs on Kabul, it's essential to prove that point.

Why should Republicans want to contradict it? Holding up the $15.5 billion foreign-aid bill will do nothing to get judges onto the bench. All it will do is slow the flow of humanitarian relief and military support to U.S. allies in the war against terrorism. Surely Republicans aren't really against helping refugees, fighting disease and strengthening democracies around the world. Since they're not, they ought to loosen their grip on the foreign-aid bill. It promises to buy health and life for faraway friends - and perhaps a glimmering of good will for the United States.

Leahy Doctrine Ensures Judicial Gridlock

The Washington Times
Monday, October 22, 2001

The war over the nation's judiciary is a familiar battleground, but one whose recent skirmishes are failing to generate the usual noise and headlines. Maybe it's because of the unexpected camouflage of the war on terrorism that Senate Democrats are now unleashing a kind of ferocity and vindictiveness which just doesn't seem to count as "politics-as-usual" anymore.

Call it the Leahy doctrine. Jealously guarding the political logjam that is keeping nearly all of President Bush's nominations from the federal bench, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy seems to be following a strategy to prevent any appeals court nominee committed to the legal doctrine of judicial restraint from even having a hearing, let alone a floor vote. The deadlock over the D.C. Court of Appeals offers a case in point. Now down to eight active judges, the circuit requires 10 active judges to carry its workload. Following Judge Stephen Williams' decision to retire from active service, Chief Judge Douglas H. Ginsberg informed Mr. Leahy and Sen. Charles E. Schumer in August that, without the confirmation of two new judges by Sept. 30, "the court will likely find it necessary to delay until next term September 2002-June 2003 hearing cases that would otherwise be argued and decided this winter and spring." Mr. Bush has already named two conservative nominees with sterling credentials to the D.C. circuit, Miguel Estrada and John Roberts. So, what has Mr. Leahy done about these two excellent nominees for those two urgent vacancies? Zip.

Senate Republicans are now taking action. With "the full backing" of the White House - as this newspaper's Donald Lambro reported, quoting a Senate Republican leadership official - they have devised a tough strategy to force Senate Democrats to break up the Leahy logjam. Republicans hope that, by blocking action on the foreign aid bill and other legislation, they can make Senate Democrats move on the 52 judges Mr. Bush has nominated, 44 of whom were named before the August recess, including Messrs. Estrada and Roberts.

To date, only eight of the president's nominees have been confirmed. This works out to a measly 15 percent confirmation rate for the president - not too good compared with his predecessors' success rates of 93 percent and up. No wonder the White House supports playing "hardball" against Mr. Leahy's nasty stall strategy. As the Republican leadership official explained, the White House is "concerned that the holdup of these nominees threatens the war on terrorism, because these judicial vacancies need to be filled as soon as possible to act on law-enforcement requests."

So, the Senate war relates back to the terrorism war, after all. Even so, and despite 108 vacancies in the federal judiciary (with 39 of them classified as "judicial emergencies"), all Mr. Leahy and his staff seem to do about it is keep the logjam in place. According to Sen. Orrin Hatch, Mr. Leahy has been "pretty irritated, and not in the mood to be helpful. If anything," he added, "he was threatening. I've heard payback talk."

Frankly, this sounds more like "The Sopranos" than the U.S. Senate. Mr. Hatch went on to say that Mr. Leahy told him that any Republican voting against the foreign aid bill "would not get the federal judges from their state confirmed." While Mr. Leahy has denied Mr. Hatch's charge - one senator's word against another - he hasn't gone so far as to deny a corroborating charge leveled by two Colorado Republicans, Sens. Wayne Allard and Ben Nighthorse Campbell. They told Roll Call that, in response to their recent request to expedite hearings for three nominees from their state, Mr. Leahy asked about their votes on the foreign aid bill. "If I go ahead and vote for cloture, you'd move my judges to the top?" Mr. Allard recalled asking Mr. Leahy. "He said, 'Yep.' " His staff actually suggested Mr. Leahy's comments were meant as a joke.

Ha ha. But who gets the last laugh? On Thursday, four district judges were unanimously approved by the committee, so maybe the Republicans' tactics are working. But there is much more to do. Scores of able judges are still waiting to don their robes. The spiteful partisanship of Mr. Leahy shouldn't stand in their way.

PLEASE WRITE YOUR SENATOR AND ASK THEM TO OPPOSE THE NOMINATION OF LAURA CAMP!

Laurie Smith Camp, who is currently Nebraska's Chief Deputy Attorney General in charge of criminal matters, has been nominated for a seat on the federal bench.

Because she has been nominated for a district court position -- i.e. trial level -- she is unlikely to encounter opposition.

However, several aspects of her professional record cause concern, and we wanted to share two, in particular, with you.

During her testimony against a bill that would have banned executions of mentally retarded

people in Nebraska, Camp first asserted that no such law was necessary, as the current law assured fairness in capital cases. When pressed, Camp admitted that the current law did not prohibit the execution of the mentally retarded, but she repeated the assertion of the fairness of Nebraska law and then went so far as to claim that banning such executions would be an affront to the retarded: "I believe LB 1266 [the bill that would ban the executions] is an insult to retarded people.

They have the ability to tell right from wrong. That's not a matter of IQ. Some people have high IQs - but low moral IQs. There are a lot of people on death row with very high IQs."

This statement, and her position on this issue overall, suggests that she is far out of the mainstream and supports a position opposed by the vast majority of Americans, including those who support the death penalty in general.

In addition, she supported a bill that would require, rather than permit, juveniles accused of violent crimes to be tried and sentenced as adults.

Attorney general Don Stenberg, who had, along with Omaha Mayor Daub, endorsed the bill as an "anti-crime" measure, asserted that it would help law enforcement officials deal with "the violent juveniles of today."

As we said, opposition to a district court nominee is not common. In this case, however, we feel that it is important that the Senators who will vote on whether to give Camp a lifetime appointment to a federal court must be fully informed about her background and views and must carefully consider these issues when voting. We are asking you to call, email or write your Senator asking them to vote against Laurie Smith Camp's confirmation. If you need any information on how to reach your senator, please email ksderby@afj.org.

GOP Wants Judge Picks Confirmed; Democrats Accused of Dragging Their Feet

Neil Lewis
The New York Times
Sunday, October 21, 2001

Senate Republicans are engaged in a full-scale campaign to press Democrats to confirm President Bush's judicial nominees quickly, with some asserting that a failure to do so could harm the war on terrorism.

With more than 100 vacancies on the federal bench -- about 12 percent of the total judgeships -- Republicans argue that Democrats have slowed the confirmation process to avoid approving Bush's choices, many of whom are staunch conservatives.

In a late-night debate on anti-terrorism legislation in the Senate this month, the Republicans took an unusual break from the business at hand to make speeches saying that the Democrats were delaying action on Bush's judicial nominees.

Over the next several days, the Republicans pressed the Democrats to move quickly on the Bush nominees. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said, "Anyone who is interested in helping the president in the war on terrorism should support the president's judicial nominees."

Asked to explain, Hatch argued that a federal bench that was less than full strength could not process warrants and subpoenas aimed at terrorists as quickly as it should. He acknowledged, however, that there was no evidence of a slowdown in the consideration of such matters.

This is all infuriating to the Democrats, who spent the last years of the Clinton administration arguing that Republicans were slowing consideration of the nominees of a Democratic administration. Sen.
Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democrat whip, said there were so many vacancies because so many nominees of former President Bill Clinton had not been confirmed.

Each side has produced a wealth of statistics to demonstrate its own fine behavior on this issue and the other's perfidy.

Democrats have produced charts to show that, on the average, a Clinton nominee for a judgeship had to wait more than 330 days to get a hearing after being nominated. David Carle, a spokesman for Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, said the average for Bush's nominees had been less than 100 days.

Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., a member of the committee, said in rebuttal that only eight, or 13.3 percent, of Bush's 60 nominees had been acted upon by the Senate. In the first year of the three previous administrations, almost all of the judicial nominees who were submitted to the Senate before the August recess were approved, Kyl said.

The numbers from both sides are usually fashioned from time periods that are not precisely comparable. The problem with the Democratic numbers generally is that they deal with the far longer period of Clinton's presidency, and the problem with the Republican numbers is that they generally deal with a short period in which first control of the Senate shifted, then Congress has been tied up with anti-terrorism bills.

GOP Slows Foreign Aid Bill to Speed Judicial Choices

By Joan Biskupic
USA Today
Monday, October 22, 2001

Senate Republicans have tried to speed up consideration of President Bush's judicial nominees by blocking action on a key foreign aid bill and by casting the need for more judges as critical in the fight against terrorism.

The clash last week, one of the first examples of partisan wrangling here since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, came as Capitol Hill was riveted by an anthrax scare. Another foreign aid bill vote is set for Tuesday. The dispute reflects the stakes in the battle over the makeup of the 862-seat federal bench, which has 110 vacancies and includes district courts that hear trials and the influential courts of appeals. There haven't been as many vacancies on the bench since March 1994, according to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts.

The bench makeup can make a vast difference in an array of individual rights. But with the new focus on terrorism, judges are likely to play an increasingly essential role in deciding how far police can go in conducting warrantless searches, determining whether certain immigrants should be deported and defining the breadth of civil liberties.

Determined to tilt federal courts to the right, the Bush administration has made judicial nominations much more of a priority than the Clinton administration. Early last week, GOP senators voted together to prevent floor consideration of a $ 15.6 billion foreign aid bill. They said they were protesting the slow pace of nomination hearings.

This year, the Senate has approved eight judges, and 52 names are pending, most from midsummer nominations. The pace of committee hearings has not been swift, but it also has not entailed record delays.

"Law enforcement is going to suffer" unless the Senate's pace in deciding judicial nominations picks up, says Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, pointing particularly to courts along the U.S.-Mexico border that are short-staffed. Hatch noted that some federal judges could end up handling key cases related to terrorism.

Neither Hatch, the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, nor Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss., would say whether the GOP would help move the foreign aid bill when it comes up for another vote Tuesday.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., says the panel is moving as quickly as possible on judges, and passage of the foreign aid bill is critical to the country's anti-terrorism efforts.

The proposal would send $ 5 billion in military and economic aid to U.S. allies in the Middle

REV_00071048

East and set aside hundreds of millions of dollars to detect infectious diseases overseas. "It is absurd to hold these funds hostage when practically every day there is a report of a new case of anthrax," Leahy says.

Democrats have been slow to move on several of Bush's judicial nominations, particularly some conservative favorites.

Among the more controversial nominees are Jeffrey Sutton, a Columbus, Ohio, lawyer who is a strong states-rights advocate; University of Utah professor Paul Cassell, who is known particularly for his legal work against the Miranda rights that police read to suspects; and federal magistrate Terry Wooten, who was once a top aide to Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C.

Thursday, the Judiciary Committee recommended Senate approval of four nominees and held a hearing on five others, including U.S. District Judge Charles Pickering of Mississippi, who has been appointed to a three-state appeals court and is the father of U.S. Rep. Charles "Chip" Pickering, R-Miss.

Lott has been seeking a deal for votes on "a significant number" of nominees in the coming weeks.

Senate Committee Advances 2 Federal Judge Nominations

By Chris Casteel
The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee, meeting despite a shutdown of its hearing room, approved two Oklahomans for federal judgeships Thursday and heard from attorney Stephen P. Friot, who has been nominated for the federal bench in Oklahoma City.

Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, has been pushing the committee to move judicial nominations, including those from his state. He got some response Thursday as the committee reported to the full Senate the nominations of Claire V. Eagan to be a U.S. district judge in Tulsa and James P. Payne to be a U.S. district judge for the Muskogee and Tulsa regions.

Eagan is a U.S. magistrate in the Northern District, based in Tulsa, and Payne is a magistrate in the Eastern District, based in Muskogee.

"These individuals are exceptionally well-qualified and will prove to be great assets to the judicial system in Oklahoma and our country," Nickles, the Senate minority whip, said. "It is good news for Oklahoma that they are moving through the nomination process. I hope and expect they will be confirmed by the full Senate in short order."

REV_00071049

Friot's nomination is pending before the committee, as is the nomination of former U.S. Attorney Joe Heaton to be a U.S. district judge in Oklahoma City.

An aide to Nickles said none of the questions asked of Friot by the committee Thursday could be considered hostile or aggressive. Friot has been practicing law since 1972 and is a partner in the Oklahoma City firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum. He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association and an adjunct law professor at the University of Oklahoma.

Camp's Nomination Goes to the Full Senate

Omaha World-Herald
Friday, October 19, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted unanimously Thursday to recommend the nomination of Nebraskan Laurie Smith Camp to become a U.S. District Court Judge.

Thursday's vote should clear the way for easy confirmation by the full Senate, perhaps as early as next week. Once confirmed, Camp will become the first female federal judge in Nebraska. A longtime aide to Nebraska Attorney General Don Stenberg, she was appointed to the federal bench in June by President Bush.

Although some judicial nominations linger for months in the Senate, Camp had support from both of Nebraska's senators, Republican Chuck Hagel and Democrat Ben Nelson.

Camp will fill the vacancy created when Judge William Cambridge retired. She worked for 11 years as general counsel for the Nebraska Department of Corrections. In 1991, she joined Stenberg's staff. She is a graduate of Stanford University and the University of Nebraska College of Law.

A Bench Full of Holes; Vacancies in the N.J. Federal District Court Could Reach 30 Percent

By Tim O'Brien
New Jersey Law Journal
Friday, October 19, 2001

With U.S. District Judge Alfred Lechner Jr. leaving for private practice this month, New Jersey's district court is down by three judges. That's a vacancy rate of 17.7 percent, based on a full complement of 17 judges, and it could climb to almost 30 percent in the next three months.

Judge Nicholas Politan will be eligible to retire in mid-December, and two other district judges, Garrett Brown and William Bassler, are widely believed to be the leading candidates to take the Third U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals seat that became available in June 2000 when Morton Greenberg took senior status. Two sources familiar with the process say Brown and Bassler have been interviewed by the White House counsel's office.

If Politan retires, and either Brown or Bassler moves up to the Third Circuit, the district court would be down to 12 judges, leaving five seats vacant. The current judge shortage isn't causing a calendar problem, according to John Bissell, who became chief judge in June when U.S. District Judge Anne Thompson retired. In part that's because the district has seven senior judges, most of whom carry substantial caseloads. Judges Thompson and John Lifland both went on senior status in June.

But the vacancies may not be filled for a long time. The combination of a Republican White House and a Democratic-controlled Senate has slowed confirmation hearings in the Senate Judiciary Committee. That, along with the slowdown of all appointments after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and President George Bush's stated priority of filling circuit vacancies first, will ensure the judicial pipeline will be sluggish at best.

Even when the White House agrees on a name, the FBI's background checks have been placed on a back burner as the agency puts its resources into the terrorist investigation.

New Jersey's nomination process is moving slower than many states due to the absence of a GOP leader with clout. Acting Gov. Donald DiFrancesco, the state's ranking Republican, is a lame duck, having decided not to run. The state's two senators, Robert Torricelli and Jon Corzine, are both Democrats.

Two sources familiar with the judge-picking process say that because of the political climate in the Senate -- Democrats have been itching for some payback for the loss of the presidency in the U.S. Supreme Court and eight years of what they perceive as GOP stall tactics on judicial nominations -- Torricelli and Corzine could get one or even two Democratic nominations.

That possibility is magnified by a mood in the Capitol to minimize partisan battles during the war on terrorism. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., earlier this month reiterated his position that noncontroversial nominations will move. Most of the fights have been over circuit seats, or in states where the two parties couldn't agree on names.

Who's in Contention

Three candidates are considered the strongest to fill the three existing vacancies: Magistrate Judge Stanley Chesler, McCarter & English partner William Greenberg and Essex County Superior Court Judge Jose Linares.

Greenberg, a Democrat, enjoys a good relationship with Torricelli. He was an assistant counsel under Gov. Richard Hughes and served as a commissioner of the State Commission of Investigations from 1982 to 1987. A well-regarded civil litigator, he is a past president of the Association of Trial Lawyers of America-NJ.

He is a big Democratic contributor. According to the Federal Election Commission and the state Commission, Greenberg and his wife have contributed $81,000 since 1998, primarily to the

Democrats.

That includes $47,000 to the Democratic National Committee and $10,000 to the State Democratic Committee. The contributions also include $4,000 to Torricelli, but none to Corzine, as Greenberg backed former Gov. Jim Florio against Corzine in the Senate Democratic primary last year. The Greenbergs gave Florio $4,000, the maximum contribution.

Greenberg, 58, is a retired brigadier general of the National Guard who has just volunteered to be reactivated. He is now serving as a special assistant for homeland security to the adjutant general of New Jersey's National Guard.

On the Republican side, a top candidate is Chesler, 54, who sits in Newark. Chesler, who has been on the bench for 14 years, is a former Bronx County assistant district attorney who later served as deputy chief of the federal Organized Crime Strike Force in Newark.

In the Law Journal's January 2001 survey of the federal bench, Chesler earned the second-highest score -- 8.84 out of a possible 10 -- among the state's eight magistrates. He finished first in four categories and was just .11 behind the highest score.

Another potential GOP nominee is Linares, who went on the bench last December. Linares practiced personal injury law, primarily medical malpractice and product liability cases, before his nomination by Gov. Christine Todd Whitman. He was active with the Essex County Bar Association.

Cuban-born, Linares is also a former president of the New Jersey Hispanic Bar Association. This is seen by some as a plus with the Bush White House, which has been making special efforts to court the Hispanic vote for the 2004 election.

The names of two other federal magistrates are also being floated as potential nominees to move up the district court: Republican Robert Kugler and Democrat John Hughes.

Logjam in Washington

Nationally, there are 30 circuit court and 75 district court vacancies, for a vacancy rate of 12.32 percent.

However, the White House has been much more aggressive in sending to the Senate nominations for the circuit courts where case law is written, as opposed to the district courts.

As of last week, the Senate Judiciary Committee had 22 pending circuit court nominations for confirmation to those 30 vacancies. By contrast, there were only 32 pending nominations before the committee to fill the 75 district slots.

Put another way, the White House has moved on more than 73 percent of the current circuit vacancies, but only 42.7 percent of the current district vacancies. And obviously, there have been no nominations for New Jersey. Even the Third Circuit vacancy created by Greenberg's departure is now 16 months old, in large measure because the Republican-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee never moved on the nomination of U.S. District Judge Stephen Orlofsky to move up to the Third Circuit.

And while the noncontroversial candidates will eventually get a hearing, Democrats are prepared to do battle over nominations, particularly for circuit seats, that they perceive as too ideological or conservative.

Within hours after Vermont's Sen. Jim Jeffords gave the Democrats control of the Senate last May by switching from being a Republican to being an Independent, Torricelli bragged, "This isn't about a single Senate seat ... it's about the federal judiciary."

So, while the committee is moving names and the Senate is confirming -- a circuit court and a district court nominee both received Senate confirmation on Oct. 10 -- nominations for New Jersey's district bench will most probably have to get in a long line.

The fact that Torricelli no longer sits on the Judiciary Committee, where he used to be able to expedite New Jersey candidates because of a good relationship with Utah Republican Orin Hatch, then committee chairman, doesn't help.

Three additional factors could combine to keep New Jersey with five vacancies.

First, there are many judges around the country who have indicated they will retire soon, leading to a bigger backlog in the process. Second, 40 vacancies around the nation have been declared judicial emergencies by the U.S. Judicial Conference, giving those vacancies a higher priority. Third, the caseload nationwide is growing, with 320,200 district cases and 56,600 circuit cases added over the past year, according to court figures.

"Nothing is happening," says one lawyer who has been following the judicial appointments process, while another lawyer agrees, saying, "I haven't the slightest feeling D.C. is moving on district seats, not until they are done with the Third Circuit."

Assistant White House Counsel Rachel Brand, who has been involved in screening names for the New Jersey bench, says only, "We're aware of the issues, and vacancies, and we're working on them."

He just called me (right after our meeting) and described where they are. I explained my views and the issues I see. He said that the DOJ goal was to issue a general notice some time soon to trigger the comment period (after consulting further with Jay and us). The notice would essentially invite comment and input on general questions and topics rather than proposing specifics.

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

DON'T LEAVE FLOOR UNGUARDED, DASCHLE WARNS GOP AS JUDGES DISPUTE CONTINUES

By Emily Pierce and Mary Dalrymple, CQ Staff Writers

Oct. 23, 2001 - Republicans were warned Tuesday that they will have to adopt full-bore traditional filibuster tactics in order to continue to block an appropriations bill on the Senate floor.

After a cloture motion was defeated, 50-47, Tuesday morning, Majority Leader Tom Daschle, S.D., said Republicans will have to remain on the floor continuously in order to continue their filibuster on the motion to proceed to the $15.5 billion foreign operations appropriations measure (HR 2506).

Republicans are attempting to force the Democratic majority to confirm more of President Bush's judicial nominees.

Daschle told Republicans that unless they keep a senator on the floor to object to proceeding to the bill, he will make the motion in their absence.

"If for whatever reason senators choose to leave the floor and there is an opportunity for me to make that motion, it will be made," Daschle said.

Republicans were unmoved by Daschle's scheduling of confirmation votes Tuesday afternoon on four U.S. District Court nominees. They said U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals nominees continue to languish in the Judiciary Committee.

"We need a commitment to move more quickly," said Craig Thomas, R-Wyo.

Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., who has led the fight for more judicial confirmations, said 42 judicial nominees currently before the Judiciary Committee are "emergency nominations" that need to be confirmed quickly.

But Majority Whip Harry Reid, Nev., blasted Republicans for delaying the spending bill, which includes money for anthrax cleanup in Uzbekistan and for removal of land mines around the world. "We're going to win this. We're doing the right thing. We've moved as quickly as we could since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks," said Reid.

One Republican also expressed dismay at the appropriations roadblock. "We just don't have time for any further delay," said Appropriations Committee ranking Republican Ted Stevens, Alaska.

Stevens broke with other Senate Republicans by voting "present" on Tuesday's cloture motion.

Senate Republicans planned to discuss at their Tuesday luncheons the possibility of permitting Senate action on the $73.9 billion agriculture spending bill (HR 2330). Minority Leader Trent Lott, Miss., said "We're going to do the right thing. We hope that they will."

But Lott added, "I have seen no indication from [Judiciary Committee Chairman] Pat Leahy to really move forward with judges in a fair way."

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?

DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise

or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.

(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Our sympathies and prayers for all the anxiety sweeping the mail. We appreciate the leadership and statesmanship of our President and his Administration in these times. Heritage has, obviously, suspended distribution of anything by mail and we encourage you to share these URL sites with your colleagues who will not be getting these publications for some time. We hope to be of service. Thanks, Ginni

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Lowey Blow - A Democrat's uncivil words.
By John J. Miller & Ramesh Ponnuru

"To have Tom DeLay delay an airport security bill is immoral, is wrong, and it just doesn't make any sense," blustered Nita Lowey, a Democratic congresswoman from New York, in yesterday's Washington Post. It's immoral?
DeLay opposes a Senate-approved plan that would turn the nation's 28,000 airport baggage screeners into federal employees. His opposition may be wise
or unwise - we happen to think it's wise, on the grounds that private companies won't handle security the way the Post Office handles the mail - but it certainly isn't immoral.
(http://www.heritage.org/views/2001/ed101901b.html for an argument in favor of DeLay's position).

Subject: Pumpkin from Pres Bush

Alicia-
OK - this falls in the "odd request" category - but I promised my friend Linda McConchie that I would at least ASK the question:

"Could the White House/President Bush provide a patriotically carved pumpkin for an event in Boston next week?"

Here's all that I know about this event:

The Freedom Trail Foundation is co-sponsoring an event with the City of Boston and Mayor Menino on Monday evening, October 29th at Faneuil Hall. It is to raise money for the families of the victims of the September 11th terrorist attacks. The 'gimmick' is an auction of pumpkins carved by celebrities using patriotic themes. So far, they have pumpkins coming from Senator Kerry and Kennedy - and many of the Mass Congressional delegation; lots of media celeb's like Bob Lobel; a few entertainers and authors; and assorted other big wigs.

Linda McConchie is the Exec. Director of the Freedom Trail Foundation (which represents all 20 sites along the Freedom Trail including the ones owned by the Nat'l Parks, the City, Landmarks and several non-profit owned historic sites.) If this is possible, you will probably want to talk with her directly re: specifics and logistics. Her tel # is PRA 6

I don't know how these things work - but if you could get authorization for a surrogate pumpkin carver - Linda or I can round up a local person to do the actual carving in a tasteful design.

Thanks for considering this kind of unusual request - let me know via e-mail today if you can. As you know, I'm off to DC for the rest of the week.

Unfortunately, I cannot get my e-mail when I am not here at my desk.

Martha

I am going to speak to Whalen later today about some of the issues that we wanted them to look at in advance of tomorrow's CBO meeting (which you're welcome to attend).

Do you want me to loop you into the Whalen call?

I'm meeting at 6 today with my folks to look at some of the numbers that they've been able to generate using the hypotheticals I provided. Please join us if you want.

I can also fill you in on the CBO meeting yesterday if you want, and fill you in on the legal issues we're working on preempting in advance of our next CBO meeting.

I cannot. I have to be at a 2:00 DOJ prep session for a judge nominee whose hearing is Thursday. I could do 5:00 or after -- or could start at any time between 11:30 and 12:45 on Wednesday.

OK - this falls in the "odd request" category - but I promised my friend Linda McConchie that I would at least ASK the question:

"Could the White House/President Bush provide a patriotically carved pumpkin for an event in Boston next week?"

Here's all that I know about this event:

The Freedom Trail Foundation is co-sponsoring an event with the City of Boston and Mayor Menino on Monday evening, October 29th at Faneuil Hall. It is to raise money for the families of the victims of the September 11th terrorist attacks. The 'gimmick' is an auction of pumpkins carved by celebrities using patriotic themes. So far, they have pumpkins coming from Senator Kerry and Kennedy - and many of the Mass Congressional delegation; lots of media celeb's like Bob Lobel; a few entertainers and authors; and assorted other big wigs.

Linda McConchie is the Exec. Director of the Freedom Trail Foundation (which represents all 20 sites along the Freedom Trail including the ones owned by the Nat'l Parks, the City, Landmarks and several non-profit owned historic sites.) If this is possible, you will probably want to talk with her directly re: specifics and logistics. Her tel # is PRA 6

I don't know how these things work - but if you could get authorization for a surrogate pumpkin carver - Linda or I can round up a local person to do the actual carving in a tasteful design.

Thanks for considering this kind of unusual request - let me know via e-mail today if you can. As you know, I'm off to DC for the rest of the week. Unfortunately, I cannot get my e-mail when I am not here at my desk.

Mr. Kavanaugh,

I am happy to report that I have finished my review of documents held at HHS Center for Faith-Based & Community Initiatives, and have removed those documents which do not respond to the FOI request received from People for the American Way Foundation. Unless directed by you otherwise, I will authorize HHS's FOI Office to contact PFAW and arrange a time for PFAW to review the requested documents (it will take more than a day, if the job is done thoroughly). I will ask someone from the FOI Office to be present at all times with the PFAW representative, and to copy all the documents copied for PFAW.

I received a forwarded voice mail message from the ACLU representative to the FOI Office here at the Department of Justice. The message from ACLU clearly requested only a copy of the report we authored. Since this report has been readily available to the public for over 2 months through our public affairs office, we have no reason to deny it to the ACLU. We will similarly authorize the Departments of Labor and HUD to provide copies of their reports to the requestors. The Department of Education responded previously to the request it had received.

We will remain vigilant if the ACLU or PFAW seeks further documents from the 5 Centers for Faith-Based & Community Initiatives. It appears that for now, however, this matter is closed. If we do not hear from you, we will proceed as stated above.

Hi Jacquie! Terry's briefing this morning got me thinking about paper flow in general. Is there a way that someone from Counsel can brief us on the laws governing paper retention? I must admit to being unsure as to the legal requirements involved in the decision to file or burn bag.

Best regards,
Janet

Senate Committee Screens New Mexico Judicial Nominees

The Santa Fe New Mexican
Friday, October 26, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee screened two New Mexico judicial nominees Thursday, with neither Harris Hartz nor William P. "Chip" Johnson meeting much resistance from the panel.

REV_00071942

The nominations of Hartz to the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and Johnson to the U.S. District Court in New Mexico will be voted on by the committee at a later hearing. Christine Armijo's nomination to New Mexico's district bench is also pending.

Republicans have accused Democrats of foot-dragging in the judicial-confirmation process.

Hartz, who served on the New Mexico Court of Appeals from 1988 to 1999, was quizzed by Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., on his views on abortion rights, a judge's proper role in shaping law and his support of individual rights.

Hartz sidestepped most of the questions by saying that as a judge he would follow the lead of the Supreme Court.

If Hartz is approved by the committee and confirmed by the full Senate, he would join a 10th Circuit panel which hears appeals from New Mexico, Colorado, Kansas, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming.

Sens. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., praised Hartz's qualifications.

"While we know he would do wonderful things in New Mexico ... we're prepared today to share him with our country," said Domenici, who recommended President Bush nominate the Republican judge. "

Daschle Disses Dubya; Why the Majority Leader Told the President to get Lost

By Byron York
National Review Online
Friday, October 26, 2001

In a White House meeting this week, George W. Bush asked Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle to help speed up the Senate's slow-motion confirmations of Bush's judicial nominees. It was the perfect opportunity for Daschle to offer a few reassuring words. "Mr. President, we've been terribly busy working on terrorism measures," the majority leader might have said, "but we want to assure you we will do all we can to help." Perhaps Daschle might even have made a token effort to confirm a few nominees — a district judge or two — so he could appear to make good on his word.

Instead, Daschle told the president to get lost. We Democrats don't need judges — you do, Daschle said. We don't need appropriations bills — you do. So forget about it. It was an almost breathtakingly dismissive response, especially at a time when leaders of both parties claim to be working in a newly bipartisan spirit.

What accounts for Daschle's brazenness? Republicans have always known the majority leader to be a hardball partisan fighter beneath his mild-mannered exterior. But there was something new in his response at the White House Tuesday. When he told the president to forget about judges, Daschle was announcing his new status as a Big Bad Dude in post-September 11 Washington.

Of the four leaders of Congress, Daschle's profile has risen the most in the weeks after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. In contrast, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, while widely visible, has not achieved the status of a national leader. "[Hastert's] strength is being a consensus builder, and his constituency is the House of Representatives," says one congressional aide. "He has not shown a tremendous inclination to go out and speak, and when he does, he doesn't always look so good." Nor have congressional minority leaders Trent Lott and Richard Gephardt achieved new levels of authority during the crisis.

But Daschle has. Not only was he a more visible and effective leader in the days after September 11, but now, with his office having been the target of bio-terrorists, Daschle is more than just a Democratic leader. He's a tough, courageous veteran of the war on terrorism — a made man in Washington. "The anthrax attack on Daschle means that he can look Bush in the eye," says one Republican. "It's taken away that look of softness around Democrats and Daschle."

Daschle's new status is undergirded by a new national prominence and popularity. One example was the recent nationally televised "Concert for New York City." Overlooked in all the discussion of the crowd booing Hillary Rodham Clinton was the fact that Daschle also appeared on the program, and was wildly popular. The Majority Leader from South Dakota received a very, very friendly reception in New York — a vivid indicator of his new standing.

So that might well be the reason Daschle felt he could tell George W. Bush to forget about getting any judges confirmed. And it appears that at least so far, Bush has chosen not to fight back. It's a telling illustration of the ways in which political Washington has changed since September 11. Consider this: In the spring, when George W. Bush's job-approval rating hovered in the low 50 percent range, he passed the largest tax cut in a generation and made significant progress on fulfilling several other campaign promises. Now, when Bush's job-approval rating is hovering in the low 90 percent range and he is widely respected as a wartime president, he finds himself dissed by the Senate's newly pumped-up majority leader.

Bunning Won't Back Down on Kin

By Patrick Crowley

REV_00071944

The Cincinnati Enquirer
Sunday, October 28, 2001

Kentucky U.S. Sen. Jim Bunning doesn't make a stump speech without mentioning his kids and his grandkids.

He and his wife, Mary, have nine children and 35 grandchildren. That's more than a family — it's a precinct.

If you've ever met any of the Bunning children, then you know that the couple sure did something right when it came to raising them.

But does there come a time when being proud of a child or grandchild crosses too far into the realm of politics and policy?

Mr. Bunning's youngest son, David, is a 35-year-old assistant U.S. attorney who works out of the federal Courthouse in Covington. By most accounts, he has done an excellent job in the decade he has held the position.

But Mr. Bunning — a Southgate Republican — is trying to help his son get a job as a federal judge, a plum gig that is a lifetime presidential appointment currently paying $142,000 a year.

Mr. Bunning and Kentucky's other U.S. senator, Louisville Republican Mitch McConnell, recommended earlier this year that President Bush nominate David Bunning for the federal judgeship opening this year in Covington.

Mr. Bush did so, passing over many other potential candidates — who were largely viewed, in the legal community, as more experienced and better qualified than the younger Mr. Bunning.

Since federal judicial appointments require Senate approval, David Bunning has been preparing for a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, a key step in winning that coveted confirmation.

But earlier this month, the American Bar Association rated Mr. Bunning unqualified for the job. The lawyers' organization didn't say why, but its guidelines for a spot on the federal bench recommend that a lawyer have at least 12 years experience. Mr. Bunning has 10.

The Senate is not bound by the ABA rating and can still confirm Mr. Bunning for the bench. Mr. Bunning's confirmation hearing has still not been scheduled.

Lawyers around the federal Courthouse in Covington will tell you that while Mr. Bunning did a great job on criminal cases, he handled too few civil cases — the difficult lawsuits raising questions of federal law — to be truly qualified for the federal bench.

REV_00071945

Still, Jim Bunning is pressing for the Senate hearing on his son's nomination.

Sen. Bunning was also the subject of some criticism for sending out a fund-raising letter ostensibly written by his 11-year-old grand son.

"If you can please include a special gift of $500, $250, $100, $50 or even $25 ... I know it would mean a lot to grandpa," the boy wrote in the letter.

Roll Call, a Washington newspaper that covers Capitol Hill, called the letter shameless. It reported that "lobbyists were stunned ... to receive a bizarre fund-raising pitch tossed out by Sen. Jim Bunning."

For his part, the elder Mr. Bunning apologized for none of it. Not for recommending a federal judge appointment for his son, whom he calls qualified, nor for using his grandkids to raise campaign cash.

Lots of pols use kids and grandkids in fund-raising appeals and campaign ads, Mr. Bunning said. And he's right, especially about the latter.

Senate Spat; Now isn't Time for Tiresome Argument

The Columbus Dispatch
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Perhaps the glorious unity forged in Congress after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks was too good to be true.

One of the latest congressional spats suggests Capitol Hill is rapidly returning to business as usual: slurs and snotty tit for tat.

Senate Republicans are complaining that majority Democrats are holding up hearings and votes on President Bush's nominees for federal court seats. Not long ago, during the Clinton administration, the Democrats were making the same complaint when the Republicans held the Senate majority.

This tiresome argument never seems to end. Each side cooks up statistics and numbers "proving" that their nominees have been treated worse than those of the opposition. On and on, back and forth.

This time, Republicans even are suggesting that Democrats will be impeding the war on terrorism unless

REV_00071946

Democrats move quickly to confirm Bush's picks. This bit of sophistry goes like this: With more than 100 of the 800 federal court seats vacant, federal courts won't be able to process warrants and subpoenas needed to identify and apprehend terrorism suspects.

In reality, of course, any warrant or subpoena request related to terrorism is going to go right to the head of the line in any federal court in the land.

The real damage that results from delayed judicial appointments is that U.S. citizens seeking the more ordinary forms of justice -- the kinds that affect liberty, quality of life and livelihoods -- must wait longer than necessary to get it.

With one in eight judicial seats empty, the Senate definitely should act to fill them as quickly as the present crisis allows. But the GOP assertion that Senate Democrats are endangering national security by dragging their feet on judicial appointments is a shameful attempt to exploit a national emergency for narrow partisan gain.

When the Senate has finished the important business of equipping the nation with the legal, political and financial tools to prosecute the war on terrorism, then it should move to judicial nominations.

Each nominee deserves a hearing and a vote. Short of some deficiency in character or competence in the nominee, the Senate should show deference to presidential choices. This principle should apply whether the president is Republican or Democrat.

Now, senators, stop bickering and get back to work.

U.S. Needs Judges Now

The Boston Herald
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Senate Republicans are pressing their Democratic colleagues to act on President Bush's judicial nominees to facilitate the war on terrorism. That may be a bit of a reach, but the president's picks still deserve speedy consideration. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, says the 100 vacancies on the federal bench (roughly 12 percent of total judgeships) make it harder to process warrants and subpoenas aimed at terrorism suspects. But Hatch was unable to show that the vacancies were actually causing delays here.

A better argument is fairness. Of the 60 nominations Bush has made, the Senate has acted on only eight. In the three previous administrations, first-year nominations always received prompt action.

Democrats would like to delay the process of approving the president's more conservative nominees, like Miguel Estrada, nominated for the powerful U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Wherever possible, the new Senate majority will no doubt try to apply it own ideological litmus test to the administration's candidates.

But the American people are in no mood for partisan games. The ability to process warrants and subpoenas aside, the judiciary is an important symbol of national unity. Like the armed forces, in times of national emergency, it should be at full strength.

Obstructionists Senate Holds Judicial Nominees Hostage

The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 26, 2001

In the final year of the Clinton presidency, Senate Democrats, including current Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont, complained bitterly that Republicans were holding up judicial confirmations. They called the 65 vacancies at the time a "crisis."

Today there are more than 100 vacancies on the federal bench, and the new Senate majority is doing the country a terrible disservice by slowing the confirmation process to a bare trickle. According to the White House, just eight of President Bush's 35 district court nominees, or 22.8 percent, have been confirmed - and that includes a Clinton judge who was renominated by Bush when he took office.

Only four of Bush's 25 circuit court nominees (16 percent) have been confirmed. In all, just 12 of 60 Bush nominees (20 percent) have been confirmed by the Senate.

Considering that the group of nominees generally would be strong, conservative judges, this is partisan obstructionism, plain and simple.

Indeed, with Majority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota not inclined to push for more confirmation votes the rest of this year, it's likely the federal judiciary actually will have shrunk during Bush's first year in office, an incredible feat by any measure.

How does the Senate's record this year compare with other presidents and other Senates? Abysmally.

At a similar point in Clinton's first year (1993), the Senate had confirmed 27 of 47 nominated judges or 57 percent. A Democratic Senate in 1989, the first President Bush's first year, had by this time confirmed 15 of 24 nominees (62 percent).

This week Senate Republicans gave up trying to force Daschle and Leahy to bring up more judges for votes by holding up work on spending bills. The strategy was shelved after Daschle bluntly told Bush that the White House needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats.

There it is: Partisanship is alive and well in Washington - and America is the loser.

REV_00071948

The Senate's power of "advise and consent" in the Constitution is being abused by the current leadership. Last year, when judicial vacancies were about half of today's total, it was called a crisis.

We don't know how Daschle and Leahy would describe the current situation, but "shameful" and "obstructionist" certainly seem to apply.

Senate Committee Screens New Mexico Judicial Nominees

The Santa Fe New Mexican
Friday, October 26, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee screened two New Mexico judicial nominees Thursday, with

REV_00072059

neither Harris Hartz nor William P. "Chip" Johnson meeting much resistance from the panel.

The nominations of Hartz to the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and Johnson to the U.S. District Court in New Mexico will be voted on by the committee at a later hearing. Christine Armijo's nomination to New Mexico's district bench is also pending.

Republicans have accused Democrats of foot-dragging in the judicial-confirmation process.

Hartz, who served on the New Mexico Court of Appeals from 1988 to 1999, was quizzed by Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., on his views on abortion rights, a judge's proper role in shaping law and his support of individual rights.

Hartz sidestepped most of the questions by saying that as a judge he would follow the lead of the Supreme Court.

If Hartz is approved by the committee and confirmed by the full Senate, he would join a 10th Circuit panel which hears appeals from New Mexico, Colorado, Kansas, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming.

Sens. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., praised Hartz's qualifications.

"While we know he would do wonderful things in New Mexico ... we're prepared today to share him with our country," said Domenici, who recommended President Bush nominate the Republican judge. "

Daschle Disses Dubya; Why the Majority Leader Told the President to get Lost

By Byron York
National Review Online
Friday, October 26, 2001

In a White House meeting this week, George W. Bush asked Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle to help speed up the Senate's slow-motion confirmations of Bush's judicial nominees. It was the perfect opportunity for Daschle to offer a few reassuring words. "Mr. President, we've been terribly busy working on terrorism measures," the majority leader might have said, "but we want to assure you we will do all we can to help." Perhaps Daschle might even have made a token effort to confirm a few nominees — a district judge or two — so he could appear to make good on his word.

Instead, Daschle told the president to get lost. We Democrats don't need judges — you do, Daschle said. We don't need appropriations bills — you do. So forget about it. It was an almost breathtakingly dismissive response, especially at a time when leaders of both parties claim to be working in a newly bipartisan spirit.

What accounts for Daschle's brazenness? Republicans have always known the majority leader to be a hardball partisan fighter beneath his mild-mannered exterior. But there was something new in his response at the White House Tuesday. When he told the president to forget about judges, Daschle was announcing his new status as a Big Bad Dude in post-September 11 Washington.

Of the four leaders of Congress, Daschle's profile has risen the most in the weeks after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. In contrast, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, while widely visible, has not achieved the status of a national leader. "[Hastert's] strength is being a consensus builder, and his constituency is the House of Representatives," says one congressional aide. "He has not shown a tremendous inclination to go out and speak, and when he does, he doesn't always look so good." Nor have congressional minority leaders Trent Lott and Richard Gephardt achieved new levels of authority during the crisis.

But Daschle has. Not only was he a more visible and effective leader in the days after September 11, but now, with his office having been the target of bio-terrorists, Daschle is more than just a Democratic leader. He's a tough, courageous veteran of the war on terrorism — a made man in Washington. "The anthrax attack on Daschle means that he can look Bush in the eye," says one Republican. "It's taken away that look of softness around Democrats and Daschle."

Daschle's new status is undergirded by a new national prominence and popularity. One example was the recent nationally televised "Concert for New York City." Overlooked in all the discussion of the crowd booing Hillary Rodham Clinton was the fact that Daschle also appeared on the program, and was wildly popular. The Majority Leader from South Dakota received a very, very friendly reception in
New York — a vivid indicator of his new standing.

So that might well be the reason Daschle felt he could tell George W. Bush to forget about getting any judges confirmed. And it appears that at least so far, Bush has chosen not to fight back. It's a telling illustration of the ways in which political Washington has changed since September 11. Consider this: In the spring, when George W. Bush's job-approval rating hovered in the low 50 percent range, he passed the largest tax cut in a generation and made significant progress on fulfilling several other campaign promises. Now, when Bush's job-approval rating is hovering in the low 90 percent range and he is widely respected as a wartime president, he finds himself dissed by the Senate's newly pumped-up majority leader.

Bunning Won't Back Down on Kin

By Patrick Crowley

REV_00072061

The Cincinnati Enquirer
Sunday, October 28, 2001

Kentucky U.S. Sen. Jim Bunning doesn't make a stump speech without mentioning his kids and his grandkids.

He and his wife, Mary, have nine children and 35 grandchildren. That's more than a family — it's a precinct.

If you've ever met any of the Bunning children, then you know that the couple sure did something right when it came to raising them.

But does there come a time when being proud of a child or grandchild crosses too far into the realm of politics and policy?

Mr. Bunning's youngest son, David, is a 35-year-old assistant U.S. attorney who works out of the federal Courthouse in Covington. By most accounts, he has done an excellent job in the decade he has held the position.

But Mr. Bunning — a Southgate Republican — is trying to help his son get a job as a federal judge, a plum gig that is a lifetime presidential appointment currently paying $142,000 a year.

Mr. Bunning and Kentucky's other U.S. senator, Louisville Republican Mitch McConnell, recommended earlier this year that President Bush nominate David Bunning for the federal judgeship opening this year in Covington.

Mr. Bush did so, passing over many other potential candidates — who were largely viewed, in the legal community, as more experienced and better qualified than the younger Mr. Bunning.

Since federal judicial appointments require Senate approval, David Bunning has been preparing for a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, a key step in winning that coveted confirmation.

But earlier this month, the American Bar Association rated Mr. Bunning unqualified for the job. The lawyers' organization didn't say why, but its guidelines for a spot on the federal bench recommend that a lawyer have at least 12 years experience. Mr. Bunning has 10.

The Senate is not bound by the ABA rating and can still confirm Mr. Bunning for the bench. Mr. Bunning's confirmation hearing has still not been scheduled.

Lawyers around the federal Courthouse in Covington will tell you that while Mr. Bunning did a great job on criminal cases, he handled too few civil cases — the difficult lawsuits raising questions of federal law — to be truly qualified for the federal bench.

REV_00072062

Still, Jim Bunning is pressing for the Senate hearing on his son's nomination.

Sen. Bunning was also the subject of some criticism for sending out a fund-raising letter ostensibly written by his 11-year-old grand son.

"If you can please include a special gift of $500, $250, $100, $50 or even $25 ... I know it would mean a lot to grandpa," the boy wrote in the letter.

Roll Call, a Washington newspaper that covers Capitol Hill, called the letter shameless. It reported that "lobbyists were stunned ... to receive a bizarre fund-raising pitch tossed out by Sen. Jim Bunning."

For his part, the elder Mr. Bunning apologized for none of it. Not for recommending a federal judge appointment for his son, whom he calls qualified, nor for using his grandkids to raise campaign cash.

Lots of pols use kids and grandkids in fund-raising appeals and campaign ads, Mr. Bunning said. And he's right, especially about the latter.

Senate Spat; Now isn't Time for Tiresome Argument

The Columbus Dispatch
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Perhaps the glorious unity forged in Congress after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks was too good to be true.

One of the latest congressional spats suggests Capitol Hill is rapidly returning to business as usual: slurs and snotty tit for tat.

Senate Republicans are complaining that majority Democrats are holding up hearings and votes on President Bush's nominees for federal court seats. Not long ago, during the Clinton administration, the Democrats were making the same complaint when the Republicans held the Senate majority.

This tiresome argument never seems to end. Each side cooks up statistics and numbers "proving" that their nominees have been treated worse than those of the opposition. On and on, back and forth.

This time, Republicans even are suggesting that Democrats will be impeding the war on terrorism unless

REV_00072063

Democrats move quickly to confirm Bush's picks. This bit of sophistry goes like this: With more than 100 of the 800 federal court seats vacant, federal courts won't be able to process warrants and subpoenas needed to identify and apprehend terrorism suspects.

In reality, of course, any warrant or subpoena request related to terrorism is going to go right to the head of the line in any federal court in the land.

The real damage that results from delayed judicial appointments is that U.S. citizens seeking the more ordinary forms of justice -- the kinds that affect liberty, quality of life and livelihoods -- must wait longer than necessary to get it.

With one in eight judicial seats empty, the Senate definitely should act to fill them as quickly as the present crisis allows. But the GOP assertion that Senate Democrats are endangering national security by dragging their feet on judicial appointments is a shameful attempt to exploit a national emergency for narrow partisan gain.

When the Senate has finished the important business of equipping the nation with the legal, political and financial tools to prosecute the war on terrorism, then it should move to judicial nominations.

Each nominee deserves a hearing and a vote. Short of some deficiency in character or competence in the nominee, the Senate should show deference to presidential choices. This principle should apply whether the president is Republican or Democrat.

Now, senators, stop bickering and get back to work.

U.S. Needs Judges Now

The Boston Herald
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Senate Republicans are pressing their Democratic colleagues to act on President Bush's judicial nominees to facilitate the war on terrorism. That may be a bit of a reach, but the president's picks still deserve speedy consideration. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, says the 100 vacancies on the federal bench (roughly 12 percent of total judgeships) make it harder to process warrants and subpoenas aimed at terrorism suspects. But Hatch was unable to show that the vacancies were actually causing delays here.

A better argument is fairness. Of the 60 nominations Bush has made, the Senate has acted on only eight. In the three previous administrations, first-year nominations always received prompt action.

Democrats would like to delay the process of approving the president's more conservative nominees, like Miguel Estrada, nominated for the powerful U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Wherever possible, the new Senate majority will no doubt try to apply it own ideological litmus test to the administration's candidates.

But the American people are in no mood for partisan games. The ability to process warrants and subpoenas aside, the judiciary is an important symbol of national unity. Like the armed forces, in times of national emergency, it should be at full strength.

Obstructionists Senate Holds Judicial Nominees Hostage

The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 26, 2001

In the final year of the Clinton presidency, Senate Democrats, including current Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont, complained bitterly that Republicans were holding up judicial confirmations. They called the 65 vacancies at the time a "crisis."

Today there are more than 100 vacancies on the federal bench, and the new Senate majority is doing the country a terrible disservice by slowing the confirmation process to a bare trickle. According to the White House, just eight of President Bush's 35 district court nominees, or 22.8 percent, have been confirmed - and that includes a Clinton judge who was renominated by Bush when he took office.

Only four of Bush's 25 circuit court nominees (16 percent) have been confirmed. In all, just 12 of 60 Bush nominees (20 percent) have been confirmed by the Senate.

Considering that the group of nominees generally would be strong, conservative judges, this is partisan obstructionism, plain and simple.

Indeed, with Majority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota not inclined to push for more confirmation votes the rest of this year, it's likely the federal judiciary actually will have shrunk during Bush's first year in office, an incredible feat by any measure.

How does the Senate's record this year compare with other presidents and other Senates? Abysmally.

At a similar point in Clinton's first year (1993), the Senate had confirmed 27 of 47 nominated judges or 57 percent. A Democratic Senate in 1989, the first President Bush's first year, had by this time confirmed 15 of 24 nominees (62 percent).

This week Senate Republicans gave up trying to force Daschle and Leahy to bring up more judges for votes by holding up work on spending bills. The strategy was shelved after Daschle bluntly told Bush that the White House needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats.

There it is: Partisanship is alive and well in Washington - and America is the loser.

REV_00072065

The Senate's power of "advise and consent" in the Constitution is being abused by the current leadership. Last year, when judicial vacancies were about half of today's total, it was called a crisis.

We don't know how Daschle and Leahy would describe the current situation, but "shameful" and "obstructionist" certainly seem to apply.

Daschle Disses Dubya; Why the Majority Leader Told the President to get Lost

Still, Jim Bunning is pressing for the Senate hearing on his son's nomination.

Sen. Bunning was also the subject of some criticism for sending out a fund-raising letter ostensibly written by his 11-year-old grand son.

"If you can please include a special gift of $500, $250, $100, $50 or even $25 ... I know it would mean a lot to grandpa," the boy wrote in the letter.

Roll Call, a Washington newspaper that covers Capitol Hill, called the letter shameless. It reported that "lobbyists were stunned ... to receive a bizarre fund-raising pitch tossed out by Sen. Jim Bunning."

For his part, the elder Mr. Bunning apologized for none of it. Not for recommending a federal judge appointment for his son, whom he calls qualified, nor for using his grandkids to raise campaign cash.

Lots of pols use kids and grandkids in fund-raising appeals and campaign ads, Mr. Bunning said. And he's right, especially about the latter.

Senate Spat; Now isn't Time for Tiresome Argument

The Columbus Dispatch
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Perhaps the glorious unity forged in Congress after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks was too good to be true.

One of the latest congressional spats suggests Capitol Hill is rapidly returning to business as usual: slurs and snotty tit for tat.

Senate Republicans are complaining that majority Democrats are holding up hearings and votes on President Bush's nominees for federal court seats. Not long ago, during the Clinton administration, the Democrats were making the same complaint when the Republicans held the Senate majority.

This tiresome argument never seems to end. Each side cooks up statistics and numbers "proving" that their nominees have been treated worse than those of the opposition. On and on, back and forth.

This time, Republicans even are suggesting that Democrats will be impeding the war on terrorism unless

REV_00072073

Democrats move quickly to confirm Bush's picks. This bit of sophistry goes like this: With more than 100 of the 800 federal court seats vacant, federal courts won't be able to process warrants and subpoenas needed to identify and apprehend terrorism suspects.

In reality, of course, any warrant or subpoena request related to terrorism is going to go right to the head of the line in any federal court in the land.

The real damage that results from delayed judicial appointments is that U.S. citizens seeking the more ordinary forms of justice -- the kinds that affect liberty, quality of life and livelihoods -- must wait longer than necessary to get it.

With one in eight judicial seats empty, the Senate definitely should act to fill them as quickly as the present crisis allows. But the GOP assertion that Senate Democrats are endangering national security by dragging their feet on judicial appointments is a shameful attempt to exploit a national emergency for narrow partisan gain.

When the Senate has finished the important business of equipping the nation with the legal, political and financial tools to prosecute the war on terrorism, then it should move to judicial nominations.

Each nominee deserves a hearing and a vote. Short of some deficiency in character or competence in the nominee, the Senate should show deference to presidential choices. This principle should apply whether the president is Republican or Democrat.

Now, senators, stop bickering and get back to work.

U.S. Needs Judges Now

The Boston Herald
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Senate Republicans are pressing their Democratic colleagues to act on President Bush's judicial nominees to facilitate the war on terrorism. That may be a bit of a reach, but the president's picks still deserve speedy consideration. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, says the 100 vacancies on the federal bench (roughly 12 percent of total judgeships) make it harder to process warrants and subpoenas aimed at terrorism suspects. But Hatch was unable to show that the vacancies were actually causing delays here.

A better argument is fairness. Of the 60 nominations Bush has made, the Senate has acted on only eight. In the three previous administrations, first-year nominations always received prompt action.

Democrats would like to delay the process of approving the president's more conservative nominees, like Miguel Estrada, nominated for the powerful U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Wherever possible, the new Senate majority will no doubt try to apply it own ideological litmus test to the administration's candidates.

But the American people are in no mood for partisan games. The ability to process warrants and subpoenas aside, the judiciary is an important symbol of national unity. Like the armed forces, in times of national emergency, it should be at full strength.

Obstructionists Senate Holds Judicial Nominees Hostage

The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 26, 2001

In the final year of the Clinton presidency, Senate Democrats, including current Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont, complained bitterly that Republicans were holding up judicial confirmations. They called the 65 vacancies at the time a "crisis."

Today there are more than 100 vacancies on the federal bench, and the new Senate majority is doing the country a terrible disservice by slowing the confirmation process to a bare trickle. According to the White House, just eight of President Bush's 35 district court nominees, or 22.8 percent, have been confirmed - and that includes a Clinton judge who was renominated by Bush when he took office.

Only four of Bush's 25 circuit court nominees (16 percent) have been confirmed. In all, just 12 of 60 Bush nominees (20 percent) have been confirmed by the Senate.

Considering that the group of nominees generally would be strong, conservative judges, this is partisan obstructionism, plain and simple.

Indeed, with Majority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota not inclined to push for more confirmation votes the rest of this year, it's likely the federal judiciary actually will have shrunk during Bush's first year in office, an incredible feat by any measure.

How does the Senate's record this year compare with other presidents and other Senates? Abysmally.

At a similar point in Clinton's first year (1993), the Senate had confirmed 27 of 47 nominated judges or 57 percent. A Democratic Senate in 1989, the first President Bush's first year, had by this time confirmed 15 of 24 nominees (62 percent).

This week Senate Republicans gave up trying to force Daschle and Leahy to bring up more judges for votes by holding up work on spending bills. The strategy was shelved after Daschle bluntly told Bush that the White House needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats.

There it is: Partisanship is alive and well in Washington - and America is the loser.

REV_00072075

The Senate's power of "advise and consent" in the Constitution is being abused by the current leadership. Last year, when judicial vacancies were about half of today's total, it was called a crisis.

We don't know how Daschle and Leahy would describe the current situation, but "shameful" and "obstructionist" certainly seem to apply.

Senate Committee Screens New Mexico Judicial Nominees

The Santa Fe New Mexican
Friday, October 26, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee screened two New Mexico judicial nominees Thursday, with

REV_00072079

neither Harris Hartz nor William P. "Chip" Johnson meeting much resistance from the panel.

The nominations of Hartz to the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and Johnson to the U.S. District Court in New Mexico will be voted on by the committee at a later hearing. Christine Armijo's nomination to New Mexico's district bench is also pending.

Republicans have accused Democrats of foot-dragging in the judicial-confirmation process.

Hartz, who served on the New Mexico Court of Appeals from 1988 to 1999, was quizzed by Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., on his views on abortion rights, a judge's proper role in shaping law and his support of individual rights.

Hartz sidestepped most of the questions by saying that as a judge he would follow the lead of the Supreme Court.

If Hartz is approved by the committee and confirmed by the full Senate, he would join a 10th Circuit panel which hears appeals from New Mexico, Colorado, Kansas, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming.

Sens. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., praised Hartz's qualifications.

"While we know he would do wonderful things in New Mexico ... we're prepared today to share him with our country," said Domenici, who recommended President Bush nominate the Republican judge. "

Daschle Disses Dubya; Why the Majority Leader Told the President to get Lost

By Byron York
National Review Online
Friday, October 26, 2001

In a White House meeting this week, George W. Bush asked Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle to help speed up the Senate's slow-motion confirmations of Bush's judicial nominees. It was the perfect opportunity for Daschle to offer a few reassuring words. "Mr. President, we've been terribly busy working on terrorism measures," the majority leader might have said, "but we want to assure you we will do all we can to help." Perhaps Daschle might even have made a token effort to confirm a few nominees — a district judge or two — so he could appear to make good on his word.

Instead, Daschle told the president to get lost. We Democrats don't need judges — you do, Daschle said. We don't need appropriations bills — you do. So forget about it. It was an almost breathtakingly dismissive response, especially at a time when leaders of both parties claim to be working in a newly bipartisan spirit.

What accounts for Daschle's brazenness? Republicans have always known the majority leader to be a hardball partisan fighter beneath his mild-mannered exterior. But there was something new in his response at the White House Tuesday. When he told the president to forget about judges, Daschle was announcing his new status as a Big Bad Dude in post-September 11 Washington.

Of the four leaders of Congress, Daschle's profile has risen the most in the weeks after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. In contrast, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, while widely visible, has not achieved the status of a national leader. "[Hastert's] strength is being a consensus builder, and his constituency is the House of Representatives," says one congressional aide. "He has not shown a tremendous inclination to go out and speak, and when he does, he doesn't always look so good." Nor have congressional minority leaders Trent Lott and Richard Gephardt achieved new levels of authority during the crisis.

But Daschle has. Not only was he a more visible and effective leader in the days after September 11, but now, with his office having been the target of bio-terrorists, Daschle is more than just a Democratic leader. He's a tough, courageous veteran of the war on terrorism — a made man in Washington. "The anthrax attack on Daschle means that he can look Bush in the eye," says one Republican. "It's taken away that look of softness around Democrats and Daschle."

Daschle's new status is undergirded by a new national prominence and popularity. One example was the recent nationally televised "Concert for New York City." Overlooked in all the discussion of the crowd booing Hillary Rodham Clinton was the fact that Daschle also appeared on the program, and was wildly popular. The Majority Leader from South Dakota received a very, very friendly reception in
New York — a vivid indicator of his new standing.

So that might well be the reason Daschle felt he could tell George W. Bush to forget about getting any judges confirmed. And it appears that at least so far, Bush has chosen not to fight back. It's a telling illustration of the ways in which political Washington has changed since September 11. Consider this: In the spring, when George W. Bush's job-approval rating hovered in the low 50 percent range, he passed the largest tax cut in a generation and made significant progress on fulfilling several other campaign promises. Now, when Bush's job-approval rating is hovering in the low 90 percent range and he is widely respected as a wartime president, he finds himself dissed by the Senate's newly pumped-up majority leader.

Bunning Won't Back Down on Kin

By Patrick Crowley

REV_00072081

The Cincinnati Enquirer
Sunday, October 28, 2001

Kentucky U.S. Sen. Jim Bunning doesn't make a stump speech without mentioning his kids and his grandkids.

He and his wife, Mary, have nine children and 35 grandchildren. That's more than a family — it's a precinct.

If you've ever met any of the Bunning children, then you know that the couple sure did something right when it came to raising them.

But does there come a time when being proud of a child or grandchild crosses too far into the realm of politics and policy?

Mr. Bunning's youngest son, David, is a 35-year-old assistant U.S. attorney who works out of the federal Courthouse in Covington. By most accounts, he has done an excellent job in the decade he has held the position.

But Mr. Bunning — a Southgate Republican — is trying to help his son get a job as a federal judge, a plum gig that is a lifetime presidential appointment currently paying $142,000 a year.

Mr. Bunning and Kentucky's other U.S. senator, Louisville Republican Mitch McConnell, recommended earlier this year that President Bush nominate David Bunning for the federal judgeship opening this year in Covington.

Mr. Bush did so, passing over many other potential candidates — who were largely viewed, in the legal community, as more experienced and better qualified than the younger Mr. Bunning.

Since federal judicial appointments require Senate approval, David Bunning has been preparing for a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, a key step in winning that coveted confirmation.

But earlier this month, the American Bar Association rated Mr. Bunning unqualified for the job. The lawyers' organization didn't say why, but its guidelines for a spot on the federal bench recommend that a lawyer have at least 12 years experience. Mr. Bunning has 10.

The Senate is not bound by the ABA rating and can still confirm Mr. Bunning for the bench. Mr. Bunning's confirmation hearing has still not been scheduled.

Lawyers around the federal Courthouse in Covington will tell you that while Mr. Bunning did a great job on criminal cases, he handled too few civil cases — the difficult lawsuits raising questions of federal law — to be truly qualified for the federal bench.

REV_00072082

Still, Jim Bunning is pressing for the Senate hearing on his son's nomination.

Sen. Bunning was also the subject of some criticism for sending out a fund-raising letter ostensibly written by his 11-year-old grand son.

"If you can please include a special gift of $500, $250, $100, $50 or even $25 ... I know it would mean a lot to grandpa," the boy wrote in the letter.

Senate Committee Screens New Mexico Judicial Nominees

The Santa Fe New Mexican
Friday, October 26, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee screened two New Mexico judicial nominees Thursday, with

REV_00072089

neither Harris Hartz nor William P. "Chip" Johnson meeting much resistance from the panel.

The nominations of Hartz to the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and Johnson to the U.S. District Court in New Mexico will be voted on by the committee at a later hearing. Christine Armijo's nomination to New Mexico's district bench is also pending.

Republicans have accused Democrats of foot-dragging in the judicial-confirmation process.

Hartz, who served on the New Mexico Court of Appeals from 1988 to 1999, was quizzed by Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., on his views on abortion rights, a judge's proper role in shaping law and his support of individual rights.

Hartz sidestepped most of the questions by saying that as a judge he would follow the lead of the Supreme Court.

If Hartz is approved by the committee and confirmed by the full Senate, he would join a 10th Circuit panel which hears appeals from New Mexico, Colorado, Kansas, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming.

Sens. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., praised Hartz's qualifications.

"While we know he would do wonderful things in New Mexico ... we're prepared today to share him with our country," said Domenici, who recommended President Bush nominate the Republican judge. "

Daschle Disses Dubya; Why the Majority Leader Told the President to get Lost

By Byron York
National Review Online
Friday, October 26, 2001

In a White House meeting this week, George W. Bush asked Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle to help speed up the Senate's slow-motion confirmations of Bush's judicial nominees. It was the perfect opportunity for Daschle to offer a few reassuring words. "Mr. President, we've been terribly busy working on terrorism measures," the majority leader might have said, "but we want to assure you we will do all we can to help." Perhaps Daschle might even have made a token effort to confirm a few nominees — a district judge or two — so he could appear to make good on his word.

Instead, Daschle told the president to get lost. We Democrats don't need judges — you do, Daschle said. We don't need appropriations bills — you do. So forget about it. It was an almost breathtakingly dismissive response, especially at a time when leaders of both parties claim to be working in a newly bipartisan spirit.

What accounts for Daschle's brazenness? Republicans have always known the majority leader to be a hardball partisan fighter beneath his mild-mannered exterior. But there was something new in his response at the White House Tuesday. When he told the president to forget about judges, Daschle was announcing his new status as a Big Bad Dude in post-September 11 Washington.

Of the four leaders of Congress, Daschle's profile has risen the most in the weeks after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. In contrast, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, while widely visible, has not achieved the status of a national leader. "[Hastert's] strength is being a consensus builder, and his constituency is the House of Representatives," says one congressional aide. "He has not shown a tremendous inclination to go out and speak, and when he does, he doesn't always look so good." Nor have congressional minority leaders Trent Lott and Richard Gephardt achieved new levels of authority during the crisis.

But Daschle has. Not only was he a more visible and effective leader in the days after September 11, but now, with his office having been the target of bio-terrorists, Daschle is more than just a Democratic leader. He's a tough, courageous veteran of the war on terrorism — a made man in Washington. "The anthrax attack on Daschle means that he can look Bush in the eye," says one Republican. "It's taken away that look of softness around Democrats and Daschle."

Daschle's new status is undergirded by a new national prominence and popularity. One example was the recent nationally televised "Concert for New York City." Overlooked in all the discussion of the crowd booing Hillary Rodham Clinton was the fact that Daschle also appeared on the program, and was wildly popular. The Majority Leader from South Dakota received a very, very friendly reception in
New York — a vivid indicator of his new standing.

So that might well be the reason Daschle felt he could tell George W. Bush to forget about getting any judges confirmed. And it appears that at least so far, Bush has chosen not to fight back. It's a telling illustration of the ways in which political Washington has changed since September 11. Consider this: In the spring, when George W. Bush's job-approval rating hovered in the low 50 percent range, he passed the largest tax cut in a generation and made significant progress on fulfilling several other campaign promises. Now, when Bush's job-approval rating is hovering in the low 90 percent range and he is widely respected as a wartime president, he finds himself dissed by the Senate's newly pumped-up majority leader.

Bunning Won't Back Down on Kin

By Patrick Crowley

REV_00072091

The Cincinnati Enquirer
Sunday, October 28, 2001

Kentucky U.S. Sen. Jim Bunning doesn't make a stump speech without mentioning his kids and his grandkids.

He and his wife, Mary, have nine children and 35 grandchildren. That's more than a family — it's a precinct.

If you've ever met any of the Bunning children, then you know that the couple sure did something right when it came to raising them.

But does there come a time when being proud of a child or grandchild crosses too far into the realm of politics and policy?

Mr. Bunning's youngest son, David, is a 35-year-old assistant U.S. attorney who works out of the federal Courthouse in Covington. By most accounts, he has done an excellent job in the decade he has held the position.

But Mr. Bunning — a Southgate Republican — is trying to help his son get a job as a federal judge, a plum gig that is a lifetime presidential appointment currently paying $142,000 a year.

Mr. Bunning and Kentucky's other U.S. senator, Louisville Republican Mitch McConnell, recommended earlier this year that President Bush nominate David Bunning for the federal judgeship opening this year in Covington.

Mr. Bush did so, passing over many other potential candidates — who were largely viewed, in the legal community, as more experienced and better qualified than the younger Mr. Bunning.

Since federal judicial appointments require Senate approval, David Bunning has been preparing for a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, a key step in winning that coveted confirmation.

But earlier this month, the American Bar Association rated Mr. Bunning unqualified for the job. The lawyers' organization didn't say why, but its guidelines for a spot on the federal bench recommend that a lawyer have at least 12 years experience. Mr. Bunning has 10.

The Senate is not bound by the ABA rating and can still confirm Mr. Bunning for the bench. Mr. Bunning's confirmation hearing has still not been scheduled.

Lawyers around the federal Courthouse in Covington will tell you that while Mr. Bunning did a great job on criminal cases, he handled too few civil cases — the difficult lawsuits raising questions of federal law — to be truly qualified for the federal bench.

REV_00072092

Still, Jim Bunning is pressing for the Senate hearing on his son's nomination.

Sen. Bunning was also the subject of some criticism for sending out a fund-raising letter ostensibly written by his 11-year-old grand son.

"If you can please include a special gift of $500, $250, $100, $50 or even $25 ... I know it would mean a lot to grandpa," the boy wrote in the letter.

Roll Call, a Washington newspaper that covers Capitol Hill, called the letter shameless. It reported that "lobbyists were stunned ... to receive a bizarre fund-raising pitch tossed out by Sen. Jim Bunning."

For his part, the elder Mr. Bunning apologized for none of it. Not for recommending a federal judge appointment for his son, whom he calls qualified, nor for using his grandkids to raise campaign cash.

Lots of pols use kids and grandkids in fund-raising appeals and campaign ads, Mr. Bunning said. And he's right, especially about the latter.

Senate Spat; Now isn't Time for Tiresome Argument

The Columbus Dispatch
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Perhaps the glorious unity forged in Congress after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks was too good to be true.

One of the latest congressional spats suggests Capitol Hill is rapidly returning to business as usual: slurs and snotty tit for tat.

Senate Republicans are complaining that majority Democrats are holding up hearings and votes on President Bush's nominees for federal court seats. Not long ago, during the Clinton administration, the Democrats were making the same complaint when the Republicans held the Senate majority.

This tiresome argument never seems to end. Each side cooks up statistics and numbers "proving" that their nominees have been treated worse than those of the opposition. On and on, back and forth.

This time, Republicans even are suggesting that Democrats will be impeding the war on terrorism unless

REV_00072093

Democrats move quickly to confirm Bush's picks. This bit of sophistry goes like this: With more than 100 of the 800 federal court seats vacant, federal courts won't be able to process warrants and subpoenas needed to identify and apprehend terrorism suspects.

In reality, of course, any warrant or subpoena request related to terrorism is going to go right to the head of the line in any federal court in the land.

The real damage that results from delayed judicial appointments is that U.S. citizens seeking the more ordinary forms of justice -- the kinds that affect liberty, quality of life and livelihoods -- must wait longer than necessary to get it.

With one in eight judicial seats empty, the Senate definitely should act to fill them as quickly as the present crisis allows. But the GOP assertion that Senate Democrats are endangering national security by dragging their feet on judicial appointments is a shameful attempt to exploit a national emergency for narrow partisan gain.

When the Senate has finished the important business of equipping the nation with the legal, political and financial tools to prosecute the war on terrorism, then it should move to judicial nominations.

Each nominee deserves a hearing and a vote. Short of some deficiency in character or competence in the nominee, the Senate should show deference to presidential choices. This principle should apply whether the president is Republican or Democrat.

Now, senators, stop bickering and get back to work.

U.S. Needs Judges Now

The Boston Herald
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Senate Republicans are pressing their Democratic colleagues to act on President Bush's judicial nominees to facilitate the war on terrorism. That may be a bit of a reach, but the president's picks still deserve speedy consideration. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, says the 100 vacancies on the federal bench (roughly 12 percent of total judgeships) make it harder to process warrants and subpoenas aimed at terrorism suspects. But Hatch was unable to show that the vacancies were actually causing delays here.

A better argument is fairness. Of the 60 nominations Bush has made, the Senate has acted on only eight. In the three previous administrations, first-year nominations always received prompt action.

Democrats would like to delay the process of approving the president's more conservative nominees, like Miguel Estrada, nominated for the powerful U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Wherever possible, the new Senate majority will no doubt try to apply it own ideological litmus test to the administration's candidates.

But the American people are in no mood for partisan games. The ability to process warrants and subpoenas aside, the judiciary is an important symbol of national unity. Like the armed forces, in times of national emergency, it should be at full strength.

Obstructionists Senate Holds Judicial Nominees Hostage

The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 26, 2001

In the final year of the Clinton presidency, Senate Democrats, including current Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont, complained bitterly that Republicans were holding up judicial confirmations. They called the 65 vacancies at the time a "crisis."

Today there are more than 100 vacancies on the federal bench, and the new Senate majority is doing the country a terrible disservice by slowing the confirmation process to a bare trickle. According to the White House, just eight of President Bush's 35 district court nominees, or 22.8 percent, have been confirmed - and that includes a Clinton judge who was renominated by Bush when he took office.

Only four of Bush's 25 circuit court nominees (16 percent) have been confirmed. In all, just 12 of 60 Bush nominees (20 percent) have been confirmed by the Senate.

Considering that the group of nominees generally would be strong, conservative judges, this is partisan obstructionism, plain and simple.

Indeed, with Majority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota not inclined to push for more confirmation votes the rest of this year, it's likely the federal judiciary actually will have shrunk during Bush's first year in office, an incredible feat by any measure.

How does the Senate's record this year compare with other presidents and other Senates? Abysmally.

At a similar point in Clinton's first year (1993), the Senate had confirmed 27 of 47 nominated judges or 57 percent. A Democratic Senate in 1989, the first President Bush's first year, had by this time confirmed 15 of 24 nominees (62 percent).

This week Senate Republicans gave up trying to force Daschle and Leahy to bring up more judges for votes by holding up work on spending bills. The strategy was shelved after Daschle bluntly told Bush that the White House needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats.

There it is: Partisanship is alive and well in Washington - and America is the loser.

REV_00072095

The Senate's power of "advise and consent" in the Constitution is being abused by the current leadership. Last year, when judicial vacancies were about half of today's total, it was called a crisis.

We don't know how Daschle and Leahy would describe the current situation, but "shameful" and "obstructionist" certainly seem to apply.

Daschle Disses Dubya; Why the Majority Leader Told the President to get Lost

Of the four leaders of Congress, Daschle's profile has risen the most in the weeks after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. In contrast, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, while widely visible, has not achieved the status of a national leader. "[Hastert's] strength is being a consensus builder, and his constituency is the House of Representatives," says one congressional aide. "He has not shown a tremendous inclination to go out and speak, and when he does, he doesn't always look so good." Nor have congressional minority leaders Trent Lott and Richard Gephardt achieved new levels of authority during the crisis.

But Daschle has. Not only was he a more visible and effective leader in the days after September 11, but now, with his office having been the target of bio-terrorists, Daschle is more than just a Democratic leader. He's a tough, courageous veteran of the war on terrorism — a made man in Washington. "The anthrax attack on Daschle means that he can look Bush in the eye," says one Republican. "It's taken away that look of softness around Democrats and Daschle."

Daschle's new status is undergirded by a new national prominence and popularity. One example was the recent nationally televised "Concert for New York City." Overlooked in all the discussion of the crowd booing Hillary Rodham Clinton was the fact that Daschle also appeared on the program, and was wildly popular. The Majority Leader from South Dakota received a very, very friendly reception in
New York — a vivid indicator of his new standing.

So that might well be the reason Daschle felt he could tell George W. Bush to forget about getting any judges confirmed. And it appears that at least so far, Bush has chosen not to fight back. It's a telling illustration of the ways in which political Washington has changed since September 11. Consider this: In the spring, when George W. Bush's job-approval rating hovered in the low 50 percent range, he passed the largest tax cut in a generation and made significant progress on fulfilling several other campaign promises. Now, when Bush's job-approval rating is hovering in the low 90 percent range and he is widely respected as a wartime president, he finds himself dissed by the Senate's newly pumped-up majority leader.

Bunning Won't Back Down on Kin

By Patrick Crowley

REV_00072101

The Cincinnati Enquirer
Sunday, October 28, 2001

Kentucky U.S. Sen. Jim Bunning doesn't make a stump speech without mentioning his kids and his grandkids.

He and his wife, Mary, have nine children and 35 grandchildren. That's more than a family — it's a precinct.

If you've ever met any of the Bunning children, then you know that the couple sure did something right when it came to raising them.

But does there come a time when being proud of a child or grandchild crosses too far into the realm of politics and policy?

Mr. Bunning's youngest son, David, is a 35-year-old assistant U.S. attorney who works out of the federal Courthouse in Covington. By most accounts, he has done an excellent job in the decade he has held the position.

But Mr. Bunning — a Southgate Republican — is trying to help his son get a job as a federal judge, a plum gig that is a lifetime presidential appointment currently paying $142,000 a year.

Mr. Bunning and Kentucky's other U.S. senator, Louisville Republican Mitch McConnell, recommended earlier this year that President Bush nominate David Bunning for the federal judgeship opening this year in Covington.

Mr. Bush did so, passing over many other potential candidates — who were largely viewed, in the legal community, as more experienced and better qualified than the younger Mr. Bunning.

Since federal judicial appointments require Senate approval, David Bunning has been preparing for a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, a key step in winning that coveted confirmation.

But earlier this month, the American Bar Association rated Mr. Bunning unqualified for the job. The lawyers' organization didn't say why, but its guidelines for a spot on the federal bench recommend that a lawyer have at least 12 years experience. Mr. Bunning has 10.

The Senate is not bound by the ABA rating and can still confirm Mr. Bunning for the bench. Mr. Bunning's confirmation hearing has still not been scheduled.

Lawyers around the federal Courthouse in Covington will tell you that while Mr. Bunning did a great job on criminal cases, he handled too few civil cases — the difficult lawsuits raising questions of federal law — to be truly qualified for the federal bench.

REV_00072102

Still, Jim Bunning is pressing for the Senate hearing on his son's nomination.

Sen. Bunning was also the subject of some criticism for sending out a fund-raising letter ostensibly written by his 11-year-old grand son.

"If you can please include a special gift of $500, $250, $100, $50 or even $25 ... I know it would mean a lot to grandpa," the boy wrote in the letter.

Roll Call, a Washington newspaper that covers Capitol Hill, called the letter shameless. It reported that "lobbyists were stunned ... to receive a bizarre fund-raising pitch tossed out by Sen. Jim Bunning."

For his part, the elder Mr. Bunning apologized for none of it. Not for recommending a federal judge appointment for his son, whom he calls qualified, nor for using his grandkids to raise campaign cash.

Lots of pols use kids and grandkids in fund-raising appeals and campaign ads, Mr. Bunning said. And he's right, especially about the latter.

Senate Spat; Now isn't Time for Tiresome Argument

The Columbus Dispatch
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Perhaps the glorious unity forged in Congress after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks was too good to be true.

One of the latest congressional spats suggests Capitol Hill is rapidly returning to business as usual: slurs and snotty tit for tat.

Senate Republicans are complaining that majority Democrats are holding up hearings and votes on President Bush's nominees for federal court seats. Not long ago, during the Clinton administration, the Democrats were making the same complaint when the Republicans held the Senate majority.

This tiresome argument never seems to end. Each side cooks up statistics and numbers "proving" that their nominees have been treated worse than those of the opposition. On and on, back and forth.

This time, Republicans even are suggesting that Democrats will be impeding the war on terrorism unless

REV_00072103

Democrats move quickly to confirm Bush's picks. This bit of sophistry goes like this: With more than 100 of the 800 federal court seats vacant, federal courts won't be able to process warrants and subpoenas needed to identify and apprehend terrorism suspects.

In reality, of course, any warrant or subpoena request related to terrorism is going to go right to the head of the line in any federal court in the land.

The real damage that results from delayed judicial appointments is that U.S. citizens seeking the more ordinary forms of justice -- the kinds that affect liberty, quality of life and livelihoods -- must wait longer than necessary to get it.

With one in eight judicial seats empty, the Senate definitely should act to fill them as quickly as the present crisis allows. But the GOP assertion that Senate Democrats are endangering national security by dragging their feet on judicial appointments is a shameful attempt to exploit a national emergency for narrow partisan gain.

When the Senate has finished the important business of equipping the nation with the legal, political and financial tools to prosecute the war on terrorism, then it should move to judicial nominations.

Each nominee deserves a hearing and a vote. Short of some deficiency in character or competence in the nominee, the Senate should show deference to presidential choices. This principle should apply whether the president is Republican or Democrat.

Now, senators, stop bickering and get back to work.

U.S. Needs Judges Now

The Boston Herald
Saturday, October 27, 2001

Senate Republicans are pressing their Democratic colleagues to act on President Bush's judicial nominees to facilitate the war on terrorism. That may be a bit of a reach, but the president's picks still deserve speedy consideration. Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, ranking Republican on the Judiciary Committee, says the 100 vacancies on the federal bench (roughly 12 percent of total judgeships) make it harder to process warrants and subpoenas aimed at terrorism suspects. But Hatch was unable to show that the vacancies were actually causing delays here.

A better argument is fairness. Of the 60 nominations Bush has made, the Senate has acted on only eight. In the three previous administrations, first-year nominations always received prompt action.

Democrats would like to delay the process of approving the president's more conservative nominees, like Miguel Estrada, nominated for the powerful U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Wherever possible, the new Senate majority will no doubt try to apply it own ideological litmus test to the administration's candidates.

But the American people are in no mood for partisan games. The ability to process warrants and subpoenas aside, the judiciary is an important symbol of national unity. Like the armed forces, in times of national emergency, it should be at full strength.

Obstructionists Senate Holds Judicial Nominees Hostage

The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, October 26, 2001

In the final year of the Clinton presidency, Senate Democrats, including current Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy of Vermont, complained bitterly that Republicans were holding up judicial confirmations. They called the 65 vacancies at the time a "crisis."

Today there are more than 100 vacancies on the federal bench, and the new Senate majority is doing the country a terrible disservice by slowing the confirmation process to a bare trickle. According to the White House, just eight of President Bush's 35 district court nominees, or 22.8 percent, have been confirmed - and that includes a Clinton judge who was renominated by Bush when he took office.

Only four of Bush's 25 circuit court nominees (16 percent) have been confirmed. In all, just 12 of 60 Bush nominees (20 percent) have been confirmed by the Senate.

Considering that the group of nominees generally would be strong, conservative judges, this is partisan obstructionism, plain and simple.

Indeed, with Majority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota not inclined to push for more confirmation votes the rest of this year, it's likely the federal judiciary actually will have shrunk during Bush's first year in office, an incredible feat by any measure.

How does the Senate's record this year compare with other presidents and other Senates? Abysmally.

At a similar point in Clinton's first year (1993), the Senate had confirmed 27 of 47 nominated judges or 57 percent. A Democratic Senate in 1989, the first President Bush's first year, had by this time confirmed 15 of 24 nominees (62 percent).

This week Senate Republicans gave up trying to force Daschle and Leahy to bring up more judges for votes by holding up work on spending bills. The strategy was shelved after Daschle bluntly told Bush that the White House needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats.

There it is: Partisanship is alive and well in Washington - and America is the loser.

REV_00072105

The Senate's power of "advise and consent" in the Constitution is being abused by the current leadership. Last year, when judicial vacancies were about half of today's total, it was called a crisis.

We don't know how Daschle and Leahy would describe the current situation, but "shameful" and "obstructionist" certainly seem to apply.

Senate Committee Screens New Mexico Judicial Nominees

The Santa Fe New Mexican
Friday, October 26, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee screened two New Mexico judicial nominees Thursday, with

REV_00072109

neither Harris Hartz nor William P. "Chip" Johnson meeting much resistance from the panel.

The nominations of Hartz to the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and Johnson to the U.S. District Court in New Mexico will be voted on by the committee at a later hearing. Christine Armijo's nomination to New Mexico's district bench is also pending.

Republicans have accused Democrats of foot-dragging in the judicial-confirmation process.

Hartz, who served on the New Mexico Court of Appeals from 1988 to 1999, was quizzed by Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., on his views on abortion rights, a judge's proper role in shaping law and his support of individual rights.

Hartz sidestepped most of the questions by saying that as a judge he would follow the lead of the Supreme Court.

If Hartz is approved by the committee and confirmed by the full Senate, he would join a 10th Circuit panel which hears appeals from New Mexico, Colorado, Kansas, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming.

Sens. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., praised Hartz's qualifications.

"While we know he would do wonderful things in New Mexico ... we're prepared today to share him with our country," said Domenici, who recommended President Bush nominate the Republican judge. "

Daschle Disses Dubya; Why the Majority Leader Told the President to get Lost

By Byron York
National Review Online
Friday, October 26, 2001

In a White House meeting this week, George W. Bush asked Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle to help speed up the Senate's slow-motion confirmations of Bush's judicial nominees. It was the perfect opportunity for Daschle to offer a few reassuring words. "Mr. President, we've been terribly busy working on terrorism measures," the majority leader might have said, "but we want to assure you we will do all we can to help." Perhaps Daschle might even have made a token effort to confirm a few nominees — a district judge or two — so he could appear to make good on his word.

Instead, Daschle told the president to get lost. We Democrats don't need judges — you do, Daschle said. We don't need appropriations bills — you do. So forget about it. It was an almost breathtakingly dismissive response, especially at a time when leaders of both parties claim to be working in a newly bipartisan spirit.

What accounts for Daschle's brazenness? Republicans have always known the majority leader to be a hardball partisan fighter beneath his mild-mannered exterior. But there was something new in his response at the White House Tuesday. When he told the president to forget about judges, Daschle was announcing his new status as a Big Bad Dude in post-September 11 Washington.

Of the four leaders of Congress, Daschle's profile has risen the most in the weeks after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. In contrast, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, while widely visible, has not achieved the status of a national leader. "[Hastert's] strength is being a consensus

But Daschle has. Not only was he a more visible and effective leader in the days after September 11, but now, with his office having been the target of bio-terrorists, Daschle is more than just a Democratic leader. He's a tough, courageous veteran of the war on terrorism — a made man in Washington. "The anthrax attack on Daschle means that he can look Bush in the eye," says one Republican. "It's taken

Daschle's new status is undergirded by a new national prominence and popularity. One example was the recent nationally televised "Concert for New York City." Only four of Bush's 25 circuit court nominees (16 percent) have been confirmed. In all, just 12 of 60 Bush nominees (20 percent) have been confirmed by the Senate.

Considering that the group of nominees generally would be strong, conservative judges, this is partisan obstructionism, plain and simple.

Indeed, with Majority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota not inclined to push for more confirmation votes the rest of this year, it's likely the federal judiciary actually will have shrunk during Bush's first year in office, an incredible feat by any measure.

How does the Senate's record this year compare with other presidents and other Senates? Abysmally.

At a similar point in Clinton's first year (1993), the Senate had confirmed 27 of 47 nominated judges or 57 percent. A Democratic Senate in 1989, the first President Bush's first year, had by this time confirmed 15 of 24 nominees (62 percent).

This week Senate Republicans gave up trying to force Daschle and Leahy to bring up more judges for votes by holding up work on spending bills. The strategy was shelved after Daschle bluntly told Bush that the White House needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats.

There it is: Partisanship is alive and well in Washington - and America is the loser.

REV_00072115

The Senate's power of "advise and consent" in the Constitution is being abused by the current leadership. Last year, when judicial vacancies were about half of today's total, it was called a crisis.

We don't know how Daschle and Leahy would describe the current situation, but "shameful" and "obstructionist" certainly seem to apply.

This is a message I received from Parsky's office regarding the flights. I would like your thoughts. Also, we need to talk in regards to how the trip should be paid for.

Also, per our conversation regarding our jet. It is fully owned by RSF Management Services, Inc. and we hold a 135 Commercial Carriage Charter Certificate through West Coast Charters. WCC is an independent charter company and is not affiliated with RSF Management. We have used the jet to fly various people, including Mr. Parsky and Condi Rice during the Bush Campaign and the campaign reimbursed us at the charter rate. With the 135 certificate RSF Managements can carry passengers as a commercial carrier. We can have an invoice generated for as an estimate which includes the per hour fee plus 7.25% fuel tax. All catering and telephone use would be at an additional cost

Thanks

Coming Face To Face With Their Pasts
By John Nowacki

A couple of weeks ago, Senate Republicans tried to get Majority Leader Tom Daschle and Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy to quit stalling President Bush's judicial nominees. Their idea was to delay passage of an appropriations bill and force the Democrats to confirm more than handful of nominees this year -- an effort that failed, in part because the Republicans didn't have the leverage to pull it off. As National Review's Byron York reported, Daschle told Republican leaders -- and the President -- that Democrats aren't the ones who need judges confirmed or appropriations bills passed.

With that, Senate Republicans decided to let the bill move forward, and Democrats insisted that they really would move judges in good faith. Meaning that judicial nominees will continue to trickle out of the Judiciary Committee, while the 106 vacancies -- 40 of them designated as judicial emergencies -- get filled . . . whenever.

At times like this, when Senator Daschle can look at the nearly half-empty U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit and shrug, it's important to understand why the judiciary's current situation is a problem. And there's no better place to look for answers than the words of Senate Democrats like Tom Daschle and Patrick Leahy.

When there were 75 vacancies, Mr. Daschle said: "There is a dire shortage -- we have a judicial emergency right now, throughout the country. And it's important for us to respond to that emergency, confirm the many, many judges whose nominations are still languishing either in committee or on the floor."

So, with an additional 31 vacancies today, we must have an extreme judicial emergency throughout the country. Odd that the Majority Leader is in no hurry to do anything about it.

But why do judicial vacancies matter? Do they really affect anyone?

Vacancies affect the quality of justice in the United States, creating a huge backlog of federal cases, explained Senator Leahy several years ago, when there were 81 vacancies -- 25 fewer than today.

"When a U.S. attorney can refer to the lack of courtrooms and federal judges as a bottleneck in the criminal justice process and the chief judge of a federal district court can acknowledge that the court is so overwhelmed with criminal cases that it is operating like an assembly line, that cases are not given the attention that they deserve and that you know that you're making a lot of mistakes because of the speed, we have reached a crisis," he said when there were 93 vacancies. "That is not American justice, that is not the federal justice system on which all of us rely to protect our rights while enforcing the law."

All right, you may think, vacancies are a problem. But how did we get into this mess?

Judicial vacancies never wholly disappear, which is why the Clinton Justice Department once referred to 63 vacancies as virtual full employment of the federal judiciary. But the numbers do fluctuate.

Under a Democrat Senate between 1991 and mid-1994, for example, vacancies were never below 100; in fact, they soared to 140 in 1991 and 131 in 1993. It wasn't until a few months before the Democrats lost the Senate--well into
Mr. Clinton's presidency--that the figure dropped below 100.

Under a Republican Senate--and during the Clinton years -- vacancies generally stayed below 90 and even dropped to the 50s. Judicial vacancies were generally in the 60s or 70s, not far from that virtual full employment mark. In fact, there were 66 vacancies one year ago today -- just before the election -- and retirements only brought that figure to the 80s when Mr.

President Bush began nominating judges on May 9, far earlier than new Presidents normally do (Bill Clinton made his first nominations in August). By June 1, 18 nominees were waiting for confirmation -- and by the August recess, 40 nominees were before the Senate. Today, there are 48.

In the spring, before they lost the Senate, Republicans scheduled a hearing for a few nominees, only to cancel it because Democrats objected that it was too soon. When Senator Leahy took over Judiciary, he did hold hearings, but only for a few at a time. Instead of holding hearings for four or five nominees as his Republican predecessor did, it wasn't unusual to find only one nominee on the witness list.

And so just 12 nominees have been confirmed this year, 20 percent of President Bush's first year nominees. In contrast, former Presidents Clinton, Bush, and Reagan had 57, 62, and 91 percent of their first year nominees confirmed.

In the midst of this deliberate slowdown -- just to top it all off -- Democrats have held hearings to justify their obstruction campaign, discussing the creation of ideological litmus tests and shifting the burden of proof to nominees.

What can you say about something like this? Again, Senator Leahy describes it best: "Those who delay or prevent the filling of these vacancies must understand that they are delaying or preventing the administration of justice."

Mr. Leahy's and Mr. Daschle's own words about the "vacancy crisis" are looking them in the face. Will partisan politics trump their concerns about the administration of justice? It seems they've already answered that one for us.

for anybody who wants an impartial judiciary.

Hatch's comments referred to the actions of Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts. The Deseret News reports, "Sen. Schumer said the Senate should be able to consider the ideology of nominees [to the federal courts] -- and reject them if their views are 'out of the mainstream.'"

In other words, if the political views of potential judges do not coincide with those of Democratic legislators -- who supposedly are best qualified to judge what ideas are "in the mainstream" -- the judges will not be confirmed.

"The hallmark of a good jurist is one who does not allow personal opinion to affect objective legal decision making," Sen. Hatch said. "The Senate's responsibility does not include establishing an ideological litmus test to gauge a candidate's fitness based on his or her position on controversial issues."

Sen. Schumer believes considering a candidate's ideology will help "ensure that courts remain balanced and moderate." Again, Sen. Schumer's paternalistic pride assumes that he and his colleagues fully understand balance and moderation.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is also trying to change the confirmation of federal judges in dangerous ways.

FRC reports: "While attention was diverted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Sen. Leahy unilaterally changed the Senate confirmation rules. Despite heated Republican objections, Sen. Leahy ordered sensitive personal information previously limited to confidential FBI background checks included on the Judiciary Committee questionnaire nominees are required to answer."

In addition, Sen. Leahy wants to force judicial nominees to disclose any political contributions they have made.

In both cases, this once confidential information will be offered to Senators who never needed it to confirm any of the 377 judges approved during the Clinton administration. This information -- which will hardly improve Senators' ability to assess a judge's professional capability -- will undoubtedly leak to the press, embarrassing the nominees.

Sens. Leahy and Schumer are trying to select judges based on their ideology. They apparently have no confidence that judges can or will act objectively, without giving in to their political preferences.

Oddly enough, Democrats believe their liberal counterparts at the American Bar Association can act

objectively, despite marked political ideologies.

For nearly 50 years, the ABA has evaluated every U.S. president's nominees for the federal bench, giving each candidate it assesses a rating of "well qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified." According to FRC, the ABA considers its evaluations "objective," and bases its ratings on a candidate's "integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament."

In March, President Bush ended this "preferential treatment" of the ABA when he advised the group that it would not be given a "quasi official role," while it held public views on controversial issues.

Martha W. Barnett, head of the ABA, responded by saying, "We cannot think of any constructive purpose this serves."

Surely Barnett is an intelligent woman. Perhaps a review of the ABA's stance on political issues might help her understand why President Bush doubted its supposed objectivity.

The FRC notes that the group advocates "abortion on demand, affirmative action, needle giveaway programs, homosexual adoption, medical marijuana and gun control," while it opposes "the death penalty, a flag desecration amendment and the right of the Boy Scouts ... to exclude homosexual leaders."

Sen. Leahy and friends feel they cannot trust nominees to one of hundreds of judicial posts across the country to be objective judges. However, they do feel the organization that recommends or rejects these individuals -- which has a very defined political agenda -- can do so objectively.

This unquestioning trust of the ABA, yet patent mistrust of conservative judicial nominees, makes Sen.
Leahy's motives for evaluating candidates' politics seem questionable.

In more simple terms, he can't be trusted.

NATIONAL AND STATE-BASED FAMILY POLICY GROUPS CALL ON DASCHLE TO COME CLEAN ON JUDGES, STOP THE STALLING

REV_00072662

"When the terrorists are brought to justice, there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," says FRC's Ken Connor

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. -- Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is playing partisan politics with the nation's court system by blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees and leaving over 100 federal judgeships vacant, said leaders from the Washington, D.C.-based Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council (SDFPC) on Wednesday. The groups announced they would be running newspaper ads about Sen. Daschle's blocking of judicial nominees in The Argus Leader beginning Thursday.

"Sen. Daschle has ratcheted up the partisanship on judges to unprecedented levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "When Bill Clinton was president, Sen. Daschle thought that 75 vacant judgeships was a 'judicial emergency,' why isn't it a crisis when 106 judgeships are vacant now that George W. Bush is president?"

"President Bush is nominating judges who will exercise judicial restraint, yet the bitterly partisan Sen. Daschle is determined to deny the president the fruits of his election - using the War on Terrorism as an excuse," Connor said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," SDFPC Executive Director Robert Regier said. "While we're praying for his safety and for a spirit of national unity, Sen. Daschle abuses his power in a spirit of partisan hostility.

"Sen. Daschle was sent to Washington to represent our values and to uphold the Constitution. He has failed on both counts. He may have won an election or two in South Dakota, but so has President Bush. We stand behind our President and so should Sen. Daschle."

Last week, President Bush asked Sen. Daschle to speed up the judicial nomination process. Sen. Daschle not only refused, he coerced the White House and Senate Republicans to cede their recent efforts to get Bush's nominees confirmed.

"Vacancies on the federal bench are beyond crisis levels," Connor said. When President Bush took office there were 67 vacancies; today there are 106. Only twelve of the 60 judges nominated have been confirmed and only a handful even have had hearings. How does this compare with previous administrations in their first years? According to the Wall Street Journal, Ronald Reagan had 41 judges confirmed, George H.W. Bush 15 and Bill Clinton 28.

"When the terrorists are brought to justice in the U.S., there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," Connor said.

Daschle on Judicial Nominees: Not a "No Spin Zone"

REV_00072663

The Family Research Council
November 1, 2001

WASHINGTON - Claims that Senator Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees are "unfair," "false and misleading," according to Sen. Tom Daschle's spokesman Jay Carson. His remarks came in response to a press conference held on Wednesday by Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council in Sioux Falls. FRC believes the response begs a closer look at the spin vs. the reality:

Daschle Spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said the senator has been Majority Leader only since June: "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership in the Senate..."

Reality:
It's true, Sen. Daschle has only been the Majority Leader since June, but between June and the August congressional recess, President Bush made 40 judicial appointments. Why is it that under Senator Daschle's leadership the Senate has only been able to confirm 12 of those 40 nominees?

The best way to measure the Senate's record on confirming judicial appointments is how many vacancies there are at the end of a congressional session. When Bill Clinton was president, the highest number of vacancies the Senate left town without filling was 67. Currently, there are over 100 vacancies and counting. How many judicial vacancies will there be when Sen. Daschle sends the 107th Senate home for the holidays?

Daschle spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said, "Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

Reality:
Just last week, The Washington Times (October 24) reported that in a meeting with congressional leaders, President Bush asked Senator Daschle about the status of judicial nominations. To try to force Democrats to stop stalling the confirmation of judges, Republicans had been holding up the Foreign Relations spending bill. According to The Times, "Senate sources said Mr. Daschle told the president that he would not link judges with spending bills and that Mr. Bush needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats did." Is that what Sen. Daschle calls getting business done for the American people?

"Vacancies on the federal bench have gone way beyond Daschle's definition of crisis levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "It's time he stop playing political games with the nation's judiciary and help move qualified judges into the nation's empty benches."

Hutchinson Wants Smith's Name Before Committee Soon

The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

Sen. Tim Hutchinson said he wants the Senate Judiciary Committee to soon consider the appointment of former state Supreme Court justice Lavenski Smith to 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

President Bush nominated Smith, 42, to the court in May. Smith said Monday he has received no word on the confirmation process.

D.J. O'Brien, spokesman for Hutchinson, R-Ark., said the Democratic-controlled committee must first approve the nomination before Smith can be considered before the full Senate.

"I think he fits in pretty well with the mold George Bush is looking for" in judicial nominees, O'Brien said.

Smith also has the support of Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., said her spokesman, Drew Goesl.

Gov. Mike Huckabee named Smith, a Republican, as PSC chairman in January 1997 and a year later appointed his fellow Hope native to the state Supreme Court to fill out the term of Justice David Newbern, who retired.

Smith ran unsuccessfully for the state Court of Appeals in November. In December, Huckabee named him to a six-year term on the PSC.

Head of National Pro-Family Group: Daschle Playing Politics with Judges

By Steven Barrett
The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

The president of a conservative national organization says Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle is holding up President Bush's federal judicial nominations to make Bush look weak and boost Democrats' election hopes.

At a news conference Wednesday in Sioux Falls, Ken Connor of the Washington-based Family

REV_00072653

Research Council told reporters that confirmations went much faster in the first year of the three previous presidential administrations.

"The strategy is to make the president bleed, to make him appear impotent" so Democrats can win more races in 2002, Connor said.

A spokesman for Daschle said the senator from South Dakota is working hard to fill seats on the judiciary and that the Family Research Council's criticisms are unfair. Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

More than 50 nominees are pending. The federal judiciary has 110 vacancies, including 39 positions open so long the courts classify them as "judicial emergencies."

Connor accused Daschle of changing his tune on judicial confirmations since Bush succeeded Clinton. He quoted Daschle as saying in a news conference March 7, 2000, that the roughly 75 judgeships vacant then under Clinton represented a "dire shortage."

But Jay Carson, a spokesman for Daschle, countered that Daschle has been majority leader only since June, before which Republicans controlled the Senate.

"Basically, the claims that are made by the Family Research Council are false and misleading," he said.

"Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

That includes things like helping the airline industry and families who lost loved ones in the terrorist attacks, Carson said, and yes, judicial confirmations.

"Under Democratic leadership, the day after the anthrax arrived in the Capitol complex, the Judiciary Committee met in a small, cramped room inside the Capitol. They didn't have their office space anymore. It was closed off by the FBI," Carson said. "They had every excuse in the world not to meet ... but they said, 'We need to get these judges done and we're going to hold a meeting.'"

That committee includes senators as diverse as Republican Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and Democrat Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Carson called Connor's comments "disappointing" at a time when unity is important.

REV_00072654

"These sorts of partisan attacks are not what we need at this time," Carson said.

Clinton had 67 judicial nominees who never got a vote on the Senate floor, he added, and 57 of those never got a hearing. Vacancies grew from 65 when Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah became chairman of the Judiciary Committee in 1995 to 107 when Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont took over the position in June, Carson said. "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership of the Senate ...," he said. "It's hard to see those criticisms as anything other than crocodile tears."

Carson also said that since July, the Senate has confirmed four Court of Appeals judges and is scheduling a hearing for a fifth. Only three such judges were confirmed in all of 1993, under Clinton, Carson noted in a news release Wednesday afternoon.

And he said more judges may be confirmed this year, making end-of-year comparisons with previous confirmation rates inaccurate.

Connor said the depleted judiciary will be ill-equipped to handle court cases arising from the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"We've heard a great deal about bringing wrongdoers to justice," and that task will be slowed by the lack of judges, he said.

Rob Regier, executive director of the South Dakota Family Policy Council, said Daschle does not want to see Bush's nominees approved because they will exercise judicial restraint rather than press a social agenda from the bench.

"Tom Daschle is doing his level best to carry out the Clinton legacy of activist judges, even at the cost of justice," said Regier, who joined Connor at the news conference. Regier said he used to work with Connor in Washington.

Republican senators recently gave up trying to get Democrats to agree to approve a specified number of Bush's nominees this year. GOP senators decided to wait until January, the start of an election year, to begin pressuring Democrats again to approve the nominees.

Connor, clad in a green flannel shirt, tan slacks and hiking boots, said he had just finished a week of successful pheasant hunting near Plankinton. It was his sixth time hunting in the state, he said.

"We limited out each day," he said.

Judicial Nomination Clears Senate Committee

REV_00072655

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Christina Armijo's nomination for a U.S. district judgeship cleared a Senate committee Thursday. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend full Senate confirmation of Armijo to serve as a U.S. district court judge for New Mexico, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said in a news release.

Domenici recommended Armijo of Las Vegas for the job, and she was nominated by President Bush.

Domenici said he hopes Armijo's Senate confirmation will occur within the next week.

Armijo has been an appeals court judge since 1996.

Group: Daschle Delaying Judges

By David Kranz
Argus Leader
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Senator's aides deny nominees held up, assail timing of charge

A conservative group focusing on family values is accusing Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle of defying President Bush's wishes to expedite approval of federal judges.

But a Daschle spokesman said the South Dakota Family Policy Council is using misleading information to make its point.

Robert E. Regier of Sioux Falls, state executive director of the group, says the group will run an ad in today's Argus Leader asking constituents to call Daschle and tell him to stop holding up the nominations.

Regier says failure to do so sends a partisan message in a time of a national crisis.

"A key element in seeking justice on the evils of the perpetrators on our country is our justice system," Regier said in a Wednesday news conference.

Daschle is contradicting a comment made in 2000 when he said the 74 vacancies meant a "dire shortage," he said

The shortage is greater now, and Daschle isn't responding, Regier said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about the anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," he said.

REV_00072656

Jay Carson, news secretary for Daschle, said it was unfortunate that Regier and Ken Connor, president of the national organization, were the ones acting in a partisan manner at a time when Daschle was working closely with President Bush to deal with the national trauma.

"At a time when our country has come together - where Daschle meets regularly with the President, Speaker (Dennis) Hastert and Sen. (Trent) Lott - it is not the right time to start pushing a partisan agenda and engaging in partisan attacks," Carson said.

He disputes the suggestion of the two men that Daschle turned his back on Bush's request to accelerate Senate confirmation of federal judges.

"It is simpy not true. I talked to the judiciary committee staff and what they are charging, it is just not true. It is an incredibly misleading claim," Carson said.

Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

More than 50 nominees are pending. The federal judiciary has 110 vacancies, including 39 positions open so long the courts classify them as "judicial emergencies."

While the press briefing was taking place in Sioux Falls, Daschle, the president and other legislative leaders were holding a lengthy breakfast meeting, Carson said.

"They were there doing the business of the American people," he said.

Connor says the Council watches Democrats and Republicans equally and believes Republicans "caved to Daschle's hardball politics."

"We are critical of Republicans, too. We are equal opportunity critics," he said.

Criticism like this is not how Daschle gets things done, Carson said. "He doesn't do it by launching attacks with false and misleading information."

The group's comments came two days after Daschle was praised by a largely Republican crowd of 1,600 members of the Sioux Falls Area Chamber of Commerce for his emotional personalization of the war on terrorism.

Timing of the critical remarks balanced with need for action were at the center of concern for some.

One respected former conservative Republican legislator, Harvey Krautschun of Spearfish, said

the message seemed appropriate, but he had mixed emotions about the timing.

"Holding a person accountable like someone in Mr. Daschle's position is totally appropriate," he said. "There are ways to do it and there are proper times to do it. We may not always agree with Mr. Daschle, but we respect him. In light of some of the gravity and situation in what is happening and the impact here, hopefully it (criticism) is being done in the proper tenor."

Now is not the time for such discussions on judgeships, but he agrees the nominees need hearings, says Republican Gov. Bill Janklow.

"Congress is in turmoil because of the anthrax situation. They are trying to get things done with the war-related measures, airline security, emergency financial policy, dealing with recession and unemployment issues, getting an appropriations bill passed. Congress ought to stay on task,"Janklow said.

Once those issues are dealt with he says Congress needs to take up the appointments.

"We, on all sides, have to quit playing game. The Constitution says the president appoints with the consent of the Senate. I don't think Congress - after they come back in session - should delay judicial hearings for political reasons. After the hearings, vote them up or down. Justice delayed is justice denied," he said.

Senate to Vote on Thurmond's Son

By Jesse Holland
The Associate Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Strom Thurmond Jr., son of longtime South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond, is on his way to becoming U.S. Attorney in his father's home state.

The nomination of Thurmond Jr. was one of 11 U.S. attorneys sent by voice vote by the Senate Judiciary Committee to the full Senate on Thursday.

It was not immediately known when the Senate would vote on the nominations, but senators rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members. Thurmond, the oldest and longest-serving senator at 98, could be heard voting "aye" when the block of U.S. attorney nominees came up for approval. The South Carolina senator is the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the second-ranking Republican.

The younger Thurmond is an assistant state prosecutor and a 1998 University of South Carolina law school graduate. He has endorsements from both Republican and Democratic leaders for the job; he has no official affiliation.

His father says he will not run again and the younger Thurmond will turn 30, the legal age for election to the Senate, a month before his father's seat will be on the ballot again in 2002. But he has said he intends to be federal prosecutor for four years.

The committee also decided to vote next week on Terry Wooten's nomination to be a U.S. District judge in South Carolina. Wooten, currently a U.S. magistrate judge in South Carolina, has been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991.

During Thomas' hearings, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the committee has received a confidential report from the FBI on the accusation. "I urge senators to read this report before voting next week," Leahy said.

The committee sent to the Senate the nominations of four other U.S. District judges, M. Christina Armijo of New Mexico, Karon Bowdre of Alabama, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma and Larry Hicks of Nevada.

The committee also sent Edith Brown Clement's nomination for a U.S. Appeals Court seat on the 5th Circuit to the Senate for approval by an 18-0 vote. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., refused to vote on the nomination, saying Clement had not answered his questions about a judicial conference she attended. When asked whether he would hold up her confirmation by the Senate, Feingold said "certainly, until I get her answers."

Business As Usual

The Ledger
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

It's not only in the U.S. House that the post-Sept. 11 bipartisanship has eroded. In the Senate, Republicans reportedly are holding up consideration of a major foreign aid appropriations bill for domestic political reasons. If this seems like an odd time to be throwing sand on the wheels of democracy -- especially when it comes to foreign aid and particularly at a time when the

REV_00072659

United States ought to be doing all it can to win over allies around the world -- rest assured that the Republicans think they have ample justification.

They don't think the Democrats, who hold a 50-49-1 Senate majority, are moving quickly enough to approve President Bush's judicial nominations. If this sounds like an old song, it is. For the last six years of the Clinton administration, Democrats complained that the Republicans were holding up judicial nominations.

Is there a logical nexus between judicial screenings and foreign aid? No. Is this just political blackmail of the sort that most Americans hoped would be left in the smoking ruins of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks? Yes.

Is it business as usual in the Washington Swamp? Sadly, yes.

Judicial nominees should be approved or not on their own merit and in timely fashion. The foreign aid bill should be passed or defeated on its own merits. Holding one hostage for the other is unacceptable while the nation is locked in a worldwide struggle for its very existence.

Democrats Try to Bend The U.S. Judiciary Branch

Michael Chidester

Looking to leave your mark in America? If so, forget about becoming a legislator.

Lawmakers are increasingly becoming high-profile budget makers. And don't shoot for the presidency. The chances are slim, the scrutiny is unbearable, and the living conditions are way over the top. If you're looking for power, become a judge.

Newsweek Columnist Jonathan Alter recognized the power of the courts in July 2000, when he called the naming of future Supreme Court justices "the real stakes" in the 2000 presidential election. "The next president, with as many as three or four Supreme Court appointments, will touch every American life," Alter wrote.

Such power can be intoxicating, especially to politicians. So nobody should be surprised by this Sept. 5 report from the Deseret News, just three months after Democrats gained control of the Senate Judiciary Committee: "[Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah] said a hearing that Democrats called Tuesday about changes that they seek appears 'to be part of a partisan strategy to ...[inject] partisanship into the judiciary.'"

Sen. Hatch is correct. Democrats are attempting to control the judiciary -- especially the approval of new federal judges -- in a number of ways. Given the modern penchant for furthering agendas through litigation rather than legislation, the efforts of these Democrats should raise a red flag for anybody who wants an impartial judiciary.

Hatch's comments referred to the actions of Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts. The Deseret News reports, "Sen. Schumer said the Senate should be able to consider the ideology of nominees [to the federal courts] -- and reject them if their views are 'out of the mainstream.'"

In other words, if the political views of potential judges do not coincide with those of Democratic legislators -- who supposedly are best qualified to judge what ideas are "in the mainstream" -- the judges will not be confirmed.

"The hallmark of a good jurist is one who does not allow personal opinion to affect objective legal decision making," Sen. Hatch said. "The Senate's responsibility does not include establishing an ideological litmus test to gauge a candidate's fitness based on his or her position on controversial issues."

Sen. Schumer believes considering a candidate's ideology will help "ensure that courts remain balanced and moderate." Again, Sen. Schumer's paternalistic pride assumes that he and his colleagues fully understand balance and moderation.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is also trying to change the confirmation of federal judges in dangerous ways.

FRC reports: "While attention was diverted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Sen. Leahy unilaterally changed the Senate confirmation rules. Despite heated Republican objections, Sen. Leahy ordered sensitive personal information previously limited to confidential FBI background checks included on the Judiciary Committee questionnaire nominees are required to answer."

In addition, Sen. Leahy wants to force judicial nominees to disclose any political contributions they have made.

In both cases, this once confidential information will be offered to Senators who never needed it to confirm any of the 377 judges approved during the Clinton administration. This information -- which will hardly improve Senators' ability to assess a judge's professional capability -- will undoubtedly leak to the press, embarrassing the nominees.

Sens. Leahy and Schumer are trying to select judges based on their ideology. They apparently have no confidence that judges can or will act objectively, without giving in to their political preferences.

Oddly enough, Democrats believe their liberal counterparts at the American Bar Association can act

objectively, despite marked political ideologies.

For nearly 50 years, the ABA has evaluated every U.S. president's nominees for the federal bench, giving each candidate it assesses a rating of "well qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified." According to FRC, the ABA considers its evaluations "objective," and bases its ratings on a candidate's "integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament."

In March, President Bush ended this "preferential treatment" of the ABA when he advised the group that it would not be given a "quasi official role," while it held public views on controversial issues.

Martha W. Barnett, head of the ABA, responded by saying, "We cannot think of any constructive purpose this serves."

Surely Barnett is an intelligent woman. Perhaps a review of the ABA's stance on political issues might help her understand why President Bush doubted its supposed objectivity.

The FRC notes that the group advocates "abortion on demand, affirmative action, needle giveaway programs, homosexual adoption, medical marijuana and gun control," while it opposes "the death penalty, a flag desecration amendment and the right of the Boy Scouts ... to exclude homosexual leaders."

Sen. Leahy and friends feel they cannot trust nominees to one of hundreds of judicial posts across the country to be objective judges. However, they do feel the organization that recommends or rejects these individuals -- which has a very defined political agenda -- can do so objectively.

This unquestioning trust of the ABA, yet patent mistrust of conservative judicial nominees, makes Sen.
Leahy's motives for evaluating candidates' politics seem questionable.

In more simple terms, he can't be trusted.

NATIONAL AND STATE-BASED FAMILY POLICY GROUPS CALL ON DASCHLE TO COME CLEAN ON JUDGES, STOP THE STALLING

REV_00072733

"When the terrorists are brought to justice, there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," says FRC's Ken Connor

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. -- Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is playing partisan politics with the nation's court system by blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees and leaving over 100 federal judgeships vacant, said leaders from the Washington, D.C.-based Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council (SDFPC) on Wednesday. The groups announced they would be running newspaper ads about Sen. Daschle's blocking of judicial nominees in The Argus Leader beginning Thursday.

"Sen. Daschle has ratcheted up the partisanship on judges to unprecedented levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "When Bill Clinton was president, Sen. Daschle thought that 75 vacant judgeships was a 'judicial emergency,' why isn't it a crisis when 106 judgeships are vacant now that George W. Bush is president?"

"President Bush is nominating judges who will exercise judicial restraint, yet the bitterly partisan Sen. Daschle is determined to deny the president the fruits of his election - using the War on Terrorism as an excuse," Connor said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," SDFPC Executive Director Robert Regier said. "While we're praying for his safety and for a spirit of national unity, Sen. Daschle abuses his power in a spirit of partisan hostility.

"Sen. Daschle was sent to Washington to represent our values and to uphold the Constitution. He has failed on both counts. He may have won an election or two in South Dakota, but so has President Bush. We stand behind our President and so should Sen. Daschle."

Last week, President Bush asked Sen. Daschle to speed up the judicial nomination process. Sen. Daschle not only refused, he coerced the White House and Senate Republicans to cede their recent efforts to get Bush's nominees confirmed.

"Vacancies on the federal bench are beyond crisis levels," Connor said. When President Bush took office there were 67 vacancies; today there are 106. Only twelve of the 60 judges nominated have been confirmed and only a handful even have had hearings. How does this compare with previous administrations in their first years? According to the Wall Street Journal, Ronald Reagan had 41 judges confirmed, George H.W. Bush 15 and Bill Clinton 28.

"When the terrorists are brought to justice in the U.S., there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," Connor said.

Daschle on Judicial Nominees: Not a "No Spin Zone"

REV_00072734

The Family Research Council
November 1, 2001

WASHINGTON - Claims that Senator Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees are "unfair," "false and misleading," according to Sen. Tom Daschle's spokesman Jay Carson. His remarks came in response to a press conference held on Wednesday by Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council in Sioux Falls. FRC believes the response begs a closer look at the spin vs. the reality:

Daschle Spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said the senator has been Majority Leader only since June: "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership in the Senate..."

Reality:
It's true, Sen. Daschle has only been the Majority Leader since June, but between June and the August congressional recess, President Bush made 40 judicial appointments. Why is it that under Senator Daschle's leadership the Senate has only been able to confirm 12 of those 40 nominees?

The best way to measure the Senate's record on confirming judicial appointments is how many vacancies there are at the end of a congressional session. When Bill Clinton was president, the highest number of vacancies the Senate left town without filling was 67. Currently, there are over 100 vacancies and counting. How many judicial vacancies will there be when Sen. Daschle sends the 107th Senate home for the holidays?

Daschle spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said, "Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

Reality:
Just last week, The Washington Times (October 24) reported that in a meeting with congressional leaders, President Bush asked Senator Daschle about the status of judicial nominations. To try to force Democrats to stop stalling the confirmation of judges, Republicans had been holding up the Foreign Relations spending bill. According to The Times, "Senate sources said Mr. Daschle told the president that he would not link judges with spending bills and that Mr. Bush needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats did." Is that what Sen. Daschle calls getting business done for the American people?

"Vacancies on the federal bench have gone way beyond Daschle's definition of crisis levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "It's time he stop playing political games with the nation's judiciary and help move qualified judges into the nation's empty benches."

Hutchinson Wants Smith's Name Before Committee Soon

The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

Sen. Tim Hutchinson said he wants the Senate Judiciary Committee to soon consider the appointment of former state Supreme Court justice Lavenski Smith to 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

President Bush nominated Smith, 42, to the court in May. Smith said Monday he has received no word on the confirmation process.

D.J. O'Brien, spokesman for Hutchinson, R-Ark., said the Democratic-controlled committee must first approve the nomination before Smith can be considered before the full Senate.

"I think he fits in pretty well with the mold George Bush is looking for" in judicial nominees, O'Brien said.

Smith also has the support of Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., said her spokesman, Drew Goesl.

Gov. Mike Huckabee named Smith, a Republican, as PSC chairman in January 1997 and a year later appointed his fellow Hope native to the state Supreme Court to fill out the term of Justice David Newbern, who retired.

Smith ran unsuccessfully for the state Court of Appeals in November. In December, Huckabee named him to a six-year term on the PSC.

Head of National Pro-Family Group: Daschle Playing Politics with Judges

By Steven Barrett
The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

The president of a conservative national organization says Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle is holding up President Bush's federal judicial nominations to make Bush look weak and boost Democrats' election hopes.

At a news conference Wednesday in Sioux Falls, Ken Connor of the Washington-based Family

REV_00072724

Research Council told reporters that confirmations went much faster in the first year of the three previous presidential administrations.

"The strategy is to make the president bleed, to make him appear impotent" so Democrats can win more races in 2002, Connor said.

A spokesman for Daschle said the senator from South Dakota is working hard to fill seats on the judiciary and that the Family Research Council's criticisms are unfair. Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

Connor accused Daschle of changing his tune on judicial confirmations since Bush succeeded Clinton. He quoted Daschle as saying in a news conference March 7, 2000, that the roughly 75 judgeships vacant then under Clinton represented a "dire shortage."

But Jay Carson, a spokesman for Daschle, countered that Daschle has been majority leader only since June, before which Republicans controlled the Senate.

"Basically, the claims that are made by the Family Research Council are false and misleading," he said.

"Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

That includes things like helping the airline industry and families who lost loved ones in the terrorist attacks, Carson said, and yes, judicial confirmations.

"Under Democratic leadership, the day after the anthrax arrived in the Capitol complex, the Judiciary Committee met in a small, cramped room inside the Capitol. They didn't have their office space anymore. It was closed off by the FBI," Carson said. "They had every excuse in the world not to meet ... but they said, 'We need to get these judges done and we're going to hold a meeting.'"

That committee includes senators as diverse as Republican Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and Democrat Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Carson called Connor's comments "disappointing" at a time when unity is important.

REV_00072725

"These sorts of partisan attacks are not what we need at this time," Carson said.

Clinton had 67 judicial nominees who never got a vote on the Senate floor, he added, and 57 of those never got a hearing. Vacancies grew from 65 when Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah became chairman of the Judiciary Committee in 1995 to 107 when Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont took over the position in June, Carson said. "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership of the Senate ...," he said. "It's hard to see those criticisms as anything other than crocodile tears."

Carson also said that since July, the Senate has confirmed four Court of Appeals judges and is scheduling a hearing for a fifth. Only three such judges were confirmed in all of 1993, under Clinton, Carson noted in a news release Wednesday afternoon.

And he said more judges may be confirmed this year, making end-of-year comparisons with previous confirmation rates inaccurate.

Connor said the depleted judiciary will be ill-equipped to handle court cases arising from the Sept. 11
terrorist attacks.

"We've heard a great deal about bringing wrongdoers to justice," and that task will be slowed by the lack of judges, he said.

Rob Regier, executive director of the South Dakota Family Policy Council, said Daschle does not want to see Bush's nominees approved because they will exercise judicial restraint rather than press a social agenda from the bench.

"Tom Daschle is doing his level best to carry out the Clinton legacy of activist judges, even at the cost of justice," said Regier, who joined Connor at the news conference. Regier said he used to work with Connor in Washington.

Republican senators recently gave up trying to get Democrats to agree to approve a specified number of Bush's nominees this year. GOP senators decided to wait until January, the start of an election year, to begin pressuring Democrats again to approve the nominees.

Connor, clad in a green flannel shirt, tan slacks and hiking boots, said he had just finished a week of successful pheasant hunting near Plankinton. It was his sixth time hunting in the state, he said.

"We limited out each day," he said.

Judicial Nomination Clears Senate Committee

REV_00072726

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Christina Armijo's nomination for a U.S. district judgeship cleared a Senate committee Thursday. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend full Senate confirmation of Armijo to serve as a U.S. district court judge for New Mexico, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said in a news release.

Domenici recommended Armijo of Las Vegas for the job, and she was nominated by President Bush.

Domenici said he hopes Armijo's Senate confirmation will occur within the next week.

Armijo has been an appeals court judge since 1996.

Group: Daschle Delaying Judges

By David Kranz
Argus Leader
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Senator's aides deny nominees held up, assail timing of charge

A conservative group focusing on family values is accusing Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle of defying President Bush's wishes to expedite approval of federal judges.

But a Daschle spokesman said the South Dakota Family Policy Council is using misleading information to make its point.

Robert E. Regier of Sioux Falls, state executive director of the group, says the group will run an ad in today's Argus Leader asking constituents to call Daschle and tell him to stop holding up the nominations.

Regier says failure to do so sends a partisan message in a time of a national crisis.

"A key element in seeking justice on the evils of the perpetrators on our country is our justice system," Regier said in a Wednesday news conference.

Daschle is contradicting a comment made in 2000 when he said the 74 vacancies meant a "dire shortage," he said

The shortage is greater now, and Daschle isn't responding, Regier said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about the anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," he said.

REV_00072727

Jay Carson, news secretary for Daschle, said it was unfortunate that Regier and Ken Connor, president of the national organization, were the ones acting in a partisan manner at a time when Daschle was working closely with President Bush to deal with the national trauma.

"At a time when our country has come together - where Daschle meets regularly with the President, Speaker (Dennis) Hastert and Sen. (Trent) Lott - it is not the right time to start pushing a partisan agenda and engaging in partisan attacks," Carson said.

He disputes the suggestion of the two men that Daschle turned his back on Bush's request to accelerate Senate confirmation of federal judges.

"It is simpy not true. I talked to the judiciary committee staff and what they are charging, it is just not true. It is an incredibly misleading claim," Carson said.

Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

More than 50 nominees are pending. The federal judiciary has 110 vacancies, including 39 positions open so long the courts classify them as "judicial emergencies."

While the press briefing was taking place in Sioux Falls, Daschle, the president and other legislative leaders were holding a lengthy breakfast meeting, Carson said.

"They were there doing the business of the American people," he said.

Connor says the Council watches Democrats and Republicans equally and believes Republicans "caved to Daschle's hardball politics."

"We are critical of Republicans, too. We are equal opportunity critics," he said.

Criticism like this is not how Daschle gets things done, Carson said. "He doesn't do it by launching attacks with false and misleading information."

The group's comments came two days after Daschle was praised by a largely Republican crowd of 1,600 members of the Sioux Falls Area Chamber of Commerce for his emotional personalization of the war on terrorism.

Timing of the critical remarks balanced with need for action were at the center of concern for some.

One respected former conservative Republican legislator, Harvey Krautschun of Spearfish, said

the message seemed appropriate, but he had mixed emotions about the timing.

"Holding a person accountable like someone in Mr. Daschle's position is totally appropriate," he said. "There are ways to do it and there are proper times to do it. We may not always agree with Mr. Daschle, but we respect him. In light of some of the gravity and situation in what is happening and the impact here, hopefully it (criticism) is being done in the proper tenor."

Now is not the time for such discussions on judgeships, but he agrees the nominees need hearings, says Republican Gov. Bill Janklow.

"Congress is in turmoil because of the anthrax situation. They are trying to get things done with the war-related measures, airline security, emergency financial policy, dealing with recession and unemployment issues, getting an appropriations bill passed. Congress ought to stay on task,"Janklow said.

Once those issues are dealt with he says Congress needs to take up the appointments.

"We, on all sides, have to quit playing game. The Constitution says the president appoints with the consent of the Senate. I don't think Congress - after they come back in session - should delay judicial hearings for political reasons. After the hearings, vote them up or down. Justice delayed is justice denied," he said.

Senate to Vote on Thurmond's Son

By Jesse Holland
The Associate Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Strom Thurmond Jr., son of longtime South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond, is on his way to becoming U.S. Attorney in his father's home state.

The nomination of Thurmond Jr. was one of 11 U.S. attorneys sent by voice vote by the Senate Judiciary Committee to the full Senate on Thursday.

It was not immediately known when the Senate would vote on the nominations, but senators rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members. Thurmond, the oldest and longest-serving senator at 98, could be heard voting "aye" when the block of U.S. attorney nominees came up for approval. The South Carolina senator is the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the second-ranking Republican.

The younger Thurmond is an assistant state prosecutor and a 1998 University of South Carolina law school graduate. He has endorsements from both Republican and Democratic leaders for the job; he has no official affiliation.

His father says he will not run again and the younger Thurmond will turn 30, the legal age for election to the Senate, a month before his father's seat will be on the ballot again in 2002. But he has said he intends to be federal prosecutor for four years.

The committee also decided to vote next week on Terry Wooten's nomination to be a U.S. District judge in South Carolina. Wooten, currently a U.S. magistrate judge in South Carolina, has been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991.

During Thomas' hearings, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the committee has received a confidential report from the FBI on the accusation. "I urge senators to read this report before voting next week," Leahy said.

The committee sent to the Senate the nominations of four other U.S. District judges, M. Christina Armijo of New Mexico, Karon Bowdre of Alabama, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma and Larry Hicks of Nevada.

The committee also sent Edith Brown Clement's nomination for a U.S. Appeals Court seat on the 5th Circuit to the Senate for approval by an 18-0 vote. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., refused to vote on the nomination, saying Clement had not answered his questions about a judicial conference she attended. When asked whether he would hold up her confirmation by the Senate, Feingold said "certainly, until I get her answers."

Business As Usual

The Ledger
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

It's not only in the U.S. House that the post-Sept. 11 bipartisanship has eroded. In the Senate, Republicans reportedly are holding up consideration of a major foreign aid appropriations bill for domestic political reasons. If this seems like an odd time to be throwing sand on the wheels of democracy -- especially when it comes to foreign aid and particularly at a time when the

REV_00072730

United States ought to be doing all it can to win over allies around the world -- rest assured that the Republicans think they have ample justification.

They don't think the Democrats, who hold a 50-49-1 Senate majority, are moving quickly enough to approve President Bush's judicial nominations. If this sounds like an old song, it is. For the last six years of the Clinton administration, Democrats complained that the Republicans were holding up judicial nominations.

Is there a logical nexus between judicial screenings and foreign aid? No. Is this just political blackmail of the sort that most Americans hoped would be left in the smoking ruins of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks? Yes.

Is it business as usual in the Washington Swamp? Sadly, yes.

Judicial nominees should be approved or not on their own merit and in timely fashion. The foreign aid bill should be passed or defeated on its own merits. Holding one hostage for the other is unacceptable while the nation is locked in a worldwide struggle for its very existence.

Democrats Try to Bend The U.S. Judiciary Branch

Michael Chidester
Daily Utah Chronicle
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

Looking to leave your mark in America? If so, forget about becoming a legislator.

Lawmakers are increasingly becoming high-profile budget makers. And don't shoot for the presidency. The chances are slim, the scrutiny is unbearable, and the living conditions are way over the top. If you're looking for power, become a judge.

Newsweek Columnist Jonathan Alter recognized the power of the courts in July 2000, when he called the naming of future Supreme Court justices "the real stakes" in the 2000 presidential election. "The next president, with as many as three or four Supreme Court appointments, will touch every American life," Alter wrote.

Such power can be intoxicating, especially to politicians. So nobody should be surprised by this Sept. 5
report from the Deseret News, just three months after Democrats gained control of the Senate Judiciary Committee: "[Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah] said a hearing that Democrats called Tuesday about changes that they seek appears 'to be part of a partisan strategy to ...[inject] partisanship into the judiciary.'"

Sen. Hatch is correct. Democrats are attempting to control the judiciary -- especially the approval of new federal judges -- in a number of ways. Given the modern penchant for furthering agendas through litigation rather than legislation, the efforts of these Democrats should raise a red flag for anybody who wants an impartial judiciary.

Hatch's comments referred to the actions of Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts. The Deseret News reports, "Sen. Schumer said the Senate should be able to consider the ideology of nominees [to the federal courts] -- and reject them if their views are 'out of the mainstream.'"

In other words, if the political views of potential judges do not coincide with those of Democratic legislators -- who supposedly are best qualified to judge what ideas are "in the mainstream" -- the judges will not be confirmed.

"The hallmark of a good jurist is one who does not allow personal opinion to affect objective legal decision making," Sen. Hatch said. "The Senate's responsibility does not include establishing an ideological litmus test to gauge a candidate's fitness based on his or her position on controversial issues."

Sen. Schumer believes considering a candidate's ideology will help "ensure that courts remain balanced and moderate." Again, Sen. Schumer's paternalistic pride assumes that he and his colleagues fully understand balance and moderation.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is also trying to change the confirmation of federal judges in dangerous ways.

FRC reports: "While attention was diverted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Sen. Leahy unilaterally changed the Senate confirmation rules. Despite heated Republican objections, Sen. Leahy ordered sensitive personal information previously limited to confidential FBI background checks included on the Judiciary Committee questionnaire nominees are required to answer."

In addition, Sen. Leahy wants to force judicial nominees to disclose any political contributions they have made.

In both cases, this once confidential information will be offered to Senators who never needed it to confirm any of the 377 judges approved during the Clinton administration. This information -- which will hardly improve Senators' ability to assess a judge's professional capability -- will undoubtedly leak to the press, embarrassing the nominees.

Sens. Leahy and Schumer are trying to select judges based on their ideology. They apparently have no confidence that judges can or will act objectively, without giving in to their political preferences.

Oddly enough, Democrats believe their liberal counterparts at the American Bar Association can act

objectively, despite marked political ideologies.

For nearly 50 years, the ABA has evaluated every U.S. president's nominees for the federal bench, giving each candidate it assesses a rating of "well qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified." According to FRC, the ABA considers its evaluations "objective," and bases its ratings on a candidate's "integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament."

In March, President Bush ended this "preferential treatment" of the ABA when he advised the group that it would not be given a "quasi official role," while it held public views on controversial issues.

Martha W. Barnett, head of the ABA, responded by saying, "We cannot think of any constructive purpose this serves."

Surely Barnett is an intelligent woman. Perhaps a review of the ABA's stance on political issues might help her understand why President Bush doubted its supposed objectivity.

The FRC notes that the group advocates "abortion on demand, affirmative action, needle giveaway programs, homosexual adoption, medical marijuana and gun control," while it opposes "the death penalty, a flag desecration amendment and the right of the Boy Scouts ... to exclude homosexual leaders."

Sen. Leahy and friends feel they cannot trust nominees to one of hundreds of judicial posts across the country to be objective judges. However, they do feel the organization that recommends or rejects these individuals -- which has a very defined political agenda -- can do so objectively.

This unquestioning trust of the ABA, yet patent mistrust of conservative judicial nominees, makes Sen.
Leahy's motives for evaluating candidates' politics seem questionable.

In more simple terms, he can't be trusted.

NATIONAL AND STATE-BASED FAMILY POLICY GROUPS CALL ON DASCHLE TO COME CLEAN ON JUDGES, STOP THE STALLING

REV_00072749

"When the terrorists are brought to justice, there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," says FRC's Ken Connor

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. -- Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is playing partisan politics with the nation's court system by blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees and leaving over 100 federal judgeships vacant, said leaders from the Washington, D.C.-based Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council (SDFPC) on Wednesday. The groups announced they would be running newspaper ads about Sen. Daschle's blocking of judicial nominees in The Argus Leader beginning Thursday.

"Sen. Daschle has ratcheted up the partisanship on judges to unprecedented levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "When Bill Clinton was president, Sen. Daschle thought that 75 vacant judgeships was a 'judicial emergency,' why isn't it a crisis when 106 judgeships are vacant now that George W. Bush is president?"

"President Bush is nominating judges who will exercise judicial restraint, yet the bitterly partisan Sen. Daschle is determined to deny the president the fruits of his election - using the War on Terrorism as an excuse," Connor said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," SDFPC Executive Director Robert Regier said. "While we're praying for his safety and for a spirit of national unity, Sen. Daschle abuses his power in a spirit of partisan hostility.

"Sen. Daschle was sent to Washington to represent our values and to uphold the Constitution. He has failed on both counts. He may have won an election or two in South Dakota, but so has President Bush. We stand behind our President and so should Sen. Daschle."

Last week, President Bush asked Sen. Daschle to speed up the judicial nomination process. Sen. Daschle not only refused, he coerced the White House and Senate Republicans to cede their recent efforts to get Bush's nominees confirmed.

"Vacancies on the federal bench are beyond crisis levels," Connor said. When President Bush took office there were 67 vacancies; today there are 106. Only twelve of the 60 judges nominated have been confirmed and only a handful even have had hearings. How does this compare with previous administrations in their first years? According to the Wall Street Journal, Ronald Reagan had 41 judges confirmed, George H.W. Bush 15 and Bill Clinton 28.

"When the terrorists are brought to justice in the U.S., there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," Connor said.

Daschle on Judicial Nominees: Not a "No Spin Zone"

REV_00072750

The Family Research Council
November 1, 2001

WASHINGTON - Claims that Senator Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees are "unfair," "false and misleading," according to Sen. Tom Daschle's spokesman Jay Carson. His remarks came in response to a press conference held on Wednesday by Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council in Sioux Falls. FRC believes the response begs a closer look at the spin vs. the reality:

Daschle Spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said the senator has been Majority Leader only since June: "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership in the Senate..."

Reality:
It's true, Sen. Daschle has only been the Majority Leader since June, but between June and the August congressional recess, President Bush made 40 judicial appointments. Why is it that under Senator Daschle's leadership the Senate has only been able to confirm 12 of those 40 nominees?

The best way to measure the Senate's record on confirming judicial appointments is how many vacancies there are at the end of a congressional session. When Bill Clinton was president, the highest number of vacancies the Senate left town without filling was 67. Currently, there are over 100 vacancies and counting. How many judicial vacancies will there be when Sen. Daschle sends the 107th Senate home for the holidays?

Daschle spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said, "Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

Reality:
Just last week, The Washington Times (October 24) reported that in a meeting with congressional leaders, President Bush asked Senator Daschle about the status of judicial nominations. To try to force Democrats to stop stalling the confirmation of judges, Republicans had been holding up the Foreign Relations spending bill. According to The Times, "Senate sources said Mr. Daschle told the president that he would not link judges with spending bills and that Mr. Bush needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats did." Is that what Sen. Daschle calls getting business done for the American people?

"Vacancies on the federal bench have gone way beyond Daschle's definition of crisis levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "It's time he stop playing political games with the nation's judiciary and help move qualified judges into the nation's empty benches."

REV_00072751

On Thursday, FRC and SDFPC ran an ad about Sen. Daschle blocking judicial nominees in South Dakota's Argus Leader.

Hutchinson Wants Smith's Name Before Committee Soon

The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

Sen. Tim Hutchinson said he wants the Senate Judiciary Committee to soon consider the appointment of former state Supreme Court justice Lavenski Smith to 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

President Bush nominated Smith, 42, to the court in May. Smith said Monday he has received no word on the confirmation process.

D.J. O'Brien, spokesman for Hutchinson, R-Ark., said the Democratic-controlled committee must first approve the nomination before Smith can be considered before the full Senate.

"I think he fits in pretty well with the mold George Bush is looking for" in judicial nominees, O'Brien said.

Smith also has the support of Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., said her spokesman, Drew Goesl.

Gov. Mike Huckabee named Smith, a Republican, as PSC chairman in January 1997 and a year later appointed his fellow Hope native to the state Supreme Court to fill out the term of Justice David Newbern, who retired.

Smith ran unsuccessfully for the state Court of Appeals in November. In December, Huckabee named him to a six-year term on the PSC.

Head of National Pro-Family Group: Daschle Playing Politics with Judges

By Steven Barrett
The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

The president of a conservative national organization says Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle is holding up President Bush's federal judicial nominations to make Bush look weak and boost Democrats' election hopes.

At a news conference Wednesday in Sioux Falls, Ken Connor of the Washington-based Family

REV_00072740

Research Council told reporters that confirmations went much faster in the first year of the three previous presidential administrations.

"The strategy is to make the president bleed, to make him appear impotent" so Democrats can win more races in 2002, Connor said.

A spokesman for Daschle said the senator from South Dakota is working hard to fill seats on the judiciary and that the Family Research Council's criticisms are unfair. Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

Connor accused Daschle of changing his tune on judicial confirmations since Bush succeeded Clinton. He quoted Daschle as saying in a news conference March 7, 2000, that the roughly 75 judgeships vacant then under Clinton represented a "dire shortage."

But Jay Carson, a spokesman for Daschle, countered that Daschle has been majority leader only since June, before which Republicans controlled the Senate.

"Basically, the claims that are made by the Family Research Council are false and misleading," he said.

"Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

That includes things like helping the airline industry and families who lost loved ones in the terrorist attacks, Carson said, and yes, judicial confirmations.

"Under Democratic leadership, the day after the anthrax arrived in the Capitol complex, the Judiciary Committee met in a small, cramped room inside the Capitol. They didn't have their office space anymore. It was closed off by the FBI," Carson said. "They had every excuse in the world not to meet ... but they said, 'We need to get these judges done and we're going to hold a meeting.'"

That committee includes senators as diverse as Republican Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and Democrat Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Carson called Connor's comments "disappointing" at a time when unity is important.

REV_00072741

"These sorts of partisan attacks are not what we need at this time," Carson said.

Clinton had 67 judicial nominees who never got a vote on the Senate floor, he added, and 57 of those never got a hearing. Vacancies grew from 65 when Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah became chairman of the Judiciary Committee in 1995 to 107 when Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont took over the position in June, Carson said. "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership of the Senate ...," he said. "It's hard to see those criticisms as anything other than crocodile tears."

Carson also said that since July, the Senate has confirmed four Court of Appeals judges and is scheduling a hearing for a fifth. Only three such judges were confirmed in all of 1993, under Clinton, Carson noted in a news release Wednesday afternoon.

And he said more judges may be confirmed this year, making end-of-year comparisons with previous confirmation rates inaccurate.

Connor said the depleted judiciary will be ill-equipped to handle court cases arising from the Sept. 11
terrorist attacks.

"We've heard a great deal about bringing wrongdoers to justice," and that task will be slowed by the lack of judges, he said.

Rob Regier, executive director of the South Dakota Family Policy Council, said Daschle does not want to see Bush's nominees approved because they will exercise judicial restraint rather than press a social agenda from the bench.

"Tom Daschle is doing his level best to carry out the Clinton legacy of activist judges, even at the cost of justice," said Regier, who joined Connor at the news conference. Regier said he used to work with Connor in Washington.

Republican senators recently gave up trying to get Democrats to agree to approve a specified number of Bush's nominees this year. GOP senators decided to wait until January, the start of an election year, to begin pressuring Democrats again to approve the nominees.

Connor, clad in a green flannel shirt, tan slacks and hiking boots, said he had just finished a week of successful pheasant hunting near Plankinton. It was his sixth time hunting in the state, he said.

"We limited out each day," he said.

Judicial Nomination Clears Senate Committee

REV_00072742

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Christina Armijo's nomination for a U.S. district judgeship cleared a Senate committee Thursday. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend full Senate confirmation of Armijo to serve as a U.S. district court judge for New Mexico, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said in a news release.

Domenici recommended Armijo of Las Vegas for the job, and she was nominated by President Bush.

Domenici said he hopes Armijo's Senate confirmation will occur within the next week.

Armijo has been an appeals court judge since 1996.

Senator's aides deny nominees held up, assail timing of charge

A conservative group focusing on family values is accusing Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle of defying President Bush's wishes to expedite approval of federal judges.

But a Daschle spokesman said the South Dakota Family Policy Council is using misleading information to make its point.

Robert E. Regier of Sioux Falls, state executive director of the group, says the group will run an ad in today's Argus Leader asking constituents to call Daschle and tell him to stop holding up the nominations.

Regier says failure to do so sends a partisan message in a time of a national crisis.

"A key element in seeking justice on the evils of the perpetrators on our country is our justice system," Regier said in a Wednesday news conference.

Daschle is contradicting a comment made in 2000 when he said the 74 vacancies meant a "dire shortage," he said

The shortage is greater now, and Daschle isn't responding, Regier said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about the anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," he said.

REV_00072743

Jay Carson, news secretary for Daschle, said it was unfortunate that Regier and Ken Connor, president of the national organization, were the ones acting in a partisan manner at a time when Daschle was working closely with President Bush to deal with the national trauma.

"At a time when our country has come together - where Daschle meets regularly with the President, Speaker (Dennis) Hastert and Sen. (Trent) Lott - it is not the right time to start pushing a partisan agenda and engaging in partisan attacks," Carson said.

He disputes the suggestion of the two men that Daschle turned his back on Bush's request to accelerate Senate confirmation of federal judges.

"It is simpy not true. I talked to the judiciary committee staff and what they are charging, it is just not true. It is an incredibly misleading claim," Carson said.

Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

More than 50 nominees are pending. The federal judiciary has 110 vacancies, including 39 positions open so long the courts classify them as "judicial emergencies."

While the press briefing was taking place in Sioux Falls, Daschle, the president and other legislative leaders were holding a lengthy breakfast meeting, Carson said.

"They were there doing the business of the American people," he said.

Connor says the Council watches Democrats and Republicans equally and believes Republicans "caved to Daschle's hardball politics."

"We are critical of Republicans, too. We are equal opportunity critics," he said.

Criticism like this is not how Daschle gets things done, Carson said. "He doesn't do it by launching attacks with false and misleading information."

The group's comments came two days after Daschle was praised by a largely Republican crowd of 1,600 members of the Sioux Falls Area Chamber of Commerce for his emotional personalization of the war on terrorism.

Timing of the critical remarks balanced with need for action were at the center of concern for some.

One respected former conservative Republican legislator, Harvey Krautschun of Spearfish, said

the message seemed appropriate, but he had mixed emotions about the timing.

"Holding a person accountable like someone in Mr. Daschle's position is totally appropriate," he said. "There are ways to do it and there are proper times to do it. We may not always agree with Mr. Daschle, but we respect him. In light of some of the gravity and situation in what is happening and the impact here, hopefully it (criticism) is being done in the proper tenor."

Now is not the time for such discussions on judgeships, but he agrees the nominees need hearings, says Republican Gov. Bill Janklow.

"Congress is in turmoil because of the anthrax situation. They are trying to get things done with the war-related measures, airline security, emergency financial policy, dealing with recession and unemployment issues, getting an appropriations bill passed. Congress ought to stay on task,"Janklow said.

Once those issues are dealt with he says Congress needs to take up the appointments.

"We, on all sides, have to quit playing game. The Constitution says the president appoints with the consent of the Senate. I don't think Congress - after they come back in session - should delay judicial hearings for political reasons. After the hearings, vote them up or down. Justice delayed is justice denied," he said.

Senate to Vote on Thurmond's Son

By Jesse Holland
The Associate Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Strom Thurmond Jr., son of longtime South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond, is on his way to becoming U.S. Attorney in his father's home state.

The nomination of Thurmond Jr. was one of 11 U.S. attorneys sent by voice vote by the Senate Judiciary Committee to the full Senate on Thursday.

It was not immediately known when the Senate would vote on the nominations, but senators rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members. Thurmond, the oldest and longest-serving senator at 98, could be heard voting "aye" when the block of U.S. attorney nominees came up for approval. The South Carolina senator is the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the second-ranking Republican.

The younger Thurmond is an assistant state prosecutor and a 1998 University of South Carolina law school graduate. He has endorsements from both Republican and Democratic leaders for the job; he has no official affiliation.

His father says he will not run again and the younger Thurmond will turn 30, the legal age for election to the Senate, a month before his father's seat will be on the ballot again in 2002. But he has said he intends to be federal prosecutor for four years.

The committee also decided to vote next week on Terry Wooten's nomination to be a U.S. District judge in South Carolina. Wooten, currently a U.S. magistrate judge in South Carolina, has been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991.

During Thomas' hearings, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the committee has received a confidential report from the FBI on the accusation. "I urge senators to read this report before voting next week," Leahy said.

The committee sent to the Senate the nominations of four other U.S. District judges, M. Christina Armijo of New Mexico, Karon Bowdre of Alabama, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma and Larry Hicks of Nevada.

The committee also sent Edith Brown Clement's nomination for a U.S. Appeals Court seat on the 5th Circuit to the Senate for approval by an 18-0 vote. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., refused to vote on the nomination, saying Clement had not answered his questions about a judicial conference she attended. When asked whether he would hold up her confirmation by the Senate, Feingold said "certainly, until I get her answers."

Business As Usual

The Ledger
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

It's not only in the U.S. House that the post-Sept. 11 bipartisanship has eroded. In the Senate, Republicans reportedly are holding up consideration of a major foreign aid appropriations bill for domestic political reasons. If this seems like an odd time to be throwing sand on the wheels of democracy -- especially when it comes to foreign aid and particularly at a time when the

REV_00072746

United States ought to be doing all it can to win over allies around the world -- rest assured that the Republicans think they have ample justification.

They don't think the Democrats, who hold a 50-49-1 Senate majority, are moving quickly enough to approve President Bush's judicial nominations. If this sounds like an old song, it is. For the last six years of the Clinton administration, Democrats complained that the Republicans were holding up judicial nominations.

Is there a logical nexus between judicial screenings and foreign aid? No. Is this just political blackmail of the sort that most Americans hoped would be left in the smoking ruins of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks? Yes.

Is it business as usual in the Washington Swamp? Sadly, yes.

Judicial nominees should be approved or not on their own merit and in timely fashion. The foreign aid bill should be passed or defeated on its own merits. Holding one hostage for the other is unacceptable while the nation is locked in a worldwide struggle for its very existence.

Democrats Try to Bend The U.S. Judiciary Branch

Michael Chidester
Daily Utah Chronicle
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

Looking to leave your mark in America? If so, forget about becoming a legislator.

Lawmakers are increasingly becoming high-profile budget makers. And don't shoot for the presidency. The chances are slim, the scrutiny is unbearable, and the living conditions are way over the top. If you're looking for power, become a judge.

Newsweek Columnist Jonathan Alter recognized the power of the courts in July 2000, when he called the naming of future Supreme Court justices "the real stakes" in the 2000 presidential election. "The next president, with as many as three or four Supreme Court appointments, will touch every American life," Alter wrote.

Such power can be intoxicating, especially to politicians. So nobody should be surprised by this Sept. 5
report from the Deseret News, just three months after Democrats gained control of the Senate Judiciary Committee: "[Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah] said a hearing that Democrats called Tuesday about changes that they seek appears 'to be part of a partisan strategy to ...[inject] partisanship into the judiciary.'"

Sen. Hatch is correct. Democrats are attempting to control the judiciary -- especially the approval of new federal judges -- in a number of ways. Given the modern penchant for furthering agendas through litigation rather than legislation, the efforts of these Democrats should raise a red flag for anybody who wants an impartial judiciary.

Hatch's comments referred to the actions of Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts. The Deseret News reports, "Sen. Schumer said the Senate should be able to consider the ideology of nominees [to the federal courts] -- and reject them if their views are 'out of the mainstream.'"

In other words, if the political views of potential judges do not coincide with those of Democratic legislators -- who supposedly are best qualified to judge what ideas are "in the mainstream" -- the judges will not be confirmed.

"The hallmark of a good jurist is one who does not allow personal opinion to affect objective legal decision making," Sen. Hatch said. "The Senate's responsibility does not include establishing an ideological litmus test to gauge a candidate's fitness based on his or her position on controversial issues."

Sen. Schumer believes considering a candidate's ideology will help "ensure that courts remain balanced and moderate." Again, Sen. Schumer's paternalistic pride assumes that he and his colleagues fully understand balance and moderation.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is also trying to change the confirmation of federal judges in dangerous ways.

FRC reports: "While attention was diverted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Sen. Leahy unilaterally changed the Senate confirmation rules. Despite heated Republican objections, Sen. Leahy ordered sensitive personal information previously limited to confidential FBI background checks included on the Judiciary Committee questionnaire nominees are required to answer."

In addition, Sen. Leahy wants to force judicial nominees to disclose any political contributions they have made.

In both cases, this once confidential information will be offered to Senators who never needed it to confirm any of the 377 judges approved during the Clinton administration. This information -- which will hardly improve Senators' ability to assess a judge's professional capability -- will undoubtedly leak to the press, embarrassing the nominees.

Sens. Leahy and Schumer are trying to select judges based on their ideology. They apparently have no confidence that judges can or will act objectively, without giving in to their political preferences.

Oddly enough, Democrats believe their liberal counterparts at the American Bar Association can act

objectively, despite marked political ideologies.

For nearly 50 years, the ABA has evaluated every U.S. president's nominees for the federal bench, giving each candidate it assesses a rating of "well qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified." According to FRC, the ABA considers its evaluations "objective," and bases its ratings on a candidate's "integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament."

In March, President Bush ended this "preferential treatment" of the ABA when he advised the group that it would not be given a "quasi official role," while it held public views on controversial issues.

Martha W. Barnett, head of the ABA, responded by saying, "We cannot think of any constructive purpose this serves."

Surely Barnett is an intelligent woman. Perhaps a review of the ABA's stance on political issues might help her understand why President Bush doubted its supposed objectivity.

The FRC notes that the group advocates "abortion on demand, affirmative action, needle giveaway programs, homosexual adoption, medical marijuana and gun control," while it opposes "the death penalty, a flag desecration amendment and the right of the Boy Scouts ... to exclude homosexual leaders."

Sen. Leahy and friends feel they cannot trust nominees to one of hundreds of judicial posts across the country to be objective judges. However, they do feel the organization that recommends or rejects these individuals -- which has a very defined political agenda -- can do so objectively.

This unquestioning trust of the ABA, yet patent mistrust of conservative judicial nominees, makes Sen.
Leahy's motives for evaluating candidates' politics seem questionable.

In more simple terms, he can't be trusted.

NATIONAL AND STATE-BASED FAMILY POLICY GROUPS CALL ON DASCHLE TO COME CLEAN ON JUDGES, STOP THE STALLING

REV_00072765

"When the terrorists are brought to justice, there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," says FRC's Ken Connor

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. -- Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is playing partisan politics with the nation's court system by blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees and leaving over 100 federal judgeships vacant, said leaders from the Washington, D.C.-based Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council (SDFPC) on Wednesday. The groups announced they would be running newspaper ads about Sen. Daschle's blocking of judicial nominees in The Argus Leader beginning Thursday.

"Sen. Daschle has ratcheted up the partisanship on judges to unprecedented levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "When Bill Clinton was president, Sen. Daschle thought that 75 vacant judgeships was a 'judicial emergency,' why isn't it a crisis when 106 judgeships are vacant now that George W. Bush is president?"

"President Bush is nominating judges who will exercise judicial restraint, yet the bitterly partisan Sen. Daschle is determined to deny the president the fruits of his election - using the War on Terrorism as an excuse," Connor said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," SDFPC Executive Director Robert Regier said. "While we're praying for his safety and for a spirit of national unity, Sen. Daschle abuses his power in a spirit of partisan hostility.

"Sen. Daschle was sent to Washington to represent our values and to uphold the Constitution. He has failed on both counts. He may have won an election or two in South Dakota, but so has President Bush. We stand behind our President and so should Sen. Daschle."

Last week, President Bush asked Sen. Daschle to speed up the judicial nomination process. Sen. Daschle not only refused, he coerced the White House and Senate Republicans to cede their recent efforts to get Bush's nominees confirmed.

"Vacancies on the federal bench are beyond crisis levels," Connor said. When President Bush took office there were 67 vacancies; today there are 106. Only twelve of the 60 judges nominated have been confirmed and only a handful even have had hearings. How does this compare with previous administrations in their first years? According to the Wall Street Journal, Ronald Reagan had 41 judges confirmed, George H.W. Bush 15 and Bill Clinton 28.

"When the terrorists are brought to justice in the U.S., there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," Connor said.

Daschle on Judicial Nominees: Not a "No Spin Zone"

REV_00072766

The Family Research Council
November 1, 2001

WASHINGTON - Claims that Senator Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees are "unfair," "false and misleading," according to Sen. Tom Daschle's spokesman Jay Carson. His remarks came in response to a press conference held on Wednesday by Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council in Sioux Falls. FRC believes the response begs a closer look at the spin vs. the reality:

Daschle Spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said the senator has been Majority Leader only since June: "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership in the Senate..."

Reality:
It's true, Sen. Daschle has only been the Majority Leader since June, but between June and the August congressional recess, President Bush made 40 judicial appointments. Why is it that under Senator Daschle's leadership the Senate has only been able to confirm 12 of those 40 nominees?

The best way to measure the Senate's record on confirming judicial appointments is how many vacancies there are at the end of a congressional session. When Bill Clinton was president, the highest number of vacancies the Senate left town without filling was 67. Currently, there are over 100 vacancies and counting. How many judicial vacancies will there be when Sen. Daschle sends the 107th Senate home for the holidays?

Daschle spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said, "Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

Reality:
Just last week, The Washington Times (October 24) reported that in a meeting with congressional leaders, President Bush asked Senator Daschle about the status of judicial nominations. To try to force Democrats to stop stalling the confirmation of judges, Republicans had been holding up the Foreign Relations spending bill. According to The Times, "Senate sources said Mr. Daschle told the president that he would not link judges with spending bills and that Mr. Bush needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats did." Is that what Sen. Daschle calls getting business done for the American people?

"Vacancies on the federal bench have gone way beyond Daschle's definition of crisis levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "It's time he stop playing political games with the nation's judiciary and help move qualified judges into the nation's empty benches."

REV_00072767

On Thursday, FRC and SDFPC ran an ad about Sen. Daschle blocking judicial nominees in South Dakota's Argus Leader.

Hutchinson Wants Smith's Name Before Committee Soon

The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

Sen. Tim Hutchinson said he wants the Senate Judiciary Committee to soon consider the appointment of former state Supreme Court justice Lavenski Smith to 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

President Bush nominated Smith, 42, to the court in May. Smith said Monday he has received no word on the confirmation process.

D.J. O'Brien, spokesman for Hutchinson, R-Ark., said the Democratic-controlled committee must first approve the nomination before Smith can be considered before the full Senate.

"I think he fits in pretty well with the mold George Bush is looking for" in judicial nominees, O'Brien said.

Smith also has the support of Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., said her spokesman, Drew Goesl.

Gov. Mike Huckabee named Smith, a Republican, as PSC chairman in January 1997 and a year later appointed his fellow Hope native to the state Supreme Court to fill out the term of Justice David Newbern, who retired.

Smith ran unsuccessfully for the state Court of Appeals in November. In December, Huckabee named him to a six-year term on the PSC.

Head of National Pro-Family Group: Daschle Playing Politics with Judges

By Steven Barrett
The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

The president of a conservative national organization says Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle is holding up President Bush's federal judicial nominations to make Bush look weak and boost Democrats' election hopes.

At a news conference Wednesday in Sioux Falls, Ken Connor of the Washington-based Family

REV_00072756

Research Council told reporters that confirmations went much faster in the first year of the three previous presidential administrations.

"The strategy is to make the president bleed, to make him appear impotent" so Democrats can win more races in 2002, Connor said.

A spokesman for Daschle said the senator from South Dakota is working hard to fill seats on the judiciary and that the Family Research Council's criticisms are unfair. Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

Connor accused Daschle of changing his tune on judicial confirmations since Bush succeeded Clinton. He quoted Daschle as saying in a news conference March 7, 2000, that the roughly 75 judgeships vacant then under Clinton represented a "dire shortage."

But Jay Carson, a spokesman for Daschle, countered that Daschle has been majority leader only since June, before which Republicans controlled the Senate.

"Basically, the claims that are made by the Family Research Council are false and misleading," he said.

"Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

That includes things like helping the airline industry and families who lost loved ones in the terrorist attacks, Carson said, and yes, judicial confirmations.

"Under Democratic leadership, the day after the anthrax arrived in the Capitol complex, the Judiciary Committee met in a small, cramped room inside the Capitol. They didn't have their office space anymore. It was closed off by the FBI," Carson said. "They had every excuse in the world not to meet ... but they said, 'We need to get these judges done and we're going to hold a meeting.'"

That committee includes senators as diverse as Republican Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and Democrat Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Carson called Connor's comments "disappointing" at a time when unity is important.

REV_00072757

"These sorts of partisan attacks are not what we need at this time," Carson said.

Clinton had 67 judicial nominees who never got a vote on the Senate floor, he added, and 57 of those never got a hearing. Vacancies grew from 65 when Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah became chairman of the Judiciary Committee in 1995 to 107 when Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont took over the position in June, Carson said. "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership of the Senate ...," he said. "It's hard to see those criticisms as anything other than crocodile tears."

Carson also said that since July, the Senate has confirmed four Court of Appeals judges and is scheduling a hearing for a fifth. Only three such judges were confirmed in all of 1993, under Clinton, Carson noted in a news release Wednesday afternoon.

And he said more judges may be confirmed this year, making end-of-year comparisons with previous confirmation rates inaccurate.

Connor said the depleted judiciary will be ill-equipped to handle court cases arising from the Sept. 11
terrorist attacks.

"We've heard a great deal about bringing wrongdoers to justice," and that task will be slowed by the lack of judges, he said.

Rob Regier, executive director of the South Dakota Family Policy Council, said Daschle does not want to see Bush's nominees approved because they will exercise judicial restraint rather than press a social agenda from the bench.

"Tom Daschle is doing his level best to carry out the Clinton legacy of activist judges, even at the cost of justice," said Regier, who joined Connor at the news conference. Regier said he used to work with Connor in Washington.

Republican senators recently gave up trying to get Democrats to agree to approve a specified number of Bush's nominees this year. GOP senators decided to wait until January, the start of an election year, to begin pressuring Democrats again to approve the nominees.

Connor, clad in a green flannel shirt, tan slacks and hiking boots, said he had just finished a week of successful pheasant hunting near Plankinton. It was his sixth time hunting in the state, he said.

"We limited out each day," he said.

Judicial Nomination Clears Senate Committee

REV_00072758

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Christina Armijo's nomination for a U.S. district judgeship cleared a Senate committee Thursday. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend full Senate confirmation of Armijo to serve as a U.S. district court judge for New Mexico, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said in a news release.

Domenici recommended Armijo of Las Vegas for the job, and she was nominated by President Bush.

Domenici said he hopes Armijo's Senate confirmation will occur within the next week.

Armijo has been an appeals court judge since 1996.

Group: Daschle Delaying Judges

By David Kranz
Argus Leader
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Senator's aides deny nominees held up, assail timing of charge

A conservative group focusing on family values is accusing Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle of defying President Bush's wishes to expedite approval of federal judges.

But a Daschle spokesman said the South Dakota Family Policy Council is using misleading information to make its point.

Robert E. Regier of Sioux Falls, state executive director of the group, says the group will run an ad in today's Argus Leader asking constituents to call Daschle and tell him to stop holding up the nominations.

Regier says failure to do so sends a partisan message in a time of a national crisis.

"A key element in seeking justice on the evils of the perpetrators on our country is our justice system," Regier said in a Wednesday news conference.

Daschle is contradicting a comment made in 2000 when he said the 74 vacancies meant a "dire shortage," he said

The shortage is greater now, and Daschle isn't responding, Regier said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about the anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," he said.

REV_00072759

Jay Carson, news secretary for Daschle, said it was unfortunate that Regier and Ken Connor, president of the national organization, were the ones acting in a partisan manner at a time when Daschle was working closely with President Bush to deal with the national trauma.

"At a time when our country has come together - where Daschle meets regularly with the President, Speaker (Dennis) Hastert and Sen. (Trent) Lott - it is not the right time to start pushing a partisan agenda and engaging in partisan attacks," Carson said.

He disputes the suggestion of the two men that Daschle turned his back on Bush's request to accelerate Senate confirmation of federal judges.

"It is simpy not true. I talked to the judiciary committee staff and what they are charging, it is just not true. It is an incredibly misleading claim," Carson said.

Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

More than 50 nominees are pending. The federal judiciary has 110 vacancies, including 39 positions open so long the courts classify them as "judicial emergencies."

While the press briefing was taking place in Sioux Falls, Daschle, the president and other legislative leaders were holding a lengthy breakfast meeting, Carson said.

"They were there doing the business of the American people," he said.

Connor says the Council watches Democrats and Republicans equally and believes Republicans "caved to Daschle's hardball politics."

"We are critical of Republicans, too. We are equal opportunity critics," he said.

Criticism like this is not how Daschle gets things done, Carson said. "He doesn't do it by launching attacks with false and misleading information."

The group's comments came two days after Daschle was praised by a largely Republican crowd of 1,600 members of the Sioux Falls Area Chamber of Commerce for his emotional personalization of the war on terrorism.

Timing of the critical remarks balanced with need for action were at the center of concern for some.

One respected former conservative Republican legislator, Harvey Krautschun of Spearfish, said

the message seemed appropriate, but he had mixed emotions about the timing.

"Holding a person accountable like someone in Mr. Daschle's position is totally appropriate," he said. "There are ways to do it and there are proper times to do it. We may not always agree with Mr. Daschle, but we respect him. In light of some of the gravity and situation in what is happening and the impact here, hopefully it (criticism) is being done in the proper tenor."

Now is not the time for such discussions on judgeships, but he agrees the nominees need hearings, says Republican Gov. Bill Janklow.

"Congress is in turmoil because of the anthrax situation. They are trying to get things done with the war-related measures, airline security, emergency financial policy, dealing with recession and unemployment issues, getting an appropriations bill passed. Congress ought to stay on task,"Janklow said.

Once those issues are dealt with he says Congress needs to take up the appointments.

"We, on all sides, have to quit playing game. The Constitution says the president appoints with the consent of the Senate. I don't think Congress - after they come back in session - should delay judicial hearings for political reasons. After the hearings, vote them up or down. Justice delayed is justice denied," he said.

Senate to Vote on Thurmond's Son

By Jesse Holland
The Associate Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Strom Thurmond Jr., son of longtime South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond, is on his way to becoming U.S. Attorney in his father's home state.

The nomination of Thurmond Jr. was one of 11 U.S. attorneys sent by voice vote by the Senate Judiciary Committee to the full Senate on Thursday.

It was not immediately known when the Senate would vote on the nominations, but senators rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members. Thurmond, the oldest and longest-serving senator at 98, could be heard voting "aye" when the block of U.S. attorney nominees came up for approval. The South Carolina senator is the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the second-ranking Republican.

The younger Thurmond is an assistant state prosecutor and a 1998 University of South Carolina law school graduate. He has endorsements from both Republican and Democratic leaders for the job; he has no official affiliation.

His father says he will not run again and the younger Thurmond will turn 30, the legal age for election to the Senate, a month before his father's seat will be on the ballot again in 2002. But he has said he intends to be federal prosecutor for four years.

The committee also decided to vote next week on Terry Wooten's nomination to be a U.S. District judge in South Carolina. Wooten, currently a U.S. magistrate judge in South Carolina, has been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991.

During Thomas' hearings, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the committee has received a confidential report from the FBI on the accusation. "I urge senators to read this report before voting next week," Leahy said.

The committee sent to the Senate the nominations of four other U.S. District judges, M. Christina Armijo of New Mexico, Karon Bowdre of Alabama, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma and Larry Hicks of Nevada.

The committee also sent Edith Brown Clement's nomination for a U.S. Appeals Court seat on the 5th Circuit to the Senate for approval by an 18-0 vote. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., refused to vote on the nomination, saying Clement had not answered his questions about a judicial conference she attended. When asked whether he would hold up her confirmation by the Senate, Feingold said "certainly, until I get her answers."

Business As Usual

The Ledger
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

It's not only in the U.S. House that the post-Sept. 11 bipartisanship has eroded. In the Senate, Republicans reportedly are holding up consideration of a major foreign aid appropriations bill for domestic political reasons. If this seems like an odd time to be throwing sand on the wheels of democracy -- especially when it comes to foreign aid and particularly at a time when the

REV_00072762

United States ought to be doing all it can to win over allies around the world -- rest assured that the Republicans think they have ample justification.

They don't think the Democrats, who hold a 50-49-1 Senate majority, are moving quickly enough to approve President Bush's judicial nominations. If this sounds like an old song, it is. For the last six years of the Clinton administration, Democrats complained that the Republicans were holding up judicial nominations.

Is there a logical nexus between judicial screenings and foreign aid? No. Is this just political blackmail of the sort that most Americans hoped would be left in the smoking ruins of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks? Yes.

Is it business as usual in the Washington Swamp? Sadly, yes.

Judicial nominees should be approved or not on their own merit and in timely fashion. The foreign aid bill should be passed or defeated on its own merits. Holding one hostage for the other is unacceptable while the nation is locked in a worldwide struggle for its very existence.

Democrats Try to Bend The U.S. Judiciary Branch

Michael Chidester
Daily Utah Chronicle
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

Looking to leave your mark in America? If so, forget about becoming a legislator.

Lawmakers are increasingly becoming high-profile budget makers. And don't shoot for the presidency. The chances are slim, the scrutiny is unbearable, and the living conditions are way over the top. If you're looking for power, become a judge.

Newsweek Columnist Jonathan Alter recognized the power of the courts in July 2000, when he called the naming of future Supreme Court justices "the real stakes" in the 2000 presidential election. "The next president, with as many as three or four Supreme Court appointments, will touch every American life," Alter wrote.

Such power can be intoxicating, especially to politicians. So nobody should be surprised by this Sept. 5
report from the Deseret News, just three months after Democrats gained control of the Senate Judiciary Committee: "[Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah] said a hearing that Democrats called Tuesday about changes that they seek appears 'to be part of a partisan strategy to ...[inject] partisanship into the judiciary.'"

Sen. Hatch is correct. Democrats are attempting to control the judiciary -- especially the approval of new federal judges -- in a number of ways. Given the modern penchant for furthering agendas through litigation rather than legislation, the efforts of these Democrats should raise a red flag for anybody who wants an impartial judiciary.

Hatch's comments referred to the actions of Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts. The Deseret News reports, "Sen. Schumer said the Senate should be able to consider the ideology of nominees [to the federal courts] -- and reject them if their views are 'out of the mainstream.'"

In other words, if the political views of potential judges do not coincide with those of Democratic legislators -- who supposedly are best qualified to judge what ideas are "in the mainstream" -- the judges will not be confirmed.

"The hallmark of a good jurist is one who does not allow personal opinion to affect objective legal decision making," Sen. Hatch said. "The Senate's responsibility does not include establishing an ideological litmus test to gauge a candidate's fitness based on his or her position on controversial issues."

Sen. Schumer believes considering a candidate's ideology will help "ensure that courts remain balanced and moderate." Again, Sen. Schumer's paternalistic pride assumes that he and his colleagues fully understand balance and moderation.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is also trying to change the confirmation of federal judges in dangerous ways.

FRC reports: "While attention was diverted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Sen. Leahy unilaterally changed the Senate confirmation rules. Despite heated Republican objections, Sen. Leahy ordered sensitive personal information previously limited to confidential FBI background checks included on the Judiciary Committee questionnaire nominees are required to answer."

In addition, Sen. Leahy wants to force judicial nominees to disclose any political contributions they have made.

In both cases, this once confidential information will be offered to Senators who never needed it to confirm any of the 377 judges approved during the Clinton administration. This information -- which will hardly improve Senators' ability to assess a judge's professional capability -- will undoubtedly leak to the press, embarrassing the nominees.

Sens. Leahy and Schumer are trying to select judges based on their ideology. They apparently have no confidence that judges can or will act objectively, without giving in to their political preferences.

Oddly enough, Democrats believe their liberal counterparts at the American Bar Association can act

objectively, despite marked political ideologies.

For nearly 50 years, the ABA has evaluated every U.S. president's nominees for the federal bench, giving each candidate it assesses a rating of "well qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified." According to FRC, the ABA considers its evaluations "objective," and bases its ratings on a candidate's "integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament."

In March, President Bush ended this "preferential treatment" of the ABA when he advised the group that it would not be given a "quasi official role," while it held public views on controversial issues.

Martha W. Barnett, head of the ABA, responded by saying, "We cannot think of any constructive purpose this serves."

Surely Barnett is an intelligent woman. Perhaps a review of the ABA's stance on political issues might help her understand why President Bush doubted its supposed objectivity.

The FRC notes that the group advocates "abortion on demand, affirmative action, needle giveaway programs, homosexual adoption, medical marijuana and gun control," while it opposes "the death penalty, a flag desecration amendment and the right of the Boy Scouts ... to exclude homosexual leaders."

Sen. Leahy and friends feel they cannot trust nominees to one of hundreds of judicial posts across the country to be objective judges. However, they do feel the organization that recommends or rejects these individuals -- which has a very defined political agenda -- can do so objectively.

This unquestioning trust of the ABA, yet patent mistrust of conservative judicial nominees, makes Sen.
Leahy's motives for evaluating candidates' politics seem questionable.

In more simple terms, he can't be trusted.

NATIONAL AND STATE-BASED FAMILY POLICY GROUPS CALL ON DASCHLE TO COME CLEAN ON JUDGES, STOP THE STALLING

REV_00072781

"When the terrorists are brought to justice, there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," says FRC's Ken Connor

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. -- Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is playing partisan politics with the nation's court system by blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees and leaving over 100 federal judgeships vacant, said leaders from the Washington, D.C.-based Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council (SDFPC) on Wednesday. The groups announced they would be running newspaper ads about Sen. Daschle's blocking of judicial nominees in The Argus Leader beginning Thursday.

"Sen. Daschle has ratcheted up the partisanship on judges to unprecedented levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "When Bill Clinton was president, Sen. Daschle thought that 75 vacant judgeships was a 'judicial emergency,' why isn't it a crisis when 106 judgeships are vacant now that George W. Bush is president?"

"President Bush is nominating judges who will exercise judicial restraint, yet the bitterly partisan Sen. Daschle is determined to deny the president the fruits of his election - using the War on Terrorism as an excuse," Connor said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," SDFPC Executive Director Robert Regier said. "While we're praying for his safety and for a spirit of national unity, Sen. Daschle abuses his power in a spirit of partisan hostility.

"Sen. Daschle was sent to Washington to represent our values and to uphold the Constitution. He has failed on both counts. He may have won an election or two in South Dakota, but so has President Bush. We stand behind our President and so should Sen. Daschle."

Last week, President Bush asked Sen. Daschle to speed up the judicial nomination process. Sen. Daschle not only refused, he coerced the White House and Senate Republicans to cede their recent efforts to get Bush's nominees confirmed.

"Vacancies on the federal bench are beyond crisis levels," Connor said. When President Bush took office there were 67 vacancies; today there are 106. Only twelve of the 60 judges nominated have been confirmed and only a handful even have had hearings. How does this compare with previous administrations in their first years? According to the Wall Street Journal, Ronald Reagan had 41 judges confirmed, George H.W. Bush 15 and Bill Clinton 28.

"When the terrorists are brought to justice in the U.S., there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," Connor said.

Daschle on Judicial Nominees: Not a "No Spin Zone"

REV_00072782

The Family Research Council
November 1, 2001

WASHINGTON - Claims that Senator Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees are "unfair," "false and misleading," according to Sen. Tom Daschle's spokesman Jay Carson. His remarks came in response to a press conference held on Wednesday by Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council in Sioux Falls. FRC believes the response begs a closer look at the spin vs. the reality:

Daschle Spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said the senator has been Majority Leader only since June: "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership in the Senate..."

Reality:
It's true, Sen. Daschle has only been the Majority Leader since June, but between June and the August congressional recess, President Bush made 40 judicial appointments. Why is it that under Senator Daschle's leadership the Senate has only been able to confirm 12 of those 40 nominees?

The best way to measure the Senate's record on confirming judicial appointments is how many vacancies there are at the end of a congressional session. When Bill Clinton was president, the highest number of vacancies the Senate left town without filling was 67. Currently, there are over 100 vacancies and counting. How many judicial vacancies will there be when Sen. Daschle sends the 107th Senate home for the holidays?

Daschle spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said, "Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

Reality:
Just last week, The Washington Times (October 24) reported that in a meeting with congressional leaders, President Bush asked Senator Daschle about the status of judicial nominations. To try to force Democrats to stop stalling the confirmation of judges, Republicans had been holding up the Foreign Relations spending bill. According to The Times, "Senate sources said Mr. Daschle told the president that he would not link judges with spending bills and that Mr. Bush needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats did." Is that what Sen. Daschle calls getting business done for the American people?

"Vacancies on the federal bench have gone way beyond Daschle's definition of crisis levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "It's time he stop playing political games with the nation's judiciary and help move qualified judges into the nation's empty benches."

Hutchinson Wants Smith's Name Before Committee Soon

The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

Sen. Tim Hutchinson said he wants the Senate Judiciary Committee to soon consider the appointment of former state Supreme Court justice Lavenski Smith to 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

President Bush nominated Smith, 42, to the court in May. Smith said Monday he has received no word on the confirmation process.

D.J. O'Brien, spokesman for Hutchinson, R-Ark., said the Democratic-controlled committee must first approve the nomination before Smith can be considered before the full Senate.

"I think he fits in pretty well with the mold George Bush is looking for" in judicial nominees, O'Brien said.

Smith also has the support of Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., said her spokesman, Drew Goesl.

Gov. Mike Huckabee named Smith, a Republican, as PSC chairman in January 1997 and a year later appointed his fellow Hope native to the state Supreme Court to fill out the term of Justice David Newbern, who retired.

Smith ran unsuccessfully for the state Court of Appeals in November. In December, Huckabee named him to a six-year term on the PSC.

Head of National Pro-Family Group: Daschle Playing Politics with Judges

By Steven Barrett
The Associated Press

The president of a conservative national organization says Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle is holding up President Bush's federal judicial nominations to make Bush look weak and boost Democrats' election hopes.

At a news conference Wednesday in Sioux Falls, Ken Connor of the Washington-based Family

REV_00072772

Research Council told reporters that confirmations went much faster in the first year of the three previous presidential administrations.

"The strategy is to make the president bleed, to make him appear impotent" so Democrats can win more races in 2002, Connor said.

A spokesman for Daschle said the senator from South Dakota is working hard to fill seats on the judiciary and that the Family Research Council's criticisms are unfair. Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

Connor accused Daschle of changing his tune on judicial confirmations since Bush succeeded Clinton. He quoted Daschle as saying in a news conference March 7, 2000, that the roughly 75 judgeships vacant then under Clinton represented a "dire shortage."

But Jay Carson, a spokesman for Daschle, countered that Daschle has been majority leader only since June, before which Republicans controlled the Senate.

"Basically, the claims that are made by the Family Research Council are false and misleading," he said.

"Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

That includes things like helping the airline industry and families who lost loved ones in the terrorist attacks, Carson said, and yes, judicial confirmations.

"Under Democratic leadership, the day after the anthrax arrived in the Capitol complex, the Judiciary Committee met in a small, cramped room inside the Capitol. They didn't have their office space anymore. It was closed off by the FBI," Carson said. "They had every excuse in the world not to meet ... but they said, 'We need to get these judges done and we're going to hold a meeting.'"

That committee includes senators as diverse as Republican Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and Democrat Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Carson called Connor's comments "disappointing" at a time when unity is important.

REV_00072773

"These sorts of partisan attacks are not what we need at this time," Carson said.

Clinton had 67 judicial nominees who never got a vote on the Senate floor, he added, and 57 of those never got a hearing. Vacancies grew from 65 when Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah became chairman of the Judiciary Committee in 1995 to 107 when Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont took over the position in June, Carson said. "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership of the Senate ...," he said. "It's hard to see those criticisms as anything other than crocodile tears."

Carson also said that since July, the Senate has confirmed four Court of Appeals judges and is scheduling a hearing for a fifth. Only three such judges were confirmed in all of 1993, under Clinton, Carson noted in a news release Wednesday afternoon.

And he said more judges may be confirmed this year, making end-of-year comparisons with previous confirmation rates inaccurate.

Connor said the depleted judiciary will be ill-equipped to handle court cases arising from the Sept. 11
terrorist attacks.

"We've heard a great deal about bringing wrongdoers to justice," and that task will be slowed by the lack of judges, he said.

Rob Regier, executive director of the South Dakota Family Policy Council, said Daschle does not want to see Bush's nominees approved because they will exercise judicial restraint rather than press a social agenda from the bench.

"Tom Daschle is doing his level best to carry out the Clinton legacy of activist judges, even at the cost of justice," said Regier, who joined Connor at the news conference. Regier said he used to work with Connor in Washington.

Republican senators recently gave up trying to get Democrats to agree to approve a specified number of Bush's nominees this year. GOP senators decided to wait until January, the start of an election year, to begin pressuring Democrats again to approve the nominees.

Connor, clad in a green flannel shirt, tan slacks and hiking boots, said he had just finished a week of successful pheasant hunting near Plankinton. It was his sixth time hunting in the state, he said.

"We limited out each day," he said.

Judicial Nomination Clears Senate Committee

REV_00072774

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Christina Armijo's nomination for a U.S. district judgeship cleared a Senate committee Thursday. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend full Senate confirmation of Armijo to serve as a U.S. district court judge for New Mexico, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said in a news release.

Domenici recommended Armijo of Las Vegas for the job, and she was nominated by President Bush.

Domenici said he hopes Armijo's Senate confirmation will occur within the next week.

Armijo has been an appeals court judge since 1996.

Group: Daschle Delaying Judges

By David Kranz

Senator's aides deny nominees held up, assail timing of charge

A conservative group focusing on family values is accusing Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle of defying President Bush's wishes to expedite approval of federal judges.

But a Daschle spokesman said the South Dakota Family Policy Council is using misleading information to make its point.

Robert E. Regier of Sioux Falls, state executive director of the group, says the group will run an ad in today's Argus Leader asking constituents to call Daschle and tell him to stop holding up the nominations.

Regier says failure to do so sends a partisan message in a time of a national crisis.

"A key element in seeking justice on the evils of the perpetrators on our country is our justice system," Regier said in a Wednesday news conference.

Daschle is contradicting a comment made in 2000 when he said the 74 vacancies meant a "dire shortage," he said

The shortage is greater now, and Daschle isn't responding, Regier said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about the anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," he said.

REV_00072775

Jay Carson, news secretary for Daschle, said it was unfortunate that Regier and Ken Connor, president of the national organization, were the ones acting in a partisan manner at a time when Daschle was working closely with President Bush to deal with the national trauma.

"At a time when our country has come together - where Daschle meets regularly with the President, Speaker (Dennis) Hastert and Sen. (Trent) Lott - it is not the right time to start pushing a partisan agenda and engaging in partisan attacks," Carson said.

He disputes the suggestion of the two men that Daschle turned his back on Bush's request to accelerate Senate confirmation of federal judges.

"It is simpy not true. I talked to the judiciary committee staff and what they are charging, it is just not true. It is an incredibly misleading claim," Carson said.

Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

More than 50 nominees are pending. The federal judiciary has 110 vacancies, including 39 positions open so long the courts classify them as "judicial emergencies."

While the press briefing was taking place in Sioux Falls, Daschle, the president and other legislative leaders were holding a lengthy breakfast meeting, Carson said.

"They were there doing the business of the American people," he said.

Connor says the Council watches Democrats and Republicans equally and believes Republicans "caved to Daschle's hardball politics."

"We are critical of Republicans, too. We are equal opportunity critics," he said.

Criticism like this is not how Daschle gets things done, Carson said. "He doesn't do it by launching attacks with false and misleading information."

The group's comments came two days after Daschle was praised by a largely Republican crowd of 1,600 members of the Sioux Falls Area Chamber of Commerce for his emotional personalization of the war on terrorism.

Timing of the critical remarks balanced with need for action were at the center of concern for some.

One respected former conservative Republican legislator, Harvey Krautschun of Spearfish, said

the message seemed appropriate, but he had mixed emotions about the timing.

"Holding a person accountable like someone in Mr. Daschle's position is totally appropriate," he said. "There are ways to do it and there are proper times to do it. We may not always agree with Mr. Daschle, but we respect him. In light of some of the gravity and situation in what is happening and the impact here, hopefully it (criticism) is being done in the proper tenor."

Now is not the time for such discussions on judgeships, but he agrees the nominees need hearings, says Republican Gov. Bill Janklow.

"Congress is in turmoil because of the anthrax situation. They are trying to get things done with the war-related measures, airline security, emergency financial policy, dealing with recession and unemployment issues, getting an appropriations bill passed. Congress ought to stay on task,"Janklow said.

Once those issues are dealt with he says Congress needs to take up the appointments.

"We, on all sides, have to quit playing game. The Constitution says the president appoints with the consent of the Senate. I don't think Congress - after they come back in session - should delay judicial hearings for political reasons. After the hearings, vote them up or down. Justice delayed is justice denied," he said.

Senate to Vote on Thurmond's Son

By Jesse Holland
The Associate Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Strom Thurmond Jr., son of longtime South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond, is on his way to becoming U.S. Attorney in his father's home state.

The nomination of Thurmond Jr. was one of 11 U.S. attorneys sent by voice vote by the Senate Judiciary Committee to the full Senate on Thursday.

It was not immediately known when the Senate would vote on the nominations, but senators rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members. Thurmond, the oldest and longest-serving senator at 98, could be heard voting "aye" when the block of U.S. attorney nominees came up for approval. The South Carolina senator is the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the second-ranking Republican.

The younger Thurmond is an assistant state prosecutor and a 1998 University of South Carolina law school graduate. He has endorsements from both Republican and Democratic leaders for the job; he has no official affiliation.

His father says he will not run again and the younger Thurmond will turn 30, the legal age for election to the Senate, a month before his father's seat will be on the ballot again in 2002. But he has said he intends to be federal prosecutor for four years.

The committee also decided to vote next week on Terry Wooten's nomination to be a U.S. District judge in South Carolina. Wooten, currently a U.S. magistrate judge in South Carolina, has been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991.

During Thomas' hearings, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the committee has received a confidential report from the FBI on the accusation. "I urge senators to read this report before voting next week," Leahy said.

The committee sent to the Senate the nominations of four other U.S. District judges, M. Christina Armijo of New Mexico, Karon Bowdre of Alabama, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma and Larry Hicks of Nevada.

The committee also sent Edith Brown Clement's nomination for a U.S. Appeals Court seat on the 5th Circuit to the Senate for approval by an 18-0 vote. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., refused to vote on the nomination, saying Clement had not answered his questions about a judicial conference she attended. When asked whether he would hold up her confirmation by the Senate, Feingold said "certainly, until I get her answers."

Business As Usual

The Ledger
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

It's not only in the U.S. House that the post-Sept. 11 bipartisanship has eroded. In the Senate, Republicans reportedly are holding up consideration of a major foreign aid appropriations bill for domestic political reasons. If this seems like an odd time to be throwing sand on the wheels of democracy -- especially when it comes to foreign aid and particularly at a time when the

REV_00072778

United States ought to be doing all it can to win over allies around the world -- rest assured that the Republicans think they have ample justification.

They don't think the Democrats, who hold a 50-49-1 Senate majority, are moving quickly enough to approve President Bush's judicial nominations. If this sounds like an old song, it is. For the last six years of the Clinton administration, Democrats complained that the Republicans were holding up judicial nominations.

Is there a logical nexus between judicial screenings and foreign aid? No. Is this just political blackmail of the sort that most Americans hoped would be left in the smoking ruins of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks? Yes.

Is it business as usual in the Washington Swamp? Sadly, yes.

Judicial nominees should be approved or not on their own merit and in timely fashion. The foreign aid bill should be passed or defeated on its own merits. Holding one hostage for the other is unacceptable while the nation is locked in a worldwide struggle for its very existence.

Democrats Try to Bend The U.S. Judiciary Branch

Michael Chidester
Daily Utah Chronicle
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

Looking to leave your mark in America? If so, forget about becoming a legislator.

Lawmakers are increasingly becoming high-profile budget makers. And don't shoot for the presidency. The chances are slim, the scrutiny is unbearable, and the living conditions are way over the top. If you're looking for power, become a judge.

Newsweek Columnist Jonathan Alter recognized the power of the courts in July 2000, when he called the naming of future Supreme Court justices "the real stakes" in the 2000 presidential election. "The next president, with as many as three or four Supreme Court appointments, will touch every American life," Alter wrote.

Such power can be intoxicating, especially to politicians. So nobody should be surprised by this Sept. 5
report from the Deseret News, just three months after Democrats gained control of the Senate Judiciary Committee: "[Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah] said a hearing that Democrats called Tuesday about changes that they seek appears 'to be part of a partisan strategy to ...[inject] partisanship into the judiciary.'"

Sen. Hatch is correct. Democrats are attempting to control the judiciary -- especially the approval of new federal judges -- in a number of ways. Given the modern penchant for furthering agendas through litigation rather than legislation, the efforts of these Democrats should raise a red flag for anybody who wants an impartial judiciary.

Hatch's comments referred to the actions of Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts. The Deseret News reports, "Sen. Schumer said the Senate should be able to consider the ideology of nominees [to the federal courts] -- and reject them if their views are 'out of the mainstream.'"

In other words, if the political views of potential judges do not coincide with those of Democratic legislators -- who supposedly are best qualified to judge what ideas are "in the mainstream" -- the judges will not be confirmed.

"The hallmark of a good jurist is one who does not allow personal opinion to affect objective legal decision making," Sen. Hatch said. "The Senate's responsibility does not include establishing an ideological litmus test to gauge a candidate's fitness based on his or her position on controversial issues."

Sen. Schumer believes considering a candidate's ideology will help "ensure that courts remain balanced and moderate." Again, Sen. Schumer's paternalistic pride assumes that he and his colleagues fully understand balance and moderation.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is also trying to change the confirmation of federal judges in dangerous ways.

FRC reports: "While attention was diverted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Sen. Leahy unilaterally changed the Senate confirmation rules. Despite heated Republican objections, Sen. Leahy ordered sensitive personal information previously limited to confidential FBI background checks included on the Judiciary Committee questionnaire nominees are required to answer."

In addition, Sen. Leahy wants to force judicial nominees to disclose any political contributions they have made.

In both cases, this once confidential information will be offered to Senators who never needed it to confirm any of the 377 judges approved during the Clinton administration. This information -- which will hardly improve Senators' ability to assess a judge's professional capability -- will undoubtedly leak to the press, embarrassing the nominees.

Sens. Leahy and Schumer are trying to select judges based on their ideology. They apparently have no confidence that judges can or will act objectively, without giving in to their political preferences.

Oddly enough, Democrats believe their liberal counterparts at the American Bar Association can act

objectively, despite marked political ideologies.

For nearly 50 years, the ABA has evaluated every U.S. president's nominees for the federal bench, giving each candidate it assesses a rating of "well qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified." According to FRC, the ABA considers its evaluations "objective," and bases its ratings on a candidate's "integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament."

In March, President Bush ended this "preferential treatment" of the ABA when he advised the group that it would not be given a "quasi official role," while it held public views on controversial issues.

Martha W. Barnett, head of the ABA, responded by saying, "We cannot think of any constructive purpose this serves."

Surely Barnett is an intelligent woman. Perhaps a review of the ABA's stance on political issues might help her understand why President Bush doubted its supposed objectivity.

The FRC notes that the group advocates "abortion on demand, affirmative action, needle giveaway programs, homosexual adoption, medical marijuana and gun control," while it opposes "the death penalty, a flag desecration amendment and the right of the Boy Scouts ... to exclude homosexual leaders."

Sen. Leahy and friends feel they cannot trust nominees to one of hundreds of judicial posts across the country to be objective judges. However, they do feel the organization that recommends or rejects these individuals -- which has a very defined political agenda -- can do so objectively.

This unquestioning trust of the ABA, yet patent mistrust of conservative judicial nominees, makes Sen.
Leahy's motives for evaluating candidates' politics seem questionable.

In more simple terms, he can't be trusted.

National and State-Based Family Policy Groups Call on Daschle to Come Clean on Judges, Stop the Stalling

NATIONAL AND STATE-BASED FAMILY POLICY GROUPS CALL ON DASCHLE TO COME CLEAN ON JUDGES, STOP THE STALLING

REV_00072797

"When the terrorists are brought to justice, there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," says FRC's Ken Connor

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. -- Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is playing partisan politics with the nation's court system by blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees and leaving over 100 federal judgeships vacant, said leaders from the Washington, D.C.-based Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council (SDFPC) on Wednesday. The groups announced they would be running newspaper ads about Sen. Daschle's blocking of judicial nominees in The Argus Leader beginning Thursday.

"Sen. Daschle has ratcheted up the partisanship on judges to unprecedented levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "When Bill Clinton was president, Sen. Daschle thought that 75 vacant judgeships was a 'judicial emergency,' why isn't it a crisis when 106 judgeships are vacant now that George W. Bush is president?"

"President Bush is nominating judges who will exercise judicial restraint, yet the bitterly partisan Sen. Daschle is determined to deny the president the fruits of his election - using the War on Terrorism as an excuse," Connor said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," SDFPC Executive Director Robert Regier said. "While we're praying for his safety and for a spirit of national unity, Sen. Daschle abuses his power in a spirit of partisan hostility.

"Sen. Daschle was sent to Washington to represent our values and to uphold the Constitution. He has failed on both counts. He may have won an election or two in South Dakota, but so has President Bush. We stand behind our President and so should Sen. Daschle."

Last week, President Bush asked Sen. Daschle to speed up the judicial nomination process. Sen. Daschle not only refused, he coerced the White House and Senate Republicans to cede their recent efforts to get Bush's nominees confirmed.

"Vacancies on the federal bench are beyond crisis levels," Connor said. When President Bush took office there were 67 vacancies; today there are 106. Only twelve of the 60 judges nominated have been confirmed and only a handful even have had hearings. How does this compare with previous administrations in their first years? According to the Wall Street Journal, Ronald Reagan had 41 judges confirmed, George H.W. Bush 15 and Bill Clinton 28.

"When the terrorists are brought to justice in the U.S., there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," Connor said.

Daschle on Judicial Nominees: Not a "No Spin Zone"

REV_00072798

The Family Research Council
November 1, 2001

WASHINGTON - Claims that Senator Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees are "unfair," "false and misleading," according to Sen. Tom Daschle's spokesman Jay Carson. His remarks came in response to a press conference held on Wednesday by Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council in Sioux Falls. FRC believes the response begs a closer look at the spin vs. the reality:

Daschle Spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said the senator has been Majority Leader only since June: "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership in the Senate..."

Reality:
It's true, Sen. Daschle has only been the Majority Leader since June, but between June and the August congressional recess, President Bush made 40 judicial appointments. Why is it that under Senator Daschle's leadership the Senate has only been able to confirm 12 of those 40 nominees?

The best way to measure the Senate's record on confirming judicial appointments is how many vacancies there are at the end of a congressional session. When Bill Clinton was president, the highest number of vacancies the Senate left town without filling was 67. Currently, there are over 100 vacancies and counting. How many judicial vacancies will there be when Sen. Daschle sends the 107th Senate home for the holidays?

Daschle spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said, "Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

Reality:
Just last week, The Washington Times (October 24) reported that in a meeting with congressional leaders, President Bush asked Senator Daschle about the status of judicial nominations. To try to force Democrats to stop stalling the confirmation of judges, Republicans had been holding up the Foreign Relations spending bill. According to The Times, "Senate sources said Mr. Daschle told the president that he would not link judges with spending bills and that Mr. Bush needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats did." Is that what Sen. Daschle calls getting business done for the American people?

"Vacancies on the federal bench have gone way beyond Daschle's definition of crisis levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "It's time he stop playing political games with the nation's judiciary and help move qualified judges into the nation's empty benches."

REV_00072799

On Thursday, FRC and SDFPC ran an ad about Sen. Daschle blocking judicial nominees in South Dakota's Argus Leader.

Hutchinson Wants Smith's Name Before Committee Soon

The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

Sen. Tim Hutchinson said he wants the Senate Judiciary Committee to soon consider the appointment of former state Supreme Court justice Lavenski Smith to 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

President Bush nominated Smith, 42, to the court in May. Smith said Monday he has received no word on the confirmation process.

D.J. O'Brien, spokesman for Hutchinson, R-Ark., said the Democratic-controlled committee must first approve the nomination before Smith can be considered before the full Senate.

"I think he fits in pretty well with the mold George Bush is looking for" in judicial nominees, O'Brien said.

Smith also has the support of Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., said her spokesman, Drew Goesl.

Gov. Mike Huckabee named Smith, a Republican, as PSC chairman in January 1997 and a year later appointed his fellow Hope native to the state Supreme Court to fill out the term of Justice David Newbern, who retired.

Smith ran unsuccessfully for the state Court of Appeals in November. In December, Huckabee named him to a six-year term on the PSC.

Head of National Pro-Family Group: Daschle Playing Politics with Judges

By Steven Barrett
The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

The president of a conservative national organization says Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle is holding up President Bush's federal judicial nominations to make Bush look weak and boost Democrats' election hopes.

At a news conference Wednesday in Sioux Falls, Ken Connor of the Washington-based Family

REV_00072788

Research Council told reporters that confirmations went much faster in the first year of the three previous presidential administrations.

"The strategy is to make the president bleed, to make him appear impotent" so Democrats can win more races in 2002, Connor said.

A spokesman for Daschle said the senator from South Dakota is working hard to fill seats on the judiciary and that the Family Research Council's criticisms are unfair. Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

Connor accused Daschle of changing his tune on judicial confirmations since Bush succeeded Clinton. He quoted Daschle as saying in a news conference March 7, 2000, that the roughly 75 judgeships vacant then under Clinton represented a "dire shortage."

But Jay Carson, a spokesman for Daschle, countered that Daschle has been majority leader only since June, before which Republicans controlled the Senate.

"Basically, the claims that are made by the Family Research Council are false and misleading," he said.

"Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

That includes things like helping the airline industry and families who lost loved ones in the terrorist attacks, Carson said, and yes, judicial confirmations.

"Under Democratic leadership, the day after the anthrax arrived in the Capitol complex, the Judiciary Committee met in a small, cramped room inside the Capitol. They didn't have their office space anymore. It was closed off by the FBI," Carson said. "They had every excuse in the world not to meet ... but they said, 'We need to get these judges done and we're going to hold a meeting.'"

That committee includes senators as diverse as Republican Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and Democrat Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Carson called Connor's comments "disappointing" at a time when unity is important.

REV_00072789

"These sorts of partisan attacks are not what we need at this time," Carson said.

Clinton had 67 judicial nominees who never got a vote on the Senate floor, he added, and 57 of those never got a hearing. Vacancies grew from 65 when Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah became chairman of the Judiciary Committee in 1995 to 107 when Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont took over the position in June, Carson said. "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership of the Senate ...," he said. "It's hard to see those criticisms as anything other than crocodile tears."

Carson also said that since July, the Senate has confirmed four Court of Appeals judges and is scheduling a hearing for a fifth. Only three such judges were confirmed in all of 1993, under Clinton, Carson noted in a news release Wednesday afternoon.

And he said more judges may be confirmed this year, making end-of-year comparisons with previous confirmation rates inaccurate.

Connor said the depleted judiciary will be ill-equipped to handle court cases arising from the Sept. 11
terrorist attacks.

"We've heard a great deal about bringing wrongdoers to justice," and that task will be slowed by the lack of judges, he said.

Rob Regier, executive director of the South Dakota Family Policy Council, said Daschle does not want to see Bush's nominees approved because they will exercise judicial restraint rather than press a social agenda from the bench.

"Tom Daschle is doing his level best to carry out the Clinton legacy of activist judges, even at the cost of justice," said Regier, who joined Connor at the news conference. Regier said he used to work with Connor in Washington.

Republican senators recently gave up trying to get Democrats to agree to approve a specified number of Bush's nominees this year. GOP senators decided to wait until January, the start of an election year, to begin pressuring Democrats again to approve the nominees.

Connor, clad in a green flannel shirt, tan slacks and hiking boots, said he had just finished a week of successful pheasant hunting near Plankinton. It was his sixth time hunting in the state, he said.

"We limited out each day," he said.

Judicial Nomination Clears Senate Committee

REV_00072790

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Christina Armijo's nomination for a U.S. district judgeship cleared a Senate committee Thursday. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend full Senate confirmation of Armijo to serve as a U.S. district court judge for New Mexico, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said in a news release.

Domenici recommended Armijo of Las Vegas for the job, and she was nominated by President Bush.

Domenici said he hopes Armijo's Senate confirmation will occur within the next week.

Armijo has been an appeals court judge since 1996.

Group: Daschle Delaying Judges

By David Kranz

Senator's aides deny nominees held up, assail timing of charge

A conservative group focusing on family values is accusing Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle of defying President Bush's wishes to expedite approval of federal judges.

But a Daschle spokesman said the South Dakota Family Policy Council is using misleading information to make its point.

Robert E. Regier of Sioux Falls, state executive director of the group, says the group will run an ad in today's Argus Leader asking constituents to call Daschle and tell him to stop holding up the nominations.

Regier says failure to do so sends a partisan message in a time of a national crisis.

"A key element in seeking justice on the evils of the perpetrators on our country is our justice system," Regier said in a Wednesday news conference.

Daschle is contradicting a comment made in 2000 when he said the 74 vacancies meant a "dire shortage," he said

The shortage is greater now, and Daschle isn't responding, Regier said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about the anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," he said.

REV_00072791

Jay Carson, news secretary for Daschle, said it was unfortunate that Regier and Ken Connor, president of the national organization, were the ones acting in a partisan manner at a time when Daschle was working closely with President Bush to deal with the national trauma.

"At a time when our country has come together - where Daschle meets regularly with the President, Speaker (Dennis) Hastert and Sen. (Trent) Lott - it is not the right time to start pushing a partisan agenda and engaging in partisan attacks," Carson said.

He disputes the suggestion of the two men that Daschle turned his back on Bush's request to accelerate Senate confirmation of federal judges.

"It is simpy not true. I talked to the judiciary committee staff and what they are charging, it is just not true. It is an incredibly misleading claim," Carson said.

Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

More than 50 nominees are pending. The federal judiciary has 110 vacancies, including 39 positions open so long the courts classify them as "judicial emergencies."

While the press briefing was taking place in Sioux Falls, Daschle, the president and other legislative leaders were holding a lengthy breakfast meeting, Carson said.

"They were there doing the business of the American people," he said.

Connor says the Council watches Democrats and Republicans equally and believes Republicans "caved to Daschle's hardball politics."

"We are critical of Republicans, too. We are equal opportunity critics," he said.

Criticism like this is not how Daschle gets things done, Carson said. "He doesn't do it by launching attacks with false and misleading information."

The group's comments came two days after Daschle was praised by a largely Republican crowd of 1,600 members of the Sioux Falls Area Chamber of Commerce for his emotional personalization of the war on terrorism.

Timing of the critical remarks balanced with need for action were at the center of concern for some.

One respected former conservative Republican legislator, Harvey Krautschun of Spearfish, said

the message seemed appropriate, but he had mixed emotions about the timing.

"Holding a person accountable like someone in Mr. Daschle's position is totally appropriate," he said. "There are ways to do it and there are proper times to do it. We may not always agree with Mr. Daschle, but we respect him. In light of some of the gravity and situation in what is happening and the impact here, hopefully it (criticism) is being done in the proper tenor."

Now is not the time for such discussions on judgeships, but he agrees the nominees need hearings, says Republican Gov. Bill Janklow.

"Congress is in turmoil because of the anthrax situation. They are trying to get things done with the war-related measures, airline security, emergency financial policy, dealing with recession and unemployment issues, getting an appropriations bill passed. Congress ought to stay on task,"Janklow said.

Once those issues are dealt with he says Congress needs to take up the appointments.

"We, on all sides, have to quit playing game. The Constitution says the president appoints with the consent of the Senate. I don't think Congress - after they come back in session - should delay judicial hearings for political reasons. After the hearings, vote them up or down. Justice delayed is justice denied," he said.

Senate to Vote on Thurmond's Son

By Jesse Holland
The Associate Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Strom Thurmond Jr., son of longtime South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond, is on his way to becoming U.S. Attorney in his father's home state.

The nomination of Thurmond Jr. was one of 11 U.S. attorneys sent by voice vote by the Senate Judiciary Committee to the full Senate on Thursday.

It was not immediately known when the Senate would vote on the nominations, but senators rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members. Thurmond, the oldest and longest-serving senator at 98, could be heard voting "aye" when the block of U.S. attorney nominees came up for approval. The South Carolina senator is the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the second-ranking Republican.

The younger Thurmond is an assistant state prosecutor and a 1998 University of South Carolina law school graduate. He has endorsements from both Republican and Democratic leaders for the job; he has no official affiliation.

His father says he will not run again and the younger Thurmond will turn 30, the legal age for election to the Senate, a month before his father's seat will be on the ballot again in 2002. But he has said he intends to be federal prosecutor for four years.

The committee also decided to vote next week on Terry Wooten's nomination to be a U.S. District judge in South Carolina. Wooten, currently a U.S. magistrate judge in South Carolina, has been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991.

During Thomas' hearings, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the committee has received a confidential report from the FBI on the accusation. "I urge senators to read this report before voting next week," Leahy said.

The committee sent to the Senate the nominations of four other U.S. District judges, M. Christina Armijo of New Mexico, Karon Bowdre of Alabama, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma and Larry Hicks of Nevada.

The committee also sent Edith Brown Clement's nomination for a U.S. Appeals Court seat on the 5th Circuit to the Senate for approval by an 18-0 vote. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., refused to vote on the nomination, saying Clement had not answered his questions about a judicial conference she attended. When asked whether he would hold up her confirmation by the Senate, Feingold said "certainly, until I get her answers."

Business As Usual

The Ledger
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

It's not only in the U.S. House that the post-Sept. 11 bipartisanship has eroded. In the Senate, Republicans reportedly are holding up consideration of a major foreign aid appropriations bill for domestic political reasons. If this seems like an odd time to be throwing sand on the wheels of democracy -- especially when it comes to foreign aid and particularly at a time when the

REV_00072794

United States ought to be doing all it can to win over allies around the world -- rest assured that the Republicans think they have ample justification.

They don't think the Democrats, who hold a 50-49-1 Senate majority, are moving quickly enough to approve President Bush's judicial nominations. If this sounds like an old song, it is. For the last six years of the Clinton administration, Democrats complained that the Republicans were holding up judicial nominations.

Is there a logical nexus between judicial screenings and foreign aid? No. Is this just political blackmail of the sort that most Americans hoped would be left in the smoking ruins of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks? Yes.

Is it business as usual in the Washington Swamp? Sadly, yes.

Judicial nominees should be approved or not on their own merit and in timely fashion. The foreign aid bill should be passed or defeated on its own merits. Holding one hostage for the other is unacceptable while the nation is locked in a worldwide struggle for its very existence.

Democrats Try to Bend The U.S. Judiciary Branch

Michael Chidester
Daily Utah Chronicle
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

Looking to leave your mark in America? If so, forget about becoming a legislator.

Lawmakers are increasingly becoming high-profile budget makers. And don't shoot for the presidency. The chances are slim, the scrutiny is unbearable, and the living conditions are way over the top. If you're looking for power, become a judge.

Newsweek Columnist Jonathan Alter recognized the power of the courts in July 2000, when he called the naming of future Supreme Court justices "the real stakes" in the 2000 presidential election. "The next president, with as many as three or four Supreme Court appointments, will touch every American life," Alter wrote.

Such power can be intoxicating, especially to politicians. So nobody should be surprised by this Sept. 5
report from the Deseret News, just three months after Democrats gained control of the Senate Judiciary Committee: "[Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah] said a hearing that Democrats called Tuesday about changes that they seek appears 'to be part of a partisan strategy to ...[inject] partisanship into the judiciary.'"

Sen. Hatch is correct. Democrats are attempting to control the judiciary -- especially the approval of new federal judges -- in a number of ways. Given the modern penchant for furthering agendas through litigation rather than legislation, the efforts of these Democrats should raise a red flag for anybody who wants an impartial judiciary.

Hatch's comments referred to the actions of Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts. The Deseret News reports, "Sen. Schumer said the Senate should be able to consider the ideology of nominees [to the federal courts] -- and reject them if their views are 'out of the mainstream.'"

In other words, if the political views of potential judges do not coincide with those of Democratic legislators -- who supposedly are best qualified to judge what ideas are "in the mainstream" -- the judges will not be confirmed.

"The hallmark of a good jurist is one who does not allow personal opinion to affect objective legal decision making," Sen. Hatch said. "The Senate's responsibility does not include establishing an ideological litmus test to gauge a candidate's fitness based on his or her position on controversial issues."

Sen. Schumer believes considering a candidate's ideology will help "ensure that courts remain balanced and moderate." Again, Sen. Schumer's paternalistic pride assumes that he and his colleagues fully understand balance and moderation.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is also trying to change the confirmation of federal judges in dangerous ways.

FRC reports: "While attention was diverted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, Sen. Leahy unilaterally changed the Senate confirmation rules. Despite heated Republican objections, Sen. Leahy ordered sensitive personal information previously limited to confidential FBI background checks included on the Judiciary Committee questionnaire nominees are required to answer."

In addition, Sen. Leahy wants to force judicial nominees to disclose any political contributions they have made.

In both cases, this once confidential information will be offered to Senators who never needed it to confirm any of the 377 judges approved during the Clinton administration. This information -- which will hardly improve Senators' ability to assess a judge's professional capability -- will undoubtedly leak to the press, embarrassing the nominees.

Sens. Leahy and Schumer are trying to select judges based on their ideology. They apparently have no confidence that judges can or will act objectively, without giving in to their political preferences.

Oddly enough, Democrats believe their liberal counterparts at the American Bar Association can act

objectively, despite marked political ideologies.

For nearly 50 years, the ABA has evaluated every U.S. president's nominees for the federal bench, giving each candidate it assesses a rating of "well qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified." According to FRC, the ABA considers its evaluations "objective," and bases its ratings on a candidate's "integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament."

In March, President Bush ended this "preferential treatment" of the ABA when he advised the group that it would not be given a "quasi official role," while it held public views on controversial issues.

Martha W. Barnett, head of the ABA, responded by saying, "We cannot think of any constructive purpose this serves."

Surely Barnett is an intelligent woman. Perhaps a review of the ABA's stance on political issues might help her understand why President Bush doubted its supposed objectivity.

The FRC notes that the group advocates "abortion on demand, affirmative action, needle giveaway programs, homosexual adoption, medical marijuana and gun control," while it opposes "the death penalty, a flag desecration amendment and the right of the Boy Scouts ... to exclude homosexual leaders."

Sen. Leahy and friends feel they cannot trust nominees to one of hundreds of judicial posts across the country to be objective judges. However, they do feel the organization that recommends or rejects these individuals -- which has a very defined political agenda -- can do so objectively.

This unquestioning trust of the ABA, yet patent mistrust of conservative judicial nominees, makes Sen.
Leahy's motives for evaluating candidates' politics seem questionable.

In more simple terms, he can't be trusted.

NATIONAL AND STATE-BASED FAMILY POLICY GROUPS CALL ON DASCHLE TO COME CLEAN ON JUDGES, STOP THE STALLING

REV_00072813

"When the terrorists are brought to justice, there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," says FRC's Ken Connor

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. -- Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is playing partisan politics with the nation's court system by blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees and leaving over 100 federal judgeships vacant, said leaders from the Washington, D.C.-based Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council (SDFPC) on Wednesday. The groups announced they would be running newspaper ads about Sen. Daschle's blocking of judicial nominees in The Argus Leader beginning Thursday.

"Sen. Daschle has ratcheted up the partisanship on judges to unprecedented levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "When Bill Clinton was president, Sen. Daschle thought that 75 vacant judgeships was a 'judicial emergency,' why isn't it a crisis when 106 judgeships are vacant now that George W. Bush is president?"

"President Bush is nominating judges who will exercise judicial restraint, yet the bitterly partisan Sen. Daschle is determined to deny the president the fruits of his election - using the War on Terrorism as an excuse," Connor said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," SDFPC Executive Director Robert Regier said. "While we're praying for his safety and for a spirit of national unity, Sen. Daschle abuses his power in a spirit of partisan hostility.

"Sen. Daschle was sent to Washington to represent our values and to uphold the Constitution. He has failed on both counts. He may have won an election or two in South Dakota, but so has President Bush. We stand behind our President and so should Sen. Daschle."

Last week, President Bush asked Sen. Daschle to speed up the judicial nomination process. Sen. Daschle not only refused, he coerced the White House and Senate Republicans to cede their recent efforts to get Bush's nominees confirmed.

"Vacancies on the federal bench are beyond crisis levels," Connor said. When President Bush took office there were 67 vacancies; today there are 106. Only twelve of the 60 judges nominated have been confirmed and only a handful even have had hearings. How does this compare with previous administrations in their first years? According to the Wall Street Journal, Ronald Reagan had 41 judges confirmed, George H.W. Bush 15 and Bill Clinton 28.

"When the terrorists are brought to justice in the U.S., there may be no one there to judge their case, thanks to Sen. Daschle's partisan politics," Connor said.

WASHINGTON - Claims that Senator Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) is blocking the confirmation of President Bush's judicial nominees are "unfair," "false and misleading," according to Sen. Tom Daschle's spokesman Jay Carson. His remarks came in response to a press conference held on Wednesday by Family Research Council (FRC) and the South Dakota Family Policy Council in Sioux Falls. FRC believes the response begs a closer look at the spin vs. the reality:

Daschle Spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said the senator has been Majority Leader only since June: "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership in the Senate..."

Reality:
It's true, Sen. Daschle has only been the Majority Leader since June, but between June and the August congressional recess, President Bush made 40 judicial appointments. Why is it that under Senator Daschle's leadership the Senate has only been able to confirm 12 of those 40 nominees?

The best way to measure the Senate's record on confirming judicial appointments is how many vacancies there are at the end of a congressional session. When Bill Clinton was president, the highest number of vacancies the Senate left town without filling was 67. Currently, there are over 100 vacancies and counting. How many judicial vacancies will there be when Sen. Daschle sends the 107th Senate home for the holidays?

Daschle spin:
Sen. Daschle's spokesman said, "Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

Reality:
Just last week, The Washington Times (October 24) reported that in a meeting with congressional leaders, President Bush asked Senator Daschle about the status of judicial nominations. To try to force Democrats to stop stalling the confirmation of judges, Republicans had been holding up the Foreign Relations spending bill. According to The Times, "Senate sources said Mr. Daschle told the president that he would not link judges with spending bills and that Mr. Bush needed the spending bills more than Senate Democrats did." Is that what Sen. Daschle calls getting business done for the American people?

"Vacancies on the federal bench have gone way beyond Daschle's definition of crisis levels," FRC President Ken Connor said. "It's time he stop playing political games with the nation's judiciary and help move qualified judges into the nation's empty benches."

Hutchinson Wants Smith's Name Before Committee Soon

The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

Sen. Tim Hutchinson said he wants the Senate Judiciary Committee to soon consider the appointment of former state Supreme Court justice Lavenski Smith to 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

President Bush nominated Smith, 42, to the court in May. Smith said Monday he has received no word on the confirmation process.

D.J. O'Brien, spokesman for Hutchinson, R-Ark., said the Democratic-controlled committee must first approve the nomination before Smith can be considered before the full Senate.

"I think he fits in pretty well with the mold George Bush is looking for" in judicial nominees, O'Brien said.

Smith also has the support of Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., said her spokesman, Drew Goesl.

Gov. Mike Huckabee named Smith, a Republican, as PSC chairman in January 1997 and a year later appointed his fellow Hope native to the state Supreme Court to fill out the term of Justice David Newbern, who retired.

Smith ran unsuccessfully for the state Court of Appeals in November. In December, Huckabee named him to a six-year term on the PSC.

Head of National Pro-Family Group: Daschle Playing Politics with Judges

By Steven Barrett
The Associated Press
Thursday, October 31, 2001

The president of a conservative national organization says Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle is holding up President Bush's federal judicial nominations to make Bush look weak and boost Democrats' election hopes.

At a news conference Wednesday in Sioux Falls, Ken Connor of the Washington-based Family

REV_00072804

Research Council told reporters that confirmations went much faster in the first year of the three previous presidential administrations.

"The strategy is to make the president bleed, to make him appear impotent" so Democrats can win more races in 2002, Connor said.

A spokesman for Daschle said the senator from South Dakota is working hard to fill seats on the judiciary and that the Family Research Council's criticisms are unfair. Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

Connor accused Daschle of changing his tune on judicial confirmations since Bush succeeded Clinton. He quoted Daschle as saying in a news conference March 7, 2000, that the roughly 75 judgeships vacant then under Clinton represented a "dire shortage."

But Jay Carson, a spokesman for Daschle, countered that Daschle has been majority leader only since June, before which Republicans controlled the Senate.

"Basically, the claims that are made by the Family Research Council are false and misleading," he said.

"Since September 11, Senator Daschle has worked closely with President Bush and his administration and the Republican leaders in Congress to get the business of the American people done in this time of crisis."

That includes things like helping the airline industry and families who lost loved ones in the terrorist attacks, Carson said, and yes, judicial confirmations.

"Under Democratic leadership, the day after the anthrax arrived in the Capitol complex, the Judiciary Committee met in a small, cramped room inside the Capitol. They didn't have their office space anymore. It was closed off by the FBI," Carson said. "They had every excuse in the world not to meet ... but they said, 'We need to get these judges done and we're going to hold a meeting.'"

That committee includes senators as diverse as Republican Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and Democrat Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

Carson called Connor's comments "disappointing" at a time when unity is important.

REV_00072805

"These sorts of partisan attacks are not what we need at this time," Carson said.

Clinton had 67 judicial nominees who never got a vote on the Senate floor, he added, and 57 of those never got a hearing. Vacancies grew from 65 when Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah became chairman of the Judiciary Committee in 1995 to 107 when Democratic Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont took over the position in June, Carson said. "The vacancies that exist in America right now are a product of a lack of confirmations by the previous leadership of the Senate ...," he said. "It's hard to see those criticisms as anything other than crocodile tears."

Carson also said that since July, the Senate has confirmed four Court of Appeals judges and is scheduling a hearing for a fifth. Only three such judges were confirmed in all of 1993, under Clinton, Carson noted in a news release Wednesday afternoon.

And he said more judges may be confirmed this year, making end-of-year comparisons with previous confirmation rates inaccurate.

Connor said the depleted judiciary will be ill-equipped to handle court cases arising from the Sept. 11
terrorist attacks.

"We've heard a great deal about bringing wrongdoers to justice," and that task will be slowed by the lack of judges, he said.

Rob Regier, executive director of the South Dakota Family Policy Council, said Daschle does not want to see Bush's nominees approved because they will exercise judicial restraint rather than press a social agenda from the bench.

"Tom Daschle is doing his level best to carry out the Clinton legacy of activist judges, even at the cost of justice," said Regier, who joined Connor at the news conference. Regier said he used to work with Connor in Washington.

Republican senators recently gave up trying to get Democrats to agree to approve a specified number of Bush's nominees this year. GOP senators decided to wait until January, the start of an election year, to begin pressuring Democrats again to approve the nominees.

Connor, clad in a green flannel shirt, tan slacks and hiking boots, said he had just finished a week of successful pheasant hunting near Plankinton. It was his sixth time hunting in the state, he said.

"We limited out each day," he said.

Judicial Nomination Clears Senate Committee

REV_00072806

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

New Mexico Court of Appeals Judge Christina Armijo's nomination for a U.S. district judgeship cleared a Senate committee Thursday. The Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend full Senate confirmation of Armijo to serve as a U.S. district court judge for New Mexico, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., said in a news release.

Domenici recommended Armijo of Las Vegas for the job, and she was nominated by President Bush.

Domenici said he hopes Armijo's Senate confirmation will occur within the next week.

Armijo has been an appeals court judge since 1996.

Group: Daschle Delaying Judges

By David Kranz
Argus Leader
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Senator's aides deny nominees held up, assail timing of charge

A conservative group focusing on family values is accusing Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle of defying President Bush's wishes to expedite approval of federal judges.

But a Daschle spokesman said the South Dakota Family Policy Council is using misleading information to make its point.

Robert E. Regier of Sioux Falls, state executive director of the group, says the group will run an ad in today's Argus Leader asking constituents to call Daschle and tell him to stop holding up the nominations.

Regier says failure to do so sends a partisan message in a time of a national crisis.

"A key element in seeking justice on the evils of the perpetrators on our country is our justice system," Regier said in a Wednesday news conference.

Daschle is contradicting a comment made in 2000 when he said the 74 vacancies meant a "dire shortage," he said

The shortage is greater now, and Daschle isn't responding, Regier said.

"At a time when South Dakotans are concerned about the anthrax attacks on our senator and his staff, Sen. Daschle is playing political games with our judicial system," he said.

REV_00072807

Jay Carson, news secretary for Daschle, said it was unfortunate that Regier and Ken Connor, president of the national organization, were the ones acting in a partisan manner at a time when Daschle was working closely with President Bush to deal with the national trauma.

"At a time when our country has come together - where Daschle meets regularly with the President, Speaker (Dennis) Hastert and Sen. (Trent) Lott - it is not the right time to start pushing a partisan agenda and engaging in partisan attacks," Carson said.

He disputes the suggestion of the two men that Daschle turned his back on Bush's request to accelerate Senate confirmation of federal judges.

"It is simpy not true. I talked to the judiciary committee staff and what they are charging, it is just not true. It is an incredibly misleading claim," Carson said.

Twenty percent, or 12 of 60, federal judges Bush has nominated have been confirmed.

That compares with 57 percent, or 27 of 47, confirmed in the first year of President Clinton's administration; 62 percent, or 15 of 24, in the elder President Bush's first year; and 91 percent, of 41 of 45, in President Reagan's first year, Connor said.

More than 50 nominees are pending. The federal judiciary has 110 vacancies, including 39 positions open so long the courts classify them as "judicial emergencies."

While the press briefing was taking place in Sioux Falls, Daschle, the president and other legislative leaders were holding a lengthy breakfast meeting, Carson said.

"They were there doing the business of the American people," he said.

Connor says the Council watches Democrats and Republicans equally and believes Republicans "caved to Daschle's hardball politics."

"We are critical of Republicans, too. We are equal opportunity critics," he said.

Criticism like this is not how Daschle gets things done, Carson said. "He doesn't do it by launching attacks with false and misleading information."

The group's comments came two days after Daschle was praised by a largely Republican crowd of 1,600 members of the Sioux Falls Area Chamber of Commerce for his emotional personalization of the war on terrorism.

Timing of the critical remarks balanced with need for action were at the center of concern for some.

One respected former conservative Republican legislator, Harvey Krautschun of Spearfish, said

the message seemed appropriate, but he had mixed emotions about the timing.

"Holding a person accountable like someone in Mr. Daschle's position is totally appropriate," he said. "There are ways to do it and there are proper times to do it. We may not always agree with Mr. Daschle, but we respect him. In light of some of the gravity and situation in what is happening and the impact here, hopefully it (criticism) is being done in the proper tenor."

Now is not the time for such discussions on judgeships, but he agrees the nominees need hearings, says Republican Gov. Bill Janklow.

"Congress is in turmoil because of the anthrax situation. They are trying to get things done with the war-related measures, airline security, emergency financial policy, dealing with recession and unemployment issues, getting an appropriations bill passed. Congress ought to stay on task,"Janklow said.

Once those issues are dealt with he says Congress needs to take up the appointments.

"We, on all sides, have to quit playing game. The Constitution says the president appoints with the consent of the Senate. I don't think Congress - after they come back in session - should delay judicial hearings for political reasons. After the hearings, vote them up or down. Justice delayed is justice denied," he said.

Senate to Vote on Thurmond's Son

By Jesse Holland
The Associate Press
Thursday, November 1, 2001

Strom Thurmond Jr., son of longtime South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond, is on his way to becoming U.S. Attorney in his father's home state.

The nomination of Thurmond Jr. was one of 11 U.S. attorneys sent by voice vote by the Senate Judiciary Committee to the full Senate on Thursday.

It was not immediately known when the Senate would vote on the nominations, but senators rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members. Thurmond, the oldest and longest-serving senator at 98, could be heard voting "aye" when the block of U.S. attorney nominees came up for approval. The South Carolina senator is the former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the second-ranking Republican.

The younger Thurmond is an assistant state prosecutor and a 1998 University of South Carolina law school graduate. He has endorsements from both Republican and Democratic leaders for the job; he has no official affiliation.

His father says he will not run again and the younger Thurmond will turn 30, the legal age for election to the Senate, a month before his father's seat will be on the ballot again in 2002. But he has said he intends to be federal prosecutor for four years.

The committee also decided to vote next week on Terry Wooten's nomination to be a U.S. District judge in South Carolina. Wooten, currently a U.S. magistrate judge in South Carolina, has been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991.

During Thomas' hearings, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said the committee has received a confidential report from the FBI on the accusation. "I urge senators to read this report before voting next week," Leahy said.

The committee sent to the Senate the nominations of four other U.S. District judges, M. Christina Armijo of New Mexico, Karon Bowdre of Alabama, Stephen Friot of Oklahoma and Larry Hicks of Nevada.

The committee also sent Edith Brown Clement's nomination for a U.S. Appeals Court seat on the 5th Circuit to the Senate for approval by an 18-0 vote. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., refused to vote on the nomination, saying Clement had not answered his questions about a judicial conference she attended. When asked whether he would hold up her confirmation by the Senate, Feingold said "certainly, until I get her answers."

Business As Usual

The Ledger
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

It's not only in the U.S. House that the post-Sept. 11 bipartisanship has eroded. In the Senate, Republicans reportedly are holding up consideration of a major foreign aid appropriations bill for domestic political reasons. If this seems like an odd time to be throwing sand on the wheels of democracy -- especially when it comes to foreign aid and particularly at a time when the

REV_00072810

United States ought to be doing all it can to win over allies around the world -- rest assured that the Republicans think they have ample justification.

They don't think the Democrats, who hold a 50-49-1 Senate majority, are moving quickly enough to approve President Bush's judicial nominations. If this sounds like an old song, it is. For the last six years of the Clinton administration, Democrats complained that the Republicans were holding up judicial nominations.

Is there a logical nexus between judicial screenings and foreign aid? No. Is this just political blackmail of the sort that most Americans hoped would be left in the smoking ruins of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks? Yes.

Is it business as usual in the Washington Swamp? Sadly, yes.

Judicial nominees should be approved or not on their own merit and in timely fashion. The foreign aid bill should be passed or defeated on its own merits. Holding one hostage for the other is unacceptable while the nation is locked in a worldwide struggle for its very existence.

Democrats Try to Bend The U.S. Judiciary Branch

Michael Chidester
Daily Utah Chronicle
Tuesday, October 30, 2001

Looking to leave your mark in America? If so, forget about becoming a legislator.

Lawmakers are increasingly becoming high-profile budget makers. And don't shoot for the presidency. The chances are slim, the scrutiny is unbearable, and the living conditions are way over the top. If you're looking for power, become a judge.

Newsweek Columnist Jonathan Alter recognized the power of the courts in July 2000, when he called the naming of future Supreme Court justices "the real stakes" in the 2000 presidential election. "The next president, with as many as three or four Supreme Court appointments, will touch every American life," Alter wrote.

Such power can be intoxicating, especially to politicians. So nobody should be surprised by this Sept. 5
report from the Deseret News, just three months after Democrats gained control of the Senate Judiciary Committee: "[Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah] said a hearing that Democrats called Tuesday about changes that they seek appears 'to be part of a partisan strategy to ...[inject] partisanship into the judiciary.'"

Sen. Hatch is correct. Democrats are attempting to control the judiciary -- especially the approval of new federal judges -- in a number of ways. Given the modern penchant for furthering agendas through litigation rather than legislation, the efforts of these Democrats should raise a red flag

I don't think this helps much. I think it just means that if they charge anyone in connection with travel on their corporate plane that they will not be in violation of FAA certification requirements. The best course here is to get a commercial charter service paid for by the RNC.

This is a message I received from Parsky's office regarding the flights. I would like your thoughts. Also, we need to talk in regards to how the trip should be paid for.

Also, per our conversation regarding our jet. It is fully owned by RSF Management Services, Inc. and we hold a 135 Commercial Carriage Charter Certificate through West Coast Charters. WCC is an independent charter company and is not affiliated with RSF Management. We have used the jet to fly various people, including Mr. Parsky and Condi Rice during the Bush Campaign and the campaign reimbursed us at the charter rate. With the 135 certificate RSF Managements can carry passengers as a commercial carrier. We can have an invoice generated for as an estimate which includes the per hour fee plus 7.25% fuel tax. All catering and telephone use would be at an

Thanks

You don't have to cut a check, seeing how this is probably part of your job.
I believe it is $75 for members of the public.

Chris:

Sorry to bother you with this again but Steve Leeds does not want to take no for an answer with regards to setting up a 501 C(3) to collect $$$ for a world bounty fund to fight terrorism. He does not understand why the state department is allowing Priceline.com to collect money for a similar effort. He has also talked to Larry Thompson at Justice who told him he thought it was a good idea but something that would not be handled by the Justice Department.

The reason for coming back to you is that Steve is Max Cleland's "Honorary Chief of Staff." I am afraid he will start creating a raucous that the right hand doesn't know what the left hand is doing (State says "yes," WH says "no".) He wants to know if there is someone he and the two indivuduals he is working with can meet with at State or at the WH to present his concept. My political antenna is up on this one so I want to make sure we handle it properly.

Please advise.

Eric

Tim: Per your question, below is Brad's analysis, which seems right to me -- namely, a one-time event due no doubt to sloppiness by someone on Hill either in handling their printed-out e-mails or by leaving screen in open area unattended.

Subject: Re: Re[2]: Nominees & the War on Terrorism

It is indeed difficult to imagine, given the distribution list on this e-mail, how this could have fallen into the hands of the press. I would certainly hate to think that we can't rely on the security of our e-mail communications, although logic suggests that whatever happened here was probably a one-off event. (If someone had regular access, it's doubtful that (a) this would be the e-mail they would have publicized, or (b) that this would have happened only once.) Still this probably merits some investigation -- how to do that, I don't know.

Chris:

Sorry to bother you with this again but Steve Leeds does not want to take no for an answer with regards to setting up a 501 C(3) to collect $$$ for a world bounty fund to fight terrorism. He does not understand why the state department is allowing Priceline.com to collect money for a similar effort. He has also talked to Larry Thompson at Justice who told him he thought it was a good idea but something that would not be handled by the Justice Department.

The reason for coming back to you is that Steve is Max Cleland's "Honorary Chief of Staff." I am afraid he will start creating a raucous that the right hand doesn't know what the left hand is doing (State says "yes," WH says "no".) He wants to know if there is someone he and the two indivuduals he is working with can meet with at State or at the WH to present his concept. My political antenna is up on this one so I want to make sure we handle it properly.

Please advise.

Eric

Pressing the Issue of Judicial Confirmations

By Al Kamen
The Washington Post
Monday, November 5, 2001

REV_00072892

Save the date! Look for an important press event at 2:30 p.m. Wednesday on the Hill as the Republicans blast the Democrats over judicial confirmations.

Chris Myers, senior communications adviser for the Senate Republican Conference, is working to put something together that will use the war on terrorism to force Democrats to confirm more GOP judges.

Myers, in an e-mail Thursday to White House and other GOP aides, said that Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) has been talking with Senate Republican Leader Trent Lott (Miss.) about "a press event to speed the pace of confirmations," with "a more specific linking of the new terrorism bill to the need for judges. Our message would be: You can't get wire taps, search warrants, etc. without judges; confirm the President's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed."

Senate Democrats, who captured the Myers e-mail Friday, were furious, noting that they have run the Senate only since July and have confirmed or sent to the floor 17 judges since then, two more than were confirmed in the first year of Bush I, and that they may match or exceed the 27 judges confirmed in President Bill Clinton's first term. And the Republicans didn't confirm anybody when they were in charge this year.

Republicans counter that 43 of President Bush's judicial nominees are still awaiting Senate action and that of the 11 nominees sent up in the first batch in May, only three have even had hearings and the pace is intolerably slow.

"Right now we're looking into an event next Wednesday (2:30) with Sen. [Fred D.] Thompson's office and we'd also like to have Sen. [Orrin G.] Hatch's participation," Myers said in his message to White House legislative affairs aide Heather Wingate, assistant attorney general for congressional relations Daniel J. Bryant, vice presidential aide Candida Perotti Wolff and Senate Judiciary GOP staffers Jeff Taylor and Makan Delrahim.

Wingate responded in a Friday e-mail, with copies to Brett Kavanaugh and Bradford Berenson in the White House counsel's office and assistant attorney general for legal policy Viet Dinh and his principal deputy Jennifer Newstead.

"Thanks, Chris. Very much love the interest you all have on noms. Let me gather with our DoJ/WH Counsel folks and get back with you re: helping you with that message," she said, suggesting to those copied "let's discuss" Myers's e-mail. "I'll be in touch this morning on this issue."

In his e-mail, Myers wanted some specific help: "Also, we'd love to have evidence of a slowed investigation because of the lack of judges. Who could help us with this? Judiciary Committee? Dept. of Justice?"

Justice might be busy these days.

OC Attorney's Judicial Nomination Advances

Tulsa World
Friday, November 2, 2001

The U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday approved the nomination of Oklahoma City attorney Stephen P. Friot to be a judge in the state's Western District.

Friot's nomination passed the panel 19-0 and now heads to the Senate floor for a final confirmation vote. A past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association, the 54-year-old nominee has been in private practice for nearly three decades.

He is a former board member of Legal Aid of Western Oklahoma.

Friot was nominated for the judicial post in August by President Bush upon the recommendation of Oklahoma Republican Sens. Don Nickles and Jim Inhofe.

He was the Oklahoma co-chairman of Lawyers for Bush-Cheney 2000.

A native of Troy, N.Y., Friot received his law degree from the University of Oklahoma in 1972, when he joined what would become the Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum law firm.

Reno Lawyer Hicks Gets Senate Judiciary Confirmation as Judge

The Associated Press
Friday, November 2, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee has approved Reno lawyer and former Washoe County District Attorney Larry Hicks for a new federal judgeship in Nevada.

The voice vote Thursday sends Hicks' name to the full Senate for final approval. It wasn't immediately known when the Senate would vote, but the Senate rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members.

Hicks was nominated in August by President Bush - his second nomination to a U.S. District Court seat. Bush's father, former President George Bush, made the same move in 1992, but the nomination lapsed when President Clinton took office.

Hicks is a partner in one of Nevada's largest law firms, McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks. He was Washoe County district attorney from 1974 to 1978.

REV_00072894

A past president of the state bar association's board of governors, Hicks also serves as one of 90 civil dispute settlement judges for the Nevada Supreme Court. He was admitted to the Nevada state bar in 1968.

The lifetime federal court appointment carries an annual salary of $145,100.

The new position had been authorized by Congress to take up part of a workload described as one of the busiest in the nation, said Cynthia Jensen, chief deputy clerk for the court in Las Vegas.

Reno Attorney One Step Closer

Las Vegas Review-Journal
Friday, November 2, 2001

Attorney Larry Hicks moved a step closer to the federal bench Thursday when the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend he become a U.S. District Court judge in Nevada.

The committee's vote sends the nomination to the full Senate, which could take it up within the next week, said a spokesman for Majority Whip Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Hicks, 57, of Reno, was among 17 federal nominees approved by the committee.

'We have every reason to believe he will be confirmed,' Judiciary Committee spokeswoman Mimi Devlin said.

Hicks traveled to Washington for a confirmation hearing Oct. 18. It took place in a Capitol meeting room on the day Senate office buildings were closed for anthrax sweeps.

Judicial Nominee Clears Committee

The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, November 2, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday gave Oklahoma City attorney Stephen P. Friot a 19-0 endorsement for a federal judgeship in Oklahoma City. His nomination now goes to the full Senate.

Friot is the third Oklahoma judicial nominee to clear the committee in the last few weeks.

Claire V. Eagan and James H. Payne were both approved by the panel and then the full Senate in late October.

Friot, a partner in the firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum, was nominated by President Bush to serve as a judge in the Western District of Oklahoma in Oklahoma City.

In response to "Obstruction Dems," Al W. Blair's letter of Oct. 25, I can only say, you must be joking. To call Democrats obstructionist on the matter of filling positions of federal judges is an outrageous hypocrisy on the part of any Republican. For those with short attention spans, I would point out that Republicans stalled Clinton nominations for eight years, leaving numerous posts unfilled.

The Democrats may be obstructing these nominations, but I would advise Republicans to just shut up and take their dose of the same medicine they handed out over the eight years of Clinton's presidency. I would also point out that during Bush's short term to date, there has been more bipartisanship at the Capitol, even before Sept. 11, than Republicans offered during Clinton's term.

...is justice denied. Chris Meyers, key aide to Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Penn.), says: "You can't get wire taps, search warrants, etc. without judges, [so] confirm the president's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed." Liberals in the Senate say that when the president's party controlled that body (before Sen. Jim Jeffords' famous "jump") no judges were confirmed. That's ridiculous. For most of those months, nominees hadn't even been submitted. That's because of the disputed election. Prior to June, few if any of the nominees had even submitted required financial disclosure forms or had FBI background checks. Liberals stalling on judges will have to come up with more plausible excuses than that. For now, however, wouldn't it be better for all concerned to act on the pending nominees? Presently, there are 106 vacancies. When there were just 74 vacancies under Mr. Clinton, Sen. Daschle called it "a judicial emergency." Senate liberals are wrong to obstruct Mr. Bush's judicial nominees; justice requires action.

Pressing the Issue of Judicial Confirmations

Save the date! Look for an important press event at 2:30 p.m. Wednesday on the Hill as the Republicans blast the Democrats over judicial confirmations.

Chris Myers, senior communications adviser for the Senate Republican Conference, is working to put something together that will use the war on terrorism to force Democrats to confirm more GOP judges.

Myers, in an e-mail Thursday to White House and other GOP aides, said that Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) has been talking with Senate Republican Leader Trent Lott (Miss.) about "a press event to speed the pace of confirmations," with "a more specific linking of the new terrorism bill to the need for judges. Our message would be: You can't get wire taps, search warrants, etc. without judges; confirm the President's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed."

Senate Democrats, who captured the Myers e-mail Friday, were furious, noting that they have run the Senate only since July and have confirmed or sent to the floor 17 judges since then, two more than were confirmed in the first year of Bush I, and that they may match or exceed the 27 judges confirmed in President Bill Clinton's first term. And the Republicans didn't confirm anybody when they were in charge this year.

Republicans counter that 43 of President Bush's judicial nominees are still awaiting Senate action and that of the 11 nominees sent up in the first batch in May, only three have even had hearings and the pace is intolerably slow.

"Right now we're looking into an event next Wednesday (2:30) with Sen. [Fred D.] Thompson's office and we'd also like to have Sen. [Orrin G.] Hatch's participation," Myers said in his message to White House legislative affairs aide Heather Wingate, assistant attorney general for congressional relations Daniel J. Bryant, vice presidential aide Candida Perotti Wolff and Senate Judiciary GOP staffers Jeff Taylor and Makan Delrahim.

Wingate responded in a Friday e-mail, with copies to Brett Kavanaugh and Bradford Berenson in the White House counsel's office and assistant attorney general for legal policy Viet Dinh and his principal deputy Jennifer Newstead.

"Thanks, Chris. Very much love the interest you all have on noms. Let me gather with our DoJ/WH Counsel folks and get back with you re: helping you with that message," she said, suggesting to those copied "let's discuss" Myers's e-mail. "I'll be in touch this morning on this issue."

In his e-mail, Myers wanted some specific help: "Also, we'd love to have evidence of a slowed investigation because of the lack of judges. Who could help us with this? Judiciary Committee? Dept. of Justice?"

Justice might be busy these days.

OC Attorney's Judicial Nomination Advances

Tulsa World
Friday, November 2, 2001

The U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday approved the nomination of Oklahoma City attorney Stephen P. Friot to be a judge in the state's Western District.

Friot's nomination passed the panel 19-0 and now heads to the Senate floor for a final confirmation vote. A past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association, the 54-year-old nominee has been in private practice for nearly three decades.

He is a former board member of Legal Aid of Western Oklahoma.

Friot was nominated for the judicial post in August by President Bush upon the recommendation of Oklahoma Republican Sens. Don Nickles and Jim Inhofe.

He was the Oklahoma co-chairman of Lawyers for Bush-Cheney 2000.

A native of Troy, N.Y., Friot received his law degree from the University of Oklahoma in 1972, when he joined what would become the Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum law firm.

Reno Lawyer Hicks Gets Senate Judiciary Confirmation as Judge

The Associated Press
Friday, November 2, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee has approved Reno lawyer and former Washoe County District Attorney Larry Hicks for a new federal judgeship in Nevada.

The voice vote Thursday sends Hicks' name to the full Senate for final approval. It wasn't immediately known when the Senate would vote, but the Senate rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members.

Hicks was nominated in August by President Bush - his second nomination to a U.S. District Court seat. Bush's father, former President George Bush, made the same move in 1992, but the nomination lapsed when President Clinton took office.

Hicks is a partner in one of Nevada's largest law firms, McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks. He was Washoe County district attorney from 1974 to 1978.

A past president of the state bar association's board of governors, Hicks also serves as one of 90 civil dispute settlement judges for the Nevada Supreme Court. He was admitted to the Nevada state bar in 1968.

The lifetime federal court appointment carries an annual salary of $145,100.

The new position had been authorized by Congress to take up part of a workload described as one of the busiest in the nation, said Cynthia Jensen, chief deputy clerk for the court in Las Vegas.

Reno Attorney One Step Closer

Las Vegas Review-Journal
Friday, November 2, 2001

Attorney Larry Hicks moved a step closer to the federal bench Thursday when the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend he become a U.S. District Court judge in Nevada.

The committee's vote sends the nomination to the full Senate, which could take it up within the next week, said a spokesman for Majority Whip Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Hicks, 57, of Reno, was among 17 federal nominees approved by the committee.

'We have every reason to believe he will be confirmed,' Judiciary Committee spokeswoman Mimi Devlin said.

Hicks traveled to Washington for a confirmation hearing Oct. 18. It took place in a Capitol meeting room on the day Senate office buildings were closed for anthrax sweeps.

Judicial Nominee Clears Committee

The Daily Oklahoman
Friday, November 2, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday gave Oklahoma City attorney Stephen P. Friot a 19-0 endorsement for a federal judgeship in Oklahoma City. His nomination now goes to the full Senate.

Friot is the third Oklahoma judicial nominee to clear the committee in the last few weeks.

Claire V. Eagan and James H. Payne were both approved by the panel and then the full Senate in late October.

Friot, a partner in the firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum, was nominated by President Bush to serve as a judge in the Western District of Oklahoma in Oklahoma City.

Turnabout is Fair Play

By Martin Ward
Rocky Mountain News
Friday, November 2, 2001

In response to "Obstruction Dems," Al W. Blair's letter of Oct. 25, I can only say, you must be joking. To call Democrats obstructionist on the matter of filling positions of federal judges is an outrageous hypocrisy on the part of any Republican. For those with short attention spans, I would point out that Republicans stalled Clinton nominations for eight years, leaving numerous posts unfilled.

The Democrats may be obstructing these nominations, but I would advise Republicans to just shut up and take their dose of the same medicine they handed out over the eight years of Clinton's presidency. I would also point out that during Bush's short term to date, there has been more bipartisanship at the Capitol, even before Sept. 11, than Republicans offered during Clinton's term.

Justice Delayed...

By Kenneth Connor
The Family Research Council
Monday, November 5, 2001

...is justice denied. Chris Meyers, key aide to Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Penn.), says: "You can't get wire taps, search warrants, etc. without judges, [so] confirm the president's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed." Liberals in the Senate say that when the president's party controlled that body (before Sen. Jim Jeffords' famous "jump") no judges were confirmed. That's ridiculous. For most of those months, nominees hadn't even been submitted. That's because of the disputed election. Prior to June, few if any of the nominees had even submitted required financial disclosure forms or had FBI background checks. Liberals stalling on judges will have to come up with more plausible excuses than that. For now, however, wouldn't it be better for all concerned to act on the pending nominees? Presently, there are 106 vacancies. When there were just 74 vacancies under Mr. Clinton, Sen. Daschle called it "a judicial emergency." Senate liberals are wrong to obstruct Mr. Bush's judicial nominees; justice requires action.

Attorney Larry Hicks moved a step closer to the federal bench Thursday when the Senate Judiciary Committee voted 19-0 to recommend he become a U.S. District Court judge in Nevada.

The committee's vote sends the nomination to the full Senate, which could take it up within the next week, said a spokesman for Majority Whip Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Hicks, 57, of Reno, was among 17 federal nominees approved by the committee.

'We have every reason to believe he will be confirmed,' Judiciary Committee spokeswoman Mimi Devlin said.

Hicks traveled to Washington for a confirmation hearing Oct. 18. It took place in a Capitol meeting room on the day Senate office buildings were closed for anthrax sweeps.

Save the date! Look for an important press event at 2:30 p.m. Wednesday on the Hill as the Republicans blast the Democrats over judicial confirmations.

Chris Myers, senior communications adviser for the Senate Republican Conference, is working to put something together that will use the war on terrorism to force Democrats to confirm more GOP judges.

Myers, in an e-mail Thursday to White House and other GOP aides, said that Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) has been talking with Senate Republican Leader Trent Lott (Miss.) about "a press event to speed the pace of confirmations," with "a more specific linking of the new terrorism bill to the need for judges. Our message would be: You can't get wire taps, search warrants, etc. without judges; confirm the President's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed."

Senate Democrats, who captured the Myers e-mail Friday, were furious, noting that they have run the Senate only since July and have confirmed or sent to the floor 17 judges since then, two more than were confirmed in the first year of Bush I, and that they may match or exceed the 27 judges confirmed in President Bill Clinton's first term. And the Republicans didn't confirm anybody when they were in charge this year.

Republicans counter that 43 of President Bush's judicial nominees are still awaiting Senate action and that of the 11 nominees sent up in the first batch in May, only three have even had hearings and the pace is intolerably slow.

"Right now we're looking into an event next Wednesday (2:30) with Sen. [Fred D.] Thompson's office and we'd also like to have Sen. [Orrin G.] Hatch's participation," Myers said in his message to White House legislative affairs aide Heather Wingate, assistant attorney general for congressional relations Daniel J. Bryant, vice presidential aide Candida Perotti Wolff and Senate Judiciary GOP staffers Jeff Taylor and Makan Delrahim.

Wingate responded in a Friday e-mail, with copies to Brett Kavanaugh and Bradford Berenson in the White House counsel's office and assistant attorney general for legal policy Viet Dinh and his principal deputy Jennifer Newstead.

"Thanks, Chris. Very much love the interest you all have on noms. Let me gather with our DoJ/WH Counsel folks and get back with you re: helping you with that message," she said, suggesting to those copied "let's discuss" Myers's e-mail. "I'll be in touch this morning on this issue."

In his e-mail, Myers wanted some specific help: "Also, we'd love to have evidence of a slowed investigation because of the lack of judges. Who could help us with this? Judiciary Committee? Dept. of Justice?"

Justice might be busy these days.

OC Attorney's Judicial Nomination Advances

Tulsa World
Friday, November 2, 2001

The U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday approved the nomination of Oklahoma City attorney Stephen P. Friot to be a judge in the state's Western District.

Friot's nomination passed the panel 19-0 and now heads to the Senate floor for a final confirmation vote. A past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association, the 54-year-old nominee has been in private practice for nearly three decades.

He is a former board member of Legal Aid of Western Oklahoma.

Friot was nominated for the judicial post in August by President Bush upon the recommendation of Oklahoma Republican Sens. Don Nickles and Jim Inhofe.

He was the Oklahoma co-chairman of Lawyers for Bush-Cheney 2000.

A native of Troy, N.Y., Friot received his law degree from the University of Oklahoma in 1972, when he joined what would become the Spradling, Alpern, Friot & Gum law firm.

Reno Lawyer Hicks Gets Senate Judiciary Confirmation as Judge

The Associated Press
Friday, November 2, 2001

The Senate Judiciary Committee has approved Reno lawyer and former Washoe County District Attorney Larry Hicks for a new federal judgeship in Nevada.

The voice vote Thursday sends Hicks' name to the full Senate for final approval. It wasn't immediately known when the Senate would vote, but the Senate rarely reject a nomination pushed by one of its members.

Hicks was nominated in August by President Bush - his second nomination to a U.S. District Court seat. Bush's father, former President George Bush, made the same move in 1992, but the nomination lapsed when President Clinton took office.

Hicks is a partner in one of Nevada's largest law firms, McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks. He was Washoe County district attorney from 1974 to 1978.

REV_00072948

A past president of the state bar association's board of governors, Hicks also serves as one of 90 civil dispute settlement judges for the Nevada Supreme Court. He was admitted to the Nevada state bar in 1968.

The lifetime federal court appointment carries an annual salary of $145,100.

The new position had been authorized by Congress to take up part of a workload described as one of the busiest in the nation, said Cynthia Jensen, chief deputy clerk for the court in Las Vegas.

Pressing the Issue of Judicial Confirmations

By Al Kamen
The Washington Post
Monday, November 5, 2001

REV_00072960

Save the date! Look for an important press event at 2:30 p.m. Wednesday on the Hill as the Republicans blast the Democrats over judicial confirmations.

Chris Myers, senior communications adviser for the Senate Republican Conference, is working to put something together that will use the war on terrorism to force Democrats to confirm more GOP judges.

Myers, in an e-mail Thursday to White House and other GOP aides, said that Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) has been talking with Senate Republican Leader Trent Lott (Miss.) about "a press event to speed the pace of confirmations," with "a more specific linking of the new terrorism bill to the need for judges. Our message would be: You can't get wire taps, search warrants, etc. without judges; confirm the President's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed."

Senate Democrats, who captured the Myers e-mail Friday, were furious, noting that they have run the Senate only since July and have confirmed or sent to the floor 17 judges since then, two more than were confirmed in the first year of Bush I, and that they may match or exceed the 27 judges confirmed in President Bill Clinton's first term. And the Republicans didn't confirm anybody when they were in charge this year.

Republicans counter that 43 of President Bush's judicial nominees are still awaiting Senate action and that of the 11 nominees sent up in the first batch in May, only three have even had hearings and the pace is intolerably slow.

"Right now we're looking into an event next Wednesday (2:30) with Sen. [Fred D.] Thompson's office and we'd also like to have Sen. [Orrin G.] Hatch's participation," Myers said in his message to White House legislative affairs aide Heather Wingate, assistant attorney general for congressional relations Daniel J. Bryant, vice presidential aide Candida Perotti Wolff and Senate Judiciary GOP staffers Jeff Taylor and Makan Delrahim.

Wingate responded in a Friday e-mail, with copies to Brett Kavanaugh and Bradford Berenson in the White House counsel's office and assistant attorney general for legal policy Viet Dinh and his principal deputy Jennifer Newstead.

"Thanks, Chris. Very much love the interest you all have on noms. Let me gather with our DoJ/WH Counsel folks and get back with you re: helping you with that message," she said, suggesting to those copied "let's discuss" Myers's e-mail. "I'll be in touch this morning on this issue."

In his e-mail, Myers wanted some specific help: "Also, we'd love to have evidence of a slowed investigation because of the lack of judges. Who could help us with this? Judiciary Committee? Dept. of Justice?"

Justice might be busy these days.

I do not see any legal problems whatsoever with this. This is an official recording for official purposes. If the recording were used for other purposes, that could pose issues, but your e-mail does not suggest that course of action. As to the contract with the recording company itself, that is something DOJ/INS would negotiate, but it should simply be an ordinary contract for services needed for official government events and activities.

Brett--
We are set to record the President's welcoming greeting for newly naturalized citizens. This greeting would be played at INS controlled ceremonies and be made available to Judge's if they so desire to play the President's message in their chambers.

DOJ/INS will be letting us know if they can cover the recording expense. Our legal questions are:

Is there any issue we need to be aware of in mass producing this video greeting and payment thereof?

Are there any legal hoop we need to jump through with the contracted recording team and INS/DOJ?

Israel mentioned we may need to use DTR...your guidance is much appreciated.

Leonard Rodriguez met with Sheila Bair's assistant today in our office, and she handed him a check made out to the RNC from Sheila. Sheila Bair is the Asst. Sec. for Financial Management at Treasury. The check is on my desk. Can we put in the mail or give to Jack Oliver in person? or do we need to send back to Sheila and say please send to Jack. It was totally unsolicitated, but we do not want to do anything wrong. thanks

I do not see any legal problems whatsoever with this. This is an official recording for official purposes. If the recording were used for other purposes, that could pose issues, but your e-mail does not suggest that course of action. As to the contract with the recording company itself, that is something DOJ/INS would negotiate, but it should simply be an ordinary contract for services needed for official government events and activities.

Brett--
We are set to record the President's welcoming greeting for newly naturalized citizens. This greeting would be played at INS controlled ceremonies and be made available to Judge's if they so desire to play the President's message in their chambers.

DOJ/INS will be letting us know if they can cover the recording expense. Our legal questions are:

Is there any issue we need to be aware of in mass producing this video greeting and payment thereof?

Are there any legal hoop we need to jump through with the contracted recording team and INS/DOJ?

Israel mentioned we may need to use DTR...your guidance is much appreciated.

Thanks

when you are looking for me on my cell, my cell often will buzz while I am in a meeting. I cannot answer right away, but I can step out and usually can call back quickly BUT ONLY IF YOU LEAVE A MESSAGE. So please leave a message when you are looking for me and try my cell phone.
Otherwise, I have no idea who was calling and why. Thank you!

Is it possible to apply liability limitations only if the Administrator has made a "triggering determination"

It is not possible to apply the liability limitations only to cases in which the Administration has made a "triggering determination," because whether industry-wide losses exceed a certain amount will depend, in virtually every case, on the outcome of the litigation.

DESCRIPTION OF ISSUE:

This legislation would provide a temporary risk sharing program only in case of a future terrorist attack causing either (a) industry-wide losses of over $1 billion; or (b) industry-wide losses exceeding $100 million and resulting in losses for any single insurer of 10 percent of its capital surplus or 10 percent of commercial property and casualty premiums. Should an attack occur, the Administrator might not know immediately whether the attack met either of these criteria. Rather, the actual amount of industry-wide losses will not be apparent until after plaintiffs have litigated claims against any insured parties for damages. Following the attack, persons injured in the attack would file suit; courts would determine liability; any defendants held liable would submit claims to their insurers; insurers and the defendants would resolve any disputes over coverage – and only then the Administrator would be able to determine whether or not to make a "triggering determination."

In other words, the Administrator may not know until well after the claims are litigated whether to trigger the risk sharing system. It is not possible to make the rules applying in litigation depend on whether there has been a "triggering determination" because the "triggering determination" may well depend on the rules that apply in litigation.

EXAMPLE:

Imagine, for example, a biological weapon attack causing only $50 million in property-related damage but causing the deaths of hundreds of people. Would this event be eligible for a "triggering determination" by the Administrator? Until the case has been litigated, it is not possible to tell.

If there is an insured party found to be liable for the damage, damages could easily exceed $100 million and result in sufficiently-high losses for a single insurer. But if the jury determines that no insured party was negligent, or that the only insured party was liable for less than $50 million in damages, this event would not trigger a determination by the Administrator. The Administrator has to know the outcome of the litigation before he decides whether or not to trigger the risk sharing program.

And, of course, whether an insured party is found to be liable and by what amount the insured parties are liable depends, in part on the law applied in the case. In other words, the legislation must provide for a way to determine which rules apply prior to the triggering determination.

'I had quite a cheering section, and at the end someone showed up with a bottle of champagne,' Hicks said after the vote. Hicks, 57, said he expects to begin work within several weeks in Nevada's expanding judiciary. He becomes the sixth full-time federal judge in the state, with a nominee for a final vacancy, Clark County District Judge James Mahan, still awaiting Senate action.

Congress in its 1999-2000 session added three seats to the Nevada District Court, one of the faster-growing districts in the country.

Federal district judges are paid $ 145,100 a year.

Hicks will be based in Las Vegas, although he also will draw some cases from Northern Nevada and hear them in Reno. He said he and his wife, Marianne, are house-shopping in Las Vegas and also plan to keep their home in Northern Nevada.

'He's going to be an outstanding addition,' said Nevada's chief U.S. District Judge Howard McKibben. 'He's held in high esteem by the bench and by the bar.'

Since 1979, Hicks has been a partner in the statewide firm of McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich and Hicks. He has been chairman of the firm's litigation section for the past 16 years.

He began his legal career in 1971 as a deputy district attorney in Washoe County, and was the county's district attorney from 1974 to 1978.

In 1992, Hicks was proposed for a federal judgeship by Rep. Barbara Vucanovich, R-Nev. His nomination was sent to the Senate that June by President George Bush. But as the presidential election approached that year, the Senate effectively froze most nominations, and Hicks lost out when Bush was ousted by Bill Clinton.

But after George W. Bush became president, Hicks was nominated to the bench earlier this year by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev.

Ensign and Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., praised Hicks before senators voted Monday.

Committee Hears Nomination for Kansas Federal Judgeship

By Libby Quaid
The Associated Press
Wednesday, November 7, 2001
for Kansas federal judgeship

A former prosecutor who exposed police corruption in Kansas City, Kan., moved closer to becoming a federal trial judge by testifying Wednesday before the Senate panel weighing her nomination.

Julie A. Robinson, 44, currently a federal bankruptcy judge, appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee as President Bush's nominee to U.S. District Court in Kansas. She was among three candidates chosen by Republican Sen. Sam Brownback and recommended by both Brownback and Republican Sen. Pat Roberts.

The same committee recently helped shape a sweeping new anti-terrorism law in response to the Sept. 11 attacks. Responding to questions about the legislation, Robinson said that while the Supreme Court has safeguarded civil liberties, "at the same time, this country is facing a serious problem."

Appearing with a half-dozen other nominees, Robinson kept her answers succinct and declined to speak with reporters after the hearing.

Brownback, who attended law school with Robinson at the University of Kansas, told fellow committee members that besides her background, Robinson is "qualified by her heart, by what all she's already done and the pedigree she has."

Her family settled as newly freed slaves in the 1860s in Kansas, Brownback said. Her late father served in Korea and Vietnam, he noted, and her mother, Charlene, served as a nurse practitioner for the Defense Department and Veterans Administration.

Roberts said the judiciary needs people who understand the human element of the law because rulings affect not only the parties in a case but future litigants as well.

"Unforeseen lives can be changed drastically by a single opinion," Roberts said. "With so many changes occurring in the law, we need judges such as Julie Robinson who grasp this concept."

The proceeding was interrupted during Roberts' remarks by the collapse of Robinson's 82-year-old aunt, Ruth, who was taken by ambulance to a local hospital. Her family said later she was fine and was resting at home.

As assistant U.S. attorney for 10 years in the 1980s and 1990s, Robinson waged a high-profile pursuit of public corruption, drug conspiracy, tax fraud and white collar crime. By 1990 her work had shifted exclusively to criminal cases, and she personally prosecuted cases for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Internal Revenue Service, Secret Service and other agencies in federal court.

Her investigations of official corruption in Wyandotte County included the conviction of the sheriff's son after the FBI raided an illegal gambling hall; two defendants were deputy sheriffs stationed as

lookouts and bodyguards.

She prosecuted a major crack cocaine distribution ring that resulted in four convictions, including that of a Kansas City, Kan., police officer who acted as a watchdog for drug dealers and stored the proceeds of their drug sales at his home.

Robinson also prosecuted one of the government's largest tax cases ever, winning convictions of 10 people who, operating as the International Business Association, created phony domestic and foreign trusts to conceal millions of dollars of taxable income. She also successfully prosecuted an Overland Park, Kan., travel agent for a phony ticket scheme that cheated airlines of $600,000 in just six weeks.

Robinson's job as a U.S. bankruptcy judge since 1994 carries a considerably lower profile. She has ruled in at least 276 cases involving debtors and payments to their creditors.

In written answers to questions from the committee, Robinson provided a two page description of her views on "judicial activism," a term frequently used by conservative Republicans in criticizing judges for too broadly interpreting the law.

"The people delegated lesser powers to the judicial branch," Robinson wrote, "precisely because the judiciary lacks electoral responsibility."

Robinson also submitted a detailed accounting of her finances, which is required by law to ensure judges have no conflicts of interest with their monetary holdings. She reported net worth of $474,590, which includes a $425,000 house in Leawood, Kan., as well as investments and stocks in various companies, mostly in telecommunications and only one, Bank of America, worth more than $1,000.

She listed liabilities of $317,500, mostly from a $280,000 home mortgage and accounts and bills due.

Senate GOP Exploits War on Terrorism to Promote Right-Wing Judges

People for the American Way
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Senate Republicans are holding press conferences on November 8, 2001, to push a strategy leaked earlier that week to demand fast-track approval of Bush administration judicial nominees, and to argue that such action is purportedly crucial to the war on terrorism. If the press conference follows the script reported earlier in the week, senators will claim, with White House approval, that not rushing approval of President Bush's judicial nominees would somehow prevent law enforcement officials from getting wiretaps and search warrants essential to identifying terrorists.

REV_00073063

People For the American Way Foundation President Ralph G. Neas said that such a plan, if true, was "dishonest and disgraceful."

Neas said search warrants and wiretaps go before magistrates or federal district court judges, and noted that the administration has submitted nominees for less than one-third of the current district court vacancies. As of November 7, there were 70 district court vacancies and the administration had submitted only 23 nominations for those spots. Five district court vacancies in New York and New Jersey are included among the 47 with no nominees. "If there's a problem with getting district court judges in place to assist law enforcement officials, that problem is not in the Senate," said Neas.

"Senate Republican leaders should be ashamed to distort the truth and misuse the national commitment to fighting terrorism in this blatant fashion," said Neas. "The right wing's number one goal for this administration is to pack the federal judiciary with far right ideologues. They are now trying to use the war on terrorism to promote that agenda."

Neas said some senators have already said that supporting the war on terrorism requires a rubber stamp approach to Bush administration judicial nominees, and have claimed that Senate Democrats have unfairly delayed consideration of his nominees. Both claims are false, Neas said.

A recent PFAW Foundation report debunked GOP complaints about the current confirmation process; indeed, confirmations have outpaced the first year of the first Bush administration in 1989 and by the end of the year will likely be comparable to 1993, the first year of the Clinton administration. In fact, as of yesterday, the Senate had confirmed 16 of President Bush's judicial nominees, more than the 15 confirmed in the entire first year of the first Bush administration. With respect to the district courts, President Bush has nominated 35 judges, and 12 of those have already been confirmed. Of the 23 remaining nominees, nine have already had confirmation hearings. This is in spite of the fact that 13 of these nominations were not even made until September or later.

Neas noted that the Bush administration's apparent priority for judicial nominees has been to the federal appeals courts. The same far-right senators who led an unprecedented blockade against Clinton's appeals court nominees - stopping nearly half of Clinton's appeals court nominees between 1995 and 2000 - are now calling for immediate action on Bush nominees while complaining that Bush's nominees have received unfair treatment.

PFAWF's recent report noted that by the end of this administration, every one of the 13 circuit courts of appeal could be dominated by Republican nominees. If those nominees are predominantly right-wing ideologues, the consequences for Americans' constitutional rights and civil liberties could be disastrous and long lasting.

Today Neas reiterated his call for President Bush to engage in genuine bipartisan consultation in an unprecedented solution to this unprecedented situation with the courts. He also said, "The Senate must resist the politics of intimidation, carry out its constitutional obligation to carefully consider the nominations that come before it, and reject candidates whose record does not reflect a commitment to constitutional rights."

Earthjustice Criticizes Efforts to Rush Judicial Confirmations; Senators Expected to Call for Accelerated Confirmation Schedule in Response to Terrorist Attacks

Earthjustice
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Earthjustice called today's expected push from some members of Congress to accelerate the judicial nomination process, "flawed thinking and a dangerous precedent." At news conferences scheduled for today, several Senators, including Rick Santorum (R-PA), Jon Kyl (R-AZ), and Mitch McConnell (R-KY) are expected to call for rushing through judicial nominees in the name of national security.

"There is no real threat to national security in making sure that each life-long appointee is the right choice for the job," said Glenn Sugameli, senior legislative counsel for Earthjustice. "The nomination process for judges should not be compromised, and it's shameless that some in Congress might be attempting to use current events to achieve that goal."

Sugameli points out that the Senate Judiciary Committee is continuing to address judicial confirmations at a reasonable pace. The committee has paid special attention to district court nominees who would be most directly affected by any terrorism-related issues. In addition, magistrate judges who handle warrants and other key issues are not subject to Senate confirmation and are currently in place in sufficient numbers. Appeals court judges would not have the opportunity to hear terrorist-related cases for many months, if not years.

"The real danger would be a rush to judgment on lifetime judicial nominees who will decide whether to strike down or enforce safety, health, and environmental protections," said Sugameli. "The Senate is acting responsibly by approving judges after carefully considering each nominee's record on critical environmental and other issues. "

Once confirmed, federal judges hold their positions for life, suggesting that rash confirmations could be especially damaging. Environmental groups place particular importance on a sensible approach to reviewing nominees for the federal bench.

"For decades to come, newly confirmed judges will exert tremendous influence over the laws that protect our public health and environment," Sugameli said. "The confirmations should not be approached hastily."

Thurmond Jr, Three Judicial Nominees Confirmed

By Pierce
Congressional Quarterly
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The oldest and longest-serving senator saw his 28-year-old son confirmed as a U.S. attorney Tuesday." Strom Thurmond Jr. "won voice vote approval from the Senate to take on his new position as U.S. attorney for South Carolina -- the state his 98-year-old father, Sen. Strom Thurmond, R, has served for nearly 47 years." The younger Thurmond "was considered an odd choice by some because he has barely three years experience as an assistant state prosecutor, but his father helped him out by recommending to President Bush that his son be nominated." The Senate also "confirmed 10 other U.S. attorney nominations by voice vote, including that of Drew Wrigley to serve in the district of North Dakota. Wrigley previously served as the executive director of the North Dakota Republican Party during the 2000 election, in which Bush won 61 percent of that state's vote." The Senate also voted 100-0 Tuesday "to confirm the nomination of Christina Armijo to be a U.S. District judge for New Mexico. By 98-0 votes, the Senate confirmed Karon Bowdre to be U.S. District judge for Northern Alabama and Stephen Friot to be U.S. District judge for Western Oklahoma."

Kuhl May Be Boxed In On Circuit Hopes

By Jason Hoppin
The Recorder
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Sen. Barbara Boxer has not consented to a hearing on Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals nominee Carolyn Kuhl, and with each passing day it appears more likely that the California Democrat may block Kuhl's nomination.

Boxer still has not returned a "blue slip" on Kuhl, the paperwork circulated to home state senators for comment on a nominee. Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein returned her blue slip a month ago, but under Senate rules both blue slips must be returned before a nominee gets a hearing.

"All I can tell you is that she has not issued a new statement," said Boxer's chief of staff, Sam Chapman, when asked whether the senator has decided what to do about the nomination. He was referring to Boxer's criticism of Kuhl's record following her nomination by President Bush in June. Conservatives have been quick to draw conclusions about Boxer's plans.

"She wants to keep her off the bench," said Tom Jipping, director of the Center for Law and Democracy. "It's not rocket science."

The delay could set the stage for Boxer to be the first Democrat to draw a line in the sand on any of Bush's appellate court nominees.

Kuhl declined to comment.

Boxer, who was instrumental in forcing Rep. Christopher Cox, R-Newport Beach, to withdraw his name from consideration for the Ninth Circuit, first received Kuhl's blue slip in July, but has not publicly stated her intentions.

Several abortion rights groups have organized opposition to Kuhl. "That's certainly a key issue," Chapman said.

For the Ninth Circuit, whose nominees have often been the subject of political gamesmanship, it's deja vu all over again. A second pending nominee, Hawaii lawyer Richard Clifton, is also waiting for a hearing.

Both Hawaii senators and Feinstein have consented to hearings for the nominees from their respective states, although the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee has been slow to schedule hearings.

But all three senators reserved judgment -- the only senators to have done so. All other blue slips returned were marked "approved."

Many of those nominees are also waiting for hearings, and Republicans and Democrats blame each other for the delays.

Of President Bush's 60 judicial nominees, 12 have been approved. There are 106 vacancies nationwide.

"From the Republican standpoint, we want to move these judges as soon as possible," said Margarita Tapia, a spokeswoman for Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary Committee.

REV_00073054

An American Bar Association committee voted unanimously to give Clifton a qualified rating. Kuhl was given a well-qualified rating by a substantial majority of the committee, with the remainder giving her a qualified rating.

The controversy over Kuhl, a Los Angeles Superior Court judge who earned praise for her work on the bench there, stems largely from her work as a Justice Department lawyer under President Ronald Reagan.

Kuhl argued in support of parental notification rules for the distribution of birth control to teen-agers, tax-exempt status for Bob Jones University (which was then racially segregated), and most significantly, in a 1986 _amicus curiae _brief to the U.S. Supreme Court, that _Roe v. Wade_ should be overturned.

"We have no confidence that she's changed her position," said Belle Taylor-McGhee, executive director of the California Abortion & Reproductive Rights Action League.

CARAL is among several abortion-rights groups actively opposing Kuhl's nomination. Taylor-McGhee said CARAL has expressed its concerns to both California senators.

"Check with her office. I think that Barbara Boxer is considering withholding the blue slip," Taylor-McGhee said.

Jipping, the conservative court-watcher, said that Boxer has argued that judicial candidates should not be judged by their work for clients, which he likens to Kuhl's work for an administration that was against abortion. "The hypocrisy is mind-boggling," he said.

The Justice Department reiterated its support for Kuhl's nomination. "Judge Kuhl is a balanced and well-reasoned judge who enjoys widespread bipartisan support," said spokeswoman Lori Rabjohns. "So we call on the committee to give Judge Kuhl a hearing."

Boxer signaled that she took issue with Kuhl's record when Bush announced her nomination.

"I have received numerous statements of opposition to the nomination of Judge Kuhl," Boxer said in a June statement. "These letters and calls raise a number of issues important to Californians, including the right to choose, civil rights, representation of tobacco companies, privacy rights and whistle-blower protection."

"I have met with Judge Kuhl and the White House counsel, informed them of these issues, and I am continuing to evaluate this nomination."

Clifton's nomination has also been the subject of political dealings, although he appears more likely to get a hearing in the near future.

Both Hawaii senators signed off on a hearing before the August congressional recess. In July, Clifton received the Hawaii State Bar Association's highest recommendation.

But Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, wrote a letter to the Judiciary Committee questioning why President
Clinton's Ninth Circuit nominee from Hawaii, James Duffy, was never approved despite waiting years for a vote.

"Based on the information that was made available to me when former President Clinton nominated Mr. Duffy, I gather that his character is without blemish, and that he received the highest assessments by both the American Bar Association and the Hawaii State Bar Association," Inouye wrote. "Thus, if he has been removed for consideration in spite of his qualifications, I would appreciate an explanation."

The Ninth Circuit does not have an active judge sitting in Hawaii, despite rules that at least one judge must sit in each of the nine states within its confines.

Several news reports have indicated that Inouye may be seeking a district court nomination for Duffy. His office did not comment.

"At this time all I can say is that the senator is prepared to allow [Clifton's] nomination to go forward," said Inouye spokeswoman Sandi Skousen, adding that Inouye wants to review Clifton's FBI report before making any decisions.

Under President Clinton, several nominees were subjected to long delays -- notably, Marsha Berzon and Richard Paez.

They waited two years and four years, respectively, before being confirmed over objections that they were too liberal. Both were approved by a divided Senate after Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., kept a promise to give them a vote.

Berzon's nomination proceeded only after Boxer held up one of Lott's appointments to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

A memo obtained by the _Chicago Tribune_ indicates that this week Senate Republicans will blame the dilatory pace of judicial confirmations on Democrats and accuse them of impeding the nation's efforts to fight terrorism.

"Our message would be: You can't get wiretaps, search warrants, etc., without judges; confirm the president's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed," the memo was quoted as saying.

Only one other blue slip has not been returned. Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., has withheld a hearing on Fourth Circuit nominee Terrence Boyle. An Edwards spokesman said the senator wants to insure that a subsequent Fourth Circuit nominee will "balance" Boyle out, whom Edwards regards as too conservative.

Senate Confirms M. Christina Armijo as U.S. District Judge

The Associated Press
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The product of a family with a history of judgeships in N.M., Armijo becomes a federal judge

The U.S. Senate on Tuesday unanimously confirmed M. Christina Armijo as a new federal judge for New Mexico.

Armijo of Las Vegas, N.M., received a 100-0 vote. She had been recommended by Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and nominated by President Bush in August. Both Domenici and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., spoke in support of her confirmation. The nomination won a favorable recommendation last week of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "I think it's wonderful that the first federal judge we confirm for our state under the Bush administration is a well-qualified, Hispanic woman from northern New Mexico, " Domenici said.

He said he was confident she would have "a distinguished career" on the federal bench.

Armijo, a judge on the state Court of Appeals since 1996, comes from a family with a history of judgeships. Her grandfather, Judge Luis E. Armijo, was one of the longest-serving trial judges in state history. Her uncle also served on the bench.

"I was pleased to offer my strong support for Christina Armijo. In her years on the New Mexico Court of Appeals, she has earned a reputation for being a fair judge and has served the people of New Mexico well. I am confident that she will continue her good service to our state," Bingaman said.

She is a 1975 graduate of the University of New Mexico law school. She served in private practice and as a public defender before joining the Court of Appeals. She is also a former member of the New Mexico Health Policy Commission and New Mexico Endowment for the Humanities.

Domenici said the Senate Judiciary Committee was expected to consider two other New Mexico judicial nominations Thursday -- William "Chip" Johnson of Roswell as a U.S. District Judge and former New Mexico judge Harris Hartz of Albuquerque for appointment to the 10th U.S.

Judiciary Committee Sends Wooten Nomination to Full Senate

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 8, 2001

The U.S. Senate approved the nomination of Terry L. Wooten on Thursday to the U.S. District Court for South Carolina.

Wooten, a U.S. magistrate in South Carolina, was recommended for the judgeship by Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "Judge Wooten will be an excellent addition to the District Court," Thurmond said. "He has had an outstanding legal career with an excellent record as a prosecutor and judge in South Carolina."

Wooten had been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991. During the hearings on Thomas' nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Oklahoma City Attorney Confirmed as Federal Judge

The Daily Oklahoman
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The Senate on Tuesday confirmed Stephen P. Friot to be a federal judge in the Western District, which is based in Oklahoma City.

Friot became the third Oklahoman nominated by President Bush to be confirmed as a U.S. district judge. The first two, Claire V. Egan and James H. Payne, were confirmed last month for the federal districts in Tulsa and Muskogee.

Friot's nomination passed 19-0 last week in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

A partner in the Oklahoma City law firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot and Gum, Friot has been in private practice since 1972.

A 1987 book ranking top lawyers in the United States included Friot among the Oklahomans.

REV_00073058

He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association.

In the past 10 years, Friot has donated $ 1,000 total to Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, who recommended Friot to Bush.

Friot has also served charitable causes in the area and the state, such as helping to raise money for legal services for the poor.

The Judiciary Committee is scheduled to hold a hearing today on the nomination of Joe Heaton, who is also in line for a judgeship in the Western District. Heaton is a federal prosecutor and former state House member from Oklahoma City.

Senate Confirms Nominee for Birmingham Judgeship

The Associated Press
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The U.S. Senate confirmed the appointments of two U.S. Attorneys and a district judge for Alabama on Tuesday.

Leura Garrett Canary will become the U.S. attorney for Montgomery, and Alice Martin will take up that role in the northern district of Alabama. Karon Bowdre will preside on the U.S. District Court in Birmingham.

Canary, a veteran state and federal prosecutor, fills the post held by Redding Pitt during the Clinton Administration. Pitt is the new state Democratic Party chairman.

Canary was an assistant state attorney general from 1981 to 1990, a trial attorney with the U.S. Justice Department in Washington, D.C., from 1990 to 1994 and an assistant U.S. attorney for the Middle District in Montgomery since 1994.

Martin replaces Doug Jones, who prosecuted the 1963 Birmingham church bombing cases earlier this year.

Martin, 45, has served as Lauderdale County Circuit Court judge and was appointed by Alabama's two Republican senators, Richard Shelby and Jeff Sessions.

Bowdre, 46, succeeds U.S. District Judge Sam Pointer Jr., who went on senior status in November 1999. She is a Cumberland School of Law professor and will serve in a lifetime slot on the court.

Senate Confirms Hicks as Judge

REV_00073059

By Doug Abrahms
Gannett News Service
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Originally chosen by former President Bush in 1992, Hicks had not made it through the Senate approval process before Bill Clinton was elected president and the Democratic administration gained control of appointing judges. Being approved unanimously by the full Senate Monday, Hicks clears the last hurdle in becoming a U.S. District Court judge.

"Larry Hicks wanted this job for a long time. He was almost nominated before," said Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Hicks -- a civil attorney at the law firm McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks -- was nominated by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev. Hicks was elected Washoe County district attorney in the 1975.

"In the legal community, receiving a presidential nomination to a federal judgeship is one of the highest honors," Ensign said in introducing Hicks' nomination to the full Senate. "Mr. Hicks now has the honor of receiving such a nomination twice."

Hicks started working as deputy district attorney in Washoe County in 1968 and became chief criminal deputy district attorney in 1971. He received his bachelor's degree from the University of Nevada, Reno, in 1965, but received his law degree the University of Colorado School of Law.

"While Larry left Nevada for a few years to receive his legal education, Nevadans don't hold it against him as we did not yet have a law school of our own to accommodate his studies," Ensign said.

Larry Hicks, who lost out on a federal judgeship in 1992 and waited almost 10 years for another chance, was confirmed 83-0 by the U.S. Senate on Monday to join the U.S. District Court in Nevada.

Hicks, his family and partners in his Reno law firm watched on C-SPAN as senators approved him to a lifetime job in the federal judiciary after a 30-year career mostly spent in civil litigation.

'I had quite a cheering section, and at the end someone showed up with a bottle of champagne,' Hicks said after the vote. Hicks, 57, said he expects to begin work within several weeks in Nevada's expanding judiciary. He becomes the sixth full-time federal judge in the state, with a nominee for a final vacancy, Clark County District Judge James Mahan, still awaiting Senate action.

Congress in its 1999-2000 session added three seats to the Nevada District Court, one of the faster-growing districts in the country.

Federal district judges are paid $ 145,100 a year.

Hicks will be based in Las Vegas, although he also will draw some cases from Northern Nevada and hear them in Reno. He said he and his wife, Marianne, are house-shopping in Las Vegas and also plan to keep their home in Northern Nevada.

'He's going to be an outstanding addition,' said Nevada's chief U.S. District Judge Howard McKibben. 'He's held in high esteem by the bench and by the bar.'

Since 1979, Hicks has been a partner in the statewide firm of McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich and Hicks. He has been chairman of the firm's litigation section for the past 16 years.

He began his legal career in 1971 as a deputy district attorney in Washoe County, and was the county's district attorney from 1974 to 1978.

In 1992, Hicks was proposed for a federal judgeship by Rep. Barbara Vucanovich, R-Nev. His nomination was sent to the Senate that June by President George Bush. But as the presidential election approached that year, the Senate effectively froze most nominations, and Hicks lost out when Bush was ousted by Bill Clinton.

But after George W. Bush became president, Hicks was nominated to the bench earlier this year by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev.

Ensign and Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., praised Hicks before senators voted Monday.

Committee Hears Nomination for Kansas Federal Judgeship

By Libby Quaid

for Kansas federal judgeship

A former prosecutor who exposed police corruption in Kansas City, Kan., moved closer to becoming a federal trial judge by testifying Wednesday before the Senate panel weighing her nomination.

Julie A. Robinson, 44, currently a federal bankruptcy judge, appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee as President Bush's nominee to U.S. District Court in Kansas. She was among three candidates chosen by Republican Sen. Sam Brownback and recommended by both Brownback and Republican Sen. Pat Roberts.

The same committee recently helped shape a sweeping new anti-terrorism law in response to the Sept. 11 attacks. Responding to questions about the legislation, Robinson said that while the Supreme Court has safeguarded civil liberties, "at the same time, this country is facing a serious problem."

Appearing with a half-dozen other nominees, Robinson kept her answers succinct and declined to speak with reporters after the hearing.

Brownback, who attended law school with Robinson at the University of Kansas, told fellow committee members that besides her background, Robinson is "qualified by her heart, by what all she's already done and the pedigree she has."

Her family settled as newly freed slaves in the 1860s in Kansas, Brownback said. Her late father served in Korea and Vietnam, he noted, and her mother, Charlene, served as a nurse practitioner for the Defense Department and Veterans Administration.

Roberts said the judiciary needs people who understand the human element of the law because rulings affect not only the parties in a case but future litigants as well.

"Unforeseen lives can be changed drastically by a single opinion," Roberts said. "With so many changes occurring in the law, we need judges such as Julie Robinson who grasp this concept."

The proceeding was interrupted during Roberts' remarks by the collapse of Robinson's 82-year-old aunt, Ruth, who was taken by ambulance to a local hospital. Her family said later she was fine and was resting at home.

As assistant U.S. attorney for 10 years in the 1980s and 1990s, Robinson waged a high-profile pursuit of public corruption, drug conspiracy, tax fraud and white collar crime. By 1990 her work had shifted exclusively to criminal cases, and she personally prosecuted cases for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Internal Revenue Service, Secret Service and other agencies in federal court.

Her investigations of official corruption in Wyandotte County included the conviction of the sheriff's son after the FBI raided an illegal gambling hall; two defendants were deputy sheriffs stationed as

lookouts and bodyguards.

She prosecuted a major crack cocaine distribution ring that resulted in four convictions, including that of a Kansas City, Kan., police officer who acted as a watchdog for drug dealers and stored the proceeds of their drug sales at his home.

Robinson also prosecuted one of the government's largest tax cases ever, winning convictions of 10 people who, operating as the International Business Association, created phony domestic and foreign trusts to conceal millions of dollars of taxable income. She also successfully prosecuted an Overland Park, Kan., travel agent for a phony ticket scheme that cheated airlines of $600,000 in just six weeks.

Robinson's job as a U.S. bankruptcy judge since 1994 carries a considerably lower profile. She has ruled in at least 276 cases involving debtors and payments to their creditors.

In written answers to questions from the committee, Robinson provided a two page description of her views on "judicial activism," a term frequently used by conservative Republicans in criticizing judges for too broadly interpreting the law.

"The people delegated lesser powers to the judicial branch," Robinson wrote, "precisely because the judiciary lacks electoral responsibility."

Robinson also submitted a detailed accounting of her finances, which is required by law to ensure judges have no conflicts of interest with their monetary holdings. She reported net worth of $474,590, which includes a $425,000 house in Leawood, Kan., as well as investments and stocks in various companies, mostly in telecommunications and only one, Bank of America, worth more than $1,000.

She listed liabilities of $317,500, mostly from a $280,000 home mortgage and accounts and bills due.

Senate GOP Exploits War on Terrorism to Promote Right-Wing Judges

People for the American Way
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Senate Republicans are holding press conferences on November 8, 2001, to push a strategy leaked earlier that week to demand fast-track approval of Bush administration judicial nominees, and to argue that such action is purportedly crucial to the war on terrorism. If the press conference follows the script reported earlier in the week, senators will claim, with White House approval, that not rushing approval of President Bush's judicial nominees would somehow prevent law enforcement officials from getting wiretaps and search warrants essential to identifying terrorists.

REV_00073080

People For the American Way Foundation President Ralph G. Neas said that such a plan, if true, was "dishonest and disgraceful."

Neas said search warrants and wiretaps go before magistrates or federal district court judges, and noted that the administration has submitted nominees for less than one-third of the current district court vacancies. As of November 7, there were 70 district court vacancies and the administration had submitted only 23 nominations for those spots. Five district court vacancies in New York and New Jersey are included among the 47 with no nominees. "If there's a problem with getting district court judges in place to assist law enforcement officials, that problem is not in the Senate," said Neas.

"Senate Republican leaders should be ashamed to distort the truth and misuse the national commitment to fighting terrorism in this blatant fashion," said Neas. "The right wing's number one goal for this administration is to pack the federal judiciary with far right ideologues. They are now trying to use the war on terrorism to promote that agenda."

Neas said some senators have already said that supporting the war on terrorism requires a rubber stamp approach to Bush administration judicial nominees, and have claimed that Senate Democrats have unfairly delayed consideration of his nominees. Both claims are false, Neas said.

A recent PFAW Foundation report debunked GOP complaints about the current confirmation process; indeed, confirmations have outpaced the first year of the first Bush administration in 1989 and by the end of the year will likely be comparable to 1993, the first year of the Clinton administration. In fact, as of yesterday, the Senate had confirmed 16 of President Bush's judicial nominees, more than the 15 confirmed in the entire first year of the first Bush administration. With respect to the district courts, President Bush has nominated 35 judges, and 12 of those have already been confirmed. Of the 23 remaining nominees, nine have already had confirmation hearings. This is in spite of the fact that 13 of these nominations were not even made until September or later.

Neas noted that the Bush administration's apparent priority for judicial nominees has been to the federal appeals courts. The same far-right senators who led an unprecedented blockade against Clinton's appeals court nominees - stopping nearly half of Clinton's appeals court nominees between 1995 and 2000 - are now calling for immediate action on Bush nominees while complaining that Bush's nominees have received unfair treatment.

PFAWF's recent report noted that by the end of this administration, every one of the 13 circuit courts of appeal could be dominated by Republican nominees. If those nominees are predominantly right-wing ideologues, the consequences for Americans' constitutional rights and civil liberties could be disastrous and long lasting.

Today Neas reiterated his call for President Bush to engage in genuine bipartisan consultation in an unprecedented solution to this unprecedented situation with the courts. He also said, "The Senate must resist the politics of intimidation, carry out its constitutional obligation to carefully consider the nominations that come before it, and reject candidates whose record does not reflect a commitment to constitutional rights."

Earthjustice Criticizes Efforts to Rush Judicial Confirmations; Senators Expected to Call for Accelerated Confirmation Schedule in Response to Terrorist Attacks

Earthjustice
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Earthjustice called today's expected push from some members of Congress to accelerate the judicial nomination process, "flawed thinking and a dangerous precedent." At news conferences scheduled for today, several Senators, including Rick Santorum (R-PA), Jon Kyl (R-AZ), and Mitch McConnell (R-KY) are expected to call for rushing through judicial nominees in the name of national security.

"There is no real threat to national security in making sure that each life-long appointee is the right choice for the job," said Glenn Sugameli, senior legislative counsel for Earthjustice. "The nomination process for judges should not be compromised, and it's shameless that some in Congress might be attempting to use current events to achieve that goal."

Sugameli points out that the Senate Judiciary Committee is continuing to address judicial confirmations at a reasonable pace. The committee has paid special attention to district court nominees who would be most directly affected by any terrorism-related issues. In addition, magistrate judges who handle warrants and other key issues are not subject to Senate confirmation and are currently in place in sufficient numbers. Appeals court judges would not have the opportunity to hear terrorist-related cases for many months, if not years.

"The real danger would be a rush to judgment on lifetime judicial nominees who will decide whether to strike down or enforce safety, health, and environmental protections," said Sugameli. "The Senate is acting responsibly by approving judges after carefully considering each nominee's record on critical environmental and other issues. "

Once confirmed, federal judges hold their positions for life, suggesting that rash confirmations could be especially damaging. Environmental groups place particular importance on a sensible approach to reviewing nominees for the federal bench.

"For decades to come, newly confirmed judges will exert tremendous influence over the laws that protect our public health and environment," Sugameli said. "The confirmations should not be approached hastily."

Thurmond Jr, Three Judicial Nominees Confirmed

By Pierce
Congressional Quarterly
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The oldest and longest-serving senator saw his 28-year-old son confirmed as a U.S. attorney Tuesday." Strom Thurmond Jr. "won voice vote approval from the Senate to take on his new position as U.S. attorney for South Carolina -- the state his 98-year-old father, Sen. Strom Thurmond, R, has served for nearly 47 years." The younger Thurmond "was considered an odd choice by some because he has barely three years experience as an assistant state prosecutor, but his father helped him out by recommending to President Bush that his son be nominated." The Senate also "confirmed 10 other U.S. attorney nominations by voice vote, including that of Drew Wrigley to serve in the district of North Dakota. Wrigley previously served as the executive director of the North Dakota Republican Party during the 2000 election, in which Bush won 61 percent of that state's vote." The Senate also voted 100-0 Tuesday "to confirm the nomination of Christina Armijo to be a U.S. District judge for New Mexico. By 98-0 votes, the Senate confirmed Karon Bowdre to be U.S. District judge for Northern Alabama and Stephen Friot to be U.S. District judge for Western Oklahoma."

Kuhl May Be Boxed In On Circuit Hopes

By Jason Hoppin
The Recorder
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Sen. Barbara Boxer has not consented to a hearing on Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals nominee Carolyn Kuhl, and with each passing day it appears more likely that the California Democrat may block Kuhl's nomination.

Boxer still has not returned a "blue slip" on Kuhl, the paperwork circulated to home state senators for comment on a nominee. Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein returned her blue slip a month ago, but under Senate rules both blue slips must be returned before a nominee gets a hearing.

"All I can tell you is that she has not issued a new statement," said Boxer's chief of staff, Sam Chapman, when asked whether the senator has decided what to do about the nomination. He was referring to Boxer's criticism of Kuhl's record following her nomination by President Bush in June. Conservatives have been quick to draw conclusions about Boxer's plans.

"She wants to keep her off the bench," said Tom Jipping, director of the Center for Law and Democracy. "It's not rocket science."

The delay could set the stage for Boxer to be the first Democrat to draw a line in the sand on any of Bush's appellate court nominees.

Kuhl declined to comment.

Boxer, who was instrumental in forcing Rep. Christopher Cox, R-Newport Beach, to withdraw his name from consideration for the Ninth Circuit, first received Kuhl's blue slip in July, but has not publicly stated her intentions.

Several abortion rights groups have organized opposition to Kuhl. "That's certainly a key issue," Chapman said.

For the Ninth Circuit, whose nominees have often been the subject of political gamesmanship, it's deja vu all over again. A second pending nominee, Hawaii lawyer Richard Clifton, is also waiting for a hearing.

Both Hawaii senators and Feinstein have consented to hearings for the nominees from their respective states, although the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee has been slow to schedule hearings.

But all three senators reserved judgment -- the only senators to have done so. All other blue slips returned were marked "approved."

Many of those nominees are also waiting for hearings, and Republicans and Democrats blame each other for the delays.

Of President Bush's 60 judicial nominees, 12 have been approved. There are 106 vacancies nationwide.

"From the Republican standpoint, we want to move these judges as soon as possible," said Margarita Tapia, a spokeswoman for Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary Committee.

REV_00073071

An American Bar Association committee voted unanimously to give Clifton a qualified rating. Kuhl was given a well-qualified rating by a substantial majority of the committee, with the remainder giving her a qualified rating.

The controversy over Kuhl, a Los Angeles Superior Court judge who earned praise for her work on the bench there, stems largely from her work as a Justice Department lawyer under President Ronald Reagan.

Kuhl argued in support of parental notification rules for the distribution of birth control to teen-agers, tax-exempt status for Bob Jones University (which was then racially segregated), and most significantly, in a 1986 _amicus curiae _brief to the U.S. Supreme Court, that _Roe v. Wade_ should be overturned.

"We have no confidence that she's changed her position," said Belle Taylor-McGhee, executive director of the California Abortion & Reproductive Rights Action League.

CARAL is among several abortion-rights groups actively opposing Kuhl's nomination. Taylor-McGhee said CARAL has expressed its concerns to both California senators.

"Check with her office. I think that Barbara Boxer is considering withholding the blue slip," Taylor-McGhee said.

Jipping, the conservative court-watcher, said that Boxer has argued that judicial candidates should not be judged by their work for clients, which he likens to Kuhl's work for an administration that was against abortion. "The hypocrisy is mind-boggling," he said.

The Justice Department reiterated its support for Kuhl's nomination. "Judge Kuhl is a balanced and well-reasoned judge who enjoys widespread bipartisan support," said spokeswoman Lori Rabjohns. "So we call on the committee to give Judge Kuhl a hearing."

Boxer signaled that she took issue with Kuhl's record when Bush announced her nomination.

"I have received numerous statements of opposition to the nomination of Judge Kuhl," Boxer said in a June statement. "These letters and calls raise a number of issues important to Californians, including the right to choose, civil rights, representation of tobacco companies, privacy rights and whistle-blower protection."

"I have met with Judge Kuhl and the White House counsel, informed them of these issues, and I am continuing to evaluate this nomination."

Clifton's nomination has also been the subject of political dealings, although he appears more likely to get a hearing in the near future.

Both Hawaii senators signed off on a hearing before the August congressional recess. In July, Clifton received the Hawaii State Bar Association's highest recommendation.

But Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, wrote a letter to the Judiciary Committee questioning why President
Clinton's Ninth Circuit nominee from Hawaii, James Duffy, was never approved despite waiting years for a vote.

"Based on the information that was made available to me when former President Clinton nominated Mr. Duffy, I gather that his character is without blemish, and that he received the highest assessments by both the American Bar Association and the Hawaii State Bar Association," Inouye wrote. "Thus, if he has been removed for consideration in spite of his qualifications, I would appreciate an explanation."

The Ninth Circuit does not have an active judge sitting in Hawaii, despite rules that at least one judge must sit in each of the nine states within its confines.

Several news reports have indicated that Inouye may be seeking a district court nomination for Duffy. His office did not comment.

"At this time all I can say is that the senator is prepared to allow [Clifton's] nomination to go forward," said Inouye spokeswoman Sandi Skousen, adding that Inouye wants to review Clifton's FBI report before making any decisions.

Under President Clinton, several nominees were subjected to long delays -- notably, Marsha Berzon and Richard Paez.

They waited two years and four years, respectively, before being confirmed over objections that they were too liberal. Both were approved by a divided Senate after Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., kept a promise to give them a vote.

Berzon's nomination proceeded only after Boxer held up one of Lott's appointments to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

A memo obtained by the _Chicago Tribune_ indicates that this week Senate Republicans will blame the dilatory pace of judicial confirmations on Democrats and accuse them of impeding the nation's efforts to fight terrorism.

"Our message would be: You can't get wiretaps, search warrants, etc., without judges; confirm the president's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed," the memo was quoted as saying.

Only one other blue slip has not been returned. Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., has withheld a hearing on Fourth Circuit nominee Terrence Boyle. An Edwards spokesman said the senator wants to insure that a subsequent Fourth Circuit nominee will "balance" Boyle out, whom Edwards regards as too conservative.

Senate Confirms M. Christina Armijo as U.S. District Judge

The Associated Press
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The product of a family with a history of judgeships in N.M., Armijo becomes a federal judge

The U.S. Senate on Tuesday unanimously confirmed M. Christina Armijo as a new federal judge for New Mexico.

Armijo of Las Vegas, N.M., received a 100-0 vote. She had been recommended by Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and nominated by President Bush in August. Both Domenici and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., spoke in support of her confirmation. The nomination won a favorable recommendation last week of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "I think it's wonderful that the first federal judge we confirm for our state under the Bush administration is a well-qualified, Hispanic woman from northern New Mexico, " Domenici said.

He said he was confident she would have "a distinguished career" on the federal bench.

Armijo, a judge on the state Court of Appeals since 1996, comes from a family with a history of judgeships. Her grandfather, Judge Luis E. Armijo, was one of the longest-serving trial judges in state history. Her uncle also served on the bench.

"I was pleased to offer my strong support for Christina Armijo. In her years on the New Mexico Court of Appeals, she has earned a reputation for being a fair judge and has served the people of New Mexico well. I am confident that she will continue her good service to our state," Bingaman said.

She is a 1975 graduate of the University of New Mexico law school. She served in private practice and as a public defender before joining the Court of Appeals. She is also a former member of the New Mexico Health Policy Commission and New Mexico Endowment for the Humanities.

Domenici said the Senate Judiciary Committee was expected to consider two other New Mexico judicial nominations Thursday -- William "Chip" Johnson of Roswell as a U.S. District Judge and former New Mexico judge Harris Hartz of Albuquerque for appointment to the 10th U.S.

Judiciary Committee Sends Wooten Nomination to Full Senate

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 8, 2001

The U.S. Senate approved the nomination of Terry L. Wooten on Thursday to the U.S. District Court for South Carolina.

Wooten, a U.S. magistrate in South Carolina, was recommended for the judgeship by Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "Judge Wooten will be an excellent addition to the District Court," Thurmond said. "He has had an outstanding legal career with an excellent record as a prosecutor and judge in South Carolina."

Wooten had been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991. During the hearings on Thomas' nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Oklahoma City Attorney Confirmed as Federal Judge

The Daily Oklahoman
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The Senate on Tuesday confirmed Stephen P. Friot to be a federal judge in the Western District, which is based in Oklahoma City.

Friot became the third Oklahoman nominated by President Bush to be confirmed as a U.S. district judge. The first two, Claire V. Egan and James H. Payne, were confirmed last month for the federal districts in Tulsa and Muskogee.

Friot's nomination passed 19-0 last week in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

A partner in the Oklahoma City law firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot and Gum, Friot has been in private practice since 1972.

A 1987 book ranking top lawyers in the United States included Friot among the Oklahomans.

REV_00073075

He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association.

In the past 10 years, Friot has donated $ 1,000 total to Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, who recommended Friot to Bush.

Friot has also served charitable causes in the area and the state, such as helping to raise money for legal services for the poor.

The Judiciary Committee is scheduled to hold a hearing today on the nomination of Joe Heaton, who is also in line for a judgeship in the Western District. Heaton is a federal prosecutor and former state House member from Oklahoma City.

Senate Confirms Nominee for Birmingham Judgeship

The Associated Press
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The U.S. Senate confirmed the appointments of two U.S. Attorneys and a district judge for Alabama on Tuesday.

Leura Garrett Canary will become the U.S. attorney for Montgomery, and Alice Martin will take up that role in the northern district of Alabama. Karon Bowdre will preside on the U.S. District Court in Birmingham.

Canary, a veteran state and federal prosecutor, fills the post held by Redding Pitt during the Clinton Administration. Pitt is the new state Democratic Party chairman.

Canary was an assistant state attorney general from 1981 to 1990, a trial attorney with the U.S. Justice Department in Washington, D.C., from 1990 to 1994 and an assistant U.S. attorney for the Middle District in Montgomery since 1994.

Martin replaces Doug Jones, who prosecuted the 1963 Birmingham church bombing cases earlier this year.

Martin, 45, has served as Lauderdale County Circuit Court judge and was appointed by Alabama's two Republican senators, Richard Shelby and Jeff Sessions.

Bowdre, 46, succeeds U.S. District Judge Sam Pointer Jr., who went on senior status in November 1999. She is a Cumberland School of Law professor and will serve in a lifetime slot on the court.

Senate Confirms Hicks as Judge

REV_00073076

By Doug Abrahms
Gannett News Service
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Originally chosen by former President Bush in 1992, Hicks had not made it through the Senate approval process before Bill Clinton was elected president and the Democratic administration gained control of appointing judges. Being approved unanimously by the full Senate Monday, Hicks clears the last hurdle in becoming a U.S. District Court judge.

"Larry Hicks wanted this job for a long time. He was almost nominated before," said Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Hicks -- a civil attorney at the law firm McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks -- was nominated by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev. Hicks was elected Washoe County district attorney in the 1975.

"In the legal community, receiving a presidential nomination to a federal judgeship is one of the highest honors," Ensign said in introducing Hicks' nomination to the full Senate. "Mr. Hicks now has the honor of receiving such a nomination twice."

Hicks started working as deputy district attorney in Washoe County in 1968 and became chief criminal deputy district attorney in 1971. He received his bachelor's degree from the University of Nevada, Reno, in 1965, but received his law degree the University of Colorado School of Law.

"While Larry left Nevada for a few years to receive his legal education, Nevadans don't hold it against him as we did not yet have a law school of our own to accommodate his studies," Ensign said.

Larry Hicks, who lost out on a federal judgeship in 1992 and waited almost 10 years for another chance, was confirmed 83-0 by the U.S. Senate on Monday to join the U.S. District Court in Nevada.

Hicks, his family and partners in his Reno law firm watched on C-SPAN as senators approved him to a lifetime job in the federal judiciary after a 30-year career mostly spent in civil litigation.

'I had quite a cheering section, and at the end someone showed up with a bottle of champagne,' Hicks said after the vote. Hicks, 57, said he expects to begin work within several weeks in Nevada's expanding judiciary. He becomes the sixth full-time federal judge in the state, with a nominee for a final vacancy, Clark County District Judge James Mahan, still awaiting Senate action.

Congress in its 1999-2000 session added three seats to the Nevada District Court, one of the faster-growing districts in the country.

Federal district judges are paid $ 145,100 a year.

Hicks will be based in Las Vegas, although he also will draw some cases from Northern Nevada and hear them in Reno. He said he and his wife, Marianne, are house-shopping in Las Vegas and also plan to keep their home in Northern Nevada.

'He's going to be an outstanding addition,' said Nevada's chief U.S. District Judge Howard McKibben. 'He's held in high esteem by the bench and by the bar.'

Since 1979, Hicks has been a partner in the statewide firm of McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich and Hicks. He has been chairman of the firm's litigation section for the past 16 years.

He began his legal career in 1971 as a deputy district attorney in Washoe County, and was the county's district attorney from 1974 to 1978.

In 1992, Hicks was proposed for a federal judgeship by Rep. Barbara Vucanovich, R-Nev. His nomination was sent to the Senate that June by President George Bush. But as the presidential election approached that year, the Senate effectively froze most nominations, and Hicks lost out when Bush was ousted by Bill Clinton.

But after George W. Bush became president, Hicks was nominated to the bench earlier this year by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev.

Ensign and Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., praised Hicks before senators voted Monday.

Committee Hears Nomination for Kansas Federal Judgeship

By Libby Quaid
The Associated Press

for Kansas federal judgeship

A former prosecutor who exposed police corruption in Kansas City, Kan., moved closer to becoming a federal trial judge by testifying Wednesday before the Senate panel weighing her nomination.

Julie A. Robinson, 44, currently a federal bankruptcy judge, appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee as President Bush's nominee to U.S. District Court in Kansas. She was among three candidates chosen by Republican Sen. Sam Brownback and recommended by both Brownback and Republican Sen. Pat Roberts.

The same committee recently helped shape a sweeping new anti-terrorism law in response to the Sept. 11 attacks. Responding to questions about the legislation, Robinson said that while the Supreme Court has safeguarded civil liberties, "at the same time, this country is facing a serious problem."

Appearing with a half-dozen other nominees, Robinson kept her answers succinct and declined to speak with reporters after the hearing.

Brownback, who attended law school with Robinson at the University of Kansas, told fellow committee members that besides her background, Robinson is "qualified by her heart, by what all she's already done and the pedigree she has."

Her family settled as newly freed slaves in the 1860s in Kansas, Brownback said. Her late father served in Korea and Vietnam, he noted, and her mother, Charlene, served as a nurse practitioner for the Defense Department and Veterans Administration.

Roberts said the judiciary needs people who understand the human element of the law because rulings affect not only the parties in a case but future litigants as well.

"Unforeseen lives can be changed drastically by a single opinion," Roberts said. "With so many changes occurring in the law, we need judges such as Julie Robinson who grasp this concept."

The proceeding was interrupted during Roberts' remarks by the collapse of Robinson's 82-year-old aunt, Ruth, who was taken by ambulance to a local hospital. Her family said later she was fine and was resting at home.

As assistant U.S. attorney for 10 years in the 1980s and 1990s, Robinson waged a high-profile pursuit of public corruption, drug conspiracy, tax fraud and white collar crime. By 1990 her work had shifted exclusively to criminal cases, and she personally prosecuted cases for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Internal Revenue Service, Secret Service and other agencies in federal court.

Her investigations of official corruption in Wyandotte County included the conviction of the sheriff's son after the FBI raided an illegal gambling hall; two defendants were deputy sheriffs stationed as

lookouts and bodyguards.

She prosecuted a major crack cocaine distribution ring that resulted in four convictions, including that of a Kansas City, Kan., police officer who acted as a watchdog for drug dealers and stored the proceeds of their drug sales at his home.

Robinson also prosecuted one of the government's largest tax cases ever, winning convictions of 10 people who, operating as the International Business Association, created phony domestic and foreign trusts to conceal millions of dollars of taxable income. She also successfully prosecuted an Overland Park, Kan., travel agent for a phony ticket scheme that cheated airlines of $600,000 in just six weeks.

Robinson's job as a U.S. bankruptcy judge since 1994 carries a considerably lower profile. She has ruled in at least 276 cases involving debtors and payments to their creditors.

In written answers to questions from the committee, Robinson provided a two page description of her views on "judicial activism," a term frequently used by conservative Republicans in criticizing judges for too broadly interpreting the law.

"The people delegated lesser powers to the judicial branch," Robinson wrote, "precisely because the judiciary lacks electoral responsibility."

Robinson also submitted a detailed accounting of her finances, which is required by law to ensure judges have no conflicts of interest with their monetary holdings. She reported net worth of $474,590, which includes a $425,000 house in Leawood, Kan., as well as investments and stocks in various companies, mostly in telecommunications and only one, Bank of America, worth more than $1,000.

She listed liabilities of $317,500, mostly from a $280,000 home mortgage and accounts and bills due.

Senate GOP Exploits War on Terrorism to Promote Right-Wing Judges

People for the American Way
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Senate Republicans are holding press conferences on November 8, 2001, to push a strategy leaked earlier that week to demand fast-track approval of Bush administration judicial nominees, and to argue that such action is purportedly crucial to the war on terrorism. If the press conference follows the script reported earlier in the week, senators will claim, with White House approval, that not rushing approval of President Bush's judicial nominees would somehow prevent law enforcement officials from getting wiretaps and search warrants essential to identifying terrorists.

REV_00073099

People For the American Way Foundation President Ralph G. Neas said that such a plan, if true, was "dishonest and disgraceful."

Neas said search warrants and wiretaps go before magistrates or federal district court judges, and noted that the administration has submitted nominees for less than one-third of the current district court vacancies. As of November 7, there were 70 district court vacancies and the administration had submitted only 23 nominations for those spots. Five district court vacancies in New York and New Jersey are included among the 47 with no nominees. "If there's a problem with getting district court judges in place to assist law enforcement officials, that problem is not in the Senate," said Neas.

"Senate Republican leaders should be ashamed to distort the truth and misuse the national commitment to fighting terrorism in this blatant fashion," said Neas. "The right wing's number one goal for this administration is to pack the federal judiciary with far right ideologues. They are now trying to use the war on terrorism to promote that agenda."

Neas said some senators have already said that supporting the war on terrorism requires a rubber stamp approach to Bush administration judicial nominees, and have claimed that Senate Democrats have unfairly delayed consideration of his nominees. Both claims are false, Neas said.

A recent PFAW Foundation report debunked GOP complaints about the current confirmation process; indeed, confirmations have outpaced the first year of the first Bush administration in 1989 and by the end of the year will likely be comparable to 1993, the first year of the Clinton administration. In fact, as of yesterday, the Senate had confirmed 16 of President Bush's judicial nominees, more than the 15 confirmed in the entire first year of the first Bush administration. With respect to the district courts, President Bush has nominated 35 judges, and 12 of those have already been confirmed. Of the 23 remaining nominees, nine have already had confirmation hearings. This is in spite of the fact that 13 of these nominations were not even made until September or later.

Neas noted that the Bush administration's apparent priority for judicial nominees has been to the federal appeals courts. The same far-right senators who led an unprecedented blockade against Clinton's appeals court nominees - stopping nearly half of Clinton's appeals court nominees between 1995 and 2000 - are now calling for immediate action on Bush nominees while complaining that Bush's nominees have received unfair treatment.

PFAWF's recent report noted that by the end of this administration, every one of the 13 circuit courts of appeal could be dominated by Republican nominees. If those nominees are predominantly right-wing ideologues, the consequences for Americans' constitutional rights and civil liberties could be disastrous and long lasting.

Today Neas reiterated his call for President Bush to engage in genuine bipartisan consultation in an unprecedented solution to this unprecedented situation with the courts. He also said, "The Senate must resist the politics of intimidation, carry out its constitutional obligation to carefully consider the nominations that come before it, and reject candidates whose record does not reflect a commitment to constitutional rights."

Earthjustice Criticizes Efforts to Rush Judicial Confirmations; Senators Expected to Call for Accelerated Confirmation Schedule in Response to Terrorist Attacks

Earthjustice
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Earthjustice called today's expected push from some members of Congress to accelerate the judicial nomination process, "flawed thinking and a dangerous precedent." At news conferences scheduled for today, several Senators, including Rick Santorum (R-PA), Jon Kyl (R-AZ), and Mitch McConnell (R-KY) are expected to call for rushing through judicial nominees in the name of national security.

"There is no real threat to national security in making sure that each life-long appointee is the right choice for the job," said Glenn Sugameli, senior legislative counsel for Earthjustice. "The nomination process for judges should not be compromised, and it's shameless that some in Congress might be attempting to use current events to achieve that goal."

Sugameli points out that the Senate Judiciary Committee is continuing to address judicial confirmations at a reasonable pace. The committee has paid special attention to district court nominees who would be most directly affected by any terrorism-related issues. In addition, magistrate judges who handle warrants and other key issues are not subject to Senate confirmation and are currently in place in sufficient numbers. Appeals court judges would not have the opportunity to hear terrorist-related cases for many months, if not years.

"The real danger would be a rush to judgment on lifetime judicial nominees who will decide whether to strike down or enforce safety, health, and environmental protections," said Sugameli. "The Senate is acting responsibly by approving judges after carefully considering each nominee's record on critical environmental and other issues. "

Once confirmed, federal judges hold their positions for life, suggesting that rash confirmations could be especially damaging. Environmental groups place particular importance on a sensible approach to reviewing nominees for the federal bench.

"For decades to come, newly confirmed judges will exert tremendous influence over the laws that protect our public health and environment," Sugameli said. "The confirmations should not be approached hastily."

Thurmond Jr, Three Judicial Nominees Confirmed

By Pierce
Congressional Quarterly
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The oldest and longest-serving senator saw his 28-year-old son confirmed as a U.S. attorney Tuesday." Strom Thurmond Jr. "won voice vote approval from the Senate to take on his new position as U.S. attorney for South Carolina -- the state his 98-year-old father, Sen. Strom Thurmond, R, has served for nearly 47 years." The younger Thurmond "was considered an odd choice by some because he has barely three years experience as an assistant state prosecutor, but his father helped him out by recommending to President Bush that his son be nominated." The Senate also "confirmed 10 other U.S. attorney nominations by voice vote, including that of Drew Wrigley to serve in the district of North Dakota. Wrigley previously served as the executive director of the North Dakota Republican Party during the 2000 election, in which Bush won 61 percent of that state's vote." The Senate also voted 100-0 Tuesday "to confirm the nomination of Christina Armijo to be a U.S. District judge for New Mexico. By 98-0 votes, the Senate confirmed Karon Bowdre to be U.S. District judge for Northern Alabama and Stephen Friot to be U.S. District judge for Western Oklahoma."

Kuhl May Be Boxed In On Circuit Hopes

By Jason Hoppin
The Recorder
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Sen. Barbara Boxer has not consented to a hearing on Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals nominee Carolyn Kuhl, and with each passing day it appears more likely that the California Democrat may block Kuhl's nomination.

Boxer still has not returned a "blue slip" on Kuhl, the paperwork circulated to home state senators for comment on a nominee. Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein returned her blue slip a month ago, but under Senate rules both blue slips must be returned before a nominee gets a hearing.

"All I can tell you is that she has not issued a new statement," said Boxer's chief of staff, Sam Chapman, when asked whether the senator has decided what to do about the nomination. He was referring to Boxer's criticism of Kuhl's record following her nomination by President Bush in June. Conservatives have been quick to draw conclusions about Boxer's plans.

"She wants to keep her off the bench," said Tom Jipping, director of the Center for Law and Democracy. "It's not rocket science."

The delay could set the stage for Boxer to be the first Democrat to draw a line in the sand on any of Bush's appellate court nominees.

Kuhl declined to comment.

Boxer, who was instrumental in forcing Rep. Christopher Cox, R-Newport Beach, to withdraw his name from consideration for the Ninth Circuit, first received Kuhl's blue slip in July, but has not publicly stated her intentions.

Several abortion rights groups have organized opposition to Kuhl. "That's certainly a key issue," Chapman said.

For the Ninth Circuit, whose nominees have often been the subject of political gamesmanship, it's deja vu all over again. A second pending nominee, Hawaii lawyer Richard Clifton, is also waiting for a hearing.

Both Hawaii senators and Feinstein have consented to hearings for the nominees from their respective states, although the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee has been slow to schedule hearings.

But all three senators reserved judgment -- the only senators to have done so. All other blue slips returned were marked "approved."

Many of those nominees are also waiting for hearings, and Republicans and Democrats blame each other for the delays.

Of President Bush's 60 judicial nominees, 12 have been approved. There are 106 vacancies nationwide.

"From the Republican standpoint, we want to move these judges as soon as possible," said Margarita Tapia, a spokeswoman for Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary Committee.

REV_00073090

An American Bar Association committee voted unanimously to give Clifton a qualified rating. Kuhl was given a well-qualified rating by a substantial majority of the committee, with the remainder giving her a qualified rating.

The controversy over Kuhl, a Los Angeles Superior Court judge who earned praise for her work on the bench there, stems largely from her work as a Justice Department lawyer under President Ronald Reagan.

Kuhl argued in support of parental notification rules for the distribution of birth control to teen-agers, tax-exempt status for Bob Jones University (which was then racially segregated), and most significantly, in a 1986 _amicus curiae _brief to the U.S. Supreme Court, that _Roe v. Wade_ should be overturned.

"We have no confidence that she's changed her position," said Belle Taylor-McGhee, executive director of the California Abortion & Reproductive Rights Action League.

CARAL is among several abortion-rights groups actively opposing Kuhl's nomination. Taylor-McGhee said CARAL has expressed its concerns to both California senators.

"Check with her office. I think that Barbara Boxer is considering withholding the blue slip," Taylor-McGhee said.

Jipping, the conservative court-watcher, said that Boxer has argued that judicial candidates should not be judged by their work for clients, which he likens to Kuhl's work for an administration that was against abortion. "The hypocrisy is mind-boggling," he said.

The Justice Department reiterated its support for Kuhl's nomination. "Judge Kuhl is a balanced and well-reasoned judge who enjoys widespread bipartisan support," said spokeswoman Lori Rabjohns. "So we call on the committee to give Judge Kuhl a hearing."

Boxer signaled that she took issue with Kuhl's record when Bush announced her nomination.

"I have received numerous statements of opposition to the nomination of Judge Kuhl," Boxer said in a June statement. "These letters and calls raise a number of issues important to Californians, including the right to choose, civil rights, representation of tobacco companies, privacy rights and whistle-blower protection."

"I have met with Judge Kuhl and the White House counsel, informed them of these issues, and I am continuing to evaluate this nomination."

Clifton's nomination has also been the subject of political dealings, although he appears more likely to get a hearing in the near future.

Both Hawaii senators signed off on a hearing before the August congressional recess. In July, Clifton received the Hawaii State Bar Association's highest recommendation.

But Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, wrote a letter to the Judiciary Committee questioning why President
Clinton's Ninth Circuit nominee from Hawaii, James Duffy, was never approved despite waiting years for a vote.

"Based on the information that was made available to me when former President Clinton nominated Mr. Duffy, I gather that his character is without blemish, and that he received the highest assessments by both the American Bar Association and the Hawaii State Bar Association," Inouye wrote. "Thus, if he has been removed for consideration in spite of his qualifications, I would appreciate an explanation."

The Ninth Circuit does not have an active judge sitting in Hawaii, despite rules that at least one judge must sit in each of the nine states within its confines.

Several news reports have indicated that Inouye may be seeking a district court nomination for Duffy. His office did not comment.

"At this time all I can say is that the senator is prepared to allow [Clifton's] nomination to go forward," said Inouye spokeswoman Sandi Skousen, adding that Inouye wants to review Clifton's FBI report before making any decisions.

Under President Clinton, several nominees were subjected to long delays -- notably, Marsha Berzon and Richard Paez.

They waited two years and four years, respectively, before being confirmed over objections that they were too liberal. Both were approved by a divided Senate after Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., kept a promise to give them a vote.

Berzon's nomination proceeded only after Boxer held up one of Lott's appointments to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

A memo obtained by the _Chicago Tribune_ indicates that this week Senate Republicans will blame the dilatory pace of judicial confirmations on Democrats and accuse them of impeding the nation's efforts to fight terrorism.

"Our message would be: You can't get wiretaps, search warrants, etc., without judges; confirm the president's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed," the memo was quoted as saying.

Only one other blue slip has not been returned. Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., has withheld a hearing on Fourth Circuit nominee Terrence Boyle. An Edwards spokesman said the senator wants to insure that a subsequent Fourth Circuit nominee will "balance" Boyle out, whom Edwards regards as too conservative.

Senate Confirms M. Christina Armijo as U.S. District Judge

The Associated Press
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The product of a family with a history of judgeships in N.M., Armijo becomes a federal judge

The U.S. Senate on Tuesday unanimously confirmed M. Christina Armijo as a new federal judge for New Mexico.

Armijo of Las Vegas, N.M., received a 100-0 vote. She had been recommended by Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and nominated by President Bush in August. Both Domenici and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., spoke in support of her confirmation. The nomination won a favorable recommendation last week of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "I think it's wonderful that the first federal judge we confirm for our state under the Bush administration is a well-qualified, Hispanic woman from northern New Mexico, " Domenici said.

He said he was confident she would have "a distinguished career" on the federal bench.

Armijo, a judge on the state Court of Appeals since 1996, comes from a family with a history of judgeships. Her grandfather, Judge Luis E. Armijo, was one of the longest-serving trial judges in state history. Her uncle also served on the bench.

"I was pleased to offer my strong support for Christina Armijo. In her years on the New Mexico Court of Appeals, she has earned a reputation for being a fair judge and has served the people of New Mexico well. I am confident that she will continue her good service to our state," Bingaman said.

She is a 1975 graduate of the University of New Mexico law school. She served in private practice and as a public defender before joining the Court of Appeals. She is also a former member of the New Mexico Health Policy Commission and New Mexico Endowment for the Humanities.

Domenici said the Senate Judiciary Committee was expected to consider two other New Mexico judicial nominations Thursday -- William "Chip" Johnson of Roswell as a U.S. District Judge and former New Mexico judge Harris Hartz of Albuquerque for appointment to the 10th U.S.

Judiciary Committee Sends Wooten Nomination to Full Senate

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 8, 2001

The U.S. Senate approved the nomination of Terry L. Wooten on Thursday to the U.S. District Court for South Carolina.

Wooten, a U.S. magistrate in South Carolina, was recommended for the judgeship by Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "Judge Wooten will be an excellent addition to the District Court," Thurmond said. "He has had an outstanding legal career with an excellent record as a prosecutor and judge in South Carolina."

Wooten had been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991. During the hearings on Thomas' nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Oklahoma City Attorney Confirmed as Federal Judge

The Daily Oklahoman
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The Senate on Tuesday confirmed Stephen P. Friot to be a federal judge in the Western District, which is based in Oklahoma City.

Friot became the third Oklahoman nominated by President Bush to be confirmed as a U.S. district judge. The first two, Claire V. Egan and James H. Payne, were confirmed last month for the federal districts in Tulsa and Muskogee.

Friot's nomination passed 19-0 last week in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

A partner in the Oklahoma City law firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot and Gum, Friot has been in private practice since 1972.

A 1987 book ranking top lawyers in the United States included Friot among the Oklahomans.

REV_00073094

He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association.

In the past 10 years, Friot has donated $ 1,000 total to Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, who recommended Friot to Bush.

Friot has also served charitable causes in the area and the state, such as helping to raise money for legal services for the poor.

The Judiciary Committee is scheduled to hold a hearing today on the nomination of Joe Heaton, who is also in line for a judgeship in the Western District. Heaton is a federal prosecutor and former state House member from Oklahoma City.

Senate Confirms Nominee for Birmingham Judgeship

The Associated Press
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The U.S. Senate confirmed the appointments of two U.S. Attorneys and a district judge for Alabama on Tuesday.

Leura Garrett Canary will become the U.S. attorney for Montgomery, and Alice Martin will take up that role in the northern district of Alabama. Karon Bowdre will preside on the U.S. District Court in Birmingham.

Canary, a veteran state and federal prosecutor, fills the post held by Redding Pitt during the Clinton Administration. Pitt is the new state Democratic Party chairman.

Canary was an assistant state attorney general from 1981 to 1990, a trial attorney with the U.S. Justice Department in Washington, D.C., from 1990 to 1994 and an assistant U.S. attorney for the Middle District in Montgomery since 1994.

Martin replaces Doug Jones, who prosecuted the 1963 Birmingham church bombing cases earlier this year.

Martin, 45, has served as Lauderdale County Circuit Court judge and was appointed by Alabama's two Republican senators, Richard Shelby and Jeff Sessions.

Bowdre, 46, succeeds U.S. District Judge Sam Pointer Jr., who went on senior status in November 1999. She is a Cumberland School of Law professor and will serve in a lifetime slot on the court.

Senate Confirms Hicks as Judge

REV_00073095

By Doug Abrahms
Gannett News Service
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Originally chosen by former President Bush in 1992, Hicks had not made it through the Senate approval process before Bill Clinton was elected president and the Democratic administration gained control of appointing judges. Being approved unanimously by the full Senate Monday, Hicks clears the last hurdle in becoming a U.S. District Court judge.

"Larry Hicks wanted this job for a long time. He was almost nominated before," said Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Hicks -- a civil attorney at the law firm McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks -- was nominated by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev. Hicks was elected Washoe County district attorney in the 1975.

"In the legal community, receiving a presidential nomination to a federal judgeship is one of the highest honors," Ensign said in introducing Hicks' nomination to the full Senate. "Mr. Hicks now has the honor of receiving such a nomination twice."

Hicks started working as deputy district attorney in Washoe County in 1968 and became chief criminal deputy district attorney in 1971. He received his bachelor's degree from the University of Nevada, Reno, in 1965, but received his law degree the University of Colorado School of Law.

"While Larry left Nevada for a few years to receive his legal education, Nevadans don't hold it against him as we did not yet have a law school of our own to accommodate his studies," Ensign said.

Larry Hicks, who lost out on a federal judgeship in 1992 and waited almost 10 years for another chance, was confirmed 83-0 by the U.S. Senate on Monday to join the U.S. District Court in Nevada.

Hicks, his family and partners in his Reno law firm watched on C-SPAN as senators approved him to a lifetime job in the federal judiciary after a 30-year career mostly spent in civil litigation.

'I had quite a cheering section, and at the end someone showed up with a bottle of champagne,' Hicks said after the vote. Hicks, 57, said he expects to begin work within several weeks in Nevada's expanding judiciary. He becomes the sixth full-time federal judge in the state, with a nominee for a final vacancy, Clark County District Judge James Mahan, still awaiting Senate action.

Congress in its 1999-2000 session added three seats to the Nevada District Court, one of the faster-growing districts in the country.

Federal district judges are paid $ 145,100 a year.

Hicks will be based in Las Vegas, although he also will draw some cases from Northern Nevada and hear them in Reno. He said he and his wife, Marianne, are house-shopping in Las Vegas and also plan to keep their home in Northern Nevada.

'He's going to be an outstanding addition,' said Nevada's chief U.S. District Judge Howard McKibben. 'He's held in high esteem by the bench and by the bar.'

Since 1979, Hicks has been a partner in the statewide firm of McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich and Hicks. He has been chairman of the firm's litigation section for the past 16 years.

He began his legal career in 1971 as a deputy district attorney in Washoe County, and was the county's district attorney from 1974 to 1978.

In 1992, Hicks was proposed for a federal judgeship by Rep. Barbara Vucanovich, R-Nev. His nomination was sent to the Senate that June by President George Bush. But as the presidential election approached that year, the Senate effectively froze most nominations, and Hicks lost out when Bush was ousted by Bill Clinton.

But after George W. Bush became president, Hicks was nominated to the bench earlier this year by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev.

Ensign and Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., praised Hicks before senators voted Monday.

Committee Hears Nomination for Kansas Federal Judgeship

By Libby Quaid

for Kansas federal judgeship

A former prosecutor who exposed police corruption in Kansas City, Kan., moved closer to becoming a federal trial judge by testifying Wednesday before the Senate panel weighing her nomination.

Julie A. Robinson, 44, currently a federal bankruptcy judge, appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee as President Bush's nominee to U.S. District Court in Kansas. She was among three candidates chosen by Republican Sen. Sam Brownback and recommended by both Brownback and Republican Sen. Pat Roberts.

The same committee recently helped shape a sweeping new anti-terrorism law in response to the Sept. 11 attacks. Responding to questions about the legislation, Robinson said that while the Supreme Court has safeguarded civil liberties, "at the same time, this country is facing a serious problem."

Appearing with a half-dozen other nominees, Robinson kept her answers succinct and declined to speak with reporters after the hearing.

Brownback, who attended law school with Robinson at the University of Kansas, told fellow committee members that besides her background, Robinson is "qualified by her heart, by what all she's already done and the pedigree she has."

Her family settled as newly freed slaves in the 1860s in Kansas, Brownback said. Her late father served in Korea and Vietnam, he noted, and her mother, Charlene, served as a nurse practitioner for the Defense Department and Veterans Administration.

Roberts said the judiciary needs people who understand the human element of the law because rulings affect not only the parties in a case but future litigants as well.

"Unforeseen lives can be changed drastically by a single opinion," Roberts said. "With so many changes occurring in the law, we need judges such as Julie Robinson who grasp this concept."

The proceeding was interrupted during Roberts' remarks by the collapse of Robinson's 82-year-old aunt, Ruth, who was taken by ambulance to a local hospital. Her family said later she was fine and was resting at home.

As assistant U.S. attorney for 10 years in the 1980s and 1990s, Robinson waged a high-profile pursuit of public corruption, drug conspiracy, tax fraud and white collar crime. By 1990 her work had shifted exclusively to criminal cases, and she personally prosecuted cases for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Internal Revenue Service, Secret Service and other agencies in federal court.

Her investigations of official corruption in Wyandotte County included the conviction of the sheriff's son after the FBI raided an illegal gambling hall; two defendants were deputy sheriffs stationed as lookouts and bodyguards.

She prosecuted a major crack cocaine distribution ring that resulted in four convictions, including that of a Kansas City, Kan., police officer who acted as a watchdog for drug dealers and stored the proceeds of their drug sales at his home.

Robinson also prosecuted one of the government's largest tax cases ever, winning convictions of 10 people who, operating as the International Business Association, created phony domestic and foreign trusts to conceal millions of dollars of taxable income. She also successfully prosecuted an Overland Park, Kan., travel agent for a phony ticket scheme that cheated airlines of $600,000 in just six weeks.

Robinson's job as a U.S. bankruptcy judge since 1994 carries a considerably lower profile. She has ruled in at least 276 cases involving debtors and payments to their creditors.

In written answers to questions from the committee, Robinson provided a two page description of her views on "judicial activism," a term frequently used by conservative Republicans in criticizing judges for too broadly interpreting the law.

"The people delegated lesser powers to the judicial branch," Robinson wrote, "precisely because the judiciary lacks electoral responsibility."

Robinson also submitted a detailed accounting of her finances, which is required by law to ensure judges have no conflicts of interest with their monetary holdings. She reported net worth of $474,590, which includes a $425,000 house in Leawood, Kan., as well as investments and stocks in various companies, mostly in telecommunications and only one, Bank of America, worth more than $1,000.

She listed liabilities of $317,500, mostly from a $280,000 home mortgage and accounts and bills due.

Senate GOP Exploits War on Terrorism to Promote Right-Wing Judges

People for the American Way
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Senate Republicans are holding press conferences on November 8, 2001, to push a strategy leaked earlier that week to demand fast-track approval of Bush administration judicial nominees, and to argue that such action is purportedly crucial to the war on terrorism. If the press conference follows the script reported earlier in the week, senators will claim, with White House approval, that not rushing approval of President Bush's judicial nominees would somehow prevent law enforcement officials from getting wiretaps and search warrants essential to identifying terrorists.

REV_00073115

People For the American Way Foundation President Ralph G. Neas said that such a plan, if true, was "dishonest and disgraceful."

Neas said search warrants and wiretaps go before magistrates or federal district court judges, and noted that the administration has submitted nominees for less than one-third of the current district court vacancies. As of November 7, there were 70 district court vacancies and the administration had submitted only 23 nominations for those spots. Five district court vacancies in New York and New Jersey are included among the 47 with no nominees. "If there's a problem with getting district court judges in place to assist law enforcement officials, that problem is not in the Senate," said Neas.

"Senate Republican leaders should be ashamed to distort the truth and misuse the national commitment to fighting terrorism in this blatant fashion," said Neas. "The right wing's number one goal for this administration is to pack the federal judiciary with far right ideologues. They are now trying to use the war on terrorism to promote that agenda."

Neas said some senators have already said that supporting the war on terrorism requires a rubber stamp approach to Bush administration judicial nominees, and have claimed that Senate Democrats have unfairly delayed consideration of his nominees. Both claims are false, Neas said.

A recent PFAW Foundation report debunked GOP complaints about the current confirmation process; indeed, confirmations have outpaced the first year of the first Bush administration in 1989 and by the end of the year will likely be comparable to 1993, the first year of the Clinton administration. In fact, as of yesterday, the Senate had confirmed 16 of President Bush's judicial nominees, more than the 15 confirmed in the entire first year of the first Bush administration. With respect to the district courts, President Bush has nominated 35 judges, and 12 of those have already been confirmed. Of the 23 remaining nominees, nine have already had confirmation hearings. This is in spite of the fact that 13 of these nominations were not even made until September or later.

Neas noted that the Bush administration's apparent priority for judicial nominees has been to the federal appeals courts. The same far-right senators who led an unprecedented blockade against Clinton's appeals court nominees - stopping nearly half of Clinton's appeals court nominees between 1995 and 2000 - are now calling for immediate action on Bush nominees while complaining that Bush's nominees have received unfair treatment.

PFAWF's recent report noted that by the end of this administration, every one of the 13 circuit courts of appeal could be dominated by Republican nominees. If those nominees are predominantly right-wing ideologues, the consequences for Americans' constitutional rights and civil liberties could be disastrous and long lasting.

Today Neas reiterated his call for President Bush to engage in genuine bipartisan consultation in an unprecedented solution to this unprecedented situation with the courts. He also said, "The Senate must resist the politics of intimidation, carry out its constitutional obligation to carefully consider the nominations that come before it, and reject candidates whose record does not reflect a commitment to constitutional rights."

Earthjustice Criticizes Efforts to Rush Judicial Confirmations; Senators Expected to Call for Accelerated Confirmation Schedule in Response to Terrorist Attacks

Earthjustice
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Earthjustice called today's expected push from some members of Congress to accelerate the judicial nomination process, "flawed thinking and a dangerous precedent." At news conferences scheduled for today, several Senators, including Rick Santorum (R-PA), Jon Kyl (R-AZ), and Mitch McConnell (R-KY) are expected to call for rushing through judicial nominees in the name of national security.

"There is no real threat to national security in making sure that each life-long appointee is the right choice for the job," said Glenn Sugameli, senior legislative counsel for Earthjustice. "The nomination process for judges should not be compromised, and it's shameless that some in Congress might be attempting to use current events to achieve that goal."

Sugameli points out that the Senate Judiciary Committee is continuing to address judicial confirmations at a reasonable pace. The committee has paid special attention to district court nominees who would be most directly affected by any terrorism-related issues. In addition, magistrate judges who handle warrants and other key issues are not subject to Senate confirmation and are currently in place in sufficient numbers. Appeals court judges would not have the opportunity to hear terrorist-related cases for many months, if not years.

"The real danger would be a rush to judgment on lifetime judicial nominees who will decide whether to strike down or enforce safety, health, and environmental protections," said Sugameli. "The Senate is acting responsibly by approving judges after carefully considering each nominee's record on critical environmental and other issues. "

Once confirmed, federal judges hold their positions for life, suggesting that rash confirmations could be especially damaging. Environmental groups place particular importance on a sensible approach to reviewing nominees for the federal bench.

"For decades to come, newly confirmed judges will exert tremendous influence over the laws that protect our public health and environment," Sugameli said. "The confirmations should not be approached hastily."

Thurmond Jr, Three Judicial Nominees Confirmed

By Pierce
Congressional Quarterly
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The oldest and longest-serving senator saw his 28-year-old son confirmed as a U.S. attorney Tuesday." Strom Thurmond Jr. "won voice vote approval from the Senate to take on his new position as U.S. attorney for South Carolina -- the state his 98-year-old father, Sen. Strom Thurmond, R, has served for nearly 47 years." The younger Thurmond "was considered an odd choice by some because he has barely three years experience as an assistant state prosecutor, but his father helped him out by recommending to President Bush that his son be nominated." The Senate also "confirmed 10 other U.S. attorney nominations by voice vote, including that of Drew Wrigley to serve in the district of North Dakota. Wrigley previously served as the executive director of the North Dakota Republican Party during the 2000 election, in which Bush won 61 percent of that state's vote." The Senate also voted 100-0 Tuesday "to confirm the nomination of Christina Armijo to be a U.S. District judge for New Mexico. By 98-0 votes, the Senate confirmed Karon Bowdre to be U.S. District judge for Northern Alabama and Stephen Friot to be U.S. District judge for Western Oklahoma."

Kuhl May Be Boxed In On Circuit Hopes

By Jason Hoppin
The Recorder
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Sen. Barbara Boxer has not consented to a hearing on Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals nominee Carolyn Kuhl, and with each passing day it appears more likely that the California Democrat may block Kuhl's nomination.

Boxer still has not returned a "blue slip" on Kuhl, the paperwork circulated to home state senators for comment on a nominee. Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein returned her blue slip a month ago, but under Senate rules both blue slips must be returned before a nominee gets a hearing.

"All I can tell you is that she has not issued a new statement," said Boxer's chief of staff, Sam Chapman, when asked whether the senator has decided what to do about the nomination. He was referring to Boxer's criticism of Kuhl's record following her nomination by President Bush in June. Conservatives have been quick to draw conclusions about Boxer's plans.

"She wants to keep her off the bench," said Tom Jipping, director of the Center for Law and Democracy. "It's not rocket science."

The delay could set the stage for Boxer to be the first Democrat to draw a line in the sand on any of Bush's appellate court nominees.

Kuhl declined to comment.

Boxer, who was instrumental in forcing Rep. Christopher Cox, R-Newport Beach, to withdraw his name from consideration for the Ninth Circuit, first received Kuhl's blue slip in July, but has not publicly stated her intentions.

Several abortion rights groups have organized opposition to Kuhl. "That's certainly a key issue," Chapman said.

For the Ninth Circuit, whose nominees have often been the subject of political gamesmanship, it's deja vu all over again. A second pending nominee, Hawaii lawyer Richard Clifton, is also waiting for a hearing.

Both Hawaii senators and Feinstein have consented to hearings for the nominees from their respective states, although the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee has been slow to schedule hearings.

But all three senators reserved judgment -- the only senators to have done so. All other blue slips returned were marked "approved."

Many of those nominees are also waiting for hearings, and Republicans and Democrats blame each other for the delays.

Of President Bush's 60 judicial nominees, 12 have been approved. There are 106 vacancies nationwide.

"From the Republican standpoint, we want to move these judges as soon as possible," said Margarita Tapia, a spokeswoman for Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary Committee.

REV_00073106

An American Bar Association committee voted unanimously to give Clifton a qualified rating. Kuhl was given a well-qualified rating by a substantial majority of the committee, with the remainder giving her a qualified rating.

The controversy over Kuhl, a Los Angeles Superior Court judge who earned praise for her work on the bench there, stems largely from her work as a Justice Department lawyer under President Ronald Reagan.

Kuhl argued in support of parental notification rules for the distribution of birth control to teen-agers, tax-exempt status for Bob Jones University (which was then racially segregated), and most significantly, in a 1986 _amicus curiae _brief to the U.S. Supreme Court, that _Roe v. Wade_ should be overturned.

"We have no confidence that she's changed her position," said Belle Taylor-McGhee, executive director of the California Abortion & Reproductive Rights Action League.

CARAL is among several abortion-rights groups actively opposing Kuhl's nomination. Taylor-McGhee said CARAL has expressed its concerns to both California senators.

"Check with her office. I think that Barbara Boxer is considering withholding the blue slip," Taylor-McGhee said.

Jipping, the conservative court-watcher, said that Boxer has argued that judicial candidates should not be judged by their work for clients, which he likens to Kuhl's work for an administration that was against abortion. "The hypocrisy is mind-boggling," he said.

The Justice Department reiterated its support for Kuhl's nomination. "Judge Kuhl is a balanced and well-reasoned judge who enjoys widespread bipartisan support," said spokeswoman Lori Rabjohns. "So we call on the committee to give Judge Kuhl a hearing."

Boxer signaled that she took issue with Kuhl's record when Bush announced her nomination.

"I have received numerous statements of opposition to the nomination of Judge Kuhl," Boxer said in a June statement. "These letters and calls raise a number of issues important to Californians, including the right to choose, civil rights, representation of tobacco companies, privacy rights and whistle-blower protection."

"I have met with Judge Kuhl and the White House counsel, informed them of these issues, and I am continuing to evaluate this nomination."

Clifton's nomination has also been the subject of political dealings, although he appears more likely to get a hearing in the near future.

Both Hawaii senators signed off on a hearing before the August congressional recess. In July, Clifton received the Hawaii State Bar Association's highest recommendation.

But Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, wrote a letter to the Judiciary Committee questioning why President
Clinton's Ninth Circuit nominee from Hawaii, James Duffy, was never approved despite waiting years for a vote.

"Based on the information that was made available to me when former President Clinton nominated Mr. Duffy, I gather that his character is without blemish, and that he received the highest assessments by both the American Bar Association and the Hawaii State Bar Association," Inouye wrote. "Thus, if he has been removed for consideration in spite of his qualifications, I would appreciate an explanation."

The Ninth Circuit does not have an active judge sitting in Hawaii, despite rules that at least one judge must sit in each of the nine states within its confines.

Several news reports have indicated that Inouye may be seeking a district court nomination for Duffy. His office did not comment.

"At this time all I can say is that the senator is prepared to allow [Clifton's] nomination to go forward," said Inouye spokeswoman Sandi Skousen, adding that Inouye wants to review Clifton's FBI report before making any decisions.

Under President Clinton, several nominees were subjected to long delays -- notably, Marsha Berzon and Richard Paez.

They waited two years and four years, respectively, before being confirmed over objections that they were too liberal. Both were approved by a divided Senate after Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., kept a promise to give them a vote.

Berzon's nomination proceeded only after Boxer held up one of Lott's appointments to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

A memo obtained by the _Chicago Tribune_ indicates that this week Senate Republicans will blame the dilatory pace of judicial confirmations on Democrats and accuse them of impeding the nation's efforts to fight terrorism.

"Our message would be: You can't get wiretaps, search warrants, etc., without judges; confirm the president's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed," the memo was quoted as saying.

Only one other blue slip has not been returned. Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., has withheld a hearing on Fourth Circuit nominee Terrence Boyle. An Edwards spokesman said the senator wants to insure that a subsequent Fourth Circuit nominee will "balance" Boyle out, whom Edwards regards as too conservative.

Senate Confirms M. Christina Armijo as U.S. District Judge

The Associated Press
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The product of a family with a history of judgeships in N.M., Armijo becomes a federal judge

The U.S. Senate on Tuesday unanimously confirmed M. Christina Armijo as a new federal judge for New Mexico.

Armijo of Las Vegas, N.M., received a 100-0 vote. She had been recommended by Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and nominated by President Bush in August. Both Domenici and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., spoke in support of her confirmation. The nomination won a favorable recommendation last week of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "I think it's wonderful that the first federal judge we confirm for our state under the Bush administration is a well-qualified, Hispanic woman from northern New Mexico, " Domenici said.

He said he was confident she would have "a distinguished career" on the federal bench.

Armijo, a judge on the state Court of Appeals since 1996, comes from a family with a history of judgeships. Her grandfather, Judge Luis E. Armijo, was one of the longest-serving trial judges in state history. Her uncle also served on the bench.

"I was pleased to offer my strong support for Christina Armijo. In her years on the New Mexico Court of Appeals, she has earned a reputation for being a fair judge and has served the people of New Mexico well. I am confident that she will continue her good service to our state," Bingaman said.

She is a 1975 graduate of the University of New Mexico law school. She served in private practice and as a public defender before joining the Court of Appeals. She is also a former member of the New Mexico Health Policy Commission and New Mexico Endowment for the Humanities.

Domenici said the Senate Judiciary Committee was expected to consider two other New Mexico judicial nominations Thursday -- William "Chip" Johnson of Roswell as a U.S. District Judge and former New Mexico judge Harris Hartz of Albuquerque for appointment to the 10th U.S.

Judiciary Committee Sends Wooten Nomination to Full Senate

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 8, 2001

The U.S. Senate approved the nomination of Terry L. Wooten on Thursday to the U.S. District Court for South Carolina.

Wooten, a U.S. magistrate in South Carolina, was recommended for the judgeship by Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "Judge Wooten will be an excellent addition to the District Court," Thurmond said. "He has had an outstanding legal career with an excellent record as a prosecutor and judge in South Carolina."

Wooten had been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991. During the hearings on Thomas' nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Oklahoma City Attorney Confirmed as Federal Judge

The Daily Oklahoman
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The Senate on Tuesday confirmed Stephen P. Friot to be a federal judge in the Western District, which is based in Oklahoma City.

Friot became the third Oklahoman nominated by President Bush to be confirmed as a U.S. district judge. The first two, Claire V. Egan and James H. Payne, were confirmed last month for the federal districts in Tulsa and Muskogee.

Friot's nomination passed 19-0 last week in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

A partner in the Oklahoma City law firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot and Gum, Friot has been in private practice since 1972.

A 1987 book ranking top lawyers in the United States included Friot among the Oklahomans.

REV_00073110

He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association.

In the past 10 years, Friot has donated $ 1,000 total to Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, who recommended Friot to Bush.

Friot has also served charitable causes in the area and the state, such as helping to raise money for legal services for the poor.

The Judiciary Committee is scheduled to hold a hearing today on the nomination of Joe Heaton, who is also in line for a judgeship in the Western District. Heaton is a federal prosecutor and former state House member from Oklahoma City.

Senate Confirms Nominee for Birmingham Judgeship

The Associated Press
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The U.S. Senate confirmed the appointments of two U.S. Attorneys and a district judge for Alabama on Tuesday.

Leura Garrett Canary will become the U.S. attorney for Montgomery, and Alice Martin will take up that role in the northern district of Alabama. Karon Bowdre will preside on the U.S. District Court in Birmingham.

Canary, a veteran state and federal prosecutor, fills the post held by Redding Pitt during the Clinton Administration. Pitt is the new state Democratic Party chairman.

Canary was an assistant state attorney general from 1981 to 1990, a trial attorney with the U.S. Justice Department in Washington, D.C., from 1990 to 1994 and an assistant U.S. attorney for the Middle District in Montgomery since 1994.

Martin replaces Doug Jones, who prosecuted the 1963 Birmingham church bombing cases earlier this year.

Martin, 45, has served as Lauderdale County Circuit Court judge and was appointed by Alabama's two Republican senators, Richard Shelby and Jeff Sessions.

Bowdre, 46, succeeds U.S. District Judge Sam Pointer Jr., who went on senior status in November 1999. She is a Cumberland School of Law professor and will serve in a lifetime slot on the court.

Senate Confirms Hicks as Judge

REV_00073111

By Doug Abrahms
Gannett News Service
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Originally chosen by former President Bush in 1992, Hicks had not made it through the Senate approval process before Bill Clinton was elected president and the Democratic administration gained control of appointing judges. Being approved unanimously by the full Senate Monday, Hicks clears the last hurdle in becoming a U.S. District Court judge.

"Larry Hicks wanted this job for a long time. He was almost nominated before," said Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Hicks -- a civil attorney at the law firm McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks -- was nominated by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev. Hicks was elected Washoe County district attorney in the 1975.

"In the legal community, receiving a presidential nomination to a federal judgeship is one of the highest honors," Ensign said in introducing Hicks' nomination to the full Senate. "Mr. Hicks now has the honor of receiving such a nomination twice."

Hicks started working as deputy district attorney in Washoe County in 1968 and became chief criminal deputy district attorney in 1971. He received his bachelor's degree from the University of Nevada, Reno, in 1965, but received his law degree the University of Colorado School of Law.

"While Larry left Nevada for a few years to receive his legal education, Nevadans don't hold it against him as we did not yet have a law school of our own to accommodate his studies," Ensign said.

Larry Hicks, who lost out on a federal judgeship in 1992 and waited almost 10 years for another chance, was confirmed 83-0 by the U.S. Senate on Monday to join the U.S. District Court in Nevada.

Hicks, his family and partners in his Reno law firm watched on C-SPAN as senators approved him to a lifetime job in the federal judiciary after a 30-year career mostly spent in civil litigation.

'I had quite a cheering section, and at the end someone showed up with a bottle of champagne,' Hicks said after the vote. Hicks, 57, said he expects to begin work within several weeks in Nevada's expanding judiciary. He becomes the sixth full-time federal judge in the state, with a nominee for a final vacancy, Clark County District Judge James Mahan, still awaiting Senate action.

Congress in its 1999-2000 session added three seats to the Nevada District Court, one of the faster-growing districts in the country.

Federal district judges are paid $ 145,100 a year.

Hicks will be based in Las Vegas, although he also will draw some cases from Northern Nevada and hear them in Reno. He said he and his wife, Marianne, are house-shopping in Las Vegas and also plan to keep their home in Northern Nevada.

'He's going to be an outstanding addition,' said Nevada's chief U.S. District Judge Howard McKibben. 'He's held in high esteem by the bench and by the bar.'

Since 1979, Hicks has been a partner in the statewide firm of McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich and Hicks. He has been chairman of the firm's litigation section for the past 16 years.

He began his legal career in 1971 as a deputy district attorney in Washoe County, and was the county's district attorney from 1974 to 1978.

In 1992, Hicks was proposed for a federal judgeship by Rep. Barbara Vucanovich, R-Nev. His nomination was sent to the Senate that June by President George Bush. But as the presidential election approached that year, the Senate effectively froze most nominations, and Hicks lost out when Bush was ousted by Bill Clinton.

But after George W. Bush became president, Hicks was nominated to the bench earlier this year by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev.

Ensign and Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., praised Hicks before senators voted Monday.

Committee Hears Nomination for Kansas Federal Judgeship

By Libby Quaid

for Kansas federal judgeship

A former prosecutor who exposed police corruption in Kansas City, Kan., moved closer to becoming a federal trial judge by testifying Wednesday before the Senate panel weighing her nomination.

Julie A. Robinson, 44, currently a federal bankruptcy judge, appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee as President Bush's nominee to U.S. District Court in Kansas. She was among three candidates chosen by Republican Sen. Sam Brownback and recommended by both Brownback and Republican Sen. Pat Roberts.

The same committee recently helped shape a sweeping new anti-terrorism law in response to the Sept. 11 attacks. Responding to questions about the legislation, Robinson said that while the Supreme Court has safeguarded civil liberties, "at the same time, this country is facing a serious problem."

Appearing with a half-dozen other nominees, Robinson kept her answers succinct and declined to speak with reporters after the hearing.

Brownback, who attended law school with Robinson at the University of Kansas, told fellow committee members that besides her background, Robinson is "qualified by her heart, by what all she's already done and the pedigree she has."

Her family settled as newly freed slaves in the 1860s in Kansas, Brownback said. Her late father served in Korea and Vietnam, he noted, and her mother, Charlene, served as a nurse practitioner for the Defense Department and Veterans Administration.

Roberts said the judiciary needs people who understand the human element of the law because rulings affect not only the parties in a case but future litigants as well.

"Unforeseen lives can be changed drastically by a single opinion," Roberts said. "With so many changes occurring in the law, we need judges such as Julie Robinson who grasp this concept."

The proceeding was interrupted during Roberts' remarks by the collapse of Robinson's 82-year-old aunt, Ruth, who was taken by ambulance to a local hospital. Her family said later she was fine and was resting at home.

As assistant U.S. attorney for 10 years in the 1980s and 1990s, Robinson waged a high-profile pursuit of public corruption, drug conspiracy, tax fraud and white collar crime. By 1990 her work had shifted exclusively to criminal cases, and she personally prosecuted cases for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Internal Revenue Service, Secret Service and other agencies in federal court.

Her investigations of official corruption in Wyandotte County included the conviction of the sheriff's son after the FBI raided an illegal gambling hall; two defendants were deputy sheriffs stationed as

lookouts and bodyguards.

She prosecuted a major crack cocaine distribution ring that resulted in four convictions, including that of a Kansas City, Kan., police officer who acted as a watchdog for drug dealers and stored the proceeds of their drug sales at his home.

Robinson also prosecuted one of the government's largest tax cases ever, winning convictions of 10 people who, operating as the International Business Association, created phony domestic and foreign trusts to conceal millions of dollars of taxable income. She also successfully prosecuted an Overland Park, Kan., travel agent for a phony ticket scheme that cheated airlines of $600,000 in just six weeks.

Robinson's job as a U.S. bankruptcy judge since 1994 carries a considerably lower profile. She has ruled in at least 276 cases involving debtors and payments to their creditors.

In written answers to questions from the committee, Robinson provided a two page description of her views on "judicial activism," a term frequently used by conservative Republicans in criticizing judges for too broadly interpreting the law.

"The people delegated lesser powers to the judicial branch," Robinson wrote, "precisely because the judiciary lacks electoral responsibility."

Robinson also submitted a detailed accounting of her finances, which is required by law to ensure judges have no conflicts of interest with their monetary holdings. She reported net worth of $474,590, which includes a $425,000 house in Leawood, Kan., as well as investments and stocks in various companies, mostly in telecommunications and only one, Bank of America, worth more than $1,000.

She listed liabilities of $317,500, mostly from a $280,000 home mortgage and accounts and bills due.

Senate GOP Exploits War on Terrorism to Promote Right-Wing Judges

People for the American Way
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Senate Republicans are holding press conferences on November 8, 2001, to push a strategy leaked earlier that week to demand fast-track approval of Bush administration judicial nominees, and to argue that such action is purportedly crucial to the war on terrorism. If the press conference follows the script reported earlier in the week, senators will claim, with White House approval, that not rushing approval of President Bush's judicial nominees would somehow prevent law enforcement officials from getting wiretaps and search warrants essential to identifying terrorists.

REV_00073131

People For the American Way Foundation President Ralph G. Neas said that such a plan, if true, was "dishonest and disgraceful."

Neas said search warrants and wiretaps go before magistrates or federal district court judges, and noted that the administration has submitted nominees for less than one-third of the current district court vacancies. As of November 7, there were 70 district court vacancies and the administration had submitted only 23 nominations for those spots. Five district court vacancies in New York and New Jersey are included among the 47 with no nominees. "If there's a problem with getting district court judges in place to assist law enforcement officials, that problem is not in the Senate," said Neas.

"Senate Republican leaders should be ashamed to distort the truth and misuse the national commitment to fighting terrorism in this blatant fashion," said Neas. "The right wing's number one goal for this administration is to pack the federal judiciary with far right ideologues. They are now trying to use the war on terrorism to promote that agenda."

Neas said some senators have already said that supporting the war on terrorism requires a rubber stamp approach to Bush administration judicial nominees, and have claimed that Senate Democrats have unfairly delayed consideration of his nominees. Both claims are false, Neas said.

A recent PFAW Foundation report debunked GOP complaints about the current confirmation process; indeed, confirmations have outpaced the first year of the first Bush administration in 1989 and by the end of the year will likely be comparable to 1993, the first year of the Clinton administration. In fact, as of yesterday, the Senate had confirmed 16 of President Bush's judicial nominees, more than the 15 confirmed in the entire first year of the first Bush administration. With respect to the district courts, President Bush has nominated 35 judges, and 12 of those have already been confirmed. Of the 23 remaining nominees, nine have already had confirmation hearings. This is in spite of the fact that 13 of these nominations were not even made until September or later.

Neas noted that the Bush administration's apparent priority for judicial nominees has been to the federal appeals courts. The same far-right senators who led an unprecedented blockade against Clinton's appeals court nominees - stopping nearly half of Clinton's appeals court nominees between 1995 and 2000 - are now calling for immediate action on Bush nominees while complaining that Bush's nominees have received unfair treatment.

PFAWF's recent report noted that by the end of this administration, every one of the 13 circuit courts of appeal could be dominated by Republican nominees. If those nominees are predominantly right-wing ideologues, the consequences for Americans' constitutional rights and civil liberties could be disastrous and long lasting.

Today Neas reiterated his call for President Bush to engage in genuine bipartisan consultation in an unprecedented solution to this unprecedented situation with the courts. He also said, "The Senate must resist the politics of intimidation, carry out its constitutional obligation to carefully consider the nominations that come before it, and reject candidates whose record does not reflect a commitment to constitutional rights."

Earthjustice Criticizes Efforts to Rush Judicial Confirmations; Senators Expected to Call for Accelerated Confirmation Schedule in Response to Terrorist Attacks

Earthjustice
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Earthjustice called today's expected push from some members of Congress to accelerate the judicial nomination process, "flawed thinking and a dangerous precedent." At news conferences scheduled for today, several Senators, including Rick Santorum (R-PA), Jon Kyl (R-AZ), and Mitch McConnell (R-KY) are expected to call for rushing through judicial nominees in the name of national security.

"There is no real threat to national security in making sure that each life-long appointee is the right choice for the job," said Glenn Sugameli, senior legislative counsel for Earthjustice. "The nomination process for judges should not be compromised, and it's shameless that some in Congress might be attempting to use current events to achieve that goal."

Sugameli points out that the Senate Judiciary Committee is continuing to address judicial confirmations at a reasonable pace. The committee has paid special attention to district court nominees who would be most directly affected by any terrorism-related issues. In addition, magistrate judges who handle warrants and other key issues are not subject to Senate confirmation and are currently in place in sufficient numbers. Appeals court judges would not have the opportunity to hear terrorist-related cases for many months, if not years.

"The real danger would be a rush to judgment on lifetime judicial nominees who will decide whether to strike down or enforce safety, health, and environmental protections," said Sugameli. "The Senate is acting responsibly by approving judges after carefully considering each nominee's record on critical environmental and other issues. "

Once confirmed, federal judges hold their positions for life, suggesting that rash confirmations could be especially damaging. Environmental groups place particular importance on a sensible approach to reviewing nominees for the federal bench.

"For decades to come, newly confirmed judges will exert tremendous influence over the laws that protect our public health and environment," Sugameli said. "The confirmations should not be approached hastily."

Thurmond Jr, Three Judicial Nominees Confirmed

By Pierce
Congressional Quarterly
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The oldest and longest-serving senator saw his 28-year-old son confirmed as a U.S. attorney Tuesday." Strom Thurmond Jr. "won voice vote approval from the Senate to take on his new position as U.S. attorney for South Carolina -- the state his 98-year-old father, Sen. Strom Thurmond, R, has served for nearly 47 years." The younger Thurmond "was considered an odd choice by some because he has barely three years experience as an assistant state prosecutor, but his father helped him out by recommending to President Bush that his son be nominated." The Senate also "confirmed 10 other U.S. attorney nominations by voice vote, including that of Drew Wrigley to serve in the district of North Dakota. Wrigley previously served as the executive director of the North Dakota Republican Party during the 2000 election, in which Bush won 61 percent of that state's vote." The Senate also voted 100-0 Tuesday "to confirm the nomination of Christina Armijo to be a U.S. District judge for New Mexico. By 98-0 votes, the Senate confirmed Karon Bowdre to be U.S. District judge for Northern Alabama and Stephen Friot to be U.S. District judge for Western Oklahoma."

Kuhl May Be Boxed In On Circuit Hopes

By Jason Hoppin
The Recorder
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Sen. Barbara Boxer has not consented to a hearing on Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals nominee Carolyn Kuhl, and with each passing day it appears more likely that the California Democrat may block Kuhl's nomination.

Boxer still has not returned a "blue slip" on Kuhl, the paperwork circulated to home state senators for comment on a nominee. Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein returned her blue slip a month ago, but under Senate rules both blue slips must be returned before a nominee gets a hearing.

"All I can tell you is that she has not issued a new statement," said Boxer's chief of staff, Sam Chapman, when asked whether the senator has decided what to do about the nomination. He was referring to Boxer's criticism of Kuhl's record following her nomination by President Bush in June. Conservatives have been quick to draw conclusions about Boxer's plans.

"She wants to keep her off the bench," said Tom Jipping, director of the Center for Law and Democracy. "It's not rocket science."

The delay could set the stage for Boxer to be the first Democrat to draw a line in the sand on any of Bush's appellate court nominees.

Kuhl declined to comment.

Boxer, who was instrumental in forcing Rep. Christopher Cox, R-Newport Beach, to withdraw his name from consideration for the Ninth Circuit, first received Kuhl's blue slip in July, but has not publicly stated her intentions.

Several abortion rights groups have organized opposition to Kuhl. "That's certainly a key issue," Chapman said.

For the Ninth Circuit, whose nominees have often been the subject of political gamesmanship, it's deja vu all over again. A second pending nominee, Hawaii lawyer Richard Clifton, is also waiting for a hearing.

Both Hawaii senators and Feinstein have consented to hearings for the nominees from their respective states, although the Democrat-controlled Senate Judiciary Committee has been slow to schedule hearings.

But all three senators reserved judgment -- the only senators to have done so. All other blue slips returned were marked "approved."

Many of those nominees are also waiting for hearings, and Republicans and Democrats blame each other for the delays.

Of President Bush's 60 judicial nominees, 12 have been approved. There are 106 vacancies nationwide.

"From the Republican standpoint, we want to move these judges as soon as possible," said Margarita Tapia, a spokeswoman for Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary Committee.

REV_00073122

An American Bar Association committee voted unanimously to give Clifton a qualified rating. Kuhl was given a well-qualified rating by a substantial majority of the committee, with the remainder giving her a qualified rating.

The controversy over Kuhl, a Los Angeles Superior Court judge who earned praise for her work on the bench there, stems largely from her work as a Justice Department lawyer under President Ronald Reagan.

Kuhl argued in support of parental notification rules for the distribution of birth control to teen-agers, tax-exempt status for Bob Jones University (which was then racially segregated), and most significantly, in a 1986 _amicus curiae _brief to the U.S. Supreme Court, that _Roe v. Wade_ should be overturned.

"We have no confidence that she's changed her position," said Belle Taylor-McGhee, executive director of the California Abortion & Reproductive Rights Action League.

CARAL is among several abortion-rights groups actively opposing Kuhl's nomination. Taylor-McGhee said CARAL has expressed its concerns to both California senators.

"Check with her office. I think that Barbara Boxer is considering withholding the blue slip," Taylor-McGhee said.

Jipping, the conservative court-watcher, said that Boxer has argued that judicial candidates should not be judged by their work for clients, which he likens to Kuhl's work for an administration that was against abortion. "The hypocrisy is mind-boggling," he said.

The Justice Department reiterated its support for Kuhl's nomination. "Judge Kuhl is a balanced and well-reasoned judge who enjoys widespread bipartisan support," said spokeswoman Lori Rabjohns. "So we call on the committee to give Judge Kuhl a hearing."

Boxer signaled that she took issue with Kuhl's record when Bush announced her nomination.

"I have received numerous statements of opposition to the nomination of Judge Kuhl," Boxer said in a June statement. "These letters and calls raise a number of issues important to Californians, including the right to choose, civil rights, representation of tobacco companies, privacy rights and whistle-blower protection."

"I have met with Judge Kuhl and the White House counsel, informed them of these issues, and I am continuing to evaluate this nomination."

Clifton's nomination has also been the subject of political dealings, although he appears more likely to get a hearing in the near future.

Both Hawaii senators signed off on a hearing before the August congressional recess. In July, Clifton received the Hawaii State Bar Association's highest recommendation.

But Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, wrote a letter to the Judiciary Committee questioning why President
Clinton's Ninth Circuit nominee from Hawaii, James Duffy, was never approved despite waiting years for a vote.

"Based on the information that was made available to me when former President Clinton nominated Mr. Duffy, I gather that his character is without blemish, and that he received the highest assessments by both the American Bar Association and the Hawaii State Bar Association," Inouye wrote. "Thus, if he has been removed for consideration in spite of his qualifications, I would appreciate an explanation."

The Ninth Circuit does not have an active judge sitting in Hawaii, despite rules that at least one judge must sit in each of the nine states within its confines.

Several news reports have indicated that Inouye may be seeking a district court nomination for Duffy. His office did not comment.

"At this time all I can say is that the senator is prepared to allow [Clifton's] nomination to go forward," said Inouye spokeswoman Sandi Skousen, adding that Inouye wants to review Clifton's FBI report before making any decisions.

Under President Clinton, several nominees were subjected to long delays -- notably, Marsha Berzon and Richard Paez.

They waited two years and four years, respectively, before being confirmed over objections that they were too liberal. Both were approved by a divided Senate after Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., kept a promise to give them a vote.

Berzon's nomination proceeded only after Boxer held up one of Lott's appointments to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

A memo obtained by the _Chicago Tribune_ indicates that this week Senate Republicans will blame the dilatory pace of judicial confirmations on Democrats and accuse them of impeding the nation's efforts to fight terrorism.

"Our message would be: You can't get wiretaps, search warrants, etc., without judges; confirm the president's slate so that efforts to capture terrorists won't be delayed," the memo was quoted as saying.

Only one other blue slip has not been returned. Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., has withheld a hearing on Fourth Circuit nominee Terrence Boyle. An Edwards spokesman said the senator wants to insure that a subsequent Fourth Circuit nominee will "balance" Boyle out, whom Edwards regards as too conservative.

Senate Confirms M. Christina Armijo as U.S. District Judge

The Associated Press
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The product of a family with a history of judgeships in N.M., Armijo becomes a federal judge

The U.S. Senate on Tuesday unanimously confirmed M. Christina Armijo as a new federal judge for New Mexico.

Armijo of Las Vegas, N.M., received a 100-0 vote. She had been recommended by Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., and nominated by President Bush in August. Both Domenici and Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., spoke in support of her confirmation. The nomination won a favorable recommendation last week of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "I think it's wonderful that the first federal judge we confirm for our state under the Bush administration is a well-qualified, Hispanic woman from northern New Mexico, " Domenici said.

He said he was confident she would have "a distinguished career" on the federal bench.

Armijo, a judge on the state Court of Appeals since 1996, comes from a family with a history of judgeships. Her grandfather, Judge Luis E. Armijo, was one of the longest-serving trial judges in state history. Her uncle also served on the bench.

"I was pleased to offer my strong support for Christina Armijo. In her years on the New Mexico Court of Appeals, she has earned a reputation for being a fair judge and has served the people of New Mexico well. I am confident that she will continue her good service to our state," Bingaman said.

She is a 1975 graduate of the University of New Mexico law school. She served in private practice and as a public defender before joining the Court of Appeals. She is also a former member of the New Mexico Health Policy Commission and New Mexico Endowment for the Humanities.

Domenici said the Senate Judiciary Committee was expected to consider two other New Mexico judicial nominations Thursday -- William "Chip" Johnson of Roswell as a U.S. District Judge and former New Mexico judge Harris Hartz of Albuquerque for appointment to the 10th U.S.

Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver.

Judiciary Committee Sends Wooten Nomination to Full Senate

The Associated Press
Thursday, November 8, 2001

The U.S. Senate approved the nomination of Terry L. Wooten on Thursday to the U.S. District Court for South Carolina.

Wooten, a U.S. magistrate in South Carolina, was recommended for the judgeship by Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., who is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "Judge Wooten will be an excellent addition to the District Court," Thurmond said. "He has had an outstanding legal career with an excellent record as a prosecutor and judge in South Carolina."

Wooten had been accused of leaking confidential material for a book on the Clarence Thomas hearings in 1991. During the hearings on Thomas' nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court, Wooten worked for Thurmond as the committee's chief Republican counsel.

David Brock, the book's author, says he received "raw FBI files" from Wooten that he used for an article and a book aimed at discrediting Anita Hill and another woman, Angela Wright, who accused Thomas of sexual harassment.

Wooten called the accusation "absolutely 100 percent untrue."

Oklahoma City Attorney Confirmed as Federal Judge

The Daily Oklahoman
Wednesday, November 7, 2001

The Senate on Tuesday confirmed Stephen P. Friot to be a federal judge in the Western District, which is based in Oklahoma City.

Friot became the third Oklahoman nominated by President Bush to be confirmed as a U.S. district judge. The first two, Claire V. Egan and James H. Payne, were confirmed last month for the federal districts in Tulsa and Muskogee.

Friot's nomination passed 19-0 last week in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

A partner in the Oklahoma City law firm of Spradling, Alpern, Friot and Gum, Friot has been in private practice since 1972.

A 1987 book ranking top lawyers in the United States included Friot among the Oklahomans.

REV_00073126

He is a past president of the Oklahoma County Bar Association.

In the past 10 years, Friot has donated $ 1,000 total to Sen. Don Nickles, R-Ponca City, who recommended Friot to Bush.

Friot has also served charitable causes in the area and the state, such as helping to raise money for legal services for the poor.

The Judiciary Committee is scheduled to hold a hearing today on the nomination of Joe Heaton, who is also in line for a judgeship in the Western District. Heaton is a federal prosecutor and former state House member from Oklahoma City.

Senate Confirms Nominee for Birmingham Judgeship

The Associated Press
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

The U.S. Senate confirmed the appointments of two U.S. Attorneys and a district judge for Alabama on Tuesday.

Leura Garrett Canary will become the U.S. attorney for Montgomery, and Alice Martin will take up that role in the northern district of Alabama. Karon Bowdre will preside on the U.S. District Court in Birmingham.

Canary, a veteran state and federal prosecutor, fills the post held by Redding Pitt during the Clinton Administration. Pitt is the new state Democratic Party chairman.

Canary was an assistant state attorney general from 1981 to 1990, a trial attorney with the U.S. Justice Department in Washington, D.C., from 1990 to 1994 and an assistant U.S. attorney for the Middle District in Montgomery since 1994.

Martin replaces Doug Jones, who prosecuted the 1963 Birmingham church bombing cases earlier this year.

Martin, 45, has served as Lauderdale County Circuit Court judge and was appointed by Alabama's two Republican senators, Richard Shelby and Jeff Sessions.

Bowdre, 46, succeeds U.S. District Judge Sam Pointer Jr., who went on senior status in November 1999. She is a Cumberland School of Law professor and will serve in a lifetime slot on the court.

Senate Confirms Hicks as Judge

REV_00073127

By Doug Abrahms
Gannett News Service
Tuesday, November 6, 2001

Originally chosen by former President Bush in 1992, Hicks had not made it through the Senate approval process before Bill Clinton was elected president and the Democratic administration gained control of appointing judges. Being approved unanimously by the full Senate Monday, Hicks clears the last hurdle in becoming a U.S. District Court judge.

"Larry Hicks wanted this job for a long time. He was almost nominated before," said Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Hicks -- a civil attorney at the law firm McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich & Hicks -- was nominated by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev. Hicks was elected Washoe County district attorney in the 1975.

"In the legal community, receiving a presidential nomination to a federal judgeship is one of the highest honors," Ensign said in introducing Hicks' nomination to the full Senate. "Mr. Hicks now has the honor of receiving such a nomination twice."

Hicks started working as deputy district attorney in Washoe County in 1968 and became chief criminal deputy district attorney in 1971. He received his bachelor's degree from the University of Nevada, Reno, in 1965, but received his law degree the University of Colorado School of Law.

"While Larry left Nevada for a few years to receive his legal education, Nevadans don't hold it against him as we did not yet have a law school of our own to accommodate his studies," Ensign said.

Larry Hicks, who lost out on a federal judgeship in 1992 and waited almost 10 years for another chance, was confirmed 83-0 by the U.S. Senate on Monday to join the U.S. District Court in Nevada.

Hicks, his family and partners in his Reno law firm watched on C-SPAN as senators approved him to a lifetime job in the federal judiciary after a 30-year career mostly spent in civil litigation.

'I had quite a cheering section, and at the end someone showed up with a bottle of champagne,' Hicks said after the vote. Hicks, 57, said he expects to begin work within several weeks in Nevada's expanding judiciary. He becomes the sixth full-time federal judge in the state, with a nominee for a final vacancy, Clark County District Judge James Mahan, still awaiting Senate action.

Congress in its 1999-2000 session added three seats to the Nevada District Court, one of the faster-growing districts in the country.

Federal district judges are paid $ 145,100 a year.

Hicks will be based in Las Vegas, although he also will draw some cases from Northern Nevada and hear them in Reno. He said he and his wife, Marianne, are house-shopping in Las Vegas and also plan to keep their home in Northern Nevada.

'He's going to be an outstanding addition,' said Nevada's chief U.S. District Judge Howard McKibben. 'He's held in high esteem by the bench and by the bar.'

Since 1979, Hicks has been a partner in the statewide firm of McDonald, Carano, Wilson, McCune, Bergin, Frankovich and Hicks. He has been chairman of the firm's litigation section for the past 16 years.

He began his legal career in 1971 as a deputy district attorney in Washoe County, and was the county's district attorney from 1974 to 1978.

In 1992, Hicks was proposed for a federal judgeship by Rep. Barbara Vucanovich, R-Nev. His nomination was sent to the Senate that June by President George Bush. But as the presidential election approached that year, the Senate effectively froze most nominations, and Hicks lost out when Bush was ousted by Bill Clinton.

But after George W. Bush became president, Hicks was nominated to the bench earlier this year by Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev.

Ensign and Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., praised Hicks before senators voted Monday.

Committee Hears Nomination for Kansas Federal Judgeship

for Kansas federal judgeship

A former prosecutor who exposed police corruption in Kansas City, Kan., moved closer to becoming a federal trial judge by testifying Wednesday before the Senate panel weighing her nomination.

Julie A. Robinson, 44, currently a federal bankruptcy judge, appeared before the Senate Judiciary Committee as President Bush's nominee to U.S. District Court in Kansas. She was among three candidates chosen by Republican Sen. Sam Brownback and recommended by both Brownback and Republican Sen. Pat Roberts.

The same committee recently helped shape a sweeping new anti-terrorism law in response to the Sept. 11 attacks. Responding to questions about the legislation, Robinson said that while the Supreme Court has safeguarded civil liberties, "at the same time, this country is facing a serious problem."

Appearing with a half-dozen other nominees, Robinson kept her answers succinct and declined to speak with reporters after the hearing.

Brownback, who attended law school with Robinson at the University of Kansas, told fellow committee members that besides her background, Robinson is "qualified by her heart, by what all she's already done and the pedigree she has."

Her family settled as newly freed slaves in the 1860s in Kansas, Brownback said. Her late father served in Korea and Vietnam, he noted, and her mother, Charlene, served as a nurse practitioner for the Defense Department and Veterans Administration.

Roberts said the judiciary needs people who understand the human element of the law because rulings affect not only the parties in a case but future litigants as well.

"Unforeseen lives can be changed drastically by a single opinion," Roberts said. "With so many changes occurring in the law, we need judges such as Julie Robinson who grasp this concept."

The proceeding was interrupted during Roberts' remarks by the collapse of Robinson's 82-year-old aunt, Ruth, who was taken by ambulance to a local hospital. Her family said later she was fine and was resting at home.

As assistant U.S. attorney for 10 years in the 1980s and 1990s, Robinson waged a high-profile pursuit of public corruption, drug conspiracy, tax fraud and white collar crime. By 1990 her work had shifted exclusively to criminal cases, and she personally prosecuted cases for the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Internal Revenue Service, Secret Service and other agencies in federal court.

Her investigations of official corruption in Wyandotte County included the conviction of the sheriff's son after the FBI raided an illegal gambling hall; two defendants were deputy sheriffs stationed as lookouts and bodyguards.

She prosecuted a major crack cocaine distribution ring that resulted in four convictions, including that of a Kansas City, Kan., police officer who acted as a watchdog for drug dealers and stored the proceeds of their drug sales at his home.

Robinson also prosecuted one of the government's largest tax cases ever, winning convictions of 10 people who, operating as the International Business Association, created phony domestic and foreign trusts to conceal millions of dollars of taxable income. She also successfully prosecuted an Overland Park, Kan., travel agent for a phony ticket scheme that cheated airlines of $600,000 in just six weeks.

Robinson's job as a U.S. bankruptcy judge since 1994 carries a considerably lower profile. She has ruled in at least 276 cases involving debtors and payments to their creditors.

In written answers to questions from the committee, Robinson provided a two page description of her views on "judicial activism," a term frequently used by conservative Republicans in criticizing judges for too broadly interpreting the law.

"The people delegated lesser powers to the judicial branch," Robinson wrote, "precisely because the judiciary lacks electoral responsibility."

Robinson also submitted a detailed accounting of her finances, which is required by law to ensure judges have no conflicts of interest with their monetary holdings. She reported net worth of $474,590, which includes a $425,000 house in Leawood, Kan., as well as investments and stocks in various companies, mostly in telecommunications and only one, Bank of America, worth more than $1,000.

She listed liabilities of $317,500, mostly from a $280,000 home mortgage and accounts and bills due.

Senate GOP Exploits War on Terrorism to Promote Right-Wing Judges

People for the American Way
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Senate Republicans are holding press conferences on November 8, 2001, to push a strategy leaked earlier that week to demand fast-track approval of Bush administration judicial nominees, and to argue that such action is purportedly crucial to the war on terrorism. If the press conference follows the script reported earlier in the week, senators will claim, with White House approval, that not rushing approval of President Bush's judicial nominees would somehow prevent law enforcement officials from getting wiretaps and search warrants essential to identifying terrorists.

REV_00073147

People For the American Way Foundation President Ralph G. Neas said that such a plan, if true, was "dishonest and disgraceful."

Neas said search warrants and wiretaps go before magistrates or federal district court judges, and noted that the administration has submitted nominees for less than one-third of the current district court vacancies. As of November 7, there were 70 district court vacancies and the administration had submitted only 23 nominations for those spots. Five district court vacancies in New York and New Jersey are included among the 47 with no nominees. "If there's a problem with getting district court judges in place to assist law enforcement officials, that problem is not in the Senate," said Neas.

"Senate Republican leaders should be ashamed to distort the truth and misuse the national commitment to fighting terrorism in this blatant fashion," said Neas. "The right wing's number one goal for this administration is to pack the federal judiciary with far right ideologues. They are now trying to use the war on terrorism to promote that agenda."

Neas said some senators have already said that supporting the war on terrorism requires a rubber stamp approach to Bush administration judicial nominees, and have claimed that Senate Democrats have unfairly delayed consideration of his nominees. Both claims are false, Neas said.

A recent PFAW Foundation report debunked GOP complaints about the current confirmation process; indeed, confirmations have outpaced the first year of the first Bush administration in 1989 and by the end of the year will likely be comparable to 1993, the first year of the Clinton administration. In fact, as of yesterday, the Senate had confirmed 16 of President Bush's judicial nominees, more than the 15 confirmed in the entire first year of the first Bush administration. With respect to the district courts, President Bush has nominated 35 judges, and 12 of those have already been confirmed. Of the 23 remaining nominees, nine have already had confirmation hearings. This is in spite of the fact that 13 of these nominations were not even made until September or later.

Neas noted that the Bush administration's apparent priority for judicial nominees has been to the federal appeals courts. The same far-right senators who led an unprecedented blockade against Clinton's appeals court nominees - stopping nearly half of Clinton's appeals court nominees between 1995 and 2000 - are now calling for immediate action on Bush nominees while complaining that Bush's nominees have received unfair treatment.

PFAWF's recent report noted that by the end of this administration, every one of the 13 circuit courts of appeal could be dominated by Republican nominees. If those nominees are predominantly right-wing ideologues, the consequences for Americans' constitutional rights and civil liberties could be disastrous and long lasting.

Today Neas reiterated his call for President Bush to engage in genuine bipartisan consultation in an unprecedented solution to this unprecedented situation with the courts. He also said, "The Senate must resist the politics of intimidation, carry out its constitutional obligation to carefully consider the nominations that come before it, and reject candidates whose record does not reflect a commitment to constitutional rights."

Earthjustice Criticizes Efforts to Rush Judicial Confirmations; Senators Expected to Call for Accelerated Confirmation Schedule in Response to Terrorist Attacks

Earthjustice
Thursday, November 8, 2001

Earthjustice called today's expected push from some members of Congress to accelerate the judicial nomination process, "flawed thinking and a dangerous precedent." At news conferences scheduled for today, several Senators, including Rick Santorum (R-PA), Jon Kyl (R-AZ), and Mitch McConnell (R-KY) are expected to call for rushing through judicial nominees in the name of national security.

"There is no real threat to national security in making sure that each life-long appointee is the right choice for the job," said Glenn Sugameli, senior legislative counsel for Earthjustice. "The nomination process for judges should not be compromised, and it's shameless that some in Congress might be attempting to use current events to achieve that goal."

Sugameli points out that the Senate Judiciary Committee is continuing to address judicial confirmations at a reasonable pace. The committee has paid special attention to district court nominees who would be most directly affected by any terrorism-related issues. In addition, magistrate judges who handle warrants and other key issues are not subject to Senate confirmation and are currently in place in sufficient numbers. Appeals court judges would not have the opportunity to hear terrorist-related cases for many months, if not years.

"The real danger would be a rush to judgment on lifetime judicial nominees who will decide whether to strike down or enforce safety, health, and environmental protections," said Sugameli. "The Senate is acting responsibly by approving judges after carefully considering each nominee's record on critical environmental and other issues. "

Once confirmed, federal judges hold their positions for life, suggesting that rash confirmations could be especially damaging. Environmental groups place particular importance on a sensible approach to reviewing nominees for the federal bench.

"For decades to come, newly confirmed judges will exert tremendous influence over the laws that protect our public health and environment," Sugameli said. "The confirmations should not be approached hastily."
